Mark Eisenegger

Further Readings

Dayan, D., & Katz, E. (1992). Media events: The live broadcasting of history. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Eisenegger, M. (2003). Kommunikationsereignisse or Issues—die Elementarteilchen sozialwissenschaftlicher Öffentlichkeitsforschung [Communications events or issues—the elementary particles of social-scientific research into the public sphere]. In M. L. Meier et al. (Eds.), Politik als Lernprozess? Wissenszentrierte Ansätze der Politikanalyse [Politics as a learning process? Knowledge-centered approaches to political analysis] (pp. 167–196). Opladen: Leske + Budrich.

Imhof, K. (1993). Vermessene Öffentlichkeit—vermessene Forschung? Vorstellung eines Projekts [Presumptuous public sphere—presumptuous research? Presentation of a project]. In K. Imhof et al. (Eds.), Zwischen Konflikt and Konkordanz. Analyse von media eventsn in der Schweiz der Vor- and Zwischenkriegszeit [Between conflict and concordance: Analysis of media events in Switzerland in the prewar and interwar periods] (pp. 11–60). Zurich: Seismo.

Weichert, S. A. (2006). Die Krise als Medienereignis. Über den 11. September im deutschen Fernsehen [Crisis as a media event: September 11 on German TV]. Cologne: Herbert von Halem Verlag.

Media Feeding Frenzy

The notion of a media feeding frenzy is a metaphor describing a type of media hype, or sometimes any form of media hype. It is a value-laden term, almost always used to criticize media interest in a particular matter at a particular time as exaggerated or detrimental or illegitimate. The notion has won currency in the United States in political communication after Larry J. Sabato's book Feeding Frenzy appeared in 1991, and subsequent media attention and behavior toward such stories as Governor Bill Clinton's marital infidelity (the Gennifer Flowers affair) and draft evasion in his 1992 presidential campaign seemed to affirm the necessity for such a term.

Sabato defines a media feeding frenzy as "the press coverage attending any political event or circumstance where a critical mass of journalists leap to cover the same embarrassing or scandalous subject and pursue it intensely, often excessively, and sometimes uncontrollably." The term press coverage in this definition is misleading in two respects. First, media feeding frenzies are a phenomenon of the television age, and second, they are not restricted to the coverage of matters in the realm of events but also show the journalists at work, with images such as a multitude of microphones, lights, and cameras, reporters shouting impolitely at politicians (who are otherwise treated respectfully), press conferences being turned into tribunals, politicians helplessly trying to dodge questions. The visibility of these elements make media feeding frenzies public spectacles, and the chance to watch the predators hunt their prey makes the metaphor of a media feeding frenzy compelling and appealing.

Another, more simple definition comes from Clem Lloyd and highlights the consequences: A media feeding frenzy is the "concentration by a media pack on a particular person or event. This process has the power to destroy careers and people."

The metaphor has several qualities that make it useful, despite its value-laden nature. First, a feeding frenzy in nature distinguishes the roles of predator and prey, roles taken by journalists and politicians, respectively, when the biological phenomenon is used as a metaphor. This implies that journalists stop to be messengers who relate events happening without their doing, and become, visible to all, the major actors in the process, the actual driving force. Second, the prey (politicians) is without a chance. Of course, there are many instances in which victims have politically survived a media feeding frenzy, but they have certainly not been unharmed. Third, in a feeding frenzy in nature, something on the inside of the prey is revealed when nothing but the skeleton remains. Revealing something usually hidden from view also moves the journalists' feeding frenzy. What is to be revealed can be a certain behavior or character trait or weakness. Fourth, feeding frenzies in nature often befall a collective, a shoal, a pack of hunting animals. The media feeding frenzy also needs a critical mass of journalists acting in a similar manner. To describe similar collective behavior among journalists, another metaphor (also taken from biology) is often used: pack journalism. Fifth, behavior in frenzied predators appears to be highly concentrated on the prey, physical, driven by primordial instinct. Journalists in a media feeding frenzy often show a lack of proportion, or thoughtfulness, or restraint, or rationality, which is especially noticeable in hindsight.

Media feeding frenzies appear to be linked to typical subject matters: information on a politician's intimate life, drug use, trivia from their personal lives (Senator Gary Hart's age and name change discussed in the 1984 presidential campaign), thoughtless remarks (Senator John Kerry's comment about education versus getting "stuck in Iraq" during the 2006 congressional campaign). Sometimes a suspected breach of law is involved (Edward Kennedy and Chappaquiddick), and sometimes larger and complex scandals such as Watergate or Iran-Contra breed various feeding frenzies.

The advent of media feeding frenzies is often associated with a turn from a tame or "lapdog" journalism of the Franklin D. Roosevelt up to the John F. Kennedy presidencies, to a watchful journalism that took seriously its function to control those in power and that troubled the administrations of Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard M. Nixon, and then to the attack journalism as has been known since the Reagan presidency. It is also associated with a shift in the subject matter of prevalent political scandals, from the substantive such as bribery or abuse of power to gaffes, character issues, and matters of lifestyle.

To date, there is no theory of media feeding frenzies. It is therefore hard to predict when they will erupt. Certain situational factors seem to increase their chance to happen: a sudden thrust of a politician into national prominence by a nomination (e.g., for vice president), frustration of journalists with an administration, a large discrepancy between politicians' public stands and their private behavior, a connection of a politician's behavior to an established issue or a latent theme in discourse. An important aspect to be also considered is the role of other politicians: The opposing party, or rivals within a politician's own party, may expect to profit from a media frenzy and do what they can to feed it further.

Media feeding frenzy in a narrow sense refers to journalists hunting a politician (or other social actor) for alleged misbehavior or unacceptable utterances. In a wider sense, the term is sometimes also used to refer to any wave of media attention that seems to be inflated. Prominent examples that have been criticized as feeding frenzies include alarmist news coverage of risks, such as BSE (mad cow disease), vaccination risks, or global warming. In the use of "feeding frenzy" for such cases, however, much of the metaphorical appeal of the term (when used for the hunt of politicians) gets lost. Therefore it is suggested that the notion be reserved to its narrow sense and consider it a subtype of news waves or media hypes. Conceptualizing other such subtypes and theorizing about media hypes in general has yet to be done.

Uwe Hartung

See also Checkers Speech; Clinton, William Jefferson; Ferraro, Geraldine; Hart, Gary; Political Scandal; Quayle, Dan; Sabato, Larry

Further Readings

Sabato, L. (1991). Feeding frenzy: How attack journalism has transformed American politics. New York: Free Press.

Vasterman, P. L. M. (2005). Media hype: Self-reinforcing news waves, journalistic standards and the construction of social problems. European Journal of Communication, 20, 508–530.

Media Logic

From a very general point of view, media logic is a concept that indicates the influence of the media (considered as both a cultural technology and an organization) on the representation of the events that we consider "reality." This representation follows the logics and the formats that are typical of media language and organizational practices, such as the ways the contents are organized and put together, the styles in which they are presented, and the grammar (syntax, semantics, and pragmatics) of mass media communication.

In this broader sense, media logic is the combination of several technological, organizational, and cultural elements. The most important element characterizing media logic is the commercial logic (which involves the commercialization both of media organizations and of society), followed by such elements as the industrial logic (the media are an important industry), the technological logic (referring to the importance of technologies in producing and reproducing contents), the cultural logic, and the political logic (the relationship between media system and political system).

The media logic involves a particular way of presenting events: according to it, media narratives and images need to focus on symbolic objects and personalities rather than abstract conceptualizations. Media narratives—both in news and entertainment products—show reality through the use of objects, persons, and characters who play a role within the story. For example, the narration of a war consists of the personalization (or the "objectification") of the hero, the villain, and the victim. Even a natural disaster is best presented if the event is narrated as a story (with an original order, the breaking of this order, and the final recomposition), with the use of clear symbols for both the causes (including what we could call a "blaming process" of the natural or human responsible) and the victims (by interviewing the survivors or the siblings of the victims themselves). The rhetorical use of symbolization in almost every narrative pattern is quite common in most historical ages and in most cultures and societies, starting from the ancient mythological tales (which accounted for the origins of society and the reality phenomena). Within the wider context of the media narratives, the media logic patterns can be found in nearly every medium and genre, from the global media sport stars to the various "freak shows" that fill the daytime and primetime talk shows. This way of narrating reality through the media is consistent with the constraints of the "news values," which impose a palatable "media material" for the reporting of stories and the presentation of the issues. Thus, media logic is also a journalistic style, based on the focus on characters playing a role within a narrative.

From a political communication perspective, media logic influences political institutions in different respects: people (candidates, politicians, and leaders) have become more important than parties; the attention has moved from the local and regional to the national (and the global); the news values influence the actions of the political parties; during the electoral campaigns, the horse race has become more important than the issues and the questions at stake.

As observed, in the case of news media, the political action is best represented by a person or a symbol that literally embodies the issue or the institution. From this point of view, media logic has the cognitive function of reducing the political complexity, that is, to concentrate the political action and the political leadership on a single symbolic aspect is to reduce the cognitive complexity of the social environment for the social actor/citizen/elector. This reduction is of a particular kind, as it reduces what is hard to comprehend to what is comprehensible in an affective way. In short, symbolization acts as what is called an "information shortcut," that is, a simplification of perception of politics. In these terms, media logic is part of a cognitive strategy based on an instrumental and "economic" use of political information, a "low-information rationality."

The media logic is considered also as opposed to "political" or "party logic," in that it challenges the traditional dominance in several political arenas of the political imperatives that have for long conditioned the growth of the media industry and the professional conduct of news reporting. In the early stages of political communication the media system tended to align to partisan loyalties. Especially the news media were subservient to political ideologies and dynamics. Media logic is also the driving force of the process of mediatization of politics. It involves a series of effects on the ways politics and political communication are performed by both the political players and the media institutions. These effects have been identified with the "spectacularization" or "dramatization" of the political performance, a clear response to the show-biz demands of today's media industry. Another effect is the mentioned "personalization," that is, the emphasis on the individual political players, represented with their personal idiosyncrasies, a trend that is linked also to the "winnowing" effect, or the selection of political candidates on the basis of their media-savvy attributes. The "sound bite" approach of much political news coverage as well as the capacity of the media to set the agenda of political debate are also implications of the expanding scope of the media logic in the relations between media and politics.

The whole process of mediatization of politics by way of the media logic highlights a preeminence of the media over politics in contemporary society, when politics must go public. The obliged passage under the media spotlights in order to reach voters, citizens, audiences entails an adaptation of political language and ultimately of political logics to the imperatives and constraints (and production formats) of the media complex.

Gianpietro Mazzoleni

Further Readings

Altheide, D. L., & Snow, R. P. (1979). Media logic. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Brants, K., & van Praag, Ph. (2006). Signs of media logic: Half a century of political communication in the Netherlands. Javnost—The Public, 13, 25–40.

Mazzoleni, G. (1987). Media logic and party logic in campaign coverage: The Italian general election of 1983. European Journal of Communication, 2, 81–103.

Mazzoleni, G., & Schulz, W. (1999). "Mediatization" of politics: A challenge for democracy? Political Communication, 16, 247–261.

MEDIATED POLITICAL REALITIES

In Mediated Political Realities (1983, 1990), Dan Nimmo and James E. Combs discuss the role of fantasy, defined as a credible story containing actors, plots, scenes, acts, styles, motives, and sanctioning agents, in the construction of political realities. The authors argue political realities are rarely the result of direct, firsthand experiences with political events. Instead, what people know about politics is mediated, that is, the result of indirect, secondhand information constructed through the media logic of fantasy.

The book emphasizes the social aspects of fantasy building. Individuals have their own fantasies about how the world works, but humans, as social beings, share these fantasies with others. These fantasies are either rejected and die or are accepted and confirmed by others. Acceptance and confirmation lead to larger numbers of people sharing a similar fantasy, which creates a social reality. The book's structure reflects the individual and group aspects of fantasy building by discussing mass-mediated politics and group-mediated politics.

Mass-mediated politics discusses the political realities constructed through the fantasies of television news, presidential campaigns, docudramas, celebrity, movies, and popular sports. The fantasies of television news revolve around celebrations, crises, conquests, crimes, and contests. The contest fantasy of presidential campaigns relies upon suspense, uncertainty, and spontaneity to build audience interest. Docudramas dramatize political pasts, presents, and futures, while celebrity provides fantasies about popularity and public scorn. Movies, whether or not blatantly political, mediate political realities through what Nimmo and Combs call "rituals of power," fantasies about the nature and consequences of power. Popular sports mediate fantasies about the relationship between good sportsmanship and good citizenship.

Group-mediated politics focuses on the fantasies of groups like political elites, inside-dopesters, religious movements, and conspiracy theorists. In discussing the nature of decision making by political elites, Nimmo and Combs equate groupthink with fantasy building. Inside-dopesters, with their perceived special knowledge and expertise, mediate the fantasy that politics is a mystery, and they possess the key to the mystery. Religious movements such as the Christian Right mediate political realities through fantasies of America as the redeemer nation that fights evil at home and abroad, and through the fantasy of apocalypse, the end is near unless America repents and returns to God. These fantasies have been used to justify political actions and to endorse public officials. Conspiracy theories, with fantasies of political elites who manipulate events for their own benefit while keeping the public in the dark, are stories about good versus evil that remind people about the potential of power to corrupt.

The importance of this book rests with its emphasis on fantasy as the means for mediating political information and realities. Understanding the mediated nature of political realities raises awareness about the nature of one's own consumption of and management of political information.

Kaylene Barbe

See also Bormann, Ernest; Dramatistic Approaches to Political Communication; Fantasy Theme Analysis; Group Decision Making, Political; Lippmann, Walter; Symbolic Convergence Theory

Further Readings

Nimmo, D., & Combs, J. E. (1983). Mediated political realities. New York: Longman.

Nimmo D., & Combs, J. E. (1990). Mediated political realities (2nd ed.). New York: Longman.

MEDIATIZATION

Even if the term mediatization refers to a broader set of societal phenomena, in the scholarly literature it is commonly associated with the media-driven process that affects politics and political communication patterns.

The mass media have brought about significant changes in several precincts of contemporary society, such as extension, substitution, amalgamation, and accommodation. Television especially has been credited to have deeply shaped today's public and individual life.

Since their diffusion the press and the broadcasting media have molded the way politics is performed in the different political arenas around the world, to different extents and at a different pace.

Conceptually, mediatization means something more extensive than the related concept of mediation. Beside playing the role of "mediator" between political institutions and the citizenry, the media have increasingly become a key player in the political arena, to the point that today's politics is unimaginable without the presence and action of the media. Similar terms are those of "media politics," "mediated politics," all emphasizing the "media dependence" of most political action. It is not clear that this is true in all political environments. Some scholars prefer to speak in terms of "interdependence" of media and politics. One significant example is the one considered by T. E. Cook, who argues that political news can be seen as the result of a "negotiation of newsworthiness" between media and political institutions. In this sense "mediatization" is the effect of the encounter of two very diverse and often opposing logics, those of the "media complex" and those of the political system. While the media are themselves affected by, for example, legislation, pressures and/or symbiosis with political subjects, the media produce important changes in the political systems by way of imposing their languages on the communication patterns of political players. The dramatization of political events has been for centuries a feature of political action. In the era of the mass media, in contexts where media respond primarily to industrial and commercial imperatives, the drama dimension of politics takes the form of spectacularization, following the canons of show business. This is especially typical of "postmodern" election campaigns where image building, sensationalism, seduction, conflict are the communication tools of the candidates. Other effects of mediatization of politics can be seen in the phenomenon of sound bites, through which political discourse undergoes a simplification process to respond to the peculiar patterns of news reporting, and in the individualization/personalization of much political activity—as opposed to the traditional model of party-centered politics. The media narratives have a preference for stories in which the players are real persons with their own temperaments, idiosyncrasies, ideas, outlooks, better if capable of sparking controversy.

Further effects are the agenda-shaping and agenda-setting functions of the mass media. Besides often determining what are the issues of public relevance that eventually politicians are obliged to respond to, the media affect the positioning of certain issues and themes in the public opinion.

In brief, mediatization is a process that is implied in several media-politics relations.

Gianpietro Mazzoleni

Further Readings

Kepplinger, H. M. (2002). Mediatization of politics: Theory and data. Journal of Communication 52, 972–986.

Mazzoleni, G., & Schulz, W. (1999). "Mediatization" of politics: A challenge for democracy? Political Communication, 16, 247–261.

Schulz, W. (2004). Reconstructing mediatization as an analytical concept. European Journal of Communication, 19, 87–101.

MEDIUM IS THE MASSAGE, THE

See McLuhan, Marshall; Medium Theory

MEDIUM THEORY

Early writings on medium theory focus on the transition from primitive oral communication to written communication. The theory argues that writing transforms the meaning of words and lessens their vitality. The central proposition of medium theory is that the vehicle of communication itself has a significant influence on the nature and content of human communication.

Probably the most famous practitioner of medium theory is Marshall McLuhan. In the 1960s, McLuhan published a series of well-publicized books that brought worldwide attention to him as someone with a profound understanding of media and their impact on society. These works elaborated on the central principles of medium theory. Using the medium theory framework, McLuhan synthesized many diverse ideas. Drawing on critical cultural theory, such as political economy, the most central idea of his theory is that communication technology individually produces change in both cultural and social order.

In The Gutenberg Galaxy (1962), McLuhan discusses shifts in society from the print revolution, to the Industrial Revolution, to electronic media. According to McLuhan, the invention of movable type greatly accelerated and ultimately enabled cultural and cognitive changes that had already been taking place since the invention and implementation of the alphabet. The advent of print technology contributed and made possible the trends in the modern world such as individualism, capitalism democracy, Protestantism, and nationalism. New communication technology (alphabetic writing, printing press, electronic media) affect both cognition and social organization. McLuhan felt that electronic communications would move society from individualism to a collective understanding of the world in what he described as a "global village."

Based on the notion that ever-changing technologies shape the way messages are communicated, another important concept of medium theory is that of figure and ground. The basic premise is that the content of any medium is another medium. When a new medium is created, it will eventually overtake the medium from which it evolved. Thus, the older medium becomes a ground upon which the new medium is the figure. The old medium loses its original content and becomes the content of the new medium. Each medium, independent of its content, has its own effects, which are its unique message.

Medium theory also is intrinsically linked to the McLuhan aphorism, "The medium is the message." This concept was first laid out in Understanding Media (1964) and later in The Medium Is the Massage (1967). Here McLuhan explained that it was the medium and not the content itself that should be the focus of mass communication studies. Thus, what we say may not be as important as how we choose to deliver it.

McLuhan believed that the message is greatly impacted by the delivery system and by an individual's participation with that medium. He hypothesized that the degree of participation an individual must exert to experience media content varies by medium. He placed individual media into two categories "hot" and "cold" media. He explained that some media, such as movies, are "hot." Hot media demand a great deal of attention from the participant. They are well filled with data and offer a "high-definition" experience. The "hotter" the medium, the less the participant needs to interpret what is presented. Other media are "cold." For example, a comic book requires more conscious participation on the part of the individual. The user must fill in the missing information. McLuhan considered this a "low-definition" experience. Thus, the "cooler" the medium, the more the participant must engage in the medium both mentally and emotionally.

Possibly the ultimate in media determinism, medium theory indicates that the message is greatly impacted by the delivery system. The medium affects society, in which it plays a role, by the characteristics of the medium itself. Various media invite different degrees of participation. The degree to which one understands and experiences the content is dependent on the medium itself. Thus, as each medium affects the human sensory, the media serve as extensions of our senses, bodies, and minds.

Lori Melton McKinnon

See also McLuhan, Marshall

Further Readings

McLuhan, M. (1962). The Gutenberg galaxy: The making of typographic man. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.

McLuhan, M. (1964). Understanding media: The extensions of man. New York: McGraw-Hill. (Reprinted by Gingko Press, 2003)

McLuhan, M. (1967). The medium is the massage. New York: Random House. (Reprinted by Gingko Press, 2000)

Meyrowitz, J. (1985). No sense of place: The impact of electronic media on social behavior. New York: Oxford University Press.

Schwartz, T. (1973). The responsive chord. New York: Doubleday.

Meir, Golda (1898–1978)

Golda Meir was the fourth prime minister of Israel and one of its founders, serving in various public and political positions from the pre-state era through the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Meir was born Golda Mabovitz in Kiev, Ukraine (part of the Soviet Union at the time); she immigrated to the United States with her family at the age of 8. Influenced by her older sister's Zionist activities, Meir joined a Zionist youth movement and later became active in several other Zionist social circles. Meir immigrated to Palestine in 1921, joining Kibbutz Merhavia. After two years in the Kibbutz she left to Tel-Aviv and later to Jerusalem.

In 1924, Meir became an official of the Histadrut Trade Union. In 1928, she was elected secretary of the Women's Labor Council of the Histadrut. During the years 1932–1934 she worked as an envoy in the United States, serving as secretary of the Halutz (a Zionist women's organization); she also became secretary of the Histadrut's Action Committee, and later of its policy section. In 1946, Meir replaced Moshe Sharett as head of the Jewish Agency's Political Department. Later in this office she was active in fundraising in the United States to help cover the costs of the Israeli War of Independence, and became one of the state's most effective spokesmen.

In 1948, Meir was appointed member of the provisional government, and later Israel's ambassador to the Soviet Union. Elected to the Knesset in 1949, Meir became minister of Labor and National Insurance until 1956. In June 1956, she was appointed foreign minister, a post she held for nearly a decade. As foreign minister, Meir was in charge of Israel's attempt to create diplomatic ties with the emerging independent countries of Africa. She also managed to strengthen relations with the United States and was successful in creating extensive bilateral relations with Latin American countries.

In 1965, Golda Meir retired from the government, but was asked to serve as party secretary, which she did for 8 months. On August 1, 1968, she retired once again, not for the last time. In February 1969, Prime Minister Levi Eshkol passed away, and Golda Meir was elected as his successor. She held this position for 5 years.

Under her leadership, Israel declared its willingness to accept the Rogers Peace Initiative, which included returning territory occupied by Israel. In reaction to the Munich Massacre during the 1972 Olympic Games, Meir authorized the Mossad to hunt and kill all the operatives involved. As prime minister during the controversial 1973 Yom Kippur War, Meir was facing a growing wave of public and political disapproval.

During most of her years as a public figure, Golda Meir enjoyed a mostly institutionalized, cooperative Israeli news media (of which hiding her long battle with cancer was only one indication). It wasn't until the post–Yom Kippur War era that Meir had to face an unprecedented opposition of hard-line journalists and commentators questioning her performance during the war. A popular and effective speaker; an appreciated interviewee (according to some of her most famous interviewers like Oriana Fallaci); and a symbol of women's success in a manly world, Golda Meir had managed to maintain a supportive coverage among most non-Israeli media as well, albeit her occasionally questioned performance.

Following the general elections at the end of 1973, Golda Meir was reelected as prime minister. However, due to the postwar public atmosphere and her failing health, she decided to resign as prime minister and retire from political life. Golda Meir died of cancer on December 8, 1978.

Vered Malka

See also Rabin, Yitzhak

Further Readings

Agres, E. (1969). Golda Meir: Portrait of a prime minister. New York: Sabra Books.

Proviser, N. (2001). In the shadow of Washington: Golda Meir, duty and the call to power. In K. Cope (Ed.), George Washington in and as culture: Bicentenary explorations. New York: AMS Press.

Memory Congeniality Effect

See Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory

Menem, Carlos (1930–)

Carlos Saúl Menem, born in 1930, was the president of Argentina in two consecutive periods from 1989 to 1999. He is renowned for successful image management within the mass media. His showmanship in front of the cameras contributed to political debate becoming a form of entertainment television and began a trivialization of politics. Under Menem's administration, a reform of broadcasting law allowed the institution of multimedia conglomerates. The liberalization of the media market and subsequent concentration in few conglomerates considerably modified the Argentinean media system.

Menem was a Peronist governor of his home province, La Rioja, from 1973 to 1976, when the military coup d'état imprisoned him until 1981. In 1983 he was elected governor of La Rioja for a new term. By running for the presidency in 1989, Menem carried out a populist and demagogic campaign, featuring successful marketing and spectacular public appearances. He promised enormous transformations that seduced the Argentinean electorate. Upon his renomination in 1995, Menem guaranteed to maintain the economy that at those times had approval of many citizens, who took advantage of the exchange rate and the easy credit.

Menem introduced reforms that moved away from historical principles of his party. He carried out a constitutional reform in 1994 and conducted a neoliberal state reform. His economic policies are controversial issues in Argentinean recent history. On the one hand, he succeeded in eliminating hyperinflation—a heritage of preceding president Raúl Alfonsín—and achieved stability by setting the Argentine peso 1 to 1 with the American dollar. On the other hand, Menem introduced liberalization and privatization programs, which increased unemployment and progressively enhanced the distribution gap within the population. His administration coincided with a new wave of market openings in Latin America. Menem's foreign policy was designed for a close alliance with the United States. Therefore, through the media he made society believe that Argentina had been incorporated to the First World.

Menem's relationships with the media were diverse. His flamboyant image and his social life with celebrities attracted the attention of popular mass media. The multimedia conglomerate benefited from his liberalization policies. Investigative journalism made subjects of Menem's autocratic and populist style as well as his involvement in scandals. His government was charged with various kinds of corruption that have had serious consequences for the economics and the institutional system in Argentina. Menem is suspected of having illegal funds outside Argentina, and the investigation of a weapons export scandal resulted in a 5-month house arrest in 2001. Despite judicial procedures and a resignation to second round by 2003's presidential election, he remains active in the Argentinean political arena.

Malvina Rodriguez

See also Alfonsín, Raúl; Argentina Democratization Process, Role of the Media

Further Readings

Palermo, V., & Novaro, M. (1996). Política y poder en el gobierno de Menem [Politics and power under Menem's government]. Buenos Aires, Argentina: Norma-Flacso.

Sarlo Sabajanes, B. (1994). Argentina under Menem: The aesthetics of domination. NACLA Report on the Americas, 28(2), 33–37.

Merkel, Angela (1954–)

Angela Dorothea Merkel is a German politician. She is chairwoman of the Christian Democratic Union (CDU) since April 10, 2000, and chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany since November 22, 2005. Merkel is the first woman and the first former citizen of the German Democratic Republic ever been elected as chancellor in Germany.

Shortly after her birth (born Angela Dorothea Kastner in Hamburg, Germany), her family moved to Templin in the German Democratic Republic, where she grew up. She studied physics in Leipzig and became a member of the academic staff at the Central Institute of Physical Chemistry at the Academy of Sciences in Berlin, where she was awarded a doctoral degree in 1986. After the fall of the Berlin Wall in November 1989, she joined the party Demokratischer Aufbruch (Democratic Awakening), which merged with the West German CDU in 1990. In the first election after the unification, Merkel was elected Member of Parliament (German Bundestag). Then Chancellor Helmut Kohl appointed her to the position of federal minister for Women and Youth. In the 1994 election, the Kohl government was reelected, and Merkel remained in the cabinet to become federal minister for the Environment, Nature Conservation, and Nuclear Safety. After the governing coalition of Christian Democrats and Free Democrats (FDP) had lost the majority in 1998, Merkel became general secretary and chairwoman of the CDU in 2000. She also became chairwoman of the CDU parliamentary group in the German Bundestag, and, and, thereby, she was opposition leader during the Schröder (Social Democrats, SPD) chancellorship from 2002 until 2005. In 2005, Schröder called early elections, and Merkel was nominated chancellor candidate for the CDU. Following a tight election result, the negotiations between the possible coalition partners proved to be difficult. Finally, the two big parties, CDU and SPD, formed a grand coalition. Merkel was elected chancellor in the newly assembled German Bundestag on November 22, 2005.

Merkel is not perceived as a "media chancellor" like her predecessor Gerhard Schröder. Especially before her nomination as chancellor candidate, it was often claimed by journalists that Merkel had an image problem. She always tried (and still does) to shut the media out from her private life. Even today, her husband Joachim Sauer rarely appears on public occasions. During the campaign, Merkel consciously refused to let the fact that she comes from the Eastern part of Germany, that she is a woman, and that she is a Protestant (all of which are exceptions from the past typical Christian Democratic candidate) to play an important role.

Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany with U.S. President George W. Bush. Merkel holds a doctorate in physical chemistry and is the first female chancellor of Germany, the first citizen of the former German Democratic Republic to assume the chancellery of reunited Germany, and the first woman to lead Germany since it became a modern nation-state in 1871.

Source: NATO Photos.

Content analysis during the Bundestag election campaign 2005 showed that Merkel received as much media coverage as did the incumbent Schröder. According to these results, there was no chancellor bonus affecting the vote. At the same time, it appears that, contrary to expectations from results of several U.S. studies, Merkel did not receive less attention because of her being a woman. Journalists indeed reported that a woman was running for office for the first time, but research did not find evidence for gender-stereotyped coverage of Merkel, nor did journalists present Merkel more negatively than Schröder. Again, contrary to results of numerous studies on women candidates in U.S. campaigns, journalists did not focus on Merkel's appearance, haircut, or dress. In general, Merkel's performance and private life have not been covered as often as Schröder's. Even the results of previous research that coverage about female candidates is more often linked with "soft" or traditional women's issues could not be confirmed.

Thomas Koch

See also Gender and Politics; Schröder, Gerhard

Further Readings

Koch, T. (in press). Immer nur die Frisur? Angela Merkel in den Medien [Always the hairstyle? Angela Merkel in the media]. In C. Holtz-Bacha & N. König-Reiling (Eds.), Politikerinnen in den Medien [Female politicians in the media]. Wiesbaden, Germany: VS Verlag für Sozialwissenschaften.

Langguth, G. (2005). Angela Merkel. Munich: dtv.

Roll, E. (2006). Die Erste. Angela Merkels Weg zur Macht [The first: Angela Merkel on the road to power]. Reinbek, Germany: Rowohlt.

METACOVERAGE

Metacoverage is a term used to describe a type of news story that contains one, or both, of the following main topics: (a) the behaviors, roles, standards, products, and practices of individual journalists or news organizations; (b) the roles, activities, and practices of publicity experts whose main occupation is to garner media visibility and coverage for political clients, such as candidates, governmental officials, political parties, or for business clients, such as corporations or celebrities. In short, metacoverage is news about the news media itself or about publicity processes, some of which, but not all, are covered in terms of how well they succeed at garnering favorable news coverage.

Metacoverage is present in both print and broadcast news formats specifically devoted to how, how much, when, and to what effect the news media cover a particular issue or topic. In radio and television news it is found in programs such as CNN's Reliable Sources, Media Watch segments of the PBS Newshour with Jim Lehrer, and National Public Radio's On the Media. In print news, beat writers (e.g., Howard Kurtz of The Washington Post) cover the news media in articles specifically labeled "media." Also, columnists and editorialists regularly discuss topics and issues in light of how, how much, when, or to what effect the news media cover events and issues (e.g., the ongoing Iraq War). In all of these instances, metacoverage can be considered an extension of press criticism found, for example, in trade magazines such as the American Journalism Review.

In both print and broadcast news, metacoverage is also found in hard news stories that are not designated by specific newspapers or TV news networks as being about the media. For example, metacoverage is prevalent in news stories with the following topics: politics (e.g., presidential campaigns, the Iraq War), crime (e.g., the 2002 Washington, D.C.–area sniper case, the 2005 conviction and sentencing of the so-called BTK killer), natural disasters and human tragedies (e.g., the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina in 2005), celebrity tragedies and trials (e.g., the death and funeral of Princess Diana in 1997, the 1995 O. J. Simpson criminal trial and acquittal), and business malfeasance (e.g., the aftermath of the 2001 Enron scandal).

There are thee principles that underlie theorizing and empirical research on metacoverage. Together, these principles clarify the conceptual definition of this type of news. The first principle is that, while metacoverage can be a feature of any narrative format that purports to be news, it is generally conceived as being a feature of mainstream news. Therefore, the bulk of research on metacoverage centers on mainstream news coverage. To be sure, metacoverage is a salient feature of discourses outside of the mainstream press. In fact, recent work attests to the regularity in which discussion about the standards, behaviors, and products of the mainstream news media, and discussion about publicity attendant to press coverage, permeates blogs, talk radio programs, and political comedy programs. Still, the bulk of content analyses, both qualitative and quantitative, are conducted on mainstream news stories, a fact that suggests two corollaries to the first principle: (1) that the mainstream press regularly incorporates press and publicity topics from ancillary formats into its coverage (e.g., cable news segments about what bloggers, talk radio hosts, or political comedy hosts say about media coverage of a political candidate) and (2) that, owing to the power of the mainstream press in terms of its agenda-setting, priming, and framing functions, metacoverage in the mainstream press has more influence on political learning and political attitudes than metacoverage on talk radio, blogs, or political comedy shows.

Continuing with the first principle, the most frequently studied topic in content studies is the political campaign. The literature on campaigns is based on the rudimentary point that some campaign stories contain enough spoken, written, or visual references to "journalists," the "press," "reporters," "spin doctors," and "media consultants" to warrant the claim that either the press or publicity, or both, is a salient topic in the story. Studies of U.S. election news, along with a few comparative studies of U.S. and European political campaign news, have counted and categorized verbal and visual references to the news media and to publicity processes related to media coverage. However, different units of analysis, ranging from sentence-level propositions to story themes, as well as different categorizations (e.g., "candidate-press interactions," "media performance/impact"), make it difficult to cross-reference results from different content analyses. Also making comparison difficult is the fact that political campaign researchers use various terms to refer to this type of news, including self-referential process news, media process news, stories about the media, media narcissism, and media stories. Differences in unitization and categorization underlie disparate views about the normative nature of campaign metacoverage. One view holds that metacoverage is mainly about political strategy. From this normative viewpoint, stories with metacoverage degrade the information environment of the campaign and tend to make news consumers cynical of the press, candidates, and the campaign process as a whole. Another normative view holds that metacoverage expresses the press's crucial role to conduct messages from candidates to the electorate (e.g., "The president appeared on Meet the Press today to discuss Social Security . . ."), rendering it relatively harmless from a normative standpoint. Yet another view holds that metacoverage expresses the press's self-regulating function (e.g., a story about why the press covers a candidate's character issues), which, in turn, provides a useful platform for news consumers to understand the press's integral role in politics. Whereas some studies adhere to the notion that all metacoverage is about political strategy, other studies, particularly recent framing studies, hold that campaign stories with metacoverage contain all of these attributes.

The second principle is that metacoverage stories contain a compound topical structure. That is, metacoverage stories are not only about the press or publicity per se; rather, these stories are about an event or issue upon which journalists impose a newsworthy press or publicity angle. At times sources propound an angle about the news media. For example, metacoverage is evident in a campaign story in which a political candidate asserts that the news media are not fully covering their policy statements. It is also evident in a story in which a candidate complains that the news media are covering an aspect of their campaign (e.g., the candidate's character) too negatively. Other times, journalists themselves seem to initiate a media angle with which to cover a particular topic, such as when journalists report on media-generated polls about a candidate. Still other times, the source of the metacoverage is difficult to discern. For example, after Vice President Cheney shot a colleague in February 2006 hunting accident, the story became metacoverage when the mainstream press reported that Mr. Cheney did not contact the mainstream news media in a timely manner, sparking additional metacoverage about his media strategy and about whether or not the press was overplaying the incident.

The apparent exception to the second principle concerns newsroom scandals. Stories such as the 2003–2004 Jayson Blair scandal at The New York Times, which dealt with Mr. Blair's record of plagiarism and the subsequent resignation of several of the paper's high-ranking editors, or the story about Janet Cooke, a Washington Post reporter whose Pulitzer Prize–winning investigative work in the early 1980s was found to be largely fabricated, were heavily covered both locally and nationally. Such stories are not simply about unprofessional behavior on the part of journalists or news organizations. In particular because the mainstream press often cover these sorts of incidents in terms of findings from media-generated polls about news credibility, these stories also deal with whether or not readers and viewers can trust news organizations to cover topics and events other than the news media according to professional standards of accuracy and autonomy from vested interests. Some scholars argue that the topic of press professionalism in news provides a potentially useful site to integrate work on metacoverage with work on news credibility.

The third principle is that metacoverage is tied to the reflexive nature of newsgathering and news reporting. This principle derives from the seminal work of Gaye Tuchman. Using an ethnographic methodology and drawing from theorizing in interpretive sociology, Tuchman argued that (mainstream) news is a reflexive enterprise, by which she meant that news stories are embedded in the very reality that they characterize and record. According to the reflexivity thesis, news stories are so deeply tied to the nature of reality that it is logical to conceive of reality as being doubly composed of discrete, observable events and the stories journalists tell about these events. For example, the tactical responses of a city or town that is going through a crime wave are prompted not only by the fact that individual crimes occur, but also by the fact that the crimes are reported every day in the local news media. Rather than systematically examine its reflexive nature via metacoverage, Tuchman argued, mainstream journalists tend to be defensive about it. When metacoverage does occur, she argued, journalists tend to "repair the paradigm" of objectivity by blaming and marginalizing individuals or organizations who do not adhere to high professional standards.

Research on metacoverage in the so-called critical perspective follows Tuchman's lead. Critical research examines three mechanisms of paradigm repair: self-policing, self-criticism, and self-analysis. This research typically examines one or more of these mechanisms via case studies of nonroutine events, such as the O. J. Simpson trial or the death of Princess Diana. A great deal of this research concludes that self-policing is accomplished by isolating the people or organizations that stray from the rest of the news media institution, such as tabloid journalists, paparazzi, and for the print media, television journalists. These studies argue that metacoverage is mainly employed to repair the paradigm of objectivity rather than to constructively examine news's reflexive relationship to events.

Most research on metacoverage in political campaign news takes a different normative approach than critical research on paradigm repair. All content studies of metacoverage in political campaign news are based on the notion that elections in the United States (and to differing degrees in democracies abroad) have transitioned from party-based elections to media-based elections—the latter being candidate centered, professionalized, and publicity oriented. As a result, journalists are attuned to the campaign's "media politics" environment. Just as candidates have become adept at devising strategies geared toward effectively communicating their policy and image messages to the electorate via news and non-news formats, so, too, have journalists adapted to these changing circumstances by weaving into stories information about the behaviors and roles of the press, as well as information about the behaviors and roles of campaign professionals who garner publicity for candidates via the news media or other communications channels. Thus, most political communication studies consider metacoverage to be a logical outcome of the heightened awareness on the part of the press corps that the campaign does not merely unfold before them. Since they hold that journalists are on the campaign stage directly, these studies work from the premise that campaign reporters are compelled to cover journalists, journalism, and publicity in order to accurately describe, interpret, and analyze the media politics environment.

Paul D'Angelo

Further Readings

Bennett, W. L., Gressett, L. A., & Haltom, W. (1985). Repairing the news: A case study of the news paradigm. Journal of Communication, 35(3), 50–68.

Esser, F., & D'Angelo, P. (2003). Framing the press and the publicity process: A content analysis of metacoverage in Campaign 2000 network news. American Behavioral Scientist, 46(5), 617–641.

Hindman, E. B. (2005). Jayson Blair, The New York Times, and paradigm repair. Journal of Communication, 55(2), 225–241.

Kerbel, M. R. (1998). Edited for television: CNN, ABC, and American presidential elections (2nd ed.). Boulder, CO: Westview.

Lule, J. (1992). Journalism and criticism: The Philadelphia Inquirer Norplant editorial. Critical Studies in Mass Communication, 9(1), 91–109.

Tuchman, G. (1978). Making news: A study in the social construction of reality. New York: Free Press.

Turow, J. (1994). Hidden conflicts and journalistic norms: The case of self-coverage. Journal of Communication, 44(2), 29–46.

Methodology

Methodology refers to the procedures used to research an issue, a research question, or hypothesis. It is the way that a topic is investigated or researched. There have been many different methodologies used to investigate political communication, and there are many ways to classify these methodologies. One way to classify methodology is to group the procedures as either quantitative or qualitative. Quantitative procedures are used when researchers are interested in counting or providing some numerical measure or statistical test to the material. Procedures or methods that are qualitative are focused less on numerical findings and are more interested in in-depth exploration and analysis of certain dimensions or characteristics of the issue being studied. Methodology can be further divided into what parts of the communication system are being investigated. For example, certain research procedures are used to investigate the source or content of a message, and others are used to investigate the audience or effects of the message. Still other procedures might look at the historical relevance of messages or media, at the legal implications of political communication, or at the cultural context of political communication. Methodology in political communication is driven, like in other disciplines, by the theory being explored or tested, by the views and preferences of the researcher and by the research problem or question guiding the research.

General Features of Methodology

Although specific methodologies require specific research procedures, most methodologies share several common features. The first issue in deciding any methodology that will be used is the determination of the research questions and hypotheses. Research questions are those questions that the study will answer. The research questions guide how the research will be done and which methodology will be appropriate in answering the questions. In political communication, research questions have ranged from questions about how media use affects political disaffection to how certain techniques or strategies in political advertising will influence a person's liking of the candidate. Hypotheses are more specific than research questions and usually predict the ways in which variables will be related. For example, in a study about how gender might influence attitudes toward candidates during a debate, one hypothesis might be that women will more highly rate a candidate who uses certain language and arguments during a debate.

A second important aspect of methodology is sampling or deciding what will be selected for studying. Samples can include content that will be analyzed or persons who will be selected to participate in a study. Quantitative studies always include an explanation of how samples are selected, and some qualitative studies also discuss how participants are selected or how material is selected for researching.

Another important component of any methodology is what variables will be measured or manipulated and how the variables will be operationalized and measured. Variables are those things that the researcher is interested in observing, manipulating, or measuring. Examples of some variables in political communication include attitude toward a candidate, intention to vote, demographic aspects of the subjects, how negative or positive an ad is about the candidate, the candidate's political ideology or party, and the argument style that the candidate uses during a debate. There are various types of variables. Independent variables are variables that may be manipulated or may vary. Researchers are interested in seeing what influence they might have one what's being studied. Independent variables are sometimes called "predictor variables." Dependent variables (sometimes called "criterion variables") are the variables that researchers are interested in seeing how they are affected by the independent variables. Although there are various ways of describing variables, two other ways of labeling variables are continuous variables (can include infinite number value, such as minutes spent looking at a candidate's Web site) and discrete variables (finite number of values, such as gender or political affiliation).

An important part of any research study is how the variable will be operationalized. It is very critical that any methodology clearly describe how the variables will be measured and defined. In political communication, there are some very standard ways that variables have been defined and measured over a long period of time. Variables such as political cynicism have been systematically measured in a particular way, and most research using this measure use fairly standard and tested ways of defining and measuring this variable. On the other hand, there are many studies that offer different ways of measuring a variable, but good research procedures will provide a clear definition for how that particular study is defining and measuring a particular variable. For example, negative advertising has been defined in numerous ways in various studies, including ads that compare and contrast, ads that are wholly oppositional in focus, ads that contain a negative attack, and ads that denigrate issue stands and personality characteristics of the opponent. What is important in each of these studies has been that the researchers have very clearly operationalized negative advertising and how it will be measured.

Part of defining a variable is explaining how it will be measured or how the variable will be given some quantitative number. There are various levels of measurements, including nominal, ordinal, interval, and ratio. Nominal measures are those where numbers are assigned to characteristics or names of things, for example, gender and political affiliation are nominal measurements. Ordinal measures provide a ranking of the variable, for example, in political communication; a study might determine how respondents rank particular issues in terms of their importance in an election. Interval measures include an order to them but there is also an assumption that the distances between the points on the scale are equal. For example, in an experiment, participants might be asked to indicate on a 5-point scale how negative a particular ad was, from not very negative to very negative. Ratio scales are like interval scales but there is the presence of a true zero on the scale. For example, in a study of how often a presidential inaugural speech uses certain metaphors, the researcher could determine the absolute number of times a term is used and compare that to the number of times other metaphors are used over time in inaugural speeches.

A final important aspect of any methodology is the reliability and validity of the measurements. There are several types of reliability and validity, but generally, reliability refers to the consistency of the measure to measure the same aspects of the variable over and over again. A reliable measure is one that provides the same result over and over again no matter how many times the variable is measured that way. The measure is consistent. Validity refers to the ability of the measurement to measure what it is supposed to be measuring. For example, in a study on the influence of negative news on political attitudes, a researcher would want to be sure that asking questions about respondents' political disaffection is truly measuring their political disaffection.

Methodologies for Studying Content

There are several methodologies for investigating political communication content. Quantitative content analysis involves the systematic coding and categorizing of the content of a message. Qualitative methods in investigating political communication can include rhetorical analysis (including fantasy theme analysis) and critical analysis (including methods like narrative analysis).

Quantitative Content Analysis

A critical part of this methodology is the sample that will be used to investigate the content. There are several types of samples for content analysis, and in political communication, the material sampled may be content such as presidential speeches, newspaper articles, political ads, or broadcast shows. Depending upon what is being studied in political communication, there are various ways of selecting samples. Probability samples (those where every content unit has the same chance of being selected as any other content unit) typically used in political communication have included simple random sampling, where all units have an equal chance of being selected; systematic sampling, where every *n*th unit is selected; and stratified sampling, where the content is divided into groups and then samples are taken from the groups.

Another type of sample used in political communication is called a "purposive sample," or a sample selected because of the nature of the study. For example, a study of debates during a presidential election would use the debates during that election and would not use a random sample of all debates. A final type of sampling that has been used with some regularity in political communication has been a convenience sample, or a sample that is readily available to the researcher. For example, researchers have used a convenience sample of political ads to look at the types of appeals used in ads.

An important step in quantitative content analysis is determining the unit of analysis in the sample and how that unit of analysis will be coded or categorized.

The units of analysis in content analysis are those things that will be systematically looked at in terms of the variables of the study. In political communication, units of analysis have included things such as a newspaper headline, a political ad, a 30-second broadcast story, a speech paragraph, and the statements made during a debate. Coding is a critical process in content analysis, and researchers must decide how the research questions or hypotheses will be answered by including certain variables for coding. After the researcher decides how the sample material will be coded or categorized, a coding instrument or sheet is developed that includes all of the variables that the researcher is interested in investigating. The codebook or coding protocol is the instruction manual for how coders who will be doing the content analysis should categorize the material in the sample.

Coders are the persons who are trained to analyze and categorize the sample material in to the categories identified in the coding instrument. After coders are trained in coding procedures, a subsample of the material is coded for a preliminary measure of whether the coders are agreeing on how to categorize material in the content. In most political communication studies, the entire sample is not coded by all coders, but rather a sample of the material (usually 10% in most studies) is coded by all coders and a measure of intercoder reliability is taken on that coding. Intercoder reliability refers to how well the coders are agreeing on the categories and how to apply them to the content. There are several measures of intercoder reliability or statistical tests to determine the level of agreement among the coders. A good intercoder reliability score indicates that the coders are agreeing on the categories.

Content analysis has many advantages and can reveal important things about the types of political communication. In addition, content analyses that are done over several decades using similar coding categories can reveal changes in political communication content. A study might, for example, show how newspapers have covered women's rights issues across several decades to see the changes in the coverage.

Rhetorical and Critical Analysis

Rhetorical analysis is also another type of methodology that looks at the content of political communication. The method is typically less interested in quantitative measures or counting variables in a study, but rather interested in the language or rhetoric in political messages. There are many different types of rhetorical approaches to looking at political communication, and the researcher generally approaches his or her analysis of the message or content from a particular approach or theory of rhetoric. In quantitative content analysis, the researcher attempts to, as much as he or she can, objectively analyze the categories in the message or content by strictly defining how these dimensions will be coded and by training coders to adhere to a systematic coding protocol. There is no such interest in rhetorical analysis, where the researcher is may be the only person analyzing the messages for the content. Typically, rhetoricians are looking at the strategies and techniques used in political language, speeches, writing, or broadcasts that make that communication persuasive, effective, and skillful. Different strains of rhetorical studies have looked at these things in different ways. Rhetorical approaches that have been used in political communication have included using the writings on speaking by the ancient Greeks and Romans to analyze political messages to more modern theorists who look at the argumentation and symbols present in political language. Fantasy theme analysis is one way of looking at the language and rhetoric of political communication by investigating how group or mediated fantasies or visions of some event or issue are present in political speech, news broadcasts, newspaper stories, and other forms of political communication. Fantasy theme analysis is a method for investigating the elements of storytelling in political content, including the scenes, the characters or actors, the plotlines, how the story is told, who are the heroes and the villains, what language is used to describe the story, and the style and motives of the characters or actors. Fantasy theme analysis has been used in political communication to analyze about 2,000 political cartoons on the Bill Clinton–Monica Lewinsky scandal and in another study to examine the worldviews and persuasion techniques used by hate groups on their Web sites.

Other methods for analyzing political communication have come from the critical or cultural area. Critical, qualitative analyses of content require that the researcher approach the content (or the text) from a particular perspective or approach. In some critical analyses, there is an assumption that a particular ideology is present in the text (whether that text is a political ad, a news broadcast, a speech, a magazine article, or a film) and therefore the researcher does a close reading or analysis of the text to explore that ideology.

Like in rhetorical analysis, there are various ways that researchers might approach a critical analysis of some text in political communication, and these methods will be determined by the theoretical guidelines of the approach. Overall, most critical theory assumes that some ideology or perspective is present in political communication and that the use of the language and visuals is not neutral or haphazard but would reveal something about the status, biases, and reality of those persons in charge of producing the political message. One example of a critical analysis is a study using the theory of metaphors to analyze political news stories on television, looking at the ways in which certain metaphors are used to construct a certain meaning in the political stories. Another example of this type of analysis would be a study of the semiotics or signs and symbols in speech practices of female politicians.

Methodologies for Studying Audiences and Effects

Other methodologies in political communication are interested in what audiences think or feel about political messages. These can also include social science quantitative studies as well as qualitative studies. They range from methods like survey research and experiments to focus groups and cultural studies procedures.

Survey Research

Survey research generally involves asking people their opinions, attitudes, feelings about some event or message or circumstance in culture. In political communication, surveys can be used to assess a variety of opinions and attitudes, including how audiences are reacting to a political campaign, to ascertain their feelings about government, the president, their use of media for political information, their attitudes about candidates and political advertising, and their use of political debates. Samples are also important in survey research, but here the samples are the people that the researcher will be questioning. Popular types of surveys in political communication have included in person surveys, telephone surveys, mail surveys, and, of increasing popularity, Internet-based surveys. Surveys allow political communication scholars to understand what a sample of persons is thinking, feeling, believing about some political phenomenon or event and then make inferences about that group to the more general population. Universities, media organizations, and private groups do numerous surveys to explore, describe and explain political behavior and communication among populations. Some surveys are interested in a one-shot understanding or snapshot of how people are feeling at a particular time. Other surveys have provided longitudinal (over time) measures of political attitudes, beliefs, feelings, knowledge, and behavior.

The main part of a survey, besides what population will be sampled (national, voters, regional, statewide) and how the survey will be conducted (telephone, mail, Internet), is the questionnaire design. The questionnaire is constructed by operationalizing the variables that the researcher is interested in studying. The questions are then constructed so that each variable is measured using one or more questions. The questionnaire is also constructed so that respondents have a fairly easy time in answering the questions and the interviewer is clear about how the questions should be answered. There are a variety of types of questions to be included on a survey, including closed-ended (forced choice), open-ended (person responds in own words), and contingency questions (the answer to a question determines what the next question for that respondent is). An important aspect of survey research is that the instructions to the respondent on how to answer the question are very clear, whether they are reading the instructions themselves (Internet or mail) or whether an interviewer is reading the instructions to them. In most survey research studies, the researcher may have to do a follow-up mailing, phone call, or e-mail to encourage persons to respond. In some cases, researchers provide incentives for respondents by including money or coupons in the mailing. One critical aspect of survey research is to be able to tell respondents how long the survey will take (a pretest of the survey and timing of it is useful here) and to make the survey as easy as possible to respond to. Response rate is important in survey research and refers to how many completed questionnaires the researcher has. A good response rate means that the researcher can generalize findings to the population. There is some disagreement about good response rates, but researchers can generally find advice in the literature about good response rates for mail surveys, for telephone surveys, and for Internet surveys.

Experimental Research

Another way of understanding political communication from the audience's perspective is by conducting experiments. Experiments in political communication are interested in investigating the effects of political messages on people. There are several different types of experimental designs, and most in political communication have been short-term effects experiments, although there have been some field experiments.

Like other social scientific, quantitative methods, experiments involve selecting a sample of participants to study some political communication influence. The researcher is interested in how some political communication phenomenon influences or affects participants. Usually in experiments the researcher is interested in actually testing hypotheses or statements to look at explaining some process or influence. The experimenter recruits subjects or participants to take part in the experiment. Subjects are sometimes randomly selected for experiments, but the more typical procedure in political communication experiments is for participants to be recruited and then randomly assigned to treatment conditions or for treatments to be randomly assigned to certain groups (this is particularly true when college students and classes are used). Another way to assign subjects to groups is to use a matching process where the experimenter tries to match subjects across treatment groups. In the area of political communication, a researcher might want his or her groups to match on certain demographics, like gender, or on certain political dimensions, like political ideology.

The treatment conditions in experiments are those cells or parts of the stimuli that the researcher wants to compare. For example, if a researcher is interested in how certain types of political statements or arguments influence a person's evaluation of a candidate's performance in a debate, the experimenter might randomly assign participants to various treatment groups featuring different types of statements and arguments. A basic experiment includes independent and dependent variables and experimental and control groups. In experiments, independent variables are those things that the experimenter manipulates or varies to see what influence they might have. Dependent variables are those variables being measured or observed to see what effect the manipulation has. In political communication, for example, an experiment might be interested in how exposure to varying levels of news broadcasts about the economy (from good news to bad news) (the independent variable) might influence confidence in the president, political disaffection, and political efficacy (the dependent variables). The experimental groups are those groups that get some variation of the stimuli or treatment. The control group would be the group that gets no treatment. In some experiments in political communication, there are no real control groups, only various experimental groups that are compared to each other.

There are numerous ways to design an experiment, but two of the most common in political communication include pretest/posttest designs or posttest-only designs. In a pretest/posttest design, the participants are asked a series of questions and given a variety of measurements to check their attitudes, feelings, knowledge, beliefs, before the experimental treatment is given. Once they are exposed to the stimuli, the same instrument is given to them to see if the treatment has changed their attitudes. In some political communication studies, researchers have preferred not to give a pretest to participants for fear that asking questions will alert the participants to the nature of the experiment. In these cases, the research has simply asked questions after the treatment, arguing that if the groups have been randomly assigned to treatments or treatments randomly assigned to groups then the differences on the questionnaires and measurements following the experiment would be due to the treatments.

Experiments are not generalizable to large populations or to much beyond the short-term effects of the experiment. They are very powerful because of the control they offer in helping political communication researchers understand the possible effects of political communication messages. They offer insight into how certain variables might influence other variables. But they measure short-term effects, and researchers cannot be sure that the effects are permanent. This is why some experiments attempt to test long-term effects by doing a second measure of the effects weeks after the experiments.

Focus Group Research

Focus groups have also been used as a way to understand audience reactions to political communication. Typically, a focus group consists of a group of persons who the researcher uses to explore details about the study. The researcher develops a series of questions and has a guided discussion with the groups to get at their reactions to aspect of the topic under investigation. Focus groups allow the researcher to go into more depth with the participants about their reaction to some political content or some aspects having to do with political communication. For example, a focus group might be conducted of participants to investigate in detail their emotional reaction to a political ad or to a political speech. The analysis is guided but the participants provide responses to open ended questions. The findings of focus group research tends to feature detailed attention to and reporting of the participants' comments.

Other Qualitative and Cultural Methods

Cultural Studies

Cultural studies approaches are also interested in understanding audiences as well as other aspects of media and include many different approaches and ways of looking at media. There are several tenets that seem to unite works under this umbrella, but the procedures used depend on the questions that the researcher wishes to answer and the interests and theoretical leanings of the researchers. Cultural studies methods are more interpretive and evaluative, like many qualitative research methods and like critical analysis. One other component is that there are no aspects of culture that would not be worthy of investigation, so in political communication, cultural studies wouldn't just have to analyze news for political content, but might also investigate soap operas, films, songs, and any other aspects of popular culture for political content. Cultural studies research is interested in production and political economy components of media communication, the text or message itself, and the audience. Generally, researchers in this area argue that all research in the media is political, and they take an interest in understanding how those groups in control in a society shape and use media messages. They are interested in how hegemony (or ruling forces in a society) serves to dominate other aspects of the society. And media as an institution is one way that those messages get out. Interest in cultural studies, like in critical theory, is on ideology, and in cultural studies that interest has typically been on ideology of race, class and gender.

Other researchers looking at audience interpretations of messages have looked at how the audiences might provide different meanings and interpretations of the media messages. In cultural studies, audiences aren't always persuaded by what the dominant message might be, but can actually resist those messages through their own interpretations.

Historical Methods

Another way of understanding political communication is through the use of historical studies or methods. These methods typically try to understand or investigate political communication content within the historical context of some political or social event or political figure. Historical research, for example, in political communication has been used to investigate how political slogans, songs, and mottos functioned throughout U.S. presidential campaigns. Historical research has provided an important foundation for discussing how context and era influence political communication and provide more than just a one-shot look at political communication at a particular time.

Case Studies

Another methodology for understanding political communication is the case study. Case studies usually look at a specific setting or system over time and investigate in depth various type of data from a variety of sources. A case study of a particular issue or advocacy campaign in a particular country might look at the culture, context, and circumstances of the campaign. The researcher would be interested in looking at whatever political communication sources might be available to provide information about that particular campaign. A variety of tools would be used in a case study, and a variety of sources would be investigated. For example, in the case study example mentioned, the researcher might look at media coverage and ad campaigns, would conduct interviews with candidates, campaign workers, and reporters, read archival documents available from the campaigns, and do observations of the organizations involved. Other examples of political communication case studies include a study of the decision-making process of a particular presidential administration during a political crisis and a study of how gender issues were characterized and featured in the speeches of a female senator.

Anne Johnston

See also Focus Groups; Survey Research Center

Further Readings

Berger, A. A. (2000). Media and communication research methods: An introduction to qualitative and quantitative approaches. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Creswell, J. W. (1998). Qualitative inquiry and research design: Choosing among five traditions. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
Graber, D. (2005). Political communication faces the 21st century. Journal of Communication, 55, 479–507.
Johnston, A. (2006). Methodologies for the study of political advertising. In L. L. Kaid & C. Holtz-Bacha (Eds.), The Sage handbook of political advertising (pp. 15–34). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
Kellner, D. M., & Durham, M. G. (2006). Adventures in media and cultural studies: Introducing the keyworks. In M. G. Durham & D. M. Kellner (Eds.), Media and cultural studies: Keyworks (Rev. ed., pp. ix–xxxviii). Malden, MA: Blackwell.
Krueger, R. A. (1988). Focus groups: A practical guide for applied research. Newbury Park, CA: Sage.
Riffe, D., Lacy, S., & Fico, F. G. (2005). Analyzing media messages: Using quantitative content analysis in research (2nd ed.). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.
Simon, A. F., & Iyengar, S. (1996). Toward theory-based research in political communication. PS: Political Science & Politics, 29(5). Available from Expanded Academic ASAP at http://www.gale.com.
Stempel, G. H., III, Weaver, D. H., & Wilhoit, G. C. (Eds.). (2003). Mass communication research and theory. Boston: Allyn & Bacon.
Wimmer, R. D., & Dominick, J. R. (2006). Mass media research: An introduction (8th ed.). Belmont, CA: Thomson Wadsworth.

Milton, John

See Press Freedom

Minimum Effects Theory

See Limited Effects Theory

Minorities, Role in Politics

To understand the role of minorities in U.S. politics necessitates defining minorities and the forms of political endeavors that are included for consideration. Since minority in politics refers to access to power, not numbers, women are a "minority" in the United States, as are gays and lesbians, Muslims, and so on. In order to avoid being overly broad in scope (and therefore compromise the depth of discussion of this topic), attention can be focused on two primary groups: African Americans and Latino Americans. Three rationales underlie this focus.

First, among racial/ethnic minority groups, Latinos and African Americans both have arguably faced the most vociferous and long-standing forms of prejudice and discrimination that have led to formal and informal barriers to their participation in American political life. For African Americans, such barriers have existed for more than four hundred years: the legacy of involuntary servitude, legalized segregation, and systematic discrimination in virtually every area of American social and political life. We include Latino Americans also because of their history of prejudice and discrimination in the United States, albeit a shorter one when compared to African Americans. Latino Americans comprise the largest population of recent immigrants to the United States (53% of foreign-born immigrants, according to the U.S. Census Bureau). Further, as the social norm to conceal prejudice toward African Americans has taken hold, there is still an acceptability of overt disdain for Latinos, largely because of the tendency to conflate the status of those Latinos who are citizens or reside in the United States legally with those who are undocumented.

Second, we focus on these two groups because the majority of the literature in political communication (an amalgam of research from diverse fields as political science, communication and media studies, social psychology, legal studies, and others) have and continue to focus primarily on these two groups. This is partly a result of the disproportionate discrimination faced by members of these groups in America, partly a result of the numbers of Americans who identify themselves with either of these groups, and partly a result of the fact that beyond the grassroots struggles for equality, members of these two groups have been most active among racial minorities in seeking elected office. Such visibility has caught the attention of researchers and pundits alike, and has led to more discussion of their participation than that of American Indians, Asians, or Pacific Islanders.

While both African and Latino Americans have faced significant barriers to political participation in the United States, the nature of these barriers, the reasons for their existence, and the way they are communicated differ in many ways, but they have a number of common themes as well.

Black and Latino Social Movements

Several long-standing social movements have been stimulated by African Americans and Latinos. Two in particular exemplify the history of black and Latino political participation from their inception to the present: the civil rights movement (CRM) of the mid-20th century, and the Latino labor movement.

Though its roots were planted long before, the fruition of the CRM came in the 1960s. It was during this time that we see greatest mobilization and participation of African Americans in this movement to gain full equality in American political, social, and economic life. While there are many ways to tell the story of this plateau in the history of black political involvement, it may be helpful to think of it in terms of particular individuals or leaders of the movement that spearheaded activism among the black populous and the various political and social groups that helped to organize and give voice to their concerns.

The CRM brings to mind two outspoken leaders who exemplify the diversity of opinion not so much about what blacks sought to gain, but the strategies used to pursue it: Martin Luther King, Jr., and Malcolm X. Both of these leaders commanded vast audiences among the black populous because they spoke to the heart of their plight: nothing less than full equality and the freedom to choose and control their own destinies as a people. King espoused the philosophy of nonviolent resistance as a way to chastise, challenge, and change the consciousness of white Americans into granting these freedoms to blacks. Malcolm's strategy, however—one mired in a controversy of characterization over the years—was less optimistic. His "by any means necessary" approach, while not an explicit call for armed black resistance, was a message that black America may have to use every weapon in its arsenal to gain the freedoms that white America had originally used to subjugate and restrict those freedoms.

Though perhaps King's approach has been given more backing in the history books, there is no doubt that both men, and both approaches, had the effect of galvanizing the black masses, channeling their collective energy to accomplish a common set of ideals. Their voice and influence spawned a number of self-organizing social and political interest groups dedicated to this cause. The number of civil right organizations that sprang up is too large even to list here, let alone describe their efforts. Whether it was the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the Black Panther Party, or Black Muslim organizations, like their diverse leaders, they all shared a common goal. It was their ability to unite around this commonality and the people's ability to channel their efforts in the way they best saw fit that made the CRM one of the most powerful, effective, and memorable social movements in American history.

The 1960s also saw the beginnings of what would become the Latino CRM that, along with achieving the American Dream articulated in the rhetoric of the black CRM, was focused on economic equality and the rights of a burgeoning working class of Latinos in the United States. This movement also had many prominent leaders, the most famous of whom is César Chávez. Chávez, who was a farm worker, later went on to organize others in the struggle for fair wages and working conditions for farm workers throughout the southwest United States. He, too, was able to activate the passions of thousands of Latinos to fight for equality, fairness, and freedom from exploitation. What began with Chávez and other Latino leaders who were his contemporaries led to the organization of a plethora of labor unions and workers' rights organizations that would become a conduit for the movement—including several early groups organized in the 1960s and early 1970s, such as Chávez's own United Farm Workers, the National Farm Workers Association, the Farm Labor Organizing Committee, and others. These groups channeled the energies of the Latino populous into mass boycotts, marches, and legal challenges to workplace injustices.

Each of these movements exemplifies not only the beginnings, but the foundation of black and Latino participation in American political life. They had common struggles, diverse strategies, and a number of important gains in the struggle for equality, all of which were accomplished because those who were oppressed became intimately involved in their own struggle. For both groups, the struggle continues. Whether in recent efforts to reauthorize the original Voting Rights Act of 1965, or recent struggles surrounding immigration and citizenship, efforts to uphold civil rights legislation in the workplace or social institutions, or efforts to repair and build relationships between the United States and Latino immigrant home nations across Latin America, Latino and African American political participation continues to find meaningful outlets.

Blacks, Latinos, and Electoral Politics

Both blacks and Latinos have made concentrated efforts to expand their political influence beyond the broad, populous forms of citizen participation in social movements into the realm of electoral politics. Similar to the mass citizen movements, the move to secure election to government bodies has been embarked upon by blacks from the 1960s on, while Latino gains in this area have been more recent. In part as a result of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and other early civil rights gains, the late 1960s and early 1970s produced record numbers of blacks elected to federal office and the formation of a coalition of black elected officials in the name of the Congressional Black Caucus. While this included only 13 black elected officials in 1969, the number of blacks elected to the U.S. Congress and Senate has climbed to 43 in the 110th Congress (2007–2009). And, while this group has influenced monumental legislative efforts over its nearly 4-decade history, the scope of its influence and power is realized in the 110th Congress, as many of those early officials moved into some of the most powerful congressional positions, including the chairmanships of the powerful Ways and Means Committee (Charles Rangel, D-NY) and the Judiciary Committee (John Conyers, D-MI).

Speaking more broadly, the number of black elected officials in all federal, state, and local offices in 2006 increased to 9,101 from 1,469 in 1970, according to the latest published report by the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies. Recent historical gains in this arena include the election of Massachusetts's first black governor, Deval Patrick, in 2006 and U.S. Senator Barack Obama (D-IL), the first black man, and only second African American elected to the Senate (in 2004) in U.S. history.

Latino gains in the area of electoral politics are also significant. In 1996, there were no Latinos in the U.S. Senate, only 17 members of Congress, no governors, 6 state officials, and 156 state legislators; in 2005, those numbers were 3, 23, 1, 9, and 232, respectively. In all elected offices, the number of Latino officials has grown from 3,743 in 1996 to 5,041 in 2005. Latino gains in positions of power in the 110th Congress are also significant, and include the first Latina to every chair a committee: Nydia Velazquez (D-NY) of the House Small Business Committee, and Sylvestre Reyes (D-TX) who heads the House Select Committee on Intelligence. Positions in such powerful roles have also extended to party leadership appointments, including Senator Mel Martinez (R-FL) as the general chairman of the Republican National Committee.

These gains for Latino and black elected officials have come in the face of a number of significant barriers to their election. There is a burgeoning literature in political science and communication studies about the way electoral communication differs when one or more of the candidates in a race are either black or Latino. Because of the social norm of racial equality, white candidates will not be successful with voters (of any race) if they explicitly suggest that an opponent of color is less qualified for the office because of his or her race. While we have seen such attacks historically, such direct racial language has all but disappeared of late. In its place, however, is a more tacit form of political communication that is designed to trigger (or at least has the effect of triggering) racial resentment.

These implicit appeals mostly come in the form of images, rather than text, in televised political campaign advertising. While text can be encoded, as well, to disguise racial intent ("inner city" or "urban" rather than "black"), it has been found that the most effective way to prime racial predispositions is to have race-neutral text with images that suggest (or, rather, remind) viewers that there is a racial component to the issue. For example, in a 2006 advertisement against black senatorial candidate Harold Ford, Jr., a white candidate humorously suggests that his or her black male opponent enjoys interracial romantic encounters with white women. Particularly in a southern state, such a "joke," aimed at questioning Ford's character apart from race, taps into deep-seated negative stereotypes about black sexuality and the threats to white women that led to hundreds of years of discrimination, including violent lynchings. Similar appeals during the 2006 midterm election cycle were prevalent in candidates' ads addressing the topic of immigration, where images of Mexican criminals, drug traffickers, and workers "stealing" American jobs, drawing on prejudices about Latino Americans.

So while explicit appeals to race rarely work (and often backfire), it is still possible (and effective) to use racial fears to woo voters. This serves as a reminder of how far we still have to come with respect to racial equality in America. But it also serves to perpetuate racist stereotypes, which makes the practice all the more dangerous.

Blacks and Latino Voting and Political Coalitions

The most basic form of political participation—voting—has risen and fallen over the years, especially for African Americans. Voter participation waned significantly through the 1970s–1990s with the percentage of blacks voting rarely rising above 50%. However, the most recent presidential election in 2004 saw a marked rise in black voter participation, to more than 60%. Latino voter participation, while higher in this same election cycle (67%) than for blacks, was about the same as the previous presidential election cycle. Both groups, however, saw a marked increase in the numbers of young voters who participated in the electoral process by casting a ballot.

Voting and other forms of political participation has become a vehicle for the formation of building political coalitions around shared interests between black and Latino communities. The so-called shared interest model of minority political dynamics posits that blacks and Latinos perceive themselves as having common goals related to their status as political "outsiders" in the United States. That is, as members of marginalized groups, they have a vested interested in supporting each others' quests for meaningful inclusion in the political system. An alternative model—the "empowerment" model—suggests that members of each group view members of the other group as threats to their own group's advancement. In this model, blacks and Latinos (as well as white women and members of other minority groups) are disinclined to cooperate in social struggles, support one another for elected office, or advocate for one another once they achieve some level of power.

What we know about minorities' role in politics is that no meaningful change could have or would have come about without constant agitation from within those communities. It has been common to propagate a myth about white folks (specifically white men) "coming to their senses" when they finally realized that the oppression of minority communities was wrong. The direct political action advocated by King, Malcolm X, and Chávez (in cooperation with their white allies) has led to laws and policies that make formal discrimination of racial minorities more difficult. This has led to more racial minority candidates running and ultimately winning elected office. And that access to power will invariably lead to more successes for the historically oppressed aspects of America's pluralistic society. But that historical oppression has left deep scars that are often unrecognized by current citizens. Bringing these issues to the forefront is one way that minorities continue to work to rectify the injustices of the past.

Charlton D. McIlwain and Stephen Maynard Caliendo

See also Civil Rights Movement; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Latinos and Politics, Media; NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People); Participation, Political; Race in Politics; Unions, Political Activity

Further Readings

Caliendo, S. M., & McIlwain, C. D. (2006). Minority candidates, media framing, and racial cues in the 2004 election. Harvard International Journal of Press Politics, 11, 45–69.

Clay, W. L. (1993). Just permanent interests: Black Americans in Congress, 1870–1991. New York: Amistad.

Hero, R. R., & Tolbert, C. J. (1995). Latinos and substantive representation in the U.S. House of Representatives: Direct, indirect, or non-existent? American Journal of Political Science, 40, 851–871.

Mendelberg, T. (2001). The race card: Campaign strategy, implicit messages, and the norm of equality. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Reeves, K. (1997). Voting hopes or fears? White voters, black candidates and racial politics in America. New York: Oxford University Press.

Vaca, N. C. (2004). The presumed alliance: The unspoken conflict between Latinos and Blacks and what it means for America. New York: Rayo.

Mitsotakis, Konstantinos (1918–)

Konstantinos Mitsotakis comes from a family with a long tradition in politics. He studied law, political and economic science at the University of Athens, and he is the father of Dora Bakogiannis (presently minister of foreign affairs) and Kyriakos Mitsotakis (MP [member of Parliament] of the ruling party). During the German occupation, he assumed a leading role in the anti-Nazi Resistance on the island of Crete, and he was imprisoned and sentenced to death twice by the Germans. In 1986, he was honored by the British Parliament for his activity.

Mitsotakis was elected as MP for the first time at the age of 28, first took governmental responsibilities at the age of 32, and ever since he had been incessantly elected with different parties until the coup d'état of April 1967.

He was arrested by the dictatorship along with other political leaders. In August 1967, he escaped to Paris, where he would remain in exile for the next 6 years. In the fall of 1973, he arrived in Greece and was again imprisoned by the dictatorial regime. He was released after the political changeover and was elected MP in 1977. In the spring of 1978, he entered Nea Democratia (New Democracy [N.D.]) and took ministerial positions.

In September 1984, he was elected president of the party of Nea Democratia, and in June's 1989 general elections, N.D., under his leadership, was elected first party with 44.3% of the vote, however without achieving absolute majority (145 seats out of 300). Under these circumstances a coalition government with the Left was the only solution. To make this move easier he accepted not becoming prime minister himself and proposed Tzannis Tzannetakis for the position. That government went down in history for referring his great political opponent, Andreas Papandreou, to a Special Court. Papandreou was indicted on charges of embezzlement of state funds but was cleared by the Special Court. Konstantinos Mitsotakis took the oath of the prime minister of Greece on April 1990 after the electoral victory of N.D. with 46.9% of the vote. During those elections, foreign communication experts were invited by N.D. (as well as by other political parties) to offer media training courses for television campaigning.

Mitsotakis's government, despite its marginal majority in Parliament (151 seats) and the massive reactions of the opposition as well as some disputes from within the party, was the first Greek government after World War II that took measures to downsize the state. But his government was overthrown on September 1993 on the initiative of the young hardliner minister of foreign affairs, Antonis Samaras, on the occasion of the "Macedonian Issue" and the privatization of the Greek Telecoms. Mitsotakis attributed his overthrow to vested economic interests, which he called "interweaving interests"—a term that still overruns Greek political discourse. After the untimely elections of October 1993 and N.D.'s electoral defeat, he resigned from the party leadership. Having achieved nearly half a century of parliamentary life, he decided not to be a candidate in the elections of March 2004. Today he continues to intervene in political life whenever he sees fit.

Mitsotakis was at pains to keep a secure relationship with the private media. His law against the publication of terrorist groups' manifestos was harshly opposed by the left-centrist press moguls who ultimately managed to cancel it. Also, his policies were ruthlessly criticized by a few but influential private radio stations that contributed much to his discreditation and stepping out of power.

Nicolas Demertzis

Further Readings

Constantine Mitsotakis. (n.d.). Retrieved July 7, 2007, from http://www.ikm.gr/MitsotakisCV.pdf

History of Greece. (n.d.). Konstantinos Mitsotakis. Retrieved from http://www.ahistoryofgreece.com/biography/mitsotakis.htm

Mitterrand, François (1916–1996)

François Mitterrand is the only French president who successfully completed two full 7-year terms. His long political career put him into light as soon as in 1947, when he became the youngest minister of Paul Ramadier's socialist government, in charge of the war veterans, and lasted for nearly half a century, with a long penance as one of the opposition leaders during the 1960s and the '70s.

A superb tactician, as well in political parties politicking as in campaigning, his stature increased when he made it to the second round of voting against incumbent president General Charles de Gaulle, for the 1965 presidential election. Though he did not win then, he appeared as a strong opponent. For the official campaign television broadcasts, in order to avoid boring monologues, he had cleverly staged token interviews by a well-known friendly journalist, Françoise Giroud.

Not at ease in less formal events, like debates, Mitterrand allegedly thought that one of the main reasons of his defeat in the 1974 presidential run against Válery Giscard d'Estaing was his weakness during the televised debate before the final round of voting. In 1977, he also clearly lost ground in another televised debate against then Prime Minister Raymond Barre. He was therefore very cautious in organizing very precisely his comeback for the 1981 presidential election. His preparation for the "decisive" televised debate was most thorough, with impeccable results. He even had dental surgery in order to sculpt his upper canines, wore new tailored suits, and so on. He also went through a careful media training, learning how to boomerang some of the 7-year-old sound bites of his opponent Válery Giscard d'Estaing. The preparation had been trusted to friendly television director Serge Moatti, who had drawn as a rule that the candidates could not interrupt each other—since he knew Mitterrand was not very good in unprepared responses.

For the 1981 campaign, Mitterrand had also hired one of the best political consultants, Jacques Seguela, who cleverly targeted his campaign to the right, with an easygoing slogan La Force Tranquille ("The quiet strength"), able to have some centrist voters join and forget that he was a candidate for the left (posters posturing him in front of a traditional country church helped to that effect).

During most of his two terms, from 1984 on, Mitterrand's communication as president was meticulously organized by another consultant, Jacques Pilhan, who staged rare and original television appearances. One of his most notorious achievements was a talk show with a popular anchorman, Yves Mourousi, where aging Mitterrand was exposed as still being able to understand the French youngsters' specific expressions and vocabulary. Broadcasted on April 28, 1985, it again drew favorable media attention to him and was the first step of his second presidential winning streak.

At the time, Mitterrand had transformed himself into a master of television and never failed, even when his age and sickness might have betrayed him. He set an example of what can be achieved by tenacious work in learning about media use for a political result.

Philippe J. Maarek

Further Readings

Attali, J. (1993–1995). Verbatim (3 vols.). Paris: Fayard.
Giesbert, F.-O. (1996). François Mitterrand, une vie [François Mitterrand, a life]. Paris: Seuil.

Modernization

Modernization is a vague concept. It is meant to indicate a process of complex social change that is taken to be linked with an increasing rationalization of the society and the individual. Modernization denotes a cluster of social processes, such as the taking over of scientifically based technologies, the proliferation of a state-sponsored system of education, urbanization, secularization, increasing interdependence within the society, an increase in political rights, and the introduction of mass media. Research on the relationship between modernization and mass media (communication and development research) emerged in the United States after World War II and had an important role in the propaganda battle between the Soviet and the non-Soviet forces for the allegiance of the peoples in the nonindustrial world.

The mass media were credited with speeding up the modernization process, whether as educational instruments or as "mobility multiplier." It was believed that the mass media could develop modern personalities. The American development aid policy involved the convergence-theoretical idea that ultimately modernization always and everywhere will have identical effects. This policy, also aiming at keeping communism in check, ironically corresponded exactly to the thought developed by Karl Marx in the introduction to Capital: "The country that is more developed industrially only shows, to the less developed, the image of its own future."

Daniel Lerner's (1958) The Passing of Traditional Society has for a long time been viewed as the standard work on the theme of mass media and modernization. Moreover, it has influenced international media policy. Modernization is regarded primarily as a communications process. Local or national cultures are seen as hindrances that have to be surmounted on the way to modern society. Modernization is considered to be linked with character change on the level of the individual. Mobile personalities in modern societies are characterized by empathy. Empathy is the capacity to see oneself in the other fellow's situation and in imaging oneself as being in strange situations, places, and times. Empathy is the prerequisite for taking on new roles as well as for adjustment to new situations. The shaping of empathic personalities is fostered in traditional societies by the introduction of mass communication.

In The Achieving Society, David McClelland (1961) emphasized the importance of the need for achievement. Ideas are in fact more important in shaping history than purely materialistic arrangements. What really counts is human resources. McClelland recommended a free press to foster modernity and to achieve an informed public. The media are to communicate knowledge of the new norms and to foster more respect for the "impersonal other." They are capable of punishment by publicity. An important step on the way to modernity is, further, the emancipation of women. Women must be so influenced by the mass media that they take on new norms and values.

On assignment from UNESCO, Wilbur Schramm, in Mass Media and National Development: The Role of Information in the Developing Countries (1964), sought to indicate the significance of mass media within the context of a program of concrete action. Free information was regarded as generally desirable. Mass media were seen as "a kind of temperature-controlling agent." Through the stimulation of aspirations the "social temperature" could be raised, and by providing explanation the "temperature" could be lowered. An improved flow of information provides a climate for national development. Schramm argued a developing country should invest in a program of mass media development. The trouble with such recommendations is clear: a decision as to whether a program of mass media development and use has been well considered or not can be taken only after the fact.

Modernization processes often began with "Western domination," which went hand in hand with "national humiliation" and the erosion of traditional cultures. The results were feelings of cultural inferiority linked with self-doubt, and self-hate as well. The proliferation of television has resulted in many people being confronted for the first time with information on the possibilities of a better way of living in industrialized societies. Mass media were found in developing countries before other facets of the productive potential (the infrastructure) came near to corresponding to the level in industrialized countries. The modernized individuals became more interested in consuming than in saving and often emigrated in order to have a better quality of life. A result of the introduction of the mass media was the creation of a situation of relative deprivation, that is, affluence was portrayed as attainable, even though it was not attainable. Thus the media became a source of frustration. They could have led to a revolution of rising expectations, because there was an increasing knowledge of the possibilities of a better life, of new ideologies, and of other political systems.

The previous optimistic perspective regarding the positive effects of the dissemination of empathy via mass media has been revised by Lerner, who recognized that the contact of a less developed society with an industrialized society will visit on the developing country externally induced tensions and/or demands. The revolution of rising expectations resulted in rising frustrations and inspired populist movements in countries in the Third World.

Nowadays, modernization theory, which had influenced media policy until the 1970s, has been replaced by dependency theories, which emphasize the power of the media to hinder development.

Michael Kunczik

See also Democratization, Role of the Media in; Dependency Theory, Media; Globalization; Schramm, Wilbur

Further Readings

Frey, F. W. (1973). Communication and development. In I. de Sola Pool et al. (Eds.), Handbook of communication (pp. 337–461). Chicago: Rand McNally.

Kunczik, M. (1991). Communication and social change: A summary of theories, policies and experiences for media practitioners in the Third World (2nd ed.). Bonn, Germany: Friedrich-Ebert-Stiftung.

Lerner, D. (1958). The passing of traditional society. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.

Lerner, D. (1968). Modernization: I. Social aspects. In D. Sills (Ed.), International encyclopedia of the social sciences (Vol. 10, pp. 386–395). New York: Macmillan Company & Free Press.

Lerner, D., & Schramm, W. (Eds.). (1967). Communication and change in developing countries. Honolulu, HI: East-West Center Press.

McClelland, D. (1961). The achieving society. Princeton, NJ: Van Nostrand.

Schramm, W. (1964). Mass media and national development: The role of information in the developing countries. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Mohammed VI (1963–)

Mohammed VI, born in Rabat, Morocco, on August 21, 1963, obtained a doctorate in law from a French university. King Mohammed VI ascended to the throne on July 23, 1999, following the death of his father, King Hassan II. As Amir Al-Mumineen (Commander of the Faithful) in Morocco, King Mohammed VI is both a political and spiritual leader.

With the motto "It is now time for authority to serve the people, and not for the people to serve authority," King Mohammed VI started what he called the "New Era" of political modernization, where a new concept of authority based on accountability, human rights, and individual freedom was introduced.

After King Mohammed VI had dismissed the unpopular Driss Basri, his father's interior minister since 1979, he allowed political exiles back into the country and established an independent commission to compensate victims of human rights violations and guarantee freedom of press. He imposed a zero tolerance policy toward corruption and often reminded his government that he is watching. These spectacular political changes have fueled political media gossips.

Fully aware of the role of the mass media, King Mohammed VI appointed new senior officials for leading the national television and the news agency. This has given the official media a new impulse.

The king owes his popularity not only to the liberal style of government but also to genuine modesty. His name has become associated with social programs designed to help the deprived sectors of society, including the poor, the elderly, and the handicapped. King Mohammed VI has unbanned Ahmed Sanoussi, better known as "Bziz," Morocco's leading satirist, to present the latest television promotion for the royal charity for poor people. He is lauded in the national and international media as the "king of the poor" because of his marked and immediate concern and compassion toward the deprived.

In his first national televised address, the king pledged to continue Morocco's development. He defended women's rights and spoke against poverty. For him, Morocco's problems are "poverty, misery, and illiteracy."

Mohammed VI, a media-friendly figure, is behind the transformation of the Moroccan media landscape. In September 2002, he created the High Authority of the Audiovisual Communication (HAAC). In November 2004, the parliament unanimously adopted a new law on the audio-visual communication that will regulate the liberalization, modernize the broadcasting system, and consolidate the democratic process.

To boost its declining audience rating, Moroccan national TVM has started to use the popular figure of King Mohammed VI and his image as a caring sovereign, especially during his official tours of Moroccan cities, where he managed to touch the hearts and minds of the youths. This has given a new dimension to the news bulletin.

During the first year of his reign, Mohammed VI did not give any media interviews. On June 26, 2000, he started his media contact with an exclusive interview with Time magazine, which placed his image on a cover page under the title "The Cool King." Mohammed VI is no conformist and no conservative. He personified a modern style of leadership. His wife appeared in public, and the press was allowed to photograph her, an open rupture with traditions and a sign of modernity. His wife does not bear the title of queen, but was granted the title of "Her Royal Highness Princess." She is regarded as Morocco's first lady. In another break with formal protocol, Mohammed VI drives his own car and pays restaurant bills, aiming to set the example for his ministers and state senior officials to follow.

Mohammed Ibahrine

Further Readings

Ben Cherif, N. (2003). Morocco: Public TV, private business. Retrieved December 5, 2006, from http://www.cmfmena.org/magazine/features/public_tv_private_business.htm

"Whatever I do, it will never be good enough": An interview with King Mohammed VI of Morocco (2000, June 26). Time Europe, 155(25). Retrieved December 5, 2006, from http://www.time.com/time/europe/magazine/2000/0626/kingqa.html

Moi, Daniel Arap (1924–)

Daniel Toirtich Arap Moi was independent Kenya's third vice president after Jaramogi Ajuma Oginga Odinga and Joseph Murumbi. He later became the second president of the Republic after the death of Jomo Kenyatta in 1978. He adopted the slogan Nyayo, which is a Kiswahili word for "in his footsteps," obviously indicating that he would follow the development path and maintain the political system introduced by Kenyatta.

Arap Moi was born on September 2, 1924, in the small village of Kurieng'or in Tugen Hills. He was a song of a shepherd who died when Moi was only 2 years old. He spent 20 years in education as student, student teacher, and teacher before entering politics as an African member of Legislative Council in 1955. He has always been described as a humble and dedicated Christian.

Kenya's seasoned politicians did not consider Moi to be presidential material. He was a Kalenjin, one of the smaller ethnic groups in Kenya. Moi was formally in KADU (Kenya African Democratic Party) before it merged with KANU (Kenya African National Union). During his time as vice president under Kenyatta, Moi functioned in the shadow of Kenyatta, performing ceremonial roles of very little political significance.

Though Moi was vice president, the Kikuyu politicians who were close to Kenyatta did not want him to ascend to power and attempted to change the Constitution in 1976, but they failed. Moi's presidency was slow and cautious in its early stages of tenure until he consolidated his own political base in the country and in the ruling party KANU. After consolidating his power, Moi became very vicious and ruthless to any dissenting voices.

Though a poor public speaker, Moi is remembered for his populist rhetoric and acts. He introduced the provision of free milk to schoolchildren and advocated national land reform. In his initial stages of his leadership, Moi appeared a true democrat. But by 1980 he started to become unpopular. From 1982, several amendments were made to the Constitution to strengthen Moi's rule and undermine democracy and good governance. Finally, under Moi, Kenya was legally converted to a workable one-party state. Under Moi, the Parliament became progressively weaker and the presidency more powerful.

In 1982, the airmen attempted a coup on the Moi government. In 1986 the opposition to Moi's rule was mounting by the day, both from clandestine movements and from the church. By 1991 the forces against Moi were becoming stronger, and Moi responded by detaining those who were agitating for the expansion of the democratic principles and space in Kenya. Moi hated the media and accused the media of fronting for the interests of foreigners. However Moi's dictatorial tendencies began to be checked after the amendment of section 2A of the Kenyan Constitution that allowed for multiparty democracy. However Moi (who Jaramogi Oginga Odinga described in his book Not Yet Uhuru as a giraffe with a long neck that sees far) once again outmaneuvered his opponents and was elected president in the first multiparty elections. He repeated the feat in 1997. His term ended in 2002.

Moi's 24 years of leadership are remembered especially for the perpetuation of a personality cult, signified by the numerous institutions named after him. Since his term ended, Moi lives in retirement but still meddles in politics, to the chagrin of many Kenyans. Moi has also has started a foundation—Moi African Foundation—to tackle issues of conflict, poverty, and philanthropy. Like Kenyatta before him, Moi perfected the culture of dictatorship, corruption, nepotism, and tribalism. More significant is the fact that he left the economy of the country in shambles.

Christopher Odhiambo

See also Kenyatta, Jomo

Morales, Evo (1959–)

Juan Evo Morales Ayma is the 80th president of the Republic of Bolivia. He began his political career as a union leader of the cocalero, the coca crop peasants. As soon as the ethnic-indigenous political movements in Bolivia started to gain political weight, he extended his political rhetoric including indigenous demands and issues. As leader of the still-young MAS (Movimiento al Socialismo—Movement Toward Socialism), he was elected member of the Bolivian Parliament in 2002 and president of Bolivia in the elections of December 2005.

Evo Morales has a very intuitive understanding of media. Of modest origin and never having studied anything related to communications, he nevertheless was able to use the media for his political purposes in a tactically very smart way throughout his political career. Since elected president, Morales is, of course, much more limited in using these tactic. Interestingly enough, Morales showed himself to be open to professional counsel during the presidential election campaign of 2005: His campaign was obviously conducted in a very professional manner, stressing his strengths—his down-to-earth ways, his accessibility and charisma. At the same time, he avoided appearing in candidate debates, probably knowing that he wouldn't be able to compete with the much more elaborate rhetoric of his middle- and upper-class opponents. His campaign was able to identify his person with a climate of much-wanted political change among many Bolivians. The results of the elections were distinct: 53.4% of electors voted Evo Morales for president. In the first 6 months of his administration and in a strongly emotional atmosphere of political optimism, Morales and the media lived in a kind of "honeymoon." Few skeptical voices were heard or lines were read, even reaching embarrassing moments of a cult of personality when describing Morales's humble origins. It is no secret that he was strongly supported in his communication work, particularly by Venezuela. The Venezuelan state-owned oil company PdVSA broadcast several TV commercials in Bolivia highlighting the Cuban and Venezuelan literacy and medical care programs being carried out on Bolivian soil.

Morales's authoritarian ways first were exposed to the media, when voices critical of his administration and his offensive style appeared. He immediately suspected the media of wanting to overthrow his administration. Morales's very rudimental understanding of freedom of the press became more obvious when he was appointing executive positions to state media. But possibly the most overt attempt to dominate the media landscape in Bolivia is the project of creating 30 "indigenous" radio stations, financed by the Venezuelan government. This project seeks to cut down the strong influence of radio broadcast channels of the Catholic Church in the country. The real challenge to freedom of the press in Bolivia is currently being faced in Sucre, in which a constitutional assembly is meeting to work out a new Constitution. This assembly is largely dominated by the MAS, and few of these are known to respect basic civil liberties. Taking into account that Morales has difficulties in understanding the role of media in a democracy, the current situation is not a very good one for the Bolivian media or freedom of press in the country.

Peter-Alberto Behrens

Moseley Braun, Carol (1947–)

Carol Moseley Braun was the first African American woman elected to the U.S. Senate. During her groundbreaking political career, Moseley Braun worked as an Illinois state legislator, a congresswoman, and an ambassador. She also campaigned for the presidency in 2003.

Carol Moseley Braun graduated from the Chicago public school system and attended the University of Illinois–Chicago, earning her Bachelor of Arts degree in 1969. She earned her Juris Doctor from the University of Chicago School of Law in 1972. Moseley Braun was elected to represent the Hyde Park section of Chicago in the Illinois state General Assembly in 1978. After 10 years in the state legislature, she was elected the Cook County recorder of deeds. Moseley Braun was the first woman and first African American politician elected to a countywide executive office in Illinois.

The 1992 election year was a year of change and expansion and has been remembered in American political history as the "year of the woman." This influx of women candidates was linked to an unusual number of retirements by long-term politicians, congressional redistricting, a national anti-incumbent climate, and public fallout in the wake of the Clarence Thomas confirmation hearings. Buoyed by these factors, Moseley Braun ousted incumbent U.S. Senator Alan Dixon to become the first African American elected to the Senate since Reconstruction. Braun's door-to-door campaign tactics and grassroots support overcame the obstacles of limited television exposure and limited finances.

Newly elected Senator Moseley Braun served on the Senate Judiciary Committee, the same body that was spotlighted during the Clarence Thomas confirmation hearings. She challenged the Senate's support of the Confederate flag and its use by the United Daughters of the Confederacy (UDC). Her opposition to the reauthorization of a design patent on the UDC's logo was threatened by longtime North Carolina Senator Jesse Helms. On July 22, 1993, Moseley Braun launched a successful filibuster to counter Helm's UDC amendment. She refused to yield the floor and argued that this was an important vote about race and the painful history of race relations in the United States. Moseley Braun's emotional discussion of race on the Senate floor was a historical moment in Congress. She spent most of her historic term advocating legislation to ensure equal opportunities to all Americans and to improve the nation's schools. Unfortunately, her term was also marked by questions of unethical financial and personal practices.

Following her unsuccessful reelection bid, President William J. Clinton named Moseley Braun a special consultant to the Department of Education. She also served as the ambassador to New Zealand in 1999. In 2003, Moseley Braun announced her candidacy for the presidency to an audience at Howard University. Moseley Braun argued that she was the best alternative to the current administration and encouraged more women to enter politics. Dubbed the "Lady in Red," she was the only woman in a group of nine candidates vying for the Democratic nomination. In the end, Moseley Braun's campaign failed due to limited funding.

Monika R. Alston

Further Readings

Gill, L. (1997). African American women in Congress: Forming and transforming history. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.

Green, P. M. (1992). Braun's dazzling win as downstate fails Dixon; Bush and Clinton pile up delegates. Illinois Issues, pp. 10–13.

Motivated Reasoning

See Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory

Moyers, William (Bill) (1934–)

William (Bill) Moyers was born Billy Don Moyers in Hugo, Oklahoma. He was a public servant during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, and he is currently a journalist and news commentator. Moyers was raised in Texas and began his journalism career as a 16-year-old reporter at the Marshall News Messenger in Marshall, Texas. He studied journalism at North Texas University. As a summer intern for Texas Senator Lyndon Baines Johnson in 1954, he managed Johnson's personal mail.

Moyers then transferred to the University of Texas at Austin. He wrote for the Daily Texan newspaper and studied at the University of Edinburgh as a Rotary International Fellow. Also while in Austin, Moyers worked for KTBC Radio and Television, a station owned by Lady Bird Johnson, as an assistant to the news editor. Moyers graduated from the University of Texas at Austin in 1956.

In 1957, he graduated from Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary in Fort Worth, Texas, with a bachelor's of divinity. After working as minister, he was ordained in 1959. He worked as a Christian ethics lecturer at Baylor University for a short time.

When Lyndon B. Johnson campaigned for the 1960 Democratic presidential nomination, Moyers worked as a top aide. After John F. Kennedy won the presidential nomination, Moyers served as a liaison between Kennedy and Johnson, who was Kennedy's vice-presidential candidate. In 1961, Moyers then served as the associate director of public affairs for the newly created Peace Corps for the Kennedy administration. From 1962 to 1963, he was the deputy director of the Peace Corps.

When Johnson became president after Kennedy's assassination, Moyers assisted in organizing and supervising the 1964 Great Society legislative task forces. He also played a key role in Johnson's 1964 presidential campaign, served as White House press secretary from 1965 to 1967, and served as Johnson's informal chief of staff until 1966.

After Moyers' years in public service, he served as publisher for Newsday, a Long Island, New York, daily newspaper, from 1967 to 1970. His long relationship with the Public Broadcasting System (PBS) began in 1971 when he hosted news program Bill Moyers' Journal. Bill Moyers' Journal was broadcast until 1981, with the exception of a brief absence from 1976 to 1977. Moyers also worked at CBS as editor and chief correspondent for CBS Reports from 1976 to 1980 and as a senior news analyst and commentator for the CBS Evening News with Dan Rather from 1981 to 1986.

Moyers and his wife, Judith Davidson Moyers, created Public Affairs Television in 1986. Some of his best-known programs include A Walk Through the 20th Century, Bill Moyers' World of Ideas, Facing the Truth with Bill Moyers, The Power of Myth with Joseph Campbell, and Moyers on America. He worked as a senior analyst and commentator for NBC News in 1995 and as a host of MSNBC's Insight program in 1996.

He hosted NOW with Bill Moyers, a news journal on PBS, from 2002 to late 2004. In 2005, Moyers hosted Wide Angle, an internationally focused news program on PBS. Moyers received a Lifetime Achievement Award Emmy in 2006, an Individual Peabody Award in 2004, a George Polk Career Award in 2004, and has received more than 30 Emmy Awards.

Kristen D. Landreville

Further Readings

Moyers, B. (2004). Moyers on America: A journalist and his times. New York: New Press.

MTV Rock the Vote

See Rock the Vote

Mubarak, Hosni (1928–)

Mohamed Hosni Said Mubarak was born on May 4, 1928, in Kafr-El Meselha, Al-Menoufeya governorate. He graduated from the Egyptian Military Academy and the Air Force Academy in 1952. Later on, in 1964, he studied at the Frunze Military Academy in the USSR.

Mubarak went up the chain of command, holding the positions of pilot, instructor, squadron leader, and base commander. In 1964, he headed the Egyptian military delegation to the USSR, and during 1967 to 1972, he was appointed director of the Air Force Academy and chief of staff of the Egyptian Air Force. In 1972 he became the commander of the Air Force and deputy minister for military affairs. Due to his outstanding performance during the 1973 War, he was promoted to the rank of air marshal. In April 1975, he was named vice president of Egypt, and in 1978 he was selected to serve as vice chairman of the National Democratic Party.

After the assassination of President Sadat on October 6, 1981, Mubarak was elected the president of Egypt on October 14 and consequently became the chairman of the National Democratic Party; he is still so today. As a matter of fact, Mubarak came to power at one of Egypt's lowest points internally and externally. He inherited a country that was buckling under severe economic and political strain; the growing influence of extremists, high rates of unemployment, government debts, excessive population growth, and slow economic growth are some examples that give a grim view of the status. Additionally, most of the Arab world had forsaken Egypt after Sadat's controversial overtures to Israel. Notably, Mubarak pledged to continue Sadat's policies outside and inside.

Internationally, despite criticizing many Israeli policies, Mubarak has maintained peace with Israel, mended relations with other Arab states to the extent to be considered the most powerful leader of the Middle East, and initiated a policy he called "positive neutrality" toward the great powers that maintained Egypt's ties with both the United States and Russia.

Internally, Mubarak instituted a vigorous economic recovery programs such as privatization and economic and financial reform initiatives, battled population growth through programs for family planning, and inched toward political reform, in particular freedom of speech. Moreover, although Mubarak himself was a target of several assassination plots and one close call that took place in June 1995 in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, at the hands of the fundamentalists, he has fairly succeeded to lessen the influence of religious extremism.

Mubarak was reelected in national referenda for three successive terms of 6 years each, in 1987, 1993, and 1999. However, in 2005, he won the presidency for a fifth term in a contested election marred by low turnout (23%). Lifting the state of emergency, presidential succession, and comprehensive political reform are, among other issues, at the top of the opposition agenda.

Saleh A. Ahmed

Further Readings

Cox, V. (2002). Hosni Mubarak: Major world leaders. New York: Chelsea House.

Ibrahim, S. E. (2002). Egypt Islam and democracy: Critical essays. Cairo: American University in Cairo Press.

Kienle, A. G. (2001). A grand delusion: Democracy and economic reform in Egypt. London: I. B. Tauris.

Presdient Mubarak's Web site: http://www.mubarak2005.com/arabic/pre.asp Solecki, J. (1990). Hosni Mubarak: World leaders, past and present. New York: Chelsea House.

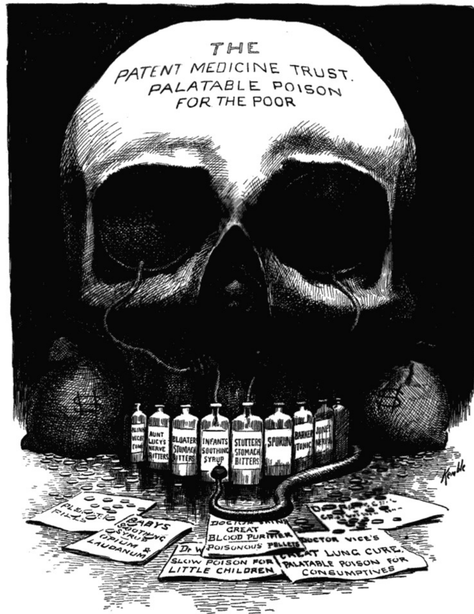
Muckrakers, Muckraking

The term muckraker is applied to describe journalists and publicists who explore and expose misconduct of public figures and institutions or deplorable social conditions. The word gained prominence in the first decade of the 20th century. President Theodore Roosevelt introduced the term muckraker into public debate, using it in his dedication speech of the House

Collier's
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY



DEATH'S LABORATORY

Patent medicines are poisoning people throughout America to-day. Babies who cry are fed laudanum under the name of syrup. Women are led to injure themselves for life by reading in the papers about the meaning of backache. Young men and boys are robbed and contaminated by vicious criminals who lure them to their dens through seductive advertisements

DRAWN BY E. W. KEMBLE

In a series of 11 articles he wrote for Collier's Weekly in 1905, investigative journalist Samuel Hopkins Adams exposed many of the false claims made about patent medicines. The series, "The Great American Fraud," had a huge impact and led to the passage of the 1906 Pure Food and Drug Act. The shocking stories of the patent medicine menace were accompanied by startling images, such as "Death's Laboratory," pictured here.

Source: Food and Drug Administration.

Office Building on April 14, 1906, in Washington, D.C., to attack the scandalmongering reporting of certain journalists and publications. Referring to John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (1678), the president likened the journalists to the "Man with the Muck Rake" who was so occupied with raking the filth off the floor that he did not know when to stop. Although Roosevelt shared some objectives of the progressive reformers, his criticism was focused on reporters who, always looking for scoops, tended to manufacture and scandalize stories. In fact, for Roosevelt the real villains were media proprietors such as William Randolph Hearst, who were seen as a driving force behind the yellow journalism and irresponsible sensationalism of the day. Roosevelt's wrath was incurred by a series of articles on the U.S. Senate in Cosmopolitan magazine, which was owned by Hearst. In the first issue of "The Treason of the Senate," published in March 1906, author David Graham Phillips sketched a polemic portrayal of U.S. Senator Chauncey Depew, depicting him as a wicked and corrupt politician, a puppet of the large railway companies. Phillips's account was based more on speculations and assumptions than on factual evidence, but the accusations were still very effective in irreparably damaging Depew's reputation. Albeit Roosevelt did not mention any journalist or publisher by name, from his private correspondence it is clear that it was particularly Hearst he was aiming at.

In the 1930s, when first studies on the Muckrakers (C. Regier) or Crusaders for American Liberalism (L. Filler) were published, a positive notion was attributed to the term. Seen in the broader context of the progressive era, muckrakers were hailed as advocates of civil reform. The term became almost a title of distinction, a badge of honor. There is still some discussion of whether muckraking was a movement, when it actually started, and who belonged to it. Though Henry Demarest Lloyd's articles on Standard Oil and other trusts of the 1880s, and Jacob A. Riis's documentary work on the social conditions in the tenements of New York City of the 1890s are often cited as early examples of muckraking, this new style of political reporting really began to flourish at the onset of the 20th century. Lincoln Steffens' exposure of municipal corruption in St. Louis and other American cities, Ida Tarbell's reporting on the business practices of Standard Oil, Ray Stannard Baker's articles on railroad companies, Charles E. Russell's writings on political machines and social housing, or Upton Sinclair's description of working conditions in Chicago's meat packing industries are all famous examples of muckraking. Many other muckrakers could be mentioned.

This literature of exposure and protest was spread through a new type of inexpensive mass magazine. Founded by Samuel S. McClure in 1893, McClure's Magazine evolved as the leading muckraking journal. Within a decade it could boost its circulation to 500,000 copies per week. Other magazines, such as the American Magazine, Collier's, Cosmopolitan, Everybody's, Hampton's, the Independent, Pearson's, or Success jumped into the fray, sending their reporters to peer into the hidden recesses of corporations and factories, political machines and city halls, hospitals and public utilities. In contrast to newspaper reporting, the magazine journalists had more time for research and more space for expounding the case. The muckrakers pursued their task with relentless energy and great zeal, combining traditional techniques of interviews and observation with new methods of political reporting, making ample use of printed materials and official documents, or presenting authoritative opinion of experts.

It is estimated that the combined circulation of those periodicals reached 12 million readers per month. Taking into account that muckraking exposés produced headlines in the newspaper press, the total effect was even greater. The crusading journalists certainly left their mark on the discourses about civil reform. The Pure Food and Drug Act and the Hepburn Act (both 1906) or the constitutional amendment reforming the U.S. Senate (1913) would hardly have been accomplished without the public pressure continuously sustained by the muckrakers. Thus muckraking is closely linked to progressivism and its political issues. When the United States entered World War I, however, its crusading spirit was subsumed into the nation's efforts to win the war. Once the war had ended, the American public yearned for normalcy, not reform.

Muckraking, as well as the more current term "investigative reporting," generally associated with Watergate, is part of an important tradition of American journalism that has its roots in colonial times but (occasionally) can still prove its force. A prominent example of a modern muckraker is Seymour M. Hersh, who first reported extensively on the My Lai massacre in Vietnam and was just recently involved in the exposure of the Abu Ghraib scandal in Iraq.

Daniel Gossel

Further Readings

Applegate, E. (1997). Journalistic advocates and muckrakers: Three centuries of crusading writers. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.

Ettema, J., & Glasser, T. (1998). Custodians of conscience: Investigative journalism and public virtue. New York: Columbia University Press.

Filler, L. (1996). Muckraking and progressivism in the American tradition. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction. (First published under the title Crusaders for American Liberalism, 1939)

Hofstadter, R. (1955). The age of reform: From Bryan to FDR. New York: Vintage Books.

Leonard, T. (1986). The power of the press: The birth of American political reporting. New York: Oxford University Press.

Miraldi, R. (1990). Muckraking and objectivity: Journalism's colliding traditions. New York: Greenwood.

Miraldi, R. (Ed.). (2000). The muckrakers: Evangelical crusaders. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Pilger, J. (Ed.). (2004). Tell me no lies: Investigative journalism and its triumphs. London: Jonathan Cape.

Regier, C. (1957/1932). The era of the muckrakers. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Serrin, J., & Serrin, W. (Eds.). (2002). Muckraking! The journalism that changed America. New York: New Press.

Weinberg, A., & Weinberg, L. (Eds.). (2001/1961). The muckrakers. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Muhammed Cartoon Events

The so-called Muhammed cartoon events took place in the fall of 2005 and spring of 2006. On September 30, 2005, 12 drawings of the prophet Muhammed—including one with a turban shaped as a bomb with a burning fuse—were published by Jyllands-Posten, a provincial newspaper situated in Denmark. Reactions to mediated news about the cartoons triggered a global debate about the proper uses of press freedom and self-censorship versus blasphemy and multicultural considerations. Pros and cons were diffused worldwide, combining traditional mass media, word of mouth, and religious preaching with text messaging and e-mail grapevines.

By January 2006 anticartoon riots had broken out in Lebanon, Syria, Iran, and Pakistan. Danish and Norwegian flags were burned in the streets and embassies picketed, documented live by Al Jazeera. A number of Middle Eastern countries withdrew their ambassadors from Denmark in protest. The State Department of the United States declared the publishing of the cartoons unnecessary, insensitive, disrespectful, and wrong. On February 3, 2006, the cartoons became the focal topic of Friday prayers in mosques in the majority of Islamic congregations around the globe. A boycott of Danish goods was declared in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. Supermarkets in Egypt, Syria, and Oman followed suit. A reward of $1 million was offered to anyone killing one or more of the cartoonists. At this point, 143 newspapers and Web sites in 56 countries, including France Soir, Die Welt, De Volkskrant, and Corriere della Sera, had reprinted the cartoons. On February 27th the cartoons made the agenda of the summit of European Union foreign ministers, and not until the end of March 2006 did influential Islamic authorities officially proclaim an end to the cartoon protests.

The Muhammed cartoon events clearly illustrate the prevailing power of political imagery. It also demonstrates the power of old print media combined with new electronic media in an age of perpetual satellite news coverage. Fundamentally, the events must be interpreted as political priming and framing in the aftermath of September 11, 2001, radicalizing political sentiments fueled by local conflicts concerning freedom of expression and competing political values in multicultural contexts.

The very notion that a newspaper may print cartoons countering the official policy of a nation state is foreign to many religious leaders and citizens originating from authoritarian regimes. Freedom of expression, however, is a defining premise for societies heralding the notion of public opinion-driven democracy. Within this tradition, antireligious satire has a long history of provoking political events. In line with this, the local publication of the Muhammed cartoons raised global concerns in terms of fundamentalist censorship and political conflicts related to the integration of immigrants. Religious and political leaders in the Middle East effectively framed the events in order to draw attention away from domestic conflicts, while competing elites around the globe used the events for national promotion of a broad variety of political purposes. In this fashion, the local acts of a provocative editor in a small and politically insignificant country fueled a worldwide crisis reflecting political differences in communication of press freedom, blasphemy, and multiculturalism.

Anker Brink Lund

Further Readings

Meyer, G., & Lund, A. B. (2006). Making room for pluralism by re-defining journalism: An essay on practical reasoning. International Journal of Communication Ethics, 3, 51–59.

Sumiala-Seppänen, J., Lundby, K., & Salokangas, R. (Eds.). (2006). Implications of the sacred in (post)modern media. Gothenburg, Sweden: Nordicom.

Murrow, Edward R. (1908–1965)

Edward R. Murrow was born Egbert Roscoe Murrow near Greensboro, North Carolina. A radio and television broadcaster for CBS, he is credited with creating honest, respectable, and courageous news reporting standards in broadcast journalism. Murrow is also credited with helping to end the "Red Scare" through his See It Now reports on Senator Joseph McCarthy.

Murrow's parents moved the family to Washington State from North Carolina when Murrow was 5 years old. While attending Washington State University, Murrow served as student body president, president of the National Student Federation, and was a top cadet in the ROTC program. Murrow remained president of the National Student Federation after his graduation from WSU in 1930 with a Bachelor of Arts degree in speech.

From 1932 to 1935, he worked as the assistant director of the Institute of International Education and served as the assistant secretary of the Emergency Committee in Aid of Displaced Foreign Scholars, which helped German scholars who had been dismissed from academic positions.

In 1935, Murrow began his lifelong broadcasting career for CBS as the director of Talks and Education. About 2 years later he became the European director and was transferred to London, where he reported the beginnings of World War II and the Nazi march into Vienna, Austria. His trademark phrase, "This is London," was heard at the beginning of each radio broadcast during World War II. Murrow provided firsthand accounts of the air raids and bomb explosions Britain experienced. Murrow's other hallmark phrase, "Good night, and good luck," closed his broadcasts, which often included German bombing raids. The CBS offices and BBC studios from which Murrow broadcasted were bombed at least once. After the war, Murrow returned to CBS in the United States and became the vice president of News, Education, and Discussion Programs. He resigned from this position in 1947, resumed broadcasting, and became a director of CBS in 1949.

Murrow traveled to Korea to report on the war in 1950. The weekly news digest, Hear It Now, which was based on an earlier project by him and Fred Friendly called I Can Hear It Now, reported on the news of the day and how the war affected people on an individual level.

See It Now became a very successful news documentary program that he narrated and coproduced with Friendly. The program's popularity was attributed to exposing the audience to previously unfilmed areas. Murrow is credited with helping to stop the Red Scare by his focus on Senator McCarthy in an episode that earned him a Peabody Award. Murrow also began Person to Person, Small World, and CBS Reports.

Murrow retired from CBS in 1961 and presided over the U.S. Information Agency under President John F. Kennedy. He was forced to retire from that position in 1964 due to lung cancer. Murrow died on April 27, 1965, on his farm in New York. He is remembered as a dedicated and sincere broadcaster who inspired, communicated, and educated the world for millions of listeners and viewers. His effective style of broadcast journalism has had a profound impact on the profession. Numerous books have been written about him, and a 2005 Oscar-nominated film, Good Night, and Good Luck, focused on his struggles against Senator McCarthy.

Kristen D. Landreville

See also McCarthy Hearings

Further Readings

Edwards, B. (2004). Edward R. Murrow and the birth of broadcast journalism. New York: Wiley.

Kendrick, A. (1969). Prime time: The life of Edward R. Murrow. Hinckley, IL: Little, Brown.

Music and Politics

Music has long been considered political. The philosopher Plato regarded music as such a powerful political weapon that he suggested it be banned from the Republic. Music is often a source of protest. From the labor songs of the early 1900s sung by members of the Industrial Workers of the World, to the protest songs of Woody Guthrie and their reinterpretation by 1960s songwriters such as Bob Dylan and Joni Mitchell, to more contemporary protest music such as punk and hip-hop, music and protest are inextricably linked in popular culture. Many argue music played an integral role in bringing down both the Soviet Union and the Apartheid government of South Africa. The relationship between music and protest songs seems to be the most obvious link between music and politics, but it is not the only one.

That music is political is undeniable, but what is music, what is politics, and how do the two relate? Music is very difficult to define, as there is no single definition that encompasses all of the complexities of music. Music is simultaneously a form of communication and an art form. For purposes of clarity, we can understand music as a set of sounds organized by human activity and the process of understanding those sounds by a human listener. From this starting point, we can find in the definition of music the role of both a composer and an audience; music cannot be music without both of these things. We find the political aspects of music in both its communicative and artistic forms.

Just as it is very difficult to define music, there is no single satisfactory definition of politics, and each definition will affect our understanding of music and politics. With some definitions of politics, there is little room to understand music as political, but with other definitions, the political aspects of music are more evident. For instance, if politics is understood as elections, legislation, and lobbying, music seems to play little or no role in politics, save for the debates that occur regarding the regulation of music. If, however, politics is understood as the process through which groups define themselves, their goals, and their demands, music can be seen as an important aspect of these definitions through its communicative role. Furthermore, if politics is understood as the challenging of accepted norms, truths, and ideas, music becomes even more political. The latter two of these definitions of politics are central to an understanding of the relation of music to politics. We can suggest, then, that music and politics are related when politics is defined as both the process of creating a group and advancing that group's claims, and as the challenging of accepted and dominant meanings, ideas, and norms.

For groups to make a political challenge, they must first create a common understanding of themselves. This is often called "collective identity." Many sociologists of music suggest that music is a central aspect in the process creating a collective identity. Music helps us understand who we are on both the individual and group level through communicating aspects of ourselves and communities back to us. This can be observed at the societal level through such things as national anthems or folk musical traditions that are fundamental aspects of culture, such as blues music in American culture. It can also be observed at the level of smaller groups, such as subcultures and social movements. The early American labor movement, for example, had its own set of musical traditions and songs that helped carry the central ideas of labor across time and space. Many subcultures—punk, rave, and hip-hop, for instance—are largely defined by a common involvement in a musical style. Music assists in creating collective identities through providing a ground on which members of a group can communicate with each other, and on which groups can construct and support collective identity. Music provides the soundtrack to these collective identities. Furthermore, music as a form of communication often helps group spread their messages to other members and to the society as a whole. This is often done through what are often called "political ballads." Music not only helps groups create a collective identity but also helps them communicate their political challenges.

Many contemporary theorists argue that politics consists of challenging the dominant meanings, ideas, and norms of our time. This argument rests on the idea that the world is ordered through the meanings and ideas that abound about this world, and that challenging these meanings is a political act. This can be seen as symbolic, or discursive, politics. Music's communicative and aesthetic elements both contain the possibility of symbolic challenge. That is, music is often a part of symbolic politics. Not only does political music often communicate the demands and concerns of political groups, but it often challenges mainstream ideas. Political songs often suggest alternative understandings of the world and humanity's role in the world. Furthermore, music's artistic or aesthetic aspects can challenge the very structures of meaning that this understanding of politics suggests order the world. There is a long tradition in continental philosophy that suggests music and art exist outside of the everyday world. Twentieth-century philosophers, particularly the members of the Frankfurt School, suggest that music allows us to dream of a life other than our own. This dreaming, or fantasizing, these theories suggest, makes us free. Critical theorists regard music, in this formulation, as not merely political, but potentially a tool for liberation.

Zachary A. Bowden

See also Critical Theory; Language and Politics; Political Culture

Further Readings

Barthes, R. (1977). Image/music/text. New York: Hill & Wang.

Eyerman, R., & Jamison, A. (1998). Music and social movements: Mobilizing traditions in the twentieth century. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Frith, S. (1996). Performing rites: On the value of popular music. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Gracyk, T. (2001). I wanna be me: Rock music and the politics of identity, Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

Marcuse, H. (1966). Eros and civilization; A philosophical inquiry into Freud. Boston: Beacon Press.

Muskie, Edmund (1914–1996)

Edmund Muskie served as the 58th secretary of state (1980–1981) under President Jimmy Carter. He also served as house member, governor, and senator of Maine. Muskie was a prominent leader during the development of the Democratic Party in Maine. The state had been a Republican stronghold, notable due to its being only one of two states carried by Alf Landon over Franklin Roosevelt in the 1936 presidential election. Muskie was a leader in the environmental movement and became one of the first environmentalist to be elected to the U.S. Senate. Edmund Muskie's lasting legacy is the large amount of environmental legislation for which he was either directly responsible or supported. His crowning achievement was the Clean Air Act of 1970, which was the first federal legislation to implement national environmental goals.

Muskie was nominated as a vice-presidential candidate with sitting Vice President Hubert Humphrey running for president during the 1968 election cycle. Humphrey and Muskie lost the election to Richard Nixon and Spiro Agnew by less than 1% of the vote (42.7% to 43.4%). The Electoral College, however, was not as close. Humphrey-Muskie took 13 states and 191 electoral votes, while Nixon-Agnew won 32 states and 301 Electoral College votes. George Wallace ran as an Independent and carried 5 southern states and their 46 electoral votes.

The 1972 Democratic presidential primary season proved traumatic for Muskie. Early during the election season, Muskie was viewed as the frontrunner, more moderate than McGovern yet firmly opposed to Richard Nixon's conduct in the Vietnam War. However, Muskie's campaign collapsed after winning the New Hampshire primary by a smaller than expected margin and his subsequent response to attacks made by letters to the editor in the Manchester Union-Leader, a newspaper in New Hampshire. The first letter claimed Muskie made disparaging remarks toward French Canadians. This was apt to soften support of much of the northern New England population. The second attack was upon Muskie's wife, Jane. The paper reported that she drank and used vulgar language during the campaign. Muskie's response was to deliver an emotionally charged speech in defense of his wife outside the newspaper's office. The press later reported that during the speech Muskie seemed unstable and was in tears. The speech shattered Muskie's image of composure and resolve and led to his ultimate defeat as the Democratic presidential nominee.

Muskie's final act of public service was to serve as Jimmy Carter's secretary of state after the resignation of Cyrus Vance. Vance, who had opposed Carter's ill-fated attempt to rescue the Iranian hostages, resigned shortly after the operation failed. Muskie then attempted to use diplomacy to end the crisis. Muskie retired from office with the inauguration of Ronald Reagan to the presidency. He was presented with the Presidential Medal of Freedom by Carter in January 1981.

Terry Robertson

See also McGovern, George

Further Readings

Muskie, E. S. (1972). Where do we go from here? In M. Goldman (Ed.), Ecology and economics: Controlling pollution in the 70s. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.

Muskie, E. S., & Rush, K. (1984). The president, the Congress, and foreign policy. New York: University Press of America.

Myers, Dee Dee

See Press Secretary, White House

N

NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People)

The NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People) is one of the oldest civil rights organizations in the United States. It was organized in 1909 by a coalition of blacks, Jews, and whites to defend the rights of minorities against systematic and pervasive social and state-sanctioned discrimination. It was formed as a grassroots membership organization, whose activities focus on challenging discriminatory practices through legal channels and the mobilization of member participation at times when mass political action is strategically necessary to accomplish its goals.

Major Interests and Accomplishments

The general interest of the NAACP is the fight for civil rights protections for American minorities, focusing specifically on promoting political, educational, economic, and social equality. The organization has been influential in advancing the agenda of, creating the rhetorical basis for, and organizing civic participation in the pursuit of these interests. In its early years, the organization protested the explicit prejudice, bigotry, and hatred of blacks portrayed in the film Birth of a Nation by D. W. Griffiths, fought segregation in the military, applied political pressure to force President Woodrow Wilson to take a public stand against lynching, and won the landmark Supreme Court case striking down segregation practices in public schools (Brown v. Board of Education).

In the 1950s and 1960s, the NAACP mobilized its membership in countless protests and mass lobbying efforts to challenge racial segregation in social venues, from eating establishments to public transportation, and to effect progress through landmark legislation, including the Equal Employment Opportunity Act, the Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1965, and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, that opened the floodgates of political participation to African Americans and other minorities. The 1960s presented a plateau of sorts for the organization. The NAACP's membership steadily declined during subsequent decades but continued its efforts to enforce legislation and other forms of progress they had helped to effect in previous years. However, the high-profile battles that galvanized the masses of blacks and other minorities were few and far between and somewhat local in their scope and reach.

The NAACP Today

The NAACP has embarked in recent years on specific efforts to increase its membership, in part by promoting youth membership and engagement in activities that continue Civil Rights-era interests, such as recent successful efforts to reauthorize and extend the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and legal challenges to the elimination of workplace and education diversity efforts through affirmative action. Much of its current visibility has come through its stepped-up ties to the entertainment industry, pressing for increased racial diversity in media—from news outlets to televisions shows, film, and ownership of minority media outlets. Along with their advocacy efforts, the organization currently focuses on issues related to religion, criminal justice, youth leadership development, health initiatives, and international affairs.

Charlton D. McIlwain

See also Civil Rights Movement; Minorities, Role in Politics; Participation, Political; Race in Politics

Further Readings

Berg, M. (2005). The ticket to freedom: The NAACP and the struggle for Black political integration. Gainesville: University of Florida Press.

Jonas, G. (2005). Freedom's sword: The NAACP and the struggle against racism in America, 1909–1969. New York: Routledge.

Nader, Ralph (1934–)

Ralph Nader has been a candidate for president of the United States in 1996, 2000, and 2004, a political activist, an attorney, and an author. He became first known to the public in 1966 when he appeared before a U.S. Senate Subcommittee on auto safety that came in the wake of his 1965 book, Unsafe at Any Speed, which examined engineering practices of American automobiles. Nader's arguments helped the public to identify with the harassment from corporate power that he was experiencing from General Motors, establish for himself a specific political agenda that he would continue to pursue, and framed him as a heroic leader, which helped to give him credibility on areas of public interest including corporate power, consumer rights, environmental issues, and feminism.

To this day he has continued to serve as attorney and activist. He led the group known as "Nader's Raiders," who investigated corruption in several governmental organizations, leading to books such as Nader's Raiders (examining the Federal Trade Commission), The Chemical Feast (Food and Drug Administration), and The Interstate Commerce Commission (Interstate Commerce Commission). His work also led to the formation of the Public Citizen, a nonprofit consumer advocacy organization, founded in 1971 and dedicated to fighting in Congress for consumer rights. Some of the major accomplishments of Nader and his organization include the creation of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) in 1979, the Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC) in 1981, and the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) in 1988. He also started several nonprofit organizations; a sampling includes Citizen Works and Democracy Rising in 2001 and Center for Justice and Democracy in 1988.

Nader is also known for his three attempts as a candidate for presidency. In 1996 he was drafted as a candidate for the Green Party but received less than 1% of the vote, spending less than $5,000 on his campaign. He had his best showing in 2000 as the nominated Green Party candidate, earning 2.7% of the vote. His campaign messages focused on promoting the environment and attacking corporate power. Winona LaDuke was his running mate for the 1996 and 2000 campaigns. In 2004 he ran as an Independent candidate with running mate Peter Camejo. Democrats were concerned Nader's entry in the 2004 presidential campaign would take away votes from John Kerry in the election and started a Stop Nader campaign, but Nader received only 0.3% of the vote and was not a factor at all.

Nader is an accomplished author and has published several books supporting his causes and positions, including The Consumer and Corporate Accountability (1973), The Good Fight: Declare Your Independence and Close the Democracy Gap (2004), and In Pursuit of Justice: Collected Writing 2000–2003 (2004).

David M. Rhea

Further Readings

Nader, R. (1973). The consumer and corporate accountability. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich.

Nader, R. (2004). The good fight: Declare your independence and close the democracy gap. New York: HarperCollins.

Nader, R. (2004). In pursuit of justice: Collected writings 2000–2003. New York: Seven Stories Press.

Public Citizen 30 Years. (2001). Citizen public news: Special anniversary edition. [Online]. Retrieved July 19, 2006, at http://www.citizen.org/documents/pctimeline.pdf

Public Citizen Web site: http://www.citizen.org

Salvador, M. (1994). The rhetorical genesis of Ralph Nader: A functional exploration of narrative and argument in public discourse. Southern Communication Journal, 59, 227–239.

Napolitan, Joseph

Joseph Napolitan, a pioneer in the field of political consulting, is largely credited with coining the term political consultant in the modern campaign era.

He has been advising candidates, parties, and national governments since 1956. He is the founder of the American Association of Political Consultants (AAPC) and cofounder of the International Association of Political Consultants (IAPC), the two primary organizations for political consultants worldwide. He has served as president of each and was the first member ever inducted into the AAPC Hall of Fame. He is also treasurer and board member for the International Foundation for Election Systems. He is the author of the book The Election Game and How to Win It and numerous articles about politics including "100 Things I Have Learned in Thirty Years as a Political Consultant."

Napolitan majored in English literature and started out as a sports and then political reporter for a newspaper in Springfield, Massachusetts. His political career began when he agreed to manage a campaign for a dark horse candidate in the local mayoral election. Napolitan went on to work on the campaigns of John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson but is perhaps most well known for orchestrating Hubert Humphrey's dramatic rise in the polls near the end of the 1968 presidential election. Napolitan also managed the 1966 campaign of Pennsylvania Governor Milton Schapp, one of the first television-intensive campaigns of our time. Since then he has worked on more than 100 domestic political campaigns, from mayoral and gubernatorial races to the U.S. House of Representatives and Senate.

In addition to his work on domestic campaigns, Napolitan estimates he has worked on at least 20 campaigns on five continents. He has been a consultant to at least nine heads of state, including French President Válery Giscard d'Estaing, several Venezuelan presidents, and Costa Rica's Oscar Arias, who went on to win the Nobel Peace Prize.

Napolitan, in his seventies and still active in politics, is the president and CEO of Joseph Napolitan Associates, Inc., a political consulting firm headquartered in Springfield, Massachusetts, and chairman of Napolitan Associates/PAA, Inc., in New York, which focuses on campaigns outside the United States. He was selected by PR Week magazine as one of the "100 most influential PR people of the 20th century" as well as by American University's Campaign Management Institute as one of eight outstanding political consultants who contributed most to establishing and maintaining high standards in the business.

Michelle Honald

See also American Association of Political Consultants; Consultants, Political; Media Consultants

Further Readings

Napolitan, J. (1972). The election game and how to win it. New York: Doubleday.

Sabato, L. J. (1981). The rise of political consultants. New York: Basic Books.

Nasser, Gamal Abdel (1918–1970)

Gamal Abdel Nasser Hussein was born in Alexandria, Egypt, in January 1918. He descended from a middle-class family that lived in the village of Bani Murr, in Asyut governorate. He completed his education while his family was moving between Cairo and Alexandria. His passion for historical leaders and events was evident.

Upon his graduation from the Military Academy, Nasser served in Asyut and Sudan, then was appointed as an instructor in the Military Academy. Taking part in the 1948 war, he witnessed the detrimental consequences of corruption, incompetence, and treason, which resulted in losing the war against the Jewish legions and guerilla fighters. Consequently, he formed with others the secret military organization to be known as the "Free Officers Movement." The relationship between this military organization and political parties of the day, especially the Muslim Brotherhood, is grist for the mill of historical debate.

On July 23, 1952, the Free Officers carried out a peaceful coup that resulted in sending the monarch to exile, and new era of republican rule began in Egypt. From 1952 to 1954, Nasser was the minister of interior. In April 1954, Nasser replaced President Mohamed Naguib as prime minister, then became president of Egypt 7 months later. Nasser was the first president to be elected. Nasserism ideology led to the emergence of a one-party system controlled by strong central government under a charismatic type of leadership. It was also during his reign that the first Egyptian People's Council was inaugurated in 1957.

Internally, Nasser's era was characteristic of a number of major achievements that had significant impact on the Egyptian society at large; namely, signing the evacuation agreement of British forces from the Canal base in 1954, the enactment of the Land Reform Law to eliminate feudalism, construction of the High Dam in Aswan, and issuing a wide range of socialist resolutions in July 1961.

In 1955, he played a key role in the Bandung Conference, which resulted in the launch of the Nonalignment Movement. Problems with the West due to the Arab/Israeli conflict were dramatized by the crisis over financing of the High Dam project. On July 26, 1956, Nasser made the historical decision of nationalizing the Suez Canal, which led to the tripartite aggression against Egypt. Due to the failure of the invasion, Nasser was acknowledged as leader of the Arab world, and achieving Arab unity became one of his dreams. In 1958, Egypt joined with Syria to form the United Arab Republic (which lasted for only three years). Nasser also encouraged Arab nationalism and revolution to take place in Arab states, and he supported national liberation movements throughout African countries. His status was undermined by the heavy losses suffered during the 1967 War, and he died on September 28, 1970.

Regionally and internationally, Nasser became, and still is to some Arabs, the role model they should follow. Nowadays several Arab political parties establish their programs based on Nasserism.

Saleh A. Ahmed

Further Readings

Abu Ezzeddin, N. M. (1981). Nasser of the Arab: An assessment. London: Third World Center for Research and Publishing.

Flower, R. (2002). Napoleon to Nasser: The story of modern Egypt. LaVergne, TN: Lightning Source.

Heikal, M. H. (2003). To Egypt not Nasser. Cairo: Dar El-Shrouk.

John, R. S. (1960). The boss: The story of Gamal Abdel Nasser. New York: McGraw-Hill.

Nasser, G. A. (1955). The revolution's philosophy. Washington, DC: Public Affairs Press.

Nasser's Web site: http://www.questia.com/library/history/gamal-abdel-nasser.jsp

Stephens, R. H. (1972). Nasser: A political biography. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Wheelock, K. (1960). Nasser's new Egypt: A critical analysis. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, Foreign Policy Research Institute.

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)

See NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People)

National Association of Broadcasters

The National Association of Broadcasters (NAB) is the primary trade association for the commercial broadcast industry in the United States. The organization, headquartered in Washington, D.C., represents the interests of more than 8,300 local radio and television station owners, as well as national broadcast networks. Operating through its political action committee NABPAC, the organization's lobbying efforts extend to Congress, the Federal Communications Commission, and the courts. The NAB also supplies its members with industry news, market research, and technological updates.

The NAB was formed in 1923 in Chicago when a small group of radio station owners entered into a dispute with the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers (ASCAP) over royalty payments. The station owners lost this initial dispute, but their organization continued to grow in influence. In 1939, the NAB established an alternative musical licensing agency, Broadcast Music Incorporated (BMI), designed to compete with ASCAP. In 1940, a rate increase dispute led to the filing of federal antitrust suits against both parties. Ultimately, the broadcasters and ASCAP reached a compromise on fees as well as an agreement acknowledging the permanent existence of BMI that brought stability to the industry into the next decade.

In response to the quiz show scandals of the 1950s, the NAB organized the Television Information Office (TIO) to supply the public with more positive information about the industry. As its first act, the TIO commissioned the Roper Survey to gauge public reaction to the scandals. In addition to publishing the survey report, the TIO also developed television study guides for elementary and secondary schools, disseminated newspaper editorial reprints, and purchased ads in prestigious national magazines intended to promote the industry.

From its beginning, the NAB has been involved in establishing industry guidelines. The NAB first formulated a code of ethics in 1929. Over the years, the NAB has tried to reign in the number of commercials telecast per hour and control ad content, and has issued guidelines for children's programming. In 1975, the FCC pressured the NAB to include a code provision establishing an hour of nonviolent "Family Viewing Time" that would be telecast between 8:00 p.m. and 9:00 p.m. This measure met with resistance from program producers and was overturned in federal courts. Voluntary industry self-regulation has always proved difficult to enforce. Eventually the code was abandoned in the early 1980s due to legal fears it could be used against stations that programmed offensive material.

The splintering of broadcast media between different platforms proved to be a challenge for the NAB. Groups representing minority and small-market interests have split away from the association. In response, the NAB established an outreach program adapted to those members' interests. At the present time, the NAB addresses issues pertaining to ownership patterns, media convergence, and introduction of digital technology. Its annual spring convention is a showcase for innovations in media.

William Renkus

Further Readings

Sterling, C. H., & Kittross, J. M. (1990). Stay tuned: A concise history of American broadcasting. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.

National Public Radio (NPR)

National Public Radio emerged in the last quarter of the 20th century as an important outlet for political news in the United States, eventually reaching a substantial audience of voters with desirable demographics. Corporate sponsorship expanded, and the network acquired a reputation for covering varied political topics in depth.

Established as an alternative medium, NPR began airing a daily news program in 1971. All Things Considered, in its first decade, emphasized long features and documentaries analyzing social issues, following the network philosophy of giving voice to common people and preparing listeners for democratic participation. The program stressed legal and political affairs, satisfying listeners' needs to stay current and fulfill their civic duties. NPR remained marginal to public debate of the 1970s, but its news program attracted commuters during the evening rush. In 1979 the network founded a second program, Morning Edition, also for drive time.

NPR came under scholarly scrutiny after conservatives charged it with liberal bias. Presidential reporting on All Things Considered was especially negative, and Republican presidents supposedly fared the worst. Conservative antipathy also sprang from the use of public funding to air controversial viewpoints. An effort in the 1980s to limit the role of public broadcasting accompanied a budget crisis at NPR.

The network changed during the next decade. To increase audience and budget, NPR sacrificed its experimental stance in favor of professionalism. It reached bureaucratic stability during the period partly by shifting to a national focus, under pressure from affiliates. It also resolved its contradictory mission, favoring a unified identity over the diverse voices excluded from the marketplace. Institutional advancement, however, came at the cost of its difference from commercial competitors.

News on NPR also joined the establishment. Programs drifted into the mainstream and adopted values from conventional journalism. Political coverage followed the general redefinition of news in other U.S. outlets, growing more interpretative, less neutral, and more focused on journalists who spoke more often, in longer stories that they peppered with briefer sound bites from politicians.

By century's end, NPR had shed its marginal status along with its populist aims. As public radio advanced, U.S. commercial radio news retreated. Regulatory agencies no longer required public service of broadcasters, the main spur for local reporting, leaving NPR news more dominant. Some conservatives defected from NPR, however, in favor of political talk radio and other right-leaning outlets.

NPR news programs are lightning rods in U.S. political discussion. Introducing conservative ideology into regular programming has not ended the debate over NPR political bias, and neither has scholarly research so far.

Kevin G. Barnhurst

See also News Coverage, Politics; Public Service Broadcasting; Sound Bite; Talk Radio, Political

Further Readings

Barnhurst, K. G. (2003). The makers of meaning: National Public Radio and the new long journalism, 1980–2000. Political Communication, 20(1), 1–22.

Engleman, R. (1996). Public radio and television in America: A political history. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

McCauley, M. P. (2005). NPR: The trials and triumphs of National Public Radio. New York: Columbia University Press.

McCourt, T. (1999). Conflicting communication interests in America: The case of National Public Radio. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Nature of Prejudice, The

The shocking experience of the Holocaust stimulated a multitude of research programs with the objective of identifying and overcoming the causes of intolerance and hostility. Gordon W. Allport (1897–1967), who taught psychology at the Harvard University since 1924, wrote his book The Nature of Prejudice in this historical context. Like many of his colleagues, he felt that his research should be devoted to reducing intolerance against others. The most immediate sociopolitical goal of his research was to repeal the racial segregation exercised in the Confederate States.

In his book, Allport defines ethnic prejudice as "an antipathy based upon a faulty and inflexible generalization. It may be felt or expressed. It may be directed toward a group as a whole, or toward an individual because he is a member of that group." Prejudice is expressed (1) as false generalization and (2) as hostility. First focusing on false generalizations, he conceives of them as attitudes toward people consisting of negative attributes. (False generalizations can be construed as a type of a stereotype, a notion already delineated by Walter Lippmann.) These negative attributes are ascribed to the entire social group to which the people are perceived to belong. Allport assumes that the roots of false generalizations develop in the process of socialization. Due to their familiarity, the social norms practiced will be preferred by children and adolescents, as opposed to unknown beliefs and behavior that will be rejected. In this manner, ethnic prejudice becomes the pattern of an intolerant personality.

Allport emphasizes that the state of the art of science does not permit an explanation of how prejudice emerges on the basis of one theory only. He discusses a broad range of theories encompassing historical, sociocultural, situational (unsuccessful coping with everyday requirements), psychodynamic, phenomenological, and stimulus-oriented (the targets of expressions of prejudice) approaches. Although he does not commit himself to a psychodynamic approach, he extensively treats psychodynamic theories, prevalent at the time. According to psychodynamic theories, ethnic prejudice results from negative feelings that have been repressed. These feelings in responses to frustration—for instance, feelings of failure—cannot be accepted by the individual because they threaten his perception of self. The meaning of such hostile attitudes is outside of the individual's conscious awareness. Allport further distinguishes between attitudes that will be internalized if they correspond to the perception of self and attitudes that will be adopted because they are instrumental for conforming to the reference group to which the individual feels related.

A broad range of possible steps to change ethnic attitudes is discussed, comprising, for instance, political measures, education by mass media, and individual therapy. Allport argues that introducing bills, practicing academic education, and getting in contact with members of dissimilar groups having like agendas would be most effective because they would create societal structures that would promote tolerant individuals.

Axel Mattenklott

Further Readings

Adorno, T., Frenkel-Brunswik, E., Levinson, D. J., & Sanford, R. N. (1950). The authoritarian personality. New York: Harper & Row

Lippmann, W. (1922). Public opinion. New York: Macmillan.

Negative Advertising

Negative political advertising is the process by which candidates, parties, and groups promote themselves and their viewpoints by attacking the opposition in a paid space or time medium. Unlike positive political advertising messages, which give potential voters reasons to vote for a candidate or an issue, a negative ad provides information on why potential voters should not vote for the opposing candidate or issue position. Although political advertising, including the attack, has existed for hundreds of years, at every level—from presidential campaigns to local state house races, from gubernatorial campaign to race for a city council seat—negativity is increasing in both its frequency of use and in its power as a persuasive force in the early years of the 21st century.

Evolution of Negative Advertising Practices

At the presidential level, 1988 is sometimes heralded as the beginning of a new era in negative advertising. The Willie Horton ad, aired by an independent group, attacked Michael Dukakis as soft on crime when, as governor of Massachusetts, he allowed Horton out of prison for a weekend furlough during which Horton committed murder. Dukakis apparently saw so little merit in the attack that he decided to ignore it; he wanted to "take the high road" and not lower his campaign by responding. One of the lessons learned from this is sometimes called "the Dukakis effect." Simply put, it means that if a candidate is attacked, she or he must respond. A failure to respond, even if the candidate sees little validity in the content of the attack itself, is often disaster. This mantra, that an attack must receive a response, is perhaps the closest guideline to a "rule" that exists governing use of negative advertising response strategies.

Since 1988, other "rules and guidelines" that politicians and their consultants learn and often practice have evolved as well. Several decades ago negativity at the national level was acceptable but "not in my backyard." The NIMBY phenomenon has practically disappeared. Mudslinging and attack advertising, sometimes at their most vicious, are as likely to be found in local community campaigns as they are in races for national offices. Similarly, certain types of races at one time were fairly immune from mudslinging. Today, in states where judges are elected rather than appointed, even campaigns for state supreme court justices are not immune. There is no level of campaign nor any elected position for which mudslinging is not a utilized strategy.

Another guideline that has practically disappeared is based on candidate status: generally speaking, there was a period of 2 to 3 decades when incumbents were less likely to attack their opponents than were challengers, and incumbents were less likely to go on the offensive first. That, too, is a guideline no more. An incumbent candidate, particularly one anticipating a serious challenge, is just as likely in this first decade of the 21st century to "initiate combat" as is any challenger.

A third informal rule that has gone away deals with gender. Today, male candidates initiate attacks against women candidates, women initiate attacks against male candidates, and women candidates attack other women candidates with the same vehemence and zeal as male candidates at one time reserved for battling one another.

Political Advertising as a Source of Information for Voters

One reason negativity in campaign advertising has become an important public policy topic is based on the increasing reliance on all political advertising as a source of information for voters. This is particularly true for those voters with relatively lower levels of interest and involvement in campaigns. In the decade leading to the turn of the century, paid political advertising messages surpassed newspapers, broadcast news, and other traditional sources of political information as the most important source of voting information for a majority of potential voters in the United States. Whereas following election campaigns was once accomplished through reading newspapers, listening and watching broadcast news, and participating as one could, a substantial number of persons who vote receive much to most of their information from the often seen 30-second televised spot advertisement.

Internet information sources, especially blogs, have become of great importance, especially to the youngest members of the voting population. There is as yet no sufficient research to conclude that paid broadcast and print political advertisements will decline in importance with young voters as a result of this trend; it is simply to note that the Internet has challenged all traditional media and that research documenting medium-specific influence is less reliable at this time than it has been in the past. Further, in this increasingly fractionalized media environment, negativity is as dominant in blogs as it is in many paid ads.

Effects of Negative Political Advertising

If negative political advertising is becoming a more important source of information for voters, and if it is increasing in frequency at all levels of elections, and if guidelines regarding its usage are becoming more flexible (all of which are accurate statements); should voters, scholars, and analysts be concerned? Overwhelmingly, public opinion polls reveal that a majority of American voters dislike mudslinging and constant attack advertising during the campaign season. What is the net effect of this persuasive strategy? There are two sides to this compelling debate, each of which merits consideration and examination.

The Demobilization Argument

On one side of the debate are political observers and scientists who argue that voters are so turned off by the increasing negativity, or mudslinging, during elections that they are tuning out virtually all political communication and separating themselves from political processes, including voting. There is some research that supports this idea that negative campaign tactics can and sometimes do result in cynicism and ultimately apathy among the very groups of people they strive to motivate. This school of thought finds negativity in election campaigns has a demobilizing effect on the electorate. It is challenging to isolate the impact of negative political ads on voter apathy apart from other trends, like shallow, "horserace" news coverage of campaigns, and a growing disenchantment with and faith in government generally at all levels. But there is some evidence that, for certain types of potential voters, negative advertising may depress their willingness to engage in the campaign and ultimately vote.

The Enhanced Involvement Argument

There is another side to the debate over negative attack advertising. There is also research that demonstrates that negative advertising is inherently more involving than is its positive counterpart, that it causes potential voters to process information (therefore think about it) more carefully, and that it can, among certain types of voters, generate excitement and enhance involvement with a campaign. This school of thought maintains that attack ads in a political race keep the campaign exciting, keep discussion of the advertisements themselves in the news as well as in their paid time and space slots, and provide a venue for generating grassroots conversations and discussions as no other political message is able to replicate.

Both sides of the debate agree that voters overwhelmingly indicate that they do not like mudslinging in elections. The two sides diverge, however, on how this dislike impacts the persuasion process. There is little doubt that many people are fed up with political campaigns generally and negative advertising specifically. These ads are viewed by many as fostering negative perceptions of politics overall, of discouraging viable candidates from throwing their hats into the ring as contenders, and creating a generation of nonvoting, noninvolved public citizens. But do they achieve the desired persuasive objective?

Persuasive Effects of Negative Political Advertising

The persuasive outcome of negativity in campaigns remains generally quite positive. That is, consultants, candidates, and special interest groups are not going to abandon a tool that possesses the strong, perhaps unique persuasive power of the negative attack ad. This school of thought argues that it does not matter if potential voters like them or not; the ads are successsful. The success seems to come from several inherently unique dimensions of a negative message.

First, an ad does not have to be liked to be power and effective. Voters have difficulty with this. The most annoying advertising slogan can "stick" in an individual's brain, even though the person doesn't want it there, for a very long time. Negative information is like that: it can be annoying, discomforting to think about, and at times cause outrage. But because it is these things and more, the negative ad is a more complex message than any positive message. The human brain has to spend more time processing it.

A positive ad ("John Smith is a Vietnam War veteran, a family man, and has true American values") provides no conflict, elicits no rebuttal (unless an individual knows the claim to be untrue), and is easily absorbed—it is the kind of positive information one expects to hear during an election. The message is not, however, particularly educational or informative, nor does it have any reason to linger in the brain (there is nothing particularly complex in the message that requires processing).

A negative ad ("John Smith used personal family influence to avoid serving in the Vietnam War; his first wife disclosed that she has had to sue him for child support payments on several occasions") causes voters to think, to make comparisons, to assess the believability of the claims. And in so doing, the negative ad requires more processing, more thinking, more lingering in the brain, whether a person wants it to or not. The comparative complexity of the message with the resultant time spent processing it virtually ensures that a negative message will be more powerful than its positive counterpart.

Second, there is a phenomenon called "the negativity bias." Basically it advances that negative information in general is more memorable and will stand out because of its inherent negative bias more than will positive information. Much as compliments may glide smoothly, though appreciatively, through the mind, an insult may stay forever. Such it is with negative advertising content—even if a person actively dislikes mudslinging in an election, one reason negative ads work is that most people are predisposed to both remember and fixate on that which is insulting, demeaning, or simply an ugly accusation.

Third, negative political advertising content has actually been demonstrated to gain in strength over a period of time. At the moment a potential voter first encounters a broadcast attack ad, she or he may dislike the ad itself, dislike the sponsor of the ad (the attacking candidate), and perhaps even feel some empathy for the victim of the attack. As time goes by, however, the psychological construct known as "the Sleeper Effect" operates: that is, as weeks pass, subjects disassociate where they heard the negative information about the candidates, they disassociate the source of the message from the message itself, and what they remember is the content of the attack. They likely do not even remember that the information came from a political advertisement.

Good Negative Political Ads and Bad Negative Political Ads

Much has been written about types of negative ads, and it is certainly accurate that they cannot all be discussed generically, or that all of them will have the same effects, for good or ill. A poorly designed and executed negative ad can in fact blow up in the face of the candidate who sponsored it. These are often personal attacks, such as likening someone to terrorist Osama bin Laden or Adolf Hitler. This strategy often creates a backlash, or boomerang effect, against the sponsor. When a boomerang occurs, viewers have strong, immediate empathy for the victim of the attack—often because the viewers believe the ad has "gone too far," or has levied a "below the belt" attack or is so far beyond the plausible as to be perceived as a ridiculous claim.

A high-quality negative ad is often seen to possess shared characteristics with other successful messages. Negative messages work best for the attacking candidate when the information is perceived as new. An attack (Jim Jones had an affair with a Capitol Hill intern) will carry little to no weight if it is "old news." If most potential voters already know about the affair, they have (a) forgiven the individual and now discount the transgression, or (b) they know about the affair and have already decided they will not vote for the individual, or (c) they have simply dismissed the affair for one of multiple potential reasons as irrelevant. Reminding voters of an opponent's previous transgression may seem like an appropriate strategy, but it is often the type of message that produces a boomerang.

A good negative attack ad is also more likely to achieve the desired persuasive impact if it is evaluated as "within the plausible." This is new information that could in fact be true. If an incumbent congressional representative with a strong record of voting for a variety of legislation supporting full and equal rights for same sex couples is accused by a challenger of being homophobic and antigay, anyone with any familiarity with the person's record would likely find the attack implausible. Exaggerations or far-fetched claims may seem like a good strategy, especially for a challenger who is running behind in preelection polls against an entrenched incumbent, but such an implausible attack rarely has the intended effect.

With few exceptions, some of the best negative ads deal with issues of professional conduct, for both incumbent officeholders and challengers. Voters regard information about an individual's conduct on the job as relevant and potentially insightful for the office she or he is running for. An accusation that a representative can "never be found" for votes on the floor or is rarely in his or her office when constituents come by to visit is considered by many to be an important insight as to what can be expected if the individual is reelected. If a prosecuting attorney has lost a majority of cases and has a record of not being able to retain assistant prosecutors in the office, that is a professional issue that voters may well regard as important information when judging this prosecutor for another office.

In the United States, since 2002 legislation designed to lessen negativity in campaigns (the "stand by your ad" provision that requires a candidate to appear personally in or endorse every ad his or her campaign sponsors), there has been no lessening in attack advertising messages. The legislation seems to have forced more independent interest groups to initiate attacks on behalf of a candidate, especially at campaigns for national offices, rather than the individual candidate's campaign sponsoring every attack ad. Negative ads are a protected form of political speech. And whether or not voters like or dislike them, they are an important, potentially educational element of the political campaign process.

Ruthann Weaver Lariscy

See also Ad Watch; Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act; Daisy Girl Ad; Dukakis, Michael; Political Advertising; Sleeper Effect; Willie Horton Ad; Women Candidates, Advertising

Further Readings

Ansolabehere, S., & Iyengar, S. (1997). Going negative: How attack ads shrink and polarize the electorate. New York: Free Press.

Kaid, L. L., & Johnston, A. (1991). Negative versus positive television advertising in presidential campaigns, 1960–1988. Journal of Communication, 41(3), 53–64.

Kaid, L. L. & Johnston, A. (2001). Videostyle in presidential campaigns: Style and content of televised political advertising. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Lau, R., & Sigelman, L. (2000). Effectiveness of negative political advertising. In J. Thurber, C. Nelson, & D. Dulio (Eds.), Crowded airwaves. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

Tinkham, S., & Lariscy, R. W. (1994). A diagnostic approach to assessing the impact of negative political advertisements. Journal of Broadcasting & Electronic Media, 37(4), 377–400.

Weaver Lariscy, R., & Tinkham, S. F. (1999). The sleeper effect in negative political advertising. Journal of Advertising, 4(28), 13–30.

Negative Campaigning

Candidates' use of negative campaign tactics, and especially negative political advertising, has generated a great deal of concern among public affairs experts. As elections near, political commentators typically decry the impact of negative campaigning on public affairs participation, claiming that negative political advertising is ruining the political process by contributing to widespread citizen disgust and disaffection.

What Is Negative Campaigning?

Oftentimes, scholars consider a political message negative—and potentially damaging to the political process by extension—if it contains any form of challenge or candidate attack. In reality, candidates employ a mix of message strategies during political elections, and perceptions of campaign negativity commonly are a matter of individual perspectives. An advertisement may seem negative to some people, for example, when a candidate simply is challenging an assertion or questioning an opponent regarding an issue position. Such give and take, however, is a normal part of political campaigning and communicates potentially useful information to voters. Research evidence also indicates that citizens are more likely to regard an advertisement as truthful and fair if it supports a political candidate they favor, and more likely to regard an advertisement as attacking and unfair if it denigrates a candidate they favor.

Why Do Candidates Use Negative Campaigning?

Despite some experts' concerns regarding the harmful effects of negative campaigning on citizens' political participation, empirical research and candidates' experiences indicate that negative campaign tactics can be tremendously effective. Social scientists have documented a consistent tendency for people to weight negative information more heavily than comparable positive information in a variety of decision-making contexts. The preponderance of this research indicates that negative information is more memorable than positive information and has a disproportionate influence on individuals' behaviors. In addition, people express greater confidence in their evaluations of others, and these evaluations are more resistant to change when they are based on negative information rather than on positive information.

In political decision making, candidates' negative campaign tactics and voters' negative evaluations have potentially serious consequences for politicians. Citizens have rated candidates as being less qualified, less honest, less serious, less sincere, and less successful after exposure to negative advertising. In addition, the behavioral link between negative information and voting behavior is potentially stronger than the link between positive information and voting behavior. Research results indicate, for example, that citizens who disapprove of the president's job performance vote in larger numbers that citizens who approve of the president's job performance.

Are Campaigns More Negative Today and Does This Discourage Participation?

Despite the common claims of journalists and political commentators to the contrary, presidential campaigns have not grown more negative in recent years. Research evidence indicates that, when considered as a whole, presidential campaigns are no more likely to contain candidate attacks in current campaigns than they were in past campaigns. Ultimately, political experts are mistaken when they claim that modern campaigns are more negative than previous campaigns.

In terms of political participation, it is true that citizens dislike negative campaign tactics and especially negative political advertising. Empirical research consistently indicates that citizens consider negative political advertising untrustworthy, unethical, deceptive, and of little informational benefit. It is interesting, however, that voters seem to have relatively clear perceptions of what is fair or unfair to include in political advertising. Research results indicate that citizens consider topics such as a candidate's family life and medical history unfair to attack in political advertising, for example, while a candidate's issue stands and criminal activities are fair for a candidate to attack.

Research evidence linking negative campaigning to political disaffection is equivocal. While scholars and political observers continue to debate issues concerning negative campaigning and public affairs participation, a comprehensive body of empirical evidence is emerging indicating that much of the concern surrounding candidates' use of negative campaign tactics and their deleterious influence on voter participation is unwarranted.

It is worth noting, of course, that negative campaigning can occur in any communication channel or format, not just political advertising. Thus, negative or attack messages can occur in news coverage of a campaign; in direct mail distributed by candidates, parties, or groups; during candidate speeches, on radio and television talk shows, through the Internet, or through virtually any campaign venue or medium.

Bruce Pinkleton

See also Negative Advertising; Political Advertising; Political Disaffection; Voter Behavior

Further Readings

Ansolabehere, S., & Iyengar, S. (1996). Going negative: How political advertisements shrink and polarize the electorate. New York: Free Press.

Goldstein, K., & Ridout, T. N. (2004). Measuring the effects of televised political advertising in the United States. Annual Review of Political Science, 7, 205–226.

Johnson-Cartee, K. S., & Copeland, G. A. (1989). Southern voters' reaction to negative political ads in 1986. Journalism Quarterly, 66, 888–893, 986.

Kahn, K. F., & Kenny, P. J. (1999). Do negative campaigns mobilize or suppress turnout? Clarifying the relationship between negativity and participation. American Political Science Review, 93, 877–889.

Kellermann, K. (1989). The negativity effect in interaction: It's all in your point of view. Human Communication Research, 16, 147–183.

Kernell, S. (1977). Presidential popularity and negative voting: An alternative explanation of the midterm congressional decline of the president's party. American Political Science Review, 71, 44–66.

Lau, R. R. (1982). Negativity in political perception. Political Behavior, 4, 353–377.

Lau, R. R. (1985). Two explanations for negativity effects in political behavior. American Journal of Political Science, 29, 119–138.

Pfau, M., & Kenski, H. C. (1990). Attack politics. New York: Praeger.

Pinkleton, B. E. (1997). The effects of negative comparative political advertising on candidate evaluations and advertising evaluations: An exploration. Journal of Advertising, 27, 19–29.

Pinkleton, B. E., Um, N., & Austin, E. W. (2002). An exploration of the effects of negative political advertising on political decision making. Journal of Advertising, 31, 13–25.

Wattenberg, M. P., & Brians, C. L. (1999). Negative campaign advertising: Demobilizer or mobilizer? American Political Science Review, 93, 891–899.

NEGATIVITY IN NEWS

See NEWS COVERAGE, POLITICS

NEW MEDIA TECHNOLOGIES

The emergence of new media technologies has impacted political communication in a variety of ways at the individual, community, and societal level.

Defining New Technologies

Encyclopaedia Britannica defines technology as "the application of knowledge to the practical aims of human life or to changing and manipulating the human environment." The term technology comes from the Greek words techne, "art, craft," and logos, "word, speech." While there is no universally accepted definition of new media technologies, they can be best understood as new forms of media technology or new applications of existing media technology.

It is useful to distinguish newly invented technological tools from already existing technologies. New technologies (e.g., CDs and DVDs) are based on advances in digital computing in recent years, which have led to smaller, faster information storage devices. Existing technologies such as the Internet have enabled new forms of communication, such as blogging and social networking, beyond the original purpose at the time they were invented,.

While it is difficult to distinguish "new" from "old" media technologies, as these labels become outdated over time, let's consider the main technologies that play a crucial role in the political communication process today.

The Internet

The Internet, even though less ubiquitous in other parts of the world, has become an indispensable part of the lives of Americans. According to 2006 statistics, 73% of American adults are Internet users. Recent election campaigns have demonstrated the tremendous potential of the Internet to influence the political process. In the 2004 U.S. presidential election, for example, the Internet played a key role for getting political news, discussing candidates, and participating in the political process online. Several aspects of the Internet as a media technology offering two-way, interactive forms of communication are particularly relevant: (1) e-mail; (2) blogging; (3) podcasting; (4) mechanisms for online feedback and participation; (5) social networking; and (6) online video sharing.

E-mail

E-mail (short for electronic mail) allows two-way communication over the Internet by exchanging electronic messages between a sender and a receiver. E-mail penetration in the United States is almost ubiquitous, and e-mail popularity around the world is growing as well. One of the advantages of using e-mail is that it is a quick and inexpensive method to reach a large group of people in matter of seconds. Political parties and candidates can now obtain detailed databases with voter characteristics and e-mail addresses from marketing companies. Using such databases gives candidates running for office a real advantage by allowing them to "fine tune" their e-mail messages with more precision. Politicians can microtarget potential voters with personalized messages using e-mail data coupled with basic demographic and psychographic user characteristics. E-mail technology can also be used, of course, for interpersonal discussion of political issues: in the 2004 U.S. presidential election, for example, 35% of Internet users reported that they used e-mail to discuss political candidates and issues.

Blogging

Blogging is another new use of the Internet that impacts political communication. Blogs (short for Web logs) are online diaries—online forums with chronologically threaded messages—that have mushroomed on the World Wide Web in recent years. Blogs can be created using free software (e.g., eBlogger) and thus allow citizens with Internet access to share their ideas online. Blogs can focus on various topics, including controversial public policy issues. As of 2006, only 11% of blogs focused on politics, however. Still, any citizen interested in a political issue can create a blog and post their views to a global audience. While blogs may lack credibility, the main advantage blogs bring is a less formal, intimate tone; therefore, they can serve as a tool for politicians running for office to create the best public image and communicate directly with voters in the blogosphere. U.S. Representative Ray Cox of Minnesota was one of the first major politicians to start a blog.

The following examples illustrate the power of popular blogs. In December 2002, several blogs, including Talkingpointsmemo.com, drove former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott out of office for making racist remarks. Since then, blogs have been acknowledged as watchdogs not only of the government but also of mainstream media. Bloggers of Powerlineblog.org questioned the authenticity of memos about President Bush's military service shown on CBS News and led to an official apology from CBS as well as Dan Rather's resignation.

Podcasting

Another new online trend is podcasting. Podcasting refers to the phenomenon of accessing audio files over the Internet via streaming or downloading. These files can be digital audio recordings of a radio broadcast or another program and come with an RSS (Really Simple Syndication) feed. Internet users can subscribe to the RSS feed and receive newly available podcasts automatically. According to the Pew Internet & American Life Project, 12% of American Internet users have downloaded a podcast as of November 2006. The latest trend in podcasting is "vodcasting," in which the user receives a video rather than an audio file. The official Web site of the Democratic Party in the United States, for instance, allows visitors to listen to recent political speeches via the following URL feed: http://www.democrats.org/podcasts.html. Interested citizens can listen to mp3 files on their own time at their own computer and automatically receive updates for new podcasts from the party's Web site. Some high-profile politicians are such as Jack Kingston, a GOP congressman from Georgia, are already using blogs and podcasts on a regular basis. Many political candidates have reportedly hired people on their staff as Internet consultants.

Mechanisms for Online Feedback and Participation

As the Internet becomes more popular, having an online presence as a political candidate will be a must. Web sites for candidates, parties, and advocacy groups are becoming a convenient way of presenting one's political viewpoints and policy stances. Web sites are often cheaper than traditional media channels. But they also offer additional tools for engaging the target audience. More than 13 million Americans used the Internet to engage in campaign activities such as fundraising, volunteering, or learning about political activities in the 2004 presidential election. Political parties and advocacy groups have realized the tremendous potential of the Internet.

If you examine the official Web site of the Republication National Committee (http://www.gop.com), many interactive features offer immediate online feedback. The so-called Action Center at the top of the GOP homepage allows users to take any of the following actions:

- Join the GOP team (asks the user to provide some personal information, such as name and address in order to log in, and an e-mail address that can be used to send news, event invitations, and volunteer information).
- Call your elected officials (you can search for your political representatives by zip code and get the phone numbers for your governor, senators, and local representatives).
- Write your elected officials (allows the user to send an e-mail to politicians directly from the Web site).
- Write letters to the editor.
- Create your own MyGOP Web site (allows individuals supporting the Republican Party to get involved in political organizing).
- Host a party or event.
- Make a monthly contribution.
- Get GOP stuff (enables sympathizers to download GOP images as desktop backgrounds, screen savers, or buddy icons; buy GOP products such as mugs and hats; and get GOP news as RSS feeds for personal Web sites or blogs).
- Sign petitions.
- Call talk radio.

Political candidates and parties today may not have a choice whether to create an online presence: they must do so in order to reach supporters and compete more efficiently with their political rivals. Web sites bring several advantages: inexpensive and timely updates; a global online audience; ability to present where you stand on major political issues quickly; video streaming/Webcasts of speeches, appearances, and town hall meetings; blogs and message boards to communicate with constituents or potential voters. These are powerful tools that allow synchronous, two–way communication between politicians and citizens. Most elected officials already have their own Web sites and take advantage of the benefits the Internet offers. Political Web sites contain highly interactive content and try to engage and mobilize the citizens.

Social Networking

Social networking Web sites have become more popular in recent years, especially among the hard-to-reach group of younger voters. Online communities such as MySpace and Facebook are most popular among high school and college students. MySpace, for example, had more than 61 million registered users with a primary age demographic of 16–34 at the end of 2006. Both MySpace and Facebook have a faithful group of daily visitors. While much of the online communication on these social networks can be described as nonpolitical in nature with a heavy focus on entertainment uses, Facebook, for instance, includes groups formed around a specific political issue. For example, several pro–Iraq War groups exist in Facebook and already have a large number of members. Thus, college-age voters have the ability to voice their opinions and form an online community around a political issue of common interest. Also, individual profiles contain political affiliation, which is already being used to send e-mails with political information and calls for action.

Online Video Sharing

Another recent phenomenon is sweeping the Internet generation: online video sharing Web sites such as YouTube. Founded in 2004, YouTube quickly became a popular online destination because of the funny videos it offers. The Web site allows anyone to upload their own movie. This increases the probability of gaffes made by political representatives being played repeatedly by any Internet user, which was not possible previously. YouTube, which was acquired by Google, has an average of 100 million video streams per day, 1,586,000 average daily U.S. visitors, and 6,205,000 average daily worldwide visitors as of July 2006. It draws a very large audience even though the Web site contains amateur videos. This new video-sharing Web site puts more pressure on politicians to avoid making any mistakes in public and perhaps requires them to check what kind of video content they may be featured in online.

Cell Phones

Cell phones are not new communication devices any more, but they may offer innovative uses for political communication purposes. One example of innovative use is sending SMS (Short Message Service) text messages. These text messages can be used for voter mobilization. Such uses may be untapped in the U.S. market, but in South Korea, for example, mobile phones have already been used for sending text messages to voters on Election Day. Cell phones are often more common than landline phones in developing countries, so they may be even more important for local politicians. Cell phones facilitate direct communication with individual voters, especially voters from the younger generation and those with mobile lifestyles.

Effects of New Technologies

Taken as a whole, the role of new media technologies in the political process can be summarized as facilitating the following.

Communication

The primary role of new media technologies is not only to raise awareness about public issues and political candidates, but also to facilitate communication among and between various players: citizens and voters, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), political parties, traditional news media, advocacy groups, and government officials.

Interaction

The main benefits new technologies bring in this area are increasing interaction between politicians and voters. Additionally, the Internet enables more precise, and more efficient, political marketing and advertising to specific target groups. Web technology allows the production of more engaging political ads such as pop-up and interactive ads.

Organization

The Internet can serve as platform for organizing political action, especially from the grassroots. To a certain extend, political activism is facilitated by the virtual environment and allows an average person to get involved.

Mobilization

The Internet and other new media technologies can be used for voter mobilization, as evidenced by the 2004 Bush–Cheney campaign. The Internet can also be used as a fundraising device (John McCain in 2000) and for mobilizing young voters and grassroots efforts (Howard Dean in 2003).

Furthermore, the effects of the new media technologies mentioned can be divided into possible positive and negative effects, depending on whether one subscribes to the optimistic or pessimistic view on the role of technology in the democratic process.

Potential Benefits

Empowerment

From the optimistic perspective, new media technologies can serve to level the playing field for individual citizens who want to be involved in the democratic process. Political communication between politicians and voters was mostly a one-way street in the past, with the politician (normally backed up by a strong party or advocacy group) having more opportunities to broadcast their messages than the average person. The democratizing influence brought by the Internet is empowering any individual to broadcast their political messages online, theoretically to the whole world. Thus, some of the new uses of the Internet such as blogging, podcasting, and social networking are, arguably, equalizers of power in the political communication process. In this new media environment, there can no longer be a monopoly of traditional media or large political organizations.

Another positive effect of the Internet is the huge amount of information made available by the media and other organizations. Thus, the Internet can be seen as a checks-and-balances tool for individuals who can track down information on elected officials, for example, their financial contributors, previous voting records, issue stances, and preelection promises. Thus, the Internet can potentially increase political responsibility.

Internet technologies allow two-way communication between candidates and voters. Today citizens can contact political representatives via e-mail and message boards in a matter of seconds. These online tools enable citizens to provide direct feedback to their elected officials and perhaps gives more power to the average person to provide their input in policymaking.

Furthermore, citizens today can form interest-based communities on the Internet. The growing popularity of online social networks such as Facebook illustrates that new technologies ask us to redefine the very notion of community. These social networks connect groups of individuals who may have no face-to-face contact and are not bound by geography. Yet these online communities can influence group knowledge, public opinion, and ultimately lead to political action.

Activism

The two leading political parties in the United States have already recognized the power of the Internet as the platform for political activism. Party Web sites encourage their supporters to create their own Web sites and form their own online communities. Using the Internet as a tool, such groups can engage in "Net activism" and organize events and fundraising activities.

Advocacy groups, which became critical players in the 2004 U.S. presidential election, are taking advantage of new technologies as well. Organizations such as MoveOn.org try to develop online information platforms and to influence public opinion. Grassroots activists can use the Internet to organize and mobilize their supporters.

New media technologies have led to a 24–7 political campaign cycle. Web sites offer limitless amounts of information and opinion to a global audience. Citizens in any society can stay better informed about politics. Politicians are subject to closer scrutiny by the public in the online environment.

Possible Drawbacks

Fragmentation

Heavy use of new media technologies for political communication purposes also raises several concerns. Relying on the Internet only to find political information based on personal interest leads to the danger of audience fragmentation: if citizens only visit the Web site of the candidate they like, then they may become even more unaware of opposing views and competing candidates. Perhaps future e-citizens would be "netting alone" if they only follow their own political interests.

Information Overload

Another possible backlash of increased Internet use for political campaigning may be information overload: As a result, voters may get tired of the huge number of online messages and start to tune out.

Polarization

Some authors have expressed concern that the Internet can lead to further polarization of the public, increasing the divisions between conservatives and liberals, for instance. Yet such fears remain unfounded. In fact, research suggests that online users tend to be more aware of the views of opposing candidates.

While there is much speculation about the positive and negative effects that new media technologies may bring, the jury is still out. It remains to be seen what the long-term effects of these technologies would be on the democratic process. One thing is clear: as new media technologies evolve, so does political communication.

Daniela V. Dimitrova

See also Alternative Media in Politics; Blogs, Blogging; E-Mail, Political Uses; World Wide Web, Political Uses

Further Readings

Bimber, B. (2001). Information and political engagement in America: The search for effects of information technology at the individual level. Political Research Quarterly, 54(1), 53–67.

Cornfield, M., & Rainie, L. (2006, November 6). The impact of the Internet on politics, Pew Internet & American life project report. Retrieved November 26, 2006, from http://www.pewinternet.org/PPF/r/73/presentation_display.asp

Grossman, L. (2004). Person of the year 2004: Blogs have their day. Time. Retrieved November 26, 2006, from http://www.time.com/time/subscriber/personoftheyear/2004/poyblogger.html

Horrigan, J. (2006, August). Politics online, Pew Internet & American life project report. Retrieved November 23, 2006, from http://www.pewinternet.org/pdfs/PIP_Politics%20Aug06_Memo.pdf

Jones, S. (Ed.). (2003). Encyclopedia of new media: An essential reference to communication and technology. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Lenhart, A., & Fox, S. (2006, July 19). Bloggers: A portrait of the Internet's new storytellers, Pew Internet & American life project report. Retrieved November 23, 2006, from http://www.pewinternet.org/pdfs/PIP%20Bloggers%20Report%20July%2019%202006.pdf

Madden, M. (2006, April). Internet penetration and impact, Pew Internet & American life project report. Retrieved November 23, 2006, from http://www.pewinternet.org/pdfs/PIP_Internet_Impact.pdf

Rainie, L., Cornfield, M., & Horrigan, J. (2005, March 6). The Internet and campaign 2004, Pew Internet & American life project report. Retrieved November 23, 2006, from http://www.pewinternet.org/pdfs/PIP_2004_Campaign.pdf

Rice, R. E. (2002). Primary issues in Internet use: Access, civic and community involvement, and social interaction and expression. In L. A. Lievrouw & S. Livingstone (Eds.), Handbook of new media: Social shaping and consequences of ICTs (pp. 105–129). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Sappenfield, M. (2005, March 24). More politicians write blogs to bypass mainstream media. Christian Science Monitor. Retrieved November 26, 2006, from http://www.csmonitor.com/2005/0324/p02s01-uspo.html

New Right

In the United States, the term New Right describes the grassroots coalition of conservatives that collectively led what scholars often refer to as the "Conservative Ascendancy" or "Republican Ascendancy" of the late 20th century. Dubbed the "New Right" partly in contrast to the "New Left" counterculture of the 1960s, the New Right theoretically consisted of conservative grassroots activists opposed to a variety of issues, including abortion, busing, homosexuality, the Equal Rights Amendment, the Panama Canal Treaty, affirmative action, and most forms of taxation.

The "newness" of the New Right refers to several things. It refers to reinvigorated and redefined forms of conservative political activity. It also refers to the geographic hubs of New Right activity, as well as the youthfulness and mobilization of a previously disorganized suburban middle class. The New Right grew rapidly during the 1960s and 1970s, thanks in part to organizations such as the Young Americans for Freedom and College Republicans at colleges and universities. These organizations shared frustrations with Americans generally, sharing common demographic characteristics (white, middle-class, Protestant, suburban). Broadly speaking, these frustrations reflected perceived declines in morality during the 1960s and 1970s. These perceptions were based in part on things such as rampant drug use, more open and public displays of sexuality, as well as rising crime rates, race riots, civil rights unrest, and protest movements against the Vietnam War. Additionally, New Right conservatives of the 1960s and 1970s often blamed the nation's ills on "liberalism." In attacking liberal philosophy, the New Right contributed to new connotations of liberalism, which rhetorically connected that philosophy in conservative political communication with the mismanagement and corruption of the federal government.

Though some debate as to the regional birthplace of the New Right still exists among scholars, the most popular view sees the Sun Belt—or, the area of land stretching from southern California across the Southwest, through Texas, and into Florida—as the geographic home of the New Right. Barry Goldwater's 1964 presidential campaign is often viewed as a watershed in the rise of the New Right, while Ronald Reagan is often seen as its iconic hero. Other key players in the rise of the New Right include Phyllis Schlafly and Richard Viguerie, whose pioneering work in the field of direct mail revolutionized political strategies for mobilizing grassroots support.

The "Religious Right" is often confused with the New Right. Although most factions included in the Religious Right were simultaneously active in the rise of the New Right, many conservatives identified as part of the New Right did not support and, in some cases, openly rejected strictly social and religious agendas. The New Right is not a synonym for the Republican Party, though much of the New Right's political activity functioned in tandem with and to the benefit of the GOP. The New Right is a term often used interchangeably with "Silent Majority," though even that comparison is not wholly accurate.

Sean P. Cunningham

See also Conservative, Conservatism; Direct Mail; Goldwater, Barry; Religion in Politics; Republican Party

Further Readings

McGirr, L. (2001). Suburban warriors: The origins of the new American right. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Schulman, B. J. (2001). The seventies: The great shift in American culture, society, and politics. New York: Free Press.

News: The Politics of Illusion

Lance Bennett's News: The Politics of Illusion is a now-classic study, used as textbook in many political science departments, on how the interplay among American politics, journalists, and the public influences objectivity in news reporting and ultimately the democratic governance in the United States.

When first published in 1983, this political communication study was a milestone work, as Doris A. Graber from the University of Illinois at Chicago writes in the book's foreword. Bennett, professor of political science at the University of Washington, analyzes what determines which stories get published and which are ignored. He demonstrates that political images in news stories are artfully constructed visions of a reality that don't resemble what an unbiased observer might see. Bennett analyzes the politicians' continued efforts to control images in the news, starting from the findings of a study of two of America's leading newspapers, The New York Times and The Washington Post. According to the study, government officials were the sources of nearly three-quarters of all hard news, and only one-sixth of the news could be traced to sources outside the government. Less than 1% of all news stories were based on the reporter's own analysis, whereas over 90% were based on the calculated messages of the actors involved in the situation.

Bennett argues that the news is the core of our political information system. Superficial, filled with mysteries, melodramas, and stereotypes, growing volumes of political spin and insider media buzz, and short on analysis and explanations, the daily news offers ever less solid basis for critical thinking or effective action. Media tend to cover more soft news—emotional and immediate—rather than hard news—what an informed person should know—blaming its tabloid trend on public demand. Even political news, with its negative focus on personality or money rather than on issues, with dramatic staging and scripting and fragmented or disconnected presentation, contributes to a public that is increasingly cynical and disillusioned with politics and government. The result is a voter turnout beneath 50%.

In the various editions of his book, keeping up with the developments and changes in media and society, Bennett not only pioneered a critical approach to the enmeshed relationship between media and politics, but he also developed and tested a series of theories, such as indexing. Indexing theory suggests that media, as news gatekeepers, will never give voice to citizen activists or grassroots views unless powerful officials promote similar viewpoints. Moreover, when conflict breaks out among key decision makers, the news gates will open to a broader range of social voices, reflecting the dissonant views of the establishment.

Bennett completes his arguments with his or other researchers' study findings and incorporates case studies in most of the book's chapters. News: The Politics of Illusion is a seminal work about how news about politics influences politics and how it serves the needs of America's democracy. Bennett ends with a list of critical proposals for citizens, journalists, and politicians, arguing that small changes within each sphere can lead to less news bias and press-government interdependency.

Raluca Cozma

See also Indexing Theory

Further Readings

Bennett, W. L. (2006). News: The politics of illusion (7th ed.). New York: Longman.

News Coverage, Politics

Politics is one of the most important topics in the news. During elections, television news shows and newspapers are filled with politics, but even outside of the election period politics is an important feature of news. News—in newspapers, on television, radio, and the Internet—constitutes the most important source of information for most citizens in the world about politics. A minority of individuals have direct or frequent experiences with politics, such as attending political meetings or interacting with politicians and other (elected) officials. The coverage of politics is, therefore, important to understand in order to judge the information environment in which the media, citizens, and also politicians operate.

Considering how key political issues and elections are covered in different news media around the world involves looking at different categories of news about politics. First, given that elections are one of the most important aspects of democracy, news coverage of elections is important. Second, a number of political issues are prominent in the news and share priority around the world. Third, news around the world has a number of distinct features, depending on the continent and each country's political and media system. Finally, different types of effects of news are driven by the coverage of politics.

News and Elections

Politics encompasses a variety of actors, institutions, issues, and processes. A fundamental feature of representative democracy is the use of elections for the selection of leaders in legislative bodies or national parliaments. News coverage of politics and election campaigns is the most important and readily available source of information about elections for most citizens across the world. News about elections and campaigns is the outcome of interactions between journalists, editors, and media organizations, on the one hand, and candidates, political parties, and campaign staffers on the other. Several features of the news coverage during elections are particularly important: (1) the visibility of the elections, (2) the topics on the news agenda, (3) the actors in the news, (4) the tone of the news, (5) the framing of the news, and (6) the balance of the news.

The Visibility of Elections

Generally speaking, news media around the world devote much attention to elections, in particular those for the national parliaments. The visibility of elections is an important prerequisite for citizens to acquire information about upcoming elections. Some election campaigns, such as those in the United States, last for several months, whereas others are short and intense (such as in, for example, Britain and the Netherlands, where they last for only 3–6 weeks). Typically, the visibility of elections in the news is greater toward the end of the campaign and around key moments such as party conventions, debates, and so on. It is commonplace to have entire pages of newspapers devoted to elections, and television news shows sometimes devote up to half of their broadcast time to elections. The automatic visibility of elections in the news, however, has changed somewhat over time, and in competitive media systems in many countries, political news, including election news, is nowadays judged against the remaining news supply and is not per se given preferential treatment. Elections for other than national parliaments, such as local, regional, state-level elections, or elections for the European Parliament are generally given much less visibility in the news, though this varies greatly depending on the context and the medium. News in some countries in Europe, for example, devote more than half of the main evening television news shows in the final weeks leading up to the elections for the European Parliament, whereas news in other places only briefly mentions such elections.

The Topics on the News Agenda

Important questions are how prominent political and election news is on the news agenda and what topics are covered. Within political news and election news, issues such as the economy, welfare, environment, international relations, immigration, and integration tend to be prominent on the agenda. There are no clear-cut, all encompassing, and inclusive accounts of the media's agenda during elections, but in most places a distinction is made between political news that focuses on issues vis-à-vis news that focuses on political processes, the strategies of the candidates, and the candidates' and parties' standing in the polls. A shift can be noted in news coverage of elections in the direction of an increasing emphasis on candidates and personalities on the one hand and polls and horserace coverage on the other. This shift is taking place at the same time as a decline in linkages between political parties and the press and also simultaneously with a shift in the political strategies of candidates and political parties. All have moved toward more professional campaigns, with messages targeted for specific media and audiences, increased levels of expenditure, and making use of more campaign staff, such as spin doctors. The use of spin doctors and media management staff, especially, has led to the political process and the interactions between media and politics becoming news stories in their own right. News that focuses less on substantive issues and more on the "processes" of politics and, in particular, the role of the media therein has been called "metacoverage." In this vein, news about other forms of political communications, such as advertising and blogging on the Internet, has too become part of news about politics that centers on the role of the media and communication in the political process.

The Actors in the News

Political actors tend to dominate election news. Some patterns are distinguishable: incumbent political actors, typically presidents, prime ministers, and leading members of the government tend to be more visible in the news leading up to elections than nongovernmental actors, typically from the opposition. This is primarily due to the fact that the incumbent actors are not only campaigning but also still governing. The phenomenon has been referred to by many terms, including the "incumbency advantage" and (in German) the Kanzlerbonus. In totalitarian regimes the prominence of elite actors in the news is stronger than in democratic contexts. Though politicians and other political actors dominate election news, there is a clear tendency toward these actors playing a less dominant role. The average sound bite or length of quote provided by politicians has been reduced significantly over the past decades, and the prominence of other actors is increasing. The "vox pop," street interviews with citizens, have become increasingly popular. Campaign experts and commentators also increasingly comment on the campaign, and journalists themselves are increasingly used as experts and sources in election news stories. These developments largely come at the expense of political actors, both in terms of frequency and the duration of their quotes. There are mixed responses to these developments, with some suggesting that the changes are not beneficial to the quality of election news (and to the quality of the democratic process) while other have emphasized the positive aspects of journalists no longer merely "holding microphones" for politicians.

The Tone of the News

News about politics and elections is generally fairly neutral and descriptive or slightly negative in tone. This characteristic is almost inherent to the conventions of the news genre that suggest that "good news" is generally less newsworthy. There are significant differences in news cultures so that, for example, news in Britain can be very explicit and evaluative whereas news in other places contains much less evaluation. News media in the United States are often accused of a liberal bias, but most studies have concluded that presidential campaigns and elections are covered in a fairly balanced manner. News in more totalitarian regimes tends to be more favorable toward incumbent governmental actors than toward the political opposition. Tone is important for how citizens perceive candidates, their competence, and prospective qualities.

Framing of the News

The framing of news refers to the emphasis of some aspects of a topic at the expense of others. In relation to elections, a number of news frames are dominant in the coverage. These include the horserace frame, which refers to the framing of the election in terms of a contest of winning and losing; the strategy frame, which refers to the framing of news with an emphasis on candidates' strategies and actions; and the meta frame, which refers to the framing of the news with an emphasis on the role played by the media themselves in the campaign and in the development of public opinion. Other news frames are rooted in conventions in journalism. These include the conflict frame, the human interest frame, the economic consequences frame, and the responsibility frame. These refer, respectively, to news focusing on disagreement and conflict between candidates and parties; news focusing on the human face behind a story;

news focusing on the economic implications of different events, issues, and plans; and news focusing assigning responsibility for actions, successes, and failures. In addition a number of news frames are inherently tied to specific issues. These, therefore, tend to vary from context to context and election to election. By and large, election news is increasingly dominated by the horserace, the strategy, and the meta-frames as well as the conflict frame, in particular in close contests.

The Balance of the News

An important aspect of political news, in particular during election time, pertains to formal regulations and (informal) conventions about access, balance, and fairness in the reporting. The regulatory and statutory frameworks vary across the world. In some countries little is defined in the way of "monitoring" election news; in other countries political parties and societal organizations have strong links with specific newspapers and television stations, while this political parallelism in other places is minimal. Broadcasting and in particular television news tends to be the most explicitly regulated news outlet (largely due to its perceived political significance). In countries with a strong public service broadcasting ethos, in parts of Europe and North America, for example, explicit rules apply to election news. In two-party political systems there tends to be one or another version of a "50–50 rule" in terms of time devoted to the two major combatants, while multiple party systems often apply a version of proportional representation in the news. In some countries this is monitored and enforced relatively strictly by "news watch" organizations, and in some cases even applied to individual news stories, while in other countries balance expectation is applied in a more laissez-faire manner and primarily judged across the campaign coverage as a whole.

News Coverage of Key Political Issues

Turning from news coverage of elections to news coverage of (contested) political issues, there are a number of issues that are prominent in the news and that share certain similarities around the world. These topics are (1) international/foreign news, (2) welfare, (3) economy, (4) immigration and integration, (5) environment, (6) European Union politics.

News Coverage of International/Foreign News

News about international and foreign affairs is heavily dominated by war reporting and news about armed conflicts. This type of news is often strongly politicized and can reflect real-world international relations and power balances. News cultures differ strongly in the amount of attention devoted to international and foreign news. Whereas news in the United States is heavily domestic in focus, news in a number of European countries is very international in nature. This pattern is in large part a function of the fact that much of international news outside the United States concerns the United States. Indeed, the world is very unevenly represented in news around the globe, with regions in Africa and Asia often taking up much less space in Europe and the United States compared to the amount of news that Europe and the United States take up in news in African and Asian regions.

Priority in political news is often given to domestic issues, but in times of war, terrorist attacks, or conflicts, foreign news can dominate. Foreign affairs typically make it in to the news when it involves elites, has proximity to the country of the news, passes a certain threshold of significance, and involves casualties. News about war and international conflict is often colored by the view of the country's position in the war. A close relationship between official sources and war reporting has been found in the United States and in countries with authoritarian regimes and strong structural links between politics and the press. Foreign news is a costly part of a news organization and often involves both a network of correspondents and the availability of equipment. Competition and cutbacks in news organizations have led to a decline in international news.

News Coverage of Economy

The economy is often the second most prominent topic in news. Economic news frequently has an explicit political component or implicit political antecedents or consequences. Political issues are often discussed and determined by economic parameters, and also in elections the state of the economy and the media's coverage can influence outcomes (hence the expression "It's the economy, stupid"). A general rule is that when the economy gets worse, the amount of attention to economic news increases. It is the case that economic news is somewhat, but by far not always, related to objective real-world economic indicators such as inflation, interest rates, and unemployment figures. Economic news has become increasingly visible in recent decades, and a number of news outlets devoted fully to economic and financial news have come into existence (ranging from, for example, CNBC to the Financial Times). Moreover, economic and financial news (such as, for example, stock exchange information) has become an integral part of mainstream news outlets.

News Coverage of Welfare

News about welfare and related issues tend to center around the role of the state and its policies vis-à-vis employment, education, and health care. Issues of education, health care, and the conditions for potentially vulnerable groups such as the elderly and children often dominate such stories. News about welfare is also related to news about liberalization, market competition, and consumer rights. The news itself is often framed in terms of the responsibility of the individual or the responsibility of the state and society at large to provide adequate welfare provisions.

News Coverage of Immigration and Integration

Issues of immigration and integration have become prominent political issues on the news agenda in many countries. As immigration has increased and globalization intensified, more people change country than before. This increase in immigration has been accompanied by a discussion of integration of newcomers in to the host society. It is well known that news is often not reflective of the ethnic composition of a region or country in which the news is produced. Moreover, there tends to be an overrepresentation of ethnic minorities in news relating to crime. Immigration and integration news is often framed in terms of either victims or in terms of intruders.

News Coverage of the Environment

News about environmental issues is very cyclic in nature. It generally peaks around (international) crises and then vanishes off the news agenda again. News coverage of the environment has been related to issues such as nuclear energy, oil consumption, CO_2 emission, and global warming, but also in relation to issues in the fisheries, forestry, and transportation. News about the environment has a distinct feature from most other political news; namely that it often addresses future developments and is less focused on the present perspective. Moreover, news about the environment is often focused on some degree of risks implied in (not) undertaking actions and implementing policies.

News Coverage of EU Politics

The process of European integration is one of the most important political and economic developments in recent history. News about European integration is at the crossroad between political and economic news and between domestic and foreign news. As in the case of foreign affairs, news coverage of European issues is the key source of information for citizens, most of whom have little or no experience with the European political institutions. News about the EU and European integration is often barely visible on national news agenda, though broadsheet quality papers in Europe do cover these topics frequently. European news is also cyclic in nature and has small peaks around key events such as parliamentary elections, national referendums, and meetings of government leaders. News about Europe is generally reported through the prism of the individual country, and it is therefore hard to speak about a common, shared European public space.

Effects of News Coverage of Politics

The different features of coverage of news can lead a variety of consequences and effects for individuals, groups, and societies. One of the primary functions of news is to increase citizens' knowledge and awareness about a variety of issues and events. Indeed, frequently turning to the news does tend to have a positive relationship with learning, awareness of, and knowledge about candidates (during elections) and issues. The visibility of issues in the news and the different topics of the news agenda are important to understand the public agenda and the extent to which the news agenda affects the composition of topics considered important by others, known as "agenda setting."

The relative attention to specific topics in the news is also important to understand political evaluations. Priming theory suggests that when most citizen make judgments about politics, they tend to "satisfice" and only consider a number of recent or readily available things. They thus rely on information that is easily brought to mind. Indeed news media and the coverage of politics may bring a variety of topics and evaluations readily to mind. These may then be considered particularly important for making political evaluations, including evaluations of political leaders and candidates. The framing of news about politics, as discussed previously, also has important implications for how citizens understand and think about issues. The strategic news frame, for example, can contribute to a rather cynical perception of politics, while the conflict frame, for example, can make people engage more in a topic. Indeed, news coverage of politics can also mobilize citizens to turn out to vote in elections (and in some cases to abstain), and under some conditions news can also affect, for example, vote choice.

The effects of the news coverage of politics are viewed by some as negative and damaging to democratic processes, but in most instances there is a positive relationship between news exposure and attention to politics, on the one hand, and awareness and engagement in politics on the other. However, this relationship does not always exist in similar ways for different types of citizens, and some individuals may not benefit from these processes if they choose to selectively avoid political news in their media consumption.

News Coverage of Politics: Patterns, Differences, and the Future

While a number of similarities cut across the news coverage of politics in different countries, media, and contexts, there are also many particularities and idiosyncrasies to political news. The features of the political system and the media system often define the parameters for political news. For example, in countries with strong party-press parallelism, the autonomy for individual news organization to define the political agenda or to choose sources freely is less strong compared to situations with a professionalized and institutionalized journalist corps. Another example is the fact that voices outside of the political mainstream have a hard time getting in to the news, in particular in countries that are (de facto) two-party system and where most news is focused on a small number of actors and institutions.

A number of developments will (continue to) influence the content of news about politics. One is the degree of commercialization in a media market. Increased competition and reliance on commercial principles can lead to a shrinking window for political news. If the competition is fought on issues other than provision of news about politics, this can force political content more to the periphery of time schedules and reduce the level of political content in the news. Partially cross-cutting this potential development are phenomena such as (digital) television on demand and the proliferation of news via new and digitized media. Such forms of news provision make issues of prime-time programming less important, but issues of audience self-selection of programs more eminent.

Another realm of developments that exerts influence on the contents of news about politics is political journalism. Journalism itself operates under the constraints and challenges of market characteristics, broadcasting legislation, and political climate. These define the external parameters of political news production, while organizational routines, editorial decision making, and journalists' and news executives' role perceptions are internal definers of political news. A distinction can be made between a sacerdotal and a pragmatic journalistic approach to politics. In a sacerdotal approach, politics (including elections) is perceived as the fundament of democracy and newsworthy per se. The attitude toward politicians is respectful, cautious, and reactive. In a pragmatic approach, campaign news is evaluated against conventional news selection criteria and is not automatically given special attention. A pragmatic orientation implies that time and space allocated to politics is determined by professional considerations of news values, not by assigning particular importance to politics. In the past, journalists at, for example, the British Broadcasting Cooperation were found to be prudential and cautious, concerned about keeping political television news beyond reproach. In comparison, U.S. journalists, such as at the network NBC, were more analytic and committed to a conventional journalistic approach. Indeed, public broadcasters in several European countries in the past have tended to rely on the official party agendas and follow politics. Since the 1990s this has changed, and even though election news is still given high priority at public broadcasters, many news shows have abandoned the often lengthy "election segments."

There are concurrent developments toward both homogenization and diversification of political news. One the one hand, economic constraints have led many news organizations to rely (increasingly) on international press agencies, which has given these agencies a de facto powerful role in providing especially international political news. Moreover, with a number of global key players (such as CNN, BBC, Al Jazeera) and concentration taking side on the ownership side of media organizations, news and current affairs program end up sharing facilities, journalists, and expertise, which can increase the homogeneity of news. Journalists themselves contribute to the process of standardization by often reporting in large scale on the same events or incidents. These patterns have been labeled both “media hype” and “pack journalism.” On the other hand, a simultaneous trend takes place toward more diversification and heterogeneity in the availability of news. The Internet has facilitated specialized coverage of politics that focuses on single issues and persons. Politicians and journalists also make use of strategies that enable them to communicate directly with their audiences and electorates outside of the mediating and selective function of the media or the constraints of a news organization. Important developments in this field include Web presence and blogging. The latter is not only a way of communicating news directly but has also become the object of news reporting in regular media accounts about politics.

Claes H. de Vreese

See also Agenda Setting; Framing; Horserace Coverage; Incumbent/Incumbency; Media Bias; Metacoverage; Negative Campaigning; News Management; News Selection Process; Priming; Sound Bite; Spin, Political; Television in Politics

Further Readings

Bennett, W. L., & Entman, R. B. (2001). Mediated politics: Communication and the future of democracy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Blumler, J. G., & Gurevitch, M. (2001). “Americanization” reconsidered: U.K.–U.S. campaign communication comparisons across time. In W. L. Bennett & R. B. Entman (Eds.), Mediated politics: Communication and the future of democracy (pp. 380–406). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Cappella, J., & Jamieson, K. H. (1997). Spiral of cynicism: The press and the public good. New York: Oxford University Press.

de Vreese, C. H. (2001). Election coverage—new directions for public broadcasting: The Netherlands and beyond. European Journal of Communication, 16(2), 155–179.

de Vreese, C. H., & Semetko, H. A. (2004). Political campaigning in referendums: Framing the referendum issue. London: Routledge.

Entman, R. B. (1993). Framing: Toward clarification of a fractured paradigm. Journal of Communication, 43, 51–58.

Hallin, D. (1992). Sound bite news: Television coverage of elections, 1968–1988. Journal of Communication, 42(5), 5–24.

Norris, P., Curtice, J., Sanders, D., Scammell, M., & Semetko, H. A. (1999). On message: Communicating the campaign. London: Sage.

Patterson, T. (1993). Out of order. New York: Alfred Knopf.

Patterson, T., & McClure, T. (1976). The unseeing eye. New York: Alfred Knopf.

News Magazines

Historically, people in the United States have relied upon three major weekly news magazines: Time, Newsweek, and U.S. News & World Report. Time was founded in 1923 by Briton Haden and Henry Luce and was the first weekly news magazine in the United States. Time’s tone is lighter than that of the other two and heavily covers celebrities, entertainment, and pop culture. It often attempts to tell its stories through people and for many years has featured single individuals on its cover. Time’s “Person of the Year” is its most famous feature. Each year the magazine recognizes in a cover story an individual or group of individuals who have had the largest impact upon that year. Newsweek, founded in 1933 by Thomas J. C. Martin, has attempted to distinguish itself from Time by introducing signed columns and avoiding the light language and celebration of celebrity practiced by Time. Newsweek is noted for taking a lead role in the 1950s concerning racial tensions in the nation. U.S. News & World Report was founded in 1933 (as U.S. News) by David Lawrence and later merged with World Report in 1948. It was marketed as a more serious-minded magazine that focused on more sober matters than Time or Newsweek. The magazine began publishing a list of college and university rankings in 1983, and that list has proved controversial.

Many research studies have investigated the political leanings and impact of news magazines. Some have suggested that Time and Newsweek have a somewhat liberal or left-leaning political orientation, while U.S. News & World Report tends to be more conservative. Nonetheless, some research has also shown that readers of news magazines have higher levels of political knowledge.

All three major news magazines have witnessed a decrease in circulation over the past several years and have fallen to pre-1988 levels. Further, readers of news magazines have tended to become older, as many younger people use new media outlets for news sources. Young citizens are turning to news magazines less frequently, but the distribution of news magazine content on the Internet has increased its availability and attraction to a wider, younger audience. Economic stratification of readers appears to be occurring as well. Wealthier individuals are now reading news magazines. Finally, the number of staff members at traditional news magazines has been declining for several years.

However, several nontraditional news magazines are seeing growth. The Week, for example, founded in 2001, brings a new approach to the genre by having its editors cull the weekly news and then provide a condensed summary. The Week's format seems more likely to appeal to a younger, more Internet-savvy reader who is accustomed to a shorter, shallower version of events. Further, niche news magazines like The New Yorker and The Economist are growing in circulation. Indeed, the longer, news and cultural format of the New Yorker and shorter, condensed version offered in The Week seem to fill niches that traditional formats are unable to meet.

In Europe, however, many news magazines remain important in the political opinion process. Magazines like The Economist in Britain, Stern and Der Spiegel in Germany, L'Express and Le Nouvel Observateur in France, and their counterparts in other countries include politics frequently as headline stories.

Ultimately, the future of news magazines will evolve in order to mesh with new media and new audiences. Trends in the new millennium tend to illustrate Time's and Newsweek's propensity to offer lighter, more celebrity-oriented fare. In addition, news magazines with new formats will continue to originate as well as boom or bust depending upon readers' tastes and proclivities.

Terry Robertson

See also Political Knowledge

Further Readings

Bennett, S. E., Rhine, S. L., & Flickinger, R. S. (2000). Reading's impact on democratic citizenship in America. Political Behavior, 22, 167–195.

Chaffee, S. H., & Kanihan, S. F. (1997). News magazines contributed to political knowledge in the 60s and 70s. Political Communication, 14, 421–430.

Esser, F., Reinemann, R., & Fan, D. (2000). Spin doctoring in British and German election campaigns. European Journal of Communication, 15(2), 209–239.

News Management

News management can be defined as strategic communication by professional news sources used to influence the news in order to reach and further political goals. Traditionally it was solely about the creation and dissemination of press releases from political organizations to the media. This activity was based on interpersonal exchanges between politicians and journalists. Since visibility has become more and more important in politics, news management has changed to a professionalized and specialized process of strategic communication controlling the news flow.

The effects on the public gain a lot of attention in the literature. It is argued by many scholars that news management techniques are a democratic problem. The critics argue that media consultants bringing to politics techniques and tools that do not necessarily fit with the way pluralist democracy is conducted. Political communication becomes designed specifically for market-oriented media, and voters are transformed into passive spectators of politics. But others claim news management practices are necessary. They allow politicians and citizens to communicate more effectively, and the market orientation creates opportunities for a large number of different political actors to communicate in conditions of competitive mass democracy.

An important distinction is made between media-centered news management and political (or party-centered) news management. In the latter, political objectives are in the center of the strategy. The media are the means, but not the goal. In contrast, media-centered news management focuses only on creating positive news coverage and support for the politician or party. Another important distinction is between person and issue. From research in election campaigns we know that communication depends whether the object is a candidate or an issue. These distinctions produce four types of news management:

1. Media-centered news management focused on a person. Strategies using personalization of politics or image management. Politicians are seen as stars, politics is framed as a game between persons instead of a political competition.

2. Media-centered news management focused on an issue. This strategy includes the staging of pseudo-events, which are events staged to stimulate media reporting. The distinction between personalization and pseudo-events blurs. News managers often try to combine image management and some action, such as bill signings and greetings of foreign guests.

3. Political news management focused on a person. Here we often find news designed to attract media's preference for negative news. Attacks on political opponents, scandals, and other strategies are used to put the opponent into a negative light.

4. Political news management focused on an issue. Strategies here can be about how an issue is framed and spin control (how to influence media coverage). But they also include attempts to dethematize the message.

Bengt Johansson

Further Readings

Cottle, S. (Ed.). (2003). News, public relations and power. London: Sage.

Pfetsch, B. (1998). Government news management. In D. Graber, D. McQuail, & P. Norris (Eds.), The politics of news, the news of politics (pp. 70–94). Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly.

Newspapers, Role in Politics

Thomas Jefferson inexorably linked newspapers and politics when he wrote in the Declaration of Independence:

> We hold these truths to be self evident. That all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness—That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of governed.

What Jefferson had in mind was, to use a current cliché, informed consent. The public must be informed because they were to decide. That meant we had to have freedom of the press, because otherwise the public never could be fully informed. The First Amendment therefore was based on the need to have information about politics and government. In 1791, when the First Amendment was ratified, that information could come only from newspapers, the only mass medium of that era.

Some will argue that the First Amendment therefore really applies only to political content, not to entertainment such as MTV or erotica such as Playboy. However, the U.S. Supreme Court has consistently ruled for a broader perspective that includes not only some marginally political content but some content that is not political at all.

Jefferson could not have imagined the press of the 21st century. Newspapers were a long time coming to the colonies. It was 1690 before there was an attempt to publish a newspaper. That newspaper was Public Occurrences Both Foreign, and Domestic, created by Benjamin Harris. However, it lasted only one issue, partly because Harris did not have permission to publish.

Next on the scene was John Campbell's Boston News Letter, established in 1704. It was published by authority, and Campbell cleared all its copy with the colonial governor or his secretary. Seventeen years later, James Franklin, Ben's older brother, started the New England Courant, which was published not by authority but in spite of it. It sought to offer what readers wanted, not what the government wanted, and was the first paper in this country to crusade. His first crusade, aimed at Increase and Cotton Mather, was to oppose smallpox inoculation, which the Mathers were promoting. Unfortunately he was on the wrong side of the issue, but so many people disliked the Mathers that the crusade was popular. Franklin thus demonstrated that the press could be something other than a bulletin broad for the government.

Newspapers spread to other colonies, partly because the unrest that would lead to the American Revolution was already surfacing. This was evident in the trial of John Peter Zenger in 1735. Zenger had established the New York Weekly Journal in 1733 with the backing of a group of men who opposed the colonial government. Zenger was arrested and ultimately charged with "raising sedition." Under English law, all that was necessary was to show that Zenger had indeed published the material. But Andrew Hamilton argued that the truth of the allegations must be determined. Told that he could not argue that to the court, Hamilton turned and made an eloquent plea to the jury. The jury found Zenger not guilty. The jury's verdict was contrary to law, but authorities may have recognized that it was not contrary to public sentiment. They made no further effort to prosecute Zenger, and the first blow for press freedom in the colonies had been struck.

The press was driven to opposition to the British by the Stamp Act of 1765. It was Britain's attempt to get the colonies to pay for the French and Indian War, and a tax imposed by the British on the colonists led to the refrain "Taxation without representation." However, the concern of the press went beyond that. One of the things taxed was paper, and newspapers had to be printed on paper that bore a stamp indicating that the tax had been paid. There were some newspapers that continued to support the British, but at some peril to themselves, most supported the colonists throughout the Revolutionary War.

The Era of the Partisan Press

George Washington was the unanimous choice for president by the Electoral College in both 1788 and 1792, but the unanimity didn't extend to the rest of the political scene. Two political parties developed quickly, each led by a member of Washington's cabinet. The Federalists, who believed in a strong central government, were led by Washington's secretary of the treasury, Alexander Hamilton. The Republicans, who believed in government by the people, were led by the secretary of state, Thomas Jefferson.

Both parties quickly saw the value of newspapers. Hamilton help establish the Gazette of the United States in 1789. Jefferson, James Madison, and other Republicans viewed this development with concern and helped set up a rival paper, the National Gazette in 1791. Both papers were extremely partisan with no pretext of providing a balanced or complete view on political issues. In content they more nearly resembled the televised political ads of today than any other current media. They were on occasion as vicious as they were one-sided. Other partisan papers came on the scene, and partisan newspapers remained the norm for 40 years.

The First Amendment was added to the Constitution in 1791, but before the decade was up we had a serious First Amendment crisis. Congress passed the Alien and Sedition Act in 1798. It forbade criticism of government officials, including members of Congress. It was used by the Adams administration to silence dissent. There were 11 prosecutions and 10 convictions, all of critics of the administration.

The Alien and Sedition Act became a central issue of the 1800 presidential campaign. When Jefferson prevailed over Adams, the act was doomed. Had Adams and the Federalists prevailed in 1800, the history of the press and the First Amendment in America would have been far different. Yet while Jefferson was president he was maligned by the press perhaps as much as any American president.

Jefferson had written in 1787 that "were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers or newspapers without government, I would not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter." While Jefferson was in the White House he was so disgusted by what Federalists papers were saying about him that he suggested a few prosecutions might be a good thing. And in 1811 he wrote of the "putrid state" of the press. However, in 1823, his years in politics long behind him, he spoke of the importance of freedom of the press because it offered "reform peaceably, which must otherwise be done by revolution."

The election of 1800 turned out to be the last stand of the Federalist Party. Jefferson's Democratic Republican Party and its successor, the Democratic Party, would win the next nine presidential elections. The partisan press became less relevant, and the time was ripe for something else.

Three Waves of Sensationalism

The Penny Press

That something else was to be the penny press. In 1833, Ben Day started the first penny newspaper, The Sun. Its price indicated that it intended to reach the masses, and in terms of those times it did, reaching a circulation of 8,000 in 6 months. That was far more than any American newspaper had ever achieved. The Sun was sensational, featuring scandals based on police and court reports. Political coverage was minimal. There would be two more great waves of sensationalism, and each of them had the effect of reducing the proportion of news content devoted to politics and government.

The Sun was followed in 1835 by James Gordon Bennett's Herald, which imitated the Sun in many respects but did do more in coverage of politics and government. It was Bennett who successfully fought to get the press admitted to sessions of the U.S. Senate. It was Bennett who was the first to cover Wall Street. He pioneered coverage of religion and of sports. In a year, Bennett's Herald had 20,000 circulation, and by 1860 it had the largest circulation of any American newspaper: 77,000.

While Day's Sun faded, Bennett was to have more serious competition. Horace Greeley founded the New York Tribune in 1841. Greeley not only covered politics but also actively took part. He was a socialist and promoted for 5 years the cause of Fourierism, an ideology named for a French communist. It advocated cooperative ownership of property.

Greeley was one of the people whose efforts led to the establishment of the Republican Party in 1854 and one of those who led the effort to get Abraham Lincoln nominated for president in 1860. Greeley was one of the strongest opponents of slavery. Partisan though he was, it was Greeley who created the editorial page, thus separating opinion from news, a distinction that remains with us today. Greeley was genuinely nationally known, in part because of the national weekly edition of the Tribune, which had a circulation of 200,000 before the Civil War.

There was yet another player—Henry Raymond and George Jones began The New York Times in 1851 with a pledge to nonpartisan news coverage. Within 4 years the Times had twice the circulation of the Tribune. Furthermore, Raymond soon became a more important figure in Republican politics than Greeley.

The three editors thus offered readers a choice between partisanship and objectivity, between serous coverage and sensationalism. All three left their mark on journalism, but in the long run, it was Raymond's approach that prevailed. Raymond's Times remains today. Bennett's Herald and Greeley's Tribune merged in the 1920s to form the Herald Tribune, which in turn was merged in the 1960s to form the World Tribune Sun, which lasted a year.

The three would go different ways during the Civil War. Bennett was opposed to the war and to abolition. Yet the Herald provided extensive coverage of the war, at a cost of half a million dollars. Greeley opposed slavery and editorialized in favor of abolishing it in Abraham Lincoln's first year in office. On August 20, 1862, Greeley published an editorial titled "The Prayer of Twenty Millions" urging immediate action. Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation on January 1, 1863. Raymond stayed focused on getting the news of the war covered, but he did manage Lincoln's campaign for reelection in 1864.

Yellow Journalism

The next serious wave of sensationalism occurred at the end of the 19th century. This was the so-called yellow journalism of Joseph Pulitzer and William Randolph Hearst. It got its name from a comic called "The Yellow Kid." Pulitzer introduced it in his paper, the New York World, but Hearst lured the artist, Dick Outcult, away for his New York Journal. Pulitzer then found someone else to draw it. Pulitzer, an immigrant from Hungary, had revived two faltering newspapers in St. Louis in the 1870s to form the Post Dispatch, which remains one of this country's great newspapers. In 1883 Pulitzer bought the New York World and set about combining coverage of crime and sex with crusades in the public interest against corruption and greed. Pulitzer combined this sensationalism with a high-minded, serious editorial page. The paper was immediately successful, and 4 years later Pulitzer established the Evening World.

Hearst was born into wealth, his father having struck the biggest silver lode anyone ever had and winning a U.S. Senate seat. Hearst went to Harvard and there saw the efforts of Joseph Pulitzer in New York. He convinced his father to let him run the San Francisco Examiner, which the father had purchased for political purposes. Young Hearst made the Examiner a first-rate newspaper. He longed to go to New York and compete directly with Pulitzer. With the help of money from his father's mining fortune, Hearst was able to purchase the New York Journal in 1895, and the contest between Pulitzer and Hearst began. It came to a climax when the Spanish-American War began in 1898. Sentiment against Spain and its occupation of Cuba had been building up, thanks in part of coverage by the Journal and others. Hearst hired the famous artist Frederic Remington and sent him to Cuba. Legend has it that Hearst instructed Remington to draw pictures of the war and that Remington wired Hearst that there was no war. Hearst wired back, "You provide the pictures; I'll provide the war." When the battleship Maine blew up in Havana harbor, Hearst and Pulitzer certainly did their best to promote the war. Both papers carried a huge front page artist's drawing of the event. The Journal's picture even showed a bomb in position under the ship. Both pictures, were, of course, figments of the artists' imaginations, but the war came quickly as American rallied to the call of "Remember the Maine." The war was a tremendous success for the newspapers. They reached an unheard-of combined daily circulation of 3 million.

The Tabloids

In 1896, Adolph Ochs bought The New York Times, which had faltered, and turned it into a major force in New York journalism. He chose not to try to outsensationalize Hearst and Pulitzer but set the paper on the course exemplified by the slogan "All the News That's Fit to Print" that appeared in the upper left on the front page for years. Yet even with the Times on the scene, the impact of yellow journalism was to distract the public from news of politics and general and the president in particular. The same thing would happen again two decades later when the tabloids the Daily News, Daily Mirror, and Daily Graphic brought a new wave of sensationalism to New York. The circulation success of those papers would bring an end to the World in 1929. Those papers, however, would not have the impact on the rest of American journalism that the yellow journalism of Pulitzer and Hearst had.

These three waves of sensationalism had somewhat different impacts on the newspapers in the rest of the country. The penny press was imitated in a number of other cities. Yellow journalism had impact because syndication and wire service reports carried their coverage to the entire country. The New York tabloids of the 1920s were imitated in both format and type of content in other cities.

The New York press was the major press of America for most of the 19th century, with about a fourth of the daily circulation in the entire country at the end of the century. Today the combined circulation of New York City newspapers is 5% of the national total. As urban centers grew, other major newspapers emerged, and some would become recognized in the 20th century as among the nation's best and most influential. These included the Atlanta Constitution, the Chicago Tribune, the Des Moines Register, the Kansas City Star, the Louisville Courier-Journal, the Milwaukee Journal, the St. Louis Post Dispatch, and the Washington Post.

Press Conferences

In the first half of the 20th century, press conferences became a major part of newspaper coverage of politics. William Hoard Taft was the first president to hold a press conference, but he abandoned them after an unfortunate incident. Woodrow Wilson resumed the press conferences, and Warren Harding, Calvin Coolidge, and Herbert Hoover continued them, but it was Franklin D. Roosevelt who made them a major factor in news coverage. He had 998 press conferences, an average of 83 a year. Harry Truman had about half as many, and the number continued to dwindle to the point that Ronald Reagan had only six a year, a number that has not been surpassed by his successors.

The news conference gave the president the opportunity to set the agenda by opening with a statement of some action by government. The strategy was to divert attention from some less favorable topic. Until the administration of President Dwight Eisenhower, news conferences were primarily for newspaper reporters. However, Eisenhower allowed press conferences to be recorded for television with the stipulation that they be reviewed by the White House before they were broadcast. That still left newspapers with a considerable edge, but that changed when President John F. Kennedy did press conferences that were televised live. He was comfortable with that, but none of his successors were. Unfortunately, televised press conferences became a social event, often done in prime time, with as many as 500 journalists attending. It was the place to be seen, and many of those who attended had no intention of writing about it but were merely spectators. This led to the decline of the press conference.

Press conferences were used by politicians at the sate and local level, too. Some were televised, some were not. They did give governors and legislators and mayors more coverage than they would otherwise have received.

Impact of Electronic Media

Radio began in 1920, and newspapers soon saw it as a competitor even though its commitment to news was minimal. By the late 1930s, however, it was a significant factor. One Roper study showed that radio was the main source of news for more people than newspapers were. Television came on the scene immediately after World War II and was a major player in news within a decade. Roper studies in the 1960s showed that television news was the main source of a majority of people. Other studies have shown that television news is the main source of news about presidential campaigns. However, studies that look at local and state news and local and state political campaigns find newspapers used more than television news. It is too early to tell what the impact of the Internet will be. Online newspapers are more popular than online TV news, but the Internet offers other sources. Particularly significant are the Web sites of political parties and government agencies. At this point, though, newspapers have the resources to do more with local and state coverage and should remain the leading source of such news.

Two Court Cases That Redefined the First Amendment

Two U.S. Supreme Court cases in the latter part of the 20th century redefined the First Amendment. The first was New York Times v. Sullivan (364 U.S. 254, 1964). The Times ran an advertisement by civil rights activists that criticized southern law enforcement. L. B. Sullivan, a police commissioner in Montgomery, Alabama, sued the Times for libel on the grounds that the advertisement identified him and contained false statements. He won $500,000 in the trial court, and the verdict was upheld by the Alabama Supreme Court. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled, however, that a public official would have to show actual malice or reckless disregard of the truth in order to win a libel suit. Sullivan's trial court victory was thrown out. The court thus established a national standard consistent with what already had been established in a number of states. This provided a rigorous standard for public officials who wanted to sue because they had been criticized—a standard that few could meet.

The other case was the so-called Pentagon Papers case—New York Times v. U.S. (403 U.S. 713, 1971). Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara had ordered a study of the origins of the Vietnam War. It was classified by the government, but the Times got a copy and began to publish it serially. The government sought an injunction to stop the publication because it was a classified document and publication would endanger national security. The Times appealed, and the case went quickly to the U.S. Supreme Court. By a 6–3 vote, the court lifted the injunction. The court pointed out that the classification system was not legislated by Congress, but was simply the result of an executive order by President Harry S. Truman in 1946. In 25 years, 20 million documents had been classified. Justice Potter Stewart summed it up in one memorable sentence in his opinion: "When everything is classified, nothing is classified." The classification system still exists, and estimates are that there are 40 million classified documents now. However, the government cannot claim that national security is involved when a classified document is leaked and published but must prove it in court.

Coverage of Presidential Campaigns

Serious study of press coverage of political campaigns really didn't begin until the 1950s. What triggered it was President Harry Truman's complaint about the press in the 1948 election. Truman, seen as almost certain to lose to Tom Dewey, embarked on a national whistlestop campaign by train. He emphasized two issues—the "Do-Nothing 80th Congress" and the "One-Party Press." What he meant by the latter was that 65% of the newspapers had endorsed Dewey editorially, while only 15% endorsed Truman. Truman maintained the news coverage was equally one-sided. There was little evidence to support that claim, but it was an effective political statement that helped Truman score a surprising upset victory over Dewey, who led by substantial margins in most polls.

In the 1952 campaign, Adlai Stevenson, the Democrat nominee, repeated that claim. It was true that 67% of the newspapers endorsed Dwight Eisenhower editorially, while only 14% endorsed Stevenson. The Society of Professional Journalists considered making a study of campaign coverage to deal with the issue, but decided that trying to study the coverage after the campaign was over was impractical. However, there were three studies, all limited, as there also were in 1956.

In 1960 there was more interest in studying coverage, and there were 11 studies made. John Kennedy and the Democrats once again claimed bias, pointing to the fact that on newspaper endorsements, Richard Nixon led Kennedy 57% to 16%. Nixon added fuel to the fire by claiming that though the newspapers supported him in their editorials, the reporters were biased in favor of Kennedy.

In that year Stempel made the first of seven studies of presidential campaign coverage by the "prestige press," a label attached to 15 newspapers singled out in a poll of editors as "most superior for news coverage, integrity and public service." He found that the two parties got virtually equal space, with the Democrats having a slight edge. However, the Republicans had slightly more space on front pages. The study found that display was fairly even. Stempel's other six studies found similar results.

In that same campaign, Danielson and Adams studied the coverage of 42 campaign events by a random sample of 90 daily newspapers. They found that 19 of the events were covered by less than 10% of the papers. Coverage by a majority of papers of a majority of the stories was less than 100 words. They also found that newspapers that endorsed Kennedy gave more coverage to the Nixon events than the newspapers that endorsed Nixon. Neither of these studies provided support for the one-party-press charge.

There have been studies of presidential campaign coverage ever since. Most studies have found little evidence of bias. More recent studies making use of computerized indexes have provided more extensive analyses of campaign coverage but little evidence of bias.

Impact of Coverage

Studies of newspaper impact on politics began with the Erie County Study of 1940.

Erie County in northern Ohio was a bellwether county—one that usually voted for the presidential candidate who won. As it turned out, it didn't in 1940, but still the study provided new insights on the political process. There was not, however, much emphasis on the role of media. Subsequent studies have found that newspapers do play a part in informing the public about campaign issues, though often it is slight.

Some studies have looked at whether editorials of endorsement affect outcomes of elections. Newspapers make such endorsements, but television rarely does because of FCC restrictions. At a glance it is obvious that endorsed candidates for president do not always win. The trade magazine Editor & Publisher surveyed newspapers about endorsements from 1940 to 1996, and in 6 of those 16 elections, the candidates who got the most endorsements lost. Yet studies that have compared survey respondents' preferences for candidates and the editorial endorsements of newspaper they read have found a small effect.

Some research has focused on agenda setting—the notion that newspapers don't tell you what to think, but they tell you what to think about. A number of studies have found that volume of newspaper coverage of issues correlated with respondents' perception of the importance of those issues. Whether this means that the newspaper is setting the agenda for the public or vice versa is an open question. Or it may be that politicians are setting the agenda for both.

Other Coverage

The coverage of the president dwarfs that of the rest of the executive branch and greatly exceeds that of the legislative and judicial branches. You can confirm this for yourself by going to a newspaper Web site and searching. A check of the New York Times index for a month in the summer of 2006 found that there were 81 articles about President George W. Bush, 28 about Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, and 50 about Vice President Richard Cheney. With the Iraq War continuing and the crisis in the Middle East, there was comparable coverage of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, with 70 stories. There were 31 about Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld. On the other hand, there were none at all about Secretary of Agriculture Mike Johanna, Secretary of Labor Elaine Chao, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development Alphonso Jackson, and Secretary of Transportation Norman Mineta. Secretary of Health and Human Services Michael Leavitt, whose department spends about a fourth of the federal budget, was mentioned in six stories. There were 117 stories about the U.S. Senate, but only 21 about the House of Representatives. There were 18 stories about Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and 23 about Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid. There were 9 about House Majority Leader John Boehmer and 12 about House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. Bear in mind this is the coverage of the newspaper with the largest Washington staff except for the Washington papers and also that the New York Times service goes to newspapers that have 60% of the newspaper circulation in the country. Many papers will have less coverage of the federal government than what is described here.

Congressional Campaigns

Congressional campaigns get considerably less attention than presidential campaigns—so much so that they are rarely studied. The most extensive data come from a study by Clarke and Evans of 86 contested House of Representatives races in the 1978 election. They analyzed coverage of those campaigns in the newspaper with the largest circulation paper in each of these congressional districts for 6 weeks prior to the election. They found an average of seven stories about each of the 86 races. That is slightly more than one a week. They found that incumbents had a clear advantage over challengers, and the closer the race, the greater the advantage. They also found that only 70% of the newspapers endorsed a candidate in a congressional race, and 90% of those endorsements were for incumbents. It should be added that 90% or more of incumbents usually win reelection to the House of Representatives. This is in sharp contrast to the coverage of presidential campaigns. Studies indicate that major papers average four or five stories a day about presidential campaigns.

Press and Politics in Other Countries

We have thus far talked exclusively about the relation between media and politics in the United States. In any country, politics and the media connect and interact in some way. This was the subject of the book Four Theories of the Press, by Fred S. Siebert, Theodore Peterson, and Wilbur Schramm written a half century ago. Others have suggested that there are five or six theories, but the additional theories that some propose seem minor variants of what Four Theories offered.

The connection between media and politics dates from the invention of the printing press by Johannes Gutenberg in the 15th century. That meant material would be more widely disseminated and naturally governments took note of that. The first theory was the authoritarian theory. It provided for government licensing and censorship of the press. The press was an instrument for promoting government policy. The press could be either privately or publicly owned. This theory developed in England in the 16th and 17th centuries.

Next came the libertarian theory, which was the basis for press-government relation in the United States at the time of the country's founding. It was based on the writings of John Milton, John Locke, and John Stuart Mill, who argued that people were rational and that they had natural rights that ought not to be thwarted by government. The function of the press was to inform and entertain and serve as a check on government. It was privately owned.

In the United States in the 20th century, we turned to the social responsibility theory. This was not a development of the media alone. As the nation grew bigger and business became big, the need to have businesses in general, including the press, assume social responsibility became evident. In some cases this was achieved by legislation, but that was something of an anomaly when it occurred. Ownership of media was private, and the press remained independent of government.

The fourth theory was labeled the Soviet communist theory, a label that reflects the Cold War perspective of the time at which the book was written. In this system the government owns the media, although the government proclaims that the media are owned by the public. However, the public does not have access to the media. It is loyal party members who have access, and the function of the media is to promote the aims of the party. It is loyalty to the party rather than censorship that controls the media.

In some countries today we see a variant of this latter theory in which broadcast stations are owned by the government and staffed by those loyal to the government, but print media are not. In part, this has to do with literacy. Where literacy is low, the broadcast media, especially radio, are the means of reaching the public.

Most countries in the world do not have a free press. Freedom House, an independent, nongovernment organization that supports expansion of freedom, analyzes the extent of press freedom throughout the world. Their conclusion is that only 74 of the 208 countries in the world have a free press. Freedom of the press exists in most countries in Western Europe and North America, but freedom is the exception rather than the rule in Africa, Asia, and Latin America. Where the press is not free, the public is not informed, and the kind of interaction between newspapers and government that we are familiar with does not occur.

Guido H. Stempel III

See also Agenda Setting; All the President's Men; American Voter, The; Debates; First Amendment; Four Theories of the Press; Greeley, Horace; Libel; Media Bias; Presidential Communication; Press Theories; Republican Party; Roosevelt, Franklin D.; Social Responsibility Theory; Testimonials, Political; Yellow Journalism

Further Readings

Clarke, P., & Evans, S. H. (1983). Covering campaigns: Journalism in congressional elections. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Danielson, W. A., & Adams, J. B. (1961). Completeness of coverage of 1960 election. Journalism Quarterly, 38(3), 441–452.

Emery, E., & Emery, M. (1988). The press and America (6th ed.). Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.

Graber, D. (2006). Mass media and American politics (4th ed.). Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press.

Nelson, H. L. (1967) Freedom of the press from Hamilton to the Warren Court. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs Merrill.

Robinson, J. P. (1974). The press as king maker: What surveys from the last live campaigns show. Journalism Quarterly, 51(1), 587–594.

Stempel, G. H., III. (1961). The prestige press covers the 1960 election. Journalism Quarterly, 38(1), 157–163.

Stempel, G. H., III, & Windhauser, J. W. (Eds.). (1992). The media in the 1984 and 1988 presidential campaigns. Westport, CT: Greenwood.

Tebbel, J., & Stewart, K. (1952). Makers of modern journalism. New York: Prentice Hall.

News Selection Process

The paradigm for news research often states that news in one way or the other does not reflect reality. Only a small fraction of events that take place are noticed by the news media. Of this fraction, only a small proportion actually gets published. Newsmaking, therefore, can be seen as a highly selective process. The selection of events or topics can be explained by gatekeeping or through newsworthiness theory.

Gatekeeping

The term gatekeeping was introduced during World War II by the psychologist Kurt Lewin, who identified the housewife as the gatekeeper for the food that ends up on the family table. David Manning White applied the term to the selection of news in the late 1940s. He assumed was that the selection of news is highly dependent on the individual likes and dislikes of the journalist. In his original case study he observed the selective decisions of a so-called wire editor (whom he named Mr. Gates) in a small newspaper in a small American town. Mr. Gates had certain prejudices that he claimed to influence his selective decision. He selected articles for his newspapers from incoming wire copy from several news agencies. This study raised a lot of criticisms, for instance that White looked at only one gatekeeper who was at the end of the news chain. Selections made at earlier stages were not explained or even considered. Reassessments of the empirical results came to the conclusion that Mr. Gates mainly reproduced the news structure presented by the news agencies more than he actively selected according to his individual preferences. Despite the shortcomings, this study established a fertile branch of news research. Subsequently, the perspective of the approach was broadened. Routines and work conditions as well as organizational factors were integrated in the gatekeeping approach.

Newer gatekeeping studies identify an ample set of influences on the gatekeeping process. Analytically, at least three levels can be specified: the micro level or the level of the individual gatekeeper, the organizational level, and the macro level, which consists of influences from the surrounding environment and the society itself. To a certain extent the news selection decision lays in the responsibility of an individual communication worker (e.g., an editor). Thus, as outlined by White, individual characteristics influence this decision, namely his or her personality, experience and interest, values and role conceptions as well as his or her capabilities and heuristics of processing—and, therefore, selecting information. It might make a difference whether the gatekeeper sees himself or herself as liberal or conservative or whether her role conceptions as a journalist adhere to objective reporting or to a more opinion-based conception. Experience might affect the selection of information regarding the interest the gatekeepers' audience might share in the topic of concern.

The gatekeeper is not a lonely decision maker; he is embedded in a work unit and his work is highly structured by routines and deadlines. A lot of decisions are made according to these routines, which she adopted when she entered the information-processing organization. These routines are not only developed to reduce the (organizational) risks that come with the decision to pass a news item or not, they also reduce the complexity of the daily work and the personal investment the journalist has to make to produce news. Work in a news organization is, therefore, highly standardized; especially the coverage of politics is characterized by a great deal of standardization. Press conferences by the government or other important institutions are usually announced well in advance, and they are scheduled for coverage no matter what topic will be discussed. Gatekeepers in local papers, for example, are more willing to accept a story as news when it concerns the area of distribution. Stories about scandals are selected only if they are backed by more than one source to reduce the risk of a subsequent court case that may result from publishing false information. The eagerness to select news items or stories also increases when the deadline for publication approaches. The role of deadlines and time pressure was observed by White in the original gatekeeper study and confirmed in later studies.

Each organization has a set of written and unwritten rules that influence the decision whether a news item passes the gate or not. Among these unwritten rules is the editorial bias or the reporting paradigm to which the media outlet in concern adheres. Conservative media will try to suppress information contradictory to its own standpoint and vice versa. Tabloids will concentrate on gossip whereas quality media such as broadsheet newspapers will be less reluctant to pass on information about politics. Early studies showed, for instance, a high correlation between the attitude of the publisher and the content of the newspaper, although the publisher is not involved in the daily gatekeeping. Size is an additional influential factor. Small organizations with flat hierarchies give the individual gatekeeper more room, whereas the position in the hierarchy determines the chances of a gatekeeper in large companies. Furthermore, the type of media and its position in the news chain will modulate the outcome of the gatekeeping. TV stations will choose stories that are visualizable, local papers will prefer local stories. News agencies will try to anticipate the needs of their customers as much as the frontline media will do so for their audience.

Organizational socialization also helps to understand the outcome of gatekeeping. Each organization selects its employees according to their qualifications and according to how well their attitudes fit in the aims of the editorial guidelines. Put simply, the Wall Street Journal will try not to hire communists. Co-orientation and social control in the day-to-day work further shape the individual socialization and might even tone down the individual preferences. Even if a communication worker does not agree with the aims of his employer, he will be hesitant to oppose (the aims) to not endanger his job.

Outside the news organization several factors modulate the gatekeeping process. Since most media organizations are profit-seeking companies, economic factors play an important role. Advertisers might seek to influence content. General Motors stopped its ads in the Los Angeles Times after critical coverage about the company in 2005. The influence of the advertiser might even be more subtle than that. In the 1980s American women's magazines were quite averse to selecting articles about the hazards of smoking so as not to scare off ads from the tobacco industry. Even if a magazine would not accept tobacco ads, it did not cover the undisputed risks of smoking so as not to upset the tobacco conglomerates, which could then withdraw their ads for other products (Kessler, 1989).

All sorts of interest groups seek to influence media content in their favor and therefore influence the gatekeeping process. The political and economical powerful, especially, are more successful in making their message pass the gates. Public relations is one mean for achieving these goals. Organizations such as companies or political parties will provide information for the media. They will try to package the information in a way to make it pass the filters (e.g., by anticipating the needs of the gatekeeping media). By creating so called pseudo-events—events that are staged only for the media—interest groups frequently enter the news. The media cover these events because they meet their needs, because they are in constant search for information to print or broadcast.

Cultural norms and fashions also affect gatekeeping on the societal level. According to cultural values certain topics will not be reported. German press usually is quite reluctant to report on the private life of politicians, whereas the American media—even quality media—make this a big issue (e.g., Clinton–Lewinsky). The recent dispute about the Muhammed cartoons in the Scandinavian press underline the importance of cultural norms and values in gatekeeping. The Scandinavian countries might value satire higher than religious issues, whereas Islamic countries do not do so. Thus articles that might portray religious issues negatively would not be selected for publication in Islamic countries.

The Theory of Newsworthiness

While gatekeeping explains how news becomes news (i.e., by looking at the characteristics of the decision makers), the theory of newsworthiness looks at the characteristics of events and topics. This approach integrates concepts of perception and the before-mentioned professional and organizational routines.

The term news value was introduced by Walter Lippmann (1922) as a characteristic of an event. News value determines the chances of an event to become news. The higher the news value of an item of reality, the higher its probability of being selected for publication. In other words, the newsworthiness of an event or topic explains why some topics are covered and others are neglected by journalists. The news value of an event is comprised by its features, also known as news factors. The first empirical study of this concept was conducted by Charles Merz, who identified four elements of news: conflict, personality, prominence, and suspense.

Östgaard was one of the first to look for explanations why the international news flow seems to be distorted. According to his observation, some countries received more media attention than others, even when regarding their size. He theorized that there are certain features of news that make these countries particularly interesting for journalists: (a) simplicity, (b) identification, and (c) sensationalism. Events that are simple, that bear a high degree of identification (for the readers) and sensationalism are newsworthy and are most likely to be published. Galtung and Ruge published a study in the same year that listed 12 news factors that constitute the newsworthiness of an event:

1. Frequency. The better the time span of an event fits the timelines of a medium, the higher will be the probability of its publication.

2. Threshold (intensity/increase). Before an event is noticed by the medium, its intensity has to pass a certain threshold. The bigger the increase in intensity, the likelier the coverage will be.
3. Unambiguity. Simplicity and clarity of an event increases the chances for publication.
4. Meaningfulness (proximity and relevance). Events with far-reaching consequences (for a lot of people) with direct effects for the lives of the recipients or events that take place "next door" will receive more media attention.
5. Consonance (predictability). The more an event fits expectations, the better its chances in becoming news.
6. Unexpectedness (unpredictability). The more surprising an event is, the better its chances are in becoming news.
7. Continuity. Once an event has been defined as news, it will stay news, even if its intensity drops.
8. Composition. If the news is dominated by a certain type of event or topic, a complementary topic has good odds in becoming news to balance the overall picture.
9. Reference to elite nations. Events that take place in powerful (politically, economically, and militarily) nations receive more media attention.
10. Reference to elite persons. Analogous to the previous factor, the media are more attentive to events in which powerful persons are involved.
11. Reference to persons. Generally speaking, the media prefer events that can be seen as actions of identifiable persons over abstract events.
12. Reference to something negative. If it bleeds, it leads. Damage, conflict, and negative consequences raise the chance of an event to become news.

Galtung and Ruge deducted the first eight factors from general rules of human perception and thought them to be stable across different cultures. The last four were seen as bound to the Western culture and were expected to vary along the north-south or center-periphery axis. Clearly some of the news factors contradict themselves. An event usually cannot be predicable and surprising at the same time. Therefore the authors formulated five hypotheses about how these factors constitute the newsworthiness of an event:

1. The more events satisfy the criteria mentioned, the more likely that they will be registered as news (selection).
2. Once a news item has been selected, what makes it newsworthy according to the factors will be accentuated (distortion).
3. Both the process of selection and the process of distortion will take place at all steps in the chain from event to reader (replication).
4. The higher the total score of an event, the higher the probability that it will become news and even make headlines (additivity).
5. If an event is low on one dimension or factor, it may compensate for that by being high on another (complementarity).

The extensive theoretical work was not matched by the empirical study the authors conducted. It proved to be a fertile framework for further research. Especially in Europe, scholars replicated and refined this approach theoretically and empirically. Most studies are confined to the content analysis of media output. Newsworthiness is usually operationalized by the editorial emphasis given to an event. Critics argue that the decision whether a story is published or not cannot be explained by news factors when only the published events are analyzed. Supporters of the approach reply that the decision not to publish a story is just the lowest degree of editorial emphasis. Newsworthiness is also indicated through the allocated space, the position of the story, and its visual emphasis.

Schulz argued that news factors cannot be seen as objective features of reality when deciding on the newsworthiness of its items. Furthermore, they have to be seen as hypotheses about reality used by journalists to decide about the news value of an event. They are guidelines or rules of thumb acquired during the professional formation and socialization of the journalists. New research suggests that not only the journalistic perception is led by these hypotheses but that the audience as well uses similar rules for selection and retention of media content. This might explain why different media often make similar selective decisions.

The newsworthiness approach developed in the United States is mostly independent from the European branch of research. In the American literature, the terms news factors and news values are often use as equivalents. According to Schulz, news value can be seen as the result of the news factors shown in the editorial emphasis of the story. The catalogs of factors are mostly comparable to their European counterparts, since they are deductible from the psychology of perception.

Gatekeeping and newsworthiness are two sides of the same coin. When gatekeepers select news items according to professional routines, they select news items depending on their news factors.

Reimar Zeh

See also News Management; Schulz, Winfried

Further Readings

Donohew, L. (1967). Newspaper gatekeepers and forces in the news channel. Public Opinion Quarterly, 31, 61–88.

Eilders, C. (1997). Nachrichtenfaktoren und Rezeption. Eine empirische Analyse zur Auswahl und Verarbeitung politischer Information [News factors and reception: An empirical analysis of the selection and processing of political information]. Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag.

Eilders, C. (2006). News factors and news decisions: Theoretical and methodological advances in Germany. Communications, 31, 5–24.

Galtung, J., & Ruge, M. H. (1965). The structure of foreign news: The presentation of the Congo, Cuba and Cyprus crises in four foreign newspapers. Journal of Peace Research, 2, 64–91.

Gieber, W. (1964). News is what newspapermen make it. In D. M. White & L. A. Dexter (Eds.), People, society and mass communication (pp. 173–180). New York: Free Press.

Kessler, L. (1989). Women's magazines' coverage of smoking-related health hazards. Journalism Quarterly, 66, 316–322, 445.

Lippmann, W. (1997/1922). Public opinion. New York: Free Press Paperbacks.

Loosen, W. (1998). Die Medienrealität des Sports. Evaluation und Analyse der Printberichterstattung [The media reality of sports. Evaluation and analysis in print reporting]. Wiesbaden: Deutscher Universitätsverlag.

Merz, C. (1925). What makes a first-page story? A theory based on the ten big news stories of 1925. New Republic, 156–158.

Östgaard, E. (1965). Factors influencing the flow of news. Journal of Peace Research, 2, 39–63.

Reinemann, C., & Schulz, W. (2006). Introduction to the special issue: News decisions and news values. Communications, 31, 1–4.

Rosengren, K. E. (1970). International news: Intra and extra media data. Acta Sociologica, 13, 96–109.

Ruhrmann, G., Woelke, J., Maier, M., & Diehlmann, N. (Eds.). (2003). Der Wert von Nachrichten im Deutschen Fernsehen. Ein Modell zur Validierung von Nachrichtenfaktoren [The value of news messages on German television: A model for validating news message factors]. Opladen: Leske & Budrich.

Sande, Ø. (1971). The perception of foreign news. Journal of Peace Research, 8(3–4), 221–237.

Schulz, W. (1976). Die Konstruktion von Realität in den Nachrichtenmedien. Analyse der aktuellen Berichterstattung [The construction of reality in the news media: Analysis of current reporting]. Freiburg/München: K. Alber.

Shoemaker, P. J. (1991). Gatekeeping. Newbury Park, CA: Sage.

Staab, J. F. (1990). Nachrichtenwert-Theorie. Formale Struktur und empirischer Gehalt [News value theory: Formal structure and empirical content]. Freiburg (Breisgau), München: K. Alber.

White, D. M. (1950). The gate keeper: A case study in the selection of news. Journalism Quarterly, 27, 383–390.

New York Times, The

The New York Times (NYT) is a morning daily newspaper with Sunday editions that is regarded as the most important newspaper in the United States. Together with the Washington Post and the Los Angeles Times, the NYT is part of the elite press that sets the trends for the other media outlets in the United States. Its coverage of political events is frequently studied by political and communication scholars and is considered both representative and influential of the entire U.S. media. It has won 94 Pulitzer prizes, more than any other U.S. newspaper.

The NYT was founded on September 18, 1851, by Henry Jarvis Raymond and George Jones as a penny paper alternative to the yellow journalism style practiced by most media outlets at the time. Its initial name, the New-York Daily Times, was changed to The New York Times on September 18, 1857. Since 1897, the newspaper has been published under the slogan, "All the News That's Fit to Print," a phrase coined by its second owner, Adolph Ochs. The newspaper is currently owned by the New York Times Company, which owns numerous other newspapers as well as broadcast and online media outlets.

The NYT has a consistent history of publishing content that leads to political controversy. The most famous such situation is the publishing of excerpts from the Pentagon Papers, a 7,000-page confidential government report on the U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War, leaked to NYT reporters by State Department officials. The government's attempt to stop the NYT from continuing to publish these documents resulted in a legal case judged by the U.S. Supreme Court, which reaffirmed the media's right to freedom of speech under the First Amendment.

Although considered the top U.S. newspaper, the NYT coverage of presidential campaigns has received much criticism. Extensive studies by several communication scholars revealed that the NYT coverage of political campaigns relies on horserace framing and discussion of candidates' character more frequently than on discussion of candidates' issue positions. Over the past five decades, its reporting of U.S. presidential elections slanted toward reporting negative news and scandal and using reporters as sources of information for articles more often than citing candidates and voters.

The NYT has also been accused of overreliance on official sources and failure to fulfill its watchdog role regarding the government. Critics claim that the newspaper downplayed important events such as Hitler's genocide of Jews, Stalin's genocide of Ukrainians, and Turkey's genocide of Armenians during War World I. Its coverage of the White House discourse prior to the 2003 invasion of Iraq is regarded as unquestioning and considered evidence of corporate ownership bias. In 2004, the newspaper's editors published a letter admitting that they failed to be rigorous in their reporting of the events that led to the Iraq War.

Monica Postelnicu

See also News Coverage, Politics

Further Readings

Graber, D. A. (1989). Mass media and American politics (3rd ed.). Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly.

Jamieson, K. H., & Waldman, P. (2003). The press effect: Politicians, journalists, and the stories that shape the political world. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

NIGHTLINE

Nightline, a live ABC late night news program, debuted on March 24, 1980. Originally a 20-minute Monday-through-Thursday-night program (11:30 p.m. Eastern Time), Nightline expanded to a 30-minute Monday-through-Friday program in April 1981. Ted Koppel anchored Nightline from its inception until November 22, 2005. Since Koppel's departure, the format of Nightline has changed from one anchor discussing one topic to three co-anchors, broadcasting from Washington and New York, addressing multiple topics. Nightline was groundbreaking in two ways: (1) the program delivered news in a new time slot, and (2) the program's format relied upon new satellite technology.

By the late 1970s, Roone Arledge, president of ABC News, saw the potential of a late night news program that could reach an audience not tuned in to the very popular NBC program, the Tonight Show with Johnny Carson. In late 1979, a national crisis provided the argument Arledge used to convince ABC executives of the need for a late night news program. This crisis, the Iranian takeover of the U.S. embassy in Tehran on November 4, set in motion the beginnings of Nightline. By November 8, World News Tonight anchor Frank Reynolds was anchoring a late night news program on ABC called America Held Hostage. The Iranian hostage situation, expected by most to last only a few days, continued for over a year. By mid-December 1979, Reynolds returned full time to World News Tonight, and Ted Koppel, an ABC reporter who had been covering the State Department, became the new anchor of America Held Hostage. Within 4 months, a successful late night news slot had been established, and ABC, realizing a program like America Held Hostage had a future beyond the hostage crisis, changed the title to Nightline.

The second significant contribution of Nightline was the program's reliance upon satellite technology as an integral part of its format. Satellite technology in 1979 was a relatively new technology, but by that time, the technology had become more accessible and more affordable. Satellite links enabled newscasters to connect people in ways not possible through other technologies like film and videotape, which had to be physically shipped from place to place. Satellite technology reduced the lag time between covering a story and broadcasting a story. Information was becoming more instantaneous. Satellite technology enabled Nightline to develop the multiperson interview format, a break from the traditional single-person interview format. Because Nightline could conduct live, simultaneous interviews with people from around the world as a result of satellite technology, various arguments and viewpoints have been brought directly into the living rooms of late night America.

Kaylene Barbe

Further Readings

Koppel, T., & Gibson, K. (1996). Nightline: History in the making and the making of television. New York: Times Books.

Nightline set to move from Times Square. (2006, July 21). Retrieved from http://www.tv.com/nightline/show/13427/story.html?story_id=5452

Nimmo, Dan (1933–2004)

Dan Nimmo was one of the most productive and influential scholars to write and teach about political communication. To his work, he brought a broadly educated mind, a profound knowledge of political science, and a great respect for the role that communication plays in politics. In this latter conviction, he was, in the 1960s and 1970s, one of the few voices from his native discipline of political science who thought that the subject matter of this volume was worthy of scholarly attention. He produced, with several coauthors and coeditors, more than 35 volumes, as well as countless book chapters and convention papers. These works provided some of the most substantive, intellectually honest, theoretically sophisticated, and well-written scholarship in the field.

Nimmo's first major book, Political Persuaders, was published in 1970, and again in 2001 with a new introduction by the author. These books covered such topics as a paradigm for political campaigns, profiling the electorate, and the effects and consequences of professionally mediated campaigns. To all of this, Nimmo brought a concern about the potential unintended consequences of the "new politics."

In 1976, Nimmo, with Robert Savage, published Candidates and Their Images. This was one of the first books on this topic that was heavily based upon empirical research. It relied on the results of the Q-Sort procedure and methodology as a means of measuring candidate image, and it proposed an early model explaining how images are formed in the minds of voters.

Still convinced that political communication as a field of inquiry needed further definition and elaboration, Nimmo in 1981 coedited with Keith R. Sanders The Handbook of Political Communication. The first single-volume reference work in the field, it was pluralistic, interdisciplinary, and comprehensive. In 2007, some chapters are still being used in reprint form.

One book, more than any other, represents one of the enduring themes of Nimmo's thinking. In Mediated Political Realities, published in 1983 with James E. Combs, the authors contend that > few people learn about politics through direct experience; for most persons political realities are mediated through mass and group communication, a process resulting as much in the creation, transmission, and adoption of political fantasies as realistic views of what takes place. (p. xv).

Dan Nimmo was also a consummate teacher. He received his doctorate in political science from Vanderbilt University, and during his academic career included service on the faculties of the University of Missouri, the University of Tennessee, and the University of Oklahoma. His many coauthors and coeditors learned more than they taught during their collaborations with him. Several of his students became major contributors to the field that he (and they) helped create.

Nimmo gave unselfishly of his time editing the works of others. He was provocative, witty, and persistent. His work habits and his qualities of mind and character inspired everyone who had the privilege of knowing him. He was, mediated or unmediated, a great force for good throughout his career.

Keith R. Sanders

See also Candidates and Their Images; Handbook of Political Communication; Mediated Political Realities

Further Readings

Nimmo, D. (2001). Political persuaders: The techniques of modern election campaigns. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction.

Nimmo, D., & Combs, J. E. (1983). Mediated political realities. New York: Longman.

Nimmo, D. D., & Sanders, K. R. (Eds.). (1981). Handbook of political communication. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Nimmo, D., & Savage, R. L. (1976). Candidates and their images: Concepts, methods, and findings. Pacific Palisades, CA: Goodyear.

Swanson, D. L. (2005). Dan Nimmo's legacy to political communication. Political Communication Report, 15(1), 1–2.

NIXON, RICHARD M. (1913–1994)

Richard M. Nixon served as president of the United States from 1969 to 1974, when he became the only U.S. president to resign from the office. Prior to his election to the presidency in 1968, Nixon served as a Republican in the U.S. House of Representatives (Calif.–12th district) from 1947 to 1950, a U.S. senator from California from 1950 to 1953, and as vice president under Dwight Eisenhower from 1953 to 1961.

Perhaps more than any other American president, Nixon's political career was shaped by television. During the 1952 presidential campaign, Nixon was accused of illegally using campaign contributions for personal gain. On September 23, 1952, Nixon became one of the first politicians to use television for a direct appeal to a mass audience. The speech became known as the "Checkers Speech" because of Nixon's reference to a cocker spaniel he had received and decided to keep during the campaign. After his 1959 televised encounter with Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev, known as the "kitchen debate," Nixon received the 1960 Republican nomination for president and, for the first time, became the victim of television rather than a beneficiary. That year, Nixon participated with the Democratic nominee, John F. Kennedy, in the first televised presidential debates. Many observers declared that Nixon did not come across well in those debates, largely on the basis of appearance and style. In what became the closest popular vote in American history, Kennedy defeated Nixon by 0.1%.

In 1968, after having lost a bid for the governorship of California in 1962 and famously telling the media that it wouldn't "have Dick Nixon to kick around any more," Nixon defeated Hubert Humphrey and George Wallace in a three-way race to become the 37th president of the United States. Nixon's victory was predicated largely on "law and order" rhetoric, made salient by images of violence and chaos broadcast throughout the year. In 1976, Michael J. Robinson published a groundbreaking study based in part on the 1968 elections and found a correlation between television dependency and political malaise. In effect, television magnified feelings of social distrust, political cynicism and inefficacy, partisan disloyalty, and third-party viability while, at the same time, reducing voter turnout. Each of these factors was seen as contributing to Nixon's victory.

Nixon had an acrimonious relationship with the media throughout his career and presidency. His vice president, Spiro T. Agnew, gained attention in 1970 for referring to media pundits as "nattering nabobs of negativism." Nixon is perhaps most famously remembered for his 1974 resignation in the wake of "Watergate," a scandal involving the cover-up of illegal activities sponsored and administered by the White House. The Watergate investigation was spearheaded by Washington Post reporters Carl Bernstein and Bob Woodward, and news reports of the scandal permeated Americans' television sets for much of 1973 and 1974. Although Nixon continues to be one of the most maligned icons in American political history, historians give him credit for major accomplishments in foreign policy, particularly his openness to engaging with China.

Richard Nixon died on April 22, 1994, after suffering a major stroke.

Sean P. Cunningham

See also Agnew, Spiro; All the President's Men; Checkers Speech; Debates; Selling of the President 1968, The; Wallace, George; Watergate

Further Readings

Ambrose, S. E. (1989). Nixon: The triumph of a politician, 1962–1972. New York: Simon & Schuster.

McGinnis, J. (1969). The selling of the president. New York: Trident Press.

NOELLE-NEUMANN, ELISABETH (1916–)

Born in Berlin, Germany, on December 19, 1916, Elisabeth Noelle is a journalist, an entrepreneur, and one of the most eminent and influential German communication researchers of the 20th century. She is the founder and director of the Institut für Demoskopie Allensbach, the first German opinion research institute to employ the representative survey method. She is best known internationally for her "spiral of silence" theory.

Elisabeth Noelle studied journalism, history, and American studies at the universities of Berlin, Königsberg (now Kaliningrad), and Munich, before spending one year as an exchange student at the School of Journalism at the University of Missouri–Columbia in 1937. There she heard about George Gallup, Elmo Roper, and Archibald Crossley's mass surveys on the basis of representative samples, which had come to the attention of a wider public during the U.S. presidential elections the previous year. In 1939–1940 she wrote her dissertation at the University of Berlin on representative public opinion surveys in America.

During the Second World War, Elisabeth Noelle was an editor for the Berlin daily newspaper Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung and, from 1941, for the weekly newspaper Das Reich, a position from which she was dismissed without notice in 1942 on the orders of Goebbels as a result of an article she had written about Franklin D. Roosevelt. Thereafter, she wrote for the liberal Franfurter Zeitung until it was banned in August 1943. Until the end of the war, she wrote anonymous reports for the Frankfurt newspaper Illustriertes Blatt and for Tele magazine published in Sweden.

Elisabeth Noelle married journalist Erich Peter Neumann (1912–1973) in 1946. Together they founded the Institut für Demoskopie in the small town of Allensbach in southwest Germany in 1947, initially at the behest of the French occupational authorities. The institute rapidly became one of the most influential survey research institutes in Germany. Elisabeth Noelle-Neumann served as an advisor to the German chancellors Konrad Adenauer (term of office: 1949–1963), Ludwig Erhard (1963–1966), and Helmut Kohl (1982–1998).

In 1961, Elisabeth Noelle-Neumann began teaching as a lecturer at the Free University of Berlin before being appointed to the chair of communication research at the University of Mainz in 1964, where, in 1967, she established the Institut für Publizistik, which is today one of Europe's most reputable communication research institutes. In addition, she also taught as visiting professor at the universities of Munich and Chicago. The University of St. Gallen (Switzerland) awarded her an honorary doctorate in 1978. Elisabeth Noelle-Neumann took on emeritus status in 1983 but has continued her research and teaching until very recently. Alongside the spiral of silence theory, her reputation is based mainly on her work in the fields of media effects research, election research, and survey research methodology. She holds numerous German and international awards. Elisabeth Noelle-Neumann, who was married for a second time to Heinz Maier-Leibnitz (1911–2000), now lives in Allensbach and Mainz.

Thomas Petersen

See also Spiral of Silence

Further Readings

Noelle-Neumann, E. (1973). Return of the concept of powerful mass media. Studies in Broadcasting 9, 67–112.

Noelle-Neumann, E. (1993). The spiral of silence: Public opinion—our social skin. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Noelle-Neumann, E. (2006). Die Erinnerungen [The memories]. Munich: Herbig.

Viswanath, K. (1996). Elisabeth Noelle-Neumann (1916–). In N. Signorielli (Ed.), Women in communication (pp. 300–311). Westport, CT: Greenwood.

NORRIS, PIPPA

See VIRTUOUS CIRCLE, A

NYERERE, JULIUS (1922–1999)

Julius Kambarage Nyerere was born in 1922 in Tanganyika. After being a teacher for a couple of years, Nyerere was granted a government scholarship to study history and political economy at the University of Edinburgh in Scotland until 1952. On his return to Tanganyika, he dedicated himself to the liberation movement. Full independence came in December 1961, and Nyerere was elected president of Tanganyika in 1962. When the islands of Zanzibar were integrated into a Union government in 1964, he became the first president of the new United Republic of Tanzania. He stayed in power until 1985. He was 77 years old when he died of leukemia in London on October 14, 1999.

Nyerere was highly aware of the two-faceted nature of the media in a newly independent African country devoted to its construction as a true nation: media's potential for the mobilization of citizens as well as its threat to ideological unity. Starting from 1967, when the Arusha Declaration proclaimed Tanzania an "African socialist" state, the role and influence of the media in the country were clearly delimited by the government. The radio and the press—no television sets were allowed—were used by the party in power and the government to support the socialist ideology and promote a common national culture. Though Nyerere published many books to mobilize citizens, explain his political choices, assert his views, or express his regrets and hopes for Tanzania, he is mainly remembered as an extremely gifted orator. He used the radio to broadcast his numerous speeches dealing with all aspects of citizens' life and the future of the new state. Delivered in an eloquent Swahili, the newly adopted national language, his speeches contributed significantly to the mobilization of the population for African socialism.

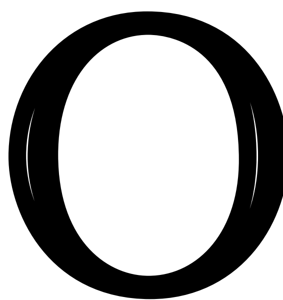
Various measures were also taken to assert political control on the media. Heads of the national media institutions had to be appointed by the president of the Republic; main newspapers, like the Standard and the Sunday News, were nationalized in 1970. As stated by Nyerere himself, "The new Standard will be a socialist paper. It will support the socialist ideology of Tanzania as defined in the Arusha Declaration." Movements of liberation in Africa and in Third World countries were intensively covered and offered as symbols of fights against colonialism that deserve active support. Such an ideological standpoint necessarily implied, for the media, a ban on antisocialist literature and, following the government's directives, repeated calls against imperialism and neocolonialism.

The Nyerere era coincided with a time in which African politics was faced with the need to build viable nations in the context of the Cold War, characterized by the immeasurable divide between capitalism and socialism. Nyerere's conception of the media, as a means in the hands of the state, noticeably illustrates such a hard task.

Marie-Aude Fouéré

Further Readings

Konde, H. S. (1984). Press freedom in Tanzania. Arusha, Tanzania: Eastern Africa Publications.



Obama, Barack (1961–)

Barack Obama has been the junior Democratic senator from Illinois since January 4, 2005. He ran an active campaign as a Democratic presidential candidate in 2008, and many speculate that he could become the nation's first African American president.

Obama was born in Honolulu, Hawaii. His father was from Kenya and his mother from Kansas. They divorced when Obama was 2 years old, and Barack spent his childhood in Indonesia with his mother and later in Hawaii with his maternal grandmother. After graduating from high school, Obama attended Occidental College in Los Angeles for 2 years and transferred to Columbia University, where he graduated in 1983. For several years he worked for a nonprofit organization, helping poor communities in Chicago, before studying law. After graduating from Harvard Law School magna cum laude, Obama worked for a civil rights firm in Chicago and taught at the University of Chicago School of Law. He published his autobiography, Dreams From My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance, in 1995. The following year, he was elected to the Illinois State Senate, where he served until 2005. He ran unsuccessfully for Congress in 2000, but in 2004, he was elected to the U.S. Senate by a landslide over Republican opponent Alan Keyes.

Barack Obama is considered one of the best orators in recent political history and is well known for his electrifying keynote address—titled "The Audacity of Hope"—at the Democratic National Convention in 2004. In this address, Obama recounted his own unique experience of the American Dream, emphasized the need for all Americans to work together to help those who are less fortunate to attain the dream, and underscored the oneness of all Americans, regardless of race, creed, religion, or political affiliation. He also attempted to create identification with all Americans through an emphasis on a common mythic narrative, common obligations, and common values. The speech overshadowed convention speeches by Jimmy Carter, Bill Clinton, Ted Kennedy, and even the party's nominee, John Kerry. It immediately caught the attention of political observers, who noted that the speech had "catapulted Obama to national political prominence."

Rhetorical scholars already have begun to study the rhetoric of the Illinois senator. Some have discussed Obama's ability to reframe the American Dream from a conservative narrative to a liberal one in the convention address. Others have focused on myth, racial issues, Obama's use of the immigration dream narrative, and the inclusive, conciliatory nature of his discourse. A number of scholarly articles and at least one book currently are being written about his rhetoric.

Presently, Obama is campaigning for the White House in 2008. He released his second book, The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream, in October 2006 and has been the subject of many interviews and news articles. His life and public rhetoric will likely generate even more scholarly attention as his political career unfolds.

John Jones

See also Race in Politics

Further Readings

Obama, B. (1995). Dreams from my father: A story of race and inheritance. New York: Crown.

Obama, B. (2006). The audacity of hope: Thoughts on reclaiming the American Dream. New York: Crown.

Obscenity and Pornography

Today, the terms obscenity and pornography refer to material of a sexual nature, particularly that designed to inspire sexual excitement. But, until the middle of the 19th century, obscenity and pornography were as likely to refer to blasphemous, seditious, or otherwise prohibited religious or political speech as to sexual expression per se. Nor did the terms begin to acquire exclusively sexual connotations in the United States until the 19th century ushered in a number of pivotal changes, including technological advances in print and film, increased literacy, urbanization, and immigration, all of which produced efforts to control a rapidly changing population that had access to an expanding array of media. Assuming that sexual material encouraged masturbation, Victorian reformers treated it as yet another call to censor scientific reports that "the solitary vice" caused blindness, promoted acne, produced insanity, compromised fertility, and, generally, depleted masculine vitality. And it was in censoring that Victorians developed a definition of obscenity that centered on sex. But even during the heyday of notorious anti-obscenity crusader Anthony Comstock (1873–1915), dissenters created suggestive and explicit sexual material, distributed it, and fought against the state censorship apparatus. Other opponents of censorship pointed out that even if obscenity laws focused on sexual expression, enforcement officials used them to entrap individuals with radical political views. Thus, obscenity has occupied a dubious and contested legal status in the United States, subject to the many federal, state, and local laws that proliferated in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

Before the 1950s, legislatures and lower courts struggled on their own to define and regulate obscenity, creating a veritable crazy quilt of laws that ignored, for the most part, constitutional concerns. Filmmakers and exhibitors, publishers and booksellers grew increasingly frustrated by the ways that local obscenity laws fragmented an otherwise national market even as they chafed under a postal obscenity code that blanketed the nation. During World War II, inconsistencies in these regulatory regimes crystallized when military officials distributed material to soldiers (Esquire's Varga girl pinups, for example) that postal authorities declared obscene and banned from the domestic mails. Not until 1957 did the U.S. Supreme Court agree to consider the possibility that obscenity laws raised constitutional issues. In Roth v. United States, the Court upheld the constitutionality of obscenity laws but defined obscenity for the first time, deeming it "material which deals with sex in a manner appealing to prurient interest." Since Roth, Supreme Court decisions have played at the margins, tinkering with standards for determining illegal obscenity without challenging its existence or the right and duty of legislatures to regulate it.

Testing the limits and implications of Roth, publishers and filmmakers produced ever more racy material that led, eventually, to the creation of a succession of presidential commissions on obscenity and pornography (1970 and 1986) and the development of a feminist antipornography movement. In 1973—amid this swelling tide of activity among commercial interests, political leaders, and feminist activists—the Supreme Court attempted to distinguish between obscenity and pornography in Miller v. California. It did so by emphasizing the general "offensive" nature of obscenity and the more specifically sexually titillating aspects of pornography. Pornography—taken from the Greek word meaning, literally, literature about prostitutes—has been defined in a number of contradictory ways. In Miller, the Court declared obscene pornography a subset of obscenity, implicitly recognizing a category of nonobscene pornography. In contrast, activists on all sides of the issue have tended to treat pornography as the most extreme, explicit, and objectionable form of obscenity, emphasizing this with modifiers such as "hard core."

Few issues have proven more intractable and polarizing in United States civic and political life than obscenity and pornography. The two presidential commissions reached dramatically different conclusions, with the 1970 report advocating the repeal of obscenity laws and the 1986 one urging stricter enforcement of those laws. Feminists, too, divided bitterly over the issue. One group, led by Catharine MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin, arguing that particular uses of pornography violated women's civil rights, pressed for municipal ordinances that would permit victims to sue producers of pornography. Other feminists declared antipornography ordinances violations of the First Amendment and accused ordinance proponents of focusing on trivial matters. More recently, many vocal women, identifying as feminists, have embraced pornography as a source of sexual liberation, information, and pleasure even as they have brought it under academic scrutiny.

The topic of obscenity and the law has received sustained scholarly attention for more than a century. Lawyers and free speech enthusiasts, such as Theodore Schroeder (1864–1953) and Morris Ernst (1888–1976), published some of the earliest work. But in the wake of Alfred Kinsey's studies on human sexual behavior (1948 and 1953), studies produced by psychologists and media scholars began to take the lead. In the 1960s, for example, Phyllis and Eberhard Kronhausen argued that pornography served a positive, cathartic social function. The next two decades saw a proliferation of more systematic research on the effects of pornography, but consensus remained elusive. In the 1980s, Edward Donnerstein found that viewing pornography, especially violent pornography, increased male subjects' antisocial attitudes, leaving them more callous toward rape victims and more willing to use force in sexual relations. Many scholars have challenged his work, less by reproducing Donnerstein's laboratory methods than by examining the relationship between pornography and sex crime and exploring pornography's contributions to culture (as an "engine of progress" or medium for artistic experimentation, for example). They have also paid more attention to female consumers of pornography, a phenomenon that has inspired the development of "porn studies" at some universities, with feminist media scholars like Linda Williams and Laura Kipnis leading the movement. Even as the academy takes up the issue, debates over pornography remain polarized. While current scholars lend pornography the legitimacy of literature by theorizing and "reading" it in different ways, journalists like Pamela Paul and Ariel Levy use interviews with consumers as the basis of exposes on pornography's devastating impact on interpersonal relationships.

The political process, judicial system, and scholarly analysis have yet to resolve the debate over obscenity and pornography. Indeed, if any consensus has been reached, it is on the illegitimacy of child pornography, a category of material denied constitutional protection by the U.S. Supreme Court in New York v. Ferber (1982). The definition of child pornography remains contested, however, as the American Civil Liberties Union and others challenge state laws against it.

Leigh Ann Wheeler

See also Censorship, Political; Feminist Movement; Film and Politics; First Amendment; Press Freedom

Further Readings

Downs, D. A. (1989). The new politics of pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Horowitz, H. L. (2002). Rereading sex: Battles over sexual knowledge and suppression in nineteenth-century America. New York: Knopf.

Hunt, L. (Ed.). (1993). The invention of pornography: Obscenity and the origins of modernity, 1500–1800. Cambridge, MA: Zone Books.

Paul, P. (2005). Pornified: How the culture of pornography is transforming our lives, our relationships and our families. New York: Time Books.

Williams, L. (1989, 1999). Hard core: Power, pleasure, and the "frenzy of the visible." Berkeley: University of California Press.

Onassis, Jacqueline Kennedy (1929–1994)

Jacqueline Lee Bouvier Kennedy Onassis was considered by many people to be one of the most popular first ladies of the 20th century. Wife of John Fitzgerald Kennedy, the 35th president of the United States, and Greek shipping magnate Aristotle Onassis, Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis was very devoted to her family. She raised two children, Caroline Bouvier, born in 1957, and John, Jr., born just after his father was elected in 1960. Kennedy Onassis had two additional children, a daughter who was stillborn, and a second son, Patrick Bouvier, who was born prematurely on August 7, 1963, and died 2 days later. She was known as a protective mother, shielding her children from media scrutiny whenever possible.

March 27, 1963: Arrival ceremonies for the king of Morocco. President and Mrs. Kennedy in motorcade.

Source: Photograph by Abbie Rowe, National Park Service, in the John F. Kennedy Presidential Library and Museum, Boston.

Kennedy Onassis occupied the White House as first lady for only 1,000 days, from January 20, 1961, to November 22, 1963. During that time she made an enduring impression on the American public. She brought a strong sense of beauty and style to the White House, and is best remembered for her status in art and fashion circles. While in the White House, she saw her main role as taking care of her husband and children by creating a comfortable place to live. Kennedy Onassis did devote significant time to a major White House restoration project, with the goal of creating an important historic site. She also exhibited excellent diplomatic qualities both nationally and internationally, as evidenced by her ease in handling both world leaders and national journalists alike.

Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis had a strong sense of how to communicate politically; she helped create long-lasting impressions of her husband's presidency. Most notable about Kennedy Onassis was her response to the assassination of her husband, John F. Kennedy. She understood what needed to be done, even in the midst of great tragedy. For example, immediately following her husband's assassination she participated in the swearing-in ceremony of her husband's successor, Lyndon B. Johnson; she helped to craft a public statement to share with a grieving nation; and she had the suit she was wearing at the time of the assassination preserved for history—realizing then that this would be an important historical artifact for the future. She is also credited with helping to create the Kennedy "Camelot" myth. In a 1963 Life interview with Theodore White, she noted that Kennedy loved the musical and strongly identified with the story line. The image resonated for many Americans and served as a symbolic representation of the Kennedy era.

After her second husband died, Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis worked in New York City as an editor for Doubleday until her death in 1994. To date, she is the only former first lady to have complete television coverage of her funeral. She is buried with Kennedy and two of her children at Arlington National Cemetery in Virginia.

Janette Kenner Muir

See also First Ladies, Political Communication of; Kennedy, John F.; Kennedy Assassination

Further Readings

Anthony, C. S. (1997). As we remember her: Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis in the words of her family and friends. New York: HarperCollins.

Natalle, E. J. (2004). Jacqueline Kennedy: The rhetorical construction of Camelot. In M. M. Wertheimer (Ed.), Inventing a voice: The rhetoric of American first ladies of the twentieth century. New York: Rowman & Littlefield.

OP-ED PIECE

See EDITORIALS

Opinion Leaders

See Two-Step Flow Model of Communication

O'Reilly, Bill (1942–)

William James "Bill" O'Reilly, Jr., is a journalist, commentator, television personality, syndicated columnist, radio host, and author. He is best known as the host of the cable news program The O'Reilly Factor on the Fox News Channel, which ranked as the top program among U.S. cable news channels from 2003 to 2006.

After his 1967 graduation from Chaminade High School in Mineola, New York, O'Reilly attended Marist College in Poughkeepsie, New York. While at Marist College, he wrote a column for the college newspaper, The Circle, and played football. O'Reilly also studied overseas at the University of London during his junior year of college. In 1971, O'Reilly received a bachelor's degree in history from Marist College. He returned to college and received a Master of Arts in broadcast journalism from Boston University after teaching high school for two years at Monsignor Pace in the Miami, Florida, area. While at Boston University, O'Reilly worked as a reporter and columnist for local newspapers and news weeklies.

O'Reilly's broadcasting career began at WNEP-TV in Scranton, Pennsylvania, where he was a reporter and anchor. He then moved to WFAA-TV in Dallas, Texas, where he won a Dallas Press Club Award for excellence in investigative reporting. He also worked at KMGH-TV in Denver, Colorado, and won an Emmy for his coverage of a skyjacking. Two years later, O'Reilly returned to the East Coast to report for WFSB-TV in Hartford, Connecticut.

While at WCBS-TV in New York City, O'Reilly won his second Emmy in 1980 for coverage of corrupt city marshals. He was then promoted to CBS News as a correspondent and covered the conflicts in El Salvador and the Falkland Islands from his base in Buenos Aires, Argentina. Additionally, O'Reilly served as an anchor on ABC and CBS television news affiliates in Boston and an anchor at KATU-TV in Portland, Oregon. He became an ABC News correspondent on ABC World News Tonight in 1986, where he won a National Headliner Award for excellence in reporting for a series of reports on the Bradley fighting vehicle.

From 1989 to 1995, O'Reilly reported and anchored the syndicated news program Inside Edition on CBS. During his broadcast news career, O'Reilly reported from all over the world, including Vietnam, Kuwait, Germany, Brazil, Australia, Japan, France, Romania, and England. In addition, he wrote an opinion column in the Boston Herald for 7 years, and his articles have appeared in publications such as Newsweek magazine, The New York Times, and Parade magazine.

He returned to college after his tenure on Inside Edition to receive a master's degree in public administration from the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University. After his graduation from Harvard in 1996, O'Reilly began working for the startup cable news channel Fox News. His show, The O'Reilly Factor, is a news analysis, commentary, and investigative reporting program that is broadcast in more than 30 countries. The O'Reilly Factor has largely been the number-one cable news program since its creation.

O'Reilly is also a best-selling author. His first novel was Those Who Trespass: A Novel of Murder and Television. O'Reilly has also written three adult nonfiction books that have each topped the New York Times best-seller list, The O'Reilly Factor, The No Spin Zone, and Who's Looking Out for You. His book for children, The O'Reilly Factor for Kids, was the best-selling nonfiction children's book of 2005. His most recent book is Culture Warrior, which was published in 2006.

His radio program, The Radio Factor, is a 2-hour call-in program and is heard on more than 400 stations in the United States.

Kristen D. Landreville

Further Readings

Hart, P. (2003). The oh, really? factor: Unspinning Fox News Channel's Bill O'Reilly. New York: Seven Stories Press.

O'Reilly, W. J. (2000). The O'Reilly factor. New York: Broadway Books.

O'Reilly, W. J. (2001). The no spin zone. New York: Broadway Books.

Orientation, Need for

The concept of a "need for orientation" (a combination of relevance and uncertainty) was first created and described by Maxwell McCombs and David Weaver in an April 1973 paper titled "Voters' Need for Orientation and Use of Mass Communication," presented at the annual conference of the International Communication Association in Montreal, Canada. In this paper, they reasoned that every individual feels some need to be familiar with his or her surroundings, to fill in enough detail to orient himself or herself. They asserted that need for orientation (NFO) leads to media use, which in turn leads to agenda-setting effects of media. They speculated that increased relevance and uncertainty were important psychological preconditions for arousal of an NFO based on information-seeking theory, and they devised a model in which relevance preceded uncertainty in time such that a low level of relevance led directly to a low NFO, a high level of relevance coupled with low uncertainty led to a moderate level of NFO, and a high level of relevance coupled with high uncertainty led to a high level of NFO.

They predicted that use of newspapers and television for political information, and political agenda-setting effects of these media, would increase monotonically as NFO increased. Using a variety of operational definitions of relevance and uncertainty, they tested these predictions with data from two surveys conducted in Durham and Charlotte, North Carolina, in the spring and summer of 1972 and found considerable support for both predictions, leading them to conclude that the sociological concept of agenda setting and the psychological concept of NFO appeared fruitful for documenting and explaining the political impact of the news media.

This concept of NFO has been tested in a variety of settings since 1973 and has been found to be a useful predictor not only of frequency of media use for political information, but also of varying levels of agenda-setting effects. A careful explication and testing of the NFO concept published in the International Journal of Public Opinion Research by Jorg Matthes of the Institute of Mass Communication and Media Research at the University of Zurich finds that the original assumption that relevance precedes uncertainty appears to be valid—that is, when there is low relevance, NFO will be low, independent of uncertainty, but when there is high relevance, uncertainty does matter. This article also finds that another related concept, need for cognition, is a predictor of NFO along with relevance, and that there are at least three separate dimensions of NFO—toward issues, facts, and journalistic evaluations. Matthes recommends that a study be conducted that examines the relationship among these three dimensions of NFO and several levels of agenda-setting effects.

David H. Weaver

See also Agenda Setting; Public Opinion

Further Readings

Matthes, J. (2006). The need for orientation towards news media: Revising and validating a classic concept. International Journal of Public Opinion Research, 18, 422–444.

Weaver, D. H. (1977). Political issues and voter need for orientation. In D. L. Shaw & M. E. McCombs (Eds.), The emergence of American political issues: The agenda-setting function of the press (pp. 107–119). St. Paul, MN: West. Also in Protess, D. L., & McCombs, M. (Eds.). (1991). Agenda setting: Readings on media, public opinion, and policymaking (pp. 131–139). Hillsdale, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Weaver, D. H. (1980). Audience need for orientation and media effects. Communication Research, 7, 361–376.

Weaver, D. H., McCombs, M. E., & Shaw, D. L. (2004). Agenda-setting research: Issues, attributes, and influences. In L. L. Kaid (Ed.), Handbook of political communication research (pp. 257–282). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Oswald, Lee Harvey

See Kennedy Assassination

Ownership of Media Outlets

See Communications Act of 1934

Özal, Turgut (1927–1993)

Turgut Özal was a politician and a statesman, prime minister of the 45th and 46th governments, and later the 8th president of the Republic of Turkey. He died while in office. Özal founded the Motherland Party (Anavatan Partisi, ANAP) on May 20, 1983, and won the elections on November 6, 1983, after a political campaign completely regulated by the National Security Council. In the early elections in 1987, aided by an amendment in the election law, ANAP won more seats with fewer votes, and Özal was reelected. In November 1989 he became president of the republic.

As the creator and practitioner of the economic liberalization program of January 24, 1980, which made its mark on the decade, Özal pioneered the establishment of liberal politics in Turkey. Özal's economic policies got the support of various academic circles, professional groups, foundations, chambers, and associations that mushroomed in the decade, and particularly of big media as a consequence of the new media capital coming in from other business sectors. The support of the wider public was gained by populist politics and discourse. Özal saw liberal economic policy as a prerequisite of democracy. Conceptualizing democracy on the basis of market conditions, he reduced it to a method of government formation. Likewise, throughout the 1980s he did not put much effort in improving the rights and liberties or the participation of social groups in the political process.

In terms of broadcasting policy, Özal years can be identified with the breaking up of the public monopoly, the development of commercial broadcasting, and emerging monopolistic tendencies. ANAP and Özal had mutual interests with the companies from outside the sector that took interest in media; a monopolistic trend has begun and major newspapers have launched radio and television channels. Following the footsteps of Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher, Özal has used the newspapers and televisions extensively to his political benefit. The public broadcaster TRT was used for progovernment and partisan broadcasts, as it was by all the governments in Turkey since the 1950s. Özal also had close relationships with certain members of the media. These relationships provided for a mutual flow of information, formed an image of Özal as a reformer and action taker, and helped in spreading his political rhetoric. However, a conflict between Özal and the big media arose after 1987 when the phrase "Ottoman Dynasty" was used in the press as a metaphor for his family.

The Americanization of the election campaigns, increased use of experts in the news, the new type of columnists in newspapers, the growth in advertising, new market research techniques, the entry of international companies into Turkish markets and their demand for local information all have led to the appearance of new actors in politics. Transferring their marketing, sales, and research experience from the business world, they have started serving the political leaders as consultants and have become close associates. This has resulted in a belief that politics is an activity to be practiced only with the help of expert knowledge.

Fatih Keskin

P

PAC

See Political Action Committees (PACs)

Pack Journalism

Pack journalism describes the practice of journalists covering the same stories from the same perspective. With the advent of 24-hour news programming, reporters from different geographical areas can travel across the globe to cover the same news event. Pack journalism was originally used to label the "packs" of journalists who traveled with political candidates to cover the news on the campaign trail.

The phrase "pack journalism" (also known as "herd journalism" and "fuselage journalism") is attributed to Thomas Crouse, who introduced the concept in his book Boys on the Bus. Published in 1972, Crouse described how journalists were transported en masse (called "packs") from one campaign location to another to cover speeches, fundraisers, and other campaign events. During the McGovern presidential campaign coverage, only a few reporters, known as a "pool," were allowed to attend certain functions (such as small dinners). Those reporters wrote a story about the function, and it was copied and distributed to the rest of the "pack" of journalists. The "pack" passed along the same information in the form of their own news reports. As a result, everyone reported the same event from the same perspective because only a few reporters were granted access to the actual event. After a while, according to Crouse, the journalists "began to believe the same rumors, subscribe to the same theories, and write the same stories" (p. 8).

Still today, there are lead reporters and news outlets (such as The New York Times and The Washington Post) that the rest of the pack follows. The pack reporters restate what the lead reporters and outlets report. The result is that these "pack journalists" contribute little to alternative viewpoints in news. Instead, there is a drive to be in sync with other major outlets.

The pack mentality can result in a "feeding frenzy" among reporters. An often-cited incidence of pack journalism occurred in the O. J. Simpson trial. News outlets were scrambling to find the latest piece of information relevant to the trial and its outcome. Reporters often exhibit this behavior when any news story breaks.

Another problem with pack journalism is that reporters, having covered the same incident, pass along the same erroneous information. This is evidenced in the news reports immediately following the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, in which multiple news sources reported that the suspects in the bombing were of Middle Eastern descent. More recently, a tragic misstatement led reporters scrambling to be the first to break the news that the 12 miners trapped in a West Virginia mine in January 2006 were found alive. Sadly, shortly thereafter it was reported that only one of the 12 miners was found alive.

Crouse's words appear to reflect journalism to this day. In Boys on the Bus, he states, "Campaign journalism is, by definition, pack journalism; to follow a candidate, you must join a pack of other reporters; even the most independent journalist cannot completely escape the pressures of the pack."

Kristin K. Froemling

Further Readings

Crouse, T. (1972). The boys on the bus: Riding with the campaign press corps. New York: Ballantine Books.
Graber, D. A. (1997). Mass media and American politics (5th ed.). Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly.
Kerbel, M. R. (1999). Remote and controlled: Media politics in a cynical age (2nd ed.). Boulder, CO: Westview.

Paid Media

See Political Advertising

Palestine Liberation Organization

See Arafat, Yasser

Paletz, David

See Political Communication

Palme, Olof (1927–1986)

Olof Palme was Sweden's internationally best-known politician during the 20th century. Notwithstanding his upper-class background, he joined the Social Democratic Party as a student. He was the party leader 1969–1986 and prime minister 1969–1976 and 1982–1986. During his more than 30 years at the center of politics, he strongly contributed to changing the relations between the political sphere and media.

Palme came into politics in the beginning of 1950s; a few years later Sweden's first television broadcasting began. As a cabinet member, he became responsible for the Swedish Radio and Television Company, which helped make him aware of media's potential. Palme strongly promoted the principle of public service, and he objected to commercial radio and TV.

Unlike most politicians at that time, he did not hesitate to appear on TV. Instead he did it often and willingly. This made him the target of criticism, in particular from political opponents who accused him of using the state television for his own political agenda. Nevertheless, the television became his most important rostrum.

One thing that distinguished Palme from his political predecessors was that he made a habit of treating journalists very informally. He was often favored by the media because of his political devotion, his provocative rhetoric, and his availability to journalists and photographers. Moreover, he had a deep knowledge of and readiness to accept and adjust to media logics.

In the '60s, many journalists liked Olof Palme, as they felt he represented something new and more radical in Swedish politics. A contributory cause was his criticism of the U.S. war in Vietnam. The relations between Palme and journalists during those years can be characterized as somewhat symbiotic. In the '70s, political journalism went through a process of professionalization. The party press became less loyal to the parties. Simultaneously, there was a drift toward conservatism. The political as well as the media agendas were dominated by issues that the Social Democratic Party had problems dealing with. When the party lost the general elections in 1976, Palme blamed the media. It would take 6 years before he was back in office.

Olof Palme believed in a strong society, where employment and the public sector were the two most important means to increase equality between classes and sexes. His commitment to international issues was about the elimination of colonialism, racism, and nuclear war.

When it comes to the relations between media and politics, he set a new standard in Swedish political life. Earlier, and to a greater extent than anyone else, his political work was directed to the mediated public sphere. This was called into question—he was accused of attaching too great importance to media publicity. The view today is that he contributed to making media an increasingly important arena for political communication. He also made media coverage a measure of political success.

Olof Palme's personality, his politics, and his media visibility made him a controversial person, arousing strong emotions—positive and negative. In February 1986, he was assassinated in central Stockholm. The murder is still unsolved.

Gunnela Björk

Papandreou, Andreas (1919–1996)

Andreas Papandreou studied at the Law School of the University of Athens and as early as 1936 he was impeached by the dictatorial regime of the time. In 1941 he set out from Greece for the United States, where he pursued an academic career in economics and philosophy at Harvard University. In 1947 he became assistant professor at Harvard University and then professor at the University of Minnesota, the University of California, Los Angeles, and elsewhere. In 1951, he married Margarita Tsant. This was his second marriage, which gave him four children, among them George (present leader of the opposition). At the invitation of Konstantinos Karamanlis, his subsequent political opponent, he came back to Greece in 1961. In the 1964 elections, he was elected with the party of Enosis Kentrou (Union of the Center), led by his father George, who had been a prominent politician during the 1950s and '60s.

In April 1967, Papandreou was arrested by the Dictatorship of the Colonels. He was released the following year, when he departed for Paris and settled first in Sweden and then Canada. While in exile he initiated extensive antidictatorial activity. After the restoration of democracy in Greece, he returned home and founded the Panhellenic Socialist Movement (Panhellinio Socialistiko Kinima; PASOK). In the first postauthoritarian elections, in November 1974, PASOK was initially represented by only a few members of Parliament (MPs). In the next parliamentary elections, in November 1977, its strength was doubled and Papandreou became the leader of the opposition.

During the period between 1977 and 1981, PASOK managed to establish itself as an hegemonic political force, which capitalized on the ability and populist charisma of its leader. In the 1981 elections, when PASOK campaigned with the catchword of "change" (allagi), it ranked first party with an absolute majority in Parliament. In 1985's elections PASOK was again elected first party (45.8% of the vote). PASOK and Andreas Papandreou dominated the political scene during the '80s, which has been described as a "populist decade." With regards to political communication, PASOK's and Papandreou's political discourse and style of campaign were, among other characteristics, polarizing, anti-American, underdog, nationalist, and mobilizing.

In 1988, Andreas Papandreou underwent a serious heart operation. In the national elections of June 1989, PASOK proved wrong all those who had predicted a dramatic downfall and placed second, with 39.1% of the vote. In September 1989, Papandreou was referred to a special court after a decision of the Greek Parliament relating to political and economic scandals. The long trial attracted the news media's attention and was reported live. In January 1991, Andreas Papandreou was found not guilty by the special court—in which he never appeared.

In 1993, PASOK's electoral victory was a vindication for Papandreou, who despite his poor health staged a triumphant return to power. In those elections "telepolitics" was widely implemented by PASOK and other parties as they applied political marketing tools and focused on television news programs, positive and negative political advertising, and political talk shows. Afterward he abandoned his former populist strategy and adopted a more realistic attitude. In November 1995 he developed serious health problems, and he resigned as prime minister in January 1996. He passed away on June 23, 1996.

Nicolas Demertzis

Further Readings

Papandreou, A. (1970). Democracy at gunpoint. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

Woodhouse, C. M. (1985). The rise and fall of the Greek Colonels. New York: Franklin Watts.

Parasocial Relationships in Politics

Parasocial relationship is a term used to describe the pseudo-personal relationship media users develop toward mass media performers. Donald Horton and R. Richard Wohl were the first to bring up the parasocial relationship idea in 1956. They claimed that the unique characteristics of the electronic media, especially those of television, have encouraged an illusional face-to-face relationship between spectators, defined as the media users, and performers, defined as the personas that appear repeatedly in the media, such as actors, presenters, newscasters, and politicians. The qualities of television, such as close-up shots and camera zooms, create a sense of intimacy, reality, and affinity toward the personas on the screen. Observers have indicated that these qualities are felt more strongly in the context of politics, due to the realistic nature of the political material and the high frequency with which it appears on screens. Researchers added that politicians, media people, and the audience welcome the parasocial phenomenon. It may contribute to the popularity of politicians, to the rating of shows, and to the gratification of audience needs to communicate with politicians and political content, especially in times of political disaffection.

It was not until the late 1970s that the parasocial concept started to receive attention in the communication discipline. The trigger came from the extensive development of the uses and gratifications theory, which examines how the audience uses the media and for what purposes. Major progress in the field was marked within the boundaries of political communication research by Mark R. Levy in 1979. Levy studied television news while measuring the parasocial relationships between newscasters and television news viewers. It appears that the viewers like to compare their own ideas with what the commentators say, see the newscasters as friends, and find the news easier to take when the newscasters joke around with each other. Moreover, support was found for the correlation between parasocial relationship and television news exposure, meaning that high gratification of the parasocial relationship comes along with increased levels of exposure to television news. Finally, in attempts to profile the parasocial audience, Levy found that education relates negatively to parasocial relationship, in other words, the more people are educated the less they would be prone to develop parasocial relationships with newscasters. Since Levy's benchmark, parasocial research in politics has taken various directions: television news, political talk radio, and parasocial strategies.

The largest group of studies has been focused on television news audiences while leaning on the uses and gratifications tradition. In 1985 Alan M. Rubin, Elizabeth M. Perse, and Robert A. Powell made a significant development when they devised a 20-item scale, known as the PSI scale, to measure parasocial interaction of television news viewers toward newscasters. Prominent PSI findings indicate that news viewers mostly see their favorite newscasters as natural, down-to-earth persons, as people who seem to understand the kinds of things the viewers want to know and feel sorry when the newscasters make mistakes. While taking a step forward, some researchers attempted to reveal the origins of the behavior depicted in the PSI scale. They did not find much support for the hypothesis that states that parasocial relationships with newscasters are used as substitutes for social events and feelings of loneliness. However, studies did find that when viewers feel affinity with news programs, perceive the news as reality, react with positive emotions to the news, and view news in order to receive information, they are more likely to develop parasocial interactions with favorite television newscasters. Some researchers suggested that viewers originally use the news to gratify instrumental needs such as information seeking and subsequently develop parasocial relationships. At the same time, other findings suggest that television news viewers seek parasocial interactions independently from other gratifications; however, it seems that in the process of obtaining these gratifications, viewers do link gratifications such as parasocial interactions and entertainment.

In the early 1980s, Lawrence A. Wenner decided to shift the focus from newscasters to politicians and conducted a study on parasocial interaction between viewers and presidential candidates who appear on television news. He found that people who are poor, uneducated, low on political cynicism, high on campaign interest, and nonreaders tend to develop parasocial interactions with candidates appearing in the news and, in the process, receive vote guidance.

Studies that have concentrated on political talk radio audiences examined the level of involvement among listeners, which ranges from passive listeners who do not listen at all to active listeners who call the host. Results illustrate a triple connection among listener involvement, political participation, and inclination toward parasocial interaction. Apparently, people who participate in political and civic activities such as voting and demonstrations tend to be more active listeners and to search for parasocial interaction with the host. Other studies explored the effects of parasocial interaction on listeners' behavior and attitudes. Listeners who experience parasocial interaction with a host tend to expose themselves to the show more often, see the host as a credible source of information, and as a persona who can influence their attitudes and behavior.

Despite the sparse literature on parasocial strategies used by politicians and newscasters, some strategies have been documented. Some of them are attractive appearance, warm tone, informality, emotionality, storytelling technique, blending with the audience, and production techniques. Studies demonstrate how media and other social forces have turned politics into a personal experience for voters and media users. Candidates' personal qualities become more significant for voters. Accordingly, research reports that politicians try to emphasize their personalities and images on the screen while using strategies to create intimacy. To illustrate the significance of this phenomenon, one study showed how in the historical 1978 Camp David Accords that outlined a peace agreement between Egypt and Israel politicians used parasocial techniques to approach their target audiences. Recently, the parasocial phenomenon was implemented in the televised political advertising setting. The one study conducted in the field found that the use of parasocial strategies in ads have increased over the years. Moreover, results suggest that religious and left-wing political parties tend to use parasocial strategies significantly more than nonreligious and right-wing parties.

Galit Marmor-Lavie

See also Political Involvement; Talk Radio in Politics; Talk Shows, Television; Uses and Gratifications Approach

Further Readings

Giles, D. C. (2002). Parasocial interaction: A review of the literature and a model for future research. Media Psychology, 4(3), 279–305.

Hofstetter, C. R., & Gianos, C. L. (1997). Political talk radio: Actions speak louder than words. Journal of Broadcasting & Electronic Media, 41(4), 501–515.

Horton, D., & Wohl, R. R. (1956). Mass communication and para-social interaction: Observations on intimacy at a distance. Psychiatry, 19, 215–229.

Keeter, S. (2001). The illusion of intimacy: Television and the role of candidate personal qualities in voter choice. Public Opinion Quarterly, 51, 344–358.

Levy, M. R. (1979). Watching TV news as para-social interaction. Journal of Broadcasting, 23(1), 69–80.

Palmgreen, P., Wenner, L. A., & Rayburn, J. D. (1980). Relations between gratifications sought and obtained: A study of television news. Communication Research, 7(2), 161–192.

Rubin, A. L., Perse, E. M, & Powell, R. A. (1985). Loneliness, parasocial interaction, and local television news viewing. Human Communication Research, 12(2), 155–180.

Rubin, A. M., & Step, M. M. (2001). Impact of motivation, attraction, and parasocial interaction on talk radio listening. Journal of Broadcasting & Electronic Media, 44(4), 635–654.

Wenner, L. A. (1983). Political news on television: A reconsideration of audience orientations. Western Journal of Speech Communication, 47, 380–395.

Participation, Political

Political participation can be loosely defined as citizens' activities aimed at influencing political decisions. It includes activities such as voting, signing a petition, or blocking streets. Political participation refers to people in their role as citizens and not, say, as politicians or civil servants. It is understood as an activity—simply watching television or being interested in politics does not constitute participation. Political participation is voluntary and is not ordered by a ruling class or obliged under some law. Finally, political participation concerns government and politics and is neither restricted to specific phases (such as parliamentary decision making), nor to specific levels or areas (such as national elections or contacts with officials). Political participation is directly related to the quality of democracy. Democracy is not worth its name if it does not refer to government by the people; hence democracy cannot function without some minimum level of political participation. A lack of political participation is considered destructive for democracy, and debates focus on the amount of participation—not on the necessity of it.

In the past 60 years the forms of political participation expanded continuously. This increase reflects the growing relevance of government and politics, the blurring of the distinction between private and public spheres, and the rise in skills and resources (especially education) among citizens. In the 1940s and 1950s political participation was restricted mainly to voting and campaign activities. By the early 1960s it was broadly understood as campaigning by politicians and parties and contacts between citizens and public officials. These forms of activities became known as "conventional" modes of participation. The late 1960s and early 1970s show a growing relevance of community groups and direct contacts of citizens with public officials and politicians. More important was the social turbulence in the late 1960s. Evidently, protest and rejection are also clear expressions of citizens' interests and opinions and should be accepted as forms of political participation. These newer forms of participation have been labeled as "unconventional" modes of participation because they were not in line with the norms and values of the early 1970s. "New Social Movements" such as the women's movement or those of pacifist organizations belong to this category too. Another expansion took place in the 1990s. The disappearing border between political and nonpolitical spheres of society led to an expansion of political participation with "civil" activities such as volunteering. In short, political participation grew from voting in the 1940s to nearly every conceivable form of nonprivate activity now.

The continuous extension of the forms of political participation does not imply that participation is a one-dimensional concept that simply absorbs new activities. The question about the modes of political participation has been debated in many studies. First, voting always is a distinct mode of political participation; that is, no other activities are systematically related to casting a vote. Second, campaign activities constitute a mode of political participation on its own, and the same applies, third, to contacting officials or politicians. Protest activities (and New Social Movements) constitute a fourth major mode. It is not yet clear to what extent activities in voluntary associations establish a fifth type of political participation or that we are dealing with a further specification of one of the existing modes.

The increase in political participation is driven by political and societal changes that have broadened the repertoire of activities as well as the public domain for those activities. Clearly, the space defined by repertoire and domain is enormous. For instance, an individual demand for some home equipment by a disabled citizen has to be labeled as political participation if the request is directed to a public office. And for a private firm selling tropical wood, a blockade of a transport rapidly becomes "political" if ecological groups try to attain public attention by mobilizing citizens against this transport.

The growth of the forms of participation has not led to a substantial increase in the proportion of citizens being politically active. Voting still is the most popular activity used by almost every citizen at least once in his or her life. Although actions such as signing petitions appeal to growing parts of the citizenry, most forms of political participation are used by (tiny) minorities of the population only. Whether a decline in some form of participation (especially voting) is "compensated" by the rise of new forms of participation is still debated. Whereas some citizens use a number of different forms of participation to express their cause, many people seem to refrain from those activities almost completely.

The willingness to participate depends on situational factors, especially mobilizing events and conflicts, institutional opportunities, and group integration. In addition, extensive empirical research confirms the fact that individual resources—education, social status, social networks—are highly relevant for the mobilization of citizens. Surprisingly, political participation is not widely spread among victims of societal developments or marginalized social groups. On the contrary: participation is tilted in the direction of the higher educated, higher income, higher status, and more integrated groups in society. The growing political skills and resources of citizenries in general in the past decades have not reduced this evident bias in political recruitment and opportunities for interest representation. Despite the rapid increase in the forms of participation available, empirical research unambiguously shows a continuous and consistent violation of the basic democratic principle of equal access and responsiveness.

The opportunities presented by Internet technologies have widened the scope and forms of political participation once again. Experiences with "digital democracy" show that voter turnout can be increased considerably. Political theorists focusing on deliberation instead of the expression of opinions and interests especially expect an improvement of the quality of democratic decision making when the Internet is used for participation. To find a fruitful conceptualization for political participation—avoiding the correct but useless conclusion that participation can be everything, but is not used by everybody—seems to be one of the most crucial challenges for the further development of democracy.

Jan W. van Deth

See also Political Disaffection; Political Efficacy

Further Readings

Barnes, S., et al. (1979). Political action: Mass participation in five Western democracies. London: Sage.
Brady, H. E. (1998). Political participation. In J. P. Robinson, Ph. R. Shaver, & L. S. Wrightsman (Eds.), Measures of political attitudes (pp. 737–801). San Diego, CA: Academic Press.
Norris, P. (2002). Democratic phoenix: Reinventing political activism. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
Verba, S., & Nie, N. (1972). Participation in America: Political democracy and social equality. New York: Harper & Row.
Verba, S., Schlozman, K. L., & Brady, H. E. (1995). Voice and equality: Civic voluntarism in American politics. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Party Election Broadcasts

Party election broadcasts (PEBs) are blocks of television and radio airtime allocated free of charge to parties during election campaigns. They are effectively free political advertising rationed to parties that meet certain criteria. While the practice of allocating free airtime is common in countries with traditions of public service broadcasting, the name "Party Election Broadcast" is associated with the United Kingdom. Britain offers an extreme example of the practice in that paid political advertising is prohibited completely on television and radio, while PEBs must be carried by designated commercial television and radio channels as well as the public broadcaster, the BBC. Few other countries provide this particular combination of controls. Thus Britain stands at the opposite end of the spectrum from the United States, which offers no free airtime and where campaigns are dominated by paid political commercials.

Principles and Regulations

The underlying principles of the United Kingdom's PEB model are (1) provision of a relatively level electoral playing field for the major parties, (2) control of campaign costs, and (3) balancing freedom of speech against the other two aims.

There has been cross-party consensus on these principles, and they explain the historic opposition to paid political advertising on television. The PEB system operated voluntarily until 1990 when the Broadcasting Act enshrined it in law. The regulatory framework is now overseen by the BBC and Ofcom, the regulator of the commercial sector. Ofcom sets the minimum requirements for designated broadcast channels in regard to carrying PEBs of specified lengths, currently between just under 3 and 5 minutes. The BBC and the main private terrestrial channels (ITV, Channel 4, and Channel 5) must air PEBs in peak time for general elections and national referenda. PEBs are offered to the "major parties": the three main parties Conservative, Labour, Liberal Democrat, plus the Scottish and Welsh nationalists and main parties in Northern Ireland. "Minor" parties may qualify for PEBs, provided they are registered with the Electoral Commission and contest at least one-sixth of all seats up for election.

The PEB rules keep political advertising tightly within the main parties' ambit. However, at every general election in recent times, there have been special interest parties that meet the qualification threshold. The Ofcom code sets the guidelines but leaves the detail of allocation and scheduling to the BBC and the "designated" commercial broadcasters. By convention since 1964, the Conservative and Labour parties have received five PEBs each per general election and the Liberals usually four. Allotments to minor parties are based on preexisting strength in Parliament and opinion polls but rarely amount to more than one each.

Control of costs has been a powerful argument against the introduction of paid political advertising. The ban has contained the costs of national campaigns, such that central election spending in Britain is no higher in real terms than in the 1960s. Moreover, the PEBs offer a subsidy in kind, offsetting the historic fund-raising advantage of the Conservatives. Freedom of speech is the third regulatory aim, and this is protected in the Ofcom Broadcasting Code. PEBs are free from the commercial advertising consumer protections of "honesty" and "truthfulness" and are not subject to the complaints procedures that Ofcom adjudicates for regular commercials.

History and Development

Initially the PEBs were the campaign on television. The BBC offered little campaign coverage and persuaded the parties to take PEBs, one each for the major parties in the 1951 and 1955 elections. The golden age of PEBs came later, from 1959 to 1966, with the arrival of commercial television (ITV) and the growth of the audience. By 1959, most homes had a set, and PEBs had become established as the main campaign tool on television. Moreover, their allocation set the terms for judging "stopwatch balance" in political news; the amount of news devoted to each major party was to be roughly in line with the ratio of PEBs. The allocation gradually increased to the current ration of five each for the Conservatives and Labour by the 1964 election. The broadcasts were shown simultaneously on both channels, thus ensuring a huge captive national audience. Concurrent transmission on BBC and ITV stopped after 1987, and in 1992 the ITV unilaterally abandoned stopwatch balance. However, even before then PEBs had come to be regarded as in decline, their functions as promotional and educational resources usurped by television news and the parties' battles to influence the news agenda. At every election since 1987, the audience for PEBs has reduced as the television market expanded, from four channels to more than 270 in 2005, with only five of them now obliged to show PEBs.

Trends Over Time

The look of PEBs transformed in the period 1979–2005, due largely to the influence of the advertising agency Saatchi & Saatchi on behalf of Margaret Thatcher's Conservatives. In form and style PEBs borrowed much from U.S. political advertising and from normal commercials. The main changes are as follows:

- Reduced length of PEBs
- Cultivation of nonpolitical language and promotional styles
- Dominance of issue advertising
- Conservative negativity within predominantly positive campaigns

The maximum length declined from 30 minutes in 1955 to 4 minutes, 40 seconds for the 2005 elections. The parties encouraged the trend, led by Saatchi, which decided in the 1983 election not to fill the then 10-minute maximum. Since then parties have increasingly opted for the minimum length, and in 2005 the average length of the main parties' PEBs was just 3 minutes. Declining length was predictable as soon as production was put in the hands of agencies, and after the success of the Saatchis, Labour has followed suit with a succession of celebrity movie and commercial directors.

The trend to nonpolitical style is exemplified in leader-biography PEBs that emphasize personal character. Leaders have progressively eclipsed all other party spokespersons. This is in contrast to the 1950s–1974 era, when it was usual for the members of leadership teams to present issues related to their individual portfolios. Equally striking is a new tendency for PEBs not to use politicians at all, preferring actors and popular genre story formats.

Research over successive elections finds that PEBs are informative, providing a reasonable guide to the main parties' key proposals. In the 1997–2005 campaigns, 79% of the three main parties' PEBs emphasized issues. The dominance of negative advertising and its potential damage to voter engagement has been a major thrust of research in the United States. However, despite British willingness to draw lessons from America, PEBs have not been heavily negative. For the four elections from 1992, the PEBs have been predominantly positive, considerably so in the case of Labour and the Liberal Democrats. The Conservatives are the exception in the period 1992–2001, with increasingly aggressive advertising, although in the 2005 campaign their positive/negative balance was more in line with their rivals.

Effects of PEBs

Overall, research finds modest but significant effects of PEBs on voters' attitudes. There is little evidence of effect on vote choice, except in the case of the third party, the Liberal Democrats, who gain a small increase in support. However, viewing PEBs is associated with improved assessments of leaders' qualities and, to a lesser extent, overall opinions of parties. Additionally, election surveys also indicate that viewing PEBs is associated with knowledge gain and with increased attention to the campaign. Polls over many elections report that the majority of respondents find PEBs uninteresting. However, there is also fairly strong support for the principle of PEBs, and surveys indicate considerable reach, with approximately two-thirds of the electorate seeing a broadcast during the course of an election campaign. PEBs remain the parties' most important non-news communication tool nationally.

Margaret Roberta Scammell

See also Political Advertising

Further Readings

Norris, P. (2006). Did the media matter? Agenda-setting, persuasion and mobilization effects in the 2005 British general election. British Politics, 1(2), 195–221.

Pattie, C. J., & Johnston, R. J. (2002). Assessing the TV campaign: The impact of party election broadcasts on voters' opinions in the 1997 British general election. Political Communication, 19, 333–358.

Scammell, M., & Langer, A. I. (2006). Political advertising in the United Kingdom. In L. L. Kaid & C. Holtz-Bacha (Eds.), The SAGE handbook of political advertising (pp. 65–82). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Party Identification

Party identification is a term that is used to describe a psychological attachment to a political party. The concept was initially developed by Angus Campbell and his colleagues at the University of Michigan in their landmark studies of voting behavior in U.S. presidential elections in the 1950s. It is at the heart of the social psychological model of electoral choice and became a central concept in the study of public opinion and voting behavior. The Michigan scholars conceptualized party identification as a durable affective loyalty that tends to reinforce itself as it serves as a perceptual filter that screens out information that might weaken it. It is seen as shaping citizens' perceptions of politics, their evaluations of political objects like candidates and issues, and their behavioral responses to political stimuli, most important their voting behavior. By providing coherence and stability to political perception and political behavior, party identification conditions the effectiveness of communication strategies adopted by political elites. At the aggregate level, party attachments provide stability to public opinion and electoral outcomes.

The concept of party identification encompasses two dimensions. The directional component indicates which party a voter identifies with, while the intensity component denotes how strongly she identifies with this party. The Michigan scholars devised a simple instrument to measure party identification in the United States. First, respondents are asked, "Generally speaking, do you think of yourself as a Democrat, a Republican, an Independent, or what?" Persons who identify with a party then are asked how strongly they do, while the remaining respondents are then asked whether they lean toward a party. Subsequently, the answers to these questions are combined to form a seven-point scale ranging from strong and weak Democratic identifiers to weak and strong Republican identifiers. At the midpoint of the scale, pure Independents are located between Democratic and Republican leaners. Thus, to capture the concept that encompasses two components a one-dimensional measure is used.

This procedure has several conceptual implications that have not gone without criticism. First, some authors proposed to regard the directional component and the intensity component as being independent of one another, so that it would become easier to explain why some strong identifiers with one party turn to strong identifiers of another party. Second, the traditional measure assumes the identification with one party to be incompatible with an attachment toward another party, thereby ruling out the possibility of multiple party identifications. Third, partisan independence and party identification are also assumed to be mutually exclusive. Building on evidence on the attitudinal and behavioral correlates of independent leaning, critics objected that this assumption is not valid and conceives of independent leaners as "closet partisans." However, more recent research revealed crucial differences between leaners and identifiers in attitudes toward political independence, thereby backing the traditional measure. Finally, critics pointed to the possibility that citizens may dislike a party while not identifying with any party. Building on this argument, they pleaded for considering positive and negative attachments to political parties independently. Despite these and related objections, the traditional measure of party identification is still in use.

Only a few years after it had been developed to analyze attitude formation and voting behavior in the United States, scholars attempted to export the concept of party identification to other political systems. In a lively debate, scholars raised severe doubts about whether the concept could travel abroad. Some critics argued that in European countries political conflict is entirely structured by deeply rooted social cleavages, so that party identification is derived from social group membership and cannot add to our understanding of opinion formation and voting behavior. Another strand in this debate questioned whether party identification could be used in parliamentary systems, as in this setting, party identification tended to travel with voting behavior, thereby undermining the notion of party identification as standing decision that is distinguishable from and provides stability to voting behavior. Measurement issues also loomed large in this debate, with functional equivalence being a primary concern. Though these and related issues are not entirely settled yet, it is widely agreed upon that the concept is applicable to political systems other than the United States. At the same time, evidence from diverse countries suggests that the characteristics of party attachments are correlated with attributes of the political setting. For instance, party identification is likely to be more stable in political systems with stable political parties.

By serving as a perceptual screen, party identification is a factor that conditions how a voter processes political information. Identifying with a political party makes a person more inclined to be attentive to and to learn about politics. At the same time, party identification promotes selective exposure, selective perception, selective retrieval, and selective interpretation, so that party identifiers are prone to primarily receive information that reinforces their existing loyalty. Party identifiers are thus likely to consider politics as being highly controversial and to prefer candidates and policy proposals from the party they identify with to politicians and issue positions of other parties. Accordingly, by shaping political perception, party identification enables voters to orient themselves to political objects that are remote to their daily lives and that they are not well acquainted with, though their attitudes toward political objects are likely to be biased.

Party identification thus serves as a heuristic or cost-saving device, providing voters with a shortcut to political evaluations and decisions. Building on the traditional view, this effect leads to a somewhat paradoxical result, as identifying with a political party is likely to be accompanied with being highly knowledgeable about politics, so that it serves as a heuristic for those voters who are least in need of orientation in the political sphere. The functional interpretation of party identification turns this upside down. It assumes the need for a cost-saving device to be function of political sophistication. Accordingly, it is the political inattentive voters who should acquire party attachments, while political attentive voters should not. Although this argument sounds reasonable, it is not supported by the evidence: party identifiers are more strongly interested in and attentive to politics and know more about political matters than political independents. Thus, voters appear to not intentionally choose to acquire party attachments in order to make sense of politics.

A fundamental issue in the controversies about party identification concerns its stability over time. Initially, the Michigan scholars conceptualized party identification as a long-term force largely unresponsive to current political stimuli. Stability is crucial to the traditional conception of party identification, as it is a prerequisite for party attachments structuring and providing stability to citizens' political perceptions and behavior. The traditional view has been challenged by empirical findings showing that party identification responds to short-term influences. Building on these findings, revisionists decided to adapt the traditional concept of an affective party loyalty that structures political perceptions, political evaluations, and political behavior. Instead, they suggested conceptualizing party identification as a "running tally" of retrospective evaluations of political parties. In this view, party identification does not stabilize and reinforce itself, so that party attachments will be stable only if the political environment is stable. Empirical evidence shows, however, that despite its responsiveness to short-term stimuli, party identification is one of the most stable of political attitudes, and it actually "colors" political perceptions and evaluations considerably, though it does not screen out any information that might weaken it. Thus, it is fair to conclude that though party identification is not an "unmoved mover," that is, immutable and insensitive to real-world events, it shapes political perception and usually does not respond to short-term forces quickly and sizably.

A related issue deals with how party identification evolves within an individual's life cycle. Initially, party identification was seen as acquired in childhood and then becoming more stable in direction and stronger throughout the life cycle as it reinforced itself by promoting selective processing. Accordingly, party identification was seen as being mainly rooted in the family and the network of social relations defining the young adult experience. This view of party identification as being inherited has been challenged and qualified considerably. First, intergenerational transmission of party identification is far from perfect and responds to social and political conditions. In the politically turbulent 1960s and 1970s, for instance, the rates of intergenerational transmission of party identification in American families were considerably lower than in the fairly calm 1950s. Second, identifications that have been learned in childhood may change in later years, when adolescents and adults encounter information that does not reinforce their existing party attachments. Finally, persons who have not acquired a party identification in childhood may identify with a party in adulthood in response to political experiences. Thus, it is now widely agreed that though the family is an important source of party identification, its effect is limited, and it competes with other factors for influence on party attachments.

Party identification is a standing decision for a political party. Thus, party identifiers are predisposed to vote for a particular party, so that they are less likely than independents to abstain, to split tickets, and to switch votes from one election to another. However, party identification does not determine voting behavior perfectly. Rather, by responding to candidate or issue appeals, voters might deviate from their party identification in the polling booth, so that they might not turn out or vote for a party other than the one they identify with. The effect of party identification on vote choice depends upon the strength of party identification, with strong party attachments being more powerful than weak ones. Moreover, political conditions play a role in conditioning the effect of party identification on vote choice. For example, voters are particularly likely to vote in line with their party attachments when they are asked to choose between parties rather than individual candidates or when individual candidates campaign as party mouthpieces. By contrast, if the prevailing issues are more controversial within parties than between parties, party identification is likely to affect vote only mildly. Though the effect of party attachments on vote choice is conditioned by several factors, party identifiers as a rule cast a vote in line with their partisan loyalty.

Party attachments condition the voter's responsiveness to campaign efforts. Party identifiers are less likely to make up their minds immediately before an election and to change their party preference as a response to electoral campaigns than independents. By implication, political independents are something of a natural target of campaign efforts aiming at this effect. However, party identifiers are not entirely immune to campaign effects but may be mobilized by electoral campaigns. Thus, it is reasonable for campaigners to adopt different strategies when campaigning for votes of partisan identifiers and independents, respectively.

The individual level effects of party identification on political perceptions and on political behaviour have several aggregate-level ramifications. As party identification shapes political perception, public opinion on political issues is likely to be fairly calm when the electorate is made of wholesale party identifiers. Party attachments also condition the effectiveness of campaign strategies. Moreover, leaving political independents aside, the aggregate distribution of party attachments is likely to approximate the outcome of an election. As party identification is stable over time, in an electorate made up of dyed-in-the-wool party identifiers outcomes of subsequent elections are likely to resemble each other, while in an electorate not exhibiting any party attachments aggregate volatility is likely to be high. Finally, party attachments to existing parties make it more difficult for new parties to enter the political stage. Partisan loyalties thus tend to preserve the existing party system.

An aggregate-level extension of the notion of party identification as a standing decision for a political party is the normal vote analysis. It aims at determining the outcome of an election that would result if individual voting behavior were not influenced by short-term forces, or short-term effects canceled out each other, so that the vote shares of competing parties are not affected differentially. Comparing the actual outcome with the normal vote thus shows how strongly the aggregate outcome of an election is affected by short-term influences. This comparison may also be used to classify elections and to identify critical elections. The most prominent type of election is the realigning election that is defined as an election in which a former minority party obtains a majority both of the popular vote and of party attachments.

Empirically, both the United States and a number of other Western democracies have experienced a decline in party attachments over several decades. In the 1950s, about 3 out of 4 Americans identified with a political party. This rate declined precipitously in the 1960s to only 6 in 10 voters, and despite some recovery it has not reached the 1950s level again. In many European countries, the number of party identifiers has decreased considerably, as well. In Great Britain, for instance, though the number of party identifiers did not change considerably, the number of voters who identified (fairly) strongly with a party dropped from roughly 80% in the 1960s to about 60% at the turn of the century. Likewise, in the 1970s more than 8 out of 10 West Germans identified with a political party, while today only about 6 in 10 do. As party attachments affect individual-level attitude formation and voting behavior, the decline of party attachments, which is termed dealignment, exhibits considerable effects on the political landscape. Public opinion is likely to become more volatile, electoral outcomes may be more strongly affected by campaigns and change considerably from one election to the next.

Harald Schoen

See also Dealignment; Ticket-Splitting; Voter Behavior

Further Readings

Bartels, L. M. (2000). Partisanship and voting behavior, 1952–1996. American Political Science Review, 44, 35–50.

Bartels, L. M. (2002). Beyond the running tally: Partisan bias in political perceptions. Political Behavior, 24, 117–150.

Budge, I., Crewe, I., & Fairlie, D. (Eds.). (1976). Party identification and beyond. London: Wiley.

Butler, D., & Stokes, D. E. (1969). Political change in Britain: Forces shaping electoral choice. London: Macmillan.

Campbell, A., Converse, P. E., Miller, W. E., & Stokes, D. E. (1960). The American voter. New York: Wiley.

Campbell, A., Converse, P. E., Miller, W. E., & Stokes, D. E. (1966). Elections and the political order. New York: Wiley.

Clarke, H. D., Sanders, D., Stewart, M. C., & Whiteley, P. F. (2004). Political choice in Britain. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Converse, P. E. (1969). Of time and partisan stability. Comparative Political Studies, 2, 139–171.

Fiorina, M. P. (1981). Retrospective voting in American national elections. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Green, D. P., Palmquist, B., & Schickler, E. (2002). Partisan hearts and minds: Political parties and the social identities of voters. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Keith, B. E., Magleby, D. B., Nelson, C. J., Orr, E., Westyle, M. C., & Wolfinger, R. E. (1992). The myth of the independent voter. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Miller, W. E., & Shanks, J. M. (1996). The new American voter. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Richardson, B. M. (1991). European party loyalties revisited. American Political Science Review, 85, 751–775.

Shively, W. P. (1979). The development of party identification among adults: Exploration a functional model. American Political Science Review, 73, 1039–1054.

Party Press

The "Party Press era" refers to a period of time (1783–1833) when news editors in the United States received patronage from political parties, usually in the form of government printing contracts. An editor who had limited financial resources would readily endorse a party's candidates and champion its principles. In turn he received support for his six-cent paper. This gave the editor, who served as printer, writer, and business manager, a sense of prestige and power in society, and patronage was critical to the paper's long-term economic stability. For example, during Thomas Jefferson's administration, Samuel Harrison Smith, editor of the National Intelligencer in Washington, D.C., received from the State Department each year thousands of dollars, a considerable sum at the time.

Generally, the era in the United States is considered to have begun in 1783 with the end of the Revolution and ended in 1833 with the rise of the penny press. Still, 80% of the press remained partisan at the outbreak of the Civil War, according to the 1860 census. The Party Press era coincided with extensive growth in the American press. In 1783, the newly independent nation had only 35 newspapers, but by 1833 it had 1,200. The non-advertising content of the Party Press era was primarily political news and interpretation, including abuse hurled at opponents. Most editors prominently displayed the names of a party's ticket for weeks. Editors also printed speeches of major national and state political leaders as well as significant government documents.

The concept of having a press that represented a variety of political points of view came directly out of the civil liberties philosophy of James Madison, among others, as stated in the First Amendment, which guarantees no interference from Congress regarding freedom of the press. Implicitly, not having an official government newspaper was parallel to the idea of not having a single state religion. In the first decade of the Party Press, newspapers had to survive the Sedition Act of President John Adams, who made criticism of the federal government illegal. Several Republican editors were prosecuted under that law, but his successor and political opponent, Jefferson, let the renewable law expire. Jefferson believed written criticism of the government did not necessarily lead to revolution and that the press could serve as a check on the abuse of power. Based on the impact of Thomas Paine's pamphlets during the Revolution, politicians in this era believed editors' words had a significant effect on public opinion.

The Party Press coincided with the first two party systems in the United States. First came the contest between the Republicans and Federalists, followed by the battle between Democrats and Whigs. Editors, many of them politicians themselves, lined up on each side of these political divides and interpreted events of the day within the ideology of a particular party.

Politicians frequently owned newspapers, and editors sometimes became politicians. Alexander Hamilton printed the pro-Federalist Gazette of the United States. Decades later, Henry J. Raymond served in the New York legislature before founding the Times, and Tribune editor Horace Greeley would run for president after the Civil War. Abraham Lincoln owned a newspaper, a German-language organ that supported the Republicans. No politician in the first 75 years of the nation's history took advantage of partisan editors better than Andrew Jackson, who bestowed federal jobs on at least 40 journalists when he became president.

David W. Bulla

See also Press Freedom

Further Readings

Baldasty, G. J. (1984, August). The press and politics in the age of Jackson. Journalism Monographs, 89.

Humphrey, C. S. (1996). The press of the young republic. Westport, CT: Greenwood.

Sloan, W. D. (1991). The party press, 1783–1833: Political sycophant or party leader? In W. D. Sloan (Ed.), Perspectives on mass communication history. Mahwah: NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Patterson, Thomas

See Unseeing Eye, The

PBS (Public Broadcasting Service)

The Public Broadcasting Service (PBS) is a nonprofit public broadcasting network that was founded in the United States in 1969. PBS has no central production or news division, and public television stations are horizontally networked so that each autonomous station determines its own programming. The Public Broadcasting Service is a community-centered and anticommercial media enterprise operated by 86 nonprofit community organizations, 57 universities, 20 state authorities, and 6 local educational authorities in the United States.

PBS has a number of partnerships with nonprofit organizations such as America's Public Television Station (APTS), Corporation for Public Broadcasting (CPB), National Educational Telecommunications Association (NETA), National Public Broadcasting Archives (NPBA), National Public Radio (NPR), and Public Radio International (PRI). These partner affiliations provide financial and nonfinancial resources as well as supports for quality programming. PBS has 349 public TV member stations throughout the United States. Although each member station that supplies PBS programs does not have the right to broadcast them, it does have the right to sell its programs in the form of nonbroadcast media such as books, DVDs, and other merchandise.

PBS goals are to provide objective information to all U.S. citizens equally by cooperating with member stations and upholding media ethics for American public and media producers. It provides communication standards and policies for media producers, determines whether programs are appropriate for public TV, and distributes and schedules programs that meet the standards to its member stations and other media corporations.

PBS is well known for its objective educational programs. PBS TeacherSource helps pre-K–12 educators learn more about efficient teaching methods. PBS TeacherLine provides professional courses and classroom lessons in reading, mathematics, science, and technology, among other subjects. Such programs prove useful for teachers and home-schooled students. PBS programs also focus on politics, science, the arts, and film. Station WGBH is one of the largest producers of educational programs, with WETA-TV and WPBT producing news programs, and WNET producing interview shows. These programs are sent to PBS, which reorganizes and schedules them for broadcasting.

PBS also contributes to media liberalism. Unlike cable or satellite TV, PBS opens its programs to public access despite the fact that it only has three to four different signals. Its programs are carefully evaluated under stricter standards and regulations than those for cable and satellite TV programs. To uphold the standards of the Public Broadcasting Act, which states that public TV programs should be politically fair, accurate, and ethically neutral, PBS tries to remain independent of political pressures and funding sources. Studies show that compared to other media corporations, PBS programs are more professionally produced, cover many different viewpoints, and offer more educational and enlightening shows to provide audiences with useful and varying information sources. Individual member stations are often innovative and diverse in their programming to meet local needs and interests.

PBS also provides a regular evening national newscast, the 1-hour-long NewsHour with Jim Lehrer. Although the show traditionally has the lowest audience of any regular network newscast, the program has a regular following, and Jim Lehrer is considered a professional and respected journalist.

Hyun Jung Yun

Further Readings

PBS red book: Your guide to program packing and delivery for PBS. (n.d.). Retrieved June 15, 2006, from http://www.pbs.org/producers/redbook/index.html

PBS Web site: http://www.pbs.org

Pentagon Papers, The

The Pentagon Papers, a 7,000-page classified study commissioned by U.S. Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara in 1967, detailed U.S. involvement in Vietnam by tracing policies and decision making in Indochina from the 1940s to 1968. The Pentagon Papers became public knowledge on June 13, 1971, with the debut of a series of articles in The New York Times by journalists Neil Sheehan and Hedrick Smith. By day three of the series, Attorney General John N. Mitchell requested The New York Times cease publication of The Pentagon Papers. The Times refused. Over the next few days, a series of court decisions addressing the right of the press to publish information and the right of the government to control information in the name of national security ensued. The case reached the U.S. Supreme Court, which ruled on June 30, in New York Times Co. v. United States (1971), that the government could not exercise prior restraint without threatening the rights of the press under the First Amendment. New York Times Co. v. United States (1971), also known as the Pentagon Papers case, was the first of its kind, as it tested the nature of the relationship between a free press and the government.

Soon after the court ordered suspension of the New York Times series, The Washington Post, and then the Boston Globe, began publishing articles on The Pentagon Papers. Both newspapers received court orders to stop publication. Clearly The New York Times was not the only newspaper with access to The Pentagon Papers and finding the source of the leak became a major focus for the government. Within days, Daniel Ellsberg was identified as the leak. On June 28, he surrendered himself to the authorities and was charged with possession of unauthorized materials. In the early 1960s, Ellsberg had worked for the Defense Department in Vietnam, and by the late 1960s, he was with an independent think tank, the RAND Corporation. Through this association, he had access to The Pentagon Papers. By 1971, disillusioned with U.S. policies in Vietnam, Ellsberg sent photocopies of The Pentagon Papers to The New York Times, The Washington Post, and more than a dozen other newspapers. The charges against Ellsberg were dropped on May 11, 1973, on grounds of governmental misconduct.

The fallout from The Pentagon Papers lasted for months after initial publication and set the stage for continued investigative journalism during Watergate. The Pentagon Papers, as a landmark case about the relationship between the government and the press, reflected a time when the government was being questioned and the right of the public to know was being preserved.

Kaylene Barbe

See also First Amendment; Press Freedom; Watergate

Further Readings

The New York Times. (1971, June 13–July 1).

The Pentagon Papers: The Defense Department history of United States decisionmaking on Vietnam. (1971–1972). (Sen. Gravel ed., Vols. 1–5). Boston: Beacon Press.

Sheehan, N. (1988). A bright shining lie: John Paul Vann and America in Vietnam. New York: Random House.

People's Choice, The

To this day, the study known as the People's Choice has influenced academic discussion far beyond the field of political communication. In sociology, the study is regarded as methodological spadework, in political science as the first systematic explanation for voting behavior, and in communicational science as the beginning of the empirical research on media effects. Thus, the study is a milestone for any of these disciplines.

Methodically, Paul Felix Lazarsfeld (1901–1976) continued to develop for People's Choice the instrument of the descriptive survey in order to explain differences between and changes of attitudes. From the constituency of the Erie County community in Ohio, he took a representative sampling that was divided into four evenly composed groups of 600 persons each. One of these groups was interviewed once a month over a period of 7 months during the presidential election campaign of Franklin D. Roosevelt and Wendell Wilkie in 1940 in order to trace individual developments. The other three groups were used for monitoring purposes by interviewing them once, but not at the same time—a groundbreaking design ("panel technique").

The substantial output of this study can be summarized in three theses:

1. Political predispositions. Social structures explain voting decisions. The assumption is that the decision for a vote can be explained by considering three lines of conflict: city/country, socioeconomic status, and religion. "Social characteristics determine political preference" (p. 27). Through an "index of political predisposition," the interviewees were grouped into different classes that permitted for prognostication about their voting decisions. The election campaign had the following effects:

- The primary political orientation of more than half of the interviewees is reinforced during and by the election campaign ("reinforcement effect").
- The political orientation of 14% is not activated until the election campaign, but this orientation can be predicted from their positions in the social structure ("activation effect").
- Only a small number (8%) undergoes conversion of its previously stated party preference during the election campaign; these are usually unconcerned people with little interest in politics ("conversion effect").

2. Opinion leadership. Political preferences are mediated by communication in homogeneous groups. The social structure forms separate social networks. The communication in these social homogeneous groups is of determining significance, especially the interaction between the "opinion leaders" who are intensively involved in the election campaign and the "opinion followers" in the according network. Both types are distinguished by psychological and communicative variables, that is, willingness of articulation. So in all social groups there are "opinion leaders." They provide orientation for the followers, that is, they mediate "interpretations" and exert social pressure, for example, in their families or at work. For this reason the group specific opinions are intensified—including those of who will win the election ("bandwagon effect").

3. Two-step flow. Media messages have limited effects—mediated by the opinion leaders. Because of the group communication, latent political predispositions become apparent in the citizens. They are the selection pattern with which the media messages are filtered ("protective screen"). The opinion leaders follow the media in a comparatively intensive manner; they arrange the election propaganda according to the pattern of analysis and pass them on afterward. The authors are able to show that those who follow politics in the media very intensively change their opinions very rarely; their positions were also confirmed by messages that were intended to achieve the absolute opposite. Conversely, the more someone is susceptible to change, the less she or he is likely to be reached. The authors find interpersonal communication by far more effective than media communication; they see the reason for this in advantages such as flexibility, trust, and commitment: "more than anything else people can move other people" (p. 158).

All three results have to a great extent formed the understanding of public opinion. The explanations for voting decisions out of the social structure became the groundwork for election prediction models. Compared to competing approaches, the sociostructural explanation has lost ground as traditional social relationships are dissolving and thus the regular constituencies decrease and the volatile voting potential increases. The hypothesis of the relevance of group communication has been reviewed many times und developed to the network approach. The hypothesis of the twofold relativized media influence (through social structures and interpersonal communication) has dominated the discussion, until in the 1970s long-term and specific—for example, cognitive—media effects became the center of empirical research. In this process, a central role is played by television, which is imputed with a comparatively high credibility and suggestive power and therefore with a higher influence on voting decisions than the press and the radio.

Gerhard Vowe

See also Mass Political Behavior; Voter Behavior

Further Readings

Lazarsfeld, P. F., Berelson, B., & Gaudet, H. (1944). The people's choice: How the voter makes up his mind in a presidential campaign. New York: Duell, Sloan & Pearce.

Perón, Juan (1895–1974)

Juan Domingo Perón (1895–1974) was three times an Argentine president, from 1946 to 1955 (reelected) and from 1973 until his death. He founded one of the most relevant political movements in Latin America, Peronism, as institutionalized in the Justicialista Party. Perón and his second wife, Eva Duarte, are credited with achieving a better quality of life for the poorest sectors of Argentines. Opponents define him as populist and a dictator.

Perón began his political career in Argentina as a member of the military government that came into power in 1943. In charge of the Department of Labor, Perón agreed with the positions held by labor unions, socialists, and other political groups that represented his voting base. As a result of his growing influence, the government arrested him. He had to be released because of his followers' claims upon their occupation of Mayo Square in Buenos Aires. After that event, Mayo Square would become a key place for demonstrations and the mobilization of campaigns.

During his presidency, he strengthened ideas of political sovereignty, economical independence, and social justice and introduced most of them in the new Constitution of 1949. Benefits for the working class, nationalization of public services, and industrialization projects gave Perón the support of workers and industrial sectors, as well as internal and external rejection from dominant classes. Perón articulated that the country's international politics and his party's ideological orientation was a "third position," a different and alternative way beyond capitalism and communism.

His government took control over many newspapers and radio stations and carried out an intensive use of them. The conservative press objected to this media policy. In 1951, the first television transmission in Argentina took place. This media emerged as a government development project under private administration. During election times the role of propaganda was influential at improving the success of his direct, and highly charismatic communication with population. Perón began the trend of government advertising in Argentine politics. National campaigns establishing social reforms and presentation of public works received widespread official promotion.

The military coup d'état of 1955 resolved his proscription. He lived in exile in Madrid until he was allowed to return to Argentina in 1973. During his absence, the country experienced political censorship from the military dictatorship, which forbade the publication as well as any kind of public statement related to Perón and his political ideas. Upon his return, the right and left wings of the Peronist Party disputed the leader's favor. The confrontations divided public opinion and put the country into a situation of violence and insecurity. After his death, the power came into the hands of his third wife and vice president, Maria Estela Martínez, until she was withdrawn in 1976 by the last military coup d'état in Argentina.

Malvina Rodriguez

See also Perón, María Eva Duarte de

Further Readings

Pavón Pereyra, E. (1993). Yo Perón [I, Perón]. Buenos Aires, Argentina: Milsa.
Turner, F. C., & Miguens, J. E. (Eds.). (1983). Juan Peron and the reshaping of Argentina. Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press.

Perón, María Eva Duarte de (1919–1952)

María Eva Duarte de Perón, well known as "Evita," was the second wife of President Juan Perón and the first female politician in Argentina whose fame extended beyond the country's borders. Bestowed with a mythic image by the worker class, Evita is credited with improving social conditions for marginal sectors and furthering women's civic and political rights.

Evita was born in a humble family and moved at a very young age to Buenos Aires, where she aimed to become an actress. A few years later she became a popular radio presenter. She was early a labor activist as the head of the union for radio employees. Her speeches demonstrated her natural talent before big audiences, a charismatic approach to the masses, and an effective rhetorical style. Eva met Juan Perón at a fundraising rally for victims of an earthquake in 1944.

As a first lady, she created a foundation that financed and executed social projects for housing, health, education, and sport, in order to improve the quality of life of the country's poorest. She was well known for paying attention to people's individual demands in her government's office. Eva Perón is also credited with achieving suffrage rights for women in 1947. She encouraged female political participation by organizing and leading the feminine branch of the Peronist Party. As a result, the nation chose its first female deputies and senators in the 1951 elections.

Eva Perón influenced not only the government's propaganda machinery but also the official press. Her role as an intermediary with labor union delegations, as mediator in governmental conflicts, and her social and philanthropy activities found widespread media coverage. Nevertheless, the conservative and anti-Peronist media as well as some intellectual circles carried out a strong opposition to her behavior. Her image as a beautiful, intelligent, and powerful woman seduced not only her Argentinean supporters but also world public opinion. By visiting some European nations in 1947 she largely demonstrated her political capacity of negotiating strategic agreements for the Argentinean geopolitical position in the postwar scenario.

In 1951, Eva turned down a vice-presidential nomination, and as a victim of cancer, died the next year at the age of 33. Evita was mourned at a public mass with long vigils held all over the country. Argentinean Worker Unions and a Latin American Labor Federation petitioned the pope for her canonization. Her corpse was embalmed, and during the military dictatorships and Perón's proscription, was the object of political disputes between her relatives, supporters, and enemies and was moved to different destinations. Evita's life provoked several controversial responses. A martyr and religious image corresponds to the "Lady of Hope," supported by worker classes and orthodox Peronists. The Black Myth, sustained by the upper middle classes and anti-Peronists, characterizes her as a prostitute and ambitious person; and the Peronist left perceives her as a revolutionary woman.

Malvina Rodriguez

See also Perón, Juan

Further Readings

Navarro, M. (1997). Evita. Buenos Aires, Argentina: Ed. Planeta.

Taylor, J. M. (1979). Eva Perón: The myths of a woman. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Perot, Ross (1930–)

H. Ross Perot is a prominent business and civic leader, best known for running as a third party U.S. presidential candidate in 1992 and 1996 and for founding the Reform Party of the United States of America (RPUSA) in 1995.

Following his education at the U.S. Naval Academy in Annapolis, Maryland, and a brief stint in the U.S. Navy, Perot went to work at International Business Machines (IBM) as a salesman. After a successful career in sales, Perot left IBM in 1962 to form his own data processing company, Electronic Data Systems (EDS). In 1984, Perot sold EDS to General Motors (GM) for billions in cash and stock options.

In 1979, while Perot was still in control of EDS, two of the company's employees were arrested and imprisoned in Iran. Perot financed a rescue mission, led by retired U.S. Army Special Forces Colonel Arthur "Bull" Simons, that proved successful.

In the same year, Perot headed the Texas War on Drugs Commission, at Texas Governor Bill Clements' request. In 1982, Perot served on a commission charged with improving public education in Texas. In February 1992, Perot announced on the Larry King Live television program that he would be challenging then-President Bush in the presidential election that fall. His platform held stances in favor of balancing the federal budget, strengthening gun control legislation, and expanding the War on Drugs.

Perot's campaign surged in the postconvention period, with polls showing him leading Bush and Arkansas Governor Bill Clinton in June. However, in July, Perot announced he was dropping out of the race after negative media attention and the selection by the Democratic Party of the Bill Clinton/Al Gore ticket. Perot reversed his decision to run in October, but his level of support never returned to the high numbers of the summer. However, he was allowed by the Presidential Debate Commission to participate in the 1992 presidential debates with Bush and Clinton, which undoubtedly increased his national visibility.

Following his defeat in 1992—in which he earned 19.8% of the popular vote, the best showing for an independent presidential candidate since Theodore Roosevelt in 1912—Perot maintained an active presence in national politics, crusading against the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) and supporting the 1994 Republican Revolution and the Republican Party's "Contract with America." In 1995, Perot formed the Reform Party of the United States of America (RPUSA). The Reform Party's original platform included strong positions on fiscal issues such as the national debt and the federal deficit, and promised significant political reform, including term limits, campaign finance reform, and lobbying restrictions.

The next year, Perot again ran for president, this time as the Reform Party's nominee. In 1996, however, he only received 8% of the national vote, due in part to difficulties getting on the ballot in several states and his exclusion from the nationally televised candidate debates.

Since 1996, Perot's visibility on the national stage has diminished. His leading role in the Reform Party was eclipsed by Jesse Ventura, the former professional wrestler and governor of Minnesota. Perot has since severed his ties to the Reform Party and turned his interests back to business.

Justin S. Vaughn

Further Readings

Follett, K. (1983). On wings of eagles. New York: Morrow.

Posner, G. (1996). Citizen Perot: His life and times. New York: Random House.

Rapoport, R. B., & Stone, W. J. (2005). Three's a crowd: The dynamic of third parties, Ross Perot, and Republican resurgence. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Personal Campaigning

Personal campaigning is a traditional form of office seeking, and despite the importance of media and the Internet in modern campaigns, personal campaigning still plays an important role. Personal campaigning refers to two different aspects of the campaign process: personal interactions between candidates and voters and personal interactions between representatives of the candidate and voters.

Personal campaigning directly by candidates is, of course, the most visible and well-known part of the political process. Candidates seek to involve themselves directly with voters by going door to door, making individual phone calls, or seeking out voters directly in other individual one-on-one settings. Candidates also find personal appearances before small groups of voters can offer some of the same advantages as direct one-on-one campaigning.

Canvassing and grassroots campaigning are other words sometimes used to describe personal campaigning. When a candidate and/or a candidate's supporters "canvass" voters in this sense, it means that they go from door to door seeking to solicit the vote of the eligible voters in each household., often distributing flyers and campaign literature as well as meeting and talking directly with voters.

In lower level races, particularly at the local and districtwide level or in rural communities, personal campaigning is one of the only ways for a candidate to communicate with voters. In such situations, there are no localized media that can serve to get out the candidate's message, or the cost of media-oriented messages is too costly and inefficient to be a viable campaign strategy. Voters in such locales have come to expect that candidates will be available to meet with them personally.

Even at the U.S. presidential level, there is some evidence that personal campaigning is important. Such individual contact and personal or small-group meetings are particularly recognized as important in the early stages of a presidential campaign. The two earliest presidential selection markers, the Iowa caucuses and the New Hampshire primary, are situations where experts have agreed that candidate appearances and personal campaigning are crucial. A candidate's bank account and the advantages of media buys play a much larger role later in the primary selection process. But Iowa and New Hampshire are very much personal tests for candidates and their workers.

Research has been mixed on the effectiveness of particular aspects of personal campaigning. There is some evidence that personal campaigning is particularly effective at enhancing turnout. Voters who have been contacted personally by candidates or their supporters are more likely to go to the polls and vote on Election Day. Evidence is less clear that personal campaigning translate directly into votes for the candidate who makes the contact.

Many studies also suggest that personal campaigning is particularly important outside the United States. In many countries, personal contact between candidates and voters is still very important and overrides media in many situations.

The increased use of computers in campaigning has raised questions about the ability of cyber-campaigning to replace or enhance personal campaigning. While some argue that Internet communications, particularly e-mail contact and chat room involvement, can provide voters with the feelings of personal and intimate involvement with candidates, other political observers argue that computers depersonalize the campaign contact and reduce voters' feelings of political engagement.

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Grassroots Campaigning

Further Readings

Farrell, D. M., & Schmitt-Beck, R. (Eds.). (2002). Do political campaigns matter? Campaign effects in elections and referendums. London: Routledge.

Gerber, A. S., & Green, D. P. (2000). The effects of canvassing, telephone calls, and direct mail on voter turnout: A field experiment. American Political Science Review, 94, 653–663.

Gerber, A. S., & Green, D. P. (2004). Get out the vote! How to increase voter turnout. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution.

Huckfeldt, R., & Sprague, J. (1995). Citizens, politics and social communications. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Johnston, R., & Pattie, C. (2003). Do canvassing and campaigning work? Evidence from the 2001 general election in England. In C. Rallings, R. Scully, J. Tonge, & P. Webb (Eds.), British Elections & Parties Review, 13, 210–228.

Wielhouwer, P. W. (1999). The mobilization of campaign activists by the party canvass. American Politics Quarterly, 27, 177–200.

PERSONAL INFLUENCE

Conceptualized by Elihu Katz and directed by mentor Paul F. Lazarsfeld at Columbia University, the 1955 book Personal Influence revolutionized understandings of how people interact with media institutions by reviewing and critiquing the substantial media theories that primarily dominated social thought at the time. Highlighting their principal argument, the duo subtitled the volume The Part People Play in the Flow of Mass Communication, thus demonstrating their key implication: mass media influence is not always one that is direct but is instead frequently mediated interpersonally through key figures who position social issues they have extricated from mass media sources.

Prior to the book's publication, social scientists studying mass communication largely believed that people assigned weight and relevance to information learned through media sources by their own means and of their own accord. That is, media theorists largely believed that the connection between mass media messages and the public was a direct one. Katz and Lazarsfeld challenge this notion in Part One of the volume by exploring how select groups of people are key to the circulation of messages within social groups, particularly messages they have extracted from mass media sources. Their theory argues, then, that instead of the largely held "one-step" system of influence that positions people as direct receivers of media messages, a "two-step" system of message dissemination is instead in play, through which key public figures identify media concepts, introduce them to people in their social networks, and explain how they are relevant to their social community. To support their assertions, the authors employ the rest of the volume exploring Katz's groundbreaking Decatur, Illinois, study examining mass communication's impact on social interaction. Not only does this study offer remarkable empirical evidence for the authors' theories, it also expands upon the assertions presented in Part One of the text—including data that suggest the media issues circulated through social systems in everyday talk were not limited to politics and public affairs, but also included recreation, fashion, discussion of popular culture, and consumer action.

The book is still frequently cited as one of the leading influences toward bringing mass communication into the exploration of how information flows interpersonally through the public sphere. After being out of print for a short period, the text was reissued in honor of its 50th anniversary in 2005 with a new essay from Katz, who revisits the research design and methodology of the Decatur study; examines the influence the study had on his career; and offers an overview of related work completed by mentor and coauthor Lazarsfeld, who passed away in 1976. Also included is an introduction from the late Elmo Roper, who founded the Roper Center for Public Opinion Research.

Jimmie Manning

See also Interpersonal Communication; Parasocial Relationships in Politics; Personal Campaigning; Two-Step Flow Model of Communication

Further Readings

Katz, E., & Lazarsfeld, P. F. (2005). Personal influence: The part played by people in the flow of mass communications (2nd ed.). Somerset, NJ: Transaction.

Lazarsfeld, P. F. (1969). An episode in the history of social research: A memoir. In D. Fleming & B. Bailyn (Eds.), The intellectual migration: Europe and America 1930–1960 (pp. 230–337). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Personalization of Politics

The personalization of politics may be defined as an individual politician gaining stature over the relative decline of his or her political power. In the United States, this may be evidenced by the terms "Reaganite" or "Reaganomics" named after President Ronald Reagan, or "Thatcherite" named after England's former Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher. In essence, the personalization of politics means more emphasis is placed on individuals instead of political parties.

No one single explanation exists regarding the origins of this phenomenon, though one theory states that the ubiquity of the electronic media is the culprit, specifically in national elections. Moreover, the electronic media has been viewed as decisive in shaping the way that governments communicate with voters and their seeking to convert them; at the same time, party leaders have exploited their exposure in the electronic media in order to attract votes.

During the past few decades, interest in how individuals accumulate information about candidates—personal as well as political—is an essential tool enabling the electorate the opportunity to make value judgments regarding the suitability or lack thereof of candidates seeking public office. Interest in a candidate for his or her personal mores has grown while strict loyalty to a political party has decreased. This supports the contention that political leaders have become electorally important in their own right, by personifying the policy platforms of their respective parties. In other words, if a political party wishes to win a national election, it needs to make sure that the chosen candidate is attractive to a wide range of voters since they are candidate centered rather than party focused.

The role of television in personalizing politics would be hard to overrate. During the 1952 presidential election, Dwight Eisenhower was viewed as being warm and friendly, while his opponent, Adlai Stevenson, was seen as cool, cerebral, and detached. A more powerful example was the first televised debate between presidential hopefuls John F. Kennedy and Richard M. Nixon. Kennedy, the more handsome of the two, appeared cool and calm when answering questions, whereas Nixon appeared nervous and flighty. In terms of appearance, Kennedy won; in terms of substance, many felt Nixon was the victor (according to radio listeners, Nixon won hands-down).

Television executives make the decision about what to show the public regarding politicians. These decisions can determine whether voters are likely to have a view on the issue in the first place. For instance, television can imply that a leader is responsible for creating a problem in the first place, such as the failure of an economic policy. In addition, while the leader may not be responsible, he is seen as incompetent if the problem is not solved. Partisan loyalties to a political party, while not completely disappeared, have dimmed, and in the absence of strong social links to specific parties, such as class or religion, voters are more likely to switch their vote between elections or to abstain.

Cary Stacy Smith and Li-Ching Hung

Further Readings

Keeter, S. (1987). The illusion of intimacy: Television and the role of candidate personal qualities in voter choice. Public Opinion Quarterly, 51, 344–358.

Poguntke, T., & Webb, P. (2005). The presidentialization of politics in democratic societies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Wattenberg, M. P. (2002). Where have all the voters gone? Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Persuasion, Political

Abraham Lincoln's observation that "he who molds public sentiment goes deeper than he who enacts statutes or pronounces decisions" remains as true today as it was when Lincoln stated it during his first debate with Stephen Douglas in 1858. It is the quintessential statement of political persuasion, and political persuasion is a critical element of contemporary media democracy. Research on political persuasion cuts across disciplines, engaging scholars in communication, political science, social psychology, and marketing.

Foundations

Political persuasion fits into the general rubric of persuasion because it involves a deliberate attempt to convince people to change their attitudes in an atmosphere of free choice. To be sure, freedom is never absolute and does not operate in all political circumstances, such as coercive attempts at vote suppression. Nonetheless, political persuasion presupposes that citizens are psychologically capable of discriminating among messages and translating private attitudes into public behavior.

At the same time, there are several aspects of political persuasion that distinguish it from other forms of persuasion.

First, attitude change occurs indirectly through exposure to messages, such as news and late night comedy programs, which are not intended to persuade so much as inform or entertain. This necessitates invocation of a host of communication concepts, such as agenda setting, priming, and framing. Second, political persuasion operates not only at the individual level of analysis, but at the group (e.g., political party), organizational (lobbying), and systemic levels (grassroots protests aimed at changing laws). Third, unlike most persuasion situations, which engage the individual's self-interest or egotistical concerns, political contexts touch on broader issues, such as values, affect-laden symbols, or, as normative theory would have it, civic duty. Finally, and partly as a result of factors just described, political persuasion is a striking study of contrasts. It involves the presentation by politicians of colorful, emotional arguments, market tested by professional elites, to audiences of individuals who are frequently indifferent to the rich panoply of messages. This in turn produces an ethically disturbing mismatch between the level of activity shown by political communicators and the passivity displayed by electoral receivers.

In addition, political persuasion overlaps with marketing but differs from commercial marketing in an important respect. While marketing may have long-term goals, the short-term ones are crucial in political persuasion—that is, to win the election! As political consultant Tony Schwartz notes, in politics you have a one-day sale, and you have to sell a majority (or plurality) of your product on that day—"or you are out of business." Because of this short-term need, persuasive messages are often more emotive, more fear arousing, and, generally, more vituperative than in other persuasive situations. Further, most of the public seems to expect, accept, and forgive such visceral messages. Negative messages are seen as influential by experts and the public. Further, the promulgators of these messages do not seem to foster long-term harm to their causes but are even in some cases lauded for their cleverness.

Purposes and Functions

Persuasion of all varieties has three goals: to form, change, and reinforce attitudes. In the political domain, attitude formation occurs through political socialization, increasingly performed by mass media. Campaigns can also change attitudes through central and peripheral processes, as articulated by the Elaboration Likelihood Model. Political marketers are adept at matching messages to voters' motivation and ability levels, for example, directing simple messages that require minimal processing to low-involvement, last-minute deciders, and gearing more complex issue-based messages to high-involvement segmented markets. Given the stability and persistence of political attitudes, political appeals directed at high-involvement/high-ability audiences are not processed independently of preexisting biases, despite idealistic hopes. For these and other reasons (e.g., consultants increasingly believe swing voters constitute a small minority of the voting public), much electoral persuasion focuses on securing the base or reinforcing preexisting attitudes.

Communications reinforce attitudes through various psychological mechanisms. Emotional ads, such as those used to reawaken questions about John Kerry's service in Vietnam during the 2004 presidential campaign, access dormant feelings toward a candidate or issue. Once brought to the surface and made salient, attitudes that draw on these feelings can strongly influence voting behavior. By accessing attitudes in this way, such reinforcement is more politically consequential than suggested by Joseph Klapper's Limited Effects Model. Political messages also reinforce attitudes through social judgment processes, such as assimilation, contrast, and associated cognitive biases that induce individuals to perceive candidates in line with existing biases rather than to probe or even reject preexisting prejudices. As Tony Schwartz observed, a political candidate does not try to persuade voters to alter their attitudes on the issues so much as to convince them that he or she shares their preexisting views on the topics at hand.

Increasingly, political message managers—President George W. Bush adviser Karl Rove being the most famous current practitioner—adopt this approach. Rove provides a useful current model for long-term political persuasion and strategy. He disregarded the common notion that elections are fights over the center and instead concentrated on his base. Persuasion in this model is about reinforcement and motivation. While this approach also seeks to tailor messages to various publics, the messages remain more consistent than they would be if the goal were to move undecided voters from one side to the other. This necessarily results in political persuasive communications designed to strengthen preexisting attitudes and access strong feelings rather than to shake up beliefs or achieve the loftier aim of educating voters on the problems that ail the country. The result, in the view of some critics, has been growth of persuasive campaigns that polarize and divide rather than unite or inform.

Continuities and Changes

Yet political persuasion goes beyond psychological mechanisms, market testing of messages, and even polarizing electoral campaigns. It is ultimately about control—whether it be control of political language, campaign and policy messages, political imagery, or political reality itself. The classic example of this is a campaign that dates back nearly a hundred years: the campaign created by George Creel and the Committee on Public Information (CPI) in 1917. The Creel committee was created to shape American and, to some extent, world attitudes toward the Axis and Germany, and to propel the U.S. public, economy, and industry into war. From this effort came the notion of propaganda writ large.

Creel and CPI also coincided with the beginnings of psychological and mass communication research into persuasion. While this may be viewed as the quintessential example of political persuasion, it is ironically the exception rather than the rule. Political messages are rarely so well coordinated or consistent. Unlike persuasive messages and campaigns in other areas, political persuasive messages are often conceived, prepared, and circulated at several levels without being specifically attributable to a single group or individual. While national Republican or Democratic parties might offer monies or provide guidance about campaign strategies, they cannot control actual messages or emphasis. The closest attempt may have been the 1994 Republican Contract with America, which intended to give central focus and frame to the election of the House of Representatives.

Presidential Persuasion

As noted earlier, these attempts at influence and control are developed by diverse political agents and occur across various domains. Much of the power to influence political attitudes has been historically centered within the actions of the president. As presidential scholar Richard Neustadt famously noted, "Presidential power is the power to persuade." Prior to the age of electronic media, it was President Theodore Roosevelt who understood how he needed to control the political agenda with his reference to the White House as his "bully pulpit," a powerful platform in which to advocate persuasively his agenda. Several decades later Franklin Delano Roosevelt was the first president to realize the potentially persuasive power of the new medium of radio to influence American public opinion. In his "fireside chats," Roosevelt spoke in an intimate, plain, and folksy manner to the American people, using colloquial phrases such as "my friend" that proved effective in reassuring the public of his leadership and policies during the Depression.

In the 1980s President Ronald Reagan and his advisors found new ways to use the power of televised images to sustain Reagan's popularity and keep the "Teflon president" immune from various administration scandals. By carefully controlling the pictures of the president available for television news, President Reagan and his advisors demonstrated how the visual image can be much more important—and politically effective—than the actual political message. But by 2006 President George W. Bush was using the powers of the presidency to control aspects of political reality in ways that would have been unimaginable to his predecessors. Speaking to journalist Ron Suskind, a top aide to President Bush explained that control of political reality was now the ultimate mode of political persuasion: “We’re an empire now, and when we act, we create our own reality. And while you’re [journalists] studying that reality—judiciously, as you will—we’ll act again, creating other new realities, which you can study too, and that’s how things will sort out.”

Political persuasion is a fundamental form of political communication. Political persuasion is essential to politicians, both in the short term (campaigning) and the long term (legislating). In their control of political language and images, presidents and politicians use all means of interpersonal and mass communication to persuade the public to agree with their constructions of political reality. While researchers may struggle with the processes by which the public responds to these persuasive messages at the macro and micro levels, the constantly shifting terrain and evolution of media technologies virtually guarantees that political persuasion will remain in the nexus of our political world. “Political language,” George Orwell wrote in 1946, “is designed to make lies sound truthful and murder respectable, and to give an appearance of solidity to pure wind.” Written in the ashes of the Nazi and fascist propaganda machines of World War II, Orwell’s understanding of the powers of political persuasion remains true today. Political persuasion remains an uneasy persuasion, founded on idealistic hopes, but frequently resorting to self-interested, vague, or polarizing appeals—the worst form of social influence, save all the others.

Richard M. Perloff, Edward M. Horowitz, and Gary R. Pettey

See also Limited Effects Theory; Presidential Communication; Schwartz, Tony

Further Readings

Chaffee, S. H., Ward, L. S., & Tipton, L. P. (1970). Mass communication and political socialization. Journalism Quarterly, 47, 647–659.

Delia, J. G. (1987). Communication research: A history. In C. R. Berger & S. H. Chaffee (Eds.), Handbook of communication research (pp. 20–98). Newbury Park, CA: Sage.

Edsall, T. B. (2006). Building red America: The new conservative coalition and the drive for permanent power. New York: Basic Books.

Fazio, R. H., & Williams, C. J. (1986). Attitude accessibility as a moderator of the attitude-perception and attitude-behavior relations: An investigation of the 1984 presidential election. Journal of Personality & Social Psychology, 51, 505–514.

Kaid, L. L. (2006). Political advertising in the United States. In L. L. Kaid & C. Holtz-Bacha (Eds.), The SAGE handbook of political advertising (pp. 37–61). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Kerbel, M. R. (1999). Remote and controlled: Media politics in a cynical age. Boulder, CO: Westview.

Klapper, J. T. (1960). The effects of mass communication. New York: Free Press.

Moore, J., & Slater, W. (2006). The architect: Karl Rove and the master plan for absolute power. New York: Crown.

Neustadt, R. E. (1960). Presidential power. New York: Wiley.

Orwell, G. (1946/1970). Politics and the English language. In G. Orwell, A collection of essays (pp. 156–170). New York: Harvest Books.

Paletz, D. (2002). The media in American politics. New York: Longman.

Perloff, R. M. (1984). Political involvement: A critique and a process-oriented reformulation. Critical Studies in Mass Communication, 1, 146–160.

Perloff, R. M. (2003). The dynamics of persuasion: Communication and attitudes in the 21st century (2nd ed.). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Petty, R. E., & Wegener, D. T. (1998). Attitude change: Multiple roles for persuasion variables. In D. T. Gilbert, S. T. Fiske, & G. Lindzey (Eds.), The handbook of social psychology (4th ed., Vol. 1, pp. 323–390). New York: McGraw-Hill.

Schram, M. (1987). The great American video game: Presidential politics in the television age. New York: William Morrow.

Schudson, M. (1986). Advertising, the uneasy persuasion. New York: Basic Books.

Schwartz, T. (1973). The responsive chord. Garden City, NJ: Anchor Press.

Suskind, R. (2004, October 17). Faith, certainty and the presidency of George W. Bush. New York Times. Retrieved September 29, 2006, from the Lexis-Nexis database.

Vaughn, S. L. (1980). Holding fast the inner lines: Democracy, nationalism, and the committee on public information. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Wood, G. S. (2006). Revolutionary characters: What made the founders different. New York: Penguin Press.

Pew Internet & American Life Project

The Pew Internet & American Life Project conducts research on the impact of the Internet on families, communities, home and work, daily life, education, health care, and civic and political life. The Internet & American Life Project is one of the seven projects of the Pew Research Center, a nonpartisan "fact tank" based in Washington, D.C. It is funded by the Pew Charitable Trusts.

The Pew Internet & American Life Project investigates Internet evolution and effects through nationwide random digit dial telephone surveys as well as online surveys, supplemented with research from government agencies, academia, and other expert venues. It includes observations of what people do and how they behave when they are online, in-depth interviews with Internet users and Internet experts alike, and examinations of individual and group behavior. The project releases 15–20 pieces of research a year, varying in size, scope, and ambition.

Internet trends studies look at who is online (in terms of demographics), Internet adoption, Internet usage over time, and online activities. For instance, in April 2006, 91% of Internet users went online to check or write e-mail, whereas 58% looked for political news or information.

In 2005, a Pew Internet study showed that the Internet became an essential part of American politics in the 2004 elections. Fully 75 million Americans used the Internet to get political news and information, discuss candidates and debate issues in e-mails, or participate directly in the political process by volunteering or giving contributions to candidates. There was also a striking increase in the number who cited the Internet as one of their primary sources of news about the presidential campaign: 18% of registered voters said the Internet was a primary source of political news in 2004, compared to 11% in 2000. The Pew Internet survey also found that, during the 2004 campaign, Internet users were more likely to be aware of differing political views—including those that counter their own beliefs—than nonusers.

In November 2006 Pew Internet researchers contended that YouTube, the free video-sharing Web site where users can upload videos, was the latest Internet-driven innovation to affect politics, after candidate Web sites in 1996, e-mail in 1998, online fundraising in 2000 (John McCain), blogs in 2003 (Howard Dean), and Net-organized house parties in 2004 (Bush-Cheney). Any candidate who nodded off at hearings (Senator Conrad Burns of Montana), ran away from questioners (Representative Sue Kelly of New York), or came up with unusual words with which to address opposition videographers (Senator George Allen of Virginia) must continuously monitor YouTube—along with Googling themselves—to see the feedback of citizen media creators.

Raluca Cozma

See also Blogs, Blogging; New Media Technologies

Further Readings

Cornfield, M., & Rainie, L. (2006, November 5). The Web era isn't as new as you think. Washington Post, p. B03.

Pew Research Center for the People & the Press

The Pew Research Center for the People & the Press is an independent research institute located in Washington, D.C. Data from the surveys conducted at the center offer insight into public sentiment about issues of politics and media.

Formerly the Times Mirror Center for the People & the Press, the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press is one of six projects that make up the Pew Research Center, an internationally recognized and respected "fact tank." The center has been funded since 1995 by the Pew Charitable Trusts.

Research at the center measures the public's attitudes and attention paid to news stories, political figures, and media channels. The mission of the center is to provide factual information on public opinion without editorializing or recommending changes in public policy. As a well-respected source of data on the opinions of the public, its findings are frequently cited in news stories, academic journals, and political discourse.

The center conducts public opinion surveys via telephone, through a process known as "random digit dialing." By using this method, the center is able to draw reliable conclusions about the opinions of the population in question from a representative sample. In addition to determining the perception of the overall public toward an issue, surveys at the center often focus on the opinions and attitudes of a specific demographic group, such as Hispanic voters or college-educated women. The center provides a summary of their survey findings, a copy of their questionnaire, and access to datasets free of charge.

Jason A. Moldoff

See also Methodology; Pew Internet & American Life Project; Polls; Public Opinion

Further Readings

The Pew Research Center for the People and the Press Web site: http://people-press.org/

Pharisee Effect

The Pharisee Effect refers to a boomerang, or voter backlash, toward candidates who overuse religion as the basis of a political argument. The phenomenon derives its name from a New Testament passage (Luke 18:9–14) in which Jesus criticized a Pharisee for being too public with his prayers. The Pharisee's mistake is that his loud public prayers were intended to enhance his own image rather than being an honest expression of internal religious devotion. The Pharisees, it was argued, were so openly religious that they were subject to charges of insincerity and hypocrisy. Powell and Neiva argued that the same thing can occur with the use of political appeals in politics.

Theoretical discussion of the Pharisee Effect is grounded in game theory as developed by von Neumann and Morgenstern. A political campaign represents a specific application of a zero-sum game, since every vote gained for one competitor (+1) would be a vote lost for the opponent (–1). In the heat of a campaign, the candidates must constantly balance two conflicting tensions regarding that message escalation. The Pharisee Effect argues that such tensions are particularly important when the content of political messages is related to religion. In an electorate in which a majority of voters hold religious values, statements about religious issues can generate positive responses among voters. But, if they overdo it—if the religious messages is escalated to the point that it is viewed as excessive by the voters—the use of religious content has potential to boomerang on the message source.

Five attribution effects of the phenomenon have been identified that could cause voters to have a negative evaluation of the speaker's intention or motivation: (1) self-serving motivation, or intentionality, that is, the speaker uses a religious appeal for his or her own purposes rather than to promote a religious purpose; (2) deception, or hypocrisy, that is, the speaker is viewed as basing his appeal on a set of religious values that he himself does not personally hold; (3) inappropriateness, that is, the particularly religious arguments used by the rhetor are deemed inappropriate for public debates; (4) a perception of fanaticism on the part of the candidate; and (5) a perception that the candidate has an undesirable "holier-than-thou" attitude.

Examples of the Pharisee Effect in political campaigns include Jimmy Carter's "lust in the heart" statement in the 1976 campaign, George W. Bush's speech at Bob Jones University in the 2000 campaign, and—more recently—the defeat of Roy ("The Ten Commandments Judge") Moore in the 2006 Alabama Republican primary for governor.

Larry Powell

See also Religion in Politics

Further Readings

Powell, L., & Neiva, E. (2006). The Pharisee Effect: When religious appeals go too far. Journal of Communication and Religion, 29, 70–102.

von Neumann, J., & Morgenstern, O. (1944, 2004). Theory of games and economic behavior. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Plato

See Rhetoric, Political

Pluralistic Ignorance

The term pluralistic ignorance was first used as a psychological term by the social psychologist Floyd Allport in the 1920s to describe mistaken impressions or misjudgments about others' beliefs, emotions, or thoughts. The term gained wide currency in the 1970s to describe patterns of false beliefs as applicable to the political arena or other social issues.

Pluralistic ignorance functions on the psychological level insofar as it explains the aspect of ignorance and on the social level to help understand the pluralistic element of the phenomena. Pluralistic ignorance occurs when people mischaracterize the number of people who hold similar or same opinions. For example, a person may believe that a majority of people subscribes to a position actually held by a minority. Conversely, one may believe that a majority position represents the views of a minority. In 1972, Charles Korte identified a distinction between "absolute pluralistic ignorance," the belief that a majority represents a minority or vice versa, and "relative pluralistic ignorance," overestimating or underestimating the degree to which others share one's beliefs or sentiments.

A central tenant of pluralistic ignorance is that people often develop or adjust their beliefs in concert with their perception of public opinion or social norms. The degree of inaccurate social projections regarding the distribution of public opinion is manifested on various matters on a continuum. Studies have shown mistakenly perceived social norms or other impressions of public opinion with respect to political candidates, voting preferences, civil rights, racial segregation, or prohibitions against smoking or drinking. For example, pluralistic ignorance can be used to explain how many southern whites overestimated national support for Jim Crow Laws in the 1960s.

Psychological factors such as fear of embarrassment and inhibitions affect the gulf between what one believes in private and expresses in public. However, recent scholars have tended to stress the social norms, cultural values, and shared aspects as opposed to the individual, psychological, and cognitive motivations of pluralistic ignorance. A majority opinion on a particular issue is expected to represent basic values that culturally resonate and match societal norms. External factors such as social environment, political climate, prominence of public agenda, diversity of communication channels, and media framing also mediate the development and degree of pluralistic ignorance.

The media are particularly considered to play a central role in development and maintenance of pluralistic ignorance. Noelle-Newman has emphasized how journalists' political leanings often create a social environment that does not necessarily reflect the distribution of opinion among the general audience. Media tend to overemphasize the views of minority groups that are particularly vocal or visible, even within the context of reinforcing existing social norms. Thus, pluralistic ignorance emerges often when public perceptions do not synchronize with public opinion. Elihu Katz indicated, on the other hand, that the media may dispel pluralistic ignorance by presenting an accurate portrayal of public opinion. For instance, the media may enlighten the audience by reporting on a scientifically valid survey of public attitudes or presenting a balanced presentation of a controversial issue.

Jae-Hwa Shin

See also Public Opinion; Spiral of Silence

FURTHER READINGS

Allport, F. H. (1924). Social psychology. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

O'Gorman, H. J., & Garry, S. L. (1976). Pluralistic ignorance: A replication and extension. Public Opinion Quarterly, 40, 449–458.

POLAND, DEMOCRATIZATION

Only 4 years after the Constitution of the United States of America had been ratified in 1787, Poland established its own supreme law—the Constitution—on May 3, 1791. The Polish Constitution, the second in the world, was actually the first act of this type established in Europe. Poland, a pioneer in establishing democratic rules, did not have much time to practice democracy. For more than one hundred years the country was removed from the world map. The democracy renaissance took place on November 11, 1918, when Poland regained its independence. Again the period of democracy was short. As a result of the Second World War, Poland ceased to be an independent state and became one of the satellites of Soviet Russia. The nation, however, did not stop the struggle for democracy—during the whole period of the communist régime there existed the Polish government-in-exile set up in France and later in the United Kingdom. Activity continued until 1990 when President-in-exile Ryszard Kaczorowski handed over Polish state insignia to Lech Wałęsa, the first Polish president democratically elected since World War II.

During the Yalta Conference in 1945 the Allies agreed to accept the Curzon line as the border between Poland and the USSR. As a result, nearly half of the former Polish territory became a part of Soviet Russia. Later, the Potsdam Conference again shifted Poland's western border. The conference also legitimized the mass deportation of Germans from the new Polish territory on the one hand and the simultaneous expulsion of Poles from the territory belonging to the USSR on the other. The change of borders, the mass-scale migration in the war-damaged country, the imposition of the Soviet political system, the continued stay of the Soviet troops, and the loss of independence were the factors defining the postwar situation of Poland.

With the help of the Polish communists, as well as the Soviet troops occupying Poland until 1993, the Soviet authorities quickly managed to crush any trace of the opposition against the communist system. Many combatants who during the war formed a number of underground resistance organizations (e.g., Home Army—Armia Krajowa, the biggest underground army during World War II) were executed, deported to the USSR, or sent to prisons and labor camps. The political leaders from the prewar period were imprisoned in Moscow and sentenced to long periods of imprisonment after a mock trial. In July 1944 Joseph Stalin elected the Polish Committee of Nation Liberation (known as PKWN) from its Polish abbreviation. In 1945 the committee became the Provisional Government of National Unity. Although formed by the Soviets, this government was formally recognized by the United States and the United Kingdom in July 1945. It was composed of the representatives of the Polish Workers' Party (PPR), the Polish Socialist Party (PPS), and the Polish Peasants' Party (PSL), led by Deputy Prime Minister Stanislaw Mikolajczyk (PSL). However, real power rested with the PPR, which had full control over the army and secret police and enjoyed the Soviet support. After the liquidating the remnants of the underground organizations by terror, the political attack was directed at the independent PSL. Members and associates of this party were arrested, intimidated, executed after fake trials, or secretly murdered. After a rigged referendum about the future of Poland held in June 1946 and the parliamentary elections in January 1947, Mikolajczyk was forced to leave the country. Fully dependent on the Soviets, the Parliament elected Boleslaw Bierut, a Polish communist and a citizen of the USSR, as president of Poland.

As the next step the communists liquidated the PPS. That aim was achieved by uniting it and the Polish Workers' Party into the Polish United Workers' Party (PZPR) in December 1948. After that date PZPR had full control of the political activities in Poland. The Sovietization of Poland accelerated: between 1948 and 1956, Poland was under the absolute rule of the PZPR Communist Party assisted by the secret police and the "Soviet advisers."

The PZPR pursued a reconstruction program stressing agrarian reform and industrial development. A war on illiteracy was declared. Free education and social insurance was made available to everyone. The Communist Party shunned the Marshall Plan, and during the first two decades of its existence the party renounced all dealings with the Western powers.

Having destroyed the private sector and thus the market economy, the communists introduced the centrally controlled economic system. In addition, the party began forced collectivization of farming. As a result the economic structure in Poland was adjusted to the needs of the USSR. The constitution of 1952 made Poland a People's Republic, a country that mirrored the Soviet model.

In politics the 1950s were the worst years of the Stalinist terror. Repressive measures were directed not just against political opponents but at normal citizens as well. The peak moment of that struggle against society came with the attack on the Roman Catholic Church. Cardinal Stefan Wyszynski, Primate of Poland, was imprisoned in 1953. The political terror in Pland diminished after the death of Stalin and Bierut. Along with the stagnating economic conditions, this led to bloodily dispersed workers' riots in Poznan in July 1956.

In October 1956, Gomulka, who had been purged in 1949 from the Polish Communist Party as a "rightist deviationist" and imprisoned from 1951 to the beginning of 1956, was elected leader of the PZPR and became the symbol of the revolt against Moscow. His promise to embark upon the "Polish road to socialism" won social support. Cardinal Wyszynski was freed from house arrest, and gradually other political prisoners were released from jails. Enforced agricultural collectivization was dropped, and the communists decided to tolerate some margin of private business in the economy. Recovering from the wartime devastation, Poland entered the so-called small stabilization period. Relations with the church improved, and economic and cultural ties with the West were broadened.

However, Gomulka soon backed out of from the liberal course and dissipated the support that he had enjoyed. He entered into conflict with the Catholic Church in 1965 when he condemned the letter wrote by Poland's Episcopate to German bishops (including the famous clause, "We do forgive and ask forgiveness"), which is considered the opening of the difficult Polish-German dialogue.

In the middle 1960s intellectual freedom was curbed even more, and political rhetoric was infused with an anti-Semitic nationalistic fervor. One of the reasons lay within the conflict among the members of the Communist Party and the anti-Semitic slogans employed by part of the party apparatus. Thus, 1968 was marked with the student demonstrations against the government in the university centers. The Gomulka regime countered with a political offensive in which many government officials and party members accused of anti-Socialist or pro-Zionist sentiments were removed from office. As a result about 12,000 Polish Jews left the country.

Two years later, demonstrations by shipyard workers in Gdansk broke out on December 16, 1970, protesting the country's economic conditions, including the planned implementation of a new incentive system and an announced rise in food prices. The party answered with force, with troops shooting at the defenseless crowds of workers. After widespread violence, in which at least 44 people were killed, Edward Gierek succeeded Gomulka as the party's first secretary. The new team undertook another attempt at reforming the system. Thanks to foreign credits the standard of living rose significantly. All those actions were accompanied with propaganda trying to convince the people of the big success of establishing socialism in the country. The middle 1970s were therefore described as the "propaganda of success" period.

The first sign of crisis within the socialistic system came in 1976, with riots in Radom and at the Ursus industrial plant. Again, the riots were crushed by force, although the authorities did not resort to shooting at the crowds. Repressions directed against rioters led to the creation of the illegal Workers' Defense Committee (KOR), which stood up for oppressed workers. Other illegal opposition groups (e.g., Movement for Defense of Human and Civic Rights—ROPCiO; Confederation of Independent Poland—KPN) and clandestine publications began to appear. The church also played a significant role, organizing widespread educational activities and addressing the most urgent social needs.

The growing resistance against the communist system was backed by a number of intellectuals who, despite censorship and administrative interference, worked on the development of Polish film, theater, arts, music, and literature. The clandestine publications were circulated among Polish citizens. They not only consisted of secretly distributed newspapers but also included books that were published even by thousands of copies. The defense against communism was also supported by literary and scientific activities pursued outside the country by Polish immigrants. Radio Free Europe, led by Jan Nowak Jeziorański, broadcast its programs from Munich (Germany) and the American radio Voice of America also played a significant role in molding public opinion. Apart from the political information, the programs included also news from the world of culture and descriptions of different aspects of everyday life not known to the public in Poland. Both radio stations transmitted their programs in the Polish language, and both were considered as extremely dangerous by party leaders, who decided to use special radio transmitters dispersed all over the country in order to deafen their signals. A similar role was played by the Paris-based periodical Kultura and a number of other publications. The importance of the émigré cultural community was highlighted by the awarding in 1980 of the Nobel Prize in literature to Czeslaw Milosz—a Polish poet who lived in the United States.

The picture of democratization in Poland in the late 1970s and early '80s would be incomplete without stressing the role of the Catholic Church, which was highlighted in October 1978 when the Polish Cardinal Karol Wojtyła was elevated as Pope John Paul II. When the pope visited his homeland in June 1979, the Polish society, previously divided and deprived of a possibility to form independent social organizations, recovered its unity and its sense of dignity.

The continued shortage of food and rising prices of everyday goods led to strikes in 1980, first at the Lenin Shipyards in Gdansk and then in other cities. The striking workers formed an illegal labor union, Solidarity, led by shipyard worker Lech Wałęsa. The workers forced the party leaders to go into the negotiations on the list of 21 demands that included not only pay raises but also called for the end of censorship and the right to form free trade unions. On August 31 the government officials agreed to make concessions to the striking workers and ratified the agreement that allowed for the creation of the Solidarity trade union led by Wałęsa. Within 2 months, huge number of Poles, more than 10 million in the country of 40 million citizens, became members of Solidarity. Also in 1980 Edward Gierek, the party first secretary, was forced to resign and was replaced by Stanisław Kania and later by General Wojciech Jaruzelski.

In the face of an economic crisis, threatened by the growing influence of Solidarity and under the pressure from the USSR, General Jaruzelski decided to embark upon a violent action. On December 13, 1981, he introduced martial law all over the country. Several thousand opposition members were interned, and strikes were crushed with the help of the army and special riot police units. On December 16, nine mine workers were killed in the Wujek Coal Mine in Katowice. Almost the whole leadership of Solidarity, including Wałęsa, was arrested, and the union was suspended. Some others were forced to emigrate. All civic rights and freedoms gained in the preceding year were abolished.

The Poles, being a nation of strong Catholics, turned to the Catholic Church, which provided the venues for meetings and patriotic demonstrations. In 1984 the police secret service decided to murder the popular priest Jerzy Popieluszko. The public reaction reached its boiling point, and the government was forced to put the direct perpetrators on trial, revealing the disintegration of the state apparatus.

The martial law was officially lifted in July 1983, but the problems of the Polish economy remained the same. The opposition against the government was growing with the help of Pope John Paul II's subsequent pilgrimages (1983 and 1987) and the award of the Nobel Peace Prize to Lech Wałęsa in 1983.

Continued decline in the living standards led to waves of strikes throughout Poland from the spring of 1988. In the autumn, the entire government resigned, making clear that talks with labor activists were unavoidable. The negotiations led to the so-called Round-Table Talks, which finally opened in February 1989. The talks between the authorities and the opposition were arranged and held with the mediation of the church. They were also helped by a favorable international situation—perestroika in the USSR and the support of the Western states for reforms in Poland. In April 1989 the party and opposition leaders reached an agreement on a number of unprecedented concessions: Solidarity was recognized as legal, and a partly free election was scheduled for June 1984. The Poles could freely choose their representatives to the newly established upper chamber of the Parliament (Senat). What was even more important, 35% of the seats in the lower chamber, Sejm, were also left for the free election. The election held on June 4, 1989, brought a landslide victory to Solidarity. The candidates chosen by the Solidarity leaders got the entire 35% of the free seats in the lower chamber and 99 of the 100 seats in the higher one.

In June 1989, the newly elected "contract parliament" named General Wojciech Jaruzelski, who had won only by one vote, Poland's president. Although the prime minister was to be voted in the lower chamber of the parliament, which was controlled by the communists, Adam Michnik, the chief editor of independent newspaper Gazeta Wyborcza, published an article with a very significant title: "Your President, Our Prime Minister." Although it was widely expected that Lech Wałęsa might lead the first Solidarity government, he demurred, instead putting forward chief adviser to the Gdansk strike committee in 1980, Tadeusz Mazowiecki, who took office on August 24, 1989, as the first noncommunist prime minister in the eastern bloc.

The People's Republic of Poland became a thing of the past. The events in Poland precipitated the fall of the entire Communist bloc. Although Jaruzelski had been elected to a 6-year term as president, Wałęsa made it known in early 1990 that he was now prepared to stand for president in open elections. Jaruzelski resigned, opening the way for new elections. Lech Wałęsa became the first president of Poland chosen by the people in a free election.

The transition from the socialist country to a democratic state was finalized in March 1999 when Poland became a full member of North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). Subsequently, the country became a member of the European Union in May 2004.

The day (June 4, 1989) when the first, not yet fully democratic parliamentary elections took place in Poland can be said to mark the birth of political communication and marketing in postcommunist states. For the first time in 40 years, political groups faced the need to develop voting strategies and conduct professional electoral campaigns in order to win the support of the electorate. Together with the political changes, a number of changes in the ways the media operate took place. These changes concerned both the legal regulations of the media market and its opening up to commercial broadcasters.

Despite the fact that democratic processes are still developing in Poland, American and Western European models are used to prepare media campaigns. Political campaigning is prohibited 24 hours before polling day and throughout polling day until the conclusion of the vote. Election committees (in parliamentary and presidential elections) have the right to free broadcast of their election programs on national television and radio channels. Regardless of the time assigned for these programs, each committee can run their paid election advertisements in public and commercial electronic and print media.

Political communication in Poland can be seen as concentrating more on candidates than on political parties and their programs. Election advertisements influence voters' image of candidates, especially, and lead to changes in voting preferences. Furthermore, research results suggest that Polish ads also increase feelings of uncertainty among citizens.

Wojciech Cwalina

See also European Union; Radio Free Europe; Solidarity Movement; Voice of America; Wałęsa, Lech

Further Readings

Bernhard, M. H. (1993). The origins of democratization in Poland: Workers, intellectuals, and oppositional politics, 1976–1980. New York: Columbia University Press.

Connor, W. D., & Ploszajski, P. (Eds.). (1992). Escape from socialism: The Polish route. Warsaw: IFIS.

Cwalina, W., & Falkowski, A. (2006). Political communication and advertising in Poland. In L. L. Kaid & C. Holtz-Bacha (Eds.), The Sage handbook of political advertising (pp. 325–342). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Cwalina, W., Falkowski, A., & Kaid, L. L. (2000). Role of advertising in forming the image of politicians: Comparative analysis of Poland, France, and Germany. Media Psychology, 2(2), 119–146.

Cwalina, W., Falkowski, A., & Koniak, P. (2006). Advertising effects: Polish elections to the European Parliament. In M. Maier & J. Tenscher (Eds.), Campaigning in Europe—Campaigning for Europe: Political parties, campaigns, mass media and the European Parliament Elections 2004 (pp. 371–386). Berlin: LIT Verlag.

Cwalina, W., Falkowski, A., & Roznowski, B. (1999). Television spots in Polish presidential elections. In L. L. Kaid (Ed.), Television and politics in evolving European democracies (pp. 45–60). Commack, NY: Nova Science Publishers.

Davies, N. (2001). Heart of Europe: The past in Poland's present. New York: Oxford University Press.

Falkowski, A., & Cwalina, W. (2004). Political marketing in evolving European democracies. Journal of Political Marketing, 3(2), 1–5.

Staar, R. F. (Ed.). (1998). Transition to democracy in Poland. New York: St. Martin's.

Staniszkis, J. (1992). The dynamics of breakthrough in Eastern Europe. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Political Action Committees (PACs)

First authorized under the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1974, PACs are interest groups that financially support political candidates and parties through funds collected from committee members and donors. PACs began to take root in the 1940s, consisting largely of traditionally organized contributors such as labor unions seeking a means to sidestep stipulations in the Taft-Hartley Act. Since that time, PACs have proliferated, growing from 608 registered groups donating $12 million to congressional races in 1974 to nearly 4,000 entities pushing $178 million into Washington, D.C., just 20 years later. In presidential races, the top-10 PACs donated approximately $123.4 million in 2004 alone. With this financial firepower, PACs have significantly transformed fund-raising practices in the electoral process in terms of contribution patterns, influence on legislative actions, and impact on political communication strategies.

There are two types of PACs. The first is the segregated fund, which is fully accountable to the organization that created it and cannot solicit funds from the public. The second type is termed a "nonconnected" political committee, as these PACs can seek money from the voting public for purposes of donation to political candidates.

While PACs have grown significantly in their ability to fund candidates and their campaigns, federal election contributions have been regulated since passage of the 1971 Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA) and its subsequent amendments. In short, FECA established spending and contribution limits on congressional campaigns, forced reporting requirements for candidates, and outlawed direct contributions from labor unions or corporations to political campaigns. Challenged in 1976 under Buckley v. Valeo, the U.S. Supreme Court found FECA constitutional, generally upholding outlined contribution and reporting regulations. Currently, PAC contributions subject to FECA are limited as follows: $5,000 per candidate per election, $15,000 per political party per year, and $5,000 per PAC per year. Regardless of federal election contribution regulations, there exist no limits on advertising expenditures supported by PACs for their own agendas.

Controversy continues in the campaign finance debate over the role of PACs in contemporary campaigns. Some are opposed to the influence of these organizations, viewing PACs as a threat to representative democracy and criticizing that PACs are able to buy policies favorable to their special interest agenda. Others see these organizations as essential sources of funding in the increasingly expensive campaign process because of the perceived need to incorporate cutting-edge technology into the candidate-centered, media-intensive campaigns. Either way, PAC contributions continue to be significantly outpaced by individual contributions. Overall, candidates have increasingly seen PACs as important sources of direct funds; as such, PAC contributions have escalated over time.

Though the exact role of PAC donations in the modern political campaign process is contested, the majority of scholarship on the subject has found that PACs operate defensively, attempting to influence present members and not election outcomes. Thus, money goes predominantly to incumbents over challengers despite ideological or partisan affiliations. Presently, Democratic and Republican candidates have been equally likely to receive monetary support from PACs. Unlike political parties and individual donors who focus on elections and are more willing to fund challengers, PACs tend to take a stance of risk aversion and pursue legislative rather than electoral strategies. As such, academic studies have depicted PACs as more concerned with their access to and influence over politicians than about who is in office and that representative's individual partisan or ideological considerations. In fact, studies show that PACs support incumbents over challengers by a 7:1 ratio. In general, when it comes to contributing to one congressional campaign over another, incumbents are at a distinct advantage.

In terms of the legislative development process, research has demonstrated that PAC contributions may have a profound influence on the creation of new laws. Members of Congress will often consult with interest groups that are recognized as experts within their fields as they construct legislation that falls within a particular PAC's sphere of interest. As such, some have argued that PAC funds have a direct impact on the content of legislation, influencing what is in the legislation from its inception. Conversely, though, their impact on legislative decision making is not discounted altogether; contending academic studies have argued PAC money is less important to members of Congress than such influences as partisanship, personal ideology, and constituency demands.

In looking at their role within political communication, PACs tend to employ direct public strategies of influence in an effort to inspire constituency pressure from a member's district. As exampled by Samuel Kernell, in seeking to promote its legislative agenda, the National Chamber of Commerce founded its own public affairs television network named BizNet. By producing weekly programs that attempt to persuade viewers to support certain interests in Congress, the National Chamber of Commerce seeks to motivate members by way of their reelection desires. Finally, a survey of PAC members found that the greatest increases in lobbying activity have been centered upon speaking with people from the press and media.

The PACs of many organizations also sometimes sponsor their own independent political communications in attempts to influence the election of particular political candidates or ballot measures. In some cases these efforts take the form of direct sponsorship of political advertising. Some observers argue that the newest campaign finance regulations passed by the United States in 2002 (the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act) encouraged PACs to make more direct and independent contributions to the political process. The result of the new legislation was to redirect PAC contributions away from candidates and parties and to channel them more directly into independent PAC-sponsored advertising.

H. E. Schmeisser

See also Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act; Incumbent, Incumbency

Further Readings

Goidel, R., Gross, D., & Shields, T. (1999). Money matters: Consequences of campaign finance reform in U.S. House elections. New York: Littlefield.

Kernell, S. (1997). Going public: New strategies of presidential leadership (3rd ed., pp. 30–33). Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Plano, J. C., & Greenberg, M. (1997). The American political dictionary (10th ed., pp. 96, 145). New York: Harcourt-Brace.

Stewart, C. (2001). Analyzing Congress. New York: Norton.

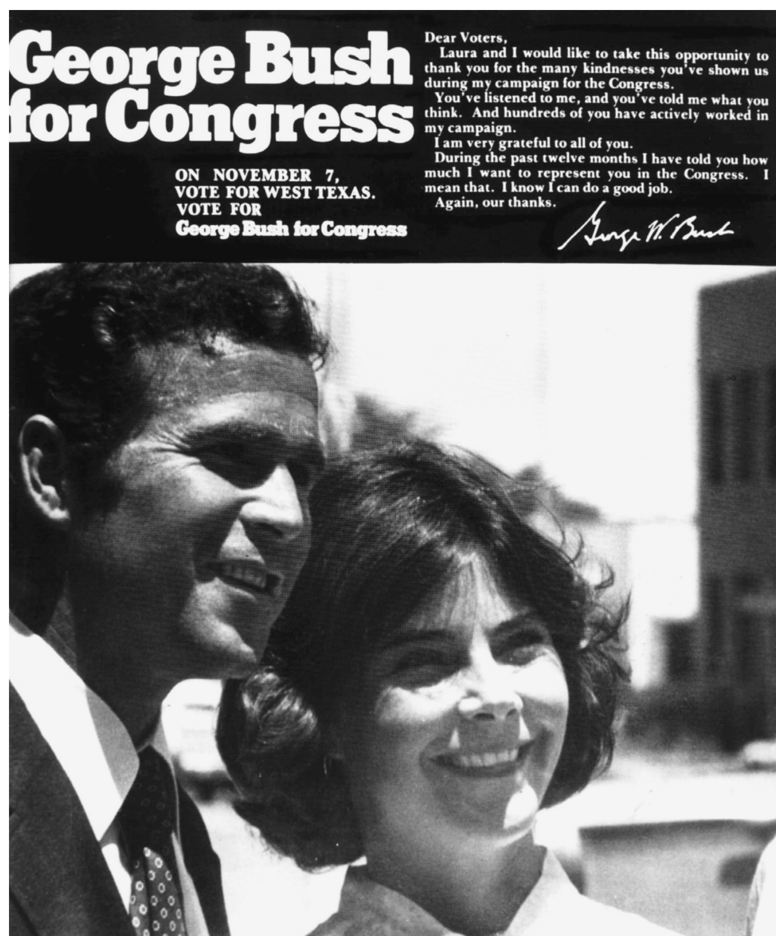
Political Advertising

Political advertising refers to the process by which candidates, parties, individuals, and groups promote themselves and their viewpoints through mass communication channels. Political advertising is generally considered a form of paid media in which the promoter (or sponsor) buys the space or time for distributing the advertising message. The paid nature of political advertising is characteristic of the system in the United States; but in many democracies in other parts of the world, candidates and parties are often given free time to promote their messages, at least on the public media channels.

Types of Political Advertising

There are at least three different ways of looking at types of political advertising. First, different types of political situations and elections call for different types of political advertising. Second, the source of the advertising message (a candidate, a political party, a group, etc.) is important. Third, political advertising is often differentiated by the communication medium or channel through which the advertising is distributed.



A George W. Bush congressional campaign poster circa 1978.

Source: George Bush Presidential Library.

Elections and Public Policy Decision Making

The most common type of political advertising in the United States is advertising occasioned by an election for a specific office. In the United States, thousands of such elections are held regularly at levels from the presidency down to city council officers and district school board members. In these elections, advertising is directed at voters who must choose one candidate over one or more other candidates. Advertising is used in these direct electoral contests in (a) primary campaigns (where voters choose between possible candidates for their political party's nomination), (b) runoff elections (which are held in some states and local districts between the two highest vote-getters in the primary, and a runoff is needed because state or local regulations require that a candidate must receive a majority of votes in order to win the nomination), and (c) general elections.

Candidate electoral contests are not the only elections in the United States in which political advertising is used. A second election type where political advertising is often used is for votes on a referendum or proposition. Many individual states and local governments have provisions that require voters to vote to approve or disapprove questions of policy. For instance, voters in California might decide on the level of benefits afforded to illegal immigrants, Florida voters have been asked to decide on class sizes in the public schools, and Oklahoma voters have voted for and against taxes and bonds for public improvements. Not every election on a proposition or referendum question is the subject of political advertising, but controversial measures may attract heated campaign advertising on both sides.

Finally, another type of political advertising became popular in the United States during the past century. Groups began to advertise their positions for or against certain policies under consideration by state or federal government legislative bodies. For example, when the U.S. Congress was considering the adoption of the North American Free Trade Association (NAFTA) agreement, many business groups and industry associations ran national advertising campaigns on the pro or con side. A similar rush of advertising messages on both sides surfaced in the mid-1990s when the Clinton administration was considering major health care reforms. Although the groups who engage in this policy advertising, sometimes called "advocacy" advertising, are not seeking a specific electoral outcome, the targets of the message are clear. On the one had, the messages encourage state and federal legislators to reconsider their positions, and, on the other hand, the advertising seeks to stir voters to take political actions (such as contacting and lobbying their elected representatives) that may help the group achieve its policy goals.

Sources of Political Advertising

The source of a political advertisement is usually the person or group who pays for or sponsors the advertisement. In the United States, the candidate is the most frequently identified source of political advertising messages. After all, it is usually the candidate who is seeking to convince the voter to choose him or her at the polling booth. Nonetheless, many other individuals and groups have a stake in the outcome of particular elections.

Political parties also sponsor advertising messages on behalf of candidates who are members of their parties or messages against those they hope will not be successful. While party advertising is not the dominant form of electoral advertising in the United States (candidate advertising is), many democracies around the world are organized as parliamentary democracies wherein voters choose a party whose leader is designated by the party (usually called a prime minister or chancellor). In these countries, the party advertising usually supplants candidate advertising.

Candidates and political parties are not the only ones who want to influence how voters will choose their leaders. Independent groups who favor a particular viewpoint or a particular candidate or party may sponsor advertising that supports a particular candidate or party. In the United States the amount of political advertising sponsored by independent groups has been growing dramatically. In the aftermath of new campaign finance legislation in 2002 that placed tighter restrictions on contributions to candidates and parties, in 2004 the expenditures by independent groups for political advertising skyrocketed. Many of the independent groups that run ads for and against presidential candidates are existing labor groups (like the AFL-CIO labor union group) and business or issue groups (like the National Rifle Association), but new campaign finance legislation has fostered the formation of many new groups that collect and spend millions of dollars for campaign advertising. Groups like Moveon.Org, the Media Fund, America Coming Together (ACT), and the Progress for America Voter Fund are just a few of the groups who have underwritten such advertising.

Finally, another source of political advertising can be an individual who wishes to sponsor advertising for or against a candidate or issue. Such sponsorship is possible and legal at all levels of campaigning in the United States. There have been many instances of such sponsorship even at the presidential level, where the cost of paying for political advertising that can be distributed nationally can be very expensive. Before the Internet, the ability of an individual who was not wealthy to produce and distribute a quality television advertisement was limited. However, the Internet has now made it possible for individuals to be sources of political advertising messages, even if they do not have substantial personal wealth at their disposal.

Channels for Political Advertising

While there are many different approaches used for every channel of communication, political advertising has usually been quite traditional in its approach to each medium of communication. Candidates, parties, and groups can choose to distribute their advertising messages through (a) print and display advertising, (b) newspaper and magazine advertising, (c) radio broadcasting, (d) television—broadcast or cable, and (e) the Internet.

Both print/display advertising and newspaper/ magazine advertising are distributed via the print channel, but they are so different in form and targeting potential that they are treated separately here. Print and display advertising of various kinds was the first channel of communication to be used by political candidates and parties. Printed campaign advertising can take the form of brochures, flyers, cards, bumper stickers, and other campaign paraphernalia. At most state and federal levels, these print channel messages are often supplemented by outside display advertising such as signs and large billboards. Variations on this political advertising channel are used primarily as a form of name identification and can do a good job of getting the candidate or party name known.

Advertisements in newspapers and magazines offer the possibility of more complex messages that may provide the candidate or party with space for explaining issue positions and promoting background and experience. Ads in newspapers and magazines can be targeted to readers in particular local areas, or in the case of magazines, to voters with particular issue or professional interests.

Radio commercials are very useful in campaigns at all levels. In part, this is because radio commercials have three clear advantages over the print media. First, radio commercials (like their television counterparts) can overcome voter selective exposure. Selective exposure is a difficult communication problem for political candidates and parties because research has shown that people tend to expose themselves to information that is in line with their current beliefs. For instance, a voter who is a Democrat may not choose to pick up the brochures or read the magazine ads of candidates who represent the Republican viewpoint. However, a radio ad may overcome this selectivity process because the voter may hear the ad as part of a radio program without making a conscious or deliberate exposure decision. Second, a message delivered with sound may provide additional message cues (such as music or sound effects) that may attract the listener's attention or assist the candidate in making his or her message stand out. Finally, an advertising message delivered on the radio channel can take advantage of the ability of radio to target the message to specific types of voters. Far more than television or newspapers, radio has become a very specialized communication channel. Professional time buyers can assist a candidate or party in choosing radio stations and time segments that can target audience groups with specific demographic characteristics and issue concerns.

While its use for candidates at lower election levels may be limited, there is no question that television has become the most important channel for political advertising in the United States. No only does television have the same advantage as radio for overcoming selective exposure, but television has a far wider reach and almost universal penetration in the United States. Television has also been praised for its ability to add dramatic and emotional imagery with the inclusion of visual messages.

A new channel is now challenging print, radio, and television media for the distribution of political advertising. The Internet has not yet reached universal penetration, but in the United States more than 75% of the population had broadband Internet access by 2005. As mentioned earlier, the Internet is providing a channel for access of ordinary citizens and increased ability for interest groups to express their viewpoints. Like radio and television, the Internet has the ability to overcome some aspects of selective exposure. Pop-up ads, banner ads, animation ads, and other innovative Web productions capture the attention of online information seekers. Web advertising distributors have the ability to target ads to specific consumers with very specific characteristics on an individual basis not possible with radio or television time buying. In the United States in 2004, more than $4 million was spent on Internet political advertising buys.

History and Regulation of Political Advertising

In the United States the earliest forms of political advertising fell into the category of print and display advertising. Brochures and political pamphlets and flyers helped candidates and parties to get their message out to voters in the early elections of the newly formed United States of America. Political ads in printed newspapers and magazines were available to voters in the first 150 years of the new republic. In 1924, parties and candidates seized upon radio as a new vehicle for election promotion, and in that year the first radio political ads were broadcast. Radio remained an important political medium until the 1952 presidential campaign.

Presidential Television Advertising

Dwight Eisenhower was the first presidential candidate to use advertising spots on television in a presidential campaign. Recently returned from heading the successful Allied military campaign in Europe in World War II, Eisenhower used short television spots to give his cold, military image a softer, warmer, more personable quality. Along with a musical, animated commercial (produced and donated to the campaign by the Walt Disney Studios), Eisenhower's campaign also aired a series of 31 short spots that were part of a series called "Eisenhower Answers America." In the spots, ordinary citizens appeared to ask Eisenhower simple questions that he answered with short, sometimes humorous, but always amiable and appealing answers. Eisenhower's opponent in 1952, Adlai Stevenson, refused to turn his campaign over to the Madison Avenue advertisers.

When Richard Nixon and John F. Kennedy faced off in the presidential race of 1960, both candidates used television ads, but Kennedy was the candidate with the warmer, made-for-television image, and his television ads were substantively and visually convincing. After Kennedy's tragic assassination in 1963 cut short his television successes, Lyndon B. Johnson faced Republican Barry Goldwater in 1964. Neither candidate was particularly charismatic on television, but the campaign is famous for the introduction by Johnson of a series of extremely negative emotional ads that hinted (some say, accused) that Goldwater was too unstable and trigger-happy for America to trust his finger on the nuclear button. This campaign is renowned in campaign advertising history because the campaign saw the airing of the most famous (and infamous) political television advertisement in history, the "Daisy Girl" spot. This 30-second ad shows a small girl picking the petals off a daisy as she counts (1–2–3 . . .); her voice is overshadowed by the background countdown (10–9–8 . . .) to a weapon's launch. The nuclear bomb explodes and a mushroom cloud appears in a close-up in the child's eye as Lyndon Johnson's voice in the background proclaims, "These are the stakes: to make a world in which all of God's children can live or to go into the darkness. We must either love each other or we must die." Only broadcast one time, on September 7, 1964, during NBC's Monday Night at the Movies, this spot was created by New York advertising professional Tony Schwartz, who also made political spots for George McGovern in 1972 and for other candidates at various electoral levels.

Subsequent presidential campaigns developed their own presidential advertising approaches. Richard Nixon in 1968 developed an approach that kept him out of the limelight in his commercials, reacting to the work of media scholar Marshall McLuhan, who maintained that Nixon had lost the 1960 debates with Kennedy and the subsequent advertising battle because he was "too hot" for television. In 1972 George McGovern used Emmy-winning producer Charles Guggenheim to produce his mini-documentary and cinema verité–style spots. Jimmy Carter used a folksy "down-home Georgia" style to appear genuine and unpackaged in his 1976 spots, but his television style was no match for the camera-comfortable Ronald Reagan in 1980. Reagan's 1980 and 1984 spots were beautifully produced, and even now serve as examples of what to do right in campaign advertising. In particular, praise was heaped on the 1984 Reagan spots that developed a positive style and used a theme called "It's morning again in America" to embody Reagan's optimistic spirit and positive vision for America.

The last presidential campaign of the 1980s will be remembered for a political ad that was sponsored not by either candidate but by an independent group, an ad that highlighted an African American criminal named Willie Horton who escaped to create murder and mayhem while on a weekend "furlough" from a Massachusetts prison when Democratic candidate Michael Dukakis was governor. Thus, the 1988 campaign has been accused of beginning a new era of negativity in campaign advertising, but the Clinton campaigns of 1992 and 1996 were the two campaigns with the highest percentage of negative ads in the history of presidential political advertising. The following sections of this entry provide additional details about the historical development of the content of televised political advertising, including the campaigns from 1992 through 2004.

Legal and Regulatory Environment of Political Advertising

The regulations and laws that apply to political advertising in the United States are not particularly complex. These regulations fall into three basic categories: (1) spending limits on general campaign expenditures determined by the Federal Election Commission, (2) broadcast regulation rules for the sale and purchase of equal time according to the Access and Equal Time Provisions of the Communications Act of 1934, and (3) statutory or case law that relates to advertising content.

Until 1971 there were generally no laws about campaign spending in the United States or about expenditures related to advertising in campaigns, although a 1920s anticorruption act prohibited corporations from contributing to political campaigns. The Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (amended 1974) set limits on the amount of contributions that individuals ($1,000 per candidate per election) and multiparty committees or political action committees ($5,000 per candidate per election) could give to political candidates. The Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (BCRA) of 2002 raised these limits to $2,000 per candidate per election and retained the $5,000 limit on contributions from committees. Direct contributions by corporations and labor unions remain illegal. The new BCRA rules also attempt to decrease the use of party "soft money" for campaign advertising. The U.S. law sets no limit on the amount of funds a presidential candidate may spend for television advertising. However, a candidate who agrees to take matching funds from the Federal Election Commission (FEC) must adhere to an overall spending limit for the campaign. This amount was set by the FEC at almost $75 million per candidate for the 2004 presidential election. BCRA also sets some new limitations on "electioneering communications" by independent groups that affect the ability of candidates to coordinate advertising with other groups.

The Federal Communications Commission administers the Communications Act (FCA) of 1934 (and revisions), which requires that a licensed broadcast station must provide reasonable access to or permit purchase of a reasonable amount of time for the use of the station by all legally qualified candidates for federal elective office, and stations must also sell this time at what is called "the lowest unit rate."

However, BCRA extended the FCC's rules on the disclaimer or sponsorship identification that must be contained in all television ads. In an attempt to reduce negative advertising by requiring candidates to take clear responsibility for their ads, the new law requires that a candidate appear visually in the ad, state his or her identity, and state that she or he approved the ad. The U.S. legal system permits virtually no limitations on political advertising content, primarily because of the fear of conflict with the First Amendment guarantee of free speech. Since so many laws explicitly or implicitly prohibit any regulation on political content, the only recourse most candidates have against false or misleading claims is to pursue action under libel laws. However, the courts set rigorous standards for proving libel for public figures, as candidates are generally interpreted to be. Laws in some individual states also prohibit candidates from making false or deceptive claims.

Content of Political Advertising

Since political advertising can occur in many different types of electoral situations, in different channels with many different sponsors, description of the content of political advertising has many different aspects. The focus here remains on presidential campaigns since they are the most visible and important electoral level in the United States, but the content of political advertising is also important in the elections of U.S. Senators, U.S. Congresspersons, state governors and other statewide officials, and, of course, at numerous state and local levels throughout all 50 United States.

The content of political advertising is often analyzed through a three-component system called "Videostyle." Videostyle is a system of analyzing how candidates present themselves to voters through their television advertising. There are three components to Videostyle: (1) the verbal content of a candidate's spots, (2) the nonverbal content of the spots, and (3) the audiovisual or television production techniques used in the spot.

Verbal Content of Political Advertising

Many of the concerns about verbal content relate to how much candidates talk about issues in their spots and how negative or positive the tone of the spots are. Television spots are frequently criticized for being too focused on the candidate's image and providing insufficient information about the candidates' positions on issues. Research does not support this concern. Historically, presidential candidates have been much more likely to stress issues in their television ads than to talk about themselves or their images. An analysis of television ads in presidential campaigns from 1952 through the 2004 election showed that 69% of all the general election ads sponsored by presidential candidates focused on issues. Table 1 shows how the percentage of image and issue ads can be broken down by presidential candidates. The trend has varied little over time. During the 2004 campaign, both George W. Bush and John Kerry concentrated four out of every five of their television ads on issues. The most frequently mentioned issues have, not surprisingly, been economic concerns, taxes, medical care and Social Security benefits, and occasionally foreign policy.

Political advertising has also been accused of being too negative, of focusing on attacks and criticisms of the opponent instead of positive things about the sponsoring candidate. On this concern, research has also documented that television ads have more often focused on the good points of the sponsoring candidate. Overall, 59% of presidential candidate ads have been positive, while 41% have been negative.

However, it is worth noting that the percentage of negative ads has been increasing over the past 2 decades. Bill Clinton used negative ads throughout both his presidential campaigns. In fact, 69% of Clinton's ads in 1992 were negative, as were 68% of his 1996 commercials. The 2000 campaign brought only a small decline in negativity when 62% of Al Gore's ads were negative, compared to 37% of Bush ads. In 2004, however, it was Bush who ran the most negative ads (58% compared to 34% for John Kerry). Some researchers have argued that it is also important to consider how often each negative or positive ad was aired and which voters in what states or television markets were exposed to these messages. While some political observers have a negative reaction to negative ads, research has shown that most negative ads focus on policy issues and often provide voters with useful information that helps them to distinguish between candidates.

Table 1 Presidential Candidate Use of Ads in the United States, 1952–2004 (N = 1,535)

Year	Name	Positive	Negative	Issue	Image
1952	Eisenhower	34%	66%	40%	60%
	Stevenson	--	--	--	--
1956	Eisenhower	100%	0	100%	--
	Stevenson	67%	33%	80%	20%
1960	Kennedy	88%	12%	82%	18%
	Nixon	92%	8%	82%	18%
1964	Goldwater	54%	46%	81%	19%
	Johnson	52%	48%	72%	28%
1968	Nixon	85%	15%	31%	69%
	Humphrey	67%	33%	46%	54%
1972	McGovern	60%	40%	70%	30%
	Nixon	80%	20%	54%	46%
1976	Carter	81%	19%	64%	36%
	Ford	73%	27%	49%	51%
1980	Carter	64%	36%	45%	55%
	Reagan	65%	35%	57%	43%
1984	Mondale	46%	54%	92%	8%
	Reagan	73%	27%	53%	47%
1988	Bush	64%	36%	44%	56%
	Dukakis	46%	54%	70%	30%
1992	Bush	34%	66%	50%	50%
	Clinton	31%	69%	67%	33%
1996	Dole	39%	61%	62%	38%
	Clinton	32%	68%	86%	14%
2000	Gore	38%	62%	84%	16%
	Bush	63%	37%	63%	37%
2004	Bush	42%	58%	85%	15%
	Kerry	66%	34%	79%	21%
TOTAL		59%	41%	69%	31%

Source: Adapted from Kaid and Holtz-Bacha, 2006, Table 3.1, p. 42.

Nonverbal Content in Political Advertising

The nonverbal content of political spots concerns the candidate's appearance and presentation through style of dress, body movements, speech rate and style, eye contact, and so on. While there is great variation across candidates in this aspect of Videostyle, successful candidates have usually dressed formally, maintained eye contact with the camera when speaking, smiled frequently, and maintained a fluent speech rate.

The final aspect of candidate Videostyle is the use of television production techniques to present the candidate to voters. Trends in production techniques have developed over the past 5 decades as television production became more elaborate and complex, and candidates were able to adopt and take advantage of new technologies. However, the development of new technologies brought with it an ethical concern in the Videostyle of candidates. Candidates and their media producers began to take advantage of the new sound, video, and digital production techniques to alter the audio and video used in their advertisements. Labeled "technodistortions," these new techniques were able to mislead voters through editing, morphing, digital alterations in video materials, and changes in audio soundtracks. Most common in negative ads, these technodistortions have been increasing since the 1980s and now constitute a substantial ethical concern in political advertising.

Effects of Political Advertising

In addition to understanding what makes up the content of political advertising, research has considered the question of how effective political advertising is. The effectiveness of political advertising can be considered in many ways, including whether political advertising results in increased knowledge for voters, whether it affects the evaluation of candidates, and, of course, to what extent political advertising can influence votes or even cause voters to become alienated from the political system.

Information Effects

One of the ways in which political advertising appears to be the most effective is in its communication of knowledge to voters. Voters who are exposed to political advertising are usually more likely to recall the candidates who are running in an election, to recognize and understand campaign issues, and to learn other useful information about the candidates and campaign. Political advertising has been shown to be such an effective transmitter of campaign information that researchers have found that exposure to political ads can lead to higher levels of information gain than can exposure to television news about the campaign or to debates between opposing candidates.

Effects on Candidate Evaluation

Exposure to political ads can also affect how voters evaluate a political candidate. Studies have shown that the candidate evaluation effects of television advertising can be both negative and positive. Sometimes a particular candidate is helped and sometimes hurt by particular advertising. It is impossible to say that political spots will always affect candidate evaluations in the same way for every candidate. Much depends on the individual voter and on the type and presentation of the advertising, but it is unquestionably possible for political advertising to affect a voter's positive or negative evaluation of a candidate.

Effects on Voting Behavior

In the United States there are many examples of situations where political advertising has made a difference in the outcome of an election. It is worth repeating that, of course, all political advertising does not result in votes for every candidate who sponsors it. But research has substantiated the potential of political ads to affect voter's choices, sometimes for a candidate in the case of positive ads and sometimes against a candidate in the case of negative advertising.

Researchers have also considered the conditions under which political advertising is more or less likely to be effective. Most of these conditions have been studied in terms of television advertising. For instance, televised political advertising seems to have stronger effects on voters who have low involvement in a political campaign. Political television ads are also more likely to affect the votes of citizens who are undecided at the time of exposure or who are late deciders. These characteristics often apply to voters who do not have strong affiliations with a political party and are thus more likely to be influenced by candidate advertising.

The content of a political advertisement may also be related to the likelihood that the political advertisement will be successful. Ads that focus on issues tend to be more effective than those that concentrate only on candidate image. Ads that arouse voter emotions are also effective.

Effects of Negative Political Advertising

Negative advertising has become such an important part of campaign advertising that a separate area of research has developed about the effects of negative advertising. Several decades ago, political consultants and candidates anticipated that negative advertising was likely to have a backlash effect that could hurt the sponsoring candidate more than it would damage the opponent being attacked. This is still a concern, and instances where backlash occurs continue to occur, but negative advertising has become so common in the modern U.S. political system that backlash happens much less often. Aside from the potential but unlikely backlash effects, how do negative advertisements function in a campaign? First, negative political advertising can be very effective because it is more likely than positive ads to be remembered by voters. Second, negative advertising is most effective when it focuses on issue messages, attacking the opponent on the basis of issue positions or inconsistencies, rather than on the opponent's personal qualities.

Negative advertising appears to be particularly effective when it is sponsored by an independent group that is not connected with the candidate. Apparently, voters view such independent sources as less biased and more likely to provide objective information.

Because negative political ads appear to be so effective, candidates have developed guidelines for how to deal with negative advertising in campaigns. Most important, a candidate cannot afford to ignore a negative television attack. Research has shown that it is important for the candidate who has been attacked to act quickly to rebut the attack, preferably by providing a direct rebuttal to the charge or charges made in the opponent's attack ad. Another strategy for a candidate who fears that attack ads may be a problem is to consider a strategy of inoculation. Research has shown that if a candidate can provide voters with initial positive and constructive information about a topic and the candidate's position on it in advance of attacks by the opponent, then voters are less likely to be convinced by the negative attack when and if it does hit the airwaves.

Some political observers and researchers have considered the possibility that negative advertising creates an unpleasant campaign atmosphere that alienates voters and may even cause voters to decide not to participate in the political system. A small amount of research has shown that voter disgruntlement about negative advertising can lead voters to refuse to vote at all and thus lower voter turnout results. Recent research has shown this concern is likely unwarranted, and, in fact, negative advertising may stimulate interest in a campaign that leads to increased voter participation and turnout.

The increased participation of women and minorities in the American political system has also led to more interest in understanding the role of political advertising when it supports or opposes female candidates and candidates who are African American, Hispanic, Asian, or representatives of other voter groups.

International Political Advertising

The United States is not the only country to use political advertising to promote candidates and parties. However, there are several differences in how political advertising functions in other democratic systems. First, many other countries prohibit political advertising on television, and candidates and parties generally rely on printed materials, particularly posters and flyers, for public distribution of their messages. Second, many countries that permit political promotional materials on television do not permit candidates and parties to purchase time for advertising. Instead, time is given to candidates or parties at no cost on public channels. Such systems prescribe very precisely the length, conditions, contents, and/or formats of the messages. Examples of such systems are Britain and France. Third, some countries operate under a dual system in which candidates or parties are given free time on public television channels and are allowed to purchase limited amounts of time on private television channels. Germany is an example of a dual system.

Research on political television advertising outside the United States has shown that such advertising is generally longer and, like ads in the United States, tends to focus primarily on issues in the campaign rather than on candidate images. This is partly a result of the fact that parties are often more important than individual candidates in elections outside the United States. Television ads outside the United States are also much more likely to be positive ads that promote the positive characteristics of the candidates or parties rather than negative or attack ads. Political television ads also tend to reflect the cultural differences between countries.

There is less research on the effects of political advertising outside the United States. However, Kaid and Holtz-Bacha have found that such advertising may affect the images of candidates and result in issue learning.

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Advocacy Advertising; Ad Watch; Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act; Communications Act of 1934; Daisy Girl Ad; Federal Election Campaign Act; Negative Advertising; Political Advertising, Independent; Political Advertising, Radio; Responsive Chord, The; Schwartz, Tony; TechnoDistortions; Videostyle; Willie Horton Ad; Women Candidates, Advertising

Further Readings

Jamieson, K. H. (1984). Packaging the presidency. New York: Oxford University Press.

Kaid, L. L. (2000). Ethics in political advertising. In R. E. Denton, Jr. (Ed.), Political communication ethics (pp. 146–177). Westport, CT: Praeger.

Kaid, L. L. (2004). Political advertising. In L. L. Kaid (Ed.), The handbook of political communication research (pp. 155–202). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.
Kaid, L. L., & Holtz-Bacha, C. (Eds.). (1995). Political advertising in Western democracies: Parties and candidates on television. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
Kaid, L. L., & Holtz-Bacha, C. (Eds.). (2006). The SAGE handbook of political advertising. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
Kaid, L. L., & Johnston, A. (2001). Videostyle in presidential campaigns. Westport, CT: Praeger/Greenwood.
Kaid, L. L., & Jones, C. A. (2004). Media and elections: United States of America. In B. P. Lange & D. Ward (Eds.), The media and elections: A handbook and comparative study (pp. 25–57). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.
Kern, M. (1989). 30-second politics: Political advertising in the eighties. New York: Praeger.
Patterson, T. E., & McClure, R. D. (1976). The unseeing eye: Myth of television power in politics. New York: Putnam.
West, D. M. (1993). Air wars: Television advertising in election campaigns, 1952–1992. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly.

Political Advertising, Independent

Political advertising is usually sponsored by the candidates and parties who seek election or reelection to political office. However, in the United States, where free speech is a valued right, political advertising is often sponsored by independent groups or individuals who wish to advocate for the election or defeat of individuals, parties, or ideas or issues. Such advertising has always been possible in print form, but growth of electronic media, radio and television, and later the Internet provided additional means and channels for these messages. Independent advertising also provided an outlet for corporations and labor unions that are prohibited from contributing to political campaigns in the United States.

Television advertising by groups independent of the candidate's campaign became nationally visible in Richard Nixon's 1972 campaign when a group called "Democrats for Nixon," headed by former Texas Governor John Connolly, sponsored a series of effective ads for Nixon. The ads were particularly effective in their attacks on George McGovern. One ad highlighted McGovern's inconsistencies and contradictory statements on policy issues, and another used toy ships, soldiers, and aircraft to illustrate alleged damage to American military security if McGovern's defense cutbacks were implemented. Following the Nixon campaign, however, the newly passed Federal Election Campaign Act went into effect, and the law and the subsequent 1976 Buckley v. Valeo Supreme Court case interpreting it made it clear that independent expenditures were legal. As long as they were not "coordinated with the campaign," such expenditures could be used for ads supporting or opposing candidates without being regulated or restricted.

In the decades following the Buckley decision, independent expenditures became an increasingly important part of campaigns. The independent groups most active in sponsoring political advertising were political action committees formed by corporations and labor unions who could not contribute directly to political campaigns. Groups like the AFL-CIO, the National Rifle Association, the AARP, the NAACP, the Conservation League, and the American Medical Association have used their political action committees as sponsors for political advertising. In some cases, committees were formed more generally to support particular viewpoints or philosophies. For instance, in the 1980s the National Conservative Political Action Committee (NCPAC) boasted many successes in its efforts to defeat candidates with liberal viewpoints and/or support candidates with conservative viewpoints.

In several instances independent groups also were formed and organized to support or oppose legislative proposals rather than specific candidates. For instance, during the 1990s many groups advertised in support or opposition to the passage of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) and in support or opposition to the passage of comprehensive health care reforms advocated by President Bill Clinton and his wife Hillary. Groups have also formed and expended money to air ads in support or opposition to Supreme Court nominees in hopes of influencing the votes of the U.S. Senate in confirmation hearings. Advertising focused on issues or policy concerns is sometimes called "issue advocacy advertising." In 1995–1996 more than $150 million was spent on advertising by such groups.

It is also legal for an individual to purchase time for ads to support or oppose candidates. Some observers believe that Senator Chuck Percy (R-IL) may have lost his Senate seat in Illinois in 1984 at least partly as a result of the expenditure of more than $1 million on negative advertising by private businessman Michael Goland of California. Even more famous was the notorious Willie Horton Ad. Sponsored by an independent group in 1988, this ad criticized Democratic presidential candidate Michael Dukakis for his prison furlough program in Massachusetts that allowed convicted criminal Willie Horton to escape custody and go on a murder and rape spree.

Independent expenditures for advertising took on even more importance after the passage of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (BCRA) in 2002. In the rush to control soft money and political party fundraising and spending, the new legislation spawned new highs in independent spending for political advertising. Since the spending of some types of political committees, particularly 527 groups named after the section of the Internal Revenue Code under which they are organized, was virtually unregulated by BCRA, the 2004 campaigns witnessed a glut of independent expenditures. Many groups were formed just for the purpose of sponsoring ads for and against presidential candidates and other high-visibility office contenders. Groups like MoveOn.org (funded heavily by wealthy businessman George Soros), the Media Fund, Progress for America Voter Fund, and many others were active sponsors of advertisements in 2004. The Swift Boat Veterans for Truth group, for instance, formed and sponsored ads designed to criticize the actions of John Kerry after his Vietnam service. Large percentages of the ads from these groups were negative. One notable exception was the very effective ad sponsored in support of George W. Bush by the Progress for America Voter Funds. Focused on the story of a young girl who lost her mother in the 9/11 World Trade Center attacks, "Ashley's Story" was an emotional ad that touted Bush's caring and compassion.

Overall, independent groups spent hundreds of millions of dollars on ads in the 2004 campaign. Groups like America Coming Together ($61.8 million) and the Media Fund ($51.7 million) sponsored ads supporting Kerry, while Progress for America Voter Fund ($37.9 million) and Swift Boat Veterans for Truth ($26 million) supported Bush. Unless new regulations are passed to control these expenditures, it is likely that they will continue to increase in future election cycles.

One reason independent advertisements have gained popularity is that research has shown that negative ads sponsored by independent sponsors are more effective than those sponsored by a candidate. Negative ads sponsored by independent groups thus allow the candidate who benefits from the attack to do so without being blamed for the attack or risking backlash from voters.

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Advocacy Advertising; Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act; Buckely v. Valeo; Campaign Finance; Willie Horton Ad

Further Readings

Beck, D., Taylor, P. Stranger, J., & Rivlin, D. (1997, September 16). Issue advocacy during the 1996 campaign. Report by the University of Pennsylvania Annenberg Public Policy Center. Retrieved December 20, 2004, from http://www.annenbergpublicpolicycenter.org/03_political_communication/issueads/REP16.PDF

Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA), 116 Stat. 81.

Kaid, L. L. (2004). Political advertising. In L. L. Kaid (Ed.), The handbook of political communication research (pp. 155–202). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Kaid, L. L., & Dimitrova, D. V. (2005). The television advertising battleground in the 2004 presidential election. Journalism Studies, 6(3), 165–175.

Sorauf, F. (1992). Inside campaign finance: Myths and realities. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

West, D. M. (2000). How issue ads have reshaped American politics. In J. A. Thurber, C. J. Nelson, & D. A. Dulio (Eds.), Crowded airwaves: Campaign advertising in elections (pp. 149–169). Washington, DC: Brookings Institution.

Political Advertising, Radio

The radio airwaves became a central mode of campaign advertising soon after the entrance of commercial radio in the United States in 1922 and maintained that role for more than 3 decades. Despite the rise of television advertising, with candidates for higher profile offices spending large amounts of their campaign budgets on the production and airing of television spots, radio advertising has persisted in the American political arena. In addition to maintaining a crucial place in the communications strategies of candidates for smaller budget state and local offices because of the cost effectiveness of radio advertising, since the early 1990s radio has reasserted its role in higher-profile campaigns as a mode of advertising that allows campaigns to target their messages to subgroups of voters.

Soon after radio's entrance into American life in the early 1920s, the new technology became a vehicle for advertising by candidates and parties. During its first decades, radio was dominated by national networks like NBC and CBS (formed in 1926 and 1927 respectively). The 1934 Federal Communications Act forced noncommercial and independent stations to share frequencies with networks or to move to less desirable space on the dial; this cemented networks' dominance. As a result, in the early years campaign advertising carried out on radio was primarily by the national parties on behalf of presidential candidates. With each election cycle after 1924, radio campaigning techniques grew more elaborate, innovative, and expensive. By 1940, more than a third of the spending by the two national parties was on radio advertising. Social scientists who studied the impact of radio advertising on politics during these early years, most notably Paul Lazarsfeld and his colleagues, contended that radio advertising served primarily as a reinforcer of voters' attitudes rather than a source of political conversion.

During the 1950s, national radio networks disappeared as the broadcast industry shifted their attention (and their dollars) to television development. Local radio stations began defecting from the networks and began focusing their attention on local advertisers, including candidates for political office. As this localization occurred, stations began to target small segments of the radio audience through focusing their programming on a particular format so that they could develop audience loyalty with the limited demographic group most drawn to that format; groups whose cultural tastes were not being served by television became an especial target for this programming . In contrast to radio's early decades, this *narrow*casting resulted in stations gaining smaller but sufficient and specialized shares of the listening audience. The number of formats grew as the years passed. More than 100 different specialized formats existed by the early 21st century. Such narrowcasting had a major impact on campaign advertising on those radio stations, creating a unique communication opportunity for candidates and partisan organizations.

While scholarly and public attention tends to focus on television campaign advertisements, radio ads continue to play a significant role in all levels of American campaigns. For instance, two-thirds of House candidates and virtually every Senate candidate uses radio ads, and there is some evidence that their use is expanding, with political consultants from the successful Bill Clinton and George W. Bush presidential campaigns noting the importance of radio ads in their communication strategies.

Radio ads have numerous features that make them attractive to political campaigns. First, lower production and airtime costs means that radio ads are generally longer and, therefore, more substantive than similar television ads. Second, radio's distinctive utilization patterns permit candidates to communicate with targeted constituencies about the issues the groups care most about and employ a style of communication that resonates with those communities, with little risk of also mobilizing the political opposition. As early as 1928, some targeted advertising began on radio with both parties using morning radio programs, with a disproportionately female audience, to air messages expected to resonate with women. But, changes in the structure of radio that began after the demise of networks and the continue with the ongoing increase in the number of formats have allowed such targeting to become more precise (most listeners tune into only one or two stations, with stations chosen largely on the basis of demographically distinct musical preferences). Recent scholarly work has found that African Americans, religious voters, and young citizens are most reliant upon radio advertising as a source of campaign information. Importantly, those who disproportionately rely upon radio messages developed for their demographic group are more likely to perceive democracy as healthy in the United States and are also more likely to approve of the quality of the campaigns in intense elections.

Jay Barth and L. Marvin Overby

See also Political Advertising; Radio, Politics and

Further Readings

Craig, D. B. (2000). Fireside politics: Radio and political culture in the United States, 1920–1940. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Herrnson, P. S. (2004). Congressional elections: Campaigning at home and in Washington. Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Hilliard, R. L., & Keith, M. C. (2005). The quieted voice: The rise and demise of localism in American radio. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press.

Keith, M. C. (2004). The radio station. Burlington, MA: Focal Press.
Lazarsfeld, P. F., Berelson, B., & Gaudet, H. (1948). The people's choice: How the voter makes up his mind in a presidential campaign (3rd ed.). New York: Columbia University Press.
Overby, L. M., & Barth, J. (2006). Radio advertising in American political campaigns: The persistence, importance, and effects of narrowcasting. American Politics Research, 34, 451–478.
Rothenbuhler, E., & McCourt, T. (2002). Radio redefines itself, 1947–1962. In M. Hilmes & J. Loviglio (Eds.), Radio reader: Essays in the cultural history of radio (pp. 367–387). New York: Routledge.

Political Advertising, Women Candidates

See Women Candidates, Advertising

Political Alienation

See Political Disaffection

Political Ballads, Songs

See Music and Politics

Political Branding

Nowadays there are highly visible resemblances between the consumer goods market and the world of politics. There is an evident relationship between business research and electoral affairs. Hence brand positioning and brand management have become more and more important in politics. Both parties and politicians hold a brand equity.

In the economic sense, a brand is a deep-seated and distinctive image of a commodity or a service in the mind of a consumer. Transferred to the world of politics, a brand is a deep-seated and distinctive image of a party or a politician (and a candidate, respectively) in the mind of a voter. Therefore it is important that parties and politicians exhibit a strong, consistent, unique, distinguishable, and trustworthy image. Besides traditional methods like grassroots campaigning differentiation from other parties or politicians, position papers, public relations, self-portrayal, public performances, appearance in media, and so on, an integral part of contemporary political campaigning is intelligent and courageous brand equity management.

From the voters' point of view, the political brand must be both attractive and emotive. Therefore the primary purpose must be building up a positive brand image and a solid brand essence. The brand essence consists of brand identity and brand value. To be successful, the brand identity should be as precise as possible. The voter must know what the party or the politician is standing for. The politicians have to meet the challenge to communicate their political attitudes, to grant insights into decision-making processes, to work with appropriate symbols and slogans, to raise the voter's awareness of party organization and identity, to define the scope of other positions, to expose the unique selling proposition, to disclose core values, and to prove expertise in problem solving. The brand value should correspond with the value hierarchy of the voter. Information about the voter's lifestyle, desires, and needs are essential. A brand not only knows the demographical distribution of the voters but understands their lives. This empathy is the requirement for a long-term strategy using emotional bonding. It guarantees the connection to a voting base. Furthermore, a politician should present her- or himself as predictive. Primarily the politician should be a reliable and familiar partner of the voters.

Political branding means to have these maxims in mind and to act upon these principles. Then the voter's esteem will be reflected in the choice of the candidate' own brand from among other brand choices.

Thomas Knieper

See also Political Marketing

Further Readings

Aaker, D. (1991). Managing brand equity. New York: Free Press.
Davies, J. P., & Newman, B. I. (2006). Winning elections with political marketing. New York: Haworth Press.

Harris, P., Wring, D., & Baines, P. (2007). Political marketing. Oxford, UK: Elsevier Books.
Lilleker, D. G., & Lees-Marshment, J. (Eds.). (2005). Political marketing: A comparative perspective. Manchester, UK: Manchester University Press.
Schneider, H. (2004). Marken in der Politik: Erscheinungsformen, Relevanz, identitätsorientierte Führung und demokratietheoretische Reflexion [Brand in politics: Form of appearance, relevance, identity orientated management, and theoretical reflection regarding democracy]. Wiesbaden: VS Verlag für Sozialwissenschaften.
Wymer, W. W., & Lees-Marshment, J. (Eds.). (2006). Current issues in political marketing. New York: Best Business Books.

Political Campaign Communication

Judith Trent and Robert Friedenberg (2004) have done a superb job of providing readers with a broad picture and a truly honest view of politics, candidates, and campaigns in their book, Political Campaign Communication. Trent and Friedenberg include perspectives from other disciplines, but ultimately they believe the backbone of political campaigns is found within the art and power of communication. Their study of political campaign communication has been broken down into two areas: the analysis of principles and the analysis of important and contemporary political practices.

Political Campaign Communication was first published in 1983 with the purpose of addressing six questions and concerns regarding political campaigns. Trent and Friedenberg agree that those same concerns still exist today, but they exist in a new day and time, and some are still tragically unchanged. The questions seek to address trends, campaign effectiveness, ethics, cost, public expectations, and the candidates themselves.

Political Campaign Communication also describes three vital areas of importance in political campaigns, providing the basis for why readers and voters should still have faith in the political system. Elections are important because they "allow us freedom to actively participate in selecting our leaders," "provide us with the opportunity to determine how our own interest can best be served," and also allow those elected the "legitimacy with which to govern." In the book, Trent and Friedenberg describe changes in politics and campaigns throughout the decades. Their use of real examples, ranging from John F. Kennedy's presidency to George W. Bush's reelection campaign, bring to life the principles and practices they describe.

In the book, Trent and Friedenberg address several topics within the communication principles. As part of the principles of political campaign communication, the book discusses communicative functions, styles, and strategies of campaigns, communicative channels of campaigning, and types and functions of political advertising. As part of the practices of political campaign communication, the book describes the art of public speaking, the forms of addresses and speeches, the skill of debate, the importance of interpersonal communication and advertising. The book is written well from a communication core. Trent and Friedenberg's goal for this book is the hope that the readers will become "better informed" voters and find a "renewed understanding and interest in the political system."

Both authors are extremely knowledgeable in political campaign communication. Trent, currently a professor of communication at the University of Cincinnati, has written and edited several books and is a popular analyst on candidates and campaigns for the network affiliates in Cincinnati, Ohio. Friedenberg, currently a professor of communication at Miami University of Ohio, has also written and edited several books and has served as a consultant for the Republican National Committee. He is also an experienced campaign consultant, having been involved in more than 70 political campaigns. Both bring a wealth of knowledge and insight to the field through their book, Political Campaign Communication, now in its fifth edition in 2004.

Alecea Davis Jones

Further Readings

Trent, J. S., & Friedenberg, R. V. (2004). Political campaign communication (5th ed.). Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Political Commercial Archive

The Political Commercial Archive (PCA) is the world's largest collection of political commercials and is nationally and internationally recognized as a major research resource. The archive is a part of the Political Communication Center (PCC) in the Department of Communication at the University of Oklahoma. The original collections in the archive were purchased from a private collector, Mr. Julian Kanter, and established at the University of Oklahoma in 1985. Kanter had operated the archive out of his home in Highland Park, Illinois, and at the time it was purchased by the University of Oklahoma, the collection contained about 20,000 items.

Under the supervision of the PCC's founding director, Lynda Lee Kaid, the collection grew to more than 50,000 in 2000. Kaid and Library and Information Sciences Professor Kathleen J. M. Haynes developed a cataloging and archival management system for the archive, and the items in the archive were organized according to the Archives and Manuscripts format for entry into standard Library of Congress bibliographic systems. They produced printed catalogs of the archive's holdings, some of which are available in online format at http://www.ou.edu/pccenter/catalogue.htm.

Many of the items in the collection are the only known existing video or audio recordings of these particular political commercials. The archive contains commercials from every election year from 1952 to the present. All levels of races are included: presidential, U.S. senatorial, gubernatorial and other statewide offices, congressional, state legislative, county and municipal, judicial, school board, and so on. The archive has materials from all 50 states and some foreign countries. It also contains ads for and against ballot issues (or propositions) and an increasing number of advocacy commercials that deal with public and social policy questions.

The archive operates with the endorsement of the Republican and Democratic National Committees, the National Archives, and the Library of Congress. In 1999, the archive was named an American "Treasure" by Save America's Treasures (White House Millennium Council and the National Historic Preservation Trust).

Scholars and researchers may access the holdings of the archive onsite at the University of Oklahoma campus in Norman, Oklahoma. Limited numbers of items are available for off-site use.

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Political Communication Center

Further Readings

Haynes, K. J. M., Kaid, L. L., & Rand, C. R. (1996). The Political Commercial Archive: Management of moving image and sound recordings. American Archivist, 59(1), 48–61.

Haynes, K. J. M., Saye, J. D., & Kaid, L. L. (1993). Cataloging collection-level records for archival video and audio recordings. Cataloging and Classification Quarterly, 18, 19–32.

Kaid, L. L., Haynes, K. J. M., & Rand, C. E. (1996). The Political Communication Center: A catalog and guide to the archival collections. Norman, OK: Political Communication Center.

POLITICAL COMMUNICATION

Political Communication is the premier academic journal in the political communication discipline. The purpose of the journal is to provide an outlet for scholarship in the political communication field. The journal is jointly sponsored by the Political Communication Divisions of the International Communication Association (ICA) and the American Political Science Association (APSA). Published quarterly and peer reviewed, Political Communication is one of the highest ranked journals in both the political science and communication disciplines.

Political Communication published its first volume under the joint auspices of these two academic organizations in 1994. The journal was a successor to two other publications, Political Communication Review and Political Communication and Persuasion.

In 1975, the Political Communication Division of ICA commenced publication of a small annual journal, Political Communication Review (PCR). PCR initially concentrated on providing bibliographic or review essays, book reviews, descriptions of nonprint materials available to scholars. PCR continued publication under the joint editorship of Keith R. Sanders and Lynda Lee Kaid until 1991, when it was succeeded by Political Communication.

Based on the recommendation of a joint publication committee, the Political Communication Divisions of ICA and APSA agreed in 1991 to cosponsor a new journal, Political Communication. The new journal was to be published by Taylor & Francis Publishers and would replace the printing house's journal Political Communication and Persuasion. The first editor of the journal was Doris Graber. Subsequent editors are appointed in alternation between the two sponsoring associations and have included David S. Warson and David Paletz. The ICA and APSA divisions also cooperate in sponsoring a regular newsletter, Political Communication Reports.

Lynda Lee Kaid

Further Readings

Political Communication Web site: http://www.tandf.co.uk/journals/titles/10584609.asp

Political Communication Center

The Political Communication Center (PCC) at the University of Oklahoma was the first academic center in the United States to focus on the role of communication in the political system. The PCC's founding director was Lynda Lee Kaid, who established the PCC in 1985 as an interdisciplinary center in the Department of Communication at the University of Oklahoma.

The Department of Communication offers an undergraduate, a master's, and a PhD specialization in political communication. Areas of study include mass media impact on voting behavior and public events; communication between political figures and the public; government-press relations; political advertising; and social, psychological, and political antecedents of public opinion. The programs of the center prepare students for careers in academic teaching and research; for positions in government with political candidates and office holders; and for jobs in public and private research consortia and with media organizations.

An important component of the PCC is the Political Commercial Archive, the world's largest collection of radio and television commercials. The archive contains political television and radio ads for campaigns from 1936 through the present. All levels of elections from president to school board elections are represented. The collection also contains ads for ballot initiatives and referenda. A portion of the archive contains advertising from elections in other countries, including Asia, Australia, Europe, and Latin America.

The Political Communication Center also sponsors conferences, workshops, symposia, and lectures on political topics. Such programs provide a forum for the interaction of students, scholars, and practitioners on political communication issues. The Political Commercial Archive also engages in active outreach efforts, providing programs and presentations for other colleges and universities, civic clubs, business and professional organizations, political gatherings, and other interested groups.

The center sometimes issues special publications such as Political Advertising Research Reports that have been mailed periodically to scholars and researchers. More information on the PCC's holdings, activities, and publications can be found on its Web site at http://www.ou.edu/pccenter.

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Political Commercial Archive

Further Readings

Haynes, K. J. M., Kaid, L. L., & Rand, C. R. (1996). The Political Commercial Archive: Management of moving image and sound recordings. American Archivist, 59(1), 48–61.

Kaid, L. L., Haynes, K. J. M., & Rand, C. E. (1996). The Political Communication Center: A catalog and guide to the archival collections. Norman, OK: Political Communication Center.

Political Communication Review

See Political Communication

Political Conflict

Political conflict can be defined as a public dispute over political influence or control between two or more antagonists. The role of the news media in political conflict is a central area of research in the field of political communication. There are at least two reasons for this level of interest. First, there is reason to believe that that role of the media in such disputes can have a major impact on both the course of these disputes and on their final outcome. Second, the news media serve as the central arena for such disputes, and most citizens rely on the press as their primary source of information about political conflicts.

The research in this area can be divided into two broad areas. Studies concerning the role of the news media in international conflicts are concerned with such issues as the role of the press in wars, international interventions, international terrorism, and peace processes. Researchers who focus on domestic conflicts are mostly concerned with the ability of movements, minorities, labor unions, and domestic terrorist organizations to gain access to and legitimacy from the media. Although the two realms of research have a number of overlapping concerns, it is helpful to distinguish between them.

The role of the news media in international conflicts receives the most amount of research interest in political communication. One central theme in this literature has to do with the relative independence of the news media during wars. Studies carried out in a variety of countries have found that the news media generally tend to "rally 'round the flag" in support of their governments, especially during the early stages of such conflicts. A number of researchers, however, have pointed to the fact that as the level of political consensus surrounding a war begins to break down, the news media reflect that change in mood or even accelerate the rate of change. The one conclusion that all researchers in this field can agree on it is that the specific role the news media play in wars varies along with the surrounding political environment.

A related body of literature concerns the ways in which technological changes influence the flow of information and images from the battlefield to people's homes. The fact that the public receives almost instantaneous news about ongoing losses in the field, for example, probably makes it more difficult for political and military leaders to convince citizens to support drawn out conflicts. Scholars have also looked at what has been termed the "CNN effect." The term refers to concerns that the constant flow of instant and graphic news stories puts undue pressure on political leaders to intervene in international conflicts and humanitarian disasters. Most researchers have come to the conclusion, however, that such fears are exaggerated because modern political leaders are well aware of the dangers involved in such interventions.

The topic of media and terrorism has also received considerable attention in the literature on international conflict. As might be expected, the research in this area tends to be more policy oriented. A major question has to do with how governments can limit the ability of terrorists' organizations to exploit the news media without unduly restricting freedom of the press. Here too technological issues—especially the creation of the Internet—have become more important in the field. The Internet provides terrorist organizations with an extremely efficient tool for mobilization and coordination that would have been unavailable a few years earlier.

Concerning the field of international conflict, the role of the news media in peace processes has received the least scholarly attention. Those who have studied the issue have concluded that there is an inherent contradiction between the needs of the news and the needs of peace. News is about conflict, and apart from an occasional breakthrough, the long and complicated negotiations involved in a long peace process do not supply sufficient drama to be considered newsworthy. In addition, news tends to be inherently ethnocentric, and any serious attempt at reconciliation requires at least a minimal understanding of the needs of the other side.

Concerning domestic political conflict, a good deal of the literature focuses on the ways in which the news media serve as central agents for increasing the gaps between the strongest and weakest elements in society. One of the more important themes in this work concerns coverage of minorities. Studies from a variety of Western countries conclude that due to definitions of newsworthiness the press either ignores such groups or relates to them as social deviants. The major reason for this phenomenon is that while the more powerful elements in society are considered inherently newsworthy, those living in the social, geographical, or economic periphery are considered worthy of coverage only if they are linked to dramatically negative events. This dynamic also has also been found important in studies that examined the attempts by political movements and other challengers to gain access to the news media. Protest groups and labor unions often find themselves paying the "dues of disorder" in order to be considered worthy of coverage. Such behavior, however, means that such groups are framed by the media as extremists.

Despite this, research also shows that some challengers manage to overcome these obstacles by successfully gaining both access and a certain amount of legitimacy from the news media. Examples include the American civil rights movement, women's movements, environmental movements, and gay rights movements. Here too, then, the overall goal of research in this area is to better understand how the role of the news media in political processes varies over time and circumstance.

Gadi Wolfsfeld

See also Minorities, Role in Politics

Further Readings

Bennett, W. L., & Paletz, D. L. (Eds.). (1994). Taken by storm: The media, public opinion, and U.S. foreign policy in the Gulf War. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Entman, R. (2004). Projections of power: Framing news, public opinion, and U.S. foreign policy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Entman, R., & Rojecki, A. (2001). The Black image in the White mind: Media and race in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Gamson, W., & Wolfsfeld, G. (1993). Movements and media as interacting systems. Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 528, 114–125.

Hallin, D. (1986). The uncensored war. New York: Oxford University Press.

Knightly, P. (2002). The first casualty: The war correspondent as hero and myth-maker from the Crimea to Kosovo. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Livingston, S. (1997). Beyond the CNN effect: The media-foreign policy dynamic. In P. Norris (Ed.), Politics and the press: The news media and their influences (pp. 291–318). Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.

Seib, P. (1996). Headline diplomacy: How news coverage affects foreign policy. New York: Praeger.

Taylor, P. (2003). Journalism under fire: The reporting of war and international crises. In S. Cottle (Ed.), News, public relations and power (pp. 63–79). London: Sage.

Weimann, G. (2006). Terror on the Internet: The new arena, the new challenges. Washington, DC: United Institute of Peace.

Wolfsfeld, G. (1997). Media and political conflict: News from the Middle East. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Wolfsfeld, G. (1997). Media and the path to peace. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Political Consultants

See Consultants, Political

Political Correctness

Political correctness, politically correct, and PC are terms used to refer to language that seems intended to give the least amount of offense, especially when describing groups identified by external markers such as race, gender, culture, or sexual orientation. The concept has been discussed, disputed, criticized, and satirized by commentators from the conservative, liberal, and moderate camps. It has been used to ridicule the view that altering language usage can change perceptions, outcomes, and beliefs in the public arena.

The term first appeared in Marxist-Leninist vocabulary following the Russian Revolution of 1917. At that time it was used to describe the party line. During the late 1970s and early 1980s, the term began to be used wittily by liberal politicians to refer to the extremism of some left-wing issues, particularly regarding what was perceived as an emphasis on rhetoric over content. In the early 1990s, the term was used by conservatives to question and oppose what they perceived as the rise of liberal left-wing curriculum and teaching methods on university and college campuses in the United States. By the late 1990s, the usage of the term had again declined and was most frequently employed by comedians and others to lampoon political language. It was also used at times by the left to scoff at conservative political themes. In recent years, a few multiculturalist writers and speakers have chosen to ignore earlier definitions of the term and have begun using it.

Linguistically, political correctness seems to be rooted in a desire to eliminate exclusion of various identity groups based on language usage. According to the Sapir-Whorf hypothesis, our perception of reality is determined by our thought processes, which are influenced by the language we use. In this way language shapes our reality and tells us how to think about and respond to that reality. Language also reveals and promotes our biases. Therefore, using sexist language promotes sexism and using racial language promotes racism.

Those who are most strongly opposed to the concept of political correctness view it as censorship and a curtailment of freedom of speech that places limits on debates in the public arena. They contend that such language boundaries inevitably lead to self-censorship and restrictions on behavior. They further believe that political correctness perceives offensive language where none exists. Others believe that political correctness has been used as an epithet to stop legitimate attempts to curb hate speech and minimize exclusionary speech practices. Ultimately, the ongoing discussion surrounding political correctness seems to center on language, naming, and whose definitions are accepted.

Cynthia Roper

Further Readings

Lakoff, R. T. (2000). The language war. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Phillips, W. (Ed.). (1993). The politics of political correctness [Special issue]. Partisan Review, 60(4).

Schlesinger, A. M. (1998). The disuniting of America: Reflections on a multicultural society. New York: Norton.

Political Corruption

Political corruption is a term generally used to describe the abuse of political or public office for private gain. Some of the more common forms of corruption concern issues of access to legislators and members of the executive branch, as well as patronage. It has been argued that while corruption is widespread and often considered systemic in many political systems, it is generally only in liberal democracies that its exposure leads to what has become a mainstay of modern political media coverage: the political scandal.

Political communication scholars have been interested in corruption especially as it pertains to three different areas: the increased importance of money in politics in general and campaigns in particular as a reason for an apparent increase of corruption, the exposure of corruption by the media, and the reaction following this exposure by the media and the persons involved.

It has been well established that political activity today poses higher financial burdens on the actors than ever before. While corruption for personal gain is certainly not uncommon, this motive does not account for the apparent increase in such practices. However, one of the issues that has often been related to this increase is the issue of financing political activity in modern society. The rising costs of political campaigns at all levels of government are generally a result of the increased need for advertising and as such have been well documented. It is generally thought that as political actors increasingly feel the pressure to secure higher levels of funding for their campaigns and for party activities, an increase in financial corruption is a likely result. In exchange for financial contributions, access may be granted or decisions may be made in favor of the funding sources. In the United States, campaign finance reform, including setting limits on contributions or spending, or even public financing, has often been touted as having the potential to limit corruption. However, political systems that do impose such limitations are not immune to corruption, as the wave of scandals throughout the world—for example, in Brazil, the Czech Republic, and Germany—has shown.

Another focus of media researchers is the investigation of the media's role in exposing corruption. This function of the media is often described as the fulfillment of its role as the Fourth Estate, providing checks on the functioning of government and contributing to remedying the consequences of corruption. The exposure of corruption and corrupt practices within the government are often the result of in-depth investigative reporting. It has been argued that in the United States, the media's execution of this function has diminished in recent years after its heyday during and immediately following the Watergate era. Similar developments have been discovered in the United Kingdom and throughout Europe. The so-called tabloidization of the media may be partially to blame, as the focus of news coverage has increasingly become the personal rather than the political or systemic. Under this model, the goal of investigative reporting has become to expose private peccadilloes rather than abuses of power and position. Additionally, patterns of media ownership have been cited as a reason for the decline of investigative reporting. On the one hand, the resources provided for newsgathering have generally declined under corporate ownership. On the other hand, conflicts of interest that may inhibit the exposure of financial connections between powerful interest groups or businesses and political actors may also have an influence on the nature of reporting.

Researchers are also interested in the developments that occur when corruption is exposed and made public. Theodore Lowi has defined scandals as "corruption revealed," and it is the press that is in large part responsible for the reaction to these scandals. Whether or not a scandal has "legs" is in large part determined by the interest the media shows in it rather than by the substance of the underlying corruption. While the media may become responsible for changes in policy and may even cause people to leave office (as was the case following Watergate, e.g.), it may also create a situation in which a scandal is quickly forgotten due to a shift in focus on another issue or, in fact, the next scandal. At times, media coverage of politics can take on the guise of a never-ending succession of scandals. The actors involved in such scandals are of course interested in influencing the media's coverage, as well. Crisis communication models and image restoration techniques in response to the exposure of corruption have been described by a number of researchers.

Thomas Bartl

See also Political Scandal; Watergate

Further Readings

Altschull, J. H. (1994). Agents of power: The media and public policy. White Plains, NY: Longman.

Klitgaard, R. (1988). Controlling corruption. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Schultz, J. (1998). Reviving the fourth estate: Democracy, accountability, and the media. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Thompson, J. (2000). Political scandal: Power and visibility in the media age. Cambridge, UK: Polity.

Waisbord, S. (2000). Watchdog journalism in South America: News, democracy and accountability. New York: Columbia University Press.

Political Culture

Political culture is one of the most popular concepts in political science. To scrutinize political culture is to study how people view their country's politics. The notion of political culture does not refer to attitudes toward specific actors such as the current president or prime minister; rather it denotes how people view the political system as a whole, the institutions and the input and output structures, including their belief in its legitimacy. Pye defines political culture as the composite of basic values, feelings, and knowledge that underlie the political process. The building blocks of political culture are, therefore, the beliefs, opinions, and emotions of the citizens toward their form of government. Political culture consists of assumptions about the political world with concentration on certain features of events, institutions, and behavior. They set the range of alternatives among which members of a given population make decisions. Thus, political culture represents a disposition in favor of a range of alternative behaviors, problems, and solutions that are possible within a population.

Political culture has been studied most intensively in the context of established Western democracies. The classic study is Almond and Verba's The Civic Culture, published in 1963. Based on surveys conducted in the United States, Britain, West Germany, Italy, and Mexico, this landmark investigation sought to identify the political culture within which a liberal democracy is most likely to develop and consolidate. Almond and Verba's argument is based on a distinction between three pure types of political culture: the parochial, subject, and participant. In the parochial political culture, citizens are only indistinctly aware of the existence of central government. In the subject political culture, citizens see themselves not as participants in the political process but as subjects of the government. In the participant political culture, citizens believe both that they can contribute to the system and that they are affected by it. Almond and Verba's work attracted the attention of generations of scholars who replicated the findings, criticized the conceptualizations, and refined the theory.

Almond and Verba's core idea was that democracy will prove most stable in societies where subject and parochial attitudes provide ballast to an essentially participant culture. This mix is termed the "civic culture." In this ideal combination, citizens are sufficiently active in politics to express their preferences to rulers but not so involved as to refuse to accept decisions with which they disagree. Thus the civic culture resolves the tension within democracy between popular control and effective governance. In Almond and Verba's study, Britain, and to a lesser extent the United States, came closest to this ideal. In both countries citizens felt they could influence the government.

In the decades following events such as the Vietnam War and student activism in the 1960, the oil crisis of the 1970s, the antinuclear movement and the rise of ecology groups in the 1980s, privatization and cutbacks to the welfare state in the 1990s, and terrorism at the beginning of the 21st century left their mark on Western political cultures. In most Western democracies the civic political culture is moving toward a more skeptical and instrumental attitude to politics. Moreover, declining trust in government, lower turnout, and unconventional political participation implies a shift away from the participant culture that Almond and Verba regarded as the basis of democracy. Since the 1980s, confidence in the legislature, civil service, parties, and political leaders declined in most democracies, but popular support for democratic principles remained high. So far as political discontent focuses more on the performance of governing institutions and leaders than on the democratic process itself, the stability of the political system itself is not threatened.

Political culture is the property of a collectivity—for example, a nation, region, class, or party. Most studies of political culture concentrate on national cultures. Almond and Verba compared the political cultures of five nations; Richardson examined the political culture of Japan; and Baker, Dalton, and Hildebrandt analyzed the changing political culture in Germany. Some studies focus on territorially defined units at the subnational level, such as the political cultures of American states, Canadian provinces, or Italian regions. Following the pioneering footsteps of The Civic Culture, Putnam argues that civic community, based on high levels of political interest, social equality, interpersonal trust, and voluntary association leads to higher probabilities of effective governance and democracy. In addition, we find studies of the cultural attributes of other social groups such as the political elite, the working class, and the like.

Political culture can be a fruitful explanation, if we identify what it is about these collectivities that leads to the distinctive patterns of assumptions. So far as nations are concerned, it is crucial whether their collective experience is essential or whether the differences between them are the result of the varying proportions of particular groups with their own unique experiences. National culture has an effect only when people in the same social categories, but in different nations, hold different assumptions. Political culture defines the range of tolerable alternatives from which groups or individuals choose an option. The choice an individual or group makes within these range is to be explained by other factors.

Jürgen R. Winkler

See also Political Disaffection

Further Readings

Almond, G. A., & Verba, S. (1963). The civic culture: Political attitudes and democracy in five nations. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Baker, K. L., Dalton, R. J., & Hildebrandt, K. (1981). Germany transformed: Political culture and the new politics. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Elazar, D. J. (1984). American federalism: A view from the states (3rd ed.). New York: Harper & Row.

Norris, P. (Ed.). (1999). Critical citizens: Global support for democratic governance. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Pharr, S. J., & Putnam, R. D. (Eds.). (2000). Disaffected democracies: What's troubling the trilateral countries? Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Putnam, R. D. (1993). Making democracy work: Civic traditions in modern Italy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Pye, L. P. (1995). Political culture. In S. Lipset et al. (Eds.), The encyclopaedia of democracy (pp. 965–969). London: Routledge.

Richardson, B. M. (1975). The political culture of Japan. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Simeon, R., & Elkins, D. J. (1974). Regional political cultures in Canada. Canadian Journal of Political Science, 7, 397–437.

Political Cynicism

See Political Disaffection

Political Disaffection

Political disaffection is a term used to describe negative attitudes and feelings toward one's political system. Political observers have hypothesized that such negative attitudes toward the political system may be influenced by the media, and particularly by television. Although such expectations have been voiced since the introduction of television, the discussion was intensified when Michael J. Robinson brought up the "videomalaise hypothesis" during the 1970s. Building on the coincidence of increasing political cynicism in the United States and a decline of trust in political institutions, on the one hand, and an increasing reliance on television for the acquisition of political information by citizens on the other, the videomalaise hypothesis regarded television as a major factor in the growth of political alienation. This revived suspicions of a "narcotizing dysfunction" of the media suggested by Lazarsfeld and Merton as early as 1948.

Several studies, in the United States and abroad, have been designed to test the simple correlation as put forward in the videomalaise hypothesis. Findings have been mixed, partly as a result of diverse conceptualizations, research designs, and measurement indicators. Often the studies applied different measures to represent political disaffection, including political powerlessness or efficacy, trust, alienation, apathy, and cynicism. A more systematic approach was based on David Easton's model of the political system and his concept of political support that can refer to the political community as a whole, the governing regime, or the political authorities. Support, as Easton saw it, can either be diffuse or specific. Diffuse support represents the general support of the different elements of the political system. Specific support is transferred to those who are responsible for decisions, first the authorities, than the governing regime. Diffuse support should be independent of day-to-day politics and therefore also provides acceptance of political decisions that may not meet an individual's expectations.

Easton's concept of diffuse support has repeatedly been related to the concept of political alienation and the diverse indicators mentioned. Alienation would occur when diffuse support weakens and thus can also be directed toward the three objects of the political system. Together with diffuse support, alienation is defined as a more general attitude toward the political system that is also more permanent than the rejection of specific political decisions, discontent with the government, or the opinion about an individual politician. However, Easton himself only accepted alienation as the opposite of support when it accompanies the refusal of and a negative evaluation of a political object. Nevertheless, he saw diffuse support and alienation in an important interrelation and therefore suggested that alienation should be regarded as a crucial determinant of support.

This research also discussed the consequences of disaffection from politics for political behavior. It was initially assumed that disaffection leads the individual to turn away from politics and become apathetic. While this might be the necessary consequence of a decline in efficacy, a decline in trust or increasing cynicism might also lead to a growth in political participation and more specifically in certain activities beyond the usual forms of participation, such as protest behavior.

Similarly, researchers discussed appropriate measures for determining television use and other independent variables that were supposed to influence disaffection. The videomalaise hypothesis spoke of "television reliance," meaning the preference for television for political information. Some of the earlier studies used television exposure instead of reliance. Research soon turned away from global measures of television exposure or reliance and started to apply interactive media behavior measures, combining general and specific exposure as well as attentiveness and motives for media use, which expands the predictive power of exposure.

Finally, researchers also contrasted the effects of the use of political content with the use of entertainment media and discovered the "virtuous circle," which has been described as a positive relation between the use of political media content and knowledge or trust and efficacy. At the same time, some support was found for a the correlation between the use of media entertainment and political alienation variables, meaning that high use of entertainment media comes along with low levels of efficacy and political trust. However, this correlation was interpreted as an interrelationship in which media use and political attitudes mutually influence each other.

By making television the scapegoat, the early videomalaise hypothesis assumed special features of the medium to be responsible for increasing political disaffection, namely its negativism, the high credibility of television, and the "inadvertent audience." This assumption, however, failed to consider that negativism and other content-related features are not specific to television. Therefore, researchers started to look into the development of political journalism in general or, even broader, the reporting about politics as it has merged with entertainment, opening up a new line of research. This approach, instead of making the television medium responsible for political disaffection, addressed journalistic behavior as well as the packaging and framing of politics in the media and their connection to political attitudes. Thus, the way the media cover politics has come under attack. Its game and strategy structure and its conflict-oriented style are accused of starting a "spiral of cynicism" that is responsible for turning citizens away from news and public affairs coverage and undermining their interest in politics.

Christina Holtz-Bacha

See also Framing; Political Efficacy; Political Engagement

Further Readings

Cappella, J. N., & Jamieson, K. H. (1997). Spiral of cynicism: The press and the public good. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Easton, D. (1965). A systems analysis of political life. New York: Wiley.

Holtz-Bacha, C. (1990). Ablenkung oder Abkehr von der Politik? Mediennutzung im Geflecht politischer Orientierungen [Distraction or withdrawal from politics? Media use and political attitudes]. Opladen, Germany: Westdeutscher Verlag.

Lazarsfeld, P. F., & Merton, R. K. (1948). Mass communication, popular taste, and organizational action. In L. Bryson (Ed.), The communication of ideas (pp. 95–118). New York: Harper.

Norris, P. (2000). A virtuous circle. Political communications in postindustrial societies. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Patterson, T. E. (1993). Out of order. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

Robinson, M. J. (1975). American political legitimacy in an era of electronic journalism: Reflections on the evening news. In D. Cater & R. Adler (Eds.), Television as a social force: New approaches to TV criticism (pp. 97–130). New York: Praeger.

Political Efficacy

Political efficacy is a term that refers to the feeling that one's own political actions can have an impact upon the political process. Like with many important concepts in the field of political communication and sociology, its origins can be traced back to a string of biannual surveys directed by Angus Campbell and his associates at the University of Michigan's Survey Research Center (SRC) that eventually became to be known as the (American) National Election Studies (ANES).

The SRC's approach to the study of politics focused on three basic tenets: (1) the idea that attitudes guide political behavior, (2) the notion that research has to be cumulative, and (3) the willingness to draw on the rich tradition of political polling that was already established as well as on commonsensical ideas about politics. Therefore, the four items—a fifth item was dropped later on—that were introduced in 1952 were not derived from some overarching theory, but were simply considered interesting and relevant by the SRC group, given the political situation of the time.

They read:

1. "I don't think public officials care much what people like me think."
2. "Voting is the only way that people like me can have any say about how the government runs things."
3. "People like me don't have any say about what the government does."
4. "Sometimes politics and government seem so complicated that a person like me can't really understand what's going on."

Items 1, 3, and 4 were replicated in the ANES after 1956 on a more or less biannual basis, and therefore at least in the United States it is possible to track the waxing and waning of the general public's sense of efficacy over several decades. Translations of the SRC items were developed for surveys of social and political attitudes in a host of other countries, and nowadays the concept has gained universal recognition in Western democracies.

Campbell and his associates initially assumed that (a) people with a high socioeconomical status (SES) would (rightly) consider themselves more influential than people with a low SES and that (b) people who consider themselves influential are more likely to participate in politics (this is even a part of their definition). Therefore, efficacy should be an important intervening variable that could help explain the manifest link between SES and electoral participation. This conclusion was borne out in countless election studies. Moreover, political efficacy turned out to be a good predictor for other, more unconventional forms of political participation like protest marches, sit-ins, or boycotts.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, the lack of a theoretical foundation of the concept finally led to a third strand of research that reinterpreted the meaning of the items in the context of other approaches. In turn, a low sense of political efficacy was seen as an indicator for political alienation, a low level of support for the political system in the sense of David Easton's work, and as sign of political disaffection and malaise. Arguably the single most important contribution to the latter debate was Robinson's article on "Public Affairs Television and the Growth of Political Malaise," which essentially blamed (political) television for the sharp decline in efficacy starting in the late 1960s. This alleged causal relationship between TV consumption and a low sense of political efficacy became known as the "videomalaise hypothesis" and sparked a scientific debate that is still far from closed. In its course, the political efficacy items were increasingly seen as core indicators for political disaffection. This interpretation of the concept rests on the (implicit) argument that for democracies high levels of participation by all members of the public are desirable per se, and that low levels of efficacy are therefore a sign of crisis. On the other hand, functional or elitist theories of democracy claim that high levels of participation may well lead to overload and instability of the political system as well as to suboptimal political results.

A fourth and final strand of research focuses on the dimensionality of the concept. As early as 1959, Robert Lane pointed out that the SRC items refer to two distinct subdimensions of the concept: Items 1 and 3 reflect perceived attributes of the political system ("external political efficacy"), while items 2 and 4 tap evaluations of the respondent's own political abilities ("internal political efficacy"). Fifteen years later, George Balch could empirically prove that internal and external efficacy do indeed form two separate (but closely related) subdimensions of the original concept. Adherents of elitist theories hold that the combination of low levels of internal efficacy with high levels of external efficacy is most beneficial for the stability of democracy (see Almond and Verbas's development of the "civic culture" for a closely related argument).

The existence of two subdimensions is nowadays uncontroversial. However, the long tradition of the concept not withstanding, its measurement underwent considerable change over the years. From the late 1960s on, additional items were introduced in the ANES surveys, the wording of the original items was varied somewhat to avoid response sets, the format of admissible answers was changed from agree/disagree to a Likert-type rating scale, and new or modified items were conceived. Therefore, a whole host of measurement models has been proposed during the past 3 decades, and the debate about the best (i.e., most valid and reliable) way to measure political efficacy is far from over.

Kai Arzheimer

See also Political Disaffection

Further Readings

Almond, G. A., & Verba, S. (1965). The civic culture: Political attitudes and democracy in five nations. Boston: Little, Brown.

Balch, G. I. (1974). Multiple indicators in survey research: The concept of "Sense of Political Efficacy." Political Methodology, 1(1), 1–43.

Campbell, A., Gurin, G., & Miller, W. E. (1954). The voter decides. Evanston: Harper & Row.

Easton, D. (1975). A re-assessment of the concept of political support. British Journal of Political Science, 5, 435–457.

Lane, R. (1959). Political life: Why people get involved in politics. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.

Robinson, M. J. (1976). Public affairs television and the growth of political malaise: The case of "The Selling of the Pentagon." American Political Science Review, 70, 409–432.

Vetter, A. (1997). Political Efficacy: Alte und neue Meßmodelle im Vergleich [Political efficacy: Old and new measurement models in comparison]. Kölner Zeitschrift für Soziologie und Sozialpsychologie, 49, 53–73.

Political Engagement

Democracy depends on an engaged populace. An important component of citizenship is political activity. People can be politically engaged by voting; reading the newspaper; volunteering on local projects; sending letters or e-mails to public officials, organizations, or media sources; participating in demonstrations and rallies; attending local school council meetings; visiting a local representative's office; going to church, synagogue, or mosque; talking to their neighbors about community concerns; or making a donation (e.g., money, time, advice) to a worthwhile cause. Any activity, individual or collective, devoted to influencing the community is defined as political engagement. Key skills necessary for political engagement include the following: active involvement, knowledge and understanding, a sense of political connectedness, and skills necessary for political participation (e.g., listening, critical thinking, research skills).

The State of Political Engagement

There is a growing concern about the health of democracy in the United States. Political participation is declining. Citizens express a lack of interest in politics at all levels and an extreme hesitancy to participate in democratic decision making. A prominent series of studies are found in the 2000 book, Bowling Alone, by Professor Robert Putnam, which describes the current state of political [dis]engagement. Putnam chronicles a pattern of declining civic participation in America and concludes that this trend has accelerated since 1985. Using data from Roper surveys, he examines 12 civic activities, and across that criterion, participation declined by an average or 24% between 1983–1984 and 1993–1994. In addition, the research also shows that each succeeding generation shows less interest and involvement in political activities.

The most cited measurement of democratic health is voting participation. Generally, half of American citizens do not participate in presidential elections. A participation level of around 50% ranks the United States at 140th among the world's 163 democratically elected governments, between Chad and Botswana, where democracies have a shorter history. Furthermore, if one includes midterm and presidential elections, the United States has the lowest voting participation level of any democracy in the world.

Political disaffection is especially pronounced among young adults. Younger Americans vote less often than their elders do, show lower levels of social trust, and have less knowledge of politics. For example, only 38% of the eligible youth participated in the electoral process in 2000, and, although there was a small increase in 2004, the overall trends remain disappointing. With few exceptions, the percentage of 18- to 24-year-olds who vote has declined in each succeeding election since 1972, when 18-year-olds were first eligible to participate. Moreover, experts say that younger individuals are not likely to acquire the habit of voting as they get older.

Furthermore, communication scholars Bruce Pinkleton and Erica Austin argue that this negative trend among the youth and adults can lead to an inconsolable situation called "spiral of disaffection." In this situation, people isolate themselves from political information, which heightens cynical perceptions of government, resulting in hardened personal views in opposition to civic participation. When individuals shun political knowledge long enough, they become uninformed on public policy and outright hostile to political candidates. As a result, a politically alienated individual will often try to encourage others to question government and civic engagement, leading to a downward spiral in political participation.

Causes for Political Abstention

Voting participation continues to decline each election year, and for many reasons. There are generally four modern areas of voting behavior: sociological, social-psychological, economic, and legal-institutional. One of the first works to give attention—albeit scant—to nonvoters was a 1924 work by Charles Merriam and Harold Gosnell. Much of the early work comes from sources whose primary purpose is to explore other phenomena. However, some early research did provide brief descriptions of characteristics common to nonvoters. The seminal work on voting behavior and nonvoters is the 1960 book by Angus Campbell and his colleagues titled The American Voter. This book was the first to present a comprehensive and organized theoretical schema, called the "funnel of causality," to describe voting behavior. Other important works on voting behavior include V. O. Key's (1949) Southern Politics in State and Nation, Lane's (1959) Political Life, Key's (1966) The Responsible Electorate, Verba and Nie's (1972) Participation in America, Milbrath and Goel's (1977) Political Participation, and Piven and Cloward's (1988) Why American's Don't Vote.

The first book to turn the focus of voting research from sociological characteristics to psychological influences was Campbell, Guerin, and Miller's 1954 book, The Voter Decides. In addition, one of the more refreshing earlier studies was written by Arthur Hadley in his 1978 book The Empty Polling Booth. This book was the first source to divide nonvoters into differing attitudinal subgroups.

One of the most frequently mentioned reasons that people do not vote is that Americans feel unempowered. Common reasons for nonvoting are apathy and the feeling that politics is not important. Other reasons offered for political abstention are the following: media reliance, negative political advertisements, past political experiences, the decline of political parties, the absence of a working-class party, the complicated voting system, the increased mobility of citizens, fraying social bonds, and the current state of economic affairs. On the whole, studies reveal that nonvoters tend to be younger, more mobile, have less of an education and income, are less partisan, and less politically involved.

Aside from demographic characteristics of nonvoters, several alternative factors contribute to a lack of political participation. These other voting influences—including economic, psychological, institutional, and cultural—vary from citizen apathy to voter confusion to governmental anger. Specifically, parental, school, and party affiliation, as well as political knowledge, political efficacy, and civic duty are all common psychological influences cited as related to voting behavior. Institutional attributes affecting voter behavior include governmental influences (e.g., registration requirements, electoral process, campaign finance system, bureaucratic nature of government), mass media influences, and campaign influences (e.g., campaign style, competitiveness of election). Cultural influences are often credited with affecting voting intentions as well.

Methods for Increasing Political Engagement

More Communication Between Populace and Politicians

There are steps that can be taken to increase political participation. Countless studies recommend communicating the importance of voting to the citizenry and educating the populace on how politics affects their everyday lives. The more education people have about politics, the more likely it is that they will participate in civic affairs. The widespread belief of a symbiotic relationship between education and civic engagement has been held among political scientists since at least the end of World War II. In 1995, three distinguished scholars—Sidney Verba, Kay Lehman Scholozman, and Henry E. Brady—provided convincing empirical evidence for this belief in their book Voice and Equality: Civic Volunteerism in American Politics. They surveyed some 15,000 individuals and conducted 2,500 personal interviews as the basis for their analyses of why Americans become political engaged.

These studies confirm that there is—specifically—a need for students to receive more education on issues of civic education and political science. High school and college teachers must spend more time and do a better job of discussing how the political process works, the difference between the political parties, the nature of political campaigns, and the importance of political participation in a representative democracy. Furthermore, the addition of civic instructional tools—mock classroom simulations of the political system, government internships, community volunteerism, in-class debates—serve to educate students on the value of political knowledge and participation.

Education increases one's knowledge of civic affairs, but it also provides individuals with bureaucratic experiences—two ingredients that mobilize voter participation. Moreover, studies conducted by the Ohio Department of Education in the late 1980s concluded that high school teachers—not mass media, campaign literature, or peers—are the most effective in encouraging voter registration and participation among youth.

For people not in school, successful efforts for engagement include voter education, registration, and participation drives. An effective method for reaching these citizens is though coordinated efforts with employment and training centers. Action on the part of American businesses—both large and small—as well as community-based activist groups can help rectify lack of voter participation. Organizations that have implemented voter registration, voter education, and get-out-the-vote efforts among their employees and/or customers have seen an increase in political participation as a result.

More Contact Between Populace and Politicians

In addition to greater education about how politics affects the average citizens, more contact between the citizenry and politicians has proven to increase political efficacy and therefore participation. Research shows that citizens value getting to know their government officials and want to interact with them. As such, community meetings, political discussions, debates, and town hall meetings are all examples of methods for increasing connections between the citizens and government. Studies also confirm the strong influence of personal contact on voting. One-on-one contact stimulates interest and provides communication about political affairs that, in turn, increases the probability of voting. The more communication modalities are used to inform and motivate the populace, the greater the likelihood of political participation.

Reform Electoral Process

Changes can also be made in the electoral process to increase political participation. Moving polls to more convenient locations and extending the polling hours are two approaches. Other options for stimulating participation include an easier registration process, same-day registration, and weekend voting. The advent of innovative technology has also heralded the call for touch-screen voting, voting via phone, and Internet voting, for example.

Scott Wells

See also Political Disaffection; Political Efficacy; Political Involvement; Political Knowledge; Voter Behavior

Further Readings

Avey, M. J. (1989). The demobilization of American voters: A comprehensive theory of voter turnout. New York: Greenwood.

Campbell, A., Converse, P. E., Miller, W. E., & Stokes, D. E. (1960). The American voter. New York: Wiley.

Checkoway, B., & Van Tsi, J. (1978). What do we know about citizen participation? A selective review of research. In S. Langton (Ed.), Citizen participation in America (pp. 19–35). Lexington, MA: Lexington Books.

Doppelt, J. C., & Shearer, E. (1999). Nonvoters: America's no-shows. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Johnson, T. J., Hays, C. E., & Hays, S. P. (1998). Engaging the public: How government and the media can reinvigorate American democracy. Boulder, CO: Rowman & Littlefield.

Milbrath, L. W., & Goel, M. L. (1977). Political participation: How and why do people get involved in politics? (2nd ed.). Chicago: Rand McNally College Publishing.

Piven, F. F., & Cloward, R. A. (2000). Why Americans still don't vote: And why politicians want it that way. Boston: Beacon Press.

Putnam, R. D. (2000). Bowling alone: The collapse and revival of American community. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Shearer, E., Morris, D. L., & Doppelt, J. (1998). No-show 96: Americans who do not vote. In T. J. Johnson, C. E. Hays, & S. P. Hays (Eds.), Engaging the public: How government and the media can reinvigorate the American democracy (pp. 17–28). Boulder, CO: Rowman & Littlefield.

Teixeira, R. A. (1992). The disappearing American voter. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

Teixeira, R. (1999). Voter turnout in America: Ten myths? In B. Miroff, R. Seidelman, & T. Swanstrom (Eds.), Debating democracy: A reader in American politics (2nd ed., pp. 181–186). New York: Houghton Mifflin.

POLITICAL INFORMATION

See POLITICAL KNOWLEDGE

POLITICAL INFORMATION EFFICACY

Political information efficacy is a concept that describes the extent to which individuals have sufficient confidence in their level of political information or knowledge to participate in the political process. The concept is closely linked to political efficacy, particularly internal political efficacy or feelings of political power or worth for engaging in politics.

Political scientists and sociologists have long hypothesized that those with low feelings of political efficacy, who feel they can do little to influence the political process, are less likely to participate in politics and often do not exercise their right to vote.

Political information efficacy was first proposed by Kaid, McKinney, and Tedesco, who found that young voters are more likely than their older cohorts to feel they are not sufficiently well informed to vote or participate in politics. In fact, many studies have validated a real concern about the low levels of political knowledge among young voters. Young voters often attribute their lack of political involvement to feeling inadequately informed. Strong gender differences are also apparent in political information efficacy. Young females appear to have significantly lower levels of political information efficacy than their male counterparts.

Research has also concluded that certain types of information exposure can increase a young citizen's level of information efficacy. For instance, young voters who are exposed to political advertising and debates during presidential campaigns exhibit higher levels of political information efficacy, which in turn leads to increased likelihood of voting.

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Political Efficacy; Voter Behavior

Further Readings

Kaid, L. L., McKinney, M. S., & Tedesco, J. C. (2000). Civic dialogue in the 1996 presidential campaign: Candidate, media, and public voices. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press.

Kaid, L. L., McKinney, M. S., & Tedesco, J. C. (in press). Political information efficacy theory and young voters. American Behavioral Scientist.

Kaid, L. L., & Postelnicu, M. (2005). Political advertising in the 2004 election: Comparison of traditional television and Internet messages. American Behavioral Scientist, 49(2), 265–278.

Niemi, R. G., Craig, S. C., & Mattei, F. (1991). Measuring internal political efficacy in the 1988 National Election Study. American Political Science Review, 85, 1407–1413.

Trammell, K. D., & Kaid, L. L. (in press). Stealth soapboxes: Political information efficacy, cynicism, and uses of celebrity Weblogs among readers. New Media & Society.

Political Information Processing

Political information processing focuses on human thoughts, emotions, and behaviors as they relate to political communication. It evaluates messages and cognitive processes on the part of recipients and considers how governments, politicians, or administrators frame and construct media messages to influence the attitudes, beliefs, and opinions of voters. It focuses on the outcomes of such message frames as they relate to the construction of social reality. Thus, political information processing theory draws on social cognition research in an attempt to explain how and why political messages influence people in various ways.

Research on political attitude, belief, or opinion formation initially employed the stimulus-response (SR) approach to predict political behavior. The causal ingredients influencing voter decisions in the SR model include factors such as partisanship (e.g., party affiliation), personal relevance of an issue, or the character attributes of the candidate. However, the model does not explain how citizens use these ingredients in political information processing. To understand how and why people behave as they do requires the use of the stimulus-organism-response (SOR) model to explain both political thinking and behavioral patterns like voting. To do so, the SOR model uses basic information processing theory to assess how political messages attract attention, are selected and interpreted by audience members, and then matched with schemas drawn from memory. Thus, political information processing theory goes beyond predicting political behavior to explaining how and why political communication influences cognitions, emotions, and behaviors of voters.

In this entry, a general model of information processing is first introduced. Then, the model is interpreted to explain the processes associated with political information processing.

Media Effects in Political Communication Research

Communication theorists have identified four paradigms during the past 100 years that have led to the evolution of contemporary information processing theory. The first part of the 20th century was a time during which SR theory dominated thinking about media effects. The media were believed to have strong or powerful effects on attitudes, opinions, and beliefs of audience members. This is because effective propaganda campaigns during World War I demonstrated that media could shift public opinion. A paradigm shift came about in the 1960s with the publication of a volume titled The Effects of Mass Communication. Sociologist Joseph Klapper considered all of the research on media effects, including a large body of research on political campaigns conducted at Columbia University. He concluded that when media do have powerful effects, it is a departure from the norm, because media primarily serve to reinforce rather than shape ideas or beliefs. Although the limited effects model took into account the content of the message, how the message is structured, and the knowledge, attitudes, beliefs, and predispositions of an individual, it did not sufficiently acknowledge individual differences among audience members, nor did it adequately consider the importance of selective processes, including exposure, perception, and recall.

Researchers in the 1970s leveled sharp criticisms against the limited effects model, arguing that it presented an overly simplistic view of the complex interaction among the media, information presented, and the audience members. Using new and wide-ranging social scientific methodologies, theorists and researchers began to demonstrate that while the media may not be all-powerful in altering public opinion and beliefs, the media can have significant effects under certain circumstances. To understand the true relationship, they argued, one must consider how people psychologically interact with media, signaling a shift to the SOR model. Pioneering research of the 1960s and 1970s also marked a shift to the third paradigm, in which mass communication theory would now focus on both messages and audience members to understand how they interact. Among the streams of research to emerge were cultivation analysis, the knowledge gap hypothesis, agenda setting, the spiral of silence, media uses and gratifications, priming, and framing.

1. Cultivation analysis. In a series of reports developed from the Cultural Indicators Project, George Gerbner and his associates argued in 1969 that exposure to televised violence and crime over time might lead to false perceptions of the world, disregard for pain and suffering of televised victims (i.e., desensitization), and the likelihood that perceptions of a mean world might be amplified for individuals living in high crime areas.

2. Knowledge gap. Phillip J. Tichenor, George A. Donohue, and Clarice N. Olien introduced the knowledge gap hypothesis in 1970, suggesting that individuals with higher levels of education are better able to process and understand news than are those individuals with less education. This phenomenon, they argued, had the potential of widening the divide between the information rich and poor based on educational level and social class.

3. Agenda setting. Maxwell McCombs and Donald Shaw introduced the agenda-setting research tradition in 1972. Agenda-setting research is based on the notion that the media control the agenda by selecting certain broad issue topics for prominent coverage, and this leads audience members to judge these issues to be more important than other issues. The researchers demonstrated that while newspaper reports may not be particularly influential in telling what to think, they can spotlight certain issues, thereby causing people to think about them.

4. Spiral of silence. In 1974, Elisabeth Noelle-Neumann introduced the spiral of silence, which suggested that people may be silenced when media messages about public issues are at odds with their own beliefs, even if they actually hold the majority opinion.

5. Media uses and gratifications. A wide range of scholars of communication researchers began looking into the psychological rewards of media usage (i.e., entertainment, surveillance, and social utility), leading to a compilation of reports in a volume edited by Jay G. Blumler and Elihu Katz in 1974 titled The Uses of Mass Communication.

6. Media priming. Priming studies appeared in the late 1970s to study person perception, stereotyping, and attitude activation. Priming procedures involve exposing participants to some stimulus to assess what associated memories might be drawn from memory. Although the first priming studies were conducted by psychologists, communication scholars quickly discovered the utility in assessing whether repeated exposure to information or recently encountered information dictates which memories are accessed by audience members.

7. Media framing. Framing research evaluates how journalists organize the world, thereby enabling audience members to understand news and events.

Each of these approaches argued from differing perspectives that media must have effects and that consideration of the underlying cognitive processes are essential to understand the impact of media on individuals and ultimately society. These complimentary research traditions led to accelerated collaboration among scholars of communication, political science, sociology, and psychology, leading in the 1980s to the fourth paradigm, known as “cognitive revolution.” The cognitive revolution expanded the boundaries of political communication research to ask what people do with media information along with focusing on how people might be influenced by media messages.

Before proceeding, it is important to mention that the notion of messages and individuals interacting was being considered long before the 1970s. As early as 1922, journalist Walter Lippmann wrote that people are all captives of the “pictures in their heads,” explaining that in the “buzzing confusion of the outer world, we pick out what our culture has already defined for us, and we tend to perceive that which we have picked out in the form stereotyped for us by our culture.” In other words, human beings tend to process information in the context of previously stored knowledge for the purpose of reinforcing beliefs and stereotypes.

Lippmann also explained that the selective portrayal of the world by the newspapers of the 1920s contributed to the construction of social reality by spotlighting certain news items while ignoring others. He wrote that issues that “obtrude,” tend to attract the attention of the news media, and these obtruding issues present themselves in the forms of hurricanes, earthquakes, fires, and other natural disasters, economic downturns, and political elections, upheaval, or scandals. Thus, although the research of the 1970s and 1980s has generally been accepted as the time period during which the true conversion from the SR to the SOR model occurred, some of the theoretical bedrock upon which these ideas were built can be traced to the early part of the 20th century.

Building a Theory of Political Information Processing

Audience Interpretation Processes

Information processing theory is essentially an amalgam of theories that explain how people perceive symbols, images, and sounds and then convert them into mental representations. It concerns the relationship among attention, encoding, information selection, schema activation, information retrieval, and information storage in memory.

Journalists and editors decide what news content to present through media channels. Once exposed to such messages, audience members initiate procedures that will lead to information processing. Information processing models begin with two assumptions. First, people are active information processors because they can use stimuli to build upon existing knowledge that may lead to changes in attitudes, opinions, and beliefs. The active audience denotes emotional, intellectual, and/or cognitive engagement with the message. Second, people have a limited and fixed pool of mental resources available to them, and may hit a threshold at which they are not capable of dealing with more sensory input. Audience members are assumed to be adept at filtering out information that is perceived as dull, irrelevant, or unimportant and focusing most on important information. Media messages that successfully engage an individual will produce a search in which she or he attempts to match the new information with knowledge stored in memory. Connections are made between the symbols, words, sounds, or images that enter the senses and the information stored in knowledge structures known as "schemas."

The Memory System and Automatic and Controlled Information Processing

The memory system is a critical element of information processing as it guides the interpretation of newly encountered information. This system contains three parts—the long-term system that stores accumulated knowledge, the short-term system that represents consciousness (i.e., all of the stimuli processed by the senses), and the working memory, which integrates new information with stored knowledge. Stimuli enter the memory system through receptors such as the eyes, ears, nose, mouth, or skin. Stimuli perceived as unimportant or irrelevant will be filtered; meaning only a fraction of the media messages encountered will make it into the short-term or active working memory. However, information that is deemed important or interesting will be extracted and linked with existing knowledge to be stored in the long-term memory.

Shiffrin and Schenider explain that automatic (unintentional) and controlled (intentional) processes guide the information selection processes. Controlled information processing occurs when people consciously decide to pay attention to a message. Motivation to learn will cause people to focus intently on new information. Automatic processes are unintentional, involuntary, effortless, autonomous, and outside awareness. Arousing content increases the resources needed to process information, shifting attention more in the direction of controlled processing. Therefore, political news that presents novel, surprising, and emotional content may enhance information processing.

Schemas

People use schemas for ease of information processing. A schema is defined as a cognitive structure that includes knowledge about a concept, person, or event. Schemas enable people to encode stimuli, they provide context from memory for new information, and they enable people to infer when information is incomplete or missing. They also enable people to use information quickly in ordinary human interactions, and they assist in making judgments. Information can summon one or more schemas from the long-term memory. When new information joins with an existing schema in the working memory, the modified knowledge structure will become more complex. For example, ongoing reporting on the inability of Israel and neighboring states to find ways of living in harmony may strengthen the "peace in the Middle East is unobtainable" schema. Schemas are strengthened by the addition of new related information, and associations between related schemata will be strengthened as individuals evaluate information over time, making the linkages more explicit.

Integration of new information and information stored in schemas takes place in working memory. Complex or recently activated schemas tend to be more accessible because the pathways between the working and the long-term are better defined and developed. Therefore, media attention to political issues, or the decision on the part of audience members to seek political information, will lead to the acquisition of new knowledge and the strengthening of schemas.

Influences on Political Information Processing

The primary media variables influencing information processing are message content and structure. Other considerations include the agenda-setting function of media, message priming and framing, labeling cues, party affiliation, candidates, issues, political sophistication of the audience member, motivation to learn, and the influence of opinion leaders.

Media Content and Structure

The interaction between structure and content can produce effects that may engage viewers. Content is selected by gatekeepers who set the media agenda and who choose content that will be offered to the public. Repeated coverage of scandals in the Clinton White House had the effect of cognitively linking the former popular president with less than flattering concepts such as adulterer and liar. Political advertisements produced on behalf of a candidate might include a hopeful message illustrated with colorful patriotic images and inspiring music, whereas an ad produced to attack the record of an opponent might feature gray tones, along with images of illicit drugs and police activity, placed over a somber narrative. Hence, the interaction between message content and structure may influence the degree to which people attend to, process, and store media content.

Agenda Setting, Priming, and Framing

As noted previously, agenda setting is a process wherein the media focus attention on an issue. Primes are messages or symbols that activate a concept, which for a period of time increases the likelihood that the concept, and related thoughts and memories connected with it, will come to mind again. Message framing is a mechanism by which journalists or editors employ a central organizing principle that holds together and gives coherence and meaning to a diverse array of symbols in news reports.

Gitlin, Goffman, and others argued in the 1970s and 1980s that frames fit nicely with the concepts of agenda setting and priming. However, the concepts are quite distinct. Agenda-setting attempts to show how mass media cues contribute to perceptions of issue salience on the part of the public. Priming research attempts to show how media coverage may influence judgments that people may have about political issues. Thus, studies testing priming effects evaluate agenda setting as the independent variable and priming effects as the dependent variable.

Message framing can have a significant impact on how information is used. News messages may be framed as either episodic or thematic frames. Episodic framing is normally event-oriented coverage of breaking news stories, while thematic frames provide background and perspective on public issues. Political leaders also have an important role in the message-framing process. Various presidential administrations took advantage of the "Cold War frame" that developed after World War II, in which good (i.e., democracy) must triumph over evil (i.e., communism). Such framing produces rally effects that strengthen support for presidents and other elected officials. The administration of President George W. Bush initially framed the 2003 invasion of Iraq as a defensive measure to protect the United States against weapons of mass destruction. But as it became clear that Iraq no longer possessed such weapons, the rhetoric changed to freeing an oppressed people, bringing democracy to the Middle East, punishing a dictator for past deeds, and maintaining the war on terrorism.

Parties, Candidates, and Issues

Party affiliation is perhaps the most important ideological signal sent to voters, because certain issues have been claimed by parties, providing voters with cues on how to vote. Republicans, for example, have traditionally presented themselves as fiscal conservatives but willing to spend to maintain a strong defense. Democrats, by contrast, have historically stressed social welfare issues. Therefore, party affiliation acts as a cue to voters that can in turn guide voting behavior.

Candidates and issues are often inextricably bound. Candidates often try to avoid hot-button issues like abortion or gay marriage, fearing that taking a stance will undermine their aspirations for public office. But emotionally charged issues such as these can cause voters to cast votes for candidate of an opposing party if the candidate from their party is not perceived as properly aligned with the position of the voter. The outcome of hotly contested presidential, congressional, or gubernatorial races may also be influenced by other variables associated with both cognitive and emotional information supplied by the media, or by the candidates themselves. Therefore, in most elections, citizens vote for candidates who will best represent their positions when policy issues are up for debate. This also explains why candidates like to align themselves with safe issues support for education or holding the line on taxes.

Issues also have an impact on voting behavior. Mueller explained in 1994 that in garnering support for the 1991 Gulf War, former President George H. W. Bush stressed in January of that year the need to defeat aggression, uphold international law, restore sovereignty to Kuwait, and protect access to Middle Eastern oil. Immediately prior to the war, polls showed public support for those goals stood at 70%. Despite the fact that all of these objectives were met, 52% of the public thought the war had not been worth the cost just weeks after the fighting had come to an end. By June, only 8% of those polled thought the war had been worth the cost.

Scholars explain while the 1991 Gulf War may have achieved the stated objectives, public expectations were not, and this became an issue in the November election. Voters expected that the war would end with the toppling of the government of Saddam Hussein. When this did not occur, the approval ratings of President Bush fell, and he was subsequently defeated by Bill Clinton in the election in November 1992. Hurst believes that the approval rating of President George W. Bush also fell in the years following the 2003 Gulf War because public expectations had not been met. Although the regime of Saddam Hussein had been toppled, U.S. troops remained in high numbers as sectarian fighting continued to escalate in Iraq and the country appeared destined to enter a civil war.

Level of Political Sophistication and Motivation to Learn

Individuals with higher levels of interest in politics are more motivated to evaluate implications of political communication than their less politically sophisticated counterparts. Furthermore, political sophisticates draw more upon well-developed schemas to evaluate incoming information. Therefore, their evaluations should occur throughout the course of thinking about political information and will involve both matching consistent information while noticing inconsistent information. For example, a political sophisticate might carefully consider that a conservative Republican is against abortion (consistent) but in favor of gay marriage (inconsistent) and arrive at conclusions about the candidate that might explain anomalies. The political novice, by contrast, would focus primarily on the consistent information and ignore the inconsistent information.

Fiske, Kinder, and Larter have shown that level of expertise in politics (i.e., political sophisticates or experts versus novices) influences political information processing. Individuals who are politically sophisticated are more likely to use both consistent and inconsistent information when evaluating new information. Their less politically astute counterparts would be expected to employ labeling cues such as party affiliation, information consistent with expectations, and the most recently encountered information. People become more motivated to learn more about political issues and candidates as their level of sophistication increases. Political novices tend to rely on cues such as party affiliation or liberal or conservative leanings as a baseline for making judgments about candidates for elective office.

Media or Opinion Leader Attention

Heavy coverage of candidates or reporting on issues influences the degree to which, and how, audiences will process political information. When public policy concerns dominate center stage in national political debates, then, in the agenda-setting tradition, people may think more about these issues. Following the 2001 terrorist attacks that destroyed the World Trade Center and damaged the Pentagon, public approval favored President George W. Bush in efforts to dislodge the Taliban from power in Afghanistan. Media coverage generally focused on the need to stop the forces that threatened the United States. However, public opinion gradually shifted away from Bush when the war with Iraq failed to conclude in a timely fashion, and when it became clear that some of the arguments given for going to war were flawed.

Political elites may also serve as opinion leaders who can influence potency of media messages about political candidates and issues. They understand both the obvious aspects of political issues along with more subtle nuances. For example, the popular CBS News anchorman Walter Cronkite concluded a special report on February 27, 1968, on the Tet Offensive during the Vietnam War, stating he believed that the war was unwinnable and that the United States must find a way to withdraw. A month later President Lyndon Johnson addressed the nation and announced that he had decided not to run for reelection and said that he was looking for a way to end the war. Although many factors may have contributed to public disillusionment with Johnson, author David Halberstam wrote that it was the first time in American history a war had been declared over by an anchorman.

Conclusion

Political information processing is an important domain for scholars of communication and political science. But to understand how political messages are processed requires an understanding of the characteristics of the message (stimulus), the receiver (organism), and the outcome or result (response). Thus, audience members are assumed to be active participants in the communication process. However, level of participation is dependent upon quite a few factors.

First, audience members use filtering processes to determine whether they should invest cognitive effort in evaluating political messages. Therefore, message content and structure will dictate whether messages are noticed and deemed important in the first place. Messages perceived as personally relevant are processed more readily and easily than are messages perceived as less relevant. Thus, a news report containing information about a property tax proposed by the mayor will attract the attention of the homeowner, while the announcement of plans to reinstate the military draft may catch the eye of the college student.

Structure will also influence processing as messages constructed to gain the attention of the overall audience (or specific identifiable audience segments) may employ devices that get and hold the attention of audience members. Political advertising in particular employs structural techniques to manipulate emotions and portray candidates in a favorable light while presenting opponents as ill informed, hypocritical, or even sinister. Therefore, production variables are capable of influencing how messages are encoded and ultimately stored in memory.

Second, the agenda-setting function of media, priming, and framing are crucial elements in political information processing. Heightened coverage of issues by media cause audience members to think about them more often than issues that received less coverage. Because individuals invest more time thinking about these issues, they are more easily primed when new information is encountered. And, like message structure, media framing techniques are capable of influencing how messages are encoded and integrated with previously held knowledge.

Third, cognitive devices will determine how much attention and effort is invested in processing messages. These processes may be either automatic or controlled depending upon the perceived importance or personal relevance of the information. Automatic processing is relatively effortless, while controlled processing involves focusing closely on message content and assimilating the information into existing knowledge structures known as schemas.

Fourth, schemas guide political information processing. Schematic structures place new political information in an existing field of meaning, thereby strengthening and enhancing the original schema. However, schemas are also used heuristically in the process of interpreting political information. Labels such as Democrat or conservative can prime related concepts and enable individuals to infer attributes or qualities to candidates. Schemas also enable audience members to infer issue relevance. Upon hearing that the local city council is discussing building a new waste treatment plant, a homeowner may immediately infer that taxes are bound to go up.

Fifth, individual characteristics that influence political information processing include level of political sophistication or expertise and motivation to learn. Motivation to learn can be rooted in self-interest (e.g., the draft or taxes) or it may be a function of intellectual curiosity. As knowledge gap research has suggested, more educated audience members stand a better chance of learning from political information. Political sophistication denotes higher levels of political knowledge, which predicts more rapid encoding of messages, more focused ease in categorizing, and better recall of political information. Political sophisticates are also more adept at spotting schema inconsistent information as would be the case if a newcomer running for Senate on the Republican ticket favored gay marriage, a woman's right to choose, or increasing the federal income tax to provide more support for social welfare programs. Thus, the politically sophisticated are better equipped and more motivated to analyze and evaluate political information.

Finally, media attention and political elites may influence political information processing. While scholars are in agreement that media messages rarely are successful in telling people what to think, spotlighting certain issues offers cues on what to think about. As media focus more on certain issues or candidates, people may be induced to invest more cognitive effort thinking about them.

Political information processing is based on the theoretical assumptions that guide all information processing models. However, such political communication models take into account specific variables such as personal relevance, level of expertise, motivation to learn, and the impact of political elites on members of the audience. Thus, it exports communication, political science, and psychological theory and applies these theories to real-world settings. Such ways of considering political information can be especially fruitful in understanding what guides shifts in public opinions or why oratory from one candidate may resonate with voters while seemingly important perspectives from an opponent may fall short. Therefore, understanding the relationship between information selection, attention, encoding, schema activation, information retrieval, and storage in memory may help understand how and why people arrive at the political positions, beliefs, and understandings that they do.

Robert H. Wicks

See also Agenda Setting; Cultivation Theory; Framing; Knowledge Gap; Limited Effects Theory; Lippmann, Walter; Priming; Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory; Spiral of Silence; Uses and Gratifications Approach

Further Readings

Blumler, J. G., & Katz, E. (1974). The uses of mass communications: Current perspectives on gratifications research. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Fiske, S. T., Kinder, D. R., & Larter, M. (1986). The novice and the expert: Knowledge-based strategies in political cognition. Journal of Experimental Social Psychology, 19, 381–400.

Gerbner, G., Gross, L., Morgan, M., Signorielli, N., & Shanahan, J. (2002). Growing up with television: Cultivation processes. In J. Bryant & D. Zillmann (Eds.), Media effects: Advances in theory and practice (pp. 43–67). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Gitlin, T. (1980). The whole world is watching: Mass media in the making and unmaking of the New Left. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Goffman, E. (1974). Frame analysis: An essay on the organization of experience. New York: Harper & Row.

Halberstam, D. (1965). The making of a quagmire. New York: Random House.

Hurst, S. (2004). The rhetorical strategy of George H. W. Bush during the Persian Gulf Crisis 1990–91: How to help lose a war you won. Political Studies, 52, 376–392.

Iyengar, S. (1991). Is anyone responsible? How television frames political issues. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Klapper, J. T. (1960). The effects of mass communication. New York: Free Press.

Lippmann, W. (1922). Public opinion. New York: Macmillan.

McCombs, M. E., & Shaw, D. L. (1972). The agenda-setting function of mass media. Public Opinion Quarterly, 36, 176–187.

Mueller, J. (1994). American public opinion and the Gulf War. In S. A. Renshon (Ed.), The political psychology of the Gulf War: Leaders, politics and the process of conflict (pp. 199–226). Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press.

Noelle-Neumann, E. (1984). The spiral of silence—Our social skin. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Norris, P., Kern, M., & Just, M. (2003). Framing terrorism: The news media, the government and the public. London: Routledge.

Potter, W. J. (2004). Theory of media literacy: A cognitive approach. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Rosengren, K. E., Wenner, L. A., & Palmgreen, P. (1985). Media gratifications research: Current perspectives. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Schneider, W., & Shiffrin, R. M. (1977). Controlled and automatic human information processing: 1. Detection, search, and attention. Psychological Review, 84, 1–66.

Tichenor, P. J., Donohue, G. A., & Olien, C. N. (1970). Mass media flow and differential growth in knowledge. Public Opinion Quarterly, 34, 159–170.

Wicks, R. H. (1992). Schema theory and measurement in mass communication research: Theoretical and methodological issues in news information processing. In S. Deetz (Ed.), Communication Yearbook 15 (pp. 115–145). Newbury Park, CA: Sage.

Wicks, R. H. (2005). Message framing and constructing meaning: An emerging paradigm in mass communication research. In P. J. Kalbfleisch (Ed.), Communication Yearbook 29 (pp. 333–360). Mahwah, NJ: Erlbaum.

Political Involvement

Political involvement, sometimes referred to as "engagement" or "interest in public affairs," is of potentially great importance in political decision making because of its relationship to media use, learning about elections and issues, and public affairs participation. Research indicates that citizens who are high in political involvement are active information seekers who purposefully use media to learn about candidates, campaigns, and public affairs issues. Unfortunately, scholars in different disciplines, including political science, psychology, advertising/consumer behavior, and communication, have used the term involvement to refer to somewhat different but related constructs. In fact, even scholars within the same discipline sometimes have conceptualized involvement differently, occasionally relying on quite different questions and/or procedures to measure involvement. As a result, involvement commonly lacks definitional and operational clarity, and research results concerning this construct can be confusing or may even appear contradictory.

In early political communication research, scholars identified political involvement with general political interest, as well as with interest in the outcomes of specific elections. As researchers further developed the construct, they suggested that involvement represented a psychological trait reflected in citizens' concern for public affairs outcomes and associated with political efficacy and a sense of public duty. Currently in political communication, social scientists commonly treat involvement as a characteristic of an individual or as a characteristic of an event or other external stimulus. Scholars also recognize that these two manifestations of involvement work together. As a personal characteristic, scholars typically associate involvement with an individual's continuing, long-term interest in public affairs. In this instance, social scientists typically call such involvement "enduring." This form of involvement refers to the strength of a preexisting relationship that individuals perceive between themselves and an issue, event, or other stimulus. This form of involvement produces a long-term, internal motivational state that contributes to greater message attention and systematic and purposeful media use among individuals as they seek information related to the object of their involvement.

When social scientists conceive of involvement as a characteristic of an event or stimulus, they typically focus on the heightened relevance of an event or other stimulus to an individual. In this instance, major events such as presidential elections or controversial public referenda typically stimulate citizens' involvement in public affairs on a transitory basis as they respond to the circumstances at hand. Political communication scholars commonly refer to this as "situational" political involvement and associate it with a temporary increase in perceived relevance or a heightened interest in a short-term outcome. This form of involvement is short-lived. As circumstances or events change, an individual's situational involvement ceases to exist at a high level, although it may manifest itself again during similar circumstances or events.

Involvement and Political Decision Making

Whether situational or enduring, involvement is especially important in political decision making because of its potential to act as a moderating variable, activating enhanced media use and learning among citizens. Citizens' experiences with mediated political campaigns and related news stories have the potential to significantly affect their political decision making. Some scholars and political observers have raised concerns that superficial, image-oriented political campaigns, negative campaign tactics, and news coverage focusing on candidates' standing in the polls rather than issues of substance have resulted in a high degree of political disaffection. These scholars suggest that media and political campaigns serve to distance citizens from the political process, many of whom ignore even the most basic forms of political participation. When citizens are highly involved with public affairs, however, research indicates that they are more likely to use the media to learn about public affairs and to engage in informed public affairs participation.

Involvement and Media Use

Research is clear in demonstrating a strong association between involvement and an individual's active use of information sources. Models of information processing that account for the role of involvement in information source use provide a constructive basis from which to understand its relationship to media use. These models generally indicate that in instances of low involvement, individuals are unlikely to seek out and thoughtfully consider information. Instead, information source use is likely to be limited and individuals are more likely to engage in a heuristic decision-making process.

When citizens are more highly involved, however, they are motivated to actively seek information relevant to their decision-making task and to systematically consider the merits of the information they obtain. Research results indicate that citizens who are involved in public affairs engage in active, purposeful information seeking using a variety of information sources ranging from newspapers to new technologies. Under these circumstances, individuals dedicate greater attention and cognitive effort to the consideration of relevant messages. This process reflects a classic learning hierarchy in which an individual engages in a purposeful information search that leads to knowledge gain and then behavior. As a result of this process, the attitudes of highly involved citizens are likely to emerge as logical outgrowths of knowledge and are more likely to be reliable predictors of behavior.

Involvement and Efficacy

Social cognitive theory suggests that citizens have the potential to develop long-term involvement through positive experiences that contribute to their development of self-efficacy, the perception that their political participation makes a difference. As people develop interests and experience rewards, they are likely to continue to practice activities that contribute to their sense of fulfillment within a specific context such as public affairs. In a public affairs context, successful citizen participation is likely to contribute to enhanced levels of individual involvement. As citizens grow in involvement, they gain knowledge and expertise and develop still greater efficacy.

Efficacy and involvement appear to enjoy a bidirectional, co-supportive relationship in political decision making in that some level of efficacy is necessary to build involvement even as involvement contributes to greater levels of efficacy. When citizens lack efficacy they are more likely to become disaffected and refuse to invest themselves in a political system they view as corrupt and unresponsive. When people believe they can make a difference, however, even if they are angry or frustrated, they are more likely to involve themselves in the political process and work for what they perceive as positive change. Citizens are likely to develop greater involvement in public affairs to the extent that they acquire expertise and experience rewards. In this instance, efficacy contributes to higher levels of involvement even as involvement helps to strengthen efficacy. As an additional note, research indicates that self-efficacy is an important precursor to political participation, both on its own and by contributing to citizens' involvement.

Involvement and Cynicism

Scholars typically define cynicism as a lack of confidence in, or a feeling of distrust toward, public officials and institutions. Cynicism is one of the most frequently studied aspects of political disaffection because of its relationship to poor voter turnout and low public affairs media use. Cynical citizens distance themselves from the political process and generally are closed to sources of public affairs information. Scholars suggest that cynicism depletes citizens' involvement and efficacy by contributing to their belief that public affairs participation is ineffective and meaningless. Critics often blame the media for contributing to the public's cynicism, but the empirical evidence to support this claim is lacking.

Based on the process of media use and learning, cynicism and involvement manifest themselves in nearly opposite ways in political decision making and participation. While involved citizens engage in purposeful information source use and dedicate attention and cognitive effort to media messages they find useful, cynical citizens are less likely to use public affairs media in a meaningful way because they are uninvolved and distrustful of the political process.

Involvement and Apathy

When citizens are apathetic they are unwilling to invest themselves in even the most basic forms of political participation. Scholars have expressed concern that as citizens follow campaigns through the mass media, they may become discouraged when confronted with negative campaign tactics and news coverage largely focused on candidates' campaign techniques. As citizens grow in their frustration and disenchantment with the political process, they may fall into apathy and simply opt out of the public affairs participation altogether. In terms of the political decision-making process, it is useful to distinguish between skepticism and outright cynicism. Healthy skepticism is more likely to result in a critical but open approach to the media and public affairs process among citizens; cynicism reflects an unreceptive distrust of the political process and governmental institutions. While scholars commonly link cynicism to apathy, research indicates that cynicism and apathy are distinct constructs. Cynical citizens are distrustful of governmental and media institutions, while apathetic citizens are unwilling to invest themselves in even the most basic forms of political participation.

In terms of citizens' involvement in public affairs, research evidence indicates that involvement enjoys a negative association to both apathy and cynicism. When citizens are motivated to seek and consume public affairs information, enhanced civic engagement is a natural outcome of their involvement, and they are more likely to demonstrate informed public affairs participation.

Ultimately, citizens' involvement in public affairs is a critical aspect of their political decision making because of its motivational role in information seeking. While scholars have expressed concern regarding the detrimental role of negative campaign tactics and inadequate media coverage in citizens' development of political disaffection, research indicates that involved citizens purposefully use media to learn about candidates and public affairs issues. Involvement negatively associates with citizens' cynicism and apathy, which are linked to a failure to participate in the political process, and positively associates with citizens' information source use and learning, contributing to informed participation in the public affairs process.

Bruce Pinkleton

See also Horserace Coverage; Negative Advertising; Political Advertising; Political Disaffection; Political Efficacy; Political Engagement

Further Readings

Austin, E. W., & Pinkleton, B. E. (1999). The relation between media content evaluations and political disaffection. Mass Communication and Society, 3/4, 105–122.

Bandura, A. (1997). Self-efficacy: The exercise of control. New York: W. H. Freeman.

Cappella, J. N., & Jamieson, K. H. (1997). Spiral of cynicism: The press and the public good. New York: Oxford University Press.

Chaffee, S. H., & McLeod, J. M. (1973). Individual vs. social predictors of information-seeking. Journalism Quarterly, 50, 237–245.

Craig, S. C., Niemi, R. G., & Silver, G. E. (1990). Political efficacy and trust: A report on the NES pilot study items. Political Behavior, 12, 289–314.

Eulau, H., & Schneider, P. (1956). Dimensions of political involvement. Public Opinion Quarterly, 20, 128–142.

McDevitt, M., & Chaffee, S. (2002). From top-down to trickle-up influence: Revisiting assumptions about the family in political socialization. Political Communication, 19, 281–301.

Petty, R. E., & Cacioppo, J. T. (1986). Communication and persuasion: Central and peripheral routes to attitude change. New York: Springer-Verlag.

Pinkleton, B. E., & Austin, E. W. (2001). Individual motivations, perceived media importance, and political disaffection. Political Communication, 18, 321–334.

Pinkleton, B. E., & Austin, E. W. (2004). Media perceptions and public affairs apathy in the politically inexperienced. Mass Communication & Society, 7, 319–337.

Pinkleton, B. E., Austin, E. W., & Fortman, K. K. J. (1998). Relationships of media use and political disaffection to political efficacy and voting behavior. Journal of Broadcasting & Electronic Media, 42, 34–49.

Tan, A. S. (1980). Mass media use, issue knowledge and political involvement. Public Opinion Quarterly, 44, 241–248.

Zaichkowsky, J. L. (1986). Conceptualizing involvement. Journal of Advertising, 15, 4–34.

Political Knowledge

Political knowledge is considered to be among the most important determinants of citizens' competence to govern in a representative democracy. The concept is used to indicate anything in the broad spectrum from information awareness to confident understanding of politics that may enable citizens to vote, cast a vote that accurately reflects their views on important public issues, and engage in other activities that affect government. Classically, knowledge has been defined as a belief that can be justified as true. There are deep philosophical debates about whether only what is evident is true, as René Descartes (1596–1650) proposed, or true is any idea that is successfully used in action to solve problems, as John Dewey (1859–1952) suggested. Generally, the meaning of the concept emerges only from the practical purposes of its users. Therefore, in the American National Election Studies (ANES), the largest, most influential and widely used sample survey research project investigating voting behavior, political knowledge has been defined since the 1950s as the amount of information that citizens remember about various public figures and institutions. Specifically, during the 2004 U.S. presidential election, ANES asked citizens to identify the speaker of the House of Representatives, vice president of the United States, prime minister of England, chief justice of the Supreme Court, and majority parties in Congress.

The ANES definition implies three main assumptions about political knowledge. First, it is information useful for voting; second, it is dependent on media use; and third, it consists of discrete facts. Although empirical research over the past 50 years has consistently supported those assumptions and has shown that ANES questions measure what they measure quite well, the question still remains of the true nature or meaning of what is being measured. The starting point for explicating the concept of political knowledge is to ask questions that may broaden the ANES assumptions: What are the purposes for which democratic citizens use knowledge? What constitutes useful knowledge? What are the sources of useful knowledge?

Knowledge for Democracy

Democracy cannot exist without citizens' expressing their opinions on how their public life should be conducted. The struggle to have those opinions enacted, either by influencing public policies or by selecting the people who make those policies, is the core of all politics. What should people know to be able to participate meaningfully in democratic processes?

Scholars disagree about the standards of adequate knowledge that can be expected of competent and effective citizens. Traditionalists contend that tests asking citizens to know names of public officials, various rules of how government works, and substantive features of major public affairs issues capture the most general skills necessary for participating in democracy in the most simplified form—voting. The answers to such questions also indicate basic cognitive awareness and connectedness to the political process. Reformists argue that those tests are geared toward those who had learned civics through formal education, who have opportunities to put that knowledge in practice, and are largely irrelevant to the political activities of average citizens that are not reducible to voting. Different kinds of political activities require distinct resources that are differentially available to various groups of citizens. Although the ANES-type factual political knowledge is very important for voting, it is only modestly related to political discussion and time-based political acts such as community work, protesting, or contacting government officials. It is even less important for donating money. The tests also do not reflect what is currently known about how individuals process information and learn: citizens construct meanings dependent on the communication contexts rather than just store cold, hard, facts in their memories. Those processes help citizens understand what politics means to their lives rather than just show where their allegiances lie.

Scholars' interpretations of ANES results diverge depending on their approach to standards for adequate knowledge, both in terms of its type and extent. The fact that Americans can on average correctly answer half of the questions, and that about 10% of Americans cannot answer any, is taken as an indication of either ill-informed citizens undermining democracy or as an elitist understatement of the ability of moderately well-informed citizens to cope with the political tasks they face in their everyday lives. Average people who may score poorly on the ANES questions still display complex understanding of the roles that government performs in society and familiarity with major policy areas. Such findings suggest that individuals' political knowledge may be more domain specific than general. In further support, typical gender differences in political knowledge favoring men disappear or are reversed when the knowledge items deal with local issues related to schools and for issues of special relevance to women such as abortion and political rights.

Conceptually, the distinction between general and domain-specific knowledge also maps onto the epistemological differentiation between declarative knowledge (also called "propositional" or "descriptive") that is based on information that answers "what" questions contained in facts and concepts, and procedural knowledge that involves information about when and how to do something, or how to solve a problem. Procedural knowledge involves more senses, such as hands-on experiences, practices, and understanding of the limitations of a specific solution.

Media as a Source of Political Knowledge

The interest in and prominence of the concept of political knowledge in political communication research coincides with the so-called cognitive revolution in social psychology. Cognitions, defined as things that a person knows about himself and the environment, or as items of information, are considered to be central for explaining behavior. Gradually, within communication research the view emerged that the main role of media was in providing political information rather than directly changing individuals' attitudes and behaviors.

Education

The cognitive revolution also affected the research in political socialization that recognized the importance of formal education in promoting political knowledge toward the formation of an individual's sense of citizenship and political enlightenment. Acquisition of knowledge is particularly facilitated in classrooms that offer opportunities for open discussion of issues over emphasis on rote learning and patriotic rituals. In general, number of years of formal education completed is related to knowledge typically studied in the civic classes. Education may also affect knowledge about public affairs indirectly through its influence on political interest and efficacy that, in turn, stimulate current information seeking and perhaps provide a framework to understand new information. However, once the formal education is over, and civic knowledge that spells out the mechanics of government and politics has been acquired or perhaps forgotten, adults learn mostly from media about current issues and what happened to whom and why in politics. Without continuous learning from media, the effects of education on knowledge may be invisible.

Effects

Knowledge gain from media has been documented since the 1960s, and research has shown positive effects of exposure to news media independent of formal education, demographics, attitudinal factors, and cultural differences. Communication research in particular has emphasized the importance of distinguishing between use of different media and various types of content when knowledge gain is measured. Newspaper reading has a stronger positive effect on knowledge than does viewing of television news, whereas exposure to entertainment-based or "soft" news shows no effect or even a negative relationship with political knowledge. Political debates and media analyses following these debates are sources of issue information, whereas campaign advertisements show positive effects in campaigns when they do not confuse and misinform.

For identifying effects for media such as television where audience members are most often doing things other than focused learning, it is important to include the level of attention that the person pays to the content in addition to the extent of exposure. Research on effects of the Internet on political knowledge further emphasize the importance of what content is selected and how it is used. In general, when the Internet is used for search of political information and accessing campaign news it has positive effect on political knowledge. Users of the Internet are more likely to be consumers of newspapers and television news, suggesting that as a newest medium the Internet is not replacing traditional media but supplementing their information.

Equivalence

Although research has convincingly shown that media use contributes to informed citizenry, no less important to normative democratic theory is evidence that knowledge gain is relatively equivalent across major forms of stratification and differentiation in the society. Equality in receiving the benefits of democracy depends on equivalence of informed participation. To the extent that media convey knowledge essential to participation, it is important to achieve equivalence in both their use and effects. Equivalence in the levels of use means that the cost and effort of accessing the media is alike for all citizens, whereas identical quality or difficulty of available information is reflected in their equivalent effectiveness. Research has shown differences in both media use and knowledge gain between high and low social economic status groups and levels of education and age, suggesting the nonequivalence or gaps. In other words, media use increases the knowledge level for everyone, but certain types of media use such as newspaper reading and seeing information on the Internet disproportionately benefit those who already have advantages in their higher level of education and younger age and so perpetuates those inequalities. The use of the Internet and newspapers, two media that have shown effectiveness among less-educated citizens, will realize their potential for overcoming knowledge gaps only if their use could be widened in those groups.

Trends

Despite clear indications that individuals are gaining knowledge from media, those effects are not reflected in aggregate levels of political knowledge.

Americans are not more informed about politics than they were about half a century ago, despite the substantial increase in the population's education and communication opportunities. The stagnation of levels of political knowledge is accompanied by a decline in voter turnout and membership in political clubs, but also increases in the numbers of those contributing to political campaigns and contacting public officials. The public has maintained previous levels of interest in campaigns and public affairs. The over-time stability in political knowledge is attributed to "offsetting forces" among which changes in the quality and relevance of available political information in the mass media are of considerable importance.

Many voters feel that information they have is sufficient to make vote decisions, but many also are left uninspired. Many Americans who are not politically active think that they should take care of themselves and their families before they worry about their community and nation, and believe that important things in their lives have nothing to do with politics. Most simply, many Americans say that they do not have enough time for politics. Little knowledge of political information and low interest in politics are among the most serious detriments to citizen's participation. Therefore, availability and easy access to the information that stimulates interest are the keys to the puzzle of functional democracy.

Providing information about specific opportunities to act is the most direct and basic way in which media may have a mobilizing role. The public wants news that is connected to them and helpful to their lives. Among strictly political stories, only the outcome of presidential elections in 1996 has been followed closely by a majority of Americans, according to the list of most closely followed news stories of the past 2 decades. In 2005, only the impact of Hurricane Katrina and high gasoline prices peaked the interest of more than half of the American public. Even though less obvious and stately, politics contained in those stories may be more meaningful to ordinary citizens. It is politics in which power is found in identities, relationships, and cultural practices that make government workings more transparent and relevant to daily lives. Audiences' perceived aversion to serious stories is a myth. More people complain that news is too superficial and sensational than fault it for being boring or opinionated.

Over recent decades, knowledge gain from both television and newspaper campaign coverage declined despite the stability of both how much they have been used and how much attention audiences paid. Media may have become less effective because of the changes in presentational format and emphases on certain values in the content and structures of news stories. Some scholars suggest that learning campaign information is primarily constrained by an overemphasis on isolated facts and inappropriate message framing in news stories. Others blame the "horserace" coverage of political campaigns, focusing on who is winning rather than on issues. The emphasis on the entertainment value of events rather than their political relevance may have the same effect as entertainment in general—to limit learning. Trends of changing definitions of news toward features and people-oriented content and away from direct public affairs accounts may have also contributed to less learning from the media over time. Overall, the inadequacies of media coverage rather than lifestyle-related changes in audiences' interest may be the main factors diminishing learning and counteracting and depressing expected effects of the increase in education on aggregate levels of knowledge.

A peek into the future of public knowledge may be gained by projecting from media use of young people today. Use of campaign information from the Internet is extremely effective for knowledge gain among the youngest adults (18–23 years old). Effectiveness of Internet use then decreases to a moderate level for ages 24–30, when it is about the same as for the newspapers, and remains significant until age 60. Given that Internet use will diffuse much further in the next decade and that today's youth and subsequent cohorts are likely to continue using the Internet over the life course, there is hope for an increase in political knowledge. The strongest effects of Internet use in the youngest cohorts that are most deficient in knowledge particularly warrant grounds for optimism. The special problem is, however, that today's youth have much lower levels of traditional (newspaper and television) news use than earlier generations. The result may be that the gains from high levels of Internet information use will be offset by the losses from traditional news media use. Unless traditional media do something to reinvigorate the news interests of the young, their pattern of low use is apt to be perpetuated as they age, and the news audience will continue to shrink.

Interpersonal Communication

Research has shown that interpersonal communication is not a major source of political knowledge.

However, media and interpersonal communication embedded within structures of discussion networks have complementary and reciprocal relationship that exerts a strong influence on political learning. Size of networks, heterogeneity of their composition, and openness to diverse points of view promote frequent interpersonal discussion, in which individuals often argue about and elaborate on what they learned from the media. Heterogeneity and openness of discussion networks also stimulate use of public affairs media and indirectly enhance learning of information.

Functional Political Knowledge

Decisions that people make in democracy are truly democratic only if they are based on full and accurate information. What exactly constitutes the information that meets those standards is contestable. Just simple facts, easy to verify empirically and accurately representing the real world, may not be what citizens want or what they need to make adequate decisions. Most citizens, about 70% in the United States, say that they want news media stories to provide both facts and context in the form of background information and connections to other relevant issues. The context triggers interpretations through which facts may become useful to individuals and ensures that the meanings formed by different people will be similar. Without being discourse analysts, media practitioners understand that only facts placed into context convey a theme or main point of the story. Some news editors, in attempt to provide content that is more useful to readers, say that they are shifting their focus to stories that deal with broader issues, outcomes, and ramifications of events at the expense of routine coverage of meetings and governmental processes. Research has suggested that particularly conducive to collective action are media stories focusing on themes of injustice, agency, and identity. Media content may be empowering and mobilizing to the extent that it helps citizens make connections between their daily experiences and a broader social context.

Themes in news stories are essential in communication because they are more likely to be remembered than any factual information used to support them. They represent "the summary, gist, upshot" of the text, and they are not reducible to the meaning of individual words, sentences, or facts. Studies have shown a substantial correspondence between certain recurrent themes in media and what was understood, believed, and remembered by the audience. The overlap is induced by audiences' motivation to make sense of what was intended by the author and their reliance on the similar sociocultural conventions.

Cognitive psychologists generally refer to all information encoded into individuals' memory as mental representations. Representations take different forms, such as features, concepts, evaluations, and summary judgments. They influence the way individuals interpret the world around them, put their experiences in context, and plan their actions. However, mental representations are not merely copies of what is intended by the authors. Themes also trigger inferential processes through which individuals actively construct various types of summary observations, categories, evaluations, and orientations that may even lead to oppositional interpretations. Research has found that people tend to remember inferences and judgments drawn from news stories rather than facts and evidence presented in those stories. In sum, across disciplines there is agreement that reliance on just facts is inadequate to account for the effectiveness of individuals' decision-making processes.

Knowledge as Structure

Marvin Minsky was among the first to point out that attempts to represent knowledge as collections of separate, simple, fragments do not explain power and speed of individuals' mental activities. Instead, he wrote, when one encounters a new situation "one selects from memory a substantial structure called a frame." Frames are data structures for representing stereotyped situations that enable a person to understand the situation from a particular viewpoint. Mental frames approximate themes in the media stories. Studies show that highlighting some properties of information by placing it in a certain context (i.e., framing it) activates interpretative frames that influence individuals' consequent decisions.

Framing has become a popular idea, generating a considerable amount of research showing that leaders and political elites can successfully use framing to generate support for their positions. Communication research has established that media encourage or discourage use of specific frames among their audiences by making them readily available. Research on framing represents a movement away from the traditional view of knowledge as isolated facts to knowledge as interconnected structures of information. Those structures consist of information from both media and directly experienced reality as well as of relatively abstract representations encoded along perceptual information from the environment. Framing may make information more relevant to citizens and may result in judgments that better reflect their true preferences. It may also reduce disadvantages in amount of factual knowledge caused by inequalities in social statuses given that studies show that no one is immune from framing effects. However, their contribution to democratic competence and informed participation will not be clear as long as research has not established a taxonomy of frames that cuts across different issues, ascertain their frequencies in the media content, or identified those with most appeal and power.

In comparison with frames, schemas are even larger-scale mental representations with significant internal structures. They represent abstract, generic, knowledge that allows individuals to connect an event to a general framework of knowledge, filling in gaps, inferring what is missing, and to understand the event according to their needs. In communication research, the concept of schema is used mostly to explain what individuals notice in the media and how they use their prior set of beliefs and general knowledge to interpret information, rather than showing how schemas are acquired or constructed. For example, highly developed political schemas are related to greater use of news, learning differentiated constructs, and higher-quality issue arguments. Media- and politics-related schemas lead to information seeking and higher salience and attention to campaign information.

Research has shown that people use their schemas to select and reduce media information to useful essentials, but when media stories include clear generalizations, they facilitate processing information in abstract terms. This suggests that media with the organizational structures of their presentation may influence schemas and consequent understanding. Studies have found that contextualizing the news by providing analytical hooks, such as historical background and economic impact, could stimulate audience members who otherwise lack cognitive skills or motivations to become informed about complex issues.

The knowledge structures with the shortest research history and largely unexplored potential in politics are exemplars. They are mental representations that consist of what a person perceived or inferred about the general or typical characteristics of an event or a person rather than of objective stimulus information. Exemplars serve the same function as frames and schemas—to summarize and organize all past experiences into representations that are useful for interpretations and judgments. Media regularly present social information in the form of exemplars, a person, or an event that is supposedly typical for the whole category, to achieve vividness. Individuals base their perceptions of distribution of particular problems or people based on those exemplars even when they are contradicted by the survey data or base rates.

Knowledge as Process

Since Ulric Neisser defined cognition as processes by which any sensory input is transformed, reduced, elaborated, stored, recovered, and used, there have been attempts to conceive knowledge not as a thing, but as a dynamic state that leads to understanding. In general, these attempts emphasize the importance of generating relations among various representations and discrete pieces of information. Thought processes and strategies that are used to connect representations into a meaningful structure and properties of those structures are seen as indicators of comprehension.

Individuals engage in processing strategies that best address their goals. Motivated persons use strategies that involve consideration of a range of information and careful attention to its implications. In contrast, unmotivated individuals seize on a single piece of information and default to relatively simple representations. Individuals motivated to be accurate may put more cognitive effort and systematically process all relevant information, in contrast to individuals who just need to solve a problem most efficiently and process information heuristically. Similarly, individuals have different goals when approaching media content, and their strategies may be to reflect, integrate, doubt, or scan media content. The strategies can be more effortful, elaborate, and analytic or less demanding, simple, and heuristic. More elaborated, active processing is related to greater recall of news and greater exclusion of irrelevant information. Elaborative and reflective processing of news is found to be weakly related to public affairs knowledge but more strongly related to knowledge of candidates' issue stances. Most important, reflection mediates the influence of media use on political participation more effectively than does factual knowledge.

Processing of the media content is not necessarily restricted to purposeful direction. The mere presence of the relevant stimulus can set into operation cognitive processes without individuals' conscious guidance or awareness. For example, perceptions of patterns in media content may help develop a tendency to think about news, recall stories later, and habitually seek more information as motivated by reflective integration. Cues of a given story, such as the primary themes, causal antecedents, and emotional response, as well as its structural characteristics, such as choppiness and coherence, can activate particular processing strategies. Studies have found that both reading newspaper public affairs and watching television crime dramas and adventure shows may stimulate reflective processing, although individuals may approach these two types of media content with very different motivations.

Three major structural properties of representations have been identified: differentiation, relatedness, and integration. These properties capture the interconnectedness of different forms of representations and determine the level of individuals' comprehension. Research shows that comprehension of media messages can be improved by modifying their organizational and logical structures. Television news produced in a tabloid style that uses music, sound effects, slow motion, flash frames as transition between shots, and obtrusiveness of the reporter's voice does not improve recognition or recall of information, and viewers find them less believable, less informative, and less enjoyable than stories produced in standard formats. News stories that use emotion sparingly, keep the pace slow to moderate, match audio and video, use concrete words and pictures, and use strong chronological narratives are better remembered, and they are rated by audiences as more comprehensible, interesting, and informative.

More complex thinking, which involves differentiation and integration of various dimensions of the issue, produces less retaliatory, punitive attitudes and more moderate and balanced positions on political controversies. Cognitive structures that support democratic principles of consultation and integration of various points of view in decision making may have important consequences for political participation. Complex thinking influences stronger nontraditional forms of political participation (community involvement) than traditional (voting and other campaign activities), but most important, it provides citizens with meaningful information beyond factual knowledge.

Knowledge is, in the discipline of political science, traditionally conceptualized as the quantity of discrete facts individuals remember about the political world. Although reasonably extensive, factual knowledge may be necessary for individuals to participate competently in democratic processes such as voting, it may not be sufficient to explain how individuals come to be politically active. Factual knowledge also does not adequately represent all types of information that individuals learn from media. Information that triggers understanding of how politics is relevant and connected to individual daily lives may have the most important implications for political action. Advances in cognitive psychology emphasize the importance of larger knowledge structures, consisting of both factual and inferential information, and linking relationships between discrete pieces of information as the main elements of comprehension. Only what is comprehended can be empowering and optimally applied toward realizing one's political interests.

Mira Sotirovic

See also Framing; Interpersonal Communication; Newspapers, Role in Politics; Political Engagement; Political Information Processing; Political Involvement; Political Socialization

Further Readings

Delli Carpini, M. X., & Keeter, S. (1996). What Americans know about politics and why it matters. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Graber, D. A. (2001). Processing politics: Learning from television in the Internet age. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Kosicki, G. M., & McLeod, J. M. (1990). Learning from political news: Effects of media images and information processing strategies. In S. Kraus (Ed.), Mass communication and political information processing (pp. 69–85). Hillsdale, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

McLeod, D. M., Kosicki, G. M., & McLeod, J. M. (2002). Resurveying the boundaries of political communication effects. In J. Bryant & D. Zillmann (Eds.), Media effects: Advances in theory and research (pp. 215–268). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Smith, E. R. (1998). Mental representations and memory. In D. T. Gilbert, S. T. Fiske, & G. Lindzey (Eds.), The handbook of social psychology (4th ed., Vol. 1, pp. 391–445). New York: McGraw-Hill.

Sotirovic, M., & McLeod, J. M. (2004). Knowledge as understanding: The information processing approach to political learning. In L. Kaid (Ed.), Handbook of political communication research (pp. 357–394). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Verba, S., Schlozman, K. L., & Brady, H. E. (1995). Voice and equality: Civic voluntarism in American politics. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Political Leadership

Leadership is a standing topic in political philosophy and the social sciences. Despite the recognized and continuous relevance of political leadership in any political system, an exhaustive and conclusive concept, theory, or even definition is still missing. Probably most advanced is research on leadership in organizations. But, as Yukl has pointed out, even in this research field no consensus has been reached on how to explain and study leadership. Despite those conceptual and definitional problems, political philosophy and theory have been concerned with political leadership from the very beginning. Plato's idea of "philosopher kings," Machiavelli's principe, and Max Weber's concept of traditional, rational-legal, and charismatic leadership show ample evidence of the relevance of the leadership concept through centuries. These thoughts still inspire research on political leadership. Notwithstanding these fruitful reflections, the term leadership remains lucid in political science and political philosophy. It is often used with diverse meanings in politics and in the social sciences. Connotations of leadership include positive and negative normative views, depending on the chosen definitions. Positive usage of the term often relates to functional definitions and to leadership as a communication process, whereas negative evaluations prevail regarding elitist views, power relations, and coercive processes.

Mughan and Patterson have shown that two characteristics of leadership are common to all definitions and approaches: the understanding that leadership is a relationship in which influence is exercised, and that this relationship can be best studied as a form of dynamic interaction within groups. Otherwise, definitions vary strongly and there are debates between advocates of different perspectives. At a very general level, one can differentiate two basic approaches: the power-based approach and the interactionist perspective on leadership.

Janda proposed a power-based definition. For him, leadership is a special type of power relationship in which a group member accepts the right of another group member to prescribe behavior patterns to the members of the group as legitimate. Similarly, Blondel defines political leadership as a phenomenon of power, because it characterizes the ability of the one or few who are at the top to decide on the actions of the others. He regards this as a top-down process. This perspective has been criticized for being too static and too strongly tied to the view that a rigid command hierarchy governs the leader-follower relationship. Burns has argued that all leaders are actual or potential power holders, but not all power holders are leaders. For Burns, leaders are a particular kind of power holders. The reach and domain of leadership are more limited than those of power, because leadership is exercised in a condition of conflict or competition in which leaders contend for followers by appealing to their convictions. Absolute wielders of brutal power may not be regarded as leaders from his point of view. Addressing leadership in democracy, this perspective meets the normative understanding that leadership involves a voluntary response of followers to leaders. However, it should not be neglected that the dark side of European history in the 20th century has shown that dictatorship may also find willing followers. Leadership covers a wide spectrum, varying from dictatorial forms to highly participatory or democratic forms.

Emergence of Leadership and Leadership Characteristics

Until the late 1940s, the situational approach was dominant among the psychological explanations of leadership. The opinion prevailed that the specific situation of a group largely determined who became a leader of that group. In a situation of attack, someone with the respective fierce capabilities would be chosen; in a situation of peaceful adaptation, someone with management qualifications would take the lead. In its modest form, the situational approach still finds support. Empirically, there seems to be some truth in the observation that leadership flourishes in problem situations. However, at the end of the 1950s, the situational approach was replaced—or better: complemented—by a variety of interactional approaches. The insight that leadership traits are not universal but vary with the situation enhanced the development of more complex models to understand the relationship between personality and leadership. To some degree, and at a very general level, the interactional character of leadership and the varying composition of leadership characteristics are already inherent in such basic concepts as the charismatic leadership of Max Weber. In Weber's approach, "charismatic grounds" for leadership rest on devotion to the exceptional sanctity, heroism, or exemplary character of an individual person and of the normative patterns or order revealed or ordained by him. Charisma applies to an individual personality with extraordinary qualities that is seen and treated as gifted with supernatural, superhuman, or at least specifically exceptional powers and thus recognized as a leader. Although this conceptualization lacks specificity, it already highlights the relational aspect of leadership, because it refers several times to the evaluation by the group members. A person must be considered as exceptional to be treated as leader. This is not the only condition. Weber has made clear that, in addition, a leader must achieve something because leadership has to benefit his followers, otherwise he will lose his charismatic authority.

Borgatta, Bales, and Couch argue that very special circumstances are required for the exceptional forms of leadership for which Weber's or other forms of "great man theories" of leadership can be regarded as applicable or adequate. In modern societies, functional differentiation and division of labor is extremely complex. Leadership can be observed in all kinds of hierarchies, at all levels, be it in the countless number of organizations, institutions, or the social structure.

This, however, does not imply that personal characteristics are of no consequence and that only function matters. To the contrary, in mass democracies with their full-fledged means of communication, the personality or image of formal power holders in politics, organizations, and institutions in any sector from economics to culture is probably more visible and closely observed, for example, by the mass media, than in any prior society. For candidates for political office, for example, empirical research has found that integrity, trustworthiness, and assertiveness are of equal importance for people's choice as the perception of political competence. Scholars like Wattenberg and King have provided evidence that, at least in some systems, persons matter more today than in earlier periods of postwar history (personalization of politics; candidate-centered politics) and that personality can make a difference.

In line with this reasoning are the findings on leadership effectiveness. Organizational sociology has found that leadership effectiveness depends very much on the character and the way in which influence or power is exercised. Leadership can use coercive power, incentive by reward, legitimate influence (when followers belief that it is exercised rightfully), expert power, or referent power in the sense that the appeal, the personal qualities, or the value system of the leader is positively referred to by the followers. Outcomes are very different depending on which resources are employed by leaders. Whereas the typical outcome of the use of coercive powers is resistance, the use of rewards or legitimate power results in compliance. Only leaders who can rely on expert or referent power produce commitment. Commitment must be regarded as the most effective of the three possible outcomes, because it implies an active and affective engagement of the followers for the leader's course. Political leadership research has demonstrated that personal effectiveness, strategic capabilities, and the ability to mobilize and persuade are crucial in order to achieve intended outcomes. In a comparative study, Brettschneider has shown that in political competition leaders or potential leaders are successful if they appear to be politically competent, trustworthy, decisive, energetic, and strong.

In competitive settings like democracy, performance and effectiveness are of crucial importance for "constituted political leaders"—that is, for those holding an official leadership position in a political order—if they want to stay in office. This confirms Max Weber's argument that even charismatic leaders have to perform well. In addition, it confirms the interactional approach, since in democracy interaction between leaders and followers in terms of selection, election, and support is raised to a principle (alternation in power). Political competition for leadership governs the turnover in leadership. Turnover of chief executives is roughly 7 years in dictatorships, more than 4 years in autocracies, but only a little more than 3 years in democracies.

Leadership and Political Communication

The development of modern mass media communication contributes strongly to the emergence of political leadership. It has changed the way in which the relationship between politics and society as well as that between leaders and followers work. Today, favorable media coverage is important in order to win popularity, support, and trust of citizens and voters. Many political leadership studies and theories relate leadership closely to political communication. Leaders who have major objectives (ideological, programmatic, policy, career, etc.) and who seek to activate, mobilize, and motivate cannot act as leaders without recognizing and using the means of mass communication. It is not by chance that political observers and political scientists speak of a symbiosis between the media and politics.

However, mass communication processes are more complex than just one step between leaders and followers. Already in the late 1940s, the analysis of the U.S. presidential elections of 1940 revealed that the flow of mass communication is not necessarily direct, but is mediated by personal communication. This model has become known as the "two-step flow of political communication." Actually, reality shows that the steps are multifold. Even in societies with high levels of political sophistication the real-world process of opinion formation does not really fit the bottom-up idea, termed the "cascade" model. Leaders communicate with representatives of the mass media, opinion leaders listen to mass media, the mass public talks with opinion leaders. Communication is more intense and more open within each level of the cascade compared to communication between levels. Although opinion leadership is leadership at its simplest, certainly not achieving the high level of leadership of a Churchill, and furthermore almost invisible, it should not be neglected as basis for political leadership. As Burns has put it, the essence of "transactional opinion leadership" is that most leaders are followers and most followers are leaders. In modern democracies, the prevailing mode of government, in general, can be best described in terms of the responsible party model. Political leadership is inherent to this mode of government. It implies that political leaders competing for office have to convince to create support for their goals. Neither coercive nor reward powers would help in this regard, neither within the party nor outside.

The means by which potential leadership can emerge and may succeed in elections is successful mass communication. Modern election campaigning shows how relevant it is to manage communication in order to install leadership. With the evolution of the modern campaign the location of political communication gradually shifted, from the print media toward the electronic, from the constituency toward the central party leadership, and from amateurs toward professionals. The crucial point is, however, that leadership does not automatically evolve from the achievement of sufficient and favorable media coverage. It may help to install a formal leader, but this does not necessarily imply leadership. Only if the leading person is able to create positive resonance among the potential followers, she might qualify for leadership. In democratic and noncoercive settings, leadership rests on acceptance and vital support. This is the basic message of the interactional approach to leadership. Empirical research on the selection and election of leaders has provided evidence that there is not the "one and only" route. Even if a person may carry all the qualifications conducive to leadership, leadership may not emerge because the potential followers do not follow. This proves true for constituted as well as for nonconstituted leadership. However, the processes of interaction and resonance between potential leaders and potential followers fostering political leadership are still not very well understood. There is urgent need for an integrated perspective of leadership and mass communication. The demand for advances in this direction will keep the topic on the agenda of political science and communication research.

Bernhard Wessels

See also Machiavelli, Niccolò; Personalization of Politics; Two-Step Flow Model of Communication

Further Readings

Blondel, J. (1987). Political leadership: Towards a general analysis. London: Sage.

Borgatta, E. F., Bales, R. F., & Couch, A. S. (1954). Some findings relevant to the great man theory of leadership. American Sociological Review, 19(6), 755–759.

Brettschneider, F. (2002). Spitzenkandidaten und Wahlerfolg. Personalisierung, Kompetenz, Parteien. Ein internationaler Vergleich [Major candidates and election success: Personalization, competence, parties. An international comparison]. Wiesbaden: Westdeutscher Verlag.

Burns, J. M. (1978). Leadership. New York: Harper & Row.

Conger, J. A., & Kanungo, R. N. (1987). Toward a behavioral theory of charismatic leadership in organizational settings. Academy of Management Review, 12, 637–647.

Deutsch, K. W. (1968). Analysis of international relations. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.

Janda, K. F. (1960). Towards the explication of the concept of leadership in terms of the concept of power. Human Relations, 13, 345–363.
Katz, E., & Lazarsfeld, P. F. (1964). Personal influence. New York: Free Press.
King, A. (Ed.). (1990). Leader's personalities and the outcome of democratic elections. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
Mughan, A., & Patterson, S. C. (Eds.). (1992). Political leadership. Chicago: Nelson-Hall.
Przeworski, A., Alvarez, M. E., Cheibug, J. A., & Limongi, F. (2000). Democracy and development. New York: Cambridge University Press.
Semetko, H. A., et al. (1999). On message: Communicating the campaign. London: Sage.
Tucker, R. C. (1992). Politics as leadership. In A. Mughan & S. C. Patterson (Eds.), Political leadership (pp. 29–43). Chicago: Nelson-Hall.
Wattenberg, M. P. (1991). The rise of candidate-centered politics. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
Weber, M. (1978). Economy and society (G. Roth & C. Wittich, Eds.). Berkeley: University of California Press.
Yukl, G. A. (2001). Leadership in organizations. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall.

POLITICAL MARKETING

Political marketing has developed in parallel with commercial marketing through the course of the 20th century, particularly in America and Europe, with the rise of the universal franchise, the development of broadcast media communications, and scientific methods of assessing market and public opinion, which have transformed how political campaigns are run today. The use of marketing in British political campaigns has been said to have developed over four different eras: the unsophisticated selling era (candidates promoting themselves to different social classes in the 19th century); the selling era (early 20th century, when politicians used the mass media to disseminate messages but did not research voting intentions); the sophisticated selling/nascent marketing era (the private poll was developed, allowing voter feedback into the political process); and the strategic marketing era (which has yet to emerge).

The commercial world of marketing has informed the worlds of political and referendum campaigning, and to a lesser extent vice versa. Charities and other campaigning organizations are increasingly using marketing techniques to influence legislation and public opinion and so use the techniques of political marketing. With the development of globalized industries, the interplay between marketing and politics has increased further, and marketing methods associated with political campaigning are increasingly used by companies to influence legislators and regulators (e.g., in Brussels, Washington, D.C., Doha) who in turn influence the structure of, and legislation associated with, commercial markets. The underlying process in political marketing is the exchange of political support (in terms of votes, petitions, funding, resources) for political influence (in terms of legislative, regulatory or programmatic—commercial or political—changes).

Although the use of promotional and managerial techniques in political, electoral, and commercial campaigning has long existed, the uptake of marketing techniques has rapidly increased in recent decades. Political marketing has been likened to a marketing-propaganda hybrid, particularly in America, where negative attack-style campaigning is rife. The political marketing "product" could be said to include party policy on important issues and party ideology and ideals, which effectively comprise political representation. Considering political representation as a political service provided to companies or voters provides a better understanding of the political party's raison d'être vis-à-vis its target markets. In parallel to the development of marketing techniques, such as advertising and market research, there is increasing use of strategic marketing techniques such as market positioning, where the campaigning organization determines its campaign's ideal positions in the minds of those in their target markets and uses research to continually refine the difference between their actual position and their ideal position. Market segmentation is also an important marketing activity for political parties as they divide the electorate into groups of targetable voters.

Parties function in representative democracies to provide the nation with guidance and information on current and potential political and economic infrastructure. This process benefits the public by improving social cohesion, democratic participation, and citizen belongingness, and ensures that politicians take account of important economic considerations associated with commercial markets. Political marketing could be argued to be increasingly important as political participation declines in Western political markets, although, ironically, its cynical overuse may well be the very cause of just such a drop in political participation.

Famous examples of campaigns include Lyndon Baines Johnson's "Daisy Girl" television campaign against Barry Goldwater in the 1964 American presidential election, when a young girl was portrayed picking leaves off a flower to Johnson's nuclear countdown voiceover. The spot was extremely evocative, and Goldwater's campaign was damaged by it. Margaret Thatcher's use of the advertising agency Saatchi and Saatchi in the 1979 British general election was particularly effective, using a devastating billboard campaign around the strike-ridden "Winter of Discontent," displaying a dole (unemployment office) queue and the words, "Labour is not working," which kept the British Labour Party out of power for a generation (1979–1997).

Most marketing activity for political, referendum, and public affairs campaigns has been provided by specialized marketing and PR agencies on an ad hoc basis, although increasingly political parties and multinational corporations are conducting their political marketing activity in-house. Agencies typically take the form of pollsters, lobbyists, and public relations or advertising agencies in Britain. In America, however, political consultants have a much wider remit, taking in roles such as polling, petition management, fundraising, strategy, media buying, advertising, public affairs, grassroots lobbying, law, donor list maintenance, and campaign software consulting. Europe is increasingly developing its own political marketing industry, geared around Brussels and Strasbourg and public affairs activity.

Marketing's entry into politics has not been widely applauded, bringing disquiet to the many who believe that politics has a "higher purpose" than commercial profitability or who acquaint marketing with "style" (viz. form) rather than "substance" (viz. content). Public affairs activity, particularly lobbying, through which a government's commercial policy is influenced by companies, comes under particular scrutiny in an age where the multinational corporations and trade bodies become more powerful and governments around the world shift from being primarily providers of goods and services to regulators of commercial and social markets.

The importance of the succinctness of political marketing is apparent when one considers that the voting public and industrial directors are subjected to limited availability of time for paying attention to public affairs, with corresponding limited understanding of political and economic issues and the technical solutions required to solve them. Thus, political parties and governments will probably never truly be market or voter oriented. There are, in any case, major ethical considerations in determining how market or voter oriented any political party or government should be since they are required, once in power, to regulate them both. Of particular concern in America is the importance of funding in elections as political campaigns become increasingly advertising focused. Around $2.2 billion was spent in total in the 2004 American election cycle by all candidates. In Britain, concerns over spending in elections were offset when an electoral commission was set up with powers under the 2000 Elections, Parties and Referendums Act to regulate spending for national party campaigns at around £20 million at that time. Around the world, political campaigns and companies operating political strategies are increasingly in vogue as companies take over the delivery of what were once considered to be government services.

Paul R. Baines

See also Daisy Girl Ad; Lobbying, Lobbyist; Political Advertising; Propaganda; Public Affairs, Communication in; Public Opinion

Further Readings

Dulio, D. A., & Nelson, C. J. (2005). Vital signs: Perspectives on the health of American campaigning. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

O'Shaughnessy, N. (1999). Political marketing and political propaganda. In B. I. Newman (Ed.), Handbook of political marketing (pp. 725–740). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Smith, G., & Saunders, J. (1990). The application of marketing to British politics. Journal of Marketing Management, 5(3), 295–306.

Political Parties

Throughout the 20th century, political parties have been counted among the most important political institutions; liberal-democratic political systems are inconceivable without parties. Parties aggregate social interests and represent those interests in the political arena. On the one hand, they contribute to the articulation of contested interests and social problems arising from underlying social and cultural structures. On the other hand, they force the advocates of various interests and aims to cooperate and package their demands. With the politicalization of the masses, the formation of coalitions between social groupings and elites, and the emergence of centrally controlled political apparatuses, parties have increasingly become an object of social science research.

Following Sorauf, the party literature approaches parties in varying ways, for example, "parties as organizations," "parties in government," and "parties in the electorate." This literature concerns itself with the origin and history of parties, describes their activities in "opposition" or "government," strives for defensible classifications of parties, and establishes their functions. Furthermore, it examines internal party structures, for example, party finances, programs, and goals, as well as processes of candidate selection and decision making. In addition, the literature analyzes a party's leadership, activists, and voters as well as the relationships among these groups. It has put forward diverse proposals for the organization and classification scores of parties and party structures, describes changes to parties and party structures, and attempts to explain these processes.

In contrast, the party system literature directs its attention to the totality of parties in one or more countries, to the system's features, the relationships between parties, and the relevant connections between parties and the background social environment. At the center of party system analysis stand the structure and development of the relationships between parties. The aims consists of developing concepts for the comparative description and classification of party systems, of examining the conditions for party system development, consolidation, and transformation, as well as exploring their effects on politics and society, especially on the support for political systems.

Concept and Classification

The term political party designates a group of like-minded individuals, who in various organizational forms, participate in political decision making and strive to occupy political positions in order to implement their aims. The aims of these groups are frequently determined through a common belief system and are focused on the implementation of policies. They can, however, be primarily focused on the occupation of positions in governmental institutions. Because parties are the primary organizations linking citizens to the state, they control access to positions of political leadership. In addition to seeking political positions, parties strive for the assumption of political power by entering government. In liberal-democratic political systems, groups are only called parties if they formally contest elections. Sociologist Max Weber (1964) understood parties to be voluntary organizations that pursue the goal of assuming power in order to give their activists the opportunity to implement their aims or to pursue their personal agendas. German political scientist Maurice Duverger saw parties above all as agents, aggregating and implementing their voters' interests. Italian political scientist Giovanni Sartori defined a party as a political group whose goal is to take part in elections in order to place their candidates in public offices.

The parties literature has long classified political parties based on their diverse characteristics. Parties are today classified, among other things, according to the structure of their membership and voters as "interest," "class," or "catch-all"; as "worker," "farmer," or "middle class" based on the social background of their voters; as "notable," "cadre," "mass," or "cartel" according to their organizational structure; as "vote seeking," "office seeking," or "policy seeking" based on their electoral strategies; as "extreme right," "conservative," "Christian," "liberal," "green," "social-democratic," "socialist," or "communist" based on their ideological orientations; as "system" or "antisystem" based on their acceptance of the political system; as "established" or "unestablished" based on their degree of institutionalization; and as "democratic," "authoritarian," or "totalitarian" based on their toleration of opposition.

Party Formation

Parties unite individuals with more or less similar socioeconomic backgrounds, religious affiliations, preferences, and values. All societies are aggregated from individuals with heterogeneous interests, and in general increasingly heterogeneous interests result in increasingly fragmented party systems. Parties represent and are influenced by contradictions that have developed in society.

According to Neumann in 1956, the modern nature of parties developed in parallel to the development of parliaments and the expansion of the franchise. They were the consequence of a growing call on the part of citizens to have a share in political decision-making processes. Early representative parties relied on loose networks of social elites, who based their relationship to their voters on personal contacts and communication. Sustained processes of democratization and industrialization, however, limited the effectiveness of these methods. With the expansion of the franchise and the participation of larger portions of the population in the political process, these parties were replaced by new organizations whose purpose, among other things, was to secure their leaders the necessary mass support to enter office. The expansion of the franchise led to the development of the first mass parties supported by powerful intermediary organizations. Their voters and activists were in many ways tightly bound to the parties and caught in an all-encompassing subculture. This organizational superiority and networking with social organizations made it possible to contest elections on a cross-regional scale, strengthened them in processes of political decision making, and offered economies of scale in voter recruitment. Out of the rise of mass parties came professional politicians, making it possible to for individuals to concentrate entirely on politics but at the same time making them increasingly dependent on the party for their livelihood.

However, the social differentiation and cultural pluralization of advanced modernization has also threatened the basis of mass parties by weakening their strong, exclusive connections to interest organizations and social groups. Parties run the danger of falling into a structurally subordinate position as progressive secularization in Western societies leads to weakening religious bonds and the development of the economy's service sector shrinks the traditional working class. This second process has forced traditional worker parties to adjust their programs to appeal to the interests of the new, growing middle class.

The organizational and ideological roots of many parties in Western democracies reach back to the implementation of universal suffrage and conflicts arising during processes of centralization, democratization, and industrialization, in the course of which coalitions between parties and social groups were developed and consolidated. The numerous intermediary organizations underpinning party affiliation strongly limited the establishment of new parties. Parties founded after World War II in many countries lacked loyal votes and supporting intermediary institutions. Only changing value orientations, the decoupling of parties from interest organizations, and new media structures and issues in the last third of the 20th century favored the rise of new parties. Supported by new social movements, Green parties established themselves above all, though extreme right or right-populist parties have entered the electoral market in many countries.

In Africa, Asia, and Latin America, parties often developed in conjunction with the establishment of national representative bodies and the implementation of elections. Some parties had their roots in nationalist independence movements struggling against the colonial powers in the first half of the 20th century. In some cases, the promotion of political groups by the colonial powers led to the development of national parties that pushed for the equal treatment of Africans in political processes. The so-called administrative parties favored by the colonial powers generally recruited personnel from the civil service but found little support in the general population. In Asia, the first and largest parties came out of independence movements. During independence struggles, movements like Congress in India or the Nationalists of the Philippines bundled various interests in order to guarantee themselves a broad support base. After reaching their common goal, divergent interests led in many countries to schisms within these movements. In Africa as well as Asia, ethnic heterogeneity led in many states to the construction of ethnic or religious parties.

Finally, postcommunist political systems have seen the formation of many parties since 1989, though with the exception of postcommunist parties, they could be characterized as lacking strong organizational resources. As in Western democracies, the nature of parties in postcommunist systems has run parallel to the democratization of Central and Eastern European societies. Many parties contained preexisting parliamentary factions, which then dominated the decision-making process within the parties. As poorly organized parties of notables, they exhibit only minor support among the large interests in society and depend far more on loose networks of social elites, with their relationship to the voters arranged through the media and elections. In contrast, postcommunist parties have acquired the financial, organizational, and personal resources of the former state parties, which provide them with an advantage in party competition.

Party Functions

The spread of system-theoretical perspectives in political science increased the interest in questions regarding the function of the party in political systems. The literature on parties attributed various functions to parties, though the precise conceptual meaning of these functions and their reasons for being named remained mostly unclear. In view of the ambiguity and lack of consistency of the concepts, no consensus has developed on the functions of parties in a democracy. Additionally, most lists fail to specify whether they are discussing empirical or normatively preferred party functions. Regardless, the functions of parties likely vary depending on the type of political system; parties in liberal-democracies provide different benefits than those in authoritarian or totalitarian systems. Among the party functions frequently counted in liberal political systems include elite recruitment and evaluation, the formulation of political goals and programs, the articulation and aggregation of interests, the communication between elites and citizens, coordination of personnel and policy functions in government, as well as control over system integration.

If one selects the stability of the political system as the point of reference for the determination of party functions, we ask what specific contribution parties make. From the system-theoretical perspective, parties secure support for the basic principles and institutions of the political order by providing the masses with the necessary emotional mooring to the system. Party competition contributes to stability by regulating and moderating political conflict and limiting political power through alternating governments. This is accomplished on one hand by politics that are responsive and communicative with citizens, and on the other hand through the recruitment of suitable personnel to hold political positions. Along with other interest groups, parties articulate social wants and needs, create feasible solutions (interest aggregation), and advocate those solutions in the decision-making process. At the electoral level, they take social demands and bundle them into political concepts; at the parliamentary level, they convert these demands into binding decisions; at the government level, they attempt to implement these political programs. In parliamentary systems they sustain and guarantee the government's capacity to act. In contrast, if one regards parties primarily as instruments of power acquisition and see the most important functions of parties in that light, the primary function of parties is to support rival groups of politicians in order to accumulate votes and enter political office.

The function of parties is connected in particular to the institutional form of political systems, particularly the form of government. In the German Empire, parties had an important influence on budgetary questions but no control over the government. Under the framework of the Weimar Republic, parties could not adapt their structures to the requirements of liberal-democratic systems, nor generate the performance necessary to maintain that system. Massive party failures contributed to the failure of democracy and the assumption of power by Hitler. In totalitarian systems, parties primarily act as instruments of the government engaged in social control.

Parties as Organizations

To achieve their aims, modern parties build more or less permanent, formal organizations. The growth of parties and the development of their organizational apparatus bring about a transformation. The preservation of the apparatus becomes a party goal, while the purpose for the creation of the apparatus increasingly moves into the background. As soon as parties reach a certain size, Robert Michele suggested that there is a separation between the party leadership and the party's members. The delegation and concentration of power effects on the one hand a decreased involvement on the part of members in inner-party decisions and on the other hand an autonomy of action for the leadership. The leaders seize the organization in order to carry out their own goals, and collective decisions are replaced by oligarchic leadership. The party leadership is no longer under the control of the party's members, but rather they use the party apparatus to direct their members.

Influenced by Michels's thesis, the party literature after World War II increased its focus on the construction of party organizations and interest groups within parties, the composition of the membership, activists, and voters, the selection of leaders, processes of inner-party decision making, and the attitudes of party members. These studies showed that the construction of oligarchies come from the division of labor in complex parties, the position of party leaders in the social stratification, and the participation interest of members. Internal party democracy is promoted by a decentralized structure, a weak bureaucracy, chances for individual members to build and acquire political competencies, and through institutionalization of protections for internal opposition. The construction of leadership circles is above all fostered by a generally weak participation by members in decision-making processes within the party.

Like Weber, the modern party literature has pointed out that parties form voluntary social organizations in order to mediate between citizens and the state. Parties work toward getting political elites in order to move state institutions toward the wishes of the electorate. Neumann emphasized that in earlier times Western European mass parties formed complex organizations to increase the role of their supporters in internal decision making. This had the reciprocal effect of bonding citizens to a coherent worldview through their inclusion in a diverse network of suborganizations. Others assumed that such parties would thrive as a result of their strong organization, their roots in large segments of the society, and their close relationship to influential interest groups.

On the other hand, Epstein argued that Western European models were approaching the organizational model of parties in the United States. By building strong organizations and anchoring themselves in social groups, parties were hindered from reacting flexibly to social changes or new challenges. Thus, parties were increasingly dependent on reaching citizens outside of the influence of large interest groups and recommended that party elites save the costs they put into member organizations and mobilize citizens directly through the mass media. Empirically, modern election campaign techniques have grown in importance, while the influence of large interest groups in mobilizing and informing voters has diminished. Epstein overlooked, however, that the recruitment of political personnel for the various offices and mandates presuppose a sufficient number of members from which suitable candidates can be drawn.

Finally, toward the end of the 20th century, parties suffered from a consistently shrinking membership. In addition, the structure and motivation of party members has changed. While the number of blue-collar workers has steadily sunk, the number of members with high levels of education as well as the portion from the new middle class has substantially grown. These newer members are less driven by the direct benefits or incentives of party membership. While not just the result of declining numbers, the question arises whether and to what extent parties still mediate between citizens and the state. As parties detach themselves from society and increasingly lose their meaning as membership organizations, the connection between parties and voters weakens. At the same time, the traditional social milieus are disintegrating and party elites are able to directly reach voters through the mass media and to gauge their opinions through surveys.

In addition, parties have gained increasing access to state resources. In many countries they have secured access to the publicly controlled electronic media and strongly expanded the state's role in party financing. As state resources increasingly serve the maintenance of the party organization, elite recruiting, and voter mobilization, the less it becomes necessary for the party to mediate between state and society and the more parties develop into quasi-state institutions. This process destroys the basis of a party's integration ability, the linkage between the party and its voters.

Party System Classification and Concepts

Following the conventional definition, party system refers to the number of parties, their characteristics and interrelationships in a political system. A party system is therefore more than the sum of its parties. Duverger labeled party systems as the form and character of coexistence between parties. A denser concept includes the relationship between parties and elements of the social system, particularly the electorate.

Most party system descriptions begin with the number of relevant parties. The earlier literature differentiated above all between "one-party," "two-party," and "multiparty" systems. Vague and often arbitrary decision rules led to a heavy critique of this classification, though it persists today. Alongside this basic classification, party systems are frequently differentiated based on the strength of the parties into "multipolar," "bipolar," and "dominant" as well as "symmetric" and "asymmetric," and by electoral volatility and government stability as "stable" and "unstable." Finally, party systems are classified by the ideological distance between parties into "polarized" and "nonpolarized," according to the prevailing tendencies of party competition as "centripetal" or "centrifugal," and by the exercise of power into "dominant" or "alternating." In addition, the fragmentation and volatility of the system, number of dimensions of conflict, and the existence and strength of party families, as well as the coalition possibilities, are used as descriptors for the determination of dimension.

The influential party system typology offered by Sartori combined the number of parties and their ideological distance. Based on the number of parties, Sartori differentiated between one-, two-, and multiparty systems, with the later divided into pluralistic (three to five parties) and extreme-pluralistic (more than five parties). Multiparty systems with little ideological distance are referred to as "moderate pluralism," while those with large differences are referred to as "polarized pluralism."

The two-party system is considered the classic model of Anglo-Saxon democracy. The distance between parties is minimal, and competition tends to move party policies toward the center. In systems of moderate pluralism, any party can in principal join a governing coalition. Moderate systems can be found in Sweden and Norway, the Netherlands and Belgium, Germany and Switzerland, as well as Hungary. Characteristic of polarized systems are the existence of substantial antisystem parties, large ideological distances between the parties, limited coalition opportunities, and competitive tendencies that result in centrifugal outcomes. Examples include the Weimar Republic, the French Fourth Republic, and occasionally Italy. An exceptional case of multiparty systems is the predominant-party system. These systems have multiple parties, with one, however, dominating the center. Dominant parties are able to perpetually win elections and form the government, as was often the case in India or Japan.

Party System Development

Party systems are the expression of sociocultural and institutional structures, and changes in those institutions or underlying social preferences should affect the fortunes and strategies of political actors. The early party literature assumed above all that electoral systems determined the number and strength of parties, as well as the stability of the political system. Proportional representation (PR) systems were seen as leading to fragmented party systems and unstable governments, whereas "winner take all" majoritarian systems led to integrated and stable party systems and effective governments. Experience has shown, however, that the change from majoritarian to proportional systems in most Western European countries at the beginning of the 20th century led to the development of stable multiparty systems rather than fragmentation. Furthermore, majoritarian systems did not always breed strongly concentrated party systems, as indicated by the German experience from 1871 to 1912.

More recent research has placed a stronger emphasis on the role of socioeconomic relationships in shaping party systems. Party systems are expressions of the fundamental conflicts present in society, and these conflicts shape the value orientations of voters and the actions of political elites. The structure of Western European party systems developed according to the outcome of territorial, religious, social, and political conflicts during processes of centralization, industrialization, and democratization. First, the demands of the middle class for a share in decision making and on questions of the constitutional order of the nation-state led to the development of Liberal and Conservative parties. In addition, the formation of nation-states produced tensions between dominant and subordinate cultures. Contradictory interests from members of ethnic or religious minorities (the periphery) and members of the majority culture (the center) facilitated the development of regional and ethnic parties, for example, by Poles in the eastern German Empire, South Tyrolians in northern Italy, Scottish nationalists in Great Britain, Swedes in Finland, or the Basques of Spain. Conflicts between church and state led to the development and stabilization of the Centre Party in Germany or the formation of Catholic, Calvinist, and Reformed parties in the Netherlands. In secular countries, for example, France or Italy, religious mass movements developed into parties in order to represent the interests of the religious community against a secular state.

In the course of industrialization, the conflicting interests between urban and rural citizens were reified into a conflict between the up-and-coming urban middle class and the traditional rural nobility. Additionally, a rift developed between salaried urban employees and manual laborers on one side and farmers on the other. This conflict led above all to the development of Agrarian parties in Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The strongest effect on party systems came, however, from the class conflict, with strong Socialist and/or Social-Democratic parties developing in almost all Western democracies. In the course of industrialization, an increasing number of workers fought for political equality and organized worker parties, which led to a fragmentation and polarization of the party system. Last, the Russian Revolution led to the formation of Communist parties as offshoots of Socialist parties in many countries.

In most postcommunist political systems, party systems have developed around conflicts between classical liberals and structural conservatives on questions of the economic system and the political rules of the game. While structural conservatives defend past political and economic clientelistic structures, liberalizers plead for free market principles and a democratic parliamentary system. Socioeconomic, religious, and ethnic conflicts play an altogether subordinate role. Last, Kitschelt et al. found that the structure of party systems in postcommunist systems were strongly influenced by the circumstances in which the communists first came to power.

Party System Change

The party systems literature has long agreed that Western European party systems “froze” at the end of their formation phase in the 1920s. The anchoring of parties to large, powerful social interests and groups, as well as their competency in articulating and aggregating interests, guaranteed extraordinary stability. Large shifts would occur only when deep, far-reaching political crises led to a failure in the continuity of party organizations (as in Italy, Germany, Austria, or Spain). For example, radical critiques on established liberal-democracies and growing nationalism in countries with severe economic, cultural, and social crises created the conditions for renewed fragmentation and polarization of party systems, unstable governments, and the rise of fascist parties.

In contrast to Lipset and Rokkan Otto, Kirchheimer postulated that European party systems had undergone a fundamental transformation. The major parties in many countries had converged in their policies, the old group-based “mass parties” had been reshaped into “catch-all” parties competing for all voters, the parliamentary opposition had become a formality, and the acrimony of the old interest conflicts had been alleviated by continuing social changes. Kirchheimer attributed these changes especially to the spread of mass media, the development of a new middle class of salaried employees and civil servants with a reasonably secure social existence, and the construction of a welfare state that guaranteed an increasing measure of social security.

Since the 1970s, social scientists have increasingly emphasized fundamental changes in Western democracies, which have also expressed themselves in changing party systems. In advanced industrial democracies the bonds between social milieus, political parties, and individuals have weakened; class and confession have lost their impact on voting. As a result, at the micro level the willingness to engage in “issue” voting has increased, with party systems fragmenting and increased electoral volatility at the macro level. These processes have altered the relationship between voters and parties. Postindustrial societies have developed a new style of citizen politics with consequences for the party system. Voting behavior had previously reflected political socialization and group loyalties. Political attitudes were therefore an expression of one’s group affiliations and position in the social structure. However, citizens in the last third of the 20th century showed an increasing readiness to participate directly in politics, with their political behavior oriented more and more on specific issues. Combined with shifts in normative values, these processes resulted in a continual loosening of sociocultural and psychological connections to established parties (dealignment), leading to a readiness of the citizenry to engage in direct political participation, with mass or catch-all parties losing much of their meaning.

Perspectives

Over the past 100 years, parties and party systems have become central objects of study in political science. Scholars approach the questions in this field with different questions in mind, using different methodologies as appropriate for those questions. Like other scientific fields, the study of parties and party systems exhibits cyclical variations in interest. For example, waves of democratization tend to be followed by an increasing interest in parties.

The continued interest in parties and party systems, however, shows that there are still large necessary endeavors to fill the many gaps and address the open questions. Thus far, there is no comprehensive, testable theory on the development of new and old parties. Authors have put identified a multitude of factors that on the whole may influence the strength and development of parties on the one hand and the continuity and change of party systems on the other. It has not been sufficiently clarified under which conditions new parties develop, which effects opportunity structures have in the founding and consolidation of new parties, or which influence social changes have. We also lack systematic comparisons of internal party structures, the relationship between party members and party structures, inner-party activities, member motives for joining, or their impact on political processes. Although the literature is united that parties select interests, transport them into the political arena and select political elites, there nevertheless remains a lack of well-elaborate theoretical models that illustrate these processes, as well as comparative empirical studies about the ability of parties to fulfill these roles.

Jürgen R. Winkler and Jürgen W. Falter

See also Dealignment; Electoral Systems; Proportional Representation

Further Readings

Dalton, R. J. (1988). Citizen politics in Western democracies: Public opinion and political parties in the United States, Great Britain, West Germany and France. Chatham, UK: Chatham House.

Dalton, R. J., Flanigan, S. C., & Beck, P. E. (Eds.). (1984). Electoral change in advanced industrial democracies. Realignment or dealignment? Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Duverger, M. (1981). Les parties politiques [The political parties]. Paris: Colin.

Epstein, L. (1967). Political parties in Western democracies. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction.

Franklin, M. N., Mackie, T., & Valen, H. (1992). Electoral change: Responses to evolving social and attitudinal structures in Western countries. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Giliomee, H., & Simkins, C. (Eds.). (1999). The awkward embrace: One-party domination and democracy. Amsterdam: Harwood.

Katz, R. S., & Mair, P. (Ed.). (1992). Party organizations: A data handbook on party organizations in Western democracies, 1960–1990. London: Sage.

Katz, R. S., & Mair, P. (1995). Changing models of party organization and party democracy: The emergence of the Cartel Party. Party Politics, 1, 5–28.

Kirchheimer, O. (1965). Der Wandel der westeuropäischen Parteiensysteme [The structure of West European party systems]. Politische Vierteljahresschrift, 6, 20–41.

Kitschelt, H. (1994). The transformation of the European social democracy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Kitschelt, H., et al. (1999). Post-Communist party systems: Competition representation, and inter-party cooperation. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press

Lawson, K., & Merkl, P. (Eds.). (1988). When parties fail: Emerging alternative organizations. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Lewis, P. G. (Ed.). (1996). Party structure and organization in East-Central Europe. Cheltenham, UK: Edward Elgar.

Lijphart, A. (1994). Electoral systems and party systems. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Lipset, S. M., & Rokkan, S. (1967). Cleavage structures, party systems and voter alignments: An introduction. In S. M. Lipset & S. Rokkan (Eds.), Party systems and voter alignments (pp. 1–64). New York: Free Press.

Mainwaring, S., & Scully, T. R. (Eds.). (1995). Building democratic institutions: Party systems in Latin America. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Mair, P. (1997). Party system change: Approaches and interpretations. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Michels, R. (1911). Zur Soziologie des Parteiwesens in der Demokratie [The sociology of party meaning in democracy]. Stuttgart, Germany: Kröner.

Neumann, S. (1956). Towards a comparative study of political parties. In Modern political parties: Approaches to comparative politics (pp. 395–421). Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Sartori, G. (1976). Parties and party systems: A framework for analysis. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Sorauf, F. S. (1967). Political parties and political analysis. In W. Chambers et al. (Eds.), The American party system (pp. 33–55). New York: Wiley.

Ware, A. (1996). Political parties and party systems. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Weber, M. (1964). Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft. Studienausgabe [Business and society: Study efforts]. Köln, Germany: Kiepenheuer and Witsch.

Wiesendahl, E. (1980). Parteien und Demokratie [Parties and democracy]. Opladen, Germany: Leske + Budrich.

Political Prisoners

Political prisoners is a term used to refer to individuals who are imprisoned or otherwise held against their will because their ideas or public personae are considered by a government to present a threat to the nation or opposition to the current regime. Frequently, incarceration of political prisoners takes place with no recourse to legal or judicial processes. At other times, a legal system may be used to arrest and try political prisoners by implementing false criminal charges and evidence to cover up the politically motivated nature of the imprisonment. This can be achieved through the use of a kangaroo court, where a mock trial is conducted for the sake of appearances, but the outcome has already been determined. This approach may be used to avoid national or international accusations of violations of human rights. At times an individual who has been denied bail or parole could be defined as a political prisoner. Ultimately, however, classifying someone as a political prisoner can be a matter of perspective and interpretation.

Throughout history, governments of almost every persuasion and type have jailed or confined individuals they have found politically inconvenient. One early case involving imprisonment for political reasons occurred in England during the late 1400s, when the young princes, Edward and Richard, were sent to Tower of London. The last incontrovertible sighting of the princes was in 1483, and the mystery of their disappearance has never been solved.

The past 100 years of world history gives testimony to a multitude of politically motivated detainments in almost every corner of the globe. In the 1930s, Stalin began the Great Purge of the party, in which many were imprisoned in gulags, deported to Siberia and the Central Asian republics, or executed. Evidence collected after the collapse of the Soviet Union indicates a total of approximately 3 million victims.

During the same time period, political activists and others were beginning to disappear in Germany as a result of the Nacht und Nebel ("Night and Fog"), a decree issued by Adolf Hitler on December 7, 1941. Even before the deportation and mass murder of the mentally impaired, Jews, and Gypsies, political prisoners and Soviet prisoners of war began to disappear without a trace.

During World War II, members of the Allied forces also implemented procedures of detention. In Great Britain, under Regulation 18B of the wartime Defense Regulations, approximately 2,000 British citizens were held without charge, trial, or term set. This action was fueled by the widespread belief in the existence of the Fifth Column. Although Churchill was initially an enthusiastic supporter of this measure, he later lamented this use of power. At the same time in the United States, approximately 120,000 Japanese and Japanese Americans were forcibly moved to War Relocation Camps, even though 62% were U.S. citizens. This internment was authorized by President Franklin Roosevelt with Executive Order 9066. In 1988, President Ronald Reagan made an official apology for this action, and the government paid reparations to surviving internees.

The years from 1950 into the 1980s bore witness to many politically motivated imprisonments in several countries in South America. During this period, many of the existing governments throughout the region were displaced by military coups. Some of the military dictators who took power during this period were Brigade General Jorge Rafael Videla (Argentina), General August Pinochet (Chile), and General Alfredo Stroessner (Paraguay). Then, during the 1970s, these and other government leaders participated in what was known as "Operation Condor." Intelligence and military groups in Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Paraguay, and Uruguay initiated a campaign of assassination and oppression to deter Marxist influence and suppress active or potential dissenters against the military dictatorships that had been established throughout the region. Archives discovered in Asuncion, Paraguay, on December 22, 1992, revealed the fates of thousands of South Americans who were secretly kidnapped, tortured, and killed. According to these records, 50,000 people were murdered, 30,000 disappeared, and 400,000 were incarcerated.

In the years following the attacks of September 11, 2001, the actions of the U.S. government, intelligence services, and military have come under international scrutiny. In the pursue of the War on Terrorism, a series of memoranda at the executive level sought to eliminate or circumvent legal constraints specified in the Geneva Convention on the use of torture to attain intelligence. On September 18, 2001, the U.S. Congress passed the "Authorization for Use of Military Force" resolution. This paved the way for President Bush to issue a Presidential Military Order, "Detention, Treatment, and Trial of Certain Non-Citizens in the War against Terrorism." Individuals held under this order are classified as "enemy combatants," a term not found in the Geneva Convention. In 2004 stories began emerging about prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad, in Afghanistan, and at the military prison in Guantánamo, Cuba.

In response to the plight of political prisoners around the world, a number of organizations have arisen to redress these human rights violations. One of the most prominent and successful is Amnesty International. The organization began in the 1960s when Peter Benenson, a British lawyer, heard about two Portuguese students who had been given a 7-year prison sentence for raising a toast to freedom. He called for an international campaign of letter writing to bombard authorities with protests. The main focus of Amnesty International has been to free all "prisoners of conscience" and ensure a prompt and fair trial for all political prisoners.

Cynthia Roper

Further Readings

Bizot, F. (2003). The gate. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

Cheng, N. (1986). Life and death in Shanghai. London: Grafton.

Greenberg, K. J., & Dratel, J. L. (Eds.). (2005). The torture papers: The road to Abu Ghraib. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Mandela, N. (1995). Long walk to freedom: The autobiography of Nelson Mandela. Boston: Little, Brown.

Sharansky, N. (1988). Fear no evil. New York: Random House.

Verdugo, P., Sigmund, P. E., & Montecino, M. (2001). Chile, Pinochet, and the caravan of death. Miami, FL: University of Miami, North-South Center Press.

Political Satire

See Humor in Politics

Political Scandal

Political scandals refer to actions by those holding public office that violate social norms and are accompanied by a public reaction of indignation. Political power's basis in social trust is key to understanding political scandal. In a representative democracy, power is ceded on the basis of trust and accountability, and it is precisely these areas that scandal affects. In addition, for scandal to be possible, there must be mechanisms allowing its expression, means for public opinion to be formed and expressed. In 20th-century democracies these have been the mass media. In the 21st century, Internet technology has permitted the development of alternative means for publicizing political scandal, including publications such as the Drudge Report, which first reported on Bill Clinton's liaison with Monica Lewinsky, and the use of Weblogs (blogs).

The following discussion looks at scandal's relationship to the domain of public vice, provides an outline of a typology of political scandals, an account of how they develop, and the impact they have, as well as a consideration of reasons for their media prominence.

Scandal, Corruption, and Sleaze

Scandal is a term belonging to the vocabulary of public vice, which also includes the terms "corruption" and "sleaze." Corruption refers to abuse of trust through the inappropriate use of power for some kind of gain. Sleaze is a term that came into vogue in the last decades of the 20th century and refers to insalubrious behavior in relation to financial or sexual morality.

Scandals have an ancient pedigree, as indicated by the antiquity of the word scandal, which can be traced back to Greek, Latin, and early Judeo-Christian thought. The original Greek terms, the noun skandalon and the verb skandalizein, referred to a spring-trap for prey, recalling its Indo-Germanic root—skand—to spring or leap. It was used in a figurative way in the Old Testament, to describe a trap, an obstacle, or a cause of moral stumbling.

Types of Political Scandal

Political scandals can come in all shapes and sizes. They can be summarized in three ways:

1. Political sex scandals. These involve the disclosure of allegations about the private lives of public figures concerning actions that appear to transgress accepted, although not always legally binding or even generally observed codes, about the conduct of sexual relations.
2. Political financial scandals. These concern the disclosure of allegations concerning the misuse of economic resources by public figures in ways that often but not always transgress legal norms.
3. Political power scandals. These involve the disclosure of allegations concerning the improper use of power by public figures in ways that either transgress the norms and conventions of the power game or break the law.

The Development of Political Scandal

Scandals generally consist of a number of elements, including an initial transgression; the phases of revelation, publication, defense, dramatization, prosecution, and labeling; and finally, the outcomes. The British sociologist John B. Thompson outlines five phases of political scandal:

1. First, there is an initial transgression of social norms and values that typically leads to "second-order transgressions," actions taken to conceal the first involving obstruction and deception. These second-order transgressions can come to assume more importance than the original transgression. The paradigmatic case is Watergate. Here the initial transgression—the break-in by Republican activists into the Watergate office complex in Washington, D.C., in order to plant taping devices in Democrat offices—was overshadowed by the subsequent attempted cover-up by the Nixon administration, which eventually led to the president's resignation in 1974.

2. Scandals involve nonparticipant knowledge of the transgression, hence the important role of the media.

3. The action must be one that provokes disapproval. Shock is a rare phenomenon.

4. The disapproval must be expressed. The response contributes to the constitution of the scandal and takes the form of language expressed in public implying that the action is shameful or disgraceful. For a political scandal to occur, it must reach a certain threshold in terms of numbers and consensus.

5. A final key feature of scandals is the potential harm to the reputation of a person that the allegation of scandalous behavior can cause. The issue of reputation allows one to understand why scandal or the threat of scandal is of such importance in politics. Reputation is a kind of resource, a symbolic capital, allowing politicians to build up legitimacy, to develop trust among audiences. Politicians must constantly use symbolic power to persuade.

Scandal can destroy this resource, which is why scandals are often characterized by struggles for one's name, denials, appeal to higher values, open confession, or downplaying the importance of the scandal.

Consequences of Political Scandal

Media coverage of political scandal begins a battle to stigmatize an individual in order to confer an inferior moral status on them. Scholars have thought about the consequences of political scandals in a number of ways.

First, the "no-consequence theory" views political scandal as the ephemeral product of media culture. Scandals entertain, divert the populace, and cause inconvenience to public figures but have no enduring consequences.

Second, the "functionalist theory" regards scandal as a mechanism for reinforcing existing social norms and conventions. Scandal is essentially conservative in its impact, acting as a marker for the boundaries of acceptable public behavior that, once crossed, are reaffirmed by the real and significant consequences of scandal.

Third, the "trivialization theory" considers the proliferation of scandal coverage as testimony to the decline of the public sphere. The Habermassian notion of the public sphere as the critical-rational domain of orientative public discourse is, in this view, undermined and impoverished by political scandals. Critics see three processes at work that combine to convert politics into a spectator sport for a cynical public, namely:

1. Privatization of the public sphere. Distinctions are no longer drawn between what constitutes private affairs from public ones.
2. Tabloidization of the media. Issue-based, analytical reporting is replaced by sensational journalism.
3. Personalization of politics. The decline of political parties and of the importance of ideology leads to an increasing emphasis on the personalities of public figures rather than the policies they advocate.

Fourth, the "carnival theory" regards scandal as subverting the power and privilege of elites to the general merriment of the populace. The topsy-turvy world of carnival breaks into the political realm, increasing the general quota of skepticism with which the public views its political class.

Fifth, there is the journalists' account of the impact of political scandal, derived from a view of journalism's function as the "Fourth Estate," the watchdog of the public interest. Here political scandals mobilize public indignation, which in turn forces action by policymakers. In this account, scandals form part of the journalism of outrage that is underpinned by the social responsibility model of the press.

Finally, Thompson's social theory of scandal locates the power of political scandals in their ability to damage reputation and undermine trust, both of which comprise the necessary symbolic capital of contemporary public figures. Political scandal strikes at the root of symbolic power because of the conditions of mediated visibility in which public figures must operate. This approach has considerable force: it posits the impact of scandal on an individual level (the loss of reputation of this or that politician) and, more significantly, on a systemic level. Survey data in liberal democracies indicate deepening public distrust of government and low esteem for politicians, and this is taken as grounds for considering that political scandals corrode trust.

Each of these approaches has weaknesses. The trials, resignations, and procedural reform seen in Spain, Italy, and the U.K. in the 1990s provide sufficient evidence to show that political scandals do have consequences. The functionalist approach fails to take into account the way in which political scandal can underline moments of uncertainty and crisis regarding prevalent norms and conventions. Many scandals arise in areas of uncertainty about norms.

The trivialization model provides a variant on the theme that liberal democratic societies are suffering from "media malaise," the argument that the news media's practices are bringing about civic disengagement, one that remains unproven.

The carnival theory provides an attractive and partly convincing account of the consequences of a particular genre of scandal (for example, the Clinton/Lewinsky affair, various British sex scandals). However, it fails to account for serious political scandal such as corruption in Nigeria or death squads in Spain.

The Fourth Estate approach establishes political scandal and its consequences as a function of the media. This approach implies, first, that there is only as much reporting of scandal as is provided by the politicians, and, second, that the media's exposure of wrongdoing is the trigger for policy action through the pressure of public outrage. Both these assumptions are suspect. The first begs the question as to what counts as political scandal. Sexual and financial scandals are not givens (the absence of sexual scandal in many countries demonstrates this), nor are all clear-cut cases of them exposed by the media (as the nonreporting of John F. Kennedy's adultery shows). The second element of the argument has scant evidence to support it. Scholars have shown that even if the revelation of scandal does prompt public outrage—not always the case—public policy changes are more reliant on prepublication transactions between journalists and policymakers than on public response, leading them to speak of a "democracy without citizens."

Attempts to frame the argument solely in terms of media effects, a cause-and-effect relationship between media content and effects on policy and/or public opinion indicators, seem doomed to failure. It may be that that a more fruitful approach is to examine what journalists do in scandal coverage.

First, they disclose information perceived as negative about an individual or institution. Second, they give publicity to this information. Third, they place this information in a narrative frame.

It is in the power to disclose, publicize, and frame perceived misdemeanors that the power of the press can be located. Political scandals are perhaps best understood as open processes with unpredictable consequences that can only be understood by taking fully into account the cultural, institutional, and temporal contexts in which they occur.

The Narrative Power of the Media

Political scandals imply wide and public knowledge of certain actions or events made possible by processes of communication, and here the media play a key role. Scholars have considered that the media have become excessively fixated on political scandal coverage to the exclusion of more serious political reporting. There may be a number of reasons for this.

First, political scandals sell newspapers and increase audiences. Scandals provide the sort of stories that have all the ingredients needed to attract audiences. They are vivid, racy, dramatic, and compelling. Second, the transformations wrought by the developments in communication media have produced a new form of visibility and publicness in the contemporary world, creating new opportunities as well as new problems and risks for political leaders. The "public president," who is engaged in a "permanent campaign," has become a continuous presence, literally constantly in the public eye. This allows a potential for damage to the reputation of the leader, which makes the media powerful in scandals and attracted to their coverage. Third, the media's own news values, skewed to the unusual and negative, ensure that political scandal will be attractive. Fourth, the media's capacity to fix symbolic content—we see before us Clinton saying, "I did not have sexual relations with that woman, Miss Lewinsky"—gives them an extraordinary central role in creating the compelling narratives of scandal.

Once a scandal begins to emerge, a whole process of mediated communication unfolds. This process, which consists of a set of subsequent revelations, reactions, accusations, and defenses, has a very specific characteristic: facts and events are told by journalists.

To narrate the story, journalists try to create a coherent whole, ordering facts and events within a cogent logic of space and time. But that logic has to be adjusted to the rhythms of media production.

The process of reporting scandal can be long and complex. Reporters might find that their information can not be confirmed, and the story might lose salience; a story might need to be reconceptualized as new information is received. In scandal stories, characters are created and qualities attributed. Stories have plots with turning points: they receive a specific temporal order to construct a coherent whole.

First, to create compelling stories and give them a coherent meaning, characters are identified in terms of villains and victims. Second, a plot or storyline is created. Third, the plot is related to drama. In preparing an investigative story, the journalist needs to allow the audience to make clear inferences about who is to be blamed for what. Moral language is used to characterize the wrongdoing for viewers or readers. Scandal narratives are full of terms like corrupt, wasteful, greedy, lazy, and shameful.

The drama is, fourth, moral drama. Scandal stories establish patterns of what is acceptable and what is not. As a result, political scandals become the center of public attention, and news coverage creates morality tales. A key characteristic of scandal tales is that whatever else they do, they always point to a moral. Scandal journalism mediates values through the exposition of wrongdoing and its consequences. Like morality tales, scandal stories implicitly recommend certain kinds of choice and action to members of the audience.

The extraordinary ordinariness that scandals capture, their airing of moral dilemmas in personalized, compelling narratives, make them into particularly engaging events but, for these reasons too, especially localized affairs. Mediated political scandals provide some knowledge of facts. Crucially they enact the drama of moral agency, and their stories become the stuff of social memory.

Political scandals are more than economic or ideological epiphenomena (which is, of course, not the same as saying that they are not put to economic and/or ideological use) in that they arise in and out of specific cultural contexts that are extremely influential in shaping the precise features of political scandal in different times and places. Political scandals are, then, examples of global phenomena that are at the same time highly local.

Karen Sanders and María José Canel

See also Framing; Political Corruption; Watergate

Further Readings

Canel, M. J., & Sanders, K. (2006). Morality tales: Political scandals and journalism in Britain and Spain in the 1990s. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press.

Della Porta, D., & Mény, Y. (Eds.). (1997). Democracy and corruption in Europe. London & Washington: Pinter.

Garment, S. (1991). Scandal: The crisis of mistrust in American politics. New York: Times Books.

Lull, J., & Hinerman, S. (Eds.). (1997). Media scandals. London: Polity Press.

Ridley, F. F., & Doig, A. (Eds.). (1995). Sleaze: Politicians, private interests and public reactions (pp. 31–41). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Schudson, M. (1992). Watergate in American memory. New York: Basic Books.

Thompson, J. B. (2000). Political scandal: Power and visibility in the media age. Cambridge, UK: Polity.

Tumber, H., & Waisbord, S. (2004). Political scandals and media across democracies, Volume I and II. American Behavioral Scientist, 47(8) & (9).

Political Socialization

The concept of political socialization embodies an unresolved tension in how theorists think about the processes by which a democratic culture renews itself. Political socialization is conventionally understood as a kind of generational inheritance in which societal "agents" such as families, schools, and media transmit civic knowledge and attitudes to youth. The promotion of values such as a commitment to voting and trust in government is thought to ensure the stability of a democratic regime. However, this top-down, "enculturation" perspective tends to view children and young adults as passive recipients of political influence. Recent research in political communication offers evidence that challenges the enculturation paradigm and points instead to civic learning as a developmental dynamic in which youth potentially exhibit a good deal of autonomy and initiative in political learning once motivated to monitor news media and to exchange opinions. In this "empowerment" framework, youth test out options for civic identity in deliberative activities that allow them to evaluate and to integrate perspectives from teachers, friends, parents, and siblings.

The Primacy of Parents

The principle that moral education should encompass training for active citizenship is evident in the prescriptions of Aristotle and Plato. However, the Greek philosophers were doubtful (if not scornful) of the inherent proclivities of youth for participatory competence. The notion that society must work actively to transform children into civically competent adults became the original motivation for establishing a public school system in the United States.

However, empirical research on political socialization did not commence until the middle of the 20th century. This early scholarship assumed that the family was the primary agent through which a political system prepares children for civic participation. In the 1960s and ’70s, parents were imagined as powerful role models: children were thought to observe parental cues and to internalize the same attitudes and orientations to politics. The structure of family relations was described as a mini-polity in itself, whereby proper behavior would be learned and transferred from the home to the larger culture. By respecting the authority of parents, children would develop respect for and trust in institutions such as law enforcement and the electoral system. In operational terms, scholars measured socialization outcomes as the extent to which parents and children held similar attitudes about politics and adopted the same partisan loyalties.

Researchers tended to focus on children rather than adolescents or young adults. According to the “primary principle,” lessons learned in early childhood endure in the shaping of behavior and attitudes into the adult years. For example, political party identification was viewed as essentially as a fixed orientation, acquired from parents and held consistently throughout a lifetime in most cases.

Theorists of this era generally believed that schools also played an important role in political socialization, albeit supplemental to parents. Other agents of influence, such as mass media and peer groups, were considered secondary. As communication scholar Jack McLeod observed, the top-down, transmission view of school and family influence reflected the anxiety of the Cold War years, marked by a preoccupation with the need to preserve democracies. Activism and provocations of the 1960s eroded much of the social homogeneity that held sway during the Eisenhower presidency (1952–1960), but the youth counterculture seemed to reinforce the desire of political scientists to demonstrate empirically how schools and families might preserve diffuse support for democracy. Political socialization was viewed as the adoption of norms, values, and behaviors accepted within a political system. In this view, children were essentially inert in civic learning; they simply absorbed a unified and culturally agreed upon a set of facts, behaviors, and beliefs.

In retrospect, it is not surprising that the heyday of political socialization research was short-lived given such an instrumental view of children as successfully socialized when they supported the political system or agreed with parents. Data collection peaked in the 1960s, and by the 1970s many scholars were abandoning the field for more promising fields of political behavior research. Scholars had failed to find consistent patterns of attitudinal matching between parents and adolescent children.

Other researchers concentrated on evaluating the effects of schools in formal civic education, and once again the results were disappointing. Schools appeared to be mostly irrelevant in political development outside of the direct transmission of information from lesson plans and textbooks. Still, the non-results were puzzling in that sociological factors such as ethnicity, years of formal education, and socioeconomic status (SES) are predictive of political interest among adults. The microsocial mechanisms of interpersonal influence and learning in families, classrooms, and peer groups were yet to be discovered.

Communication in Civic Development

Against this backdrop of disappointing findings, communication scholars began to investigate effects from media while applying a more interactive approach to family life. Outside the realm of political socialization, media theorists were debating the merits of a once-dominant perspective known as “limited effects.” The view of minimal media influence emerged out of the research of Paul Lazarsfeld. His voter studies of the 1940s seemed to show that adults are influenced more by peer groups than by media when making voting decisions. More generally, citizens could resist or avoid media influence through selective exposure to media content. Media merely reinforced preexisting beliefs about politics, according to the limited effects paradigm.

By the 1970s, political communication scholars such as Steven Chaffee were arguing that the media reinforcement presumption did not make sense when applied to youth civic development. Children did not possess fully formed attitudes in the first place. In media-saturated environments of the late 20th century, youth were potentially exposed to a milieu of political information, opinions, and perspectives. In survey research, children themselves identified media as more important than parents or teachers as influences on their views about politics.

Youth impressions of relative influence were confirmed in parallel research. In experimental and survey studies, investigators sought to disentangle the multiple effects of teachers, parents, gender, age, and ethnicity to gauge media contributions. Researchers found that, despite controlling for the impacts of parents and family demographics, attention to news accounted for gains in adolescents' knowledge of current affairs as well as more fundamental knowledge of the political system. Other research showed that media provide raw material for youth discussion about politics with parents and friends. Beyond effects on knowledge, partisan opinions, and interpersonal communication, media contribute to children's support for the electoral system and support for other prosocial, democratic values. Attention to news, and subsequent observations of political actors and institutions, prompts many children to imagine their future as voters and activists.

With media contribution to political socialization generally established, theorists turned to identifying the distinct learning functions of different media and the specific conditions of influence. Theorists proposed that television, despite its superficial coverage of issues, is in some respects more important than print media with regard to civic development. Broadcast news stories are easier to comprehend and more engaging visually for younger audiences. Children can pick up on discrete bits of knowledge, such as the names of candidates during elections. For both children and adult immigrants to a new country, television operates as a bridge into the political world.

Children would ideally "graduate" on to newspaper reading during adolescence to gain from the more substantive depictions of political issues and controversies. The acquisition of a newspaper-reading habit during the teenage years is highly predictive of adult participation in politics, as youthful readers integrate various perspectives, connect the cognitive dots, and develop sophisticated opinions.

As scholars have designed improved measures of media use, they have been more successful in documenting media influence. For example, mere exposure, or time spent with news media, is marginally associated with youth gains in knowledge and opinion formation. Active, purposeful attention to news content leads to more efficient learning and motivation for talking about politics with parents and friends.

Another important distinction for political socialization is entertainment programming versus news shows. These content categories have blurred in recent decades, but the bulk of evidence suggests that excessive television viewing is accompanied by political apathy, ignorance, and cynicism among youth. There are many psychological constructs that could help to explain why general TV viewing inhibits civic development, but part of the answer is time displacement. Studies of generational differences show that young people today spend more time plopped in front of television. This leaves less time for social activities that cultivate interpersonal trust and communication skills—orientations that could be applied later in life to civic engagement. Generational differences represent what some call a "reverse gap" for media use. Older citizens pay more attention to news media, but young Americans consume more entertainment media. Unfortunately, this dynamic is not simply the result of life cycle changes whereby we can be confident that the current generation of youth will give up a heavy entertainment diet for news content once they get older.

The widespread avoidance of news media among youth is unprecedented, and reflects more generally a historic erosion of youth interest in public affairs and electoral participation.

Survey research on college freshmen, for instance, cast a bleak portrait for the future of participatory democracy in the United States. The following indicators of civic engagement have all diminished by about one-half since the 1960s: acquiring political knowledge, discussing politics with friends, and believing that keeping up with politics is important. The problem is more complex than simply a lack of youth interest in political media. Political scientists refer to the "start-up" costs of civic engagement: Young adults are busy with completing formal education, finding jobs, moving frequently, and searching for a spouse. Young adults are also less likely than their parents and grandparents to identify strongly with a political party. Without a psychological investment in a party, or without some other ideological loyalty, there is little motivation to keep up with public affairs.

These trends are troubling, to the say the least, because regular attention to news is the fuel of spontaneous conversation about politics in everyday life. When young people are not motivated to talk about public affairs and lack the information and perspectives to engage in meaningful conversations, other civic dispositions associated with deliberative democracy remain dormant. Interpersonal orientations such as respectful listening, the gumption to voice unpopular opinions, and a willingness to compromise derive from habitual political discussion. Some theorists contend that a culture of intolerance, incivility, and hyperpartisanship is the inevitable result of a society in which youth are not encouraged to express themselves politically and to pay attention to news media that might challenge preexisting beliefs.

Crisis or Opportunity?

While scholars have described youth disengagement as a crisis for participatory democracy, we should keep in mind that every generation of adults tends to project its fears about the future on to the younger members of society. Just as Plato's philosophy of moral education reflected anxiety about the civic competence of youth, many activists and educators worry about the meager levels of political interest among neophyte citizens.

A vigorous debate in contemporary scholarship circles around the question as to whether youth are really apathetic, or whether they are instead eschewing traditional modes of electoral participation while adopting new forms of active citizenship. Empirical studies show that while many young adults do not relate to politics via party identification and voting, volunteering is more common than in previous generations of youth. Reflecting and reinforcing this trend is the incorporation of service learning as a regular part of high school and college curricula.

Adolescents and young adults are also more likely to participate in new media compared with older cohorts. Interactive media such as the blogosphere constitute densely interconnected discussion venues that represent, at least theoretically, the opportunity to revive a culture of deliberative engagement. Scholars are currently investigating whether the kind of interpersonal trust and social capital associated with face-to-face interaction is also generated in online communities. If so, new media might constitute an arena for civic development with possibilities yet to be imagined. Online media are also increasingly used in political mobilization of young adults, as evident in the Howard Dean campaign for president in 2004.

Certainly the notion of youth as permanently disengaged is overwrought. Concepts such as apathy and cynicism are exaggerated characterizations of how youth relate to politics. To be sure, curricula reforms and media innovations are needed so that educators and activist can better comprehend the possibilities for how political communication might animate the civic imagination of youth. Recent research identifies some hopeful strategies:

- In some media literacy programs, students learn how to critique political news. By assessing journalistic bias or by checking out claims in campaign advertisements and candidate debates, adolescents become more sophisticated about media, politics, and how these two domains interact in a democratic system.

- Political satire is immensely popular with college students, who respond to an irreverent and comical take on the serious business of politics. Scholars are beginning to explore the ways in which satire might contribute to civic awareness and inclinations to participate in politics.

- Civic education at the high school level is potentially effective, despite the early research that showed minimal influence. Adolescents are easily bored by the traditional approach of rote memorization of textbook material. However, when they are invited to participate in classroom debates and discussions about controversial issues, they develop peer norms for skillful political communication. Just as deliberative theory would predict, adolescents become motivated to acquire knowledge from media as they prepare for classroom discussions.

- Prior research has tended to examine effects of one socializing agent at a time, as when studies investigate learning within the contexts of schools, families, or peer groups. But recent studies point to elevated influences possible when these spheres interact. For example, classroom discussions about politics motivate students to engage parents in conversations and the resulting discussions lead to increased news media use as a regular feature of family life. In this scenario, students essentially turn political socialization theory upside down, as they put the onus on parents to become more civically aware. Educational initiatives that involve the entire family—rather than individual students—are examples of synergistic innovations that offer an optimistic view of the prospects for democratic renewal.

These strategies have all proven to be successful, and they are all based on the premise that political socialization is not a matter of top-down influence. Youth are themselves the most important agent of civic development. When they actively interact with family members, friends, and media, the result is civic empowerment rather than the passive internalization of attitudes and behavior handed down by elders.

Michael McDevitt

See also Deliberation; Kids Voting USA; New Media Technologies; Party Identification; Political Engagement; Political Knowledge; Rock the Vote; Youth Voting

Further Readings

Atkin, C. (1981). Communication and political socialization. In D. Nimmo & K. Sanders (Eds.), The handbook of political communication (pp. 299–328). Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Bennett, S. E. (1997). Why young Americans hate politics, and what we should do about it. PS: Political Science & Politics, 30, 47–52.

Center for Information & Research on Civic Learning & Engagement. (2003). The civic mission of schools. New York: CIRCLE and Carnegie Corporation.

Langton, K. P., & Jennings, M. K. (1968). Political socialization and the high school civics curriculum in the United States. American Political Science Review, 62, 852–857.

McDevitt, M., & Chaffee, S. H. (2002). From top-down to trickle-up influence: Revisiting assumptions about the family in political socialization. Political Communication, 19, 281–301.

McLeod, J. (2000). Media and civic socialization of youth. Journal of Adolescent Health, 27(2), 45–51.

Niemi, R. G., & Junn, J. (1998). Civics education: What makes students learn. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Political Spin

See Spin, Political

Political Trust

See Political Disaffection

Politics, Policy, Polity

How much do the terms politics, policy, and polity differ from one another and how helpful is their distinction for the research on political communication? In Anglo-American technical terminology, each of these terms describes a different nuance of the political.

- Polity is used in the sense of "community." The term comes from the Greek word polis and includes not only the city state, but also other forms of politically organized societies such as the nation-state and the empire.
- Politics describes the theory and practice of the power struggle between the players inside the polity. It constitutes the core of the political system.
- Policy aims at the planned formation of social domains such as economy, environment, or education through collectively binding decisions ("policy making"). With this functional perspective the output and outcome respectively come to the fore and provide the opportunity to differentiate between individual political domains (e.g., social policy, foreign policy) and individual phases of the policy cycle (from the articulation of interests to the evaluation of policy).

The English terms have entered the German technical terminology as foreign words and constitute general common distinctions of the generic term Politik. However, as three coequal dimensions of the political, the terms are referred to one another more systematically and are disassociated more explicitly than it is the case in the Anglo-Saxon technical terminology:

- Polity describes the formal dimension of Politik. It includes the framework of institutions, that is, the political order in which political action has to take place. One example is the competences of individual governmental authorities specified in the constitution.
- Politics describes the process-related dimension of Politik, the conflict about decisions between the political players, for example, between the parties.

- Policy describes the substantial dimension of Politik; that is, the organization of individual social problem areas through obliging decisions, for example, about the distribution of resources.

This differentiation has proven quite helpful in the research on political communication. The three dimensions are used in order to distinguish between political attitudes. Attitudes can refer to individual policies such as the introduction of the Euro or the environmental policy of the government. Or they refer to single players and their debates, for example, the competition between parties or the predominance of interest groups ("politics"). Or attitudes are analyzed that refer to the political system in general, such as contentment with democracy as a form of government or with the possibilities to influence political decisions ("efficacy"). This, then, is tangent to the dimension of polity.

In content analyses of political media offerings, it is also helpful to distinguish which range the media dedicate to substantial political problems (e.g., effects of tax laws), to political conflicts (e.g., conflict in the government), and to general questions of the political order (e.g., constitutional conformity of a regulation).

Different explanatory approaches for phenomena of political communication, such as the political agenda or the framing of certain issues, are the result of this distinction. When, for example, it is to be explained why a conflict is pictured differently in two nations, the respective functional requirements and possibilities can be the cause or the different institutional general conditions or the respective miscellaneous disputes of the political actors.

Gerhard Vowe

Further Readings

Almond, G. A., & Powell, G. B. (Eds.). (1988). Comparative politics today: A world view. Glenview, IL: Scott, Foresman.

Mols, M., Lauth, H.-J., & Wagner, C. (Eds.). (2001). Politikwissenschaft: Eine Einführung [Political science: An introduction] (3rd ed.). Paderborn, Germany: Ferdinand Schöningh.

Wolling, J. (1999). Politikverdrossenheit durch Massenmedien? Der Einfluss der Medien auf die Einstellungen der Bürger zur Politik [Political disaffection through the mass media? The influence of the media on citizens' attitudes toward politics]. Opladen, Germany: Westdeutscher Verlag.

Politics, The

See ARISTOTLE

Polls

Polls are a useful method for collecting information about the public's opinions, attitudes, and behavior in a variety of political contexts. Good-quality polling results in information that describes these attributes of a relevant population to which inferences can be drawn from the sample of the respondents who were interviewed. Polls and surveys are employed by political campaigns, news organizations, and interest groups who want to understand the public's reactions to actual or potential events in order to develop strategy, report on current events, or contribute to the development of public policy.

A poll is a form of data collection that typically involves a sample of respondents, drawn to represent an underlying relevant population, who are asked a standardized series of questions in a fixed form. The results are analyzed for the entire sample, with inferences drawn back to the population from which it was drawn, as well as for specific subsamples that represent subgroups in the population. In some cases, the relevant population is well known and easily operationalized, as in the case of "adults age 18 and over residing in telephone households." But in other cases, the relevant population has to be constructed during the course of the interview, as in the case of "likely voters."

Polls and the news media have been closely linked ever since the start of commercial polling in the 1930s. In this initial period, many pollsters built the commercial, private side of their businesses by having a relationship with news organizations that would distribute the results of their polls of public opinion and build the visibility of their firms. This was true of George Gallup, who produced a syndicated newspaper column, and Elmo Roper, who started out doing quarterly polls for Fortune magazine. They anchored their public work around their performances during presidential election campaigns; their general success in estimating those outcomes, leaving aside the 1948 election, validated the method and increased its public acceptance. In the 1960s, major news organizations formed partnerships to conduct their own polls, linking large circulation metropolitan dailies and national television networks.

In the 1970s, broadcast networks were engaged in a contest with newspapers about the nature and content of election night coverage. The networks began to develop the exit poll methodology as a way to capture the views of voters leaving the polls to support immediate coverage of who won and why. Up until this time, newspapers had been the primary source of information about elections, although the full tabulation of the votes would often not be available until Wednesday's or Thursday's editions. This exit polling technique transformed the coverage of elections by providing more immediate information and fuller analyses of what happened and why. Exit polls did not come without controversy, however.

Polls in Political Campaigns

Campaigns rely upon polls for intelligence as well as an assessment of the effectiveness of their strategy. They collect their own data to provide different kinds of information at different stages of the campaign. The release of information from public polls also can have an effect on the campaign.

Polls form an integral element of the research function of the campaign that also includes analyses of potential opponents and their records, historical voting patterns in the constituency, and assessments of advertising content and its effectiveness. Polling consultants may conduct benchmark polls before the campaign starts to set a baseline for a candidate's standing and how it has to be improved or sustained. There are also polls conducted after key events in the campaign, such as major speeches or debates, and tracking polls that measure the relative standing of the candidates, especially at the end of the campaign.

The relative standing of a candidate in the polls can have important consequences for the campaign. It is an indicator of viability early in the campaign and electability later. Early on, this standing can be a function primarily of name recognition, but it also has an effect on the flow of contributions, volunteers, and the quality of consultants who sign up for the campaign. Electability and viability in turn affect the quality and quantity of news coverage that candidates receive, so poll standing contributes in an important way to coverage as well. While many of the impacts of polls on a campaign are seen as negative, there can also be positive equivalents. For example, when the polls show one candidate way ahead, there are concerns about depressing turnout in a "no contest" race. But at the same time, polls that show a race is "too close to call" can have a stimulating effect on turnout.

One of the different ways that campaigns use polls involves their sampling procedures. In many cases, campaign strategists are not interested in the entire electorate, especially strong partisans who support their opponent. They may interview samples of undecided or uncommitted voters or of their own weak supporters in order to determine what kinds of issues or approaches can move them to become strong supporters. So these polls produce results that are not generalizable to the normal adult population or even the likely electorate. Nevertheless, the campaign may leak such results to the press in order to make the candidate's standing look better than it actually is or than it appears in other published polls.

Polls Used by News Media

Polls are attractive to news organizations because they support their tendency to cover campaigns and elections through sporting metaphors and "horserace" coverage and as a way to stem losses in audience size and share. Both of these functions are important to the way that news is currently covered.

Elections have a special attraction for news organizations because they encompass so many attributes of newsworthiness. In the case of a presidential election, for example, there is a high-impact event involving conflict that occurs on a regular schedule. This allows news organizations to allocate resources and adjust those allocations as events take place. The campaigns also include willing sources who are happy to be interviewed and quoted. Polls contribute to these interests by providing scientific and precise measures of where the candidates stand and how that has changed. And at the same time, they provide a distinctive and independent voice for the electorate about how they are reacting to the candidates and their campaigns.

Thinking about the "old" form of campaign coverage, the articles leading up to Election Day would often involve quotations from party leaders and campaign officials about what was going to take place. These strategists always had a particular "spin" to impart to their comments about how. Patterns of turnout and the preferences of specific subgroups of the population were difficult to discern. The use of key precincts could help where homogeneous subgroups had distinct residential patterns so that the behavior of groups of voters by race or size of place of residence could be analyzed. But the advent of exit polls provided the key for news organizations to analyze the preferences of more meaningful subgroups, such as men or women or even voters who held different attitudes about abortion.

Use of Polls by the Government

Government agencies have given increasing weight to citizen input since the advent of environmental impact statements. This means that the views of potentially affected citizens had to be taken into account when government projects were being considered. These impacts were often measured by ethnographic techniques and focus groups. But as the costs of data collection dropped with the advent of telephone interviewing, then surveys of individuals gained an increasing role in evaluating citizens' reactions.

Public polls often provide other kinds of important information on referenda and initiatives, also a growing phenomenon in contemporary politics as risk-averse legislators demonstrate increasing reluctance to take on tough policy questions in legislative debate and pass laws. When this is combined with a different set of strategies from interest groups who want to push their own agendas through petition drives to get issues on the ballot, voters are often faced with an increasing number of issues to vote on without very much guidance about what is at stake or how their fellow citizens are reacting to the issues. The availability of public polls on such issues can inform both government agencies and officials about how citizens will feel about and react to such plebiscites.

One way that polls are not used by elected officials is to help them adopt positions on specific issues. Most candidates for office have a history of speeches and even votes on a wide range of issues, and they cannot turn their back on those, or "flip flop," based upon the results of current polls. Recent incumbent presidents have maintained extensive polling operations, usually through their national party committees, so they are always well informed about where the public stands on important issues of the day. And the availability of public polls from media organizations also provides important information in this regard. While poll results may sometimes indicate the best way that discussion of an issue can be framed in terms of the officials' personal beliefs or past history, there is little evidence that they adopt different positions based upon them.

Use of Polls by Interest Groups

Interest groups use polls to collect information in their attempts to influence public policy and legislation. Polling data can be used to represent the views of citizens, to describe their policy preferences, and to assess their reactions to proposed policies. Interest groups collect this kind of information to inform the discussion and debate surrounding these kinds of issues, as interest group leaders use it to produce press releases and support testimony before legislative hearings. Since interest groups are organized to the represent collective views of their membership, polls provide a convenient and relevant way to describe such views.

In most cases, interest groups contract for polls conducted by private polling firms. In this way, they get to build their argument based partly on the legitimacy and record of the polling firm they hire. But sometimes interest groups use "pseudo-polls" to boost their membership or as a fundraising technique. When interest groups engage in Fund Raising Under the Guise of polls ("frugging") or Solicitation/Selling Under the Guise of polls ("sugging"), they engage in a form of deception that has been outlawed by the American Association for Public Opinion Research (AAPOR), the Council of American Survey Research Organizations (CASRO), and the Marketing Research Association (MRA).

Public Reactions to Polls

Research shows that the public has a variety of interests in poll results, although they have a very limited ability to evaluate the methodology of any specific poll as it might relate to its accuracy. There are two separate dimensions of this interest: one is related to political communication in the sense of providing information about mass preferences of citizens to their government. The second dimension reflects the entertainment value of polls and the information they can provide about how other citizens are thinking about issues and policies.

As part of this second function, polls can provide information about popular or majority views as well as unpopular or minority views. When this phenomenon is at work, it can produce a "spiral of silence" by which those who hold minority views become less willing to express them in public. In election campaigns, momentum refers to how citizens react to campaign events, including recent primary and caucus results or the outcome of debates. Potential voters who do not have any preference for a candidate can look to polls for guidance. In one circumstance, such voters may choose to support the frontrunner in the polls, responding with a "bandwagon effect." However, others may make a sympathetic gesture in support of the trailing candidate, resulting in an "underdog effect." These effects are very difficult to measure, as they represent countervailing forces in the electorate and would tend to cancel each other out in any cross-sectional survey. Furthermore, they are both difficult concepts to operationalize because they represent a shift over time from an initial position of "no preference" or a weak preference to eventual support at the polls. This implies the assembly of panel data in order to measure such change, a research design not commonly employed in the public polls.

The TV networks' use of exit polls to project vote results since the 1970s has consistently created public concerns about invasion of privacy, because citizens want to be left on their own to make up their minds at the end of the campaign, as well as about the suppression of turnout among West Coast voters who have not voted yet when the networks call the winner before their polls close. This is also a difficult research issue to address, because it is the combination of the Electoral College assignment of all of a state's votes to the winning candidate and the timing of poll closings across the United States that underlie such concerns, not even considering the guarantees of freedom of the press under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. What is more troubling to some is that the effects of calling the presidential race based on the turnout for offices lower down the ballot is that people are dissuaded from voting for president. The research on these effects is mixed at best, suggesting there is little or no such effect.

Michael W. Traugott

See also Horserace Coverage; News Coverage, Politics; Polls; Public Opinion; Voter Behavior

Further Readings

Frankovic, K. F. (in press). Exit polls and pre-election polls. In W. Donsbach & M. W. Traugott (Eds.), The SAGE handbook of public opinion research. London: Sage.

Steeper, F. (in press). The use of voter research in campaigns. In W. Donsbach & M. W. Traugott (Eds.), The SAGE handbook of public opinion research. London: Sage.

Traugott, M. W., & Lavrakas. P. J. (2004). The voter's guide to election polls (3rd ed.). Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Pooled Journalism

The term pooled journalism refers to the journalistic coverage of events, particularly international conflicts and wars, by a comparatively small and therefore controllable group of reporters. In the United States, the Department of Defense (DOD) established in 1987 the so-called DOD National Media Pool as a system designed to control media accessibility to American troops. Consequently, pooled journalism may be defined as a technique of political or military censorship. In a broader meaning, the term pooled journalism is also applied to describe news-gathering organizations pooling their resources in the collection of news. A video pool or pool feed, for instance, is then distributed to members of the pool who are free to edit it.

The setting up of media pools as a method of censorship first came to be used in 1989, when the Pentagon selected about a dozen reporters to cover the U.S. invasion of Panama. These journalists were not permitted to accompany troops into the combat zone but were restricted to an airport in Panama until nearly all fighting ended. The emergence of pooled journalism is connected to tensions between U.S. media and military created in and after the Vietnam War. When the war ended, many in the military blamed the press for "losing Vietnam." Since then American political leaders and high-ranking military personnel favored tight media policies in subsequent conflicts.

In the second Gulf War, in 1991, the Pentagon authorized several "press pools," allowing a selected number of reporters to travel to the "front" under the supervision of media escorts, usually U.S. military public affairs officers. News organizations and journalists willing to join the pool system were required to observe numerous ground rules outlining categories of information that could not be reported on (e.g., troop deployments, weapon systems) and spelling out the methods of information gathering that reporters were restricted to. Interviews, for instance, could only be conducted in the presence of a military escort, and pool dispatches had to first pass through the "military security review system" that was organized and controlled by the American military's Joint Information Bureau in Saudi Arabia.

The pool-and-review system later was criticized by scholars and media organizations as an illegal "prior restraint" (censoring of material before its publication) violating the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, even though a majority of Americans, for the most part, had supported the military's control of the press during the second Gulf War. It took, however, until the 2003 war against Iraq before the U.S. military replaced the system of pooled journalism with current "news management" techniques, including the embedding of journalists into combat troops. Scholars interested in pooled journalism especially described the media pool system as a component of military public relations or looked at the effects of this form of censorship on news coverage.

Martin Löffelholz

See also Embedded Journalists; Gulf War, Media Coverage of; War Coverage

Further Readings

Committee on Governmental Affairs. (1990). DOD [Department of Defense] National Media Pool Ground Rules [Reissuance of April 13, 1990, Rules]. Hearings before the Committee on Governmental Affairs, August 1990, p. 289.

MacArthur, J. R. (1992). Second front: Censorship and propaganda in the Gulf War. New York: Hill & Wang.

Newhagen, J. E. (1994). The relationship between censorship and the emotional and critical tone of television news coverage of the Persian Gulf War. Journalism Quarterly, 71(1), 32–42.

Sharkey, J. (2001). War, censorship and the First Amendment: The military has replaced outright control of war reporting with "news management" techniques. Media Studies Journal, 15(1), 20–25.

Populism

Populism is a notoriously vague concept, and scholars of populism frequently mention its polysemic and elusive, chameleon-like nature. It was defined as an ideology, a doctrine, a mentality, a system of ideas and a political style, also a rhetoric, demagogy, and discourse, or as a number of concrete historical movements. Thus many advocate speaking of populism in the plural and prefer examining each concrete case individually.

Indeed, there are very specific and idiosyncratic characteristics to the Narodnichestvo of agrarian Russia, the populiusmo of Argentinean descamisados ("the shirtless people"), the American farmers movement, and even the supporters of Joerg Heider in Austria or Jean-Marie Le Pen in France at the beginning of the 21st century. There are, however, some common denominators to all of these historical phenomena and analytical concepts. They are all an appeal to the people against both the established structure of power and the dominant ideas and values of society.

Populism basically distinguishes between the people, el pueblo, and the social groups in power, the elites. It regards the pueblo as the incarnation of the authentic nation—the good, the just, the virtuous, and the moral—while despising the oligarchy for representing evil, the foreign, the unjust. It therefore aspires to reestablish the mythical unified community of the past.

The other crucial element of populism is the centrality of the leader. He is the one who expresses the nation and embodies its spirit; he represents all that is good and beautiful in the nation. Therefore, he is qualified to maintain a more autocratic system of government than liberal representative democracy.

Thus populism has a radical nature. It opposes the liberal concept of democracy, which emphasizes separation of powers, political parties, representative institutions, civil rights, and pluralism. It also challenges the established powers and calls for their overthrow by, or the inclusion of, the counter-hegemonic bloc.

That is why populism is seen by its supporters as a positive concept, promoting the participation of the periphery within the political system and equal distribution of power in society. Its opponents, on the other hand, point to the ethnocentric, nationalist, xenophobic impulses; its antiparty and antiparliamentarian nature, and for being a system of political mobilization used by charismatic yet demagogic leaders.

Close to the turn of the 20th century, a new wave of populism spread in the world, similar to the previous wave of the 1960s. The new trend was descried as "neopopulism," "new populism," or "postpopulism." Besides the fact that in this phase populism moved from the left to the right, the new populism had a different economic orientation, and it strongly supported neoliberal economics.

Yet what is so peculiar to the new populism is the interrelationship with the media. Though populist leaders always had to use the mass media to connect with "the people," this time television and television culture became central to this political style, to such a degree that it justified the use of the term Telepopulism.

Indeed, the nature of contemporary media fosters populist values and populist leaders. They appeal to, and in the name of, the common (wo)man, engage emotions, promote popular culture and popular discourse, and encourage anti-intellectualism. They personify and personalize issues and have preference for style and packaging rather than substance. Consequently, the more people rely on television for political knowledge, the more they incline to a populist approach.

Yoram Peri

Further Readings

Peri, Y. (2004). Telepopulism: Media and politics in Israel. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Posters, Political

Political posters are visual means of communicating political messages to large audiences. A poster is a printed mass media product. Graffiti and murals do not qualify as posters, since one of the defining criteria for a poster is its mass reproducibility. While graffiti and murals only exist as single objects, attached to a specific place, posters are moveable objects produced in large quantities to cover a wide geographical area. The production of political posters is typically event related. Political events that regularly lead to poster production are election campaigns and also public relations campaigns as well as public protests and demonstrations. While political posters in the context of an electoral campaign have to be considered as paid media, protest posters produced for demonstrations or to express clandestine opposition are free media that have an end in itself and are not part of a larger, commercialized campaign.

Historically, the introduction of posters as political means of mass communication is linked to two developments: first, the invention of lithography at the end of the 18th century, which enabled the reproduction of visual motifs in large quantities; and, second, the political development of mass democracy in the 19th and 20th centuries, which created an audience for political posters.

Political posters are produced for the purpose of being displayed in public. In the United States, during the 1960s and 1970s, printed posters and billboards were largely replaced by televised commercials. Contemporary campaigns in the United States print posters, if at all, only in small numbers, and mainly as collector's items. Outside the United States, and particularly in Europe, the political campaign poster maintains its role as major campaign communication tool.

The poster's content or motif depends on the political context for which it is produced and in which it is displayed. The most pervasive motif is a candidate's headshot in the context of a political election campaign. The majority of political posters feature portraits. Thus, the election campaign poster is a specific, and in quantitative terms dominant, subcategory of the political poster.

History of Election Campaign Posters

Lithography, a printing technique from stone that uses the repulsion of water and grease for the reproduction of graphic images, was invented by the Bavarian printer Aloys Senefelder around 1796. This cheap and relatively fast technique to reproduce visuals spread quickly in Western Europe and was mainly used in art and in early forms of advertising. The political poster needed a second "fertilizer"—mass democracy—to flourish in the second half of the 19th century, which happened to be the United States of America as the world's first mass democracy. The first publication of a lithograph in the United States dates back to the year 1819. But, it took another 20 years until this printing technique became popular and the political campaign poster emerged to become a characteristic feature first of presidential campaigning, then of campaigning in general. While, for example, in France and Germany posters were already produced in the 19th century, those two countries were then still lacking the mass audiences at which political posters were targeted. Thus, the origin of the modern printed election poster is the U.S. presidential campaign. Four phases of the presidential campaign poster can be distinguished:

The Experimental Phase of U.S. Electoral Posters (1828–1840)

Elections and electioneering already existed in colonial America. Candidates for political offices used to solicit votes by providing the few eligible voters with a barbecue and, even more important, booze for free. The decades after independence showed marginal differences in colonial electioneering techniques. It was only during the 1820s that a larger enfranchisement of white male voters took place, and thus anonymous audiences had to be convinced of voting for the respective candidates. In many ways, running for office then could not be compared with today's campaigns. In the absence of visual and other means of entertainment, political campaigns were a spectacle that drew large crowds. Until the advent of the so-called Jacksonian democracy, termed after Democratic candidate and later President Andrew Jackson, most of the electioneering was direct oral communication involving long speeches. Andrew Jackson was the first political candidate who, in 1828, was also campaigning with visual reproductions of his portrait. In the early 19th century, when parties were still in formation and most political communication happened either orally or in writing, few people knew what the presidential candidate looked like. But opposition against Andrew Jackson was strong and the first poster-like print products—the Coffin Handbills scandalizing Andrew Jackson's military past and his alleged responsibility for the shooting of soldiers, who were symbolized by the coffins depicted on the broadside—could count as the first attack visuals in U.S. campaigning. This was in 1828. At that time the majority of the available woodcuts and etchings were limited in edition, and campaigns were local events that were lacking any centralized planning. This changed with the "Log Cabin and Hard Cider Campaign" of Whig presidential candidate William Henry Harrison in 1840. Trinkets and memorabilia were produced in large numbers, and many images helped to promote the myth of the wealthy plantation owner as a simple and hardworking farmer who grew up in a log cabin, drinking hard cider, and defending the interests of the common man. While campaign structures started to get organized and campaigning turned into a mass phenomenon with torchlight parades, marching bands, and an abundance of campaign memorabilia, the true heyday for campaign posters was yet to come, in the following 2 decades.

The Commercialization of the U.S. Campaign Poster Production (1844–1880)

While nowadays political posters and other campaign items are usually commissioned by the respective campaign, and in Europe by the political parties running campaigns, the invention of candidate portraits in poster format was owed to the commercial genius of America's early lithographers. Lithography as a trade blossomed in the 1840s and 1850s and kept its momentum until the end of the century, when color lithography, so-called chromolithographs were fashionable. Around 1860, a total of 60 operating firms employing 800 people were registered in the United States. Twenty years later the census of 1880 showed an increase to 167 lithography firms, employing a total of 4,332 people and a production volume of $6,912,338. The business kept growing, and toward the end of the 19th century, 700 lithograph companies were registered, with a total labor force of about 8,000 and a turnover of about $20 million annually. Given those figures, it comes as no surprise that in the 1840s small lithographic firms like the New York–based Currier & Ives were also offering political posters. From the perspective of 20th-century campaigning, where the differentiation of candidates is crucial, the similarities of opposing candidates' posters is surprising. For example, the only differences between the posters for the Whig presidential candidate Henry Clay and the competing Democratic candidate James K. Polk are the portraits and the accompanying names and slogans. The rest of the poster, including an American eagle, flags, floral ornaments and framing curtains, are identical. This was typical for the commercial period of the electoral poster, since these posters were meant to be sold by peddlers at very low price. The most expensive part of the poster production was the original design of the poster prepared by an artist. In presidential campaigns, those designs could be used twice by just exchanging the medallion-shaped portraits of the candidates, thus reduce production costs. These early campaign posters were meant to be posted indoors—in saloons, at the sheriff's office, and by the large partisan audience at home above the fireplace.

Mass Printing, Partisanship, and the U.S. Campaign Poster (1884–1948)

At the turn of the 19th century, the printing trade had reached its peak, and the professionalization of presidential campaigning had led to a reversal of the former commercial production structures of posters into commissioned products with distinct iconographic programs promoting both the candidate and the Republican or Democratic party symbols. These colorful posters had a larger format and were no longer meant for private display, but for adorning party rallies, work spaces, and public billboards, as well as street parades. The New Deal campaigns of Franklin D. Roosevelt employed artists such as Ben Shahn, who had formerly been working in the Work Progress Administration (WPA), to design posters and billboards for his campaign.

TV Commercials Take Over the Functions of Posters (1952–Present)

With the introduction of television commercials for Dwight D. Eisenhower's first presidential bid in 1952, posters became first old-fashioned, then too costly, and finally obsolete in modern U.S. campaigning. Television advertisements had many advantages. They provided a national reach at comparatively low costs, and they could convey more information in a short period of time. Still, the poster tradition lives on. Stereotypes of presidential candidates were long established in political posters before electronic communication was available. Thus, the U.S. presidential campaign poster can be termed the legitimate predecessors of contemporary TV and Internet commercials. The medium has changed, but the political messages vary only marginally, as can be demonstrated by the nine following types of visual campaign strategies, most of which are still applied in 21st-century campaigning.

Typology of U.S. Presidential Campaign Posters

A total of nine types of visual strategies in U.S. presidential campaigning can be distinguished. The first five strategies pertain to the candidate's personality, the other four to the issues advocated:

1. Strategy of silence
2. Hero strategy
3. Ancestor strategy
4. Common san strategy
5. Family strategy
6. Educational strategy
7. Negative strategy
8. Emotional strategy
9. Economic strategy

The strategy of silence is mostly used by presidents in office during their reelection campaigns. Presidents are usually portrayed in profile and from an angle below so that the distance between the president and ordinary people is implicit. A pictorial silence strategy was employed by Presidents Abraham Lincoln, William McKinley, and Ronald Reagan during their reelection campaigns. The hero strategy also tries to emphasize the distance and thus the authority of the candidate by focussing on his heroic war record, which is usually accompanied by an ancestor strategy, pointing out the predecessors in office that the candidate likes to be associated with. Contrary to those honorable and distant strategies, both the common man strategy and the family strategy aim at pointing to the humble origins of presidential candidates, trying to elicit identification and personal liking in the beholder of those images. The main purpose of these five personality strategies is to establish name recognition of the person, his or her face and looks, and the party and ideas the candidate stands for.

Of the four issue strategies, educational campaigning was prominent at the end of the 19th century, when whole platforms were printed in enormous numbers and the electorate preferred to read on the issues rather than being entertained with spectacles focussing on personality. The other three issue strategies are a staple of all presidential campaigns, the negative or attack strategy being the most notorious of the later 20th century. Emotional campaigning is not per se negative; it tries to establish a direct emotional link between the electorate and the candidate through strong visual symbols, while the economic strategy focuses on topics that have a direct impact on the financial and economic situation of the electorate. Posters like the colorful chromolithographs for William McKinley's 1900 gold standard campaign, rebutted by his Democratic opponent William Jennings Bryan, who favored the silver standard, used powerful visuals to communicate their differing political standpoints. This tradition is continued in the United States in the form of televised political commercials.

Campaign Posters in Germany and France

In Germany, to this day, publicly advertised billboards and posters illustrate the election campaign. Campaign posters still rank high in the mix of paid media used by German parties to communicate with the electorate. Although a slight decline in the importance of posters can be observed when comparing the campaigns 1998 and 2002, posters still featured second on the list of most important campaign communication tools, beaten only by party conventions in 1998 and by the then-newly introduced TV-Duelle ("television debates") in 2002. Since in the German public broadcasting system, television commercials of parties running in the general election are limited according to party size, but have to be aired for free (only on the private television channels does airtime have to be paid), TV ads are not dominating the German campaign communication and have not yet replaced the posters. Due to the electoral system in a parliamentary democracy, parties, not candidates, commission the posters and control the campaigns. The parties' logos as well as the party chairmen and chairwomen dominate the posters. But "Americanization" in terms of emotional and personality-oriented campaigning has left an imprint on German campaigns. Despite the fact that the German chancellor is elected by the German Parliament and not directly by the voting public, the two competing parties' candidates for the chancellor's office—the conservative Christian Democratic Union (CDU) and the center-left Social Democrats (SPD)—dominate the election posters. Another reason for the domination of personality images over policy issues on the poster is the limited time that the audience has for grasping the poster's meaning.

The colorful French tradition of political campaign was abruptly curbed by the so-called Loi Rocard in 1990, a law titled after then-French Prime Minister Michel Rocard that banned all forms of political advertising within the 3 months preceding an election, expressively including newspaper advertisements and commercial posters. The only possibility for displaying a poster in public during election time is in designated poster areas in the immediate vicinity of polling stations. Elaborate billboard campaigns like the one that brought President Mitterrand to power in 1980—La Force Tranquille (The "quiet strength"), drafted after the image of U.S. actor John Wayne—belong to the past. Thus, in contemporary French campaigning, posters no longer play a significant role.

Propaganda and Protest Posters

The 20th century, and particularly the two World Wars and the following Cold War, were the heyday of political posters. Posters were a crucial strategic tool of war propaganda on all sides. Communist regimes in the Soviet Union and in China perfected large billboard campaigns that were spread over vast territories, propagating the communist model of society.

Contemporary usage of political posters is, with few exceptions, concentrated outside of the Western and the developed world. For example, the use of posters of religious leaders, of victims of violence, and of terrorist "martyrs" in public rallies and demonstrations in the Near and Middle East is a scarcely researched topic. Additionally, in many non-Western countries election posters still play an important role that requires further investigation.

Posters are typically displayed in public, and the passers-by, or rather the drivers-by, have a very small amount of time in which to grasp the poster's visual message. Little is known about the effects and the perception of political posters by the audience. An experimental study using dummy posters of political candidates in a simulated German campaign found that the displayed candidates were perceived as either being competent or as being likeable. This incompatibility of inferred meanings on candidates' images is supported by a more recent experimental study on U.S. congressional candidates that did not, however, use poster displays.

Marion G. Müller

See also Americanization; American-Style Campaigning; Candidates and Their Images; Electoral Systems; Image, Political; Political Advertising; Presidential Communication; Willie Horton Ad

Further Readings

Art as activist: Revolutionary posters from Central and Eastern Europe. (1992). New York: Universe, Smithsonian Institution Traveling Exhibition Service.

Benoit, J.-M., Benoit, P., & Lech, J.-M. (1986). La politique à l'affiche. Affiches électorales and publicité politique 1965–1986 [Politics through posters: Campaign posters and political public relation 1965–1986.]. Paris: Éditions du May.

Brosius, H.-B., Holicki, S., & Hartmann, T. (1987). Der Einfluß der Gestaltungsmerkmale von Wahlplakaten auf Personenwahrnehmung und Kompetenzzuschreibung [The organizational influence of election posters and personal perception write ups]. Publizistik, 3, 338–353.

DeNoon, C. (1987). Posters of the WPA. Los Angeles: Wheatley Press.

Gervereau, L. (1991). La propagande par l'affiche [Propaganda in posters]. Paris Éditions Syros-Alternatives.
Gregory, G. H. (1993). Posters of World War II. New York: Gramercy Books.
Gunderson, R. G. (1957). The log cabin campaign. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press.
Jacobs, K., & Heller, S. (1992). Angry graphics: Protest posters of the Reagan/Bush era. Salt Lake City, UT: Peregrine Smith.
Marzio, P. C. (1979). The democratic art: Pictures for a nineteenth-century America: Chromolithography 1840–1900. Fort Worth, TX: Amon Carter Museum of Western Art.
Müller, M. G. (1997). Politische Bildstrategien im amerikanischen Präsidentschaftswahlkampf 1828–1996 [Political visual strategies in American presidential campaigns 1828–1996]. Berlin: Akademie Verlag.
Müller, M. G. (2002). Parteienwerbung im Bundestagswahlkampf 2002. Eine qualitative Analyse politischer Werbung und PR [Party advertising in the 2002 German national campaign]. Media Perspektiven, 12, 629–638.
Reilly, B. F. (1991). American political prints 1766–1876: A catalog of the collections in the Library of Congress. Boston: G. K. Hall.
Todorov, A., Mandisodza, A. N., Goren, A., & Hall, C. C. (2005). Inferences of competence from faces predict election outcomes. Science, 308, 1638–1626.

PRESENTATION OF SELF IN EVERYDAY LIFE, THE

In The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life (1956), one of sociologist Erving Goffman's earliest works, he uses the imagery of the theater as an analogy to everyday life in order to portray the importance of human interaction in the production of self-identity and self-design. Ideas found in the book follow the symbolic interactionist tradition in general—that all reality is socially constructed. Goffman sees the individual self as a product of the various means by which it is produced, maintained, and constrained through interaction with others who both create and threaten it. Thus, people do not merely act for the sake of action; rather, all actions are social performances with the aim of not only achieving the inherent purposes of the action itself but also of giving and maintaining certain impressions to others.

Goffman outlines several techniques people employ in order to manage these social performances: the selection of a stage or backstage (the physical setting), the actor's personal appearance and mannerisms, dramatic actions directed by certain props, idealistic representations, misrepresentations, and mystifications. The actor is also an audience for his viewers' play, even while he is being watched by the audience. The involved parties are audience members and performers simultaneously, with an agreed-upon definition of the situation. Goffman acknowledges that when the accepted definition of a situation has been discredited, some or all of the actors may pretend that nothing has changed if they find this advantageous. Goffman claims that this type of artificial, willed credulity happens on every level of social organization, from top to bottom. To Goffman, there exists no pure reality or pure contrivance, but rather all actions take place within a liminal state between reality and contrivance.

Goffman's concept of the presentation of self in everyday life is recognized as a contribution both to systematic sociological theory and to an understanding of human consciousness. It is representative of the dramaturgical model in the humanities and social sciences developed by Kenneth Burke, Victor Turner, and Goffman during the mid-20th century. This model, which uses the notion of performance as an approach to understanding the self and society, can be seen in Burke's "dramatistic approach," Turner's concept of "social drama," and Goffman's "dramaturgical" approach to everyday life through interaction models. Goffman's concept contributed greatly to the theory of social constructionism outlined by Peter L. Berger and Thomas Luckmann in their seminal 1966 book, The Social Construction of Reality.

The dramaturgical model has spread to many intellectual fields or disciplines through the late 20th and early 21st centuries. From this perspective, politics, for example, can be seen as a form of symbolic action, as spectacle or as "the performance of power."

Janis Teruggi Page

See also Dramatistic Approaches to Political Communication; Videostyle

Further Readings

Berger, P, L., & Luckmann, T. (1966). The social construction of reality. Garden City, NY: Anchor Books.
Edelman, M. (1971). Politics as symbolic action. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Freidson, E. (1983). Celebrating Erving Goffman. Contemporary Sociology, 12(4), 359–362.
Goffman, E. (1959). The presentation of self in everyday life. Garden City, NY: Doubleday Anchor.

PRESIDENTIAL COMMUNICATION

Presidential communication refers to the means for shaping and mobilizing varied publics and is a primary tool used by presidents in their attempts to implement policy objectives. Communicative acts are called into play by exigencies, problems for which persuasion can affect potential outcomes.

More narrowly, a rhetorical perspective on presidential communication attends to the social construction of meanings; the intersection of message, audience, and context, where meaning is layered and multivocal, contingent and negotiated. The president offers recommendations and directives, and, perhaps more important, tenders worldviews, values, and moral and ethical direction. The president's communication, in conjunction with other actors including the media, shapes the context in which discussion, potential solutions, and evaluation are understood. Exercise of rhetorical choice is often addressed as agenda setting, framing, priming, and cuing.

Researchers employing a communicative lens see the presidency as principally a rhetorical or symbolic institution. The presidency is constituted not only by institutional authority but also by public communication undertaken in a variety of modes, traditions, and contexts. Investigation from this perspective employs principles of communication theory and criticism, examining situation, audience, speaker's character, arrangement, style, ideas, motives, argument, and delivery.

Presidents believe that public support aids their ability to govern, to influence Congress, and to have weight in the international arena. "Political capital" can be cashed in but must first be earned, largely through communicative efforts. To that end they communicate more often, to innumerable audiences, using increasingly diverse modes of transmission via scores of official and unofficial messages and for a variety of reasons.

Presidents must close fissures of political life; legitimize their policies, principles, passions, and patronage. They must define a country, its nationhood and values, articulate the common good, and be credible on the basis of their own character. Finally, the president must get things done, enact policy, and praise collective enterprise.

The White House is increasingly the political epicenter for domestic and international audiences. The president is expected to "be all things to all people" and becomes symbolically "interpreter-in-chief," "celebrity-in-chief," and according to some, "schemer-in-chief." Every word, every movement, every occasion—even the lack of communication—are potentially persuasive. The president's communication is parsed, amplified, scrutinize, used, and misused by a host of audiences, many of whom are hostile.

The discussion of presidential communication here examines speechmaking and "going public," mainly from a rhetorical viewpoint, and then considers effects, strategies, genre, venues, formal structures, and non-speaking modes more generally. The discussion is limited to communication regarding governance; topics associated with campaigning are considered under other topics in this volume.

Rhetorical Presidency/ Presidential Rhetoric

Scholars have observed the emergence of the "rhetorical presidency"—a development argued to be antithetical to the Constitution—at the turn of the century. Rather than carrying out the traditional managerial duties enumerated in the Constitution, the office has been transformed by "going public." Going public refers to the president appealing directly to the people for support, bypassing the media or the Congress. Theodore Roosevelt's concept of using the "bully pulpit" to increase the power of the presidency through popular support has come to symbolize the phenomena.

Political scholar Jeffrey K. Tulis argues the transition to the modern rhetorical presidency occurred in the period of Theodore Roosevelt through that of Woodrow Wilson, who legitimated it with a theory of governance that stressed the motive force of the president in American politics. Nineteenth-century presidents, Tulis observes, governed more by written communication to the other branches of government rather than the oral tradition that characterizes modern presidents.

Some argue the turn to public persuasion necessarily evolved as presidents sought to achieving workable leadership, while others lament declining eloquence and presidential discourse likened to "empty rhetoric." Others, primarily communication scholars, contend that there has never been a nonrhetorical period, but rather simply differences in the mode of presentation.

These scholars see the power of presidency, from the beginning of the Republic, as emanating from their own authorship in creating the presidency. The case is presented that presidential communication exhibits more concordant structures, conventions, and values than differences and that the strategy of "going public" is as old as the Republic. George Washington used newspapers to direct public opinion, not unlike current practice.

Research Traditions

What constitutes presidential rhetoric has accelerated in the past 3 decades, as scholars approach expanded venues. Traditionally, communication research focused on criticism of single presidential speeches, movements and genres of presidential speeches. Continuing in the public address tradition, rhetorician/historian scholars have ushered in a renaissance of interest in past presidents, examining historical cases of presidential discourse.

A series of books have examined a single speech, bringing into new perspective the invention process of conceiving and executing influential speeches. These include works on Lincoln's Gettysburg Address and second Inaugural; Jefferson's, Kennedy's, and Franklin D. Roosevelt's (FDR) Inaugurals; Lyndon Johnson's Voting Rights Address; and Eisenhower's Atoms for Peace. Distinct historical eras studied include President Johnson's' War on Poverty, Dwight D. Eisenhower's Cold War efforts, and movements like the Nuclear Freeze campaign. More recently, rhetorical eras and persuasion campaigns have found extended study including Woodrow Wilson's campaign for the League of Nations, Kennedy's Bay of Pigs, and some heretofore forgotten presidents, in particular Herbert Hoover and William McKinley. Additionally, numerous book-length works with rhetorical compass have addressed civil rights, economics, environment, leadership, moral rhetoric, national identity, and war and peace.

Communicative Influence

Efforts to trace the effects of presidential communication and in particular efforts on behalf of specific legislative initiative have found small effects, seemingly mitigated in the blur of ongoing events. Yet few would go as far as to argue that presidential messages make no difference. Certainly specific efforts impact political realities, as when Truman initiated and moved public opinion on aid to Greece and Turkey, redefining the limits of the Cold War containment. Assessing presidents' ability to change hearts and minds can be seen as case-by-case success, such as Johnson and the Civil Rights Act, or failure, as when Bill Clinton's proposals emboldened opposition to his gays in the military initiative. Even when the effects are judged modest when measured by public opinion or congressional votes, impacts can become more generalized within the larger political milieu.

Presidential attempts to configure the discussion of policy or national character operate within firm parameters. Events and prevailing public mood, political enemies and competing storylines seek to influence the same eventualities. Presidential messages necessarily function in a mediated environment; an ever-expending milieu of traditional media (newspapers, radio, television), complete with 24/7 news cycles and electronic communication unavailable a decade ago. The conventional media are increasingly operating within a context restricted by prevailing media narratives, driven by conflict and convenience.

Presidential communication is most often presented as directing and stimulating political response. Communication, however, also has the function of reinforcing political institutions and values, or as Murray Edelman counseled, symbolic constructions often induce quiescence.

Speeches and Going Public

Presidential speeches and pronouncements remain primary modes of modifying public opinion and congressional action. Speeches are isolated following for the reasons that they dominate scholarship and are perceptually the connection between presidents and the public. Additional modes of presidential communication are addressed later in this entry.

Presidents must speak to perform their constitutional duties, stipulated or not. Roderick P. Hart's research found that presidents, with each passing administration, speak more. Policy speeches on single topics can materially influence public opinion, yet speech effects are often short-lived, with little discernable influence. The tenure of a president is strewn with long forgotten speeches on long forgotten topics. For example, several presidents have verbally fought the "War on Drugs" but arguably have achieved more anxiety than results. Presidential popularity seems to interact with most arenas addressed, with popular presidents having more influence on public action and congressional compliance.

Presidents give speeches on nearly every subject imaginable, ranging from welcoming sports teams to the White House to world-changing events, such as John F. Kennedy's and Ronald Reagan's speeches at the Berlin Wall. Presidents tend to speak to very few specific legislative initiatives, generally speak positively about bills under consideration, and show more interest on legislation enacting their own initiatives. Hostile congressional makeup also increases the incentive to go over the heads of Congress and appeal directly to the American people. The choice to not speak on legislation can also serve not to stir opposition or risk prestige on issues that have a life of their own or are unlikely to prevail even with presidential intervention.

Presidents have, since Richard Nixon, increasingly spoken about the economy, and in more optimistic terms. They have assumed the mantle for economic viability, and by the creation of economic expectations create material impact on economic performance. Electoral success is associated with the economy's performance, which may in part account for the more attention it receives in election years. Positive economic talk often fails as well, as with President Gerald Ford's ill-fated Whip Inflation Now (WIN) campaign or Jimmy Carter's moral calling to repair the spirit of "malaise."

Foreign policy speeches are important facets of every presidency. Teddy Roosevelt's diplomatic maxim was to "speak softly and carry a big stick," and he maintained that a chief executive must be willing to use force when necessary while practicing the art of persuasion. In 1907, Theodore Roosevelt chose to send the "Great White Fleet" on a 14-month world tour over the objections of Congress and media. The expedition created a cause célèbre in support of "world peace," enlisting public opinion and in so doing silencing lawmakers and editors.

Focusing public attention is also to divert public attention. Most presidents use force in public affairs and are from time to time accused of diverting public attention from domestic problems or other foreign policies (for example, Reagan's Granada "rescue mission"). Using foreign policy to distract achieved wide public awareness with the 1997 movie Wag the Dog, in which a Washington spin doctor distracts the electorate from a presidential sex scandal by hiring a Hollywood producer to fake a war. The realities are less dramatic than the movies, but presidents do attempt to "change the topic." Nixon's emphasis on foreign policy during the Watergate scandals or Clinton's speeches from Africa during the Lewinsky scandal seems suspect. Regardless of the merits of these examples, critics are always prepared to offer the accusation of presidential failure to address the "relevant" topics. Such criticism invites questioning of presidential motives. In the arena of foreign policy, presidents may choose to "go private" by conducting portions of foreign policy out of the public spotlight. Engaging the public raises the stakes, creating public demand that may be unpredictable over time, and may have small payoffs in terms of national security or electoral favor.

Communicative Strategies

Rhetorical choices by the president can be seen as instrumental responses to immediate exigencies, the balancing of competing demands, multiple audiences, and future considerations. The president's rhetoric responds to events, as with George W. Bush and the attacks of September 11, 2001, but speeches also reframe the very meaning of events, as with FDR's 1933 response to the Depression, "We have nothing to fear but fear itself."

Strategies vary from calculated ambiguity, as with apologia of self-defense (Nixon's Watergate defense), to focused form (Clinton's collective atonement for the Tuskegee, Alabama, syphilis experiment). Several rhetorical forms are apparent in presidential communication, each with attendant qualities and relative effects on the political process. Exemplars include the used of Jeremiad, whereby presidents chastise the public for breaking moral covenants that can be repaired only through conforming to proper and ethical behavior by convergence with commends of providence (e.g., Lincoln's Gettysburg Address). Presidents are storytellers, who recount the past in ways that celebrate and marginalize particular people and events.

History/Memory/Narrative

Rhetorical choice can be understood as situated in larger historical traditions, recruiting the conditions, styles, and cultural resonance to persuade. Collective memory presumes selective appropriation and is malleable, pieced together like a mosaic. For example, presidents since the time of Martin Luther King, Jr., have appropriated his memory in service of dissimilar Civil Rights agendas.

Presidents often evoke former presidents and public figures to establish identification with personages and purposes. William Clinton's memorable 1993 Memphis speech to black ministers echoed the representational black church, emulating Martin Luther King's last speech. "If Martin Luther King were to reappear by my side today and give us a report card on the last 25 years, what would he say? 'You did a good job,' he would say. . . . 'But,' he would say, 'I did not live and die to see the American family destroyed.'" Lyndon Johnson petitioned not only persons but the Emancipation Proclamation, the Constitution, the Declaration of Independence, and even emblematic song—"We Shall Overcome"—to recruit shared moral rightness for the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

Definition/Transcendence

Presidents often emerge as the chief definer of situations. The act of naming invites transformation and transcendence, moving from one interpretation to another way of thinking. For example, President Reagan recast Marine deaths in Lebanon as a tragedy rather than a crisis, to precipitate withdrawal not escalation. George W. Bush's attempts to (re)define the War on Terror asked for acquiescence based on the nature of the enemy. In a larger sense, the White House recognizes who is included and excluded, who is up and down, visible and imperceptible. The ability to define chiefly favors the institutional and the known.

Trends

Several scholars have traced changed presidential talk, producing useful insights. For example, Roderick Hart employs his DICTION program to compare a 20,000-item sample to examine language uses across a series of variables. Presidential language, he suggests, varies by (a) optimism: language endorsing positive entailments; (b) activity: language of movement, changes, implementation; (c) realism: tangible language, immediate; (d) commonality: language utilizing agreed-upon values; and (e) certainty: resolute and totalistic language. The latter, for example, is found to have declined as political demands moderate presidential speech, but is reversed for foreign engagements (George W. Bush being the exception).

Also, political scientist Elvin T. Lim found presidents, in their inaugural and State of the Union speeches, to be more (a) anti-intellectual: less contemplative, more formal; (b) abstract: religious, poetic, and idealistic references; (c) assertive: confident, realistic, powerful; (d) democratic: inclusive, egalitarian, people oriented; and (e) conversational: intimate, trust based, anecdotal.

Customary Communicative Form

Presidents are expected to honor certain rhetorical traditions when they address the public. Karlyn K. Campbell and Kathleen H. Jamieson in their seminal work, Deeds Done in Words: Presidential Rhetoric and the Genres of Governance (1990), examine the situation, style, and substance that cohere to reoccurring speech occasions. The study of genre has grown beyond the categories classified by Campbell and Jamieson, drawing out understanding of sermon, eulogy, war and prophetic speech, conspiracy and moral suasion.

Inaugural

The inaugural address is a hybrid with deliberative and ceremonial aspects: a speech that reunites a politically divided country, previews the policy agenda for the new president's term in a general way, affirms cultural beliefs, situates the launching of a presidency within a historical context, recruits nostalgic strains, and establishes legitimacy. Presidents routinely describe American ideals in terms of civil religious themes; constituting the American people as "God's chosen people." The language is comparatively elevated. In the 21st century they have dropped in length, and the language has been make simpler, inviting identification with the "people." Symbols of unity increasingly ground the speech.

Some presidents have also used the inaugural address to structure an ambiguous situation to their advantage. One thinks of Thomas Jefferson in 1801 ("We are all republicans, we are all federalists") and Abraham Lincoln in 1865 ("With malice toward none, with charity for all"). Sometimes a phrase enters the cultural lexicon instructing what it means to be a citizen, as with John Kennedy's 1961 address ("Ask not what your country can do for you—ask what you can do for your country").

State of the Union

The "Annual Message," the only communication constitutionally required of the president, moved from a speech to a written report delivered to and read to Congress when Jefferson thought it too regal. The tradition of the president delivering the message in person was revived by Woodrow Wilson, a move designed to assert executive power in the face of strong congressional prerogative. The innovative use of the State of the Union address as legislative agenda is of more recent origin. The State of the Union traditionally reassures that problems are solvable.

Farewell Address

Farewell addresses have commanded less attention but continue as a president's parting statements. As a rhetorical form, the speech places the administration's accomplishment in a historical context, presenting a prospective legacy consistent with presidential character and events. These speeches have a presumed honesty, imbued with the wisdom that can only come by grappling with the nation's fortune. Farewell addresses seems to have less staying power than the hopeful beginnings of administration unless they are appropriated by subsequent generations as guidance. Eisenhower's admonishment that "we must guard against the acquisition of unwarranted influence . . . by the military-industrial complex" or Washington's reproach not to "entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition . . ." resonated in later political fare.

War Rhetoric

Presidents routinely celebrate peace and the peaceful nature of the American character, yet nearly all generations have been summoned by presidents to pursue wars; from the Revolution to the War on Terror there have been more than a dozen extended encounters as well as numerous military actions. Presidents attempt to rally the nation, exhort sacrifice, justify, unifying the national effort. Framing, (mis)information, metaphorical enrichment, savage imagery, and other critical responses characterize studies of war rhetoric. Generally, war rhetoric is both deliberative (justification, accounts) and epideictic (values, virtues).

Situations of crisis rhetoric share characteristics with war rhetoric. Presidents periodically are called upon to address imminent circumstances, acknowledging or amplifying frames for understanding, calling for action in some cases, as with war, or calm, as with natural disasters. Largely it falls to the president to define a crisis, resulting in diversion or focus of national responsibility, values, and resolve.

Related is the president's role of "national mourner" who must regularly comment on the passing of notable figures and more visibly and dramatically respond in the aftermath of tragic circumstance. The occasions are used to celebrate shared values, lessen uncertainty, and restore confidence. The moment calls for a collective response, and only the president speaks for "the people." Strategies typically include continuance and on occasion reformulation of national character and mission. Reagan postponed his State of the Union address to poetically eulogize the Challenger crew who "slipped the surly bonds of earth" to "touch the face of God." He also addressed the policy implications of continuing American's space program. Bill Clinton's speech following the Oklahoma City bombing in 1995 reassured, "You have lost too much, but you have not lost everything. And you have certainly not lost America. . . ."

Structures of Presidential Communication

Press Apparatus

The president has at his disposal an impressive array of communication outlets, ranging from press operations at each administrative unit (e.g., State Department's Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs) to several units operating out of the White House, including foreign (the Office of Global Communication, which amplifies U.S. policy), and several offices focused on domestic policy. The most visible communication link is the press secretary, who briefs and coordinates access for the White House Press Corps, including schedules and timely responses to unfolding news and updates on what is happening with government operations. The press secretary's work is often contentious exchanges with senior and seasoned quasi-permanent press representatives.

Press Conferences

There is a long tradition of presidents standing "exposed" before the press. FDR's regularity and John Kennedy's ease during press conferences remain prototypes of the practice. Research has focused on the conditions under which press conferences are called, their growth and institutionalization, their increasingly public character, and the declining frequency with which they are held.

Speechwriting

Presidents are often portrayed as marionettes of their speechwriters, or as with President Reagan, "merely" skilled actors. Reagan's considerable influence in constructing his addresses has emerged in later scholarship, just as other presidents have been found to retain authorship of their messages, contributing in design, purpose, and prose. Even when lacking specific authorship, they rightly assume possession and responsibility for "their words." The process is often collaborative, with speechwriters being more policy contributors than procurers of adornment. The practice of seeking contributions in preparing speeches goes back to the beginning of the Republic. Even Lincoln, rightly touted as the author of his most famous speeches, nonetheless passed around drafts of speeches and often implemented the counsel of others. Input is not always reserved to the administration.

Venues

Newspapers

From 1800 to 1860, presidents often spoke through newspapers that served as the semi-official voices of the administration. Before that period, Federalists financed the Federal Gazette of the United States, beginning in 1789. Jefferson's "campaign" was bolstered by the Aurora, published in Philadelphia and distributed nationally, and the administration's exponent was the Washington-based National Intelligencer. Overtly partisan press prospered in the years that followed. Newspapers continue to be influential in interpreting, leading, and critiquing presidential communication, but in the past century have become less directly the voices of the administration.

Radio

In 1924, the Democratic Party broadcast their national party convention, gavel to gavel, from New York City on radio before nominating Al Smith. The use of radio became a formidable political tool when Franklin D. Roosevelt launched his "Fireside Chats," noted for their sense of "intimacy," in March 1933. FDR's address to the joint session of Congress, declaring war against Japan following Pearl Harbor, moved a stunned nation gathered around their radios. Other presidents made use of radio to establish resolve, as with the articulation of the Truman Doctrine before a joint session of Congress in 1947. In recent times, presidents beginning with Ronald Reagan each week air a short radio addresses. The audiences for these speeches seem to not be citizens as much as they are aimed at subsets of supporters, opinion leaders, and the media, their role more akin to agenda setting than persuasion.

Televised Addresses

The direct television address is often seen as the president's most powerful means of going public, bypassing other political actors and unfettered by the media's interpretive ability. Studies indicate modest effects from televised addresses, often in the range of 2%, and these opinion shifts are typically short term. Of course, the president may not be seeking to move general public opinion but may be speaking to a particular audience, fulfilling political roles, or setting the stage for other persuasive efforts. Televised appearances are less likely to be carried by the largest networks, but do reach audiences through cable news outlets and C-SPAN. Formal presidential addresses of import command full television coverage, as do speeches occasioned by crisis.

Internet

Presidents increasingly use the full range of "new media" and are, in turn, constrained by them. Clinton's White House first made heavy use of Internet communication to broadcast their message and to distribute the president's speeches. The role of the Internet is unfolding at a mind-boggling rapidity. Official presidential communications of all classifications are available online, as are podcasts and Webcasts of most speeches and informal remarks. The Internet and Web pages have also provided critics venues to mount counter-persuasion to presidential initiative and fan the flames of scandal. Going over the heads of media and Congress to the people is increasingly subject to ad hoc corrective information and organized grassroots opposition.

Local Speeches

Presidents often communicate in local markets aimed at influencing national stories, but also to avert the national spotlight. Local coverage in state media markets, town halls, and newspapers engender more favorable press. They are designed to recognize problems while not overpromising and recognize group solidarity while building a national identity. Local audiences are praised in a way that ingratiates the president with his audience.

Often the president travels around the nation to punctuate policy initiatives, as has become the custom following State of the Union addresses. Presidents in recent administrations average around 60 trips a year in support of legislation, performing party leader functions, and in support of electoral contenders. Research indicates only slight effects from these trips, but such efforts are often embedded in larger persuasive campaigns.

Written Communication

The president has at his disposal a series of "official" written communications, many of which are formally posted in the Federal Registrar and are informally offered electronically by the White House press office. Most of these instruments establish policy and many have the force of law, but they also contain persuasive aspects.

Proclamations

Proclamations are issued for commemorative occasions and congressionally mandated observances; highlighting of days, weeks, and months set aside for recognition. In 1789 George Washington issued the first proclamation establishing the Thanksgiving holiday. Many proclamations are epidictic in nature. George W. Bush issues about 110 proclamations each year. They are often used to characterize the national character, as with "Loyalty Day," on which Bush observed, "As Americans, we work to preserve the freedom declared by our Founding Fathers, defended by generations, and granted to every man and woman on Earth by the Almighty," thus invoking the founders, religion, and ideological posture all in the opening sentence.

Executive Orders

Presidents in the 19th century signed orders, but the instrument known as the executive order originated with Abraham Lincoln in 1862, establishing the provisional court of Louisiana. Many are implementation instruments, but others carried rhetorical impact that still resonates, as with John Kennedy's establishment of the Peace Corps and Franklin Roosevelt's internment camps in World War II. Executive orders are gradually used more to bypass congressional action.

Signing Statements

Signing statements, starting with James Monroe, are issued when the president signs a bill. Most often they simply comment on legislation. They have become controversial since Ronald Reagan when they are used to "ignore" parts of legislation, arguing the law can only be implemented in ways believed to be constitutional. Critics argue that the proper presidential action is either to veto or execute the laws.

Other Written Methods

Presidents also use a series of official and quasi-official means of notification and means to persuade. These include National Security instruments, regulations, presidential letters, and veto messages. Also Findings are offered, as required by law, to certify compliance with congressional mandates, for example, conditions of foreign assistance or certifications for nations "engaged in terrorist activity."

Nonspeaking Contexts

Increasingly scholars examine presidential communication in contexts beyond traditional spoken and written form. Potentially influential channels are many. The illustrations provided here are not exhaustive, but rather suggestive.

Self-Presentation

Presidents' nonverbal presentation becomes part of their message, and some argue, in an era of constant exposure, an integral aspect of accomplishing practical leadership. The presidents' idiosyncratic manners of speaking are more than fodder for impressionists and political humor; they are integral to interpreting messages, character, and layers of meaning. In many ways the president is always engaged in impression management. Nonverbal traits intersect evaluation of performance, competence, knowledgeability, and more personal dimensions of likeability, trustworthiness, positive regard, and others.

A persistent question accompanying presidential assessment, consciously or unconsciously, asks what the president is "really like." Auditors unavoidably judge the president's public and backstage dimensions, noting coherence and divergence. Often expressed as degrees of authenticity, judgments are rendered for characterological coherence in which presidents' behavior and words are measured as "ringing true" with lived experience.

Indirect Communication

Presidential often seek to influence through a myriad of indirect channels. Trial balloons, unidentified sources, off-the-record interviews, surrogates, leaks, and other informal channels become expressions of the president, albeit buffered "quasi-official" expressions. They also mask for effect. Indirect modes function to highlight, clarify, correct, mislead, distance, initiate, delay, and divert.

Silence

Noncommunication, often used by the White House, can communicate as much as overt messages. Theorists argue that strategic silence invites assignment of meaning of mystery, uncertainty, passivity, and relinquishment, independent of context. Refusals to engage can be seen as intentional or unintentional, leading to diverse political meanings. The relative importance of issues is signaled by the president choosing to embellish or avoiding giving an issue a political stage.

On occasion presidents can adopt a modified version of silence by refraining from standard political activity and remaining in Washington. The practice, sometimes identified as "the Rose Garden strategy," can signal heightened importance or immediacy of political events. Jimmy Carter adopted a Rose Garden strategy during the Iranian Hostage Crisis in 1980, forgoing reelection travel in deference to solving the calamity. He was eventually forced to abandon the strategy and assume the role of an active candidate.

Space and Place

Presidents inherently use space and place to communicate. The White House is presented as the center of the free world and, more narrowly, the center of U.S. government. The Oval Office becomes ground zero of decisions, the symbol of power and responsibility. Spatial proximity to the president is perceived as power and communicates actual power.

Presidents routinely stage events to provide interpretive contexts for their message. Reagan on Normandy Beach, Nixon walking the Great Wall of China, or Kennedy playing a game of touch football powerfully visualize and frame. The synoptic moment supplements and sometimes replaces the eloquence of a well-crafted speech. Ronald Reagan's 1987 speech in Berlin ("Mr. Gorbachev, tear down this wall!") and Theodore Roosevelt's performative body English indicate the power. Critics argue such "displays" reinforce prevailing power structure, constrain the public sphere, and short-circuit deliberation.

Post-Presidency

For some presidents, their most important rhetorical influence unfolds after office. John Quincy Adams served nearly 2 decades in the House of Representatives (1830–1848), becoming an important antislavery voice in Congress. Adams notably represented the Amistad Africans in the Supreme Court of the United States and won repeal of the "gag rule" on citizen antislavery petitions to Congress. William Howard Taft solidified the independent status of the Judiciary, serving 9 years as Chief Justice. Nixon engaged in a redemptive exile, weighing in on foreign policy. Carter's legacy of the "good man" seems less about vindication and more about teaching moral lessons through personal example.

Allan D. Louden

See also Apologia; Argumentation, Political; Fantasy Theme Analysis; Fireside Chats; Inaugural Addresses, Presidential; Language and Politics; Press Conferences; Press Secretary, White House; Radio Addresses; Speeches, Presidential; State of the Union Address

Further Readings

Campbell, K. K., & Jamieson, K. H. (1990). Deeds done in words: Presidential rhetoric and the genres of governance. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Dorsey, L. G. (Ed.). (2002). The presidency and rhetorical leadership. College Station: Texas A&M University Press.

Edelman, M. (1988). Constructing the political spectacle. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Eshbaugh-Soha, M. (2006). The president's speeches: Beyond "going public." Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.

Hart, R. P. (1987). The sound of leadership: Presidential communication in the modern age. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Jamieson, K. H. (1988). Eloquence in an electronic age: The transformation of political speechmaking. New York: Oxford University Press.
Laracey, M. (2002). Presidents and the people: The partisan story of going public. College Station: Texas A&M University Press.
Medhurst, M. J. (Ed.). (1996). Beyond the rhetorical presidency. College Station: Texas A&M University Press.
Smith, C. A., & Smith, K. B. (1994). The White House speaks: Presidential leadership as persuasion. Westport, CT: Praeger.
Stuckey, M. E. (2004). Defining Americans: The presidency and national identity. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas.
Waldman, M. (2003). My fellow Americans: The most important speeches of America's presidents, from George Washington to George W. Bush. Naperville, IL: Sourcebooks.
White, R. C. (2005). The eloquent president: A portrait of Lincoln through his words. New York: Random House.
Zarefsky, D. (1986). President Johnson's War on Poverty: Rhetoric and history. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press.

Press and Politics

The expression "press and politics" is most often used to denote a large and complex set of issues related to the interaction between the political sphere of activity and the media. The term press is therefore not only restricted to newspapers. Instead, it encompasses media in general and journalistic media in particular. The fact that the term is still used although not restricted to a particular form of media should be seen as a reflection of the historical fact that newspapers used to be synonymous with journalistic media in general. Until the 1960s, newspapers continued to be the most important source of information for most people, before successively being replaced by television in most advanced countries around the world.

On the most general level, the political sphere includes the political system and all its parts. More specifically, it includes political institutions on a national, regional, or local level, political parties and candidates and their activities, as well as other groups in society that aim to influence policy. The questions related to the interaction between press and politics—between the media and the political sphere—are descriptive and empirical as well as normative and theoretical in their nature.

That being said, even descriptive and empirical research is often accompanied by normative assumptions and underpinnings. This reflects the historical fact that mass circulation newspapers and authoritative politics are both children of the same process of nation building that began in the 17th century. The invention of the printing press in the 15th century was a prerequisite for mass circulation newspapers, but also for mass communication by other means such as pamphlets and books. Such mass communication was necessary for the dispersion of information across larger geographic distances, which, in turn, was necessary for the formation of political movements and the creation of more or less centralized political institutions and hence authoritative politics. When democracy started to replace predemocratic regimes, and political parties started to evolve, this process gained momentum, and the need for communication between rulers and the ruled became acute when competitive elections were introduced.

Originally, in Western countries, newspapers were generally tied either to the government or to political parties and other political movements. In such countries, this was the era of the "partisan press," when newspapers were subordinated to political causes. This was reflected in different ways, such as in ownership, readership, and journalistic content. The underlying reason for aligning with a party could be that owners sympathized with a particular political party. It could also be because the printers required licenses to print and to obtain governmental printing contracts, and these could be provided by the political party in power. Through licensing, subsidies, and sponsorship, political actors could thus exercise power over the press. Through partisan coverage, newspapers could provide support for the political actors who sponsored and supported them. As advertising had not yet developed as a source of income for newspapers, they were dependent on subsidies and sponsorship from the political sphere. This was also before the concepts of journalistic objectivity and impartiality were developed and became widely acknowledged as normative journalistic ideals. This process started in the United States in the late 19th and the early 20th centuries. Since then, this journalistic ideal has gained acceptance in democracies around the world, although not always to the same extent or using the same interpretations. There are also differences between countries that belong to different models of media and politics. In some countries, the press in general or at least some mass media is still partisan, in democracies as well as in semi-democratic and authoritarian countries.

Politics and the press thus have a common history, and both these spheres of activity have always been closely intertwined. Since the political sphere and the media sphere have always been partly independent and partly interdependent, although to varying degrees across space and time, there is a tension between "what is" and "what ought to be" with regards to the proper balance between a politically speaking independent press, on the one hand, and a press subordinated to politics and political needs on the other. The fact that the press can exert considerable power, for example, with regard to agenda setting and the framing of issues, events, and personalities, is another source of tension between press and politics.

A Symbiotic Relationship

The relationship between politics and the press varies across countries depending on historical, cultural, technological, economic, and political circumstances and the structures of each country. However, it is widely acknowledged that the relationship between politics and the press in democratic countries is symbiotic. As long as politics requires a system for communication between those elected for office and the citizenry, and that widely available information is seen as being crucial for the workings of the political system, there is a need for the mass media. Additionally, as long as the media requires to be free and reasonably independent in order to operate, there is a need for democratic governance. Thus, the relationship has been described as a social contract, in which the democratic regime is legally and morally obliged to respect the freedom of speech and of the press, and in which the mass media is morally obliged to provide the information that people need to be free and self-governing, to act as watchdogs against abuse of power and to facilitate public debate and deliberation.

The concept of a social contract between democracy and the press notwithstanding, there is general consensus that freedom of both speech and the press are essential for any political system that describes itself as democratic. The First Amendment to the U.S Constitution is famous for its formulation that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press," but laws with a similar meaning form part of the constitutions in other democracies around the world. The degree to which freedom of both speech and the press is respected in different countries is also an important part of the annual and worldwide investigations of the state of democracy conducted by the Freedom House. In fact, freedom of both speech and the press are an essential part of the definition of a democratic regime.

There is less consensus regarding which, if any, obligations the media have in a democracy and which, if any, functions the media must fulfill in order to assist a democracy to work. There are five major explanations for this lack of consensus. First, this is an area in which different countries and regions have different traditions. Second, even though most observers might be in agreement as to what distinguishes a democratic from a nondemocratic regime, they often disagree over issues such as the best electoral system, the role of political parties, and the importance of people being actively involved in politics and civil society, to name just a few examples. Thus, there are different conceptions of what constitutes "the good democracy," and each of these have normative implications for the media in general and for journalism in particular. The third explanation is that there exists several press-political ideologies or theories of the press. Fourth, most major media in most democratic countries are, with the exception of public service media, run as commercial enterprises. As such they are required to make profits, and it might be thought of as being wrong in principal to place any specific legal or moral obligations on the media other than the requirement to follow the same laws that apply to other private enterprises. Fifth, ideas and concepts are not static but dynamic and, hence, change gradually over time through interaction with cultural, sociological, political, technological, and ideological changes.

Four Theories of the Press

Discussions concerning the press and politics have taken place for as long as newspapers and other mass media have been in existence, but it was not until the 1940s that they gained prominence. One reason was that an independent Commission on Freedom of the Press was set up—often referred to as the Hutchins Commission after its chairman Robert M. Hutchins—in the United States in 1942. Their final report was published in 1947 and sparked a major debate, not least because of its conclusion that the freedom of the press was in danger. According to the commission, the freedom of the press is essential to political liberty, and the press has a fundamental right to its freedom. At the same time, the commission argued that any power capable of protecting freedom is also capable of endangering it. Furthermore, it argued that the press had become a powerful force in society, and that this power rested in the hands of a very few. As such a powerful institution, the press thus had a responsibility not to abuse its power, but was, instead, expected to provide a service that was adequate to the needs of society and to promote the common, rather than the private, good.

A few years later this view was identified as the "Social Responsibility theory" of the press by Fred S. Siebert, Theodore Peterson, and Wilbur Schramm in the very influential book Four Theories of the Press. In their book, they attempted to analyze the philosophical and political rationales that lie behind the different kinds of press that exist around the world, including its origins and development, chief purposes, and essential characteristics. The four theories of the press identified by the authors were Authoritarian, Libertarian, Social Responsibility, and Soviet Communist-Totalitarian, the two latter treated as developments of the two former.

The essential characteristic of the Authoritarian theory of the press, developed in 16th- and 17th-century England, is that the press should function as an instrument for effecting governmental policies, but it need not be owned by the government. The Soviet Communist-Totalitarian theory differs from the authoritarian theory in the belief that the press must be state owned and closely controlled by the state. The press is perceived and treated as part of the state. The Libertarian theory of the press was adopted in England after the revolution of 1688, and the essential characteristic of this theory is that the press should be as free as possible. Only through total independence can the press fulfill its role as watchdog, checking on the government and acting as an arena for a free debate that will ultimately assist society to discover the truth. In this theory, the press functions as a marketplace of ideas. According to some, however, a totally independent and uncontrolled press might lead to a marketplace of money instead of a marketplace of ideas, as the right to own and use the media resides among those who own the media. Thus, there is a need for socially responsible media, according to the social responsibility theory of the press. If the press does not adopt a socially responsible attitude, the government should thus have some, although limited, means of creating positive incentives or negative sanctions in order to enforce some social responsibility on the part of the press.

What is common to these four theories of the press is that they all recognize the close links between the press and politics. Any theory of the press is partly a theory of the state, and any theory of the state is partly a theory of the press and its proper role and functions in society. The political and the media sphere define and are defined by each other, although not exclusively.

Three Models of Media and Politics

If the four theories of the press are identified mainly on theoretical and philosophical ground, an empirically based account of the relationship between the media and politics was provided by Daniel C. Hallin and Paolo Mancini at the beginning of the 21st century. Through an analysis of the political systems and media systems in Western democracies, they identified three models of media and politics, each with its own distinctive features: the Liberal, Democratic Corporatist, and the Polarized Pluralist models. These models are also called the North Atlantic, the North/Central European, and the Mediterranean, respectively, in recognition of where they are most prevalent. The most important political system characteristics include patterns of political conflict or consensus, partly related to consensus or majoritarian government, whether individual or organized pluralism predominates, the role of the state and how active it is, how polarized a society is, and the development of rational-legal authority. What is meant by rational-legal authority is a form of rule based on adherence to formal and universalistic rules of procedure. The media system characteristics deemed to be most important are the development of the media industry and the strength of the newspaper sector, the degree of political parallelism, which refers to the extent to which the media reflect political and social divisions in society, the degree of journalistic professionalization, and the extent to which the state intervenes in the media system. Together these dimensions interact and shape the relationship between the press and politics. In the Liberal model, the media system is dominated by market mechanisms and commercial media rather than by the state or organized political or social groups. In Polarized Pluralist countries, the media is integrated into party politics, while commercial media is relatively weak and the state is relatively strong. In Democratic Corporatist countries, commercial media coexist with media more or less strongly tied to organized political and social groups, while the state plays a legally limited but active role.

These three models of media and politics are empirically grounded ideal types. As such, they do not offer exact empirical descriptions. Nevertheless, the United States is said to be a prototypical example of the Liberal model. Similarly, Greece is said to be a prototypical example of the Polarized Pluralist model, whereas Norway, Finland, Denmark, and Sweden are said to be typical examples of the Democratic Corporatist model.

Differences across space and time notwithstanding, the press and politics exist in a complex, interactive and symbiotic relationship, and this is what the expression "press and politics" usually refers to.

Jesper Strömbäck

See also Agenda Setting; Comparing Media Systems; Four Theories of the Press; Framing; Party Press; Press Freedom; Press Theories

Further Readings

Cook, T. E. (1998). Governing with the news: The news media as a political institution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Hallin, D. C., & Mancini, P. (2004). Comparing media systems: Three models of media and politics. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Kaplan, R. L. (2002). Politics and the American press: The rise of objectivity, 1865–1920. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Leigh, R. D. (Ed.). (1947). A free and responsible press: A general report on mass communication: Newspapers, radio, motion pictures, magazines, and books by the Commission on Freedom of the Press. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Overholser, G., & Jamieson, K. H. (Eds.). (2005). Institutions of American democracy: The press. New York: Oxford University Press.

Schudson, M. (1978). Discovering the news: A social history of American newspapers. New York: Basic Books.

Seibert, F. S., Peterson, T., & Schramm, W. (1963). Four theories of the press: The authoritarian, libertarian, social responsibility and Soviet communist concepts of what the press should be and do. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Strömbäck, J. (2005). In search of a standard: Four models of democracy and their normative implications for journalism. Journalism Studies, 6(3), 331–347.

Press Conferences

A press conference is a formal question-and-answer session between reporters and public officials. The press conference is a media event, designed to give reporters access to a newsworthy public official and official access to the public through media. Although lawyers, celebrities, sports figures, and company CEOs also hold them, political press conferences—especially those given by the president—comprise the bulk of these interactions. Much of what we know about presidential press conference varies by the history of the office and each president's individual preference for holding them.

The presidential press conference is a unique event that combines a prewritten introductory presidential statement with direct questions asked by reporters. Individual presidents set the tone and direction of press conferences with a formal policy or position statement. This allows presidents to communicate directly with the American people. Because the president can use other means to do this, the press conference is more for reporters than the president. Press conferences give the media direct access to the president and give reporters an opportunity to ask specific questions and receive immediate responses from the president. Although reporters ask questions, presidents have enormous influence over the direction and tenor of the press conference. The president calls on members of the media during the question-and-answer portion of the conference and might strategically avoid certain reporters whom he or she knows will ask a difficult or controversial question. George W. Bush famously revealed the predetermined nature of reporter selection in an April 13, 2004, press conference: "Hold on for a minute. . . . I've got some 'must calls,' I'm sorry." Reporters often hint what questions they will ask in daily "gaggle," so the press secretary and other staffers in the Office of the Press Secretary can alert presidents as to which topics are likely to be covered and by whom. Presidents can also announce press conferences just hours before they take place—or schedule them on Saturdays, as Lyndon Johnson did—leaving reporters ill prepared to ask tough and detailed questions.

The press conference is an important conduit for presidential–press relations. Presidents need media to communicate their policy positions to the public. Media need presidents as a reliable source for political news, and presidents' press conferences are often considered newsworthy. The press conference also satisfies a basic requirement that politicians are available to the news media. At the same time, presidents have used the press conference to dictate their policy agendas to the media. It was Franklin Roosevelt who first used the press conference in this way, to encourage reporters to frame their stories in a manner mostly favorable to the president and his policies. The advent of television allowed presidents to use the press conference not only to communicate with and appease media's desire for access to the president but also to speak directly to the American people, whose support is vital to the president in the democracy of the United States. President John F. Kennedy was the first to use the press conference as this vehicle for communicating directly to the American people on live television. Because he set a high standard of presidential performance during press conferences, other presidents, such as Richard Nixon, Gerald Ford, and Ronald Reagan, avoided press conferences and chose other means to publicize their policy positions.

California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) and U.S. Senator John McCain (R-AZ) hold a news conference on the docks of Terminal Island in the Port of Los Angeles to talk about the governor's efforts to reduce greenhouse gas emissions and dependence on fossil fuels on February 21, 2007, in Los Angeles, California.

Source: Getty Images.

Even so, presidents do not have discretion simply to ignore the media and not hold press conferences. Doing so may exacerbate an already contentious and adversarial relationship between media and presidents. Initially held irregularly as informal exchanges with President Roosevelt, today, presidents hold formal primetime press conferences in the East Wing of the White House. Presidents may hold other daytime press conferences outside the White House, in the Rose Garden, in the press briefing room, or other locations throughout the White House, or as joint press conferences with foreign dignitaries.

Although less studied than presidential press conferences, other politicians and government officials at the federal, state, and local levels also use press conferences to make statements concerning policy and public safety. Members of Congress use the press conference to raise awareness of an issue, emphasize partisan loyalty, or challenge the positions of the president or legislators from the opposing political party. Upon becoming speaker of the House in 1995, for example, Newt Gingrich held daily, televised press conferences in an effort to wrest control of the policy and political agendas away from President Bill Clinton and lead the media and public according to the agenda of Republican Party leaders in the House of Representatives. Cabinet secretaries use press conferences to announce changes in public policy and take questions from reporters. Governors may use a press conference to explain a state of emergency declaration, while mayors or police chiefs hold them to reassure local citizens in times of crisis, such as natural disasters or local crime waves. Indeed, it is through the press conference that local officials have the greatest access to the public, as they have fewer media resources to make public announcements as frequently as federal officials do.

Ultimately, press conferences are similar in format for all political officials. The presidency dominates discussion of the political press conference, as presidents have the greatest access to the media and are deemed most newsworthy. Other governmental officials, especially at the state and local levels, are more likely to hold press conferences during times of crisis. Despite these differences, the goal of the press conference is the same for all: convey a message to the media and public while giving reporters access to a source of news.

Matthew Eshbaugh-Soha

See also Congress and the Media; Presidential Communication; Television in Politics; Press Secretary, White House

Further Readings

Cook, T. E. (1998). Governing with the news. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Cornwell, E. (1965). Presidential leadership of public opinion. Bloomington: University of Indiana Press.

Eshbaugh-Soha, M. (2003). Presidential press conferences over time. American Journal of Political Science, 47, 348–353.

Grossman, M. B., & Kumar, M. J. (1981). Portraying the president: The White House and the news media. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Press Freedom

In the United States, press freedom is guaranteed by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. This right of free speech encompasses both print and electronic media and is designed to ensure that media organizations have the ability to gather and distribute knowledge and ideas without government censorship or restrictions.

The idea of an independent press that is free from government control is embraced as a means to keep the public informed of government activities. The press has long been considered a fourth branch of the government alongside the executive, legislative, and judicial branches. In order to maintain the public's interest, media organizations must be able to keep watch over the actions of the government in an unencumbered manner.

Press freedom came to the forefront not long after the printing press was invented and the mass distribution of ideas suddenly became a reality. In England, a royal proclamation required that all publications obtain a license from the monarchy prior to publication. This attempt at licensure of the press was essentially an attempt by the government to censor the content of what was printed. In 1644, John Milton published Areopagiticia: A Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing to the Parliament of England, in which he argued for and defended a free press. Milton argued that censorship was unnecessary in a free society and that all points of view should be heard because truth would ultimately prevail. In 1695, licensing laws were abolished in England.

In the United States, during colonial times, the press was censored by the British government. Prior to being printed, newspapers were required to obtain approval from the government. Once government approval was obtained, the newspapers were stamped with an official approval notice. In 1735, a landmark trial occurred in which press freedom was defended. John Peter Zenger was the publisher of the New York Weekly Journal and was an outspoken critic of Governor William Cosby of the Province of New York. Cosby accused Zenger of libelous statements and using seditious language. Libelous statements damage an individual's reputation, while seditious statements are considered to encourage revolt against the government. In the trial, the jury did not convict Zenger and therefore established the precedent that if printed material is factual it cannot be considered libelous or seditious.

An essential aspect of free speech rights for the press is that prior restraint by the government is prohibited. In 1931, the Supreme Court ruled in Near v. Minnesota that there was a constitutional guaranty of press freedom. In the Near case, the Supreme Court asserted that it was in the public's best interest to have a free and unrestrained press than to have government suppression. The Supreme Court argued that instances of press freedom abuses should be dealt with after the fact through established legal procedures rather than through prior restraint.

There are rare exceptions when prior restraint may be allowed, including whenever the following information is involved: (a) information that would interfere with war efforts, (b) information that would incite acts of violence, and (c) information that is defined as obscene. The Supreme Court noted that there was a difference between restrictions that are aimed at the content of the expression versus restrictions aimed at the avenue of the expression. For example, the Supreme Court ruled that time, place, and manner restrictions are permitted. In order for a government action that restricts expression to be considered content neutral by the courts, the restriction must not be based on personal partiality or personal interpretation. The restriction must be applied equally in all situations.

In 1965, in Freedman v. Maryland, the Supreme Court outlined the procedures required for censorship, of obscene material, to be considered constitutional. First, the censor, and not the exhibitor, must prove the material in question is obscene. Second, there must be a process in place for a quick judicial review for the matter. Third, a permanent restraint is permissible only if the courts find the material to be obscene. Obscene material is sexually explicit as defined in the later 1973 Miller v. California case.

In 1971, the Supreme Court underscored its earlier ruling prohibiting prior restraint in the case of New York Times Company v. United States. This case revolved around an incident in which the Department of Justice attempted to prevent The New York Times and The Washington Post from publishing details of a report about government decision making relating to the Vietnam War. The Department of Justice argued that publication of the report posed a threat to national security. This case became known as the Pentagon Papers case. The Supreme Court noted that the government carried a heavy burden of showing justification for prior restraint and sufficient justification had not been met in this case.

Press freedom does not extend to the actual gathering of information for news purposes. The American government perceived news coverage of the Vietnam War as negative. Thus, the government imposed access restrictions on journalists in all wars that have followed the Vietnam War. Unlike in Vietnam, where reporters had the ability to travel without restraint through battlefields, now journalists must be escorted in press pools throughout areas of conflict. This was most noticeable during both Persian Gulf wars.

Press freedom primarily exists in democratic societies. Reporters Without Borders, an international organization, ranks countries based on their freedom of the press. Internationally, countries that rank high in terms of press freedom include Finland, Iceland, Norway, Denmark, and Switzerland, while North Korea, Burma, China, Vietnam, Saudi Arabia, and Iran rank low. Reporters Without Borders asserts that more than a third of the world's population lives in countries where freedom of the press does not exist.

John Allen Hendricks

See also First Amendment; Pentagon Papers, The; Reporters Without Borders; Shield Laws

Further Readings

Lahav, P. (1985). Press law in modern democracies: A comparative study. New York: Longman.

Levy, L. W. (1985). Emergence of a free press. New York: Oxford University Press.

The 2005 World Press Freedom Index. (2005). Colombia, Mexico and Cuba are holding back the continent. Paris: Reporters Without Borders. Available at http://www.worldpress.org

Zelezny, J. D. (2001). Communications law: Liberties, restraints, and the modern media (3rd ed.). Belmont, CA: Wadsworth Thomson.

Press Law of 1766, Sweden

The Swedish Press Law of 1766 is regarded as the oldest legislation of press freedom. It was passed by the Swedish Riksdag (the Parliament) as "His Royal Majesty's Law on freedom of writing and print" on December 2, 1766. It was considered as a basic law, which meant that changes must be decided by identical decisions by two Riksdags. The law abolished the censorship of all printed publications, including those imported from abroad, but excluding those on theological subjects. Further, it guaranteed public access to documents drawn up by government agencies. However, the strong punishments for writing against the state or the king were kept, meaning that control was transferred from the public censor to the publishers.

The background of the Swedish Press Law of 1766 was the weakened power of the king. King Charles XII had died in 1718 leaving no children, and the throne had gone to his sister, who was followed by very weak kings. This meant an increasing importance of Parliament on political development. Even though it still had four chambers—for nobility, clergy, townsmen, and farmers—Parliament had developed two strong parties—"The Hats" and "The Caps"; the latter aimed for liberalization of Swedish society. The intense political debates included a number of printed political pamphlets. This created problems for the public censor, who himself participated in the debates, and meant an increased acceptance of critical publications. Thus, when censorship was abolished it had already lost most of its power.

In 1770 a new king—Gustaf III—entered the throne. He wanted to restore the power of the king. In 1772 he took dictatorial power, and the status of the 1766 as a basic law was abolished, making it possible for the king himself to make changes in the law. Formally censorship was not reintroduced, but the control of publishers was strengthened, specific rules for the right to publish newspapers were introduced, and punishments for harmful printing became harder.

Gustaf III was assassinated in 1792, and slightly more than a decade later the old dynasty died out. Thus in 1809 a new constitution was passed by Parliament, containing the main principles of the 1766 Press Law, and in 1810 the rules of press freedom and free access to public documents were transferred to their own basic law, where censorship on academic and theological publications was abolished. This law was extended in 1812 with, among other things, principles of editorial responsibility and specific rules for the legal process. Even if the new king, Charles XIV Johan—a former French general—tried to implement an increased press control, the newspapers managed to resist the activities, and in 1842 most of the state control was excluded from the law. In 1949 the law was somewhat revised, but its main principles are still the same as in 1766. In 1992 a similar basic law for radio, television, and film were passed.

Lennart Weibull

Further Readings

Levy, L. W. (1980). Emergence of a free press. New York: Oxford University Press.

Press Secretary, White House

Leaders are measured by their success in communicating with the public; however, the evaluation of communication has changed dramatically throughout the American presidency. With no paid staff to assist early presidents in their dialogue with reporters, newspapers were awarded government printing contracts to promote programs. In contrast, the modern White House Press Office employs 25 to 50 staffers, depending on the administration. The press secretary leads this office, to speak on behalf of the president across print, broadcast, and Internet channels, issue credentials to journalists, distribute as many as 15 news releases each day, hold televised daily briefings as well as press gaggles (untelevised but on-the-record meetings), and maintain nearly real-time information between the president and the news media. With comments broadcast instantly and globally, the press secretary is the most recognized representative of the executive branch other than the president.

William McKinley was the first president to provide workspace for reporters in the White House. His secretary, George Cortelyou, met daily with reporters on behalf of McKinley and later for Theodore Roosevelt. Roosevelt sought to make his own news from the "bully pulpit" as well as in meetings with selected reporters, but not every president worked to gain favorable headlines. Press relations were inconsistent in the early 20th century. William Howard Taft abandoned the reporters who came to expect time with Roosevelt and spoke less to the press throughout his presidency. Woodrow Wilson's secretary, Joe Tumulty, returned regularity to meeting with reporters and set the model for what would become the daily briefing.

A career newsman, Warren Harding handled his own press. He offered candid access but kept with tradition not to be quoted. The no-quote rule continued for Calvin Coolidge, who instead became the first unnamed "White House spokesman." As Harding's and Coolidge's secretary of commerce, Hoover was known as a terrific news source. His appreciation for the press carried into his presidency. He was the first president to assign his secretaries—first George Akerson and then Theodore Joslin—with the original, specific duty of press secretary.

Franklin Delano Roosevelt's press secretary Stephen T. Early planned to hold conferences only on the occasion of news events rather than on a schedule. Still, through a series of conferences to trumpet the New Deal, he gained popular celebrity. With Roosevelt, Early served the longest of all press secretaries, whose average tenure is nearly 3 years—long in comparison with other White House staff. The unique demands of the job have encouraged some presidents to appoint friends. Harry Truman selected lifelong friend Charlie Ross. President Jimmy Carter brought his gubernatorial press secretary (Jody Powell) to Washington.

Others opted to appoint news professionals. Dwight D. Eisenhower asked former reporter James C. Hagerty to be his press secretary. During his tenure, Hagerty allowed the first televised press conference.

Technology did the most to change his job, but Hagerty did the most to change presidential communications. He set goals and procedures that would become the work of the White House Communications Office. Hagerty also served as Eisenhower's advance man—traveling internationally to prepare for presidential visits.

Another newsman, Pierre Salinger, served John F. Kennedy and remained on staff for Lyndon Johnson. With Salinger, Kennedy held the first live televised press conferences. Salinger enjoyed a close relationship with both Kennedy and reporters, but that relationship changed with Johnson, who referred to reporters as "spies." Reporters responded with their own cynicism as the Vietnam conflict escalated. Salinger was succeeded by George Reedy, Bill Moyers, and George Christian—all in less than two full terms.

News often emerges just from the triangulation of the press, president, and press secretary. Richard Nixon's press secretary Ronald Ziegler is remembered for calling the Watergate breakin a "third-rate burglary attempt." Gerald Ford's first press secretary, Jerald terHorst, resigned in protest of the pardon of Nixon. Deputy press secretary Larry Speakes (James Brady retained the title of press secretary after being wounded in the 1981 assassination attempt on Ronald Reagan) admitted fabricating statements for Reagan. Mike McCurry faced repeated questions on Bill Clinton's personal life during the Monica Lewinsky scandal. When reporters demanded personal information as never before, McCurry steered clear of internal meetings on the matter so he could fulfill his job without deceiving the press or damaging the president.

The president who met most often with the press in recent years has been George H. W. Bush. Marlin Fitzwater served both Reagan and Bush: Reagan was the "Great Communicator," but Bush was not as effective on television or in formal speeches. However, Bush possessed thorough knowledge of the issues and was comfortable in the briefing room. He met with reporters 280 times in just four years. In a presidency bookended by the first Gulf War and economic recession, Fitzwater and Bush excelled in offering open communication to the press but failed to articulate larger leadership themes.

Those larger themes helped elect Clinton, and his administration made history with the appointment of the first female and youngest press secretary, Dee Dee Myers. Restructuring to place Myers under Communications Director George Stephanopoulos reflected efforts to exercise greater control of information. It is notable as the first time the press secretary did not report directly to the president. The Internet arrived during these years—again changing the timing and delivery of news as Myers was succeeded by McCurry and then Joe Lockhart.

Like those of many who served George W. Bush, Ari Fleischer's tenure as press secretary is remembered for his performance following the attacks of September 11, 2001. Though already televised, the daily briefing gained new audiences and the press secretary gained still new stature. When Bush's approval ratings dropped in his second term, the White House underwent high-ranking staff changes, and Fleischer's successor, Scott McClellan, was among the most visible departures. Tony Snow replaced McClellan. Snow—experienced as a former White House staffer under George H. W. Bush, a well-known broadcast journalist and radio talk show host—is arguably the first press secretary to come to the job with established celebrity status and gravitas.

Nearly 30 individuals have held the title of press secretary since Hoover asked Akerson to meet with reporters. Each has been different in experience, approach, and of course in their response to the events of each presidency. Still, the job's fundamental purpose is unchanged: Press secretaries talk to reporters on behalf of the president.

Karen Lane DeRosa

See also Press Conferences

Further Readings

Edwards, G., III. (1983). The public presidency: The pursuit of popular support. New York: St. Martin's.

Kumar, M. J. (2003). The office of the press secretary. In M. J. Kumar & T. Sullivan (Eds.), The White House world: Transitions, organization, and office operations (pp. 224–251). College Station: Texas A&M University Press.

Nelson, W. D. (1998). Who speaks for the president? The White House press secretary from Cleveland to Clinton. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.

Press Theories

The idea of "press theories" dates from Fred S. Siebert, Theodore Peterson, and Wilbur Schramm's 1956 book Four Theories of the Press, which advanced the thesis that media systems could be classified in terms of four philosophical orientations: the Authoritarian, Libertarian, Social Responsibility, and Soviet Communist press theories. Two of these, the Social Responsibility and Soviet Communist theories, are considered to be variations on the other, more basic ones; this framework thus divided media systems into two fundamental categories, understood in terms of the role of the media in relation to the state and the individual: in the Authoritarian model, the media served the state; in the Libertarian model, it served the individual.

Four Theories of the Press has widely been used to classify media systems worldwide, and subsequent authors have often started from its framework and added additional "press theories." Some authors, for example, add "development journalism" as a fifth theory. The notion of development journalism was advocated by many journalists and intellectuals in developing countries during the 1970s as an alternative to dominant Western theories. Development journalism was built around the idea that the primary function of the press was to promote modernization and nation building through education and mobilization of communities; it deemphasized the notions of the press both as a "watchdog" of state power and as a servant of advertisers and consumers. Some have also noted that Northern European social democratic theory deviates from Siebert, Peterson, and Schramm's four categories, since it emphasizes press freedom but includes a strong positive role for the state.

Both of these "fifth" press theories stand apart from Siebert, Peterson, and Schramm's formulation because they rest on conceptions of the media's role that are not built around the opposition between state and individual: the social democratic theory puts greater stress on the tension between the market and the public sphere, and the development communication perspective on the divisions between the global North and South and between dependence and modernization. In the 1960s, American modernization theories also classified media systems into traditional, transitional, and modern based not on the distinction between libertarianism and authoritarianism, but on the degree to which specialized communication institutions had emerged, intensifying social exchange and displacing traditional means of communication tied to structures of kinship and status. Individualism was important in this framework but was not necessarily opposed to the state, which was often seen as a force for modernization.

Four Theories of the Press was attractive to media scholars because it raised the question of the relation between media institutions and the wider societies of which they were a part. The press theories proposed by Siebert, Peterson, and Schramm, and others following in their footsteps, however, were normative theories of the press; that is, they were theories about how the press should be organized. They were not really empirical models; that is, scholarly theories about how different media systems actually worked They could perhaps most accurately be described as press ideologies, since they were advanced to fight political battles over the role of the press—Siebert, Peterson, and Schramm reinterpreted liberal press theory to help fight the Cold War battles of ideas between the Soviet bloc and the West, for instance, while the advocates of development journalism or more recently of "Asian journalism" developed their ideas to fight the influence of those same liberal theories.

Comparing Media Systems

In recent years, researchers in communication and in comparative politics have begun to think more systematically about how to compare media systems and explain their development and relationships with other social institutions. "Press theories" may enter into this kind of analysis but will not be the center of it as they were in Four Theories of the Press. Their centrality in that book was based in part on the premise that philosophical assumptions about human nature, the state and the individual, and the nature of truth underlay the structure of media systems. This conception leaves out factors like the market structure of media industries and the structure of party and interest group competition in the political system.

One of the appeals of the notion of press theories was the idea that it was possible to categorize media systems using a relatively parsimonious set of ideal types that would summarize the main similarities and differences among them. Is it possible to develop a set of models of this sort on the basis of empirical comparative research? Three models that can be used to summarize the distinct patterns of development in the media systems of Western Europe and North America, the "Polarized Pluralist" or "Mediterranean" model, "North/Central European" or "Democratic Corporatist" model, and the "Liberal" or "North Atlantic Model." Several cautions about the use of this type of model should be considered. First, there these are not intended to be universal models. One of the most important problems with the tradition of scholarship that followed from Four Theories of the Press was that the effort to fit all the world's media systems into a small number of models meant that the specificity of most systems was obscured. The three models presented here will no doubt be useful as points of comparison for thinking about media systems in other parts of the world, in part because the countries studied are dominant countries in the world system and their media have had influence worldwide. But they are not intended to be applied mechanically, without modification. Second, Concrete media systems do not fit neatly into these conceptual models Many will be mixed cases or will deviate from the ideal types in important ways. The scholarly function of media system models is not to create a set of pigeonholes with which to categorize particular cases but to understand what patterns of characteristics tend to go together in the development of media systems. When we analyze individual cases, then, we can use those models to think about how and why they conform to or deviate from these patterns. Third, media systems are not homogeneous: not all elements of a media system will reflect the same logic or ideology. In Europe, for example, broadcasting and the press have been organized on very different models, the press characterized by private ownership and "external pluralism"—that is, by a variety of different media outlets reflecting different political tendencies—while broadcasting was organized on the basis of public ownership, internal pluralism, and a principle of "due impartiality" in the coverage of political controversy. Third, media systems are not static. They change over time, and the models we develop need to be understood not as timeless but as historically bound.

The Mediterranean or Polarized Pluralist Model

In the Mediterranean countries of Europe, the press developed as an institution of the worlds of politics and literature rather than of the market. With the exception of France, literacy rates remained low in these countries until the mid-20th century. The newspaper, therefore, developed not as a form of mass culture but as a medium for debate among elites active in politics and high culture, and remains so to a significant degree today, though sports dailies and weekly magazines devoted to celebrities and human interest reporting circulate among wider publics. Because of the political roots of the press, the level of "party press parallelism" or, more generally, "political parallelism" has always been high in this media system: the structure of the media system, that is, tends to reflect the main lines of partisan and ideological division in society. Newspapers and often electronic media as well typically have clear partisan or ideological identities and readerships. This pattern of partisanship and external pluralism is closely related with a history of what political scientist Giovanni Sartori called "polarized pluralism." Because the political systems of these countries have been characterized by a wide spectrum of political parties with sharply differing ideologies, the idea of neutral media standing apart from partisan divisions has never seemed plausible or appealing. Even as media in the Mediterranean countries have become more market oriented in recent years, political partisanship has continued to structure media markets.

The political roots of the press also meant that journalistic professionalism developed later and less strongly in the Mediterranean countries than in Northern Europe or North America. The role of the reporter as a specialized type of communicator—differentiated from the political commentator—developed relatively late, as did codes of ethics distinct to journalism. While many Northern European countries have press councils, which serve as a form of professional self-regulation, the only press council in Southern Europe is in Catalonia. This is related to the fact that rational-legal authority is less deeply rooted in Southern than in Northern Europe, and conceptions of common norms transcending particular ideologies and interests are thus less accepted. A history of instrumentalization of the media, that is, control by outside actors in politics or business, means that the autonomy of journalists has with a few notable exceptions—the French newspaper Le Monde, for example—not been strongly developed.

Finally, the Mediterranean model is characterized by a relatively active state intervention in the media system. The state or state-owned companies have often been media owners, for example, and France and Italy have the highest level of press subsidies in Western Europe. At the same time, legal regulation of the media has often been weaker than in Southern than in Northern Europe. Sylvio Berlusconi's television empire in Italy was built during a long period when partisan divisions prevented Italy from passing a new broadcasting law.

The North/Central European or Democratic Corporatist Model

The media system that prevails in Northern and North/Central Europe is interesting from the point of view of communication theory because it combines elements that have often been assumed to be incompatible. In the first place, this system has combined a strong commercial press with a strong history of what might be called "representational media," media whose primary purpose is to represent a social group or community in the public sphere. These groups have included political parties, trade unions, and churches and religious communities. The combination of these two press traditions produced the highest rate of newspaper readership in the world, as the connection of newspapers with social groups created a culture in which newspaper readership was closely connected with peoples' sense of social identity.

The Democratic Corporatist system also has combined a high degree of political parallelism—a legacy of the representative press—with a high degree of journalistic professionalism. Party newspapers have declined since the 1970s, and the degree of political parallelism has diminished in Northern Europe. But national newspapers do still tend to vary in their political orientations, and the media of Northern Europe still focus fairly strongly on the views of parties and other organized social groups. The Democratic Corporatist system is characterized by relatively high levels of consensus on the distinct norms of journalism as a profession. Press councils, for instance, are more important in this system than in the Liberal or Polarized Pluralist one. Journalists also enjoy relatively strong autonomy. Democratic Corporatism is a form of political organization based on bargaining among organized social groups. One of its characteristics is to combine political pluralism with a high degree of consensus on the rules of the political game, and traditions of rational-legal authority are strong. The media system reflects this same combination of pluralism and consensus.

Finally, the Democratic Corporatist system combines strong protection for press freedom with a relatively strong role of the state. Liberal protections for press freedom developed early in most of these countries. But the state is also seen as having a positive role to play in preserving a plural and open media system, a role that is reflected in press subsidies in many countries and also by particularly strong public broadcasting systems.

The North Atlantic or Liberal System

The Liberal system, which prevails in Britain and former colonies like the United States, Canada, and Ireland, has been theorized more extensively than others. The central characteristic of this system is the strong dominance of commercial media, which relatively early displaced the "representative media" that were more central to media development in Continental Europe. A strong commercial press produced relatively high newspaper circulation, though not as high today as in Northern Continental Europe. It also combined with a consensual political culture to produce a relatively high level of journalistic professionalism.

It is common to speak of an "Anglo-American media model," and in many ways this makes sense. Britain and the United States share a strong commercial press and a form of journalism based on information and storytelling rather than the kind of political analysis and commentary that played a larger role in Continental Europe. There are, however, important differences between the U.S. and British media systems. The United States, first of all, is characterized by a low level of political parallelism: journalistic culture is dominated by the principle of balance or internal pluralism. The same journalistic norm of "due impartiality" applies in British broadcasting. The British press, however, is strongly partisan. The difference is due in part to market structure. American newspapers are local monopoly newspapers, and the United States therefore lacks the external pluralism that characterizes competitive national newspaper markets in Britain or Continental Europe.

The United States and Britain also share a tradition of limited state power, manifested, for example, in the absence of press subsidies. The legal tradition associated with the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution limits many kinds of media regulation common in other parts of the world. Press freedom does not take legal precedence in the same way in Britain, however, and Britain, with more of a social democratic tradition, has a strong public broadcasting system, which the United States does not.

Globalization and Convergence of Media Systems

When Siebert, Peterson, and Schramm wrote about press systems reflecting the nature of the societies in which they developed, they were assuming that these "societies" coincided with national boundaries. In fact, media systems—and particularly where the news media are concerned—have historically developed in a close relation to national political institutions. There have always been important cross-national influences, to be sure. This is an important reason why common patterns of media systems organization exist. The media in Italy, Spain, and Portugal are similar to one another and to the media in France, for example, in part because French press practices were exported to Italy and the Iberian Peninsula during the Napoleonic wars. But from the time nation states became consolidated, newspapers were closely tied to national political systems, and broadcasting in most cases was directly run by them. With commercialization and globalization of media, it is possible that the nation state may cease to be the correct unit for comparing media systems, though there is considerable debate still about haw far cross-national convergence has gone.

Daniel C. Hallin and Paolo Mancini

See also Comparing Media Systems; Four Theories of the Press

Further Readings

Hachten, W. A. (1996). The world news prism: Changing media of international communication. Ames: Iowa State University Press.

Hallin, D. C., & Mancini, P. (2004). Comparing media systems: Three models of media and politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Merrill, J. C. (Ed.). (1983). Global journalism: Survey of international communication. New York: Longman.

Mohamad, M. (1985). A prescription for a socially responsible press. Media Asia, 12, 212–215.

Picard, R. G. (1988). The ravens of Odin: The press in the Nordic nations. Ames: Iowa State University Press.

Pye, L. W. (1963). Communications and political development. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

PRIMARIES

The presidential primaries are a phenomenon of the American presidential election system. Every 4 years, in a series of 35–40 primary elections in the states, the presidential nominees are selected. In these primaries, the voters are choosing delegates who are committed to the candidates and who will vote in the national party conventions during the summer. As one of the party's candidates moves into the lead and gains more and more delegates, the other candidates typically are "winnowed" from the race, withdrawing because of lack of support. In 2004, for example, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts had won enough of the primaries by early March to have enough delegates to secure the Democratic nomination. He was officially chosen as the party's nominee at the Democratic convention in July 2004.

While some states select their delegates by a caucus process instead of by primaries, the primary process is the main route to presidential nomination. (Caucuses, such as the famous Iowa precinct caucuses, are held in several stages, and require that voters attend meetings at night to discuss the candidates. The time-consuming and public nature of the caucuses has the effect of keeping voter participation much lower than in the primaries.)

Presidential primaries were part of the reforms advocated by the Progressive Movement in America in the early 20th century. Reformers such as Senator Robert M. LaFollette of Wisconsin and former President Theodore Roosevelt urged the states to change the old system, whereby a small group of party leaders at the national convention selected the nominees. Instead, urged the Progressives, the party members at the grassroots level should have a direct voice in choosing the presidential nominees through primary elections. Many states adopted this reform, and by 1912, there were at least 12 primaries, and newspapers mentioned others, with widely different rules and structures. So embedded was the party convention system, however, that the party leaders in 1912 replaced the delegates at will during the convention. The reform effort underwent a long hiatus. Although 12–16 states routinely had presidential primaries, and the early primaries (particularly the first primary, New Hampshire) occasionally had an agenda-setting effect on the campaign, the majority of states did not use this method of selecting candidates.

The McGovern-Fraser Commission of the Democratic Party, working during the 1968–1972 period, revived the idea that party members at the grassroots level should have a direct hand in selecting the party nominee. The commission mandated new rules for wider participation (adopted by the Democratic Party), which led to sweeping changes in the nomination process and the adoption of primaries and caucuses by the states. Starting with the presidential election of 1972, one candidate (Senator George McGovern of South Dakota) had won enough delegates in the primaries that as the party convention approached, it was evident that he was the party's nominee before the convention. Presidential primaries are now the main way candidates become the party nominees, in both parties.

The presidential primaries have six unique situational factors that influence the campaign communication process. First, the primaries are held much earlier in the year than the convention, and with every quadrennial cycle, states have moved their primaries earlier, in a process of "front loading." The earliest primaries tend to capture the heaviest media attention and to set the news agenda for the presidential campaign. Second, instead of there being a one-time event such as a fall election date, there are multiple primaries, which forces the candidates and media to divide their communication energies and resources among many states. The media focus their attention on the "horse race," giving the most attention to the candidates who are ahead in the polls. They also give heavy coverage to the "fighter," the candidate(s) who fight against the odds and do better than expected.

Third, there are multiple candidates openly competing against each other rather than just the two candidates typical in a fall campaign. The frontrunner in the race tends to draw the most attacks from the other candidates. All the candidates work to introduce themselves to the public in effective biographical messages, in candidate videos, political advertisements, speeches, and Web sites.

Fourth, in the primaries the individual candidates must fund and promote their own candidacies, whereas in the fall campaign the national party plays a leading role in promoting the party's nominee. The year before the primaries officially begin has been called "the money primary," as candidates struggle to raise enough money to enable them to hire staff, develop their campaign plans, travel among the early primary states, conduct polling, and gain favorable media attention. Fifth, because the primary candidates are all in the same party, there are fewer differences in policy positions among them. This leads them to emphasize differences in character and image rather than policy. Sixth, the primaries are serial: they occur over a period of several months rather than all at once. In planning for the 2008 nominating race, for example, candidates needed to focus on the earliest state events, in Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Florida, scheduled for January, while also looking ahead to primaries in many other states scheduled in February and later.

Because the primaries are held long before the general election, before many people have formed strong opinions, the candidates and media have an unparalleled opportunity to influence their perceptions and to set the agenda. The stakes are high: selection of the presidential nominees. While the principle that voters at the grassroots should choose the nominee has wide support (instead of giving this power to a little group of men behind closed doors), there are also proposals for reform. Some propose a national primary, or four regional primaries, to reduce the heavy influence of the earliest primary states, and to bring order to a hectic system. In the meantime, the American system of presidential primaries poses diverse communication challenges.

Kathleen E. Kendall

See also Conventions, Political; Iowa Caucuses

Further Readings

Benoit, W. L., Pier, P. M., Brazeal, L. M., McHale, J. P., Klyukovski, A., & Aime, D. (2002). The primary decision: A functional analysis of debates in presidential primaries. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Cho, S., & Benoit, W. L. (2005). Primary presidential election campaign messages in 2004: A functional analysis of candidates' news releases. Public Relations Review, 31, 175–183.

Cook, R. (2000). Race for the presidency: Winning the 2000 nomination. Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Jamieson, K. H., & Miller, M. (Eds.). (2000, November). Presidential campaigns: Sins of omission [Special Issue]. Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 572.

Goff, M. J. (2004). The money primary: The new politics of the early presidential nomination process. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Kendall, K. E. (2000). Communication in the presidential primaries: Candidates and the media, 1912–2000. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Kendall, K. E. (2005, September). Constructing the primary story: Embedded with the media in New Hampshire. American Behavioral Scientist, 49, 157–172.

Mayer, W. G., & Busch, A. E. (2004). The front-loading problem in presidential nominations. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

McKinney, M. S., & Banwart, M. C. (2005). Rocking the youth vote through debate: Examining the effects of a citizen versus journalist controlled debate on civic engagement. Journalism Studies, 6, 153–163.

Parmelee, J. H. (2003). Meet the candidate videos: Analyzing presidential primary campaign videocassettes. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Tedesco, J. C. (2005, September). Intercandidate agenda setting in the 2004 Democratic presidential primary. American Behavioral Scientist, 49, 92–113.

Tewksbury, D. (2006). Exposure to the newer media in a presidential primary campaign. Political Communication, 23, 313–332.

Trent, J. S., Short-Thompson, C., Mongeau, P. A., Metzler, M. S., & Trent, J. D. (2005, September). The idealized presidential candidate: A vision over time. American Behavioral Scientist, 49, 130–156.

PRIMING

Also known as a consequence of agenda setting, priming refers to the process by which the importance of political issues in media content and public opinion influences evaluations of political leaders. Whereas agenda-setting theory posits that mass media increase the salience of political issues in public opinion, priming suggests that the issues made prominent via agenda setting are used as the major criteria by which individuals judge political leaders, particularly the president. Thus, if news media tend to cover the economy more than any other issue, public evaluations of politicians will be predominantly based on their perceived performance of how those leaders are handling that issue. Thus, the emphasis of news media on certain issues at the expense of others can substantially alter assessments of political figures.

Led by Shanto Iyengar and associates, several studies have offered robust support for priming effects. In a seminal series of experiments, residents of New Haven, Connecticut, were presented manipulated television newscasts to assess news media impact on audience perceptions. The issues manipulated were national defense, pollution, and inflation. Among the key findings of these studies were that news media content not only raised the salience of theses political issues (agenda setting), but also affected subsequent evaluations of President Jimmy Carter's job performance (priming). Effects were more pronounced for performance evaluations than for personal assessments. In a more recent set of experiments in Columbus, Ohio, priming influence was examined for a diverse set of issues, ranging from drug use to unemployment. Both studies reported priming effects prompted by exposure to news. A common feature of the aforementioned inquiries was their use of television newscasts as experimental stimuli. The exploration of priming via print and online news has remained somewhat unexplored.

Building on this laboratory work, researchers have supplemented experimental research with field studies. For example, one investigation observed that presidential approval of George H. W. Bush was predicted by public perceptions of his performance on foreign policy issues during the First Gulf War. Using content analysis and survey data, this investigation demonstrated that increased news media coverage of the war led to greater emphasis on foreign policy by citizens when asked about presidential job performance.

In a related analysis comparing the Gulf crisis and the economy from 1990–1992, researchers found that evaluations of the president were principally determined by the salience of these two issues in media coverage and public opinion. In particular, public assessments of job approval varied depending upon which issue dominated news media content. As a consequence, this study confirmed priming influence for both a domestic and foreign policy issue.

Consistent with previous research, similar patterns were noted for the impact of media attention of the Iran–Contra scandal on public evaluations of President Ronald Reagan. Specifically, an examination of National Election Studies' data compared public opinion before and after the scandal was made known to the American public to ascertain causal relationships. Study results illustrated that priming effects were more pronounced for appraisals of job approval than judgments of presidential character. In an international context, media attention to the introduction of the euro in Denmark was also associated with priming effects on Danish political leaders. In sum, a variety of experimental and field studies have offered support for priming using both cross-sectional and time series data.

Given the widespread evidence, some scholarly debate concerning the mechanisms underlying priming has been engendered. One major perspective indicates that the process occurs psychologically by making certain issues more accessible in individuals' minds as they make political judgments. From this standpoint, people are viewed as cognitive misers who use simple cues from the media as the basis for their political evaluations. Another perspective indicates that inference is the primary psychological mechanism by which priming occurs. Inconclusive evidence regarding underlying psychological explanations for priming suggests that this debate will remain pervasive in the scholarly literature for years to come.

While news media are considered the driving force in priming, political campaigns can also play an integral role in the process, particularly when candidates and political parties aim to impact the agenda of issues in news content. By emphasizing certain issues over others, campaigns attempt to impact public evaluations of candidates by stressing concerns upon which their candidates are believed to have a strategic advantage. These efforts are often carried out through news releases, interviews, and other types of "information subsidies."

In addition to the evidence obtained from news content, research has indicated that other forms of political communication can lead to priming effects with voters. For example, one study found that political advertisements can prime racial opinions to shape evaluations of political leaders. In an innovative setting, another inquiry proposed that priming via campaign advertisements can modify assessments of judges running for political office. In brief, multiple investigations have identified political advertising as a key determinant of priming influence.

Though understudied, some research has uncovered priming effects from entertainment content. Specifically, one investigation revealed that exposure to the West Wing television show could impact reactions to current and past presidents. A connected study of film content reported that exposure to Fahrenheit 9/11 affected ambivalent attitudes toward President George W. Bush. Finally, priming effects were shown for attention to late night comedy shows during the 2000 presidential campaign using data from the National Annenberg Election Survey. The extension of priming to entertainment content represents a key frontier for further scholarly exploration. Other forms of political communication that are largely unexamined include attention to political debates and conventions.

A major reason for the consistent interest in priming research lies in its potential implications for voting behavior. In an analysis of the 2002 German federal election, one inquiry found that priming contributed to vote choice and significantly swayed the election outcome. Similar results were obtained empirically in studies of voter behavior in Canadian and Israeli elections. Priming does not always enhance voting. Some scholars have argued that news media can prime cynicism, leading to declining voter turnout. Thus, priming appears to have ramifications for political participation, which may extend beyond voting to other actions, such as volunteering, donating, and demonstrating.

Issue ownership theory supplies a germane conceptual framework for explaining why priming influence can lead to strategic advantages for political candidates, parties, and campaigns. According to this perspective, political parties tend to "own" certain issues in public opinion, in that voters often believe that certain parties are able to handle some problems better than others. For example, Republicans are frequently regarded to be more effective for issues of defense, while Democrats are regarded as more effective for social issues. As a result, when media focus on issues owned by a particular party, the resulting priming effects should translate into increased support for candidates from the advantaged party. Research has suggested that priming effects can also occur for political parties themselves. Issue ownership theory has received support in several studies, including an extensive analysis of debate content, political ads, media content, and public opinion from 1952 to 2000.

In the abstract, priming posits that mass media wield substantial influence on the considerations used in public evaluations of political leaders. As such, beyond issues, scholars have examined priming effects for aspects of candidate images, such as leadership. One analysis, for instance, revealed that a president's own remarks during the State of the Union Address could translate into priming impact via both issues and aspects of his image. International evidence obtained in investigations of Canadian elections has documented similar results. Another inquiry reported that the publicity associated with public opinion poll results can lead to priming effects for aspects of candidate images.

Connected to the related concept of second-level agenda setting, scholars have also observed "attribute priming" influence, whereby shifts in the salience of dimensions of topics in the news can affect public evaluations concerning those same topics. For example, one study found attribute priming effects for news coverage of a local issue in Ithaca, New York, among a sample of adult residents. The exploration of priming beyond national elections to the state and local levels in studies such as this is vital to the expansion and application of the theory.

Despite the observed relationships, several moderating variables have been identified that can amplify or reduce priming effects. Political knowledge has been perhaps the most extensively examined. Research has been mixed as to whether it enhances or diminishes priming effects. Other moderating variables receiving scholarly attention include partisanship, political expertise, trust, and involvement.

With the growing impact of the Internet and other forms of political communication, researchers will need to examine priming dynamics in several contexts with a variety of political objects. Hence, it should continue to remain a fruitful arena for political communication scholarship for several years to come.

Spiro Kiousis

See also Agenda Setting; Political Knowledge

Further Readings

de Vreese, C. H. (2004). Primed by the euro: The impact of a referendum campaign on public opinion and evaluations of government and political leaders. Scandinavian Political Studies, 27, 45–64.

Druckman, J., & Holmes, J. (2004). Does presidential rhetoric matter? Priming and presidential approval. Presidential Studies Quarterly, 34, 755–778.

Edwards, G. C., Mitchell, W., & Welch, R. (1995). Explaining presidential approval: The significance of issue salience. American Journal of Political Science, 39, 109–134.

Holbert, R. L., & Hansen, G. (2006). Fahrenheit 9-11, need for closure and the priming of affective ambivalence: An assessment of intra-affective structures by party identification. Human Communication Research, 32, 109–129.

Holbert, R. L, Pillion, O., Tschida, D., Armfield, G., Kinder, K., Cherry, K., et al. (2003). The West Wing as endorsement of the American presidency: Expanding the domain of priming in political communication. Journal of Communication, 53, 427–443.

Iyengar, S. (2002). The effects of media-based campaigns on candidate and voter behavior: Implications for judicial elections. Indiana Law Review, 35, 691–699.

Iyengar, S., & Kinder, D. R. (1987). News that matters. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Iyengar, S., Peters, M. D., & Kinder, D. R. (1982). Experimental demonstrations of the "not-so-minimal" consequences of television news programs. American Political Science Review, 76, 848–858.

Iyengar, S., & Simon, A. (1993). News coverage of the Gulf crisis and public opinion: A study of agenda-setting, priming, and framing. Communication Research, 20, 365–383.

Krosnick, J. A., & Kinder, D. R. (1990). Altering the foundations of support for the president through priming. American Political Science Review, 84, 497–512.

Mendelsohn, M. (1994). The media's persuasive effects: The priming of leadership in the 1988 Canadian election. Canadian Journal of Political Science, 27, 81–97.

Miller, J., & Krosnick, J. (1997). Anatomy of news media priming. In S. Iyengar & R. Reeves (Eds.), Do the media govern? (pp. 258–275). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Pan, Z., & Kosicki, G. (1997). Priming and media impact on the evaluations of the president's performance. Communication Research, 24, 3–20.

Petrocik, J., Benoit, W., & Hansen, G. (2003–2004). Issue ownership and presidential campaigning, 1952–2000. Political Science Quarterly, 118, 599–626.

Sheafer, T., & Weimann, G. (2005). Agenda building, agenda setting, priming, individual voting intentions, and the aggregate results: An analysis of four Israeli elections. Journal of Communication, 55, 347–365.

Valentino, N., Hutchings, V., & White, I. (2002). Cues that matter: How political ads prime racial attitudes during campaigns. American Political Science Review, 96, 75–90.

Prince, The

See Machiavelli, Niccolò

Processing the News

Doris A. Graber's seminal study Processing the News: How People Tame the Information Tide, represents a landmark in political communication research. First published in 1984, the study shed new light on major questions concerning the political consequences of media use and audience behavior.

This carefully conducted, pioneering research eschews the generalizations that characterize media effects as either nonexistent or all powerful. Instead, Graber illustrates the complexities of media uses and effects on individuals' mental stores of information by bringing schema theory into the field of political communication. Media influence on schemas is evident in the way Graber's interviewees talk about politics, but media influence cannot be categorized simplistically in all-or-nothing terms.

Schema theory draws heavily on cognitive psychology, and Graber argues that when people encounter new information they integrate parts of it into existing schemas. Schematic thinking, Graber argues, is rather well informed; affectively consistent and interdependent; based in more abstract conceptualization; and stable over time.

The book is based on a yearlong panel study with a sample of 21 randomly selected registered voters from Evanston, Illinois. Through careful analysis of media diaries and 10 depth interviews with each of her 21 respondents over the course of a year, Graber offers a valuable research design and methodological approach to studying media uses and effects on political knowledge, attitudes, and behavior. The study offers new insights on how citizens obtain information via print and broadcast media in comparison with learning about politics from friends or personal networks. Graber shows how citizens synthesize information from various sources to make sense of the news. She finds that citizens are active users of the media and not passive recipients of media content. Personal situations and criteria predispose people to be selectively attentive to some information in the media and to ways of organizing and processing that information.

Graber's study goes deep into the individual experience to challenge some of the traditional expectations of media effects research, such as the "two-step flow hypothesis" and the power of agenda setting. She draws upon her depth interviews to discuss the applicability of major concepts in the field of media effects research, such as uses and gratifications, agenda setting, and more, with concrete examples from her fieldwork.

Processing the News is one of Graber's 15 books published to date. Her most recent study, Processing Politics: Learning from Television in the Internet Age (2001) received the Goldsmith Book Prize for Best Academic Political Communication book of 2003. Processing Politics continues where Processing the News left off on the topic of information processing and provides exciting insights from neurobiology research to show how the brain processes visual and verbal information. Graber is also known for her classic texts in the field: Media Power in Politics (5th ed., 2006) and Mass Media and American Politics (7th ed., 2006) are popular volumes rich with detail and attention to the latest in political communication scholarship.

Holli A. Semetko

See also Graber, Doris A.; Political Information Processing

Further Readings

Graber, D. A. (1984). Processing the news: How people tame the information tide. New York: Longman.

Graber, D. A. (2001). Processing politics: Learning from television in the Internet age. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Graber, D. A. (2006). Mass media and American politics (7th ed.). Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press.

Graber, D. A. (2006). Media power in politics (5th ed.). Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press.

Professionalization

During the past 10 to 15 years, professionalization has become a catchword for characterizing recent developments in electoral campaigning. The term, however, refers to a concept that was originally developed in the sociology of labor and professions. Professionalization stands for the process through which occupations become professionalized. This process passes through certain stages from specialization, academization, the founding of professional organizations, the introduction of licensing or some other kind of certification, and the development of professional standards. Wilensky emphasizes the relevance of autonomous expertise and the service ideal. Among the classical professions are doctors and lawyers.

When the term was introduced to characterize modern election campaigning, not much was retained from the sociological concept. Instead, professionalization was often used to describe U.S. campaigns and to declare them the model for modern electioneering. However, when Maggie Scammell studied U.S. campaigning at the end of the 1990s, she applied the sociological professionalization criteria (control over entry, self-regulating code of conduct, definable bodies of knowledge, training and certification by recognizable standards, full-time employment, formal organization). She found that while professionalization was often treated as the hallmark of American-style modern campaigning, professionalization is problematic even in the United States. She discovered only some emerging signs of professionalization (as the growth of a common identity, specialist knowledge, the development of a specialist education, and the establishment of a code of conduct) but nevertheless ascertained that the campaign business was predominantly influenced by folk wisdom. She finally concluded that political consultancy in the United States was characterized more by commercialism than professionalism.

More often, the term has been used in a simple, one-dimensional sense, where professionalization became equated with the trend of giving the organization of election campaigns into the hands of consultants. In this sense, professionalization mostly stands for the alleged worldwide adaptation of campaigns to the U.S. model of electioneering, and thus was also used as a synonym for Americanization.

However, this shift of campaign organization from parties and candidates to experts in the marketing business implies the application of certain strategies and techniques and thus a new perspective on politics and how it is "sold" to citizens and the media. In this broader sense, professionalization can be understood as an adaptation to recent changes in society, in the political system, and in the media system. These changes have been influenced by the modernization of society. In short, this describes an individualization process that has brought about a decreasing influence of once-powerful social structure variables. These no longer prescribe individual behavior in a binding way. Without these guidelines, individuals have gained new liberties that often come along with new uncertainties.

The changes in society also had consequences for the political system and for political communication. The traditional models of voter behavior were more or less built on social structure variables and were conceived of as being rather stable. Parties and politicians knew who their voters were and how they should be addressed. During the past decades, these ties between parties and their voters have been weakening in most Western democracies, a process that has also been called "dealignment." At the same time, the mass media, and television in particular, have gained importance for the communication process between political actors and the electorate. The increasing relevance of economic factors in television markets led to commercialization, which has had consequences for the way politics is presented to the audience.

These developments—modernization of society, unpredictable voters, and the commercialization of the media market—posed a major challenge to the political system, which was thus forced to adapt to the new conditions. Those who have to communicate politics to citizens and the media had to cope with social differentiation and to make greater efforts to gain the attention of the media. Therefore, the professionalization of political communication was an inevitable consequence of and reaction to these trends. How this process developed and what its consequences are can best be observed in election campaigns where the share of power is at stake and communication efforts increase.

Professionalization in this sense implies the application of those tools and techniques that have proven their worth in marketing. On the one hand, that means the extensive use of polling and other social science methods to analyze voters' attitudes and for testing campaign material in advance. On the other hand, these techniques include strategies that raise the chances for reaching the attention of the media and the voters and for directing the attention to certain topics. Ideally, these strategies are the result of proactive planning. They encompass attention strategies like agenda setting and framing to steer the attention to those topics that are uncontroversial or on which a candidate or party can demonstrate competence or point to earlier successes. This also includes the organization of media events or negative campaigning. Accordingly, distraction strategies divert the attention from topics that are uncomfortable for the candidate or party (e.g., personalization, privatization). Finally, adaptation strategies customize the campaign to the individualized electorate and to the (new) media environment. How these strategies turn out in a certain campaign is very much dependent on the situation, which is influenced by long-term and stable factors (e.g., the electoral system) and by short-term, varying factors (e.g., the candidate, the economic situation).

While these processes have been widely studied in election campaigns, professionalization is not restricted to campaigning but rather is a process that takes place in political communication in general. However, due to the fact that elections directly decide about the distribution of power, the process of professionalization is probably more advanced in election campaigning than in day-to-day politics.

Christina Holtz-Bacha

See also Americanization; Consultants, Political; Dealignment; Government Communication; Political Marketing

Further Readings

Holtz-Bacha, C. (2002). The end of old certainties: Changes in the triangle of media, political system, and electorate and their consequences. Ethical Perspectives, 9, 222–229.

Negrine, R., Mancini, P., Holtz-Bacha, C., & Papathanassopoulos, S. (2007). The professionalisation of political communication. Bristol, UK: Intellect.

Scammell, M. (1997). The wisdom of the war room: U.S. campaigning and Americanization. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, John F. Kennedy School of Government, Joan Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics and Public Policy.

Wilensky, H. L. (1964). The professionalization of everyone? American Journal of Sociology, 70(2), 137–158

Pro-Life Movement

See Abortion

Propaganda

Propaganda is a communicative technique that seeks to manipulate the opinions and attitudes of a targeted audience. It intends to change existing belief systems, value structures, and political positions in order to create specific attitudes toward a subject of public discourse in a manner favorable to the propagandist. Specific messages usually are linked to an overwhelming ideology. Propaganda is directed at a large number of people and thus is communicated by mass media. It can use different media genres, such as speeches, advertisements, editorials, articles, songs, or posters. Propaganda is a function of the political system and strives to gain or defend political power. It is ideological in the sense that it tries to "naturalize" specific, self-interested viewpoints and opinions to let them appear self-evident, logical, and in the public interest. Propaganda may, for tactical reasons, take the form of open public discourse or dialogue, but it is always directed toward a previously defined end that the propagandists carefully attempt to achieve. In this sense, it is always unidirectional communication.

Types of Propaganda

Defining propaganda is a difficult task. For nearly a century, definitions of both criteria and limits characterizing this phenomenon have been highly contested. For instance, there has been no consensus about whether propaganda should be seen as a subform of advertising or the other way around. While, at the beginning of the 20th century, propaganda was predominantly used as a synonym for advertising in the commercial sphere, social scientists after World War I tended to see it as an exclusively political technique. In National Socialist Germany it was prohibited by law to apply the word propaganda to commercial promotion because the regime reserved the term for its own politics of persuasion. Today, propaganda is widely considered either a historical phenomenon of the 20th century—closely linked to the propaganda regimes in Germany, Italy, Russia, and China, yet without much significance for the present—or one perceives propaganda as a not very precise collective term for all promotional activities in the political realm.

There are at least three major types of propaganda in modern society.

1. War propaganda (also termed psychological warfare, public diplomacy, psychological operations) consists of communicative campaigns designed to serve as auxiliaries in warfare. The typical techniques here are deception, defection, and other devices that help to weaken the adversary's power and to strengthen one's own forces. Propaganda is directed against enemy civilians and troops and to the home front in an attempt to fortify the morale. War propaganda is usually performed by the military; its deployment is limited to the time of crisis. War propaganda is applied in democracies as well as in authoritarian systems.

2. "Sociological" propaganda in totalitarian regimes. Totalitarian regimes of the 20th century have intensively sought to create "a new mankind" by using propaganda and permanent persuasion. The population of National Socialist Germany or the Soviet Union, for instance, was exposed to constant propaganda. Every aspect of society was penetrated by persuasive communication to ensure the dominance of the ruling ideology and to make people act according to the wants and needs of the regime. The French sociologist Jacques Ellul termed this type of all-pervasive persuasion "sociological propaganda."

3. Political propaganda in democracies. Some scholars define ongoing political contests in democracies, especially during election campaigns, as propaganda. When the term propaganda is used in this context, it reflects a close relationship to political communication, public relations, and campaigning and implies a rather weak impact on the audience.

Competing parties openly admit that they try to persuade the electorate, and the media can comment freely on the various positions. Propaganda competes as one position among many on the market of opinions.

Origins of Propaganda

The Latin word propagare means "to spread out, to enlarge." It has been used since the Middle Ages to characterize the missionary work of the Roman Catholic Church. The Spanish Carmelite Thomas A. Jesu published in 1613 a book titled De erigenda Congregatione pro fide propaganda, in which he made detailed suggestions for the improvement of missionary work. In 1622, Pope Gregory XV founded the Sacra Congregatio de propaganda fide ("holy congregation"), a secret board responsible for the missionary work of the Catholic Church. During the Enlightenment, many intellectuals identified this agency, which still exists today, as the center of the anti-Enlightenment. They considered propaganda to be a secret and dangerous technique for deluding the people and making them act against their will and their interests. Over time the word became a collective expression for all kinds of persuasive communication techniques directed at public opinion and was conceptualized as a specific means of political action that could be employed wherever political ideas were at stake.

In this new understanding, propaganda became one of the most important concepts of the French Revolution. In analogy to the church's missionary work, the revolutionaries in Paris saw it as their duty to spread the ideals of the French Revolution to other European countries, thus raising widespread fear in conservative Europe about the agitating effects of secret and influential clubs. For the first time in history, propaganda was regarded as a technique, which could universally be employed for all political aims. Fear of propaganda increased even further during the European uprisings in the year 1830, when conservative governments were convinced that the French were exporting their revolution by means of propaganda. This assumption was indeed more fitting in 1830 than in 1789, because by then propaganda had lost its negative connotation among European democrats. While it gained a reputation as an effective instrument to propagate revolutionary ideas, the term lost its association with traditional propaganda agencies like the propaganda fide.

It was only logical that the strongest political power of the 19th century, the labor movement, soon discovered and developed the potential of propaganda. Early in their Paris exile, Karl Marx, Wilhelm Weitling, and Heinrich Heine fervently debated the impact of propaganda and its function for the promotion of communism. In this discourse, Marx neglected the use of the term propaganda, because in his view it did not conform to his claim that communist ideology should be based on rational thinking and scientific accuracy. As a result, the labor movement was deeply split about how to use the concept of propaganda: while communists in the Soviet Union as well as in France and in Germany employed it excessively, social democrats avoided it and spoke rather about agitation. As a result propaganda gained very little momentum in the Western European labor movement, whereas in communist regimes it came under the influence of Vladimir Lenin, who outlined a sophisticated propaganda theory, one of the cornerstones of socialist ideology.

The Emergence of Modern Propaganda

Toward the end of the 19th century, two trends led the European and American bourgeoisie to discover the power of propaganda. For one, the expansion of consumer capitalism and modern mass media sped up the professionalization of an advertising industry (a development discussed in many countries under the heading of "propaganda"). Furthermore, "crowds" or "mass society" appeared as subject of intense discussion. The writings of Gustave Le Bon, Scipio Sighele, Wilfred Trotter, and—later—Sigmund Freud expressed what many members of the bourgeoisie had observed in the decades since 1848: Political dominance in modern society was no longer exclusively based on formal power and law; public opinion (and thus mass media) had become a driving force in society. In the age of class struggle, conservatives and liberals alike tended to view public opinion as an inherently irrational force—and a dangerous one to boot—that had to be controlled. New forms of propaganda promised to be one cure for this new challenge of social control. Accordingly, by the first decade of the 20th century, scientific research on propaganda had been initiated, with universities and think tanks approaching propaganda in similar ways as other societal problems, for example, syphilis or infant mortality.

Scientific propaganda analysis initially conceptualized the impact of propaganda in terms of the crude mass psychology outlined by Le Bon and others.

According to this approach, the human being in modern industrial society was not much more than a biological organism reacting to outer stimuli with preconditioned responses. Products of this strand of thought were those well-known formulas about the simple repetition of messages until even the most slow-witted in the audience grasped them. In the first half of the 20th century, the academic mainstream attributed to propaganda almost unprecedented power.

At the outbreak of World War I, the concept of propaganda had found its way into the policy papers of ministries and state chancelleries. Image had become crucial to European regimes governing vulnerable territorial empires stretched all over the world. By 1914, then, propaganda had become integral part of international politics and a means of cultural diplomacy. Then propaganda turned into a weapon of warfare. All parties involved in the war set up propaganda units, some of them even in the rank of ministries. Led by an enemy propaganda apparatus under Lord Northcliffe, Great Britain was credited to be the most successful nation in creating effective atrocity propaganda that affected the morale of German and Austrian soldiers and isolated the two powers in the diplomatic sphere. In the United States, President Woodrow Wilson set up the Committee on Public Information in April 1917. Led by the journalist George Creel, the committee created a new type of modern propaganda that used all available public media and that was widely regarded as a very successful adaptation of advertising techniques to the realm of political propaganda. Germany, in turn, at least in the first half of the war, was not very active on the propaganda front, which caused an intense discussion about the shortcomings of German propaganda and, after Germany's defeat, to the creation of the doctrine of the "propaganda deficit." This was the starting point for heavily subsidized German research programs on the subject in the 1920s, and the National Socialists later used many of its findings for their own purposes.

The Russian Revolution 1917, Mussolini's purge in 1923, and the National Socialist Machtergreifung ("rise to power") in 1933 were peak times in the history of propaganda; all three regimes can be considered movements that came into power at least in part due to their effective communication techniques. The creation of the German Ministry for Popular Enlightenment and Propaganda, headed by Joseph Goebbels, one of the key figures in propaganda history, is one example. Just like the Soviet communists and the Italian fascists, National Socialism used propaganda in order to stabilize their regime both domestically and on international diplomatic ground, while trying to remodel their respective societies according to their ideology. The anti-Jewish propaganda of the National Socialists became notorious for creating the ideological notion of a "Jewish question" in German public opinion and thus playing a crucial role in paving to the holocaust.

World War II (1939–1945) started with a propaganda coup—the alleged attack of Polish troops on the Gleiwitz broadcasting station—and saw propaganda as an auxiliary to fighting throughout the war. The use of propaganda during the course of the war—different than in World War I—was more tactical than ideological. Much research by the most able social scientists of the time was carried out to assess how troop morale could be stabilized or how the enemy could be encouraged to desert. Social scientific research on propaganda rapidly gained sophistication. Empirical methods replaced the old stimulus-response model, and people were no longer merely seen as "mass" but as human beings with specific needs and interests. Scholars like Paul F. Lazarsfeld and Harold D. Lasswell replaced the notion of strong propaganda impacts with theories according to which the success even of the most carefully designed propaganda message could never be taken for granted because both people and modern society had inbuilt barriers against the power of unprecedented persuasion.

The Impact of Propaganda in Today's Democracies

After World War II, the term propaganda was discredited because of its association with Hitler and Goebbels. The word disappeared from both scientific discourse and political debate and was replaced by more neutral terms like international communication, public diplomacy, or public relations. Research on this subject continued, especially in the United States, even though much of it was carried out in secret. All major wars since 1945 were accompanied by intensive propaganda campaigns. In addition to this, the Cold War between the Soviet Union and the United States set the stage for a constant ideological propaganda battle over the basic values of modern society. In this struggle, the Soviet Union as a totalitarian regime had some advantages, as many social scientists observed: modern media, characterized by freedom of information rights, media competition, and the journalistic principle of consulting multiple sources, and an increasing public awareness of the potential threats of propaganda have made the successful use of propaganda more difficult. Today, propaganda is often limited to campaigns directed against the enemy with specific goals. Nevertheless, large-scale attempts to influence the home front continue to exist. Attempts by the Bush administration to convince the American public of the danger allegedly posed by Saddam's regime in 2003 is one recent outstanding illustration of both its possibilities and its limits. Bush's claims about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq turned out to be false. As a result, Bush's reputation was damaged, and his entire administration faced an increasing credibility gap. It became once again obvious that propaganda needs to be at least partially true to have a lasting impact, and that in democracies the media and the critical public can constitute effective obstacles against the power of propaganda. This is one of the lessons of propaganda's history: Propaganda may be a powerful weapon, but it cannot create information that has no correspondence in the outer world.

Thymian Bussemer

See also Communism; Ideology; Persuasion, Political; Political Advertising; Revolution, Political; Spin, Political; United States Information Agency; War Coverage

Further Readings

Bussemer, T. (2005). Propaganda. Konzepte und Theorien [Propaganda: Concepts and theories]. Wiesbaden: VS Verlag.

Cole, R. (1996). Propaganda in twentieth century war and politics: An annotated bibliography, Lanham, MD: Scarecrow.

Cole, R. (1998). International encyclopedia of propaganda. Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn.

Cunningham, S. B. (2002). The idea of propaganda: A reconstruction. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Ellul, J. (1973/1962). Propaganda: The formation of men's attitudes, New York: Vintage.

Jackall, R. (Ed.). (1995). Propaganda. New York: New York University Press.

Sproule, J. M. (1997). Propaganda and democracy: The American experience of media and mass persuasion. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Thomson, O. (1999). Easily led: A history of propaganda. Phoenix Mill, UK: Sutton.

Proportional Representation

Proportional representation (PR) provides for the allocation of parliamentary seats to political parties in proportion to the votes they received in an election. As a principle of representation, the desired objective of PR is to reflect in parliament the existing political preferences and parties as accurately as possible. As a decision rule, in PR systems the share of votes candidates or parties receive determines whether they get a seat. In both aspects, PR is diametrically opposed to majority or plurality representation. Ever since the invention of PR as a decision rule during French Enlightenment and the mirror function of national assemblies during the French Revolution, majority/plurality and proportionality have built up the basic alternatives in debates on political representation. Regarding constitutional arrangements, their supposed impact goes so far as to determine the types and functions of political systems. PR is seen as intimately connected with the consensus model of democracy, where governments are not only responsive to the majority of the electorate but to as many people as possible.

Normative Expectations

In normative terms, defenders of proportional representation refer to the following advantages: (a) maximal representation of all opinions and interests in parliament in relation to the percentage of votes in their favor; (b) rejection of excessively artificial political majorities that do not correspond to any real majority in the electorate; (c) promotion of majorities by negotiation, compromise, and consent; (d) prevention of extreme political convulsions in the composition of parliament caused by the distortion effect of the electoral system rather than by fundamental changes in the voters' political preferences; (e) equality of the vote not only in numerical but in outcome terms (effective vote). All these advantages may be aggregated in the PR ideal of "fair representation." Nevertheless, the PR ideal continues to be seriously challenged by the opposite principle of representation. But empirically, real PR systems deviate more or less from it.

Diversity of Proportional Systems

There are many ways of designing a PR system, especially with regard to increasing or decreasing proportional effects. The achievement of proportionality is mainly dependent on districting, thresholds, and electoral formulae. In a nationwide district, proportionality is nearly accurate (pure PR). Distortions between the share of votes and the share of seats increase when magnitudes of districts decrease. Theoretically, the amount of disproportionality in the national outcome is highest in single-member districts. Thresholds, used in order to prevent an excessive fragmentation of parliaments, force political parties to show a certain level of electoral support (for example, 5% of the votes) for getting parliamentary seats. Their effects on proportionality differ. While pure PR encourages dispersion of votes by strategic mistakes, leading to high numbers of wasted votes (up to 30%), thresholds may exert a concentration effect on voting behavior that fosters the number of effective votes and by this a higher degree of proportionality. The most common PR system provides for multimember districts of different magnitudes with blocked lists, using the d'Hondt formula.

Empirical Evidence

Proportional representation has been long discredited for creating multiparty systems and political instability. However, most stable democracies of the world apply PR systems. Nearly all of them use technical elements to prevent extreme fragmentation. Furthermore, PR systems may create a considerable distortion in the vote–seat relation. To be true, real effects of PR on party systems crucially depend on contextual factors, which are also responsible for the kind of electoral system in force. In general, there is no linear causal relationship between PR and party system.

Dieter Nohlen

See also Electoral Systems; Political Parties

Further Readings

Duverger, M. (1963). Political parties. New York: Wiley.
Lijphart, A. (1994). Electoral systems and party systems. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
Nohlen, D. (1995). Elections and electoral systems. New Delhi: Macmillan India.
Nohlen, D. (2004). Sistemas electorales y partidos políticos [Electoral systems and political parties]. México: Fondo de Cultura Económica.
Rae, D. W. (1968). The political consequences of electoral laws. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
Roper, J., Holtz-Bacha, C., & Mazzoleni, G. (2004). The politics of representation: Election campaigning and proportional representation. New York: Peter Lang.
Rose, R. (2000). The international encyclopedia of elections. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly.
Sartori, G. (1976). Parties and party systems. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
Sartori, G. (1994). Comparative constitutional engineering. Houndmills, UK: Macmillan.
Taagepera, R., & Shugart, M. S. (1989). Votes and seats. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Propositions

See Ballot Initiatives

Protests, Political

Political protest refers to various means of influencing the political process that typically fall outside of the more traditional means such as voting for elected officials and running for office. These actions do not always involve fringe groups or individuals and can emerge instead from within the establishment. Further, protest activities are instrumental to social movements as a way to affect change, recruit members, share messages, and reach broader publics through mass media coverage. Protest acts can take many forms, including speeches, marches, rallies, letter-writing campaigns, sit-ins, and demonstrations, among other actions. As a result of this variation, research on political protest has explored a wide range of groups, activities, issues, and causes. Scholars have particularly focused on the key role communication processes can play in the success and functioning of protest activities at many levels, including through interpersonal connections among members, the communication artifacts and rhetorical strategies used by social movements, and coverage of protest acts by news media.

Much of the scholarship on what factors predict whether individuals will engage in protest-related activity has been categorized under the "social movements" label. This literature suggests the importance of an individual's connections to other people and how those connections influence the individual's decision to participate in protest activities and join protest groups. The influence of others takes two main forms. First, social network research indicates that having network ties to protestors and protest groups are important, such that those with more social network ties to protestors are more likely to engage in protest activity than those who have few ties to protesters. Second, work by Pamela Oliver and others on critical mass indicates that individuals take into account the number of other individuals participating in a protest action or social movement when making their own decision to participate. Specifically, each individual has a threshold for the number of people that need to be involved in order to feel comfortable participating themselves. If there are not enough other people involved, the individual will not participate.

*Protesters, including Cindy Sheehan (center), march down 15th Street during the "10,000 Mother of a March" rally May 14, 2007, in Washington, D.C. Hundreds of antiwar protesters marched from Lafayette Park across from the White House to the U.S. Capitol, staging a sit-in and blocking traffic on Independence Avenue for more than 30 minutes.*

Source: Getty Images.

Apart from individual protesters, interpretations of the meaning and success of a protest event are based on the rhetorical strategies and tactics employed by a movement. The symbolic actions—speeches, marches, slogans, signs, chants, clothing, and so on—that different protest groups employ have provided a rich source for scholars studying the rhetoric of social movements, and each contributes to how a group or event is interpreted. As such, the rhetorical scholar studying social movements would only consider the protest event as one small piece of the symbolic meaning of a social movement. Considerable debate within the field has also centered on how to best characterize and study the rhetoric of social movements. Morris and Brown's collection of readings tracks the theoretical development and debates within this area of research as well as highlighting scholarly work on key political movements. Such work highlights a shift in focus toward application and testing of rhetorical theory by conducting case studies on key political movements such as the American Indian movement, the Black Power movement, and the feminist movement, among others.

News coverage of protest events, tactics, and rhetoric can also play an important role in the success and perceptions of protest groups. Protest events are important to journalists and news media because they are often event and conflict driven—therefore they make for interesting news. Media coverage of protest events is also important to protest groups in that news coverage allows groups to broadcast their message, gain publicity, and generate awareness and membership for causes. Although protesters have been able to generate and control their own media and rhetorical strategies through such means as newsletters and pamphlets, they have typically struggled to control how protest groups and events are represented to the wider audiences offered by mainstream news media such as television and newspapers.

Much of the research on news coverage of protest is rooted in theories of social control with scholars proposing that inherent biases in those who control the media play a central role in the perceived function and success of protest groups. Specifically, scholars have found that mainstream news media tend to marginalize protesters—particularly those who pose a greater threat to the status quo. This notion of social control via the news media is highlighted by Chan and Lee's study of the Golden Jubilee protests in China. Their work introduced the concept of the journalistic paradigm, commonly referred to as the "protest paradigm," which has become an oft-explored area in the study of news coverage of protest. The notion of the protest paradigm is that mainstream news media maintain the status quo (i.e., the current power structure) by marginalizing and delegitimizing groups that pose a threat to the system. Resulting news coverage that fits this paradigm is typically characterized by stories that present protesters as odd, threatening, ineffective, small in numbers, and disorganized.

Michael P. Boyle

See also Political Involvement

Further Readings

Chan, J. M., & Lee, C. C. (1984). The journalistic paradigm on civil protests: A case study of Hong Kong. In A. Arno & W. Dissanayake (Eds.), The news media in national and international conflict (pp. 183–202). Boulder, CO: Westview.

Gamson, W. A., & Wolsfsfeld, G. (1993). Movements and media as interacting systems. American Academy of Political and Social Science, 528, 114–125.

Gitlin, T. (1980). The whole world is watching: Mass media and the making and unmaking of the new left. Berkeley: University of California Press.

McLeod, D. M. (1999). The protest paradigm and news coverage of the "Right to Party" movement. In D. A. Schultz (Ed.), It's show time! Media, politics, and popular culture (pp. 29–49). New York: Peter Lang.

Morris, C. E., III, & Browne, S. H. (Eds.). (2001). Readings on the rhetoric of social protest. State College, PA: Strata.

Oliver, P. E. (1984). If you don't do it, nobody else will: Active and token contributors to local collective action. American Sociological Review, 49(5), 601–610.

Shoemaker, P. J. (1984). Media treatment of deviant political groups. Journalism Quarterly, 61, 66–75, 82.

Pseudo-Event

A pseudo-event is an event produced by a communicator with the sole purpose of generating media attention and publicity. These events lack real news value, but still they become the subject of media coverage. Pseudo-events can include press conferences, advertisements, speeches, campaign events, and other similar events with little value in terms of content and importance. Pseudo-events are carefully choreographed productions that follow a prepared script and leave nothing to chance. They are scheduled in advance, and journalists are informed of the specific time when the event occurs, which makes covering pseudo-events very convenient. Pseudo-events are also dramatic, which makes them interesting for the public, and produce iconic images, such as big enthusiastic crowds and hand shaking and baby kissing. In short, pseudo-events are a public relations tactic.

The term was coined by American scholar Daniel J. Boorstin in his book about the effects of media publicity and advertising on political and social practices in the United States in the 1950s. Boorstin defined a pseudo-event as an ambiguous truth that appeals to people's desire to be informed. He argued that being in the media spotlight is a strong incentive for public figures to stage artificial events, which become real and important once validated by media coverage. Boorstin described pseudo-events as the opposite of propaganda, although both forms of communication have similar consequences and result in public misinformation. Propaganda slants facts to keep the public from learning the truth, while pseudo-events provide the public with artificial facts that people perceive as real.

Pseudo-events are often used by political candidates to gain media attention during elections. Sometimes candidates stage pseudo-events in order to distract journalists' attention from real, more important events unfavorable to them. Opponents of candidates also stage pseudo-events in an effort to divert media attention from the competitor's event. Political pseudo-events are criticized for lowering the quality of political dialogue because they focus on image and horserace information rather than on issues and substances. Real dialogue is replaced by sensationalistic, dramatic, and emotional images that provide the viewer with a distorted sense of reality.

Monica Postelnicu

See also Image, The

Further Readings

Boorstin, D. (1961). The image: A guide to pseudo-events in America. New York: Vintage.

Clark, P. R. (2004). How to cover a pseudo-event. Retrieved March 2, 2007, from http://www.poynter.org/content/content_view.asp?id=68864

Psychographics in Politics

Psychological variables or data have been used to measure personality of political actors and analyze the beliefs, attitudes, or values of voters that may affect their political behaviors. Psychographics in politics is a method of political market segmentation that divides the entire political market into several relatively homogeneous groups with similar views.

The term psychographics derives from a combination of psychology and demographics. Psychographics adds the analysis of psychological motivations to the dimension of demographics. Psychographics was first broadly defined as beliefs, attitudes, socioeconomic status, and general patterns of living that influence buying decisions in marketing. Psychographics later drew distinctions among geographic, demographic, or behavioristic segmentations. Scholars focused on the personality profiles in psychographics. More recent researchers have emphasized the concept of lifestyle and values with a much broader class of variables, including attitudes, opinions, interests, needs, or activities.

The use of psychographics in marketing denotes the lifestyle and preferences of consumers, analyzes motivations behind their behaviors, and creates messages that consumers are likely to recognize and match to their own opinions, interests, and activities. Similarly, psychographics in politics refers to analysis of the psychic imagery underlying voters' decision-making processes. It is useful to explain the cognitive processes guiding voters' preferences as well as the changing patterns of voters' behaviors over time. This is due, in part, to the cause and effect of political campaigns to engender, reinforce, transform, or eradicate voters' mental imagery of political candidates or parties.

Psychological mapping of voters' perceptions leads researchers to discover key features of political candidates inside voters' minds and identify patterns of similarity and complex relationships about voters' political preferences and voting patterns. The goal of psychographic analysis in the political arena is to identify the ways in which voters classify and characterize political candidates or parties, as well as how voters weigh the benefits of alternative positions. This allows political candidates to strategically tailor their messages to match voters' expectations. Multidimensional scaling is often used to develop hypotheses about which candidates are most likely to compete against one another, what characteristics will be associated with positioning of candidates, and how best to take advantage of the political climate.

Harold D. Lasswell constructed psychological typologies of political actors in the 1930s. In an effort to discover the psychological traits of certain political actors, Lasswell developed a behavioral inventory of political types and offered an insight into the psychology of political convictions. His behavior inventory has influenced subsequent psychographic analysis in political campaigns. Dwight Eisenhower was among the first to employ political market segmentation and positioning as a political campaign strategy during his 1952 campaign for the presidency. He sent fundraising letters with varying messages targeted to different population groups and developed his campaign strategy based on the messages that encouraged the largest donations. Political candidates or parties have subsequently assessed and developed policy or character positions by identifying their voters' interests and beliefs. Sadrudin A. Ahmed and Douglas N. Jackson studied the Canadian provincial elections in the 1970s using respondents' attitudes toward welfare to produce different political market segments.

Jae-Hwa Shin

See also Political Marketing

Further Readings

Lasswell, H. D. (1950). Power and society: A framework for political inquiry. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Psychology of Radio, The

The Psychology of Radio (1935) paints a comprehensive portrait of the early days of radio. At the core of the book there is a series of experiments exploring the possibilities of this then-new medium. In Cantril and Allport's opinion, it is the task of social psychology to deliver empirical knowledge to the prospective users—including program sellers, publicity managers, and educationalists—on how to shape their messages appropriately. The authors combine this explicit orientation toward the interests of practitioners with an academic interest in the role of the radio in society. Their speculative reasoning gives an early example of social utopia associated with a new medium: Cantril and Allport ascribe to the radio the potential to vitalize political life, to promote social integration, to enlarge the cultural competence of the masses, and to improve the understanding between nations. They see it as an agent of democracy. But they also warn against the standardization of opinions and forms of everyday life caused by the structural conservatism of commercially oriented mass media.

The Psychology of Radio develops an understanding of the new medium, comparing it with print media, film, and the speaker–audience relationship. Concepts to describe the radio—communication in only one direction, reception free of the conventions of a present audience, mass communication with a parapersonal manner that addresses the users and creates the suggestion of a shared social experience—are built by analogies and distinctions to the "old" media.

The experiments are designed to explore the potentials of the new medium, as an instrument for education but also for commercial and political "propaganda." A series of experiments analyze the differences between the perception of a speaker compared with the perception of the voice of the same speaker transmitted by the radio with regard to the assessment of the communicative situation and the modes of information processing. The findings show that mediated communication is recognized as more structured, less personal, and less social; and that it dulls "higher mental processes" because the hearers are not required to be analytical or vigilant, and they are less personally and socially involved. Another series of experiments compares the efficiency of radio with reading, with regard to memorizing, understanding, and assessing information. It becomes evident: the more complex and difficult the information, the less efficient radio is as a medium. But the reception of radio does facilitate reproductive mental performances, especially those that concern "concrete" or acquainted material. Cantril and Allport were surprised to also find that the higher the degree of formal education of the listener, the better the capability to benefit from the reception of radio.

Cantril and Allport scrutinized several dimensions of programming—the best length of sentences, speed of speech, and attributes of content—with regard to information processing. They found, among many other results, that a general statement combined with an illustrating example is optimum for clear understanding and perceived relevance of the information.

They also determined that hearers build a consented image of the invisible media personae based only on the sensual impression of the voices. They supposed underlying social stereotypes of persons. With their experiments, Cantril and Allport revealed a basis for parasocial interactions with media personae.

Radio provides the users with access to events in culture, society, and politics in a very comfortable way. Summarizing, Cantril and Allport identify the "sense of participation" as the central characteristic of the radio. Meanwhile, television and online communication would take over much of this societal function. In The Psychology of Radio, Cantril and Allport demonstrated in an impressive manner how the meaning of a medium could be creatively analyzed.

Ralph Weiss

Further Readings

Cantril, H., & Allport, G. W. (1935). The psychology of radio. New York: Harper.

Public Address, Political

See Rhetoric, Political

Public Affairs, Communication in

For more than 5,000 years, since the time of the ancient Egyptians, governments have sought to inform citizens of the inner workings of the political process. As a specialization of public relations, public affairs (also referred to as "government relations"), fills the need to inform citizens of the many services that a particular government has to offer. Organizations outside of government also employ public affairs specialists to lobby and help shape public policy. Viewed within a democracy framework, public affairs is essential if citizens are to make logical and intelligent choices about their candidates and their political policies.

Communication in public affairs can come from all sides of the political spectrum. William Ragan, former director of public affairs for the U.S. Civil Service Commission, is credited by Wilcox and his colleagues with developing a set of objectives for governmental information efforts:

1. Provide information to the public.
2. Use appropriate information activities to improve the effectiveness of agency operations.
3. Provide feedback to governmental administrators to allow continuation or change.
4. Recommend to management the most desirable communication strategies for distributing decisions or initiatives.
5. Undertake the role of an ombudsman on behalf of the public.
6. Educate administrators and bureaucrats about the functioning of the media and how to influence coverage.

By law, the U.S. government is forbidden from using appropriated money to hire "publicity experts." Therefore, public affairs usually falls under a variety of diverse departments, such as the External Affairs Division (FBI), the Office of Communications and Consumer Affairs (Interstate Commerce Commission), the Office of Public Awareness (EPA), and the Offices of Public Affairs, in which the military uses needed public relations functions that inform the citizens about their operations. Within these departments, public relations practitioners may be given such titles as director of public affairs, public information officer, press secretary, administrative aide, or government program analyst, to carry the government's mission of communicating to its publics.

With the increased complexity of government, the need for more communication and/or publicity has increased as well. Public affairs officers must help define and achieve governmental program goals, enhance the government's responsiveness and service, as well as provide the public with sufficient information to permit self-government. To do this, they must construct messages for internal and external audiences, gauge public opinion, plan and organize for public relations effectiveness, as well as measure the effectiveness of the entire process.

Looking to create many avenues of communication for a diverse audience, governmental public affairs officials rely on a variety of different media platforms to disseminate information. Press conferences and releases, VNRs (video news releases), and direct mailings have been popular ways for governmental agencies to communicate. Most recently, the technological focus has been on the Internet. Being relatively inexpensive, the Internet allows governmental agencies operating on low budgets to put out vast amounts of material at a fraction of the cost of printing and mailing. This practice allows audiences to get instantaneous information and communicate directly with the departments, while governmental agencies can maintain better control over their content and effectively bypass traditional media.

Public affairs also helps nongovernmental organizations respond to issues that concern their environment. Businesses, schools, libraries, foundations, and nonprofits must effectively build relationships with governmental agencies in order to affect public policy. Most business or corporate public relations programs have a component to deal with the government. Relying on fact finding and dissemination, public affairs specialists must then evaluate the differing policies and their effects on the corporation and communicate them effectively to their publics (i.e., corporate decision makers, employees, stockholders, etc.). Dow Chemical is one company that has a thorough public affairs program in place for its employees. Its four communication objectives include:

1. Keeping employees informed about relevant national and local issues
2. Acquainting employees with government procedures
3. Encouraging involvement of employees in the political process
4. Helping employees to understand the value of political contributions and assisting them with access to political action committees or PACs

This communication can be conducted via corporate planning sessions, newsletters, e-mail and Web pages, or through company Web log (blog) updates.

In addition to communicating within the organization, public affairs experts must also lobby the government to create policies beneficial to the organization. After the dissemination process, a variety of communication tactics can be used to attract the government's attention. Spoken tactics, such as speeches, informal office visits to officials, or testimonies at public hearings, may be employed. Written tactics can include such things as preparing position papers, writing letters and op-ed articles, newsletters, mass e-mails, blogging, and advocacy (issue) advertising.

Lobbying has become a main staple in public affairs. With the 1995 lobby reform bill, grassroots lobbying has now become an $800 million industry due to the absence of rules and regulations governing this practice. Grassroots lobbying establishes organizations at local levels that can be activated when the need arises. To increase public support for their causes, grassroots lobbyists employ a variety of communication methods such as toll-free phone lines, bulk faxing, computerized direct mail, and bulk e-mail so that local citizens can call and/or contact the appropriate governmental agency or department.

Those professionals involved with public affairs can become involved with the Public Affairs Council. Begun in 1954 under the name of the Effective Citizens Organization (ECO), the Public Affairs Council seeks to get businesses to become more active in the political process. The organization offers a wide variety of comprehensive programs as well as produces a number of conferences and publications (Impact, etc.) that communicate with those in the field.

Danny Shipka

See also Lobbying, Lobbyist; Public Relations, Political

Further Readings

Apostolidis, P., & Williams, J. (2004) Public affairs: Politics in the age of sex scandals. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Harris, P., & Fleisher, C. (2005). The handbook of public affairs. London: Sage.

Lattimore, D., Baskin, O., Heiman, S., Toth, E., & Van Leuven, J. (2004). Public relations: The profession and the practice (pp. 300–319). New York: McGraw-Hill.

Stephenson, H. (1971). Handbook of public relations: The standard guide to public affairs and communications. New York: McGraw-Hill.

Wilcox, D., Cameron, G., Ault, P., & Agee, W. (2003). Public relations strategies and tactics (7th ed.). New York: Allyn & Bacon.

Public Broadcasting Service

See PBS (Public Broadcasting Service)

Public Communication in Politics

Discussion of public communication in politics presupposes discourse in democratic or republican systems of government. Though publics play a role in all modern nations, they perform a necessary function in democratic forms of government. According to democratic theory, public approval legitimizes government actions. Jean Cohen explains the role of the public in what she terms “deliberative democracy,” that democratic associations value choice derived through public reasoning. As such, community decisions are deemed legitimate inasmuch as they are the product of open deliberation. Understanding just what the public is, however, is essential to any further explanation.

There are three ways to understand the concept of “the public.” Often, public is used to denote a space to which people are given free access. As such, “the public” constitutes a context. Children are told to use their “public voice” when “in public.” Displays of affection “in public” are generally frowned upon, despite the general thawing of conventions. In the social scientific sense, publics have been generally understood by Chicago School sociologists—Hannah Arendt, and Walter Lippmann, for instance—as communities of people who realize a common interest, coalescing around a single issue. John Dewey defined the public as transitory groups that emerge to respond to a shared good or evil. Antiwar or pro-life advocates may emerge as publics in response to events that generate a shared awareness or concern. Michael McGee’s explanation of the process by which “the people” are constituted has been used by students of public communication to describe the formation of publics as individuals united by myths seeking to effect political change. “The public” is also used in common parlance to denote those people who comprise a nation’s population. For instance, the government releases documents to “the public,” or makes them “publicly available” in an archive ostensibly to keep “the public” informed and capable of reasoned deliberation and knowledgeable decision making.

The formation of publics necessitates communication between citizens for their formation—public communication. Interaction is necessary; without it, a group cannot form. A public cannot exist until individuals somehow become aware that their interests, concerns, or anxieties are shared with others. John Dewey, seeking to dispel the common assumption that publics emerge spontaneously, explained that face-to-face interaction was necessary to the organization of publics. Consciousness-raising seminars used by feminists are paradigmatic illustrations of the role of interpersonal and group communication in the organization of publics of women who are prepared to react to or advocate for government policy.

Spheres of Communication

The performance of public communication is governed by cultural norms that distinguish it from other communication modalities. There are, according to Thomas Goodnight the public, private, and technical spheres. The standards for argument in these three spheres differ. Most anyone can note from experience that what makes a good political argument, for instance, vastly differs from what makes a good private argument. The norms of public deliberation differ from those of private argument in that they are relatively more formal and demand different forms of proof and reasoning. Public speakers might, as a result, be less likely to rely on informal modes of address as well as on highly technical data and jargon.

Public Communication and Rationality

Communication in public does not perforce constitute the communication Dewey claims is necessary for the formation of a public. Much communication conducted "in public" either is not intended to be deliberative (e.g., a group chatting in a park) or fails to satisfy is necessary for deliberative communication. Much public sphere communication can foster crowd or mob behavior. One need only listen to political radio personalities for evidence of the latter; they are often highly emotional and appeal, with seeming strategic intent, to passion instead of reason. In contrast, Jürgen Habermas has argued that active participation and rational communication in the public sphere are prerequisites for strong and legitimate government in modern society. Western Europe's 18th-century bourgeois public sphere, Habermas explained, is an Enlightenment development that legitimized the role of citizens to critique their governments. Public debate, he wrote, shifted decision making from an elite private decision-making calculus to a public competition of ideas. Thus, private citizens were, with the new organs of information (e.g., the press) and venues for discussion (e.g., coffeehouses), able to influence government. Habermas maintains, however, that the quality of contemporary public communication has deteriorated for two reasons. First, he maintains that in Western society the ethos of individualism has overwhelmed the sense of collective responsibility. Second, current institutions fail to foster debate and participation. Blaming late capitalism and mass communication, Habermas argues that public communication has been largely reduced to a one-way activity; individuals now consume ideas and arguments while participating less in the testing and production of these ideas.

Counterpublics

Habermas's formulation of "publics" came under intense theoretical criticism and reconsideration following the publication of the English translation of The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere. Among several notable problems with Habermas's notion of the public sphere—including what some consider the unnecessary distinction between public and private and the inaccurate distinction between public sphere and government—scholars noted the lack of access suffered by many to the bourgeoisie public sphere. Consequently, it is argued that an important component of modern democracy had been ignored: counterpublics. Counterpublics develop because of their exclusion from the more generally accepted public sphere. Instead of competing in the marketplace for the superiority of ideas, counterpublics attempt to affirm their difference from the mainstream. Counterpublics, the identities of which are precluded from equal public sphere access, attempt to disrupt the culturally homogenizing forces of mass communication that promote and perpetuate uncritical consumerism. A good illustration of counterpublics can be found among "zine" publishers. Zine publishers are underground comic writers who write, illustrate, print, and distribute their own zines. Often political in nature, it is evident from the miniscule distribution of these publications that these writers seek less to change the public sphere and more to find a community willing to listen to their countercultural perspectives. Common themes in zines include homosexuality, identity issues, rape, and leftist women's matters.

Deterioration of Public Communication

Understanding the public's deterioration into an aggregate of highly individuated persons has been the focus of numerous scholars since Habermas. People have become more separate from one another: more lonely, as Meyrowitz puts it. More recently, Robert Putnam's Bowling Alone has revisited this issue, extensively evidencing the deterioration of public interaction. Putnam maintains that without face-to-face interaction, the quality of public discourse spirals downward. Anonymity harms deliberation. Thus, it is concluded by some that in today's social, political, economic milieu people function in public to perform economic transactions, while social and political participation have waned.

Mass media effects on public communication have also become widely studied. Habermas's arguments are consistent with many of the conclusions drawn by technological determinists (e.g., Meyrowitz; Neil Postman): that the confluence of mass communication delivery, modes of interface, commodification, consolidation of ownership, and content incapacitate citizens, lulling them with the perception that they are informed, knowledgeable, and active. In 1986, Postman, describing television as the most potent expression of flawed information mass-delivery mechanisms, asserts that television makes information abstract, decontextualized, and entertaining. He further warns that reliance upon this medium for information can put a nation at risk.

Other scholars have focused more on the impact of media conventions and ownership on public communication. Dewey maintained that access to thorough information and records is necessary for knowledgeable citizens to affect public policy. Long before television's ubiquity and anticipating Postman by more than 60 years, Dewey lamented that news is rarely presented in context, while its contents are governed by its shock value. McChesney maintains that the United States' media system is designed to maximize corporate profit. This, he explains, can be disastrous to a self-governing society. The disaster McChesney writes about is a result of policies increasingly enabling corporate media consolidation. Though ownership heterogeneity was once considered necessary enough to society that ownership rules, and content requirements were codified as prerequisites for broadcast licenses by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), the government has back-peddled on many of these rules over the past 20 years. Lawmaker attitudes about media consolidation and public communication responsibility seemed to change following the demise of the Fairness Doctrine, an FCC rule that required broadcasters to examine different sides of issues relevant to the public. The FCC repealed its rule in 1987, and President Ronald Reagan subsequently vetoed legislation codifying the Fairness Doctrine as federal law. Since that time, limits on radio, television, and newspaper ownership have also been scaled back significantly.

Postmodernism and Public Communication

Much of the debate regarding public communication from postmodernists centers around responses to Habermas's modernist notions of public communication, his project of emancipating rationality, the "ideal speech situation," and his theory of communicative action. Generally, postmodern arguments challenging Habermas's ideas proceed from suspicion or outright rejection of the existence of socially determinable metaphysical truths and communicative practices predicated on the assumption of their existence. The norms of public communication situations, the arguments go, ultimately privilege a perspective or a regime of knowledge. Kellner and Steven Best summarize the postmodern position as rejecting the modern notions of reason and freedom while characterizing rationality as reductive and oppressive. They further explain that, according to postmodernism, arguments for rationality suppress plurality while favoring conformity. Society is plural inasmuch as there exists various points of view, perspectives, realities, and logics. The role of the individual in society is to maintain an attitude of reasoned skepticism because of the relationship between rationalization and excesses of political power. Cooperation with public communication norms legitimizes existing power arrangements.

New Media and Public Communication

Clearly, the role of public communication in politics differs based on one's theoretical standpoint and the period during which one is observing politics. The technology and techniques available to those wanting to deliberate change with the times. Kevin DeLuca and Jennifer Peeples describe ways with which publics today exploit newsgathering conventions in order to be heard. They argue that the mediated environment we presently inhabit warrants the reconsideration of communication in the public sphere: that the epistemology of visual media has made Habermas's public sphere, to the extent that it ever existed, obsolete. DeLuca and Peeples maintain that public communication exists in a new form, as competing spectacles viewers consume through what they term the "public screen." We see this manner of public communication often today, as protest groups exploit corporate newsgathering conventions in order to break through the ordinary broadcast chatter, directing the public's attention to underaddressed issues and/or solutions. Protests, sit-ins, and marches are often used. DeLuca and Peeples identify protests at the 1999 World Trade Organization ministerial conference as exemplifying this modality of contemporary public communication.

Besides exploiting mainstream media outlets, voices have helped develop alternative channels for participation. Some observers hold out hope for the promise of public communication in light of the development of newer technologies and the new contexts created by our technologies. Most notably, the Internet has become a forum for political discussion and has recently been acknowledged for its growing political influence. In the 2004 Democratic primaries, Vermont Governor Howard Dean and his campaign manager Joe Trippi ran a surprisingly successful grassroots campaign by tapping the communication power of the Internet. Using a Web log, the Dean campaign arranged revolutionary "meet-ups" that convened committed and prospective supporters at volunteers' houses for speakerphone conferences with the candidate. Today, interactive blogs have changed the political communication landscape, making influential political players out of quasi-Web journalists ("bloggers") like Markos Moulitsas-Zuniga (DailyKos.com), Jerome Armstrong (MyDD.com), and Eli Pariser (MoveOn.org), giving power to the large communities of devoted readers and contributing writers. DailyKos.com, for instance, receives approximately 500,000 daily visits.

Philip Dalton

See also Bowling Alone; Deliberation; Fairness Doctrine; New Media Technologies; Public Sphere

Further Readings

Arendt, H. (1958). The human condition. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Asen, R., & Brouwer, D. C. (2001). Counterpublics and the state. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Bagdikian, B. (2000). The media monopoly. Boston: Beacon.

Best, S., & Kellner, D. (1991). Postmodern theory: Critical interventions. New York: Guilford.

Cohen, J. (1989). Deliberation and democratic legitimacy. In A. Hamlin & P. Pettit (Eds.), The good polity (pp. 17–34). Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

DeLuca, K. M., & Peeples, J. (2002). From public sphere to public screen: Democracy, activism, and the "violence" of Seattle. Critical Studies in Media Communication, 19, 125–151.

Dewey, J. (1946). The public and its problems: An essay in political inquiry. Chicago: Gateway Books.

Goodnight, G. T. (1982). The personal, technical, and public spheres of argument: A speculative inquiry into the art of public deliberation. Journal of the American Forensic Association, 18, 214–227.

Habermas, J. (1989). The structural transformation of the public sphere: An inquiry into a category of bourgeoisie society (T. Burger & F. Lawrence, Trans.). Cambridge: MIT Press. (Original work published 1962)

Henry, J. (1965). Culture against man. New York: Vintage.

Lippmann, W. (1965). Public opinion. New York: Free Press.

McChesney, R. W. (2004). The problem of the media: U.S. communication politics in the twenty-first century. New York: Monthly Review Press.

McGee, M. C. (1975). In search of "The People": A rhetorical alternative. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 61(5), 235–249.

Meyrowitz, J. (1985). No sense of place: The impact of electronic media on social behavior. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

Packard, V. (1974). A nation of strangers. New York: Pocket Books.

Postman, N. (1986). Amusing ourselves to death: Public discourse in the age of show business. New York: Penguin.

Putnam, R. D. (2000). Bowling alone: The collapse and revival of American community. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Schudson, M. (1995). The power of news. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Public Funding

See Campaign Finance

Public Journalism

Public journalism is a movement within journalism that aims to reconnect news institutions to public and civic life and local community. Also known as "civic journalism," it began with a series of experiments in local newspapers in the late 1980s and eventually spread to more than a fifth of all U.S. newspapers (as well as some public and commercial television and radio stations) before beginning to fade as a self-conscious movement around 2002. The public journalism movement generated an impressive array of innovative practices in newsrooms and communities and an extensive network of practitioners, educators, and organizations committed to reshaping professional and institutional norms. Further, public journalism laid some of the foundations for the current practice of citizen journalism.

Philosophy of Public Journalism

The philosophy of public journalism, as manifest in the writings of its leading theorists and practitioners, can be summarized as follows: Journalists must assume responsibility for helping to constitute vital "publics" with the usable knowledge that enables them to deliberate about complex issues and to engage in common problem solving. Since journalists invariably frame and narrate the story of our common life in their reporting of "the facts," they should do so with an eye to how their stories permit people to see themselves as citizens rather than as mere spectators, victims, or consumers of information. While they should not compromise their objectivity through advocacy journalism, or by taking the lead in developing solutions to problems, they can play convening and catalytic roles that bring citizens together to deliberate among themselves, and with those who hold positions of power and authority, so that citizens may help fashion problem-solving strategies and policy responses.

Journalists can frame their coverage in ways that enable citizens to better map their own associational resources and build the knowledge base needed for active and productive engagement. They can shine a comparative spotlight on "solutions" that seem to have worked reasonably well in other communities, in order to expand citizens' knowledge of potentially useful models and to generate a sense of efficacy, without advocating for specific models or succumbing to "feel good" news and superficial optimism. Indeed, civic journalists can be tough on those in power by challenging them to respond to citizens' own agendas and real-life concerns and to engage with integrity in how they present their views and follow through on their commitments. And even as civic journalists help to expand the forums and usable knowledge through which citizens can engage with public life, they hold citizens themselves accountable for grappling with the full complexity of issues and acting responsibly to solve common problems. If there is a bias in civic journalism, it is a bias toward the democratic work of citizens in a self-governing republic.

History of Public Journalism

The public journalism movement began in the mid-1980s at the Knight-Ridder newspaper chain, led by James K. Batten, its then-CEO. Concerned about declining readership and the drift of newspapers from the communities they served, Batten began a company-wide search for new forms of what he called "community connectedness." In a series of experiments, beginning in Columbus, Georgia, in 1987, and moving soon to Wichita, Kansas, and Charlotte, North Carolina, editors at Knight-Ridder papers began to wrestle with the relationship between their coverage and democracy.

In Wichita, Davis "Buzz" Merritt, editor of the Knight-owned Wichita Eagle, responded to what he saw as a breakdown in the fundamental relationship of the press to the public. Merritt and the Eagle experimented with a new model of "citizen-driven" election coverage of the 1990 Kansas gubernatorial race. Citizens were polled on the issues that were most important to them, and their questions were asked of the candidates. When candidates refused to answer citizen questions, Merritt ran white space, and candidates quickly responded. By 1992 the Eagle sought to expand the experiment from politics to civic life and launched "The People Project: Solving It Ourselves," which explored a series of problems facing Wichita and sought citizen-solutions through a new kind of public deliberation in the pages of the newspaper. The People Project had a strong indirect effect on local public life, stimulating local community–government partnerships for more than a decade.

The Knight-owned Charlotte Observer (which Batten had once edited) tackled similar election projects in 1992 and then in 1994 launched "Taking Back Our Neighborhoods" under the leadership of editor Jennie Buckner. This pathbreaking effort to link coverage of crime to its underlying causes included extensive neighborhood forums on problems and potential solutions. These were followed by intensive, coordinated coverage with television and radio partners for more than a year, and included spotlights on strategies used successfully in other communities in Charlotte and around the country. The media partners also covered citizen and governmental efforts to implement solutions. "Taking Back Our Neighborhoods" catalyzed lasting changes in the neighborhoods and the wider metropolitan community as well as in the newspaper itself. The project helped to forge civic linkages across lines of class, race, and neighborhood, and was widely credited by citizens, government, and police officials with reducing crime in the most dangerous neighborhoods as well as with the mobilization of communitywide social capital. Some magnet schools were opened to their neighborhoods for afterschool programs. Community centers were established where children could be tutored, and schools supplies, uniforms, and recreational equipment were collected and distributed. Neighborhood leaders began to meet with each other, in some cases for the first time, thereby catalyzing new forms of grassroots engagement and leadership training. The Charlotte Observer continued its efforts after the project with shorter daily and weekly civic series on race, education, the environment, and many other topics. The paper was reorganized into teams around new beats that reflected its broader civic approach to framing the news. By 2000 it had become one of the most consistent civic newsrooms in the United States, even though it had largely abandoned the rhetoric of civic journalism.

In Madison, Wisconsin, the "We the People Project," launched in 1991, enriched the democratic culture of Madison and Wisconsin communities statewide with a series of innovative collaborations among Wisconsin Public Television, Wisconsin Public Radio, the Wisconsin State Journal, CBS affiliate WISC-TV (Madison), and a local public relations firm. The project reported on both critical state elections and public issues (taxes, health care, budgets, land use, and the environment), usually combining careful community-based deliberation well in advance of news coverage, in-depth issues reporting by each of the media partners, and regional or statewide on-air coverage that featured innovative techniques of citizen reporting, questioning, or small group deliberation. By the late 1990s, to "we-the-people" an issue had become a verb in Wisconsin political culture.

In Norfolk, Virginia, and the surrounding "Hampton Roads" cities, the Virginian-Pilot led by editor Cole Campbell (1954–2007) undertook the most ambitious effort to build civic capacity in a daily newspaper. A series of innovations, including "community conversations" and "public life pages," were designed, in the words of managing editor Dennis Hartig, to do "public work" that "builds capacity" in the Norfolk region. For several years the Pilot, led by public life editor Tom Warhover, mapped a civic agenda in its five-city area on the topics of government, education, and public safety, each of which had a carefully formatted weekly public life page designed to build public memory on local issues, leading to better public deliberation and decision making. Citizens reported that, although they had not read the paper before, or only read the sports pages, they had begun photocopying articles and distributing them in their neighborhoods and through their civic organizations. The public life pages motivated citizens to become involved and attend trainings, and the civic institutions in turn taught citizens how to use the paper in a public way.

National Networks of Public Journalism

Many of these efforts were stimulated or supported in some way by two national networks: the Project on Public Life and the Press (PPLP) and the Pew Center for Civic Journalism (PCCJ). The PPLP, founded by New York University professor Jay Rosen in 1993 and funded by the Kettering and Knight Foundations, was a center for practical research and reflection until it closed in 1997. Particularly in its early years, PPLP served as a think tank for the movement, as executive and midlevel editors, senior reporters, and new hires mingled with leading journalism scholars like James Carey in quarterly seminars at the American Press Institute in Reston, Virginia. The seminars helped revive the long-forgotten work of John Dewey on the public and the press, thereby forging a language connecting the practical sense of the newsroom and the larger reaches of democratic theory.

The Pew Center, founded by journalist Ed Fouhy in 1994 and later directed by reporter Jan Schaffer, took a slightly different approach. Both were experienced, award-winning journalists, and their primary goal was to set up a series of experiments in newsrooms whose results could be studied, publicized, and replicated. The PCCJ awarded annual grants to news organizations (generally ranging from $10,000 to $15,000) and also served as a center for reflection on practice and technique through scores of workshops and a clearinghouse of ideas until it closed in 2002. The Pew Center eventually reached out to hundreds of newsrooms, both directly and through important journalism organizations like the American Society of Newspaper Editors and Investigative Reporters and Editors. One study, which systematically analyzed the Pew archives, found that 320 American newspapers, approximately one-fifth of the total, had conducted nearly 650 civic journalism projects from 1994 to 2001.

Criticisms of Public Journalism

After the early experiments became widely discussed in the critical and journalism trade press in the early 1990s, mainstream critics, led by editors of The New York Times and Washington Post and the press reviews, reacted harshly to public journalism. The criticisms were wide ranging and often contradictory. Initially, many concerned the tone of public journalism's advocates, arguing that they were evangelical or proselytizing gurus seeking to convert journalists. Careful scholarly examination of the actual framing and tone of most public and civic journalism advocates has demonstrated that these characterizations were generally distortions. The larger question concerned what public journalism was and what it should do. Two public journalism criticisms of the mainstream press seem to have struck the deepest chord with those who sought to discredit public journalism. The first was making explicit that news media frame public debates and are not simply neutral filters for objective news (a proposition now widely accepted). If this was true, then many of the practices of the mainstream press would be opened to much wider public scrutiny and criticism, and the role of the elite press in serving as a primary filter and arbiter of public debate would be called into question. The second was the corollary proposition that, if framing is inevitable, journalists ought to employ frames that encouraged, enabled, or advanced civic and public life, although they should do this in a nonpartisan way. This remains the primary dividing line between public and mainstream journalism.

Critics also claimed that public journalism was a gimmick, designed to reinforce the failing commercial position of newspapers and build audiences. Further, critics claimed it was doing this cheaply. While there was an explicit and open link between Batten and the early Knight experiments to the rebuilding of newspaper audiences, studies demonstrated that public journalism was rarely cheaper than the standard practice. One of its main tenants of basic practice was that journalists should leave their desks, not rely on the usual sources in their Rolodexes, talk to a much wider range of citizens as well as experts, and build these sources into more complex, multisided stories on difficult public and civic problems. Whatever their shortcomings (and critics and supporters alike sometimes derided public journalism stories as broccoli, meaning that it was good for the public but not to its taste), these stories were almost invariably more difficult to report, took longer, involved more resources in writing, editing, layout, and space than almost all traditional daily journalism.

A third criticism was that public and civic journalism was being forced on the press by foundations, particularly the Pew Charitable Trusts, which financed the Pew Center for Civic Journalism. The Pew Center did have tremendous influence, through its workshops and seminars, research, and grants. The Pew grants, however, rarely covered the cost of projects funded, much less underwrote any news organization's practice over time. Rather, they were catalytic, creating space for experiments in news organizations.

Public and Civic Journalism in the Present

By the time the Pew Center closed it doors in 2002, however, momentum in the public and civic journalism movement as a movement had declined considerably, for several reasons. First, it was difficult to sustain the movement against continued opposition from mainstream critics. Within newsrooms, advocates became tired of defending civic journalism and frequently continued many of the practices without attempting to articulate them in terms of democratic renewal. After several years, the legitimacy and distinctiveness of the movement began to fade, and what was left was a collection of new practices without a larger frame. Intellectual and academic leaders moved on to other things, as did many newsroom leaders, editors, and reporters. Second, the generation of corporate leadership represented by James Batten passed (Batten died in 1995), and leading corporate sponsors like Knight-Ridder continued verbal support but became more focused on profit and short-term solutions to declining readership in the face of the considerable costs of doing public journalism well and the competing investments in new technologies. Newspapers, always the engine of public journalism, were in crisis as an industry, and it had become clear (to supporters and critics alike) that public journalism per se was not a short-term fix. Third, and perhaps most important, as the larger framework of rethinking of citizen participation in media shifted to the World Wide Web, so did much of the specific focus of public journalism, as many of its veterans moved forward to new experiments in citizen journalism.

Still, many of the major innovations in news practice initiated by public journalism have been absorbed into the journalistic mainstream. Issue grids, ad watches, and citizen-posed questions for candidates can now be found in most mainstream papers during elections. The civic problem focus of civic journalism has entered the mainstream as "solutions-oriented" reporting. And major pockets of practice remain in newspapers that are still edited by movement veterans. As noted, the Charlotte Observer continues much of its civic practice, although without naming it as such. The St. Paul Pioneer Press, the editorial pages of the Philadelphia Inquirer, the Spokesman-Review in Spokane, Memphis Commercial-Appeal, and Portland [Maine] Press Herald are among the papers that actively continue the tradition in some form. Other newspapers still actively incorporate elements of civic and public practice into their work, including the Wichita Eagle, Seattle Times-Intelligencer, and Portland Oregonian, along with dozens of smaller papers. In Tampa Bay, the Tribune has been a leader in digital convergence in the newsroom and maintained a civic journalism tradition at least through 2005.

Further, public journalism experiments have spread internationally, to Europe (particularly Scandinavia), Africa, Asia, and South America. In many countries, where the public role of the media is more formally recognized, understood, institutionalized, and debated than in the United States, the public journalism movement's impact is still being felt.

Lewis A. Friedland

See also Citizen Journalism

Further Readings

Carey, J. W. (1995). The press, public opinion, and public discourse. In T. L. Glasser & C. T. Salmon (Eds.), Public opinion and the communication of consent (pp. 373–402). New York: Guilford.

Friedland, L. A. (2003). Public journalism: Past and future. Dayton, OH: Kettering Foundation Press.

Friedland, L. A., & Nichols, S. (2002). Measuring civic journalism's progress: A report across a decade of activity. Washington, DC: Pew Center for Civic Journalism.

Haas, T. (2007). The pursuit of public journalism. New York: Routledge.

Merritt, D. (1998). Public journalism and public life: Why telling the news is not enough. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Rosen, J. (1999). What are journalists for? New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Public Opinion

Despite its centrality and invocation in today's political and social world, the notion of public opinion has been plagued by inconsistent conceptualizations over the years. Disagreements over the public can be traced back to the ancient Greek philosophers: Plato expressed disdain for the public and believed in the rule of philosopher kings, whereas Aristotle was more optimistic, believing in the power of the community and the wisdom of collective deliberation. These differences in perspectives transcended time, manifesting themselves in European thinking in the 16th and 17th centuries. For instance, Machiavelli cautioned rulers to be wary of the ruled, but Rousseau noted the indestructibility of the general will, arguing that the state should rest on—and advocate for—the good of the community. Contemporary views of public opinion are grounded in the assumption that a government should enact policies that reflect the will of its citizens. Despite this general consensus, the extent to which leaders respond to the demands and interests of their constituents has varied across space, time, and context.

Scholars continued to grapple with defining public opinion in the 20th century. In the inaugural issue of Public Opinion Quarterly in 1937, Allport posited a definition that involved "individuals . . . expressing themselves [regarding a] condition, person, or proposal of widespread importance . . . as to give rise to the probability of affecting action . . . toward the object concerned." Linking citizens' preferences to policy, this definition assumes that public opinion is an aggregate of individual opinions.

Allport's definition, however, is only one of several perspectives on public opinion. Another view does not see it as something quantifiable, but as a reflection of societal norms. This majoritarian perspective can be seen in Locke's "law of opinion" and Noelle-Neumann's theory of the spiral of silence, in which society has the power to impose sanctions on those who deviate from the norm. Other common definitions of public opinion include its being the opinion expressed by media and elites, something that arises from the clash of group interests, and a fiction.

This latter definition, equating public opinion with something that does not exist, is particularly crucial given a decades-long debate about citizen competence. Scholars immersed in this debate have questioned whether members of the mass public, who participate in an increasing number of polls, really understand enough about public affairs so as to express a meaningful opinion on these issues. After all, studies have shown that citizens are willing to express opinions on fictitious issues, and that their responses to questions asked repeatedly can be quite inconsistent. The extent to which opinions really exist, therefore, is critical in addressing the normative question regarding how much policymakers should rely on these expressed opinions.

Opinions, however, can be expressed in venues other than public opinion polls. Given these definitions, citizens can express their opinions in political conversation with friends, family, and neighbors; they can contact the media or their representatives directly; they can vote, campaign, donate money, sign petitions, and protest alongside others. Of course, technological advances have provided numerous opportunities to deliberate with and express views to individuals outside one's immediate lifespace. The public sphere, once delimited by geographical boundaries, has become more physically diffuse. Not surprisingly, this development has changed how public and expression of opinion are defined.

The study of public opinion is quite interdisciplinary in nature. Researchers across a number of fields collectively ask what public opinion is on a given issue, which segments of the populations hold these opinions, how these opinions are shaped, and in the spirit of Allport, how these opinions can effect change. For instance, sociologists tend to be more interested in how social movements and mobilization efforts take hold and how group identity can influence perceptions, while psychologists devote more time to studying how information gets processed and which persuasive appeals are more effective. In a related vein, political scientists' study of public opinion can include voting and other forms of political behavior as well as influences on policy formation.

Borrowing from a number of disciplines, political communication scholars examine public opinion from a number of different vantage points. Some examine public opinion as a product (how many people feel a certain way about a given issue), while others emphasize process-related phenomena (i.e., how opinions are formed). Some researchers look at macrolevel issues (e.g., how trust in government varies by country), leaving others to address microlevel concerns, such as how citizens acquire and use political information.

A large corpus of political communication research emphasizes the study of messages, ranging from their construction to content to consequences. That is, what institutional and ideological factors affect whether an issue gets covered or how the story is conveyed? What are the effects of media coverage or interpersonal discussion on an individual or group? And are attitudes, thoughts, and/or behaviors shaped by these messages, whether they appear in a conversation, news, entertainment content, advertisements, or political debates? According to communication theorists, the media not only have agenda-setting effects (the ability to convey to their audiences which issues are important), but also framing effects, or the capacity to shape attitudes and cognitions based on how an issue is portrayed.

Patricia Moy

See also Agenda Setting; Framing; Political Engagement; Spiral of Silence

Further Readings

Allport, F. H. (1937). Toward a science of public opinion. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1, 7–23.

Childs, H. L. (1939). By public opinion I mean. Public Opinion Quarterly, 3, 327–336.

Converse, P. E. (1964). The nature of belief systems in mass publics. In D. E. Apter (Ed.), Ideology and discontent (pp. 206–261). New York: Free Press of Glencoe.

Glynn, C. J., Herbst, S., O'Keefe, G., J., Shapiro, R. Y., & Lindeman, M. (2004). Public opinion (2nd ed.). Boulder, CO: Westview.

Noelle-Neumann, E. (1993). The spiral of silence: Public opinion—Our social skin (2nd ed.). Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Page, B. I., & Shapiro, R. Y. (1992). The rational public: Fifty years of trends in Americans' policy preferences. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Rousseau, J.-J. (1968). The social contract. Baltimore: Penguin Books.

Public Relations, Political

Political public relations refers to the strategic communication activities of actors participating in the political process that aim at informative and persuasive goals in order to realize single interests. Beyond this rather general outline, however, the concept of public relations is quite inconsistent. The term's definition varies according to discipline and perspective. In general, three different approaches can be specified:

1. From a micro-perspective, public relations is defined by its instruments and activities ("Public relations is what public relations does"). These depictions of public relations are often adopted by practitioners and professional associations emphasizing normative views in order to justify their doing. Accordingly, these definitions often stress the idea of harmony and postulate the creation of mutual understanding.

2. Today, organization theory provides the most prevalent concept of public relations. It deals with the contribution of public relations to the goal attainment of an organization.

3. The macro-perspective deals with the function of public relations for society. Some authors consider public relations as part of the public communication system that also includes journalism and that provides information on publicly relevant subjects, whereas others argue that public relations is functionally dependent on other social systems and therefore has to be regarded as their subsystem. Some scholars, such as Franz Ronneberger, maintain that public relations is constitutive for the functioning of a democratic system because it helps to publicly articulate the diverging interests within a democratic society and thus allows for a reconcilement of these interests and for integration.

Differentiation From Related Terms

Political Advertising

Political advertising is a nonpersonal, one-way form of communication. It differs from public relations (which mainly tries to influence media coverage) in the use of paid media—the purchase of advertising space—in order to transmit a message to the public. Typically, in contrast to public relations, which aims at long-term effects such as the building of trust and credibility or image cultivation, advertising strives at short-term goals, such as the initiation of an electoral decision. However, the two concepts may overlap insofar as political advertising can affect the image of a political actor, just as long-term political public relations can influence voting behavior.

Political Marketing

The term marketing originated in the business sector and refers to influencing the behavior of the public or a target group in a competitive situation. Transferred to politics, it means the application of commercial marketing tools within the political field. This leads to designing "market-oriented" "products" (e.g., a political party) that suit the preferences of the electorate (detected by market intelligence) in order to gain a competitive edge. From a marketing perspective, public relations is a part of marketing (among advertising, etc.). This assumption, however, rests upon a very limited and narrow concept of public relations.

Propaganda

After having been used in a quite neutral way for a long time—originally in the religious and political, and since the 19th century also in the economic realm—the use of propaganda in the World War I and especially in Nazi Germany resulted in a negative connotation of the concept. Since then, propaganda designates partial, manipulative, and mendacious forms of persuasive communication that are often contrasted with the self-proclaimed pretense of public relations to provide only objective, honest, and informative messages. From a strictly functional perspective, however, public relations and propaganda are synonyms.

History of Public Relations

It was probably at the end of the 19th century that the term public relations was first used with today's meaning. The history of the term and the professional history of public relations, however, are much shorter than the thinking and acting that fulfilled the functions that correspond to those of public relations today. Determining at which time in history public relations started is therefore a much-contested question among public relations scholars. Three approaches may be identified:

1. Public relations has existed since people first tried to persuade and seek the trust of other people and applied respective techniques. Concrete examples can be named for the ancient world; however, appropriate activities can be probably traced back to the beginnings of humankind (activity-oriented approach).

2. Public relations appeared when industrialization, division of labor, and urbanization led to a more differentiated, heterogeneous society—a development that bore the need for systematic communication in order to foster one's own interests. This was the case in the second half of the 19th century. This need-oriented approach mainly applies to commercial public relations—examples for political public relations can be found much earlier.

3. Public relations has existed since the profession of public relations counselors emerged (profession-oriented approach). The development of public relations as a profession had already started in the middle of the 19th century. The first one to claim the invention of the phrase "counsel on public relations," however, was Edward L. Bernays (1891–1995), who together with his wife allegedly coined it in 1920. Ivy Ledbetter Lee (1877–1934), another founder of American professional public relations, in 1916 spoke of himself as "Adviser in Public Relations." Both Bernays and Lee worked not only for companies but also for politicians and states.

Actors in Political Public Relations

Political public relations is applied by diverse actors. These may be

- international organizations (e.g., UNO, EU, and their institutions);
- nation states;
- constitutional bodies such as governments and governmental institutions, parliaments, courts, authorities;
- intermediary actors such as parties, public organizations (federations and associations), NGOs, and pressure groups such as social initiatives and movements (e.g., citizens' groups).

As Barbara Pfetsch stresses, these actors strive for different goals, dispose of different resources and correspondingly use different strategies and instruments, and have different prospects of success. For example, governments in the first place aim at legitimization and acceptance for their generally binding decisions. In their public relations activities, they may take advantage of their members' prominence and of many occasions that take place and attract attention routinely (e.g., state visits), and they dispose of a large and professional public relations apparatus.

Intermediary organizations' functions are the articulation and aggregation of specific interests. They aim at the commitment of their partisans and at attention for their particular concern. Parties, in particular, have to distinguish themselves from their competitors in order to win elections. Associations are dependent on the support of their members and have to convince the public of the importance and the legitimacy of their interests. They also try to influence political decisions in the desired way. Social movements try to occupy topics that are neglected by established organizations. Their financial scope is usually limited, and they cannot access public attention routinely. This leads to strategies that aim at public attention in the first place, for example, by staging spectacular events.

As not only these actors as a whole but also their individual representatives avail themselves of public relations activities, a differentiation can be made between corporate and personal actors. Additionally, for example, Guenter Bentele distinguishes between professional corporate and personal actors whose main task lies in public relations activities and in functional actors who fulfill public relations tasks only in addition to their main function (e.g., politicians who appear in talk shows). Professional actors may work within a political organization (public relations divisions, press officers) or as external consultants (e.g., public relations agencies or single counselors). They may fulfill their task as long-term consultants or as short-term ones for special occasions (e.g., electoral campaigns). According to the increasing importance of public relations, a process of professionalization is taking place. This means that purely functional public relations is reduced in favor of the use of experts (or at least training functional public relations actors) and that professionals become more and more specialized.

Target Groups, Strategies, and Measures of Political Public Relations

Concerning the target groups of political public relations, a differentiation has to be made between internal and external public relations. Internal public relations is directed at the members of an organization (for example, in order to communicate decisions, coordinate a campaign, or mobilize partisans during elections). External public relations, in contrast, is directed at an organization's environment, at the public or special segments of it that are important for an organization's successful functioning (stakeholders).

The target groups may be reached by direct measures, such as personal communication (e.g., speeches) or the distribution of an actor's own printed material (e.g., brochures). Most public relations messages, however, are indirect, which means they are mediated by the media (the effects of direct measures may also be fortified by media coverage, however). Therefore, the creation and maintenance of a reliable network of interpersonal relations between political actors and public relations professionals, on the one hand and media representatives, on the other hand, play a crucial role in public relations. These activities may be referred to as "relation management." They comprise the preparation of information, press conferences, background circles, invitations to accompany politicians on major journeys, and so on. These measures aim at creating favorable conditions and occasions for successful "news management." News management comprises strategies that aim at having one's position carried over to the public via the mass media in the most favorable way. Successful news management requires an adaptation to the media logic, which includes the specific conditions of content production (e.g., news values, deadlines), in order to make public relations messages more attractive to journalists and to overcome selection barriers.

An important component of news management is the strategy of agenda building, which attempts to influence the media agenda and thus to control the topics that become dominant in the public sphere. By this means, political actors may try to raise favorable issues. Correspondingly, another variant of this strategy is dethematization, which aims at avoiding media coverage of disadvantageous subjects or at gaining time for internal decision processes by shielding a topic from public interest.

An important measure in the agenda-building process is personalization. According to the media logic, it is more probable that the media will pick up an issue if it is linked with a—if possible, prominent—person, which makes abstract and complex facts easier to visualize and may serve as a kind of symbolic message. The same holds true for actions and events. Another measure to gain the interest of the media, therefore, is event management, which means the staging of events that take place purely for the media to cover them (pseudo-events, e.g., press conferences or protest actions by social movements) or influencing events that take place anyway but that may be arranged in a way (e.g., by timing, presence of celebrities) that guarantees the highest media attention possible (mediated events, e.g., party conventions).

However, these measures of news management not only aim at having a topic or an event simply covered by the media, but also, and at least as important, to have it covered in the desired way. The technique that tries to put an issue in a predefined context and aims at the convenient interpretation and accentuation of single aspects in order to influence the emerging perception is called "framing."

All these strategies build on issues management, which means the permanent identification and observation of issues actually or potentially relevant to an organization's stakeholders that are already or may in future be discussed in public and that bear a risk or an opportunity for an organization's scope of action.

Public relations not only tries to influence the coverage on particular issues, but also extends to another important field of activity, image building. Image building—which is applied to organizations as well as persons—aims at establishing credibility and trust that may guarantee long-term support without having to ask for understanding for each single decision and that enhances the chances that public relations messages are adopted by journalists. With respect to persons, the aim is not only to create a favorable image in respect to factual qualifications or for abilities that are needed in the political process (e.g., assertiveness), but also to add facets that create sympathy, for example, by delivering insights into the private sphere (e.g., pictures of family life). News management and image building are closely related to each other insofar as a favorable image is an important condition for the personalization of a topic, as issues focused by the media establish criteria for the judgment of political actors (priming) and contribute to the shaping of their image.

Another measure that can be assigned to political public relations is public affairs. Public affairs is directed at political and administrative decision makers and aims at influencing the legal and administrative conditions of an organization's work in the most favorable way (e.g., by lobbying).

Finally, it has to be stressed that political public relations takes place not only within a state or nation, but it is also used in international communication in order to achieve foreign policy goals. The most commonly used strategy in this context is media diplomacy. Direct media diplomacy uses the media as a channel to communicate with policymakers of foreign states (e.g., if diplomatic relations are troubled or nonexistent). Sometimes also journalists act as media brokers, which means that they deliver messages between political actors. Indirect media diplomacy, in contrast, designates a strategy of influencing decision making in other states by influencing public opinion. Media diplomacy is part of public diplomacy that also comprises cultural diplomacy activities that aim at building a climate of mutual trust in the long run and that are part of national image cultivation.

Public Relations Democracy

Because of eroding party loyalties, increasing competition among a rising number of political actors, a growing complexity of political decisions, and an expanding media sector, political public relations activities are becoming more and more important. The mediatization of politics (meaning the adaptation of politics to the media logic) and the emerging "public relations democracy" (a political system that is focused on the distribution of positive messages and the enhancing of one's public perception) are intensively discussed topics. On the one hand, it is argued that public relations helps articulate different standpoints in the political field and to put political issues across also to the politically less interested segment of the population. On the other hand, it is stated that public relations distorts the image of political reality, endangers factual decisions in favor of politainment (politics as entertainment) considerations, and finally contributes to a disenchantment with politics and a public disengagement from the democratic process.

The main criterion for the scope of positive versus negative effects lies in the question of whether public relations is policy focused—meaning whether public relations serves only to better communicate political decisions to the public—or whether public relations is applied in a media-focused version— whether the requests of public relations activities influence or substitute for political decisions.

Astrid Zipfel

See also Framing; Government Communication; Image, Political; Issue Management; Mediatization; News Management; Personalization of Politics; Political Advertising; Political Marketing; Press and Politics; Priming; Propaganda; Pseudo-Event; Public Affairs, Communication in; Spin, Political

Further Readings

Bentele, G. (1998*).* Politische Öffentlichkeitsarbeit [Political public relations]. In U. Sarcinelli (Ed.), Politikvermittlung und Demokratie in der Mediengesellschaft [Political switching and democracy in the media industry] (pp. 124–145). Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag.

Cutlip, S. M. (1994). The unseen power: Public relations: A history. Hillsdale, NJ: Erlbaum.

Cutlip, S. M. (1995). Public relations history: From the 17th to the 20th century: The antecedents. Hillsdale, NJ: Erlbaum.

Kunczik, M. (1997). Geschichte der deutschen Öffentlichkeitsarbeit [History of German public relations]. Köln: Böhlau-Verlag.

Louw, E. (2005). The media and the political process. London: Sage.

McNair, B. (2003). An introduction to political communication (3rd ed.). London: Routledge.

Pfetsch, B. (1998). Government news management. In D. Graber, D. McQuail, & P. Norris (Eds.), The politics of news—the news of politics (pp. 70–93). Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Public Service Broadcasting

Public service broadcasting (PSB) has emerged in three distinct waves: paternalistic (as in the UK, Canada, Australia, and elsewhere in the 1920s and 1930s); democratic and emancipatory (as in some Western European countries in the 1970s, when state [government] control of monopoly broadcasters could no longer be justified and they were transformed into autonomous PSB organizations); and systemic (as in West Germany after World War II, Spain, Portugal, and Greece in the 1970s, and in Central and Eastern Europe after 1989, when transition to democracy after an authoritarian or totalitarian system prompted corresponding change in the media).

Most European PSB organizations were originally created as public monopolies. Elsewhere, they emerged in the context of a mixed, public/commercial system. In special cases (as in the United States), they were created as alternatives to an already existing commercial broadcasting system, or recreated (as in New Zealand) in the conviction that commercial broadcasting alone fails to meet all the needs of society.

PSB mostly arose out of collectivistic, social-democratic social arrangements that assigned to the state a duty to create a public sector institution providing a fundamental service with all the content needed by the audience as members of a society, culture, and democratic polity. The objective was to sustain an informed electorate, cultural and educational enrichment, and enlightenment of society. An important element of this was the culture of "noncommercialism."

Public service broadcasting emerged during what has been called the "public service" phase of media policy development, when it was dedicated to the achievement of cultural and social goals (mainly in broadcasting) and to the provision of "communication welfare." The ultimate goal was protection of the public interest and enhancement of democracy, with PSB serving as a mainstay of the public sphere, a forum for public debate, and one of the primary channels of political communication. It had the democratizing effect of making virtually the whole spectrum of public life available to all and extending the universe of discourse.

PSB displays, as do all media systems, "systemic parallelism": its organization, structure, governance, and financing reflect national specificities. Still, some shared features include public ownership; public funding, at least in part; universal access, free at the point of reception; a charter or legislative remit enshrining purpose; the Reithian doctrine that the purpose of broadcasting is "to inform, educate and entertain"; the promoting of national identity and culture, or nation building; a comprehensive range of programming to serve the whole audience (diversity of programming); programming to address the needs of minority audiences; programming that includes elements of "high culture" or other content unlikely to be provided by the free market; the encouraging of risk taking and innovation in programming; regard for the audience as citizens rather than consumers. Editorial independence and institutional autonomy are indispensable, as PSB is to serve the public, rather than the state, government, or political establishment. Often, however, political influence on PSB is strong.

As formulated by the Council of Europe in 1994, some additional program obligations of public service broadcasters provide a reference point and a factor for social cohesion and integration of all individuals, groups, and communities; provide a forum for a broad public discussion; develop pluralistic, innovative, and varied programming, meeting high ethical and quality standards; reflect the different philosophical ideas and religious beliefs in society, promote mutual understanding and tolerance and community relations in pluri-ethnic and multicultural societies; ensure that the programs offered contain a significant proportion of original productions and as appropriate use independent producers and cooperate with the cinema sector.

In Europe, as commercial broadcasting and new communication technologies developed, PSB first lost its monopoly on the audience and then, with the arrival of thematic channels, on most of the PSB "content." That, and a "program convergence" with commercial stations (due to competition for audiences and/or advertising revenue) resulted in a crisis of legitimacy and financing for PSB stations.

Meanwhile, ideological, cultural, and axiological change (the arrival of postmodernism, neoliberalism, individualism, anti-authoritarianism, marketization, and commercialism) undercut the legitimacy of the public sector and its involvement in satisfaction of individual needs. Moreover, the leveling of living and educational standards and democratization led to rejection of asymmetrical relations once involved in the model of paternalistic, public enlightenment-oriented PSB organizations. This is also promoted by the "architecture of participation," created by the information and communication technologies (ICTs) and the Internet.

The future of PSB seems to hang in the balance. It is clear that it needs to be fundamentally adjusted to the digital age. At the same time, governments and some trade-oriented international organizations, under pressure from the commercial sector, are insisting it remain in its traditional mold. This may prevent its vital realignment to new technological realities and new ways of popular participation in mediated social communication.

Digitalization and ICTs seem to create limitless choice and are seen as further undermining the rationale for PSB. Yet, they also force commercial broadcasters and content providers into cut-throat competition, reducing their ability to provide high-quality content to the mass audience and to offer public service-like content. Even thematic commercial channels are abandoning ambitious, quality content in favor of more entertainment. Where quality content is available from commercial sources, additional payment is often required. PSB—with its dedication to universal access, free at the point of reception—continues to be the only realistic alternative of access to such content. Thus the old scarcity rationale for PSB's existence may paradoxically return, bolstering the claim that PSB will be more needed in the Information Society than ever before. Moreover, ICTs offer PSB an opportunity to perform its service better and extend its range of activities, from universal service to personalized public service via a range of new platforms other than traditional broadcasting. Hence the calls for a change of name, for example, to "public service media."

Karol Jakubowicz

See also Public Journalism

Further Readings

Banerjee, I., & Seneviratne, K. (Eds.). (2005). Public service broadcasting: A best practices sourcebook. Paris: UNESCO.

Nissen, C. (2006). Public service broadcasting in the information society. Strasbourg: Council of Europe.

Public Sphere

The field of political communication has always drawn upon and incorporated elements from different intellectual currents. In recent decades the concept of the public sphere has emerged as a focal point of theorizing, research, and reflection within a number of disciplines in the social sciences and humanities and in political communication. In fact, it could be argued that for political communication, the relevance of the public sphere as a particular concept and as a general perspective is particularly compelling, even if the notion of the public sphere brings with it a number of contested issues. The discussion here first looks at the basic elements of the concept of the public sphere as derived from the groundbreaking work of Jürgen Habermas. From there it suggests that the public sphere, as a concept to be used with political communication, can be seen as comprising three basic dimensions. The discussion then looks briefly at some of the issues and debates that have followed the evolution of this concept.

The Public Sphere According to Habermas

Increasingly, discussions about democracy and the media are framed within the concept of the public sphere. In schematic terms, a functioning public sphere is understood as a constellation of communicative spaces in society that permit the circulation of information, ideas, debates—ideally in an unfettered manner—and also the formation of political will, that is, public opinion. In the vision of the public sphere, these spaces, in which the mass media and now, more recently, the newer interactive media figure prominently, serve to permit the development and expression of political views among citizens. These spaces also facilitate communicative links between citizens and the power holders of society. While in the modern world the institutions of the media are the institutional core of the public sphere, we must recall that it is the face-to-face interaction, the ongoing talk among citizens, where the public sphere comes alive, so to speak, and where we find the actual bedrock of democracy.

While versions of the concept of the public sphere appear in the writings of a number of authors during the 20th century, such as Walter Lippmann, Hannah Arendt, and John Dewey, most people today associate the concept with Jürgen Habermas's version that was first published in 1962. Though the full text was not translated into English until 1989, his concept had by the 1970s come to play an important role in the critical analysis of the media and democracy in the English-speaking world. Since the translation, both the use of the concept and critical interventions in relation to it have grown considerably. While Habermas has not attempted a full-scale reformulation of the public sphere, it is clear that his view of the concept is evolving as his work in other areas develops.

After an extensive historical overview, Habermas surmises that a public sphere began to emerge within the bourgeois classes of Western Europe in the late 18th and early 19th centuries. The institutional basis for this public sphere consisted of an array of milieu and media, such as clubs, salons, coffeehouses, newspapers, books, and pamphlets, all of which in various (though incomplete) ways manifested Enlightenment ideals of the human pursuit of knowledge and freedom.

For Habermas, the key here was not only the institutional basis, but also the manner in which communication took place in this burgeoning public sphere. He saw that interaction in this social arena, however imperfectly, embodied the ideals of reason, that is, the Enlightenment goals of rational thinking, argument, and discussion. In his notion of the public as a rational, dialogic process, Habermas's account of communication and democracy bears similarities with that of John Dewey. We can note that Habermas's work from the 1980s on communicative rationality further develops normative perspectives on how political communication should take place in order to enhance intersubjectivity and the democratic character of society.

Habermas sees the public sphere growing and deepening in the first few decades of the 19th century with the spread of mass literacy and the press, but then, gradually, the decay sets in. Journalism increasingly loses its claim to reason; public discourse degenerates into public relations. As the logic of commercialism increasingly shapes the operations of the media, the domain of rationality diminishes. Moving into the 20th century, Habermas observes with pessimism the trivialization of politics, not least in the electronic media, the industrialization of public opinion, and the transformation of publics from discursive to consuming collectivities. These and other ills serve to constrict society's potential for democratic political communication.

Three Dimensions of the Public Sphere

The public sphere perspective on political communication, with its strong normative commitments and broad horizons, may seem removed from the empirical realities of political communication. While the strength of the perspective lies in its conceptual and theoretical dimensions, it also offers many entry points for empirical and critical analysis. To make the notion of the public sphere more accessible as an analytic tool for political communication research, it can be useful to conceptualize it as comprising three constitutive dimensions: the structural, the representational, and the interactional.

The structural dimension has to do with the formal institutional features of the public sphere. At bottom, the public sphere rests upon the idea of universality, the norm that it must be accessible to all citizens of society. If the media are a dominant feature of the public sphere, they must thus be technically, economically, culturally, and linguistically within reach of society's members; any a priori exclusions of any segment of the population collides with democracy's claim to universalism. Seen from this angle, the vision of a public sphere raises questions about media policy and economics, ownership and control, the role of market forces and regulation, issues of the privatization of information, procedures for licensing, rules for access, and so forth.

The representational dimension refers to the forms and contents of mass media output, as well as the attributes of "one-to-many" communication via the newer interactive media. Thus, the representational dimension includes all the traditional questions and criteria within political communication about media output—for example, fairness, accuracy, pluralism of views, sensationalism, infotainment, diversity of cultural expression. Yet, while the media are central to the public sphere, they also generate a semiotic milieu that far exceeds its boundaries. Most media output is not about political communication; it deals instead with entertainment, popular culture, sports, advertising, and so on. Thus, the mediated public sphere of political communication is competing for attention in a semiotic environment overwhelmingly oriented toward (ostensibly) nonpolitical matters.

The dimension of interaction reminds us that democracy resides, ultimately, with citizens who engage in talk with each other, whether face to face or via interactive technologies like the Internet and telephones. The public sphere as a process does not "end" with the publication of a newspaper or the transmission of a radio or TV program; these media phenomena are but one step in larger communication chains that include how the media output is received, made sense of, and used by citizens in their interaction with each other. Moreover, civic interaction in the public sphere need not just be directly mobilized by the media; it can also rise through discussions that relate personal experience to societal horizons. Here it is useful to recall that Habermas, as well as other writers such as Dewey, argue that a "public" should be conceptualized as something other than just a media audience. A public, according to Habermas and Dewey, exists as discursive interactional processes; atomized individuals, consuming media in their homes, do not comprise a public. To point to the interaction among citizens is to take a step into the sociocultural contexts of everyday life. Interaction has its sites and spaces, its discursive practices, its contextual aspects; politics, in a sense, it emerges through talk. Thus, from a public sphere perspective, it can be argued that political communication extends deep into people's microworlds.

Conceptual Issues and Debates

Habermas's work on the public sphere had a major impact on thinking about media, publics, democracy, and the nature of political communication. Observers have noted that Habermas's historical account bears many of the markings of the original Frankfurt School of critical theory. There is also a decidedly nostalgic quality to the analysis, the sense that there once was an historical opening that then became closed off. Habermas certainly sees the limitations of this original bourgeois public sphere, not least in class terms; a counterpoint to Habermas's model even argued for a proletarian public sphere. Feminists have been quick to point out the gender limitations of the bourgeois public sphere—as well as in Habermas's own thinking. He has responded generously to his critics and made constructive use of their interventions.

There is ambiguity with the concept: it is not fully clear whether what Habermas describes is the empirical reality of an historical situation or whether he is fundamentally presenting a normative vision. Most readers conclude that it is both. He describes the structural mechanisms that erode the public sphere, yet at the same time he—and many of his readers—continue to be inspired by the vision of a robust public sphere serving a well-functioning democracy. Indeed, as the use of the concept spreads, the idea of the public sphere has tended to gravitate away from its Frankfurt School origins and to join mainstream discussions about media performance, journalistic quality, political communication, and the conditions of democracy. In practical terms, the normative horizons from the liberal or progressive traditions that promote "good journalism" or "information in the public interest" are not so different from ideals about the media inspired by the framework of the public sphere.

Another key theme of debate has centered on the tension between a unified, national public sphere versus a pluralistic or fragmented one. The argument that each nation state should strive for a large, encompassing public sphere is based in part on the criteria for governability—with too many forums and too many voices, democracy ends in an ineffective cacophony. This position also derives from concern that isolated islands of public discourse will become politically ineffectual. This view of the public sphere—as providing a unified political culture—was used (albeit indirectly) in, for example, defining the mission of European public service broadcasting. Today, the importance of the public sphere concept is being reiterated in the context of the European Union; there is a need to achieve some such semblance of a transnational public sphere, as well as the profound difficulty in attaining anything other than a collection of national mediated spheres in which European Union matters are aired and discussed.

The arguments that see the public sphere in essentially plural terms base their claims in part on the complex and heterogeneous sociocultural realities of late modern society, including its increasingly globalized character. To even think of a unified communicative space for all citizens seems simply sociologically out of touch with the real world. Habermas has moved in this direction in a more recent reformulation of the concept. Further, it has also been argued that in a democracy, various groups, movements, interests, and other collectivities need a semi-sheltered space to work out their own positions, promote collective identity, and foster empowerment. Some argue for oppositional or counter-public spheres. Obviously the heterogeneous quality of late modern life and its public cultures raises problematic issues for democracy, and these become particularly compelling when refracted through the prism of the public sphere.

One way to conceptualize the public sphere in the context of societal heterogeneity is to see it as consisting of many communicative spaces structured in a tiered fashion. The major mass media of a society can be seen as creating the dominant public sphere, while smaller media outlets, not least those that exist on the Internet, can generate cluster of smaller spheres defined by interests, gender, ethnicity, and so on. Smaller spheres "feed into" larger ones, ideally resulting in interfaces that allow collective views to "travel" from the outer reaches toward the dominant center.

A further point of contestation has been the normative view of the kind of communication that should take place in the public sphere. There is in the Habermasian tradition a strong leaning toward the rational; communication is theorized in a rigorous manner that emphasizes formalized deliberation. Among the common criticisms leveled against his approach is that he seemingly strives to reduce political communication in a manner that excludes affective, rhetorical, symbolic, mythic, bodily, humorous, and other dimensions. Furthermore, it could be argued that the criteria of traditional notions of rational speech may exclude other, specific communicative registers prevalent among particular groups, thereby undercutting their communicative legitimacy in the public sphere—a line of argument that readily links up with the theme of a unified versus pluralistic public spheres.

Politics, the Public and the Private

Certainly one of the central quandaries of public sphere theory is that social and cultural evolution continues to scramble the distinction between public and private. This is a development that is abundantly visible in the late modern media milieu. The traditionalist stance is to define politics in a narrow way, focusing on the formal political arena in the mainstream media. In the process it thereby shuts its eyes, so to speak, to a lot of reality.

The concepts of public and private encompass an ensemble of notions that readily align themselves into sets of polarities. The idea of "public" in traditions like the Habermasian is implacably associated with reason, rationality, objectivity, argument, work, text, information, and knowledge. The private resonates with the personal, with emotion, intimacy, subjectivity, aesthetics, style, image, and pleasure. (There is a large literature on these themes as they pertain to the media.) In the media context, the private is also closely related to consumption, entertainment, and popular culture.

At a fundamental level, what is at stake in the modern use of the public sphere perspective is the question of where the political resides and how it is positioned against that which is deemed nonpolitical. There has been a flood of discussion and debate around this issue. Depending on circumstances, the seemingly private can often harbor the political, a point that has been forcefully made not least by feminist political theorists like Lister and Meehan. Similarly, the potentially political character of popular culture is often asserted, a view that has also entered into some corners of political science. The possibilities for topics to become politicized are key elements of the open, democratic society. In the final instance, it can be said that politics has to do with decision making, but within the public sphere, the realm of the "politically relevant" is larger, always shifting—and can never be fully specified.

Peter Dahlgren

See also Deliberation; Democracy Theories; Public Communication in Politics

Further Readings

Arendt, H. (1998). The human condition. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Benhabib, S. (Ed.). (1996). Democracy and difference. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Calhoun, C. (Ed.). (1992). Habermas and the public sphere. Cambridge: MIT Press.

Corner, J., & Pels, D. (Eds.). (2003). Media and political style: Essays on representation and civic culture. London: Sage.

Dahlgren, P. (1995). Television and the public sphere. London: Sage.

Dewey, J. (1954). The public and its problems. Chicago: Swallow Press. (Originally published 1923)

Fraser, N. (1992). Rethinking the public sphere: A contribution to the critique of actually existing democracy. In C. Calhoun (Ed.), Habermas and the public sphere (pp. 109–142). Cambridge: MIT Press.

Habermas, J. (1984/1987). The theory of communicative action (2 vols.). Cambridge, UK: Polity.

Habermas, J. (1989). The structural transformation of the public sphere. Cambridge, UK: Polity.

Habermas, J. (1996). Between facts and norms. Cambridge: MIT Press.

Jones, J. (2005). Entertaining politics. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Lippmann, W. (1922). Public opinion. New York: Macmillan.

Lister, R. (1997). Citizenship: Feminist perspectives. London: Macmillan.

Meehan, J. (Ed.). (1995). Feminists read Habermas. London: Routledge.

Negt, O., & Kluge, A. (1993). The public sphere and experience. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Street, J. (1997). Politics and popular culture. Cambridge, UK: Polity.

Van Zoonen, L. (2005). Entertaining the citizen. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Warner, M. (2002). Publics and counterpublics. New York: Zone Books.

Weintraub, J., & Kumar, K. (Eds.). (1997). Public and private in thought and practice. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Pundits, Punditry

Pundits are individuals who are considered highly knowledgeable or possessing of expertise in a particular topic. Most commonly, the term pundit is attributed to people knowledgeable and interested in politics, current affairs, sociology, and other social sciences, but the term is also applied to individuals knowledgeable in technology or computer science. The term has become an increasingly common word in popular culture as the cable news channels have risen in power.

Pundit has a somewhat negative connation in recent usage, as it denotes a person who is politically biased but is portraying a knowledgeable, balanced, and neutral image. People who are recognized as pundits often express opinions without necessarily being acknowledged experts in the subject areas in which they opine. Pundits may be more similar to ideological partisans who have an agenda than similar to legitimate experts in a particular subject area who have measured and educated commentary.

Additionally, in part because of the popularity of punditry on cable news channels, there is a perception that punditry may be damaging the credibility and objectivity of journalism. There is concern that news consumers may associate punditry with news reporting and therefore develop a distrust of journalism. Additionally, critics of pundits believe the large amount of news space and news time devoted to punditry (commentary, opinion, and analysis) takes away news space and news time for legitimate news reporting, and it encourages an "infotainment" view of news.

Cable news channels such as CNN, Fox News, and MSNBC often have punditry news and political programs on their lineup. For example, Lou Dobbs on CNN, Bill O'Reilly on Fox News, and Joe Scarborough on MSNBC are all considered pundits. Other media personalities considered pundits are Al Franken, Rush Limbaugh, and Ann Coulter. Sometimes television pundits are referred to as "talking heads."

Pundits also exist in print news media. For example, newspaper columnists are sometimes considered pundits because they comment on current affairs even though they are not recognized experts in all of the subject areas they discuss in their columns.

The term originates from the Indian term pandit, which refers to someone who is knowledgeable in various subject areas, conducts religious ceremonies, and offers counsel to authorities.

Kristen D. Landreville

See also Commentary, Political

Further Readings

Hirsch, A. (1991). Talking heads: Political talk shows and their star pundits. New York: St. Martin's.

Nimmo, D., & Combs, J. E. (1992). The political pundits. Westport, CT: Praeger/Greenwood.

Putin, Vladimir (1952–)

Born in Leningrad (now Saint Petersburg), Vladimir Vladimirovich Putin served as the second president of Russia. During his one-year appointment as the last of Boris Yeltsin's prime ministers, he unexpectedly became acting president of Russia on December 31, 1999, following Yeltsin's resignation after 8 years in power. Putin's first decision was to grant immunity from prosecution to his predecessor, who had been under investigation for money laundering by Russian and Swiss authorities. Elected president in the first round by a clear majority of 57%, Putin projected the image of a literally and metaphorically strong leader (a judo black belt), a welcome change for Russians nostalgic about the country's glorious past. Putin's firm approach to the Chechen crisis combined with his law-and-order image have kept his popularity high throughout his presidency, as reflected in his 2004 reelection with 71% of the vote.

With a degree in international law from the Leningrad State University, Putin speaks near-native German and acceptable English. Before becoming a prominent Russian politician, he spent most of his career in the KGB. Having completed training at the KGB School in Moscow, between 1985 and 1990 he was stationed in Dresden, Germany. In the 1990s he changed positions frequently and received a degree in economics from the Saint Petersburg Mining Institute. Immediately prior to his nomination as prime minister, Putin was head of the FSB (successor to the KGB) and a permanent member, and then head, of the Security Council of the Russian Federation.

Domestically, Putin focused much of his efforts in office on overturning the negative population growth that threatens the very existence of the Russian people. His policies are characterized by concentration of political power and renationalization of critical economic sectors such as oil and gas industries.

Intent on taking Russia back to its strong international position without directly repeating the Cold War rhetoric, Putin is popular at home but increasingly controversial internationally. What started out as an almost unconditionally approving response of the United States and European Union (EU) to Putin's Russia has slowly turned into a more critical view of his rule. The world has let Putin know it does not like Russia's suppression of media, court, and legislative freedoms, and the treatment of Kremlin critics. Several events have been particularly controversial: the prosecution and imprisonment of Russia's richest man, Mikhail Khodorkovsky, president of Yukos oil company and Putin's frequent critic, for tax evasion; the Beslan school hostage crisis; former KGB agent Aleksander Litvinienko's deathbed accusation of Putin poisoning him; the murder of political journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who extensively criticized Putin's policy in Chechnya; the poisoning of a Ukrainian opposition presidential candidate; and numerous limitations on media freedoms.

According to the Committee to Protect Journalists, Putin's Russia is the third most dangerous place in which to work, after Iraq and Algeria, and Politkovskaya was the 13th journalist to be killed in Russia in 2006. Informal and formal government control of the media has increased through punitive tax audits and hostile takeovers, leading to the situation where "all three major television stations are in the hands of Kremlin loyalists."

The beginning of 2007 saw the EU adopt a more unified critical stand against Russia concerning energy security, following Russia using energy to gain or keep political domination in the region through dramatic increases in gas and oil prices and through sudden interruptions of energy supply. Putin has also been criticized for supporting former communist Victor Yanukovych for president of the Ukraine against the more progressive opposition leader, which is emblematic of Putin's efforts to increase Russian influence in the whole region, leading to strained relations with a number of countries, including the Ukraine, Belarus, Georgia, Moldova, the Baltic Republics, and Poland.

At the same time, overall, Putin has had relatively good relations with most of the Western world, including U.S. President George W. Bush and former German Chancellor Gerhard Schröder and has actively sought to increase Russian influence in Asia, particularly in China and India. Internationally, Russia is treated like a democracy and plays an important (if unwarranted by its economic potential) role, exemplified by its membership in the G8 group.

Since 1983, Putin has been married to Lyudmila Putina (born Shkrebneva) with whom he has two daughters, Maria and Yekaterina.

Tomasz Płudowski

See also Russia, Democratization and Media

Further Readings

Baker, P., & Glasser, S. (2005). Kremlin rising: Vladimir Putin's Russia and the end of revolution. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Politkovskava, A. (2005). Putin's Russia: Life in a failing democracy (A. Tait, Trans.). New York: Metropolitan Press.

QUAYLE, DAN (1947–)

James Danforth Quayle, born to James and Corrine Quayle in Indianapolis, Indiana, served as vice president of the United States under President George H. W. Bush from 1989 to 1993. At the time of his birth, his father, Jim Quayle, a far-right conservative and member of the John Birch Society, was a middle manager with the Huntington Herald-Press newspaper, owned by his father-in-law, Eugene Pullman, in the small town of Huntington, Indiana. After moving to Arizona for 8 years, Jim Quayle returned to Huntington with his family in 1963 and bought the Herald-Press from his father-in-law. After returning to Indiana, Dan Quayle finished his last 2 years of high school in Huntington, which he calls home. From 1965 to 1969, Quayle worked as a reporter and pressman for the Herald-Press (and general manager from 1974 to 1976). In 1969, he also graduated from DePauw University in Greencastle, Indiana, with a degree in political science.

In 1974, Quayle graduated from Indiana Law School and passed the Indiana bar, but before doing so, he held various positions in Indiana state government. Between 1970 and 1971, he worked with the Indiana State Attorney General's Office, served as an administrative assistant to the governor of Indiana from 1971 to 1973, and was Director of the Indiana Inheritance Tax Division between 1973 and 1974. After teaching Business Law at Huntington College, Indiana, in 1975, Quayle was elected to the U.S. Congress in 1976, where he represented the fourth District of Indiana for two terms. Quayle was then elected to the U.S. Senate and served from 1981 to 1989. During this time, Quayle was relatively unknown outside of his home state. All of that changed when Bush nominated him to serve as his vice-presidential running mate in the 1988 presidential election.

At the age of 41, with 12 years of experience in Congress, Dan Quayle not only became George Bush's surprise running mate but also a constant target of jokes and ridicule by the media. As such, Quayle would earn his dubious distinction, according to David Broder and Bob Woodward, in The Man Who Would Be President: Dan Quayle, as not only a political lightweight but as a boyish buffoon. Stunned during the campaign by what he referred to in his memoir, Standing Firm, as a feeding frenzy by the press, he failed to be forthright about accusations concerning his privileged upbringing, mediocre performance and academic dishonesty in college, and use of family connections to enter the Indiana National Guard to avoid the draft and enroll in law school.

In light of the 1988 election campaign, Quayle became known as one of the most undesirable and debunked vice-presidential candidates to hold the office. During his vice-presidential campaign debate with Democratic vice-presidential opponent Lloyd Bentsen, Quayle was famously ridiculed when, in response to Quayle's mention of John Kennedy's youthful accomplishments as a defense of his own young age, Bentsen quipped: "You're no Jack Kennedy." Quayle's lackluster and gaffe-ridden campaign notwithstanding, he remained largely unknown to the public and believed himself that he was misunderstood by the press. Broder and Woodward also admitted that some media allegations, particularly those surrounding descriptions of vast wealth and academic dishonesty, were false. Nevertheless, there were legitimate doubts about Quayle's strength as a potential president, and given the options for a conservative running mate that Bush had, the campaign ironically brought attention to the importance of the vice presidency and the diligence needed when selecting a candidate for the office.

Mark P. Moore

Further Readings

Broder, D. S., & Woodward, B. (1992). The man who would be president: Dan Quayle. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Moore, M. P. (1992). "The Quayle quagmire": Political campaigns in the poetic form of burlesque. Western Journal of Communication, 56, 108–124.

Quayle, D. (1994). Standing firm: A vice-presidential memoir. New York: HarperCollins.

R

Rabin, Yitzhak (1922–1995)

Yitzhak Rabin was the fifth prime minister of Israel (and the first local born), serving in this office for two terms, during the years 1974 to 1977 and 1992 to 1995. A former chief-of-staff and a Nobel Peace Prize winner, Rabin has made a significant contribution to the developing history of the state of Israel, in times of war as well as in the pursuit of peace.

Through most of his childhood years Rabin's family lived in Tel-Aviv, where he was raised in a Zionist-socialist educational environment. As a teenager Rabin left the family house and joined the agriculture boarding high school, Kadoori. During his years there, Rabin joined the "Haganah" (a paramilitary Zionist organization). After graduating high school with distinction in 1940, Yitzhak Rabin became one of the leading officers in the "Palmach," the strike force of the "Haganah."

When the state of Israel was established in 1948, Rabin became one of the senior commanders in the IDF (Israeli army). During his 27 years in the IDF, Rabin played key roles in some of the most dramatic and influential military operations. Following more than a decade of service in senior military positions, Rabin was appointed chief-of-staff, serving in this role from 1964 through 1968 (and leading the army to its historic victory in the 1967 Six Day War).

When he retired from the IDF, Rabin became a diplomat, serving as the Israeli ambassador to the United States from 1968 to 1973. In this office Rabin promoted and consolidated the ties between the two countries.

Returning to Israel in 1973, Rabin joined the Labor Party and became a Knesset member. In 1974, following Golda Meir's resignation as prime minister, Rabin was chosen as her successor, first in his party and later in the general elections that took place in that year. His first term as prime minister ended in 1977, as a result of a few political and personal turbulent events. In 1984, after 7 years as an oppositional Knesset member, Rabin was appointed as the defense minister in the newly established national unity government. He served in this position for 6 years, during which the first Intifada (Palestinian uprising) had begun. As a defense minister Rabin has been associated with a "strong hand" policy toward the Palestinians, although some of his moves were meant to increase their political autonomy.

In 1992, following his reelection as chair of the Labor Party, Rabin was once again elected as prime minister. He served in this position through his last day.

Rabin's second term was marked by his intense efforts to pursue peace between Israel and its neighbors. Rabin played a leading role in the signing of the Oslo Accords, which enabled the creation of the Palestinian authority. For this role Rabin was awarded the 1994 Nobel Peace Prize, along with Yaser Arafat and Shimon Peres. This was also the year in which the Israeli-Jordanian peace treaty was signed.

Yitzhak Rabin's relationships with journalists and the news media were relatively strong and solid throughout the years (partly due to his reputation as an honest politician and a man of his words). This is ironic because it was an Israeli journalist who contributed to Rabin's resignation as prime minister in 1974 (by publishing a report on Lea Rabin's illegal bank account in the United States). Rabin had the habit of utilizing long hours in flight (during his frequent visits around the world) to share sensitive and rare pieces of information with the group of political reporters who would join him, making such flights cherished opportunities for any journalist involved. Another irony in Rabin's relationship with the news media was found in the last months prior to his assassination. Although there was an overall support for his debated peace agenda, the Israeli media had covered the numerous terror attacks of the time in ways that frustrated Rabin, as he would see them as disproportional and dangerously harmful. The growing popular resistance to Rabin and his policy, and especially the violent and sometimes illegal demonstrations from the far right, was also intensively covered. It was not until after the assassination that many journalists began questioning their own performance, wondering whether giving the right extremists such extensive coverage might have stimulated the chain of events that ended with Rabin's death.

On November 4, 1995, at the end of a massive peace rally in Tel-Aviv, Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated by a right-wing Jewish extremist. This was the tragic peak of a long period of escalating oppositional activities against Rabin and his peace plans. The day of the assassination has become a national memorial day for Rabin and his legacy.

Vered Malka

Further Readings

Milstein, U. (1999). The Rabin file: An unauthorized exposé. Jerusalem: Gefen Publications House.

Rabin, Y. (1996). The Rabin memoir (Expanded ed.). Berkeley: University of California Press.

Race in Politics

"Race in politics" can mean many things depending upon which definition of politics is used. Defining politics as "the use of power" encompasses the broadest range of topics. Many of these, such as persuasion techniques in intercultural communication and dominant and subservient stereotypes in entertainment, are of interest to scholars of communication, yet they tend not to be the focus of a political communications curriculum. Political communication tends to define the parameters of studying race using a more restricted definition of politics that relates more directly to the power of the government. Attention is paid to communication on explicitly racial issues (such as slavery, Japanese internment, desegregation, affirmative action in education) or to issues that impact racial minorities disproportionately (such as welfare spending, English-only referendums, or immigration). Other times it refers to public speeches, advertising, and news coverage of events and people who mobilized racial minority communities or defined (and redefined) race relations. Another way to think of "race in politics" is to focus on the members of racial minority groups who are literally "in politics" as politicians, candidates, and voters. Political communications studies their persuasive strategies, messages, coverage, and effects of campaign communication.

This discussion of race in politics begins with the question of what race is—explaining how race as a concept is inherently political and how it has changed over time. It then examines the centrality of race in American history. Political communications are central to how that history is understood and the place that this history holds in today's racial debates. Finally, the role of race in political campaigns will be considered focusing on strategies of candidates and politicians of color, voting behavior of people of color, as well as the ways that the idea of racial difference is used to persuade white voters.

Race as Inherently Political

Since race is a social construction rather than a biological fact, its meaning has changed over time. Its understanding both reflects and influences politics. The notion that people can self-identify as a member of a racial group and practice "identity politics" with a community of similar people is a fairly recent way of considering race as a social construction of political relevance. It assumes an individual autonomy that ignores the authority exercised by the government to ultimately determine racial categories (and who fits in each) and the implications of these categories.

Until the mid-1960s, the category of "white" was recognized by law as the "top" of a racial hierarchy imbued with power and privilege. The naturalization law of 1790 limited citizenship to "free white people" because they were assumed (by free white people) to be the only ones "fit for self-government." The perceived threat to "good citizenship," by including large numbers of Irish immigrants in the 1840s and Eastern Europeans in the 1880s, resulted in a redefinition of "whiteness." What was once considered a monolithic group was differentiated using eugenics into a hierarchy of "white races." Courts defined the boundaries of whiteness in naturalization and miscegenation cases (determining, for example, in one case that a Sicilian was not white and in another that Armenians were). In 1924, Congress passed the Johnson-Reed Act establishing a quota system that allowed in just 2% of each group's population as of the 1890 census. This was designed to reduce the influx of "undesirable" Europeans. This highly restrictive policy was generous in comparison to approaches taken to blacks (Black Codes and Jim Crow laws), Indians (extermination, displacement, and re-education), and Asians (Chinese exclusion immigration policy and being barred from California in 1854). Native Americans were given official citizenship in 1924, but it was not until 1968 that the Indian Bill of Rights gave Native Americans living on reservations full constitutional rights.

By the 1940s large black migration and agitation over segregation in the military, the poll tax, and lynching refocused conceptions of race into a black/white binary. The idea that race is "about blacks" continues to dominate public discourse. It is challenged by other people of color who argue that they are rendered invisible by this dualistic thinking.

American Political Heritage and the Centrality of Race

Although assumptions about racial difference have moderated, the fundamental dilemmas remain the same—how to balance freedom and equality, property rights and human rights, unity and individualism. America's enduring challenge is how to create community, unity, and stability while valuing freedom, individualism, and competition. One approach to creating a national identity among diverse people is to impose a hierarchy under which everyone "knows their place" and to justify these "places" in a way that sidesteps contradictions with central American values. Another is to allow diverse groups access to democratic values under conditions that mitigate differences. Still another is to prioritize group identities over a unified national one.

The first was explicitly racist (and as indicated in the previous discussion—nativistic). The nation's founding was predicated on conceding to Southern states' desire for maintaining slavery and South Carolina and Georgia's insistence that unrestricted slave importation continue (at least until 1808). The debate that resulted in the 3/5 Compromise (counting slaves as 3/5 of a person for representation and direct taxation) was the result of practical bargaining among men whose economic self-interests differed; it was not a moral debate. The idea of a new "free nation" outlawing slavery was dismissed fairly quickly in a negotiation over commerce and navigation rights.

Similarly, western expansion helped forge a national identity of rugged individualism at the expense of Native American and Mexican American property and lives. According to this model, racial oppression was seen as compatible with core American values by those who accepted the biological essentialist argument that non-whites were inferior (childlike, dangerous, or even subhuman). Abolitionists eloquently challenged this approach in speeches and writings. These include Frederick Douglas ("We Have Decided to Stay," "The Hypocrisy of American Slavery," and "What to the Slave Is the Fourth of July"), Lucretia Mott ("The Law of Progress"), and William Lloyd Garrison (Peace Declaration).

An acknowledgment of the contradiction between the ideals of the "American Creed" (freedom, equality, and fairness) and the realities of racial discrimination heralded the second approach, called liberal nationalism. Liberal nationalism argues that through assimilation diverse people become one nation (the "melting pot" model). Although originally thought to address ethnic diversity, it was also applied to blacks as they sought opportunities open to "new" Americans. Liberal nationalism assumes an open political system and people's eagerness to follow an individualistic "bootstrap climbing" acculturation and shoulder the blame if they do not succeed. For example, successful Asian Americans (the "Model Minority") and fictional characters (such as the family on The Cosby Show) are seen as "evidence" that failure is the fault of individuals rather than "the system." According to this model, racial inequality can be compatible with core American values because it is assumed to be derived from minorities' faulty work ethic, lack of personal discipline, and defiance of authority. These attitudes are called "symbolic racism" or "modern racism."

The Civil Rights Movement fought for liberal nationalism. The goals of inclusion and opportunity use values central to American national identity. This is evident in the most acclaimed speeches of the time: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s "I've Been to the Mountaintop" and "I Have a Dream" speeches and the televised "Civil Rights Address" of John F. Kennedy, Lyndon Baines Johnson's "We Shall Overcome," and Robert Kennedy's "Remarks on the Assassination of Martin Luther King."

Yet, it is important to remember that the dominant ideology had begun to shift away from endorsing segregation and black exclusion prior to the mass demonstrations. This was evident in Supreme Court decisions (including Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka), passage of minor civil rights laws, and gradual change in public opinion beginning in the 1940s. This shift in hegemony was reflected by national television news coverage. It was evident in major legislation that embraced liberal nationalism (the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Voting Rights Act of 1965, and the Immigration and Naturalization Act of 1965).

The limitation of the liberal nationalism approach to end discrimination helped a third approach gain support. It prioritizes group rights and recognition over a uniform national identity offering "race conscious" solutions. These can be extra-governmental (separatism, self-determination) or compel government action (affirmative action policies; restitution for slavery). This approach is generally unpopular among whites, who see it as "un-American" (e.g., not based on an individualistic approach to fairness and equality). Speeches which articulate this approach include Stokely Carmichael's "Black Power" speech; Malcolm X's "Message to the Grassroots" and "The Ballot or the Bullet." The American Indian Movement, the Chicano Youth Movement, and the Black Panthers also advocated race consciousness.

Race in Political Campaigns

Race is perhaps most explicitly "in politics" when people of color hold positions of power in government or have political leverage with whites in these offices. Obtaining suffrage was only the first step; organizing to effectively use suffrage to change public policy was the ultimate goal. When the movement went from "protest to politics," activists moved from demonstrating to campaigning (many, such as John Lewis and Andrew Young, became politicians).

Blacks were mobilized by group consciousness and new feelings of efficacy and hoped to register and vote beyond what would be expected by their socioeconomic status. Having black candidates on the ballot and black politicians in local offices also contributes to black voter turnout. This has not worked as well for Hispanic voters.

Vote turnout is higher among blacks and Hispanics when they reside in communities with large minority populations. This helps explain why politicians of color are most successful in local races. Black candidates won mayoral elections as early as 1967 (Carl Stokes in Cleveland and Richard Hatcher in Gary, Indiana). Maynard Jackson became mayor of Atlanta, Georgia, in 1973. Hispanic geographic concentration and their growing numbers make them a political force in places such as California, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and south Florida.

Candidates of color campaigning in areas where whites make up the majority of voters, though there are substantial minority populations, find themselves in a double bind. If they talk about race, they are accused of representing "special interests." Yet, "deracialized campaigns" run the risk of deflating minority turnout. One advantage of deracialized campaigns is that they encourage the media to police "race baiting" campaign tactics, such as the use of racial code words or more explicit messages used to frighten white voters away from voting for minority candidates. A good example of "race baiting" is the North Carolina senatorial race of 1984. Jesse Helms ran a misleading ad (titled "Hands") which showed white hands crumpling a job rejection letter while the voice-over said, "You needed that job, and you were the best qualified. But they had to give it to a minority because of a racial quota. Is that fair? Harvey Gantt says it is." Gantt did not support quotas.

Deracialized campaigns can also provoke accusations that the candidate is "inauthentic." For example, when Henry Bonilla ran for the House of Representatives seat in San Antonio in 1992, newspaper coverage focused on another politician's accusation that he was a "coconut" (brown on the outside but white on the inside) and criticized Bonilla for not speaking for the Hispanic community.

The media can still talk about race even if the candidate does not. Tom Bradley tried to downplay race issues in the 1982 California gubernatorial race, but the media made frequent references to his race, his popularity with black voters, and suggested that whites might not be willing to vote for him. Running a deracialized campaign worked for Doug Wilder (he won the gubernatorial race in Virginia in 1989) but not for Andrew Young (he lost the gubernatorial race in Georgia in 1990).

Although not the first black to run for president, Jesse Jackson's campaigns in 1984 and 1988 held the greatest symbolic victories. For a time, he was the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination, receiving extensive media attention (a situation that provoked accusations of "special treatment"). He was characterized in much of the coverage as a novelty, an outsider, a spoiler, and a negative role model (based on his calling New York City "Hymietown" and a photograph of him embracing Louis Farrakhan). Jackson's efforts dramatically increased black voter registration and voting and provided campaign experience for many black activists. Although his attempt to build a "Rainbow Coalition" saw limited success, his speeches at the Democratic National Conventions inspired Democrats of all races (as Barbara Jordan's Keynote Address had at the 1976 Democratic National Convention).

The influence of race in campaigns is not limited to those involving minority candidates. Racial resentment is provoked by white candidates competing with each other. The most memorable example of using racial resentment in a modern presidential campaign occurred in 1988. The general election campaign between Republican George Bush and Democrat Michael Dukakis followed Jesse Jackson's early success in Democratic primaries and his (and black delegates') visibility at the Democratic Convention. First, Republicans exaggerated Jackson's power in a Dukakis presidency, and then they campaigned against Dukakis's support for a prisoner furlough program. Finally, the infamous "Willie Horton" ad was shown on cable networks. It was sponsored by a political action committee, but it used the same story (one linking Dukakis to a black convict's violent crimes) told by Bush on the campaign trail and by the Republican Party in fliers. Dukakis failed to directly accuse his opponent of using racist tactics or to talk about race issues or to address primarily black audiences. As a result, racial resentments were activated helping Bush win white voters and discouraging black turnout (hurting Dukakis).

Racial issues have also transformed the political party system. The Civil War resulted in black Republicans and a one-party (Democratic) South. Then economic considerations led to blacks voting for Democrats in the 1930s and 1940s. In 1948, both parties included civil rights resolutions in their platforms. Blacks split their votes between Republicans and Democrats from 1952 to 1960. Race became a critical issue in the 1964 election when Lyndon Johnson (representing the Democratic liberal wing) and Barry Goldwater (representing the Republican conservative wing) took clear and contrasting positions on civil rights. This began a secular realignment of the parties accelerated by George Wallace's campaign for presidency in 1968. The realignment resulted in Republicans having a stronghold on the white South and strongly aligning blacks with the Democratic Party.

As the Civil War demonstrated, the 1960s was not the first time race was central in party alignments, nor is it likely to be the last. As the parties now compete for the burgeoning Hispanic vote, the issue of immigration has the potential to change party platforms and coalitions.

Stephanie Greco Larson

See also Affirmative Action; Conventions, Political; Democratic Party; Fear Appeals, Use in Politics; Jordan, Barbara; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Latinos and Politics, Media; Minorities, Role in Politics; Protests, Political; Segregation; Wallace, George; Watts Riots; Willie Horton Ad

Further Readings

DeSipio, R. O., Shapiro, L., de la Garza, R. Y. (2004). Muted voices: Latinos and the 2000 elections. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Goldfield, M. (1997). The color of politics: Race and the mainsprings of American politics. New York: New Press.

Jacobson, M. F. (1999). Whiteness of a different color: European immigration and the alchemy of race. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Jhally, S., & Lewis, J. (1992). Enlightened racism: The Cosby Show*, audiences, and the myth of the American dream.* Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Kinder, D. R., & Sanders, L. M. (1996). Divided by color: Racial politics and democratic ideals. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Larson, S. G. (2006). Media & minorities: The politics of race in news and entertainment. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Lawson, S. (1997). Running for freedom: Civil rights and black politics in America since 1941. New York: McGraw-Hill.

Leighley, J. E. (2001). Strength in numbers? The political mobilization of racial and ethnic minorities. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Mayer, J. D. (2002). Running on race: Racial politics in presidential campaigns, 1960–2000. New York: Random House.

Myrdal, G. (1962). An American dilemma: The Negro problem and modern democracy. New York: Harper & Row.

Omi, M., & Winant, H. (1986). Racial formation in the United States: From the 1960s to the 1980s. New York: Routledge.

Reeves, K. (1997). Voting hopes and fears? White voters, black candidates, and racial politics in America. New York: Oxford University Press.

Sniderman, P., & Piazza, T. (1993). The scar of race. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Stimson, J. A., & Carmines, E. G. (1990). Issue evolution. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Tate, K. (1993). From protest to politics: The new black voter in American elections. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

RADIO, POLITICS AND

Politics was well suited to radio when the new broadcast medium first began to develop national audiences. The first radio station in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, KDKA, broadcast the results of the 1920 presidential elections. Warren Harding soon began using the radio for political addresses, giving his 1923 State of the Union Address on radio. Political events, such as the national party conventions of both Republicans and Democrats in 1924, were among the first major productions to attract a broad national audience.

Calvin Coolidge also made use of radio in his communications with the American people, but it was Franklin D. Roosevelt who became the pre-eminent radio communicator. FDR's fireside chats began in 1933 and continued through 1945. FDR's resonant and commanding voice offered hope and encouragement to American audiences from the dark days of economic depression through the trials and eventual triumphs of World War II.

Presidents were not the only political figures who saw the usefulness of radio in promoting political viewpoints. The "Radio Priest," Father Charles Coughlin, used radio to broadcast his own controversial message during the 1920s and 1930s. Groups such as the League of Women Voters also used the radio to disseminate programs designed to inform voters with background information, differing points of view on issues, and information on the political and voting process.

Radio also began to play an important role in the political campaign process. Herbert Hoover was particularly keen on the use of radio, and he used radio and film as major parts of his 1928 campaign. His Democratic opponent, Alfred Smith, was not as comfortable or successful in his radio performances. However, radio spending was significant in the 1928 campaign, reaching nearly 2 million dollars. Both Republicans and Democrats made substantial use of radio campaigns from that time on, developing the strategy in 1932 of using short "spot" announcements.

Radio was an important political medium outside of political campaigns, of course. In World War I, radio had been available but in use only for military purposes. In World War II, however, the radio medium became a universal information source providing news and progress reports around the world. Particularly significant were Edward R. Murrow's effective reports from London. Radio also evolved during this time into a powerful propaganda tool for governments on both sides of the conflict. There is considerable historical evidence of the successful use of radio by Germany's Adolf Hitler and Italy's Benito Mussolini.

In the immediate postwar years, radio continued to be an important information source in politics. For instance, in 1948, Harry Truman began to record press conferences. In the latter half of the 20th century, television supplanted radio as a major form of political information, but radio maintained a large audience by developing all-news formats and innovative programming that provided additional avenues of being heard in the political process. Particularly strong political voices have developed in the talk radio format where call-in formats have thrived by giving ordinary citizens a chance to voice their political views and to interact with radio commentators such as Rush Limbaugh, Oliver North, Gordon Liddy, and others.

Presidents today continue radio addresses to the nation, sometimes on the occasion of national holidays or to commemorate special events. Reagan used them extensively, giving more than 300 addresses during his White House occupancy. Clinton also used radio addresses frequently, and George W. Bush uses the radio for regular policy addresses.

Radio continues to play a vital role in local and regional politics in the United States. While television unquestionably dominates national and statewide elections, radio remains a crucial medium for local and regional elections. Thousands of candidates use radio advertising to reach their potential voters. Even at the presidential level, radio advertising continues to prove effective in political races because it provides much greater opportunities for targeting more specialized audiences with specialized messages. Radio news operations in these venues also cover local campaigns more closely than television.

Radio also serves an important link between the free world and many oppressed and less free societies. Throughout the Cold War, Radio Free Europe and Voice of America provided messages of hope and freedom throughout the world and continue that mission today. In many less-developed countries, radio is still the most pervasive and available form of mass communication and is used extensively for dissemination of political information.

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Fireside Chats; Political Advertising, Radio; Radio Addresses; Radio Free Europe; Voice of America

Further Readings

Becker, S. L. (1961). Presidential power: The influence of broadcasting. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 47, 10–18.

Braden, W. W., & Brandenburg, E. (1955). Roosevelt's Fireside Chats. Speech Monographs, 22, 290–302.

Browne, D. R. (1982). International radio broadcasting: The limits of the limitless medium. New York: Praeger.

Chester, E. W. (1969). Radio, television, and American politics. New York: Sheed & Ward.

Cornwell, E. E. (1965). Presidential leadership of public opinion. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Hiebert, R. E., & Gibbons, S. J. (2000). Exploring mass media for a changing mind. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Hollander, B. A. (1999). Political talk radio in the '90s: A panel study. Journal of Radio Studies, 6, 236–245.

Kernell, S. (1997). Going public: New strategies of presidential leadership. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly.

Overby, M. L., & Barth, J. (2006). Radio advertising in American political campaigns. American Politics Research, 34, 451–478.

Radio Addresses

Radio addresses were a primary way for politicians to communicate with citizens and voters prior to the advent of television, yet presidential radio addresses continue into the 21st century. With other technologies available today for presidents and political leaders to communicate, there are a number of reasons why radio addresses continue. First, as they are typically unedited, radio addresses offer the opportunity for elected officials to communicate directly to the public. Second, radio addresses are preferred by politicians who do not feel they are treated fairly by the news media and are often used by presidents who feel they or their policies are not supported by other mass media. Third, contemporary presidential radio addresses have typically been given on Saturdays and therefore shape the news agenda for weekend coverage of the White House.

Presidential radio addresses are most often associated with President Franklin D. Roosevelt's "fireside chats." FDR is considered to be the first president to use broadcast communication for political purposes to speak directly to citizens. Roosevelt faced considerable opposition by many newspaper publishers, so he sought out the public audience by radio and was able to control the message listeners received. Roosevelt's addresses were introduced as "fireside chats," as he pictured his listening audience as a small group sitting around a fireside. The fireside chats drew large listening audiences and were more popular than radio comedy shows or other highly rated programs. Roosevelt's informal and conversational style was successful with listeners, and radio was a medium by which Roosevelt could convey active leadership.

Roosevelt's addresses, often lasting 30 minutes and airing in the evening from the Oval Office or East Room of the White House, provided hope and comfort for listeners. They often motivated listeners as well, encouraging people to return to using banks, after nearly one third of the banks closed in the 1930s, and recycling rubber during World War II. Roosevelt's fireside chats began in March 1933 with an address about the Great Depression, followed next by one on his New Deal. He gave approximately 30 fireside chats during his presidency, with his addresses continuing through January 1945 with commentaries regarding World War II and related coal crises and loan drives.

In the late 20th and early 21st centuries, presidential radio addresses have become institutionalized as communication directly to the public. Radio addresses often focus on domestic policy, social issues, and foreign affairs and are often ceremonial to celebrate holidays (such as Labor Day or Independence Day) or achievements. Today presidential radio addresses generally run 5 minutes in length and are sometimes followed by a response from the political party opposite the president's own party. While many presidential speeches are written primarily by staff members, radio addresses are often authored, or heavily edited, by presidents themselves.

Ronald Reagan, often called the "Great Communicator," used radio addresses nearly every week while president from 1981 to 1988, giving 330 addresses while in the White House. He used them to better connect with citizens and to bypass other news media that he felt were not giving his administration fair treatment in their coverage. Reagan was also a president who grew up in the era of radio and had worked early in his career in radio. His acting background made him an engaging speaker for the public listening audience. Reagan had initially planned to offer just 10 addresses about his administration's economic policy, but he quickly followed with additional addresses that then became institutionalized within his presidency. He was known for closing each address with the words, "Until next week, thanks for listening. God bless you."

George H. W. Bush rarely gave radio addresses in his first two years in office but did so amid the events of the Persian Gulf War and through the rest of his term in office. In comparison to Ronald Reagan, George H. W. Bush focused a greater proportion of his addresses on domestic issues but considerably fewer on international affairs.

Bill Clinton, sometimes referred to as "the Great Talker," gave nearly 350 radio addresses during his two terms in office. Domestic issues were overwhelmingly the focus of Clinton's addresses, with the majority of his talks on domestic policy rather than international affairs. His radio addresses were also consistently upbeat and positive, even amid the investigation of his relationship with Monica Lewinsky and subsequent impeachment by the House of Representatives.

George W. Bush continued the routine of regular Saturday morning radio addresses into his presidency with the regularity of Reagan and Clinton and will equal or exceed both for the number of Saturday addresses given during his presidency. The Democratic Party regularly offers a short response to each Bush radio address, with a variety of politicians speaking for the party.

In the midst of new communication technologies and evolving sources of information, radio addresses continue to be used by presidents and other politicians in the 21st century, as a way to communicate directly to the public to bring issues to the national agenda so as to shape the news agenda and subsequently news coverage.

Joan L. Conners

See also Fireside Chats; Presidential Communication; Radio, Politics and; Reagan, Ronald; Roosevelt, Franklin D.

Further Readings

Sigelman, L., & Whissell, C. (2002). "The great communicator" and "the great talker" on the radio: Projecting presidential personas. Presidential Studies Quarterly, 32(1), 137–146.

Rowland, R. C., & Jones, J. M., (2002). "Until next week": The Saturday radio addresses of Ronald Reagan. Presidential Studies Quarterly, 32(1), 84–110.

Radio Free Europe

Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (RFE/RL) is a U.S. government–sponsored agency broadcasting pro-American information into Eastern and Southeastern Europe, Russia, the Caucasus, Central Asia, the Middle East, and Southwest Asia. The two closely linked broadcast services, which signed on in 1950 and 1951, have had complicated funding and reporting structures since their creation as Central Intelligence Agency (CIA)–affiliated organizations intended to effect political change through propaganda.

Following in the footsteps of the original U.S. government broadcast news service—the Voice of America (VOA)—RFE/RL is one of seven American special interest radio and television services broadcasting to millions of people around the world in their native languages. However, unlike the better-known VOA, RFE/RL has, since its inception, been less committed to impartial reporting of the news and more focused on inspiring political change among listeners.

During its more than 50 years, RFE/RL and the other government-supported "freedom radios" have come under criticism from congressional critics who argued that the need for these services passed as more of the targeted countries fell away from communism and adopted Western-style journalism. Still, the various services have retained enough supporters to maintain congressional funding and continue their mission.

The role of the CIA in initially funding RFE/RL was, for a number of years, a widely known and loosely kept secret. Many journalists working during the Cold War period later said they knew of the ties between the stations and the intelligence agency, but those links were not publicly disclosed until a 1967 New York Times story. During that time, the press appealed to Americans to financially support the Crusade for Freedom, ostensibly to fund RFE/RL, which was largely staffed by refugees of the stations' targeted nations. Once the funding structure of the radio station became public knowledge, it was reassigned to oversight by the Broadcasting Board of Governors (BBG), a government-funded agency tied to the State Department. That board maintains jurisdiction over the Voice of America and six other international stations, including Radio and Television Marti, targeted at Cuba, and Radio Sawa, broadcasting into the Middle East.

One of the most significant and controversial events in RFE/RL's history was its role in the Hungarian uprising of 1956. During the uprising, the stations broadcast appeals to citizens of Soviet-dominated Hungary, urging them to join an ill-fated rebellion, in spite of near-overwhelming evidence that the protests would be crushed. In the wake of the crackdown, many criticized RFE/RL for callously encouraging Hungarians to put themselves at risk while knowing that the efforts were doomed to fail.

Johanna Cleary

See also Voice of America

Further Readings

Cone, S. (1998–1999). Presuming a right to deceive: Radio Free Europe, Radio Liberty, the CIA, and the news media. Journalism History, 24(4), 148–156.

Urban, G. R. (1997). Radio Free Europe and the pursuit of democracy: My war within the Cold War. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Radio Political Advertising

See Political Advertising, Radio

Rather, Dan (1931–)

Dan Rather spent 24 years as anchor of CBS Evening News and was called "the hardest working man in broadcast journalism," receiving nearly every major broadcast journalism award. Born in Wharton, Texas, Rather graduated in 1953 from Sam Houston State Teachers College with a journalism degree. He taught as a journalism instructor at Sam Houston the following year. Rather also studied at the University of Houston and the South Texas School of Law.

Rather began reporting for the Associated Press in 1950 and worked for several other news organizations in Texas during the 1950s, including United Press International, KSAM and KTRH radio stations, Houston Chronicle, and KTRK and KHOU television stations in Houston.

In 1962, Rather joined CBS News as the Southwest bureau chief in Dallas. The following year, he became the chief of the Southern bureau in New Orleans. While there he covered Southern racial conflicts, the civil rights movement, and the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Rather also served as chief of CBS's bureaus in London and Saigon and as the White House correspondent during the administrations of Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard Nixon.

On March 9, 1981, Rather began as the anchor and managing editor of CBS Evening News. When 48 Hours premiered on January 19, 1988, Rather anchored and premiered for that program and continued to anchor until September of 2002. He also reported for CBS Radio and 60 Minutes. During the 1988 presidential campaign, Rather was in the limelight as a result of a controversial interview he conducted with then Vice President George H. W. Bush. In the interview, billed as a campaign profile for the 1988 primary campaign in which Bush was a candidate, Rather engaged in a contentious and, many thought, unseemly confrontation with Bush during the regular CBS evening news over Bush's possible involvement in the Iran-Contra Affair.

During the presidential election of 2000, Rather stayed on the air for 16 hours. Following the events of September 11, 2001, he reported around the clock and later reported from Ground Zero in New York. Rather also reported at times from around the world, including from several war zones. He was the first anchor to report from Belgrade in Yugoslavia during the NATO bombings.

Rather interviewed every U.S. president since Dwight D. Eisenhower and most international leaders, including Yasir Arafat, Hosni Mubarak, and Raoul Cedras. He was the first to interview President Bill Clinton following Clinton's impeachment. In February 2003, Rather had an exclusive interview with Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, which was Saddam's first with an American journalist in 12 years. Rather had also been the first to interview Saddam after the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.

Rather has authored several books, including The American Dream, I Remember, and The Camera Never Blinks. He has also written numerous newspaper and magazine articles. He has received numerous awards, including the prestigious Peabody and several Emmy Awards. In 1994, Sam Houston State University named its journalism and communication department after Rather.

Rather left the CBS Evening News anchor desk on March 9, 2005, following the "Rathergate" controversy surrounding a 60 Minutes report Rather made the previous September that questioned President George W. Bush's National Guard service. CBS eventually fired others involved in the report. Rather continued to file reports for CBS until he left the network in 2006. He later began reporting for HDNet, a high-definition cable television station.

Brian T. Kaylor

See also Bush–Rather Confrontation

Further Readings

Rather, D. (1977). The camera never blinks. New York: Morrow.

Rawlings, Jerry (1947–)

Jerry John Rawlings, who ruled Ghana between June and September 1979 and from December 1981 to January 2001, was born on June 22, 1947. He is charismatic, with a penchant for populist rhetoric and a cunning ability to identify with the masses. His analysis of deprivation and poverty pits the privileged elite against the oppressed masses. At a symbolic level, these acts demystified the office of the head of state and presented Rawlings as a leader in touch with his people by being willing to sacrifice the conveniences of office. His political rhetoric emphasizes accountability, probity, equity, social justice, and grassroots participation, portraying him as a paragon of virtue and a defender of the subaltern, even though some actions by his governments cast doubt on the extent to which these principles were upheld under his watch.

Rawlings was commissioned as a pilot officer in the Ghana Air Force in January, 1969. On May 15, 1979, he was arrested for attempting a coup which, he averred, was motivated by extensive corruption within the military government, elite privilege, and socioeconomic deprivation among the masses. On June 4, 1979, he was freed from custody by some military personnel. The operation culminated in a coup d'état, and Rawlings was appointed chairman of the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC). The AFRC ruled for 4 months, pursuing a "housecleaning exercise" to rid the country of socioeconomic ills and promote the virtues of probity and accountability among citizens. It received tremendous popular support, even though the period witnessed extreme human rights abuses against those who were seen as enemies of the "revolution." The AFRC handed over power to the democratically elected government of the People's National Party (PNP).

On December 31, 1981, Rawlings overthrew the PNP government, accusing it of violating the tenets of the revolution, and formed the Provisional National Defence Council (PNDC). Much of the PNDC era witnessed a brutal assault on political dissent and free expression, in the media and elsewhere, culminating in the incarceration, death, and disappearance of some regime opponents. The result was a "culture of silence," as citizens felt intimidated from voicing alternative views freely. The government maintained a stranglehold on the state-owned media using legal instruments, such as the Newspaper Licensing Law, to control the limited private press that existed.

In the early 1990s, the PNDC was compelled, through internal and external pressure, to initiate a transition to constitutional rule. Notwithstanding his avowed disdain for multi-partyism, Rawlings founded the National Democratic Congress (NDC) to contest democratic elections in 1992 under a new democratic constitution. He and his party won this, and the 1996, election. Political expression was more open, but the NDC used legal and extra-judicial tactics to curb expression, even in a democratic setting. The regime exploited the convenience of the archaic colonial laws of criminal libel and sedition to cow and victimize journalists. The law of sedition prohibited the publication of any material that could be discerned by the authorities as threatening to national security and public order, exciting disaffection against the government, or evoking hatred or contempt for it. Even though Section 183A of the penal code (which made it an offense to publish any material "with intent to bringing the President into hatred, ridicule or contempt") preceded the Rawlings regimes, it was conveniently and rigorously applied by the regime to mollify criticism. The government employed the power of arrest for emotional, psychological, and sometimes physical torture of journalists. To this end, it used those security agencies that were notorious for brutality (such as the Bureau of National Investigation and the military), instead of the police to effect the arrest of its staunchest critics in the media.

Government officials also employed civil libel suits to exact financial hardship on critical journalists and media outlets, through heavy fines imposed by the judiciary, with the goal of ensuring acquiescence. In addition to the use of the legal system and the coercive apparatus of the state to intimidate, harass, and abuse journalists, there were covert acts of vandalism, most certainly by agents of the government, against media personnel and organizations that were critical of the regime.

The media climate under the various Rawlings regimes cannot, however, be encapsulated by a single, static perspective. There was an unprecedented expansion in the number and variety of media outlets and viewpoints during the NDC era, due to the liberal provisions of the 1992 Constitution and the democratic opportunities that it created. Some of the private print media displayed brazen disdain, strident criticism, and uncivil discourse toward Rawlings and the government. On the airwaves, particularly private radio, there was no shortage of partisan expression, by journalists and the public at large, for and against the government and its leader. It is this shift in the nature of state–media relations that led the Commonwealth Press Union to describe the Ghanaian media, in 2001, as "remarkably one of the most unfettered and freest on the continent of Africa."

In January 2001, Rawlings handed over power to the New Patriotic Party (NPP), which had won the 2000 elections—elections he did not contest because of a constitutional limit of two terms for the presidency. Rawlings continues to be a polarizing figure in Ghanaian politics, and his influence remains very strong, even after leaving the presidency. His constant and vituperative condemnation of the NPP administration draws the wrath of the latter and its supporters while generating admiration from his followers. Rawlings' intolerance for dissent looms over his own political party, as opponents of his preferences are marginalized or compelled to quit.

Wisdom J. Tettey

See also Authoritarianism; Journalism, Political; Political Corruption; Press Freedom

Further Readings

Adedeji, J. L. (2001). The legacy of J. J. Rawlings in Ghanaian politics. African Studies Quarterly, 5(2), 2–12.

Boafo-Arthur, K. (2006). Rawlings' former presidency: A threat to democracy in Ghana? In R. Southall & H. Melber (Eds.), Legacies of power: Leadership change and former presidents in African politics (pp. 256–280). Cape Town, South Africa: HRSC Press.

Tettey, W. J. (2003). The mass media and the construction of democratic space in Ghana. In W. J. Tettey, B. J. Berman, & K. P. Puplampu (Eds.), Critical perspectives in politics and socio-economic development in Ghana (pp. 83–106). Boston: Brill.

Reagan, Nancy (1921–)

Nancy Davis Reagan, First Lady of the United States from 1981 to 1989, was her husband's protector and confidant throughout his White House years. Often criticized during her time as First Lady, she rehabilitated her public image through an antidrug campaign urging children to "Just Say No." Since leaving the White House, Reagan has been committed to preserving her beloved "Ronnie's" memory and finding a cure for Alzheimer's disease, which her husband suffered from during his final years.

Nancy and Ronald Reagan, both former actors, brought Hollywood glamour to the White House. Reagan became known for her designer gowns, lavish parties, and famous friends, such as Frank Sinatra. However, her opulent tastes were criticized by journalists, who characterized her as being out of touch with the average citizen and ignorant of the country's ongoing economic recession. For example, her purchase of $200,000 china caused controversy, even though private donations covered the costs, and her practice of keeping designer clothing "lent" to her resulted in an IRS investigation of whether she violated the Ethics in Government Act.

In an effort to improve her image, White House advisors decided Reagan needed a project that would garner positive press coverage. The result was the "Just Say No" antidrug campaign, launched in 1985. Using the media to promote her cause, Reagan appeared on numerous talk shows, hosted a documentary on drug abuse, and starred as herself on the popular television sitcom Diff'rent Strokes. Within months, "Just Say No" was a pop-culture catchphrase, and Reagan's approval ratings had improved considerably.

Reagan's closeness with her husband shaped their time in the White House. She became known for the adoring looks she would give him in public, which the media termed "the gaze." However, Reagan faced criticism for her perceived influence over her husband. She often advised him on personnel issues and was instrumental in firing White House Chief of Staff Donald Regan. In her memoirs, she acknowledged telling the president that Regan was not serving his best interests but claimed she was only offering supportive, wifely advice. Reagan also had considerable control over her husband's schedule, using input from an astrologer to determine which were good and bad days for the president. She maintained that she was protecting her husband, whose life she feared for after a 1981 assassination attempt. An incident in which she prompted her husband's response during an impromptu press conference also raised questions regarding Reagan's role in her husband's administration.

After retiring to California in 1989, Reagan focused on preserving her husband's legacy. She was active in designing the Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, California. She also orchestrated her husband's funeral in 2004, which was a major media event. That same year, Reagan began advocating for stem cell research, a potential cure for Alzheimer's disease, which her husband suffered from during his final years. Reagan plans to be buried next to her husband in Simi Valley.

Lisa M. Burns

See also First Ladies, Political Communication of; Reagan, Ronald

Further Readings

Benze, J. G. (1996). Nancy Reagan. In L. Gould (Ed.), American First Ladies: Their lives and their legacy (pp. 583–607). New York: Garland.

Reagan, Ronald (1911–2004)

Ronald Wilson Reagan was the 40th president of the United States and one of the most effective orators of the 20th century. His public speaking career lasted nearly 50 years and includes several speeches that are listed in the top 100 addresses of the 20th century by AmericanRhetoric.com.

Reagan was born in Tampico, Illinois, on February 6, 1911, and grew up in nearby Dixon. During his formative years, his did his first public speaking as a Sunday School teacher and through acting in church and school plays. At Eureka College, Reagan continued to develop his performance skills by being involved in drama. He also was one of the featured speakers during a student strike. After graduating from college, Reagan worked as a sportscaster for WOC and WHO radio in Iowa, at times broadcasting Chicago Cubs games by using descriptions and accounts from a teletype and adding his own imaginative descriptions to enable the home audience to picture the scenes.

In 1937 while covering the Cubs' spring training games, Reagan auditioned at Warner Brothers Studio and received his first contract as an actor. He went on to appear in 53 films, the two most memorable of which were Kings Row and Knute Rockne All American. After World War II, Reagan, then a liberal Democrat, became deeply disturbed by what he considered an attempt by communist organizations to take over Hollywood and began to speak out against communism and served as an informant for the FBI. In 1947, he testified as a friendly witness before the House Un-American Activities Committee, denouncing communism but also maintaining that democracy was strong enough to stand on its own without outlawing the Communist Party. It was also during this time that Reagan was elected president of the Screen Actors Guild (SAG) where he would serve seven terms. His experiences with SAG helped develop his negotiating skills which would prove to be of great benefit in future dealings with the California Assembly, the United States Congress, and the Soviet Union.

In the 1950s, Reagan's film career started to decline and he turned to television, hosting General Electric Theater from 1954 to 1962. Part of his responsibilities with GE included traveling to the corporation's numerous plants and speaking to its employees. During the 1950s, Reagan also found himself slowly moving from left to right politically, and his speeches took on a conservative political tone. He warned of the fundamental flaws and dangers of communism and the "encroaching control" of the federal government. He was convinced that each new or expanding government program resulted in a gradual erosion of personal freedom. If this trend were allowed to continue, he cautioned, our freedoms gradually would be eroded until none was left, and the nation would find itself having drifted into socialism. By 1962, Reagan had become a Republican.

It was in 1964 that Reagan gained national attention with a speech he gave on behalf of Barry Goldwater, the Republican presidential nominee. Delivered on October 27, "The Speech" was simply a repetition of what Reagan had been saying for years with adaptations to make it relevant to the Goldwater campaign. The address raised $8 million for the candidate, and Time magazine called it "the one bright spot in an otherwise dismal campaign." Reagan also taped television commercials to aid Goldwater's presidential campaign. Almost immediately supporters urged Reagan to run for office.

By 1966, he was approached by business leaders such as Holmes Tuttle, Henry Salvatori, and others, who encouraged him to run for governor of California. At first Reagan resisted, but he later agreed to travel across the state and deliver speeches for 6 months before making a decision. He received so much positive feedback from the addresses that he announced his candidacy for governor on January 4, 1966. His opponent, Edmund G. (Pat) Brown dismissed Reagan as a mere actor who had no substance. Reagan countered this charge by shortening his speeches to 10 to 15 minutes and devoting the remainder of the time to questions and answers. In so doing he showed himself to be a person of substance, gifted at argumentation and persuasion. Although he also focused on the fiscal situation in California and Brown's record as governor, the most salient issue for Reagan was the unrest at California's university campuses. His frequent assertion that students should "obey the rules or get out" resonated with many voters, and on Election Day, Reagan defeated Brown by 1 million votes.

Reagan served two terms in Sacramento and even made a brief run for the White House in 1968. As governor, the primary themes of his rhetoric continued to be tax relief, welfare reform, limited government, and what he called "the mess at Berkeley." During this time, he also debated Senator Robert F. Kennedy on the Vietnam War. Kennedy later stated that Reagan was the toughest debate opponent he had ever faced. Reagan was reelected in 1970 and returned to private life in 1975.

In 1974, Richard Nixon, in the wake of the Watergate scandal, resigned from office. A year later, his successor, Gerald R. Ford, appeared vulnerable and in November 1975, Reagan announced that he would challenge Ford for the Republican nomination. During the early days of the primary race, Reagan adhered to the "Eleventh Commandment," refusing to directly attack the incumbent. After losing several primaries and facing a campaign debt of $250,000, his associates persuaded him to go negative. Reagan sharply denounced the Ford administration in the speeches that followed. In these addresses, Reagan criticized the president for the policy of détente with Russia and for what the challenger considered a proposal to "give away" the Panama Canal. A televised speech to the nation that Reagan delivered in March 1976 had particular impact. As the campaign moved to the South and West, Reagan began winning primaries and, in the final analysis, he came within 117 delegates of upsetting Ford for the nomination.

Four years later, Reagan again ran for president, advocating limited government, tax relief, and peace through strength. The primary themes of his rhetoric were neighborhood, family, work, peace, and freedom. As Election Day approached, the race between Reagan and Jimmy Carter was too close to call. While the nation was dissatisfied with Carter's performance, it also was fearful of what a Reagan presidency might bring. Of course, the political campaign advertising format provided a natural forum for display of Reagan's television persona, and many of the campaign ads featured Reagan himself speaking head-on into the camera. Political observers, however, questioned if his communication skills would be as sharp in spontaneous, non-rehearsed formats. Reagan essentially put these fears to rest in his televised debate with Carter. A scholarly analysis of the encounter revealed that Reagan won the debate not only on style but on substance, by outscoring his opponent in the areas of fully answering questions, substantiating his claims, and skillfully refuting the incumbent's arguments. On November 4, he won by an electoral landslide. His inaugural address ranks 30th on the list of greatest speeches of the 20th century.

As president, Ronald Reagan proved himself to be a skilled rhetor in both domestic and foreign policy. His rhetoric persuaded Congress to enact his economic package and even gained the support of several Democratic legislators. Over time, he proved less successful in garnering support for domestic spending cuts, however, and massive budget deficits resulted. Nevertheless, Reagan largely has been credited with making conservatism a dominant political ideology in the United States.

In his 1984 reelection campaign, Reagan took full advantage of the communication tools and strategies of an incumbent. The high-quality production of his television commercials is still a model for professional and skilled presentation, presenting an America with a bright and shining future. A series of these ads, dubbed the "Morning in America" spots, credit Reagan with bringing back an America full of prosperity, hope, and optimism. He also performed well in a series of debates with his Democratic challenger Walter Mondale, laying to rest fears that he was too old to carry out the responsibilities of being president. In one famous retort during a question about whether his age was limiting his capabilities, Reagan good-naturedly denied the charge and then drew widespread crowd approval by turning the tables with the magnanimous comment that he would not hold the youth and inexperience of his opponent against him.

In the area of foreign policy, Reagan began his presidency by sharply criticizing the Soviet Union and pushing for a military buildup. In an early press conference he suggested that the Soviets would "lie, cheat," or "commit any crime" to further their agenda. On March 8, 1983, he denounced the Soviet Union as an "evil empire" and "the focus of evil in the modern world." Less than 3 weeks later, in another televised address, Reagan revealed his plan to build a missile defense initiative known as the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI). By 1984, however, Reagan became more conciliatory in his remarks about the Soviet Union.

When Mikhail Gorbachev came to power in 1985, Reagan recognized that the new premier was a different kind of Russian leader and pushed for summitry. The two leaders met first in Geneva and then in Reykjavik to discuss nuclear arms reduction. Although the latter summit ended without an agreement due to differences over the future of SDI, the two men would meet in Washington a year later to sign a treaty that eliminated an entire class of nuclear weapons. On June 12, 1987, Reagan stood at the Brandenburg Gate and called upon Gorbachev to "tear down this wall." Both the State Department and the National Security Council objected to this line and attempted to excise it from the address. Reagan, however, insisted that the line remain in the speech. A year later, Reagan delivered an address at Moscow State University, which was an attempt at identification with the Soviet Union. It is regarded by some as Reagan's finest rhetorical hour. During the Moscow visit, he stated that he no longer considered the Soviet Union an "evil empire." Careful analysis of Reagan's Soviet rhetoric reveals both a principled anticommunist conservative and a pragmatist who adjusted to changing times, leaders, and contexts.

Reagan also was a gifted ceremonial speaker, as evidenced by his speeches commemorating the 40th anniversary of D-Day, his farewell speech, and his address to the nation after the Challenger exploded on January 28, 1986. The Challenger speech accomplished a twofold purpose of calming the nation as it mourned the loss of the seven astronauts and protecting the space program. It is ranked eighth on the list of greatest speeches of the 20th century.

After leaving the White House in 1989, Reagan continued to speak on what he called the "mashed potato circuit," promoting conservative policies such as the line-item veto and a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced federal budget, but also issuing an implied warning against the excesses of conservatism. This clearly can be seen in his 1992 address to the Republican National Convention, in which he implied that some government intervention was necessary and embraced an inclusive vision of who was part of the American family in stark contrast to Patrick J. Buchanan's call for a "cultural war."

An assessment of Ronald Reagan's rhetorical legacy reveals several qualities. Conventional wisdom attributes his success largely to performance and acting ability. Scholars have long noted Reagan's skillful use of narrative, whether in the form of humorous anecdotes, stories of excessive government and welfare abuse, or his larger narrative of America as a "Shining City on a Hill." Others emphasize his use of apocalyptic discourse, commonplaces, definition and redefinition, myth and ideological/value appeals. In the years since his death in 2004, a group of scholars and writers have uncovered evidence that Reagan played a significant role in the creation of his own rhetoric. Prior to becoming president, there is evidence to suggest that Reagan wrote his own speeches. Archival materials also suggest that as president, Reagan was an involved editor of speech drafts, especially during his first term in office. This lends support to the argument that Reagan's rhetorical success was at least as due to ideology as to performance or rhetorical strategy.

John Jones

See also Reagan, Nancy

Further Readings

Ritter, K. (1992). Ronald Reagan: The great communicator. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
Stuckey, M. (1989). Getting into the game: The pre-presidential rhetoric of Ronald Reagan. Westport, CT: Praeger.
Stuckey, M. (1990). Playing the game: The presidential rhetoric of Ronald Reagan. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC

In Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC the Supreme Court upheld in 1969 the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) fairness doctrine, which provided that stations should allow a person criticized on the station an opportunity to respond to the criticism.

The Red Lion case had its origins when author Fred J. Cook criticized presidential candidate Barry Goldwater in his book. A Pennsylvania radio station operated by Red Lion Broadcasting Co. ran a 15-minute broadcast by Rev. Billy James Hargis criticizing Cook and claiming he had been fired from a newspaper for false charges against city officials and that he worked with a communist publication where he had attacked J. Edgar Hoover and the CIA. The Reverend said that Cook had now written a book smearing Goldwater.

When Cook heard of the broadcast, he demanded free reply time to address the attack. The broadcast station refused to allow Cook to reply to the allegations. On appeal the FCC declared that the station should give Cook an opportunity to reply to allegations against him. The Court of Appeals for D.C. upheld the FCC decision. On appeal the Supreme Court upheld the lower court's decision, holding that FCC had the authority to regulate the electronic media and that the fairness doctrine was both "authorized by statute and constitutional."

The court held that because of the scarcity of radio frequencies there was no First Amendment right for all citizens to own a radio license. However, the court said, there was also no First Amendment right for licensees to monopolize the airwaves. Thus, the government had the authority to require a licensee to share his station with the public since the right of viewers and listeners was paramount and not the right of broadcasters. Under certain circumstances, the court held, a licensee had to provide reasonable broadcasting time for persons with a view different from that expressed on his or her station. The court found that it was consistent with the First Amendment goal of "producing an informed public capable of conducting its own affairs" to allow persons attacked on stations to respond publicly on the station.

Changes to the Communications Act of 1934 and subsequent interpretations of the FCC have essentially repealed the Fairness Doctrine and its corollary personal attack provisions.

Roxanne Watson

See also Communications Act of 1934; Fairness Doctrine

Further Readings

Red Lion Broadcasting Co., Inc. et al. v. Federal Communications Commission, 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

Reedy, George

See Press Secretary, White House

Reeves, Rosser

See Eisenhower, Dwight D.

Referendum

See Ballot Initiatives

Reform Party

The Reform Party of the United States of America is a relatively recent political party founded by Ross Perot in 1995 based on his belief that Americans were disappointed with the state of politics and the corruptness of the two-party system. He wanted to offer an alternative to the Democratic and Republican Parties because he felt they were not sufficiently confronting vital U.S. issues such as the federal deficit and term limits. Perot's creation of the Reform Party began after he ran for the presidency in the 1992 elections as an Independent and became the first non-major party candidate since 1912 to have been considered viable enough to win the presidency, earning 18.9% of the popular vote. Though he was less successful in the 1996 elections and his dispute with Dick Lamm over the party's presidential nominee caused a split within the party, his financial and emotional support from the party spurred one of the most successful third parties in U.S. history.

Initially, Perot's Reform Party gained ballot access in all 50 states. The party's controversy, however, over who should be the presidential nominee for the 2000 elections and the Federal Election Committee (FEC) investigation resulting from accusations of ballot fraud affected its original positive image. Pat Buchanan was ultimately recognized by the FEC as the official presidential candidate in 2000, but the investigations and underground dealings that surfaced during his reign alienated over 90% of the Reform Party's supporters. The misspending of large amounts of money caused most states to remove the party from their ballots. By the October 2003 National Convention, the Reform Party had only started rebuilding after interference from Buchanan's brigade, but several former state organizations had already elected to rejoin. They increased their membership from 24 to 30 states and managed to regain ballot access in seven states.

Despite ongoing disputes on the national level between founders and extremists, several Reform Party state parties have been actively running candidates across the country. In the past, the Reform Party has run candidates for various offices and seats, including president, Senate, House of Representatives, state house, county commissions, and city councils. The most notable of these candidates include Ross Perot, Pat Buchanan, and Ralph Nader, all of whom ran for the presidency in consecutive elections. In 1998, the Reform Party gained ground when Jesse Ventura was elected governor of Minnesota, the highest office win to date for the Reform Party. Since then, the party has consistently appeared on ballots in many other states with active Reform Party organizations petitioning to regain ballot access in their states.

In 2006, the Reform Party ran candidates in several states, including Arizona, California, and Mississippi. The Reform Party of Kansas nominated a slate of candidates led by Iraq War veteran Richard Ranzau. In Colorado, a former assistant Environmental Protection Agency administrator and Navy veteran, Eric Eidsness, ran on the Reform Party ticket in Colorado's fourth congressional district and received 11.28% of the vote. The Florida Reform Party sponsored Max Linn of Florida Citizens for Term Limits (a traditionally Republican organization) in the 2006 Florida gubernatorial election. Linn was supported by a campaign staff with connections to the Perot and Ventura campaigns but received only 1.9% of the vote. Most recently, Daniel Imperato has pursued the Reform Party nomination in the 2008 presidential elections.

Hilary Noriega and Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Buchanan, Patrick; Perot, Ross

Further Readings

Binning, W. C., Esterly, L. E., & Sracic, P. A. (1999). Encyclopedia of American parties, campaigns and elections. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Jelen, T. G. (2001). Ross for boss: The Perot phenomenon and beyond. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Religion in Politics

Religion and politics in the United States are tied inextricably to one another, a tandem that is manifest in several key ways. From the efforts of religious special interest groups to influence public policy to candidates' goals of appealing to a large portion of the populace, religious faith is both a desired end as well as a tool used by eager politicians. Religion has recently been recognized as a necessary component of American political platforms. In comparison to the world's other industrialized nations, the United States is a rather religious country, and this characteristic is evident in several modern political and journalistic trends.

Regardless of the Establishment Clause in the First Amendment to the Constitution—ensuring the populace that the federal government shall make no law establishing a state religion—politics and faith have long exerted shared force in American government. Many Americans might be surprised by the fact that the words "separation of church and state" are not found in the Constitution but were instead penned by Thomas Jefferson in an 1802 missive demanding that the federal government not in any way establish a specific religion for the citizenry. Perhaps contrary to Jefferson's insistence, to this day religion helps direct the course of political outcomes in the United States, on matters of public health to tenets of foreign policy.

President Reagan addresses the annual convention of the National Association of Evangelicals ("Evil Empire" speech) in Orlando, Florida, March 8, 1983. The National Association of Evangelicals represents millions of evangelical Christians in the United States.

Source: Courtesy Ronald Reagan Library.

Religion in the Modern Political Age

Historically, religion has been noticeably visible in national politics. Not long after the United States was founded, President John Adams remarked that "our constitution was made only for a religious and moral people. It is wholly inadequate for the government of any other." Every American president has openly identified himself as either Protestant or Roman Catholic.

Perhaps for this reason, past American leaders have tended to view large-scale challenges to the United States as quasi-religious struggles of good versus evil. For Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration, the German and Japanese dictatorships were the evil opposition to a righteous way of life in the West. In the 1960s, President Lyndon Johnson considered the existence and proliferation of communism in Southeast Asia inherently evil. Later in the Cold War, Ronald Reagan went so far as to call the Soviet Union an "evil empire" and regularly made mordant remarks about the secular nature of his communist foes. Similarly, George W. Bush markets his Bush doctrine and war against terrorism as a fundamental bout of good versus evil.

Religious influences on politics have become even more salient in recent decades. In the late 1970s, American journalists began recognizing religion's potential to influence politics on the grand scale, including Supreme Court rulings, congressional initiatives, and presidential executive orders. During this time Jimmy Carter, a self-proclaimed evangelical Christian, occupied the Oval Office. Carter did not conceal the fact that his religious upbringing in Plains, Georgia, influenced his stances toward issues such as nuclear nonproliferation and abortion.

Reagan was a leader who frequently made religious references in his speeches, famously remarking that felled astronauts in the Challenger disaster of 1986 had "slipped the surly bonds of earth to touch the face of God." During Reagan's two terms, the "religious right" became a popular descriptor among political scientists studying the forces behind the actor's electoral victories.

Few if any political leaders in the United States, however, particularly in the modern age, have been more openly religious than George W. Bush has. During his first run for the White House in 2000, Bush was asked by a journalist to name a hero in his life, to which he responded "Jesus Christ." The remark made many headlines across the country and the then-governor of Texas was ridiculed on more than a few op-ed pages in daily newspapers. The public did not ultimately seem to be bothered, however, and other politicians vying for high office seemingly took notice of the relationship between faith and victory at the polls.

In the summer of 2006, President Bush made headlines the world over when he delivered a presidential veto rejecting a federal bill subsidizing embryonic stem-cell research. At first glance the decision may not appear too controversial; American presidents frequently veto bills when they feel the Congress is misguided. By year two of their second terms, for example, presidents Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton had vetoed dozens of bills. Bush's decision, however, was the first veto of his presidency.

The doomed fate of the stem-cell bill demonstrates the mighty role that religion plays in American politics. Despite having broad bipartisan support in both houses of Congress, the bill never made it past Bush's desk, due largely to conservative religious groups that were able to assure the president of the bill's reprehensible nature. In an article titled "When the Majority Doesn't Rule," the St. Petersburg Times reported on the president's proscription, as well as the disproportionate influence occasionally exerted by religious groups in the American political system.

Herein lays a remarkable facet of religion in American politics. While many observers believe that the United States is a relatively religious nation, which it is, they may also assume that a religious majority is necessary to force political change, which it is not.

The American Jewish community serves as a good example of the power of religious minorities to mobilize voters and special interest groups and to affect the national political climate. While American Jews comprise less than 3% of the voting-age population in the United States, they represent nearly 5% of the total vote in presidential elections. For this reason, Jews in the United States usually receive a generous hearing from American presidents—presidents who closely listen and usually respond with auspicious directives toward Israel.

Another good example of religion's role in voter mobilization involves the issue of gay marriage. Even in the perhaps less religious strongholds of Washington and California, religious conservatives have succeeded in energizing the public in voting down decisions that would have legalized same-sex marriage. In Washington, where State Supreme Court justices are elected to the bench, the high court voted 5–4 in 2006 to recognize state marriage contracts only between one man and one woman. Many Washington-based religious groups as well as other organizations from around the country hailed the decision as a political victory.

These are just a few examples of ways religion affects American political initiatives, something that has become slightly more conspicuous in the modern political scene, especially with the emergence of "values voters"—a large demographic of Americans attracted to the moral fiber and religiosity of political candidates. Prior to the midterm elections of 2006, politicians often used religious rhetoric in their public talks, and candidates on both the left and right ends of the political continuum were increasingly and deliberately invoking the Judeo-Christian God in their public dialogue.

The reason for this is that American politicians have recognized the necessity of pious faith in winning high political office. It is now common for politicians on both the local and national level to pay homage to religion and family values in speeches, pamphlets, or on candidate Web sites. During the 2004 presidential contest, challenger John Kerry hired advisors to focus on projecting his image as a devout Catholic and man of traditional American values. Political speeches to religious congregations have become arguably as important and strategic as other traditional venues.

Politicians try to avoid, however, appearing sanctimonious in their rhetoric, lest the public view them as insincere or self-righteous. Furthermore, public figures must be careful not to use religious diction in the wrong situations, or they render themselves vulnerable to widespread criticism. Following Hurricane Katrina in the summer of 2005, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin alluded to a divine rage that possibly precipitated the disaster that destroyed much of his city. National media outlets all but eviscerated the mayor, who subsequently apologized for his insinuation. So, while modern political candidates may recognize the utility of religious fervor in their speeches, they also must strike a balance of faith in their appeals to voters.

Communicating Religion in Politics

There exists an old adage admonishing socialites never to discuss politics or religion in polite settings because of the often inflammatory nature of these topics. Perhaps partly for this reason, for a time journalists avoided covering religion consistently. Also, for many journalists, religion reporting was not the most desirable of beats, and many writers and broadcasters struck into the journalistic field intending to write in other arenas.

Prior to the 1980s, American media practitioners did not seemingly emphasize religious news content. In recent years, however, religion has maintained a constant presence in American journalism, so much so that the majority of daily newspapers in the United States have at least one reporter devoted solely to covering contemporary religious issues. Based on the more visible nature of religion in American politics in recent years, such reportage frequently comes from the political realm. For instance, in covering the potential inclusion in public school curricula of intelligent design, which challenges Darwinian evolution, news coverage often focuses on political controversy surrounding the dockets of education boards across the country in places such as Kansas, Ohio, or Pennsylvania.

For some time American media consumers desired more news coverage of religious issues, something that editors and producers seemingly picked up on. America is one of the most religious nations in the world, especially when considering the religiosity of other first-world nations. Roughly 85% of Americans identify themselves as followers of the Christian faith—one possible reason Americans desired greater news coverage of religious topics.

In the past 5 years mass media have increasingly covered national religious issues. It is now not at all uncommon for national newspapers to cover religion in stories above the fold or for weekly newsmagazines to devote their covers to articles on contemporary religious debates. To list only a few, the debates surrounding intelligent design versus evolution in American public schools, abortion, and purported secular propriety of the Pledge of Allegiance are common issues in media outlets across the country.

Reporting on such issues—especially religious issues with political implications—is rarely easy, and American media are incessantly criticized for their coverage of such sensitive material. Media consumers who are acutely interested in a particular topic will usually express discontentment with that topic's coverage in news at one point or another. This tendency is often multiplied with hypersensitive issues such as religious faith. Some media critics chastise mainstream news practitioners in their coverage of religion, citing endemic inaccuracies and sloppy contextualization. This criticism, however, is not unilateral. Secular organizations such as the ACLU and Americans United for the Separation of Church and State occasionally criticize mass media practitioners for offering what they feel is undue credence to religious movements and ideals in news content.

In most cases where it exists, poor coverage of contemporary religion is not necessarily deliberate. American journalists at elite media outlets, by their open admission, do not engage in religious practices as much as the average layperson. Media researchers in the 1980s found that more than half of a large sample of elite media practitioners in the United States expressed few or no religious beliefs. Such research was later called into question by other media scholars and some media advocacy groups, but such findings still serve as evidence that American journalists perhaps do not share a religious worldview similar to many members of their audience.

This has led pundits and media critics, such as Ann Coulter and Bernard Goldberg, to vehemently criticize media for what they consider inaccurate and unfair characterizations of religion and religious conservatives. For its part, the public takes great interest in such critiques; Coulter's books Slander and Godless and Goldberg's Bias were runaway best-sellers in the United States. Such muckraking helps foster an us-versus-them mentality in the mindset of many media consumers, whereby public mistrust of many journalists is bolstered.

Conclusion

Whatever the true ideological nature of religious/political content in American media outlets, such increased coverage in the news generates passionate responses from the general reader/viewer and political pundits alike. Because of this, journalists and editors have recognized in recent years that covering religious trends has the capacity to stir and rivet news consumers in strong ways. Many political candidates, too, now realize that communicating religion to the masses can aid in success, in this case not in selling newspapers or advertisements, but in culling support at the polls.

Justin D. Martin

Further Readings

Allison, W. (2006, August 14). When the majority doesn't rule. St. Petersburg Times, p. 1.

Coulter, A. (2002). Slander: Liberal lies about the American right. New York: Crown.

Coulter, A. (2006). Godless: The church of liberalism. New York: Crown Forum.

Engstrom, E., & Semic, B. (2003). Portrayal of religion in reality TV programming: Hegemony and the contemporary American wedding. Journal of Media & Religion, 2(3), 145–163.

Goldberg, B. (2003). Bias: A CBS insider exposes how the media distort the news. Washington, DC: Regnery.

Goldberg, B. (2004). Arrogance: Rescuing America from the media elite. New York: Warner Books.

Hoover, S. M. (1993). Who reads religion news? Nieman Reports, 47(2), 42.

Huntington, S. R. (2004, June 16). Under God. The Wall Street Journal.

Keeler, J. D., Tarpley, J. D., & Smith, M. R. (1990). The National Courier, news, and religious ideology. In W. D. Sloan (Ed.). Media and religion in American history. Northport, AL: Vision Press.

Lichter, R., Rothman, S., & Lichter, L. (1986). The media elite. Bethesda, MD: Adler & Adler.

MacDonald, G. J. (2006, August 12). Muzzled anger: In the mix of religion, politics and the press, God can be most anything but divinely vengeful. Winston Salem Journal, p. 1.

Moses, P. (1993). Reporting religion: Holiness in the ordinary. America, 168(15), 12–16.

Silk, M. (1995). Unsecular media: Making news of religion in America. Chicago: University of Illinois Press.

Stout, D. A., & Buddenbaum, J. M. (2002). Genealogy of an emerging field: Foundations for the study of media and religion. Journal of Media & Religion, 1, 5–13.

Terry, J. (2006). U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East: The role of lobbies and special interest groups. London: Pluto Press.

Weaver, D., & Wilhoit, G. C. (1996). The American journalist in the 1990s. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Religious Right

See Religion in Politics

Reporters Without Borders

Reporters Without Borders (RWB), also called Reporters sans frontières in French and Reporteros sin fronteras in Spanish, is a world organization officially recognized as serving public interest. The official Web site www.rsf.org lists the slogan "Defending press freedom . . . every day," capturing the basic essence of RWB.

The RWB Web site reports that more than a third of the world's population lives in countries with no press freedom, and hence RWB works constantly to restore the right to be informed among these countries' citizens. Its Web site quotes statistics about crimes perpetrated around the world against media professionals, who often spend years in jail just for using the "wrong" word or photo. RWB conceives of such imprisonment or murder of a journalist as akin to eliminating a key witness and as a threat to everyone's right to information.

RWB, with its team of over 100 professionals, keeps constant watch and condemns any attack on press freedom worldwide by keeping the media and public opinion informed through press releases and public-awareness campaigns. It also defends journalists and other media contributors who have been imprisoned or persecuted for doing their job and protests against the abuse and torture being meted out to media professionals in nations around the world. It not only provides support to journalists threatened in their own countries but also provides financial and non-financial support to their families. RWB also wages a battle worldwide — to reduce the use of censorship, oppose laws restricting press freedom, and improve the safety of journalists around the world, especially those stationed in war zones. Among RWB's other objectives is its commitment to rebuild media groups and provide financial and material support to news staff facing different hardships in their jobs.

Damocles Network, RWB's judicial arm, created in January 2002, works to ensure that criminals murdering/ torturing journalists are brought to trial. It also provides legal services to victims representing them in competent national and international courts to ensure enforcement of proper judicial procedures.

RWB's Web site maintains a regularly updated tally of attacks being inflicted on press freedom worldwide, serving like a press-freedom news agency providing Internet users with opportunities to demand the release of jailed journalists by signing petitions online. To battle censorship, articles banned in their country of origin are also published online. Among RWB's other contributions are its two annual publications, the Worldwide Report on Press Freedom and the Country Index of Press Freedom, measuring the extent of freedom that journalists and media possess—being published on World Press Freedom Day every year.

RWB, however, has not escaped critics' scrutiny. One major criticism raised against it is that it receives 19% of its funding from the Western world, raising questions about the extent of possible bias in its reporting. The methodology used by RWB to rank press freedom has also been criticized in the past.

RWB's operations are spread out over five continents through its national branches. The organization also has close cooperation with local and regional press freedom organizations around the world.

Sumana Chattopadhyay

See also Censorship, Political; Press Freedom

Further Readings

Reporters Without Borders. (2003). The Internet under surveillance—Obstacles to the free flow of information online. Retrieved August 1, 2006, from http://freebies.weburb.org/newsservice/link/3053/http://www.rsf.org/IMG/pdf/doc-2236.pdf

Republican National Committee

The Republican National Committee (RNC) is the organization that oversees political activities for the Republican Party, including (a) organizing the party's national convention, (b) developing its political platform, (c) coordinating campaign strategies, and (d) fundraising.

Each political area (states, U.S. possessions, District of Columbia) has a minimum of two representatives (one man, one woman). Some states qualify for additional members, based on previous election, by having (a) a Republican governor, (b) a majority in the state's congressional delegation, or (c) a Republican majority in the presidential election.

The RNC was founded in 1856 (2 years after the organization of the modern Republican Party) to aid in the, albeit unsuccessful, campaign of John C. Fremont, its first presidential nominee. Chairs for the RNC, elected by the members for 2-year terms, are usually recognized by media as party spokespersons. Chairs have included George W. Bush's 2004 campaign chairman Ken Mehlman (elected in 2005), former Senator Robert "Bob" Dole (1971 to 1973), future President George H. W. Bush (1973 to 1974), noted campaign consultant Lee Atwater (1989 to 1991), and future Mississippi Governor Haley Barbour (1993 to 1997).

The committee was originally composed of one person from each state. After the 1924 passage of the 19th Amendment, which provided voting rights to women, the rules were changed to one man and one woman from each area. The rules were changed again in 1952 to add membership rewards for electoral success.

The RNC also oversees activities of the Republican state committees and coordinates activities with its two national legislative committees—the National Republican Senatorial Committee and the National Republican Congressional Committee. The state committees are organized around counties, similar to the structure of the national party.

The two legislative committees support Republican candidates for the House and the Senate. The National Republican Congressional Committee, organized in 1866, works for candidates to the House of Representatives. The senate committee was organized in 1916 following the ratification of the 17th Amendment, which provided the first direct election of senators. Its original name was the "Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee"; that was changed to its present title in 1948.

The RNC's activities focus heavily on fundraising, turnout, and message development. Funds are used for both direct financial contributions to candidates and indirect assistance. Funds for indirect assistance—including organization, voter registration, turnout, research, and consultant fees—can be provided by the committee without being subject to the same contribution limits as those imposed on federal candidates (aka "soft money").

The committee also organizes 527 groups, named after a section of the Internal Revenue Code that allows political groups to circumvent federal donation limits that apply to the party committees. The 527 groups cannot advocate the election or defeat of any candidate but can engage in issue advertising that favors the party. Federal law prohibits such groups from coordinating their campaigns with candidates or party committees, but many of the people involved have ties to the party committee.

The RNC headquarters is at 310 First Street, SE, Washington, DC 20003.

Larry Powell

Further Readings

Edsall, T. B. (1997). The cultural revolution of 1994: Newt Gingrich, the Republican Party, and the third great awakening. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House.

Phillips, K. P. (1969). The emerging Republican majority. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington House.
Pomper, G. M. (Ed.). (1981). Party renewal in the national Republican Party. New York: Praeger.

Republican Party

Founded in 1854 in opposition to slavery expansion, the Republican Party is one of two major political parties in the United States. In the modern era, the Republican Party (aka G.O.P. or "Grand Old Party") has been viewed publicly as being in support of a philosophy of limited government, libertarian economics, and social conservatism. In conjunction with the demise of the Democratic Party's New Deal Coalition, the Republican Party benefited from a national partisan realignment during the last quarter of the 20th century and, from 1968 to 2004, won 7 of 10 presidential elections. Though traditionally critical of the media's alleged "liberal bias," Republicans have successfully used mass communications outlets to foment the party's appeal, largely on the basis of patriotism and family values.

The Republican Party's first successful presidential candidate was Abraham Lincoln, who was elected in 1860, despite not having been on the ballot in most Southern states. In the aftermath of the Civil War and Reconstruction, the American South became known as the "Solid South" for its unified opposition to the Republican Party. Nonetheless, Republicans enjoyed great success at the national level throughout the 20th century, though for much of that time it was perceived as a friend of big business and the wealthy at the expense of the working class and poor.

While Democrats such as President Franklin D. Roosevelt pioneered the use of radio as a political tool, Republicans, beginning in the 1950s, took the lead with television. In 1952, Republican presidential candidate Dwight Eisenhower was the first to use television commercials in his campaign. During that same campaign, vice-presidential candidate Richard Nixon, in his famed "Checkers Speech," became one of the first politicians to appeal directly to the public through television.

The careers and aspirations of Republicans such as Joseph McCarthy in 1954, Barry Goldwater in 1964, and Nixon during the Watergate scandal were adversely affected by negative media coverage and fostered, in some Republican circles, an adversarial relationship with the media. Nonetheless, Republicans such as Ronald Reagan effectively used the media to emote patriotism, hope, and optimism during much of the 1980s while, at the same time, broadening the party's appeal to include libertarians, evangelicals, social conservatives, anticommunists, urban Catholics, disaffected labor, and white Southerners.

In 1994, the Republican Party swept midterm elections and took control of both houses of Congress for the first time since 1952. Many political pundits credited the influence of conservative radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh for that surge in Republican electoral success. During coverage of the 2000 presidential campaign, network news entities began to distinguish the Republican Party from the Democratic Party through a color-coded system in which red represented Republican and blue represented Democrat. The terms red state and blue state have come to connote dichotomies between broadly defined conservative and liberal philosophies and have entered the American lexicon as identifying statements of political values.

Sean P. Cunningham

See also Conservative, Conservatism; Democratic Party; Eisenhower, Dwight D.; Goldwater, Barry; Limbaugh, Rush; Nixon, Richard M.; Reagan, Ronald

Further Readings

Black, E., & Black, M., (2002). The rise of southern Republicans. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
Gould, L. (2003). Grand Old Party: A history of the Republicans. New York: Random House.

Reputation in Politics

Reputation designates the respect enjoyed by a person, organization, institution, or, more generally, an individual or collective subject among relevant reference groups in the mid or long term. An agent's reputation gains in social importance to the degree that prestigious information diffuses beyond the sphere of his or her immediate group of acquaintances. This diffusion process takes place either via oral propaganda or—and much more effectively—via the medium of public communications. Because this implies that reputation is strongly linked to public celebrity, it is simultaneously evident that the mass media play a central role in the process of creating reputation. Indeed, in the political sphere, the importance of the mass media as creators of reputation has increased massively in recent decades. Thus stakeholders perceive political and government agents to an increasingly exclusive degree via the leading opinion-forming media. At the same time, the reputation bearers concentrate their public relations ever more strongly on the media arena, whereas other communications media, such as political advertising, tend to lose significance.

In modern societies, the creation of a good (or bad) reputation follows a logic from which two elementary types of reputation are derived. First, the actions of a reputation bearer are measured on the basis of objectives specified by the function systems of politics, business, journalism, science, and so on. Politicians gain a reputation when they prove to be effective in making political decisions or can mobilize voters in large numbers. Journalists appear to be worthy of recognition when they push circulation and viewer figures up dramatically. By the same token, companies and their managers increase their respect when they run their businesses at a profit. When people or organizations are measured on the basis of such performance objectives set by the various function systems, this corresponds to what is known as functional reputation. This is an indicator of success and technical competence and is linked to how well an agent fulfills the role assigned to him or her or how well an organization serves the purpose for which it was created. However, a second general type of reputation has also emerged in modern societies, namely, social reputation. It is not based on the specifications and logics of the various function systems but is subject to overall standards of social evaluation. In social reputation, interest centers on the extent to which agents possess moral integrity; that is, act in a manner that complies with social norms. Accordingly, agents have an intact reputation if they are successful and appear to be competent (functional reputation) as well as act with social responsibility in their efforts to achieve success (social reputation). Particularly in politics, social reputation has gained markedly in significance under media conditions: Politicians take care to manage their social reputation as credible and charismatic personalities who possess integrity. At the same time, an authentic expert culture of scandal-mongering has developed in the media system that specializes in revealing failings of a social-moral character.

A good reputation brings fundamental benefits to its bearers in politics and society. High respect allows people to select reputation bearers despite minimum knowledge, simply on the basis of a gut feeling. Agents with intact respect more easily mobilize support and followers because pressure groups have learned to trust the performance, competence, and integrity of the status bearers. Reputation thus extends the scope of action and minimizes social control. The function of reputation as a way of legitimizing social power is particularly important. High respect gives access to power. At the same time, power positions become fragile if the reputation of a status bearer is seriously damaged. Almost every day we witness how political, business, or other leaders must leave the scene because their tarnished reputation no longer allows them to hold high office. This shows that power and reputation must be in balance to be stable in the long term. Not surprisingly, modern election campaigns concentrate not so much on complex political arguments about specific issues but increasingly on directly challenging the reputation of their political opponents. Reputation strategies aiming to damage social reputation are particularly effective in this regard because, in contrast to functional reputation, it is almost impossible to recover a social reputation that has been tarnished.

Mark Eisenegger

Further Readings

Bromley, D. B. (1993). Reputation, image and impression management. Chichester, UK: John Wiley & Sons.

Eisenegger, M. (2005). Reputation in der Mediengesellschaft—Konstitution, Issues Monitoring, Issues Management [Reputation in a media society—Constitution, issues monitoring, issues management]. Wiesbaden, Germany: VS Verlag für Sozialwissenschaften.

Fombrun, C. (1996). Reputation: Realizing value from the corporate image. Boston: Harvard Business School Press.

Voswinkel, S. (2001). Anerkennung und Reputation. Die Dramaturgie industrieller Beziehungen [Recognition and reputation. The dramatics of industrial relationships]. Konstanz, Germany: UVK-Verlag.

Resonance Theory

The term resonance theory has been used in different ways by two well-known communication scholars.

Both George Gerbner and Tony Schwartz have used the word resonance to refer to a process by which a mass media message is received, interpreted, or affected by a person's real-world experiences. However, Gerbner believed resonance happens by accident, whereas Schwartz believes it can be used by a communicator on purpose, in order to persuade.

Gerbner used the term resonance to describe one of two processes involved in his theory of media cultivation. That theory contends attitude change is a gradual and cumulative process as a person is exposed over time to many media messages. His research found that heavy television viewers began to believe their real world was like the fictional world presented on the TV screen. Gerbner said he found evidence that heavy TV viewers believed their world was just as violent as the world of the television crime program. His studies and those of his colleagues describe two processes leading to media cultivation. The first, called mainstreaming, contends different people exposed to the same media messages will be similarly cultivated by those messages. The second, called resonance, refers to what happens when a person's real-life environment really does resemble what they see on television. Gerbner said he found evidence that in a high-crime area of a city there was a strong fear of victimization because television viewers received a double dose of crime messages. The crime seen on television "resonated" with the crime all around the viewers in their neighborhood.

Schwartz seems to agree with Gerbner when he writes that patterned electronic information provides the basis for how people perceive their world. He takes this notion one step further, arguing that shared TV exposure over time creates a common reservoir of media experiences in the brain. When a persuasive message taps into the shared experiences of a receiver, it brings forward a meaning in the listener or viewer. Schwartz believes resonance has always been a part of communication, but by virtue of a shared electronic media environment, stimuli in radio and television messages evoke material stored in the brain. In this way, the audience is put to work by the message sender, investing itself in the message and becoming part of the communication process. This process is almost instantaneous. A successful message, writes Schwartz, "strikes a responsive chord" using the resonance principle, whereby the brain of a listener or viewer actually creates the intended perception or behavior. This can have a powerful persuasion effect, as illustrated by Schwartz's most famous political spot, "Daisy Girl." Created by Schwartz for the Lyndon B. Johnson presidential campaign, it evoked feelings of fear in viewers who saw a little girl picking petals off of a flower, but then heard a countdown from mission control preceding images of a nuclear bomb explosion. Although Johnson's opponent, Barry Goldwater, never appeared in the spot and was never mentioned, he was placed there by viewers who feared nuclear proliferation under his administration.

Lisa Mills-Brown

See also Cultivation Theory; Daisy Girl Ad; Responsive Chord, The; Schwartz, Tony

Further Readings

Gerbner, G., Gross, L., Morgan, M., & Signorielli, N. (1994). Growing up with television: The cultivation perspective. In J. Bryant & D. Zillmann (Eds.), Media effects: Advances in theory and research (pp. 17–41). Hillsdale, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Schwartz, T. (1973). The responsive chord. New York: Anchor Press/Doubleday.

RESPONSIVE CHORD, THE

This classic book in the mass communication literature has been widely cited by both scholars and practitioners because it uses a communication principle called resonance to outline both a theoretical and a practical approach to creating electronic media messages. The author contends "presearch" is critical to creating a persuasive radio or television message that will "use the audience as a workforce" by evoking a response from each listener's or viewer's personal experiences and background. Published in 1973, this was the first book written by Tony Schwartz, the man who created the famous "Daisy Girl" spot for Lyndon B. Johnson's presidential election.

Schwartz believes many people using the electronic media to persuade or inform do not really understand how it works. He explains why transportation theories of communication that track the linear information flow of a message from sender to receiver are outdated and do not fully account for or explain the effects of complex messages delivered through the electronic media. Schwartz contends that for such sound and picture messages to be successful, they must "strike a responsive chord." Such a "chord" is "struck" when a sound or visual image in a message is designed and controlled with the goal of evoking a desired response from the receiver's stored past experiences.

Schwartz was among the first to view the communication process in electronic media as interactive. He calls this interactive process the "resonance principle," whereby a radio listener or television viewer actually brings more information to the communication process than the sender or the stimulus itself. The listener's or viewer's brain is an important component of the communication process because his or her life experiences interact with the stimulus in determining the meaning of the message. Schwartz challenges communicators to deeply understand how controlled stimuli in their visual and aural messages can evoke stored information and result in a desired learning or behavioral effect.

If the first 25 pages of the book outline the resonance principle, the next 85 guide practitioners on how to use resonance to make effective messages for radio and television. In his section on designing a commercial, Schwartz argues that the audience should be viewed as "a work force in the communication process," filling in spaces of familiar phrases such as "things go better with _____." He contends the radio audience is not just listening, it is "bathing" in the sounds it hears.

Schwartz's chapter on political messages applies his strategy to campaign and candidate communication. Instead of creating political spots and then testing them with an audience, Schwartz believes in "presearch." He urges campaign managers to first find out how an audience feels about a candidate because, Schwartz writes, "it is much more important for a voter to feel a candidate than to see him." Thus, the goal of a political spot producer is to find a way to "bring the voter to the candidate," by evoking positive feelings about him or her with appropriate sound and picture stimuli that strike a responsive chord in the audience.

Lisa Mills-Brown

See also Daisy Girl Ad; Resonance Theory; Schwartz, Tony

Further Readings

Schwartz, T. (1973). The responsive chord. New York: Anchor Press/Doubleday.

Revolution, Political

In political revolutions, it becomes evident that social change in modern societies is catalyzed by public communication. This can be observed in revolutionary Paris in 1789: In the period from February to May 1789 alone, even before the estates-general were convened, 450 clubs and more than 200 journals appeared, while the three traditional newspapers just simply disappeared. After the storming of the Bastille on July 14, 1789, another surge of new publications in the form of hundreds of brochures, pamphlets, and illustrated leaflets followed. Apart from these print products, the communication events of the revolution manifested themselves in theatre, in literature, in songs, in revolutionary festivities, and in numerous other manifestations. Like a magnet, the fundamental conflict of the "(political) rule of progress" attracts all of public communication.

Political revolutions are marked by a multitude of communicators which is in tandem with an intensification of communication where only few topics remain the focus of attention. Mass mobilizations rely on this process, and at the same time, they produce those dramatic events on which public communication then focuses. In no other periods do many communicate about the same so intensely as in periods when the existing social order is called into question in an "either-or" conflict. The mass media public sphere fuses with the physical public sphere of the manifestations and demonstrations in such a way it becomes one single world that consists only of these actors involved. A revolution creates this very special historical period when all persons affected look at the new, emerging arena of the public sphere and see themselves and each other in it. For revolutionaries and counter-revolutionaries, a direct public sphere is constituted where communication, action, and interpretation by the media merge. The successful and the failed revolutions at the beginning of modernity—the revolution in Mexico, the revolutions at the end of World War I and in the 1930s, the revolution in China in 1949, the upheavals in Hungary in 1956 and in Czechoslovakia in 1968, those in the context of de-colonization and, finally, the upheavals in Eastern Europe in 1989—had their "Bastilles," their key communication events, and their identity-shaping symbols. They constitute for both contemporaries and future generations those epoch-making breaks which tear up the continuity between the past and the present.

In this process, semantics of difference which are used in public communication prove to be crucial. The rigid differentiations that can be observed for the interpretation patterns of the revolutionaries regarding the temporal, segmentary, stratificatory, and functional dimension dominate the attention structures, direct the expectation structures, and indicate future societal structures. It is through these semantics of difference that "more-or-less" conflicts, which societies constantly have to deal with, are transformed into "either-or conflicts."

If one examines where these semantics of difference come from, it becomes clear that they originate in non-established political actors (social movements and protest parties). Without social movements (starting with the Enlightenment movement), neither the revolutions from the late 18th to the late 20th century nor the totalitarianisms of the 20th century can be explained. The importance of social movements (in all various forms, compositions—homogenous or heterogeneous regarding ethnicity or socioeconomic strata—and organizational types) for social change is not to be underestimated.

Following this, a diachronic analysis of public political communication reveals that the importance of social movements and protest parties, including their charismatic leaders, shows a discontinuous pattern. Non-established actors have different chances for resonance to define social problems for society, and they need to compensate their lack of influence on the political system by resonance in the political public sphere. While in periods of stable social development established political actors (and increasingly the media) dominate the agenda of political communication, periods of upheaval are marked by resonance of new social problem definitions by social movements and protest parties. One cannot understand rapid value and norm change and processes of delegitimization without taking into account the role of this type of political actor that emerges again and again. Once more, the French Revolution serves as a case in point: Beginning in the 1770s, the frivolity, immorality, and corruption of the nobility and the royal family were revealed and denounced in a large number of "cahiers scandaleuses" (scandal sheets) and leaflets. This way, the delegitimization of the ruling elite constantly gained resonance, culminating in the calling of the estates-general in the spring of 1789 when the political public sphere emerging through scandal got out of control. Since then, political elites have been challenged by new, powerful actors in periods of upheaval; furthermore, the conditions and contents of political communication have been changing.

Revolutions are extraordinary communication intensifications in the struggle for the right interpretation of the past, present, future, and belonging. It is in revolutions that political conflict breaks out, which—induced by the secular promise for progress based on enlightenment—regularly and unavoidably occurs in modern societies.

Kurt Imhof

Further Readings

Arendt, H. (1974). Über die Revolution [On revolution]. Munich: Viking. (Original work published 1963)

Darnton, R., & Ritter, H. (1985). Literaten im Untergrund. Lesen, Schreiben und Publizieren im vorrevolutionären Frankreich [Literature in the underground: Reading, writing and publication in pre-revolutionary France]. Munich: Hanser.

Habermas, J. (1990). Strukturwandel der Öffentlichkeit. Untersuchungen zu einer Kategorie der bürgerlichen Gesellschaft [The structural transformation of the public sphere: An inquiry into a category of Bourgeois society]. Frankfurt: Suhrkamp. (Original work published 1962)

Hirschmann, A. O. (1994). Wieviel Gemeinsinn braucht die liberale Gesellschaft? [How much community spirit does liberal society require?]. Leviathan, 22, 293–304.

Imhof, K. (2007). Öffentlichkeit und Krise. Theorie des sozialen Wandels [The public and crisis: Theories of social change]. Frankfurt: Suhrkamp.

Imhof, K., & Schulz, P. (Eds.). (1998). Kommunikation und Revolution [Communication and revolution]. Series: Mediensymposium Luzern, Volume 3. Zurich: Seismo.

Soboul, A. (Ed.). (1988). Die grosse französische Revolution [The great French Revolution]. Frankfurt: Athenäum.

Wilke, J. (1988, July 7). Geschichte als Kommunikationsereignis—Dargestellt an der französischen Revolution [History as communication event—The case of the French Revolution]. Inaugural lecture at the Johannes Gutenberg-University Mainz, Special Reproduction.

Rhetoric, Political

Political rhetoric is an art of articulating and promoting one's political interests through influence in the public sphere by symbolic manipulation of signs and symbols, including language, images, and the staging of events. The rhetorical theorist Lloyd Bitzer noted that political rhetoric was in action wherever there were groups of individuals with collective interests at stake in some public, decision-making situation. As such, its scope includes the individual campaign speech of a local politician as well as the broadcast advertisements for a senatorial candidate and the Web log discourse of an advocacy group for or against a president's public initiatives or governing policies at federal, state, or local levels. This discussion of political rhetoric includes a brief review of the main streams of thought about political rhetoric and the current forms and functions of political rhetoric scholarship.

Classical Western Traditions

Political rhetoric is a concern that stretches back to Plato, the Sophists, and Aristotle. The battle between Plato and the Sophists gave the term political rhetoric a negative connotation. Plato's concern with the health of the body politic (soul) was directly in contrast to the Sophists' concern with audience analysis and adaptation. Plato's "Gorgias" skewered rhetoric as "cookery" and a false ability to substitute the worse for the better, appearance for reality, and the probable for the true. This conception of political rhetoric echoes to this day, where public officials of all stripes denounce the "mere rhetoric" of their opponents.

An alternative to Plato's dour view of political rhetoric was that of the Sophist Isocrates. In such works as "Against the Sophists," he argued that political rhetoric was essentially bound to civic life and that political rhetors should take great care in how they used language, asserting that it reflected upon their character. This work was a sharp critique of his contemporaries, placing character as the central driving force behind Isocrates' ideal of a community-grounded political rhetoric. For Isocrates, political rhetoric would arise through a specific "liberal" form of education (something akin to the contemporary liberal arts) and would engender a practical wisdom within those who would be the leaders of society.

The most respected and systematic treatment of political rhetoric was developed and articulated in the works of Aristotle. In his work, Aristotle acknowledged that ethics, politics, and rhetoric are inextricably linked in public life, as can be seen in his essential works on "Politics," "Rhetoric," and "Nicomachean Ethics." These three areas are the pillars of public life and each contributes to the form and substance of political rhetoric. The ends of political rhetoric, from the Aristotelian perspective, are practical wisdom, which enables a person to be able to attain "the good life." Two essential parts of this wisdom are an ability to make good, responsible choices in public affairs and an ability to balance between the extreme vices of excess and deficiency in a given situation, also called "the golden mean."

From an Aristotelian perspective, rhetoric serves politics as the central tool for defining and evaluating matters that are essential to the good life: what is considered to be just, good, and noble. In this regard, these three essences parallel the three modes of proof inherent in rhetoric (ethos, pathos, and logos). The modes of proof arose from the realization that political affairs fell within the area of the probable and thus require a practical wisdom that is arrived at through proper modes of argumentation. Additionally, a virtuous character was necessary for any political figure to establish any kind of bond of authority and trustworthiness with his or her audience. Lastly, a correct emotional experience on behalf of the political speaker was essential in setting the proper emotional tone through which the argument should be received and judged. These three elements form an interrelated series of factors that bind a political communicator, his or her message, and an audience into a functioning civic entity.

Equally important are the three genres of political rhetoric (deliberative, forensic, and epideictic). These three types of rhetorical situations, endemic to politics, center on the legislative deliberation as to future policy and actions; judicial examination of past actions and the establishment of fact within those past situations; and praise and vilification of those persons, actions, and events that comprise the polity. The epideictic differed from the other two genres in that it did not suggest any overt action (establishing past "fact" or deciding future action) but rather considered whether the subject in question was virtuous or not.

Related to the Aristotelian perspective on political rhetoric is that of ancient Cicero. Where Aristotle's work served as a prime exemplar of Greek ideas on political rhetoric, Cicero's work was the best representation of the Roman perspective. Cicero's classic work De Oratore established the rules for both rhetorical practice and statesmanship. In De Oratore, the Ciceronian ideal of the good person who speaks well and actively participates in the civic life of his or her community was set forth as a model for readers to imitate. Indeed, according to a Ciceronian formulation, rhetoric was most alive when used for public affairs. Here political rhetoric functioned as a site of controversy in which persons entered to proffer claims and counterclaims, accepting only those assertions that had been thoroughly tested through debate.

The Ciceronian ideal of political rhetoric took a distinct turn in later formulations of political rhetoric. A different concept of political rhetoric was articulated through the Renaissance period writings of Machiavelli and his classic work The Prince. In The Prince, Machiavelli presented a complete theory of power politics that was based on real, practical problems and situations in which a politician had to adapt rhetorical appeals. Machiavelli's theory of political rhetoric found the most essential, pragmatic elements of political circumstance to be of higher importance than civic and moral virtue.

The transition from the Renaissance notion of pragmatic power politics to that of Enlightenment and modern notions of political rhetoric was effected by a number of political philosophers and writers from the Renaissance onward. Throughout all of these conceptions of political rhetoric, three essential elements were at their core: rhetoric (as discourse focused on addressing public issues), ethics (as a sensibility of determining what was right and wrong), and politics (as the form in which a society was governed), each one an intrinsic part of the other. Moreover, these ideas show political rhetoric had been the mediating factor between human persuasion and the inherent tensions between liberty and equality, the individual and community, and the ways people conducted themselves under different systems of government (monarchy, oligarchy, republic, democracy).

Contemporary Political Rhetoric

Contemporary thinking on the subject considers that political rhetoric manifests itself within all forms of political speeches, candidate and issue advertisements, debates, campaign films, ritualistic public ceremonies, journalistic reporting and opinion, and many of the other communicative facets of a modern political campaign. "Image politics" is the modern and postmodern reliance on polling, public relations "spin," and media handlers to shape highly stylized, narrative meaning on events of national significance. The televisual positioning of candidates and politicians, and the staging of events for media consumption, has greatly altered public and academic assessment of political rhetoric. This evaluation of the form and content of contemporary political rhetoric has primarily centered upon ideology, style, the use of generic forms, and the postmodern condition of political rhetoric. It has considered the contexts of political advertising, debates, polls, the "constructed" public person or issue, and political media.

Ideology has a significant role in contemporary thinking on political rhetoric. The two main perspectives of thinking about ideology, ideology as false consciousness and ideology as a belief system, are reflected in the scholarship on political rhetoric of the last two decades. An important contribution to the literature on ideology and political rhetoric has been in the development of the "ideograph" and its link between rhetoric and a collective worldview in understanding how political sentiments are expressed symbolically. The context of rhetorical action is more than just the immediate circumstances that brought life to the discourse; historical and cultural forces were equally important to the understanding of a statement. Terms such as freedom, justice, right to know, when used in public debate, suggest a broad point of view that is embedded in our culture and expresses deeply held values. Contemporary political rhetoric is, at its essence, a blend of language, culture (popular or traditional), and history. These serve as the bases for meaning within the public sphere.

Some contemporary work in political rhetoric focuses on the identification of specific political styles. Identification and analysis of the realist, courtly, republican, and bureaucratic, paranoid, puritan, hortatory, laudatory, admonitory, and feminine political styles are some of the studies being performed within this sphere of political rhetoric scholarship. The broader analysis of a "political style" is a recent contribution to this area. Political style is defined as the symbolic cause that engenders a particular aesthetic reaction as political effect, a focus on style has had wide-ranging findings. From one corner of this scholarship, we find that Machiavelli is responsible for creating "modern" politics (realism in politics) through his use of a realist style that has, at its essence, a negation of those texts and social norms that would be above it. From another corner there is the feminine style, which relied more on personal examples rather than strict deductive reasoning, put a premium on identification with the audience, and used alternative public personae to make those connections.

Studies of political rhetorical genres have identified and analyzed the various genres in presidential rhetoric and those genres that correspond with running for or holding political office. Such genres include political convention speaking, nomination and acceptance speeches, and victory/defeat speeches. Additionally, resignation speeches, political apologia, and congressional antiwar speaking can constitute genres of political rhetoric. The presidential genres include inaugural addresses, state of the union addresses, and presidential war requests. Much of the scholarship in this area of political rhetoric focuses upon the continued existence of certain forms of political rhetoric and a discussion of the ways these recurring forms tap into the wider culture and society.

Scholarship within political rhetoric has worked within the larger sphere of rhetorical studies and the concern with the connection between rhetoric, identity, and image. Numerous studies have been conducted with a focus upon class, gender, race, sexual orientation, and culture. Studies in this sphere seek to understand, in a broad sense, how a speaker, listener, or other objective subject is constructed through a rhetorical act. Whereas this concern places political rhetoric squarely within the larger sphere of the rhetorical studies and the humanities, the concern with rhetoric and image making (or image politics) has been conducted from a number of ideological positions. While some have focused on image from an Aristotelian or neo-Sophistic (postmodern) perspective, there are others that have taken a narrow Platonic view of political rhetoric as issue and image manipulation for politically unhealthy ends. Thus, we can have rigorous analyses of a president's image construction within a contemporary, postmodern milieu side by side with other, more popular treatments of presidents' ability to "spin" public issues through their discourse.

Grant C. Cos

See also Aristotle

Further Readings

Bitzer, L. F. (1981). Political rhetoric. In D. D. Nimmo & K. R. Sanders (Eds.), The handbook of political communication (pp. 225–248). Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Gronbeck, B. E. (2004). Rhetoric and politics. In L. L. Kaid (Ed.), Handbook of political communication research (pp. 135–154). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Jasinski, J. (2001). Sourcebook on rhetoric: Key concepts in contemporary rhetorical studies. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

McGee, M. C. (1980). The "ideograph": A link between rhetoric and ideology. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 66, 1–16.

Swanson, D. L., & Nimmo, D. (1990). New directions in political communication: A resource book. Newbury Park, CA: Sage.

Rhetoric, The

See Aristotle

Rhetorical Criticism

See Methodology

Rice, Condoleezza (1954–)

Condoleezza Rice was born in Birmingham, Alabama. From her childhood in the most segregated cities in the South in the 1950s and 1960s, Rice became one of the most influential women in the history of the U.S. government. She received her bachelor's degree in political science from the University of Denver in 1974; her master's degree from the University of Notre Dame in 1975; and her Ph.D. from the Graduate School of International Studies at the University of Denver in 1981. In that same year, Rice joined the Stanford faculty as a professor of political science and won two of the highest teaching honors: the Walter K. Gores Award for Excellence in Teaching in 1984 and the School of Humanities and Sciences Dean's Award for Distinguished Teaching in 1993.

From 1989 to 1991, Rice served as an advisor on Soviet and European affairs to President George H. W. Bush's National Security Council and a Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs. She was the only Soviet adviser at the National Security Council and helped write the U.S. policy through the unification of Germany and the end of the Cold War. Returning to Stanford in 1991 as a member of the faculty, Rice became the provost in 1993: the youngest, the first non-white, and the first female provost at Stanford. In 2000, Rice became George W. Bush's foreign policy advisor and in 2001 she was named the National Security Advisor: the first woman and the second African American, after Colin Powell, to hold the post. In 2005, Rice succeeded Colin Powell as the U.S. secretary of state.

Rice is the most distinctive member of the Bush foreign affairs team because of her gender, age, and academic achievement. Her publications include Germany Unified and Europe Transformed (1995) with Philip Zelikow, The Era (1986) with Alexander Dallin, and Uncertain Allegiance: The Soviet Union and the Czechoslovak Army (1984) in addition to numerous articles. Rice's popularity surfaced in September of 2001 when she was appointed as one of the primary White House spokespersons on the war on terrorism. Since then, her visibility has been enhanced by profiles in magazines such as Vogue and O: The Oprah Magazine. Rice was also ranked as the second most powerful woman by Forbes magazine in 2006.

Juliana Maria da Silva

Further Readings

Condoleezza Rice. (1996). In S. Griffiths (Ed.), Beyond the glass ceiling: Forty women whose ideas shape the modern world (pp. 210–216). New York: Manchester University Press.

Felix, A. (2005). Condi: The Condoleezza Rice story (New updated ed.). Waterville, ME: Thorndike Press.

Richards, Ann (1933–2006)

Former Texas Governor Dorothy Ann Willis Richards championed her beloved Texas and appointed more women and minorities to state positions during her term than any other governor. Serving as the 45th governor of Texas, and only the second woman governor of the state, Ann Richards got her start in elective politics in 1976 as a Travis county commissioner and went on to serve as Texas state treasurer until her gubernatorial election in 1990.

"Welcome to the first day of the new Texas!" With these words Governor Richards opened her inaugural address on January 15, 1991, and defined the hallmark of her political communication. Not only did Richards revitalize the Texas economy, she also cut state bureaucracy and advocated insurance, education, and prison reform.

Governor Richards's style of political leadership represented the new Texas. Richards prided herself on building partnerships, actively putting people in places to effect change, and opening the doors of government to those who hadn't been welcome before. Richards believed that "everyone who has a piece of the puzzle" must be "at the table when we sit down to put the jigsaw together." Leadership required the input of all in Richards's administration. As she often remarked, "using the visibility of my office to open doors" is an important way to build the new Texas.

Richards's political communication was known for its humor, stories, and flair, best represented by her self-described "Dairy Queen lady" hair. The country was first introduced to Richards's sense of humor in her keynote address at the 1988 Democratic Convention when she quipped about Republican nominee George H. W. Bush: "Poor George. He can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth." Following that rousing 1988 address, speculation mounted about a Richards run for Texas governor. She ran and, after a hard-fought race, declared the most negative in the state's history, Richards narrowly defeated Texas millionaire Clayton "Wheat" Williams.

Governor Richards was defeated in 1994 by George W. Bush, but her commitment to public service did not end when she left the governor's mansion. She served on several boards of directors, worked in law and public relations, and campaigned tirelessly for Democratic political candidates, particularly women, and for issues such as women's rights, civil rights, abortion, and gay rights.

In September 2006 Ann Richards died of esophageal cancer. Former President Clinton eulogized Richards as larger than life: "First, she was big. Big hair. Big bright eyes. Big blinding smile. She also had a big heart, big dreams; did big deeds." Clinton praised Richards for opening the doors of government to women and minorities and said that Richards "really believed we could make a world where everyone could be a winner . . . where young girls grew up to be scientists, engineers, police officers and politicians, where people, without regard for color, condition or orientation were treated as God's children." Governor

Ann Richards will be remembered for her pioneering work paving the way for other political women.

Kristina Horn Sheeler

Further Readings

Anderson, K. V., & Sheeler, K. H. (2005). Governing codes: Gender, metaphor, and political identity. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.

Marshall, B. D., & Mayhead, M. A. (2000). Navigating boundaries: The rhetoric of women governors. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Right-to-Life Movement

See Abortion

Rivera, Geraldo (1943–)

Gerald Miguel "Geraldo" Rivera, a television journalist, an entertainer, and a talk show host, is best known for sensationalistic reporting and his tendency to include himself in stories. He has aired investigative pieces about abuse of the mentally ill, war coverage of fighting in Afghanistan, and talk show topics such as "Men in Lace Panties and the Women Who Love Them." He has also taken occasional acting roles (movies: Natural Born Killers, The Bonfire of the Vanities; occasional TV appearances as himself). He has earned numerous honors, including 10 Emmy Awards and a Peabody Award, but his approach has become a target for comedians and critics on the problems of sensationalistic journalism.

Rivera was born on July 4, 1943, in New York City. He graduated from Arizona State University and received a law degree from Brooklyn Law School. In 1970, his work as the attorney for some New York Puerto Ricans led to television interviews that became his break into TV journalism. He joined WABC-TV in New York as a reporter, eventually working on both Good Morning America and 20/20. In 1972, Rivera won his first Emmy for a story on the abuse of patients at Willowbrook State School, a New York institution for the mentally ill.

He stayed with ABC until 1985 but was fired after complaining that the network refused to air his story on the relationship between John Kennedy and Marilyn Monroe. The next year, he produced a 2-hour, live, syndicated special called The Mystery of Al Capone's Vault in which he opened an empty vault found in Capone's former headquarters.

Rivera hosted a daytime talk show, Geraldo (1987 to 1998), known for theatrics and controversial guests. One episode included the "Men in Lace Panties . . ." story. Another led to an on-air brawl with neo-Nazis. Twice he had plastic surgery on the show. Meanwhile, he also produced a series of prime-time specials on Satanism.

His 1991 autobiography, Exposing Himself, discussed his sexual encounters (most notably with Bette Midler). The book became a source of news itself.

In 1994, he signed with CNBC to do Rivera Live. Three years later, he became a reporter for NBC, covering the impeachment of President Bill Clinton.

Rivera joined Fox News Channel in 2001 and became a war correspondent in Afghanistan. His tenure was marked by two controversies—an inaccurate report that he was at the scene of a friendly fire incident and his reporting on a military operation while embedded with a U.S. military unit. In the latter incident, he drew a map in the sand on camera, describing the planned movements of the unit.

He later hosted At Large with Geraldo Rivera for Fox and the syndicated Geraldo at Large. He obtained an exclusive interview with Michael Jackson before the pop star went on trial on child molestation charges. Rivera said he believed Jackson was innocent and promised to shave his mustache if he were wrong—again inserting himself into a news story.

Larry Powell

Further Readings

Rivera, G. (1991). Exposing myself. New York: Bantam.

Rock the Vote

Rock the Vote is a nonprofit organization for political advocacy, established in Los Angeles in 1990 by Jeff Ayeroff, co-chief of Virgin Records. Though its political affiliation has been disputed in recent years, the group does claim to be nonpartisan. The group argues that it was created as "a response to a wave of attacks on freedom of speech and artistic expression."

Rock the Vote's main objectives are to increase youth voter turnout and encourage positive change in society. This is evident from the organization's slogan listed on its official Web site—"Political power for young people." The central motto of the organization is also reflected through its numerous voter registration drives, get-out-the-vote events, and voter education efforts, which intend to ensure that young people exercise their right to vote.

Rock the Vote is also known for the debates it organizes every 4 years during the U.S. presidential campaign. Though the credibility of this once in 4 years event has been marred by questions like "Boxers or briefs?" or "Mac or PC?" researchers of campaign politics have looked upon the debate organized by Rock the Vote as a big electoral event trying to capture the attention of the increasingly apathetic young voter. A large number of studies in recent years have analyzed the debate and its effects on young citizens' perceptions toward politics. They have concluded that the content for this debate is structured and framed to attract the youth voter, unlike other traditional campaign messages, which is why it has a greater chance of engaging their attention and perhaps leading them to exercise their right to vote and participate in the political process.

Despite its claim of being nonpartisan, the Rock the Vote organization drew criticism from Republicans during the 2004 presidential election because it sent a mock draft notice to over 600,000 e-mail addresses. This e-mail had the Rock the Vote logo and a facsimile of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's signature at the bottom of the message. In addition, Rock the Vote also created two public service announcements focusing on the draft issue and a third public service announcement endorsed by celebrities that mentioned the draft issue as one of the issues young voters might be concerned about. At least one of these public service announcements focusing on the draft ran on MTV for 10 consecutive days in September 2004. Rock the Vote also devoted a significant amount of content to this issue on its Web site. Such actions have led many people to believe that the group was trying to suggest that the draft might be reinstated if President George W. Bush were to be reelected.

Sumana Chattopadhyay

See also Framing; Political Efficacy; Youth Voting

Further Readings

Burgess, D., Haney, B., Snyder, M., Sullivan, J. L., & Transue, J. E. (2000). Rocking the vote: Using personalized messages to motivate voting among young adults. Public Opinion Quarterly, 64, 29–52.

Rogers, Everett M. (1931–2004)

Everett M. Rogers was born on March 6, 1931, in Carroll, Iowa. In an academic career spanning 47 years, he wrote 36 books and some 425 journal articles, book chapters, and technical reports. His clear prose has left an indelible mark on our understanding of how innovations (new ideas and practices) diffuse in societies.

Rogers almost skipped college. He wanted to farm. One day in 1948, a high school teacher drove Rogers to Ames, the home of Iowa State University (ISU) where he enrolled in agriculture. Numerous agricultural innovations were being generated at ISU, and its rural sociologists were conducting studies on the diffusion of such innovations as hybrid seed corn and chemical fertilizers. Questions were asked about why some farmers adopted these innovations and some did not. Rogers found these questions to be especially intriguing given, back home, he knew his father loved electro-mechanical farm innovations but resisted adopting biological-chemical innovations (such as the new hybrid seed corn even though it yielded 20% more crop and was drought resistant).

Questions about innovation diffusion, including accompanying resistances and how communication could help overcome them, formed the core of Rogers's graduate work at ISU. His 1957 doctoral dissertation analyzed the adoption of a cluster of agricultural innovations among farmers in Collins, Iowa. In reviewing existing diffusion studies in various fields (agriculture, education, marketing, and so on), he found marked similarities: Innovations, for instance, tended to diffuse following an S-shaped curve of adoption. This finding was of great interest to scholars because of its deductive and parsimonious potential. For instance, marketing scientists, epidemiologists, demographers, and political scientists appreciated the predictive potential of S-shaped curve given it elegantly describes an exponential growth curve.

In 1962, Rogers published this literature review, greatly expanded as the Diffusion of Innovations. The book provided a comprehensive theory of how innovations diffused in a social system. The book's appeal was global; his timing was uncanny. In the 1960s, dozens of countries in Asia, Africa, and South America gained their political independence and were searching for ways to effectively communicate agricultural, health, and family planning innovations.

Rogers's book proved to be of tremendous practical value in furthering such efforts.

Many believe that Rogers's scholarly contributions are defined by his uncanny ability to explain how macro processes of system change were linked to micro (individual and group) level processes. The explanations he offered showed both how micro-level units of innovation adoption were influenced by system norms, as well as how system change was dependent on individual action. In this sense, diffusion of innovations theory is one of the few social theories that connect macro- with micro-level phenomena.

Not surprisingly, as per the Social Science Citation Index, the Diffusion of Innovations is the second most cited book.

Arvind Singhal

Further Readings

Dearing, J. W., & Singhal, A. (Eds.). (2006). Communication of innovations: A journey with Ev Rogers. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Rogers, E. M. (2003). Diffusion of innovations (5th ed.). New York: Free Press.

Roosevelt, Eleanor (1884–1962)

Anna Eleanor Roosevelt, First Lady of the United States and internationally known advocate in her own right, was committed to civic, social, and political reform. During her lifetime, she spoke and wrote about an impressive array of topics including poverty, employment, voting, housing, education, child labor, workers' rights, public health, civil rights, and women's rights. Her extensive involvement in political life, which included press conferences, lectures, and campaigning, secured the respect and affection of audiences worldwide.

Born into a wealthy and influential New York family, Eleanor Roosevelt quickly developed an interest in progressive reform and political activism. As a young adult, Eleanor participated in the Social Settlement and National Consumers' League movements, becoming attuned to poverty and working class concerns.

After her marriage to Franklin Delano Roosevelt (FDR) in 1905, Eleanor's political activism flourished. Prevailing notions of femininity constrained women's public roles, but Eleanor found socially acceptable ways to justify her advocacy by lobbying on behalf of women's interests and by supporting her husband's career. She gradually assumed prominent roles in the Democratic Party, gaining a substantial political following. She campaigned actively for Al Smith during his bid for the presidency, backed Robert Wagner's New York senatorial campaign, and accepted leadership positions in the Democratic National Committee.

Later, Eleanor Roosevelt redefined the presidential First Lady role especially with regard to public communication. Recognizing the power of mass media, she made full use of several forms of media. She engaged in an unprecedented volume of correspondence with the American public, earning a reputation for genuinely caring about ordinary citizens. She addressed the administration's policies, controversial topics such as civil rights, and family life in radio addresses, her syndicated column "My Day," and articles in political publications such as the Democratic Digest. She was the first wife of a president to testify before Congress where she advocated for migrant worker living and working conditions. Addressing the Democratic National Convention in 1933 when FDR was nominated for a third term, Eleanor Roosevelt spoke on behalf of Henry Wallace and is credited with securing his vice-presidential nomination. Reflecting her abiding support of women, Eleanor set a precedent for holding regular press conferences, restricting attendance to female journalists. She traveled the world, composing and delivering scores of speeches, sometimes as a paid lecturer.

Eleanor Roosevelt at Gila River, Arizona, at the Japanese American Internment Center, April 23, 1943. For more than 30 years, Eleanor Roosevelt was the most powerful woman in America. Historian Geoffrey Ward once described her as "one of the best politicians of the twentieth century."

Source: Franklin D. Roosevelt, Presidential Library and Museum.

After leaving the White House, Eleanor Roosevelt continued her political activities. She served on the board of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, made television appearances in support of presidential candidate John F. Kennedy, and was appointed by President Harry S. Truman as a delegate to the United Nations where she was instrumental in the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Her thriving speaking and writing career grew as she authored addresses, newspaper articles, and books, taking an arguably liberal stance on issues.

Eleanor Roosevelt's death on November 7, 1962, prompted a flood of tributes. Newspapers, radio broadcasts, U.S. presidents, and world leaders extolled Eleanor for her lifetime commitment to social justice.

Lisa M. Gring-Pemble

See also Democratic National Committee; Democratic Party; First Ladies, Political Communication of; Roosevelt, Franklin D.

Further Readings

Beasley, M. H., Shulman, H. C., & Beasley, H. R. (Eds.). (2001). The Eleanor Roosevelt encyclopedia. Westport, CT: Greenwood.

Roosevelt, Franklin D. (1882–1945)

Among American presidents, Franklin Delano Roosevelt stands out as a master of political communication. FDR and his administration strove to inform, explain, and justify the many New Deal programs to address the economic catastrophe of a great depression, so much so that the White House became the major center of national news. More than any president before or since, Franklin Roosevelt gave access to journalists with timely, newsworthy information in his press conferences. These primarily background sessions highlighted his policy knowledge, personality, and quick retort, impressing the correspondents with his leadership skills for counteracting the nation's economic disaster. With a record of almost 1,000 press conferences, Roosevelt's more than once weekly sessions set an expectation of news from the White House.

Roosevelt had the first designated press secretary, Stephen T. Early, who met twice daily with White House correspondents and helped organize an entire administration communication system of openness and information efficiency. Just before the 1933 inauguration, Early told one Washington correspondent that FDR did not want the press to serve in a "watchdog capacity" but rather to transmit spot news (announcements), thereby serving as stenographers to the public. In fact, this president mangled the watchdog role concept by his artful control and the tremendous information output during vast government changes. However, journalists more and more had to give interpretive news accounts to make sense of the many new agencies and programs.

Roosevelt's communication efforts relied upon the technologies of the day. During that golden era of radio, FDR originated a new informal speaking style with his fireside chats, held infrequently for impact. There, rather than exhort as with a radio address, he would explain policies and discuss administration options, as if he were sitting in a listener's living room. FDR sustained an image of an involved, active president, reinforced with newsreels, photojournalism, and even the first television pictures. Roosevelt's multiple communication efforts were to garner public opinion for the vast government changes. To monitor the public reaction during the New Deal, the president received reports from around the country; during the war he relied on the embryonic public opinion polls.

If control of information is a source of political power, FDR's presidency is a prime example of that control and that power, especially in the military sphere. With a world war, Roosevelt's presidency shows how a democracy becomes more authoritative, more closed, and more censored. Unlike the New Deal years when the administrative deliberated solutions in public, the president had the administrative speak in one voice. Remembering the World War I communication mistakes, Roosevelt had few sedition trials and different censorship and information agencies with security labels and regulations. Previous frankness gave way to wartime covertness to protect military and diplomatic plans. The political candor of the New Deal era was never to return.

The political communication legacy of the Franklin D. Roosevelt presidency rests in the classic conflict of a democracy between openness and access to information for the people to make reasoned decisions, and confidentiality, which must be preserved to some extent if government is to operate, especially during an all-out war. Roosevelt was, as a result, one of the great presidential communicators with one of most open presidencies until the onset of World War II.

Betty Houchin Winfield

See also Fireside Chats; Presidential Communication; Press Conferences; Radio, Politics and

Further Readings

Steele, R.W. (1984). The great debate: Roosevelt, the media, and the coming of the war, 1940–1941. The Journal of American History, 71(1), 69–92.

Winfield, B. H. (1994). FDR and the news media. New York: Columbia University Press.

Royal Commission on the Press

There have been three Royal Commissions on the Press (RCP) in the United Kingdom: 1947 to 1949, 1961 to 1962, and 1974 to 1977. The Commissions were established because of concerns about press standards and concentration of ownership. Their recommendations concentrated on self-regulated reform and antimonopoly measures and are regarded as merely having reinforced the status quo. This conservatism resulted largely from the strong influence of the liberal tradition, with its emphasis on the protection of the press from state interference. Moreover, governments, fearing antagonizing the press, failed to enact the more reformist recommendations.

Little has changed since then; despite later inquiries examining the press and private bills calling for legislation, the press is still, unlike broadcasting, largely self-regulated. Furthermore, the RCPs have had little impact on fostering professionalization and a public-service culture.

Regarding economic structure, the first RCP stated that "free enterprise . . . is a prerequisite of a free press." Moreover, it concluded that, despite some problems with local monopolies and chain-ownership, "concentration is not so great as to prejudice the free expression of opinion or the accurate presentation of news." However, it recommended that acquisitions and mergers should be monitored.

By 1962 it became clear that this optimism was unwarranted. The second Commission concluded that, given the economics of production and sales, further contraction of titles and concentration were all but inevitable. However, it rejected government financial assistance and instead recommended government approval for press acquisitions by large groups. It also stated that press shareholdings in broadcasting companies were "contrary to the public interest."

The third Commission reported further decline in diversity, especially due to high entry costs and economies of consolidation. Departing from previous Commissions, it also referred to the need to protect editors and journalists from owners, and emphasized the importance of preserving the public's freedom of choice. Nevertheless, it ruled out any form of government assistance. Instead, it recommended the referral of more cases to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, the toughening of tests of approval (which was ignored), and the limitation of press shareholdings in broadcasting. This recommendation was enacted in the 1981 Broadcasting Act but relaxed in the 1990s.

Regarding press performance, the Commissions consistently upheld the principle of self-regulation. The first Commission recommended the establishment of a Press Council, to deal with questions of standards and training, and to promote press research. The Council was formed only in 1953, with a narrower remit, and due to threats of statutory regulation. The second Commission heavily criticized the Council and this judgment was repeated by the third, which recommended "far-reaching changes" in its composition, funding, and operation. Nevertheless, the Council failed to reform and never achieved its aims. Amid renewed threats of statutory regulation, especially because of the tabloids' invasion of privacy, the Council was replaced in 1991 by the Press Complaints Commission (PCC). The PCC, within its more restricted remit, is generally considered a somewhat more effective self-regulator than its predecessor.

Ana Inés Langer

See also Press Freedom

Further Readings

Curran, J. (2000). Press reformism 1918–98. A study of failure. In H. Tumber (Ed.), Media power, professionals and policies (pp. 35–55). London: Routledge.

O'Malley, T. (1998). Demanding accountability: The press, the Royal Commissions and the pressure for reform, 1945–1977. In H. Stephenson & M. Bromley (Eds.), Sex, lies and democracy (pp. 84–96). New York: Longman.

Ruby, Jack

See Kennedy Assassination

Russia, Democratization and Media

The opening of media through the policy of glasnost helped facilitate a democratic transformation in the Soviet Union. After the fall of the Soviet Union in 1991, the structure of Russian television changed from one of central government control of media outlets to a hybrid system of government and corporate ownership which some thought would promote democratization. Today the Russian public clearly has more access to information than under Soviet rule. Government control, however, has tightened under the leadership of President Vladimir Putin, and many now question the ability of media to promote or safeguard democratization in Russia.

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union controlled television from above, and the structure of the Soviet television system reflected the understanding of television as a socialization force. The State Committee for Television and Radio (Gostelradio) coordinated the communication of the ideological message sent down from above, and the chairman of Gostelradio was directly responsible to the general secretary of the Communist Party and the Politburo. Directives passed down to various departments that produced the television programs aired on Soviet television. The State owned all equipment, paid all salaries, and monitored all broadcasts. As a consequence, television presented the leadership view and agenda and did not cover events the party leadership preferred to suppress. Under Soviet control, citizens were unlikely to see certain types of stories, including those about crime, accidents, policy failures, or other bad news. The language of Soviet discourse was highly formalized, but the degree to which ordinary people understood or made meaningful the discourse is questionable.

The late 1980s saw the introduction of glasnost or openness, as Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev and others sought to facilitate more active citizen involvement in the political system in the pursuit of socialist goals. Although still controlled, Soviet media presented a wider range of issues, but this had unintended consequences that undermined one-party rule in the Soviet Union, contributing significantly to the breakup of the USSR. Many associated the opening of media with the transformation of the Soviet Union along a democratic path as various views were given an outlet for expression.

After the fall of the Soviet Union, Russian media were restructured in the midst of economic and political transformation. At first new publications and radio and television channels proliferated. By early 1993, however, no longer supported by state subsidies, media outlets, particularly newspapers, found it increasingly difficult to compete for readers. Some television channels remained state-owned or state-controlled, as was the first channel, Gostelradio, renamed ORT in 1994. Others were privately owned, including NTV (founded in 1993). The range of programming on these channels increased greatly as Western television programming was introduced alongside the Russian. In the early 1990s many journalists and scholars looked forward to the development of media as a fourth estate, able to serve as a watchguard for democratic development.

The power of television, however, was not lost on political and economic elites (oligarchs), and the coverage of important events was followed closely by leaders. This included the 1993 constitutional crisis and the surprisingly strong showing of nationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky in parliamentary elections. In 1994, NTV, the largest private television station in Russia, covered the battlefield atrocities and destruction of the First Chechen War (1994 to1996) extensively. Government credibility was questioned as television exposed divisions in elite and public opinion about the war. While some argued that this type of coverage served to further the goals of a democratic transformation in Russia, others said that it threatened the stability of the Russian state.

The 1996 presidential election helped to forge a renewed connection between political power and the media in Russia. Instead of promoting an independent media system in which candidates for political office were critically scrutinized, commercial and state-run television channels chose to support President Boris Yeltsin against his communist challenger, even as Yeltsin struggled with ill health and unpopular policies. Many journalists justified this clear support by asserting that a communist victory would have meant the death of democracy altogether.

Many scholars have noted with concern the reassertion of government control associated with the rise of Vladimir Putin as leader of Russia. The Second Chechen War (1999) shows how things changed. Russian leaders, including Putin, whom Yeltsin appointed as president in December 1999 and who was elected in March 2000, were critical of NTV's coverage of the First Chechen War. This led, in part, to a reassertion of governmental control over the media. Not only was coverage of the Chechen War more restricted, but owners and journalists were challenged in general. Oligarchs Vladimir Gusinsky of the Media Most group (that controlled NTV) and Boris Berezovsky were both forced out of Russian media and the country.

Today in Russia, journalists and the public view media as tied to significant political and economic interests. The concept of the public interest is often overridden by personal and professional interests. It is extremely difficult and dangerous to be a journalist in Russia. The public, for its part, has experienced the trauma of rapid transformation in the political, economic, and social realms. Many long for stability and do not desire a critical press, presenting a multitude of voices.

Laura Roselle

Further Readings

Mickiewicz, E. (1999). Changing channels: Television and the struggle for power in Russia. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Oates, S. (2006). Television, democracy and elections. London: Routledge.

Politkovskaya, A. (2001). A dirty war: A Russian reporter in Chechnya. London: Harvill.

Rantanen, T. (2002). The global and the national: Media and communications in post-communist Russia. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Voltmer, K. (2006). Mass media and political communication in new democracies. London: Routledge.

Zassoursky, I. (2004). Media and power in post-Soviet Russia. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe.

Rwanda Genocide, Role of Media

The roots of the genocide of members of the Tutsi, which resulted in the loss of up to 1 million lives in Rwanda between April and July 1994, lie in the colonial history of the East African country. After the colony's independence from Belgium in 1962, the Hutu majority of the population came into power and began to discriminate against the Tutsi minority group. This so-called social revolution had its ideological foundation in the racist "Manifest of the Bahutu." Because of several waves of violence and emigration in the second half of the 20th century, the population of Tutsi was diminished to 9% of the Rwanda population. To avoid a further exclusion and to depose the regime of President Juvénal Habyarimana, the Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF), which consisted of emigrated Rwandan Tutsi soldiers in Uganda, attacked the north of Rwanda in 1990.

Since the beginning of the civil war, the ruling single party National Revolutionary Movement for Development (MRND) adopted a double strategy: On the one hand, it accepted peace talks, introduced a multiparty system, and allowed a media pluralism. On the other hand, these official measures were undermined by the systematic preparation of the genocide which became manifest in the "10 Commandments of the Hutu." This text called openly for the exclusion of the Tutsi and was published by the extremist journal Kangura. At the same time, the number of military tripled and the Rwandan population was armed via militias. These groups participated in several programs against Tutsi between 1990 and 1992.

The final genocide commenced after the murder of President Habyarimana on April 6, 1994. Until today, it is not clear if extremist Hutu circles or the RPF were responsible for the assassination. However, only hours after this event, the systematic murder of oppositional politicians, Tutsi, and moderate Hutu began and successively captured the whole country. The mass media played a crucial role in the conduct of the genocide. In addition to several print media and the official Radio Rwanda, it was particularly the newly founded Radio-Télévision Libre des Mille

Collines (RTLM) which abetted the entire population in diatribes, songs, and death lists for the elimination of the Tutsi. Beyond its function as the voice of genocide, RTML even contributed to the organization of the genocide which was finally stopped by the RPF's conquest of Rwanda. Two and a half million Rwandans fled from this offensive. Among them, a large number of political, military, and media actors who were responsible for the genocide succeeded in escaping to the security zone or overseas. In 1994, the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) was established in Arusha, Tanzania, and mandated to judge the main perpetrators. However, the ICTR cannot answer the question of the share of responsibility of the international community and of global media which failed at the prevention of the crime.

Frank Wittmann

Further Readings

Ben Arrous, M. (2001). Médias et conflits en Afrique [Media and conflicts in Africa]. Paris: Karthala (avec Institut Panos Afrique de l'Ouest).

Chrétien, J.-P., et al. (2002). Rwanda: Les médias du génocide [The media of the genocide]. Paris: Karthala (avec Reporters sans frontières).

Dallaire, R. (2004). Shake hands with the devil: The failure of humanity in Rwanda. New York: Carroll & Graf.

Melvern, L. (2004). Conspiracy to murder: The Rwanda genocide and the international community. London: Verso.

Schabas, W. A. (2006). The UN international criminal tribunals: The former Yugoslavia, Rwanda and Sierra Leone. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Straus, S. (2006). The order of genocide: Race, power, and war in Rwanda. New York: Cornell University Press.

Thompson, A. (2007). The media and the Rwanda genocide. London: Pluto Press.

S

Sabato, Larry (1948–)

Larry Sabato, the Robert Kent Gooch Professor of Government and Foreign Affairs at the University of Virginia, is known for his research on U.S. elections. His political expertise has earned him different nicknames over the years. The Wall Street Journal once referred to him as "probably the most quoted college professor in the Land," The Washington Post dubbed him "the Mark McGwire of political analysts," and Fox News Channel called him "America's favorite political scientist" while the Washingtonian magazine called him the "Dr. Phil of American politics." Dr. Sabato is the founder and director of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics, and his favorite slogan "Politics is a good thing!" aptly describes his lifetime contribution to political analysis.

Sabato's research focuses broadly on national and state governments, particularly the different elements of the U.S. electoral scene. He has written numerous books and essays on topics such as the rising power of political consultants in U.S. elections, the changing nature of the gubernatorial office, the role of Political Action Committees (PACs) in the U.S. political process, and history of U.S. primary elections. He was among the first to identify the changing nature of the political scenario with increasing power being handed over to consultants and to point out how campaign financing determines U.S. electoral dynamics.

Sabato's book Divided States of America: The Slash and Burn Politics of the 2004 Presidential Election analyzes the individual 2004 races in great detail and provides background analysis leading to the 2006 and 2008 elections. He is also the author of over 20 other books and countless essays discussing the American political process. His other recent works include Get in the Booth! A Citizen's Guide to the 2004 Election, Midterm Madness: The Elections of 2002, Overtime: The Election 2000 Thriller, Dangerous Democracy: The Battle Over Ballot Initiatives in America, Peepshow: Media and Politics in an Age of Scandal, Toward the Millennium: The Elections of 1996, and Dirty Little Secrets: The Persistence of Corruption in American Politics. Sabato also issues a political newsletter through Sabato's Crystal Ball, a critically acclaimed election analysis Web site which predicted results for the 2002 midterm elections and the 2004 presidential elections.

A graduate in government from the University of Virginia, Sabato also studied at Princeton University for a year before completing his doctorate at Queen's College at Oxford University as a Rhodes Scholar. He has appeared on numerous U.S. news programs as a political expert and has served on many national and state commissions and panels.

Sumana Chattopadhyay

Further Readings

O'Connor, K., & Sabato, L. J. (2004). Essentials of American government: Continuity and change. New York: Longman.

Sabato, L. J. (1981). The rise of political consultants: New ways of winning elections. New York: Basic Books.

Sabato, L. J. (1991). Feeding frenzy: How attack journalism has transformed American politics. New York: Free Press.

Salinger, Pierre

See Press Secretary, White House

Sanders, Keith R. (1939–)

Keith R. Sanders deserves more credit than any other individual for the formation and development of the field of political communication as an academic discipline. A teacher and a scholar, he taught and mentored generations of young political communication researchers.

Sanders was born in Benton, Illinois. After receiving bachelor's and master's degrees in speech and psychology from Southern Illinois University at Carbondale, he was awarded a Ph.D. in communication from the University of Pittsburgh. As an assistant professor, he taught at George Washington University, but he spent most of his academic career at Southern Illinois University at Carbondale where he established one of the first academic programs in political communication in the country.

The interdisciplinary approach to political communication study and research characterized Sanders's perspective on the young discipline. He reached out to scholars in political science, journalism, television and film, psychology, and sociology, respecting what each could bring to a deeper understanding of the role of communication in political processes. It was an inclusionary vision that served well the expanding new field of political communication.

Seeing the need for a formal recognized structure for the growth of the discipline, Sanders worked tirelessly to establish the first political communication division in a national/international academic organization. In 1973 to 1974, the International Communication Association agreed to establish the Political Communication Division as one of its permanent divisions; Sanders served as the inaugural chair of the division. Sanders also founded and edited Political Communication Review for the ICA division. The journal, the first dedicated solely to the political communication discipline, evolved into the current journal Political Communication, now co-sponsored by the Political Communication Divisions of the International Communication Association and the American Political Science Association.

An important marker for an academic discipline is the collection and recognition of its scholarship, and Sanders has contributed strongly to that aspect of the field's evolution as well. In addition to his own research and publications on communication and candidate image development, he coauthored early bibliographic work in political communication and coedited with Dan Nimmo the first Handbook of Political Communication, a classic in the political communication discipline.

Sanders was also a leader in recognition of the importance of broadening the political communication field to international and comparative perspectives. He organized and led one of the first international political communication research teams, a group formed to study the 1988 U.S. and French presidential elections. This effort, which he spearheaded with French colleague Jacques Gerstlé, led to the publication of Mediated Politics in Two Cultures: Presidential Campaigning in the United States and France. Throughout his career, Sanders authored/edited five books and numerous journal articles, book chapters, and professional papers.

He continued his commitment to academic excellence as an academic administrator, serving as the university's governmental relations officer and dean of the College of Communication and Fine Arts for Southern Illinois University, chancellor of the University of Wisconsin–Stevens Point, senior vice president for administration and chief operating officer of the University of Wisconsin system, and executive director of the Illinois Board of Higher Education. Currently serving on the Board of Trustees of Southern Illinois University at Carbondale, Sanders has received many awards and recognitions for his service to higher education.

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Handbook of Political Communication, The

Further Readings

Kaid, L. L., Nimmo, D., & Sanders, K. R. (Eds.). (1986). New perspectives on political advertising. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press.

Kaid, L. L., Sanders, K. R., & Gerstlé, J. (Eds.). (1991). Mediated politics in two cultures: Presidential campaigning in the U.S. and France. New York: Praeger.

Kaid, L. L., Sanders, K. R., & Hirsch, R. O. (1974). Political campaign communication. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press.

Sanders, K. R., & Nimmo, D. (1981). The handbook of political communication. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

SATURDAY NIGHT LIVE

Saturday Night Live is a U.S. late night comedy and variety show that first aired on NBC in October, 1975. The show satirizes current events and news personalities through a format of skits and sketches. One example is "Weekend Update," a sketch that parodies news broadcasts and has helped launch the careers of many famous comedians, such as Dennis Miller and Chevy Chase. Saturday Night Live has been a cornerstone of NBC's late night programming and a model for subsequent late night television comedy shows such as Politically Incorrect and The Daily Show that are becoming more and more popular as alternative sources of political information.

A key impact of the mass media is their ability to inform. The quality of public debate on issues and political candidates depends on a citizen's political socialization process in which information is acquired that helps one make competent political judgments. Traditional political communication research has focused on television news because it has been the major source of political information for most citizens. More recently, however, political communication is undergoing change as new and alternative sources of political information emerge.

Late night television comedy shows such as Saturday Night Live have become a significant source of political information. Entertainment programs such as Saturday Night Live have become more and more useful to voters in helping them make sense of political reality. Politicians will often bypass traditional news outlets and make appearances on these late night television comedy shows. These late night programs use an emotionally intense comedic style that emphasizes images over fact-based issue coverage. Yet, this humor helps in the process of forming and shaping voter evaluations by highlighting certain traits that enable voters to access political information. In particular, the humor in late night television comedy shows is useful in helping voters access readily available political stereotypes, especially in the areas of candidate impressions and personalities. This type of information is often not available from mainstream news outlets.

From its inception, Saturday Night Live has been a prime example of such a show, especially among the 18- to 34-year-old demographic that the program was designed to target. During the 2000 national election, 9% of voters reported they learned about the election from late night comedy television shows such as Saturday Night Live. In 2004, this number increased to 21%. Young viewers rate the comedy formats as more "real" than the actual campaigns. Humor on Saturday Night Live often focuses on certain characteristics of a politician that are already central in voters' mental images. Young voters report that this personalization of candidates not only stimulates their interest in politics but also helps them in their overall learning about the political process. The "Weekend Update" segments, which comment on the week's newsmakers and events, have been very popular with this younger audience. Political analysts noted that Saturday Night Live's debate satires of Al Gore during the 2000 presidential campaign actually impacted how he performed in the subsequent debates. This effect was amplified as other news shows would air replays of the sketches from Saturday Night Live.

The best examples of Saturday Night Live's use of humor to convey political information have been in debate satires and opening skits. Comedians on Saturday Night Live have parodied Michael Dukakis's height, Ross Perot's physical appearance, Ronald Reagan's competence, Bill Clinton's reading erotic novels, and George W. Bush's intelligence and mannerisms. Saturday Night Live's opening sketches in Election 2000 offered a glimpse of "our presidential future" with all three candidates. Ralph Nader was impersonated in the Oval Office with pigs flying and devils shivering. Al Gore was impersonated as he read from an economics textbook in front of a supercomputer. George W. Bush was impersonated hiding behind the Oval Office desk as the Capitol burned in the background and as beer cans littered his desk.

Few programs match Saturday Night Live for this type of satire. Saturday Night Live is one of the most distinctive and significant programs in television history. Saturday Night Live is the prototype of a new type of political communication that is now a key source of information for young voters.

Michael Nitz

See also Daily Show, The; Political Knowledge

Further Readings

Baum, M. (2003). Soft news and political knowledge: Evidence of absence or absence of evidence. Political Communication, 20, 173–190.

Campbell, R. (2002). Media and culture: An introduction to mass communication (3rd ed.). Boston: Bedford/St. Martin's.

Hammill, G. (2006, August). Saturday Night Live: U.S. Comedy variety program. Museum of broadcast communications. Retrieved from http://www.museum.tv/archives/etv/S/htmlS/saturdaynigh/saturdaynigh.htm

Jamieson, K. (2000). Everything you think you know about politics . . . and why you're wrong. New York: Basic Books.

Mindich, D. (2005). Tuned out: Why Americans under 40 don't follow the news. New York: Oxford University Press.

Moy, P., Xenos, M., & Hess, V. (2005). Communication and citizenship: Mapping the political effects of infotainment. Mass Communication & Society, 8, 111–131.

Nitz, M., Cypher, A., Reichert, T., & Mueller, J. (2003). Candidates as comedy: Political presidential humor on late-night television shows. In L. L. Kaid, J. Tedesco, D. Bystrom, & M. McKinney (Eds.), The millennium election: Communication in the 2000 campaign (pp. 165–179). Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Paletz, D. (1999). The media in American politics. New York: Longman.

The Pew Research Center for the People and the Press. (2004, January). Cable and internet loom large in fragmented political news universe: Perceptions of partisan bias seen as growing, especially by Democrats. Retrieved from http://www.people-press.org/reports/display.php3?ReportID=200

Sella, M. (2000, September 24). The stiff guy versus the dumb guy: The power and prejudice of political comedy. New York Times Magazine, pp. 72–82, 102.

Young, D. (2004). Late-night comedy in Election 2000: Its influence on candidate trait ratings and the moderating effects of political knowledge and partisanship. Journal of Broadcasting and Electronic Media, 48, 1–22.

Schemas, Political

See Political Knowledge

Schramm, Wilbur (1907–1987)

Wilbur Schramm founded communication study at the University of Iowa (1943), the University of Illinois (1947), and Stanford University (1955). He established communication research institutes at these universities and launched doctoral programs in communication studies. Unlike other forerunners in the field, Schramm did not return to his previous discipline once he had established and contributed to communication studies.

Schramm received a B.A. from Marietta College in 1928, an M.A. in American civilization from Harvard University in 1930, and a Ph.D. in American literature from the University of Iowa in 1932. He worked as a reporter, desk editor, correspondent, and associated press member in his early 20s. Throughout his professional and academic life, Schramm wrote fiction and poetry and worked as an administrator in many academic capacities. He was a professor of English at the University of Iowa from 1934 to 1941 and served as Education Director in the Office of Facts and Figures and the Office of War Information until 1947. His talents in various fields and professional experience made his ideas for a new communications program practical and viable.

Schramm became Director of the School of Journalism at the University of Iowa in 1943 and a research professor at the Institute of Communication Research at the University of Illinois in 1947, where he also served as Dean of the Division of Communication. In his later life, Schramm was an educator and scholar at several communication research institutions, such as the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences and International Communication (1959 to 1973), Stanford University (1967 to 1973), and the East-West Communication Center in Hawaii (1973 to the early 1980s).

Schramm's research interests included audience behaviors, persuasion, WWII propaganda, media uses, and world violence. He primarily focused on media messages as an integral part of people's daily lives. His model of communication suggests connections between a sender, message, channel, coder, decoder, and receiver. Schramm theorized the relationship between communication and economics and the impact of communication development on democracy. He strongly believed in the social responsibility model of mass communication.

Schramm's most important research contributions discussed the effects of the media on the public. Among his 25 books, his best-known works, such as Mass Communication (1949 & 1960), Process and the Effects of Mass Communication (1954), Television in the Lives of Our Children (1961), Mass Media and National Development (1964), and The Story of Human Communications: Cave Painting to the Microchip (1987), deal with how the media affect audiences. Several of these books remain seminal readings for communication scholars, influencing generations of students and professionals. Likewise, Schramm's Stanford communication program greatly influenced the field of communication study in the United States during the 1950s and 1960s.

Hyun Jung Yun

Further Readings

Chu, G. C. (1974). Communication and development: Schramm's contributions. Journalism Monographs, 36, 17–23.

Rogers, E. M. (1997). A history of communication study: A biographical approach. New York: Free Press.

Schröder, Gerhard (1944–)

Gerhard Schröder was German chancellor from 1998 to 2005. He also was prime minister of Lower Saxony from 1990 to 1998 and chairman of the Social Democrats from 1999 to 2004. Schröder is especially known as Germany's first media chancellor or the first chancellor of the arising media democracy.

When Schröder first ran for prime minister of the state of Lower Saxony in 1986, he had already made his biography the subject of public discussion. It would become one of his main strategies throughout his career to make use of his simple origin and the fact that he grew up without a father yet achieved great success. In addition to constructing the image of a promising social leader, Schröder also capitalized on his private life for political benefit at other occasions: Now married for the fourth time, Schröder always tended to use his spouses for public relation purposes. The fact that the Social Democrat and his third wife appeared on several non-political TV shows and allowed stories about their home life led to their image as the "Clintons of Lower Saxony." As a consequence, a "War of the Roses" situation arose when the couple split up that even the quality press could not ignore. It seemed that whenever it came to presenting politics in a popular way, Schröder would be at the forefront: Posing in expensive suits in a flashy magazine and allowing the public to be present when meeting with newly discovered relatives are only a couple of examples. In particular, the social democratic election campaigns in 1998, 2002, and 2005, during which the focus was put on the chancellor candidate Schröder rather than on his party, led to his image as a showman.

Even this brief review of Schröder's behavior in relation to the media shows that he can be regarded as a politician who knew the rules of journalism, accepted them, and used them in his favor. However, although Schröder worked with and not against the media–contrary to his predecessor in chancellorship Helmut Kohl—it should not be forgotten that the changes in the relation between media and politics often connected with the Schröder era cannot be attributed to the former chancellor's personality alone. It should be recognized that Schröder's chancellorship coincided with a time in which politics had to deal with the challenges of a more volatile electorate as well as a more commercialized and differentiated media market. On account of this, "fun chancellor" Schröder's so-called lifestyle politics can be regarded as a good example of the response of politics to these challenges.

Mona Krewel

Further Readings

Holtz-Bacha, C. (2003). Germany: How the private life of politicians got into the media. Parliamentary Affairs, 57(1), 41–52.

Holtz-Bacha, C. (2004). The end of old certainties. Changes in the triangle of media, political system, and electorate and their consequences. Ethical Perspectives, 9(4), 222–229.

Schroeder, Patricia (1940–)

Patricia Nell Scott Schroeder was a pioneer for women, a Democratic politician who represented the state of Colorado in the U.S. House of Representatives. After completing a law degree at Harvard, Schroeder moved to Denver, Colorado, where she began her career by working as a lawyer for the National Labor Relations Board. She also became involved with the community by working closely with the local Planned Parenthood chapter and teaching in the Denver public school system.

In 1972, she was elected to Congress as a Democrat in Colorado's first district, based in Denver. This first electoral victory was a narrow one, but she was reelected without contest the following 11 times with a platform consisting of anti–Vietnam War sentiments and the reordering of national priorities with emphasis on health services, environmental protection, education, and health care. In Congress, she immediately began pushing boundaries by becoming the first woman to serve on the House Armed Services Committee. Though she and the head of the committee, F. Edward Hébert, were at odds most of the time, she continued to fight to channel "saved" defense funds into social welfare programs. She openly denounced the Military Procurement Authorization Bill and accused the committee of being afraid of debate on defense issues.

Schroeder was also active on behalf of women's and children's issues, attempting to eliminate gender inequities, introducing legislation providing finances for child-abuse centers, sponsoring legislation to develop Head Start programs, and supporting year-round use of recreational facilities for underprivileged children. As chair of the National Task Force on Equal Rights for Women, she spoke out for federal payments for abortions and spoke against the anti-abortionist's violent tactics. As chair of the Defense Burden Sharing Panel, a component of the House Armed Services Committee, she advocated the cause of women participating in the military. The legislation she was most instrumental in putting through include the Family and Medical Leave Act and the National Institutes of Health Revitalization Act, passed during her tenure as chair of the House Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families. Others important legislation she championed included the Breast and Cervical Cancer Mortality Prevention Act, National Child Protection Act, and the Violence Against Women Act of 1994.

In 1987, Schroeder started campaigning for the 1988 presidential elections seeking the Democratic nomination. After touring the country for 5 months, she realized she did not have enough support and dropped out of the race. In 1995, she announced she would not seek reelection partly due to the 1994 Republican "House cleaning" that eliminated much of the Democratic power in the House of Representatives. Instead, in 1996, she turned to supporting Bill Clinton's presidential campaign before moving out of politics. In 1997, after a brief stint as a professor at Princeton, she was appointed President and CEO of the Association of American Publishers where she has been a vocal proponent of stronger copyright laws and has been head of New Century/New Solutions, a think tank for the Institute for Civil Society.

Hilary Noriega and Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Gender and Politics

Further Readings

Schroeder, P. S. (1998). 24 Years of House work . . . and the place is still a mess: My life in politics. Kansas City, MO: Andrews McMeel.

Schroeder, P. (with Camp, A., & Lipner, R.). (1989). Champion of the great American family. New York: Random House.

SCHULZ, WINFRIED (1938–)

Winfried Schulz (born in Berlin, Germany) is especially well known for his many publications in the field of political communication. He has been influential over decades not only on the direction of research in political communication but on the methodological developments of the field in Germany. His work has been unconventional but tenacious. He has focused on empirical methods since his dissertation when he explored the role of experiments in social sciences. He received his Ph.D. at the University of Mainz, Germany. His advisor was Elisabeth Noelle-Neumann. From 1972 until 1975 he was assistant professor at the University of Mainz. From 1975 until 1976 he worked as a research fellow at the University of California at Berkeley. From 1977 to 1983 he was a professor of communication at the University of Münster, Germany. From 1983 until 2004 he was chair of the Department of Communication at the University Erlangen-Nuremberg, Germany, until he became Professor Emeritus in 2004. Schulz has worked with content analysis when the method was not quite established in Germany and thus introduced, popularized, and developed the method. He was one of the first to apply the method of content analysis not only to the print media but to film and radio as well. With his many contributions he has triggered further debate of the research content, and he enriched the methodological developments.

There are three primary areas Schulz has focused on: news selection and media reality, changes of media systems, and media reception and media effects.

The construction of reality has been his focus of attention at various times. Schulz was in charge of many content analyses exploring this topic. His publication The Construction of Reality in the News Media: An Analysis of Contemporary News Coverage (1976) is a milestone in political communication research. Schulz suggests that media do not simply reflect reality but they (re-)construct it. With this publication, he not only expanded previous research on news factors, but he laid the foundation and thus triggered the European research on news factors.

With the liberalization of the broadcasting system in the 1980s and social changes in Eastern Europe, Schulz also focused more on media systems and their changes. One of his major research themes has been the effects of the media expansion on the viewer. With the growing competition between public and commercial channels in the mid-1990s, he focused on the quality of media content and on methods to measure quality. Another research theme was the changing media environment in Eastern Germany with the reunification. Already during the first changes and well before the official reunification, Schulz had been interested in democratization processes in the former GDR. He was involved in a study about regional elections in 1990 in Leipzig, Eastern Germany, concentrating on the actual development of a democratic culture in political communication. He investigated how far the political communication process already worked under the new circumstances. His interest and involvement in Eastern countries and media systems has been rewarded by the Charles University, Prague, with an honorary doctorate.

Winfried Schulz is also credited with many theoretical contributions and descriptive research summaries. His work illustrated research deficiencies and solutions to shortcomings primarily in media effects research. He was, thus, one of the founders, as well as the chair, of the media effects area in the German Research Community (DFG) to support media effects research. His theoretical and explanatory publication Political Communication is yet another milestone equally known by students and scholars and often cited. It lays the foundation of many students' papers, and it serves as recommended literature in many political communication classes.

Nina König-Reiling

See also News Selection Process

Further Readings

Holtz-Bacha, C., Scherer, H., & Waldmann, N. (1998). Medienrealität, Medienwandel und Medienwirkung—Facetten politischer Kommunikation. Ein Beitrag zum werk von Winfried Schulz [Media reality, media change, and media effects—Facets of political communication. Contributions on the work of Winfried Schulz]. In C. Holtz-Bacha, H. Scherer, & N. Waldmann (Eds.), Wie die Medien die Welt erschaffen und die Menschen darin leben [How the media create the world and people experience it] (pp. 9–18). Opladen, Germany: Westdeutscher Verlag.

Schönbach, K. (1998). Winfried Schulz 60 Jahre. Publizistik, 43, 427–429.

Schüssel, Wolfgang (1945–)

Wolfgang Schüssel, Austrian chancellor since 2000, started his political career in Peoples Party (Österreichische Volkspartei/ÖVP) in 1968. In 1989 he moved up as minister for economic affairs in an effective coalition between Social Democrats (Sozialdemokratische Partei Österreichs/SPÖ) and ÖVP under SPÖ Chancellor Franz Vranitzky. In 1995 he was elected chairman of the ÖVP. From 1995 to 2000 he filled the position of vice chancellor and minister for foreign affairs.

After the federal elections in 1999 Schüssel found himself in third place (behind the SPÖ and an all-time-high Freiheitliche Partei Österreichs [FPÖ] vote of 27%), scoring the worst result since 1945 with only 27% of the votes. Despite this he led his party in opposition and without the mandate to build a coalition, managing with strategic flair to become chancellor by forming a coalition with the FPÖ of Jörg Haider. This made him the first chancellor from the Peoples Party since 1970. The new coalition faced massive protests both in Austria and abroad. The other 14 EU Member States decided to limit relations with the Austrian government until a delegation of three experts was sent to Austria to examine the political situation and to determine if the EU14's so-called sanctions should be withdrawn.

After the early end of the collaboration in 2002, the ÖVP won the elections (focusing on Schüssel in the election campaign with the slogan "Wer wenn nicht er" ["Who if not him"]) and became the strongest party in Austria. Schüssel continued the coalition with the FPÖ, which had been reduced to 10% of the vote. Finally, in the 2006 federal elections the ÖVP lost the first place to the SPÖ. Schüssel remained in power only until a new coalition was formed.

Schüssel is often called a strategist and tactician, and his verbal skills are unquestioned as is his strong leadership. His government shaped a rigorous economic drive and cost-cutting reforms following the axiom “Mehr privat—weniger Staat” (“More private responsibility in spite of public services”).

The relationship between journalists and Schüssel has sometimes raised questions. Because of an alleged verbal slip-up in informal talks at an EU conference in Amsterdam 1997, he came under journalistic fire. Thereafter, the relationship between journalists and Wolfgang Schüssel seemed to be tense and reserved. Schüssel was given the nickname “Schweigekanzler” (“the silent chancellor”) by the opposition and the media due to his habit of remaining silent, especially in reaction to statements of the FPÖ and Jörg Haider. The initial criticism against the first coalition of Schüssel especially forced him and his team to focus even more on political communication and to try to control every public move as much as possible, using, for instance, pseudo-events and staging political appearances.

Peter Filzmaier, Flooh Perlot, and Maria Beyrl

See also Haider, Jörg; Vranitzky, Franz

Further Readings

Pelinka, P. (2003). Wolfgang Schüssel: eine politische Biographie [Wolfgang Schüssel: A political biography]. Vienna: RM-Buch-und-Medien-Vertrieb.

Riedl, J. (2001). Der Wende-Kanzler: die unerschuetterliche Beharrlichkeit des Wolfgang Schüssel [The turnaround chancellor: The imperturbable persistance of Wolfgang Schüssel]. Vienna: Czernin.

Schwartz, Tony (1923–)

According to Tony Schwartz, political campaigns are won or lost in the living room with the help of the media. Long gone are the days of baby kissing and mingling with the constituents. Now it seems as though the major television networks are the new political parties. Schwartz has played an important role in creating this new system. “Tony Schwartz, as much as any person, laid the foundation for modern political advertising,” says Senator Warren Rudman (R-NH). Schwartz’s “presearch” theory has become a necessary tool in campaigning and creating political ads. “We are in the business of using public relations in a new manner, not in the old terms of press relations,” says Schwartz. “We are using PR as ‘peoples’ reaction,’ personal retrieval of feelings and associations.” Schwartz believes there is no reason to try and impart information about a candidate. He feels voters have already formed an opinion and a more effective campaign includes sensory impressions used to create an emotional response.

The single most famous and talked about political spot in history was produced by Tony Schwartz for Lyndon Johnson’s 1964 presidential campaign. The “Daisy Girl” ad features a little girl counting while pulling petals off of a daisy. Her image is frozen as a monotone missile launch countdown begins. When the count reaches zero, a mushroom cloud appears and the voice of Lyndon Johnson says, “These are the stakes, to make a world in which all God’s children can live, or to go into the darkness. Either we must love each other or we must die.”

The Responsive Chord, a book by Tony Schwartz, explains how audio and visual material is used to strike what he calls “a responsive chord.” A chord is struck through what he refers to as “resonance theory” where the audience of a particular media object brings with them more information than they are being given. This method uses what an audience already knows to create the desired emotional response. In producing political campaign material, Schwartz suggests learning what an audience thinks of a candidate and using that information to create a positive emotional response. Then, an audience is not asked to digest a message but to help create it, to use information already stored in their head to key off reactions to the current message.

Tony Schwartz, born in New York City in 1923, graduated from Peekskill High School in 1941 and Pratt Institute in 1944. From 1945 to 1976 Schwartz produced radio programs about the sounds and people of New York on WNYC. He has lectured extensively around the world and still lectures occasionally at New York University, Columbia, and Emerson colleges.

Lisa Mills-Brown

See also Daisy Girl Ad; Resonance Theory; Responsive Chord, The

Further Readings

Schwartz, T. (1973). The responsive chord. Garden City, NY: Anchor Press/Doubleday.

SCHWARZENEGGER, ARNOLD (1947–)

Arnold Schwarzenegger successfully transformed himself from an internationally acclaimed bodybuilder into an internationally recognized action-movie hero and then in 2003 into the governor of California. His ability to use the muscle man image in crafting political images garnered him respect, particularly when the transference proved successful, but also criticism, when the movie star persona acted as a shield to challenges about his life and public policies.

Born in 1947 near Graz, Austria, he immigrated to the United States shortly after becoming the youngest man to win the Mr. Universe title at age 20. After struggling, he says, to both learn English and gain entrance into Hollywood, Schwarzenegger earned a Golden Globe Award for best newcomer in the film Stay Hungry (1976). He continued in bodybuilding competition, earning 12 world titles. His film career excelled as muscle action movies became popular, starring in Conan the Barbarian (1982) and The Terminator (1984). In 1983, he became an American citizen and earned his bachelor's degree from the University of Wisconsin. Three years later he married television journalist Maria Shriver, daughter of diplomat Sargent Shriver and Eunice Kennedy Shriver, sister to John F. and Robert Kennedy.

Schwarzenegger, though a Republican, became active in Kennedy family civic concerns, particularly in the Special Olympics, which was founded by Eunice Kennedy Shriver, and serves as the program's Global Ambassador. In 1990, President George H. W. Bush appointed him chair of the President's Council on Physical Fitness and Sports.

Numerous politicians have made appearances on entertainment television, including presidential hopefuls Bill Clinton, playing sax on the Arsenio Hall Show, and Al Gore and George W. Bush, appearing on Saturday Night Live. Other celebrities, including former President Ronald Reagan and Congressman Sonny Bono, turned to political careers after entertainment careers. On August 6, 2003, Schwarzenegger took the celebrity politician model, also called politainment, to new heights when he announced on The Tonight Show with Jay Leno plans to enter the recall race to replace California Governor Gray Davis. Fans turned voters came out in droves to Schwarzenegger's political rallies. Some opposing candidates argued that the media largely ignored anyone but the man now nicknamed "the gubenator," so they pooled resources and rented a bus to follow Schwarzenegger's entourage around the state. Notably, Maria Shriver was the only wife of a California gubernatorial candidate invited to appear on the Oprah Winfrey Show during the campaign.

Allegations surfaced that could have collapsed the political ambitions of other candidates: As many as 15 women approached the Los Angeles Times stating Schwarzenegger had groped them. Schwarzenegger dismissed some accounts but admitted that he had "behaved badly" on "rowdy movie sets." He apologized and promised to be a "champion of women." Other news organizations questioned the timing of the story, less than a week before the recall, and many in the voting public vilified the Los Angeles Times for reporting on what came to be called Schwarzenegger's masculine antics. Other accusations were deflected as well, including that Schwarzenegger had years earlier praised Adolf Hitler's rhetorical abilities and had used illicit drugs.

Schwarzenegger won the recall and ousted the sitting governor, a feat accomplished only one other time in U.S. history. In a field of 135 candidates, Schwarzenegger garnered 49% of the vote and over 1.3 million ballots more than the next ranked candidate. Jay Leno introduced Schwarzenegger at his victory party. Later, Schwarzenegger and Davis appeared together on Leno's show, promoting key legislation that they both supported. They also reported that they had become friends, with Davis giving Schwarzenegger political advice on managing a fractured state government and Schwarzenegger giving Davis acting tips for the out-of-work governor's cameo appearances on television sitcoms.

Critics charge that Schwarzenegger continued to be indulged more like movie star than a governor by both the public and the media even after election to a second term in 2006. At that victory party, Schwarzenegger announced, "I love sequels." The governor and his political policies, critics argued, were treated with the deference normally reserved for entertainment reporting while his opponents received scrutiny common for politicians. Yet in that climate Schwarzenegger used his celebrity and personal charisma to create support among California's political insiders across party lines, a crucial and largely successful strategy when compared with Republicans elsewhere who lost the GOP's stronghold in Congress. In his second inaugural address, Schwarzenegger referred to himself as post-partisan.

Virginia Whitehouse

See also Celebrities in Politics

Further Readings

Babcock, W., & Whitehouse, V. (2005). Celebrity as a postmodern phenomenon, ethical crisis for democracy, and media nightmare. Journal of Mass Media Ethics, 20, 176–191.

Schultz, D. (2004–2005, Winter). Lights, camera, action! Ethics and the California recall. Public Integrity, 7, 57–65.

Smolken, R. (2003–2004, December–January). The women. American Journalism Review, 33–41.

Second-Order Election

The conceptual framework concerning second-order elections was developed by Karlheinz Reif and Herman Schmitt in the article "Nine Second-Order National Elections" (1980). In one of the first systematic studies of direct elections to the European Parliament, Reif and Schmitt draw an important distinction between two categories of elections: (1) First-order elections offer voters the critical choice of who should govern the country. This includes elections in parliamentary systems such as Great Britain, Sweden, and Germany and presidential elections in countries such as the United States, Venezuela, and the Philippines. (2) Second-order elections, in contrast, are less important since they determine the outcome for lesser offices, such as regional, municipal, and local officials in parliamentary systems and legislative representatives in presidential systems.

Based on this distinction Reif and Schmitt showed that European parliamentary elections clearly fall into the second-order election category. Elections to the European Parliament are seen by both political parties, mass media, and voters as less important compared to the first-ranked national elections. The main explanation for these attitudes can be found in the institutional framework. There is no government chosen based on the results of the voter turnout, and there are few all-European campaigns conducted. The party system on the EU level is rather underdeveloped, and the European Union still has limited authority compared to the national parliaments.

A number of characteristics of second-order elections are pointed out in the literature: (1) lower level of voting turnout; (2) the outcome is strongly related to the popularity of national parties within a particular country, rather than around particular issues, individual candidates, or specific events; (3) in a cyclical pattern, governing parties often experience a fall in support in second-order elections and can therefore be characterized as "barometer-elections," as a poll on how the national government is doing their job and how the economy develops; (4) minor parties, often with charismatic leaders, are usually the main beneficiaries of any temporary protest vote against the government.

Bengt Johansson

See also European Parliamentary Elections

Further Readings

Reif, K., & Schmitt, H. (1980). Nine second-order national elections—A conceptual framework for the analysis of European elections results, European Journal of Political Research, 8, 3–44.

van der Eijk, C., & Franklin, M. (1996). Choosing Europe? The European electorate and national politics in the face of union. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Segregation

Segregation means the separation of the races by informal means such as custom and tradition, frequently upheld by threats of violence, or formal means through laws that forbid the mixing of the races in public facilities such as trains, buses, hotels, restrooms, restaurants, schools, and hospitals. When slavery was practiced in the United States, free blacks in both the North and the South found restaurants and hotels closed to them, and they were often excluded from first-class accommodations on trains and steamboats. Although these forms of segregation continued after the Civil War, during Reconstruction the complete segregation of the races was not mandated by law. The withdrawal of federal troops from the South following the election of 1876 allowed Southern states to restrict and eliminate voting rights of blacks by utilizing such devices as the poll tax and literacy tests. Once this was accomplished, the Southern states were able to pass laws segregating public accommodations. The Supreme Court of the United States upheld legal segregation on railroads in Plessy v. Ferguson in 1896.

Governor George Wallace attempting to block integration at the University of Alabama, June 11, 1963. Deputy U.S. Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach confronts him.

Source: Library of Congress, Prints & Photographs Division, LC-U9-9930-20.

By the turn of the century Jim Crow laws mandating segregation and relegating black Americans to an inferior status proliferated across the South. The National Association for Colored People (NAACP), founded in 1909 to fight against racism, used the courts to fight against segregation. The struggle against segregation was also aided by social forces such as the migration of many blacks to northern states where they could vote and influence the political process. During World War II, black Americans fought in segregated units but following the war, President Truman ordered the Armed Forces to integrate.

The U.S. Supreme Court decision in Brown v. Board of Education reversed the earlier Plessey decision and declared that separate but equal was no longer the law. Massive resistance to school integration in the South led to the creation of White Citizens' Councils and increased violence against blacks. This resistance led to increased determination by blacks to defy segregation through sit-ins at lunch counters and freedom rides on buses. The demonstrations turned increasingly violent. In August 1963, over 200,000 Americans gathered at the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D.C., to rally for the passage of federal legislation that would outlaw segregation in public accommodations. On July 2, 1964, President Johnson signed the Civil Rights Act of 1964 into law. It outlawed segregation in public accommodations such as restaurants, hotels, motels, public restrooms, railroads, bus lines, airplanes, and waiting rooms for public transportation. The end of legally mandated segregation did not mean the end of de facto segregation as residential segregation reinforced by white flight to the suburbs of the major cities continued. Even good faith compliance with the Brown decision did not end de facto segregated schools with those in the suburbs tending toward all white students and schools in the inner cities tending toward all black.

Lloyd Rohler

See also Civil Rights Movement; Wallace, George

Further Readings

Woodward, C. V. (1957). The strange career of Jim Crow. New York: Oxford University Press.

Selective Attention

See Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory

SELECTIVE ELABORATION

See SELECTIVE PROCESSES, EXPOSURE, PERCEPTION, MEMORY

SELECTIVE PROCESSES, EXPOSURE, PERCEPTION, MEMORY

Selective processes are the means by which individuals' preexisting beliefs shape their use of information in a complex environment. Current interests and opinions influence the acquisition (selective exposure), evaluation (selective perception), and retention (selective memory) of political information. As a consequence, individuals tend to be more knowledgeable about personally salient topics than about topics that do not interest them, and they tend to know more of the evidence supporting their political opinions than they know about other perspectives. These characteristics limit individuals' ability to revise their political beliefs in response to new evidence and promote political polarization because existing opinions receive systematic reinforcement. Though these processes have rich roots in political communication, there is also significant research on the processes in nonpolitical contexts.

Selective processing is related to motivated reasoning, the idea that individuals' cognitive processes are goal-oriented and are often biased in favor of their political predispositions. Motivated reasoning concerns the mechanisms by which individuals construct justifications for their positions, specifically how they recall and interpret information, whereas selective processes concern the mechanisms that shape individuals' awareness of the political information that they use to form such justifications. Selective processing and motivated reasoning overlap with regard to the evaluation of opinion-relevant information. Individuals' tendency to be more critical of information that challenges their political opinions is cited as an example of both concepts.

Two key factors motivate selective processing. The first is the complexity of the information environment. People do not have the time or the cognitive ability to consider every argument, so they must be selective, choosing a subset of information that adequately, though incompletely, addresses the information need at hand. The second is that individuals experience a negative emotional response, referred to as cognitive dissonance, to information that conflicts with their existing opinions. Individuals seek to minimize dissonance by seeking out opinion reinforcement and finding fault with opinion-challenging information.

Selective Exposure

Selective exposure refers to the idea that individuals' political interests and opinions influence the information to which they attend. Within political communication the term selective attention is sometimes used synonymously. Selective attention has a somewhat different meaning within the field of cognitive psychology. Human cognition is limited, which means that people are unable to process the volume of information conveyed by the senses, so some stimuli go undetected. In this context, selective attention refers to the nonrandom process through which certain stimuli are attended to while other stimuli are ignored.

The evidence that political interests influence individuals' exposure decisions is unambiguous. Individuals pay more attention to political information the more it interests them or is personally salient. There is substantial debate, however, regarding the influence that political opinions have on information exposure. Opinion-motivated selective exposure is said to occur when individuals choose an information source that supports their opinion over one that challenges their opinion. Some scholars argue that decades of research have yielded little compelling evidence of the phenomenon, while others maintain that it remains an important concept for the field. The most recent research suggests that opinion-motivated selective exposure does occur under certain conditions. First, individuals must be committed to their opinion for this form of selective exposure to occur. Confidence has the opposite effect: The more confident an individual is about his or her opinion, the less likely he or she is to practice selective exposure. Second, to the extent that an individual engages in selective exposure, its effect is moderated by a variety of environmental factors. For example, environments in which individuals feel threatened or which place limits on their ability to acquire information produce stronger selective exposure effects. Third, there are some circumstances under which individuals will seek out opinion-challenging information. For example, individuals who expect that they will have to defend their opinion often seek other viewpoints prior to debate.

Selective Perception

Individuals tend to interpret novel political information in a manner that is consistent with their preexisting beliefs. Selective perception occurs in at least two ways. First, individuals fail to notice, or they misperceive, information that does not match their beliefs. For example, individuals tend to think that the positions held by a favored candidate or party mirror their own and will misinterpret evidence to the contrary rather than updating their views or preferences. Second, individuals frequently accept evidence supporting their opinions without hesitation but will scrutinize information that challenges their position carefully, critiquing the methods by which data were collected and analyzed and questioning the interpretation of results. This form of selective perception is often referred to as selective judgment or biased assimilation. It should be noted, however, that this bias may have a rational basis: Questioning new information that contradicts prior knowledge and experience can be an effective assessment strategy in a complex information environment. If one invests considerable energy in evaluating available evidence when forming an opinion, he or she may be justified in thinking that new, contradictory information is less trustworthy.

Selective Memory

Individuals are more likely to retain political information the more personal importance they attach to the topic. This effect is partially due to interest-motivated selective exposure. As noted previously, individuals exert more effort seeking out information about topics they deem important. The other mechanism underlying selective memory is that individuals devote significant cognitive resources to elaborating on interest-relevant information. Taken together, these processes yield greater political awareness and higher knowledge accuracy for personally important political issues than for issues that an individual considers unimportant. Recent research, however, suggests that there is not a memory congeniality effect: People do not exhibit a bias for opinion-consistent or against opinion-inconsistent information. Thus, selective memory is influenced by political interests but not political opinions.

R. Kelly Garrett

See also Hostile Media Effect; Limited Effects Theory; Public Opinion

Further Readings

Frey, D. (1986). Recent research on selective exposure to information. Advances in Experimental Social Psychology, 19, 41–80.

Gerber, A., & Green, D. (1999). Misperceptions about perceptual bias. Annual Review of Political Science, 2(1), 189–210.

Holbrook, A. L., Berent, M. K., Krosnick, J. A., Visser, P. S., & Boninger, D. S. (2005). Attitude importance and the accumulation of attitude-relevant knowledge in memory. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 88(5), 749–769.

Hutchings, V. L. (2001). Political context, issue salience, and selective attentiveness: Constituent knowledge of the Clarence Thomas confirmation vote. The Journal of Politics, 63(3), 846–868.

Kunda, Z. (1990). The case for motivated reasoning. Psychological Bulletin, 108(3), 480–498.

Lord, C. G., Ross, L., & Lepper, M. R. (1979). Biased assimilation and attitude polarization: The effects of prior theories on subsequently considered evidence. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 37(11), 2098–2109.

Sears, D. O., & Freedman, J. L. (1967). Selective exposure to information: a critical review. Public Opinion Quarterly, 31(2), 194–213.

Taber, C. S., & Lodge, M. (2006). Motivated skepticism in the evaluation of political beliefs. American Journal of Political Science, 50(3), 755–769.

Selling of the President 1968, The

The Selling of the President 1968, written by Joe McGinniss, is widely considered to be the first book of its kind. Joe McGinniss essentially infiltrated the Nixon campaign and, in his book, told America what was really happening behind closed doors in political campaigning. McGinniss reveals how Nixon's team developed an image of Nixon as a good and decent man and found ways to ensure the perfect image was presented to the public according to a concise plan. This "planned image" ran counter to the beliefs of the general public that candidates were presented as themselves and not as creations of a campaign team.

The Selling of the President 1968 describes how the Nixon campaign believed the perfect image was necessary to get Nixon elected in 1968. Nixon had previously run for president and lost to John Fitzgerald

Kennedy in 1960. During that election the American people formed a rather unfavorable opinion of Richard Nixon, viewing him as an ugly and cold man. It was apparent from the previous election that his old image was not successful and could not win him this election either. For that reason, it was necessary for Nixon to have the new image.

The Selling of the President 1968 provides the details of how that new image was created. The Nixon campaign team developed a systematic approach to reveal the new and appealing image of Nixon. Nixon's team discovered that television was the best medium for advertising Nixon's new perfect image. The book begins with quotes from Nixon and his crew while they were filming Nixon's commercials for television. Nixon had different commercials with different scripts for various parts of the country. The first chapter of the book contains scripts from some of the commercials aired in various locations. Chapter 7 of the book explains how Nixon's advisors created a series of commercials for Nixon without Nixon having to actually appear or speak much in them. The commercials consisted of crowd-pleasing still pictures with Nixon's voice in the background. Nixon's words were going to be the same he always used—the words from his acceptance speech. The goals of these commercials were to divert the audience's attention away from the words of Nixon and toward the emotional appeal presented by the still pictures. The book suggests that one of the reasons for this strategy was the media consultants' belief that Marshall McLuhan was right about the importance of hot and cold media and images. McLuhan had earlier attributed Nixon's loss of the first 1960 Kennedy–Nixon debate to Nixon's failure to come across successfully on the cool medium of television. The last 100 pages of the book is an appendix which details specifics such as actual television ads. The index may be useful for further research or identifying details about the Nixon campaign.

The book has had such significant value to the study of politics, government, and communication that it is often required reading for some undergraduate courses to this day. The Selling of the President 1968 still has relevance as a prime example of how politicians must carefully devise a plan and an image to present to the voters to gain their vote.

Kalisa Lynn Hauschen

See also Candidates and Their Images; McLuhan, Marshall; Nixon, Richard M.; Political Advertising; Presidential Communication

Further Readings

Ambrose, S. E. (1987). Nixon. New York: Simon & Schuster.

McGinniss, J. (1969). The selling of the president 1968. New York: Trident Press.

Stone, D. M. (1988). Nixon and the politics of public television. New York: Garland.

Senghor, Léopold Sédar (1906–2001)

Léopold Sédar Senghor was the first president of the Republic of Senegal, co-founder of the Negritude movement, and the first African member of the Académie Française. He attended schools in the capital of Dakar, and went to university in Paris, France. Here he met other African and Caribbean intellectuals such as Aimé Césaire and Léon-Gontran Damas with whom he founded, at the end of the 1920s, the culturally influential Negritude movement. This movement revolved around the theory of Africanity which postulated the universal equality of all peoples, contributed to the fortification of African identity, and claimed the political independence of the colonized countries. He then returned to Senegal where his actual political career started.

In 1948, he founded the Senegalese Democratic Block and the journal La Condition Humaine, which obtained the symbolic title L'Unité in 1957. According to this motto, and after his election as president of independent Republic of Senegal in 1960, Senghor governed the country in a socialist one-party system. Senghor's main objective was national unity in order to preserve the diverse belongings of Senegalese society members to ethnic groups, families, brotherhoods, and castes. This is the reason why he did not permit the existence of a political opposition or of independent mass media. The media market was monopolized by state-run media such as the daily journal Le Soleil and Radio Sénégal, which served the single political party.

During the first half of his term of office, Senghor succeeded, through clientelistic and neo-patrimonial politics, in integrating the key actors of Senegalese society in general and the religious leaders of the Muslim brotherhoods in particular. However, at the beginning of the 1970s, he was forced to revise his semi-authoritarian way of ruling. This revision was an indirect effect of the world economic crises which were responsible for the slump of agricultural production and prices. Confronted with this precarious situation, Senghor changed the constitution in order to introduce stepwise a controlled multi-party system. Besides his own Socialist Party, he now allowed the foundation of the liberal Senegalese Democratic Party, the communist African Independence Party, and the conservative Senegalese Republic Movement. The political opening was accompanied by a cautious liberalization of the mass media: Clandestine journals were officially released and other journals newly founded. On an economic level, the president decided to introduce the structural adjustment programs conceived by international institutions before he set an example by handing over power (even though it was unsolicited) to his Prime Minister Abdou Diouf in 1980.

With the exception of television, Diouf liberalized the entire mass media market from the end of the 1980s onwards. Although the pluralization of the media market has continued since then, the semi-authoritarian style of politics—originally introduced by Senghor—has remained a central feature of Senegal statehood until today.

Frank Wittmann

Further Readings

Cruise O'Brien, D., Diop, M. C., & Diouf, M. (2002). La construction de l'État au Sénégal [The construction of the state of Senegal]. Paris: Karthala.

Lewis, S. K. (2006). Race, culture, and identity: Francophone, West African and Caribbean literature and theory from Négritude to Creolité. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.

Loum, N. (2003). Les médias et l'État au Sénégal. L'impossible autonomie [The media and the state of Senegal: The impossible autonomy]. Paris: Harmattan.

Nyamnjoh, F. (2005). Africa's media: Democracy and the politics of belonging. London: Zed Books.

Ottaway, M. (2003): Democracy challenged: The rise of semi-authoritarianism. Washington: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Perret, T. (2005). Le temps des journalistes. L'invention de la presse en Afrique francophone [The time of the journalists. The invention of the press in French-speaking Africa]. Paris: Karthala.

Senghor, L. S. (1977). Négritude et civilisation de l'universel [Negritude and universal civilization]. Paris: Éditions du Seuil.

Wittmann, F. (2006). La presse écrite sénégalaise et ses dérivés: précarité, informalité, illégalité [The Senegal newspaper industry and its drifts: Precariousness, informality, illegality]. Politique Africaine, 101, 181–194.

September 11 Attacks

See Terrorism and Media

Sharon, Ariel (1928–)

Ariel ("Arik") Sharon is a former prime minister of Israel and a high-ranked general in the IDF (Israeli army). Although he is one of the most controversial public figures in Israel, his long-term, wide-range influence on the formation and history of the state is beyond doubt.

Sharon was born in Israel as Ariel Scheinermann. In 1942, at the age of 14, he joined the Hagana (a paramilitary Zionist organization). During the 1948 War of Independence, Sharon was already an active commander, and in 1953, he founded and led the "101" special antiterror unit. During the Six Day War Sharon commanded an armored division, and as major general he commanded another armored division during the 1973 Yom Kippur War. Holding this position, Sharon led the crossing of the Suez Canal, considered to be a critical turning point in the course of the war.

In December 1973, Sharon began his political career by becoming a Knesset member of the right-wing Likud party. He resigned a year later to serve as security adviser to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. Sharon was reelected to the Knesset in 1977 and was appointed minister of agriculture in Menachem Begin's first government. In this office Sharon initiated and carried out an extensive settlement program in Judea and Samaria and the Gaza strip, creating one of his most famous public images as "Father of the Settlements Movement." Despite his critical role in evacuating settlements (as part of the peace agreement with Egypt) in 1982, Sharon remained extremely close to that movement.

In 1981 Sharon was appointed defense minister, serving in this post during the Lebanon War. Following the Sabra and Shatilla Massacre in 1982, and the establishment of an Israeli inquiry commission, Sharon was found indirectly responsible for the massacre, was dismissed from his office, and banned from any future similar position. Sharon remained in the government as a minister without portfolio and then served as minister of industry and trade from 1984 to 1990. During the years 1990 to 1992, he served as minister of construction and housing and chairman of the Ministerial Committee on Immigration and Absorption. In 1996, Sharon was appointed minister of national infrastructure and, in 1998, became foreign minister and headed the permanent status negotiations with the Palestinian Authority.

In 1999 Sharon was elected chair of the Likud Party, following the resignation of its former chair, Benjamin Netanyahu, as a result of the party's defeat in the general elections of that year. In 2000 Sharon paid a historic visit to Temple Mount in East Jerusalem, a visit that was, and still is, considered by many to be the trigger for the second Intifada (Palestinian uprising).

Sharon was elected prime minister in 2001 and then reelected in the elections of 2003. His disengagement plan and its initial implementation during the summer of 2004 caused a split in the Likud Party, and altered Sharon's long-lasting public image as a hawkish statesman. This state of affairs led Sharon to form a new, left-center party called Kadima ("Forward" in Hebrew) after leaving the Likud.

Ariel Sharon's highly complex relationship with journalists and the news media (Israelis as well as non-Israelis) can be thought of as a reflection of his political ideology. From his lawsuit against Time magazine in the aftermath of the Sabra and Shatilla Massacre, through his bitter relationship with several leading Israeli commentators who criticized how he functioned and questioned his integrity during the war in Lebanon, and through his confrontation with the BBC in 2003 (banning any Israeli cooperation with the organization due to its alleged anti-Israel continuing bias), Sharon, unlike many other political leaders, rarely enjoyed a supportive and cooperative media. A well-known exception was Uri Dan, a journalist and a commentator and a long-time close friend and supporter, who has been serving for decades as Sharon's mouthpiece, in and out of Israel.

With Sharon's change of status, as he became prime minister of Israel, with his political-ideological shift toward the Israeli left, and especially following the implementation of his disengagement plan, national and foreign media alike became less critical of him. Sharon's relationship with many of the leading journalists in Israel turned warmer, followed by a "softer," more positive public image (i.e., the hawkish "bulldozer" who became a peacemaker). A similar trend has taken place among foreign media, although on a much more limited scale.

Sharon suffered a massive stroke on January 4, 2006. The stroke placed him into a coma, and so Ehud Olmert replaced him as acting prime minister. Olmert was elected prime minister in the election of 2006, stressing the continuance of Sharon's political legacy.

Vered Malka

Further Readings

Hefez, N., & Bloom, G. (2006). Ariel Sharon: A life. New York: Random House.

Sharon, A. (with Chanoff, D.). (2001). Warrior: An autobiography. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Sheafer, T. (2005). Detecting campaign effects in imbalanced campaigns: The Likud's intra-party referendum over Sharon's disengagement plan. Paper presented at the 2005 annual meeting of the International Communication Association, New York, NY.

Shaw, Donald

See Agenda Setting

Shield Laws

Shield laws are statutes designed to help journalists keep their sources confidential and to protect journalists from unnecessary subpoenas. Journalists cite several reasons why shield laws are needed. First, journalists assert that if they are unable to guarantee anonymity to sources, then individuals will be less likely to share confidential and sensitive information. This hinders the process of investigative journalism that can be beneficial to the public. Second, journalists assert that if the government requests both confidential and nonconfidential information, then journalists actually become investigators for the government. This scenario also forces journalists to waste resources in court proceedings. Third, journalists assert that shield laws protect them from frequent subpoenas from litigation surrounding the content of their work.

The U.S. Supreme Court, in Branzburg v. Hayes (1972), ruled that news gathering was protected by the First Amendment. The court did not define the extent of the protection that the Branzburg case yielded for journalists. However, the Supreme Court did rule that journalists did not possess constitutional immunity from the law. After the Branzburg ruling, both case law and state statutes have defined when it is legally appropriate to seek confidential information from journalists, and includes (a) when the information is highly relevant to the case, (b) when a compelling need exists, (c) when the information cannot be obtained through other means, and (d) whether the information was gained through a confidential source or through observation. Some state shield laws apply to both civil cases and criminal cases, whereas others apply only to civil cases. This varies from state to state.

In the United States, 30 states and the District of Columbia have shield laws that protect journalists' right to keep sources private. Those states include Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, and Tennessee. The first shield law was adopted in Maryland in 1896.

In addition to the shield laws, all states have a constitution that guarantees free speech not only for journalists but also for every citizen. Although shield laws exist in many states, there is no federal statute protecting journalists. There have been unsuccessful attempts by the U.S. Congress to pass legislation that would provide journalists federal shield law protection. Occasionally, issues highlight the need for a federal shield law. The case involving Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) agent Valerie Plame initiated a debate among journalists and politicians regarding the need for a federal shield law. Plame's identity as a CIA agent was revealed to journalists through confidential sources and the Department of Justice subpoenaed journalists to determine who leaked her identity. Judith Miller, a New York Times reporter, served jail time for refusing to reveal the identity of her source.

John Allen Hendricks

See also Press Freedom

Further Readings

Lee, D. (n.d.). Press: Shield laws. Available at http://www.firstamendmentcenter.org

Pracene, U. C. (2005). Journalists, shield laws and the First Amendment: Is the fourth estate under attack? Hauppauge, NY: Nova Science.

Shriver, R. Sargent

See McGovern, George

Simitis, Konstantinos (1936–)

Konstantinos Georgiou Simitis (generally known as Costas Simitis) was born in Piraeus, Greece, and studied law and economics in Germany and England. He began his academic career in law at the University of Marburg in 1959. He taught as an assistant professor at the University of Konstanz in 1971 and went on to become a regular professor of commercial and civil law at the University of Giessen. In 1977, he was appointed regular professor at the Panteion University of Athens.

Living in Athens as a lawyer, Simitis played a leading part in the founding of the Association of Political Research, also known as Alexandros Papanastasiou. In 1967, the association evolved into the antidictatorial organization Democratic Defense (Democratiki Amina), which was to participate in the founding of PASOK (the Panhellenic Socialist Movement) 7 years later. Simitis was an active participant in the antidictatorial struggle against the colonels' junta (1967 to 1974) and was sentenced to imprisonment by default. In 1969, he fled abroad and by way of retaliation his wife was arrested and kept in isolation for 2 months. In 1974, he became a founding member of PASOK (Panhellinio Socialistiko Kinima). Immediately after PASOK's electoral victory on October 1981, he was appointed by Andreas Papandreou to minister of agriculture. During this time, he achieved the successful inclusion of Greek agriculture into the European Common Agricultural Policy. He was elected member of Parliament for the first time in 1985, when he took over the ministry of national economy (until 1987). From 1993 to 1995, he was minister of industry, energy, research and technology and was minister of commerce at the same time. On January 1996 he was elected prime minister by the parliamentary group of PASOK, after the resignation of Andreas Papandreou from the office due to health problems. The same year, he emerged from PASOK's fourth convention as the president of the movement and was reelected prime minister after PASOK's victory in September's parliamentary elections with a self-reliant parliamentary majority. In the elections of April 2000, he was reelected prime minister. The 1996 and 2000 electoral campaigns were outmaneuvered by all sorts of broadcast political communications and political marketing strategies (opinion polls, TV spots, debates, talk shows, live coverage of rallies, and so on).

On January 2004, Simitis announced his resignation from the presidency of PASOK, remaining the prime minister until the end of his second term in office and the elections of March 2004, having completed 8 consecutive years as prime minister. Simitis's premiership was characterized by an effort for the overall modernization of Greek society, especially for the stabilization and development of the economy. This policy made Greece achieve inclusion in the Economic Monetary Union in the year 2000, but the effects of Simitis's rule continue to be a central point of confrontation between political parties and among the electorate. Today, after the elections of March 2004, Costas Simitis is a member of Parliament for PASOK. His writings and public discourse include many books and texts of political and scientific interest.

Nicolas Demertzis

Sleeper Effect

The Sleeper Effect, first identified by the psychologist Carl I. Hovland in the middle of the 20th century, refers to the short-term and long-term effects of communications depending on the communicator's image.

In the 1940s, Hovland studied attitude changes on the basis of learning theory or reinforcement theory approach. Researchers Hoveland, Lumsdaine, and Sheffield examined the impact of the film The Battle of Britain (the fourth film of the series "Why We Fight" that was showed to recruits of the U.S. army) on U.S. soldiers' attitudes. They found that some changes in attitude in the direction of the communicator's position were more pronounced after several weeks than immediately after the confrontation with the film. This phenomenon they described as the Sleeper Effect.

One hypothesis that Hovland and his colleagues advanced for this result was that individuals may be suspicious of the communicator's motives, initially discount his position, and thus may show little or no change in opinion. However, with the passage of time one may remember what was communicated and not who communicated it and then may be more inclined to accept the position of the communicator.

In other experiments in the early 1950s, Hovland and Weiss wanted to verify the Sleeper Effect under controlled conditions. They examined the differences in the retention and the acquisition of identical messages when being attributed to a "trustworthy" and "untrustworthy" communicator. They then presented several identical messages—written texts about four different topics—to two different groups of students. One group was told that the messages came from a trustworthy communicator, whereas the other one believed that the messages came from an untrustworthy source. Immediately after being confronted with the messages, as well as 4 weeks later, the students answered a questionnaire concerning the factual information of the communicated message and their personal attitudes toward the topic. The main result of this experiment was that neither the acquisition nor the retention of factual information seemed to be affected by the trustworthiness of the source but that changes in attitude were related to this factor: Students who were confronted with the trustworthy communicator changed their opinion significantly more often in the direction advocated by the communicator when they believed that the message came from a trustworthy source than when they attributed the information to an untrustworthy one. The results also confirm the hypothesis of the Sleeper Effect. After 4 weeks the two groups of students showed similar attitudes. The agreement with the position of the trustworthy communicator in the first group decreased (Forgetting Effect), and the agreement in the group of the untrustworthy communicator increased (Sleeper Effect). In further experiments, Kelman and Hovland supported these findings.

However, the Sleeper Effect as a theoretical concept is not reliable as once was thought and was criticized in the following decades. One of the main critiques is that the Sleeper Effect was demonstrated by Hovland under experimental conditions, which are not comparable to real life where the process of communication is much more complex.

Sandra Lieske

Further Readings

Hovland, C. I. (1951–1952). The influence of source credibility on communication effectiveness. Public Opinion Quarterly, 15, 635–650.

Hovland, C. I., Lumsdaine, A. A., & Sheffield, F. D. (1949). Experiments on mass communication. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Kelman, H., & Hovland, C. I. (1953). "Reinstatement" of the communicator in delayed measurement of opinion change. The Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 48, 327–335.

Social Marketing

Social marketing is the application of traditional marketing tools and practices to promote social products rather than consumer goods and services. The term social marketing was coined in 1971 by Philip Kotler and Eduardo Roberto to describe socially based campaigns, though government agencies and nonprofit organizations had been using marketing practices many years beforehand. Social marketing and public communication campaigns, as well as public service campaigns, are often referred to interchangeably.

A primary goal of social marketing is to increase the acceptance of a social idea or practice in one or more groups of target audiences. Areas in which social marketing is often employed include disease prevention, gun control, the arts, conservation, seat belt usage, and charitable giving, to name only a few. Political involvement is one topic that agencies have attempted to influence. For example, Rock the Vote was designed to increase voter participation in the United States. Another current campaign, Pay Attention and Vote*,* sponsored by the Federal Voting Assistance Program, was specifically designed to increase involvement among young adults ages 18 to 24. Through various means the campaign sponsors attempt to get members of this group to vote in midterm elections.

Social marketing is similar to traditional marketing in several ways. For one, campaigns for social causes use carefully defined target audiences. Audience segmentation is based on in-depth analyses of the target members' motivations, attitudes, beliefs, and behaviors gleaned through research such as focus groups, interviews, and surveys. Generally, campaigns are designed to target individuals who are most at risk. Examples of these campaigns include efforts to get people to stop smoking or to get a colorectal exam, or to persuade large groups of individuals to work for water conservation, litter reduction, and energy reduction.

Second, creative message construction, usually employing paid professionals, uses planned persuasion goals that often use theoretical concepts. Although many campaigns are education based, a change in behavior is the ultimate goal of most social marketing campaigns. Action can range from making a phone call to report domestic abuse, to stopping smoking, or to recycling paper at the office to aid conservation efforts. Appeals to fear are a common message strategy for many public health issues. Increasingly, however, social marketers use a range of approaches designed to appeal to the audience's positive emotions and motivations.

Third, message delivery is a vital consideration as advertising, public relations, events, and word-of-mouth are strategically used to reach members of the target audience. A commonly employed technique is the public service announcement (PSA). PSAs are very similar to paid commercial advertisements. In some instances the media air the PSAs at no cost to the sponsoring agency or as a public service. More often, however, to guarantee exposure to the target audience, social change organizations budget media costs so that PSAs are paid to air just like paid advertising. In addition to mass media messages, many social marketing campaigns use peer influences and word-of-mouth. For example, the Centers for Disease Control (CDC) places a significant emphasis on the involvement of community representatives, stakeholders, and opinion leaders.

Social marketing differs from traditional marketing in several ways. For one, in commercial marketing the beneficiary is the sponsoring organization (i.e., company or individual) and profits are a desired goal. In social marketing, the goal is to improve individual members of the population or the population as a whole. In addition, government and nonprofits sponsor the social marketing messages as opposed to manufacturers and suppliers.

The Ad Council is an organization that has produced some of the most successful and memorable public service campaigns in the United States. Those campaigns include Smokey Bear's "Only You Can Prevent Forest Fires," the Crash Test Dummies "You Could Learn a Lot From a Dummy," as well as "Take a Bite Out of Crime" and "Friends Don't Let Friends Drive Drunk." Volunteers from the advertising and media professions select, plan, create, and distribute campaigns sponsored by a wide variety of government agencies and nonprofits.

In 1942 the first campaign developed by the Ad Council, then known as the War Advertising Council, sought to stimulate the sale of war bonds. Another campaign developed that same year, "Loose Lips Sink Ships," sought to aid the war effort by raising citizens' awareness of the dangers associated with sharing vital information concerning troops/armaments.

The efficacy of social marketing campaigns is evident. For example, an Ad Council campaign initiated in 1972 for the United Negro College Fund has used a variety of avenues for its message, "The Mind Is a Terrible Thing to Waste." As of 2006, the campaign had helped to raise $22 billion and graduate 350,000 minority students from college. Similarly, a campaign initiated in 1985 to increase auto safety-belt usage helped to increase the practice from 14% to 79%, saving 85,000 lives from auto fatalities and over $3.2 billion in social costs.

Effective health-related social marketing campaigns include the Stanford Five-City Heart Disease Prevention Project, among others. A current government-sponsored campaign, VERB, is designed to increase physical activity among 9- to 13-year-olds. Secondary target audiences include parents and teachers. A range of mediated messages, including posters and PSAs, are being placed to remind adolescents to be active instead of watching television or playing videogames.

Tom Reichert

See also Advocacy Advertising; Diffusion of Innovations; Rock the Vote; Youth Voting

Further Readings

Bagozzi, R. P., & Moore, D. J. (1994). Public service advertisements: Emotions and empathy guide prosocial behavior. Journal of Marketing, 58, 56–70.

Fine, S. H. (1992). Marketing the public sector: Promoting the causes of public and nonprofit agencies. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction.

Kotler, P., Roberto, N., & Lee, N. (2002). Social marketing: Improving the quality of life (2nd ed.). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

PSA Gallery (sample PSA announcements): http://www.adcouncil.org/gallery.html

Rice, R. E., & Atkin, C. K. (2000). Public communication campaigns (3rd ed.). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Weinreich, N. K. (1999). Hands-on social marketing: A step-by-step guide. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Social Responsibility Theory

The Social Responsibility Theory (SRT) argues that the press has a responsibility to the public. This theoretical approach is a result of broadcasting and media ethics. Early communication administrators such as Robert Hutchins (head of the Commission on Freedom of the Press) expressed concern over communication ethics in libertarian media cultures. Early followers of the theory believed that mass media should contribute to societal improvement. SRT has been widely recognized by media practitioners and scholars since the Commission on Freedom of the Press in 1947.

The Committee on a Free and Responsible Press (1947) expressed the view that the press should provide a truthful, comprehensive, and intelligent account of the day's events in a context which gives them meaning; serve as a forum for the exchange of comment and criticism; project a representative picture of the constituent groups in society; help in the presentation and clarification of the goals and values of society; and offer full access to the day's intelligence. The statement of principles by the American Society of Newspaper Editors (2002) restated that the primary purpose of gathering and distributing news and opinion is to serve the general welfare by informing the people and enabling them to make judgments on the issues of the time.

Early communication scholars, such as Frederick Siebert, Theodore Peterson, and Wilbur Schramm, argued that according to the relationship between the social structure and the media, each society has a particular communication system. These early scholars emphasized SRT as a desirable direction for new media societies to correspond to liberal political and social climates.

However, current scholars such as Scott Lloyd think a fresh perspective of SRT should be considered, because all information sources are interrelated and message channels grow more complicated. Thus, social responsibility for certain social actors is an obscure concept in terms of media ethics and social values. Lloyd argues that although SRT is practically and academically useful and acceptable, American society does not consistently correspond to the assumptions of SRT. He asserts that societal obligation, individual rights, and interpersonal relationships are concepts necessary to modifying the theory to fit a contemporary usage.

Levels of media accuracy and reportage depend on how social circumstances support media information. Reporting with either very few details or vague information could make media sources look unethical and socially irresponsible. Thus, the appropriateness of media roles proves troublesome in rapidly changing societies with multiple information sources. Therefore, some argue that SRT is an outdated theoretical approach, while others still assert that the media and the public should determine and uphold social values and degrees of responsibility. Besides the original SRT assumption that the media remain independent and self-regulate their level of social responsibility, all journalists need to understand the appropriate social values for a given time and place and adjust SRT to fit current social systems.

Hyun Jung Yun

Further Readings

Commission on Freedom of the Press. (1947). A free and responsible press. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Lloyd, S. (1991). A criticism of social responsibility theory: An ethical perspective. Journal of Mass Media Ethics, 6(4), 199–209.

Soft Money

Soft money describes financial contributions that are virtually unregulated by federal election laws, yet are used to influence elections. Originally designed to help local and state parties with party-building activities (such as voter registration or get-out-the-vote drives), soft money later was often used to fund “issue” ads for candidates. While “hard money” (monies regulated by the Federal Election Commission) has strict limits on the amount of contributions, soft money typically had no such limits. Soft money accounts regulated by state law could accept money from individuals, corporations, and labor unions even where federal law did not allow such contributions.

To avoid being regulated by federal law, ads funded by soft money could not expressly ask voters to vote for a specific candidate. However, the parties could address issues from the campaign so long as express advocacy was avoided. In other words, the parties’ soft money ads could ask the people to vote, but could not say “vote for” a specific candidate, even though the implication in the ad often was clear.

The Bipartisan Campaign Finance Reform Act (BCRA) banned soft money for national parties, requiring that all party-building activities be paid for with hard money that was regulated by federal law. Legal loopholes in BCRA quickly led to the formation of the so-called 527s, nonprofit political groups that could still legally accept soft money. The Democratic Party is generally credited with the creation of the 527s, but Republicans and Independents quickly participated, and groups such as Swiftboat Veterans and MoveOn.org became key 527s in the 2004 presidential race, spending millions of dollars to influence the vote. Named after section 527 of the IRS tax code, these groups are required to file their contribution list with either the Internal Revenue Service or their home state, but there is little restriction on contributions.

Numerous organizations have campaigned both for and against a total ban on soft money. Proponents of a ban argue that soft money allows contributors to contribute more funds than allowed by legal contribution limits. Opponents of a soft money ban argue that such a ban would violate free speech rights in the political process and unnecessarily chill political activity.

In 2006, the U.S. House of Representatives passed a bill called the 527 Reform Act, seeking again to tighten the loopholes on soft money, but the bill has not passed in the U.S. Senate.

Glenda C. Williams

See also Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act; Campaign Finance

Further Readings

Bauer, R. F. (2003). More soft money, hard law. Washington, DC: Perkins Coie.

Corrado, A., Mann, T. E., Ortiz, D., & Potter, T. (2005). The new campaign finance sourcebook. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

Soft News

The term soft news was originally synonymous with feature stories placed in newspapers or television newscasts for human interest. Such stories were often placed much lower in priority than more urgent items. However, more recently soft news evolved into a concept associated with a style of journalism that blurs the line between information and entertainment. In addition to soft news stories, there are now entire soft news programs and reporters who present with a soft news style. Professional journalists often make a distinction between hard news and soft news this way: Hard news stories require immediate attention to an event or incident, soft news stories usually center on the lives of people. In 1973 Gaye Tuchman noted that the publication of hard news of the moment cannot be delayed, whereas soft news stories have no urgency. Tuchman suggested that hard news concerns issues, politics, economics, international relations, welfare, and scientific developments, soft news focuses on human interest stories and gossip. Gamson's 1989 guidelines for soft news suggest it is "telling stories about the world rather than presenting information, even though the stories of course include factual elements." Repeated studies begun in 1995 by the Global Media Monitoring Project have found women are more likely to be assigned soft news stories about entertainment, arts, and culture. Such stories are also more likely to feature women in traditional, rather than professional, roles.

Beginning in the late 1990s media critics and some scholars expressed concern over the so-called feminization of the media, exemplified by an announcement by the Wall Street Journal that it was setting aside more space for "family news." Scott and Gobetz documented an upward trend in the amount of soft news carried in the three major network newscasts between 1972 and 1987, from 59 to 73 seconds in 1973 to 90 seconds in 1987. Critics such as former Vice President Al Gore believe the recent de-emphasis on hard news stories characterizes the bottom line mentality of media conglomerates that want to maximize profits by giving readers and viewers what they want instead of what they need. If that is indeed the case, this corporate strategy is not working, because there is evidence that the shift from hard news to soft news has not stopped the decline in news audiences.

Beyond the cultural dynamics of what makes news "hard" or "soft," Thomas Patterson argued soft news "weakens the foundation of democracy by diminishing the public's information about public affairs and its interest in politics." His 2-year study of Americans' news habits concluded soft news distorts the public's perceptions of politics and public affairs. He argued his evidence indicates that as interest in public affairs declines, so does interest in news, therefore what is good for democracy is also good for the press.

Others have challenged this general notion, suggesting the effects of soft news differ, depending on whether members of the audience are actually interested in politics (specifically, foreign affairs). The least politically engaged citizens are more likely to view soft news programs and outlets. Such viewers do gain political information from programs such as Oprah and The Daily Show. Some studies have shown that knowledge of candidates is positively correlated to viewing of late night soft news, while such knowledge is not associated with viewing morning news programs.

While the effects of soft news on political knowledge and interest are debated, features, entertainment, and lifestyle stories continue to be a substantial part of print and broadcast news content. The 2006 Report on the State of News Media indicates "Celebrity/Entertainment" and "Lifestyle" stories make up nearly 17% of broadcast stories by duration and nearly 10% of print stories by length. In contrast, "Election" and "Government" stories make up 15% of broadcast stories and 21% of print stories. Similar research on Web news content is now under way. However, indications are that Web news stories may be even more driven by advertising in the digital medium than in traditional broadcast and print.

Lisa Mills-Brown

See also News Coverage of Politics

Further Readings

Baum, M. (2003). Soft news goes to war. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Brewer, P., & Cao, X. (2006). Candidate appearances on soft news shows and public knowledge about primary campaigns. Journal of Broadcasting and Electronic Media, 50(1), 18–35.

Gamson, W. (1989). News as framing. American Behavioral Scientist, 33(2), 157–161.
Graber, D. (1989). Content and meaning. American Behavioral Scientist, 33(2), 144–152.
Patterson, T. E. (2000, December). Doing well and doing good. KSG Working Paper No. 01–001. Retrieved December 28, 2006, from http://ssrn.com/abstract=257395 or 10.2139/ssrn.257395
The Project of Excellence in Journalism. (n.d.). State of the news media report. Retrieved December 28, 2006, from http://www.stateofthenewsmedia.com/2006/index.asp Scott, D. K., & Gobetz, R. H. (1992). Hard/soft news content of the national broadcast networks: 1972–1987. Journalism Quarterly, 69(2), 406–412.
Tuchman, G. (1973). Making news by doing work. American Journal of Sociology, 79(1), 110–131.

Solidarity Movement

Solidarity began in September 1980 at the Lenin Shipyards, and although it was a Polish trade union federation originally led by Lech Wałęsa, it in fact constituted a broad anticommunist social movement. It rapidly changed into an umbrella organization under which a broad range of political and social groups united in opposition to the communist regime.

At Solidarity's first national congress in 1981, a program calling for an active Solidarity role in reforming Poland's political and economic systems was adopted. The government attempted to destroy the organization with the martial law of 1981 and several years of repression. The organization was forced underground until the late 1980s. During its underground phase, Solidarity lost much of its original cohesion as tactical and philosophical disagreements split the movement into factions. The radical elements, convinced that an evolutionary approach to democratization was impossible, created the organization called Fighting Solidarity in 1982. Ultimately, however, Wałęsa's moderate faction prevailed. Favoring negotiation and compromise with the Polish United Workers' Party, the moderates created the Citizens' Committee, which represented Solidarity at the Round Table Talks and brought about the election triumph of June 1989. A coalition government led by Solidarity was formed and in December Wałęsa was elected president. The organization not only had regained its legal status as a trade union but also had become an effective political movement that installed Eastern Europe's first post-communist government.

The defeat of the ruling Polish United Workers' Party in the June 1989 parliamentary elections removed Solidarity's most important unifying force, that is, the common enemy. By the time of the local elections of 1990, Solidarity had divided, and a number of small parties had appeared. Since 1989 Solidarity has become a more traditional trade union and has assumed less and less importance on the political scene of Poland. A political arm was founded in 1996 as Solidarity Electoral Action won the Polish parliamentary election in 1997 but lost the following 2001 election. Currently Solidarity has little political influence on modern Polish politics.

The survival of Solidarity was an unprecedented event not only in Poland, a satellite state of the USSR ruled by a one-party communist regime, but in the whole of the Eastern Bloc. It meant a break in the strong position of the communist Polish United Workers' Party and the broader Soviet communist regime in the Eastern Bloc.

Solidarity's influence led to the intensification and spread of anticommunist ideals and movements throughout the countries of the Eastern Bloc, weakening their communist governments and causing the peaceful anticommunist counterrevolutions in Central and Eastern Europe. Solidarity's example was in various ways repeated by opposition groups throughout the Eastern countries, leading to the communist Eastern Bloc's dismantling and contributing to the collapse of the Soviet Union in the early 1990s.

Andrzej Falkowski

See also Wałęsa, Lech

Further Readings

Ash, T. G. (2002). The Polish revolution: Solidarity. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
Osa, M. (2003). Solidarity and contention: Networks of Polish opposition. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Sorensen, Theodore C.

See Kennedy, John F.

Sound Bite

Sound bite is a term most often used by television journalists, although radio journalists use the term clip in the same way. A bite is one of the staple elements of electronic journalists who face increasing pressure to present their stories in a very limited amount of time. Electronic journalists are rarely allotted the time inside a newscast to include an entire recorded interview, thus they select parts or pieces of the interview and edit them into their reports as sound bites. One college-level electronic journalism textbook describes the process this way: "Once the sounds bites have been selected, the story should begin to fall into place around them." The idea behind this selection is to choose a sound bite that clearly and succinctly conveys meaning or emotion. Objective sound bites are chosen for description or fact. Subjective sound bites are chosen to give the viewer a sense of feeling in the story. Voiceover narration connects the bites together and, when well written, provides context for the bites in the sentences immediately before and after the selections. In television, the name and title of the person in the sound bite is often superimposed on the screen. In radio, the name and title are used in the sentence prior to, or immediately following, the clip.

Sound bites have been criticized most often by politicians, who would naturally prefer that their entire interview be aired on the news. However, there also has been increasing concern among media critics about the effects of the so-called shrinking sound bite. One academic study compared sound bites used in presidential elections since 1968 and found the average length of a candidate statement dropped from 43 seconds in 1968 to 8 seconds in 2000. Critics argue such short sound bites do little to add meaning or information to a report. Critics also suggest journalists are increasingly prone to choosing sound bites that express extreme opinion or overcharged emotion. Such sound bites might attract viewers' attention and provide entertainment value, but critics argue they do little to help viewers understand complex circumstances or issues.

Journalists have often been defined as selectors, wading through documents, interviews, and in the case of television, video to choose the elements that, in the best cases, lead viewers somewhere near to the truth. Newspaper quotes came long before sound bites and neither is likely to go away. The people most likely to be quoted or used in sounds bites know this and prepare themselves with the help of books and articles such as one published in the July 2003 Harvard Management Communication Newsletter, which offers "four secrets to delivering the right sound bites."

Lisa Mills-Brown

Further Readings

Scheuer, J. (1999). The sound bite society. New York: Routledge.

Speeches, Presidential

Presidential speeches are in their most basic form, verbal events that occur when the chief executive decides to communicate with the public. For most of American history, these speeches take the form of prepared addresses by a president and communicated to the people. Presidential speeches touch upon a wide variety of interrelated topics ranging from campaigning to governing to bolstering public support. When presidents campaign for either themselves or others, they are seeking the public to support themselves and members of their party for elected office.

Perhaps the most famous of all presidential speeches are the inaugural addresses. After taking the oath of office, each president gives a speech in which the president sets out a vision for America. These speeches are also instrumental in setting the tone for the incoming, or in the case of reelection, continuing administration. For many administrations prior to President Hoover, the inaugural addresses are the only public speeches the national government has archived. Other speeches are recorded, but there is not a standardized system. The National Records and Archives Administration was created in 1957 in response to the lack of uniformity in the collection of presidential speeches. Since then, the national government has publicly collected all the speeches and public communication for every president since Harry Truman. These speeches compiled by the government are published as part of the Public Papers of the President. They also have all this material for the Herbert Hoover administration, but the Franklin D. Roosevelt papers were donated and published privately before the establishment of the national archives.

The State of the Union speeches are also considered some of the most important presidential speeches. The Constitution in Article II, Section 3 says the president shall from time to time give Congress information regarding the State of the Union. George Washington, on January 8, 1790, personally delivered the first State of the Union speech to both chambers of Congress during a joint meeting in New York. However, Thomas Jefferson chose to send his written communication to Congress regarding the State of the Union believing Washington's approach too similar to that of a monarch. The tradition of a written State of the Union address delivered to Congress continued for the next 112 years. Woodrow Wilson was the first president to revive the spoken State of the Union address to a joint session of Congress. Calvin Coolidge was the first president to have his State of the Union broadcast on radio, and Harry Truman the first on television. With the movement toward broadcasting the speeches to the public, they have also become events in which the president can present a yearly vision for the country to the people. These speeches have become some of the most critiqued, analyzed, and dissected of a president's administration.

President Lyndon B. Johnson addresses the nation, announcing a bombing halt in Vietnam and his intention not to run for reelection (March 1968).

Source: LBJ Library photo by Yoichi R. Yokamoto.

In the early years of both radio and television, presidential speeches drew large media audiences, and presidents used these tools as a way to avoid exhaustive travel. Franklin Roosevelt's paralysis and Dwight Eisenhower's declining health inhibited them from vigorously engaging in speaking tours throughout the country. A nationally televised presidential address often preempts other television programs. At that moment, the president has the attention of the majority of the American public. Presidents save these occasions for highly scripted and carefully orchestrated speeches to convey thoughts, actions, or ideas. Presidents have used these occasions to deliver State of the Union addresses, resign from office (Richard Nixon), announce policies or military actions, and a multitude of other things. In the latter part of the 20th century, however, television viewers for these broadcasted speeches began to wane. Some blame the rise of cable television while an equally viable explanation may lie in the vast array of distractions available to the public in the form of the Internet, mobile phones, and other forms of modern technology. As technology has increased, the ability to self-select news sources has grown so many people do not need to commit time toward watching television to learn the contents of a speech delivered by the president.

Presidential campaign speeches often unavoidably involve the coordination of practical problems such as transportation. Before the 1896 presidential campaign, candidates often relied on surrogates to give campaign speeches on their behalf throughout the country. Surrogates were often well-known local or regional orators who would stump on behalf of a political party's candidate. As a candidate, William Jennings Bryan in 1896 was the first to give a large whistle stop tour filled with speeches. The 1908 campaign was also important because it was the first to involve speechmaking from candidates of both major parties. The 1912 campaign is notable for a wide variety of well-known speakers (Louis Brandeis, William Jennings Bryan, James Gillett) standing in for President Taft and the other candidates (Woodrow Wilson, Theodore Roosevelt, and Robert LaFollette). Before modern transportation, travel constraints often kept sitting presidents from giving campaign speeches at the same pace as their rivals. The duty to govern the country often took precedence over long and grueling travel around the United States. Many presidents from Taft onwards used the White House to their advantage by allowing the press corps greater access to craft stories publicizing the activities and commitment of the chief executive.

President Coolidge was the first president to address the nation by radio from the White House in 1924. In fact, during his run for the presidency that same year, Coolidge gave his final campaign speech on the radio, garnering the largest listening audience of any broadcast to date. President Franklin Roosevelt most notably employed radio broadcasts with his fireside chats. Thirty speeches spanning more than a decade, from 1933 to 1944, the fireside chats humanized an American president in ways no previous administration had achieved. The term was coined because Roosevelt sought to cultivate an image of him actually sitting in the living room of individual citizens informally conversing about his policies and actions. These talks were enormously successful in forging a new relationship between the public and presidency. People viewed Roosevelt as a friend and partner who took the time to carefully explain his strategies in clear, straightforward terms. The use of television by later presidents further served to amplify the president's relationship with the American public. Though Franklin Roosevelt was the first president to appear regionally on television in 1939 at the opening of the New York World's Fair, Harry Truman was the first president to have an address nationally broadcast in 1951. Neither president, however, used television as a mechanism to directly connect with the public. In 1953, Dwight Eisenhower was the first president to give regular televised news conferences, interacting with reporters and answering their questions. Like Franklin D. Roosevelt with radio, he saw this new medium as a way to manage his image and foster a bond between him and the public. Between his heart attack in 1955 and intestinal surgery in June 1956, Eisenhower was quite ill toward the end of his first term. He used televised speeches to interject himself into American homes during his reelection campaign. Television campaign commercials cultivating an image of health put Eisenhower into practically every American household. This television approach succeeded with Eisenhower winning in a landslide.

The creation and content of presidential speeches are also quite interesting. Throughout history, American presidents have both written their own speeches as well as delegated that task to others. One of the most famous presidential speeches, George Washington's farewell address, was actually written by John Jay, Alexander Hamilton, and James Madison. Lincoln frequently used William Seward for help with speeches. Theodore Roosevelt wrote many of his own speeches, even writing one in the smoking room of Penn Station in New York waiting for a train. The first president with a full-time White House speechwriter was Warren G. Harding, and his speechwriter continued through the Calvin Coolidge administration after Harding's death. The Franklin D. Roosevelt administration marked a noticeable change in the nature of presidential speechwriting. Before FDR, speechwriters were often someone personally or professionally close to the president. During the Roosevelt presidency, speeches were no longer given to friends, colleagues, or a single assistant to craft. Instead, FDR created a large assembly of people often referred to as the Brain Trust. These people were not credited as speechwriters but were often referred to as administrative assistants. It was not until 1969 when Nixon created the Writing and Research Department that the White House had a formal office for speechwriting. Since then, speechwriters have become an acknowledged and often well-known part of the president's staff. However, the1969 change was more than just a new office title for presidential speeches. Before this period, policy creation and speechwriting were often one and the same. Afterwards, speechwriters found their access to the president curtailed, and speechwriting was often reduced to "wordsmithing" rather than policy formulation. Speeches have often become more of a negotiation between the president, various departments, policy officials, and the speechwriters. The balance between the president's intent, departmental policy goals, and speech integrity often creates fights and power struggles within administrations. The study of speeches from inception to delivery has received more attention in recent years. Often, what is included and excluded in draft speeches reveals much about the attitude and focus of an administration. While each speech is different, almost all speeches in the modern era have followed a similar process. This process usually involves receiving the assignment, creation, editing, and circulation of a draft, and revisions from various interested parties including the president. Most presidential speeches are highly scripted, though the final version is always left up to the chief executive. Some speeches are written long in advance, while others are quickly written, often in response to national tragedies such as the events of September 11 or the explosion of the space shuttle. Many presidents, though they do not often create the speech, involve themselves in crafting the final product into a form that flows more with their general speaking styles. These changes may involve insertions and deletions of specific words, but they are not solely limited to minor shifts.

Presidential speeches are the president's way of communicating with the public. Different types of speeches allow presidents to pursue different goals. Congresspersons have distinct incumbency advantages through franking privileges, pork barrel legislation, and name recognition. The president similarly has strong advantages through occupying the office. Most important, any appearance, engagement, or event inevitably attracts attention. Consequently, every word or phrase spoken by the president invites scrutiny. How and what a president says can have major implications both domestically as well as internationally. Presidential speeches can often impact popularity, polling, and support. A successful speech can help the president gain support needed to persuade Congress, other governments, or constituents into backing the president's own policies. The first president to actively reach out to the public through speeches was Theodore Roosevelt. Roosevelt believed presidential power was rooted in public approval, not the constitution. Theodore Roosevelt's use of the "bully pulpit" allowed him to make appeals to the public to win support for his policies. When he lacked support in Congress for the Hepburn Act in 1906, Roosevelt gave public speeches with the intent of shaping public opinion to influence the legislative branch.

In more modern times, this common technique is referred to as "going public." Constitutionally, the president should convey his ideas to Congress, and, in turn, they relay these thoughts to their constituents since the population directly elected them while the president was indirectly elected via the Electoral College. Going public means the president bypasses Congress and appeals directly to the people. If the president can successfully sway the public through speeches, then he can use their support to pressure Congress into backing his administration's policies and goals. With the advent of radio and later television, speeches from the president have increasingly employed the "going public" technique. They have been able to communicate national-level appeals directly into the homes of the American public. In recent years as national television audiences have waned for presidents' speeches, there has been an increase in the number of local speeches presidents give throughout the United States. George W. Bush, in particular, has been notable for the large number of similar speeches he has given in smaller locales throughout America. During his first term in office, George W. Bush gave a smaller percentage of speeches in the largest media markets than any other president in the past 35 years.

Presidential speechmaking is not static. Every administration has its own style and preferred methods of delivery. Bill Clinton enjoyed giving more informal speeches whereas George W. Bush leans more toward scripted events. When a president gives a speech, there is always an audience. Some speeches, such as honoring a championship sports team, are innocuous, while others, such as Franklin Roosevelt's speech on December 8, 1941, asking Congress to declare war on Japan, are extremely significant. Speeches given by a president can help inform, persuade, and even help heal the American public. How, when, and why a president says something within a speech can have serious repercussions to his administration, the country, as well as the world.

Shannon L. Bow

See also Presidential Communication

Further Readings

Allen, C. (1993). Eisenhower and the mass media: Peace, prosperity, and prime time TV. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Edwards, G. C., III. (2003). On deaf ears: The limits of the bully pulpit. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Eshbaugh-Soha, M. (2006). The president's speeches: Beyond "going public." Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.

Gelderman, C. (1997). All the president's words: The bully pulpit and the creation of the virtual presidency. New York: Walker.

Jamieson, K. H. (1988). Eloquence in an electronic age: The transformation of political speechmaking. New York: Oxford University Press.

Kendall, K. E. (2000). Communication in the presidential primaries. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Kernell, S. (1997). Going public: New strategies of presidential leadership (3rd ed.). Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Ritter, K., & Medhurst, M. J. (2003). Presidential speechwriting: From the New Deal to the Reagan revolution and beyond. College Station: Texas A&M University Press.

Spiegel Affair

During the so-called Spiegel affair of 1962 the German weekly news magazine Der Spiegel was accused of high treason after having published an article about the weak points of the Western defensive alliance. The critical reactions by the majority of the media concerning the proceeding of the government against the magazine were taken as a symbol of the redemocratization of the German media after World War II. Never before or afterwards has the German press been called a fourth power more often.

In the context of the criminal charges against Spiegel the editors' offices were searched in the night. This house search remained questionable because according to German law, this type of search is only allowed if there is either an imminent danger or if it can contribute to catching somebody in the act. The district attorney claimed that the first reason was given, because they had erroneously arrested a person who they had thought to be the magazine's publisher, Rudolf Augstein, and now feared that evidence could be destroyed. However, the opponents of the police raid stated that because it was such a long time after the story came out, no one could speak of an imminent danger and the person arrested in no way resembled Augstein. Another point that led to negative reactions was the fact that a lot of material that had nothing to do with the case itself but was of general interest to the government was also confiscated. Augstein as well as Conrad Ahlers, the journalist responsible for the story, were searched in connection with warrants of arrest. Whereas Augstein gave himself up to the police, Ahlers was arrested in Spain. Ahlers's arrest on foreign territory, which was arranged by Secretary of Defense Franz Josef Strauss, caused considerable indignation because it was somewhat out of their legal jurisdiction, as the government had to admit later. Strauss denied his involvement in the arrest because he did not want to appear vengeful. After all, his relationship to Spiegel had been bad for years because the magazine had repeatedly tried to create a scandal regarding Strauss's behavior because Augstein wanted to keep the upcoming politician away from the chancellorship because he disapproved of his defense policy. Strauss suffered heavily when his participation was proved. The Spiegel affair caused a coalition crisis because the attorney general, who was supposed to be in charge, had not been fully informed about the steps carried out against Spiegel; instead it was the Department of the Defense that took matters into their own hands. Strauss had to resign but was able to make a political comeback and ran as chancellor candidate of the Christian Democrats in 1980, but the fact that he never became chancellor is attributed by many to the Spiegel affair.

Mona Krewel

See also Adenauer, Konrad

Further Readings

Jankus, A. (2001). Franz Josef Strauss und die Medien—analysiert am Beispiel des Hamburger Nachrichtenmagazins Der Spiegel [Franz Josef Strauss and the media—analyzed by the case of Hamburg's newsmagazine Der Spiegel]. Unpublished master's thesis, University of Mainz, Germany.

Spin, Political

Spin is a pejorative term often used in the context of public relations practitioners and political communicators. It is used to refer to the sophisticated selling of a specific message that is heavily biased in favor of one's own position and that employs maximum management of the media with the intention of maintaining or exerting control over the situation, often implying deception or manipulation.

In the political context, it is often associated with government press conferences in which it is understood that the press secretary or the government official has a vested interested in communicating a political message to have a desired outcome, often to the neglect of delivering the full truth of a situation. In such situations, the press conference room is sometimes cynically referred to as the "spin room" and the schedule of briefings as the "spin cycle."

Spin techniques may include careful timing in delivering information, selective presentation of facts, careful selection of words and phrases meant to invoke certain responses in hearers, choice of sound bites, or redefining of terms and phrases. Skillful practitioners of spin are sometimes pejoratively referred to as "spin doctors," "spin merchants," or "spinmeisters," among other unflattering terms.

Famous and successful "spinsters" in the political arena have included Mike McCurry, press secretary to former President Bill Clinton, who has been called a "spinmeister extraordinaire" with his ability to maintain charm and wit while occasionally misleading reporters, intimidating and also courting correspondents, and managing a litany of damaging stories coming out of an administration mired in controversy.

Another well-known example to whom the label has been applied is Britain's Peter Mandelson, who was head of Prime Minister Tony Blair's publicity machine and successful political campaigns. He was considered ruthless in his management of the media in favor of Blair's message and using the media to cast opposers in a negative light.

The rise of spin and media pressures has been said to be harmful to the political system in that it has contributed to ongoing cynicism among journalists and the voting public as politics is increasingly viewed more as theater than governing.

Concern over the effects of spin have manifested in the popular culture with the rise of talk shows, talk show personalities, and self-proclaimed "fact-checkers" such as Bill O'Reilly's No Spin Zone, and numerous Web sites proclaiming to help a cynical and unsuspecting public unravel the barrage of political spin.

Sandra Braun

See also Public Relations, Political

Further Readings

Fritz, B., Keefer, B., & Nyhan, B. (2004). All the president's spin: George W. Bush, the media, and the truth. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Kurtz, H. (1995). Media circus. New York: Random House.

Kurtz, H. (1998). Spin cycle: Inside the Clinton propaganda machine. New York: Free Press.

Spin Alley

See Spin, Political

Spin Doctor

See Spin, Political

Spiral of Silence

The spiral of silence theory, which was developed by German survey and communication researcher Elisabeth Noelle-Neumann in the 1960s and 1970s, is one of the most frequently cited and debated theories in the field of communication studies. Formulated against a backdrop of surprising election outcomes and group-dynamic processes during the era of student protests in Germany in the 1960s and 1970s, the theory attempts to describe collective opinion formation and societal decision making in situations where the issue being debated or decided upon is controversial and morally loaded.

In the literature in the field, the theory of the spiral of silence is often reduced to a single premise; that is, that people who feel their opinion is held by the minority tend to fall silent in public. Although this is a perfectly accurate description of one key aspect of the theory, it is in fact just one element of a far more comprehensive theory of how public opinion functions. In the context of the theory, the term public opinion refers to opinions or behavior that can be displayed or expressed in public without running the risk of social isolation or, in some cases, that even must be displayed to avoid the danger of isolation. Public is not meant in the legal sense (freely accessible to all) nor in the sense of a political category, in other words, as something that concerns the general public or society as a whole. Instead, the concept is interpreted from a social psychological perspective as a state of consciousness in which individuals, who are subjected to the gaze of those around them, consciously realize that their actions are "seen by all" and "heard by all" and must therefore constantly monitor the reactions of others in their environment. Accordingly, Noelle-Neumann views public opinion as a form of social control that ultimately applies to everyone, regardless of social class, and that is apparent in many areas of life, ranging from controversial political issues to fashion, morals, and values. This understanding of public opinion stands in contrast to another conception which views public opinion as the result of rational debate among an educated elite that is of crucial importance for the state.

The theory of the spiral of silence must be viewed in the light of this social psychological understanding of public and public opinion. At the same time, the theory also rests on the notion that there is such a thing as a "social nature of man," which causes people to fear social isolation and thus substantially influences their actions in public.

Origins of the Theory

The theory of the spiral of silence did not originate from abstract theoretical thinking, but from a surprising research finding for which a plausible explanation had to be found. This puzzling finding was encountered in connection with election research conducted during the 1965 German federal election campaign. Months before Election Day in September 1965, Noelle-Neumann and her staff at the Allensbach Institute for Public Opinion Research launched a series of surveys designed to track the entire campaign. Over the course of 10 months, from December 1964 to shortly before Election Day, the survey findings on voting intentions remained practically unchanged. Month after month, the two major parties, the governing Christian Democratic Party and the opposing Social Democratic Party, were in a dead heat, with about 45% of the population intending to vote for each party. Under these circumstances, it seemed impossible to predict which party was most likely to win the election. Throughout the entire campaign, the two parties remained locked in a neck-and-neck race.

In the final few weeks and days prior to the election, however, the situation suddenly changed, with survey findings showing a so-called last-minute swing in favor of the Christian Democrats. After a standstill that had persisted for months on end, the percentage of respondents who said they intended to vote for the Christian Democrats in the upcoming election suddenly climbed to almost 50%, while the share who intended to vote for the Social Democrats dropped to less than 40%. In the end, the election outcome confirmed these final survey findings: The Christian Democratic Party clearly won the election with 49% of the vote and the Social Democrats obtained 40%.

On attempting to determine what had caused this last-minute change in voting intentions, the puzzle was encountered that ultimately led to the development of the spiral of silence theory. Namely, while voting intentions—as measured via the question, "If the next federal election were held this Sunday, which party would you vote for?"—remained unchanged over the course of many months, responses to the following trend question shifted dramatically over the same period of time: "Of course, nobody can know for sure, but what do you think: who is going to win the election?" In December 1964, the percentage of respondents who expected the Social Democrats would win the election was about the same as the share who anticipated a Christian Democratic victory—in fact, the Social Democrats even had a slight edge. But then the results began to change direction. The percentage of respondents who expected a Christian Democratic victory rose relentlessly, while the Social Democrats continually lost ground. By as early as July 1965, the Christian Democrats were clearly in the lead; by August, almost 50% anticipated a Christian Democratic victory. It was not until late in the campaign that the bandwagon effect came into play, with 3% to 4% of voters being caught up by the general current and swept along in the direction of the expected winner.

How could party strength possibly have remained constant for so long while at the same time expectations as to who would win the election change so dramatically? Noelle-Neumann suspected that a visit by the Queen of England to Germany in the summer of 1965 may have contributed to the situation. Under sunny skies, the Queen traveled up and down the country, being greeted at all times by cheering crowds and with Chancellor Ludwig Erhard, a Christian Democrat who was extremely popular anyway, almost always at her side. Had the images of this state visit, the cheerful atmosphere, perhaps given rise to an optimistic mood among the supporters of the governing Christian Democratic Party, prompting them to gladly proclaim their convictions? And might the supporters of the Social Democrats thus suddenly have felt that they were surrounded by political opponents on all sides? Had they allowed themselves to be intimidated by their opponents' ebullient mood and ultimately fallen silent, to the point where their own political camp was hardly visible in public, even though it was actually no smaller than that of their opponents? Had the social nature of man, man's fear of isolation, caused the Social Democrats' supporters to fall silent?

Subsequently, especially during the emotionally charged federal election campaign of 1972, the Allensbach Institute gradually gathered survey data pointing to man's fear of isolation, to the tendency to speak out or fall silent in controversial, morally loaded debates. The pattern that had been observed during the 1965 campaign was detected again on other occasions—and thus the spiral of silence theory slowly began to take shape. The following is a brief summary of the theory's most salient points.

Key Elements of the Theory

People experience fear of isolation. They have a fear—probably developed over the course of evolution—of being rejected by those around them. For this reason, people constantly monitor the behavior of others in their surroundings, attentively noting which opinions and modes of behavior meet with public approval or disapproval. But people do not only observe their environment. They also—in part unconsciously—issue their own threats of isolation via what they say and do, via behavior such as turning away from someone, knitting their brow, laughing at someone, and so on. These are the signals that individuals perceive, showing them which opinions meet with approval and which do not. Since most people fear isolation, they tend to refrain from publicly stating their position when they perceive that this would attract enraged objections, laughter, scorn, or similar threats of isolation. Conversely, those who sense that their opinion meets with approval tend to voice their convictions fearlessly, freely, gladly, and at times vociferously. Speaking out loudly and gladly enhances the threat of isolation directed at the supporters of the opposing position, reinforcing their sense of standing alone with their opinion and thus their growing tendency to conceal their opinion in public. A spiraling process begins, whereby the dominant camp becomes ever louder and more self-confident, while the other camp falls increasingly silent.

This process does not occur at all times and in all situations, but only in connection with issues that have a strong moral component, in other words, in situations where ideology, agitation, and emotions come into play. The process of public opinion is not set in motion if there is no underlying moral fundament implying that those who think differently are not merely stupid, but bad. This moral element is what gives public opinion its power and allows it to levy the threat of isolation that sets the spiral of silence in motion. Only controversial issues can trigger a spiral of silence. Topics on which there is social consensus—true consensus and not merely outward agreement—give rise to no disagreement and thus leave no room for a spiral of silence.

The actual strength of the different camps of opinion does not necessarily determine which view will predominate in public. An opinion can dominate in public and exert the pressure of isolation even if the majority of the population holds the opposing view that has come under pressure—yet does not publicly admit to holding this position.

The mass media can significantly influence the spiral of silence process. If the majority of the media take the same side in a morally charged controversy, they exert a substantial, presumably even decisive influence on the direction which the spiral of silence takes. Thus far, no instances in which a spiral of silence ran contrary to the media tenor have been observed.

As a rule, people are not consciously aware of either the fear or threat of isolation. They observe behavior in their environment that is indicative of self-confidence and strength and react to threats of isolation levied by their surroundings with fear and silence.

Public opinion is limited by time and place. As a rule, a spiral of silence only holds sway over a society for a limited period of time. In this regard, there are both short-lived elements, such as the controversy over the sinking of the Brent Spar oil platform in the 1990s, and extremely long-term elements, such as the growing tendency in Western societies over the course of the past centuries to attach ever greater importance to the value of equality. In geographical terms, the area in which a certain climate of opinion predominates can be of varying size. Thus, there have even been a few cases of globally valid public opinion in recent history, such as the public opinion that isolated South Africa around the world for decades and ultimately forced the apartheid regime to step down from power. Generally, however, the process of public opinion, and thus the spiral of silence, tends to be limited by national borders or the borders of a particular cultural group. When viewed in hindsight or from an outsider's perspective, it is hard to comprehend the agitation and emotional fervor that accompany a spiral of silence.

Public opinion serves as an instrument of social control, indirectly ensuring social cohesion. Whenever there is especially strong integrative pressure in a society, as found in connection with the spiral of silence, this generally indicates that the issue or controversy that triggered the spiral of silence poses a particularly great threat to social cohesion. In extreme cases, the spiral of silence culminates in a situation where certain topics can either only be broached using a specific vocabulary (political correctness) or cannot be mentioned at all (taboo), lest people wish to be the target of extremely harsh signals of social isolation.

Difficulties Encountered When Testing the Theory of the Spiral of Silence

Over the past 3 decades, the spiral of silence theory has been subjected to numerous empirical tests, many of which have been based on misinterpretations of the theory. The spiral of silence model is contingent upon a number of conditions and is not designed to be a universal theory that can explain every social situation, since it is, as stated above, only one part of a more comprehensive theory of public opinion. Given the complexity of the spiral of silence model and the numerous conditions that must be fulfilled for the theory to apply, it is fair to ask how the theory can be empirically tested at all, an issue which numerous researchers have addressed over the past few decades.

The most common misunderstanding found in many tests of the theory pertains to the concept of the "quasi-statistical sense." In Noelle-Neumann's book The Spiral of Silence, this term is used to describe people's tendency to constantly monitor their environment, thereby assessing which opinions are gaining ground and may be expressed in public and which ones are losing ground and hence connected with the threat of isolation. The concept of the quasi-statistical sense is often misinterpreted, as if Noelle-Neumann were saying that most people have some sort of cash register in the back of their heads with which they continually estimate and record the distribution of opinions among the population. Yet this is not what this somewhat unfortunately formulated term means. On the contrary, the spiral of silence theory assumes that the perception of which opinions meet with public approval or disapproval is not, as a rule, a conscious process. People who are not directly subjected to the pressure of isolation in a particular situation are apparently unable to rationally comprehend the behavior of those who do find themselves under pressure from the climate of opinion.

Thus, there is generally no point in attempting to test the spiral of silence theory via hypothetical questions such as, "Do you tend to remain silent if you think that your opinion is held by the minority?" Questions asking respondents to estimate the percentage of people who hold a particular view are also of little value. When asked directly, "Do you think your opinion is shared by the majority?" most respondents tend to say "yes." Yet speaking out and falling silent do not depend on whether people, on considering the matter rationally, claim to be in the majority. People who hold a view that is subject to pressure from the climate of opinion still become increasingly less willing to speak out even if they deny this when asked directly during the interview. In 1997, Caroll Glynn, Andrew Hayes, and James Shanahan completed a meta-analysis of a total of 17 studies designed to test the spiral of silence, ultimately determining that most of the studies included in their analysis revealed only a slight connection between respondents' willingness to speak out and whether they assumed they held the majority opinion. Hence, the authors concluded that there was only weak empirical corroboration for the assumptions on which the spiral of silence theory is based. In fact, however, practically all of the investigations included in the meta-analysis focused on abstract, hypothetical situations. None of the studies analyzed created an interview situation in which there was in fact perceptible pressure from the climate of opinion.

Contributions of the Theory to the Field of Communication Studies

Even though most attempts to test the spiral of silence theory empirically have been less than satisfactory thus far, the spiral of silence theory is still indisputably one of the most inspiring theories to emerge in the field of communication studies in the 20th century. Few other theories have had a similar impact on empirical communication research. Although there is still no definitive proof that the assumptions formulated in the theory are in fact correct, there are at least numerous indications and research findings from other scientific fields, such as behavioral research and psychology, that are in line with the theory and would seem to indicate that the core elements of the theory are fundamentally correct. The theory has also proved influential in the political sphere. In Germany, at least, conclusions drawn from the theory about how to act successfully in election campaigns are now regularly considered by campaign strategists.

Thomas Petersen

Further Readings

Glynn, C., Hayes, A. F., & Shanahan, J. (1997). Perceived support for one's opinions and willingness to speak out: A meta-analysis of survey studies on the "spiral of silence." Public Opinion Quarterly, 61, 452–463.

Glynn, C., & McLeod, J. M. (1985). Implications of the spiral of silence theory for communication and public opinion research. In K. R. Sanders, L. L. Kaid, & D. Nimmo (Eds.), Political Communication Yearbook 1984 (pp. 43–65). Carbondale: Southern Illinois University.

Noelle-Neumann, E. (1974). The spiral of silence: A theory of public opinion. Journal of Communication, 24, 43–51.

Noelle-Neumann, E. (1993). The spiral of silence. Public opinion—Our social skin (2nd ed.). Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Scheufele, D. A., & Moy, P. (2000). Twenty-five years of the spiral of silence: A conceptual review and empirical outlook. International Journal of Public Opinion Research, 12, 3–28.

Starr, Kenneth

See Lewinsky, Monica

Starr Report

See Lewinsky, Monica

State of the Union Address

Article II, Section 3 of the United States Constitution requires that the president give information to Congress on the state of the union. The founders, however, did not specify when, how often, or in what manner the information should be delivered. Furthermore, presidents can also recommend policies they believe "necessary and expedient." The State of the Union Address (SUA) highlights much of what the president believes Congress should do in the upcoming legislative session. Over the years, the SUA has been known by various names, including the "annual message" until 1934 when it was called the Annual Message to Congress on the State of the Union. Finally, in the 1940s, it became known as the State of the Union Address. George Washington established the precedent of delivering an oral address at the beginning of a congressional session, and John Adams continued this practice. Thomas Jefferson, however, did not follow suit and presented written messages to Congress during his tenure. The SUA was submitted in writing and read by clerks until Woodrow Wilson reinstituted the oral delivery in 1913, forever changing the nature of presidential communication with Congress. This made the occasion of the SUA a visible and monumental event for the president. It was not until Franklin D. Roosevelt, however, that the practice of delivering an oral SUA would be firmly established and would evolve into a significant aspect of presidential rhetorical and legislative leadership.

The SUA is meant to be a persuasive speech in which presidents simultaneously communicate their policy agenda to both the Congress and the public. When presidents give the SUA they have an opportunity to further their policy agenda while at the same time fulfilling their constitutional duty. Because of the vagueness of the reporting and recommending provisions in the Constitution, as the institution of the presidency changed so did the SUA. Presidents began to assert their leadership of Congress, specifically with the presidencies of Teddy Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson, and Franklin D. Roosevelt. In addition, increased powers were granted to the president with the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921 and the creation of the Executive Office of the President in 1939, providing the president with more staff, policy advice, and information. These changes allowed presidents to expand their role in the legislative process, and they could take the lead in making policy recommendations.

U.S. President Bill Clinton addresses a joint session of Congress during his final State of the Union Address on January 2, 2000, in the U.S. Capitol in Washington, D.C.

Source: AFP/Getty Images.

Presidents who gain the public's support may have an easier time getting Congress to enact their agenda. Despite the fact that the founders were afraid of this type of demagoguery, public appeals are an integral part of the modern presidency. With the SUA, presidents address both the public and Congress in an attempt to set the policy agenda and exercise legislative leadership. The inclusion of the public began early through technological advancements including the expansion of newspaper circulation, the development of radio, and ultimately the creation of television. Recognizing the importance of public support, Lyndon B. Johnson was the first to specifically address the public in his salutation; he also moved the address to the evening in 1965, in order to capture the largest possible audience.

The public has come to expect the president to assume the role of legislative leader. Both Congress and the public want to hear from presidents where they stand on particular issues, where they want the country to go in the future, and what they believe should be done to alleviate troubles. As the nation's problems became more complex, the need for the president to provide a vision for the country by identifying policy priorities and offering solutions became inevitable and the SUA became a significant policy-making tool for presidents. At the same time, however, public expectations about what the president should accomplish have increased tremendously over the years, creating an "expectations gap." Presidents are expected to fulfill promises made during a campaign and while in office. This is seldom easy to do because of the system of shared powers in the United States, and, as a result, much of the time the public is disappointed and disillusioned. The SUA calls attention to a host of policy issues the president would like to see accomplished; however, many will not be accomplished during a president's tenure contributing to the "expectations gap."

Scholars vary in their assessment of the SUA. Some downplay its importance, while others argue that the speech is a significant part of a president's political communication with Congress. There are two primary fields of study: One focuses on the rhetorical presidency and the other on presidential rhetoric. Both of these approaches assess the importance of communication and popular rhetoric for presidents. Whether the focus is on changes in the institution of the presidency and the use of popular rhetoric as a tool to accomplish policy-making goals, or on the type of language used in the addresses, the study of presidential communication is essential for understanding the institution and power of the presidency. Early studies detailed historically how the speech evolved into an important agenda-setting document for presidents. Other scholars classify the addresses into types of speeches and discuss the policy issues and the legislative program outlined. Content analyses, media reactions to the speech, and public opinion studies have also been done. Similarly, the president's role as chief legislator has been explored through a close examination of the policy-making rhetoric in SUAs. Policy-making rhetoric is defined as rhetoric that frames a problem and offers a solution. Using common themes, symbols, and universal values, presidents explain their policy agenda and attempt to focus congressional attention in an effort to initiate deliberation. Presidents are elected to lead, and the SUA is used to put forth their agenda, engage Congress in the policy-making process, communicate their agenda to the public, and exercise legislative leadership.

Alison Dana Howard

See also Presidential Communication

Further Readings

Campbell, K. K., & Jamieson, K. H. (1990). Deeds done in words: Presidential rhetoric and the genres of governance. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Fersh, S. H. (1961). The view from the White House: A study of the presidential state of the union messages. Washington, DC: Public Affairs Press.

Hoffman, D. R., & Howard, A. D. (2006). Addressing the state of the union: The evolution and impact of the president's big speech. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.

Neale, T. H. (2003, March). The president's state of the union message: Frequently asked questions. Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, Report RS20021,

2003. Retrieved from http://www.senate.gov/reference/reSUArces/pdf/RS20021.pdf

Tulis, J. K. (1987). The rhetorical presidency. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Stephanopoulos, George (1961–)

George Stephanopoulos is best known as a broadcaster in the United States and as a political advisor to former President Bill Clinton from 1992 to 1996. He is currently chief Washington correspondent for ABC News and anchor of ABC's This Week.

As a former senior political advisor to Bill Clinton, Stephanopoulos directed communications and advised on policy and strategy in an administration rocked with scandal. In his 1999 book, he documents the pressures he endured in attempting to get out the White House message. He worked on both of Clinton's successful presidential bids (1992 and 1996), served in the first administration, but resigned after the second campaign.

George Robert Stephanopoulos was born in Fall River, Massachusetts, to a family of Greek heritage. Both his father and grandfather were Greek Orthodox priests. His mother was a former public relations student at the University of Minnesota. He was raised largely in Cleveland, Ohio. As a child and young adult, he considered careers in both law and the priesthood. He credits his experiences as an altar boy in his father's church for preparing him to be an operative behind the scenes.

He received his Bachelor of Arts degree in 1982 from Columbia University, and graduated summa cum laude in political science. At Columbia, he was a Truman Scholar, valedictorian of his class, and later the commencement speaker in 2003. He obtained his master's degree in theology at Oxford as a Rhodes Scholar. He later served as executive floor manager to House Majority Leader Richard A. Gephardt.

He rose to prominence on the United States political scene as a result of his connection with former President Bill Clinton. In the Clinton White House, he served first as de facto press secretary for Dee Dee Myers and then as senior advisor for policy and strategy. He worked closely with other Clinton strategists David Wilhelm and James Carville. He left the Clintons after the 1996 campaign to teach briefly at Columbia University.

He joined ABC in 1997 as a political news analyst and correspondent. In September 2002, he became host and anchor of This Week and, in December, was officially named chief Washington correspondent of ABC. His memoir, All Too Human, was published in 1999, for which he received a $2.75 million advance. It became a New York Times best-seller and relates his experiences with the Clintons. The book highlights his physical and mental ailments as a result of job pressures. It is also a critique of both the President and First Lady. The publication raised criticism because it was released while President Clinton was still in office.

Stephanopoulos was the inspiration behind television characters in The American President and The West Wing. His role in the Clinton campaign is also featured in the documentary film The War Room. Stephanopoulos is married to actress Alexandra Wentworth and they have two daughters.

Sandra Braun

Further Readings

Stephanopoulos. G. (1999). All too human: A political education. Boston: Little, Brown.

Stevenson, Adlai (1900–1965)

Adlai Stevenson was a Democratic politician from Illinois, best known for his unsuccessful presidential campaigns against Dwight Eisenhower in 1952 and 1956 and for his role in the Cuban Missile Crisis as ambassador to the United Nations.

Stevenson attended law school at Northwestern University and worked as an attorney in Chicago. For 15 years, Stevenson's career alternated between private-sector attorney and midlevel bureaucrat in the Department of Agriculture, the U.S. Navy, and the Department of State.

In 1948, Stevenson unseated the incumbent governor of Illinois, Republican Dwight Green. As governor, Stevenson reformed the criminal justice system, improved highways, and toughened antigambling statutes. He served a single term, before being drafted by then-President Harry Truman to run for president in 1952.

Running against the Republican Party ticket of Dwight Eisenhower and Richard Nixon, Stevenson and his running mate, John Sparkman (U.S. senator from Alabama) were defeated handily and lost the popular vote 55% to 44%. Widely perceived as an "egghead," as Nixon had tagged him, Stevenson performed poorly in every region of the nation except the South.

In 1956, Stevenson again won the Democratic Party's nomination for the presidential election. With Tennessee Senator Estes Kefauver as his running mate, Stevenson once again faced a dominating Eisenhower/Nixon ticket. The strong economy and emerging foreign policy crises in the Suez Canal and Hungary persuaded voters to return Eisenhower to office. Eisenhower beat Stevenson by an even larger margin than he had in 1952, winning 57% of the popular vote to Stevenson's 43%.

Following the election, Stevenson returned to his law practice in Illinois. After John F. Kennedy's election in 1960, Stevenson served as ambassador to the United Nations, a position that made use of Stevenson's role as elder statesman and extensive foreign policy experience. When the United States and the Soviet Union appeared on the brink of nuclear confrontation in 1962, Stevenson realized his final moment of greatness. In an emergency session of the United Nations Security Council, Stevenson vigorously interrogated his Soviet counterpart, Valerian Zorin, about whether the Soviet Union was building missile sites in Cuba. This exchange led to Stevenson's famous demand, "Don't wait for the translation, answer yes or no!" As Zorin refused to answer Stevenson's charge, Stevenson followed up with the equally memorable statement, "I am prepared to wait for my answer until Hell freezes over." When Zorin denied the existence of missiles on Cuban soil, Stevenson dramatically produced reconnaissance photos that proved the existence of those very weapons.

After the resolution of the Cuban Missile Crisis, Stevenson's tenure as ambassador was relatively quiet, with the exception of an assault in Dallas, Texas, from an anti–United Nations protestor in October 1963. Less than 2 years later, Stevenson died from heart failure.

Justin S. Vaughn

Further Readings

Baker, J. H. (1996). The Stevensons: A biography of an American family. New York: W.W. Norton.

Martin, J. B. (1976). Adlai Stevenson of Illinois: The life of Adlai E. Stevenson. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

Martin, J. B. (1977). Adlai Stevenson and the world: The life of Adlai E. Stevenson. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

Stewart, Jon

See Daily Show, The

Strategic Communication

Strategic communication is the purposeful communication by a person or an organization designed to persuade audiences with the goal of increasing knowledge, changing attitudes, or inducing desired behavior. Strategic communication campaigns are generally designed to respond to the perceived communications needs of significant publics. The term was originally associated with U.S. governmental communications directed toward audiences outside the United States. However, the use of the term has expanded and is now commonly used to describe the overall communications efforts of both individuals and organizations, including political candidates.

Historically, strategic communication has been used to describe the barrage of informational and cultural communication strategies employed by U.S. agencies such as the Voice of America and the U.S. Information Agency during the Cold War in order to position the United States in opposition to the Soviet Union in both Western and Eastern Europe. In 2004, the U.S. Department of Defense outlined strategic communication principles for an "influence campaign" designed to reverse negative opinions about the United States among mainstream Muslims in the Arab world.

A strategic political communication campaign relies on the integrated use of multiple communications strategies from both the public relations and advertising arenas, taking into account both the specific audiences targeted for communication and the media through which those audiences can most successfully be reached. The goal of a strategic political communications campaign is to create an image of reality in which a party's or candidate's positions about important issues appear consistent with those of the audience being targeted. Strategic communications may rely on traditional media, such as print and broadcast media. However, in the information age, strategic communications campaigns increasingly use non-traditional media, especially the Internet. Message consistency and clarity are regarded as crucial to the success of a strategic communication campaign.

A key element of successful strategic communication management in the political arena is audience research. Assessing current audience beliefs and attitudes is critical in designing a campaign that will result in real change. Focus groups and public opinion polls serve to inform strategic communication campaigns, determining issues important to impressionable publics.

Strategic political communication campaigns may employ a wide variety of tactics to reach audiences. Traditional public relations tactics are often the centerpiece of strategic communication campaigns, including the distribution of press releases and video news releases, the staging of press conferences and town hall meetings, and the granting of personal interviews to key members of the news media. Political advertising must also be considered a strategic communication element, because advertisements work in synergy with traditional public relations tactics to create an overall image of a candidate, a party, or an issue.

Colleen Connolly-Ahern

See also Political Advertising; Propaganda; Public Relations, Political; Voice of America

Further Readings

Manheim, J. B. (1991). All of the people all the time: Strategic communication and American politics. New York: M. E. Sharpe.

U.S. Department of Defense, Defense Department Task Force on U.S. Strategic Communication. (2005). Historic documents of 2004. Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Strauss, Franz Josef

See Spiegel Affair

Stringer

A stringer is a part-time or freelance journalist. Stringers typically are assigned to cover areas that are considered less newsworthy or peripheral to the news organization's coverage area, where it has no bureau or full-time reporters. A local newspaper may have stringers in surrounding small towns, whereas major news organizations may have stringers in dozens of countries around the world. Stringers also may be used in areas such as Iraq and Afghanistan that are seen as "trouble spots."

"Stringing" can be a way for aspiring journalists to get their work into print or on the air and build a portfolio that will help them land a full-time job. New technology such as satellite telephones, digital cameras, and the Internet have made reporting from abroad more feasible for freelancers. A Brookings Institution survey showed stringers in foreign countries can be placed into six categories: spouses (of journalists abroad), experts (about a certain region), adventurers (who aren't tied to an area), "flingers" (who have gone abroad for a short period of time), ideologues (who sympathize with one side in a conflict), and residents. The latter category makes up an increasing number of the journalists reporting for Western news organizations in Iraq. Residents may do more work than their bylines would indicate because they often gather information for full-time correspondents. Some wish not to be named because of fear of reprisals.

Stringers sometimes face great danger. They often lack protections news organizations expend on full-time reporters, such as flak jackets, bodyguards, or armored cars. They may seek out danger because news organizations will pay much more for dramatic photos or footage. Many resident stringers in Iraq keep their work a secret from friends and family and have faced death threats. They say journalists are sometimes assumed to be spies. In fact, the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency revealed in the 1970s that it had had relationships with journalists from most major U.S. news outlets, most often with stringers, although this practice is believed to have declined. But stringers captured in Iraq, by Iraqis or Americans, have sometimes received less support from their employers than full-time correspondents have.

One reason news organizations use stringers is because they are paid much less. News organizations in recent years have been cutting bureaus and full-time staff to minimize costs. Stringers usually are paid a certain amount per word or inch or copy, or per photo. Because they are independent contractors and may provide the same material to multiple outlets, they often do not receive benefits such as insurance coverage. While stringer pay is low compared to what a correspondent might make, it may be much more than a typical resident correspondent can earn.

Patrick C. Meirick

Further Readings

Hess, S. (1996). International news and foreign correspondents. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution.

Supreme Court, Media and the

The relationship between the media and the U.S. Supreme Court differs from that between the media and other institutions in terms of the deference that mass media outlets have shown the court throughout history. By covering the court less frequently and in a less political manner than the other branches of government, the media enhance the court's legitimacy, which allows it to function more effectively.

The court's high degree of legitimacy and level of public support facilitate compliance with its rulings. Americans do not hear very much about the Supreme Court's activities, which may partially be a result of the way the mass media cover the court's activities. The justices do not give frequent press conferences and are rarely interviewed by journalists. They generally seek to maintain the independence that is associated with judicial posts. As a result, the Supreme Court is covered far less frequently than the presidency or the Congress. In recent years, the court has handed down fewer than 80 to 100 decisions per term, and only a fraction of those receive any substantial media coverage. In contrast, rarely a day passes without a story about the president or Congress. Because one function of the media is to set the agenda for public discussion, this lack of attention leads to the so-called political branches of government maintaining their prominence on the American political landscape, while the court remains relatively less visible most of the time.

The Supreme Court receives substantial media attention in two instances: when it issues a ruling on a case that has a higher level of interest to the public and when there is a vacancy, nomination, and subsequent confirmation of a new justice. On these relatively infrequent occurrences, the court temporarily moves into the public consciousness, only to slip back to the shadows after the "news" is exhausted.

Cases that generate media attention often involve a salient public issue (e.g., abortion, capital punishment, freedom of expression, rights of the criminally accused) or a public figure. While such decisions will likely make the news, there is potential newsworthiness at two other stages in the process, as well. For the highest-profile cases, there will also be brief media attention when the court issues or denies a writ of certiorari (agreeing to hear or refusing to hear a case) and during oral arguments on the case. Such cases are often covered in an apolitical manner, which contributes to the court's comparatively high level of public support. Broadcast media reports rarely mention the names of individual justices during reports of decisions, and if they do, they rarely connect the justices to their political ideologies or the presidents who appointed them. A notable exception to this was in media coverage of the Supreme Court's decisions in 2000 in Bush v. Gore, the litigation over the Florida recounts in the presidential race between Republican President George W. Bush and former Democratic Vice President Al Gore. In those cases, the media made frequent mention of which justices were appointees of which presidents or were thought to lean toward a particular ideology.

Newspapers have more space to devote to reporting court decisions; but, even there, journalists often spend more time explaining the relevance and implications of the decision than they do elaborating on the political underpinnings of the decision-making process. The result is a picture of the court as an institution that is above politics.

When a vacancy on the court occurs, media coverage focuses on three stages of the story. First, there is discussion about the retiring or deceased justice, including biographical information, recollection of his or her nomination, and discussion of his or her legacy (including salient decisions he or she authored). Second, there is speculation as to whom the president will nominate to fill the vacancy. Unlike the reporting on salient decisions, there is explicit political discussion. How would each prospective nominee rule on various salient legal issues if and when those issues come before the court? How likely is the prospective nominee to make it through the Senate confirmation hearings? How will the replacement change the balance of the court's ideological makeup? While these questions are ripe for a political frame, the political nature of the answers is often offset here, as well as in the third stage—the nomination hearings, by the language used by the president and senators, who go out of their way to note that their decisions will not be based on politics (i.e., ideology or policy preferences), but rather apolitical elements of the nominee such as judicial temperament, experience, and legal expertise. The nominee plays into this characterization during the confirmation hearing, as well, by refusing to answer questions that would suggest any political predisposition whatsoever. In 1987, the nomination of former Professor and Federal Judge Robert Bork to the Supreme Court by President Reagan was contested on explicit ideological grounds, using many of Professor Bork's own writings, and the dispute was so sharp that the word Borked subsequently entered the national lexicon to signify that a nominee was the subject of strident personal or ideological attacks sufficient to defeat the nomination. The Bork experience is one of the reasons subsequent nominees are careful to eschew signaling any particular political or ideological leanings; another is the idea that no judge should appear to have decided any case on grounds other than the facts of the particular case.

Once the nominee joins the court, he or she becomes part of the mystique that both affects and is affected by the quantity and type of coverage the court receives.

Stephen Maynard Caliendo

See also Buckley v. Valeo; Hill–Thomas Hearings; McConnell v. Federal Election Commission

Further Readings

Davis, R. (1994). Decisions and images: The Supreme Court and the press. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.

Hoekstra, V. J. (2003). Public reactions to Supreme Court decisions. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Maltese, J. A. (1995). The selling of Supreme Court nominees. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Slotnick, E. E., & Segal, J. A. (1998). Television news and the Supreme Court: All the news that's fit to air? New York: Cambridge University Press.

Survey Research

See Methodology

Survey Research Center

The Survey Research Center (SRC) was established in 1946 and is affiliated with the Institute for Social Research (ISR) at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, Michigan. Rensis Likert, the inventor of the Likert scale, was the first director of SRC, which has been a pioneer in political behavior research since its foundation. Most of the SRC's political behavior research between the late 1940s and the 1960s was initiated by its Political Behavior Program.

In a 1948 foreign affairs survey that also measured the national electorate's intention to vote, researchers in SRC accurately predicted Harry Truman's victory in the 1948 election, whereas the commercial pollsters missed the forecast. After the 1948 election, Angus Campbell and Robert Kahn in SRC introduced a social-psychological approach to the first national election study on voting behavior. From 1952 to 1960, Angus Campbell and Warren Miller conducted the first national panel study of voting behavior. The researchers were among the first to integrate survey data with census data, election statistics, content analysis of newspapers, and roll call records of legislative behavior to examine the influences of psychological, social, and economic factors on voting behavior.

In 1960, Angus Campbell, Philip Converse, Warren Miller, and Donald Stokes published The American Voter. This book was regarded as a milestone in the political science discipline. It well represented SRC's social-psychological perspective to voting behavior analysis and highlighted sampling and personal interviews as the data collection methodology for this line of research. The book was the result of a 10-year-long study that attempted to identify key factors influencing voting behavior in both presidential and congressional elections. For the first time, concepts such as party identification and general feelings about "the times" and "candidates" relative to specific issues were advocated for voting behavior analysis, which created a much broader and deeper context than any previous approach. In addition to The American Voter, Philip Converse also directed a national panel study on the stability and change in political values, attitudes, and behaviors of the American electorate in the early 1960s. The analysis indicated that attitude stability could be better explained by basic group affiliations, such as identification with a specific religion or political party, than other social attributes of individuals, such as occupation.

In 1970, the Political Behavior Program in SRC became the Center for Political Studies (CPS) of ISR. Studies in CPS continue to investigate a wide variety of issues associated with the electoral process and voting behavior. In 1977, the National Election Studies (NES) was established within CPS by a National Science Foundation grant. More than 50 countries have joined NES for worldwide election studies, and the center remains the world's preeminent source of voting and social behavior theory and data.

Feng Shen

See also American Voter, The; Party Identification

Further Readings

Campbell, A., Converse, P. E., Miller, W. E., & Stokes, D. E. (1960). The American voter. New York: John Wiley & Sons.

Frantilla, A. (1998). Social science in the public interest: A fiftieth-year history of the Institute for Social Research. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan.

Symbolic Convergence Theory

Symbolic convergence theory (SCT), brainchild of Ernest G. Bormann, attempts to explain how communication can create and sustain group consciousness through the sharing of narratives or "fantasies." Drawing on the observations of Harvard social psychologist Robert Bales, Bormann explored how the practice of cooperative fantasizing leads to enhanced group cohesion and, ultimately, the emergence of a group mind. He asserted that these communal narratives serve as the means by which group members can understand and articulate their shared social reality. Thus, sharing fantasies encourages the development of a convergent point of view, a shared understanding of the group's common experiences, as well as their identity as a community. Fantasy theme analysis was developed to detect the presence of group consciousness resulting from collaborative fantasizing and is the line of research from which this theory evolved.

Symbolic convergence begins when an individual "dramatizes" or shares a narrative in such a way as to arouse excitement in the rest of the group. A chain reaction results as the other members begin to build on the initial narrative, embellishing and extending the story in response to each other. This "chaining out" of the original dramatization generates the basic unit of symbolic convergence, a "fantasy theme." According to Bormann, a fantasy theme is a cooperative interpretation of ideas or events that serves the needs of the group, therefore helping its members to understand and evaluate experiences in accordance with the group mind.

The presence of group consciousness allows and even encourages the group members to share multiple fantasy themes, enabling the group to continually evaluate new experiences in terms of established social knowledge. Moreover, group members will often unconsciously recycle the same basic plotline for each additional fantasy theme so as to ensure that subsequent narratives will be palatable to the group mind. Group consciousness also prompts group members to develop "symbolic cues," or succinct references to previously shared fantasy themes. Bormann likened these cues to referencing an inside joke, where a word or phrase or even a gesture, although incomprehensible to an outsider, will arouse group members to respond in much the same way they did when the fantasy theme originated. Both the recurrence of fantasy themes and the creation of symbolic cues serve as evidence that symbolic convergence has occurred.

Since a given group can share multiple fantasy themes, these communal narratives can coalesce over time to form a broader worldview to which the group members subscribe, what Bormann called a "rhetorical vision." A rhetorical vision has five main components: the "dramatis personae," or the characters; the "plotline" or the action of the vision; the "scene," or location of the action; the "sanctioning agent," or that which legitimizes the action; and a "master analogue," or purpose that guides the vision. Bormann identified three categories of master analogues: "pragmatic," with a focus on practical purposes; "social," emphasizing relationships; and "righteous," guided by a higher cause.

Those who participate in a rhetorical vision comprise a "rhetorical community." An individual can participate in multiple rhetorical visions and thus belong to multiple rhetorical communities. Membership in a rhetorical community can be formal or informal, brief or long term. Long-standing communities are often united not only by a rhetorical vision but also by a "saga," a unifying understanding of the group's origins and founders, customs and values, purpose(s) and ultimate significance.

Originating in small group communication research at the University of Minnesota in the late 1960s, symbolic convergence theory has been expanded since its inception to include communication at any level, from small group to public to mass media. Bormann argued that fantasies can chain out among larger publics just as they do within small groups. Furthermore, he contended that a rhetorical vision can develop through public address and/or the mass media to unite large segments of the population in rhetorical communities. Group consciousness, then, is not limited to small groups, but is possible whenever fantasy themes catch on and chain out within a community. Accordingly, Bormann conceived of symbolic convergence as a general theory of communication.

Since its introduction in 1972, symbolic convergence theory has been challenged for lacking clarity in its basic assumptions and for recycling and relabeling concepts from other theories. Bormann's use of the word fantasy in particular has drawn much criticism. In addition, critics have claimed that the theory's foundation in Freudian thought limits its application to small group communication and that any conclusions drawn from symbolic convergence theory studies are based on researcher insight rather than theory application. Bormann publicly acknowledged and refuted these challenges to the theory in a 1994 publication. As recently as 2003, Bormann joined John F. Cragan and Donald C. Shields to defend symbolic convergence against the accusation that its fundamental premises are contradictory.

Since its formulation, symbolic convergence theory has been applied to various media, such as the Internet and political cartoons, and within various communication genres, from interpersonal to mass communication, from political to organizational communication. In 2001, along with Cragan and Shields, Bormann traced the development of symbolic convergence theory over the previous 3 decades, reviewing its research applications and answering its critics while speculating on its future research avenues.

Arin Rose Dickerson

See also Bormann, Ernest; Fantasy Theme Analysis

Further Readings

Bales, R. F. (1970). Personality and interpersonal behavior. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston.

Bormann, E. G. (1972). Fantasy and rhetorical vision: The rhetorical criticism of social reality. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 58, 396–407.

Bormann, E. G. (1982). Fantasy and rhetorical vision: Ten years later. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 68, 288–305.

Bormann, E. G. (1985). Symbolic convergence theory: A communication formulation based on homo narrans. Journal of Communication, 35(4), 128–136.

Bormann, E. G., Cragan, J. F., & Shields, D. C. (1994). In defense of symbolic convergence theory: A look at the theory and its criticisms after two decades. Communication Theory, 4, 259–294.

Bormann, E. G., Cragan, J. F., & Shields, D. C. (2001). Three decades of developing, grounding and using symbolic convergence theory. Communication Yearbook, 25, 271–313.

Symbolic Uses of Politics, The

Murray Edelman's classic book, The Symbolic Uses of Politics, has exerted a strong and enduring influence on political communication scholarship since its publication in 1964 and remains an all-time best-seller for the University of Illinois Press. The Symbolic Uses of Politics is the germinal work on symbolic politics as it explores the influence of cultural signs, myths, rites, and other symbolic forms of communication on political involvement and institutions. In his review of The Symbolic Uses of Politics, noted political scientist Harold D. Lasswell wrote that Edelman's book "is evidence of the degree to which the political scientist's map has changed." Lasswell also notes that at "every point comments or hypotheses are put forward that will undoubtedly focus future research."

Indeed, Lasswell's early observation has been realized, as Edelman's first book has created and shaped the study of political symbolism. The theses of The Symbolic Uses of Politics largely center on the idea that democratic action is symbolic and expressive in function. Edelman argues that political reality becomes overlooked as people focus their energies on the interpretation of political symbols, ultimately compromising the democratic process. Thus, as people participate in politics, which Edelman says for most people is a "passing parade of abstract symbols," they may be far removed from political reality and relegated to participate as an ignorant and quiescent public. Perhaps overshadowed by political speeches, media coverage, advertising and ceremony, political reality, and the actual impact of government on its people may be ignored by the public; signs, rites, and symbols are often the smoke and mirrors distorting political reality.

In the introduction to The Symbolic Uses of Politics, Edelman writes, “political forms thus come to symbolize what large masses of men need to believe about the state to reassure themselves. It is the needs, the hopes, and the anxieties of men that determine the meanings.” Edelman argues that these meanings also operate in concordance with the will, and on behalf, of the political elite.

This theme is interwoven throughout all of the chapters of The Symbolic Uses of Politics, which topically focus on symbols and political quiescence, the administrative system as a symbol, political leadership, political settings as symbols, language and political perception, the forms and meanings of political language, persistence and change in political goals, and mass response to political symbols. Many of these topics are further explored in Edelman’s 10 other books and numerous scholarly articles. In his 1971 book Politics as Symbolic Action: Mass Arousal and Quiescence, Edelman called for political scientists to shift their focus from formal government action to illuminate the force of the political elite on the public’s political involvement and attitudes.

Elizabeth Johnson Avery

See also Edelman, Murray

Further Readings

Edelman, M. (1964). The symbolic uses of politics. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Edelman, M. (1971). Politics as symbolic action: Mass arousal and quiescence. Chicago: Markham.

Systems Theory

Systems theories are scientific descriptions not of single phenomena but of systematic relationships between individual parts. A system is generally understood as composed of elements that stand in a lasting connection with one another, thus forming a complex whole that can be separated by boundaries from an environment of elements not belonging to the system. Systems theory is based on the idea that the whole is irreducible to the sum of its parts (emergence) and that through the interaction among the parts, a specific capacity (function) is made possible. Systems research investigates the emergent order and functional logic of these connections based on the assumption that each larger unified whole possesses properties and regularities that are not observed in the parts. Whereas microanalytic research efforts, which predominate in communication science, accumulate ever more detailed knowledge of the relationships among a few variables, the systemic approach attempts to decipher the laws and principles of complex, interconnected wholes.

Because various material and non-material components can be understood as comprising a systemic whole, the system concept is used in a multitude of scientific disciplines. This has led to differentiation among a multitude of systems theories in different fields of research, among which cross-connections can be drawn via the system concept. General systems theory aims at finding general principles of the behavior of all systems based on the findings of systems research in different scientific disciplines (physics, biology, chemistry, psychology, the social sciences, philosophy, theology). Ludwig von Bertalanffy (1901–1972), who was a biologist, is known as the father of general systems theory.

Social systems are regarded as extremely complex phenomena because they are composed of many elements that interact and relate to one another in a multitude of ways. It is also characteristic of social relationships that they frequently contain feedback loops. Due to these circular causal relationships, the momentum of social systems is not easily foreseeable, and they cannot be controlled through external influences in a targeted way. A distinction can be made among social science systems theories according to what they view as the basic element of a social system: individuals, social actions, or communication.

A number of prominent systems theories emerged in theory building in the 20th century. The American sociologist Talcott Parsons (1902–1979) is known as the founder of the structural functionalist systems theory (structural functionalism). Entirely within the tradition of holistic social theories (Herbert Spencer, Émile Durkheim, and others), Parsons starts out from the assumption that social phenomena can be understood sufficiently only when they are investigated in their systemic connection with other social phenomena, no matter whether these are human interactions or complex social structures. Structural functionalism formulates a universal answer to the question of what conditions (functional prerequisites) must be fulfilled in order for these systems to maintain themselves. Two analytic categories are central here. The relatively stable order of a given whole system is called its structure. Function is understood as a specific contribution made by the individual system element to the maintenance of the system as a whole. According to Parsons, a social system must perform four basic functions if it is to survive and continue. A system must be able to adapt to changing environmental conditions (adaptation). A system must formulate goals and be able to master instrumental problems in achieving those goals (goal attainment). Systems must be able to ensure the cohesion of the system (integration). A system must be able to manage and reduce tensions that arise among the elements (latent pattern maintenance). Referred to by the acronym AGIL, these four functional imperatives, which any society must accomplish to maintain itself, form the central instrument of structural functional analysis. With the aid of the AGIL scheme, each element in the system can be examined in terms of what it specifically contributes to which of the four basic functions. The stable order of a social system is then said to be explained, if it can be demonstrated that it contains sufficient functional elements and, at the same time, has the ability to eliminate dysfunctional components. In modern societies, four subsystems are responsible for maintaining the system: the economic system (adaptation), the political system (goal attainment), the legal system (integration), and education, religion, family, or the sociocultural system (latent pattern maintenance). In each of these subsystems, in turn, the same functional prerequisites must be served, just as they must be served in each organization system and action system of the subsystems.

Cybernetic systems theory is the study of control and communication processes in self-regulating systems. Cybernetics was first developed by the American mathematician Norbert Wiener. The term cybernetic system denotes a feedback system that uses its own output as input and in this way is able to maintain equilibrium. As an interdisciplinary paradigm, cybernetics has left its mark not only on engineering and natural science disciplines but also on psychology and the social sciences. Applied to political science, cybernetics inspired Karl W. Deutsch, an important social and political scientist, to view the governing process as a cybernetic steering process and, therefore, as a problem of information and communication flows. Here, the norm of democratic self-determination is reformulated as the ability of autonomous self-steering, which, for its part, is dependent on connection of communication channels, allowing the system to learn from itself. Deutsch's work can be regarded as one of the few basic research efforts conducted expressly for the purpose of aiding the development and testing of the theory of political communication (in a broad sense). Modern, or second-order, cybernetics, developed by Heinz von Foerster, is based on the insight that cybernetic systems must be thought of as closed, because they can perceive the environment only through observing their own operations (feedback). With this, the reality surrounding a system gains the status of the system's own "invention." Moreover, cybernetic systems are blind to their own blindness, because they cannot see that they do not see what they cannot see. If this basic idea is applied beyond the realm of technical and living systems to social systems, highly interesting perspectives emerge for theory building in the social sciences.

In the European social sciences, the theory of autopoietic (self-producing) systems, developed by the German sociologist Niklas Luhmann, has had great impact. In contrast to Talcott Parsons, whom Luhmann met in the early 1960s during his studies at Harvard University, Luhmann's interest was not in the stability of existing systems but in the relation of system to environment. Luhmann describes this relation as a gradient of complexity between a world in which everything is possible and social systems that allow only certain possibilities of experience and action. Only the "reduction of complexity" makes social order possible, and it is the actual function of system formation. The search for the selection mechanisms, through which social systems protect themselves against the superabundance and variety of possibilities and, through this, maintain their boundaries to the environment, is thus declared to be the core task of sociological systems research.

Starting in the 1980s Luhmann further developed his systems theory into a communication theory. The basic element of a system is now no longer societal action but instead communication. According to this, all social systems are systems of communication. Social systems emerge by developing a specific code and distinguishing themselves from other societal communications. Here, communication is understood in an abstract sense as the interaction of three selection processes: selection of information, selection of the utterance of this information, and a selective understanding or misunderstanding of this utterance and its information. Only when these three processes can be synthesized can communication take place. Human consciousness cannot guarantee this, so Luhmann places the human being outside any social system, as a part of the environment. To make successful communication probable, social systems have developed different types of media: languages to facilitate understanding; dissemination media, such as writing, print, radio, and so on, to increase the reach of communication; and finally, symbolically generated communication media, such as love, power, money, truth, and the like, to foster the continuation of communication. As every communication must itself create the preconditions for its continuance, and because communication in addition can take reference only from other communications of the same type, social systems are to be seen as self-reproductive (autopoietic) and self-referentially closed communication circuits. To Luhmann, society is a network of functionally specialized communication systems that cannot operatively have an effect on each other but instead work exclusively and strictly according to their own structures (codes, programs, media). A society formed in this way has to do without hierarchical top and without center and without representation of the whole.

As Parsons did, Luhmann took up a multitude of theoretical concepts and currents, integrating them in his theory. Luhmann's language and thinking reached a degree of complexity that to many social scientists remains unfamiliar and inaccessible.

Systems theory can be used in order to enlarge theory building in communication science, the majority of which is microanalytic, with macroscopic analyses. It is particularly useful for developing a sophisticated theoretical understanding of the media system and for describing its relationships to other functional areas, such as to the economy, politics, science, and others. In fact, all of the systems theoretical approaches described previously have left visible traces in media research and political communication.

An extensive structural functional analysis of the media has not been presented up to the present. Parsons himself dealt explicitly with the mass media only in one short work, which was not a theoretical study but a critical depiction of the situation of the American media in the 1960s. Nevertheless, the influence of functionalist theories in communication science is obvious, as evidenced to this day by the ever appearing, varied taxonomies of the political, economic, social, and cultural functions of the media. When, for instance, political information, control of political power, and needs articulation through the media are deemed functionally essential requisites of democratic political systems, the basic pattern of structural functional thinking is easily recognizable.

Second-order cybernetics, the "cybernetic of cybernetics," strengthened and radicalized constructivist thinking in communication science. This has, among other things, consequences for our view of the relationship between media and reality. In the cybernetic way of looking at things, media organizations must be seen as circular causal, closed systems, which, like all observing systems, have no direct access to the reality surrounding them. They can only observe and reconstruct. The accusation that the media reality is a distortion of reality cannot be upheld from the constructivist perspective, because the "real" world provides no complete and objective representation of itself that could serve as a yardstick of authentic reality. Consequently, media research can always only draw comparisons among different constructions of reality and trace the principles upon which they are built. If human consciousness is also understood as a cybernetic system, with contact to environment restricted to observation of its own operations, there are considerable consequences for media effects theory.

Above all, the functional structural systems theory rendered outstanding services to an alternative understanding of public opinion. In a systems theory view, public opinion has nothing to do with what real people actually think. The concept does not focus on the opinions of individuals or opinions shared by the collective. Instead, public opinion stands for the structure of themes in public and, most of all, political communication. Public opinion reduces the superabundance of problems and issues that stand at the disposal of politics to a manageable stock of topics that can be used in the political process. It indicates which issues can be seriously considered for decision making, without having to expect that they will be found to be misplaced or that they will be rejected as topics of political communication. Public opinion helps politics to reduce the multitude of possible decision problems; for compacting of the range of opinions to a decision, the decision rules of the system are then responsible.

The autopoiesis theory also opens up new perspectives of a multitude of communication science basic concepts and problems. It sees the media system as a functionally differentiated communication system that focuses on filtering and making distinctions among information that can be assumed to be known to society at large. The binary code (public–non public) processes the distinction between issues, events, and states that can be communicated with a right to receive attention (as "information") and information that is not dealt with within the system with great attention and, therefore, remains unpublicized. The system has developed numerous criteria for making this series of logical distinctions (its “program”) that result from observation of successful public communication. In this respect, each new publication represents a communicative connection to the system’s own operations; it is self-referential.

A self-referentially functioning system cannot be expected to contribute effectively to the functioning of other areas of society. For this reason, the functions expected of the media from a systems theoretical perspective are limited. The media produce a description of reality that imposes itself on others as a common fiction of societal reality and allows society to observe itself.

Frank Marcinkowski

Further Readings

Deutsch, K. W. (1963). The nerves of government: Models of political communication and control. London: Free Press of Glencoe.

Luhmann, N. (1992). What is communication? Communication Theory, 2(3), 251–259.

Luhmann, N. (1995). Social systems. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press.

Parsons, T. (1951). The social system. New York: Free Press.

Parsons, T., & White, W. (1960). The mass media and the structure of American society. Journal of Social Issues, 16, 67–77.

von Foerster, H. (Ed.). (1995). Cybernetics of cybernetics: The control of control and the communication of communication. Minneapolis, MN: Future Systems.

T

Tabloids

Tabloid has two meanings. First, it is used for a small newspaper format, roughly half the size of the ordinary broadsheet. Second, it stands for various concepts of popular and largely sensationalistic journalism. Not every newspaper, however, that is printed in tabloid format is a tabloid in content and style. The Christian Science Monitor, for instance, not known for being sensational, is a tabloid-size publication. Also, many of the free local dailies, like Metro, are printed in tabloid format, and only a few years ago, even several traditional British broadsheet newspapers such as the Independent, the Times, and the Scotsman have changed to the smaller size, preferring, however, to call it "compact" format. On the other hand, the biggest tabloid in Europe, the German Bild-Zeitung, is still printed as a broadsheet.

The origins of the term are disputed. According to the most plausible explanation, the name seems to derive from tablet—the product of compressed pharmaceuticals. Tabloid—a combination of tablet and alkaloid—was a trademark for tablets introduced by Burroughs, Wellcome & Co. in 1884. Within a couple of years, the connotation of being compressed was transferred to other items and also to a new kind of reporting that condensed stories into a simplified, concentrated style.

In 1900, Joseph Pulitzer, publisher of the New York World, invited the English publisher Alfred Harmsworth, founder of the Daily Mail, to edit the World for one day. Harmsworth (later Lord Northcliffe) was the new creative power of London's Fleet Street, having boosted the Mail within a few years to become Britain's biggest newspaper. On January 1, 1901, Harmsworth's imaginative version of the World came out. Half the size of its customary format, the new World was

Thursday November 9 2000

The Mirror

32p

www.mirror.co.uk

Paula's final hours

PAGES 12 & 13

U.S. HUMILIATED IN PRESIDENTIAL SHAMBLES

FORREST CHUMPS

'This election's like a box of chocolates. You never know what you're gonna get'

From DAVID LEIGH, Foreign Editor in Texas

AMERICA is without a new president today after its election ended in confusion and farce.

In a night of drama, TV stations declared George W Bush the winner and Al Gore accepted defeat — then backtracked as a recount was called in Florida.

Bush was favourite to win as counting went on but the result may not be known until tonight. President Bill Clinton said: "The American people have spoken. It's just going to take a little while to figure out what they have said."

The drama left the men fighting to be America's 43rd president looking like a pair of Forrest Gumps, the bumbling character from the Tom Hanks hit film.

SEE PAGES 2, 3, 4 AND 5

BROWN GOES GREEN ON FUEL

TAX CUTS: Brown yesterday

By JAMES HARDY, Political Editor

GORDON Brown launched a green revolution yesterday in a bid to scupper a new round of fuel protests.

The Chancellor unveiled a £1.75billion package which he said would cut costs by the equivalent of 8p a litre for lorries and 4p for cars.

Despite the pledges, fuel activists threatened a new wave of direct action starting with a motorway convoy tomorrow.

In a sparkling Commons performance giving his pre-Budget report, Mr Brown left the Tories in tatters. Labour MPs cheered as he announced his £5billion giveaway which included a one-off winter fuel payment of £200, a big rise in pensions, £200million for school improvements and a string of measures to boost firms.

Mr Brown also scrapped plans to raise tax on petrol by 1.5p in next March's Budget. The freeze – revealed exclusively by The Mirror on Monday – comes on top of a penny cut last year.

He trimmed the levy on "green" ultra low sulphur petrol by 2p a heralded as the "newspaper of the twentieth century." For the English publisher, who called this newspaper edition a tabloid newspaper, the term did not refer to the reduced size, but to the economical use of printing space. Short stories, short paragraphs, and simple sentences were key elements of this new technique.

TURN TO PAGE 7

The November 9, 2000, front page of The Daily Mirror, one of Britain's largest tabloid newspapers, carries headlines mocking U.S. presidential elections.

Source: AFP/Getty Images.

Two years later, Harmsworth started the first modern tabloid newspaper, the Daily Mirror, in London. After a difficult start, it became a huge success. Appealing to the mass market, the tabloid offered all the attractions of traditional popular journalism: sensational makeup, visual images, and entertainment in various forms ranging from crime stories, human tragedies, to celebrity gossip, sport events, comics, and puzzles. The Mirror offered more photographs than other newspapers and presented its stories in a reduced and easy-to-read manner. By 1909, the Mirror was selling a million copies a day. Not surprisingly, new tabloids the Daily Sketch and the Daily Graphic jumped into the fray, imitating Northcliffe's concept.

The modern British press, measured by circulation, is dominated by tabloids: five national dailies (Daily Express, Daily Mirror, Daily Star, the Daily Mail, the Sun) and their respective Sunday papers have a combined circulation of roughly 16 million (July 2006). Despite the fact that the emphasis is clearly on entertainment and not on news coverage or political issues, due to their daily appearance and nationwide distribution, British tabloids are reckoned as an important force in public opinion building.

Tabloids in the United States developed differently. Though American concepts of popular journalism can be traced back to the penny press of the 1830s and the yellow press of the 1880s and 1890s, it was not before the end of World War I that a tabloid newspaper was produced in the United States. On June 26, 1919, the first issue of the Illustrated Daily News, published by Joseph Medill Patterson and his cousin Robert R. McCormick, publishers of the Chicago Tribune, appeared in the streets of New York City. Within 2 years the Daily News' circulation was up to 400,000, and by 1930 the daily circulation had risen to 1,520,000. In 1924, William Randolph Hearst followed with his own tabloid—the New York Daily Mirror—and Bernarr Macfadden started the New York Evening Graphic. By 1937, 49 tabloids were being published in the United States.

In the 1970s, many American tabloids were transformed into weekly publications shifting from newsstand to supermarket distribution. The main producer of tabloid weeklies is American Media Inc., based in Boca Raton on Florida's east coast, which publishes some of the most popular tabloids in the United States. The National Enquirer, the Globe, the National Examiner, and Star—the latter turning itself into a more glossy magazine—devote themselves almost completely to Hollywood and other American celebrities, and the Sun and Weekly World News have a strong focus on the weird and bizarre, featuring largely faked news stories of aliens and supernatural powers, religious prophecies and curious mysteries, juicy scandals and political conspiracies. Reliable circulation figures are available only for three of these six publications, but the estimated combined circulation is over 5 million (July 2007).

Since the 1980s and 1990s, the tabloid as a journalistic model for popular entertainment appealing to mass readership (or mass audience) has been successfully applied to television, producing low-brow talk shows (Jerry Springer), soap operas (A Current Affair), and pseudo-documentaries (Unsolved Mysteries). As the circulation figures for print tabloids are going down, TV "tabloidism" is as successful as ever with many productions being copied all over the world. And the "tabloidization" of online media has just started. Whatever media technology may be applied, tabloids seem to have become a persistent cultural phenomenon of modern society.

Daniel Gossel

Further Readings

Bessie, S. M. (1969). Jazz journalism. The story of the tabloid newspapers. New York: Russell & Russell. (Original work published 1938)

Bird, E. (1999). For enquiring minds. A cultural study of supermarket tabloids. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press.

Conboy, M. (2002). The press and popular culture. London: Sage.

Conboy, M. (2006). Tabloid Britain. Constructing a community through language. Milton Park, UK: Routledge.

Glynn, K. (2000). Tabloid culture. Trash taste, popular power, and the transformation of American television. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Greenberg, G. S. (1996). Tabloid journalism. An annotated bibliography of English-language sources. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.

Sloan, B. (2001). I watched a wild hog eat my baby! A colorful history of tabloids and their cultural impact. Amherst, NY: Prometheus.

Sparks, C., & Tulloch, J. (Eds.). (2000). Tabloid tales. Global debates over media standards. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Talk Radio, Political

The history of radio is synonymous with the spreading of political messages to a mass audience. World War I brought with it the use of radio as a tool for the propagandist and an agent for shaping public opinion, whereas World War II saw radio used at the hands of the Nazi Party in Germany for the spreading of its aggressive, nationalistic diatribes. In addition, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's fireside chats broadcast via radio were created to inspire the American people to persevere through the Great Depression and to battle against the Axis powers. In short, it is difficult to disassociate radio as a medium from political radio as a social force. Radio played a central role in the rise of the mass and the creation of the modern conceptualization of public opinion. As a result, radio has been consistently used by the elite as a means by which to shape what issues people think about, what proposals and policies gain public support, as well as the shaping of public judgment toward a given set of political outcomes.

The academic study of political talk radio has been approached as both a social scientific and a humanistic endeavor. Humanists approach the study of political talk radio as text in order to deconstruct the nature of the arguments prevalent within this type of programming, the communicative dynamics involved in the give and take between host and caller or guest, as well as power relationships that exist between those who are participating in talk radio message construction. The empirical study of political talk radio has been a mainstay of political communication research for more than 50 years, with the seminal The People's Choice study serving as a foundation from which several different empirical lines of political talk radio research have been formed. Researchers found in this study of the 1940 U.S. presidential election that Roosevelt, the Democrat, retained a "good radio manner," whereas Willkie, the Republican, had a comparatively "bad radio manner." In addition, radio was labeled "the Democrats' medium" for the 1940 election. These findings mirror later discussions concerning the Kennedy–Nixon debates aired on television versus radio, as well as the partisan nature of talk radio as a place that shapes modern political discourse.

Most recent work on political talk radio has been focused on the medium's reemergence as an American political force. More specifically, studies of late have analyzed political talk radio within the context of presidential elections. In addition, political talk radio has been studied as an agent for the promotion of a particular political ideology, America's brand of conservatism. As a result, what political communication research has come to understand about this particular medium and this particular format within the medium falls within a fairly small set of theoretical and empirical boundary conditions.

There has been surprisingly little systematic content analysis work completed on political talk radio messages. A number of assumptions are made concerning the nature of the messages offered on American conservative political talk radio, but no one has analyzed large amounts of this type of political content across time. Cappella, Jamieson, and Turow analyzed the political messages offered on a wide range of political talk radio programs during the 1996 American presidential primary season and found clear differences in the issues receiving the most air time across conservative, moderate, and liberal talk radio shows. In addition, one specific conservative talk radio program (Rush Limbaugh) was an anomaly relative to all other talk radio programs in terms of the types of issues being raised.

Other research has found that political talk radio content can stand out from more top-down political information outlets (e.g., newspapers, broadcast television news) due to the nature of its call-in format. Political talk radio generates significant portions of its content through audience participation. Several major political talk radio programs ask audience members to call in and speak with the host about the major issues of the day, and this communicative dynamic is unique relative to the pre-packaged pieces of public affairs information supplied by news organizations through all forms of mass communication. Conservative political talk radio provides fundamentally distinct presentations of all three branches of the federal government, the news media, and public schools relative to more traditional political information outlets. Overall, it was revealed that public institutions were generally presented in a negative light on political talk radio, which is directly reflective of American political conservatism's skepticism toward government.

Political communication scholarship has been able to determine a great deal about who tunes in to listen to American conservative political talk radio. Males are more likely to use this particular political information source. In addition, Republicans are more likely to listen, as well as those who rate themselves higher in general political interest. Political talk radio listeners also have higher levels of education and income, and older Caucasians are more likely to tune in to this type of programming. Information seeking dominates the motivations for why people turn to political talk radio, more so than for entertainment or developing parasocial relationships with the radio personalities who drive the programs. This combination of studies provides a solid typology of the typical audience member who makes political talk radio one of the political information sources used to gain an understanding of the major issues and political personalities of the day.

Research has also provided a better understanding of how the use of this particular form of communication relates to the consumption of other political information outlets. The typical political talk radio listener does not obtain most of his or her public affairs information from political talk radio, but relatively little when compared to more traditional news outlets (e.g., newspapers). The political talk radio audience is fairly concentrated, with those who define themselves as listeners not treating this political information source as their primary political information outlet. This combination of findings points to the need to study political talk radio in combination with the use of other media forms.

Although the study of the political messages offered on political talk radio and who is tuning in to listen to these messages have been of interest to political communication scholarship, of greater concern have been the effects of this potentially powerful source for unapologetically ideologically biased political information. Political talk radio effects span the range of the hierarchy of effects, including analyses of audience awareness, knowledge (information and misinformation), attitudes, and behaviors.

A few examples of the effects found related to political talk radio listening include the ability of ideologically extreme political talk radio to influence attitudes toward specific public policy proposals, to reinforce preexisting attitudes toward politicians, as well as to aid in the establishment of audience understanding of political outcomes. In terms of a basic knowledge function, political talk radio listening positively predicts political knowledge, but listening to extreme levels of ideologically conservative political talk radio negatively predicts political knowledge and positively predicts political *mis*information. As for political participation, some research has found that listening to conservative political talk radio by moderate and conservative listeners over time produced higher levels of efficacy and a subsequent increase in political participation. The sum of empirical findings for the political talk radio influence point to the ability of this particular political communication information source to have substantive effects on basic democratic processes.

However, it is important that a distinction be made between general political talk radio and ideologically extreme political talk radio, in particular American conservative political talk radio. The effects of conservative political talk radio do not translate to general political talk radio and vice versa. Moderate political talk radio is reflective of a two-sided message flow of public affairs information, whereas conservative political talk radio is reflective of a one-sided message flow outlet. One-sided message flows have the ability to influence audience members in that the opposing side of any issue is not presented within the message, whereas a two-sided message flow tends to lead to a negating of any overall media influence due to the presenting of multiple, opposing viewpoints within a single message.

Finally, there are growing lines of political talk radio effects research relative to the study of emerging democracies. Researchers have considered the role of talk radio within Hong Kong and its democratization movement, and similar types of work can be found in the study of other nations as well, such as Hungary and Spain. It is important that these studies of political talk radio, conducted outside the context of America as a stable democracy, continue in order to gain a full appreciation of the influence of talk radio as a source for political information, political discourse, and social change.

R. Lance Holbert

Further Readings

Barker, D. C. (2002). Rushed to judgment: Talk radio, persuasion, and American political behavior. New York: Columbia University Press.

Barker, D., & Knight, K. (2000). Political talk and public opinion. Public Opinion Quarterly, 64, 149–170.

Cappella, J. N., Jamieson, K. H., & Turow, J. (Eds.). (1996). Call-in political talk radio: Background, content, audiences, portrayal of mainstream media. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, Annenberg Public Policy Center.

Davis, R., & Owen, D. (1998). New media and American politics. New York: Oxford University Press.

Gunther, R., Montero, J. R., & Wert, K. I. (2000). The media and politics in Spain: From dictatorship to democracy. In R. Gunther & A. Mughan (Eds.), Democracy and the media: A comparative perspective (pp. 28–84). New York: Cambridge University Press.

Hofstetter, C. R., Barker, D. C., Smith, J. T., Zari, G. M., & Ingrassia, T. A. (2002). Information, misinformation, and political talk radio. In D. C. Barker (Ed.), Rushed to judgment: Talk radio, persuasion, and American political behavior (pp. 106–118). New York: Columbia University Press.

Hofstetter, C. R., Donovan, M., Klauber, M., Cole, A., Huie, C., & Yuasa, T. (1994). Political talk radio: A stereotype reconsidered. Political Research Quarterly, 47, 467–479.

Holbert, R. L. (2004). Political talk radio, perceived fairness, and the establishment of President George W. Bush's political legitimacy. Harvard International Journal of Press/Politics, 9, 12–27.

Holbert, R. L. (2005). Intramedia mediation: The cumulative and complementary effects of news media use. Political Communication, 22, 447–462.

Jones, D. A. (1998). Political talk radio: The Limbaugh effect on primary voters. Political Communication, 15, 367–381.

Lazarsfeld, P. F., Berelson, B., & Gaudet, H. (1944). The people's choice: How the voter makes up his mind in a presidential election. New York: Columbia University Press.

Lee, F. L. F. (2002). Radio phone-in talk shows as politically significant infotainment in Hong Kong. Harvard International Journal of Press/Politics, 7, 57–79.

Owen, D. (1997). Talk radio and evaluations of President Clinton. Political Communication, 14, 333–353.

Page, B., & Tannenbaum, J. (1996). Populistic deliberation and talk radio. Journal of Communication, 46(2), 55–78.

Pfau, M., Moy, P., Holbert, R. L., Szabo, E., Lin, W., & Zhang, W. (1998). The influence of political talk radio on confidence in democratic institutions. Journalism & Mass Communication Quarterly, 75, 730–745.

Sukosd, M. (2000). Democratic transformation and the mass media in Hungary: From Stalinism to democratic consolidation. In R. Gunther & A. Mughan (Eds.), Democracy and the media: A comparative perspective (pp. 122–164). New York: Cambridge University Press.

Verwey, N. E. (1990). Radio call-ins and covert politics. Aldershot, UK: Avebury Gower.

Talk Shows, Television

Politicians have a long history of appearing on television entertainment and talk programs. Baum notes Richard Nixon's piano playing appearance on The Tonight Show in 1960, and Schultz reminds us of the same candidate's turn on Laugh-In in 1968. Many voters undoubtedly recall an image of Bill Clinton playing the saxophone on the Arsenio Hall Show. Besides filling guest spots, politicians have long served as comedy fodder for talk show hosts. At one level, these types of programs may seem peripheral and unimportant to the political process. However, in recent presidential elections, candidate appearances on such shows seem to have become an almost institutionalized part of campaigns. Given research findings that late night shows can serve as important political information sources, especially for young people, the relationship between talk shows and politics has become a topic worthy of academic attention. Researchers are beginning to study the political content of television talk shows and the potential effects they have on the political process.

David Niven, S. Robert Lichter, and Daniel Amundson found late night comedy talk show political content to be fairly narrow in scope. Their examination of 13,301 jokes on late night shows between 1996 and 2000 revealed that the most frequent target of humor was the president or a candidate for the office. There was little attention given to the legislative or judicial branches of the federal government, as well as other levels of government (state or city). The number of politicians targeted was relatively small, and there was consistency in individual features that served as the basis for jokes. For example, in 1996 Bob Dole's age was a springboard for humor. In 1997 Clinton was targeted based on financial dealings, eating habits, and sexual issues. It is perhaps not surprising that the researchers found only 9.3% of the jokes to deal with issues involving public policy. The appearances of George W. Bush and Al Gore on late night shows had no subsequent effect on the content of the shows as it remained substantially the same after the candidate visits.

Given the unserious nature of such programs and their particular focus on personal characteristics, why do candidates appear on them? One answer may lie in the finding that in 2000 candidates got more time on late night shows speaking for themselves than they would have during an average month of evening news. Shrinking sound bites and time constraints, as well as extensive editing in news formats help explain why this is true. Also, as a rule, candidates prefer communication contexts in which they exercise some control.

Another reason candidates may agree to talk show appearances is that they receive positive treatment. Matthew Baum found support for this idea in an examination of candidate appearances on daytime and late night television talk shows in 2000. His content analysis revealed that candidate interviews on what he called entertainment talk shows made fewer political references than were elicited by candidate appearances on traditional outlets such as the evening news and political talks show (i.e., Meet the Press). Entertainment talk shows avoided controversial issues and were more sympathetic to candidates than were traditional news outlets. Baum also discovered that entertainment shows did not focus on issues or candidate issue position comparisons as much as traditional outlets did. The different approach taken on entertainment based talk shows might also serve to make them an attractive communication option for candidates.

Along with examining content of talk shows, researchers have tried to explore the relationships between exposure to talk shows and viewers' political feelings, attitudes, and behaviors. Baum found that for "politically unaware individuals," traditional news exposure had less effect on perceptions of candidate likeability and vote choice than did exposure to daytime entertainment talk shows. Further, exposure to daytime talk shows for these politically unaware types resulted in their rating the opposition party candidate as more likeable. The opposition party candidate was also more likely to get votes from this same group. Baum did find that these positive assessments of the opposition diminished as political awareness increased.

It may be that the particular type of talk show viewed is a factor in the relationship between viewer and political characteristics. Late night comedy talk shows attract liberal, politically interested viewers, and there is a positive relationship between viewing such programs and campaign participation. Politically sophisticated viewers of late night comedy talk shows were more likely than less sophisticated viewers to get out and vote and also to engage in interpersonal discussions about politics. In contrast, although politically interested viewers were more likely to watch candidate appearances on the daytime show Oprah, viewing such appearances had no relationship to subsequent levels of interpersonal discussions of politics. As is the case in many areas of effects research, what may be happening is reinforcement rather than conversion.

Michael Pfau, Jaeho Cho, and Kirsten Chong found evidence that there may be variance in the way different communication forms affect candidate perceptions as opposed to perceptions of the democratic process. The researchers studied the relationship between 13 communications forms and citizen perceptions in the 2000 presidential campaign. In general they found that subjects' candidate perceptions were influenced more by less traditional media, including entertainment talk shows, whereas traditional media had the most impact on their feelings about the democratic process. Interesting specific findings showed that use of political talk radio was related to pro-Bush perceptions and higher likelihood of voting Republican. Use of entertainment-based television talk shows was related to pro-Gore perceptions and a higher likelihood of voting Democrat. It may be that with their emphasis on personality, television talk shows are more likely to influence candidate perceptions, whereas traditional media forms such as the evening news, with their more serious focus on the political process, would influence feelings concerning the democratic process.

Mike Chanslor

Further Readings

Baum, M. A. (2005). Talking the vote: Why presidential candidates hit the talk show circuit. American Journal of Political Science, 49(2), 213–234.

Moy, P., Xenos, M. A., & Hess, V. K. (2005). Communication and citizenship: Mapping the political effects of infotainment. Mass Communication & Society, 8(2), 111–131.

Niven, D., Lichter, S. R., & Amundson, D., (2003). The political content of late night comedy. Press/Politics, 8(3), 118–133.

Pfau, M., Cho, J., & Chong, K. (2001). Communication forms in U.S. presidential campaigns: Influences on candidate perceptions and the democratic process. Press/Politics, 6(4), 88–105.

TAMPA INCIDENT

In August 2001, the Norwegian cargo vessel Tampa made Australian political history when it picked up 438 mostly Afghan refugees from a sinking Indonesian people-smuggling vessel, the KM Palapa 1, in the Indian Ocean, but was refused permission to land them on the nearby Australian territory of Christmas Island. Australian Prime Minister John Howard exploited the incident politically to make radical changes to the country's territorial boundaries to increase his popularity in the months prior to an important election campaign. The Tampa incident was a major landmark in legitimizing Howard's increasingly populist approach to policy making, and of his use of the popular media to broadcast nationally a "tough" stance on asylum seekers to the segmented audiences of talk radio and commercial television.

The Tampa's captain, Arne Rinnan, had assumed he would be allowed to off-load his human cargo on Christmas Island. However, when he was not given permission to land at any Australian port for 6 days, he refused to move his ship and a political stalemate ensued, culminating in the boarding of the vessel by the Australian military. Australia paid Pacific Island neighbors Papua New Guinea and Nauru to take the asylum seekers for detention and processing (the so-called Pacific solution), and New Zealand voluntarily accepted 150. Howard later introduced legislation permitting the exclusion of Christmas Island (and other external territories) from Australia's migration zone. As a bonus for Howard, people-smuggling between Indonesia and Christmas Island is no longer viable.

The Tampa episode provided Howard with a means of practicing what veteran Australian journalist Laurie Oakes has called "dog whistle politics." This involves communicating, usually via the populist media, support for a populist cause—in this case that of strengthening border protection from asylum seekers arriving by boat from the Middle East and Central Asia—to a receptive part of the electorate without need for justification. Populist tendencies in the media (expressed as the need to provide saleable news in order to make profits) often form a neat fit with populist policies. This was supported by the fact that most of the pro-government support was from influential talk radio and tabloid newspapers.

Howard's actions were designed especially to appeal to supporters of Pauline Hanson's One Nation Party, who were believed to be taking votes from Howard's ruling conservative coalition. His actions, including labeling the opposition as "weak" for opposing his legislation, won over an unruly section of the electorate, increased his support in the opinion polls, and helped gain him a third term of office in November 2001.

Julianne Stewart

See also Hanson, Pauline

Further Readings

Marr, D., & Wilkinson, M. (2003). Dark victory. Crows Nest, NSW, Australia: Allen & Unwin.

McAllister, I. (2003). Border protection, the 2001 Australian election and the coalition victory. Australian Journal of Political Science, 38, 445–463.

Stewart, J. (2003). Profughi ai nostri confini: I media Australiani e il populismo del Primo Ministro John Howard [Asylum seekers at our borders: The Australian media and the populism of Prime Minister John Howard]. Communicazione Politica, 4(2), 167–184.

TechnoDistortions

TechnoDistortions is a word that has been used to describe the distortions in audio and video messages caused by the use of various technologies to alter the messages. TechnoDistortions have been defined by Lynda Lee Kaid and other researchers as any use of technology that may give the viewer a false, distorted, deceptive, or misleading impression. The concept has primarily been applied to political advertising but could potentially be present in other types of political messages. TechnoDistortions were first used in television commercials during the 1952 presidential election. Television advertising has since become the dominant form of communication between the candidates and voters in the United States and many other countries.

Studies have shown that exposure to political spots affects voter knowledge levels, attitudes toward candidates, and voting behavior. However, with these potential effects come concerns about the ability of television spots to manipulate the images to which voters are exposed. Concerns have increased with advances in video and computer technology.

TechnoDistortions fall into five different categories. First, there are editing techniques which include rearranging video or audio, using audio or video out of its proper or original context, or the juxtaposition of two or more images or sounds to create a falsehood that misleads the viewer. A second type of TechnoDistortion is the use of special effects such as animations, slow and fast motion video, inappropriate sound effects, or other specialized audio, video, or computerized techniques. Dramatizations are a third type of potential TechnoDistortion. Dramatizatons include staged action, often using performers. The famous "Daisy Girl" spot from 1964 is an example of a dramatization. A fourth possible type of TechnoDistortion is a computerized alteration that uses computer technologies to alter or create images or sound. For instance, morphing, color alterations, changing a person's features, or altering a real-life setting might fall into this category. The fifth and final category of TechnoDistortions is subliminal techniques, which are the integration of a message below the normal threshold of human recognition or awareness. Such distortions are rare in political ads; but some have been identified by researchers.

Political ads from political campaigns have been analyzed over long periods of time to determine how often TechnoDistortions occur in ads. Research initially concluded that about 15% of all political ads since 1952 have used one or more of these five types of TechnoDistortions to mislead voters. However, the growth in the use of computers and technology has greatly increased the presence of such techniques, and political campaigns in 1996, 2000, and 2004 had much higher rates of TechnoDistortions. TechnoDistortions are much more common in negative, or attack, advertising than in positive advertising.

An important question is whether or not the presence of such distortions influences how voters react to political spots and to the candidates who sponsor them. Unfortunately, research has shown that candidates who use such distortions are often successful in fooling voters and enhancing their support and the likelihood of voting for the sponsoring candidate. However, researchers have also found that making voters aware of the TechnoDistortions, increasing education about the distortions and how they are done, can reduce the negative impact on voters. Thus, voters with a higher level of visual literacy, who recognize and understand visual distortions, are less likely to be affected negatively by them.

University of Florida researchers have produced a DVD that explains and provides examples of the TechnoDistortions. The DVD contains examples of all five types of TechnoDistortions and includes a glossary of terms and expanded explanations of how to recognize TechnoDistortions. Called "TechnoDistortions in Political Advertising," the DVD provides an in-depth overview of the use of technological distortions in political commercials. The goal of this production is to educate voters about this ethically suspect practice and thus help reduce the effects of technological distortions on viewers. Through additional examples, this DVD tracks changes in the use of technological distortions in political ads from the 1950s. In addition, users can test their own knowledge of manipulation through technology in the TechnoDistortions Game.

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Negative Advertising; Political Advertising

Further Readings

Kaid, L. L. (1996). Technology and political advertising: The application of ethical standards to the 1992 spots. Communication Research Reports, 13, 129–137.

Kaid, L. L. (1997). Effects of the television spots on images of Dole and Clinton. American Behavioral Scientist, 40, 1085–1094.

Kaid, L. L. (2004). TechnoDistortions in political advertising [DVD Production]. Gainesville, FL: Political Communication Research Foundation.

Kaid, L. L., McKinney, M. S., & Tedesco, J. C. (2000). Civic dialogue in the 1996 presidential campaign: Candidate, media, and public voices. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press.

Kaid, L. L., & Noggle, G. (1998, December). Televised political advertising in the 1992 and 1996 elections: Using technology to manipulate voters. Southeastern Political Review, 26, 889–906.

Noggle, G., & Kaid, L. L. (2000, December). The effects of visual images in political ads: Experimental testing of distortions and visual literacy. Social Science Quarterly, 81, 913–927.

Telecommunications Act of 1996

See Communications Act of 1934

Television and Politics

See Debates; Medium Theory; Political Advertising; Talk Shows, Television

Television in Politics

Television in Politics: Its Uses and Influence (1968) by Jay G. Blumler and Denis McQuail examines the role of television during the British parliamentary election campaign in 1962 when Sir Alec Douglas-Home ran as top candidate of the Conservatives and Harold Wilson for the Labour Party. At that time, the American communication researcher Jay Blumler and his British colleague Denis McQuail worked for the Granada Television Research Unit of the University of Leeds. Their 1964 study was explicitly understood as a follow-up to Television and the Political Image (1961), which was the result of a study conducted by McQuail and Joseph Trenaman during the previous election campaign in 1959. Both studies can be credited with having brought the mass media, and television in particular, back to the attention of (European) election research after their influence had been regarded as negligible in the wake of the book The People's Choice, published in 1949 by Paul Lazarsfeld, Bernard Berelson, and Hazel Gaudet.

By applying the uses and gratification approach, the 1964 study, however, went beyond its predecessor. The authors assumed that the amount of TV use would be less influential for persuasion effects than the motives underlying TV consumption and their varying intensity. Thus, Blumler and McQuail initiated the reorientation of European effects research, which was later called a change in paradigms. By taking the individual search for gratifications into account, the study complemented the traditional transfer model with a new perspective that attributed, to a certain extent, an active role to the recipient.

The study used a three-wave panel design with 768 respondents who were interviewed twice before and once after the election date. This survey was prepared by two exploratory surveys done in early 1964 to develop the questions finally used in the main panel. The interviews were made in two constituencies in the county of Yorkshire, which had also been the location of the Trenaman and McQuail study. Additionally, the 1959 panel participants were re-interviewed, thus allowing for the assessment of campaign effects as well as some long-term effects.

With the 1964 campaign, television became the most important medium for the campaign. In addition to Party Election Broadcasts (PEBs), electoral programs were broadcast. During the 1959 campaign, the regular political programs were taken off air, and the newscasts rarely dealt with the campaign to prevent any influence on the voters. Thus, in 1964, TV was no longer just a platform for politicians and parties and therefore changed its function for the campaign.

The authors describe the analytical steps and the results in detail. An extensive annex documents the data of the sample and the fieldwork, the questionnaires, index construction, as well as the findings of a theme analysis of the PEBs. All in all, the results indicated an influence of television, and of PEBs in particular, on attitudes and beliefs deemed relevant for the voting decision. Two motives, the search for vote guidance and reinforcement, proved to be relevant. These and other motives, such as campaign interest, often interacted with other variables (e.g., sociodemographic variables).

The fixation of agenda-setting research on its beginnings in North Carolina left forgotten that the 1964 election study in Great Britain, as well as its predecessor, had already looked at agenda-setting effects although the process was not yet named that way.

Christina Holtz-Bacha

See also Blumler, Jay G.; McQuail, Denis; People's Choice, The; Uses and Gratifications Approach

Further Readings

Blumler, J. G., & Katz, E. (1974). The uses of mass communication. Current perspectives on gratifications research. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Trenaman, J., & McQuail, D. (1961). Television and the political image. A study of the impact of television on the 1959 general election. London: Methuen.

Television Political Advertising

See Political Advertising

Terrorism and Media

The reporting of terrorism provides one of the biggest challenges for the mass media in democracies. Terrorism is defined as the use of violence in order to promote a political cause. The media have an obligation

Video grab taken from CNN showing Afghan Foreign Minister Wakil Ahmed Mutawakel, speaking late September 11, 2001, in Kabul following the series of terrorist strikes in New York and Washington. Afghanistan's ruling Taliban militia denied that Saudi dissident Osama bin Laden had played any role in a series of apparent terrorist attacks in the United States.

Source: AFP/Getty Images.

to report on politics as well as violent events, but reporting on terrorist acts does more than just broadcast news about explosions, airline hijacking, and other violence. This reporting also gives publicity to the terrorist organizations and their aims. As a result, reporting on terrorism presents the mass media with a difficult dilemma. News organizations must balance their role as information providers with their function as gatekeepers of civil society and social order. At the same time, failing to examine the complex social and political causes of terrorism makes it difficult to find ways to stop terrorists.

Media coverage of terrorism can have several different effects on media outlets, terrorist groups, and the general population. First, coverage of terrorist events can provide a huge source of sensational, visually compelling news. This helps media outlets in competition for ratings, revenue, and prestige. At the same time, it leaves journalists open to charges of providing extensive publicity for a terrorist campaign.

The media have a great deal of power in defining whether terrorists are simply criminals or have some sort of legitimate political grievance to justify their acts of violence. The tone as well as the level of sympathy for "terrorists" varies a great deal in different countries. For example, African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela was labelled a terrorist by the South African government at the same time he was called a freedom fighter by the international media for his campaign against the racist regime. Eventually this "terrorist" became the elected leader of the country.

As the media coverage of Mandela suggests, it is easier for those removed from the violence of political unrest to make dispassionate judgments about whether violence is justified for a political cause. For example, Christopher Hewitt found that Italian journalists were relatively uncritical of domestic terrorism until the violence of the attacks escalated. There was little interest in covering terrorism as an international phenomenon in the United States until the September 11, 2001, attacks. Since then, coverage of terrorism has increased markedly and remained on a high level although there have been no subsequent major terrorist attacks on the United States.

Although there is a relatively large amount of time devoted to possible terrorist plots in the U.S. media, there is little discussion about the broader political reasons for Islamic groups to target the United States. Studies of news broadcasts and magazines in the wake of September 11 found that U.S. journalists were uncritical of plans to attack foreign countries in the attempt to reduce terrorist threat. This suggests that although journalists are careful to avoid manipulation by terrorist groups, they are perhaps less questioning about government messages on counter-terrorism.

Northern Ireland: The British Media and Domestic Terrorism

Although the United States is relatively new to dealing with the aftermath of terrorist attacks on its population, the region of Northern Ireland in the United Kingdom has a long history of a complex media-and-terrorist relationship. Terrorist acts have been used on both sides of a conflict between Irish-Catholic groups who want to break the region away from British rule and British Protestants who passionately support the continued inclusion of Northern Ireland as a full part of the United Kingdom. This Irish–British conflict goes back for hundreds of years and, although most of Ireland gained independence in the 20th century, Northern Ireland remains under British control. Terrorist organizations, often with strong community support, were formed on both sides of the conflict. The result was decades of violence and fear. Most of the violence and murder was perpetuated against people in Northern Ireland, but there were assassinations and bombings carried out against English targets as well.

British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher once accused the British media of giving terrorists in Northern Ireland the "oxygen of publicity" and allowing them to thrive. In the minds of many political leaders, if the media simply stopped reporting on terrorist events, terrorists would stop killing innocent people. After all, terrorists do claim that they perpetuate violence against innocent civilians only in order to make their political views heard. If there is no publicity surrounding the event, then there is theoretically no point to the terrorism. Yet, this creates the dilemma of a population that is not informed about important events in their community.

It is clear that the fear of terrorism was the single most powerful political force in Northern Ireland for decades. The British government tried several measures to limit media coverage of terrorism, including at one time a complete ban on allowing any person with a terrorist affiliation to speak on television. The tactics did not reduce the power of the terrorist groups. Eventually, the British officials tried an entirely new tactic with the media, a type of journalistic diplomacy. Certain journalists were encouraged to suggest ideas in print about possible reconciliation between the two entrenched enemies of Catholic loyalists and Protestant unionists.

Although the British government had sworn not to negotiate with terrorists, ideas for reconciliation were discussed by political leaders in newspaper columns. The deadlock was ended and eventually led to the peace process in the mid-1990s. Although the Northern Irish peace process is still problematic, the level of violence has decreased and dialogue has increased between the two sides of the conflict. It should be noted, however, that it was the choice of the politicians to use the newspapers rather than a pro-active move by journalists to lead the dialogue for reconciliation themselves. It is also hard to tell how much difference the change in newspaper coverage had in the overall peace process.

September 11, 2001: The U.S. News Media and International Terrorism

It would be difficult to think of a more stark contrast in terrorism from Northern Ireland to September 11. Whereas terrorism in Northern Ireland was an issue for decades, a single day in 2001 changed the relevance of terrorism for Americans. On September 11, 2001, terrorists allied with the Al-Qaeda fundamentalist Islamic group used passenger aircraft as bombs to destroy the World Trade Center in New York City and part of the Pentagon. The September 11 attacks, which left almost 3,000 people dead and many more injured, caused widespread panic and disruption. Although terrorist acts were not unprecedented in the United States, the scale and method of the September 11 attacks were particularly shocking for the American public. Just as the domestic security forces had no precedent for this type of attack, the news media also were faced with a completely new and alien situation.

Given the enormous interest generated by the story, all television stations with news coverage immediately switched to live, blanket coverage of the events. There was no existing template or "frame" for the story, as there are for other major events such as elections, natural disasters, or even riots. The media were faced with a number of enormous challenges on the day of September 11: how to simply get the facts in a timely manner in a chaotic situation in two major U.S. cities; how to get useful safety information to the populace; and how to reassure traumatized citizens. The U.S. media is generally competent at performing all three of these roles. To perform all of these roles simultaneously in an unprecedented situation was an enormous challenge. However, in one way it was clear that the media had learned from earlier terrorism coverage. The breaking television news did not rush to identify the terrorists as a particular group. In the 1995 bombing of an Oklahoma City federal building, early news reports attributed the attack to Islamic extremists. This led to hate crimes against Arab Americans, even though it quickly emerged that the bombers were American white supremacists.

Analysts have found that the additional time and attention to September 11 on the news did not lead to more meaningful political and historical context for the attack. Rather, the attacks followed a style similar to that of crime reporting, a script that elevates the drama of the situation while suggesting a satisfying retribution by society. It was clear that Americans were receiving important emotional support and gratification from television in this time of crisis. However, the fact that the emotional content outweighed the informational content about September 11 did not necessarily serve the public's long-term interest or the ability of the news organizations to mediate the threat of terrorism.

The September 11 coverage did not analyze in depth why certain groups would resort to terrorist tactics against the United States or whether terrorists had a meaningful base of political support. Nor did the news coverage discuss what policy choices may have led to terrorist attacks or what policy choices could address the problem. Rather, the news discourse focused on finding who to blame and how much proof of this blame would be required before the United States could retaliate. Violent retaliation was never seriously debated. The September 11 coverage gave little information to help Americans to perceive "terrorists" to be as diverse as the causes, people, or nations they purport to represent. At the same time, the journalists echoed the twin themes of U.S. strength and the demonization of the "enemy," relying heavily for sources on government officials and politicians united in nationalistic outlook in the wake of the attacks.

Thus, research suggests that the U.S. media responded to the September 11 attacks using a model not unlike the "patriotic" approach to war coverage. There was a great deal of news from the scenes of the attack, with myriad stories of human tragedy. There was some discussion of the gaps in domestic security and surveillance that allowed the attacks to proceed. There was little attempt, however, to examine whether the September 11 attacks were a part of a broader political movement and a result of U.S. foreign policy. Rather, they were framed as the act of a group of extremists, who were aided and abetted by rogue regimes in places such as Afghanistan and Iraq. On the one level, this reassured the American people that the "criminals" would be "punished." On the other hand, it left unanswered many questions about future insecurity in an uncertain world.

The coverage of September 11 also relates to the broader issue in coverage of foreign affairs by American media outlets. In general, there is a cycle of disinterest in foreign news, which can be confusing and alienating to U.S. news consumers. As a result, U.S. media outlets cover little foreign news and the audience remains uninformed. However, in a complex world with shifting alliances, this makes it difficult for readers and viewers to understand the causes (or possible solutions) to international conflict, including terrorism. As a result, the challenges for U.S. media outlets in covering terrorism cannot be considered separately from the general challenges of presenting complex international political issues to a U.S. audience that is often uninterested in foreign news.

The London Underground Bombings and the British Media

Britain faced another terrorist challenge when the London transport system was bombed by Islamic terrorists on July 7, 2005. Four young men who described themselves as devout Muslims detonated three bombs on underground trains and one on a bus during the morning rush hour. The explosions killed 26 people, including the four bombers, and hundreds were injured. The bombings led to widespread disruption in one of the world's largest cities. This was the deadliest act of terrorism in the United Kingdom since the terrorist bombing of Pan Am Flight 103 over Scotland that killed 270 people in 1988.

Commercial, public, and international stations immediately began covering the events. Roger Mosey, head of the public British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) television news, reported that 30 million people tuned into BBC news on the day of the bombings (more than half of the British population). Like their U.S. counterparts on September 11, television broadcasters suspended normal coverage to bring breaking news from London. In particular, the BBC struggled to make sure that the live video from the scene would not be unduly distressing or disturbing.

The major difference between the coverage of the July 2005 London bombings and that of September 11 was in the domestic focus. Whereas the U.S. September 11 coverage often focused on the surprise and shock of the event, the coverage of the London bombings put the event in a familiar context in a number of ways. First, London has considered itself a terrorist target for decades because of Northern Irish terrorism. In addition, there had been numerous threats to London—and particularly to the Underground—discussed particularly in the wake of September 11 and Britain's involvement in the second Gulf War. Issues surrounding the perceived cultural isolation of British Muslims had been discussed in the media. As part of the coverage, the BBC and other media outlets examined the reasons behind the attack. Although a government report into the attacks eventually concluded there were no formal links with Al-Qaeda, it was clear that all four of the bombers had an interest in fundamentalist Islam.

For the British public and the British media, the July 2005 bombings brought up a set of issues separate from those of September 11. Although tragic (on a smaller scale), the bombings could be discussed and understood in a context familiar to the media audience. In discussions in British focus groups immediately after the bombings, most respondents claimed they were not surprised by the bombings, feeling that London was an inevitable target. Hence, although the public seemed resigned, the bombings did not significantly change their feeling of security or their perception of the world as September 11 may have done for much of the U.S. media audience.

Sarah Oates

See also Framing; Mandela, Nelson; Thatcher, Margaret; War Coverage

Further Readings

Bucy, E. P. (2003). Emotion, presidential communication, and traumatic news: Processing the World Trade Center attacks. The Harvard International Journal of Press/Politics, 8(4), 76–96.

Entman, R. M. (2003). Cascading activation: Contesting the White House's frame after 9/11. Political Communication, 20(4), 415–432.

Greater London Authority. (2006, June). Report of the 7 July review committee. London: Greater London Authority. Retrieved July 6, 2007, from http://www.london.gov.uk/assembly/reports/7july/report.pdf

Hewitt, C. (1992). Public's perspective. In D. L. Paletz & A. P. Schmid (Eds.), Terrorism and the media (pp. 174–177). London: Sage.

Hutcheson, J., Domke, D., Billeaudeaux, A., & Garland, P. (2004). U.S. national identity, political elites, and a patriotic press following September 11. Political Communication, 21(1), 27–50.

McDonald, I. R., & Lawrence, R. G. (2004). Filling the 24 × 7 news hole: Television news coverage following September 11th. American Behavioral Scientist, 48(3), 327–340.

National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States. (2004). The 9/11 commission report. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office. Retrieved July 7, 2007, from http://www.gpoaccess.gov/911/

Oates, S. (2006). Comparing the politics of fear: The role of terrorism news in election campaigns in Russia, the United States and Britain. International Relations, 20(4), 425–437.

Sparre, K. (2001). Megaphone diplomacy in the Northern Irish peace process: Squaring the circle by talking to terrorists through journalists. The Harvard International Journal of Press/Politics, 6(1), 88–104.

Wilkinson, P. (2006). Terrorism versus democracy. London: Routledge.

Testimonials, Political

A testimonial, also referred to as an endorsement, is a statement for or against a product, service, candidate for office, or political idea. Such a statement is intended to influence others to follow the guidance of the individual(s) providing the testimonial. The use of testimonials is based on identification, association, and projection. Testimonials are often used as a persuasive technique in propaganda and political advertising.

Propagandists and advertisers often use testimonials because they believe that members of the audience will identify with, or want to be like, the individual(s) providing the statement(s) of support. Often, celebrities or well-known figures are used to provide testimonials. This is done to enhance the desire of audience members to accept the ideas being presented because they wish to be like, or identify with, celebrities. Association works in much the same way as identification, where audience members may be more likely to accept claims in a testimonial because they wish to be associated with the source, the ideas presented, or a group the source represents. Testimonials may also employ projection by using statements from ordinary people which allow members of the audience to recognize that people who are similar to them recommend a product or support a candidate.

Testimonials were one of the "seven common propaganda devices" identified by the Institute for Propaganda Analysis (IPA) in its 1939 "A, B, C's of Propaganda Analysis." According to the IPA, testimonials involve an esteemed or despised person stating that an idea, program, product, or person is beneficial or harmful. The IPA noted that testimonials, like each of the other propaganda devices, could be used by dangerous propagandists to get people to accept ideas without critically examining the claims being made. Fair propagandists would use testimonials to get people interested in a statement of support so they could examine it before accepting the idea. To judge the validity of a testimonial, the IPA said that we should determine who or what is quoted in the testimonial, why this person(s) should be regarded as an expert on the subject, and the value of the idea without the support of the testimonial. The IPA also noted that testimonials can be used unfairly by employing untrustworthy sources, distorting facts or opinions of trustworthy sources, and falsely attributing statements to a trustworthy source.

Since the early days of televised political advertising, testimonials have been used in campaigns. In the 1952 presidential campaign, Adlai E. Stevenson used an ad showing an average American woman expressing her support for the candidate. Eisenhower used several testimonials from average Americans in his 1956 campaign, including ads that featured average women, a man identified as a union member, and Lena Washington, an African American woman. Harry Belafonte was featured in a television ad endorsing John F. Kennedy during the 1960 campaign. In the 1964 campaign, actor Raymond Massey was featured in a television ad urging Americans to "Vote for a real American. Vote for Barry Goldwater. In your heart you know he's right." Ronald Reagan also appeared in a television ad endorsing Goldwater. Mamie Eisenhower made a testimonial television ad for Richard Nixon's reelection bid in 1972. Singer, actress, and activist Pearl Bailey appeared in a television ad endorsing Gerald Ford in his unsuccessful reelection campaign 1976. Former President Gerald Ford himself appeared in a testimonial ad for Ronald Reagan in 1980. John Kerry's 2004 campaign used a television ad with Kristen Breitweiser, whose husband had been killed in the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, giving her endorsement to Kerry.

Larry Jene King

Further Readings

Doob, L. W. (1948). Public opinion and propaganda. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston.

Jowett, G., & O'Donnell, V. (2006). Propaganda and persuasion. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Lee, A. M., & Lee, E. B. (Eds.). (1939). The fine art of propaganda. New York: Harcourt, Brace.

Thatcher, Margaret (1925–)

Margaret Thatcher is considered by many to be one of the most influential women in politics. She gained a strong reputation in England and worldwide as the highest regarded politician in recent British history. She is the only female British prime minister and the longest-serving British prime minister in the 20th century.

Margaret Thatcher was born in Grantham, England, as Margaret Hilda Roberts. Her parents, Alfred and Beatrice Roberts, were small business owners. Thatcher studied chemistry and law at Somerville College, Oxford University, and graduated in 1947. While at Oxford University she was elected president of the student Conservative Association.

In 1950, while in her mid-20s, she ran as a Conservative candidate for a Labour Party parliamentary seat. She was not elected, but she did gain national attention for being the youngest female Conservative candidate ever. As she was starting to gain national attention pursuing her career, she also started her family. In 1951 she married Denis Thatcher and, in 1953, gave birth to a set of twins.

Unlike many women of that time, having a family did not stop her from continuing her career in politics. Margaret Thatcher entered Parliament in 1959 at age 34. In 1970 at age 44, she was appointed to the cabinet as education secretary. Shortly after her appointment she was forced to cut the education budget. One of the cuts she made abolished free milk for school children. That incident gave her a rather unflattering nickname: "Margaret Thatcher, Milk Snatcher." Thatcher gained another nickname on the night of January 19, 1976, when she gave a speech that attacked the Soviet Union; shortly afterward, she became known as the "Iron Lady." Thatcher appeared to like the name and, shortly after, it became part of her political image.

In 1979, after serving for 20 years in Parliament, Thatcher was elected British prime minister—the first and only female ever elected to this post. She continued to serve as prime minister for 11 years. Thatcher resigned as prime minister on November 28, 1990, after many in her cabinet expressed doubt that she could be elected for a fourth term, leaving her no choice but to resign.

During Thatcher's 11 years as prime minister, her leadership style was questioned often and by many. Thatcher's actions were considered controversial by most. Although Thatcher's leadership style is controversial, her importance is not questioned. Critics along with supporters agree that the Thatcher years are historically important and have great value. During her time in the office, she helped grow the economy in the United Kingdom. She was a co-founder with U.S. President Ronald Reagan of a school of "conservative conviction politics."

Leaving the office of prime minister did not eliminate her influence. After her resignation, Thatcher continued to travel the world as a lecturer. She also wrote two best-selling books, The Downing Street Years (1993) and The Path to Power (1995).

Kalisa Lynn Hauschen

See also Conservative Party, Britain

Further Readings

Green, E. H. (2006). Thatcher. London: Hadder Arnold.

Seldon, A., & Collings, D. (2000). Britain under Thatcher. New York: Longman.

Third-Person Effect

Coined by W. Phillips Davison in 1983, the term third-person effect refers to people's tendency to perceive others (the "third" person) as more susceptible to media effects than themselves. This tendency is assumed to lead individuals to take action, for example, to support the regulation of media content that may have undesirable effects. The third-person effect thus consists of a perceptual component (usually called third-person perception) and a behavioral component. The third-person perception is typically seen as a self–other perceptual bias: People are prone to assume that something undesirable—for example, being influenced by media—applies to others rather than to themselves. This assumption may be right at the individual level. At the aggregate level, however, the assumption is logically inconsistent: The majority of people claim that the majority of people are more strongly affected by media than they themselves are.

Although empirical research on the third-person effect effectively started only in 1988, more than 80 published correlational and experimental studies and a meta-analysis have confirmed the robustness of the third-person perception since then. Researchers have documented the third-person perception regarding issues as diverse as political advertising, Internet pornography, and the Lewinsky affair. Moreover, evidence from different cultural contexts tentatively suggests that the third-person perception is a universal perceptual tendency although recent research has pointed out that a collectivist orientation typical of some Asian cultures may reduce third-person perceptions. Finally, studies have shown that the third-person perception is insensitive to methodological influences such as question order.

To study the factors that affect the emergence and strength of third-person perception, researchers have focused essentially on three domains: the features of the media message and its effects, the characteristics of the self, and the (perceived) characteristics of the others. In terms of the features of the media message, persuasive, incredible, and biased media content with a negative valence has been found to generally increase third-person perceptions. Incredible sources and persuasive or biased media genres—for example, political advertisements—also boost third-person perceptions. An important role for the emergence of third-person perceptions is played by the social desirability of the media effects in question: If media effects are socially undesirable, third-person perceptions occur. However, the reverse third-person perception—people perceive themselves as more strongly influenced than others—only erratically emerged when media effects were socially desirable.

Regarding the characteristics of the self that influence third-person perception, research has shown that self-perceived knowledge about an issue, the belief that one is better educated than others, and greater self-esteem augment third-person perceptions. Further, people's involvement in (emotionalized political) issues has generally increased the size of third-person perceptions. People's gender, age, and media exposure are usually unrelated to third-person perceptions.

In terms of the (perceived) characteristics of others, early research consistently showed that third-person perceptions increase as the others become socially more distant. For example, the third-person perception is bigger for "the public at large" than for "friends." Recent studies, however, have challenged the so-called social distance corollary. Various studies have shown that people draw on relevant social knowledge, including stereotypes and schemas about out-groups, when they assess media effects on others. For example, the perceived exposure of others to particular media content has been shown to be a better predictor of the size of third-person perception than has social distance. Moreover, stronger effects for groups of remote others have been found to result from larger group sizes in addition to social distance. Finally, others' perceived predispositions toward accepting or imitating media messages, the relevance of media messages for others, and negative stereotypes about out-groups have appeared as promising explanations of third-person perceptions.

The behavioral component of the third-person effects has received somewhat less research attention than has the perceptual component. Studies have established evidence that third-person perceptions increase the support for external regulation of entertainment or advertisement content. However, third-person perceptions do not affect whether people support control over news. There is growing evidence that third-person perceptions also influence domains other than people's support for regulation of media content. For example, third-person perceptions may reduce people's intention to prepare for potentially dangerous events, may decrease adolescents' use of condoms, and may boost individuals' willingness to resort to violent protest.

Researchers have used various theoretical frameworks to study the third-person effect, for example, attribution theory, social comparison theory, social identity theory, and the optimistic bias concept. These frameworks typically emphasize either motivational or cognitive explanations of the third-person effect. Motivational approaches consider the third-person effect essentially a form of self-enhancement, that is, the tendency of individuals to see themselves in a light as positive as possible, even if this entails an adjustment of reality. Cognitive approaches see the third-person effect as a result of information processing. Limitations in how we perceive, process, store, and retrieve information may lead to perceptual biases such as the third-person effect. Both motivational and cognitive approaches are useful for explaining particular aspects of the third-person effect. However, it is unclear whether and how the two approaches can be combined to come to a more encompassing explanation of the third-person effect.

The significance of the third-person effect for mass communication research in general and political communication in particular lies in its focus on the implications of perceived, instead of actual, media effects. In less than 20 years of empirical research, our knowledge of the phenomenon and its underlying processes has advanced greatly. However, our understanding of the range and intensity of the behavioral consequences of the third-person perception is still limited. Moreover, research is silent about which theoretical approaches to the third-person effect are most appropriate to explain the phenomenon. It is these two lines of inquiry that need the particular attention of future research.

Jochen Peter

Further Readings

Davison, W. P. (1983). The third-person effect in communication. Public Opinion Quarterly, 47, 1–15.

Paul, B., Salwen, M. B., & Dupagne, M. (2000). The third-person effect: A meta-analysis of the perceptual hypothesis. Mass Communication & Society, 3, 57–85.

Perloff, R. M. (2002). The third-person effect. In J. Bryant & D. Zillmann (Eds.), Media effects. Advances in theory and research (2nd ed., pp. 489–506). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Thomas, Clarence

See Hill–Thomas Hearings

Ticket Splitting

Ticket splitting is a term that is used to describe voting for different parties when voters are provided with the opportunity to cast more than one vote at a time. By contrast, voters who vote for only one party are said to cast a straight-ticket. This definition applies to voting behavior in various institutional settings. Voters can cast split tickets when they are asked to elect different offices. Voting for a Republican candidate in an American presidential election while voting for a Democrat in the House contest is a case in point. Citizens can also cast split tickets when voting for only one institution. For example, in German federal parliamentary elections voters are asked to cast two votes that they are allowed to cast for different parties. For a long time, intra-institutional ticket splitting was unique to Germany. Yet, in recent years, a considerable number of countries, including Hungary, Italy, Japan, Mexico, New Zealand, Russia, South Korea, and the Ukraine, adopted two-vote systems for elections to legislative assemblies.

Depending on the institutional setting, ticket splitting has considerable political consequences. As regards intra-institutional ticket splitting, split tickets can influence the partisan composition of parliament and thereby turn the partisan balance. Inter-institutional ticket splitting can cause divided partisan control over institutions. If many Americans, for instance, vote for the Republican candidate in the presidential election while casting their House votes for Democratic candidates, a Republican president and a predominantly Democratic House could result. As far as these institutions jointly decide about policy-making, this pattern of divided government requires different parties to compromise about policies. Thus, divided government can render a system of checks and balances to be more effective, but it can also cause gridlock.

Regardless of the institutional setting, only a minority of voters engage in ticket splitting. In the United States, the extent of ticket splitting between presidential and congressional votes increased from roughly 10% in 1952 to about 30% in 1972, but it then declined again to about 15% in 2004. Intra-institutional ticket splitting is also not common. In New Zealand, for instance, the share of split tickets dropped from about 39% in 1996 and 2002 to about 29% in 2005, although in Germany, ticket splitting in federal elections rose from roughly 5% in the late 1950s to almost 25% in 2005.

A large and rapidly growing amount of literature has proposed various explanations for ticket splitting. A traditional account considers voters to cast split tickets because they prefer (candidates of) different parties when it comes to casting more than one vote. This model of sincere or affective ticket splitting appears in various guises. Scholars argue that a lack of strong partisan attachments increases the likelihood of casting split tickets as political independents are more likely to prefer (candidates of) different parties. Divided partisan preferences may be fueled by lopsided campaigns. For instance, to explain ticket splitting between presidential and congressional candidates in the United States, scholars rely on congressional incumbents' advantage in resources and visibility that allows them to secure reelection, irrespective of partisan ebbs and flows at the presidential level. Alternatively, divided partisan preferences may result from voters relying on different criteria when deciding whom to vote for. For instance, Jacobson argues that Americans suppose presidents to provide national goods like peace and prosperity, whereas they expect members of Congress to concentrate on providing benefits for their districts. Likewise, under the German two-vote system, a voter may refer to national policies when deciding for which party to cast his or her party vote while judging local candidates in terms of personal appeal.

A more recent line of reasoning claims that ticket splitting is a result of voters engaging in strategic decision making rather than in expressing their preferences sincerely. In the United States, so the argument goes, ticket splitters deliberately cast split tickets to obtain divided government so that policies will result from parties compromising about moderate policies. Thus, in this account, divided government is not an unintended by-product of ticket splitting but is deliberately chosen by strategically balancing voters.

As regards intra-institutional ticket splitting, the strategic voter account is somewhat different. It builds on the notion of strategic voting implying that voters do not vote for their most preferred party or candidate because they consider it not viable. Instead, they vote for the party they prefer among those parties they consider viable. Thus, strategic ticket splitting occurs when a party is viable with regard to one vote as it is not viable with regard to the other vote. In Germany and New Zealand, for instance, one vote is cast under plurality rule and the other one under proportional representation so that small party supporters may vote for their party in the latter contest but for the major party they prefer most in the former one. Scholars propose even more sophisticated calculations to exploit institutional incentives resulting in ticket splitting.

Scholars have put forth convincing evidence supportive of the notion that voters express multiple preferences and the lack of strong partisan attachments when they split their votes. As regards the strategic splitting approach, in spite of indications that some voters engage in strategic ticket splitting, the evidence is not encouraging. Some scholars even contend that ticket splitting may sometimes result from voter confusion rather than from sophisticated strategic reasoning. As mixed-electoral systems which allow voters to engage in intra-institutional ticket splitting are quite complicated, some voters are ill-informed about the working of the electoral rules. Thus, they may split their tickets in a rather unreasonable way. A case in point is a German voter who casts a party vote for the party of his or her most preferred local candidate while voting for his or her most preferred federal party with the local candidate vote. As a result, though mixed electoral systems clearly provide incentives to cast split tickets, strategically this appears not to be the prevailing way voters split their tickets.

Harald Schoen

See also Party Identification; Voter Behavior

Further Readings

Burden, B. C., & Kimball, D. C. (2002). Why Americans split their tickets. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Cox, G. W., & Kernell, S. (Eds.). (1991). The politics of divided government. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Fiorina, M. P. (1996). Divided government (2nd ed.). New York: Macmillan.

Jacobson, G. (1990). The electoral origins of divided government. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Tripp, Linda

See Lewinsky, Monica

Trippi, Joe (1956–)

Joe Trippi is an American political consultant who worked on political campaigns for prominent members of the Democratic Party, such as Edward Kennedy, Walter Mondale, Gary Hart, and Dick Gephardt. In 2003–2004, Trippi served as campaign manager for Democratic presidential candidate Howard Dean and ran a campaign which is now a textbook example of successful online grassroots activism.

Trippi described his pioneering work for Howard Dean in his book The Revolution Will Not Be Televised: Democracy, the Internet, and the Overthrow of Everything (2004). One of the most important innovations to political campaigning was the creation of the first ever campaign Web log, initially named Call to Action and later changed to Blog for America. Trippi used the blog as a way to appeal to supporters directly for fundraising. Trippi also pioneered the use of social networking Web sites such as MeetUp.com to organize and connect supporters. When the MeetUp site became insufficient for the huge number of people who signed up to support Dean, Trippi ordered the development of special software which supporters could download for free, personalize, connect to other Dean supporters in their area, and campaign on behalf of the candidate. Through blogging and social networking, he built a huge online community of political activists and managed to break all previous fundraising records in the history of U.S. primaries by collecting 50 million dollars for Dean. Trippi explained that his vision was to decentralize the way political campaigns are run and to involve voters into the political dialogue, rather than relying on a small number of big donors.

Trippi also pioneered online television for a political candidate, setting up a Web site called DeanTv.com, which played videos of candidate speeches and clips from the campaign trail.

These strategies and tools for online campaigning developed by Trippi for Dean in 2004 transformed political campaigning in the United States and have been widely adopted by political candidates ever since. Trippi's campaign for Dean is also credited for revitalizing engagement in the political process and stimulating grassroots support for political candidates.

Monica Postelnicu

See also Blogs, Blogging; Dean, Howard; World Wide Web, Political Uses

Further Readings

Trippi, J. (2004). The revolution will not be televised: Democracy, the Internet, and the overthrow of everything. New York: HarperCollins.

Triumph of the Will

See Film and Politics

Turnout, Voter

See Center for the Study of the American Electorate

Two-Step Flow Model of Communication

The two-step flow model of communication is a theory of limited media effects formulated in 1948 by Paul Lazarsfeld, Bernard Berelson, and Hazel Gaudet in the book The People's Choice, after research into voters' decision-making processes during the 1940 U.S. presidential election. The two-step flow model of communication stipulates that mass media content first reaches "opinion leaders," people who are active media users and who collect, interpret, and diffuse the meaning of media messages to less active media consumers. According to the authors, opinion leaders pick up information from the media, and this information then gets passed on to less active members of the public. This implies that most people receive information from opinion leaders through interpersonal communication rather than directly from mass media, as previously assumed by other theories of mass communication. Lazarsfeld, Berelson, and Gaudet discovered that most voters in the 1940 election got their information about the candidates from other people who read about the campaign in the newspapers, and not directly from the media. These more informed people became "opinion leaders" who filtered mass media content and passed it on to other people, together with their own interpretation. Lazarsfeld, Berelson, and Gaudet concluded that word-of-mouth transmission of information plays an important role in the communication process in our society, and mass media have only a limited influence on most individuals.

The theory of the two-step flow of communication reversed the dominant paradigm in mass communication at the time. Before Lazarsfeld's study, it was assumed that mass media have a direct influence on a mass audience who consumed and absorbed media messages. Media were thought to significantly influence people's decisions and behaviors. However, the research done by Lazarsfeld et al. showed that only about 5% of people changed their voting preference as a result of media consumption and that interpersonal discussions of political issues were more prevalent than consumption of political news within one typical day. Factors such as interpersonal communication with family members, friends, and members of one's social and professional circles turned out to be better predictors of a person's voting behavior than that person's media exposure. These findings came to be known as the "limited effects paradigm" of media influence, explicated more fully by Joseph Klapper in The Effects of Mass Communication (1960), which guided mass communication researchers over the next 5 decades.

The theory of the two-step flow of mass communication was further developed by Lazarsfeld together with Elihu Katz in the book Personal Influence (1955). This book explains that people's reactions to media messages are mediated by interpersonal communication with members of their social environment. A person's membership in different social groups (family, friends, professional and religious associations, etc.) has more influence on that person's decision-making processes and behavior than does information from mass media. Researchers of mass communication cannot therefore conceive the public as a homogenous mass audience that actively processes and responds to media messages uniformly, as postulated by initial theories of mass communication such as the hypodermic needle model, which assumed that audiences responded to media messages directly as if the message had been injected into them.

Since its formulation, the theory of the two-step flow of communication has been tested, and validated, on numerous occasions through replicative studies that looked at how innovations were diffused into society through opinion leaders and trendsetters. However, the theory came under some criticism in the 1970s and the 1980s. Some researchers argued that the process of a two-step flow is an oversimplification and that the actual flow of information from mass media to media consumers has more than two steps. For instance, additional research revealed that conversations based on media content are more frequent among opinion leaders themselves rather than among opinion leaders and less informed individuals. This creates the extra step of opinion sharing among equally informed individuals, compared to only a vertical flow of information from opinion leaders to followers. Another criticism is the fact that the two-step flow model was formulated during a time when television did not exist. Both original studies relied on people's responses to newspapers and radio broadcasts and concluded that interpersonal communication is more frequent than media consumption during an average day. Later studies of everyday behavior in the era of television dominance seem to indicate the opposite. It was also found that only a small percentage of people discuss information they have learned from mass media with their peers. National surveys regarding people's main sources of information also indicate that people rely much more on mass media rather than on personal communication.

Monica Postelnicu

Further Readings

Defleur, M. L., & Larsen, O. N. (1958). The flow of information. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Katz, E., & Lazarsfeld, P. (1955). Personal influence: The part played by people in the flow of mass communication. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.

Klapper, J. (1960). The effects of mass communication. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.

Lazarsfeld, P., Berelson, B., & Gaudet, H. (1948). The people's choice. New York: Columbia University Press.

U

Underground Media

Underground media is synonymous with underground press and underground journalism. All these terms refer to the ideologically liberal journalism during the 1960s and 1970s that revolted against the journalistic norms of objectivity and appeared in the form of independently owned, published, and distributed print media. The first underground newspaper is considered to be the Los Angeles Free Press, founded in 1964. Some examples of underground media are the Berkeley Barb, San Francisco's Oracle, Chicago's Seed, the East Village Other, and New York's Rat Subterranean News. The Underground Press Syndicate was created in 1967 so underground newspapers could freely share information and news. Most college towns and large cities had an underground newspaper by 1969.

Underground journalists did not believe that a reporter could escape personal biases to report a factual news story. Underground stories did not feature divergent views and investigate opposing beliefs; rather, underground stories included the reporter's own passionate opinions. Although underground media were not mainstream news outlets and offended many different segments of America, the underground press can be credited with covering important stories that the traditional news media did not pick up for months or years. For example, the Kerner Commission faulted the 1967 Newark and Detroit riots to institutionalized white racism and the traditional media's negligence in failing to report on racism. Additionally, stories about Agent Orange made underground media headlines long before mass media picked up the stories.

Underground media was not a long-lived experiment in journalism. Most underground newspapers had disappeared by the mid-1970s. However, the investigative drive that the underground media possessed drifted into the mainstream as the underground newspapers faded away. Popular underground media beats that the traditional media eventually incorporated into its regular coverage included environmental pollution, music, civil and women's rights, and drugs.

There are still magazines and online news outlets that can be described as being in the spirit of underground media. Utne Reader is just one of many alternative magazines that focus on stories that the mainstream press does not cover. CommonDreams.org, AlterNet.org, and IndyMedia.org are some of the online news resources for people interested in alternative news. Even on the political right, ideological conservatives have their own news magazines and online news outlets that cater to the news stories conservatives think are not getting covered by the mainstream media. The underground media had an impact on both mainstream news organizations and also today's alternative press.

Kristen D. Landreville

Further Readings

Giessing, R. J. (1970). The underground press in America. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Kessler, L. (1984). The dissident press: Alternative journalism in American history. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Peck, A. (1985). Uncovering the sixties: The life and times of the underground press. New York: Pantheon Books.

UNESCO Media Policy

The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization's (UNESCO) media policy is the whole of its collective binding decisions, which the multilateral United Nations agency takes in order to change the frame for public communication. Media policy, which is part of UNESCO's communication policy, sets standards, laws, and rules and, thus, narrows or extends the playground of stakeholders and participants in mass communication. Traditionally analyzed in the national context, the discovery of the global dimension of media policy is quite a recent phenomenon, although communication and exchange over long distances is an old historical fact. International policy, therefore, referred to the policy between nation-states rather than to a global media policy. A new comprehension developed only after the two great catastrophes of the 20th century, World War I and World War II. Together, nation-states erected world institutions such as the Völkerbund (1919). But only after the end of World War II did the erection of the United Nations (1945), with its comprehensive structure of special organizations, lead to institutional conditions for global media policy. UNESCO is the global forum for international communication and media policy.

"Since the wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defenses of peace must be constructed." This poetic first sentence of the UNESCO Constitution explains why, from its very beginning, the UN Special Organization for Culture has been concerned with communication policy. The principle of the free flow of ideas in word and images, one of the very basic values of Western democracies, in order to enable freedom of expression, has therefore been enshrined in Article 1 of the Constitution of this specialized UN agency. Today, UNESCO functions as a laboratory of ideas and a standard-setter to forge universal agreements on emerging ethical issues among its 191 member states and six associate members. It does so by adopting recommendations, declarations (so-called soft law), and conventions. As international treaties, conventions have to be signed and ratified by member states. Also, 30 ratification documents must be handed over before a convention becomes part of international law.

History

Communication has been central to the thinking of UNESCO from the start, but this question has taken on markedly different meanings depending on the period concerned. There seem to be few points in common between the postwar period of trying to improve the distribution of books and the readership of newspapers and UNESCO's program today, which aims at shaping new norms for the construction of knowledge societies in the age of Internet, global computerization, and digital contents. Yet the basic idea, the defense of peace, has remained the same, although the tools have changed. But what has changed even more is the composition of the membership of the organization in the very first decades of its existence. Founded by 20 states, which signed the constitution on November 4, 1946, the agency consisted of 140 member states in the mid-1970s, mostly developing countries, due to the worldwide process of decolonization. These states, the so-called third world, together with the socialist bloc, questioned the state of play concerning the "cultural contract" in the world, pointed out the "one-way flow" of information from North to South, analyzed the structures and means of communication in the hands of a few Western countries, and—recognizing the importance of cultural perception for the developing of their own countries—asked for a New World Information and Communication Order. In the mid-1980s the United States, Great Britain, and Singapore left the organization.

Media Policy

In 1989, UNESCO changed its strategy in international media policy. The iron curtain tore, and the Berlin Wall and Communism fell. As the world left behind the era of the cold war, UNESCO parted with the concept of a new order. It was increasingly realized that the impediments to what is called the free flow of ideas and the interchange of cultures are not only political ones but also economic ones. Yet the imbalances in the international media landscape could not be overcome by directing or restricting information flows. New media landscapes should come into existence by freedom, recognition of cultural differences, and through international solidarity. This was not only the conviction of Federico Mayor, since 1987 the general director, it was widely shared by the member states. The 25th General Conference ultimately led to the new program Communication in the Service of Man. As modern communication technologies such as satellites and new media enabled a world without frontiers, the newly designed UNESCO program sector comprised communication, information, and informatics. The former vice president of Russia's broadcasting system, Henrikas Yushkiavitshus, holder of the renowned American Emmy Award, became its director (1990). Again, UNESCO supports the development of a free, independent, and pluralistic media landscape throughout the world. For this aim, the organization works closely together with the United Nations and its development program, United Nations Development Programme, as well as international nongovernmental organizations and their networks in the field of journalism, print and electronic media, news agencies, libraries, archives, press freedom, and human rights. The Declaration of Windhoek, Namibia (1991) endorsing the importance of a free and independent press, followed by such declarations in all regions of the world, demonstrated the successful involvement of civil society in the organization's media policy. Core programs of UNESCO's reform became the International Program for the Development of Communication, adopted in 1980, and the 2001 program Information for All. Yet, as media aid was not a political priority in the Western world, UNESCO was confronted with growing unrest. Even Western diplomats commented on the inability of UNESCO's instruments to tackle the undeniable structural problems. On a global scale first analyzed by the so-called McBride Report (1980), the structural problems grew with rapidity at the beginning of the digital age.

The New Concept

Information and knowledge are core aspects of business in the postindustrial world. Worldwide, states are increasingly unable to handle on their own the internal and cross-border flow of ideas, images, and resources that affect societal development. Notwithstanding its basic democratic function, international competition increasingly frames media and media policy in the context of economics. In its extension of market principles, and by highlighting the culture of economically powerful nations, globalization has created new forms of inequality, thereby fostering cultural conflict rather than cultural pluralism. As all developments create their reverse, new impulses for the global debate came from the cultural sector. The 1995 report Our Creative Diversity, published by the World Commission on Culture and Development chaired by Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, marked a shift from development to diversity. The title of the report is a clear reflection of this shift. It is no accident that the report was published in the very same year the member states of the World Trade Organization signed the General Agreement on Trade in Services Treaty, which recognizes media as products with the consequence that instruments of cultural policy are to be deemed superfluous in the context of continuing market deregulation. But media goods and services are always both economic as well as cultural assets. They are "vehicles of values." As such they should not be treated like other commodities. This was the strong statement of the World Culture Conference in Stockholm 1998. States were asked to design national cultural policies in order to create pluralism and do so in full respect of individual freedom. In 2001, UNESCO's General Conference adopted the Declaration on Cultural Diversity, followed in 2005 by the adoption with an overwhelming majority of the International Convention on the Protection and Promotion of Cultural Expressions. By becoming part of international law in 2007, nation-states were allowed to develop their media policies by using their cultural tool kits in order to create and develop media pluralism without running the risk of being accused of having violated international trade law.

Verena Metze-Mangold

Further Readings

Breuning, C. (1987). Kommunikationspolitik der UNESCO. Dokumentation und Analyse der Jahre 1946–1987 [Communication politics of UNESCO. Documentation and analysis for years 1946–1987]. Konstanz, Germany: Universitätsverlag Konstanz GmbH.

Metze-Mangold, V. (1994). Medien- und Kommunikationspolitik, internationale [International media and communication politics]. In D. Nohlen (Ed.), Lexikon der Politik, Band 6 Internationale Beziehungen [Lexicon of politics, Volume 6. International relations] (pp. 283–288). Munich: C. H. Beck.

Pérez de Cuéllar, J. (1996). Our creative diversity. Report of the World Commission on Culture and Development (2nd ed.). Paris: UNESCO.

UNESCO. (2005). Towards knowledge societies. UNESCO world report. Paris: Author. Retrieved July 12, 2007, from http://unesdoc.unesco.org/images/0014/001418/141843e.pdf

UNESCO. (2005). UNESCO: Draft programme and budget 2006–2007. Paris: Author. Retrieved July 12, 2007, from http://www.unesco.ca/en/documents/138939e.pdf

Unions, Political Activity

Unions are associations of wage earners who work together to maintain and improve the economic, social, and political conditions that affect them. Unions offer a collective voice on jobs, on government, on candidates, on political issues, and on community and global economy. The National Relations Act of 1935 gave most U.S. workers the right to join or to form unions. Union membership is voluntary, and most people join unions for the collective bargaining power they provide. In fact, it is estimated that union members earn on average 28% more than their non-union counterparts.

In the United States, over 16.1 million individuals are members of labor unions. Although there are numerous large union groups (United Steelworkers of America, the United Auto Workers, the Teamsters Union, and so on), over 9 million individuals are affiliated nationally with the American Federation of Labor–Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO), which represents 53 affiliate unions. Although often associated with representation for industrial workers, modern unions are comprised of all types of individuals. In fact, the greatest growth has recently occurred in the service and public sectors. There are unions for manufacturing, construction, teaching, technical, and medical employees. Although the majority of union members traditionally have been white males, unions are seeing their highest membership growth among female members, workers of color, and immigrant workers.

Objectives vary by union but may include providing benefits to workers (health care, etc.), collective bargaining (wage negotiations, etc.), industrial actions (strikes, lockouts, etc.), and political activity (favorable legislation, campaign communication, lobbying, financial support, etc.). Through political involvement, unions work to secure social and economic justices. Unions provide a stronger political voice to members by engaging in political activity in several major ways.

First, unions endorse political candidates. Although dwarfed by business interests, union endorsements and contributions still mean large donations. Endorsements have been known to shape election races. Indeed, candidates who are seeking endorsement may be influenced to support the issues that are of importance to the unions. According to the Center for Responsive Politics, unions are among the most generous contributors to political campaigns. In recent election cycles, labor unions have spent over $120 million on federal political activity. By pooling resources, unions engage in lobbying and in political activity aimed at securing the interests of their membership. In the past, unions have been criticized for promoting favorable legislature by supporting political "friends" and punishing political "foes" through both campaign financing and votes. Although "friends" may be of any political party affiliation, findings from the Center for Responsive Politics indicate that unions have traditionally contributed far more to Democrats than to Republican or Independent candidates. A sponsored candidate does not have to vote for all bills endorsed by the union as contributions are made in good faith. However, to be considered "friendly" a candidate usually votes in support of most legislation that is favorable to the union. In recent years, unions also have been criticized for using membership dues to help fund political campaigns. Following recent legislation, this practice is no longer acceptable. Currently, most unions accept voluntary donations from members to support political activities.

Second, unions communicate with members about the status of legislation and the political stances of candidates that affect their working conditions, industry issues, or funding for services or products they provide. Their mission is often to give voice to legislative professional, economic, and social aspirations; to strengthen the work environment; to improve the quality of products or services provided; and to bring members together. In many cases, unions are involved in politics because members' working lives are impacted by decisions made in the political realm. Indeed, working conditions are a matter of public policy. Thus, it is not only the members' right but also their responsibility to engage in politics. Although unions do not tell members whom to vote for, they do communicate with members about the issues and the stances of political candidates that they feel will be in the best interest of union members. In addition to providing campaign literature, many unions also mobilize campaign workers and organize voting drives. This helps encourage member participation in the political process. Indeed, the strength of unions often can be seen at the ballot box.

Finally, unions communicate with the public about the status of legislature and the candidates' political stances that affect the union. Unions communicate with the public through community forums. They distribute campaign literature by hand and through direct mail in support of candidates or particular issues. They purchase commercial airtime on television and radio or buy space in newspapers and magazines to run political advertisements. Some argue that the political activity of unions resembles that of modern political parties.

Lori Melton McKinnon

See also Political Action Committees (PACs)

Further Readings

Epstein, E. M. (1976). Corporations and labor unions in electoral politics. Annals, AAPSS, 425, 33–58.

Marick, F. M., & Delaney, J. T. (2005). Organized labor's political scorecard. Journal of Labor Research, 26(3), 365–392.

Wilson, J. Q. (1995). Political organizations. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

United States Information Agency

The United States Information Agency (USIA), best known for the Voice of America (VOA) and the Fulbright Fellowships, was a U.S. foreign affairs agency from 1953 to 1999. It was established by President Eisenhower to explain U.S. foreign policy and promote national interests abroad through a program of public diplomacy. USIA supporters assert that its public diplomacy programs made a crucial contribution to the collapse of the Eastern Bloc by promoting the values of freedom and democracy. Detractors counter that the agency did no such thing and, in fact, mirrored its Soviet counterpart in the use of propaganda and selective truths.

The USIA's mission was continuously redefined by the changing international political environment, with priorities determined by an array of policy makers and leaps in new technology. When the Cold War era ended, advocates for merging the USIA into the State Department argued that its mission ended with the Cold War. The emergence and commercial success of the global news networks such as Cable News Network also made USIA's traditional broadcasting operation appear to be obsolete.

Advocates for an independent USIA refuted having any propagandistic function, asserting its sole mission to be the distribution of information. Thus, after the Cold War era, the USIA sought to continue its mission through cultural and educational exchange programs for journalists, scholars, and public officials. It also actively engaged in civic educational programs aimed at helping nations learn how to conduct elections, run markets, attract investment, and protect ethnic and political minorities. This was to be accomplished through radio broadcasts and libraries, as well as educational and cultural exchanges. When Senator Jesse Helms (R-NC) was pushing the Clinton administration to fold the USIA into the State Department, there was considerable opposition to the idea of merging public diplomacy with traditional diplomacy. Critics argued that traditional diplomats tend to put their values into negotiation, compromise, and even secrecy, an art known as quiet diplomacy. Public diplomacy, they argued, requires openness, both to reach foreign audiences and to keep in touch with journalists, intellectuals, students, and cultural organizations. Whereas traditional diplomacy seeks to communicate with the public as little as possible, public diplomacy was said to dig into a country's grassroots. Despite their stern defense, the USIA experienced first budget cuts and then finally complete merging of the slimmed organization into the State Department in October 1999 by the Foreign Affairs and Restructuring Act. Its public diplomatic functions were taken over by the State Department and its broadcasting technologies were combined with the International Broadcasting Bureau, providing the administrative and engineering support for U.S. government-funded non-military international broadcast services. Their functions include the Voice of America, Radio Sawa, and Radio and TV Martí (Office of Cuba Broadcasting). They also provide engineering and program support to Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty and Radio Free Asia. Though nearly entirely forgotten by the American public, the USIA has received renewed attention in the post-9/11 world. John Hughes, associate director of the USIA during the Reagan administration, contends that the USIA needed to be reconstituted as a means of countering the distorted messages from Osama bin Laden and other Al-Qaeda leaders over Al Jazeera and other media outlets in the Arab world.

Others, however, argue that the entire effort of public diplomacy is inherently flawed, resting as it does on the notion that it is misunderstanding that causes disagreement with the United States.

Joon Soo Lim

Further Readings

Dizard, W. P. (2001). Digital diplomacy: U.S. Foreign policy in the information age. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Hughes, J. (2004, December 15). Needed: USIA's people-to-people message. The Christian Science Monitor, 96, 9.

An independent U.S.I.A. (1995, June 2). The New York Times, p. A28.

Lord, C. (1998, Winter). The past and future of public diplomacy. ORBIS, 42(1), 49–73.

Wang, J. (2006). Managing national reputation and international relations in the global era: Public diplomacy revisited. Public Relations Review, 32, 91–96.

Unseeing Eye, The

In 1976, Syracuse political scientists Thomas Patterson and Robert D. McClure published The Unseeing Eye: The Myth of Television Power in National Elections, detailing the controversial and groundbreaking results of one of the first rigorous and systematic studies of television's impacts on the outcomes of an election. This National Science Foundation funded analysis employed a four-wave panel study with interviews of over 600 subjects, as well as content analysis of news and political ads aired by both major parties in the 1972 presidential campaign.

The authors contend that their findings negate the conventional wisdom that political commercials are devoid of political issue information, whereas broadcast news coverage provides a panacea of campaign issue coverage. Conversely, Patterson and McClure reported that political ads actually taught viewers more information about candidates and political parties and their stances than did televised news coverage. Ads, they hypothesized, impart issue knowledge well due to their simple messages and heavy use of repetition. Campaigns' assumed power to manipulate voters' minds is also refuted by the study's findings.

The authors also discovered that television news was no more informative or persuasive than newspaper coverage of the campaign. With these conclusions, the authors criticized television network news for its failure to inform the public rather than simply cover the "horse race" elements of the campaign, hence laying much of the blame for political malaise on television news coverage of campaigns. One of the most telling statistics reported is that the script of a full 30-minute news broadcast could fit on a single newspaper page.

This text is a part of the third generation of mass communication study, the first being that scholarship which attempted to find powerful effects in the media; and the second, after failing to find powerful effects, assuming the media's effects to be minimal. The book marks a return to the belief that the media can impact viewers, tempered with the knowledge that the media's effects are variable-dependent and generally gradual and incremental rather than party-changing, election-winning entities.

The Unseeing Eye was named by the American Association for Public Opinion Research as one of the 50 most influential books on public opinion. Media scholars and practitioners alike acclaim the significance of Patterson and McClure's contribution to the landscape of political scholarship. Warren Weaver, Jr., then a New York Times reporter, in the book's foreword, predicted that the book would be an eye-opener for broadcasters, political party strategists, and political scientists. Even the book's critics, despite warning readers of possible overstated conclusions, acclaimed the book as a watershed event for the study of political communication.

Karla Hunter

See also Limited Effects Theory; Political Advertising; Television in Politics

Further Readings

Patterson, T. E., & McClure, R. D. (1976). The unseeing eye: The myth of television power in national elections. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Uses and Gratifications Approach

This topic presents some difficulties, in that there is no clear or agreed definition to be offered. In general terms, the uses and gratifications approach refers to a media research orientation, in which priority is given to the perspective of the receiving audience, with particular reference to self-perceived motives or reasons for using (attending to) mass media and the satisfactions (or gratifications) they believe that media (both the process of use and the particular content) provide. Information of this kind is believed to shed light on the dynamics of audience formation, explaining variations in attention and appreciation. It is also a potential predictor of certain kinds and degree of effect, on the assumption that the consequences of media use or content received will depend, to some degree, on the motivations of the audience. Audience motivations are, in turn, expected to vary according to social circumstances and individual differences.

The approach has a significant place in the history of political communication research as well as in the field of communication generally. The origins lie in an early stage in the form of studies that were carried out during the 1950s and 1960s in the United States. These studies were characterized by a strong focus on the subjective experience of the audience, on recounting and making sense of "media use" from this perspective. The underlying issue was expressed by Elihu Katz as a need to focus less on what the media do to people and more on what people do with their media. Early studies were mainly concerned with children's general media use and with certain entertainment genres (especially with radio soap operas aimed at women audiences), although the significance of newspaper reading was also assessed.

Compared to the predominant focus on persuasion, propaganda, and mass information at the time, this was little more than a byway of the communication research field. It became more central during the 1960s, for a number of reasons, but primarily because of dissatisfaction with the apparent sterility of mainstream research into persuasive effects. The basic model for effect research derived from a view of mass communication as one-directional and noninteractive, governed by the motives of the source and sender and with a high potential to directly impart information and opinions, following a stimulus-response logic, even against the apparent interests of the receiver. The adoption of this "propaganda" model had typically failed to produce much evidence of significant effects from the media (still presumed to be powerful) or to explain patterns of media use behavior. The indisputable public appeal of all forms of mass media, with such little evidence of effect, was increasingly seen as a conundrum requiring systematic inquiry and especially attention to the driving forces underlying media use.

Another support for the adoption of this approach was the then contemporary appeal of "functionalism," a theoretical school that sought to explain recurrent social phenomena (such as media use) in terms of their consequences for the society, mediated by individual perceptions and motivations. Charles Wright, following Harold Lasswell and Robert Merton, named the main societal functions of media as "surveillance," "correlation," "cultural transmission," and "entertainment." The emerging "uses and gratifications" approach seemed to offer a way both of explaining the appeal of mass media (answering the question "why use media?") and also of providing a key to potential effects.

The central tenets of the approach that underlie this expectation can be summarized in the following points: (1) media use (attention by an audience) requires personal motivation; (2) motives are fundamentally rational, in terms of perceived needs and interests, as shaped by social background; (3) audiences (as individuals) are able to give some account of their motivations (reasons for behavior); (4) these expressed motivations provide an explanation of media choice and use; and (5) different levels and types of motivations lead to different probabilities of effect from mass media (differentiated by medium and content type) and different levels of satisfaction with the experience.

In general, this paradigm elevates the subjective view of the audience member and the interaction it presupposes between receiver and sender (or the message) over and above the planned manipulation on the part of a propagandist. It has affinities not only with functionalism but also with the newer schools of phenomenology, symbolic interactionism, and ethnomethodology, which were emerging as alternative paradigms to structural-functionalism and behaviorism at this time (1960s).

The relevance of this to the study of election campaigns (seemingly characterized by high exposure and few effects) was evident. The basic logic of political campaigning by way of mass media conformed largely to the linear model of direct effects as sketched previously. The results of research into political campaigning certainly showed the typical pattern of "few significant differences," suggesting that campaigns were largely ineffective or self-canceling, despite the enormous effort invested in them. The new approach offered a possibility of investigating political effects from the perspective of the voter audience member rather than the campaigner. It was also a moment of potentially significant change in the character of election campaigns, with the recent arrival of television as a replacement for radio and newspapers as the medium of choice for the majority of citizens. The new medium was believed to have more impact. It was also a more truly universal and popular medium, less prone to the patterns of selective exposure which had typically screened the majority of supposedly disinterested citizens from political propaganda and news, leading to the predominant "reinforcement" effect of political communication.

The first full and specific application of the approach to the study of an election campaign was made by Jay Blumler and Denis McQuail to the case of the 1964 British general election in two local constituencies, using a panel survey design. The general expectations were as outlined previously, with the specific aim of seeking explanations of differential campaign exposure and effects according to respondents' motives (and degree of motivation) for following the campaign on television. The primary challenge was to find an adequate way to measure and record the various motives that might be recognized by viewers and play a part in the process of exposure and effect. Preliminary open-ended research identified eight specific motives for attending to politics on television. A cluster analysis of these data showed a more economical structure. The main axis of motivation lay between one pole labeled "surveillance" (generally keeping up with issues, judging leaders, and policies, etc.) and another of "contest-excitement" (the horse race aspects). Two other more specifically political clusters showed up: looking for reinforcement of existing beliefs and looking for guidance in deciding how to vote. The analysis enabled a distinction to be made between more and less politically motivated viewers. In addition, a set of items reflecting negative feelings about following the campaign was devised in a similar way, identifying motives that reflected, variously, an alienation from perceived propaganda, a firmly settled partisan position, or a preference for more entertaining fare. This provided the material, when combined with positive motivation scores, for a scale of favorability to the television campaign ranging from very positive to hostile rejection. The panel survey collected detailed evidence of pre-campaign intentions, actual vote, actual exposure to different components of the media campaign, and evaluations of these components in relation to motivations.

The results of the study undoubtedly helped to answer the question "Why do people watch political television?" confirming the expectation of underlying rationality, despite the redundancy of much content and lack of strong interest on the part of a majority of viewers (much exposure being politically unmotivated). The most important explanation was found to lie in the acceptance of the role as a citizen of a democracy to keep at least minimally informed. The criterion of degree of motivation was, in many respects, predictive of attention patterns. The self-chosen motivations were also found to be consistent with the evaluations made about different program formats and with certain types of effect.

The study identified a number of changes during the campaign, some that could be classified as campaign effects, including an increase in political information, a shift toward adopting the issue agenda emphasized by the campaign, and a gain in attitudinal support for the minority Liberal Party as well as a shift toward Labour. The measures of degree and type of motivation showed a complex pattern of interaction with these changes (effects) depending on which group was involved. The strongest piece of evidence of the role of motivation was the finding that the Liberal Party benefited particularly strongly from its campaign exposure among the less motivated section of the electorate, consistent with the view that a passive reception of persuasive content about a relatively unknown object is likely to bear fruit. All in all, the findings vindicated the expectation that the new approach would have some added value when compared to earlier before and after effect studies.

This research was followed by other applications, notably in the case of the U.S. presidential election of 1972, where Jack McLeod and Lee Becker followed a similar procedure, using essentially the same design and indicators of motive. They confirmed the general usefulness of the indicators as additional sources of valid information about the campaign process, with some deviation from the British findings. They also concluded that even after the effects of television time and content exposure on 14 political effect variables were held constant in regression analysis, the gratification and avoidance dimensions were able to explain significant amounts of additional variance in over half the comparisons. The general conclusion of McLeod and Becker was that the results encourage the adoption of a transactional model of additive media effects, with both exposure and gratification variables making independent contributions to political effect variance. Other research during the 1970s confirmed the general utility of the research approach, without altering the general conclusion that most political campaigning most of the time has no measurable effects as intended by senders. The suspicion voiced at the time that the uses and gratifications approach would deliver more effective weapons into the hands of the persuaders has not been supported, although the intention to use such knowledge is certainly an element in contemporary political marketing.

Leaving this potential aside, several different purposes can be served by this audience-centered approach, especially the following:

- To classify and describe the motives for receiving political communication
- To find the origin of (explain) these motives
- To assist in evaluating and comparing the capacity of different media and formats to meet the communication of citizens
- To investigate the interaction between prior motive and actual use of political content (gratifications expected versus gratifications received)
- To investigate the relation between motivation (both degree and type) and a range of possible effects

Although the approach as outlined has received support for its cross-national validity and general robustness and utility, it has also remained an object of some criticism because it has raised several unresolved problems. These problems are theoretical, conceptual, and methodological. Leaving aside the general charges that the approach is irredeemably saddled with the sins of functionalism, behaviorism, psychologism, and conservatism, the main theoretical objection is that there is really no theory, just a framework or model for organizing a variety of variables that could or should play a part in any empirical investigation of the political communication process. Many separate elements of this framework have been validated to a reasonable degree, but not the framework as a whole. It can also be argued that the assumption of audience rationality in media use is too weakly grounded, given the fact that much media use is not really motivated, but a matter of habit or ritual.

The conceptual problems have been alluded to, as there is no definite agreement about the meaning of several key terms that are used, sometimes interchangeably, such as need, motive, gratification, satisfaction, use. This does not stand in the way of using the approach, with appropriate definitions, but it is to acknowledge a high degree of uncertainty about what is more or less fundamental or causal in the assumed logical sequence from need to observed behavior.

Several methodological problems are linked to the previous, despite the empirical confirmation of validity in the case of political communication (more than elsewhere). In the end, research into motivations has to depend primarily on self-reporting, with some uncertainty on both sides about the meaning of terms used, quite apart from variations in the capacity to express or distinguish between alternatives, plus factors of social desirability, and so on. The linkages between general orientations before a campaign, reasons for choosing specific materials during it, and reflections after the event can never be made with much precision, although this is a more general problem for much social research.

Despite criticism, limitations, and difficulties, the approach has proved to have some staying power and retains contemporary relevance. It is now axiomatic to try to understand the audience perspective in any communication process, especially if the purpose is persuasion. This imperative, quite apart from its practical good sense, helps to differentiate more from less democratic means of campaigning (and of research). The approach has provided an essential component in other advances in the study of political communication. It offers a pathway to investigating agenda setting (via the link to surveillance) and to understanding the appeal of "horse race" news (entertainment) and the limited possibility of conveying substantive political information on any scale. In some version or another, this perspective is used in order to investigate the alleged tendency of mass media to increase cynicism among voters. It is currently an essential aid in studying the implications for political communication of channel multiplication and fragmentation, with their different niche audiences. It may seem to have disappeared from view, but in fact it has now largely merged into the general investigative armory of political communication research and theory. As a footnote, it is worth observing that the tenets of the uses and gratifications approach have probably been better upheld in the case of political communication than in most other content areas, partly because needs for political information are fairly specific and identifiable as well as widely dispersed.

Denis McQuail

See also Blumler, Jay G.; Katz, Elihu; McQuail, Denis

Further Readings

Blumler, J. G., & McQuail, D. (1968). Television in politics: Its uses and influence. London: Faber.
Blumler, J. G., & McQuail, D. (2001). Political communication scholarship: the uses of election research. In E. Katz & Y. Warshel (Eds.), Election studies: what's their use? (pp. 219–246). Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
McLeod, J. M., & Becker, L. B. (1974). Testing the validity of gratification measures through political effects analysis. In J. G. Blumler & E. Katz (Eds.), The uses of mass communications (pp. 137–166). Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.
McLeod, J. M., & Becker, L. B. (1981). The uses and gratifications approach. In D. N. Nimmo & K. R. Saunders (Eds.), The handbook of political communication (pp. 67–100). Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.
Wright, C. R. (1960). Functional analysis and mass communication. Public Opinion Quarterly, 24, 606–620.

Uzan, Cem (1960–)

Cem Cengiz Uzan is a Turkish businessman-turned-politician. He is best known for his launch of the first private Turkish television channel in 1990 and for his political campaign in the 2002 general elections. Uzan is also known worldwide for fraud and racketeering because his family's cell-phone provider business, Telsim, defaulted on a huge loan to Nokia and Motorola.

Uzan launched Turkey's first private television channel, Star, with ex–Prime Minister Turgut Özal's son, which violated the Turkish Radio and Television Corporation's constitutional monopoly. Even though this led to a severe controversy about a private channel's legality for a couple of years, in the long run it symbolized the initial step of de facto deregulation of broadcasting in Turkey.

In 2002 Uzan announced that he would put his own work as a businessman aside to pursue a historical task, that is, governing Turkey. He then founded the Youth Party. The party got 7.2% of general votes in the 2002 elections, or 2½ million votes, most of which came from young people and the Western regions of Turkey. This rapid rise in votes for a newly founded party directed attention to the political campaign, designed by "advertising genius" Ali Taran. Other political parties and the media simply ignored the Youth Party, which was exactly what was wanted by the campaign strategist: Instead of being forced to enter into public discussion, Uzan could appear in the rallies and could extensively use his own media outlets for his purposes.

In his campaign, Uzan did not talk about hot issues such as the European Union, economic policies, education, and health, but promised students free books and raged against the International Monetary Fund and other institutions and people within a nationalistic discourse. He used the "us and them" distinction extensively and repeated simple phrases. His use of such tactics even led him to be called "Young Führer."

Uzan was also labeled as the "Turkish Berlusconi" because he owned a football team and several media outlets along with other assets in construction, energy, and finance, and for his fortune-fueled political ambitions. However, his career would be different. The Recep Tayyip Erdoğan government, from 2003 on, seized more than 200 Uzan-owned companies to collect the Uzan family's debt to financial authorities. Cem Uzan, in return, targeted his propaganda directly at Erdoğan, accusing him of being an "infidel," "godless," and "treacherous," which caused another libel suit to be added to the Uzan family's scores of lawsuits, ranging from extortion to fraud.

Beybin Kejanlioglu

See also Erdoğan, Recep Tayyip; Özal, Turgut

Further Readings

Gormus, A. (2002). Medya Genc Parti'yi "gormedi," partinin istedigi de buydu [The media ignored the Youth Party, which was exactly what the party wanted]. Birikim, 163/164, 81–86.
Purvis, A. (2003, July 27). Not just business as usual. Time Europe online. Retrieved July 12, 2007, from http://www.time.com/time/magazine/article/0,9171,901030804-471150,00.html

Vanderbilt Television News Archive

The Vanderbilt Television News Archive, a department of the Vanderbilt University Library in Nashville, Tennessee, is a collection of U.S. national network news programs (1968–present) available on a loan basis to all researchers. The collection includes evening news and selected other news programs (specials) from ABC, CBS, CNN, NBC, and Fox, with occasional items from CNBC, MSNBC, PBS, and others.

The Archive makes its materials available through tape loans and in-house viewing. A premium subscription package is available to educational institutions. The tape loans take two forms. The best for most researchers is the compilation of items from the evening news. The borrower creates a list of individual news items to be viewed, and these are put together on videotape or in the near future on DVD. The second is the duplication of complete shows or of materials in the specials collection. In order to sustain itself the Archive charges for its services.

The Collection

The archive collection is divided into two parts: the evening news shows and specials. Specials are news programs other than the evening news. These include Democratic and Republican presidential conventions, other election events, presidential debates, speeches, press conferences, Watergate hearings, Iran–Contra hearings, Clinton impeachment hearings/trial, Iran hostage crisis, Gulf War, September 11, 2001, attacks, and the first weeks of the Iraq War.

The collection is described in a searchable 800,000 plus record database. Specials are catalogued by program or hour, and the evening news is abstracted by the individual news story. This database is available on the Internet at http://tvnews.vanderbilt.edu. Video loans can be arranged online. By 2007 all programs in the collection will be stored digitally as mpeg2 files with copies stored at both Vanderbilt and the Library of Congress.

History

The archive was founded through the efforts of Nashville businessman and Vanderbilt University graduate Paul Simpson. The archive began recording the news on August 5, 1968. On that first day the archive recorded the evening news shows along with Republican Convention coverage from ABC, NBC, and CBS. This established a routine that carried on for the next 2 decades of recording the evening news from the three major broadcast networks and recording news specials, primarily current event programming centered on the president.

In November 1988, the Archive began to record from a cable network, CNN, for the first time. At first these were election coverage and post-election specials, but on January 1, 1989, the archive began recording its first regular cable news program, CNN PrimeNews. In October 1995, with the beginning of the show WorldView, the archive started creating abstracts of the CNN broadcast to go with the 27 years of abstracts of evening news shows from ABC, CBS, and NBC.

In January 2004, the archive added one more network to its regularly recorded group, Fox, which was added to broaden coverage of the presidential election campaign. The show selected to join the evening news collection was The Fox Report.

John Lynch

Vargas, Getulio (1882–1954)

Getulio Vargas was the president of Brazil from 1930 to 1945 and 1951 to 1954. His terms in the presidency can be divided into four distinct periods. After losing the election in 1930, Vargas and his allies organized a military action to take over the government and to depose the president elected, Julio Prestes. In October 1930, Vargas took over the Provisory Government (1930 to 1934), which marked the end of the Old Republic and the beginning of a political, social, and economic transformation in Brazil. In the second period, the Constitutional Government (1934 to 1937), Vargas was elected by a Constituent Assembly, and a new Constitution was approved in 1934. However, with the Constitution of 1934, Vargas would have a 4-year term and he would not be allowed to run for reelection. These rules deeply upset Vargas, who wanted a more controlled government. As a result of a military coup, Vargas became a dictator and established his third presidential period: the New State (Estado Novo, 1937 to 1945). He closed the Congress and dissolved all political parties including the Integralistas, a political movement with fascist ideas that had failed to depose Vargas in 1938. During the dictatorial period, Vargas instituted the minimum wage, enacted labor legislation, and created important national companies that stimulated economic growth.

Since the beginning of his government, Vargas attributed great importance to the radio and foresaw it as a powerful political tool. It was through the radio that, in 1937, Vargas announced the establishment of the New State and the promulgation of the new Constitution. In 1935, the Hora do Brasil radio program was created to publicize the accomplishments made by the government. All radio stations were required to broadcast this program, which airs up to the present day. It is clear that Vargas used the radio as a main means of communication with the population, using censorship as its main tool. With the creation of the Departamento de Imprensa e Propaganda (DIP—Department of Press and Propaganda), newspapers had censors on their staff who literally controlled all the material that would be published. Although every publication had to be checked first by the DIP, Vargas always tried to maintain a friendly relationship with the press. One of his platforms was valuing journalism as a profession because he knew that he could use the press to disseminate his populist ideals.

Vargas's populist ideals were well received by the people. Nevertheless, Liberals and Democrats who were against Vargas decided to take military action to depose the president. In October 1945, Vargas was removed from the government by the same military that helped him establish the New State.

Vargas's last term in the government was when he was elected president (1951 to 1954) by popular vote. The democratic government, however, was considered turbulent. The previous president had left numerous debts, the military was not satisfied with the performance of some cabinet ministers, and the pressure to resign from the presidency eventually led to the tragic end of the Vargas Era. On August 24, 1954, Vargas committed suicide.

Juliana de Brum Fernandes

See also Brazil, Media and the Political System

Further Readings

Haussen, D. F. (2005). Radio and populism in Brazil: The 1930s and 1940s. Television and New Media, 6(3), 251–261.

Silva, R. R., Cachapuz, P. B., & Lamarao, S. (2004). Getulio Vargas e seu tempo [Getulio Vargas and his times]. Retrieved from http://www.bndes.gov.br/conhecimento/publicacoes/catalogo/livro_gv.asp

Verbal Style

Verbal style was proposed by Roderick P. Hart as a method to analyze the rhetoric of presidents of the United States. Such analysis was an effort to determine the rhetorical effectiveness of the president. Because American presidents do not take up arms, perform manual labor, or perform medical surgery on their constituents, their primary way of leading is through the spoken word. The method of verbal style provides a computer-based content analysis of the words spoken by presidents during speeches. The word counts are then subjected to statistical analysis to determine the strength of the four variables or dictionaries that comprise the computer program (DICTION) that performs the initial word count. These four dictionaries include activity, certainty, optimism, and realism.

Activity refers to motion, or change, or the implementation of ideas; Certainty includes statements demonstrating resoluteness, inflexibility, and completeness; Optimism statements endorse someone or something, offer positive descriptions, or predict favorable occurrences; Realism expresses tangible, immediate, and practical issues. Taken individually the variables might not mean much but taken collectively and analyzed as such in a presidential speech, a rhetorical picture of the president can be constructed. The analysis determines how much change to the status quo is offered in the speech (activity) or how much resolve or resistance to change is expressed (certainty). It also determines if there is praise or satisfaction offered in the speech (optimism) and whether or not the president discusses issues in a forthright, honest, and uncompromising manner (realism).

Although verbal style was designed to perform a post hoc analysis on speeches already delivered in order to determine how effective a president's speaking ability was to his governing ability, the heuristic value inherent in verbal style has been explored in other venues of presidential communication as well.

Verbal style was used in an attempt to project winners of presidential elections based on their campaign speeches. In other words, the candidate that spoke most like a president during the campaign would be elected. Although verbal style was detected in campaign speeches when candidate George H. W. Bush defeated candidate Michael Dukakis, who actually did speak more like a president based on the verbal style variables, none was statistically significant enough to claim that more use of activity, certainty, optimism, and realism was the deciding factor in the election. Further use of DICTION in the analysis of presidential campaign advertisements demonstrated that verbal style was evident in presidential commercials as well. Here again, statistical analysis of data resulted in no significance.

Future investigation of political communication in an effort to determine verbal style should analyze presidential debates in an effort to detect the verbal style present in the candidate's responses in a more spontaneous and impromptu manner. Although debates are rehearsed by the candidates, data retrieved via verbal style analysis would provide insight into the word choice selection of the particular presidential candidate during a live exchange and not from a prepared speech or commercial.

R. John Ballotti, Jr.

See also Hart, Roderick P.; Presidential Communication

Further Readings

Hart, R. P. (1984). Verbal style and the presidency: A computer based analysis. Orlando, FL: Academic Press.

Hart, R. P. (1987). The sounds of leadership: Presidential communication in the modern age. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Video Games, Political

Video games officially became a significant cultural force when sales outpaced Hollywood movie ticket receipts in 1999. Apart from games such as The Political Machine (2004), a strategy game that simulates a presidential race, relatively few mainstream games have taken conventional politics as a central theme. Games have become a political force, however, in other ways: (a) through moral panic, (b) by way of the military-entertainment complex, and (c) as activism.

First, as a new technology, games have spurred moral panic and much public debate. The most prominent cultural debate surrounding video games continues to be those centered on the issue of violence and its imitation. The first game to attract widespread attention on this count was Exidy's Deathrace (1972). This was followed much later by Mortal Combat (1992) and Grand Theft Auto (1997). In 1999, after the school shootings at Columbine High School in Colorado, first-person shooter games such as Doom (1993) and Wolfenstein 3D (1992) entered public debates about adolescent gun fantasies. More recent continuations of the Grand Theft Auto franchise have created a stir due to their graphic violence, anarchic ethic, and misogynistic and racist themes. With a push by U.S. Senator Joseph Lieberman, the video game industry institutionalized the Electronic Software Review Board, which in 1994 adopted a voluntary ratings system in the manner of the Motion Picture Association of America. Not all video game political provocations have been negative. The highly developed female adventurer character of the series that began with Tomb Raider (1996) has been lauded for smashing female stereotypes in the predominantly male world of video games.

In the military sphere, the real-time television spectacle of Operation Desert Storm in 1991 initiated the popularity of war games based on real conflicts. Cooperation between defense contractors and video game companies intensified throughout the 1990s in what some have dubbed the military-entertainment complex. The flight simulator F-15 Strike Eagle II (1993) explicitly referenced Gulf War fighting, as did Desert Tank (1994) and Apache (1995), which featured the Apache helicopter, a frequent subject of television war coverage. In 1997, the military developed a strategy simulator called Real War, which was released commercially in 2001. This was followed by the release of a foot soldier trainer named Full Spectrum Warrior in 2003 during the early U.S. occupation of Iraq. In 2005, the Marines released another foot soldier trainer commercially under the name Close Combat: First to Fight. The U.S. Army was perhaps the first to use sophisticated games for actual recruitment. In 2001, the Army developed a free, first-person shooter called America's Army, which came to include updated versions and online hosting. Commercial game makers capitalized on the 2003 televised invasion of Iraq as well. Although Sony may have failed in its attempt to trademark the phrase "Shock & Awe" for use in a game, another production house, Electronic Arts, marketed Conflict: Desert Storm (2002) and Conflict: Desert Storm II: Back to Baghdad (2003) during the initial bombing and occupation. The online subscription game company Kuma/War, launched in 2004, provides playable first-person shooter games featuring recent military missions overseas, billing itself as less of a game company than a news organization. Although most of the episodic missions are based on recent events, such as the capture of Saddam Hussein, Kuma/War also featured an episode based on Democratic presidential contender John Kerry's service in Vietnam, which attracted controversy in 2004.

The final category of political video games has been called "activist games" or "edugames." These games are designed as a means to an end. In 2003, game scholars Ian Bogost and Gonzola Fresca began the Web site www.watercoolergames.com as a forum for discussing the role of "persuasive games" (from advergaming to politically oriented material), signaling increased interest in this area. Most activist games are small-scale productions utilizing an online Flash format. Some of the more visible of this genre include Food Force (2005), designed by the United Nations World Food Program to raise awareness about world hunger. The Reebok Human Rights Foundation, the International Crisis Group, and the television channel MTV sponsored a contest to design an educational game to raise awareness of the ongoing genocide in the Darfur region of Sudan. The result was the online Flash game Darfur Is Dying (2006). In the realm of more sophisticated off-the-shelf games, the game Under Ash (2001) was an early activist game produced by a Syrian game maker. Players of Under Ash take on the character of Ahmed, a young Palestinian boy resisting Israeli occupation. The game's distinguishing aspect is the fact that it was intentionally designed to be "unwinnable." Finally, a phenomenon has emerged that creates certain online multiplayer games as sites of political activism. The most visible example of this is the organization Velvet Strike, which produced a series of strategies and modifications for protesting the culture of military violence within the virtual world of the massively popular online game Counterstrike (1999). These tactics included "martyrdoms for peace" and spray painting the virtual walls of the playspace with messages of peace within the context of the Bush administration's war against terror.

Roger Stahl

Further Readings

Der Derian, J. (2001). Virtuous war: Mapping the military-industrial-media-entertainment network. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Halter, E. (2006). From Sun Tzu to Xbox: War and video games. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press.

Water Cooler Games Web site: http://www.watercoolergames.com

VIDEOSTYLE

Videostyle is a concept used to describe the pattern of styles and strategies that candidates use in their televised political advertising. A candidate's videostyle includes three important components of their ads: the verbal elements, the nonverbal elements, and the production elements. The concept of videostyle was influenced by several studies looking at personal style, presentation of self, and communication style. These earlier studies of style suggested that a person's communication style would be revealed through a pattern of behavior that recurred over and over again in different settings.

Videostyle builds on this concept, proposing that a political candidate's personal communication style is translated and constructed for voters through the candidate's television ads. A candidate's videostyle is also influenced by his or her political status, ideology, and the context of the campaign.

The videostyle approach to political advertising, first outlined by Lynda Lee Kaid and Dorothy Davidson in 1986, has been updated, revised, and enhanced through the numerous studies using the approach. The current videostyle coding instrument has approximately 62 categories into which ads are systematically coded. Those categories are organized into the three dimensions of the ads: the verbal elements, the nonverbal elements, and the production elements of the ads. Kaid and Johnston have used the system to analyze U.S. presidential campaign commercials beginning with their first use in 1952, and the system has been applied by many other researchers to candidate advertising at different electoral levels and in numerous countries.

The first dimension or aspect of a candidate's videostyle is the language or verbal elements of the ads. This dimension includes things like whether the ad is a positive ad and says good things about the candidate or is a negative ad and criticizes the opponent. Other verbal categories that make up a candidate's videostyle include the use of certain appeals (appeals to issue stands, personality characteristics, or group/partisan affiliations), the types of issues discussed, the types of proof or evidence provided (use of facts, use of emotional appeals, use of the candidate's credibility), the use of fear appeals, the appeal to certain values in the ads, and the communication strategies and styles present in the ad associated with incumbent or challenger political positions. One interesting finding about candidate videostyle is that presidential political ads contain lots of issue information and that important candidate characteristics mentioned in ads over the years have included honesty, competency, and aggressiveness.

A second critical element of a candidate's videostyle is the nonverbal dimensions of his or her ad. Nonverbal aspects of communication include things such as gestures, eye contact, facial expressions, and appearance. The nonverbal aspects of videostyle include the setting of the ad, the candidate's eye contact, dress, facial expression, body movement, fluency, rate of speech, and pitch. In addition, other aspects that add to a candidate's nonverbal videostyle include the speaker used in the ad, the use of American symbols (flags, landmarks, or monuments), and the presence of family members or partisans in the ad. Researching the nonverbal dimensions of a candidate's videostyle has revealed that candidates use a variety of speakers in their ads. In addition to the candidates themselves, speakers used in political ads have included family members, anonymous announcers, politicians, celebrities and average citizens.

A third important aspect of videostyle is the unique production components of television. Television has a language of its own and offers candidates an intimacy and conversational style with viewers. Candidates have used the unique aspects of television to develop their style and to reinforce that style with voters. Production aspects of videostyle have included format of the ad (documentary, staged press conference, testimonial), production techniques (use of slides, video, or cinema), sound characteristics (sound over, live sound), use of music in the ads, the dominant camera angles and shots used, and the presence of certain special effects and editing techniques. Research on this area of videostyle has shown that broadcast political ads have made full use of the range of special effects available in television production and have increasingly included more movement and combinations of production styles.

In addition to being influenced by a candidate's personal style, videostyle can be influenced by a variety of things, including the candidate's political position as incumbent or challenger, the candidate's gender, external factors influencing the campaign, the focus (issue or image) of the ad, the tone (negative or positive) of the ad, and the country or culture where the ads are produced and aired. Incumbent and challenger videostyles, for example, are similar in that they have historically both focused on issues, but have differed in several ways, including that incumbents tend to focus on personality characteristics, use source credibility appeals, use more fear appeals, use anonymous announcers more, include more testimonials, and emphasize foreign policy issues. Challengers tend to speak for themselves more in ads, call for changes, attack the record of the opponent, and use tight, close-up camera shots.

Gender has also been shown to influence videostyle, with women candidates sometimes appearing similar to challengers in their videostyles. Female candidates tend to speak for themselves more and use more testimonial or introspective type ads. In addition, some studies have found that successful female candidates use fear appeals, stress their accomplishments, and discuss the important issues of an election. Finally, several studies have applied videostyle in international settings to understanding how candidates and political broadcasts communicate with voters. Candidate videostyle has been investigated in Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, Greece, as well as other countries. In these situations, videostyle has evolved in accordance with the countries being studied, and researchers have made modifications to the videostyle coding design based on how the political, economic, and regulatory climate influence the political ads or broadcasts in a particular country.

Videostyle has recently been expanded to encompass political advertising messages on the World Wide Web. Adding the elements of Web construction and interaction, this approach has been labeled Webstyle.

Anne Johnston

See also Political Advertising

Further Readings

Bystrom, D. G., Banwart, M. C., Kaid, L. L., & Robertson, T. A. (2004). Gender and political candidate communication: Videostyle, webstyle, and newsstyle. New York: Routledge.

Johnston, A., & Kaid, L. L. (2002). Image ads and issue ads in U.S. presidential advertising: Using videostyle to explore stylistic differences in televised political ads from 1952 to 2000. Journal of Communication, 52, 281–300.

Kaid, L. L., & Davidson, D. K. (1986). Elements of videostyle: Candidate presentation through television advertising. In L. L. Kaid, D. Nimmo, & K. R. Sanders (Eds.), New perspectives on political advertising (pp. 184–209). Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press.

Kaid, L. L., & Holtz-Bacha, C. (2004). The SAGE handbook of political advertising. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Kaid, L. L., & Johnston, A. (1991). Negative versus positive television advertising in presidential campaigns, 1960–1988. Journal of Communication, 41, 53–64.

Kaid, L. L., & Johnston, A. (2001). Videostyle in presidential campaigns: Style and content of televised political advertising. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Viguerie, Richard

See Direct Mail

Virtuous Circle, A

The title and subtitle of this book, A Virtuous Circle: Political Communications in Postindustrial Societies, attest to an ambitious program. The book promises an overall picture of political communication, not an extract, a case study, or a snapshot. In using the term virtuous circle—a control loop of mutual strengthening processes—Pippa Norris, McGuire Lecturer in Comparative Politics at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government and presently director of the Democratic Governance Group at the United Nations Development Program in New York City, has chosen a metaphor which is perhaps destined to become a token with a similar sustained yield as it was granted to two-step flow, agenda setting, or videomalaise.

The many facets of videomalaise theory—from Langs via Robinson to Patterson and Putnam—have been applied in research on political communication in the past 10 years. Some claim the media are responsible for the increase in public apathy, mistrust, and cynicism, and television's portrayal of politics is said to undermine the foundations of society. Norris vehemently objects to conventional wisdom, although not always with the necessary differentiation.

The main focus of Norris's argument is developing an effect theory regarding the recipients. She hypothesizes that the more citizens turn their attention to political media information, the more political knowledge, trust in the political system, and civic commitment increase; at the same time, knowledge, trust, and commitment increase the attention directed toward the media. Norris fashions an interplay between the use of political media contents and the formation of political virtues.

Norris tests her hypothesis through secondary analyses of surveys and cannot find any confirmation in the data for the correlations conjectured by theories that suggest that exposure to media result in political disillusionment. Instead, she finds evidence for her assumed mutual positive correlation which she fashions as helical dynamics. Her spiral model rests on empirical groundwork in which the weight is spread out evenly. Norris finds only weak correlations in the single analyses at different points throughout a long period of time, and with different data sets from different political contexts with different variables and methods of inquiry. She relies on the fact that none of the many multivariate analyses is persuasive when looked at individually, but the position is convincing through cumulative evidence.

Logically, the opposite of the upward spiral is the downward spiral: The less people turn to the media, the less knowledge, trust, and commitment they have regarding it. And here, too, mutual amplification would be a plausible interpretation, but Norris only touches on it. Instead, she concentrates on the good side of the coin, or the virtuous circle. However, only the downward spiral can explain the result that political commitment and general use of television correlate negatively. This simultaneity of downward and upward spiral not only is important for the evaluation of the digital divide but suggests other complex relationships between access to information and political attitudes.

Thus, her theoretical figure consists of four elements:

1. The identification of statistically positive correlations between the turn to political media contents and political knowledge, interest, and commitment
2. The assumption of a mutual causal relationship between variables
3. The assumption of a dynamic sampling of this relationship as a result of mutual amplification
4. Assessing this process as politically positive

This Norris subsumes under the metaphor of the virtuous circle, a twofold positive term: A control loop with positive feedback (a process building itself up) is evaluated as positive. Coined by Edith Simon in 1953, virtuous circle is the opposite of "vicious circle" (circulus vitiosus). Both have the same logical structure, but in the vicious circle the vices are amplified, and in the virtuous circle the virtues are amplified. Anyone thinking about cybernetic control loops must ask where the positive amplification, praised by Norris, leads. Where is the negative feedback, or the stabilization through backlash? One possibility could be ceiling effects in committed people or bottom effects in indifferent people. It is also conceivable that the correlation levels off in the time lapse caused, for example, by a decrease in participation. Although Norris does not pose this question explicitly in her book, she hints at it in the most inconspicuous location: the book's dust jacket, which prominently features Pieter Bruegel's painting "The Tower of Babel" from 1563. A spiral escalates into the sky, but the painting does not show where the spiral ends.

Gerhard Vowe

See also Political Disaffection; Political Efficacy

Further Readings

Norris, P. (2000). A virtuous circle. Political communications in postindustrial societies. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

VOICE OF AMERICA

The Voice of America (VOA) represents the U.S. government's original venture in influencing world opinion through broadcast news and entertainment content. As of 2006, VOA broadcasts were delivered via shortwave in 44 languages to an estimated 100 million people.

From its beginning, the VOA has walked a fine line between providing balanced news coverage and offering content supportive of U.S. political policies. On February 24, 1942, the VOA—then known as the U.S. Foreign Information Service—aired its first broadcast, transmitting news of World War II to Europe. In signing on the network, announcer William Harlan Hale told listeners that the service would broadcast the truth regardless of whether it was good or bad. Hale's words were reflected in the VOA charter, drafted in 1960 and adopted in 1976. That document included a promise that information broadcast via the network would be a reliable source of news for listeners around the world to hear balanced information about the United States and its policies.

Broadcasting to the world, the U.S. State Department dispenses information to foreign countries throughout the world by way of VOA (Voice of America), January 1950.

Source: Hulton Archive.

Still, although the commitment to an objective presentation of the news is a stated core value of the VOA, reviews have been mixed as to whether the line has ever been blurred between balanced news coverage and the political agenda of the United States. Part of that perception may be due to the fact that the State Department, through the Broadcasting Board of Governors and the United States Information Agency (USIA), ultimately oversees the VOA. The dual objectives are demonstrated on air on a daily basis, with news content making up much of a typical VOA broadcast hour at the same time that pro-U.S. government editorials are also featured as a regular part of programming.

Although the Voice of America is respected in many quarters for maintaining an overall balanced approach to its news content, even VOA staff members have, at times, been critical of the level of outside influence exercised over editorial content. For example, former VOA Director Sanford Ungar claimed that overt congressional and administrative political influence, once held at bay, has recently been allowed to creep into the network's content.

Since the VOA signed on more than 60 years ago, it has experienced threatened budget cuts starting with cold war era conservatives who charged that the network was a haven for pro-communist sympathizers up to more recent challenges from congressional critics arguing that VOA broadcasts needed to be more overtly pro-American. To date, attempts to strip away all funding have failed. Many would argue that the reason the service has staved off these budget assaults is the VOA's basic commitment to providing balanced news and information to its audience. As one-time USIA director and long-time CBS newsman Edward R. Murrow argued, to be persuasive the VOA should first be credible.

Johanna Cleary

See also Radio Free Europe

Further Readings

Heil, A. L. (2003). Voice of America: A history. New York: Columbia University Press.

Ungar, S. J. (2005, May/June). Pitch imperfect. Foreign Affairs, 84(3), 7–13.

VOTER BEHAVIOR

Between the early 1940s and the late 1960s, four basic models of voter behavior were proposed on which almost all studies of electoral behavior draw. These models describe how humans react to environmental factors and choose between different courses of action. Homo sociologicus (more or less implicitly) forms the basis of the approaches to voting behavior laid out in the first three parts of this entry. In contrast, rational voter theory explicitly invokes homo economicus through deductive reasoning. A closer examination reveals, however, that these seemingly different approaches are in fact complementary and can be regarded as aspects of an overarching model. In the past few years this line of reasoning has become increasingly present both in sociopsychological as well as rational choice writings.

The Microsociological Model

The microsociological model was developed in the early 1940s by Paul F. Lazarsfeld and his colleagues, and its formulation in The People's Choice first appeared at the end of World War II. A milestone of modern electoral research, it was also criticized for its methodological and empirical deficiencies, and these critiques informed the design of the follow-up study Voting.

The motivating question for Lazarsfeld and his colleagues can be found in the subtitle of The People's Choice: How do voters develop concrete vote intentions over the course of an election? Lazarsfeld et al. investigated this question by conducting an intensive study of Erie County, Ohio, during the 1940 presidential election. They interviewed a representative sample up to seven times over the course of the campaign with regard to vote intention, evaluation of the candidates, and assessment of the major political issues. By doing so the researchers sought to determine how individual voters developed their political attitudes over time and the impact of the campaign on this process.

Lazarsfeld et al. rapidly determined that sociostructural variables, above all socioeconomic status and religious affiliation, strongly influenced vote intention for both major American parties. Taken together with a voter's living situation (urban or rural), the researchers constructed an "index of political predisposition" with an extremely accurate predictive capability. Blue-collar workers and Catholics disproportionately trended toward the Democrats, but Protestants and middle-class voters predominantly supported the Republicans, with the interaction of both variables strengthening these effects.

With muted reservations, the authors concluded that the political preferences of their respondents were largely socially determined. For many voters, party choice was fixed months before the election, and new information was used selectively to reinforce rather than challenge or update prior opinions. These findings were far removed from the ideal of responsible democratic citizens painstakingly informing themselves about the various parties and candidates before coming to a decision based on sober reflection.

As they went on, however, Lazarsfeld et al. could only tentatively explain why sociostructural variables influenced vote choice so strongly, despite the relative anonymity of individual members to these large, impersonal structures. The authors argued implicitly that sociostructural variables could be viewed as indicators of membership in a mostly homogenous social environment of friends, family, neighbors, and colleagues with similar political views. This web of interactions is then capable of reinforcing wavering individual opinions through social pressure. In these circumstances, so-called opinion leaders play an important role by intensively informing themselves about political events through the media and then passing their observations on to less interested or less educated citizens. To describe this relationship Lazarsfeld et al. formed their famous "two-step flow" hypothesis of political communication.

Emphasis on the immediate social environment disposed some researchers to observe an interesting phenomenon: If a voter's social environment is not homogenous and he/she belongs to multiple social groups with incompatible political norms, conflicting behavioral expectations (cross pressures) should develop. To explain non-voting or party-switching, two phenomena that electoral researchers have always been preoccupied with, Lazarsfeld et al. were forced to rely above all on cross pressures in the immediate social environment.

The Macrosociological Model

In contrast to the Columbia study, the macrosociological approach focuses its explanations on processes at the level of the entire society. In Germany, this approach was initially forwarded by M. Rainer Lepsius, who was primarily occupied with social-moral milieus, a key characteristic of German society in the Imperial and Weimar periods. Internationally Lepsius had little impact, and even within German literature his approach was soon displaced by a competing macrosociological model that argued with abstract categories, was tailored to explain a larger area (Western Europe), and was easily portable to other contexts. This model was the cleavage theory of Seymour Martin Lipset and Stein Rokkan, originally formulated in the comprehensive introductory chapter of their work Party Systems and Voter Alignments.

By cleavage, Lipset and Rokkan mean a social fault line, a sustained social conflict pitting (at least) two large groups with conflicting social interests (defined by their social characteristics) against one another. According to Lipset and Rokkan, European social conflicts can be systematically ordered and divided into four groups:

- Conflicts between the national center and the subordinate periphery
- Conflicts between the state and the Catholic Church
- Conflicts between urban and rural territories
- Conflicts between labor and capital

These four conflicts ultimately go back to processes of modernization. The first two refer predominantly to the cultural sphere and hearken back to the development of modern nation-states, and the latter two conflicts are, above all, economically motivated and consequences of the Industrial Revolution.

For Lipset and Rokkan, social conflicts become politically relevant if a specific set of conditions is fulfilled:

1. The conflict must remain virulent over a long period and play a central role in the lives of the affected individuals.
2. Social mobility must be low, so that one typically remains a lifelong member of the relevant social group.
3. Those affected by the conflict must have the motivation and opportunity to ensure that their interests are incorporated into formal associations.
4. The leaders of these pressure groups must found their own party or agree to some form of coalition with a pre-existing party.
5. This party must have an opportunity within the electoral system to cross the threshold of parliamentary representation.

Under these conditions social conflicts achieve a sort of political reification. The parties that develop are understood as the agents of social groups and are treated as such by group members. The format of the party system that develops, such as the number of parties or polarization between them, is determined by the number of relevant social cleavages and whether these fault lines run parallel or overlap with one another. So long as the system of social conflicts remains stable, for example, when parties negotiate a lasting compromise that is also acceptable to their represented social groups, the party system will remain fundamentally stable.

Lipset and Rokkan's unpacking of the relationship between social structures and the party system is highly internally consistent and constitutes a powerful analytical frame, in that prior findings on voting behavior are easily integrated into a cleavage theory. An obvious deficiency in their model, however, is the failure to consider the individual level and the role of communication. Lipset and Rokkan do not address why individual voters usually behave empirically as elites expect them to.

It is possible to close the microlevel gap and integrate Lipset and Rokkan's macrosociological model with the complementary microsociological findings of the Lazarsfeld group and Lepsius's work at the mesolevel. But even this combined approach has a major deficiency, because it poorly explains moments of political change. For relatively short-term fluctuations in the strength of political parties, which lead to relatively frequent changes in the size and composition of governing parties or coalitions, the picture of an idealtypical homo sociologicus blindly adhering to the norms of his reference groups is unsatisfying. The sociopsychological model represents a solution to this problem and its findings are highly complementary with the previous sociological models.

The Sociopsychological Model

Ten years after The People's Choice Angus Campbell and his associates at the Survey Research Center published their first major election study. The Voter Decides was distinct from the Lazarsfeld group's work in two respects. First, Campbell and his co-authors conducted a random sample covering the entire United States, as opposed to prior regionally limited inquiries. Second, Campbell et al. initially explained voting behavior exclusively through psychological variables, specifically the evaluation of candidates, their positions on the major political issues, and their party identification, or the degree of attachment to a political party. Initially all three psychological variables were considered equally important. Sociological variables, of primary importance to Lazarsfeld et al., were held in The Voter Decides as exogenous and remained unconsidered.

Campbell et al. were initially and correctly criticized for almost fully ignoring the social context of vote choice and for relying on variables so temporally and empirically connected with the act of voting that the model risked tautology. Campbell et al. reacted to these critiques by extending their inquiries to include the broader social context, a sociopsychological model of behavior that would become identified with the University of Michigan as the Ann Arbor model. Put forward in The American Voter, this new model demonstrated its effectiveness by using surveys from the 1952 and 1956 elections. The response from the scientific community was overwhelming: The American Voter became one of the most influential monographs in the history of electoral research, and the Ann Arbor model dominated the study of voting behavior in Western democracies for many years after its publication.

The American Voter deviated from the Michigan group's past work in two respects. First, party identification was now taken as a long-term stable variable, causally prior to individual evaluations of candidates and political issues. Second, psychological variables were no longer taken as given, but rather were seen as influenced by a voter's sociological background. This included the experiences of an individual's reference groups with various parties and the integral role of the strengthening or weakening of opinions through a voter's immediate social circumstances. The Ann Arbor model can therefore be considered an extension of sociological theories of voting behavior.

An aspect that is frequently overlooked, however, is that The American Voter describes a wide range of potential influencing factors, which were seen as alternatives to the sociopsychological model in later years. These factors include, for example, the institutional context, economic situations and personality structure of voters.

Using the famous image of the "causality funnel" Campbell et al. summarized the relationship between these varied factors. Individual vote decision is understood as the result of a complex process principally traced far back into a voter's past. At the moment of the vote decision itself, only the previously identified psychological variables are of interest. The further one moves back into a voter's history, the more potential influences have to be taken into account to explain the final behavior. The causality funnel, therefore, expands into the past until it reaches a level of complexity that the researcher can no longer untangle.

Despite its evident advantages, a dispute arose over the next several years concerning the Ann Arbor model's portability outside of the American context. Especially problematic for the Michigan group was the central concept of party identification: The idea of a psychological membership seemed too dependent on the peculiarities of the American system, particularly the (relatively) stable two-party system, the organizational weakness of the major parties, and the absence of historically based ideological conflicts.

In an influential contribution Russell Dalton, Paul Allen Beck and Scott C. Flanagan showed that long-term stable party identification did not imply a psychological party membership. The characteristic coalitions between social groups and ideological parties in Europe, as set out by Lipset und Rokkan, could instead be considered the functional equivalent of party identification described in The American Voter.

The Rational Voter Model

The theory of rational voting goes back to Anthony Downs's pioneering study, An Economic Theory of Democracy. Building on prior work by Kenneth Arrow, Joseph Schumpeter, Herbert Simon, and others, Downs applied the tenets of neo-classical economics to voting behavior and provided the impetus for a new and fruitful research agenda in political science.

Downs's concept differed from previous approaches in two respects. First, Downs's approach to electoral research was primarily theoretical: Downs engaged in no empirical studies but rather limited himself to deductively deriving axiomatic propositions that could be empirically tested. Second, the approach founded by Downs was based much more strongly on formal modeling than were earlier approaches. Although the sociological and sociopsychological approaches tied into experiences from everyday political life and seemed intuitively plausible despite their abstractions, the rational choice approach initially struck many researchers as all too artificial and unrealistic. That the contributions of rational choice theorists were often presented through systems of equations only strengthened this impression.

The starting point for Downs is the assumption that politicians and voters behave as rational actors in a market, in which political power (in the form of votes) is exchanged for the realization of political objectives. The rationality of actors is therefore understood in a formal sense that has nothing to do with reasonableness in the commonly accepted sense, but rather is solely related to the decision between alternative actions.

According to the model, rational actors possess stable and transitive preferences, which give them the ability to select from a set of alternatives to maximize their benefits. Benefits are not limited to economic gains for an actor, but rather any result that is in line with their preferences. Stable means nothing more than that the preferences of actors remain constant during the period in question; transitive means that there are no contradictory or cycling preferences. A rational actor that prefers a government formed by Party A to one formed by Party B, and prefers Party B to Party C, must therefore prefer Party A to Party C given a choice between the two.

If one assumes that political programs can be placed as positions on an ideological left-right continuum, a rational voter will choose the party that stands nearest to his or her ideal point on that continuum (the point where their benefits are maximized). At the same time, parties will formulate their political programs with an eye toward maximizing their vote total. As the preferences of actors are seen as stable, changes in behavior are only explained through structural changes, such as through the entry of a Party D.

How the benefits of actors persist and how their preferences come about are not discussed in rational choice models. As the preferences of actors are, as a rule, constructed from observations of their behavior, the rational voter approach is fundamentally tautological: The rationality postulate is an axiom rather than an empirically tested hypothesis.

But this tautological structure is precisely the greatest strength of the rational choice approach. It makes it possible to connect psychological or sociological models to the rational choice approach by treating them as mechanisms for the construction of preference sets. Thus, it is possible to hold exogenous the complex and often-idiosyncratic backgrounds of individual voters in order to focus on the influence the structural features of a situation have on decision making.

Downs himself recognized some of the complications that arose from exporting market behavior to electoral research. The most famous of these problems is the so-called paradox of voting: Independent of the electoral system, in a mass democracy with millions of voters the probability of any one voter casting the winning vote is infinitely small. Therefore, there is effectively no relationship between a voter's behavior and the victory of his or her preferred party. Although it is unlikely that an actor can draw some personal (instrumental) benefit from casting his or her ballot, participation certainly entails costs. A voter has to spend time and/or money to build a picture about the intentions of the various parties (information costs). Furthermore, the acts of voting or voter registration often take time, which means foregoing other material or immaterial benefits (opportunity costs).

The net benefit of voting is therefore always negative, and rational individuals should not choose to vote. This conclusion contradicts actual voter turnout, which consistently reached 70% to 80% in many democratic states in the 20th century. Many solutions have been suggested to solve the paradox of voting, though all have their complications.

The uncertainty inherent in the act of voting is not limited to whether one's own behavior can affect the outcome. For example, a voter cannot be certain whether he or she will receive the desired outcome for the actual costs spent; his or her party could lose the election. Uncertainty also exists regarding a party's future actions. Even when parties intend to honor promises made during the election, changes in the general political situation could cause them to depart from their programs.

Voters in mass democracies thus find themselves in a low-cost situation. Rational choice explanations typically do not delve further into the intricacies of behavior in low-cost situations, as it is already highly irrational under these circumstances for rational actors to put effort into collecting information or engaging in a cost-benefit analysis. Instead moral and expressive patterns dominate behavior in these situations; decisions are made on the basis of everyday information, group norms, or fundamental ideological beliefs, which function as information shortcuts. Rational voters therefore often behave as the sociological or sociopsychological models would predict. Such considerations were already evident in Downs's approach and stand at the center of the research agenda for some newer theories of rational voting.

Kai Arzheimer and Jürgen W. Falter

See also Lazarsfeld, Paul F.; Party Identification; People's Choice, The; Survey Research Center; Two-Step Flow Model of Communication

Further Readings

Berelson, B., Lazarsfeld, P. F., & McPhee, W. N. (1954). Voting. A Study of opinion formation in a presidential campaign. Chicago: Chicago University Press.

Brennan, G., & Lomasky, L. (1993). Democracy and decision. The pure theory of electoral preference. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Campbell, A., Converse, P. E., Miller, W. E., & Stokes, D. E. (1960). The American voter. New York: John Wiley.

Dalton, R. J., Beck, P. A., & Flanagan, S. C. (1984). Electoral change in advanced industrial democracies. In R. J. Dalton, S. C. Flanagan, & P. A. Beck (Eds.), Electoral change in advanced industrial democracies: Realignment or dealignment (pp. 3–22). Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Downs, A. (1957). An economic theory of democracy. New York: Harper.

Kirchgässner, G. (1992). Towards a theory of low-cost decisions. European Journal of Political Economy, 8, 305–320.

Lazarsfeld, P. F., Berelson, B., & Gaudet, H. (1944). The people's choice. How the voter makes up his mind in a presidential campaign. New York: Columbia University Press.

Lipset, S. M., & Rokkan, S. (1967). Cleavage structures, party systems, and voter alignments: An introduction. In S. M. Lipset & S. Rokkan (Eds.), Party systems and voter alignments: Cross-national perspectives (pp. 1–64). New York: Collier-Macmillan.

Popkin, S. L. (1994). The reasoning voter. Communication and persuasion in presidential campaigns (2nd ed.). Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Voter News Service

The Voter News Service (VNS) was a data collection and analysis service intended to aid in the reporting of exit poll numbers during national elections. The consortium was created by ABC News, CBS News, CNN, Fox News, NBC News, and the Associated Press under the direction of Murray Edelman. The main mission of the VNS was to provide rapid delivery of exit polling numbers to media outlets. In 2000, the VNS had difficulty in providing accurate information for the presidential election, particularly in the state of Florida. This led to inaccurate exit polling reports and confusion about which candidate had secured a win in Florida. As reports continued to flip-flop, the American public was unsure of who won the presidency until after several days had passed and recounts of votes were demanded.

The inaccurate data was only one problem for the VNS. There were complaints that the executives of the consortium had contact with—and personal ties to—the candidates, and early reports did not take into account time zones, particularly in the Florida panhandle. After the 2000 election disaster, the VNS attempted to again serve the media during the 2002 midterm elections. Due to a computer glitch, the VNS did not deliver results from their data until 10 months after the election. In January of 2003, the VNS was disbanded after the media partners determined that the consortium provided too little accurate information.

In the 2004 presidential election, a new reporting agency was created by the same media organizations and renamed the National Election Poll (NEP). In an effort to achieve greater accuracy and speed in results, an outside consulting firm was to oversee the NEP. Much like its predecessor, the NEP used the consulting firm to analyze the results tabulated by the Associated Press. However, several problems emerged again during this election which led to leaked information that projected John Kerry as the elected president. Several news agencies assumed that Kerry would win the election, but after re-calculating the statistics, it was reported that Bush had actually been in the lead.

In 2006, the NEP was used for exit polling results for the midterm election. Although results took longer, the accuracy was relatively accepted and most reporting agencies were reluctant to report too quickly. It appears that the NEP was successful in fulfilling its mission during this election. However, the past problems with the VNS, the NEP, and the media reports still haunt the acceptance of exit poll results and may lead to questions about the accuracy of any exit polling data.

Elizabeth Dudash

See also Polls

Further Readings

Biemer, P., Folsom, R., Kulka, R., Lessler, J., Babu, S., & Weeks, M. (2003). An evaluation of procedures and operations used by the Voter News Service for the 2000 presidential election. Public Opinion Quarterly, 67, 32–44.

Mitofsky, W. J. (2003). Voter News Service after the fall. Public Opinion Quarterly, 67, 45–58.

Sumpter, R. S., & Braddock, M. A. (2002). Source use in a "news disaster" account: A content analysis of Voter News Service stories. Journalism & Mass Communication Quarterly, 79, 539–558.

Vranitzky, Franz (1937–)

Franz Vranitzky was Austrian chancellor (1986–1997) and head of the Social Democratic Party (SPÖ; 1988–1997). He studied business administration, was adviser to Finance Minister Hannes Androsch (in the Kreisky era), and finally became finance minister himself in 1984. At this time Fred Sinowatz (SPÖ) was chancellor of a red-blue coalition between Social Democrats and the Freedom Party (FPÖ).

Following an aggressive election campaign against Kurt Waldheim in the 1986 presidential elections (which was clouded by the Waldheim affair), Sinowatz retired as chancellor after Waldheim won the election. Vranitzky followed him and continued the coalition with the FPÖ until Jörg Haider took over the Freedom Party in September 1986. Vranitzky suffered consequences due to the obvious shift of the FPÖ to the far right and ended the coalition which was installed in 1983 and which was the first time that the FPÖ was part of an Austrian government. The following elections were won by the SPÖ, and Vranitzky emerged as chancellor of a strong revived coalition in 1987 (which was the first strong coalition since 1966). He remained chancellor for 10 years and then passed on the chair of the SPÖ and the office of the federal chancellor to his successor Victor Klima.

During Vranitzky's term in office Austria joined the European Union, which was seen by many as the one crucial and decisive project in the 1990s that also tied the two big parties, SPÖ and ÖVP (Austrian Peoples Party), together. Vranitzky managed to win the referendum for entry into the EU by a two-thirds vote. This result was preceded by a large consensus of political, economic, and media elites that believed the EU would hold big opportunities for Austria.

In domestic politics Vranitzky changed the course of the Social Democrats toward the FPÖ by preventing any further coalition between them. He also kept some distance between himself and Haider. This move was directed against the right-wing populist agenda of Haider and the hostile statements of the FPÖ about foreigners. The strategy of exclusion was heavily criticized and attacked by Haider, who could not stop the rise of the Freedom Party. However, although Vranitzky was criticized for the exclusion strategy's contribution to Haider's success, it made it possible for him to present himself as a victim of old-fashioned politics.

One of the most memorable events in Vranitzky's career was a letter to all Austrian retirees in the electoral campaign of 1995. In this letter he personally promised that the pensions would not be cut. Vranitzky could not keep his promise, and in the following years the letter became a symbol of broken election pledges.

The great coalition under his leadership had to face growing criticism concerning personal privilege and favoritism. His appearances were rather cool and defensive most of the time. Vranitzky expressed himself more like an elder statesman than a people's chancellor. Vranitzky was the first Austrian chancellor to admit publicly that Austrians played an active part in World War II and the Holocaust.

Peter Filzmaier, Maria Beyrl, and Flooh Perlot

See also Haider, Jörg; Schüssel, Wolfgang

Further Readings

Bischof, G (1999). The Vranitzky era in Austria. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction.

Czernin, H. (1997). Der Haider-Macher. Franz Vranitzky und das Ende der alten Republik [The Haider maker: Franz Vranitzky and the end of the old republic]. Vienna: Ibera & Molden.

W

Waldheim, Kurt

See Waldheim Affair

Waldheim Affair

The Waldheim affair refers to discussions about the involvement of the former Austrian President Kurt Waldheim (1918–2007) in World War II. Waldheim, a member of the People's Party (Österreichische Volkspartei, or ÖVP), was foreign minister and UN Secretary General from 1972 to 1981. In 1986 he ran for the office of Austrian president. As Waldheim missed an absolute majority of votes in the first round, it came down to a runoff between him and Social-Democrats candidate Kurt Steyrer. During the campaign questions about his past as an officer in the German army and his membership in the SA (Sturmabteilung, Stormtroopers) in World War II arose, as there were some omissions in his, at the time, recently released autobiography. This created suspicions about his possible involvement in war crimes.

As a consequence the election campaign got much more aggressive. Waldheim faced massive critiques both at home and abroad (for instance, by the World Jewish Congress). He was severely attacked by Chancellor Fred Sinowatz from the Social Democratic Party (Sozialdemokratische Partei Österreichs, or SPÖ). The People's Party reacted harshly and defended its candidate, using arguments considered at least partly anti-Semitic (this was stressed by the mass media). It also took advantage of the international critique by appealing to Austrian voters that no one but Austrians themselves would decide who should become the next president. Waldheim himself denied any involvement in war crimes and claimed that he had done nothing but his duty as a soldier. He won the election and became the Austrian president and remained in office until 1992. As a consequence Chancellor Sinowatz retired.

Due to his uncertain role between 1938 and 1945 Waldheim was internationally isolated and even put on the U.S. Watch List (prohibiting his entry to the United States). The Austrian government installed an international commission to investigate Waldheim's past. The commission found that Waldheim must have known about war crimes but could not prove any personal involvement.

The 1986 election campaign and the Waldheim affair became symbols of both Austria's handling of its own past and the latent anti-Semitism still present in society. This is closely related to the picture of Austria being the first victim of Hitler's Germany (which views Austrians as victims but not perpetrators in World War II). This view was almost a consensus for decades after the war, backed by all political parties. Bringing up the involvement of Austrians in the Third Reich was no majority-winning political issue. It took scandals such as the Waldheim affair to draw attention to Austria's coming to terms with the past. Due to the rise of the Freedom Party (Freiheitliche Partei Österreichs, or FPÖ) under Jörg Haider in the 1990s—which stood up for the argument that the Austrians just did their duty and used anti-Semitic stereotypes in their rallies—this topic got more attention.

Peter Filzmaier, Flooh Perlot, and Maria Beyrl

See also Haider, Jörg

Further Readings

Gehler, M., & Sickinger, H. (Eds.). (1996). Politische Affären und Skandale in Österreich. Von Mayerling bis Waldheim [Political affairs and scandals in Austria. From Mayerling through Waldheim]. Vienna: Kulturverlag.

Pelinka, A. (1995). Kurt Waldheim. In H. Dachs (Ed.), Die Politiker. Karrieren und Wirken bedeutender Repraesentanten der Zweiten Republik [Politicians: Careers and work of important representatives of the Second Republic] (pp. 586–593). Vienna: Manz.

Wałęsa, Lech (1943–)

Lech Wałęsa is a Polish politician who co-founded the first independent trade union, Solidarity, in the Soviet Bloc, won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1983, and served as president of Poland from 1990 to 1995. Wałęsa's importance is clearly shown by the international recognition he received; he was featured widely in the international media.

In 1980 Wałęsa became the leader of an occupational strike in the Lenin Shipyard of Gdańsk, which was spontaneously followed by similar strikes across Poland. Together with workers he organized the Strike Coordination Committee to lead and support the general strike in Poland. In that year, the communist government signed an agreement with the Strike Coordination Committee to allow legal organization although not actual free trade unions. The Strike Coordination Committee legalized itself as the National Coordination Committee of Solidarity Free Trade Union, and Wałęsa was chosen as a chairman of this committee. He kept this position until 1981, when he was arrested as a result of his activities on behalf of workers, and, just after the state of martial law was declared, he was interned for 11 months until November 1982. The next year Wałęsa applied to come back to the Gdańsk Shipyard to his former position as an electrician. While formally treated as a "simple worker," he was practically under house arrest for over 4 years. In 1988 Wałęsa organized an occupational strike in Gdańsk Shipyard, demanding only the re-legalization of the Solidarity Trade Union. After 80 days of "power-testing," the government agreed to enter into roundtable talks in September, and Wałęsa was an informal leader of the "nongovernmental" side during the talks. During the talks the government signed an agreement to reestablish the Solidarity Trade Union and to organize "half-free" elections to Polish parliament. Although officially just a chairman of Solidarity Trade Union at the time, Wałęsa played a key role in Polish politics. At the end of 1989, he persuaded leaders from the Communist Party to form a non-communist coalition government, which was the first non-communist government in Eastern Europe under the influence of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. After that, Poland started to change its economy to a Western capitalist system.

During his presidency, Wałęsa started a "war at the top," which meant changing the government almost annually. His style of ruling was strongly criticized by most of the political parties, and he lost most of his initial public support. However, Poland was completely changed from an oppressive communist country under strict Soviet control and with a weak economy to an independent and democratic country with a fast-growing market-based economy. Apart from his Nobel Prize, Wałęsa received several other international prizes and has been awarded honorary degrees from several U.S. and European universities.

Andrzej Falkowski

Further Readings

Stefoff, R. (1999). Lech Wałęsa: The road to democracy. New York: Ballantine Books.

Wałęsa, L. (1992). The struggle and the triumph: An autobiography. New York: Arcade.

Wallace, George (1919–1998)

George Corley Wallace served as governor of Alabama for 16 years and ran unsuccessfully four times for U.S. president. Wallace was a segregationist and outspoken proponent for states' rights. He is most remembered for his attempt to prevent racial integration at the University of Alabama in Tuscaloosa. In 1963, Wallace stood at the entrance of a campus building to prevent physically the enrollment of two African American students. Wallace allowed the two students, Vivian Malone and James Hood, to enter the building and enroll in classes only after the Alabama National Guard, federal marshals, and the U.S. deputy attorney general intervened.

Wallace served four terms as governor of Alabama in 1963, 1971, 1975, and 1983 and is the only individual ever to be elected to four terms as governor of Alabama. Before being repealed, the Alabama constitution prevented Wallace from seeking a second term as governor. Instead, Wallace's wife, Lurleen, campaigned for governor and won the 1966 election. Although Lurleen Wallace was the governor, it was understood by Alabama voters that during this time George Wallace was actually running the state government. Lurleen Wallace died of cancer before her term as governor expired.

Wallace campaigned for the Democratic nomination for U.S. president in 1964, 1972, and 1976. In 1968, he campaigned for U.S. president as a third-party candidate, seeking the nomination from the American Independent Party. In 1972, during a campaign stop in Laurel, Maryland, Wallace was shot by a would-be assassin named Arthur Bremer. Wallace was left paralyzed from the waist down after the shooting because a bullet was lodged in his spinal column.

The foundation of Wallace's campaign rhetoric for the presidency was a populist stance promoting strong states' rights through less government involvement, anti-Washington sentiments, and empowerment for the poor and middle-class citizens. Wallace believed his political views were adopted by other successful presidential aspirants such as Richard Nixon, Ronald Reagan, Jimmy Carter, and Bill Clinton. In the early 1970s, a Gallup poll indicated that Wallace was the seventh most admired man in America. Despite his popularity, Wallace was unable to win the nomination for either the Democratic Party or the American Independent Party.

In the 1980s, Wallace publicly denounced segregationist stances and reversed his views on civil rights matters. He apologized to African American civil rights leaders for the segregationist views he held in his early political career. In his final term as governor, he was supported by many African Americans in Alabama and appointed many African Americans to high-level state positions.

Wallace was known for his strong and emotional rhetorical style. His populist rhetoric was sometimes characterized as demagogic. The political television advertisements he used in his 1968 presidential campaign are also often cited as examples of ads with strong emotion and fear appeals.

John Allen Hendricks

See also Civil Rights Movement; Populism; Segregation

Further Readings

Carter, D. T. (2000). The politics of rage: George Wallace, the origins of the new conservatism, and the transformation of American politics. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

Lesher, S. (1994). George Wallace: American populist. New York: Perseus.

Wallace, G. C. (1976). Stand up for America. New York: Doubleday.

War Coverage

The term war coverage refers to two dimensions of journalism. On the one hand it describes media content dealing with war and war-related events. On the other hand war coverage refers to the journalistic work process from which media content on wars emerge. This definition of war coverage is based on a specific understanding of war. Essential characteristics of a war are the involvement of at least two military or armed social systems, an extraordinarily high degree of physical force against people or objects, and a certain continuity of combat. This description goes beyond the traditional understanding of war as an international conflict. In civil wars or (partially) non-state conflicts, which have been dominating the statistics of clashes since the end of World War II, at least one of the war parties is to be assigned to the non-state sphere.

War coverage evolved with the development of a periodical press in the 17th century. For the aspiring newspapers of the absolutist European societies, the violent conflicts of 1618 to 1648 delivered the material for news which, in content and form, certainly resembled adventure stories. The relevance of this literary war coverage decreased in the 19th century when the basic principles of today's objective reporting, a differentiated journalistic profession and the role of the "war reporter," developed. William Howard Russell, who, in 1854, reported to the London Times on the Crimean War, is regarded as the first protagonist of modern war coverage. During the following violent conflicts, war coverage changed considerably. Innovations in media technology, economic interests, the abuse of journalism for political purposes as well as information and entertainment desires of the audience represent characterizing factors of war coverage.

The current scholarly understanding of war coverage is mainly based on case studies. Every new war, extensively covered by Western media, induced a batch of respective analyses. Although a comprehensive theory on war coverage does not exist, there are numerous empirical findings on war coverage enabling insights into its effects on political communication. When exploring the production of media content, above all the relation between war coverage and the information management of security policy is, besides the characteristics of war reporters, the focus of scientific attention. International discussions center on, among other aspects, the legitimacy of the secrecy of military information, the chances of the so-called peace journalism as well as the significance of public relations instruments such as censorship or "embedded" journalism.

For the scholarly examination of war coverage, content analyses of media contents constitute the main part of research activities. The results show that, in the initial phase of a war, the subject dominates nearly the entire coverage. Already after a short time, however, the extent of coverage returns to a normal level: The war is again subject to the usual competition of topics. Long-lasting conflicts as well as wars not corresponding to the criteria of news selection are, on the other side, marginalized in coverage. Whether a war is considered worth being covered or is left unnoticed depends, among other criteria, on the involvement of so-called elite nations, the possibility of follow-up communication referring to domestic events, the degree of surprise, the visualization of an event, and the cultural, political, and economic proximity.

The findings of media effect studies show that communication on war attracts considerable attention on the part of the audience, at least at the beginning of a conflict. This leads to ambivalent reactions: uncertainty, depression, anxiety, but also—depending on the respective conflict—satisfaction that finally something was done. The audience's interest, however, fades with the increasing length of the war, as recipients tend to be unresponsive toward events not concerning them personally. Furthermore, research shows that in the United States the public approval of the president, the Congress, and the military considerably increases at the beginning of a conflict. After a certain time, however, the results of this "rally effect" (deriving from "rally-around-the-flag") decline, and the valuation of the political class reaches the pre-war level.

It is disputed whether media coverage generally may contribute to the ending or the enforcement of wars. On the one hand, the media are used to stimulate a patriotic public opinion; on the other hand, the media are attributed the potential to promote peace efforts. In any case the increasing global character of the public communication system has changed the quality of political action. However, the coverage in war situations obviously seems to shape the symbolic agenda more than the actual political decision-making process. The significance of war coverage for the political process increases if politicians are not able to compare the media content to other sources of information. War coverage is especially relevant in phases of decision making and if there is a dissent in the decision-making center.

Even if wars between territorial states become less likely in the 21st century, the numerous existing conflicts indicate that an age of worldwide peace is not imminent. Therefore, war coverage will remain considerably relevant not only as a basis for decision making in democratic societies but also as an object of professional attempts by political public relations to abuse its role in society. It is doubtful whether journalism is sufficiently prepared to appropriately meet these challenges. Especially with regard to war coverage, the erosion of the established news journalism is obvious. This can be seen clearly when looking at the propagandistic coverage of the attacks of the United States and its allies on Afghanistan (2001) and Iraq (2003) by many U.S. media which once had been considered as the ideal of objective journalism. On the other hand the increasing public criticism of war coverage may contribute considerably to the improvement of quality in war coverage.

Martin Löffelholz

Further Readings

Allan, S., & Zelizer, B. (Eds.). (2004). Reporting war: Journalism in wartime. New York: Routledge.

Carruthers, S. (2000). The media at war: Communication and conflict in the twentieth century. New York: St. Martin's Press.

Löffelholz, M. (Ed.). (2004). Krieg als Medienereignis II. Krisenkommunikation im 21. Jahrhundert [War as media event. Crisis communication in the 21st century]. Wiesbaden, Germany: Verlag für Sozialwissenschaften.

Thussu, D., & Freedman, D. (Eds.). (2003). War and the media: Reporting conflict 24/7. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Tumber, H., & Palmer, J. (2004). Media at war: The Iraq crisis. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

War of the Worlds, The

On October 30, 1938, between 8 p.m. and 9 p.m., CBS broadcast the radio play The War of the Worlds. The script by Howard Koch was based on the novel of the same name by H. G. Wells, written in 1897; the director of the radio play was the then unknown Orson Welles. The broadcast became a milestone in media history, causing the emergence of many myths. At the same time, it is also a milestone of media research because the discourse in communication science constantly refers to it.

The radio play is about an invasion of the planet Earth by Martians. The first part of about 40 minutes depicts the futile fight of resistance against the invaders. In the second part of about 20 minutes, a survivor describes how he managed to escape and how he discovers that the invaders have died due to terrestrial bacteria.

The radio play stands out because of its numerous and, for 1938, novel plot devices which create an impression of authenticity. It is structured in such a way that elements of different genres (reportage, news, press conference, interview, etc.) are combined in a dramatic manner, clouding the fictive character of the production. Only three times—in the beginning, middle, and end—is the program clearly identified as a radio play. In a resourceful manner it shows the possibilities of the new medium of radio, which is to create a feeling of direct presence.

It is a stroke of luck for communication science that the Princeton Radio Research Project analyzed listeners' reactions to the broadcast. That is why we reliably know about some of the events that took place after the broadcast and do not have to refer to the lurid recounts by the press, which exaggerated the individual reactions to a mass panic—a distortion which to this day has obstinately stayed in the collective memory. As a psychologist, Cantril was interested in the variance of the reactions to the radio play and how they can be explained. On the basis of different data sources, the study shows that about 6 million people listened to the whole program or parts of it. The lynchpin of the reception was the estimate of authenticity of the program by listeners. Twenty-eight percent of the listeners thought the program authentic. Of these, 70% were scared; the rest described themselves after the event as calm. Thus, about 1.2 million were excited. In interviews, the various reactions to the experiences became obvious. One group was naive. Its members did not doubt the authenticity of the broadcast but responded in different ways: Some were paralyzed by fear, some tried to flee, and so on. In contrast, the uncertain tried to get a picture of the character of the program through different checks. This in turn led to different reactions. The research produced a complex network of different types of perception and action. The differences cannot alone be explained by the broadcast's high quality and the cultural unfamiliarity with the medium of radio. This would have affected all the recipients just as would the overall historical context (the imminent perils of war, economic situation, etc.). According to the results of the study, the following factors are of greater relevance:

- Differences in the amount of time the program was listened to and in the additional programs tuned in to
- Differences in personality, especially in "critical ability" and "susceptibility" or "suggestibility," which are again connected to educational background, religious belief, and mental stability
- Differences in the situation of reception (the behavior of present persons and the anticipation of non-present ones)

The study reveals the complex network of personal, social, cultural, and media factors which can cause an incident such as a panic. Thus, it is irreproducible to use this media event in order to illustrate a model of intense direct media effects.

The radio play was not only Orson Welles's breakthrough, it also gave rise to many post-productions, among others a TV movie by Joseph Sargent reenacting the production and the effects of the radio play.

Gerhard Vowe

Further Readings

Cantril, H. (1940). The invasion from Mars. A study in the psychology of panic. With the complete script of the famous Orson Welles broadcast. (2nd ed.). Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Faulstich, W. (1981). Radiotheorie. Eine studie zum hörspiel "The War of the Worlds" (1938) von Orson Welles [Radio theory. A study on the radio play "The War of the Worlds" (1938) by Orson Welles]. Tübingen, Germany: Narr.

Koch, H. (1970). The panic broadcast. New York: Avon Books.

Lowery, S., & De Fleur, M. L. (1983). Milestones in mass communication research: media effects. New York: Longman.

WARREN COMMISSION

See KENNEDY ASSASSINATION

WASHINGTON POST, THE

The Washington Post is the largest daily newspaper published in the Washington, D.C., area and one of the largest in the United States. Its coverage focuses on political affairs, especially on the workings of the White House and the government. Together with The New York Times and the Los Angeles Times, the Post is part of the elite media in the United States, reporting trends and topics that tend to influence other media's publishing agendas. It is also well known for its role in the Watergate affair, which led to President Richard Nixon's resignation in 1974.

The newspaper was founded in 1877 by Democratic politician Stilson Hutchins and was the first newspaper to have a Sunday edition. It is currently owned by the Washington Post Company, which also owns the news magazine Newsweek and several other media outlets. By 2006, The Washington Post had won 22 Pulitzer prizes and numerous other awards.

In June 1971, the newspaper joined The New York Times in publishing excerpts from a leaked government report known as The Pentagon Papers. It was ordered by the U.S. Justice Department to stop publishing the secret documents, but the U.S. Supreme Court reversed the government's injunction a week later.

In June 1972, reporters Carl Bernstein and Bob Woodward started an investigation into the arrest by police of five men accused of burglary and break-in into the Watergate office building in Washington, D.C. The reporters soon discovered that the presumed burglars were former CIA agents attempting to plant listening devices in the headquarters of the Democratic National Committee. Bernstein and Woodward's investigation became known as the Watergate scandal and continued for about 2 years, during which the two reporters were able to trace a connection between the break-in and Richard Nixon's campaign fundraising committee. The continuous reporting of The Washington Post into the Watergate affair culminated in Nixon's resignation in 1974 and was rewarded with a Pulitzer Prize for Public Service in the following year.

The main criticism against The Washington Post is its liberal bias. Although the newspaper's current policy is not to endorse political candidates, it has a history of endorsing Democratic candidates rather than Republicans.

Monica Postelnicu

See also Pentagon Papers, The; Watergate

Further Readings

Bernstein, C., & Woodward, B. (1974). All the president's men. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Graham, K. (1997). Personal history. New York: Knopf.

Roberts, C. M. (1977). The Washington Post: The first 100 years. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

WATERGATE

Watergate, an apartment complex in Washington, D.C., was the site of a botched burglary of Democratic National Committee (DNC) offices on June 17, 1972, perpetrated by nonaligned covert operatives—known as the Plumbers—working for President Richard M. Nixon, who had originally won the presidency in 1968 with law and order as a major plank in his platform. The name of the apartment complex became synonymous with the journalism that doggedly pursued the president's cover-up of the break-in and with Nixon, the only president in U.S. history to resign.

Two Washington Post reporters, Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein, investigated the burglary, in which the Plumbers were planting listening devices in the office of DNC chairman Lawrence F. O'Brien, and their gumshoe work kept the story alive. The New York Times, led by the reporting of Seymour Hersh, also probed the illegal activity. Eventually, in the spring of 1973, when the Senate began to investigate the incident, the news operations of the three major television networks and PBS made coverage of the congressional hearings must-see TV. The coverage made stars of Senator Sam Ervin of North Carolina and Congressman Peter Rodino of New Jersey, chairs of the two committees investigating Watergate.

A year later, Rodino's House Judiciary Committee recommended three articles of impeachment against Nixon for abuse of power, obstruction of justice, and contempt of Congress. Then the full House voted 410–4 to begin impeachment hearings. Nixon, with flagging support from his core in the Republican Party, decided to resign on August 8, 1974, rather than face impeachment. The investigations into the matter led to more than 70 convictions, including members of Nixon's cabinet and White House staff.

Bernstein and Woodward, supported by their boss, Ben Bradlee, pursued the story of the burglary, originally reported by police reporter Alfred E. Lewis, and discovered a connection to the White House and the president's reelection committee. Early in the Post investigation, the reporters found that one of the burglars, James McCord, who said he had been in the CIA, was connected to E. Howard Hunt, a former CIA officer who was listed as being in the White House. The Post duo scrutinized public records and benefited from an anonymous source named "Deep Throat," who turned out to be the assistant director of the FBI, W. Mark Felt, whom Woodward had met briefly while he was in the Navy. Felt told Woodward to follow the money and the story would unfold. Woodward found that a check for $25,000, a donation to the Committee to Re-elect the President, was in the bank account of one of the burglars.

The White House consistently told the country that Deep Throat's information was false or misleading, although there was speculation that the source was inside the inner circle. It must be noted that Felt had been in line to replace J. Edgar Hoover, but when the long-time FBI director died in May 1972, Nixon chose L. Patrick Gray as his successor.

Reporters for the Post's Metro section, Bernstein and Woodward were unfamiliar with how the upper echelons of the federal government functioned and had to learn as the story unfolded. They faced extreme resistance from the White House. However, damaging evidence came from Felt, other FBI agents, and eventually some of Nixon's aides.

So convincing was the work of the Post reporters, as well as that of the Times' Hersh, the Los Angeles Times' Jack Nelson, and CBS's Dan Rather, that Watergate is seen as the crowning moment of 20th-century U.S. journalism. Most historians agree that the reporters had a hand in Nixon's downfall, although a debate continues over the degree of the journalistic role in the unseating of the president. Many in the FBI did not look kindly on the president and his men, and the fact that the Republicans did not have control of Congress also left Nixon vulnerable. Woodward himself has said the press did not cause the president to resign, though Rather has claimed that the cover-up would have been successful if journalists had been silent. Furthermore, technology had a role in Nixon's demise as he had recorded his Oval Office conversations on a reel-to-reel machine. The tapes, which Nixon tried to block from public hearing but were finally turned over to Watergate trial Judge John J. Sirica by the U.S. Supreme Court on July 24, 1974, showed that the president's denials that he had any knowledge of wrongdoing were false.

Perhaps an equally important historical point for journalism was the relative unresponsiveness of the press in the early days of the story. Overall, newspapers, wire services, magazines, and broadcast companies assigned only 15 of 433 Washington-based reporters to cover Watergate in the first six months of the story. The news media before Watergate tended to be less skeptical of public servants. Accordingly, journalists gave Nixon a free pass for months.

Even if some academics are skeptical about the role the Post reporters had in bringing down a president, adversarial investigative journalism became a mainstay in the U.S. media for decades. This included the rise of television investigative news shows, starting with CBS's 60 Minutes. Relentlessly pursuing the facts of a case became the chief function of such reporting, and journalists began to focus on the how and why of stories, not merely the superficial details. This approach was in sharp contrast to another popular form of the day, the "new journalism," which also attempted to go in-depth, but in a subjective manner.

For its work on Watergate, the Post received the Pulitzer Prize for Public Service in 1973. According to mass communication historian Michael Schudson, most Americans saw the reporting of Woodward and Bernstein as a David slaying Goliath; that is, Nixon, who had an enemies' list that included approximately 50 journalists. The Post was just emerging as Washington's top newspaper, supplanting the Star, which generally was supportive of the Republican president on its editorial pages. As a consequence of the Post's Watergate coverage, owner Katharine Graham found herself the target of a Nixon-led attempt to challenge the licenses of her television stations in Jacksonville and Miami, Florida.

Vice President Gerald Ford replaced Nixon and said, "Our long national nightmare is over." He then pardoned Nixon from prosecution. Public opinion was divided over Ford's decision, but it was not over the watchdog function of the press. Suddenly, being a reporter was popular and investigative journalism was the industry standard. College journalism schools across the country saw substantial increases in enrollment after the 1974 publication of Bernstein and Woodward's book on Watergate titled All the President's Men and a Hollywood movie based on the book starring Robert Redford and Dustin Hoffman.

David W. Bulla

See also All the President's Men; Nixon, Richard M.; Rather, Dan

Further Readings

Bernstein, C., & Woodward, B. (1974). All the president's men. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Feldstein, M. (2004). Watergate revisited. American Journalism Review, 26(4), 61–68.

Liebovich, L. W. (2003). Richard Nixon, Watergate, and the press: A historical retrospective. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Schudson, M. (1993). Watergate in American memory: How we remember, forget, and reconstruct the past. New York: Basic Books.

Watts, J. C. (1957–)

Former Republican Congressman Julius Caesar "J. C." Watts, Jr. has the natural gift of charisma and leadership, skills that were honed as a football quarterback and as a youth minister. Although he received many individual honors in sports and politics, he was always revered as a team player.

His accomplishments in sports shaped his personality and his public image, preparing him for a future career in politics. He quarterbacked the Eufaula Iron Heads, the University of Oklahoma Sooners, and the Ottawa Rough Riders of the Canadian Football League (CFL). In 1980 and 1981 Watts was named Most Valuable Player (MVP) of the Orange Bowl, leading his Sooners to two consecutive conference championships and Orange Bowl titles. In his CFL rookie season he was MVP of the Gray Cup game, even though his team ultimately lost the championship. When asked the source of his charisma, Watts once explained that he had spent much of his life standing next to the coach in a receiving line.

During his political career Watts was a trailblazer for African Americans. In 1990 he was the first African American elected to statewide office in Oklahoma. He became the only Republican African American in Congress in 1994, when he was elected in Oklahoma's largely rural and white Fourth Congressional District. In 1997 he was the first African American to deliver his political party's response to the president's State of the Union Address. In 1998 he became the first African American to gain a Republican leadership position in Congress when he was elected chairman of the House Republican Conference.

Politics and controversy were no stranger to the Watts family. Watts's Uncle Wade served as the president of the Oklahoma NAACP. As a child, Watts participated in the integration of Jefferson Davis Elementary School in Eufaula, Oklahoma.

Raised in a staunchly Democratic family, Watts is a proud conservative, claiming that his upbringing and faith taught him the value of hard work, family, and doing the right thing. He opposed many of the social programs that other African American leaders supported, believing they reduce incentives for personal responsibility and degrade family. In Washington he refused to join the Congressional Black Caucus.

Nationally, many African American leaders criticized his conservative stands. However, in Oklahoma he enjoyed the support of several African American state legislators. These local leaders stepped forward to publicly condemn Watts's 1994 Democratic opponent for playing a race card in his first congressional campaign.

Although Watts preferred to be known for his character and policy positions rather than for the color of his skin, news coverage continually alluded to it. One reporter noted that he gets testy when asked about being an African American Republican. Watts generally dismissed race as unimportant.

After leaving Congress, Watts started a consulting company and is regularly seen as a political commentator on national television. Watts is often mentioned as a potential candidate for office in Oklahoma and nationally.

Rick Farmer

Further Readings

Watts, J. C., Jr. (2002). What color is a conservative? My life and my politics. New York: HarperCollins.

Watts Riots

The Watts riots (August 11–17, 1965) began with the arrest of an African American man, Marquette Frye, by California Highway Patrol officers for drunk driving. Most accounts now concur that Frye resisted arrest, but it remains unclear whether police used undue force to subdue him. Although named for the small, Los Angeles inner city community of Watts, the riots actually affected many sections of what is now called South Central Los Angeles. In six nights of rioting, 34 people were killed, 1,032 injured, and $40 million worth of property was destroyed. Many of the most vivid images of the Watts riots depict the massive fires set by the rioters. Hundreds of buildings, whole city blocks, were burned to the ground. Firefighters were unable to work because police could not protect them from the rioters.

Public officials and the news media offered conflicting depictions of the Watts riots in their immediate aftermath. Conservatives and many city officials blamed the riots on African American tendencies toward lawless behavior, pointing to the large number of minority men living in the inner city who had criminal records and to the influx of "outsiders" from the South. They observed that looters took far more goods from stores than they could possibly find useful and that it was irrational to burn down one's "own" neighborhood. Some suggested that the riots were an insurrection fostered by urban gangs or by the Black Muslims, at that time considered by the mainstream press as a radical cult. Others suggested that police-community relations in South Central Los Angeles had long been uneasy and that those tensions had exploded into rioting. At the time of the Watts riots, Americans had been exposed to police brutality toward African American civil rights demonstrators, particularly during the then-recent Selma to Montgomery march which was violently dispersed by local police in Alabama. However, the civil rights movement was still primarily associated with struggles for voting rights and an end to legal segregation in the South, so the riots were not clearly associated with the larger movement for civil rights. Finally, many federal officials and some reporters explained the Watts riots as a violent protest against the poverty and hopelessness of life in the inner city. They described the challenges of joblessness and the lack of basic services such as health care in South Central Los Angeles. This interpretation of the riots dovetailed effectively with the federal government's War on Poverty programs just then being rolled out in cities across the country. The War on Poverty seemed to be a response to the Watts riots, and the riots seemed to demonstrate the need for the War on Poverty programs.

Despite this apparent synergy, South Central Los Angeles was slow to come back from the damage done during the riots. In later years, some media reports would suggest that the Watts riots had blighted the area rather than that the community's poverty, and lack of infrastructure had long predated the riots. Nevertheless, today, the Watts riots are most typically represented as the community's angry response to deprivation and neglect, and they remain a vivid collective memory, particularly in Los Angeles, but also nationally.

Jill A. Edy

See also Civil Rights Movement

Further Readings

Edy, J. A. (2006). Troubled pasts: News and the collective memory of social unrest. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

Weaver, David H. (1947–)

David H. Weaver is primarily known for his theoretical work on media agenda setting and his landmark studies of American journalists. Weaver's most significant contribution to the original agenda-setting hypothesis is the psychological concept of need for orientation, which he developed with Maxwell E. McCombs in the 1970s. The need for orientation explains how political interest and uncertainty influence people's tendency to seek information about political issues in the news media. Weaver's representative survey studies of American journalists conducted in 1982, 1992, and 2002 provide exclusive insights into the changing demographic and educational backgrounds, working conditions, and professional and ethical norms that have characterized journalists in the United States during the past 3 decades. His coauthored book The American Journalist in the 21st Century is based on the latest survey conducted in 2002 and features interviews with almost 1,500 print, television, radio, and online journalists. Weaver is also the editor of the book The Global Journalist, which brings together surveys of journalists from more than 20 countries around the world.

Weaver earned his Ph.D. in mass communication research from the University of North Carolina in 1974, after working as an editor and reporter at four daily newspapers in Indiana and North Carolina and serving as an information officer in the U.S. Army. His bachelor's and master's degrees in journalism are from Indiana University. In 1974, he joined the School of Journalism at Indiana University in Bloomington, where he has been lecturing mainly in the areas of research methods, political communication, and public opinion. In 1988, he accepted his current position as the Roy W. Howard Professor in Journalism and Mass Communication Research.

Weaver's professional achievements, among many others, include serving as president of the Midwest Association for Public Opinion Research (MAPOR) from 1986 to 1987 and as the president of the Association for Education in Journalism & Mass Communication (AEJMC) from 1987 to 1988. His honors include the 1983 Krieghbaum Under 40 Award for excellence in teaching, research and service in journalism and mass communication from the AEJMC, the 1986 Sigma Delta Chi Distinguished Service Award for research about journalism (with G. Cleveland Wilhoit) for the book The American Journalist, the 1993 Fellow Award for significant contributions to public opinion research from the MAPOR, the 1996 Sigma Delta Chi Distinguished Service Award for research about journalism (with Wilhoit) for the book The American Journalist in the 1990s, the 2000 Fellow Award from the International Communication Association, the 2005 Trayes Award for outstanding contributions to mass communication scholarship from the AEJMC, and the 2006 Presidential Award (with Wilhoit) for 3 decades of research on journalists also from the AEJMC.

Weaver's studies on professional journalism are unique in the field of mass communication because they have provided empirical findings about the work of journalists that can be easily compared across time. Moreover, his studies have brought together communication scholars from different countries who have enriched his research with an international perspective lacking in so many other communication studies.

Lars Willnat

Further Readings

Global Journalist Web site: http://www.globaljournalist.org

Stempel, G. H., Weaver, D. H., & Wilhoit, G. C. (2002). Mass communication research and theory. Boston: Allyn & Bacon.

Weaver, D. H., Beam, R. A., Brownlee, B. J., Voakes, P. S., & Wilhoit, G. C. (2006). The American journalist in the 21st century. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Web Campaigning

Web campaigning can be defined as activities with political objectives that are manifested in, inscribed on, and enabled through the World Wide Web. The terms e-campaign or hypermedia campaign are sometimes used synonymously with Web campaigning but may also be used to describe campaigns' use of a broader array of information and communication technologies in addition to the Web. To understand Web campaigning, it is important to understand its characteristics, history, and anticipated trends.

Characteristics of Web Campaigning

Various actors engage in Web campaigning in a range of sociopolitical contexts. Candidates for public office and their campaign organizations, along with political parties, seek to accomplish electoral objectives by creating and managing a Web presence that promotes themselves through one or more Web sites. The pursuit of electoral, legislative, and other political aims through the Web by advocacy groups, lobbying organizations, and individual citizens constitutes Web campaigning as well. Some Web campaigning, including most in the electoral arena, is accompanied by simultaneous and closely linked offline campaigning as well. In these cases, Web campaigning is part of a larger set of activities that include face-to-face interactions and communication through other forms of media. Other Web campaigning is initiated, organized, and enacted largely if not solely online. Sometimes, Web campaigning activities expand to the offline arena over time, such as the international campaigns against sportswear manufacturers accused of supporting sweatshops or in favor of fair trade coffee.

Political actors enact and extend campaign activities on the Web by employing one or more Web production practices. These practices can include informing site visitors about a candidate or cause, involving site visitors in supporting the campaign, enabling site visitors to connect with other political actors online or offline, and mobilizing supporters to become advocates of the candidate or cause. Electoral campaigns, as well as largely integrating Internet applications into traditional campaign activities, have also developed important and highly effective tools for mobilizing activists. In developing a Web presence that goes beyond informing and involving supporters, campaign organizations cede to others some of the control they have traditionally sought to maintain. Web production decisions by political actors reflect the inherent tensions between the desire to maintain control over messages and resources and the generally decentralizing dynamic of Web-based communication.

History of Electoral Web Campaigning

Web campaigning emerged from the experiences of political actors' use of the pre-Web Internet. The history of the Internet begins with the advent of the Advanced Research Projects Agency Network (ARPANET) in the United States in the mid-1960s. The first overtly political uses of the Internet are usually traced back to Usenet, which was first introduced in 1979. By 1986, some political actors, most often advocacy organizations with international constituencies, had adopted e-mail and bulletin board systems and were using these Internet applications intensively. Many users and contemporaneous scholars believed that computer networking technology had the potential to dramatically alter the nature and shape of political discourse, and of democracy itself, by engaging and energizing new participants in the political process. Following the January 1994 introduction of Mosaic 2.0, the first Web browser that presented integrated graphics, a few electoral campaign organizations in the United States launched Web sites, including Senators Diane Feinstein (California) and Edward M. Kennedy (Massachusetts).

By 1996, the campaign Web site was considerably more common in the United States, the United Kingdom, and several other countries. In the United States, most contenders for the major party U.S. presidential nomination had Web sites, as did nearly half of the candidates for U.S. Senate and about one sixth of the candidates for the U.S. House of Representatives. Analysts examining sites from this era describe them as mostly "brochureware" or "virtual billboards," simply replicating in electronic form materials already distributed in print. In general, Web campaigning was largely seen as a gimmick, or at best an ancillary to "real" campaigning. In 1996, for most candidates, merely being on the Web, or demonstrating knowledge of the Web, was Web campaigning. And only marginal change was noted in the types of Web campaigning in 1998. Although the percentage of candidates with Web sites increased significantly, scholarly analyses concluded that most campaigns limited their Web campaigning to the practice of informing, with little overall development in sophistication or features noticeable.

As the 2000 election season dawned, the dot-com boom was in full swing in the United States. Some analysts proclaimed 2000 to be the "first Internet election" in the United States, and comparisons were often made to the role of television in the 1960 U.S. elections. Though much of this commentary proved to be hyperbole, the 2000 U.S. election marked a significant shift in the attention paid to the Web by political candidates. All major party candidates for the presidential nomination established a Web presence early in the campaign cycle. Several invested significant resources and placed considerable strategic value on Web campaigns.

By 2002, uses of Web technologies that had been pioneered in the 2000 U.S. presidential campaign had become more commonplace among gubernatorial, Senate, and House campaigns in the United States and in many European and Asian national elections. In 2004, some campaigns took yet another leap forward in the complexity and strategic value of their uses of the Web. Candidates for the Democratic U.S. presidential nomination developed extensive and complex Web presences leading up to the primary elections. Howard Dean, the former governor of Vermont, became established as a serious contender for the nomination and indeed as the frontrunner for a time in late 2003, demonstrating legitimacy as a candidate largely on the basis of his campaign's Web strategy. The Dean campaign dramatically altered the landscape of the political Internet. During its peak, the extent and strength of the campaign was demonstrated not only by the Web sites produced by the campaign but by the material produced by supporters across the Web, on sites including those produced by the campaign as well as those produced by supportive but independent organizations. The Dean campaign demonstrated, on a national level, how a political organization could use the Web as the platform for a large-scale national movement. In just 10 years, some campaign organizations had moved beyond thinking of the Web as an electronic brochure to viewing it as an electronic headquarters.

The Internet was clearly a significant source of political information and a location of political action in the 2004 elections in the United States and many other countries. Over 40 countries held national elections in 2004; European Parliamentary elections were held that year as well. In most of these elections, most candidates and political parties engaged in one or more Web campaigning practices, as did many issue advocacy groups. Informing was the most common practice, followed by involving, connecting, and mobilizing. Web campaigning practices were more consistent within each type of political actor across democratic countries in Asia, Europe, and North America than among different types of actors from countries with similar political cultures. In the first half of 2006, French presidential candidate Segolene Royal drew international attention with her campaign's use of informing, involving, and connecting practices on the Web and the innovative strategy of writing a policy book during the campaign—posted chapter by chapter on her campaign Web site—on which site visitors could comment via a campaign-hosted blog.

Trends in Web Campaigning

Significant changes in Web campaigning can be anticipated during the next few years. The act of producing a basic campaign Web site will be nearly ubiquitous among candidates for elected office in most democracies, raising the baseline of political information available to online citizens. Most practices are fairly enduring and will evolve gradually over time. However, Web production techniques, which emerge with and evolve alongside new technologies, will change rapidly and dramatically and, thus, will reshape each of the practices of Web campaigning. In addition, new techniques will emerge in relation to technologies that enable information provision through a wide variety of interfaces other than the familiar Web browsers embedded in personal computers, for instance, via highly mobile and wireless devices.

As a response to the challenge of producing greater quantities of information that is fresh and interesting (created partially by increased demand for new and relevant content from site visitors), campaigns will increasingly co-produce information with other actors that share their agenda through syndication and other means. More campaigns will provide comprehensive access to candidate biographies, issue position statements, and voting records for longer periods of time, perhaps even providing permanent and sustained archives of key documents, as they seek to control and manage their own online representation.

More significant and perhaps more dramatic development can be expected in the ways and extent to which campaigns engage in the practices of involving and connecting. With respect to involving, there will be greater convergence between the online and offline worlds. Campaigns will increasingly manage citizen involvement and view the relationship through a transactional lens. Campaigns will develop rewards and incentives for individuals to provide credentials, through a user ID and password, to access more and more of their Web sites and information environments. For example, features that track visitor interactions will emerge, similar to online structures on e-commerce sites, suggesting additional activities based on profiles of similar involved citizens. In sum, the campaign's Web site will increasingly be seen as the primary mechanism through which individuals interested in being involved with the campaign will negotiate and manage their involvement with the campaign organization.

With respect to connecting, increased linking to other political actors is anticipated. Fewer campaign Web sites will be constructed on a model that assumes providing links to other actors risks losing the attention of site visitors. Instead, the campaigns will cede more control over the messages to which visitors may be exposed when they follow links to sites produced by other actors. More broadly, campaigns will increasingly position themselves as connection managers, carefully steering visitors to the sites of selected actors and increasingly seeking to control messages through techniques like framing and syndication.

Of all four Web campaigning practices, mobilizing will develop furthest in the near future. The emphasis on mobilizing activities, especially relative to informing and involving, will increase dramatically, as campaign organizations develop their Web presence using techniques which give site visitors the ability to engage other citizens in the activities of the campaign. In these ways, campaigns will deepen the commitment of involved citizens and more effectively turn them into advocates.

The Web is now a place where many citizens in a wide range of countries look for politically oriented information and where political activity occurs to a significant extent. Electoral and issue advocacy campaigns are becoming increasingly aware that they need to not only post a Web site but also manage their Web presence as it is mediated across the Web on sites that they do not and cannot control. In addition to electoral and issue advocacy campaigns, all types of political actors are increasingly likely to have a Web presence: political parties, civic groups, individual citizens, government bodies, and news producers, including those that were originally established in print and broadcast media and those that were "born digital." Understanding how campaigns use the Web in relation to other political actors, and why they use it in particular ways, is thus a foundational step toward understanding the relationship between the Web and politics.

Kirsten A. Foot and Steven M. Schneider

See also E-Mail, Political Uses; Grassroots Campaigning; Information Technology in Politics; New Media Technologies; Protests, Political; World Wide Web, Political Uses

Further Readings

Bimber, B., & Davis, R. (2003). Campaigning online: The Internet in U.S. elections. New York: Oxford University Press.

Chadwick, A. (2006). Internet politics: States, citizens, and new communication technologies. New York: Oxford University Press.

Foot, K. A., & Schneider, S. M. (2006). Web campaigning. Cambridge: MIT Press.

Gibson, R. K., Nixon, P., & Ward, S. (2003). Political parties and the Internet: Net gain? New York: Routledge.

Howard, P. N. (2006). New media campaigns and the managed citizen. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Kamarck, E. C. (1999). Campaigning on the Internet in the elections of 1998. In E. C. Kamarck & J. S. Nye (Eds.), Democracy.com? Governance in a networked world (pp. 99–123). Hollis, NH: Hollis.

Kluver, R., Foot, K. A., Jankowski, N. W., & Schneider, S. M. (Eds.). (in press). The Web and national elections: A global comparative perspective. New York: Routledge.

Trippi, J. (2004). The revolution will not be televised: Democracy, the Internet, and the overthrow of everything. New York: HarperCollins.

Williams, A. P., & Tedesco, J. C. (Eds.). (2006). The Internet election: Perspectives on the Web in campaign 2004. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Web Site

See Web Campaigning

Webstyle

Webstyle is a term used to describe a system for analyzing how candidates strategically present themselves to voters through their campaign Web sites. Since the 1996 campaign Web sites have been institutionalized in presidential campaigns. By 1998 close to 90% of U.S. Senate and gubernatorial candidates hosted campaign Web sites. Since that time voters and the media have developed expectations that serious campaigns for national or statewide office will host a campaign site; and expectations are growing for races at lower levels as campaign Web sites become financially reasonable for candidates at all levels.

Similar to political television advertising, campaign Web sites offer candidates a communication forum they can control. This control allows candidates to fine tune both their message and appearance, neither of which are subject to reinterpretation by a third party before reaching the voter directly. Campaign Web sites differ, however, in that they are relatively inexpensive to design and host; do not have time and length restrictions; provide textual, visual, and video capabilities; can link to materials outside of the site; require an active—as opposed to passive—viewer; and offer voters and the candidate/campaign an opportunity to interact with one another.

Because of the similarities between political television advertising and a campaign Web site, Webstyle was grounded in the construct of Videostyle—the systematic analysis of political television advertisements developed by Lynda Lee Kaid and Dorothy Davidson. Indeed, the uniqueness of the Internet medium required certain adaptations to the three traditional Videostyle content areas (verbal, nonverbal, production techniques) and the necessity to develop a fourth content area to address the interactive capabilities. As such, Webstyle consists of the following four components: the verbal content of a candidate's Web site, the nonverbal content, the production techniques used on the site, and the interactive content.

Specifically, the verbal content analyzed in Webstyle includes the text, video, and audio available on the Web site. The verbal categories include the issues addressed, use of a negative attack, strategies used in attacking the opponent, candidate characteristics, use of appeals, identification of the office, and identification of party affiliation. The nonverbal content examines the photos of the candidate and others as placed on the Web site. The nonverbal categories include settings of the photos, who is pictured, eye contact, facial expressions, body movement/posture, and candidate attire. The production categories examine the presence of graphics and the type of graphics featured on the site.

The interactive content categories coded in Webstyle include the number of main menu links, types of links, information about feedback links, links to detailed information created by the campaign, links to press coverage, and links to legislation the candidate has sponsored or co-sponsored. Additional categories include links to campaign coordinators in a constituent's specific area, a form for contributing and volunteering, a sign-up form for getting involved, ability to print/download campaign distribution materials, and the opportunity to sign up for e-mail updates.

Webstyle has been frequently applied to mixed-gender races, those races that include a female and a male candidate. Drawing from research on gender-related stereotypes in politics, variables were included to identify if and how candidates were adapting to such stereotypes. Although political television advertising research has detailed how female and male candidates present themselves differently in their Videostyles, Webstyle analyses have uncovered minimal gender-related differences. Thus, at least initially, candidate self-presentation on Web sites did not seem to be subject to gendered expectations, offering female candidates the potential for an even playing field.

In 2000, for instance, as many differences were present when analyzing candidate gender as candidate party and status (incumbent, challenger, open seat). Republican candidates were more likely to discuss taxes, defense issues, and other "masculine" issues, whereas Democrat candidates were more likely to discuss gun control. Incumbents were more likely to use incumbent strategies such as "incumbency stands for legitimacy" and being a "voice for the state"; challengers were more likely to "call for change," attack their opponent, and "invite viewer participation." Open race candidates and incumbents similarly emphasized their accomplishments and "masculine" appeals, yet both did so more than challengers. Female candidates were more likely to discuss women's issues, use expert authorities, and include a contribution form on their Web site. Male candidates were more likely to discuss defense issues, use statistics, and identify their party on their home page. Both female and male candidates were more likely to be shown in formal attire in their photos (as opposed to casual), although women were 23% more likely to do so. Both male and female candidates smiled in their photos, but female candidates were 21% more likely to smile.

In an analysis of U.S. Senate and gubernatorial mixed-gender races from 2000 and 2002, the candidates' Webstyles were again similar. Although gender-related differences were scarce, the candidates actively used their Web sites to discuss issues and to present images as viable political candidates. Yet, the candidates underused interactive opportunities. Less than a majority provided a campaign calendar of events, making it difficult for interested voters to find out how to meet the candidate. Just over half provided detailed information about their issue positions and not one provided links to issue-related legislation. Links for feedback were sporadically placed throughout the sites, and almost half of the candidates did not provide a form for getting involved. Not surprisingly, by 2002 approximately 80% of candidates in these mixed-gender races provided forms for contributing.

An analysis of Webstyle from 2004 mixed-gender U.S. Senate races found similar results, determining that the strategies employed by female and male candidates remain in response to the expectations of the medium of campaign Web sites and the candidates' status, as opposed to gendered stereotypes. The Webstyle research cautions that it is too early to discontinue examination of gender differences in this form of political communication; as structural expectations stabilize, voter cues used in evaluation of other forms of female and male candidate communication may become salient. Further, as candidates' use of the interactive content identified by Webstyle continues to evolve, additional analysis that can offer important implications for candidates, campaigns, and voters is warranted.

Mary Christine Banwart

See also Videostyle; Web Campaigning

Further Readings

Banwart, M. C. (2006). Webstyles in 2004: The gendering of candidates on campaign Web sites? In A. P. Williams & J. C. Tedesco (Eds.), The Internet election: Perspectives on the Web's role in campaign 2004. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Bystrom, D. G, Banwart, M. C., Kaid, L. L., & Robertson, T. A. (2004). Gender and political candidate communication: Videostyle, Webstyle, and Newsstyle. New York: Routledge.

Banwart, M. C. (2002). Videostyle and Webstyle in 2000: Comparing the gender differences of candidate presentations in political advertising and on the Internet. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, University of Oklahoma, Norman.

Kaid, L. L., & Davidson, D. K. (1986). Elements of Videostyle: A preliminary examination of candidate presentation through televised advertising. In L. L. Kaid, D. D. Nimmo, & K. R. Sanders (Eds.), New perspectives on political advertising (pp. 184–209). Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press.

Kaid, L. L., & Johnston, A. (2001). Videostyle in presidential campaigns: Style and content of televised political advertising. Westport, CT: Praeger/Greenwood.

Welfare Policy

Welfare policy has a controversial history in American political life. Values such as personal responsibility, hard work, and family have influenced welfare legislation from colonial times to the present. Interested parties have debated the causes of poverty, sources and goals of assistance, and eligibility criteria. Broadly speaking, welfare policies fault individuals or structures for poverty; rely on private charities, volunteer organizations, or local, state, and federal governments for aid provision; and aim to assist the needy, modify recipient behavior, deter aid requests, and/or reform the welfare system. Policymakers have struggled to define aid eligibility, resulting in an implied hierarchy of deserving and undeserving recipients. The categories of deserving and undeserving have remained relatively constant since welfare's inception; what has changed are the criteria used to define them.

Class, gender, and race distinctions have pervaded discussions of recipient eligibility. Arguably forms of welfare, government programs associated with employment (e.g., social security, tax advantaged retirement plans, flexible spending accounts, and most group health insurance plans) are considered earned entitlements, not welfare. Implicitly, recipients of these types of aid are deserving of assistance. Welfare has acquired increasingly negative connotations, referring to public assistance programs associated with poor, minority, unwed, divorced, and separated mothers. Recipients of public assistance have been stigmatized as less deserving of aid, frequently leading to intense criticism of welfare programs.

Prior to 1935, individualist explanations of poverty prevailed, and relief efforts were largely at the local and state levels, relying on families and institutions for aid provision. Following the stock market crash on October 24, 1929, Americans experienced severe economic hardship and sought federal relief. President Franklin Delano Roosevelt responded with the New Deal and Social Security Act of 1935. Ending a nearly three-century tradition of local and state provision of aid, the Act relied on federal funds and signaled preference of structural over individually based explanations for poverty. The Act provided several forms of aid, including social insurance, work relief, and categorical assistance programs. A relatively low priority at the time, the categorical assistance program Aid to Dependent Children was the precursor to the largest and most controversial welfare program, Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC).

For most of the 20th century, AFDC experienced increased criticism, due to caseload increases, rising program costs, and changing recipient demographics. Many families experienced difficulty leaving welfare rolls and escaping poverty. In response, President Clinton signed the 1996 Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act (PRWORA).

PRWORA replaced the entitlement-based AFDC with the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families block grant, giving states increased administrative control over welfare programs. PRWORA's passage sparked controversy; supporters praised the legislation for affirming traditional work and family values, whereas critics accused the law of harming millions of poor and lower-income working families.

For many reasons, including the Iraq War, PRWORA, which was set to expire in 2002, has operated under a series of continuing resolutions as Congress debates reauthorization proposals, many of which emphasize marriage promotion, work requirements, and social services.

Lisa Gring-Pemble

Further Readings

Weaver, R. K. (2000). Ending welfare as we know it. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

Wellstone, Paul (1944–2002)

Paul Wellstone was a professor, progressive activist, and two-term U.S. senator from Minnesota. Prior to being elected to the Senate in 1990, Wellstone was a professor of political science at Carleton College and a liberal activist. As a senator, Wellstone was often referred to as the "conscience of the Senate" or a leading spokesperson for the "Democratic wing of the Democratic Party." He served in the Senate from 1991 until his death in a plane crash on October 25, 2002. His wife Sheila, daughter Marcia, three campaign aides—Tom Lapic, Will McLaughlin, and Mary McEvoy—and two pilots were also killed. There were no survivors of the crash. Paul and Sheila Wellstone are survived by their sons, Mark and David.

During the 1970s and 1980s, Wellstone became involved in community organizing, working mainly with the poor. In the process, he gained a reputation as an effective organizer and a powerful speaker. In 1990, Wellstone ran for the U.S. Senate against wealthy incumbent Rudy Boschwitz. He was an underdog, outspent by a 7-to-1 margin. Despite the odds, Wellstone ran a grassroots campaign that energized voters, crisscrossing the state in a green, old, rickety bus. He was significantly helped by a risky advertising strategy that injected into the campaign what would be one of his greatest assets: humor. Finally, Wellstone's surprising victory is also often credited to the "Boschwitz letter," which accused Wellstone of being a "bad Jew" for marrying a gentile and not raising his children in the Jewish faith. In 1996 Boschwitz ran against Wellstone again; Wellstone beat him by a nine-point margin. Wellstone contemplated a run for president of the United States between 1997 and 1999. After relatively extensive travel and planning, Wellstone called a press conference to declare that he would not be a candidate due to an old wrestling injury (which was later diagnosed as multiple sclerosis). Wellstone ran for a third term in the Senate against Republican Norm Coleman in 2002, but the campaign ended abruptly with his untimely death in a plane crash. The replacement candidate was former Vice President Walter Mondale, who lost the election.

Wellstone was a successful legislator, authoring legislation to ban gifts from lobbyists and limit the influence of special interests. He won victories in the areas of economic security, health care, environmental protection, and children's issues. He gained a national reputation for efforts on veteran, mental health, and domestic violence issues. According to former presidential candidate Bill Bradley, however, Wellstone will be best remembered for taking principled but sometimes unpopular positions. He opposed the first Gulf War in 1991. He voted against President Clinton's welfare reform legislation in 1996, and in 2002, he voted against congressional authorization for the war in Iraq. In the end, Wellstone claimed his success as a legislator was due, in part, to abide by a set of four principles: personalize the issue, be relentless, look for unlikely allies, and advocate for those who do not have advocates.

Scott Wells

Further Readings

Lofy, B. (2005). Paul Wellstone: The life of a passionate progressive. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

McGrath, D. J. (1995). Professor Wellstone goes to Washington: The inside story of a grassroots U. S. Senate campaign. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Wellstone, P. (2002). The conscience of a liberal: Reclaiming the compassionate agenda. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

West Wing, The

Arguably the most complete and extensive portrayal of the American presidency in popular culture history, The West Wing (TWW) was a 1-hour dramatic serial program broadcast on the NBC television network from September 22, 1999, until May 14, 2006. A total of 156 episodes of the program aired on NBC, with rerun episodes featured on the Bravo television network. TWW has also been released on DVD in yearly installments and in a final series package in late 2006. The program depicted the inner workings of the administration of President Josiah "Jed" Bartlet, a New Hampshire Democrat.

TWW was created by Aaron Sorkin, a film and television writer who was also the screenwriter for the feature films A Few Good Men (adapted from his Broadway play), Malice, and The American President and who created and wrote the television series Sports Night. Sorkin wrote and was an executive producer for TWW until its fourth season (2003). TWW received many awards, including numerous Emmys, several Screen Actor's Guild honors, and two Peabody Awards for excellence in broadcasting. The recurring cast of TWW included Martin Sheen as President Bartlet, Stockard Channing as First Lady Abigail Bartlet, Gary Cole as Vice President Bob Russell, Dulé Hill as Personal Assistant Charlie Young, Allison Janney as Press Secretary C. J. Cregg, Rob Lowe as Speechwriter Sam Seaborn, Tim Matheson as Vice President John Hoynes, Janel Moloney as Assistant to the Deputy Chief of Staff Donna Moss, Richard Schiff as Communications Director Toby Ziegler, John Spencer as Chief of Staff Leo McGarry, and Bradley Whitford as Deputy Chief of Staff Josh Lyman. In the show's sixth and seventh seasons, TWW depicted the presidential election campaign for Bartlet's successor that featured candidates Matthew Santos, a Democratic Texas congressman played by Jimmy Smits, and Arnold Vinick, a Republican California senator played by Alan Alda. The show also featured literally hundreds of supporting characters, including members of the president's administration, members of Congress, foreign dignitaries and diplomats, members of the news media, and military leaders.

Originally, TWW was designed as a program about the White House staff, where viewers would come to learn the backstage happenings of a presidential administration. That focus shifted, however, when noted actor Sheen was cast as President Bartlet, and the program evolved into a complex ensemble that blended depictions of the president, his family, his staff, and other domains of political and governmental life in the United States. This administration confronted a series of crises, tackled numerous public policy issues, and dealt with ongoing scandal and intrigue. Among the issues discussed in TWW were drug policy, terrorism, the census, gay rights, women's rights, civil rights and racial tension, child labor, international trade policy, nuclear proliferation, Mideast peace, conflict between India and Pakistan, and abortion. In addition, the program featured three presidential campaigns (Bartlet's initial election campaign, depicted in flashbacks; Bartlet's reelection; and the election of his successor), an assassination attempt on the president's personal assistant that left the president and an aide seriously wounded, a scandal concerning the president's health, and the kidnapping of Bartlet's daughter.

Although some plotlines on TWW stretched credibility, others were certainly "ripped from the headlines." Most significantly, TWW produced a "play" titled "Isaac & Ishmael" in response to the September 11, 2001, attacks at the World Trade Center and the Pentagon that aired just 3 weeks after the attacks, on October 3. Preceded by an appeal for donations to charities assisting the victims of the 9/11 attacks, the play occurred outside of the show's regular plot and featured a lengthy discussion of the causes of terrorism and exposed assumptions and prejudices at the heart of American responses to terrorism. The special episode was both praised and derided by critics, even as it garnered significant ratings and was one of only a handful of television fictional programs to incorporate and discuss the 9/11 attacks in their immediate aftermath.

Among the criticisms leveled against TWW was its failure to accurately and completely depict presidential politics and its depiction of a liberal, left-leaning administration complete with villainous Republicans. Such criticisms are not universal, however, with some critics applauding the program for its capacity to educate citizens about political issues and public policy concerns and others attacking the show for its conservative moralizing and jingoistic nationalism. TWW was also simultaneously praised and attacked for its depictions of women and people of color. Although women were often portrayed in powerful positions in the show, with considerable political and policy authority, they were also often sexualized and delegitimized. The same critique can be offered about TWW's depictions of people of color.

Ultimately, TWW tried to be many things at once. The program was clearly progressive in its politics, offering a liberal, Democratic president to its viewers and electing another Democrat to succeed him. But TWW also went to considerable lengths to depict Republicans and conservatives in a favorable light, hiring Reagan speechwriter Peggy Noonan and George H. W. Bush press secretary Marlin Fitzwater as creative consultants. TWW was a gripping, often sensational television narrative, complete with action, romance, and melodrama, but it also worked to seriously grapple with complex policy questions.

TWW provided a powerful, complete, and extended depiction of a presidential administration to television viewers in the United States and around the world for seven seasons. Some studies have demonstrated the power of TWW's depiction of the presidency. A 2001 Council for Excellence in Government survey discovered a considerable increase in the esteem accorded to government employees, a rise the Council attributed to TWW. Other studies have explored TWW viewers' reactions to presidents of both parties and to the depictions of President Bartlet's multiple sclerosis. But whatever the reactions, TWW demonstrated the viability and power of political topics in popular culture and the singular importance of the presidency in the American cultural imaginary.

Trevor Parry-Giles

Further Readings

Holbert, R. L., Pillion, O., Tschida, D. A., Armfield, G. G., Kinder, K., Cheery, K. L., et al. (2003). The West Wing as endorsement of the U.S. presidency: Expanding the bounds of priming in political communication. Journal of Communication, 53(3), 427–443.

Holbert, R. L., Tschida, D. A., Dixon, M., Cherry, K., Steuber, K., & Airne, D. (2005). The West Wing and depictions of the American presidency: Expanding the domains of framing in political communication. Communication Quarterly, 53(4), 505–522.

Jones, R., & Dionisopoulos, G. N. (2004). Scripting a tragedy: The 'Isaac and Ishmael' episode of The West Wing as parable. Popular Communication, 2(1), 21–40.

Parry-Giles, T., & Parry-Giles, S. J. (2002). The West Wing's prime-time presidentiality: Mimesis and catharsis in a postmodern romance. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 88(2), 209–227.

Parry-Giles, T., & Parry-Giles, S. J. (2006). The prime-time presidency: The West Wing and U.S. nationalism. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Richardson, K. (2006). The dark arts of good people: How popular culture negotiates "spin" in NBC's The West Wing. Journal of Sociolinguistics, 10(1), 52–69.

Rollins, P. C., & O'Connor, J. E. (Eds.). (2003). The West Wing: The American presidency as television drama. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.

Zoller, H. M., & Worrell, T. (2006). Television illness depictions, identity, and social experience: Responses to multiple sclerosis on The West Wing among people with MS. Health Communication, 20(1), 69–79.

White House Press Corps

The White House press corps consists of those journalists from various news media who primarily cover the presidency. In covering the president as well as other administration officials, they rely on daily briefings and news releases for information, ideally hold officials accountable, and give the White House communication entrée into the presidential news cycle by deadline.

Journalists have covered the president from the nation's beginning, along with other news from the nation's capital. As the power of the presidency grew in the 19th century, two factors led to a White House press corps. First, the number of Washington correspondents increased from four, during James Madison's administration, to several hundred by the 20th century and to almost 10,000 by the 21st century. Because of this, journalists had to specialize their coverage. Second, by the latter part of the 19th century a number of major city newspaper editors and publishers concentrated on reportage of the president so much so that a designated White House space was allotted to waiting journalists. A secretary would give daily briefings on everyday information and advance copies of speeches and arrange for conferences and interviews with the president.

With more and more direct contact with Washington correspondents and a desire to sway public opinion, the White House developed additional techniques to influence its political communication. Theodore Roosevelt held informal press meetings with his "newspaper cabinet," as he called them, when he went over his mail or had his morning shave. For the most part, he gave the journalists background information, without attribution, and threatened to stop all briefings and press releases for erring journalists. Woodrow Wilson initiated semi-weekly talks and was surprised when a hundred reporters attended. Although the meetings were useful for both the president and the correspondents, even with rules of confidentiality, Wilson found it difficult to be open with the journalists during peacetime and impossible during war; by the end of 1916, he stopped.

To separate from the huge Washington Correspondents' Association, a White House Correspondents Association began in 1914 as a social organization with a dozen or so members; it also acted as a screening mechanism for admission to the president's press conferences. The impetus was President Wilson's threat to cease his press meetings after several journalists published his "off-the-record" comments about a 1913 diplomatic crisis with Mexico. The association accredited members, weeded out rule violators, and negotiated with the White House over their working conditions. Membership was initially limited to those whose duty was to cover the White House (then, print journalists) and who had membership in the accredited press galleries of Congress. During the Franklin Roosevelt years, the association began annual dinners for the president. Today, all kinds of media are represented in the White House press corps.

President Gerald Ford talks with reporters, including Helen Thomas, during a press conference at the White House, Washington, D.C.

Source: Library of Congress, Prints & Photographs Division, LC-DIG-ppmsca-08532.

New technologies impacted the White House press corps membership and communication. Radio correspondents were included in the 1940s, television in the 1950s, and more recently reporters for online publications. Now, the press corps relies on the White House Web site for press releases, the daily briefings, the president's schedule, and pooled reports from those journalists who travel with the president. The president's press conferences have gone from taped television during the Eisenhower years to live television beginning with John F. Kennedy to live press secretary's briefings during the Clinton era. Website updates meant that Washington correspondents can follow White House news.

A major issue concerning the White House press corps is whether these journalists serve as part of the president's press agency, as an uncritical transmission belt for official opinion. The difficulty rests in a White House source dependency that is tied to news management and spin. Key White House press corps members are based in the White House, and the press office exerts tremendous leverage over the press corps by controlling the amount of news, leaving journalists little time for enterprising reporting.

Betty Houchin Winfield

See also Journalism, Political; Presidential Communication; Press Conferences; Press Secretary, White House

Further Readings

Juergens, G. (1981). News from the White House: The presidential-press relationship in the progressive era. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Marbut, F. B. (1971). News from the capital: The story of Washington reporting. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press.

Ritchie, D. A. (2005). Reporting from Washington: The history of the Washington press corps. New York: Oxford University Press.

Tebbell, J., & Watts, S. M. (1985). The press and the presidency, from George Washington to Ronald Reagan. New York: Oxford University Press.

Whitewater Scandal

See Clinton, William Jefferson

Why We Fight Series

See Film and Politics

Will, George (1941–)

In 2006 George Will's syndicated newspaper column appeared twice weekly in more than 475 newspapers. However, trying to assign an occupation to George Will is difficult. Although Will is one of the most recognizable conservative political commentators on television, he could also add college professor and author to his résumé. George Frederick Will was born May 4, 1941, in Champaign, Illinois. He received a B.A. degree from Trinity College in Hartford, Connecticut, a Master of Arts degree from the University of Oxford, and a Ph.D. in political science from Princeton University in 1968. After 2 years of service to Senator Gordon Allott (R-CO) from 1970 to 1972, Will began his career in public life.

Will was the Washington editor of the National Review from 1973 to 1976. He began his career as a syndicated writer in 1974 when he wrote a column for the Writers Group, founded by The Washington Post's Ben Bradlee and Katherine Graham. In 1976 Will became a contributing editor for Newsweek magazine and one year later, in 1977, won the Pulitzer Prize for Commentary. Other writing awards include the 1978 National Headlines Award for "consistently outstanding special features columns" appearing in Newsweek; a finalist citation in the Essays and Criticism category on the 1979 National Awards competition; a column on New York City's finances earned a 1980 Silurian Award for Editorial Writing; in January 1985, the Washington Journalism Review named Will "Best Writer, Any Subject"; and he was named one of the 25 most influential Washington journalists by the National Review in 1997.

Will began working as an ABC News panelist and commentator in 1981 with the premier of This Week with David Brinkley. This Week subsequently became This Week with George Stephanopoulos, and Will remained a regular weekly contributor to the program.

Will has published seven collections of his Newsweek and newspaper columns, including The Pursuit of Happiness and Other Sobering Thoughts (1978); The Pursuit of Virtue and Other Tory Notions (1982); The Morning After: American Successes and Excesses 1981–1986 (1986); Suddenly: The American Idea Abroad and at Home 1986–1990 (1990); The Leveling Wind: Politics, the Culture & Other News 1990–1994 (1994); The Woven Figure: Conservatism and America's Fabric, 1994–1997 (1997); and With a Happy Eye But . . . America and the World 1997–2002 (2002).

Five other books include three on political theory: Statecraft as Soulcraft (1983); The New Season: A Spectator's Guide to the 1988 Election (1987); and Restoration: Congress, Term Limits and the Recovery of Deliberative Democracy (1992). The other two are on baseball: Men at Work: The Craft of Baseball (1989); and Bunts: Curt Flood, Camden Yards, Pete Rose and Other Reflections on Baseball (1998).

Will taught political philosophy at Michigan State University and the University of Toronto and he taught at Harvard University in 1995 and again in 1998, but he is most recognized as columnist, author, and commentator.

R. John Ballotti, Jr.

Further Readings

American Broadcasting Companies, Inc. (2006). ABC Medianet: George Will. Retrieved from http://www.abcmedianet.com/shows05/news/correspondents/will.shtm

Washington Post. (1998). George Will. Retrieved from http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/politics/opinions/will.htm

Washington Post Writers Group. (2006). George Will. Retrieved from http://www.postwritersgroup.com/will.htm

Willie Horton Ad

The Willie Horton ad was a political television advertisement used by those sympathetic to Republican George H. W. Bush's campaign during the 1988 presidential election against Democratic nominee Michael Dukakis. The attack ad emphasized Dukakis's support of a weekend furlough program in his home state of Massachusetts, where he served as governor. This program, as the ad claimed, allowed Willie Horton, convicted of murder in 1974, to commit rape and armed robbery after he was released from prison in 1987 on a weekend furlough and never returned. A picture of Willie Horton is included in the ad, thus showing that he is of African American descent. This attack first materialized after Lee Atwater, a strategist for Bush's campaign, consulted with aides Jim Pinkerton and Andrew Card and discovered the Massachusetts weekend furlough program. Atwater witnessed the strength of this issue by screening an early version of the ad to a focus group of Dukakis supporters in Alabama, nearly all of whom switched their allegiance to Bush after viewing the ad. Although Dukakis supported this program as a rehabilitative measure, it was actually started by Republican governor Frank Sergeant in 1972. Dukakis, however, was governor in 1987 when Horton was released on the furlough, committed further crimes in Maryland, and remains incarcerated there to this day serving two life terms. The Bush campaign took advantage of this issue by producing its own ad, the "Revolving Door," which focuses on the Dukakis furlough program but does not identify Willie Horton or any other specific offender by name. This ad is often confused with the Willie Horton ad.

The Willie Horton ad was not released as an advertisement by the Republican Party or the Bush campaign, but rather by an arm of the National Security Political Action Committee known as Americans for Bush. The producer of this ad was Larry McCarthy, a former employee of current Fox News Channel chairman Roger Ailes. Others, such as Jesse Jackson and Dukakis's running mate Lloyd Bentsen, called the ad overtly racist. Lee Atwater eventually apologized to Dukakis for the creation of the ad before he succumbed to cancer in 1991. In addition, the "Black Elected Democrats of Ohio" along with the Ohio Democratic Party filed complaints with the Federal Election Commission alleging that the political action committee that released the ad did so as an in-kind campaign contribution to the Bush campaign, but no evidence of campaign finance violations was found.

Although the Willie Horton ad was not aired a great deal, it benefited from repeated play and commentary by the news media. Of course, the Revolving Door ad did run frequently and may have called the Willie Horton ad issues to mind for some voters. The failure of the Dukakis campaign to respond effectively to the charges in these ads is considered a major reason for his electoral defeat.

Although Dukakis abolished the weekend furlough program in April 1988, the criticism of his past support of it continued. Dukakis, however, continued to insist that it was overwhelmingly effective long after its demise. Following his presidential loss, Dukakis announced his departure from politics effective with the conclusion of his third gubernatorial term in 1991. Horton remains incarcerated at the Maryland House of Correction Annex in Jessup, Maryland.

Fredrick H. Sowder

See also Dukakis, Michael

Further Readings

Takesian, S. (2002). Willie Horton: True crime and its influence on a presidential election. Lawrence, MA: Author.

Wilson, Harold (1916–1995)

Harold Wilson was British prime minister from 1964 to 1970 and again from 1974 to 1976, serving as leader of the Labour Party from 1963 to 1976. His career demonstrates both the importance and limitations of political communications. Born to lower-middle-class parents in Huddersfield, Wilson studied Politics, Philosophy and Economics at Jesus College, Oxford. After a period in academia he became a temporary civil servant during World War II. He returned as a Labour Member of Parliament (MP) for Ormskirk in the 1945 General Election, remaining in the Commons until 1983. He quickly rose to become a member of Clement Attlee's cabinet in 1947.

Wilson came to political activism and the Labour Party relatively late in life (though he made rapid progress once he arrived). During the 1950s he developed an association with the left-wing faction, which coalesced around Aneurin Bevan, but Wilson's ideological baggage was light. Political positioning—to which communication skills and image were vital—was more important. In 1963 the Labour leader Hugh Gaitskell died suddenly, and Wilson succeeded him.

As leader of the opposition, Wilson made a spectacular media impact. He presented himself as a man of the people and a dynamic leader; he presented Labour as a party of modernization. By contrast the Conservatives, led by the aristocratic Alec Douglas-Home, appeared outmoded. Wilson was an effective performer on the rising medium of television and used striking phrases (including his often-misquoted reference to the white heat of a scientific revolution). He visibly surrounded himself with advisers molded after John F. Kennedy's Camelot—some of whom followed him to No. 10 Downing Street when he became prime minister—whose duties included media management and contributing to speeches. Though the press was favorable at this stage, the substantial opinion poll lead Wilson inherited from Gaitskell declined. He won the General Election of 1964, ending 13 years of Conservative government, but the victory was narrow.

In office Wilson continued in his publicity-seeking, image-conscious manner, recruiting journalists to his staff. The Beatles were given honors—a groundbreaking decision at the time. To appear statesmanlike he was seen smoking a pipe. But Wilson's government—reelected with a substantial majority in 1966—soon encountered disaster. The National Plan for economic growth was abandoned in July 1966, and in November 1967 there was a forced devaluation of the sterling currency. Wilson's turn of phrase, once so effective, became a weakness. His claim that "the pound . . . in your pocket" had not been devalued along with sterling attracted derision. Relations with the media soured. In 1968 the newspaper magnate Cecil King attempted to inspire a coup against Wilson. Though defeated in 1970, Wilson returned to power in 1974. In his second premiership he was charged once again with valuing style over substance. An example of this was his allegedly largely cosmetic renegotiation of Britain's terms of membership within the European Economic Community. While he pioneered some of the promotional and administrative methods used by Labour under Tony Blair, and his governments saw great progress toward social tolerance and equality, his reputation for shallowness and short-sightedness has tainted his achievements, though there are signs of a rehabilitation beginning.

Andrew Blick

Further Readings

Blick, A. (2004). People who live in the dark: The history of the special adviser in British politics. London: Politico's/Methuen.

Pimlott, B. (1992). Harold Wilson. London: HarperCollins.

Ziegler, P. (1993). Wilson: The authorised life of Lord Wilson of Rievaulx. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson.

Wolfsfeld, Gadi (1951–)

Gadi Wolfsfeld is best known for his research on the role of the media in political conflicts and peace processes. As an Israeli political science and communication scholar at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, his main political laboratory is the Israeli–Palestinian conflict. Wolfsfeld's research represents a life-long commitment to trying to understand how we can use political communication tools to make a contribution to resolving conflict and war. This started with his first article, which was published in 1977 in the Journal of Conflict Resolution and looked at how Palestinians and Israelis perceived each other in ways that contributed to their mutual hatred and suspicion, and has continued into his latest book, Media and the Path to Peace, which was published in 2004 and is dedicated to "the victims of violent conflict and their families."

In his first major book in the field of political communication, Media and Political Conflict: News From the Middle East, published in 1997, Wolfsfeld demonstrates that the news media play a central role in political conflicts. The major thrust of the political contest model developed in this book is that the best way to understand the role of the news media in politics is to view the competition over the news media as part of a larger and more significant contest among political antagonists for political control. He argues that the political process is more likely to have an influence on the news media than the news media have on the political process.

Wolfsfeld's second major book, Media and the Path to Peace published in 2004, turns the analytical lens to the opposite direction: the role of the media in peace processes and especially in the Israeli–Palestinian peace process (but including a comparative analysis with the North Ireland case). This is one of the first major studies to analyze the interaction between the media and the peace process, and its major finding is that the role the news media play in resolving conflict is very different than the role they play in the midst of conflict. Due to a fundamental contradiction between the nature of a peace process and news routines, the media often play a destructive role in attempts at making peace, as they have played in the Israeli–Palestinian peace process.

The most important contribution of this book to his earlier political contest model is the development of the politics media politics (PMP) model, which in essence states that the influence of the news media on a peace process is best seen in terms of a cycle in which changes in the political environment lead to changes in media performance that often lead to further changes in the political environment. Wolfsfeld stresses that it is not a "chicken and an egg problem" because politics almost always comes first. Although the PMP model was applied specifically to peace processes, he argues that this proposition can and should be applied more generally in efforts to understand the role of the media in large-scale and long-term political processes.

Tamir Sheafer

Further Readings

Wolfsfeld, G. (1997). Media and political conflict: News from the Middle East. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Wolfsfeld, G. (2004). Media and the path to peace. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Women Candidates, Advertising

With significantly more women entering the political arena, exploring the differences and similarities in the campaign communication styles and strategies of female and male candidates has become more important. Studies investigating the role of gender in campaign communication have become more feasible, from a methodological perspective, since the 1992 election when record numbers of women began seeking and winning political office.

Televised political ads provide an important resource for documenting the communication styles and strategies of political candidates as they remain one of the few candidate-controlled (rather than media-mediated) communication tools of the modern political campaign. The importance of television advertising to today's political campaign is underscored by the significant financial resources devoted to such communication.

Television advertising and the control it offers over campaign messages, especially in transmitting information on image and issues, may be more important for women candidates, who are often framed in stereotypical terms by the media. Media coverage of women candidates oftentimes emphasizes their traditional roles as wives and mothers and focuses on their appearance, personality, and personal lives. Women candidates can use televised political advertising to counter such images and present themselves in their own ways and words.

Studies of the communication strategies used by female and male candidates in their television commercials date back to at least 1985. Over the past 20 years, researchers have found both differences and similarities in the ways in which female and male candidates use this campaign communication medium.

In the 1980s, female candidates' political ads were more likely to emphasize social issues considered feminine because they are more commonly associated with women, such as education and health care, whereas men were more likely to focus on economic issues, such as taxes, in their political spots. As far as image traits, women were more likely to emphasize the stereotypical feminine characteristic of compassion and men to stress the stereotypical masculine attribute of strength, although sometimes both sexes emphasized stereotypical masculine traits such as competence and leadership. Although the early studies found that both women and men used negative political advertising, the results were mixed as to the types of attack strategies employed in their television spots.

In their nonverbal communication, these early studies found that men were more likely to dress in formal attire and women preferred feminized business suits and office or professional settings in their television spots. In their production content, female candidates in the 1980s were more likely to appear live in their television commercials and male candidates used more voiceovers.

From the 1990s to the present, as more women ran for political office, female and male candidates have become strikingly similar in their uses of verbal, nonverbal, and film/video production techniques—or "Videostyle" as conceived by Lynda Lee Kaid and Dorothy Davidson—though some differences have been found. In terms of their verbal communication strategies, female and male candidates were similar in the use of negative spots, employing attacks in about one third of their total ads. Female and male candidates were increasingly similar over time in the issues discussed in their ads and, especially, in the image traits emphasized and appeal strategies used.

The similarities and differences that did emerge over the past 15 years in verbal communication strategies are interesting from a gender perspective. For example, although female and male candidates have been similar recently in their use of negative ads, they differ in the purpose of the attacks and strategies employed. Both female and male candidates now use negative ads primarily to attack their opponents on the issues. However, the ads of women candidates are significantly more likely to criticize the opponent's personal character as compared to the spots of male candidates. And, although negative association was the preferred attack strategy in the ads of both women and men, the spots of women are significantly more likely to use name calling.

Attacking the opponent's character, rather than his or her stance on the issues, and calling the opponent names are seen as much more personal. Here, female candidates may be taking advantage of voter stereotypes, which portray women as more caring and compassionate. That is, female candidates may be given more latitude than male candidates to make personal attacks as they enter the race with the stereotypical advantage of being considered kinder. Of course, defying stereotypical norms also may backfire for women candidates as they may be labeled as too aggressive, rather than assertive, by the media.

Male candidates, on the other hand, may feel more constrained by expectations that they treat women with some degree of chivalry by refraining from attacks on the personal characteristics of their female opponents. So, instead, they lash out significantly more often at their opponent's group affiliations, which is a more acceptable and indirect way to question their opponent's character as a member of certain organizations.

Although female and male candidates are increasingly similar in the issues they discuss, image traits they emphasize, and appeal strategies they use in their ads, the differences that did emerge are interesting from a gendered perspective. For example, the top issue in the ads by women candidates running for office between 1990 and 2002—and one that was discussed significantly more often in females' spots than in the ads for male candidates—was the stereotypically feminine concern of education and schools.

The ads of female candidates between 1990 and 2002 also discussed other stereotypical feminine issues—such as health care, senior citizen issues, and women's issues—significantly more often than the ads of their male opponents. As with the issue of education, women candidates may be conforming to stereotypical expectations that consider them to be experts on such concerns. However, female candidates also were more likely than male candidates to discuss the economy, which is usually associated more with men than with women and therefore can be considered a masculine issue.

The only issues discussed significantly more often in the ads of male candidates, compared to female candidates, were crime and prisons, a more masculine issue, and welfare, a more feminine issue. However, some of the male candidates discussing welfare took a hard-line approach, focusing on limiting the number of families receiving such benefits.

Even fewer differences are evident between female and male candidates in the images they emphasize and appeal strategies they use in their television commercials. However, the traits they choose to emphasize both defy and underscore stereotypical expectations about the roles and behaviors of women and men in today's society. The top traits emphasized in the ads by women candidates between 1990 and 2002 were aggressive/fighter, toughness/strength, past performance, leadership, and action-oriented—commonly considered masculine attributes—and honesty/integrity, more commonly considered a feminine quality. The top traits emphasized in the ads by men candidates were past performance, leadership, aggressive/fighter, action-oriented, toughness/strength, and experience in politics—all masculine attributes. Of these traits, women candidates were significantly more likely to emphasize toughness/strength than men candidates, and men candidates were significantly more likely to discuss their experience in politics than were women.

The appeal strategies used in female and male candidate ads were closely related to the traits they emphasized and, thus, also are interesting from a gendered perspective. Both female and male candidates were equally as likely to use all of the elements of feminine style, which is characterized by an inductive structure, personal tone, addressing the audience as peers, relying on personal experiences, identifying with the experiences of others, and inviting audience participation. Male candidates did rely on statistics, a masculine strategy, significantly more often than did female candidates, and female candidates were significantly more likely to make gender an issue in their ads—an indication that at least some women are campaigning as female candidates and not political candidates who happen to be women. The fact that both women and men candidates used elements of feminine style in similar proportions may suggest that this style works best for 30-second spots on television.

In the nonverbal content of their television ads, it is interesting to note that female candidates were more likely to dress in businesslike, as opposed to casual, attire and to smile significantly more often than men did. Both of these nonverbal characteristics reflect gender-based norms and stereotypical expectations. For example, the choice of businesslike attire reflects the gender-based norms that society imposes on women as they face the challenge of portraying themselves as serious and legitimate candidates. In their everyday life, smiling is regarded as a nonverbal strategy that women use to gain acceptance. Perhaps women candidates are more likely than men candidates to smile in their ads for the same reasons—to gain acceptance from viewers in the traditionally male political environment.

Because society's gender stereotypes more often associate women with families and children, it is interesting to note who is pictured in female and male candidate ads. Interestingly, women candidates distanced themselves from their roles as wives and/or mothers by picturing their families in only 9% of their ads, whereas male candidates showed their families in 20% of their ads between 1990 and 2002. In picturing their families or not, both male and female candidates are confronting societal stereotypes. Women candidates may want to show voters that they are more than wives and/or mothers and to dismiss any concerns voters may have over their abilities to serve in political office due to family obligations. Men candidates, on the other hand, may want to round out their images beyond business and politics with voters by portraying themselves as loving husbands and/or fathers.

In terms of production content, no significant differences between female and male candidates have been found in the past 15 years of study. Both female and male candidates overwhelmingly preferred 30-second spots, both about 90% of the time, sponsored by the committee for election or reelection of the candidate as sponsors. The ads of both female and male candidates were most likely to feature straight-on dominant camera angles and medium or tight shots.

Recent studies also have been conducted for political party affiliation and election outcome to see if Democrat and Republican female and male candidates as well as winners and losers differ in their television advertising strategies. Some differences have been found.

For example, television ads tended to be more negative in races between female Democrats and male Republicans than in races between female Republicans and male Democrats. Female Democrats were more likely than other candidates to use negative advertising; to attack their opponent's personal qualities and background; and to discuss education and school issues, taxes, and health care. Male Democrats were more likely than other candidates to attack their opponent's issues, stands, and group affiliations; voice their dissatisfaction with government; and emphasize their experience in politics, leadership, and past performance. Female Republicans were more likely than other candidates to discuss the economy and emphasize their toughness/strength and qualifications. Male Republicans were more likely than other candidates to talk about crime/prisons and emphasize their trustworthiness.

Winning female and male candidates also use different strategies from losing female and male candidates in their televised political advertising. Winning candidates, both female and male, used substantial issue discussion in their advertising, but this was particularly true of the ads of winning female candidates. Specifically, female candidates who ultimately won had discussed issues more frequently—taxes, health care, senior citizen issues, and women's issues, in particular—and emphasized being aggressive or being a fighter more often than other candidates. Male candidates who won had discussed crime and prison issues more frequently and emphasized their leadership and experience.

Women candidates, both winning and losing, used attacks in almost half of their ads. Losing males were the most negative and winning males the least negative of all candidates in their campaigns.

Overall, it is notable that female candidates who won tended to be those who emphasized masculine traits and both feminine and masculine issues (although more feminine than masculine issues) in their television advertising. Winning male candidates incorporated a mix of feminine and masculine strategies to ensure their success.

In addition to the content of their television ads, it is interesting to look at the effects these appeals have on potential voters. At first, researchers and campaign consultants thought that masculine strategies (aggressive and focused on career)—rather than traditional feminine strategies (nonaggressive and focused on family)—worked best for women candidates in their political ads. However, it now seems that women are most effective when balancing stereotypical feminine and masculine traits, such as compassion, honesty, toughness, and competence. Also, neutral—as opposed to emotional—appeals for women candidates seem to trigger the greatest audience recall, especially for issue stances. Research also has found that women candidates are more effective when communicating about stereotypical feminine issues as women's rights, education, and unemployment than stereotypical masculine issues such as crime and illegal immigration.

Based on the research, then, women candidates should be advised to emphasize both stereotypical feminine and masculine images and issues in their televisions commercials. Voters will perceive a woman candidate as more honest and trustworthy than a man, and just as intelligent and able to forge compromise and obtain consensus. However, especially in a climate of international terrorism, homeland security, and the war in Iraq, a woman candidate will need to emphasize her ability to lead the nation during a crisis and to make difficult decisions.

Issue emphasis will vary with the context of the campaign. In the 1992 through 2000 elections, the economy, education, and health care were the top issues. According to survey research, voters rate female candidates about the same as, or more favorably than, male candidates on these issues. However, according to survey research, women candidates are considered less able to handle such issues as law and order, foreign policy, and governmental problems. In elections like those of 2002, 2004, and 2006, when the war in Iraq and terrorism emerged among the top voter concerns, women candidates needed to demonstrate their competency on such issues through their television advertising.

Dianne G. Bystrom

See also Feminine Style, in Communication; Gender and Politics; Political Advertising; Women Candidates, News Coverage

Further Readings

Bystrom, D. G., Banwart, M., Kaid, L. L., & Robertson, T. (2004). The gendering of candidate communication: VideoStyle, WebStyle, and NewsStyle. New York: Routledge.

Bystrom, D., & Kaid, L. L. (2002). Are women candidates transforming campaign communication? A comparison of advertising videostyles in the 1990s. In C. S. Rosenthal (Ed.), Women transforming Congress (pp. 146–169). Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

Kahn, K. F. (1996). The political consequences of being a woman: How stereotypes influence the conduct and consequences of political campaigns. New York: Columbia University Press.

Kaid, L. L. (2004). Political advertising. In L. L. Kaid (Ed.), The handbook of political communication research (pp. 155–202). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Trent, J. S., & Sabourin, T. (1993). Sex still counts: Women's use of televised advertising during the decade of the 80's. Journal of Applied Communication Research, 21(1), 21-40.

Women Candidates, News Coverage

Women are underrepresented in the news. Women are rarely used as sources in news stories, and when women are quoted, they are more likely to represent private citizens than experts or authorities. On network news, for example, men are used as on-camera sources five times more often than women are. And, newsmakers receiving attention in newspapers, in news magazines, and on television news programs are much more likely to be men than women. When women are newsmakers, they are much more likely to be entertainers and artists than government officials or activists.

The dominance of men as newsmakers is illustrated by Time magazine's choice of "man of the year." Since 1928, when Time magazine began selecting "men of the year," only three women have been recognized as sole recipients. The first woman chosen was Mrs. Wallis Warfield Simpson in 1936, the Duchess of Windsor. The next woman, Elizabeth II, was selected in 1956. And, 30 years later, in 1986, Corazon Aquino, the president of the Republic of the Philippines, was chosen.

The scarcity of women in the news may be driven by the dominance of men in the newsroom. According to recent surveys, more than 60% of reporters are men and almost 75% of newsroom supervisors are men. While the proportion of women in newsrooms has increased steadily over the past 30 years, men still outnumber women in news departments across the nation.

Women Politicians in the News

Women in the U.S. Congress, when they receive coverage, are often described as "agents of change." The bulk of the coverage these women receive in the press emphasizes their work on health, abortion policy, and, to a lesser extent, sexual harassment issues. News coverage of women members of Congress downplays their involvement in other issues, such as foreign affairs, international traits, and the appropriations process. On the international scene, women politicians are also often described by the press as outsiders or agents of change. And women political leaders from countries as disparate as Turkey, the Philippines, Norway, and Nicaragua receive less press attention than their male counterparts.

*Senator Hillary Clinton (D-NY) (center) raises hands with National Organization for Women (NOW) President Kim Gandy (right) and others at a news conference March 28, 2007, in Washington, D.C. NOW has endorsed Senator Clinton in her bid for the White House in 2008.*

Source: Getty Images.

Women Political Candidates in the News

The news media also differ in how they cover men and women political candidates. Women candidates receive less press attention than their male counterparts. Moreover, the coverage that women candidates do receive is more negative than the coverage given to male candidates. For instance, news reports covering women candidates often focus on women candidates' poor standings in public opinion polls, or their inability to raise funds for their campaigns, or their failure to secure important endorsements. This negative slant on women candidates' viability persists even among women officeholders running for reelection and among women challengers mounting competitive bids, according to objective measures such as campaign fundraising and support in public opinion polls.

Furthermore, the content of coverage is different for men and women candidates. The news media are more likely to focus on women candidates' personal life, appearance, and personality. For example, after Hillary Rodham Clinton claimed victory in the 2000 New York Senate race, The New York Times ran the following headline: "First Lady's Race for the Ages: 62 Counties and 6 Pantsuits." In a similar vein, the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel wrote how Clinton "whittled her figure down to a fighting size 8" and mentioned that she had eaten "little more than a lettuce leaf" during her fundraisers.

In addition, the news media, in their coverage of campaigns, is more likely to pay attention to the marital status of women candidates, compared to male candidates. And, when covering political campaigns, more press attention is given to discussing the women candidates' relationships with their husbands and children, as well as discussing their gender as an issue.

When male candidates are covered in the press, there is significantly less attention devoted to their appearance, their choice of clothes, their hairstyle, and their marital status. Instead, news reports on the campaigns of male candidates focus more heavily on their policy proposals and policy priorities, compared to news coverage given to women candidates.

Stereotypical Coverage of Women Political Candidates

News reports of political campaigns tend to mirror common gender stereotypes that people hold about men and women politicians. Gender stereotypes are beliefs about the characteristics and behaviors considered appropriate for men and women. People use these stereotypes as cognitive shortcuts to process information more efficiently in their everyday lives.

These gender stereotypes lead people to associate certain types of traits with men and male politicians, such as competence, leadership, aggression, and intelligence, while traits like compassion, integrity, passivity, and honesty are more likely to be associated with women and women politicians.

Similarly, common gender stereotypes lead people to view male candidates as better able to deal with certain issues, like economic issues, foreign policy, crime, and defense policy. On the other hand, women are viewed as competent at dealing with compassion issues, like education, health care, and the environment.

The news media coverage of campaigns echoes these common stereotypes. In particular, the news media associate male candidates with certain issues, like foreign policy and defense issues, and specific traits, such as competence, strength, and experience. And, when covering women candidates, news reports highlight alternative issues, such as education and health care, and different personality traits, like honesty and warmth. Finally, the news media is more likely to link issues that resonate with voters (e.g., the economy) with male candidates than female candidates.

The Disconnect Between Candidates' Messages and News Coverage

The electoral consequences of these gender differences in coverage lead people to develop less favorable impressions of candidates covered like women candidates. For example, candidates who are covered like women candidates are viewed by citizens as less viable and less competent than candidates who are covered like male candidates.

Additionally, female candidates often express frustration with media coverage of their own campaigns. For example, Christine Gregoire, who ran for governor of Washington in 2004, lamented the disconnect between her own campaign message and media coverage of her campaign. While her own campaign advertisements stressed her humble beginnings and experience as attorney general, news coverage emphasized her toughness, ambition, and self-confidence—in a negative fashion.

Governor Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, while not a candidate at the time, encountered problems with the press after Hurricane Katrina destroyed much of her state in the summer of 2005. According to a New York Times article published in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, Governor Blanco was mocked as weepy and indecisive and the press derided her as "momma governor." Governor Blanco's staff was concerned with improving Blanco's image in the aftermath of Katrina. For example, Governor Blanco's spokeswoman, Denise Bottcher, worried that the governor was doing too many first lady things and not acting enough like John Wayne.

In candidates' campaign messages, such as their televised political advertisements, speeches, Web pages, and direct mail, they focus on themes that will lead to an electoral advantage. And, men and women articulate different campaign themes. First, men and women candidates focus on different issues, with women focusing on their stereotypical strengths, like education and health care, while men are more likely to focus on their stereotypical strengths, such as the economy and foreign policy.

However, candidates do not highlight their stereotypical strengths when discussing their personality characteristics during campaigns. Instead, women candidates try to eradicate trait stereotypes by emphasizing their possession of stereotypically male traits, such as experience and leadership. Male candidates adopt a similar strategy by highlighting their possession of typically female traits, focusing on their empathy and integrity in their political communications.

While men and women candidates emphasize alternative issue and trait messages in their campaigns, the news media are not equally likely to cover the messages of men and women candidates. In fact, the news media much more faithfully represent the messages of male candidates, virtually mirroring the content of their political communications. In contrast, the news media are less accurate in their representation of the messages of women candidates, often distorting the messages of these candidates.

Coverage of Elizabeth Dole's Campaign for President

To understand how women candidates are covered, it is instructive to see how Elizabeth Dole was covered by reporters when she ran for the Republican nomination for president in 2000.

The office of president presents women with unique challenges because of the highly masculine nature of the office. In particular, the president's role as commander in chief of the military and as manager of the country's economy highlights men's stereotypical strengths, while corresponding to women's stereotypical weaknesses.

Given that the office of president may draw attention to women's perceived liabilities, it is not surprising that Elizabeth Dole's coverage during the 2000 campaign for president was less favorable than coverage given to her rivals.

To begin, Elizabeth Dole received less coverage and less serious and less sustained coverage than George W. Bush and John McCain, even though Dole was leading McCain in public opinion polls at the time. In addition, the press reported horserace coverage more often for Dole, and the coverage of Dole's viability was negative, focusing on her lack of fundraising abilities. And, Dole received significantly less attention to her policy concerns when compared to her male colleagues.

In addition, reporters covered Elizabeth Dole's personality and appearance more than the traits and appearance of her opponents. For example, reporters described Dole as "robotic," a "control freak," and "over-rehearsed." In an article appearing in The New York Times, a reporter explained that Dole prepares so thoroughly for appearances that she requires aides to count the steps she must take to the podium. In the same article, the reporter compared Dole to the former prime minister of Great Britain, Margaret Thatcher, and explained that Dole is so thin-skinned that she sometimes burst into tears when she receives unflattering news coverage.

Coverage of Dole during her 2000 presidential campaign emphasized her gender more than any other aspect of her candidacy and framed her coverage as the "first woman" to be a serious contender for the presidency. By using the "first woman" frame, the news media may have been encouraging citizens to view Dole as a novelty and to view her as a candidate not to be taken seriously.

Moreover, male and female reporters differed in their coverage of Elizabeth Dole. For example, female reporters were more likely than their male counterparts to describe Dole's position on issues (i.e., 25% of the articles by women reporters discussed Dole's issue views, compared to 14% for male reporters). And, male reporters were more likely than female reporters to focus on Dole's personality traits (i.e., 39% of the articles written by men mentioned Dole's personality, while only 27% of the female reporters' news stories discussed Dole's personal traits).

However, women reporters did not always offer Dole praise in their coverage of the candidate. In fact, some of Dole's harshest criticism came from women journalists. The Pulitzer Prize–winning New York Times columnist, Maureen Dowd, noted in a March 31, 1999, column that "it's hard to imagine the woman who likes to coordinate the color of her shoes with the color of the rug on the stage where she gives a speech, dealing with any crisis that involved a lot of variables . . ."

Similarly, Mary McGrory, in a column in The Washington Post in October 1999, said, "Some men call her . . . an over-programmed perfectionist. And women from outside the South found her deep-fried effusiveness off-putting. . . . Despite her considerable credentials she brought only a skirt to the proceedings and in the end offered only the novelty of the first serious presidential run by a woman." Dole's communications director, Ari Fleisher, often expressed his frustration in the way Dole was covered. Why were male politicians "on message" and women "scripted?" George W. Bush's inaccessibility rivaled Dole's, but he was praised for being "disciplined" and having "a controlled message," while Dole was portrayed as a Stepford-like personality who offers sound bites on command. Although Elizabeth Dole's campaign was plagued by a number of political shortcomings in the 2000 nomination campaign for president, one was clearly the negative and stereotypical news coverage.

Conclusion

Women are seldom used as sources in the news and rarely appear as newsmakers. Women candidates and politicians receive inequitable news coverage, compared to their male counterparts. Gender stereotype may be at the core of this inequity. However, as women's presence in the newsroom increases and as women move into leadership positions in news organizations, the impact of gender stereotypes may diminish, thus shrinking imbalances in news coverage.

In addition, the escalation of women in powerful political positions may lead to more even-handed press coverage. Today, 14 women serve as president or prime minister in countries as diverse as Bangladesh, Finland, Chile, Germany, Latvia, Jamaica, and New Zealand. Some women were freely elected in countries where women historically have held subservient roles. For example, Michelle Bachelet was elected in January 2006 as president of Chile, a conservative, male-dominated, deeply Roman Catholic country. Western European countries are also placing women at the helm of political leadership. For instance, Angela Merkel is currently serving as Germany's first female chancellor. In addition, in the United States, there has been an increase in the number of women in high-level elective office as well as an increase in women in leadership positions, such as Nancy Pelosi, the minority leader of the U.S. House of Representatives and Condoleezza Rice, the U.S. secretary of state. The increase of women in positions of power may help reduce people's stereotypes about men and women's unique strengths and weaknesses, producing more equitable treatment of women in the news.

Kim L. Fridkin and Gina Serignese Woodall

See also Feminine Style, in Communication; Women Candidates, Advertising

Further Readings

Aday, S., & Devitt, J. (2001). Style over substance: Newspaper coverage of Elizabeth Dole's presidential bid. The Harvard International Journal of Press/Politics, 6, 52–73.

Braden, M. (1996). Women politicians and the media. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky.

Bystrom, D. G., Banwart, M. C., Kaid, L. L., & Robertson, T. A. (2004). Gender and candidate communication: VideoStyle, WebStyle, NewsStyle. New York: Routledge.

Bystrom, D. G., Robertson, T. A., & Banwart, M. C. (2001). Framing the fight: An analysis of media coverage of female and male candidates in primary races for governor and U.S. Senate in 2000. American Behavioral Scientist, 44, 1999–2013.

Carroll, S. J., & Fox, R. I. (2006). Gender and elections: Shaping the future of American politics. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Fox, R. L. (1997). Gender dynamics in congressional elections. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Kahn, K. F. (1996). The political consequences of being a woman: How stereotypes influence the conduct and consequences of political campaigns. New York: Columbia University Press.

Norris, P. (Ed.). (1997). Women, media, and politics. New York: Oxford University Press.

Woodward, Bob

See Watergate

World Association for Public Opinion Research

The World Association for Public Opinion Research (WAPOR) is a professional association of survey researchers from universities and private institutions. It is open to individual people who have an interest in the conduct, use, or teaching of scientific opinion and attitude surveys, social science research, media or communications research, market research, or related activities. The organization has approximately 500 members from almost 60 different countries. It was founded in 1947.

WAPOR aims at organizing and sponsoring meetings and publications, encouraging high professional standards, promoting improved research techniques, informing journalists about the appropriate forms of publishing poll results, observing the democratic process and use of polls in elections, promoting personnel training, coordinating international polls, and maintaining close relations with other research agencies.

WAPOR considers public opinion a critical force in shaping and transforming society. As the constitution formulates, > Properly conducted and disseminated survey research provides the public with a tool to measure opinions and attitudes in order to allow its voices to be heard. In light of this mission the Association shall . . . promote . . . the right to conduct and publish scientific research on what the people and its groups think and how this thinking is influenced by various factors, . . . promote the knowledge and application of scientific methods in this objective, . . . assist and promote the development and publication of public opinion research worldwide, and promote international cooperation and exchange among academic and commercial researchers, journalists and political actors, as well as between the representatives of the different scientific disciplines.

In furtherance of these aims, WAPOR representatives have taken part in election supervision projects, and WAPOR has repeatedly co-sponsored reports on the freedom to conduct and publish polls.

WAPOR organizes annual conferences, usually conducted alongside the meetings of the American Association for Public Opinion Research in even-numbered years and the meetings of the Worldwide Association of Research Professionals in odd-numbered years. WAPOR also offers regional and thematic seminars in all parts of the world.

The organization publishes a quarterly journal, the International Journal of Public Opinion Research, founded in 1989 by three past presidents of the organization, Seymour Martin Lipset (United States), Elisabeth Noelle-Neumann (Germany), and Robert M. Worcester (United Kingdom). From the beginning, the managing editor was Wolfgang Donsbach (Germany). The journal is devoted to the study of public opinion theory and methodology and also publishes studies on the role of public opinion in politics and mass communication, the dynamics of individual and group behavior, and long-term shifts in attitudes and values. Aside from the journal, WAPOR also publishes a quarterly newsletter.

The chief representative of WAPOR is the president, elected for a 2-year term and to be succeeded by the vice president, who has to come from a different country. Along with the immediate past-president, the general secretary, and a number of committee chairpersons, they form the WAPOR Council, the body to lead the organization between annual meetings.

Since 1981, WAPOR has annually presented the Helen Dinerman Award in memory of Helen Dinerman's achievements over 3 decades of public opinion research. The award particularly honors significant contributions to survey research methodology.

Uwe Hartung

See also Donsbach, Wolfgang; Noelle-Neumann, Elisabeth; Polls; Public Opinion

Further Readings

Spangenberg, F. (2003). The freedom to publish opinion poll results: Reports on a worldwide update. Amsterdam: Foundation for Information.

WAPOR. (Ed.). (n.d.). Code of professional ethics and practices. Retrieved from http://www.unl.edu/wapor/ethics.html

World Wide Web, Political Uses

Political uses of the World Wide Web refers to the ways in which political actors can use Hypertext Markup Language (HTML) for political action. That political action can include information dissemination, discussion, mobilization, and activism. Information dissemination is the core of the Web's functions and is one of its most heavily used elements. Discussion includes conversation among citizens in online discussion spaces, including Web logs. Mobilization refers to the ways that political organizations can use the Web to engage potential supporters in online or offline political action. Activism refers specifically to the uses to which activist-citizens use the Web for political expression and protest.

The World Wide Web is a set of agreed upon standards designed to relay digital information across the Internet. One can think of the Web as being similar to the conventions that govern how analog signals are broadcast to television sets. Those conventions ensure that the programming content is received by the television set and then channeled through it for viewers to see.

The World Wide Web has three essential components. The first component is the standards that govern the encoding of information. This is called HTML, and it was developed by software engineer Tim Berners-Lee. HTML is a set of expressions called tags that convey how information should be presented, including what should be the background colors, font sizes, and location of text and images on the page. The second component is the standard for sending information through the Internet, which is known as Hypertext Transfer Protocol (HTTP). The third component is the naming convention that identifies a site. This is known as the Uniform Resource Locator (URL). The URL can be thought of as a unique address, similar to a street address for postal mail, and is often referred to as the domain name.

To illustrate how the Web works, take for example the Web page for the White House. Its URL is www.whitehouse.gov. To view the content of that Web page, a person must use a Web browser, which is the software program that reads the encoded text, graphics, and design of the page. To see the page, a person would type the URL http://www.whitehouse.gov, which tells the browser to retrieve the HTML of the resource whitehouse.gov using HTTP to send the information through the Internet.

Additional software can be embedded in a Web site to add functions, such as forms that a user can fill out, polls or surveys that users can answer, audio and video they can download, and threaded discussion or a chat room for visitors to talk with each other or with the host of the Web site. These additional functions increase the World Wide Web's utility for political action. Without them, the Web primarily serves as an information dissemination tool. With them, the Web also becomes a conduit for interaction between people (through discussion spaces) and for interaction between people and the Web site (through multimedia downloads or click polls).

Researchers of political communication have found that the technical characteristics of the World Wide Web open up the possibility for political action. Web pages are relatively cheap to produce, especially compared with newspapers or television. This inexpensive cost entails that more people can share information or express themselves online than they could through traditional media channels. The phenomenon of Web logging is a good example of this. Web logging or "blogging" is a way for people to easily create a personal space on the Web and then to express their opinions or share information with readers of the blog.

Software tools have been developed to make Web page creation possible for the technically inexperienced. Tools, such as blogger, were developed to make it easy for people to build and maintain a blog. Facebooks, services designed to promote social networks such as My Space, Orkut, and Friendster, make it easy for people to create personal Web pages to express themselves and to find and network with others of similar interests.

Information Dissemination

The World Wide Web is at its essence an information dissemination tool. Its original purpose was to help individuals, organizations, and governments to display information for others to view. Although it now offers much more than this, at its core it is a highly efficient, inexpensive, and user-friendly way to display and to find information.

Political organizations and political campaigns increasingly rely on the Web to display information about themselves and their activities. Nearly all candidates for political office at the state and federal levels create a campaign Web site during the campaign season in the United States and Europe. U.S. presidential candidates since the 1996 presidential election have created a Web site. Most candidates running for state and federal offices also develop Web sites.

Political campaigns use the Web as a means through which to connect to potential supporters alongside older forms of campaigning, including broadcast advertising, door-knocking, and free media. The advantage of the Web site for the political candidate is the opportunity to express a lengthy and detailed message, with elaborated issue positions, unfiltered by journalists and unconstrained by the 30-second sound bite. Candidates' Web sites generally include issue positions, biographical statements, texts of speeches, press releases, archives of advertisements airing on television, and campaign events. Information dissemination is an essential element of any political campaign Web site.

Traditional political and social organizations have established Web sites to disseminate information about their organizations, to detail the problems the organizations work to solve, and to highlight solutions toward which the organizations work. Organizations—ranging from the mainstream environmental group, Sierra Club, to the more radical animal rights group, People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, to the Countryside Alliance, an organization in the United Kingdom working to stop a proposed ban on hunting with dogs—have elaborate Web sites devoted to informing visitors about the organizations and their work.

New tools have been developed to make it easier for users to manage the wealth of information on the Web. Really Simple Syndication (better known as RSS) is a software application that allows users to create what is known as a Web feed. These feeds allow users to see summaries with links to news stories, updated information on Web sites, or blogs that the user is tracking. Users can view these feeds through an aggregator service, such as Feedster, and these services are also embedded in updated versions of most Web browsers.

Discussion

Discussion and deliberation Web sites—made possible because of additional software that is embedded in HTML—promote political conversation among citizens and between citizens and elites. Some Web sites, such as Google groups, Usenet (accessed now through Google), and Yahoo! chat, offer spaces for political conversation. Other Web sites, such as E-thepeople.org, are designed specifically for political discussion, allowing users to rate the posts, creating a user-controlled discussion space. Some Web sites, such as Slashdot .org, an otherwise nonpolitical discussion space about information technologies, has a special section for political topics. Political blogs also often include an opportunity for readers to comment on the blog posts and to engage in conversation with others.

In general, political organizations and campaigns do not include applications on the site to enable citizens to talk with each other or with organizers. Generally, political campaigns, for example, view forums for political discussion as a risky addition to the Web sites. There are a few notable exceptions, such as the campaign of Howard Dean, a candidate in the Democratic primaries of 2004. Although he did not win any primaries and dropped out of the race, the campaign was heralded for using blogs to promote a sustained dialogue between the campaign and supporters.

Mobilization

Web sites are also used for mobilizing supporters to the social cause or political campaign. Involvement and mobilization tactics include inviting supporters to use secure online transactions to donate money, to send information to the campaign via feedback forms to indicate if the visitors would like to become more involved with the organization or campaign, to invite the visitors to sign up for e-mail alerts or newsletters, or to offer electronic petitions for visitors to sign and which are then delivered to politicians or other power elites. These tactics situate the visitors to the Web sites as not only information seekers but also as political actors who can participate in the political process in a variety of ways.

An example of organizational uses of the Web for involvement and mobilization is that of the environmental organization Environmental Defense Fund (EDF). The EDF, established in the 1960s in the United States to ban the chemical DDT, had no real membership until 1999 when its leaders shifted their organizational structure to harness the Web. The organization created a database-backed Web site to invite visitors to share their environmental concerns with the organization and to receive information about environmental issues from EDF by filling out a form on the Web site. Through this strategy the organization developed a list of over 120,000 people who expressed interest in the organization and who can be mobilized by the organization to write letters to members of Congress or to switch to compact fluorescent light bulbs to reduce the amount of electricity households use.

Political Activism

Political activism is another use to which the Web is put. It refers to the activities citizens can engage in to advocate for, or protest against, a political candidate, public policy, or social issue. The Web facilitates many of the traditional offline forms of political activism, including information dissemination (discussed earlier), and also opens up some new forms of political protest made possibly because of the communication technology, including new forms of political parody, "hactivism," and vote swapping, to name a few.

Because the Web is a digital medium, the name of each Web site must be unique. A user who misspells the URL of the desired Web site or who uses a .com rather than a .org designation will find themselves at an entirely different Web site from the one they seek. Some political activists have used this feature of the Web to engage in a kind of domain name activism for political parody. For example, in the 1996 U.S. presidential campaign Republican candidate Bob Dole created a Web site at the domain name www.dole96.com. His staff did not purchase other domain names and early in the campaign season a parody Web site was developed that capitalized on the confusion users have between .com and .org Web sites. They created a parody site at www.dole96.org that operated on associations noninformed citizens might have about Dole, such as that he was the head of the Dole pineapple company. The parody site included much of the same images and content from the official Dole Web site but altered them to make jokes at Dole's expense.

Citizen-activists can also engage in "hactivism," political motivated sabotage of Web spaces. Techniques include breaking into the server holding Web site content and altering it, and denial of service attacks that overload the servers by bombarding the servers with requests for content. A group calling itself the Yes Men engaged in a denial of service attack on the Dow Chemical Corporation to protest the company's refusal to pay additional reparations to victims of a 1984 chemical spell in Bhopal, India.

Another novel political use of the Web occurred in the 2000 election in the United States. In that election three candidates vied for office, Republican George Bush, Democrat Al Gore, and Green Party Ralph Nader. In October of that year, several Web sites were developed to allow Nader supporters to find Gore supporters, with the intention of swapping votes in the election. Voters in states likely to go to Bush and who had an inclination to vote for Gore could help out the Green party by agreeing to vote for Nader, while those Nader supporters in contested states could vote for Gore.

The range of political uses of the Web will become even larger as it evolves. Current trends suggest that more applications will be accessible through the World Wide Web, making the Web similar to a personal workspace with spreadsheet and word processing applications available through Web sites, such as Google. In addition, there is a push to make different applications on the Web work with each other, such as to have one's online photo diary, such as Yahoo!'s Flickr, work with a blogger site to easily combine user photos and blog posts. Such applications may make it easier for novice users to harness the Web for political ends and may be used creatively by organizations or activists for new forms of political expression and action.

One must recognize that the political uses of the Web are limited to those with access. There are still many without access, some of whom choose not to have access while others lack the skills, resources, or live in geographic locales without connectivity. For those with Internet access and an inclination to become politically active, however, the political uses to which the Web can be put are diverse and plentiful.

Jennifer Stromer-Galley

See also Blogs, Blogging; E-Mail, Political Uses; E-Voting; New Media Technologies; Web Campaigning

Further Readings

Berners-Lee, T. (2000). Weaving the Web: The original design and ultimate destiny of the World Wide Web. New York: HarperCollins.

Bimber, B. (2003). Information and American democracy: Technology in the evolution of political power. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Chadwick, A. (2006). Internet politics: States, citizens, and new communication technologies. New York: Oxford University Press.

Foot, K. A., & Schneider, S. (2006). Web campaigning. Cambridge: MIT Press.

Oates, S., Owen, D., & Gibson, R. K. (Eds.). (2006). The Internet and politics: Citizens, voters and activists. New York: Routledge.

Stromer-Galley, J. (2000). Online interaction and why candidates avoid it. Journal of Communication, 52(4), 111–132.

Warnick, B. (1998). Appearance or reality? Political parody on the Web in campaign '96. Critical Studies in Mass Communication, 15, 306–324.

Williams, A. P., & Tedesco, J. C. (Eds.). (2006). The Internet election: Perspectives on the Web in campaign 2004. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

YASSINE, ABDESSALAM (1928–)

Abdessalam (sometimes translated as Abdul Salam) Yassine, born in 1928, is the leader of Al-Adl Wal-Ihsan (Justice and Charity), one of the leading Islam-oriented political movements in Morocco. Founded in the early 1980s, Al-Adl Wal-Ihsan is popular among students, professionals, and Moroccan diasporas in Europe and North America.

Yassine has tried different political communication strategies to appeal and target a variety of groups inside and outside Morocco. Yassine's books have functioned as a channel for voicing Al-Adl Wal-Ihsan's perspectives and thus gain access to Moroccan elite publics. He initially chose the book medium as a platform for communicating with Moroccan intellectuals. Yassine's first book was published in 1972. He has published more than 20 books, and thus can be regarded as one of the most prolific ideologues in the Arab world.

In 1973, Yassine published a 114-page letter Al-Islām Au At-Túfān: Risāla Maftúha Ilā Malik Al-Maghrib (lslam or the Deluge), which earned him a 3-year imprisonment. After his release in 1978, he began preaching and was then banned from mosques. Yassine established his first periodical, Al-Jama'a (The Group) in February 1979. Al-Jama'a initially appeared quarterly and then turned into a monthly magazine and was banned in July 1984, after its 16th issue. The magazine's year of publication was suggestive because it coincided with the outbreak of the Iranian Revolution of 1978 to 1979.

The communication technologies of the second generation, especially cassettes and videos, have captured the imagination of Yassine since the early 1980s. With the growing popularity of Sheikh Abdel Hamid Kishk's cassettes among Arab masses, Yassine quickly realized the potential of what has come to be known as "Islamic small media" to target Moroccan masses.

Having been banned from preaching, in 1982 Yassine recorded more than 40 videos on the basis of his books. His cassettes were, and still are, very popular and widely circulated among his followers and supporters in Morocco, Europe, and North America. Yassine also used video films for internal communication.

The Internet gained momentum in Moroccan politics on January 28, 2000, when Yassine launched a Web site to release a memorandum (a critical letter), titled "to whom it concerns" in many European languages on the Internet, after the political regime prevented the independent magazines from publishing the full text of the memorandum. The conscious use of the Internet to modernize his political communication arsenal was announced in a press conference, which suggests the paramount importance Islamists place on new media. The personal Web site "Yassine Online" published many of his writings, including some of his books, which are technically banned in Morocco.

In the area of social software, Yassine is again in the vanguard. He employs podcasting to target the Moroccan youth, who have become familiar with these new tools.

Mohammed Ibahrine

Further Readings

Yassine, M. (2003). The Muslim mind on trial: Divine revelation versus secular rationalism. Iowa City, IA: Justice and Spirituality Publishing.

YELLOW JOURNALISM

Yellow journalism refers to the style of journalism that features scandals, sensationalism, and unethical or unprofessional practices by news media organizations or journalists. The term originated during the newspaper battles between Joseph Pulitzer's New York World and William Randolph Hearst's New York Journal. It was another newspaper, New York Press, that coined the term yellow journalism in 1897, apparently arising from The Yellow Kid comic strip that both papers featured in their Sunday editions. From 1895 to about 1989, these two papers were accused of sensationalizing news, exaggerating news, and, even, creating news to increase circulation, although both papers reported serious news as well.

In regard to the New York World, Pulitzer's strategy of low cost, high volume, and a mixture of crime stories, games, and investigative reporting made the paper the highest circulated in New York. Pulitzer's strong link to the Democratic Party also helped increase circulation. Other New York newspapers attacked the World because of its success and accused it of yellow journalism. Hearst founded the Journal to compete with the World and was very successful at luring reporters and consumers to the Journal. The Journal was also Democratic and sympathetic to immigrants, laborers, women, and the poor. Even though these two papers did feature war-hawk stories and inaccurate accounts on their front pages, the journalists who traveled to Cuba to report the war, including Hearst himself, have been credited with exposing the injustice and misrule of the Spanish over Cuba.

In modern times, the term yellow journalism is reserved for news media that use sensationalism, profiteering, propaganda, journalistic bias, or government pandering. Some critics accuse the media conglomerates of cowardly journalism with its focus on infotainment. However, most news media organizations today are respected for, and take pride in, factual, objective, balanced, and fair news reporting.

Kristen D. Landreville

See also Muckrakers, Muckracking; Tabloids

Further Readings

Campbell, W. J. (2000). Yellow journalism: The life of William Randolph Hearst. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

Campbell, W. J. (2001). Yellow journalism: Puncturing the myths, defining the legacies. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.

Cohen, D. (2000). Yellow journalism: Scandal, sensationalism, and gossip in the media. New York: Twenty-First Century Books.

YELTSIN, BORIS (1941–2007)

Boris Nikolayevich Yeltsin was born in the village of Butka and went down in history as the first freely elected president of Russia. Sworn in as president of the Russian Federation on July 10, 1991, Yeltsin remained in office for over 8 turbulent and decisive years of Russia's democratization and adoption of a free-market economy until he unexpectedly resigned on the eve of 2000 in favor of Prime Minister Vladimir Putin, making the former KBG spy acting president.

Yeltsin's early career saw numerous ups and downs. In 1955 he graduated from the Ural Polytechnic Institute in Sverdlovsk with a degree in construction. After joining the Communist Party in 1961, he occupied a number of local and central-level positions in construction and party administration, both in Sverdlovsk and Moscow, including first secretary of the Sverdlovsk regional committee, the experience he later likened to being "a god, a czar, a master of his province," and member of the USSR Supreme Council. Several years after his fall from grace within the Communist Party, the end of the 1980s saw his career accelerate. Following his nationally televised critical speech at a party conference in 1989, which well echoed the public mood of discontent with the government, he was elected delegate to the Congress of People's Deputies and began his steady rise to power.

Yeltsin earned the acclaim of the democratic world and secured his place in history during the August 1991 coup by communist hard-liners when he famously rallied his supporters to oppose the coup and demand the release of Gorbachev. The footage of Yeltsin mounting a tank outside the White House is one of the unforgettable political communication images of the 1990s and has earned a place in the world's textbooks.

Gorbachev's one-time protégé, Yeltsin saved the perestroika (restructuring) and glasnost (openness) champion's rule, only to end it several months later.

The years 1990 to 1991 mark the transition from the Soviet Union to independent Russia. In the 18 months following Yeltsin's resignation from the Communist Party in July 1990, he not only became president of Russia but also rendered the Soviet Union obsolete by negotiating (with the leaders of Ukraine and Belarus) the establishment on December 8, 1991, of the Commonwealth of Independent States behind Gorbachev's back. On December 25 of that year Gorbachev resigned as president of the Soviet Union that no longer existed.

Yeltsin's 8 years in power were mixed at best. He supported the free media more than his predecessors and his follower, he eagerly collaborated with the Western world, and he maintained friendly relations with the newly independent former Soviet satellites of Central and Eastern Europe. However, economic reform was slow and ineffective, and many of the monetary funds given to Russia by international institutions to help the process of democratization were squandered by his circle. Yeltsin also ordered the military invasion of Chechnya. His leadership was compromised by his erratic behavior, frequent disappearances, personal weaknesses, poor health, and firing his cabinet four times.

As a result, his chances for reelection in 1996 looked dim, reflected in his 35% of the vote during the first round of that election. However, with the financial help of influential business oligarchs and the expertise of American political communication consultants, he did manage to beat his communist challenger, Gennady Zyuganov, in the runoff election. Rumors of Yeltsin's poor health were managed with campaign TV images of Yeltsin vigorously dancing at rallies. Later that year he spent months in the hospital undergoing and recuperating from quadruple bypass surgery. At the time of his resignation, Yeltsin's popularity oscillated around 5%. In his televised resignation speech, Yeltsin asked forgiveness and apologized for his mistakes.

Married to Naina Yeltsin (born Naina Iosofovna Girina in 1932), he had two daughters, Yelena and Tatyana, and five grandchildren. After his resignation on December 31, 1999, he kept a low profile, enjoying his comfortable life and occasionally endorsing Putin as "the right choice" for Russia.

His health, however, was in decline from the time he resigned, and in April 2007, he died of heart failure at the age of 76.

Tomasz Płudowski

See also Gorbachev, Mikhail; Russia, Democratization and Media

Further Readings

Coleman, F. (1996). The decline and fall of Soviet empire: Forty years that shook the world, from Stalin to Yeltsin. New York: St. Martin's Press.

Felkay, A. (2002). Yeltsin's Russia and the West. Westport, CT: Praeger.

YOUTH VOTING

Youth voting typically refers to the voting trends of 18- to 24-year-olds in the United States. Citizens as young as 18 years old were first able to vote in U.S. federal elections in 1972 following the ratification of the 26th amendment to the U.S. Constitution on July 1, 1971, which lowered the voting age in state and federal elections to 18 years old (the voting age was set at 21 years old in the original U.S. Constitution). Since that time, youth voting has been closely tracked.

Voting numbers indicate that the electoral participation of young people in the United States was highest in 1972, when they were first given the right to vote, and has declined in years since then. There are several ways to measure the number of young people who voted in elections. The most widely reported measure of youth voter turnout is calculated by the U.S. Census Bureau. This measure is an estimate of the number of young voters calculated from a Census Bureau survey conducted immediately following a general election. That number is then divided by an estimate of the number of young citizens of the United States. While the Census Bureau process for generating estimates of youth voting has been debated, the data are the most consistent with regard to methodology and its reported numbers are similar to other reports of youth voting. Since the U.S. Census Bureau has used consistent methodology for generating its reports, the trends for youth voting can be reported from 1972 to present. The U.S. Census Bureau reported voting estimates for presidential election years only. Additionally, there are few consistent reports of young voter turnout prior to 1972 (when the minimum voting age in federal elections was 21), which limits comparisons prior to this time.

Overall, voter turnout for 18- to 24-year-olds in the United States has generally declined since 1972, with two exceptions, 1992 and 2004. In 1972, 52.1% of citizens aged 18 to 24 voted. The overall downward trend begins in 1976 with 44.4% turnout, followed by 43.4% turnout in 1980, 44.3% in 1984, and 39.9% in 1988. Youth voting took a dramatic turn in 1992 increasing to 48.6% turnout, the highest turnout since 1972. However, the trend was short-lived when, in 1996, the lowest turnout was recorded at 35.6%, and low turnout continued in 2000 with 36.1%. Another increase was seen in 2004 with 46.7% turnout among 18- to 24-year-olds. Given that the increase in young voter turnout in 1996 was for only one election cycle, many believe that the increase in 2004 will be just as short-lived.

However, more than 11.6 million American youth voted in the 2004 presidential election. Young voter turnout was at a 12-year high in the 2004 presidential election with a 46.7% turnout. The young voter demographic showed an 11% increase in voter turnout from 2000 to 2004—the largest increase of any age demographic during that time. Young voters also represented a larger share of the total votes cast in 2004 (9.3%) than in any of the previous 11 years. However, several reports leading up to the election indicated that approximately 80% of registered voters in this demographic intended to vote; therefore, the 46.7% young voter turnout on Election Day was extremely low when compared to the reported intent to vote.

Several reports of youth voting further divide turnout in this age group by gender and education. Generally, young women vote in higher numbers than do young men, with a 6% gender gap in the 2004 election (50% female, 44% male). A comparison of young people with at least some college education to those with only a high school education indicate that those with only a high school education vote in much lower numbers than their college-educated counterparts. For instance, in 2004, 18- to 24-year-old college citizen turnout was 59% compared to only 34% of 18- to 24-year-old non-college citizens. Additional comparisons of youth voter turnout to other age groups indicate that youth voting rates also fall below those of any other age group in the United States.

A number of nonprofit, governmental, and media organizations have been established with the purpose of civically engaging young people and increasing the youth vote in U.S. elections. Nonprofit organizations such as the Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning, the Harvard University Institute of Politics, the American Democracy Project, and Campus Compact are all dedicated to examining the lack of civic and political participation by young voters and have developed programs to increase their participation. Many of these organizations provide reports of youth voter turnout rates and conduct surveys of the attitudes of young people toward the political process. At the state level, the National Association of Secretaries of State has also initiated several programs to address the low levels of engagement among the young voter demographic. MTV also embraced the cause in the past few presidential general elections with its Rock the Vote campaign, focusing programming and advertising using celebrity endorsements to encourage youth voting with the slogan "Vote or Die."

The trend of low turnout among young voters is visible not only in the United States. In countries that do not have compulsory voting laws, turnout of young voters also lags behind that of older age demographics. In the United Kingdom, for instance, young voter turnout is much lower than all other age groups in parliamentary general elections despite higher overall voter turnout in the United Kingdom than in the United States. In recent Canadian elections, only about 22% of young voters (18- to 20-year-olds) participated compared to about 83% of those over 65 years old. Compulsory voting laws seem to have a positive influence on youth voting. In countries with compulsory voting laws, such as Australia, youth voter turnout is much higher than in noncompulsory countries. However, youth voting still lags behind voting rates of older demographics in Australia, with approximately 80% of young people (18 to 25 years old) turning out on Election Day compared to an overall 95% voter turnout.

Jenifer L. Lewis

See also American Voter, The; Rock the Vote; Voter Behavior

Further Readings

Bennett, S. W. (1997). Why young Americans hate politics, and what we should do about it. PS: Political Science and Politics, 30, 47–53.

Harvard University, Institute of Politics. (2000, April 20). Attitudes toward politics and public service: A national survey of college undergraduates. Available at http://www.iop.harvard.edu

Harvard University, Institute of Politics. (2005, April 19). Harvard Institute of Politics' survey of student attitudes: The global generation. Available at http://www.iop.harvard.edu

U.S. Census Bureau. (2004, November). Voting and registration supplement to the Current Population Survey. Available at http://www.census.gov

Z

Zhelev, Zhelyu (1935–)

Zhelyu Zhelev, Bulgarian philosopher and politician, is a former dissident and president of Bulgaria (1990 to 1997). He graduated with a degree in philosophy from Sofia University (1958) and earned a Ph.D. (1974) and a Doctor of Science (D.Sc.) degree (1988). As a philosopher, he worked in the field of ontology. He had membership in the Bulgarian Communist Party but was expelled in 1965 for questioning Leninist theory. He subsequently was expelled from Sofia (1966), spending 6 years without employment. In 1974 he started work at the Institute of Culture as head of the Culture and Personality Department (1977–1982).

Zhelev is the author of a number of books and publications. In 1967 he finished his book Fascism, which was published 15 years later. Three weeks after its publication the book was banned and withdrawn from the bookshops because of the obvious likeness between the fascist dictatorship and the Socialist state system. Zhelev took part in the organization of the Public Committee for Ecological Protection of the Town of Rouse in 1988. In 1989 he became founding member and chair of the Club for Support of Glasnost and Perestroyka (Restructuring), which boosted him to the position of chair of the Coordinating Council of the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF).

The UDF was founded in 1989, after the overthrow of the communist leader Todor Zhivkov. It was a coalition of a group of nongovernmental organizations and restored former parties aimed at discarding the communist totalitarian system and establishing democracy in Bulgaria. UDF formed two governments—one headed by Filip Dimitrov (1991–1992) and one by Ivan Kostov (1997–2001)—and had two presidents from its ranks: Zhelyu Zhelev (1990–1997) and Petar Stoyanov (1997–2001). In 1997 UDF organized protests against the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP) government. The members of Parliament (MPs) were besieged in the Parliament by the social unrest and the parliament building itself was violated. This brought about preliminary parliamentary elections won with a convincing majority by UDF. In a short period of time UDF was transformed into a party, but the centrifugal forces prevailed and it was fragmented once more into small formations that weakened the right wing in the country. UDF is an associated member of the European People's Party.

Zhelyu Zhelev was elected MP to the 7th Grand National Assembly in 1990. On August 1, 1990, the assembly elected him president. During his term of office, the BCP Party House was set on fire (1990) and the New Constitution of Bulgaria was adopted (1991). In January 1992 Zhelyu Zhelev stepped into office as the first democratically elected Bulgarian president and served the full 5-year term. However, in 1996 he was defeated in the primary elections by the new UDF candidate Petar Stoyanov. In order to keep UDF intact, Zhelev withdrew from the contest.

Currently, he is one of the patrons of the Liberal International. He also presides over his own foundation, which was established in 1997. Zhelev was the initiator and president of the Balkan Political Club, a union of former political leaders from Southeastern Europe.

Lilia Raycheva

See also Bulgaria, Democratization

Further Readings

Zhelev, Z. (1982). Fascism. Sofia, Bulgaria: Narodna Mladej.
Zhelev, Z. (2000, February). Ten years after. Philosophical Alternatives Magazine, pp. 69–76.

ZHIVKOV, TODOR (1911–1998)

Long-time Communist leader of Bulgaria, Todor Zhivkov was the longest serving among all Eastern Bloc leaders. A printer by trade, Zhivkov was a member of Parliament for 35 years (1954–1989) and first secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party for 9 years (1962–1971). He served as prime minister and for 18 years (1971–1989) was the head of state.

Todor Zhivkov's career is related to the general development of Bulgaria when the country fell into the zone of influence of the Soviet Union under the Yalta treaties (1945). After the coup on September 9, 1944, the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP), supported by the Red Army advancing into the country, quickly managed to take absolute political and economic power. A totalitarian regime was imposed under communist supremacy, legitimized by the Constitution of the People's Republic of Bulgaria of 1947, known as Dimitrov's Constitution. The multiparty sector was reduced to only one other party besides the BCP, the Bulgarian Agrarian People's Union, which in fact was a satellite of the ruling BCP. The political opposition was routed. Many paid with their lives, others were interned; a third group chose to emigrate. After the death of Prime Minister (serving from 1946 to 1949) Georgi Dimitrov and the chairman of the National Assembly Vasil Kolarov (serving from 1945 to 1949), both prominent figures in the Communist International, Todor Zhivkov began his smooth ascent up the party hierarchy. In 1954 he became first secretary of the CC of the BCP. Since 1981 that post was renamed secretary general of the CC of the BCP. After initiating the April plenary session of the CC of the BCP (1956), which marked the beginning of eradication of the personality cult of the party leader Vulko Chervenkov, Todor Zhivkov, in turn, began to concentrate ever more power in his hands by permanently occupying the posts of prime minister (1962–1971) and president of the State Council—that is, head of the state (1971–1989).

Thus, with Zhivkov's active and leading participation, and guided by its major political goal, "the building of communism," BCP established dictatorship of the proletariat in the country (the rule of "political expedience," not of the law) and carried out a series of government programs: (1) nationalization of large-scale urban and rural estates; (2) industrialization (resulting in the growth of industry over the next 40 years); (3) collectivization (coercive cooperation of private farm producers and setting up of consolidated agriculture); (4) social policy (free education, free health care, early retirement, 3-year paid maternity leave, full employment of all active population); (5) 40-hour work week; (6) hefty subsidizing of prices of staples, children's foods, and clothes, culture, education, and transportation; and (7) the so-called cultural revolution (development of large-scale but ideologically slanted art activities).

The rule of BCP was tightly bound up with the policy of the Soviet Union and accompanied by ideological and religious intolerance. Thus, for instance, during the so-called Regeneration Process (1984–1989) the Bulgarian Turks and Mohammedans were forced to change their characteristic Muslim names and rites into Christian ones.

On November 10, 1989, Todor Zhivkov was removed from the post of the BCP secretary general. The following week saw his removal from the position of the head of the state, and at the plenary session of the CC of the BCP (December 11–13, 1989), he was expelled from the BCP and brought to justice. After his death all allegations were dropped.

Lilia Raycheva

Further Readings

Zhivkov, T. (1997). Memoirs. Sofia, Bulgaria: SIV.

ZIEGLER, RONALD

See PRESS SECRETARY, WHITE HOUSE

Index

Aal-Kasim, Faisal, 1:23–24
AAPC. See American Association of Political Consultants
AAPOR (American Association of Public Opinion Research), 1:382, 1:391
AARP (American Association of Retired Persons), 1:1–2, 1:20
- grassroots networking of, 1:1
- lobbying efforts of, 1:1
- National Policy Council of, 1:1
- nonpartisan policy of, 1:1
- political advertising by, 2:566
- political influence of, 1:1

ABC
- Fox News and, 1:253
- Kennedy assassination and, 1:374
- Nightline on, 1:138, 2:514–515
- nominating conventions and, 1:138
- presidential debates and, 1:160, 1:161
- Geraldo Rivera and, 2:721
- George Stephanopoulos and, 2:763
- 20/20 and, 1:333, 2:721
- Vanderbilt Television News Archive and, 2:806
- Barbara Walters and, 1:161

Abdullah II, 1:2
- Jordan media liberation and, 1:2
- King Hussein and, 1:2
- press freedom, media policies of, 1:2
- regional instability and, 1:2

Abortion, 1:2–4
- agenda setting, framing theory and, 1:17–18
- attribute agenda setting and, 1:18
- authoritarianism and, 1:46
- female voting issue and, 1:264
- issues concerning, 1:2
- Roe v. Wade and, 1:3, 1:264
- sociopolitical discourse and, 1:3
- state laws regarding, 1:2–3
- Supreme Court decisions regarding, 1:3

Abramoff, Jack, 1:410
Accession Act of the European Union, 1:116
Ackerman, Bruce, 1:168
ACT (America Coming Together), 2:559, 2:567
Adams, J. B., 2:507
Adams, John
- State of the Union Address of, 2:707, 2:761

Adams, John Quincy, 1:135, 2:638
Ad Council, 2:747–748
Adenauer, Konrad, 1:4
- national censorship of, 1:4
- Elisabeth Noelle-Neumann and, 2:517
- personalization of politics of, 1:4
- political communication of, 1:4
- PR organization of, 1:4
- Spiegel affair and, 2:756
- "tea discussions" media relations of, 1:4

Administrative Procedure Act of 1946, 1:261
Adorno, Theodor W., 1:45
- critical theory and, 1:143, 1:144, 1:145

Advertising. See Advocacy advertising; Negative advertising; Political advertising; Women candidates, advertising
Advocacy advertising, 1:4–8
- Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:6
- Buckley v. Valeo and, 1:6, 1:69, 1:233
- candidate advertising vs., 1:5
- express vs. issue advocacy and, 1:6, 1:57, 1:69–70, 2:426–427, 2:429, 2:559, 2:566
- 527 groups and, 1:5, 1:6–7, 2:567
- "Harry and Louise" ads and, 1:5, 1:7
- health care reform debates and, 1:5, 1:7, 2:559, 2:566
- impact of, 1:7–8
- legislators, voters to take action and, 2:559
- rise of, 1:5
- social marketing and, 2:747–748
- soft advertising (China) and, 1:99
- soft-money campaign finance and, 1:6, 1:69
- See also Political advertising

Ad watch, 1:8–10
- David Broder and, 1:67–68, 1:363
- "Eisenhower Answers America" 1952 ad and, 1:8–9, 1:205 (figure), 2:561
- L. B. Johnson's 1964 "Daisy Girl" spot and, 1:9
- 1996 senate race ad and, 1:9
- political advertising focus of, 1:8, 1:363
- TechnoDistortions focus of, 1:9, 1:363
- World Wide Web use by, 1:9–10

Affirmative action, 1:10–11
- DeFunis v. Odegaard and, 1:11
- Gratz v. Vollinger and, 1:11
- "Philadelphia Order" and, 1:10
- The Regents of the University of California v. Bakke and, 1:11 reverse discrimination and, 1:10, 1:11 states' ban on, 1:11

Wygant v. Jackson Board of Education and, 1:11
Afghanistan
embedded journalists and, 1:211, 2:721
Soviet troops withdrawal from, 1:278
Tampa incident and, 2:780–781
women in, 1:110
AFL-CIO, 2:559, 2:566, 2:798
African Americans, role in politics
Black Power and, 1:109
Shirley Chisholm and, 1:102–103
Bill Clinton and, 1:112
Congressional Black Caucus and, 2:463
Democratic Party and, 1:175
electoral politics and, 2:463–464
Great Depression and, 1:175
Hill–Thomas hearings and, 1:306–307
Willie Horton ad (1988 election) and, 1:194, 2:485, 2:561, 2:695, 2:838–839
Jesse Jackson and, 1:357, 2:695
Barbara Jordan and, 1:359
liberal nationalism and, 2:693–694
local elections success of, 2:694
Malcolm X and, 1:109
media's unbalanced racial coverage and, 1:212
Carol Moseley Braun and, 2:470–471
NAACP and, 2:479–480
Negritude movement and, 2:742
Barack Obama and, 1:58, 1:110, 2:463, 2:519
political coalitions and, 2:464
Colin Powell and, 2:720 prejudice, discrimination against, 2:461 race in politics and, 2:692–695
racist electoral communications and, 2:463
Condoleezza Rice and, 2:719–720
social movements and, 2:462–463 symbolic racism, modern racism and, 2:693–694 visibility of, 2:461
voting behavior of, 1:95, 2:464, 2:694, 2:695
J. C. Watts, 2:826–827
Watts riots and, 2:827
See also Civil rights movement; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Minorities, role in politics; Race in politics; Racism; specific individual
AFSCME. See American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees Agenda melding, 1:11–12 agenda groups and, 1:12
agenda setting and, 1:12–19
audience power and, 1:11–12 political opinion focus on, 1:12 theory of cognitive dissonance and, 1:12
See also Agenda setting
Agenda setting, 1:12–19
agenda building and, 1:13, 1:18 agenda melding and, 1:11–12 AIDS example of, 1:185–186 attribute framing and, 1:18 attribute priming and, 2:654 attribute salience and, 1:17 of attributes of objects vs. objects, 1:13, 1:19
blogs, blogging and, 1:60–61
comprehensive model of, 1:14 (figure) cultivation theory and, 1:17
Democratic National Committee and, 1:174 dependent, independent variables in, 2:587 diffusion of innovations and, 1:184–185 energy shortage example of, 1:15 explanation of, 1:15–16
framing theory and, 1:17–18, 1:256–257
gatekeeping theory and, 1:17, 1:18, 1:61
government communication and, 1:279–280
Doris Graber's work in, 2:656
The Handbook of Political Communication (Nimmo & Sanders) and, 1:295
historical developments in, 1:13–15
Hong Kong Handover and, 1:310
interpersonal political communication and, 1:348 issue salience polls and, 1:16–17
knowledge gap and, 1:383
Walter Lippmann's work in, 1:16, 1:251, 1:322, 1:408–409, 2:585–586 long-term agenda trends and, 1:19
Maxwell McComb's work in, 2:425–426 measuring agendas and, 1:16–17 media agenda concept and, 1:12, 1:18, 1:184–185 media agenda measurement and, 1:17 media dependency theory and, 1:182 media power to set agendas and, 1:11, 2:425–426, 2:640
mediatization and, 2:448
metacoverage and, 2:453
"need for orientation" concept and, 1:16
news agenda and, 2:499, 2:508
news magazines and, 1:332
newspapers vs. television and, 1:15–16 news values concept and, 1:12 obtrusive vs. unobtrusive issues and, 1:16 orientation need and, 2:524 policy agenda and, 1:185
political information processing and, 2:585
political journalism and, 1:364 political predispositions and, 1:157
political public relations and, 2:679
in political revolutions, 2:716 presidential elections and, 1:13–15, 1:17, 2:420
priming and, 2:653–655
professionalization of political communication and, 1:172 public agenda and, 1:13–15, 1:18, 1:185, 2:420, 2:426, 2:508 public agenda and, long-term trends of, 1:19
public opinion and, 2:675–676
real-world events affecting, 1:14 related concepts and, 1:17–19
"second-level agenda setting and," 1:13
spiral of silence theory and, 1:17
State of the Union Address and, 2:761–762 status conferral theory and, 1:17 substance abuse example of, 1:15

Television in Politics (Blumler & McQuail) and, 2:432, 2:783 theory of salience transmission and, 1:12 time lag in, 1:18–19
two-step flow communications model and, 1:19, 2:541–542
Vietnam War example of, 1:15
David Weaver's work on, 2:827–828 what to think about focus of, 1:12
See also Agenda melding; Presidential communication; Public agendas Aging and politics, 1:19–20
AARP and, 1:1, 1:20
demographic study of, 1:180 disengagement theory and, 1:19–20 homogeneity fragmentation and, 1:20 political information efficacy and, 2:583
radio talk show audience and, 2:778 senior power model of political impact and, 1:19, 1:20
statistics regarding, 1:19, 1:95
voter turnout and, 1:37, 1:241
Agism. See Aging and politics
Agnew, Spiro, 1:20–21
Patrick Buchanan and, 1:68
early political career of, 1:20
journalists and, 1:251
Nixon's vice president and, 1:20–21, 2:477, 2:516
resignation of, 1:21, 1:129
Vietnam War and, 1:21
AIDS
George and Laura Bush and, 1:75
Cinton's post-presidency work on, 1:114 knowledge ceiling effects regarding, 1:384 media, public, and policy agendas regarding, 1:185–186 rhetoric humanization of, 1:41, 1:185–186 Ailes, Roger, 1:21
election media jobs of, 1:21
television career of, 1:21
Air America Radio, 1:258, 1:258*
Al-Asad, Hafiz, 1:21–22
"The Corrective Movement" and, 1:21 mobilizing media system used by, 1:21–22 pan-Arabis policies of, 1:22
Socialist system under, 1:22
Albright, Madeleine, 1:155
Alexander, Jeffrey, 1:294
Alfonsín, Raúl, 1:22–23
democratization and, 1:22, 1:39–40 economy mismanagement by, 1:23 human rights and, 1:22, 1:23
Carlos Menem and, 1:23
political spin of, 1:22–23
Algeria, 1:63–64
Alien and Sedition Act, 2:504, 2:538
Al Jazeera television, 1:23, 1:23–25
"Al Jazeera effect" and, 1:273
Arab political culture focus of, 1:24
CNN and, 1:114
content analysis of, 1:24
Control Room (Noujaim, Dir.) and, 1:242 controversial topics on, 1:23–24
criticism of, 1:24
democracy reported on, 1:24
Emir al-Thani and, 1:23, 1:24 financial and organizational frameworks of, 1:24
founding of, 1:23
Iraq War coverage and, 1:352
Israel and United States criticism on, 1:24 political focus of, 1:24 popularity of, 1:24
Qatar and, 1:24
September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and, 1:23, 1:24, 2:799 terrorism mouthpiece reputation of, 1:24
United States Information Agency and, 2:799
Allende, Salvador, 1:25
Chilean Way to Socialism and, 1:25
Marxist-Communist ideology of, 1:25 suicide of, 1:25
Augusto Pinochet Ugarte and, 1:25
Allport, Floyd, 2:551, 2:675
Allport, Gordon, 2:484
The Psychology of Radio (Cantril & Allport), 2:665–666
All's Fair: Love, War, and Running for President (Carville & Matalin), 1:88, 2:422
All the President's Men (Bernstein & Woodward) book, 1:26
film from, 1:26
The Final Days sequel to, 1:26 illegal campaign practices and, 1:26 movie version of, 1:26 trails of money and secrecy in, 1:26 unnamed sources and, 1:26
Washington Post Pulitzer Prize and, 1:26
Watergate break-in, scandal and, 1:26
All the President's Men (Pakula, Dir.) film, 1:26, 1:241
Almond, G. A., 2:576–577, 2:580
Al-Qaeda, 1:24, 2:785, 2:787, 2:799
Al-Sadat, Anwar, 1:26–27
assassination of, 1:27
as Egypt's president, 1:27 peace initiative of, 1:368 political activism of, 1:26–27
Altemeyer, Bob, 1:45–46
Alterman, Eric, 1:118
Alternative media in politics (AMP), 1:27–31 advocacy journalism and, 1:27
agenda setting and, 1:13
banner ads and, 1:52–53
big-character posters (China) and, 1:55–56
blogs, blogging and, 1:59–61, 1:60*
broadcasting and, 1:29 broadcast regulation and, 1:28
citizen journalism and, 1:105–106
citizens affected by, 1:30–31
The Daily Show with Jon Stewart, 1:29, 1:155–156, 1:313–314, 1:363, 2:731, 2:750 development of, 1:27–28
Fairness Doctrine and, 1:28, 1:122, 1:213, 1:227–228, 1:333, 1:407
information technology in politics and, 1:334–335
infotainment and, 1:335–336

Internet resources and, 1:29 mainstream media bias and, 1:27 newspaper precursor to, 1:28 1992 presidential election and, 1:29
political impact of, 1:30 politics, economics, technology, audience impact on, 1:28, 1:30 radio precursor to, 1:28 spectrum scarcity concept and, 1:28 talk shows and, 1:29, 1:30, 1:333
Telecommunications Act and, 1:28
Web logs and, 1:13, 1:29–30
See also Blogs, blogging; Information technology in politics; Internet; New media technologies; Talk radio, political; Talk shows, television; World Wide Web, political uses; specific radio, television program
Al-Thani, Emir, 1:23, 1:24
Altheide, David L., 1:142
America Coming Together (ACT), 2:559, 2:567
American Association for Public Opinion Research, 2:800
American Association of Political Consultants (AAPC), 1:31–32, 1:215
James Carville and, 1:88
Code of Professional Ethics and, 1:31
growth of, 1:134
Joseph Napolitan, 2:481
oral history project of, 1:31–32
Pollie Awards of, 1:31 services of, 1:31
American Association of Public Opinion Research (AAPOR), 1:382, 1:391
American Association of Retired Persons (AARP). See AARP
American Business Media Guide, 1:199
American Civil Liberties Union, 2:521
American Coming Together, 1:6
American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), 1:6
American Indian Movement, 2:663, 2:694
Americanization, 1:32–33
American-style campaigning and, 1:33–35
Argentina democratization process and, 1:40
Tony Blair (Britain) and, 1:59
Willy Brandt (Germany) and, 1:65, 2:629
campaigners in other countries and, 1:32–33 as descriptive paradigm, 1:32
explanation of, 1:32
Giscard d'Estaing (France) and, 1:268–269
Turgut Özal (Turkey) and, 2:525 professionalization, modernization vs., 1:32–33, 2:656–657 voter unpredictability and, 1:32
American Journalism Review, 2:452
American Life Project, 1:60 American Medical Association health care reform issue and, 1:5
political advertising by, 2:566
American National Election Studies
The American Voter (Campbell, Miller, Converse, & Stokes), 1:35 political efficacy studies and, 2:579–580 political knowledge definition and, 2:593–594
Reagan Iran-Contra scandal and, 2:653
Survey Research Center and, 2:768
American Political Science Association (APSA), 1:96, 1:281, 2:571–572, 2:730
The American President, 1:114
American Society for Magazine Editors, 1:199
American Society of Newspaper Editors, 1:261, 2:674, 2:748
American-style campaigning, 1:33–35
Americanization concept and, 1:31–32
Tony Blair (Britain) and, 1:59
Willy Brandt (Germany) and, 1:65
campaign finance and, 1:34 candidate issue ownership and, 1:34 image vs. issues focus and, 1:34
impact of, 1:34–35
issue orientation in political advertising and, 1:34 modernization, professionalization and, 1:34, 2:656–657 negative campaigning and, 1:34
old vs. new style campaigning and, 1:33–34 political-marketing system and, 1:34 political posters and, 2:626–630
targeting voters focus of, 1:34
American Voter*, *The (Campbell, Miller, Converse, & Stokes), 1:35–36
American National Election Studies and, 1:35, 2:768
"causality funnel" concept and, 2:815 electoral process studied in, 1:35, 2:767 electoral systems and, 2:419 funnel of causality and, 2:581 long- vs. short-term factors and, 1:35, 2:815 1956 election vote and, 1:35 party identification and, 1:35–36, 2:815 random interview methodology of, 1:35 sociopsychological dimension factors and, 1:35, 2:815
Survey Research Center and, 2:767, 2:815
America (the Book): A Citizen's Guide to Democracy Inaction (Stewart et al.), 1:155
Amnesty International, 1:54, 2:612
AMP. See Alternative media in politics (AMP)
Anderson, John, 1:161
ANES. See American National Election Studies
Annenberg School of Communication, University of Pennsylvania, 1:10
Annual Report on American Journalism, 1:115
Anti-Mason party, 1:135
AOL Time-Warner, 1:99
Apathy, voter, 1:36–37
age factors and, 1:37
cynicism vs., 1:36, 1:37, 1:311, 2:592, 2:810
horserace coverage and, 1:311, 2:486
negative advertising, campaigning and, 1:36, 2:486 political alienation and, 1:36 political efficacy and, 1:36
political involvement and, 2:592–593 television information source and, 1:37 turnout rates and, 1:36, 1:37
videomalaise theory and, 2:810
youth voter and, 1:37

Apologia, 1:38
Ted Kennedy example of, 1:38, 1:370 moral choices, ethical challenges and, 1:38
Nixon Checkers Speech and, 1:38, 1:97–98, 2:516, 2:712
Nixon Watergate scandal and, 2:633 self-defense, self-justification and, 1:38
APSA. See American Political Science Association
Arab press, television
Al Jazeera television and, 1:23,* 1:23–25
Syrian Hafiz Al-Asad and, 1:21–22
See also Al Jazeera television
Arab States Broadcasting Union (ASBU), 1:24 Arafat, Yasser, 1:38–39
early years of, 1:38
First and Second Intifadas and, 1:39
Israel and, 2:691
Nobel Prize and, 1:38, 1:39, 2:691
Oslo Accords and, 1:39
PLO and, 1:38–39
Archive of Women's Political Communication, 1:87
Argentina democratization process, role of the media, 1:39–41
Raúl Alfonsín and, 1:22–23, 1:39–40
Americanization, political communication in, 1:40 broadcasting law reform and, 1:40 censorship prior to, 1:39
Fernando De la Rua and, 1:40
Falklands-Malvinas War and, 1:228 media, telephone companies merger and, 1:40
Carlos Menem and, 1:40, 2:450–451
Juan Perón and, 2:542
María Eva Duarte de Perón and, 2:542–543 presidential successions in, 1:40 Radical Civil Union (UCR) and, 1:39–40 scandals, power abuse and, 1:40 television role in, 1:40
Argumentation, political, 1:41–42 broadcast focus in, 1:42
cracker barrel democracy and, 1:42
deliberation and, 1:167–168
Great Debates format and, 1:41, 1:42 influencing others' thoughts, actions and, 1:42
Kathleen Hall Jamieson study of, 1:358
logocentricty concept and, 1:41
New England town meeting format and, 1:41 political debate vs., 1:41 political discourse vs., 1:42
presidential debates and, 1:159–165
professionalization of political communication and, 1:172 symbolic interaction element of, 1:41 television element in, 1:42
two-way process element of, 1:41 virtual democracy, media technology and, 1:41
Aristotle, 1:42–45
active citizenship training and, 2:616
Alexander the Great and, 1:42 artistic vs. inartistic proofs and, 1:43 character, human emotions roles in persuasion and, 1:44 Cicero and, 2:717–718
citizenship and, 1:44–45 deductive vs. inductive reasoning and, 1:43–44 deliberative, ceremonial, forensic, epideictic rhetoric and, 1:44, 2:717 enthymeme vs. syllogism and, 1:44
"Five Classical Canons of Oration" and, 1:44 four forms of political constitutions and, 1:44 free society maintenance and, 1:41 good life focus of, 1:43, 1:44, 1:45, 2:717 human happiness, flourishing focus of, 1:43 liberal democracy, rule of law and, 1:45 moral education, active citizenship and, 2:617
Peripatetic School of, 1:43
Plato and, 1:42, 1:44
political argumentation and, 1:41, 2:717 political system for human flourishing focus of, 1:43 Politics work of, 1:42, 1:43, 2:717 pragmatic empiricism of, 1:43
public opinion and, 2:675
regime types and, 1:45 revolution causes, avoidance and, 1:45 rhetoric vs. dialectic and, 1:43 Rhetoric work of, 1:42, 1:43–44, 2:717
utopist states and, 1:44–45
Arnett, Peter, 1:114
Arsenio Hall, 1:27, 1:114, 1:155, 2:779
ASBU (Arab States Broadcasting Union), 1:24
Ashcroft, John, 1:146
"Ashley's Story" ad, 1:7, 2:567
Asia Pacific Association of Political Consultants, 1:31
Association for Education in Journalism and Mass Communication, 1:96
Atkin, Charles, 1:295
Atlanta Constitution, 1:332
Atwater, Lee, 2:441, 2:711
Audience frames, 1:254–255
Auer, J. Jeffery, 1:42
Australia
character assassinations in, 1:82
debates in, 1:164
direct action protest in, 1:187–188, 2:418
e-government initiatives in, 1:201
Pauline Hanson and, 1:295–296, 2:780–781
mass nonviolent protest in, 2:418
Tampa incident and, 2:780–781
youth voting in, 2:856
See also Direct action protest, Australia; Mass nonviolent protest, Australia
Austria
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
Jörg Haider and, 1:293–294, 2:625
Bruno Kreisky and, 1:385–386
Wolfgang Schüssel and, 2:735–736
Franz Vranitzky and, 2:818
Waldheim Affair and, 2:819–820
Authoritarianism, 1:45–47 anti-Semitism explained through, 1:45 authoritarian aggression, submission and, 1:46 authoritarian theory of the press and, 1:250, 2:509, 2:641

of José María Aznar (Spain), 1:47–48 conservative attitudes and, 1:46 conventionalism and, 1:46
Dogmatism Scale and, 1:46
Adolf Hitler and, 1:307–308
inequality acceptance and, 1:46
Evo Morales (Bolivia) and, 2:470
Muhammed cartoon events and, 2:475
political beliefs, systems structure and, 1:45
The Prince (Machiavelli) and, 2:413
Jerry Rawlings (Ghana) and, 2:700–701
resistance to change and, 1:46 right-, left-wing authoritarianism and, 1:45–46 theory of social dominance and, 1:46
See also Authoritarian responsibility theory of the press
Authoritarian Personality (Adorno), 1:45
Authoritarian responsibility theory of the press, 1:250, 2:509, 2:541, 2:647
Aznar, José María, 1:47–48
authoritarianism of, 1:47
Euskadi Ta Askatasuna (ETA) and, 1:47
People's Party and, 1:47
public image problems of, 1:47

Bachelet Jeria, Michelle, 1:49–50
early years of, 1:49
media popularity of, 1:49–50
political career of, 1:49–50
Bad News From Israel (Glasgow Media Group), 1:270
Bad News (Glasgow Media Group), 1:270
Bailey, Doug, 2:441
Bain, Ralph M., 1:135
Baker, Ella, 1:109
Baker, Nancy Kassebaum, 1:87
Baker, Ray Stannard, 2:473
Bakke, Allan, 1:11
Balch, George, 2:580
Bales, Robert F., 1:229 Ballot initiatives, 1:50–52 campaign advertising role in direct democracy and, 1:50–52 campaign spending effect on, 1:50 informative advertising and, 1:50–51 interest groups and, 1:51
statistics regarding, 1:50
television advertising and, 1:51–52 Ball-Rokeach, Sandra, 1:181–182
Bandura, Albert, 1:45
Banner ads, 1:52–53
goal of, 1:52–53
Internet Advertising Bureau and, 1:52 political use of, 1:53 success measures of, 1:53
Baraistanet.com citizen news blog, 1:106
Barrett, Cameron, 1:59
Barthold v. Germany (European Court of Human Rights), 1:216
The Battle for Public Opinion (Lang & Lang), 1:391
Baxter, Leone, 1:133, 2:441
Bay of Pigs incident, 1:89, 1:289
Bayosphere citizen news blog, 1:106
BBC
BBC World Television News and, 1:99, 1:114
Churchill and, 1:104
Charles de Gaulle and, 1:167
Glasgow Media Group and, 1:270
London underground bombings, British media and, 2:786–787
party election broadcasts and, 2:533–534
BCRA. See Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act
Becker, Lee, 1:295
Beckley, John, 1:133
Belgium, 1:214
Bella, Ahmed Ben, 1:63
Ben Ali, Zine el-Abdine, 1:53–54
Democratic Constitutional Rally and, 1:53 international public relations of, 1:54 journalist self-censorship and, 1:53 media control and used by, 1:53
Web site use by, 1:54
Benjamin, Walt, 1:145
Bennett, James Gordon, 2:504
Bennett, W. Lance
gatekeeping in news selection process, 1:361
News: The Politics of Illusion and, 1:329, 2:495
Bentsen, Lloyd, 1:194
Berelson, Bernard, 1:407
Berger, Charles, 1:96
Berlin Wall construction of, 1:371–372 fall of, 1:72, 1:114, 1:184, 1:273, 2:442, 2:443, 2:451
Berlusconi, Silvio, 1:54–55
Forza Italia party and, 1:54 market-oriented political communication of, 1:54–55, 1:82 personal image of, 1:54, 1:82 private and public media power combination and, 1:172 publishing industry control by, 1:54, 2:649 television campaign of, 1:54
Bernas, Edward, 2:441
Bernstein, Carl, 1:26, 1:125, 2:516, 2:825–826
Bias. See Media bias
Big-character posters, China, 1:26, 1:55–56, 1:100
Cultural Revolution and, 1:55
Democracy Wall movement and, 1:55 handwritten protest posters and, 1:55 small-character posters and, 1:55
social movements and, 1:55
Tiananmen Square movement and, 1:55 bin Laden, Osama, 1:24, 1:74, 1:243, 2:487, 2:784, 2:799 Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (BCRA), 1:56–58
advocacy advertising and, 1:6, 2:426–427
Buckley v. Valeo, 1:6, 1:56, 1:69–70, 1:233
electioneering communications and, 1:57, 2:427, 2:562
Federal Election Campaign Act and, 1:233
Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. and, 1:57, 1:70, 1:234, 2:428–429
527 groups and, 1:57, 2:567, 2:749
free airtime and, 1:258–260
hard money and, 1:56–57
McConnell v. FEC and, 1:57, 1:58, 1:234, 2:426–429
Millionaire's Amendment provision of, 1:57–58, 1:234 minors' political contributions and, 1:58, 2:427
1996, 2000 elections and, 1:56

political action committees (PACs) and, 2:556–557, 2:566 radio disclaimer ads and, 1:58
Randall v. Sorrell and, 2:428 soft money focus of, 1:6, 1:56–57, 1:259, 2:426–427, 2:562, 2:567, 2:749 television disclaimer ads and, 1:58
Birmingham, Ernest F., 1:252
Bitzer, Lloyd, 1:295
BizNet, 2:557
Blackmun, Justice, 1:3
Black Muslims, 2:462
Black Panthers, 2:694
Black Power, 1:109, 2:663
Blair, Jayson, 2:453
Blair, Tony, 1:59
American consultants to, 1:59
Alastair Campbell and, 1:130
Bill Clinton and, 1:112
Hong Kong and, 1:309
identifying with voters by, 1:82
Iraq crisis and, 1:59, 1:131
Labour Party and, 1:59, 1:112, 1:130, 1:390
Peter Mandelson and, 2:415–416, 2:757
media instrumentation by, 1:172 public relations state expansion by, 1:59
Blank Panther Party, 2:462
Blogs, blogging, 1:59–61, 1:60
agenda setting and, 1:13, 1:60–61
as alternative media in politics, 1:27, 1:29–30, 2:485, 2:490, 2:671
Michelle Bachelet Jeria and, 1:49–50
banner ads and, 1:53
bloggers, blog readers and, 1:60
by David Cameron, 1:82 campaign blogs and, 1:60
citizen journalism and, 1:105–106
DailyKos and, 1:27, 1:29–30, 2:671 definitions of, 1:59–60 of Democratic National Committee, 1:174
e-government and, 1:203
Fox News and, 1:254
“gatewatchers” and, 1:61, 2:490
Hungarian election tool and, 1:318
media consultants and, 2:441
nominating conventions and, 1:138
Pew Internet studies of, 2:550 political consulting and, 1:154 political gossip and, 1:83 political scandals and, 2:613
statistics regarding, 1:60, 2:490
Joe Trippi and, 2:792
Blumler, Jay G., 1:61–62
American style campaigning and, 1:32
collaborative communication work of, 1:62, 1:124 communication theory, research work of, 1:62, 1:124, 1:177, 1:295 Crisis of Public Communication work of, 1:62
European Journal of Communication and, 1:62
Elihu Katz and, 1:368
Television in Politics and, 2:432, 2:782
“uses and gratification” work of, 1:61, 1:62, 2:432, 2:585, 2:800–803
Bolivia cultural imperialism in, 1:150* freedom of the press in, 2:470
Che Guevara and, 1:89
Evo Morales and, 2:469–470
Bongrand, Michel, 1:214
Boorstin, Daniel J., 1:325, 2:664
Bormann, Ernest G., 1:62–63, 1:229
fantasy theme analysis and, 1:62–63
The Force of Fantasy work of, 1:63 symbolic convergence theory and, 1:62–63, 2:768–769
Boston Globe, 1:332
Boulding, Kenneth, 1:322
Boumedienne, Houari, 1:63
Bounded reality theory, 1:255
Bourdieu, Pierre, 1:294
Bouteflika, Abdelaziz, 1:63–64
Islamic Salvation Front and, 1:63 journalism and, 1:63–64
National Reconciliation Plan of, 1:63 radio, television controlled by, 1:63
Reporters Without Borders and, 1:63
Tunisia Civil War and, 1:63
Bowen, Shannon, 1:353
Bowling Alone* (Putnam), 1:64–65 alternative membership forums and, 1:64 bonding social capital and, 1:64 bridging social capital and, 1:64
civic decline and, 1:64, 2:581
criticism of, 1:64
political engagement decline and, 2:581, 2:670
Boys on the Bus (Crouse), 2:527
Bradlee, Ben, 1:26
Brady, Henry E., 2:582
Branco, Castelo, 1:66
Brandt, Willy, 1:65
American-style campaigning of, 1:65
“German Kennedy” myth of, 1:65
Urho Kekkonen (Finland) and, 1:369 national, foreign media relationship with, 1:65
Nobel Peace Prize received by, 1:65 peace chancellor reputation of, 1:65
Branson, Richard, 1:279
Branzburg v. Hayes, 2:745
Braun, Carol Moseley, 1:87
Brazil, media and the political system, 1:65–67
Fernando Henrique Cardoso and, 1:86 citizen deliberation in, 1:288
Fernando Collor de Mello and, 1:116
democratization and, 1:66–67
“direct vote” movement and, 1:66 electoral code changes and, 1:66 mandatory voting in, 1:66
multiparty system in, 1:66 political advertising regulations and, 1:66–67 televised political advertising and, 1:66 television's influence on public opinion and, 1:66

Getulio Vargas and, 2:806
Brazilian Democratic Movement, 1:66
Brazilian Labor Party, 1:66
British Columbia, 1:288 Broadcast media, politics and Chinese Cultural Revolution and, 1:100–101
democratization process role of, 1:176
See also Radio, politics and; Television, politics and Brock, Bernard, 1:193
Broder, David, 1:4, 1:67–68
"ad watches" responsibility and, 1:67, 1:362 integrity of, 1:67–68 journalism political accomplishments of, 1:67
Pulitzer Prize received by, 1:67
Dan Quayle and, 2:689
scandal coverage and, 1:125
Brokaw, Tom, 1:155
Brown, Gordon, 1:131
Brown v. Board of Education, Topeka, KS, 1:108, 2:479, 2:694, 2:739
Bruce, Lenny, 1:313
Bryan, William Jennings, 1:137, 2:589
Buchanan, Patrick, 1:68
"culture war" speech of, 1:68, 2:704
Ford administration and, 1:68
Nixon administrations and, 1:68
"Pitchfork Pat" nickname of, 1:68 political columnist, commentator work of, 1:68
Reform Party and, 2:706
2000 election and, 1:68, 2:706
Buckley, William F., 1:129
Buckley v. Valeo,* 1:69–70
advocacy terms and, 1:69
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:56, 2:426, 2:566 campaign contribution limits and, 1:69, 1:77, 2:426 express vs. issue advocacy and, 1:6, 2:426–427, 2:429
Federal Election Campaign Act and, 1:69–70, 1:233, 2:426, 2:566
First Amendment and, 1:69, 2:426–428
political action committees and, 2:556–557, 2:566
Randall v. Sorrell and, 2:428 right of free association and, 1:69, 2:426
Bulgaria, democratization, 1:70–72
Bulgarian Communist Party in, 1:70
Simeon Saxe Coburg-Gotha and, 1:115–116 democratic constitution and, 1:70–71 democratic elections and, 1:71
glosnost and perestroika in, 1:70
Andrew Loukanov and, 1:410–411 parliamentary Republic formation and, 1:71 political organizations and, 1:71 televised presidential debate and, 1:71 transition period economic woes and, 1:71
The Union of Democratic Forces and, 1:70–71
voter behavior and, 1:71
Zhelyu Zhelev and, 2:857
Burke, Edmund, 1:251
Bush, Barbara, 1:247, 1:291*
Bush, George H. W., 1:72–73
Roger Ailes media consultant to, 1:21
Bush–Dukakis debates and, 1:161
Bush–Rather confrontation and, 1:75, 2:490, 2:699
CNN and, 1:115
Communism decline and, 1:72 disaster relief activities of, 1:114
early years of, 1:72
fear appeal ads and, 1:231–232
Ari Fleisher and, 1:247
Gorbachev and, 1:277*
Gulf War and, 1:72, 1:291,* 2:588
Helsinki Summit and, 1:278*
inaugural address of, 1:72
Iowa caucuses and, 1:350–351, 1:351
Iran-Contra affair and, 1:75, 2:699
Iraq War and, 1:110
Mary Matalin and, 2:422
1988 election and, 1:72, 1:161, 1:194, 1:231–232, 1:350–351, 2:422
1992 election and, 1:72, 1:111, 1:247, 1:351, 2:422, 2:434, 2:436, 2:588
press secretary of, 2:647 primary candidate film of, 1:84
Dan Quayle and, 2:689–690
radio addresses of, 2:698
Reagan's vice president and, 1:72, 1:75, 1:112
Republican National Committee chairman, 2:711
Condoleezza Rice and, 2:719–720
Thousand-Points-of-Light speech of, 1:72
Bush, George W., 1:73–74, 2:612
alternative media used by, 1:29
Patrick Buchanan and, 1:68
Laura Bush and, 1:74–75
campaign spending by, 1:50 congressional campaign poster of, 2:558*
Bob Dole and, 1:191
e-government initiatives of, 1:201
e-mail used by, 1:210 enemy combatants detained and, 2:612
Fahrenheit 9/11 (Moore, Dir.) and, 1:242, 2:654
Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. and, 2:429
527 groups and, 1:7, 2:567
Ari Fleisher, press secretary of, 1:247
free speech issue and, 1:243, 1:301
Rudy Giuliani and, 1:269
good vs. evil, War on Terrorism and, 2:707 grassroots campaigning of, 1:282
Gary Hart adviser to, 1:298
Hussein-Iraq propaganda of, 2:661
inaugural address of, 1:328*
Iraq War and, 1:73–74, 1:74, 1:242–243, 1:351–352, 2:587
John Kerry's criticism of, 1:377–378
Mary Matalin and, 2:422
media instrumentation by, 1:172, 2:587
Angela Merkel (Federal Republic of Germany) and, 2:451*
National Guard Service issue and, 1:61, 1:363
Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act and, 1:3 political reality control by, 2:549 political satire regarding, 1:314 popularity decline of, 1:74

press conferences of, 2:642, 2:755
press secretaries of, 2:647
proclamations by, 2:637 pronoun usage by, 1:394
public campaign funding and, 1:78
Vladimir Putin (Russia) and, 2:687
radio addresses of, 2:696, 2:698
radio advertising and, 2:568
Dan Rather and, 2:700
religion's affect on, 2:707–708
Condoleezza Rice and, 2:720
Karl Rove and, 1:242
Saturday Night Live and, 2:731
September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and, 1:73, 1:242, 2:588, 2:633, 2:647
Shut Up and Sing (B. Kopple, Dir.) and, 1:243 stem-cell research veto of, 2:708
television talk shows and, 2:779
as Texas governor, 1:73
2000 election and, 1:73, 1:210, 1:224, 1:278, 1:355, 1:407, 2:551, 2:563, 2:765, 2:775*
2004 election and, 1:7, 1:73–74, 1:158–159, 1:269, 1:282, 1:314, 1:364, 2:492, 2:563
War on Terror of, 1:73–74, 2:634
See also Iraq War, media coverage of Bush, Jeb, 1:73
Bush, Laura, 1:74–75 campaign activities of, 1:74 causes of, 1:74
"comforter-in-chief" role of, 1:74 literacy work of, 1:74 reading campaign of, 1:247 women's health programs work of, 1:74–75
Bush (G. H. W.)–Rather confrontation, 1:75
Bush live and unedited request and, 1:75
Iran-Contra affair and, 1:75
live sparring match and, 1:75
Bush v. Gore, 1:73, 2:765

Cable Communications Policy Act, 1:122
Cable News Network. See CNN (Cable News Network)
Cable-Satellite Public Affairs Network. See C-SPAN Network
Cable television, politics and
Cable Communications Policy Act and, 1:122
Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act and, 1:122
history of, 1:28
pundits, punditry and, 2:686
See also specific network and program
Calderón, Felipe de Jesus, 1:396*
California
affirmative action legislation banned in, 1:11 ballot measures spending in, 1:50, 1:51
Shirley Chisholm and, 1:103
Arnold Schwarzenegger and, 1:90, 1:155, 2:737–738
television campaign advertising in, 1:51
California Wellness Foundation, 1:5
Cameron, David, 1:82, 1:131
Campaign advertising. See Advocacy advertising; Campaign finance; Political advertising Campaign finance, 1:77–79
ballot initiatives and, 1:50–52
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:6, 1:56–58, 2:567
Buckley v. Valeo and, 1:6, 1:56, 1:69–70, 1:77, 1:233
Hillary Rodham Clinton Senate race and, 1:110 express vs. issue advocacy and, 1:6, 1:57, 2:426–427, 2:429
Federal Election Campaign Act and, 1:77, 1:232–234
Federal Trade Commission and, 1:235 female candidates and, 1:263
issue of, 1:34
McConnell v. FEC and, 1:57, 1:58, 1:70, 1:234, 2:426–429
Nixon Checkers Speech and, 1:38, 1:97–98, 2:516, 2:712
political action committees (PACs) and, 2:556–557
political marketing and, 2:604
Presidential Election Campaign Fund and, 1:77–78 professionalization of political campaigns and, 1:70 public funding and, 1:77–78, 1:234 public funding and, outside U.S., 1:78–79
Larry Sabato's study of, 2:729
soft money and, 2:749
unions and, 2:798
Watergate scandal and, 1:26
See also Campaign finance reform Campaign finance reform
advocacy advertising and, 1:5–6
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:6, 1:56–58, 2:567
Buckley v. Valeo decision and, 1:6, 1:56, 1:69–70, 1:77, 1:233, 2:426–427
Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. and, 2:428–429
free airtime and, 1:258–260
McConnell v. FEC and, 2:426–428
Randall v. Sorrell and, 2:428
Taft-Hartley Act, 1947 and, 1:5
Tillman Act, 1907 and, 1:5
Campaign Insider newsletter, 1:79
Campaigns, campaigning. See Americanization; American-style campaigning; Campaign finance; Campaign finance reform; Debates Campaigns & Elections Magazine,* 1:79
cambering polls and, 1:79 feature sections of, 1:79 mission statement of, 1:79
nonpartisan monthly magazine of, 1:79 political consultants information in, 1:79 training seminars and, 1:79
Campaign Talk: Why Elections Are Good for Us (R. P. Hart), 1:299
Campbell, Alastair, 1:59, 1:130
Campbell, Angus, 1:35–36, 2:419, 2:579, 2:581, 2:767
Campbell, Karlyn Kohrs, 1:327
Camp David Accords, 1:368, 2:531
Canada
debates in, 1:164
e-government initiatives in, 1:201

party issue ownership in, 1:354
youth voting in, 2:856
Candidate, The,* 1:79–80 cynical view of politics in, 1:79–80 image-based campaign focus of, 1:80
1968 election and, 1:80
winning obsession in, 1:80
Candidate-centered communication, 1:80–83
American Association of Political Consultants and, 1:29–31
autobiographies and, 1:82
character assassination, media exposés and, 1:82–83
Crosstalk (Just, Crigler, Alger, Cook, Kern, & West) and, 1:146–147
Eisenhower 1952 ad campaign and, 1:204–205, 1:205–206 (figures), 2:441, 2:561, 2:665, 2:712 identifying with voters and, 1:82 incumbent, incumbency symbols and, 1:329
Internet resources and, 1:29
parliamentary democracies and, 1:80, 1:81 personal attributes, voter choice and, 1:80, 1:81 political actors focus in, 1:80 political cartoons and, 1:199
political image and, 1:322
presidential elections and, 1:80 primary elections, media coverage and, 1:81 self-disclosure and, 1:80, 1:81–83 selling the self and, 1:82
talk shows and, 1:81
television and, 1:80–81
visibility of candidates, party leaders and, 1:80–81
Web logs and, 1:29–30
Web sites and, 1:81
See also Debates
Candidate films, biographical, 1:83–85 ad spots taken from, 1:84 of G. H. W. Bush, 1:84 of Calvin Coolidge, 1:84
history of, 1:84–85
length significance and, 1:83–84
A Man From Hope (W. Clinton), 1:111
A New Beginning (Reagan, 1984), 1:84 personal, professional focus of, 1:84 primary campaign videos and, 1:84 types of, 1:84
voters' interpretation of, 1:85 Candidates and Their Images: Concepts, Methods and Findings (Nimmo & Savage), 1:85–86 changing images and, 1:85 image definition and, 1:85 images and messages relationship and, 1:85, 1:322, 2:515 methodological techniques used in, 1:85
1972 election and, 1:85
voter behavior and, 1:85
Cantril, H., 2:665–666
Capra, Frank, 1:232
Cardoso, Fernando Henrique, 1:86 democratic reform of, 1:86
economic policies of, 1:86
human development work of, 1:86 journalist work of, 1:86 public policy analysis of, 1:86 public schools, universities focus of, 1:86
Carlin, George, 1:313
Carlyle, Thomas, 1:251
Carmichael, Stokely, 2:694
Carpetbagging, of Hillary Rodham Clinton, 1:110
Carrie Chapman Catt Center for Women and Politics, 1:86–87
Archive of Women's Political Communication of, 1:87 leadership development focus of, 1:87 programs of, 1:87
Carson, Claybourne, 1:109
Carter, Jimmy
Rosalynn Carter and, 1:247
on The Daily Show, 1:155
Ford-Carter debates and, 1:160–161, 1:250
"good man" legacy of, 2:638
Iowa caucuses and, 1:350
moral calling speeches of, 2:633
Edmund Muskie and, 2:478
1976 election and, 1:160–161, 1:250, 1:350, 2:551, 2:561
Pharisee Effect and, 2:551
press secretary of, 2:646
Reagan-Carter debates and, 1:161
religion's influence on, 2:707
"Rose Garden strategy" of, 2:637
2004 Democratic National Convention and, 2:519
Carter, Rosalynn, 1:247 Cartoons, political, 1:87, 1:87–88 contemporary, newsworthy content of, 1:87
editorials and, 1:198
factual requirements and, 1:87–88 freedom of speech, press and, 1:87 journalistic-artistic hybrid and, 1:87 metaphor, satire, wit in, 1:87
Muhammed cartoon events and, 2:474–475, 2:511
Thomas Nast and, 1:313 opinion formation, decision making function of, 1:88 reader knowledge and, 1:87 rhetorical analysis of, 2:457 visual commentary of, 1:87
Carville, James, 1:88
books by, 2:422
Clinton campaigns and, 1:88
Crossfire hosted by, 1:88
Mary Matalin wife of, 2:422
Pennsylvania elections and, 1:88 political consultant, Democratic strategist and, 1:88, 2:441
"Ragin' Cajun" nickname of, 1:88
Castro, Fidel, 1:89–90
Salvador Allende and, 1:25
anti-Americanism of, 1:89–90
Bay of Pigs incident and, 1:89
Raúl Castro Ruz, brother and, 1:89, 1:90
Hugo Chávez (Venezuela) and, 1:90, 1:97
health and education reforms of, 1:89
Mao Zedong beliefs and, 1:89
Nonaligned Movement of, 1:89 political and economic freedom denied by, 1:89 revolutionary activities of, 1:89 socialism supported by, 1:89

Soviet bloc alliance and, 1:89
U.S. trade embargo and, 1:89
Catt, Carrie Chapman, 1:86–87
See also Carrie Chapman Catt Center for Women and Politics
CBS
Kennedy assassination and, 1:374
Joseph Klapper and, 1:382
Bill Moyers and, 2:471
Edward R. Murrow and, 2:475–476
1996 election free airtime and, 1:259
nominating conventions and, 1:138
presidential debates and, 1:160
Sixty Minutes and, 1:333
See also CBS News
CBS News
Bush–Rather confrontation and, 1:75, 2:490, 2:699
Walter Cronkite and, 1:146, 1:374, 2:589
Deciding What's News (Gans) and, 1:166
Dole-Clinton on 60 Minutes and, 1:192
Fox News and, 1:253
Dan Rather and, 2:699–700
Vanderbilt Television News Archive and, 2:806
CCP (Chinese Communist Party), 1:98
Celebrities in politics, 1:90–91 attracting media attention and, 1:90 candidates endorsement by, 1:90 candidates identifying with, 1:82 democratization of fame and, 1:90
Jane Fonda and, 1:90
Charlton Heston and, 1:90
news media change and, 1:91
1920, 1940, 1960 elections and, 1:90
Arnold Schwarzenegger and, 1:90, 2:737–738
Barbra Streisand and, 1:90
Woodrow Wilson and, 1:90
See also Reagan, Ronald; Schwarzenegger, Arnold
Cell phones, 2:492
Censorship, political, 1:91–94
Audenauera era, Germany and, 1:4
Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali (Tunisia) and, 1:53
Chinese Cultural Revolution and, 1:100–101
Chinese media, politics and, 1:98–100
Cold War and, 1:92
in democratization process, 1:177 in early China, 1:91
editor self-censorship and, 1:94 freedoms of press and expression limited by, 1:91, 1:94
Joseph Goebbels (Germany) and, 1:92 government licensing and, 1:92–93
history of, 1:91–92
Internet access restriction and, 1:93
Joseph McCarthy and, 1:92 measures of, 1:92–94
in Middle Ages, 1:91
John Milton and, 1:91, 2:509, 2:644
in Nazi Germany, 1:91–92
obscenity and pornography and, 2:520–521
Pentagon papers example of, 1:92, 2:507, 2:513–514, 2:540, 2:644 political correctness and, 2:574–575 pooled journalism as, 2:624–625, 2:644
postpublication censorship and, 1:93
Press Law of 1766 (Sweden) and, 2:645–646 preview censorship as, 1:93 purposes of, 1:92 religious oppressions, persecutions and, 1:91 Reporters Without Borders and, 2:710–711
results of, 1:94 social order and racial harmony maintained by, 1:92 of Socrates, 1:91 targets of, 1:91
in Venezuela, 1:97
during war, 1:92
See also First Amendment; Freedom of expression; Freedom of speech; McCarthy hearings; Press freedom; Reporters Without Borders
Census Scope, 1:179
Center for Democracy and Election Management, of American University, 1:94
Center for International Earth Science Information Network (CIESIN), 1:179
Center for the Study of the American Electorate, 1:94–95
African American voters and, 1:95
National Voter Registration Act and, 1:95 political disengagement study of, 1:95 subjects, issues studied by, 1:94–95 voter age factors and, 1:95 voter turnout focus of, 1:94–95
Central States Communication Association, 1:62
Central States Speech Journal, 1:62
Cerrell, Joseph, 2:441
CETV, 1:99
Chaffee, Steven H., 1:95–96
Kids Voting Project and, 1:96 mass communication work of, 1:96 political communication theory and, 1:95
Wilbur Schramm and, 1:95
Chaney, James, 1:109
Character assassination, 1:82–83
Charter of Paris for a New Europe, 1:304
Chase, Chevy, 1:314
Chase, W. Howard, 1:353–354
Chávez, César, 2:462
Chávez, Hugo, 1:96–97
Bolivarianism of, 1:96
censorship, freedom of speech and, 1:97 commercial press opposition to, 1:97
Jesse Jackson and, 1:347
nationalization by, 1:96
political career of, 1:96
political television activity of, 1:97 public opinion regarding, 1:97 rhetorical skills of, 1:97
union political activity and, 1:97

Checkers Speech, 1:97–98 audience appeal in, 1:98 delivery force of, 1:98 Democrats attacked in, 1:98 political favors omission in, 1:98 power of television and, 1:38, 1:97, 2:516, 2:712 Truman criticism in, 1:98 word choice in, 1:98
Cheney, Dick
G. W. Bush's Vice President and, 1:73
Gulf War and, 1:72
Operation Iraqi Freedom and, 1:72
Chicago Tribune, 1:332
Chicano Youth Movement, 2:694
Chile
Salvador Allende and, 1:25
Michelle Bachelet Jeria and, 1:49–50
Chilean Way to Socialism and, 1:25
military junta dictatorship in, 1:25 newspapers supporting government in, 1:25
U.S. owned copper mines in, 1:25
China, media and politics in, 1:98–100
big-character posters and, 1:55–56, 1:100 communication system and, 1:98
Communism and, 1:123
"contracting out" publishing services and, 1:99
Cultural Revolution and, 1:89, 1:98, 1:100–101
cybernationalism example and, 1:154 de-ideologizing trend and, 1:99
democratization process in, 1:177
"economic liberation without political democratization" and, 1:99
Golden Jubilee protests and, 2:663 government licensing in, 1:93
Hong Kong Handover and, 1:309–310
Internet censorship in, 1:93–94, 1:99
Internet growth and, 1:99 journalist democratic media search and, 1:99
Mao Zedong and, 1:98, 2:416 media commercialization in, 1:177 media cross-ownership and, 1:99 media democratization and, 1:99 media public, private advertising and, 1:98–99 media's role and, 1:98
"multi-channel financing" policy and, 1:98
"new cultural ideologies" and, 1:99 paid news, soft advertising and, 1:99 political censorship in, 1:92 political transformation and, 1:98 Property Rights Reform and, 1:99 state control and, 1:98 tabloid daily newspapers and, 1:99 transnational corporations and, 1:99
World Trade Organization and, 1:99
See also Big-character posters, China; Chinese Communist Party (CCP); Chinese Cultural Revolution
Chinese Communist Party (CCP)
Cultural Revolution and, 1:89, 1:98, 1:100–101
Deng Xiaoping and, 1:180–181
Nikita Khrushchev and, 1:378
Mao Zedong and, 2:416
Chinese Communist State, 1:98–99, 1:100–101
Chinese Cultural Revolution, 1:100–101
big-character posters in, 1:55, 1:100
Fidel Castro and, 1:89
Chinese media, politics and, 1:98–100 class struggle and, 1:100–101 communication and media affected by, 1:100–101 cultural destruction and, 1:100
Deng Xiaoping and, 1:180–181
end of, 1:101
Gang of Four and, 1:101
Hong Kong Handover and, 1:309–310
little Red Book and, 1:100–101
Mao Zedong and, 1:89, 1:98, 1:100–101, 2:416
Marxist doctrine and, 1:100, 1:101
Nixon visit and, 1:101, 2:516, 2:638 political extremism, forced mobilization and, 1:100 propaganda in, 1:100–101
Red Guards and, 1:100
Chirac, Jacques, 1:101–102 communication skills, charisma of, 1:102 early political activities of, 1:101 electoral strategic planning of, 1:102
Jean-Marie Le Pen and, 1:402
political communication skills of, 1:102 television skills of, 1:102
Chisholm, Shirley, 1:102–103
1972 election and, 1:102–103
political activism of, 1:102
televised debate and, 1:103
Chomsky, Noam, 1:252
Christian Democratic party (Chile), 1:25, 1:49
Christian Democratic party (Germany), 1:65, 2:758
Christian Democratic Union (CDU, Federal Republic of Germany), 1:4 Churchill, Sir Winston, 1:103–104 authorship of, 1:103
honorary U.S. citizenship of, 1:104 Iron Curtain Speech of, 1:104
oratory skills of, 1:103–104 political prisoners and, 2:612 radio speeches of, 1:104
F. D. Roosevelt and, 1:104
United States and, 1:104
as war correspondent, 1:103 wilderness years of, 1:103
Cicero, 2:717–718
CIESIN. See Center for International Earth Science Information Network
Çiller, Tansu, 1:104–105
Süleyman Demirel and, 1:169
election campaigns of, 1:105 political speech blunders of, 1:105 television, radio and, 1:105
True Path Party and, 1:104, 1:169

Citizen journalism, 1:105–107 blogosphere, viogosphere and, 1:105, 1:106 citizen reviewed editorial process and, 1:106 community journalism and, 1:105 fact-oriented content in, 1:106
gatekeeping and, 1:106 locally based reporting and, 1:105 media and society interaction and, 1:106 news production process and, 1:105, 1:106 Ohmynews.com (South Korea) and, 1:106 openness of information and, 1:105 potentials and weaknesses of, 1:106 prevalence of, 1:106
public journalism and, 2:672–675 quality control challenge of, 1:106 self-expressed opinion content and, 1:106 sustainability challenge of, 1:106 traditional journalism erosion and, 1:106
Citizen Kane,* 1:107–108
deep focus photography in, 1:107
William Randolph Hearst and, 1:107, 1:303
political power abuse in, 1:107–108, 1:240
Orson Welles and, 1:107–108
Citizens for a Strong Senate, 1:6
The Civic Culture (Almond & Verba), 2:576–577, 2:580
Civic participation trends, 1:64 debates' effect on, 1:164
interpersonal political communication and, 1:347–348
political socialization and, 2:617–618
Civil Rights Act of 1957, 1:314
Civil Rights Act of 1960, 1:314
Civil Rights Act of 1964, 1:10, 1:314, 2:479, 2:694, 2:739
Civil rights movement, 1:108–109
Brown v. Board of Education, Topeka, KS and, 1:108, 2:479, 2:694, 2:739
Civil Rights Act of 1957 and, 1:314
Civil Rights Act of 1960 and, 1:314
Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, 1:10, 1:314, 2:479, 2:694, 2:739
conservativism and, 1:129
de jure segregation and, 1:108, 2:739
Freedom Rides and, 1:371, 2:739 grassroots perspective on, 1:109
Hubert Humphrey and, 1:314–315
integration and, 1:108–109, 1:109,* 2:739*
Jesse Jackson and, 1:357
John F. Kennedy and, 1:371
Martin Luther King, Jr. and, 1:108–109, 1:109,* 1:381, 2:462 major leaders of, 1:109
Malcolm X and, 2:462
media coverage and, 1:108, 1:333
media legitimacy and, 2:573
Montgomery Bus Boycott and, 1:108, 1:381 nonviolent direct action focus of, 1:108 organizations of, 2:462 political group decision making and, 1:288
political journalism and, 1:360
race in politics and, 2:693–694
Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and, 1:108 symbolic dimensions of, 1:109
A Time for Justice documentary film on, 1:290 tragedies, deaths in, 1:109
Voting Rights Act and, 1:95, 1:109,* 2:462, 2:463, 2:479, 2:634, 2:694
Watts riots and, 2:827
Clay, Henry, 1:135, 2:627
Clear Channel Communications, 1:122
Cleveland, Francis, 1:246
Clift, Eleanor, 1:87
Clinton, Hillary Rodham, 1:110–111, 1:117
carpetbagging charges and, 1:110
Bill Clinton and, 1:111–114
as first lady, 1:246, 1:247
gender bias campaign coverage of, 2:845
Iraq War and, 1:110
Monica Lewinsky scandal and, 1:110, 1:113, 1:404
National Organization for Women and, 2:845*
N.Y. Senate seat and, 1:110, 1:114, 1:246
Task Force on National Health Care Reform and, 1:5, 1:110, 1:247, 2:566
2008 presidential candidacy of, 1:110, 1:114, 1:246
Whitewater affair and, 1:110, 1:113
women's rights, Afghan women issues of, 1:110
Clinton, William Jefferson, 1:111–114 alternative media used by, 1:29
apologia of, 1:38
Arsenio Hall show and, 1:27, 1:114, 1:155 balanced budget of, 1:111
biographical campaign film of, 1:85, 1:111
James Carville, political consultant and, 1:88
centrist politics of, 1:111–112
Hillary Rodham Clinton and, 1:5, 1:110–111, 1:114
Clinton–Dole debates and, 1:162 collective atonement, Tuskegee syphilis experiment and, 2:633 Congress and, 1:127
Democratic Leadership Council (DLC) and, 1:112
Democratic Party and, 1:175
Robert E. Denton, Jr.'s work regarding, 1:181 domestic policies of, 1:111, 1:112
e-government efforts of, 1:201
Electronic Freedom of Information Act and, 1:262 federal government shutdowns and, 1:268
"first black president" label of, 1:112 foreign policy challenges of, 1:111
free air time and, 1:259
free speech zones concept and, 1:301
Newt Gingrich and, 1:126, 1:268
Al Gore and, 1:278
government investment focus of, 1:112
Gary Hart adviser to, 1:298
image repair by, 1:113 impeachment against, 1:112, 1:148
Internet used by, 2:636
Martin Luther King, Jr. evoked by, 2:634
Monica Lewinsky scandal and, 1:38, 1:110, 1:113, 1:127, 1:268, 1:363, 1:404, 2:439, 2:615, 2:633
Mike McCurry and, 2:756–757
George McGovern and, 2:431

Carol Moseley Braun and, 2:470
NAFTA and, 1:111
National Partnership for Reinventing Government and, 1:201 negative advertising by, 2:563
"New Covenant" rhetoric of, 1:111–112, 1:137
New Democrat policy and, 1:59
new media and politics emergency and, 1:113–114
1992 presidential campaign of, 1:27, 1:72, 1:83, 1:111, 1:147, 1:163, 1:407, 2:434, 2:436, 2:561, 2:563, 2:588
1996 presidential campaign of, 1:56, 1:111, 1:191, 1:259, 1:334, 2:561, 2:563
1996 Virginia senate race ad and, 1:9
Oklahoma City bombing eulogy of, 2:635 partial-birth abortion issue and, 1:3 post-presidency activities of, 1:114 presidential communication of, 2:632
press secretary of, 2:647, 2:756–757, 2:837
public opinion diverted by, 2:633 racial reconciliation discourse of, 1:112
radio addresses of, 2:696, 2:698
radio advertising and, 2:568
Dan Rather and, 2:700
Ann Richards eulogy by, 2:720
Saturday Night Live and, 2:731
scandals, impeachment, image restoration of, 1:112–113 soft money contributions and, 1:56 speeches of, 1:112
Starr Report and, 1:404
State of the Union Address of, 2:761*
George Stephanopoulos and, 2:763
Task Force on National Health Care Reform and, 1:5, 1:111, 2:566
television talk shows and, 2:779
2004 Democratic National Convention and, 2:519
welfare reform legislation of, 1:111, 1:112, 2:833–834 Wye River Memorandum and, 1:39 youth campaign of, 1:37 Club for Growth, 1:6
CNBC
Roger Ailes and, 1:21
Vanderbilt Television News Archive and, 2:806
CNN (Cable News Network), 1:114–115
Al Jazeera television and, 1:23, 1:24, 1:114
"CNN effect" and, 1:114–115, 1:273, 2:573
competitors of, 1:115
Walter Cronkite and, 1:146
Crossfire, James Carville and, 1:88 formation of, 1:28
Fox News and, 1:253
global medium of, 1:271–272
Gulf War coverage by, 1:114, 1:115, 1:291, 1:333
Hannity & Colmes and, 1:253
Hill–Thomas hearings and, 1:306
Inside Politics, David Broder and, 1:67 international news coverage by, 1:114
Iraq War coverage and, 1:351
Eason Jordan and, 1:61
Larry King Live and, 1:29
metacoverage by, 2:452
1996 election free airtime and, 1:259
nominating conventions and, 1:138
pundits on, 2:686
24 hour news coverage and, 1:113, 1:126, 1:333
Vanderbilt Television News Archive and, 2:805–806
Coalition for Health Insurance Choices, 1:5, 1:7
Coalition of Parties for Democracy (Chile), 1:49
Coburg-Gotha, Simeon Saxe, 1:115–116
European Union and, 1:116
exile years of, 1:115
Movement for Rights and Freedoms and, 1:115
National Movement for Simeon the Second and, 1:115–116
NATO and, 1:115–116
parliamentary elections of, 1:115
Code of Professional Ethics, 1:31
CoE. See Council of Europe (CoE), media policy
Cohen, Bernard, 1:364
Cohen, Ian, 1:188
Cold War, 1:123
Charter of Paris for a New Europe and, 1:304
"Cold War frame" and, 2:587
conservativism and, 1:129
democratization after, 1:176
détente and, 1:303
D. D. Eisenhower and, 2:632
end of, 1:304, 2:720, 2:796, 2:799
Mikhail Gorbachev and, 1:277, 2:704
John F. Kennedy and, 1:371–372
Nikita Khrushchev and, 1:378–379
liberal press theories and, 2:648 political posters in, 2:629
political socialization and, 2:617
propaganda and, 2:660–661
Vladimir Putin and, 2:687
Radio Free Europe, Voice of America and, 2:697, 2:699, 2:764, 2:799, 2:812, 2:812*
Ronald Reagan and, 2:707
strategic communication during, 2:764
UNESCO and, 2:796
Coleman, J. S., 1:183
Collaborative communication studies, 1:61–62
Collor de Mello, Fernando, 1:116
economic policies of, 1:116
National Reconstruction Party and, 1:116 resignation, impeachment of, 1:116
Colman, Prentis, and Varley (CPV) communication consultant, 1:130
Combs, James E., 1:193, 2:446–447, 2:515
Comedy Central
The Daily Show with Jon Stewart on, 1:29, 1:155–156, 1:313–314, 1:363, 2:731, 2:750
Commander in Chief,* 1:117
Geena Davis in, 1:117 episode plotlines of, 1:117
stereotypic roles examined in, 1:117
West Wing counterpoint and, 1:117 woman as president possibility in, 1:117

Commentary, political, 1:117–119
apologia and, 1:38
Patrick Buchanan and, 1:68
editorials and, 1:198–199
election campaign news and, 1:118 in European countries, 1:118 Gingrich Contract with America and, 1:267–268 global rise of, 1:118 informative, argumentative, analytical functions of, 1:117 opinion polls and, 1:118 public opinion affected by, 1:118 punditocacy term and, 1:118
pundits, punditry and, 2:686
television and, 1:118
Commission on Presidential Debates (CPD), 1:119–120 bipartisan creation of, 1:119
DebateWatch and, 1:119, 1:165–166
501(c)(3) education organization and, 1:119
formation of, 1:161
mission statement of, 1:119
private funding sources of, 1:119 problems faced by, 1:120 voter education projects of, 1:119
Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, 1:10
Common Agricultural Policy (European Union), 1:220
Common Cause, 1:259
Common Fisheries Policy (European Union), 1:220
Common Market, 1:220
Communication and Cultural Domination (Schiller), 1:151
Communication Monographs journal, 1:62
Communications Act of 1934, 1:120–122
Cable Communications Policy Act and, 1:122
Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act and, 1:122
Communications Act of 1996 and, 1:122
equal time provision of, 1:212–213, 2:440, 2:562
Fairness Doctrine and, 1:28, 1:122, 1:213, 1:227–228, 1:333, 1:407
Federal Radio Commission (FRC) and, 1:120–121
Federal Trade Commission and, 1:235
free airtime and, 1:259
media ownership and, 1:121, 1:122, 2:440 political communication regulated by, 1:121
"public interest, convenience, and necessity" (PICN) criteria and, 1:120–121, 1:122, 1:227
Radio Act of 1912 and, 1:120
Radio Act of 1927 and, 1:120–121, 1:212
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC and, 2:705 telecommunication policy and, 1:120
Title I - VI of, 1:121
Van Deerlin 1978 rewrite attempt and, 1:121–122
Communications Act of 1996, 1:122
Communism, 1:123
Salvador Allende and, 1:25
big-character posters, China and, 1:55–56, 1:100
Fidel Castro and, 1:89–90
Chilean Way to Socialism and, 1:25
Chinese Communist Party (CCP) and, 1:98
Chinese Communist State and, 1:98–99
Churchill's Iron Curtain Speech and, 1:104 common ownership of property and, 1:123 Communist Manifesto (Marx) and, 1:123 democratization process from, 1:178
Friedrich Engels and, 1:402
Mikhail Gorbachev and, 1:277, 2:704
Aleksander Kwaśniewski (Poland) and, 1:386–387
Vladímir Lenin and, 1:401–402
McCarthy hearings and, 1:243, 1:333, 2:424–425
Nixon Checkers Speech and, 1:98
political posters and, 2:626
propaganda and, 2:659
Russian Revolution and, 1:123, 1:401, 2:660
Soviet Communist theory of the press and, 1:250–251, 2:509, 2:641, 2:648
Soviet Union collapse and, 1:114, 1:123, 1:176, 1:177, 1:184
See also Chinese Communist Party (CCP); Communist Party; Marx, Karl; Soviet communist theory of the press; Soviet Union Communist Manifesto (Marx), 1:123 Communist Party
in Bulgaria, 1:70
Mikhail Gorbachev and, 1:278
See also Chinese Communist Party (CCP)
Comparing Media Systems: Three Models of Media and Politics* (Hallin & Mancini), 1:123–124
Four Theories of the Press (Siebert, Peterson, & Schramm) and, 1:79, 1:123 media systems concept in, 1:124, 1:294, 2:414 political and economic factors focus in, 1:124 Conference for Security and Co-operation in Europe, 1:303
Congress and the media, 1:124–128 credibility issues and, 1:126, 1:127 declining civility and, 1:127
e-mail use and, 1:210
implications of, 1:127–128
media coverage of, 1:125–126
member responsiveness and, 1:126 negative image and, 1:124–125
new media, 1990s to the present and, 1:126–127
news immediacy and, 1:126 presidential coverage versus, 1:125–126 reciprocity tradition and, 1:127 scandal focus and, 1:125 skepticism, cynicism and, 1:125 talk radio and, 1:126
Watergate affecting, 1:125
Web pages and, 1:126, 1:127
Congressional Black Caucus, 2:463
Congressional campaigns, newspaper coverage of, 2:508
Connally, John, 1:128–129
early political career of, 1:128
Kennedy assassination and, 1:128, 1:373
Richard Nixon and, 1:128–129
Watergate scandal and, 1:129
Conscience of a Conservative (Goldwater), 1:275
Conservation League, 2:566

Conservative, conservativism, 1:129–130
authoritarianism and, 1:46
cultural studies and, 1:152–153
Democratic Party and, 1:174–175
demographic and social changes and, 1:129 Enlightenment philosophy and, 1:129 federal government size and, 1:129
Al Franken and, 1:258
Barry Goldwater and, 1:275–276
ideological beliefs of, 1:321
inequality acceptance and, 1:46
Rush Limbaugh and, 1:406–407, 2:777
National Public Radio and, 2:483
radio talk shows and, 1:130, 2:777, 2:778 regional distinctions and, 1:129 resistance to change and, 1:46
Clarence Thomas and, 1:306
J. C. Watts and, 2:826–827
See also Conservative Party, Britain
Conservative Opportunity Society (COS) House caucus, 1:267–268 Conservative Party, Britain, 1:130–131
labels regarding, 1:392
Labour Party vs., 1:130
John Major and, 1:130
media and, 1:130
professional advertisement help and, 1:130
Margaret Thatcher and, 1:130, 2:788–789
Conspiracy theories group-mediated politics and, 2:447
Kennedy assassination and, 1:374
Constructivism, 1:131–133 communication science applications of, 1:132 cybernetic of the second order and, 1:131–132
in The Handbook of Political Communication (Nimmo & Sanders), 1:295 media-generated realities and, 1:131 neurobiological orientation of, 1:131 objective knowledge focus of, 1:131 social constructivism and, 1:255–256 sociology of knowledge and, 1:131 traditions of, 1:131–132
Consultants, political, 1:133–134
American Association of Political Consultants and, 1:29–31, 1:31–32, 1:134
American-style campaigning and, 1:33–35
John Beckley, 1:133
Edward Bernays, 1:133
Campaigns & Elections Magazine and, 1:79
The Candidate film and, 1:79–80
James Carville, 1:88, 2:422 commercialism in, 2:657
Charles de Gaulle and, 1:167
European Association of Political Consultants (EAPC) and, 1:215–216
Ari Fleisher, 1:247–248
Robert Friedenberg, 2:570
Jacob Javits campaigns and, 1:133 of Labour Party (Great Britain), 1:389 Liberty Bonds sales and, 1:133
Mary Matalin, 2:422
media consultants and, 2:440–442
Joseph Napolitan, 2:480–481
1796, 1800, 1828 elections and, 1:133
Jacques Pilhan (France), 2:466 political marketing and, 2:604
professionalization and, 2:656–657
Larry Sabato's study of, 2:729
Jacques Seguela (France), 2:466
Joe Trippi, 2:792
Martin Van Buren and, 1:133
J. C. Watts, 2:827
Contextualism, 1:193
Contract with America, 1:267–268
Conventions, political, 1:134–138 campaign rally function and, 1:135 candidate campaign issues and, 1:137 communication functions of, 1:136–137 congressional caucuses and, 1:135 delegates' selection and, 1:135
1832 election and, 1:135
Electoral College and, 1:134–135 electoral process legitimization by, 1:136 evolution of, 1:134–136
Gerald Ford and, 1:135*
inclusiveness images and, 1:136–137
mass media and, 1:136, 1:137–138
McGovern-Fraser Commission and, 1:136 media gatekeeper control of, 1:137–138 new media outlets of, 1:138 nominees legitimized by, 1:136 party platform and, 1:135 party unity demonstrated at, 1:136 pragmatic functions of, 1:135 primaries and, 2:651–652
primary election system vs., 1:135–136
radio and, 1:137
reduced coverage of, 1:138 symbolic functions of, 1:136 television coverage of, 1:137–138
12th amendment and, 1:134–135
See also Democratic National Convention; Republican National Convention
Converse, Philip, 1:35–36, 2:419, 2:581, 2:767
Cook, T. E., 2:447
Cooke, Janet, 2:453
Coolidge, Calvin, 1:84
no-quote press rule of, 2:646
press conferences and, 2:506
radio addresses of, 2:696
radio campaign speeches of, 2:754 speech writers for, 2:754
State of the Union Address of, 2:753
Copenhagen criteria, of European Union, 1:220
Copperheads, 1:175
Corner, John, 1:81

Council of Europe (CoE), media policy, 1:138–142
Article 10 of European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and, 1:139, 1:140, 1:141, 1:142 assistance programs of, 1:142 components of, 1:142–143
Declaration on Cultural Diversity and, 1:140
Declaration on Freedom of Communication and, 1:139 Declaration on Freedom of Expression and Information and, 1:139–140 defamation cases and, 1:141 democratic process served by, 1:141 election campaigns coverage and, 1:141
European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages and, 1:139
European Convention on Human Rights and, 1:216–217
European Convention on Transfrontier Television and, 1:139 European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) and, 1:139
e-voting and, 1:141
Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities and, 1:139 free and democratic media system and, 1:140 freedom of expression, information and, 1:139–140 freedom of political debate and, 1:140–141 freedom of the press and, 1:140–141
goals of, 1:138–139, 1:140 independence of broadcasters and, 1:140 journalists protection and, 1:141 media priorities of, 1:139 monitoring activities of, 1:141–142 public service broadcasting and, 1:140
Recommendation on Measures to Promote Media Pluralism and, 1:140
Resolution on the Right of Reply and, 1:140
Council of the European Union, 1:215–216
Court TV, 1:306
Cox, Ray, 2:490
CPD. See Commission on Presidential Debates
Crable, Richard, 1:353, 1:354
Cracker barrel democracy, 1:42
Cragan, John F., 1:63, 1:230, 1:231
Crane, Teresa Yancey, 1:353
Crawford, William, 1:135
Creating Reality (Altheide), 1:142–143
news perspective concept and, 1:142 news show production affects and, 1:142 Crisis of Public Communication, 1:62
Critical theory, 1:143–146
Adorno's work and, 1:143–145 capitalist media system and, 1:144 critical-materialist theory and, 1:145 culture industry and, 1:144–145
Dialectic of Enlightenment (DE) and, 1:143–144
dialectic theory of society and, 1:143–144
Frankfurt Institute for Social Research and, 1:143–144
Horkheimer's work and, 1:143–144
Marxist theory and, 1:143–144 mass culture and, 1:144–145 political economy focus of, 1:143–144 reformulation of, 1:144–145 social and cultural changes focus of, 1:143–144 technology in the culture industry and, 1:145
Cronkite, Walter, 1:146
Apollo 11 moon landing and, 1:146
CBS Evening News anchor and, 1:146
free airtime issue and, 1:259
Iraq War and, 1:146
Kennedy assassination and, 1:146, 1:374
1952 nominating convention and, 1:146
post-retirement work of, 1:146
Vietnam War and, 1:146, 2:589
Cross, Harold L., 1:261
Crossfire talk show, 1:68, 1:88
Geraldine Ferraro host of, 1:237
Mary Matalin and, 2:422
Crosstalk (Just, Crigler, Alger, Cook, Kern, & West), 1:146–147 citizen viewpoints analysis in, 1:147 1992 presidential campaign analysis and, 1:147 television ads focus of, 1:147
Crouse, Thomas, 2:527
C-SPAN Network, 1:147–148
Newt Gingrich and, 1:267
growth, funding, importance of, 1:147, 1:333
Hill–Thomas hearings and, 1:306
international government coverage of, 1:147 Trent Lott and, 1:61
nominating conventions and, 1:138
presidential televised addresses and, 2:636
Supreme Court and, 1:148
Cuba
Fidel Castro and, 89–90
Communism in, 1:123
Cuban Missile Crisis and, 1:289, 1:371–372, 1:378, 2:763
Nikita Khrushchev and, 1:378
Cultivation theory, 1:148–150
agenda setting and, 1:17
class distinction blurring and, 1:150 cultivation analysis and, 1:265–266, 2:585 cultivation as continual, dynamic process, 1:149 evidence of, 1:149–150
German unification and, 1:266–267
knowledge gap and, 1:383, 2:585
mainstreaming process and, 1:149, 1:150 political views mainstreaming and, 1:150 racial segregation conservativeness and, 1:149–150 resonance concept and, 1:149, 2:713–714 social reality focus of, 1:149 television affecting children focus of, 1:148–150 television character demography and, 1:149 television viewing assessment in, 1:148–149, 1:265–266 variations in, 1:149
Cultural Compliance (Glasgow Media Group), 1:270 Cultural imperialism, 1:150, 1:150–152
critics of, 1:151–152
definitions regarding, 1:151 dominance focus of, 1:151 global capitalism critique and, 1:151 globalization and, 1:151

media imperialism discourse and, 1:151 modernity critique and, 1:151 nationality discourse and, 1:151
North-South relations and, 1:151
UNESCO and, 1:151
Cultural Indicators Project, 1:265, 1:266
Cultural Revolution. See Chinese Cultural Revolution
Cultural studies, 1:152–153
cultural contexts analysis and, 1:152 culturalist vs. structuralist analysis and, 1:153
S. Hall's work and, 1:153 institutional origins of, 1:152
Marxism vs. conservatism and, 1:152–153 multiplicity of themes in, 1:153
Raymond William's work in, 1:152, 1:153
Culture and Society (Williams), 1:152 Cybernationalism, 1:153–154 example of, 1:154 execution channel for objectives function of, 1:154 globalization and, 1:153–154
information center element of, 1:154 organizational platform function of, 1:154
Cyprus, 1:194, 1:220
Czech Republic
East German exodus and, 1:267
Václav Havel and, 1:301–302

DailyKos, 1:27, 1:29–30, 2:671
Daily Show, The, 1:155–156 candidate, campaign information source, 1:363 celebrity interview segment of, 1:155
"mockumentary" format of, 1:155 nightly news satire program, 1:155, 1:313–314 political information source, 1:29, 1:333, 2:750
Saturday Night Live and, 2:731
soft news of, 2:750
Jon Stewart and, 1:155
Daisy Girl ad, 1:156 fear appeals of, 1:232, 2:714 historic impact of, 1:156, 1:333 1964 Johnson campaign and, 1:9, 1:276, 2:561, 2:604, 2:714, 2:736 political marketing example and, 2:604
resonance theory and, 2:714
TechnoDistortion used in, 2:782
Daley, Richard, 1:138
Danielson, W. A., 2:507
Das Kapital (Marx), 2:418
David, Richard C., 1:135
Davis, Dennis, 1:295
Dealignment, 1:156–158
agenda setting and, 1:157
decoupling of parties and society concept and, 1:157–158
individualization of politics and, 1:158 party identification and, 2:537 political communication effects and, 1:157 political socialization processes and, 1:157, 2:657
priming and, 1:157
psychological predispositions erosion and, 1:157–158 social characteristics focus in, 1:156–157 social modernization and, 1:157, 2:657
voter apathy and, 1:36, 2:592–593, 2:657
See also Political parties
Dean, Howard, 1:60, 1:158–159
"Dean Scream," 2004 Iowa caucuses and, 1:158, 1:326
Democratic Party and, 1:158–159
grassroots approach of, 1:159 Internet use by, 1:158, 1:334, 1:351, 2:492, 2:619, 2:792, 2:829–830, 2:851
public campaign funding and, 1:78
Joe Trippi and, 2:792
2004 election and, 1:158–159, 1:258, 1:334, 1:351, 2:619, 2:671, 2:792, 2:829–830, 2:851
Death penalty, 1:46
Debates, 1:159–165
abbreviated response times issue and, 1:161
argumentation, political and, 1:41–42 average viewing audience and, 1:159, 1:160 (table) behavioral effects of, 1:163, 1:164
Brandt–Adenauer (Germany), 1:65
in Bulgaria, 1:71
Bush (G. H. W.)–Clinton (1992), 1:72
Bush (G. H. W.)–Clinton–Perot (1992), 1:163, 2:544
Bush (G. H. W.)–Dukakis (1988), 1:161
Bush (G. H. W.)–Ferraro (1984) vice-presidential, 1:237
Bush (G. W.)–Gore (2000), 1:278
candidate-centered communication and, 1:81 candidate clash and, 1:162 candidate image evaluation effects of, 1:164
Carter–Reagan (1980), 2:703
Jacques Chirac (France), 1:102
Clinton–Dole (1996), 1:162, 1:163 cognitive effects of, 1:163–164
Commission on Presidential Debates (CPD) and, 1:119–120, 1:161
DebateWatch and, 1:119–120, 1:165–166
democracy and, 1:159–160, 1:164
Dole–Mondale Vice Presidential debate and, 1:191
Equal Time Rule and, 1:160
Federal Communications Act and, 1:160
Federal Communications Commission and, 1:160
follow-up questioning issue and, 1:161 Ford–Carter (1976), 1:159,* 1:160–161, 1:250 formats of, 1:161–162
in Germany, 2:629
Great Debates, of Constitutional Convention, 1:41, 1:42
in The Handbook of Political Communication (Nimmo & Sanders), 1:295 history of U.S. presidential, 1:160–161
horserace coverage of, 1:362 issue positions focus of, 1:159, 1:163–164
Kennedy–Nixon (1960), 1:159, 1:160, 1:284, 1:333, 1:371, 1:385, 2:516, 2:546, 2:561, 2:742, 2:777
"kitchen debate" (Nixon–Khrushchev) and, 2:516
Sidney Kraus and, 1:385
Lang's work on, 1:390
latent effects of, 1:164
League of Women Voters and, 1:160–161

Jim Lehrer and, 1:162
Lincoln–Douglas, 1:42, 1:284, 2:547
McGovern–Humphrey–Chisholm (1972), 1:103 panel of journalist questioners role and, 1:161 political argumentation and, 1:41–42
political image and, 1:323
political information efficacy and, 2:583
Reagan–Mondale (1984), 1:21, 1:161, 1:313, 2:704 responsive to public needs and, 1:164
Rock the Vote and, 2:722
Saturday Night Live satire of, 2:731 statistics regarding, 1:159, 1:160 (table)
televised debates around the world and, 1:164–165 Town Hall vs. podium, vs. chat format effects and, 1:162 verbal style analysis in, 2:807 viewer dispositions and, 1:163
Barbara Walters and, 1:161
See also DebateWatch

DebateWatch, 1:165–166
Commission on Presidential Debates (CPD) and, 1:119–120, 1:165
debates and, 1:159–165
key findings from, 1:165–166

Deciding What's News (Gans), 1:166
content analysis of, 1:166
ethnographic focus of, 1:166
"golden age" of news and, 1:166

Deep Throat, 1:26, 1:825
DeFleur, Melvin, 1:181–182
DeFunis v. Odegaard, 1:11

de Gaulle, Charles, 1:167
advertising consultant used by, 1:167 Fifth French Republic and, 1:167
media used by, 1:167

Deliberation, 1:167–168
argumentation politics and, 1:167–168 bargaining and rhetoric and, 1:168 deliberative democratic theories and, 1:167–168 empirical studies of, 1:168
political group decision making and, 1:287–289
public communication in politics and, 2:668–671

Dell, Daniel, 1:331
de Mello, Fernando Collor, 1:66

Demirel, Süleyman, 1:168–169 advertising strategies of, 1:169
early political career of, 1:168
National Front coalition government of, 1:169
popularity of, 1:168

Democracy theories, 1:169–174
deliberation and, 1:167–168
democracy concept and, 1:170–171 democratic nucleus and, 1:169 direct democracy and, 1:188–189 empirical vs. normative democracy theories and, 1:169 equality dimension and, 1:170–171 freedom dimension and, 1:170 guarantee of rights and, 1:171 institutional design theories and, 1:169 matrix of democracy and, 1:172, 1:173 (table) normative foundation theories and, 1:169 political, judicial control of power dimension and, 1:171 political communication and, 1:172–173
political group decision making and, 1:287–289
procedural democracy defined and, 1:170 procedures of decision and, 1:171 public communication and, 1:171 quality of functioning theories and, 1:169 questions answered by, 1:169–170 regulation of intermediate sphere and, 1:171 rules settlements and implementations and, 1:171–172 self-determination, sovereignty of the people and, 1:170 social welfare and education focus in, 1:170

Democracy Wall (China), 1:55
Democratic Corporatist media system model, 2:648, 2:649–650
Democratic Leadership Council (DLC), 1:112, 1:175 Democratic Left Party (Turkey), 1:197

Democratic National Committee (DNC), 1:174
Commission on Presidential Debates and, 1:119 controversies confronted by, 1:174
Howard Dean and, 1:158–159
functions of, 1:174
fundraising of, 1:174
Fred Harris and, 1:298
health care reform issue and, 1:5
leadership of, 1:174
new media technologies and, 1:174
1968 nominating convention and, 1:136, 2:421
platform of, 1:174 political advertising of, 1:174
2004 nominating convention and, 1:138
See also Democratic National Convention; Democratic Party; Watergate

Democratic National Convention
Shirley Chisholm (1972) and, 1:102
Bill Clinton (1992) and, 1:111–112
C-SPAN and, 1:148
Democratic National Committee and, 1:174
Hubert Humphrey (1948) and, 1:314
Jesse Jackson speeches and, 1:347, 2:695
mass media and, 1:137–138
George McGovern and (1972), 2:430, 2:651
1924, 2:636, 2:696
1968, 1:136, 1:138, 1:241, 1:290, 1:372
Barack Obama (2004) and, 2:519
Ann Richards (1988) and, 2:720
Eleanor Roosevelt (1933) and, 2:724
Adlai Stevenson (1956) and, 1:371
2004, 1:60*
See also Democratic National Committee (DNC); Democratic Party

Democratic Party, 1:174–175
AARP and, 1:1
Shirley Chisholm and, 1:101–102
civil rights and, 1:314
Civil War and, 1:175
Hillary Rodham Clinton 2008 presidential bid and, 1:110
Bill Clinton and, 1:111–112
coalition tensions in, 1:175 color-coded system (blue) and, 2:712 Commission on Party Structure and Delegate Selection and, 2:430

conservativism and, 1:129, 1:175
Howard Dean and, 1:158–159
Democratic Leadership Council and, 1:175
Democratic National Committee and, 1:174
female voting behavior and, 1:263–264
527 groups and, 2:749
Horace Greeley and, 1:285
Hubert Humphrey and, 1:314–315
issue ownership of, 1:34, 1:354, 2:654
Jesse Jackson and, 1:357, 2:695
Latino vote and, 1:399
liberalist trends of, 1:175
McGovern-Fraser Commission of, 2:651
New Democrats and, 1:111, 1:112 new media technologies used by, 1:175
nominating conventions of, 1:135–138
Party Press era and, 2:538–539
podcasts used by, 2:491
James Polk and, 2:627
Joseph Pulitzer and, 2:854
race affecting, 2:695
Republican Party and, 1:174–175
Eleanor Roosevelt and, 2:723–724
"Solid South" and, 2:712
Southern Democrats and, 1:111
unions and, 2:798
See also Democratic National Committee (DNC); Democratic National Convention Democratic Republican Party, 2:504
Democratic Republican Party caucus, 1:135
Democratization, role of the media in, 1:175–179
Al Jazeera television and, 1:24
in Argentina, 1:22–23, 1:39–41
big-character posters (China) and, 1:55
in Brazil, 1:65–67, 1:86
in Bulgaria, 1:70–72, 2:857
campaign advertising and, 1:50–52
Fernando Henrique Cardoso (Brazil) and, 1:86
in Chile, 1:49–50
in China, 1:99
consolidation phase of, 1:177–178
Council of Europe, media policy and, 1:138–142
cracker barrel democracy and, 1:42
democracy theories and, 1:169–175
democratization phase of, 1:177
diffusion of innovations and, 1:184
direct democracy and, 1:188–189
East Asian, autocratic regimes path to, 1:179
Eastern Europe, post-communist path to, 1:178 globalization and, 1:175–176
in Hungary, 1:315–318
international media attention and, 1:177 Internet use and, 2:492–493
interpersonal political communication and, 1:345
in Jordan, 1:2, 1:319 journalists' role in, 1:178
Latin American military dictatorships path to, 1:178–179 liberalization phase of, 1:177 media regulation and, 1:178 media strategies of participants in, 1:176 modernization and, 2:466–467
new media technologies and, 1:176–177
partial or defective democracies and, 1:176 path dependency theory of, 1:178–179 phases of, 1:177–178
political argumentation and, 1:41–42
political censorship and, 1:177
radio talk shows and, 2:778
Soviet Union collapse and, 1:114, 1:123, 1:176, 1:177, 1:184
Third Wave of Democratization and, 1:273
Zhelyu Zhelev (Bulgaria) and, 2:857
Democrats for Nixon, 1:129
Demography, 1:179–180
causations theories and, 1:179–180 ontological study of, 1:180
political communication and, 1:179–180 research organizations and, 1:179 social interactions study and, 1:179
Deng Xiaoping, 1:180–181
Chinese Communist Party and, 1:180–181 economic reform and openness of, 1:180–181
"four modernizations" of, 1:181
Hong Kong Handover and, 1:309
Tiananmen movement and, 1:180–181
Denmark
debates in, 1:164
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
Muhammed cartoon events and, 2:474–475, 2:511
Denton, Robert E., Jr., 1:181 political communication publications of, 1:181 presidential elections focus of, 1:181 Dependency theory, media, 1:181–182
agenda setting and, 1:182
audience-media-society relationship focus of, 1:181–182 cognitive, affective, behavioral media effects and, 1:182 deactivation of voters and, 1:182 modernization theory vs., 2:467
Descartes, René, 2:593
DeVries, Walter, 1:31
Dewey, John, 1:409, 2:593 public communication focus of, 2:668–670 public sphere discourse and, 2:682, 2:683
Dewpew, Chauncey, 2:473
Diffusion of innovations, 1:182–185
agenda setting and, 1:184–185
basic research paradigm of, 1:183
definitions regarding, 1:182
digital divide and, 1:186–187 history, conceptual overview of, 1:182–184 hybrid seed corn example of, 1:183 interpersonal communication role in, 1:183–184 mass media importance in, 1:183–184 media agenda and, 1:184–185
Philippine example of, 1:182
policy agenda and, 1:185

political contexts and, 1:184
public agenda and, 1:185
S-curve of adoption and, 1:182–183, 1:183 (figure)
social marketing and, 2:747–748
social process of, 1:183–184
Gabriel Tarde origination of, 1:182–183 tetracycline example of, 1:183–184 time variable in, 1:184
Diffusion of Innovations (Rogers), 1:183 Digital divide, 1:186, 1:186–187 digital inequality concept and, 1:187 between industrialized and developing countries, 1:271, 1:272 information and communication technologies (ICT) focus of, 1:186 Internet diffusion rates and, 1:186 knowledge divide and, 1:186, 1:383
knowledge gap and, 1:383–384
material, motivation, skills, and usage access issues of, 1:186–187 policy initiatives regarding, 1:187 Direct action protest, Australia, 1:187–188 anti–Vietnam War campaigns and, 1:188 civil disobedience through, 1:187, 1:188 environmental activism and, 1:188
Franklin River blockage and, 1:188 indigenous rights movement and, 1:188 labor movement and, 1:188 nuclear disarmament campaigns and, 1:188 social movements focus of, 1:187–188 Direct democracy, 1:188–189
in ancient Greece and Roman Republic, 1:189 representative democracy vs., 1:190 in United Kingdom, 1:189
Direct mail, 1:189–190
AAPC awards and, 1:31
American-style campaigning and, 1:34 candidate biographical films and, 1:84
criticisms of, 1:191
Eisenhower use of, 1:190
grassroots campaigning and, 1:189, 2:494
immediacy factor of, 1:190 marketing focus of, 1:190
media consultants and, 2:441
personal appeal techniques of, 1:190–191 political campaigning and, 1:79 political uses of, 1:190
Dirty Politics (Jamieson), 1:358 Discrimination
affirmative action and, 1:10–11
Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, 1:10
"Philadelphia Order" and, 1:10
reverse discrimination and, 1:10–11
See also African Americans, role in politics; Civil rights movement; Minorities, role in politics; Race in politics; Racism; Segregation
Disengagement theory
infotainment and, 1:335, 1:336
negative advertising and, 2:486
older voting adults and, 1:19–20
Disney, Roy, 1:205, 2:546
Diversity Institute, Vanderbilt University, 1:260
DLC (Democratic Leadership Council), 1:112
DNC. See Democratic National Committee
Doe v. University of Michigan, 1:301
Dogmatism Scale, 1:46
Dole, Elizabeth, 1:87, 1:190–191
biased media coverage of, 1:190–191
Robert Dole and, 1:191–192
drinking age work of, 1:190
"first woman" frame and, 2:847
Ari Fleischer and, 1:247
1996 election and, 1:190
political "firsts" of, 1:190
as Senator, North Carolina, 1:190, 1:191 talk-show communication style of, 1:190 2000 presidential nomination and, 1:190–191, 2:846–847
Dole, Robert, 1:191–192
books by, 1:192
Patrick Buchanan and, 1:68
Clinton–Dole debates and, 1:162
Elizabeth Dole and, 1:191–192
free air time and, 1:259
humor, wit of, 1:191, 1:192
Iowa caucuses and, 1:350–351
military career of, 1:191
negative advertising of, 1:191
1976 vice presidency and, 1:191
1980, 1988 elections and, 1:75, 1:161, 1:350–351
1996 election and, 1:111, 1:190, 1:191, 1:259, 1:334, 2:851
Republican National Committee chairman, 2:711
television talk shows and, 2:779
Domino theory, communism and, 1:123
Donohue, George, 1:383, 2:585
Donsbach, Wolfgang, 1:192 comparative research of, 1:192 journalism focus of, 1:192 political communication focus of, 1:192 public opinion polls focus of, 1:192
World Association for Public Opinion Research and, 1:192, 2:849
Doonesbury comic strip, 1:313
Douglas, Frederick, 2:693
Downs, Anthony, 2:419–420, 2:815–816
Dramatistic approaches to political communication, 1:193–194
Bernard Brock's work and, 1:193
Kenneth Burke's work and, 1:193 common vocabulary focus in, 1:193 contextualism and, 1:193
Fantasy Theme Analysis and, 1:193
ideology and, 1:193–194
infotainment and, 1:335–336
Robert Ivie's work and, 1:193, 1:194 language-based interaction shaping human behavior, 1:193
Gianpietro Mazzoleni's (Italy) work and, 2:423
media logic and, 2:446
Mediated Political Realities (Nimmo & Combs) and, 2:446–447

mediatization and, 2:447–448
motivation and, 1:193–194 political speaker's language choices and, 1:193 political symbols focus in, 1:193 politics across time and, 1:193
The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life (Goffman) and, 2:630–631
Symbolic Convergence Theory and, 1:193
Dramaturgy, 1:193
Drucker, Pete, 1:331
Drudge, Matt. See Drudge Report
Drudge Report
Monica Lewinsky scandal and, 1:113, 1:127, 1:363, 2:613
news immediacy and, 1:126
Duhalde, Eduardo, 1:40
Dukakis, Michael, 1:72, 1:194–195
Bush–Dukakis debates and, 1:161
Willie Horton and, 1:194, 2:485, 2:561, 2:567, 2:695, 2:838–839
Massachusetts political career of, 1:194
1988 election and, 1:194, 1:231–232, 1:298, 1:357, 2:485
Saturday Night Live and, 2:731

Eagleton, Thomas F., 1:142, 1:230
George McGovern and, 2:430
EAPC. See European Association of Political Consultants
Easton, David, 2:577, 2:580
EBU (European Broadcasting Union), 1:221
EC. See European Community
Ecevit, Bülent, 1:197–198 center-left programs of, 1:197
Cyprus and, 1:197
Süleyman Demirel and, 1:169
Democratic Left Party and, 1:197 man of the people image of, 1:197
Republican People's Party and, 1:197
ECHR. See European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR)
ECHR (European Court of Human Rights), 1:139
An Economic Theory of Democracy (Downs), 2:419, 2:815–816
The Economist news magazine, 2:502
Edelman, Lauren, 1:198
Edelman, Murray, 1:193, 1:198, 1:390
books written by, 1:198
symbolic politics focus of, 1:198, 2:632
The Symbolic Uses of Politics work of, 1:198, 2:769–770
Voter News Service and, 2:817
Editorials, 1:198–199 candidate endorsement through, 1:199 current events inspiration for, 1:199 ethical guidelines for, 1:199 explanatory vs. persuasive type of, 1:199 Horace Greeley creator of, 2:505 message and purpose solidarity of, 1:199 official publication viewpoint and, 1:198 op-ed pieces and, 1:198
political cartoons and, 1:87,* 1:87–88
political commentary and, 1:117–119, 1:332
Edwards, John, 1:110
Effects of Mass Communication, The (Klapper), 1:199–200, 1:381–382, 1:407–408, 2:584, 2:793
E-government, 1:200–204
G. W. Bush administration and, 1:201
Clinton administration and, 1:201
conclusions regarding, 1:203 definition and study of, 1:200–201
e-administration of, 1:202, 1:202 (figure) E-Government Act and, 1:201
e-participation in, 1:202 (figure), 1:203
e-services of, 1:202 (figure) e-spheres of, 1:202, 1:202 (figure) FirstGov.gov web portal and, 1:201 government-to-business e-services of, 1:202–203 government-to-citizen e-services of, 1:202 government-to-employees e-services of, 1:203 government-to-government e-services of, 1:203 information and communications technologies use and, 1:200 IRS overhaul and, 1:201 multi- and interdisciplinary field of, 1:200 narrow-broad distinction controversy regarding, 1:200–201 in other nations, 1:201
in practice, 1:201–202
Quicksilver Initiatives and, 1:201 transforming government access through technology and, 1:200, 1:201, 1:204
Egypt
Anwar Al-Sadat and, 1:26–27, 1:368
Corrective Revolution in, 1:27
Israel's peace treaty with (1979), 1:368
Kifayah movement in, 1:24
Hosni Mubarak and, 2:472
Gamal Abdel Nasser and, 1:26–27, 2:481–482
Eisenhower, Dwight David, 1:204–206
The American Voter and, 1:35–36, 2:419, 2:581
direct mail used by, 1:190
"Eisenhower Answers America" ad and, 1:8–9, 1:204–205, 1:205 (figure), 1:333, 2:561
Farewell Address of, 2:635
"I Like Ike" ad and, 1:205, 1:206 (figure) 1952 election and, 1:8–9, 1:190, 1:204–205, 1:205–206 (figures), 1:333, 2:441, 2:507, 2:546, 2:561, 2:628, 2:665, 2:712, 2:763–764
1956 election and, 1:35–36, 2:764
Nixon as vice president to, 2:516
press conferences of, 2:506, 2:754, 2:837
press corps and, 2:837
press secretary of, 2:646–647
psychographic campaign techniques used by, 2:665 Stevenson radio commentaries and, 1:28 television used by, 2:754
testimonials used by, 2:788
Elderly. See Aging and politics
Electioneering industry
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:57, 2:427 candidate-centered, personal campaigning and, 1:33–34, 1:80 in colonial America, 2:626–627
electioneering communications and, 1:57, 2:427, 2:562

media consultant history and, 2:441
political consultants and, 1:133–134
professionalization and, 2:656–657
Elections: 1800 presidential, 2:504
Elections: 1828 presidential, 2:441, 2:627
Elections: 1832 presidential, 1:135
Elections: 1840 presidential, 1:285, 2:627
Elections: 1844 presidential, 2:627
Elections: 1856 presidential, 1:135
Elections: 1860 presidential Democratic Party in, 1:175
Horace Greeley and, 1:285, 2:505
Abraham Lincoln and, 2:505
Republican Party and, 2:505
Elections: 1872 presidential, 1:285
Elections: 1900 presidential, 2:628
Elections: 1940 presidential media's effect on voting behavior study and, 1:400, 1:407, 2:419, 2:508, 2:540–542, 2:777, 2:793–794, 2:813
radio and, 1:333, 2:777
Elections: 1948 presidential, 2:507
Elections: 1952 presidential direct mail used in, 1:190
"Eisenhower Answers America" ad and, 1:8–9, 1:204–205, 1:205–206 (figures), 1:333, 2:441, 2:546, 2:561
Hubert Humphrey and, 1:315
Gladys Lang's research on, 1:390
newspaper coverage of, 2:507
Adlai Stevenson and, 1:28, 2:763–764
TechnoDistortion television ads and, 2:781 television advertising expenditures in, 1:204, 1:333, 2:441, 2:712
testimonials used in, 2:788
Elections: 1956 presidential
The American Voter (Campbell, Miller, & Converse) and, 1:35–36 campaign spending in, 1:34
D. D. Eisenhower and, 1:35–36, 2:764
Adlai Stevenson and, 2:763–764
testimonials used in, 2:788
Elections: 1960 presidential debates and, 1:385
Hubert Humphrey and, 1:315
L. B. Johnson and, 1:128, 1:359
John F. Kennedy and, 1:371
Kennedy–Nixon debates and, 1:159, 1:160, 1:284, 1:333, 1:371, 2:516, 2:546, 2:561, 2:742, 2:777
newspaper coverage of, 2:507
political consultants and, 1:154
testimonials used in, 2:788
Elections: 1964 presidential
"Daisy Girl" ad and, 1:9, 1:156, 1:232, 1:276, 1:333, 2:561, 2:604, 2:714, 2:736, 2:782
direct mail used in, 1:190
Barry Goldwater and, 1:136, 1:156, 1:190, 1:232, 1:275–276, 2:494, 2:561, 2:695, 2:703, 2:712
L. B. Johnson and, 1:128, 1:156, 1:159, 1:232, 1:358, 2:471, 2:561
nominating convention and, 1:136
racial issues in, 2:695
testimonials used in, 2:788
Elections: 1968 presidential agenda setting in, 1:13–14
Spiro Agnew and, 1:20–21
Patrick Buchanan and, 1:68
Hubert Humphrey and, 1:315, 2:477, 2:481, 2:516
L. B. Johnson and, 1:358
Robert F. Kennedy and, 1:372
Eugene McCarthy and, 1:80, 1:358, 1:372
Edmund Muskie and, 2:477
Nixon's media adviser and, 1:21, 1:134, 2:561
nominating conventions and, 1:136, 1:138, 1:241, 1:290, 1:372
racial issues in, 2:695
The Selling of the President 1968 (McGinniss) and, 2:741–742
George Wallace and, 1:371, 2:477, 2:516, 2:695
Elections: 1972 presidential agenda setting in, 1:14
Spiro Agnew and, 1:20–21
candidate images and, 1:85–86
Shirley Chisholm and, 1:101–102
John Connally and, 1:129
Creating Reality (Altheide) and, 1:142
Eagleton Affair and, 1:230
Fred Harris and, 1:298
Hubert Humphrey and, 1:315
Iowa caucuses and, 1:350
George McGovern and, 1:101–102, 1:230, 1:290, 1:350, 2:429–430, 2:477, 2:561, 2:651
Edmund Muskie and, 2:477–478
primaries in, 2:651
testimonials used in, 2:788
The Unseeing Eye (Patterson & McClure) and, 2:800 uses and gratifications study of, 2:802–803
youth vote in, 2:855
Elections: 1976 presidential agenda setting in, 1:15, 1:17
Jimmy Carter and, 1:73, 1:160–161, 1:250, 1:350, 2:561
Ford-Carter debates and, 1:160–161, 1:250
Fred Harris and, 1:298
Iowa caucuses and, 1:350
nominating conventions and, 1:138
Ronald Reagan and, 2:703
testimonials used in, 2:788
youth vote in, 2:855
Elections: 1980 presidential
G. H. W. Bush candidate film and, 1:84
John Connally and, 1:129
debates of, 1:161
nominating conventions and, 1:138
Republican primary in, 1:72
testimonials used in, 2:788
youth vote in, 2:855

Elections: 1984 presidential Geraldine Ferraro and, 1:237
Gary Hart and, 1:350, 2:444
Iowa caucuses and, 1:350
Jesse Jackson and, 1:103, 1:357, 2:695
media partisan bias and, 2:436
nominating conventions and, 1:138
Reagan campaign and, 1:21, 1:84, 2:704
Reagan-Mondale debates and, 1:21, 1:161, 1:313, 2:704
Elections: 1988 presidential
G. H. W. Bush and, 1:21, 1:161, 1:194, 1:231–232, 1:350–351, 2:422
Bush–Dukakis debates and, 1:161
Bush–Rather confrontation and, 1:75, 2:699
character assassinations in, 1:83
Michael Dukakis and, 1:194, 1:357 fear appeals in, 1:231–232
Gary Hart and, 1:83
Willie Horton ad and, 1:194, 2:485, 2:561, 2:567, 2:695, 2:838–839
Iowa caucuses and, 1:350–351
Jesse Jackson and, 1:103, 1:194, 1:357, 2:695
media consultants and, 1:21 negative television advertising in, 1:8, 1:72, 1:194, 2:485
Patricia Schroeder and, 2:734
youth vote in, 2:856
Elections: 1992 presidential alternative media in, 1:30
ballot measures spending in, 1:50
G. H. W. Bush and, 1:72, 1:111, 1:247, 1:351, 2:422, 2:434, 2:588 candidate film and (Clinton), 1:85
James Carville, political consultant and, 1:88
character assassinations in, 1:83
Bill Clinton and, 1:27, 1:72, 1:83, 1:111, 1:147, 1:163, 1:407, 2:434, 2:561, 2:563, 2:588
Crosstalk (Just, Crigler, Alger, Cook, Kern, & West) and, 1:146–147
debates of, 1:120, 1:163
Democratic voting press corps and, 2:434
horserace coverage of, 1:147
Iowa caucuses and, 1:351
Iraq War issue and, 2:588
media partisan bias and, 2:436
negative advertising in, 1:72, 1:147, 2:561, 2:563
Ross Perot and, 1:29, 1:78, 1:111, 1:120, 1:163, 2:543, 2:706 public campaign funding in, 1:78
talk shows and, 1:81, 1:407
youth vote in, 2:855, 2:856
Elections: 1994 midterm
advocacy advertising in, 1:5
Gingrich and, 1:268
Rush Limbaugh and, 1:407
radio talk shows and, 1:333, 1:407, 2:712
Republican Congress and, 1:268, 2:548, 2:712
Elections: 1996 presidential
Patrick Buchanan and, 1:68
James Carville, political consultant and, 1:88
Clinton campaign and, 2:561, 2:563
Clinton–Dole debates and, 1:162
DebateWatch and, 1:165
Robert Dole and, 1:191
Dole–Mondale vice-presidential debate and, 1:191
free airtime and, 1:259
Ralph Nader and, 2:480
negative advertising in, 2:563
Ross Perot and, 2:544, 2:706
radio talk shows, primaries and, 2:777
soft money expenditures in, 1:56, 1:70
Web campaigning and, 1:334, 2:829
youth vote in, 2:856
Elections: 1998 midterm, 1:50
Elections: 2000 presidential advocacy advertising in, 1:5
ballot measures spending in, 1:50
Patrick Buchanan and, 1:68, 2:706
G. W. Bush and, 1:73, 1:210, 1:224, 1:278, 1:355, 1:407, 2:563
Bush's military service, bloggers and, 1:61 color coding of parties and, 2:712 comedy shows priming and, 2:654
DebateWatch and, 1:165
Elizabeth Dole and, 1:190–191
election dataset of, 1:358
e-mail used in, 1:210
entertainment priming and, 2:654
female voting behavior and, 1:264
Florida controversy and, 1:73, 1:224, 1:278, 2:765, 2:775,* 2:817
Al Gore and, 1:278, 1:407, 2:563, 2:731
grassroots campaigning in, 1:282
John McCain and, 2:424
Ralph Nader and, 2:851
negative advertising in, 2:563 party issue ownership and, 1:355
Dan Rather and, 2:699
Reform Party and, 2:706
Saturday Night Live and, 2:731
soft money expenditures in, 1:56
television coverage of, 1:333
Web campaigning and, 2:829
Webstyle analysis of, 2:832
youth vote in, 2:856
Elections: 2002 midterm
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:6, 2:567
Elections: 2004 presidential advocacy groups and, 2:493, 2:567
American National Election Study of, 2:594
"Ashley's Story" ad and, 1:7, 2:567 attack ads of, 1:73–74
ballot measures spending in, 1:50
blogs, Internet used in, 1:30, 1:60, 2:490, 2:491, 2:492, 2:619, 2:671, 2:792, 2:829–830
Patrick Buchanan and, 1:68
G. W. Bush and, 1:7, 1:73–74, 1:158–159, 1:269, 1:282, 1:314, 1:364, 2:563 campaign financing and, 2:562
character assassinations in, 1:83

Howard Dean and, 1:158–159, 1:258, 1:334, 1:351, 2:619, 2:671, 2:792, 2:829–830, 2:851
DebateWatch and, 1:165
election dataset of, 1:358
e-mail used in, 2:490
female voting behavior and, 1:264
527 groups and, 1:6–7, 2:567, 2:749
grassroots campaigning in, 1:282–283, 1:334, 2:792 image vs. issue ads and, 2:563
Iowa caucuses and, 1:351
John Kerry and, 1:6–7, 1:73–74, 1:83, 1:158, 1:314, 1:340, 1:351, 1:364, 2:435, 2:547–548, 2:563, 2:567, 2:708, 2:788, 2:808
Libertarian Party and, 1:406
minority voting statistics and, 2:463
Carol Moseley Braun and, 2:470–471
Ralph Nader and, 2:480
National Election Poll and, 2:817 national security vs. moral issues in, 1:323 negative advertising in, 2:563
news content analysis of, 1:364
nominating conventions and, 1:138
Pew Internet study of, 2:550
political interest groups and, 1:340, 2:567
political satire regarding, 1:314
Rock the Vote and, 2:722
Saturday Night Live and, 2:731
television coverage of, 1:333
testimonials used in, 2:788
Web campaigning and, 2:829–830
youth vote in, 2:855, 2:856
Elections: 2005 gubernatorial, 1:5
Elections: 2006 midterm
electronic voting systems and, 1:224
National Election Poll and, 2:817
women's vote and, 1:264
Elections: 2008 presidential Hillary Rodham Clinton and, 1:110, 1:114, 1:246
John Edwards and, 1:110
Rudy Giuliani and, 1:269
John McCain and, 2:424
Barack Obama and, 1:110, 2:519
primaries of, 2:652 public fund campaign finance and, 1:78
Reform Party and, 2:706
Electoral college, 1:134–135, 2:477
Electoral systems, 1:206–210
The American Voter (Campbell, Miller, & Converse) and, 1:35–36, 2:419, 2:581 closed and blocked candidacy list and, 1:207 closed and unblocked candidacy list and, 1:207 compensatory system type of, 1:208–209 concentration evaluation criteria and, 1:209 constituency magnitude and, 1:207 contextual factors and, 1:206–207 districting process and, 1:207 electoral formulae and, 1:208 evaluation criteria for, 1:209 forms of candidacy and, 1:207 freedom of choice candidacy list and, 1:207 gerrymandering and, 1:207 individual candidacy and, 1:207 kinds of voting and, 1:207–208 legitimacy evaluation criteria and, 1:209 majority and proportional representation and, 1:207, 1:208 multi-member constituencies and, 1:207 narrow vs. broad conceptualization of, 1:206 participation evaluation criteria and, 1:209 party lists candidacy and, 1:207 party systems and, 1:206–207 personalized proportional system type of, 1:208 plurality formula and, 1:208 proportional formula and, 1:208
proportional representation and, 2:661–662 representation evaluation criteria and, 1:209 segmented system type of, 1:209 simplicity evaluation criteria and, 1:209 single-member constituencies and, 1:207 societal factors and, 1:206–207 structure of, 1:207–208 thresholds of representation and, 1:208
2000 Election controversy and, 1:73
types of, 1:208–209
worldwide trends in, 1:209
See also Political parties
Electronic government. See E-government
Ellsberg, Daniel, 2:540
E-mail, political uses, 1:210 cause mobilization and, 1:210 congress, the media and, 1:127 congress to constituents and, 1:210 cost savings of, 1:210
cybernationalism and, 1:154
DebateWatch results and, 1:165
grassroots campaigning and, 1:282, 1:334
grassroots lobbying and, 1:283, 2:668
personal campaigning and, 2:545
2000, 2004 elections and, 1:210, 2:490, 2:492, 2:722
See also Web campaigning; World Wide Web, political uses
Embedded journalists, 1:211
interpersonal communication and, 1:211
Iraq War and, 1:211, 1:352
metacoverage and, 2:454
openness and immediacy standards and, 1:211
pooled journalism and, 2:625
Public Affairs Guidance on Embedding Media and, 1:211 reporting bias and, 1:211
Geraldo Rivera controversy and, 2:721 war coverage and, 2:822
EMILY's (Early Money Is Like Yeast) List, 1:263
Engels, Friedrich, 1:123, 1:402, 2:417
The Engineering of Consent (Bernays), 1:133
England. See Great Britain
English Woman's Journal, 1:236
Entman, Robert, 1:211–212
books written by, 1:212
media influence in international contexts and, 1:212

media's framing effects and, 1:212, 1:256
media's unbalanced racial coverage and, 1:212
EP. See European Parliament
Equal Employment Opportunity Act, 2:479
Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, 1:10, 1:307
Equal Rights Amendment (ERA)
Betty Ford and, 1:249
Equal time provision, 1:212–213
Communications Act of 1934 and, 1:212–213, 2:440, 2:562
debates and, 1:160
equal access and, 2:440
equal opportunity vs., 1:212–213
Fairness Doctrine and, 1:227
FCC and, 2:420, 2:562
Radio Act of 1927 and, 1:212
ERA. See Equal Rights Amendment
Erdoğan, Recep Tayyip, 1:213–214 as conservative democrat, 1:213
image of, 1:213
Islamist political parties of, 1:213 media opposition to, 1:213–214 tradition vs. modern Turkey and, 1:213
Cem Uzan and, 2:804
Estonia, 1:201
EURATOM. See European Atomic Energy Community
Eurobarometer,* 1:214
European Commission and, 1:214, 1:215–216
European Union and, 1:219–221
face-to-face interviews and, 1:214 first study and, 1:214 Flash Eurobarameter surveys and, 1:214 questions on, 1:214
See also European Union (EU)
European Association of Political Consultants (EAPC), 1:31, 1:214–215 board of, 1:215 brother associations of, 1:215 cooperation focus of, 1:215 democracy focus of, 1:215 Election Time yearbook of, 1:215 information, experience exchange focus of, 1:215 International Association of Political Consultants and, 1:215 Master Class seminar of, 1:215 membership of, 1:215 nonpartisan association and, 1:214 political campaigns analysis and, 1:215
European Atomic Energy Community (EURATOM)
European Commission and, 1:215–216
European Court of Justice and, 1:217
European Broadcasting Union (EBU), 1:221
European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages, 1:139
European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC), 1:217 European Commission, 1:215–216 appointment schedule of, 1:216 cases of political parties governing regulations and, 1:216
Commissioner for Information Society and Media, 1:221
cross-border television regulation and, 1:221
European Court of Justice and, 1:217–218
European Union executive arm and, 1:215
European Union media policy and, 1:221–223
EU Transparency Directive and, 1:223
functions of, 1:215–216
guardian of the treaties function of, 1:216 media Merger Regulation and, 1:223 members of, 1:216
Member States in, 1:216 motion of censure and, 1:216 parliament accountability of, 1:216 political parties governing regulations and, 1:216 public service broadcasting debate and, 1:223
European Community (EC)
European Commission and, 1:215–216
European Court of Justice and, 1:217
See also European Union (EU); European Union (EU), media policy
European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), 1:139, 1:216–217
Council of Europe (1950) and, 1:216
European Court of Human Rights and, 1:216
European Union and, 1:219–221
freedom of expression, speech and, 1:216–217, 1:217 releasing information to the public issue and, 1:216–217 thirteen rights protected by, 1:216
See also European Union (EU)
European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. See European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR)
European Convention on Transfrontier Television, 1:139
European Court of Human Rights, 1:139, 1:216 European Court of Justice, 1:217–218 appeals heard by, 1:217
Charter of Fundamental Rights and, 1:223
cross-border television regulation and, 1:222
EC or EU law judgments of, 1:217
EU court system and, 1:217
EU member states and, 1:217
European Commission and, 1:215–216
European Union and, 1:219–221
European Union court of, 1:217
European Union media policy and, 1:221–223 political parties, elections regulation cases and, 1:218 preliminary references heard by, 1:217–218 purpose of, 1:217
See also European Union (EU)
European Economic Community, 1:220
European Journal of Communication, 1:62
European Parliament (EP), 1:218 direct democratic legitimacy of, 1:218 elections of, 1:218, 1:219
EU legislative and budgetary power and, 1:218
European Commission and, 1:215–216
European Court of Justice and, 1:217–218
European Parliamentary elections and, 1:219
European Union and, 1:219–221
European Union media policy and, 1:221–223 media policy and broadcasting activities of, 1:218 membership numbers determination and, 1:218 power increase of, 1:218 supranational party fractions in, 1:218

See also European Parliamentary elections; European Union (EU)
European Parliamentary elections, 1:219
J. G. Blumler and, 1:61–62
European Parliament and, 1:218
media and, 1:221
second-order elections and, 2:738
European Union (EU), 1:219–221
Accession Act of the European Union and, 1:116
Bulgaria in, 1:71, 1:116
Common Market and, 1:220 constitution issue and, 1:220
Copenhagen membership standards and, 1:220
Cyprus issue and, 1:220
Eurobarometer public opinion survey and, 1:214
Euro currency and, 1:220
European Commission and, 1:215–216
European Court of Justice and, 1:217–218
European Parliament and, 1:218, 1:220
European Parliament elections and, 1:219
Eurozone democratic entity and, 1:220 foreign policy and security mandates of, 1:220 growth stages of, 1:219 language issues and, 1:219–220 member list of, 1:219
news coverage of, 2:499
Poland membership in, 2:555
power of, 1:221
Vladimir Putin and, 2:687
religious conflicts and, 1:220
Turkey and, 1:213
unified European market focus of, 1:220 United Nations charter, human rights and, 1:220 voter participation issue and, 1:220
See also European Union (EU), media policy
European Union (EU), media policy, 1:221–224 advertising restrictions and, 1:222
Audiovisual Media Services Directive and, 1:222
Charter of Fundamental Rights and, 1:223
Commissioner for Information Society and Media and, 1:221 concentration regulation and, 1:223
EC merger regulation and, 1:223
European Broadcasting Union (EBU) and, 1:221
European Parliament and, 1:218, 1:221
European television channel issues and, 1:221
European Union and, 1:219–221
EU Transparency Directive and, 1:223 films and training initiatives and, 1:222 free public access to major events and, 1:222 linear and nonlinear services and, 1:222 merger, competition issues and, 1:223 news reporting regulation and, 1:222
public service broadcasting debate and, 1:223
Television Without Frontiers (TWF) Directive and, 1:222–223
See also European Union (EU)
Eurozone, 1:220
Eveland, William, 1:30
E-voting, 1:224, 1:224–225 companies providing systems and, 1:224
definition of, 1:224
e-government and, 1:203
problems with, 1:224
2000 election and, 1:224
2006 general election and, 1:224
voter-verified paper audit trails of, 1:224–225
See also World Wide Web, political uses
Executive Order 9066 (F. D. Roosevelt), 2:612
Executive Order 10925 (John F. Kennedy), 1:10
Executive Order 11246 (L. B. Johnson), 1:10
Express advocacy vs. issue advocacy, 1:6, 1:57, 1:69–70, 2:426–427, 2:429, 2:566

Fabricant, Neil, 1:281
Facebook, 2:441, 2:491, 2:493
Face-to-face communication Eurobarometer surveys and, 1:214 of grassroots campaigning, 1:282
Internet use and, 2:493
of interpersonal communication, 1:341
Nixon Checkers speech and, 1:38
parasocial political relationships and, 2:530
personal campaigning and, 2:544–545
political argumentation and, 1:41
political debates and, 1:159–160
public communication and, 2:670
publics organization need of, 2:669 public sphere and, 2:682
See also Interpersonal communication
FactCheck, Univ. of Pennsylvania Annenberg School of Communication, 1:10
Fahrenkopf, Frank, 1:119
Fairness Doctrine, 1:227–228 equal time requirements and, 1:227
Federal Communications Commission and, 1:28, 1:122, 1:213, 1:227–228
public interest, convenience, and necessity (PICN) and, 1:227
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC and, 1:227, 2:705 repeal of, 1:228, 1:333, 1:407, 2:670
Falklands-Malvinas War, 1:228–229
Argentine propaganda and, 1:228 geography communication factors and, 1:228 international public opinion in, 1:228 ships sinking and, 1:228
Family Research Council, 1:3
Fantasy theme analysis, 1:229–231
Ernest G. Bormann and, 1:62–63, 1:229, 1:230 cold war paradigm and, 1:230–231 communication applications of, 1:230 community memberships and, 1:230 cooperative story-telling and, 1:229
criticism of, 1:231
dramatism and, 1:193, 1:229 fantasy chaining and, 1:229–230 group consciousness and, 1:229
Massachusetts Bay colony example of, 1:230
“master analogue,” guiding purpose and, 1:230

Mediated Political Realities (Nimmo & Combs) and, 2:446–447
1972 Eagleton Affair example and, 1:230 research studies and, 1:231 rhetorical community and, 1:230 rhetorical criticism and, 1:229 rhetorical vision, broader worldview and, 1:230–231 saga concept and, 1:230 social scientific component of, 1:229 symbolic clues, shorthand references and, 1:230 symbolic convergence and, 1:229, 1:230, 1:231, 2:768–769
Farewell Address, 2:635
of Ronald Reagan, 2:704
of George Washington, 2:635, 2:754
Farm Labor Organizing Committee, 2:462
Faulkner, Ashley, 1:7
FCC. See Federal Communications Commission
Fear appeals, use in politics, 1:231–233
"Daisy Girl" ad and, 1:9, 1:156, 1:232, 1:276, 1:333, 2:561, 2:714, 2:736 effectiveness life of, 1:232 gender factors in use of, 2:810 humor and, 1:232
negative advertising and, 1:231–232
1988 election and, 1:231–232
nonmonotonic characteristic of, 1:232
George Wallace and, 2:821
World War II and, 1:232
FECA. See Federal Election Campaign Act
FEC (Federal Election Commission), 1:234 Federal Communications Commission (FCC) equal opportunity, equal time concept and, 1:213, 2:440, 2:562 Fairness Doctrine and, 1:28, 1:122, 1:213, 1:227–228, 1:333, 1:407, 2:670
free airtime and, 1:259
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC and, 1:227, 2:705
The Telecommunications Act of 1996 and, 1:28
See also Communications Act of 1934
Federal Communications Act, 2:568 Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA), 1:233–234 amendments of, 1:233
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:56, 1:233, 2:562
Buckley v. Valeo, 1:6, 1:56, 1:69–70, 1:77, 1:233
campaign finance and, 1:77
corporate and labor union PAC contributions and, 1:234 disclosure of contributions and expenditures and, 1:233
electioneering communications and, 1:233, 2:427, 2:562 expenditure limits for candidates and, 1:233–234 express vs. issue advocacy and, 1:6, 1:57, 2:426–427, 2:429
Federal Election Commission and, 1:234, 2:562
Federal Trade Commission and, 1:235 independent expenditures limits and, 1:234 individuals' contribution limits and, 1:233 McConnell v. FEC and, 1:57, 1:58, 1:70, 1:234, 2:426–429
political action committees and, 1:233, 1:234, 2:556–557 political speech affected by, 1:233 public financing of presidential election campaigns and, 1:234 radio and television advertising expenditure limits and, 1:234
soft money and, 1:56, 2:562
Watergate scandal and, 1:233
Federal Election Commission (FEC), 1:234, 2:562
Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. and, 1:57, 1:70, 1:234, 2:426, 2:428–429
Willie Horton ad and, 2:839
Federal Election Committee, 2:706
Federalist Party, 2:504
Party Press era and, 2:538–539, 2:636
Federal Radio Commission (FRC), 1:120–121
Federal Republic of Germany
Konrad Adenauer and, 1:4
Angela Merkel and, 2:451,* 2:451–452
Federal Trade Commission (FTC), 1:235 Bureau of Consumer Protection of, 1:235 health claims regulation by, 1:235
National Do Not Call Registry, 1:235
Telemarketing Sales Rule and, 1:235 unfair or deceptive business practices and, 1:235
Feinstein, Diane, 2:829
Felchner, Morgan E., 1:79
Felt, W. Mark, 1:26
The Feminine Mystique (Friedan), 1:236
Feminine style in communication, 1:235–236
"double bind" concept and, 1:235–236 empowering the listener as change agent and, 1:234 male speech strategy and, 1:234 rhetorical style and, 1:234 stereotypical gaps decrease and, 1:236
See also Gender and politics; Women; Women candidates, advertising; Women candidates, news coverage
Feminist movement, 1:236–237 black feminism, 1:236
Shirley Chisholm and, 1:102–103
differences among women focus and, 1:236
Betty Friedan and, 1:236
"liberal" feminism and, 1:236
Marxist/socialist feminism and, 1:236
media legitimacy and, 2:573
national women's organizations and, 1:236
obscenity and pornography and, 2:520–521
political group decision making and, 1:288 radical feminism and, 1:236 right to vote and, 1:236 social and legal justice for women and, 1:236 Ferraro, Geraldine, 1:237 autobiography of, 1:237
Clinton U. N. ambassador and, 1:237
CNN's Crossfire and, 1:237 liberal voting record of, 1:237 media stereotyping of, 1:237
Mondale's running mate, 1:237 senate races of, 1:237 vice-residential debate and, 1:237
Festinger, Leon, 1:12
Fifth Amendment, 1:259
Fifty Books That Significantly Shaped Public Opinion Research (AAPOR), 1:382

Film and politics, 1:237–243
abortion issue and, 1:242
AIDS epidemic and, 1:241, 1:242
All Quiet on the Western Front (Milstone, Dir.), 1:239
All the President's Men (Pakula, Dir.), 1:26, 1:241
American civil war and, 1:238, 1:239
The American President, 1:114
Attack (Aldrich, Dir.), 1:240
Back to Bataan (Dmytryk, Dir.), 1:240
The Battle of Britain (Capra, Dir.), 1:240
The Battle of China (Capra, Dir.), 1:240
The Battle of Russia (Capra, Dir.), 1:240
Battleship Potemkin (Eisenstein, Dir.), 1:238–239
Berga: Soldiers of Another War (Guggenheim, Dir.), 1:290
Best Years of Our Lives (Wyler, Dir.), 1:240
The Birth of a Nation (Griffith, Dir.), 1:238
Bolshevik Revolution and, 1:238–239
Born on the 4th of July (Stone, Dir.), 1:241
Bush's Brain (Mealey & Shoob, Dirs.), 1:243
candidate biographical films and, 1:83–85
The Candidate (Ritchie, Dir.), 1:79–80, 1:241
Catch 22 (Nichols, Dir.), 1:241
Chinese Cultural Revolution and, 1:101
Citizen Kane (Welles, Dir.), 1:107–108, 1:240, 1:303
Citizen Roth (Payne, Dir.), 1:242
City Lights (Chaplin, Dir.), 1:239 classism and, 1:238, 1:239
cold war and, 1:241
conspiracy, corruption and, 1:239, 1:240, 1:241, 1:242
The Contender (Lurie, Dir.), 1:242
Control Room (Noujaim, Dir.), 1:242
The Coronation of Edward VII (Méliès, Dir.), 1:238
Cuban missile crisis and, 1:242
Dead Man Walking (Robbins, Dir.), 1:242 death penalty issue and, 1:242 December 7 (J. Ford, Dir.), 1:240 deep focus photography and, 1:107
Divide and Conquer (Capra, Dir.), 1:239 documentaries and, 1:242–243, 2:447
Dr. Strangelove or: How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb (Kubrick, Dir.), 1:241
The Enemy Below (Powell, Dir.), 1:240 environmental issue and, 1:243
Fahrenheit 9/11 (Moore, Dir.), 1:242–243, 2:654
fantasy theme analysis and, 2:447
The Fighting Seabees (Ludwig, Dir.), 1:240
Flying Tigers! (Miller, Dir.), 1:240
Foreign Correspondent (Hitchcock, Dir.), 1:240
free speech issue and, 1:243
Full Metal Jacket (Kubrick, Dir.), 1:241
Gentleman's Agreement (Kazan, Dir.), 1:240
Joseph Goebbels and, 1:275
Gone With the Wind (Selznick, Dir.), 1:239
Good Night and Good Luck (Clooney, Dir.), 1:243, 2:476
Grapes of Wrath (J. Ford, Dir.), 1:240
Guess Who's Coming to Dinner (Kramer, Dir.), 1:241
Charles Guggenheim and, 1:290
Halls of Montezuma (Milestone, Dir.), 1:240
Hamburger Hill (Irvin, Dir.), 1:241
Hangmen Also Die (Lang, Dir.), 1:240
Tom Hanks and, 1:242
Heaven and Earth (Stone, Dir.), 1:242
Hiroshima Mon Amour (Resnais, Dir.), 1:240
Hitlerjunge Quex [The German youth Quex] (Steinhoff, Dir.), 1:239
Holocaust and, 1:240
How Green Was My Valley (J. Ford, Dir.), 1:240
I Am a Fugitive From a Chain Gang (Chaplin, Dir.), 1:239
The Immigrant (Chaplin, Dir.), 1:238
An Inconvenient Truth (Guggenheim, Dir.), 1:243, 1:278–279
The Insider (Mann, Dir.), 1:242
Intolerance (Griffith, Dir.), 1:238
Iraq for Sale (Greenwald, Dir.), 1:243
Iraq War and, 1:242–243
Istorlya grazhdanskoy voyny [History of the Civil War] (Vertov, Dir.), 1:238
Jud Süß [Street Jew] (Harlan, Dir.), 1:240
The Kid (Chaplin, Dir.), 1:238
To Kill a Mockingbird (Mulligan, Dir.), 1:241
Know Your Enemy-Japan (Capra, Dir.), 1:239–240
La Battaglia di Algeri [The Battle of Algiers] (Pontecorvo, Dir.), 1:241
Lifeboat (Hitchcock, Dir.), 1:240
The Littlest Rebel (Butler, Dir.), 1:239 lobbying issue and, 1:243
Longtime Companion (Rene, Dir.), 1:242
The Lost Boys of Sudan (Mylan & Shenk, Dirs.), 1:242
The Manchurian Candidate (Frankenheimer, Dir.), 1:241
*M*A*S*H (Altman, Dir.), 1:241
McCarthyism and, 1:243 media shaping public opinion and, 1:242
Meet John Doe (Capra, Dir.), 1:240
Metropolis (Lang, Dir.), 1:239
The Moral Storm (Borzag, Dir.), 1:240
Mr. Smith Goes to Washington (Capra, Dir.), 1:79, 1:238,* 1:239
The Nazi Strike (Capra, Dir.), 1:240 new production techniques and, 1:243
1910s, 1:238
1920s, 1:238–239
1930s, 1:239
1940s, 1:239–240
1950s, 1:240
1960s, 1:240–241
1970s, 1:241
1980s, 1:241
1990s, 1:241–242
Nuit et Brouillard [Night and Fog] (Resnais, Dir.), 1:240
obscenity and pornography and, 2:520–521
Our Brand is Crisis (Boynton, Dir.), 1:243
The Parallax View (Pakula, Dir.), 1:241
Paths of Glory (Kubrick, Dir.), 1:240
The Phantom President (Taurog, Dir.), 1:239
Philadelphia (Demme, Dir.), 1:242 Platoon (Stone, Dir.), 1:241 political humor and, 1:313 poverty and, 1:238, 1:240
Power (Lumet, Dir.), 1:241

Prelude to War (Capra, Dir.), 1:240
Primary Colors, 1:114
professionalization of media campaign and, 1:241 propaganda (Nazi) and, 1:239, 1:240 propaganda (Russian) and, 1:238 racism, prejudice and, 1:238, 1:239, 1:240, 1:241
A Raisin in the Sun (Petrie, Dir.), 1:241
Robert Redford and, 1:79–80, 1:241
Reds (Beatty, Dir.), 1:241
The Resistance, 1:240
Bill "Bojangles" Robinson and, 1:239
Sands of Iwo Jima (Dwan, Dir.), 1:240
Sciuscià [Shoeshine] (De Sica, Dir.), 1:240
Shagay, Sovet! [Forward, Soviet!] (Vertov, Dir.), 1:238
Shut Up and Sing (B. Kopple, Dir.), 1:243
So Ends Our Night (Cromwell, Dir.), 1:240
Jimmy Stewart and, 1:238*
Strategic Air Command (Mann, Dir.), 1:240 Team America: World Police (Parker & Stone, Dirs.), 1:313
Shirley Temple and, 1:239
Thank You for Smoking (Reitman, Dir.), 1:243
They Were Expendable (J. Ford, Dir.), 1:240
Thirteen Days (Donaldson, Dir.), 1:242
This Land is Mine (Renoir, Dir.), 1:240
Traffic (Soderberg, Dir.), 1:242
Triumph of the Will (Riefensthal, Dir.), 1:239
21st century trends in, 1:242–243
Uncovered: The Whole Truth About the Iraq War (Greenwald, Dir.), 1:242
Vietnam War and, 1:241, 1:242
Wag the Dog (Levinson, Dir.), 1:114, 1:242, 2:633
War Comes to America (Capra, Dir.), 1:240 war on drugs and, 1:242
The Weather Underground (Siegel & Green, Dirs.), 1:242
Who Killed the Electric Car? (Paine, Dir.), 1:243
Why We Fight (Capra, Dir.), 1:232, 1:239, 1:360, 2:746–747
Why We Fight (Jarecki, Dir.), 1:243
WMD: Weapons of Mass Deception (Schecther, Dir.), 1:242–243 women in politics issue and, 1:242
The World at War (Mellett, Dir.), 1:240
World War I and, 1:239
World War II and, 1:232, 1:239–240, 1:240
A Yank in the RAF (King, Dir.), 1:240
The Final Days (Bernstein & Woodward), 1:26
Finkelstein, Arthur J., 1:33
Finland
debates in, 1:164
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
Helsinki Process and, 1:303–304
Urho Kekkonen and, 1:303
Fiorina, Morris, 2:419
Fireside chats, 1:28, 1:42, 1:243–244
Great Depression and, 1:243–244, 1:333, 2:697
New Deal policies and, 1:137, 1:243–244, 1:303, 1:333, 2:697, 2:724 political persuasion by, 2:548, 2:696, 2:754 simple language of, 1:244, 2:548, 2:636, 2:697, 2:724, 2:754
First Amendment, 1:244–246
"actual malice" libel law and, 1:245 advertising and, 1:245
advocacy advertising and, 1:6
Alien and Sedition Act and, 2:504, 2:538
Brandenburg v. Ohio and, 1:245
Branzburg v. Hayes and, 2:745
Buckley v. Valeo and, 1:6, 1:56, 1:69–70, 1:77, 1:233 campaign finance reform and, 1:56
"clear and present danger" concept and, 1:245 content discrimination and, 1:244–245 democracy and press relationship and, 2:640
electronic media and, 1:245
free airtime and, 1:259
freedom of expression and, 1:244, 1:245, 2:562
freedom of the press and, 1:244, 1:245, 1:252
free speech zones concept and, 1:301
gag orders on court proceedings and, 1:245 hate speech and, 1:245, 1:301
health care reform issue and, 1:5
Helsinki Process and, 1:303–304
hierarchy of freedom of protected speech and, 1:244 individual autonomy theory and, 1:244 informed consent and, 2:503 judicial interpretation of, 1:244
libel and, 1:404–405
"marketplace of ideas" concept and, 1:244
McConnell v. Federal Election Commission and, 2:426–428
Miller v. California and, 1:245, 2:520, 2:644
New York Times Co. v. Sullivan and, 1:245, 1:405, 2:507
New York Times v. U.S. (Pentagon Papers) and, 1:92, 2:507, 2:513–514, 2:540, 2:644, 2:824
obscenity, pornography and, 1:245, 2:520–521
Party Press era and, 2:538–539
political cartoons and, 1:87, 1:87*
political dissidence and, 1:245
political journalism and, 1:360
prior restraint vs. subsequent punishment and, 1:245 Randall v. Sorrell and, 2:428 reporter confidential sources and, 1:245 self-governance theory, democracy and, 1:244 speech vs. action dichotomy and, 1:244
See also Freedom of Speech
First Amendment Center, Vanderbilt University, 1:260
First International Women's Conference, 1:236
First ladies, political communication of, 1:246–247
Laura Bush, 1:74–75, 1:247 Rosyalynn Carter, 1:247 children protection and, 1:246
Francis Cleveland, 1:246
Hillary Rodham Clinton, 1:110–111, 1:246, 1:247
Betty Ford, 1:247
Betty Ford and, 1:249
Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, 1:246, 2:521–522 personal causes of, 1:247
Nancy Reagan, 1:246, 2:701–702 rhetorical and symbolic actions of, 1:246
Eleanor Roosevelt, 1:246, 1:247, 2:723–724 social aspects of the presidency and, 1:246 term of “first lady” and, 1:246

“white glove pulpit” concept and, 1:249
Edith Wilson, 1:246, 1:247 woman as president and, 1:247
Fish, Stanley, 1:377–378
Fisher, Walter, 1:193
Fishkin, James S., 1:168, 1:342
Fishman, Mark, 1:142, 1:256
527 groups
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:57, 2:567 express advocacy, “soft-money” and, 1:6, 1:57, 2:426–427, 2:429, 2:567, 2:749
Republican National Committee and, 2:711
Fleischer, Ari, 1:247–248
G. H. W. Bush 1992 reelection campaign and, 1:247
G. W. Bush press secretary and, 1:247–248 consulting work of, 1:247–248
Elizabeth Dole campaign and, 1:247 early press career of, 1:247 National Republican Congressional Committee and, 1:247
resignation of, 1:247
FLN (National Liberation Front, Algeria), 1:63–64 Florida
affirmative action legislation banned in, 1:11
Reform Party in, 2:706
2000 election controversy and, 1:73, 1:224, 1:278, 2:765, 2:775,* 2:817
2006 general election in, 1:224
Focus groups, 1:248
data analysis strategies and, 1:248 marketing studies and, 1:248 moderators of, 1:248 purposes and uses of, 1:248 qualitative data from, 1:248 sample type and size of, 1:248 subjective issues focus of, 1:248 validity issues and, 1:248
Fonda, Jane, 1:90
The Force of Fantasy (Bormann), 1:63, 1:230
Ford, Betty, 1:249
Betty Ford Clinic and, 1:249
breast cancer awareness focus of, 1:249
Equal Rights Amendment and, 1:249
as first lady, 1:247, 1:249
Gerald Ford and, 1:249–250
frankness of, 1:249
media relationship with, 1:249
political activism of, 1:249
60 Minutes interview controversy and, 1:249
Time magazine’s Man of the Year award of, 1:249
Ford, Gerald, 1:249–250
Spiro Agnew and, 1:21, 1:129, 1:249
Patrick Buchanan and, 1:68
communication skills, issues of, 1:250
Robert Dole and, 1:191
early career of, 1:249
Equal Rights Amendment and, 1:249
Betty Ford and, 1:247, 1:249
Ford–Carter debates and, 1:160–161, 1:250
foreign and domestic issues and, 1:250
1974 Revision of Freedom of Information Act and, 1:262
1976 election and, 1:160–161, 1:191, 1:249
Nixon pardon and, 1:247, 2:647, 2:826
Nixon’s vice-president and, 1:249–250
political humor regarding, 1:314
press conferences of, 2:643
press corps and, 2:837*
press secretary of, 2:647
testimonials used by, 2:788
veto used by, 1:250
Vietnam War and, 1:249, 1:250
Watergate Scandal and, 1:249–250, 2:826
Whip Inflation Now campaign of, 2:633
Ford, Harold, Jr., 2:463
Foster, Vince, 1:113
Four Theories of the Press (Siebert, Peterson, & Schramm), 1:79, 1:123, 1:250–251
authoritarian theory and, 1:250, 2:509, 2:641, 2:648
criticisms of, 1:251
libertarian theory and, 1:250, 2:509, 2:641, 2:648
Social Responsibility theory and, 1:250, 2:509, 2:641, 2:648, 2:732, 2:748
Soviet Communist theory and, 1:250–251, 2:509, 2:641, 2:648 variations of, 1:251
Fourth estate, media as, 1:251–252
ad watch and, 1:8–10, 1:67
Bulgarian democratization and, 1:71
Thomas Carlyle and, 1:251
Constitution and, 1:252
democracy and power abuse focus of, 1:251 enlightenment origin of, 1:251
First Amendment and, 1:252
free-market journalism and, 1:252 oppositional position of, 1:251 party press and, 1:252
Spiegel affair (Germany) and, 2:756 three government branches and, 1:251 watchdog role of, 1:251–252, 2:575, 2:614, 2:615, 2:826
Fourth Estate (Birmingham & Lancaster), 1:252
Fox, Vicente, 1:252–253 marketing tactics of, 1:252
media instrumentation by, 1:252 negative ads and, 1:252
Fox network
formation of, 1:28
1996 election free airtime and, 1:259
Vanderbilt Television News Archive and, 2:806
Fox News, 1:253–254
Roger Ailes and, 1:21, 1:253
CNN challenged by, 1:115 conservative bias accusation and, 1:253–254 convention coverage on, 1:138
“Fox News Alert” innovation of, 1:253
Iraq War coverage and, 1:351
objective reputation of, 1:253
The O’Reilly Factor and, 1:253, 1:258, 2:523, 2:686
popularity of, 1:253

pundits on, 2:686
24 hour news coverage and, 1:113, 1:126, 1:333
Web site, blogs of, 1:254
Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities, 1:139 Framing, 1:254–257
abortion issue and, 1:17–18
accessibility bias and, 1:305
agenda setting and, 1:17–18
applicability model of, 1:255
attribute agenda setting and, 1:18 audience frames and, 1:254–255 availability heuristics and, 1:305
cascading activation model and, 1:212 consistency, validity issues of, 1:256–257
Creating Reality (Altheide) and, 1:142
Robert Entman's work in, 1:212
episodic vs. thematic frames and, 2:587 frame building, frame setting and, 1:256 global, long-term worldview frames and, 1:254–255
heuristics in political decision making and, 1:304–305
Hong Kong Handover and, 1:310
horserace election coverage and, 1:310–311, 1:358, 2:497
indexing theory and, 1:329–330
individual-level outcomes of, 1:256
Kathleen Hall Jamieson study of, 1:358
journalists as frame audience and, 1:256
knowledge gap and, 1:383
levels of analysis and, 1:256
Walter Lippmann's work and, 1:409
mass political behavior and, 2:419–421
media frames and, 1:254–255, 2:585, 2:587, 2:597–598, 2:640 media of minority groups and, 2:573
metacoverage and, 2:453, 2:497
Muhammed cartoon events and, 2:475, 2:511
of news about politics, 2:497–498, 2:500
"perception is reference-dependent" concept and, 1:255 political disaffection and, 2:577–579, 2:578
political image and, 1:322–325
political information processing and, 2:585, 2:587
political journalism and, 1:364 political knowledge and, 2:597–598
political public relations and, 2:677–680
political scandals and, 2:613–616
psychological theory approach of, 1:255
public opinion and, 2:675–676
Rock the Vote and, 2:721–722
schemas vs., 2:598 scope of participation concept and, 1:254 short-term, issue-related frames and, 1:254–255, 2:498
social constructivism and, 1:255–256 sociological theory approach of, 1:255–256 war rhetoric and, 2:635
See also Presidential communication
France
Jacques Chirac and, 1:101–102
debates in, 1:164
Charles de Gaulle and, 1:167
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
Giscard d'Estaing and, 1:268–269
Jean Marie Le Pen and, 1:402–403, 2:625
François Mitterrand and, 2:465–466
Polish government-in-exile in, 2:552–553
political advertising in, 2:565
political censorship in, 1:92
political posters in, 2:629
privacy laws in, 1:83
two-ballot electoral system in, 1:208
Franken, Al, 1:257–258, 1:258
Air America Radio and, 1:258, 1:258*
John Ashcroft and, 1:146
books of, 1:257–258
Fox News and, 1:257–258
The O'Franken Factor radio program and, 1:258 political rallies and, 1:258 political satire of, 1:257–258
punditry of, 2:686
Saturday Night Live and, 1:257
television comedy performances of, 1:257
2008 Senate candidacy of, 1:258
Frankfurt Institute for Social Research, 1:143–145
Franklin, Benjamin, 1:360
FRC (Federal Radio Commission), 1:120–121
Free airtime, 1:258–260
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:259
Bill Clinton campaign reform and, 1:259
Communications Act of 1934 and, 1:259
Congressional bills on, 1:259 economic burden on stations of, 1:259, 1:260
Federal Communications Commission and, 1:259
John Kennedy and, 1:259
1996 election and, 1:259
public interest focus and, 1:258, 1:259
Freedom Forum Media Studies Center, 1:260 Media Studies Center and, 1:260
Media Studies Journal, 1:260 media think tanks and, 1:260
Newseum interactive museum and, 1:260
Freedom House
freedom of speech and press and, 2:640
political censorship and, 1:94
Freedom of expression
Helsinki Process and, 1:303–304
interpersonal political communication and, 1:345
libel and, 1:404–405
Muhammed cartoon events and, 2:474–475
obscenity and pornography and, 2:520–521
See also First Amendment; Freedom of speech; Press freedom
Freedom of information, 1:260–262
Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 and, 1:261, 1:262
American Society of Newspaper Editors and, 1:262
exclusions of, 1:261
executive privilege and, 1:261
Gerald Ford and, 1:262
Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) of 1967, 1:260–261
Helsinki Process and, 1:303–304

historical context of, 1:261
Hoover Commission and, 1:262
L. B. Johnson and, 1:260–261
military information classification and, 1:261
1974 revision of, 1:262
1986 Freedom of Information Reform Act and, 1:262
1996 Electronic FOIA and, 1:262
"The People's Right to Know" report and, 1:261
Harry Truman and, 1:261
Freedom of speech
democracy and press relationship and, 2:640
European Convention on Human Rights and, 1:216–217
Freedom Forum Media Studies Center and, 1:260
Mikhail Gorbachev and, 1:277
libel and, 1:404–405
states' laws protecting, 2:745
See also First Amendment; Freedom of expression; Press freedom
Free Officers Organization (Egypt), 1:26
Free Political Broadcasting Act of 1988, 1:259
Free TV for Straight Talk Coalition, 1:259
Freud, Sigmund, 1:143
Friedan, Betty, 1:236
Friedeburg, Ludwig von, 1:144
Friedenberg, Robert, 1:329, 2:570
Fromm, Erich, 1:45, 1:143
FTC. See Federal Trade Commission
Functional reputation, 2:713

Gallup, George, 1:204
Gamson, W. A., 1:256, 1:343, 2:750
Gandhi, Indira, 1:263–264
assassination of, 1:263
early politics of, 1:263 economic policy of, 1:263 foreign policy of, 1:263
Indian National Congress and, 1:263
as India's prime minister, 1:263
"Indira's Cardinal Sin" and, 1:263
Gandhi, Mahatma, 1:392
Gang of Four (Chinese Cultural Revolution), 1:101
Garland, Judy, 1:204
Garrison, William Lloyd, 2:693
Gartner Group, e-government definition of, 1:201
Gaskin v. United Kingdom (European Court of Human Rights), 1:216
Gatekeeping. See News selection process: gatekeeping theory
Gaudet, Hazel, 1:407
Gazette of the United States (1789), 2:504
GDR. See German Democratic Republic
Gender and politics, 1:264–265
19th Amendment and, 1:263
Shirley Chisholm and, 1:102–103
Commander in Chief and, 1:117
Democratic Party and, 1:263
fear appeals use and, 2:810 female candidate fund raising and, 1:263 female candidate press coverage and, 1:263
female voting behavior and, 1:263–264
feminine communication style and, 1:235–236
feminist movement and, 1:236
Green Party gender equality platform and, 1:286 hard news gender differences and, 1:297
interpersonal political communication and, 1:345
Kathleen Hall Jamieson study of, 1:358
Barbara Jordan political career and, 1:359
Angela Merkel and, 2:451–452
negative advertising and, 2:485
political information efficacy and, 2:583 political knowledge and, 2:594
radio talk show audience and, 2:778
Roe v. Wade and, 1:3, 1:264
Patricia Schroeder and, 2:733–734
videostyle affected by, 2:810
Webstyle, mixed-gender elections and, 2:832–833 women's rights issues and, 1:264 youth voting and, 2:856
See also Women candidates, advertising; Women candidates, news coverage
Gephardt, Dick, 1:194
Gerbner, George, 1:265–266 articles written by, 1:266
cultivation analysis and, 1:265–266, 2:585, 2:714
Cultural Environment Movement and, 1:265
Cultural Indicators Project and, 1:265, 1:266, 2:585
Journal of Communication and, 1:265
mainstreaming process and, 2:714 mass communication paradigm and, 1:265
resonance theory and, 2:714
television violence studied by, 1:265–266, 2:714
German Democratic Republic (GDR)
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
news magazines in, 2:502
unification, role of media and, 1:266–267
See also German unification, role of the media
German unification, role of the media, 1:266–267
Berlin Wall collapse and, 1:72, 1:114, 1:184, 1:273
cultivation theory and, 1:266
East vs. West German media and, 1:266 exodus to West and, 1:267 import of press products and, 1:266 media entertainment and, 1:267 media instruments of political power and, 1:267 media revolution and, 1:267
"peaceful revolution" and, 1:266, 1:267
political journalism and, 1:267
Germany
citizen deliberation in, 1:288 combined electoral systems in, 1:208
debates in, 1:164
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
free airtime in, 1:260
Joseph Goebbels and, 1:274–275
Green Party of, 1:286–287
institutional ticket splitting and, 2:791
Helmut Kohl and, 1:384
personalized proportional electoral system in, 1:208
political censorship in, 1:4, 1:91–92

political posters in, 2:628–629 preview censorship practice in, 1:93
privacy laws in, 1:83
public television in, 1:24
Gerhard Schröder and, 2:733
Spiegel affair and, 2:756
TV ads, debates in, 2:629
See also Federal Republic of Germany; German Democratic Republic (GDR); German unification, role of the media
Gerrymandering, 1:207
Get-out-the-vote campaigns door-to-door technique and, 1:283 effectiveness of, 1:283, 2:420 of grassroots campaigns, 1:37, 1:56, 1:57, 1:133, 1:282
the Latino vote and, 1:283
media consultants and, 2:441
Rock the Vote and, 2:721–722
subpopulations focus and, 1:283 youth vote and, 1:283
Getting the Message (Glasgow Media Group), 1:270 Gingrich, Newt, 1:126, 1:267–268
congressional resignation of, 1:268
Contract with America and, 1:267–268
GOPAC training organization and, 1:267–268
press conferences of, 2:643
Speaker of the House role of, 1:268
Giscard d'Estaing, Valéry, 1:268–269 campaign marketing skills of, 1:268, 2:481 Center Right party and, 1:268
Charles de Gaulle and, 1:268
François Mitterand and, 1:268–269, 2:465–466
1981 defeat of, 1:269
Giuliani, Rudy, 1:269–270
"America's Mayor" image of, 1:269
Bush 2004 reelection and, 1:269 media skills of, 1:269
Reagan administration and, 1:269
Time person of the year and, 1:269
2008 Republican nomination and, 1:269
Glasgow Media Group, 1:270
critics of, 1:270
media bias reporting and, 1:270 social and political issues focus of, 1:270
Glenn, John, 1:350
Globalization, 1:270–274
Americanization myth and, 1:273
American-style campaigning and, 1:33–34
Arab satellite broadcasts and, 1:24
CNN and, 1:271–272, 1:273
cross-border, transcultural communication and, 1:271 cultural imperialism and, 1:150,* 1:150–152
cybernationalism and, 1:153–154
democratization and, media role in, 1:175–176
digital divide and, 1:271, 1:272
global information flow and, 1:330–331
Global Trends 2015 (CIA) report, 1:272–273
hybrid culture creation and, 1:272 Internet connectivity and, 1:271, 1:272–273 linguistic and cultural competence and, 1:271–272 mass-mediated transnationalization and, 1:270–721 media connectivity and, 1:271–272 media diplomacy concept and, 1:273
modernization and, 1:273, 2:466–467 music vs. image vs. text and, 1:271
new media and, 1:271
political commentary and, 1:118
political/cultural change and, 1:272–273 political/economic interdependence and, 1:273–274 satellite broadcasting and, 1:271, 1:272 system connectivity, change, interdependence and, 1:271 technological reach and, 1:271 user reach and, 1:271
Global Media Monitoring Project (GMMP), 1:297
Global Political Consultancy Survey (1998-2000), 1:34
Global Trends 2015 (CIA) report, 1:272–273
GMG. See Glasgow Media Group
GMMP (Global Media Monitoring Project), 1:297
Goebbels, Joseph, 1:274–275 anti-Semitism, anticommunism of, 1:274
Hitler myth and, 1:275
National Socialist Party of Germany and, 1:274–275
political censorship and, 1:92
propagandist of Nazi Party and, 1:274–275, 1:307, 2:660
Goffman, Erving, 1:193, 1:254, 1:326, 2:587, 2:630–631
See also Presentation of Self in Everyday Life (Goffman)
Goldman, Paul T., 1:135
Goldwater, Barry, 1:275–276
Arizona senator, 1:275
communism threat and, 1:123
conservativism and, 1:129
direct mail used by, 1:190
extremism of, 1:276
L. B. Johnson "Daisy Girl" ad and, 1:276, 2:604
1964 election and, 1:136, 1:156, 1:190, 1:232, 2:494, 2:561, 2:695, 2:703, 2:712
Ronald Reagan and, 1:276, 2:703
testimonials used by, 2:788
Gonzales v. Carhart, 1:3
González, Márquez, Felipe, 1:276–277 economic and domestic reforms of, 1:276 Franco protests of, 1:276
media utilized by, 1:277
PSOE membership of, 1:276–277 social-democratic activities of, 1:276 Goodman, Andrew, 1:109
Goodman, Bob, 1:31
Good Morning America, 1:333, 2:721
Google
in China, 1:93, 1:99
YouTube and, 2:492
GOPAC, Republican Party training organization, 1:267
Gorbachev, Mikhail, 1:277–278
G. H. W. Bush and, 1:277*
censorship relaxation by, 1:278
Community Party and, 1:278
economic policies of, 1:277–278
foreign policies of, 1:278

glosnost and perestroika and, 1:70, 1:177, 1:266, 1:277, 2:726
Helsinki Summit and, 1:278*
Nikita Khrushchev and, 1:378
new government institutions formed by, 1:278 nuclear weapons reduction by, 1:278
Ronald Reagan and, 2:704
Soviet Union collapse and, 1:278
Boris Yeltsin and, 1:278, 2:854–855
Gore, Albert, 1:278–279
books by, 1:279
Clinton vice presidency of, 1:278 congressional years of, 1:278 environmental issues and, 1:243, 1:278–279
hard news and, 1:297
An Inconvenient Truth (Guggenheim, Dir.) and, 1:243 Internet developed by, 1:278 negative political advertising by, 1:278, 2:563
1988 election and, 1:194
Saturday Night Live and, 2:731
television talk shows and, 2:779
2000 election controversy and, 1:73, 1:210, 1:278, 2:765, 2:775*
2000 election e-mail and, 1:210
Gotham Gazette citizen journalism, 1:106
Gould, Philip, 1:59, 1:389
Government communication, 1:279–281
democracy theories and, 1:169–175
dethematization diversionary tactic and, 1:279 image management and, 1:279 informing citizens and, 1:279 media agenda setting and, 1:279, 1:280 parliamentary system and, 1:280
personalization of politics and, 1:279, 1:280 political coalition building and, 1:279 political messages management and, 1:279
political public relations and, 2:677–680 presidential system and, 1:280 press secretary and, 1:280
professionalization and, 2:656–657
pseudo-events and, 1:279, 1:280
spin-control and, 1:279 Graber, Doris A., 1:281, 1:295, 2:572
awards of, 1:281
information processing focus of, 1:281, 2:655–656 personality of, 1:281
political communication focus of, 1:281
publications of, 1:281, 2:656
Graduate School of Political Management (GSPM), 1:281–282 curriculum of, 1:282 ethics, democratic process focus of, 1:281–282
Neil Fabricant and, 1:281
at George Washington University, 1:281
Governability Program of, 1:282
Institute for Politics, Democracy and the Internet (IPDI) of, 1:282 Latin American conferences and, 1:282 mission statement of, 1:281 political action committee program of, 1:282 Politics Online Conference and, 1:282 professional policies field and, 1:282
Graham, Billy, 1:73
Grassroots campaigning, 1:282–284
AARP and, 1:1
of Jacques Chirac (France), 1:102 of Common Cause, 1:259 contact a policymaker efforts and, 1:282 of Howard Dean, 1:159, 1:334, 2:492 direct mail and, 1:189, 2:494
of Recep Tayyip Engroğan (Turkey), 1:213 Get-Out-The-Vote campaigns and, 1:37, 1:56, 1:57, 1:133, 1:282, 1:283, 2:420
of Barry Goldwater, 1:275 incidence of, 1:282–283
Internet use and, 2:492
Iowa caucuses and, 1:350–351
lobbying and, 1:283–284, 2:668
media consultants and, 2:441
mobilize masses and, 1:282, 2:492
Carol Moseley Braun and, 2:470 narrow communication feature of, 1:282
personal campaigning and, 2:544–545 politician branding and, 2:569
statistics regarding, 1:282–283
of Paul Wellstone, 2:834
See also Web campaigning
Gratz v. Vollinger, 1:11
Great Britain
Jay G. Blumler and, 1:61–62 character assassination tactics in, 1:82, 1:83 communication studies in, 1:61–62 Conservative Party in, 1:130–131
cultural studies and, 1:152–153
Direct Democracy Campaign in, 1:189
The Economist news magazine in, 2:502
e-government initiatives in, 1:201
election news coverage in, 2:496
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
Falklands-Malvinas War and, 1:228 feminist movement in, 1:236
free airtime in, 1:260
Hong Kong Handover and, 1:309–310
Liberal media system model in, 2:648, 2:650
London underground bombings, British media and, 2:786–787
Northern Ireland: British media, domestic terrorism and, 2:784–785 partisan press in, 2:434
party election broadcasts and, 2:533–534 party identification decline in, 2:537 “penny dreadfuls” infotainment in, 1:336 plurality electoral system in, 1:208
Polish government-in-exile in, 2:552–553
political advertising in, 2:565
political marketing in, 2:603, 2:604
Royal Commission on the Press and, 2:725–726 tone of the news in, 2:497 war atrocity propaganda and, 2:660 Harold Wilson and, 2:839–840

youth voting in, 2:856
See also Blair, Tony; Churchill, Sir Winston; Thatcher, Margaret; Wilson, Harold Great Debates, the, 1:284–285 of the Constitutional Convention, 1:41, 1:42
The Great Debates (Kraus) and, 1:284, 1:385
Kennedy–Nixon (1960), 1:159, 1:160, 1:284, 1:333, 1:371, 1:385, 2:516, 2:546, 2:561, 2:742, 2:777
Lincoln–Douglas (1858 Senate race), 1:42, 1:284, 2:547
See also Debates
Great Depression, 1:129
Communism and, 1:123
Democratic Party and, 1:175
Roosevelt's fireside chats and, 1:243–244, 1:333, 2:548, 2:696, 2:697, 2:724
Great Society, 1:129, 1:360
Greece
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
Konstantinos Mitsotakis and, 2:464–465
Andreas Papandreou and, 2:529
Konstantinos Simitis and, 2:745–746
Greeley, Horace, 1:285–286
editorial page created by, 2:505
1840, 1872 elections and, 1:285
Fourierism and, 2:505
Liberal Republican Party and, 1:285
Abraham Lincoln and, 1:285, 1:360, 2:505
New Yorker and, 1:285
New York Tribune and, 1:285, 2:504–505, 2:539
Joseph Pulitzer and, 2:505
San Francisco Examiner and, 2:505 slavery and, 2:504–505
Spanish-American War and, 2:505
Transcendental movement and, 1:285
Thurlow Weed and, 1:285
Greenberg, Stanley, 1:33, 1:59
Green Party, 1:286–287
direct political participation focus of, 1:286 grassroots democracy of, 1:286
"Greying of the Greens" and, 1:286–287
New Politics party of, 1:286 platforms of, 1:286
unconventional political actions of, 1:286
Greenwald, Robert, 1:253–254
Gregory, Dick, 1:313
Group communication theory, 1:62–63
Group decision making, political, 1:287–290 in Ancient Athens, 1:287 citizen deliberation and, 1:287–288 congressional committees and, 1:288–289 deliberative democratic theory and, 1:287 democratic social movements and, 1:287, 1:288 executive branch groupthink and, 1:287, 1:289 fantasy theme analysis and, 2:447
juries and, 1:287, 1:288
GSPM. See Graduate School of Political Management
Guerra v. Italy (European Court of Human Rights), 1:216
Guevera, Che, 1:89
Guggenheim, Charles, 1:31, 1:290–291
human fortitude focus of, 1:290
McGovern 1972 presidential campaign and, 1:290, 2:430, 2:561 media adviser work of, 1:290 political advertising and, 1:290 presidential biography films of, 1:290
Robert Kennedy Remembered documentary of, 1:290
The Gulag Archipelago (Solzhenitsyn), 1:93
Gulf War, media coverage of, 1:181, 1:291
G. H. W. Bush and, 1:72, 1:291,* 2:588
close-up-coverage of, 1:291
CNN coverage of, 1:114, 1:115, 1:291, 1:333
embedded journalism and, 1:211
Kuwait liberation and, 1:291 media as participants in, 1:291
pooled journalism and, 2:624–625, 2:644
Gurevitch, Michael, 1:32, 1:124, 1:177, 1:295
See also Uses and gratifications approach

Habermas, Jürgen, 1:144 citizen decision making and, 1:287
Daniel Hallin's work and, 1:294
postmodernist criticism of, 2:670
public communication and, 2:669 public sphere meaning and, 2:443, 2:671
See also Public sphere
Hagelin, John, 1:68
Hagerty, James C., 2:646–647
Hague, William, 1:131
Hahn, Dan F., 1:181
Haider, Jörg, 1:293–294 campaign techniques of, 1:293 Freedom Party and, 1:293
media utilized by, 1:293–294
Nazi history and, 1:293
populism focus of, 1:293, 1:294, 2:818
Wolfgang Schüssel and, 2:735–736
Franz Vranitzky and, 1:294, 2:818
Waldheim Affair and, 2:819–820
Hall, E. T., 1:337, 1:338
Hallin, Daniel C., 1:294–295
clientism research of, 1:294
Comparing Media Systems, 1:123–124, 1:294, 2:414
Latin American work of, 1:294 social contexts focus of, 1:294
Vietnam War and media analysis work of, 1:294
Halloran, James D., 1:142
Halloway, Rachel L., 1:181
Hamas, 1:24
Hamilton, Alexander, 2:504, 2:539
Hamilton, Bill, 1:31
Handbook of Communication Science (Chafee & Berger), 1:96
Handbook of Political Communication, The (Nimmo & Sanders), 1:295, 1:386, 2:515, 2:730
European scholarship and, 1:295 Handbook of Political Communication Research (L. L. Kaid) and, 1:295, 1:386 subjects covered in, 1:295
Handbook of Political Communication Research (L. L. Kaid), 1:295, 1:386

Handbook of Political Marketing (Newman), 1:295
Hannity & Colmes (Fox News) program, 1:253
Hanson, Pauline, 1:295–296
  media relationship with, 1:296
  One Nation party and, 1:295–296
  racism of, 1:295–296
  Tampa incident and, 2:780–781
Harding, Warren G., 1:83
  celebrities' support of, 1:90
  press conferences and, 2:506
  press relationships of, 2:646
  radio addresses of, 2:696
  speech writers for, 2:754
Hard money, 1:56–57
  Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:56–57
  Buckley v. Valeo and, 1:69
  soft money vs., 2:749 Hard news, 1:296–297 content of, 1:296 decisions about government and, 1:297 decrease in coverage of, 1:297 gender differences and, 1:297 presentation of, 1:295–296 soft news vs., 1:295–296, 2:439, 2:495, 2:750 traditional news and, 1:296
Harman, Jane, 1:127
Harris, Fred, 1:297–298
  man-of-the-people communication style of, 1:298
  New Populism and, 1:297–298
  1972, 1976 elections and, 1:298
  race and poverty focus of, 1:297–298
Harrison, William Henry
  1840 election and, 1:285, 2:627
  Horace Greeley and, 1:285
  Log Cabin and Hard Cider Campaign of, 2:627
Hart, Gary, 1:83, 1:194, 1:298–299
  American security expertise of, 1:298–299 international affairs expertise of, 1:298
  Iowa caucuses and, 1:350
  McGovern and, 1:298, 2:429
  1984, 1988 elections and, 1:298, 1:350, 2:444
  personal scandal of, 1:298, 2:444
Hart, Peter, 1:31
Hart, Roderick P., 1:299–300, 1:328
  books by, 1:299
  political communication awards of, 1:299 rhetorical analysis expertise of, 1:299, 2:634, 2:806–807 television as political educator issue and, 1:299–300
Hartinger, Sepp, 1:214
Hashemite kingdom, 1:2
Hassan II, King, 1:300–301 authoritarian political regime of, 1:300 communication skills of, 1:300 national identity and, 1:300
Hate speech, 1:301
  First Amendment and, 1:245, 1:301
  freedom of expression and, 1:301
  free speech zones concept and, 1:301 hate speech regulation debate and, 1:301
  political censorship and, 1:91–94
  political correctness and, 2:574–575
  Supreme Court decisions and, 1:301
Havel, Václav, 1:301–302
  Czech dissident movement and, 1:301
  Czech Republic president and, 1:302 human relations and communication work of, 1:302 human rights work of, 1:302
Haynes, Kathleen J. M., 2:571
Health care reform
  advocacy advertising and, 1:5, 1:7
  in Chile, 1:49
  older voting adults and, 1:20
  political advertising regarding, 2:559, 2:566
  Task Force on National Health Care Reform and, 1:5, 1:110, 1:111
Health Care Reform Project, 1:5
Health Insurance Association of America (HIAA), 1:5, 1:7
Hearst, William Randolph, 1:302–303
  Citizen Kane and, 1:107–108, 1:303 Marion Davies and, 1:107
  muckraking of, 2:473 political career or, 1:303
  racism of, 1:303
  San Francisco Examiner and, 1:303
  Spanish-American war instigation by, 1:303, 2:854 tabloid journalism of, 2:776 yellow journalism of, 1:302,* 1:303, 2:473, 2:505, 2:854
Heath, Robert, 1:353
Hegel, George Wilhelm, 1:143
Heine, Henrich, 1:94, 2:659
Helms, Jessie, 2:470
Help America Vote Act, 1:224
Helsinki Process, 1:303–304
  Cold War détente and, 1:303
  Conference for Security and Co-operation in Europe and, 1:303 cooperation in humanitarianism and, 1:304 European democratic movement and, 1:304 freedom of expression and information and, 1:303 Helsinki Accords and, 1:303–304
  Helsinki Federation for Human Rights and, 1:304
  Hrho Kekkonen and, 1:369 security and human rights relationship and, 1:304
Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation, 1:5
Heston, Charlton, 1:90
Heuristics in political decision making, 1:304–306
  accessibility bias and, 1:305
  availability heuristics and, 1:304, 1:305 goodness-of-fit assessment and, 1:304–305 low-information rationality and, 1:304, 1:305 media coverage intensity and, 1:305
  political information processing and, 2:585
  representativeness heuristics and, 1:304–305 rules of thumb, shortcuts and, 1:304
HIAA. See Health Insurance Association of America
High Performance Computing and Communication Act of 1991, 1:278
Hill–Thomas hearings, 1:306–307
  African American response to, 1:307, 2:470 race, sex, politics theatrical drama of, 1:306–307 Title VII, federal employment discrimination law and, 1:307 women's response to, 1:306–307 Hitler, Adolf, 1:307–308 audience interaction, mass hysteria and, 1:308

German Worker's Party and, 1:308
Joseph Goebbels and, 1:274–275, 1:307
Mein Kampf [My Struggle] and, 1:308
Nazi party propaganda and, 1:308 political prisoners and, 2:612
radio as tool of, 2:696
suicide of, 1:308
Hofstede, G., 1:337–338
Hoggart, Richard, 1:152
Holliman, John, 1:114
Holtz-Bacha, Christina, 1:81, 1:308–309 communication research work of, 1:308 international perspective of, 1:309 videomalaise hypothesis of, 1:309
Hong Kong Handover, 1:309–310
Basic Law of Hong Kong and, 1:309, 1:310
Deng Xiaoping and, 1:309
domestication of global news and, 1:310 regions of, 1:310
Sino-British Joint Declaration and, 1:309
Hoover, Herbert
press conferences and, 2:506
press secretary of, 2:646
radio campaign of, 2:696
Hoover Commission, 1:262
Horserace coverage, 1:310–311 campaign as a contest and, 1:310
Crosstalk (Just, Crigler, Alger, Cook, Kern, & West) on, 1:146–147 of debates, 1:362
gatekeeping function breakdown and, 1:310
Kathleen Hall Jamieson's work and, 1:358 media injection into the news and, 1:310–311 metacommunication trend and, 1:310–311
New York Times and, 2:514
political journalism and, 1:362 political knowledge decline and, 2:596 polls and, 2:622 of primary elections, 1:362 projected race results and, 1:310
pseudo-events and, 2:664
in Spanish-speaking newspapers, 1:398 tabloidization of news and, 1:310 uses and gratifications approach and, 2:802, 2:803
voter apathy and, 1:311, 2:486
Hospers, John, 1:406
Hostile media effect, 1:311–313 active audience paradigm and, 1:311 audience bias and, 1:312 different standards process and, 1:312 dysfunctional consequences of, 1:312
empirical research on, 1:312
media partisan bias and, 2:436 nature of information processing and, 1:312 partisan concept and, 1:311–312 psychololgical contrast effect and, 1:311 selective categorization mechanism and, 1:312 selective recall mechanism and, 1:312 Hovland, Carl, 1:232 sleeper effect work of, 2:746–747 Howard, John
Tampa incident and, 2:780–781
Howard, Michael, 1:131
Hua Guofeng, 1:101
Hudson, Rock, 1:185
Huffington Post Web site, 1:146, 1:258
Humor in politics, 1:313–314 ancient Greek and Roman examples of, 1:313
Comedy Central and, 1:29
The Daily Show, 1:155–156, 1:313–314
Charles de Gaulle and, 1:167
Doonesbury comic strip and, 1:313 fear appeals and, 1:232
Ford's physical clumsiness and, 1:250
Al Franken and, 1:257–528
political cartoons and, 1:87,* 1:87–88, 1:313, 1:314 political satire and, 1:313–314 presidential humor and, 1:314 research on, 1:314
Ann Richards and, 2:720
Will Rogers and, 1:313
Saturday Night Live and, 1:250, 1:257, 1:269, 1:313–314, 2:731
self-deprecating humor and, 1:313
George Bernard Shaw and, 1:313 situation comedies and, 1:313 sketch comedy and, 1:313 standup comics and, 1:313
television talk shows and, 1:313–314, 2:779–780
Mark Twain and, 1:313
Web sites of, 1:314
yellow yournalism and, 1:313, 2:854
Humphrey, Hubert H., 1:314–315
Shirley Chisholm and, 1:103
civil rights work of, 1:314–315
Fred Harris and, 1:297
L. B. Johnson's vice president and, 1:314–315
Midwestern progressivism of, 1:314–315
Edmund Muskie and, 2:477
Joseph Napolitan and, 2:481
1968 election and, 1:136, 1:315, 2:477, 2:481, 2:516
presidential candidacies of, 1:314–315
Senate career of, 1:314–315
Hungary, communication and politics, 1:315–319 blogging election campaign tool and, 1:318 campaigning regulation and, 1:318 campaign media presentation regulation and, 1:317 campaign posters regulation and, 1:318
compensatory electoral system in, 1:209
Danubius commercial radio station and, 1:315 democratic voting legislation and, 1:318
democratization process in, 1:178, 1:315
East German exodus and, 1:267
freedom of press in, 1:316
Internet as election tool and, 1:318

Internet forums and, 1:316 marketing election campaign strategies and, 1:318 media system and, 1:315–317 online communication election tool and, 1:318 parliamentary system in, 1:315 political advertisement regulation and, 1:317, 1:318 political communication in, 1:317–318 political parties in, 1:315 press media market consolidation and, 1:316 print media privatization and, 1:316 publicity reform and, 1:316
Radio Free Europe and, 2:698
tabloids and, 1:316
television and, agenda setting, 1:316 television and, market concentration of, 1:316–317 television and, political parties' struggle and, 1:317 television and, program topics, 1:317 television and, public television broadcast and, 1:316 Hurricane Katrina, 1:74, 1:106, 1:114, 2:708, 2:846
Hussein, Saddam, 1:73, 2:700
Hussein I, King of Jordan, 1:2, 1:319
communication skills of, 1:319 democratic transformation and, 1:319 media system established by, 1:319
Huxley, Aldus, 1:313

ICA. See International Communication Association
Ideology, 1:321–322
Congressional roll call vote analysis and, 1:321
definitions regarding, 1:321
Adolf Hitler and, 1:307–308
liberalism vs. conservativism and, 1:321
mass political behavior and, 2:419–421
negative reference to, 1:321 political behavior and, 1:321 political language and, 1:391, 1:393 political rhetoric and, 2:718–719
preconceptions vs. reality and, 1:321 presidential inaugural addresses and, 1:328
propaganda and, 2:658–661
public policy and, 1:321 talk radio shows and, 2:778
"I Have a Dream" speech, of Martin Luther King, Jr., 1:108, 1:381, 2:694
Image, political, 1:322–325
of José María Aznar (Spain), 1:47
of Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali (Tunisia), 1:53 of Silvio Berlusconi (Italy), 1:53 of Tony Blair (Britain), 1:59
Kenneth Boulding's work on, 1:322 of Willy Brandt (Germany), 1:65 campaign strategies research and, 1:322
The Candidate film and, 1:79–80
Candidates and Their Images: Concepts, Methods and Findings (Nimmo & Savage) and, 1:85–86, 1:322 of Jacques Charac (France), 1:102 of Bill Clinton, 1:112–113
of Fernando Collor de Mello (Brazil), 1:116
Crosstalk (Just, Crigler, Alger, Cook, Kern, & West) and, 1:146–147 debates effects on, 1:164 of Bülent Ecevit (Turkey), 1:197 framing and, 1:322–325, 1:324
of Rudy Giuliani, 1:269
global information flow and, 1:331
The Image (Boorstin) and, 1:325–326
impression management and, 1:326–327 information processing and, 1:322–323 interactional model of, 1:323 issues positions and, 1:323
Walter Lippmann and, 1:16, 1:251, 1:322, 1:408–409, 2:585
Niccolò Machiavelli and, 1:322
mass media effects on, 1:322 measurement methods of, 1:323 of Carlos Menem (Argentina), 2:450 nation images and, 1:323–324 of Richard Nixon, 2:742 party image and, 1:323
Richard Perloff's work and, 1:322 political message environments and, 1:322 political message perception and, 1:322 political posters and, 2:626–630 political psychology research and, 1:324
political public relations and, 2:679
political rhetoric and, 2:718–719
projection model of, 1:323 pseudo-events concept and, 1:325–326
of Vladimir Putin (Soviet Union), 2:686
of Ronald Reagan, 2:548 receiver model of, 1:323 retrospective voting concept and, 1:323 of Gerhard Schröder (Germany), 2:733
The Selling of the President 1968 (McGinniss) and, 2:741–742 short- vs. long-term voting factors and, 1:323 symbolic gestures and, 1:322 of Margaret Thatcher (Great Britain), 2:788–789 voter behavior research and, 1:324
See also Women candidates, advertising; Women candidates, news coverage
Image, The (Boorstin), 1:325–326 celebrities as human greatness illusions and, 1:325
pseudo-events concept and, 1:325–326, 2:664 pseudo-ideal and, 1:325
The Image (Boulding), 1:322
Immigration and Naturalization Act of 1965, 2:694 Impression management, 1:326–327 controlling information to aid others and, 1:327
"Dean Scream," 2004 Iowa caucuses and, 1:158, 1:326
dramaturgical view of sociology and, 1:326 organizations and, 1:327
political advertising and, 1:326 political party platforms and, 1:327
Presentation of Self in Everyday Life (Goffman) and, 1:326 prototypes deviation and, 1:326 role playing and, 1:326
Barry Schlenker's work on, 1:326
Self-Presentation (Leary) and, 1:326

strategic communication and, 1:326
Videostyle in Presidential Campaigns (L. L. Kaid & A. Johnston) and, 1:326, 1:367, 2:809
Inaugural addresses, presidential, 1:327–329, 2:634
American civil piety and, 1:328 audience as testimonial body and, 1:327
G. H. W. Bush, 1:72
G. W. Bush, 1:328*
defining features of, 1:327
John F. Kennedy, 1:371, 2:634 moral dimensions of, 1:328
Ronald Reagan, 2:704 vision for America and, 2:752
George Washington, 1:328
An Inconvenient Truth (Gore) documentary, 1:278–279 Incumbent, incumbency, 1:329
charisma and, 1:329
competency and, 1:329 distinct campaign styles and, 1:329
Eleventh Commandment (Reagan) and, 2:703
incumbency advantage and, 2:497, 2:703–704 legitimacy of the office and, 1:329, 2:755
negative advertising and, 2:485
PACs and, 2:556, 2:557
public opinion polls and, 2:623 symbolic trappings of office and, 1:329
videostyle and, 2:809–810
Independent Television News (ITN), 1:270
Indexing theory, 1:329–330 empirical support for, 1:330
framing and, 1:330
media and government relationship and, 1:329 media autonomy theories and, 1:329–330 new institutionalism and, 1:330
News: The Politics of Illusion (Bennett), 2:495 India
character assassinations in, 1:82
Indira Gandhi and, 1:263
Industrial Workers of the World (IWW, Australia), 1:189
Information flow, global, 1:330–331 balance or imbalance of, 1:330
civil rights movement and, 1:333 direction of flow and, 1:330 gatekeepers and, 1:331
globalization and, 1:330 human orientation of, 1:330
ideology and, 1:330
image and perception studies and, 1:330 image manipulation, control and, 1:331 internal and external communication systems and, 1:330 international relations and, 1:330
Kennedy–Nixon debates and, 1:333
McCarthy hearings and, 1:333
political advertising and, 2:564
propaganda, policy studies and, 1:331 technology and, 1:330, 1:331
Vietnam War and, 1:333
Watergate scandal and, 1:333
See also Information society; Political information processing
Information society, 1:331–332
digital divide and, 1:186–187, 1:383
e-government and, 1:200–204
knowledge classifications and, 1:331 knowledge economy of, 1:331 knowledge industries in, 1:331
Fritz Machlup's work and, 1:331
World Summit on the Information Society (WSIS, U. N.) and, 1:54, 1:186*
Information technology in politics, 1:332–335
agenda setting and, 1:332
digital divide and, 1:186–187
electronic media and, 1:332–334
emerging media and, 1:334–335 Internet impact and, 1:334–335
news magazines and, 1:332
political advertising and, 1:332
print media and, 1:332
radio talk shows and, 1:333
television and, 1:333–334
See also Web campaigning
informed consent and, 2:503
Infotainment, 1:335–336
cross-cultural trends and, 1:336 historic examples of, 1:336 negative effects of, 1:335–336 political disengagement and, 1:335, 1:336 television, tabloid press and, 1:335
See also Talk shows, television; Television, politics and Inglehart, Ronald, 1:214
Ingram, Bernard, 1:130
Initiatives. See Ballot initiatives
Inoculation, political, 1:336–338 attack ads and, 1:337
William McGuire's work in, 1:336
M. Pfau's work in, 1:336–337 political communication application of, 1:337 refutational preemption element of, 1:336, 2:565
research on, 1:337
spiral of silence protection and, 1:337 threat element of, 1:336
Institute for Politics, Democracy and the Internet (IPDI), 1:282
Institute for Social Research, Frankfurt, 1:143–145 Integration. See Civil rights movement Intercultural communication, dimensions, 1:338–339 context, space, time, information flow dimensions, 1:338 cultural dimensions, 1:337–338 femininity vs. masculinity dimension, 1:338 Hall's work in, 1:338 high-low communication context and, 1:338 individualism vs. collectivism dimensions, 1:337 long- vs. short-term orientation and, 1:338 pattern variables and, 1:338 power distance dimension, 1:337 uncertainty avoidance dimension, 1:338 value orientations and, 1:338 Interest groups in politics, 1:340
ballot initiatives and, 1: 50–52
inside vs. outside game and, 1:340
lobbying and, 1:340, 1:409–410

policy outcomes and, 1:51–52
political action committees and, 1:340
polls used by, 2:623 private vs. public interest groups and, 1:340 public opinion, public policy influenced by, 1:340 television and Internet used by, 1:340
See also Campaign finance; Lobbying, lobbyists; Political action committees (PACs)
International Association of Political Consultants, 1:31, 2:481
International Communication Association (ICA), 1:62, 1:281, 2:571–572, 2:730
International Encyclopedia of Communication, 1:376
Internet
as alternative media in politics, 1:29, 1:363–364, 2:490–493
argumentation via, 1:42
banner ads and, 1:52–53
blogs, blogging and, 1:59–61, 1:60,* 1:334, 2:490
campaign Web sites and, 1:334 candidate privacy and, 1:83
in China, 1:93–94, 1:99
citizen journalism and, 1:105–106, 1:363–364 cultural change through, 1:272–273
cybernationalism and, 1:153–154 databases available on, 1:363
democratization process role of, 1:176–177, 1:179
digital divide and, 1:186–187, 1:363
digital politics and, 1:282
e-government and, 1:200–204
e-mail use and, 1:334, 2:490
e-voting and, 1:224,* 1:224–225
First Amendment protection and, 1:245 fragmentation function of, 1:273
global information flow and, 1:331
Al Gore and, 1:278
Hungarian election tool and, 1:318
individual political advertising and, 2:559 information overload from, 2:493
information technology in politics and, 1:334–335, 2:485, 2:490–493
Institute for Politics, Democracy and the Internet (IPDI) and, 1:282
letters to the editor and, 1:403 linguistic diversity of, 1:272 media consultant specialization on, 2:441
MeetUp.com and, 2:792
Muhammed cartoon events and, 2:474–475
"net activism" and, 2:493 news credibility and, 1:126, 1:127, 1:364 online feedback, participation and, 2:491 online newspapers and, 2:506 online vide sharing and, 2:492
podcasting and, 2:490–491
polarization of the public and, 2:493 political censorship of, 1:93–94, 1:99 political commentary on, 1:118 political communication importance of, 1:172, 1:334–335 political humor on, 1:314
political impact of, 1:334–335
political interest groups and, 1:340
political journalism and, 1:363–364 political knowledge source and, 2:595, 2:596 political participation increase and, 2:532 power and pitfalls of, 1:363–364 presidential use of, 2:636 public affairs communication use of, 2:667 public communication using, 2:671 scandal publicizing and, 2:613 social networking on, 2:491–492, 2:493
strategic communication and, 2:764
tabloidization of, 2:776 terrorists access and, 1:273 transnational communication and, 1:271, 1:272 transnational libel cases and, 1:405
2004 election and, 1:158–159, 1:334, 1:364, 2:490, 2:492, 2:493, 2:550, 2:671, 2:722 user statistics and, 2:490 video sharing on, 2:492
videostyle analysis and, 2:810
Abdessalam Yassine (Morocco) use of, 2:853
See also Blogs, blogging; E-government; E-mail, political uses; E-voting; Web campaigning; World Wide Web, political uses
Internet Advertising Bureau, 1:51
Interpersonal communication, 1:183, 1:341–350
agenda setting and, 1:348
cognitive resources factor and, 1:345, 1:348 community identify, social trust through, 1:342 cross-national differences in, 1:343, 1:344–345 (table), 1:345 democratic citizenship affected by, 1:347–348
diffusion of innovations and, 1:183–184
electoral behavior affected by, 1:347
embedded journalism and, 1:211, 1:352, 2:721 face-to-face interaction and, 1:341 Fishkin's deliberative polls research on, 1:342 flexibility of, 1:349
freedom of expression and, 1:345
Gamson's study of working-class Americans and, 1:343
gender factors and, 1:345
homogeneity and heterogeneity in, 1:346–347 inter-individual differences in, 1:345 Internet mass mediated, 1:42 mass communication and, 1:341, 1:348–349
motivational role of, 1:347–348
Personal Influence (Katz & Lazarsfeld) and, 1:199, 1:349, 1:368, 1:400, 2:545–546, 2:793 political communication study and, 1:341–342 political diversity factors and, 1:345 populist democratic conception and, 1:342 primary vs. secondary relationships and, 1:343, 1:346, 1:347, 1:349 private interpersonal communication and, 1:341, 1:342–343 projection attributions and, 1:346 public interpersonal communication and, 1:341, 1:342 small range of coverage of, 1:341 social movement participation and, 1:347 social network communication and, 1:343, 1:345 social reality test and, 1:349 socioeconomic factors and, 1:345 socioeconomic modernization processes and, 1:343 survey research on, 1:343

two-step flow of communication and, 1:348, 1:368, 2:541–542, 2:793–794 vertical activities vs. horizontal logic and, 1:343

Iowa caucuses, 1:350–351
"Dean Scream" (2004) and, 1:158, 1:326
first-in-the-nation status of, 1:350
grassroots campaigning and, 1:350
New Hampshire primaries vs., 1:350–351, 2:651
1972-2000 history of, 1:350–351
personal campaigning and, 2:544
Hugh Winebrenner authority on, 1:351

IPDI (Institute for Politics, Democracy and the Internet), 1:282

Iran-Contra affair, 1:75, 2:653, 2:699

Iraq War, media coverage of, 1:351–352
Abu Ghraib scandal and, 2:474
Australian mass nonviolent protest against, 2:418
G. W. Bush and, 1:73–74, 1:74, 1:351–352, 2:587 casualty coverage and, 1:351, 1:352
censorship in, 1:92
Hillary Rodham Clinton and, 1:110
close-up-coverage of, 1:291
Walter Cronkite and, 1:146
Howard Dean and, 1:158
embedded journalism and, 1:211, 1:352
initial phase coverage and, 1:351 insurgency phase coverage and, 1:351–352
John Kerry's criticism of, 1:377–378
media framing and, 2:587
news indexing and, 1:351
New York Times and, 2:514
Poland and, 1:386
precensorship and, 1:352 stringers and, 2:765

Ireland
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
Northern Ireland: British media, domestic terrorism and, 2:784–785

Iron Curtain Speech (Churchill), 1:104

Isikoff, Michael, 1:113

Islamic Salvation Front (FIS, Tunisia), 1:63

Israel
Al Jazeera television and, 1:24
Anwar Al-Sadat (Egypt), 1:27
American Jewish voters and, 2:708
Yasser Arafat (Palestine)and, 1:38–39, 2:691
Bad News From Israel (Glasgow Media Group) and, 1:270
debates in, 1:164
Egypt peace treaty with (1979), 1:368
Lebanon bombings by, 1:61
Golda Meir and, 2:449–450
Hosni Mubarak (Egypt) and, 2:472
PLO and, 1:38
principle of representation electoral system in, 1:208
Yitzhak Rabin and, 2:691–692
Ariel Sharon and, 2:743–744
U.S. political consultants and, 1:33
Gadi Wolfsfeld's work and, 2:840–841

Issue advocacy vs. express advocacy, 1:6, 1:57, 1:69–70, 2:426–427, 2:429, 2:566, 2:749

Issue management, 1:353–354 adaptive issue change strategy and, 1:353–354 catalytic issue change strategy and, 1:354 corporate decision making and, 1:353 dynamic issue change strategy and, 1:354 energy debate example of, 1:353
functions of, 1:353
influence vs. authority and, 1:354 lobbying, lobbyists and, 1:409–410
political public relations and, 2:677–680
public policy creation and, 1:353 reactive issue change strategy and, 1:353

Issue ownership, 1:354–355
Democratic vs. Republican Party and, 1:354
media partisan bias and, 2:435 performance issues and, 1:354
priming and, 2:654

Italy
Silvio Berlusconi and, 1:54–55, 1:82
compensatory electoral system in, 1:209
debates in, 1:164
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
Niccolò Machiavelli and, 2:413

Ivie, Robert, 1:193, 1:194

The Jack Paar Show, 1:81

Jackson, Andrew, 1:133, 1:135
1828 election and, 2:441, 2:627
Party Press era and, 2:539

Jackson, Jesse, 1:357
civil rights movement and, 1:357
international work of, 1:357
Martin Luther King, Jr. and, 1:357
liberalism of, 1:347
presidential campaigns of, 1:103, 1:194, 1:357, 2:695
rhetorical skills of, 1:357

Jamieson, Kathleen Hall, 1:327, 1:358
horserace framing by media and, 1:358
National Annenberg Election Survey of, 1:358 Packaging the Presidency: A History and Criticism of Presidential Advertising and, 1:358
2000, 2004 election public opinion studied by, 1:358

Janis, Irving, 1:289

Japan
debates in, 1:164
high-context culture in, 1:338
segmented electoral system in, 1:209

Javits, Jacob, 1:133

Jefferson, Thomas, 1:133
Alien and Sedition Act and, 2:504, 2:538
Federalist newspapers and, 2:504, 2:538–539
inaugural address of, 2:634
informed consent and, 2:503
National Gazette and, 2:504, 2:636
Republican Party and, 2:504
"separation of church and state" and, 2:707
State of the Union Address of, 2:753, 2:761

Je Jianying, 1:101
Jennings, Peter, 1:155
Jiang Qing, 1:101
John Paul II, Pope, 2:554, 2:555
Johnson, Lyndon B., 1:358–359 affirmative action introduced by, 1:10
Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, 1:10, 1:314, 2:479, 2:694, 2:739
Commission on Obscenity and Pornography and, 1:382
John Connally and, 1:128–129
"Daisy Girl" ad and, 1:9, 1:156, 1:232, 1:276, 1:333, 2:561, 2:604, 2:714, 2:736, 2:782
domestic policy focus of, 1:358–359
early political career of, 1:358
Executive Order 10925 of, 1:10
extramarital affair of, 1:83
Freedom of Information Act of 1967 and, 1:260–261 good vs. evil, communism and, 2:707
Great Society agenda of, 1:129, 1:360
Guggenheim biographical film on, 1:290
Fred Harris and, 1:297
Hubert Humphrey and, 1:314–315
J. F. Kennedy and, 1:358, 1:373–374
Martin Luther King, Jr. and, 1:109,* 2:694
media utilized by, 1:359
New Deal policies of, 1:359–360
1960, 1964, 1968 elections and, 1:358–359, 1:372, 2:471, 2:561, 2:695
presidential debates and, 1:160
press conferences of, 2:642
press secretaries of, 2:647
public opinion changed by, 2:632
State of the Union address of, 2:762
Vietnam War and, 1:358, 1:359, 2:589, 2:753*
Voting Rights Act and, 2:634
Johnston, Anne, 1:34, 1:231, 1:326
Joint Victory Campaign 2004, 1:6
Jones, Barry, 1:353–354
Jones, George, 2:505, 2:513
Jones, Paula, 1:113
Jordan
King Abdullah II and, 1:2
King Hussein I and, 1:319
Jordan, Barbara, 1:359–360
Congressional career of, 1:359 distinguished recognitions of, 1:359
rhetorical skills of, 1:35, 1:359, 2:695
Journalism, political, 1:360–365
ad watch and, 1:8–10, 1:67
agenda setting and, 1:12–19
Associated Press wire service and, 1:332 bias in, 1:270, 1:362
Abdelaziz Bouteflika and, 1:63–64
Bush–Rather confrontation and, 1:75, 2:699
Fernando Henrique Cardoso (Brazil) and, 1:86
Chilean government and, 1:25
in China, 1:99
Chinese Cultural Revolution and, 1:101
Winston Churchill and, 1:103–104
citizen journalism and, 1:105–106
commentary, political and, 1:117–119
confidential source protection and, 1:245
Congressional coverage and, 1:124–128
Creating Reality (Altheide) and, 1:142
C-SPAN Network and, 1:147–148
Deciding What's News (Gans), 1:166
Wolfgang Donsbach and, 1:192
editorials and, 1:198–199, 1:332
effects of, 1:364 election campaign coverage and, 1:360
embedded journalists and, 1:211, 1:352, 2:721, 2:822 ethical standards and, 1:361 executive branch coverage and, 1:360 fourth estate and, 1:8–10, 1:67, 1:71, 1:251–252, 2:575, 2:614, 2:615
Ben Franklin and, 1:360 free speech, First Amendment and, 1:360 future of, 1:364 gatekeeping focus and, 1:361
German unification and, 1:266–267
Horace Greeley and, 1:285
history of in U.S., 1:360–361 horserace elections coverage and, 1:362 hostile media effect and, 1:311–312
infotainment and, 1:335
Internet and, 1:361, 1:363–364
letters to the editor and, 1:403
Walter Lippmann and, 1:16, 1:251, 1:322, 1:360, 1:408–409 media and audience framing and, 1:254–255 media credibility and, 1:361 muckrakers, muckraking and, 2:472–474, 2:473* national vs. local newspapers and, 1:332
news magazines and, 1:332
political advertising analysis and, 1:362–363
political cartoons and, 1:87,* 1:87–88
political commentary and, 1:117–119
political news story construction and, 1:361–362 political punditry and, 1:363
Dan Rather and, 2:699–700
Jerry Rawlings (Ghana) and, 2:700–701 religion topic and, 2:708–709 social science theory research and, 1:364 structural bias and, 1:362, 1:364
Syrian Hafiz Al-Asad and, 1:21–22
24-hour news cycle and, 1:362 underground media and, 2:795
war coverage and, 1:360
"watchdog" role, progressivism and, 1:360, 2:826
See also News coverage, politics; News magazines; Newspapers, role in politics; News selection process; Penny press newspapers; War coverage; Women candidates, news coverage; Yellow journalism
Journal of Communication, 1:265, 1:266, 1:376
Jury system, deliberative qualities of, 1:288
Justice Party (JP, Turkey), 1:168–169

Kahneman, Daniel, 1:255, 1:304–305
Kaid, Lynda Lee, 1:367–368
books written by, 1:386

fear appeals work of, 1:231
The Handbook of Political Communication and, 1:386
The Handbook of Political Communication Research and, 1:231 impression management work of, 1:326 political advertising focus of, 1:34, 1:231, 1:295, 1:386
Political Commercial Archive and, 2:570–571
Political Communication Center and, 2:572
Political Communication Review journal and, 2:571–572 research grants of, 1:386
TechnoDistortion defined by, 2:781 video productions by, 1:386
Videostyle and, 1:326, 1:367, 1:386, 2:809, 2:841
Webstyle and, 1:386, 2:832
Kant, Immanuel, 1:132, 1:143
Katz, Elihu, 1:183, 1:368–369
Camp David Accord work of, 1:368
Israel broadcast television development and, 1:368
Personal Influence and, 1:199, 1:349, 1:368, 1:400, 2:545–546, 2:793 pluralistic ignorance and, 2:552
two-step flow model of communication of, 1:348, 1:368, 1:400, 2:552 uses and gratifications work of, 1:368, 2:585, 2:800–803
Kefauver, Estes, 1:371
Kekkonen, Urho, 1:369–370
Finlandization policies of, 1:369
Finnish neutrality and, 1:369
Helsinki Process and, 1:303
journalism self-censorship and, 1:369 nationalism focus of, 1:369 radical political realism of, 1:369
Soviet Union policy of, 1:369
Kellner, Douglas, 1:144–145
Kennedy, Edward (Ted), 1:370
apologia of, 1:38, 1:370
Chappaquiddick accident, scandal and, 1:370, 2:444
1960 election and, 1:315
Senate career of, 1:370
2004 Democratic National Convention and, 2:519
Web site of, 2:829
Kennedy, John F., 1:370–372
affirmative action and, 1:10
Berlin Wall and, 1:371–372
Willy Brandt (Germany) and, 1:65
"Catholic issue" and, 1:371 civil rights issues and, 1:371, 2:694
Cuban Missile Crisis and, 1:289, 1:371–372
Democratic National Convention (1956) and, 1:371
Executive Order 10925 of, 1:10
foreign policy of, 1:371–372
free airtime concept of, 1:259 groupthink policy-making in, 1:289
Guggenheim biographical film on, 1:290
inaugural address of, 1:328, 1:371, 2:634
L. B. Johnson and, 1:359
Ted Kennedy and, 1:370
Kennedy–Nixon debates (1960) and, 1:159–160, 1:284, 1:333, 1:371, 1:385, 2:516, 2:546, 2:561, 2:742, 2:777
Edward R. Murrow and, 2:476
New Frontier program of, 1:137, 1:371
Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis and, 2:521–522, 2:522*
Peace Corps executive order of, 2:637
political consultants and, 1:134
press conferences of, 2:506, 2:635, 2:643
press corps and, 2:837
press secretary (Salinger) of, 2:647
Theodore Sorensen and, 1:371 speeches, addresses of, 1:370–372
television talk shows and, 1:81
testimonials used by, 2:788
See also Kennedy (John F.) assassination
Kennedy, Robert F., 1:372
assassination of, 1:372
early political career of, 1:372
Fred Harris and, 1:297
Ted Kennedy and, 1:370
Martin Luther King, Jr. and, 2:694
1968 nominating convention and, 1:136, 1:358, 1:372
Ronald Reagan and, 2:703
Robert Kennedy Remembered, Guggenheim documentary on, 1:290
Senate career of, 1:372
Vietnam War issue and, 1:372
Kennedy (John F.) assassination, 1:373–375
John Connally and, 1:128–129
conspiracy theory of, 1:374 events of, 1:373,* 1:373–374 investigations into, 1:374
media coverage of, 1:374
Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis and, 2:522 single-bullet theory of, 1:374
Warren Commission and, 1:374
Zapruder Film and, 1:374
Kenya
Jomo Kenyatta and, 1:375–376
Daniel Arap Moi and, 2:468–469
Kenyatta, Jomo, 1:375–376
domestic policies of, 1:375
Facing Mount Kenya written by, 1:375
Daniel Arap Moi and, 2:468–469
orator skills of, 1:375
Pan African movement and, 1:375
Kepplinger, Hans Mathias, 1:376–377 media professionalism concept of, 1:376 negativism and symbolic politics and, 1:376 presidential television techniques and, 1:376
publications of, 1:376 scholarly accomplishments of, 1:376 theory of instrumental actualization and, 1:376 Kerry, John, 1:377–378
campaign spending by, 1:50
on The Daily Show, 1:155
grassroots campaigning of, 1:282
Iowa caucuses and, 1:351
The New Solder book of, 1:377
political satire regarding, 1:314
public campaign funding and, 1:78
rhetoric of, 1:377–378, 2:444
Senate career of, 1:377

Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and, 1:6, 1:7, 1:340, 1:364, 2:567, 2:808
testimonials used by, 2:788
2004 election and, 1:6–7, 1:73–74, 1:83, 1:158, 1:314, 1:340, 1:351, 1:364, 1:377–378, 2:547–548, 2:563, 2:567, 2:708, 2:788, 2:808
2004 Democratic National Convention and, 2:519
Vietnam War protests of, 1:377
Key, V. O., 2:419
Khrushchev, Nikita, 1:378–379
Cold War and, 1:378–379
Cuban missile crisis and, 1:378
de-Stalinization campaign of, 1:378
domestic policies of, 1:378–379
foreign policies of, 1:378
"kitchen debate" and, 2:516
Nixon and, 2:516
nuclear test-ban treaty and, 1:378
"secret speech" of, 1:378 transitional leadership of, 1:378
Kibaki, Mwai, 1:379–380
early education, politics of, 1:379
National Alliance of Kenya coalition party and, 1:379 neutral policies of, 1:379 universal free primary education policy of, 1:379 Kids Voting USA (KVUSA), 1:96, 1:380–381
civic parenting and, 1:380 family voting effects and, 1:380 national schools network of, 1:380 political socialization theory and, 1:380 trickle-up-influence of, 1:380 youth civic disengagement focus of, 1:380
King, Larry, 1:155
King, Martin Luther, Jr., 1:381 assassination investigation and, 1:374
assassination of, 1:109, 1:381
civil disobedience and non-violence focus of, 1:381, 2:462
civil rights movement and, 1:108–109, 1:109,* 2:462
"I Have a Dream" speech of, 1:108, 1:381, 2:694
Jesse Jackson and, 1:357
L. B. Johnson and, 1:109*
"Letter from Birmingham Jail" of, 1:108
liberal nationalism and, 2:694
March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom and, 1:381
Montgomery bus boycott and, 1:381
presidential rhetoric and, 2:633–634
Southern Christian Leadership Conference and, 1:381, 2:462
as statesman vs. politician, 1:392
Kinnock, Neil, 1:59, 1:389
Kirchner, Nestor, 1:40
Kirk, Paul, 1:119
Kirk, Russell, 1:129
Kissinger, Henry, 1:3
Klapper, Joseph, 1:381–382
CBS Social Research and, 1:382
Commission on Obscenity and Pornography, 1:382
The Effects of Mass Communication by, 1:199–200, 1:381, 1:407–408, 2:584, 2:793 functional analysis approach of, 1:382 limited effects theory of, 1:381–382, 1:407–408, 2:548, 2:584, 2:793 1940 election study of, 1:400, 1:407, 2:419, 2:508, 2:793
selective exposure concept and, 1:407
selective perception, selective retention and, 1:408, 2:584
uses and gratifications work of, 1:382
Voice of America broadcast research of, 1:382
Klein, Joseph, 2:441
Kluckhohn, C., 1:338
KMT (Kumingtang, China), 1:98
Knight-Ridder newspapers, 2:672–673
Knowledge gap, 1:382–384 active information exposure and, 1:383 ceiling effects concept and, 1:384 communication skills factor and, 1:383
digital divide and, 1:186,* 1:186–187, 1:383
dysfunctional media effects and, 1:383
empirical research regarding, 1:383–384 information transfer, knowledge acquisition by media users and, 1:382 media systems factor and, 1:383 micro vs. macro level deficiencies and, 1:383
political information processing and, 2:585
prior knowledge factor and, 1:383 social contacts factor and, 1:383 theoretical criticism and, 1:383 voting decisions and, 1:382
See also Political knowledge
Kohl, Helmut, 1:384–385
German reunification and, 1:384
Angela Merkel and, 2:451
negative media image, relationship and, 1:384
Elisabeth Noelle-Neumann and, 2:517
Koppel, Ted, 1:138, 2:514
Korea
Communism in, 1:123
e-government initiatives in, 1:201
high-context culture in, 1:338
Korte, Charles, 2:552
Kraus, Sidney, 1:284, 1:295, 1:385 debate policy recommendations of, 1:385 debates covered by, 1:385
The Great Debates book of, 1:385 televised political debates focus of, 1:385
Kriesky, Bruno, 1:385–386
Austrian socialism under, 1:385–386
economic policies of, 1:386
foreign policies of, 1:386
media utilized by, 1:386
Ku Klux Klan, 1:129, 1:290
Kumingtang (KMT, China), 1:98
Kurtz, Howard, 2:452
KVUSA. See Kids Voting USA
Kwaśniewski, Alexsander, 1:386–387
European Union membership and, 1:387 international terrorism focus of, 1:386
Iraq War and, 1:386
NATO membership and, 1:386, 1:387

popularity of, 1:387
trade union pluralism and, 1:386
Lech Wałęsa and, 1:386, 1:387

Labour Party, Britain, 1:389–390
advertising experimentation by, 1:389
Tony Blair and, 1:59, 1:112, 1:130, 1:390 campaign consultants and, 1:389
Conservative Party and, 1:130
federal system of internal democracy and, 1:389 Philip Gould and, 1:389 imagery and symbolism focus of, 1:389
Neil Kinnock and, 1:389
Peter Mandelson and, 2:415–416
market-driven electoral focus of, 1:389
Herbert Morrison's reelection (1937) and, 1:389
1979 general election and, 2:604
opinion polling, focus groups and, 1:389
Margaret Thatcher and, 2:788
Harold Wilson and, 1:130, 1:389, 2:839–840
Lancaster, Frank L., 1:252
Lane, Robert, 2:580
Lang, Gladys Engel, 1:390 collective dynamics research of, 1:390 Etched in Memory and, 1:390
Kurt Lang and, 1:391
news practices, policy outcomes work of, 1:390 1952 nominating conventions coverage by, 1:390
Politics and Television and, 1:390 television effects focus of, 1:390
Voting and Nonvoting and, 1:390 voting behavior focus of, 1:390
Lang, Kurt, 1:391
The Battle for Public Opinion, 1:391
Gladys Engel Lang and, 1:390
MacArthur Day study of, 1:391
Politics & Television and, 1:391 television shaping public opinion focus of, 1:391 television Watergate coverage focus of, 1:391 Language and politics, 1:391–395
denotative vs. connotative definitions and, 1:391–392 discourse analysis and, 1:391
Greek Sophists and, 1:393, 2:717
Henry IV references and, 1:392
ideology and, 1:391
labels and, 1:392–393 media bias, truth and, 1:393 metaphor, metonymy and, 1:394
Plato on politics and, 1:392 plural vs. singular pronoun forms and, 1:393–394 politician, connotations of, 1:391–392 politicize positive connotation and, 1:392 politic root word meaning and, 1:392 problem of truth and, 1:393 public speaking as an art and, 1:393 rhetoric and, 1:391, 1:393
See also Presidential communication; Rhetoric, political Larner, Jeremy, 1:80
Larry King Live, 1:29, 1:333
Lasswell, Harold, 1:395
Chicago School membership of, 1:395 communication definition, functions and, 1:395 political psychology field founded by, 1:395 propaganda strategies, content analysis and, 1:395, 2:660 psychoanalysis and behaviorism linked by, 1:395
publications of, 1:395
qualitative and quantitative research methods and, 1:395
The Symbolic Uses of Politics (Edelman) and, 2:769 uses and gratifications theory and, 1:395
Lateline comedy series, 1:257
Late Show with David Letterman, 1:333 Latin America
democratization process in, 1:178–179
Graduate School of Political Management programs and, 1:282
Daniel Hallin's work and, 1:294
political discussions in, 1:343, 1:344 (table)
Latin American Association of Political Consultants (ALACOP), 1:31, 1:215
Latinos and politics, media, 1:396–400, 2:462, 2:694
AM, FM radio stations and, 1:397–398, 1:399
Felipe de Jesus Calderón (Mexico) and, 1:396*
César Chávez and, 2:462
Chicano Youth Movement and, 2:694 communication strategy research and, 1:398 cultivation theory and, 1:149
daily, weekly newspapers and, 1:397, 1:398 Democratic vs. Republican party efforts and, 1:399 diverse populations within, 1:396
electoral politics and, 2:463–464
empirical research regarding, 1:398–400
English-language Latino politics press coverage and, 1:398–399 future research directions and, 1:399 get-out-the-vote techniques and, 1:283, 1:399
horserace coverage and, 1:398
immigrant status factor and, 2:461
Internet and, 1:396, 1:398
language factors and, 1:396–397
Latin labor movement and, 2:462
Latino candidates and, 1:399
local elections success of, 2:694 media content analysis and, 1:396 media landscape and, 1:397–398 national, regional magazines and, 1:397
political coalitions and, 2:464
racist electoral communications and, 2:463
social movements and, 2:462–463
statistics regarding, 1:396–397, 2:461
television broadcast networks and, 1:397, 1:399 in the United States, 1:396–397
U.S. Jones Act and, 1:397
visibility of, 2:461
voting behavior of, 1:396, 1:398–399, 2:464, 2:694 voting eligibility and, 1:397
Laugh In, 2:779
Lazarsfeld, Paul F., 1:400–401 focus group interviewing by, 1:400 interpersonal political communication study by, 1:343, 1:347

"Lazarsfeld-Stanton program analyzer" developed by, 1:400–401 mass media influence on voting behavior study of, 1:156, 1:400, 1:407, 2:419, 2:617
"narcotizing dysfunction" of media and, 2:577
The People's Choice work of, 1:199, 1:400, 2:540–542, 2:783, 2:813
Personal Influence, 1:199, 1:349, 1:368, 1:400, 2:545–546, 2:793
propaganda and, 2:660 quantitative and qualitative data analysis methods developed by, 1:400–401 radio advertising research of, 2:568 socio-structural voting behavior variables and, 2:813 two-step flow model of mass communication and, 1:19, 1:368, 1:400, 2:419, 2:541–542, 2:793–794, 2:813 unemployment impact on community life study of, 1:400 League of Women Voters, 1:5, 1:87, 1:160–161
presidential debates and, 1:120
radio used by, 2:696
Leander v. Sweden (European Court of Human Rights), 1:216
Lebanon, 1:24
Left-wing authoritarianism, 1:46
Legacy of Heroines scholarship program, 1:87
Legislative Transparency and Accountability Act of 2006, 1:410 Lehrer, Jim, 1:401 awards presented to, 1:401 journalism career of, 1:401
The MacNeil/Lehrer Report and, 1:401
The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer (PBS) and, 1:401, 2:452, 2:540
Lenin, Vladamir I., 1:401–402
Friedrich Engels and, 1:402
Karl Marx and, 1:401–402
media instrumentation by, 1:178 political theory and philosophy works of, 1:401
propaganda and, 2:659
Russian Revolution lead by, 1:401
Soviet Union founded by, 1:401
Theory of Party Press and, 1:402
Leno, Jay, 1:29, 1:155, 1:313, 1:333
Le Pen, Jean-Marie, 1:402–403 campaign discourse skills of, 1:402 Front National party of, 1:402–403
media utilized by, 1:402–403
Parliamentary career of, 1:402 political campaign marketing methods of, 1:403
Lerner, David, 2:466, 2:467
Letterman, David, 1:29, 1:155, 1:314, 1:333
Letters to the editor, 1:403–404
editorials and, 1:198–199
Internet and, 1:403
public opinion and, 1:403
public policy influenced by, 1:403
Levy, Mark R., 2:530
Lewin, Kurt, 2:510
Lewinsky, Monica, 1:38, 1:110, 1:268, 1:404, 2:439, 2:615, 2:633
Drudge Report and, 1:113, 1:127, 1:363, 2:613
Starr Report and, 1:404
Libel, 1:404–406
actual malice standard and, 1:405 economic, emotional injury compensation and, 1:405 fault requirement and, 1:405
First Amendment and, 1:244, 1:245
Internet transnational cases of, 1:405
New York Times v. Sullivan and, 1:245, 1:405, 2:507 press defenses against, 1:405 press freedom vs. reputation damage and, 1:404–405, 2:562 public's constitutional right for information and, 1:405 requisite elements of, 1:405
slander vs., 1:404
Supreme Court rulings on, 1:405
Zenger trial (1735) and, 2:644
Liberalism, 1:321
George McGovern and, 2:430
New Right vs., 2:494–495
of press corps, 2:434–435
Liberal media system model, 2:648, 2:650
Liberal Republican Party, 1:285
Libertarian Party, 1:406 economic and personal freedom foundation of, 1:406
John Hospers candidacy and, 1:406
Nixon wage and price controls and, 1:406 public policy institutions of, 1:406
Ayn Rand's work and, 1:406
2004 election and, 1:406
Libertarian theory of the press, 1:250, 2:509, 2:641, 2:648
Liddy, Gordon, 2:696
Lies and the Lying Liars Who Tell Them (Franken), 1:257–258
Limbaugh, Rush, 1:406–407
conservativism and, 1:129, 1:406–407, 2:777
1994 Republican Congress and, 1:407, 2:712
punditry of, 2:686
radio talk shows and, 1:29, 1:30, 1:113, 1:363, 2:696, 2:777
2000 election and, 1:407
The Way Things Ought to Be published by, 1:407
Limited effects theory, 1:407–408
The Effects of Mass Communication (Klapper) and, 1:199–200, 1:381–382, 1:407–408, 2:548, 2:584, 2:793
1940 election study and, 1:407, 2:793 political persuasion and, 2:547–549
political socialization and, 2:617
salience of subject matter and, 1:408
selective exposure concept and, 1:407
selective perception, selective retention and, 1:408 television emergence and, 1:408
The Unseeing Eye (Patterson & McClure) and, 2:800
Lincoln, Abraham
1860 election and, 1:175, 1:285, 2:505, 2:712
Emancipation Proclamation and, 2:505 executive order originated by, 2:637
Gettysburg Address and, 2:612, 2:633
Horace Greeley and, 1:285, 2:505
inaugural address of, 1:328, 2:634
Lincoln–Douglas debates and, 1:42, 1:284, 2:547 newspaper owned by, 2:539
speechwriting and, 2:636, 2:754
strategy of silence campaign poster of, 2:628

Lincoln–Douglas debates, 1:42, 1:284, 2:547
Linkugel, Wil A., 1:38
Lippmann, Walter, 1:408–409 false generalization concept of, 2:484 journalist and media agenda setting and, 1:16, 1:251, 1:322, 1:408–409, 2:585–586 media criticized by, 1:360, 1:409
media framing and, 1:409
media's effect on public opinion and, 1:409
New Republic magazine and, 1:408 news value term coined by, 2:511 Public Opinion book of, 1:408–409 publics as communities of people and, 2:668 public sphere discourse of, 2:682
Lipset, S. M., 1:156–157, 2:814
Lloyd, Clem, 2:444
Lloyd, Henry Demarest, 2:473
Lobbying, lobbyists, 1:409–410
AARP and, 1:1
Jack Abramoff controversy and, 1:410
Byrd Amendment regulation of, 1:409
grassroots lobbying and, 1:283–284, 2:668
inside, professional lobbying and, 1:409
Legislative Transparency and Accountability Act and, 1:410 Lobby Disclosure Act of 1995 regulation of, 1:409–410 media transparency and, 1:410
National Association of Broadcasters PAC and, 2:482 outside, citizen lobbying and, 1:409 political marketing and, 2:604 process of influencing politics and, 1:409 public affairs communication and, 2:666–668
unions and, 2:798
Locke, John, 2:509, 2:675
The Long Revolution (Williams), 1:152
Los Angeles Free Press, 2:795
Los Angeles Times, 2:515
Lott, Trent, 1:61
Loukanov, Andrey, 1:410–411
assassination of, 1:411
Bulgarian Communist Party and, 1:410 democratic social system, market economy of, 1:410
Russian-Bulgarian Topenergy Joint Venture and, 1:410–411
Zhivkov deposed by, 1:410
Lowenthal, Leo, 1:143, 1:144
Lowi, Thodore, 2:575–576
Luhmann, Niklas, 1:294
Lurie, Rod, 1:117
Luxembourg, 1:214
Lyotard, Jean-François, 1:331

Maastricht Treaty, 1:220
Machiavelli, Niccolò, 2:413–414
Cesare Borgia and, 2:413
early political career of, 2:413
ethics and, 2:413 leadership concepts of, 2:600
political image and, 1:322
political rhetoric and, 2:718
The Prince and, 2:413, 2:718
public opinion and, 2:675
Machlup, Fritz, 1:331
Mackling, Elizabeth W., 1:295
MacNeil, Robert, 1:401
The MacNeil/Lehrer Report, 1:401
MADD (Mothers Against Drunk Driving), 1:12
Madison, James, 2:538
Maine
Edmund Muskie and, 2:477
public funding for state candidates in, 1:78
Major, John, 1:130
The Making of the English Working Class (Thompson), 1:152
Malcolm X, 1:109, 2:462, 2:694
Mancini, Paolo, 2:414
academic accomplishments of, 2:414
Comparing Media Systems, 1:124, 1:294, 2:414
Italian media focus of, 2:414 mass media and political systems relationship work of, 2:414
Mandela, Nelson, 2:414–415
African National Congress and, 2:415 anti-apartheid activism and, 2:415 arrests and trials of, 2:415 democracy in South Africa and, 2:414–415 National Peace Accord and, 2:415
as statesman vs. politician, 1:392 terrorism label of, 2:784
Mandelson, Peter, 2:415–416
Tony Blair and, 1:59, 2:415–416, 2:757
British political communication transformation and, 2:415–416 early communications career of, 2:415
European Union work of, 2:416
Labour Party and, 1:389, 2:415–416
party and media relationships of, 2:415–416 Manifesto of the Communist Party (Engels), 1:402
Mao Zedong, 2:416–417
big-character posters and, 1:55
Fidel Castro and, 1:89
Chinese media and, 1:98
Cultural Revolution and, 1:89, 1:98, 1:100–101, 2:416 democratic centralism principle of, 2:416
Deng Xiaoping and, 1:180
little Red Book of, 1:100–101
Peoples Republic of China established by, 2:416 poems, political writings of, 2:416 political mobilization by, 2:416
Selected Works of Mao Tse-tung and, 2:416
March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom, 1:381, 2:739
Marcuse, Herbert, 1:143
Martinez, Mel, 2:463
Marx, Karl, 2:417–418
Salvadore Allende (Chile) and, 1:25
authoritarianism and, 1:45
Jay Blumler and, 1:62
capitalism analysis focus of, 2:417
Fidel Castro (Cuba) and, 1:89
Chinese Cultural Revolution and, 1:100, 1:101
communism and, 1:123
Communist Manifesto and, 1:123
critical theory and, 1:143–144
cultural studies and, 1:152–153

Das Kapital economic theory work of, 2:418, 2:466 dialectical materialism concept of, 2:417
Friedrich Engels and, 2:417
historical materialism concept of, 2:417 Vladímir I. Lenin and, 1:401–402 modernization concepts and, 2:466 philosophy interests of, 2:417
political censorship of, 1:91, 1:92 political correctness terminology and, 2:574
propaganda and, 2:659
Mass nonviolent protest, Australia, 2:418
Franklin Dam campaign and, 2:418
Gandhi's influence on, 2:418
Iraq War protests and, 2:418 nonviolent direct action, civil disobedience, 2:418 nuclear disarmament campaign and, 2:418 right to protest assertion and, 2:418
Vietnam Moratorium movement and, 2:418
Mass political behavior, 2:418–422
The American Voter (Campbell, Miller, Converse, & Stokes) and, 1:35–36, 2:419, 2:581, 2:766, 2:815
babyboomers and, 2:421 campaigns and voting and, 2:419
candidate-centered communication and, 1:80–83
An Economic Theory of Democracy (Downs) and, 2:419–420 economic voting models and, 2:420 education factor and, 2:420
GenXers and, 2:421
Joseph Goebbels and, 1:275
Adolf Hitler and, 1:307–308
individual factors and, 2:419–420 institutional factors and, 2:420
interpersonal political communication and, 1:348–349 issue preference importance in, 2:419 knowledge acquisition and, 2:420
"New Deal" cohort and, 2:421 occupation, income factors and, 2:420 opinion leaders and, 2:419, 2:420, 2:793, 2:813 party identification factor and, 2:419, 2:421, 2:617 People's Choice study of, 2:540–542 protest activity and, 2:421 rational voter model of, 2:419–421 social-psychological model of, 2:419 societal factors of voter turnout and, 2:420 sociological model of, 2:419 televised debates and, 1:81
two-step flow of communication and, 1:19, 1:368, 1:400, 1:419, 2:541–542, 2:793–794
The Unseeing Eye (Patterson & McClure) and, 2:800
voter registration laws and, 2:421 voting by mail and, 2:421
See also Television, politics and; Voter behavior
Matalin, Mary, 2:422
books written by, 2:422
G. W. Bush's administration and, 2:422
James Carville and, 1:88, 2:422
television career of, 2:422
Maturana, Humberto R., 1:131
Mazzoleni, Gianpietro, 2:422–423
Italian political communication field and, 2:422–423
The Media and Neo-Populism work of, 2:423 media commercialization consequences and, 2:423 personalization, dramatization of politics and, 2:423
McArthur, Douglas, 1:391
McCain, John, 2:423–424, 2:643
campaign finance reform work of, 2:423–424 Congressional career of, 2:423
on The Daily Show, 1:155
Internet used by, 1:334, 2:492
Keating savings and loan scandal and, 2:423
New Hampshire primaries and, 1:68
2000 Republican primary and, 1:407
2008 election and, 2:424
Vietnam War service of, 2:423
See also Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (BCRA); *McConnell v. Federal Election Commission
McCaine-Feingold Act. See Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (BCRA)
McCarthy, Eugene
1968 election and, 1:80, 1:136, 1:358, 1:372 political censorship by, 1:92
McCarthy, Larry, 2:839
McCarthy hearings, 1:92, 1:333, 2:424–425, 2:712
Edward R. Murrow and, 1:243, 2:424, 2:475–476 television's political influence and, 2:424–425
McClellan, Scott, 1:247
McClelland, David, 2:466
McClure, Robert D., 2:800
McCombs, Maxwell, 1:13–14, 1:295, 2:425–426 agenda-setting mass media function focus of, 2:425–426, 2:828
awards of, 2:425
need for orientation concept and, 2:828 1968 election studied by, 2:425 scholarly career of, 2:425
McConnell v. Federal Election Commission,* 1:70, 2:426–429
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (BCRA) and, 1:57, 1:58, 1:234
Buckley v. Valeo and, 2:426–427
electioneering communications and, 2:427
Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. and, 2:428–429
First Amendment rights and, 2:426–427
minors' political contributions and, 2:427 political speech vs. money in politics and, 2:426
Randall v. Sorrell and, 2:428
soft money ban and, 2:426–427
McGee, Michael Calvin, 1:193
McGovern, George, 2:429–430
Thomas Eagleton and, 1:230, 2:430
Guggenheim and, 1:290
Gary Hart and, 1:298, 2:429
international work of, 2:430
Iowa caucuses and, 1:350
liberalism of, 2:430
McGovern Library and Center for Public Service and Leadership and, 2:430–431
1968, 1984 elections and, 1:136, 2:429
1972 election and, 1:101–102, 1:230, 1:290, 1:350, 2:429–430, 2:477, 2:561

popular support focus of, 2:429–430
R. Sargent Shriver and, 2:430
Vietnam War opposition of, 2:430
McGovern-Fraser Commission, 1:136
McGovern Library and Center for Public Service and Leadership, 2:430–431
Bill Clinton at dedication of, 2:431
McGovern Legacy exhibit area of, 2:431 public services and leadership focus of, 2:430–431
McGuire, William, 1:336
McKinley, William
press secretary of, 2:646
strategy of silence campaign poster of, 2:628
The McLaughlin Group talk show, 1:68
McLeod, Jack, 1:295
McLuhan, Marshall, 1:368, 2:431–432, 2:561
academic career of, 2:431
communication technology affects on cognition and, 2:432 “global village” concept of, 2:432, 2:448
The Gutenberg Galaxy of, 2:432, 2:448
“hot” vs. “cold” media and, 2:431, 2:449, 2:561, 2:742
The Medium Is the Massage, 2:431–432, 2:448–449
Nixon, 1968 election and, 2:561 popular culture studies of, 2:432
“surfing” through knowledge concept of, 2:432
McNamara, Robert, 2:507, 2:540
McQuail, Denis, 2:432–433
academic career of, 2:432
European media effects research and, 2:432, 2:433
Mass Communication Theory and, 2:433
Television in Politics and, 2:432, 2:782
uses and gratifications work of, 2:432–433, 2:800–803
Media. See Alternative media in politics (AMP); Media bias Media bias, 2:433–440 alternative media and, 1:27
Elizabeth Dole and, 1:190–191
embedded journalism and, 1:211, 1:352, 2:721
Robert Entman’s work in, 1:212
Fox News network and, 1:253–254
Glasgow Media Group and, 1:270
Internet and, 1:363–364
letters to the editor and, 1:403
liberal press corps and, 2:434–435
National Public Radio and, 2:483
third-person effect and, 2:789–790 “truth is relative” concept and, 1:393
See also Media bias: partisan bias; Media bias: structural bias Media bias: partisan bias economic factors in, 2:433–434
“50-50 rule” and, 2:435, 2:498
Great Britain press and, 2:434
hostile media effect and, 1:311–312, 2:436
issue ownership and, 2:435
news content analysis and, 2:435–436
1992 election and, 2:434
objective equated to balanced reporting and, 2:434 penny press papers and, 1:28, 1:30, 2:433–434, 2:776 perceptions vs. actual bias and, 2:436 political party favoritism and, 2:433 public perceptions of, 2:436 reporters voting Democrat and, 2:434–435 tone of coverage and, 2:435
2004 election and, 2:435
Media bias: structural bias conflict emphasis and, 2:438, 2:500 “Democrat said/Republican said” pattern and, 2:438 disasters, crimes emphasis and, 2:438 dramatic element stories focus and, 2:439
effects of, 2:439
government sources reliance and, 2:437 hard to soft news shift and, 2:439 increasing audience size and, 2:438–439 known political personalities favor and, 2:438 lowering costs and, 2:437–438 negative news emphasis and, 2:438
new, novel topics focus and, 2:438–439 “news subsidies” concept and, 2:437–438 of political journalism, 1:362, 1:364 profit motive and, 2:437
structural bias and, 2:436–439
Media buying in politics, 2:440
equal access and, 2:420
Equal Time Provision, FCC and, 1:213, 2:420 lowest unit rate, tier-structured pricing and, 2:420
Media consultants, 2:440–442
American Association of Political Consultants (AAPC) and, 1:31–32
American-style campaigning and, 1:33–35
Edward Bernays and, 2:441
British war propaganda and, 2:441
“Campaigns Incorporated” (1933) and, 2:441 crucial role played by, 2:441–442 early 19th century and, 2:441
1828 election and, 2:441
Eisenhower, 1952 election and, 2:441, 2:561
European Association of Political Consultants and, 1:215–216
Joseph Napolitan, 2:480–481
political consultants and, 1:153–154
polling and, 2:441 in the Roman Republic, 2:440 specialization in, 2:441 symbolism and, 2:441
See also Consultants, political Media dependency theory. See Dependency theory, media Media events, 2:442–443
examples of, 2:442
high news value, public resonance and, 2:442
information technology in politics and, 1:332–335
integrating function of, 2:443 “media meaning” events and, 2:442–443 object, time, social dimensions of, 2:442 social change function of, 2:443
Media feeding frenzy, 2:444–445
alarmist risk news coverage and, 2:445 consequences of, 2:444
examples of, 2:444
Feeding Frenzy (Sabato) and, 2:444 journalists become actors in, 2:444 other politicians’ role in, 2:445 pack journalism, collective behavior aspects of, 2:444, 2:527

predator and prey roles in, 2:444
Dan Quayle subject of, 2:689 situational factors affecting, 2:444–445 television age phenomenon of, 2:444
Media frames, 1:254–255
Media Fund, 1:6, 1:7, 2:559, 2:567
Media logic, 2:445–446
agenda setting of, 2:446 party logic vs., 2:446 political complexity reduced by, 2:446 political institutions affected by, 2:445–446 rhetorical symbols used in narrative patterns and, 2:445
"sound bite" approach of news coverage and, 2:446 technological, organizational, and cultural elements of, 2:445 Media policy. See Council of Europe (CoE), media policy
Media Studies Journal, 1:260
Mediated Political Realities (Nimmo & Combs), 2:446–447 fantasy theme analysis of, 2:446–447, 2:515
group-mediated politics and, 2:447, 2:515
mass-mediated politics and, 2:446–447, 2:515 rituals of power of movies and, 2:447
social reality focus of, 2:446
Mediatization, 2:447–448
agenda setting and, 2:448
Christian Democratic Union (Federal Republic of Germany) and, 1:4 dramatization of political events and, 2:447 media dependence of political actions and, 2:447
media logic and, 2:446
political public relations and, 2:677–680
sound bites and, 2:448
Mediterranean media system model, 2:648, 2:649
The Medium Is the Massage (McLuhan), 2:432, 2:448
Medium theory, 2:448–449
figure and ground concept and, 2:448
"hot" vs. "cold" media and, 2:431, 2:449
individual's participation with the media and, 2:431–432, 2:448–449
Marshall McLuhan and, 2:431–432, 2:448–449
"medium is the message" concept and, 2:431–432, 2:448–449 message impacted by delivery system and, 2:449 print technology importance and, 2:448 writing transforms, lessens meaning of words and, 2:448
Meet the Press, 1:333
MeetUp.com, 2:792
Meir, Golda, 2:449–450
early political career of, 2:449
foreign policies of, 2:449
Israeli founder and prime minister, 2:449
media relationships of, 2:450
Rogers Peace Initiative and, 2:449
Yom Kippur War and, 2:449
Menem, Carlos, 2:450–451
Raúl Alfonsín and, 1:23
broadcast law reform of, 1:40, 2:450 economic and foreign policies of, 2:450 image management of, 2:450
media relationships of, 2:450–451
scandals regarding, 2:450–451
Menzel, H., 1:183
Meredith, James, 1:109
Merkel, Angela, 2:451–452
Christian Democratic Union and, 2:451
German reunification and, 2:451
Helmut government and, 2:451
media relationships of, 2:451–452
Gerhard Schröder and, 2:451–452
Merz, Charles, 2:511
Metacoverage, 2:452–455
campaign metacoverage and, 2:453, 2:454 compound topical structure of, 2:453–454 content analysis of, 2:453
embedded journalists and, 2:454, 2:721
mainstream news feature of, 2:452–453 news about news itself and, 2:452, 2:497 news scandals and, 2:453–454 paradigm repair and, 2:454 political learning and attitudes influenced by, 2:453 political strategy and, 2:453 press self-regulating function and, 2:453, 2:454 reflexivity thesis regarding, 2:454
Methodology, 2:455–461
case study methods and, 2:460 coding process and, 2:457 content analysis and, 2:457 continuous variables and, 2:455 convenience sample and, 2:456 critical analysis and, 2:457–458 cultural studies method and, 2:460 discrete variables and, 2:455 experimental research method and, 2:458–459 focus group research method and, 2:459–460 historical methods and, 2:460 independent vs. dependent variables and, 2:455 nominal, ordinal, interval measures and, 2:456 Pew Research Center for the People & the Press and, 2:550–551 probability samples and, 2:456 purposive sample and, 2:456 quantitative content analysis and, 2:456–457 quantitative vs. qualitative methods and, 2:455 questions and hypotheses identification and, 2:455 random sampling and, 2:456 ratio scales and, 2:456 reliability, validity of measures and, 2:456 rhetorical analysis and, 2:457 sampling decisions and, 2:455 stratified sampling and, 2:456 survey research method and, 2:458 systematic sampling and, 2:456 unit of analysis determination and, 2:456–457 variable operationalization and, 2:455–456 variables identification and, 2:455
Mexico
Felipe de Jesus Calderón and, 1:396*
debates in, 1:164
Vicente Fox and, 1:252–253
Daniel Hallin media research work on, 1:294
segmented electoral system in, 1:209
The Mike Douglas Show, 1:21

Mill, John Stuart, 2:509
Miller, Warren, 1:35–36, 2:419, 2:581, 2:767
Miller v. California, 1:245, 2:520, 2:644
Millionaire's Amendment provision, of BCRA, 1:57–58, 1:234
Milton, John, 2:509
censorship and, 1:91
freedom of the press and, 2:644
Minorities, role in politics, 2:461–464 access to power focus and, 2:461
affirmative action and, 1:10–11
civil rights movement and, 1:108–109, 1:109*
electoral politics and, 2:463–464
e-mail to inform and, 1:334 empowerment model of voting and, 2:463 Great Depression, Democratic Party and, 1:175 minority, defined, 2:461
NAACP and, 2:479–480
negative advertising and, 2:565
political conflict and, 2:572–573 prejudice, discrimination effects on, 2:461
race in politics and, 2:692–695
racist electoral communication techniques and, 2:463 social movements and, 2:462–463 voting and political coalitions and, 2:464
Watts riots and, 2:827
See also African Americans, role in politics; Latinos and politics, media; Race in politics
Mitchell, John N., 2:540
Mitsotakis, Konstantinos, 2:464–465
media relationships of, 2:465
political career of, 2:464–465
Mitterrand, François, 2:465–466
campaign tactics of, 2:465, 2:629
debates and, 2:465–466
Giscard d'Estaing and, 1:268–269
Jean-Marie Le Pen and, 1:402
media utilized by, 2:466 political consultants used by, 2:466
Modernization, 2:466–467
The Achieving Society (McClelland) and, 2:467
Americanization concept and, 1:32–33
American-style campaigning and, 1:33–35 dependency theory and, 2:467 empathetic personalities and, 2:466 international media policy and, 2:466
Marxism and, 2:466
Mass Media and National Development (Schramm) and, 2:467
The Passing of Traditional Society (Lerner) and, 2:466 political predispositions changes and, 1:157 professional management of elections and, 1:34 rationalization processes of society, individual and, 2:466
Western domination, national humiliation and, 2:467
Modigliani, A., 1:256
Mohammed VI, 2:467–468
authority based on accountability and, 2:468 domestic, social programs of, 2:468
media utilized by, 2:468
New Era of political modernization and, 2:468
Moi, Daniel Arap, 2:468–469
dictatorship of, 2:469
one-party state under, 2:469 populist rhetoric and acts of, 2:469
Mondale, Walter
Dole-Mondale vice presidential debate and, 1:191
Fred Harris and, 1:297
1984 election and, 1:357, 2:436
Reagan-Mondale debates and, 1:21, 1:161, 1:313, 2:704
Montgomery Bus Boycott, 1:108, 1:381
Morales, Evo, 2:469–470
authoritarianism of, 2:470
freedom of the press and, 2:470
media utilized by, 2:469–470
socialist career or, 2:469
Venezuelan support of, 2:470
More Bad News (Glasgow Media Group), 1:270
Morocco
King Hassan II and, 1:300, 2:468
King Mohammed VI and, 2:467–468
Abdessalam Yassine and, 2:853
Morris, Aldon, 1:109
Morris, Richard, 2:441
Morrison, Herbert, 1:389
Morrison, Toni, 1:112
Moseley Braun, Carol, 2:470–471
Clinton and, 2:470
grassroots campaign of, 2:470
1992 election year and, 2:470
Senatorial career of, 2:470
2004 presidential bid of, 2:470–471
Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD), 1:12
Mott, Lucretia, 2:693
MoveOn.org, 1:6, 1:12, 1:340, 2:493, 2:559, 2:567, 2:671, 2:749
Moyers, William (Bill), 2:471–472
early journalism career of, 2:471
L. B. Johnson administration and, 2:471
Kennedy administration and, 2:471
Peace Corps work of, 2:471
Public Affairs Television created by, 2:471 television news career of, 2:471
Moynihan, Daniel Patrick, 1:110
MSNBC, 1:113, 1:126, 1:333
Fox News and, 1:253
Bill Moyers and, 2:471
nominating conventions and, 1:138
pundits on, 2:686
Vanderbilt Television News Archive and, 2:806
MTV alternative media of, 1:30
in China, 1:99
China, media and, 1:99
Choose or Lose, 1:27
Bill Clinton on, 1:29, 1:114
Mubarak, Hosni, 2:472
economic policies of, 2:472
Israeli policies of, 2:472
military career of, 2:472

positive neutrality policy of, 2:472
Sadat's policies and, 2:472
Muckrakers, muckraking, 1:360, 2:472–474
Abu Ghraib, Iraq War scandal and, 2:474 civil reform and, 2:474
William Randolph Hearst and, 2:473
Hepburn Act and, 2:474 investigative reporting and, 2:474
Henry Demarest Lloyd and, 2:473 magazines of, 2:473–474
McClure's Magazine and, 2:473
My Lai massacre and, 2:474
patent medicine scams and, 2:473* progressive era and, 2:473
Pure Food and Drug Act, 2:474
Teddy Roosevelt and, 2:472–473
See also Yellow journalism
Muhammed cartoon events, 2:474–475
cultural norms and, 2:511
Danish newspaper and, 2:474
Islamic protest against, 2:474 political imagery power of, 2:475
Murdoch, Rupert, 1:99, 1:115, 1:253
Murrow, Edward R., 1:146, 2:475–476
Good Night and Good Luck (Clooney, Dir.), 1:243, 2:476
Kennedy administration and, 2:476
Korean War and, 2:475
McCarthy hearings and, 1:243, 2:424, 2:475–476
Voice of America and, 2:811
World War II reporting career of, 2:475, 2:696
Music and politics, 2:476–477
collective identity concept and, 2:476–477 composer, audience elements of, 2:476 labor songs and, 2:476, 2:477 music, defined, 2:476
music as liberation tool and, 2:477 political ballads and, 2:477 politics, defined, 2:476 powerful political weapon and (Plato), 2:476 protest music and, 2:476 subculture music and, 2:477 symbolic politics and, 2:477
Muskie, Edmund, 1:350, 2:477–478
Carter administration and, 2:478
Clean Air Act of 1970 and, 2:477 environmental policies of, 2:477
Humphrey-Muskie ticket (1968) and, 2:477
1972 Democratic primary and, 2:477–478
Mussolini, Benito, 2:696
MySpace, 2:491

NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People), 1:479–480
Birth of a Nation film and, 2:479
Brown v. Board of Education and, 2:479 civil rights movement organization and, 2:462 current advocacy efforts of, 2:479–480 federal legislation efforts of, 2:479, 2:739 grassroots membership organization of, 2:479
Martin Luther King, Jr. and, 1:381
1909 founding of, 2:479
political, educational, economic, social equality focus of, 2:479
political advertising by, 2:566
Eleanor Roosevelt and, 2:724
Nader, Ralph, 2:480
ballot initiatives and, 1:51
books written by, 2:480
consumer advocacy work of, 2:480 presidential bids of, 2:480, 2:851
Reform Party and, 2:706
Saturday Night Live and, 2:731
Web site used by, 2:851
NAES. See National Annenberg Election Survey
NAFTA. See North American Free Trade Agreement
Napolitan, Joseph, 2:480–481
American Association of Political Consultants founded by, 1:31, 2:481 international campaign work of, 2:481
"political consultant" term and, 1:31, 2:441, 2:480
Narrative Analysis, 1:193
Nasser, Gamal Abdel, 2:481–482
Anwar Al-Sadat and, 1:26–27
Arab unity efforts of, 2:482
Aswan High Dam and, 2:482
military career of, 2:481
one-party system under, 2:481
Nast, Thomas, 1:313, 2:441
National Action Party (PAN, Mexico), 1:252
National Annenberg Election Survey (NAES), 1:10, 1:358, 2:654
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. See NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People)
National Association of Broadcasters (NAB), 2:482–483 code of ethics of, 2:483
free airtime issue and, 1:259
music licensing conflicts and, 2:482 political action committee of, 2:482 quiz show scandals and, 2:482
Television Information Office and, 2:482
National Association of Talk Show Hosts, 1:29
National Communication Association
DebateWatch and, 1:165–166
National Conference of Editorial Writers, 1:403
National Democratic Union (Brazil), 1:66
National Do Not Call Registry, 1:235
National Election Studies. See American National Election Studies National Farm Workers Association, 2:462
National Gazette (1791) newspaper and, 2:504, 2:636
National Liberation Front (FLN, Algeria), 1:63–64
National Movement for Simeon the Second (NMSS, Bulgaria), 1:115
National Organization for Women (NOW), 1:3, 1:236, 2:845*
National Partnership for Reinventing Government, 1:201
National Policy Council, of AARP, 1:1

National Public Affairs Center for Television (NPACT), 1:401
National Public Radio (NPR), 2:483–484
All Things Considered news program of, 2:483 democratic participation focus of, 2:483 liberal bias accusations against, 2:483
On the Media program of, 2:452
metacoverage by, 2:452
Morning Edition news program of, 2:483
1996 election free airtime and, 1:138
nominating conventions and, 1:138
Clarence Thomas confirmation and, 1:307
National Renewal Alliance (Brazil), 1:66
National Republican Party, 1:135
National Rifle Association, 2:566
National Right to Life Committee, 1:3
National Telecommunications and Information Administration (NTIA), 1:186
National Voter Registration Act, 1:95
National Women's Political Caucus, 1:236, 1:263
Native Americans
American Indian Movement and, 2:663, 2:694
Indian Bill of Rights and, 2:693
NATO
Bulgaria in, 1:71, 1:115–116
Poland membership in, 2:555
Nature of Prejudice, The (Allport), 2:484 false generalization, hostility of prejudice and, 2:484 Holocaust and, 2:484
psychodynamic theories of prejudice and, 2:484
Nazi propaganda, 1:239, 1:240, 1:274–275, 1:275, 1:293, 1:308, 1:408, 2:549, 2:660
NBC
"Daisy Girl" ad on, 1:9, 1:156, 1:232, 1:276, 1:333, 2:561, 2:604
Kennedy assassination and, 1:374
Lateline comedy series and, 1:257
Bill Moyers and, 2:471
1996 election free airtime and, 1:259
nominating conventions and, 1:138
presidential debates and, 1:160
Vanderbilt Television News Archive and, 2:806
NBC Nightly News
Deciding What's News (Gans) and, 1:166
Fox News and, 1:253
Near v. Minnesota, 2:644
Negative advertising, 2:484–488, 2:563 (table)
ad ownership and, 2:562
ad watch and, 1:8–10, 1:67
backlash from, 2:487, 2:564–565
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:58, 2:562, 2:567
G. W. Bush Texas Governor race and, 1:73 campaign posters and, 2:628 candidate rebuttal of, 2:565 character assassination, tabloid exposés and, 1:82–83
Clinton 1996 campaign and, 2:561, 2:563
by Congress members, 1:125
"Daisy Girl" ad and, 1:9, 1:156, 1:276, 1:333, 2:604, 2:714, 2:736, 2:782
demobilization argument and, 2:486
by Bob Dole, 1:191, 2:563
"the Dukakis effect" and, 2:485 enhanced involvement argument and, 2:486
evolution of, 2:485
Vicente Fox (Mexico) and, 1:252
gender factors in, 2:485 good vs. bad negative political ads and, 2:487–488, 2:564–565
Al Gore and, 1:278, 2:563
Willie Horton ad and, 1:194, 2:485, 2:561, 2:567, 2:695, 2:838–839
incumbent vs. challenger status and, 2:485 independent sources effectiveness and, 2:565, 2:567
negative campaigning and, 2:488–489
negativity bias concept and, 2:487
1988 election and, 1:8, 1:72
1992 election and, 1:72, 1:147, 2:563
personal campaigning and, 1:83
political fear appeals and, 1:231–232 political inoculation and, 1:336–337, 2:565 power and effectiveness of, 2:486–487, 2:564–565, 2:567
prevalence of, 2:485
professional conduct issues and, 2:487
"the sleeper effect" of, 2:487, 2:746–747
"stand by your ad" legislation and, 2:487
statistics regarding, 1:36
TechnoDistortions and, 2:781–782 television ads and, 1:333–334
voter apathy and, 1:36
voter behavior and, 1:34–35, 2:421, 2:564–565
voter information source and, 2:485 women candidate advertising and, 2:841–842
See also Negative campaigning; Political advertising
Negative campaigning, 1:34, 2:488–489
against Willy Brandt (Germany), 1:65
candidate-centered communication and, 1:80–83
Tansu Çiller (Turkey) and, 1:105
effectiveness of, 2:488
individual perspectives on, 2:488
negative advertising and, 2:484–488
political decision making and, 2:488
voter apathy and, 1:36–37
voter behavior and, 2:488
See also Negative advertising
Nehru, Jawaharlal, 1:263
Neisser, Ulric, 2:598
Netanyahu, Benjamin, 1:39
Netherlands
election news coverage in, 2:496
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
Neuman, Nancy, 1:161
New Covenant (Clinton) program, 1:111–112
New Deal, 1:129, 1:137, 1:243–244, 1:303, 1:333, 2:697, 2:833
New Democratic Network, 1:6
New Democrat policy (Clinton), 1:59
New Frontier, 1:137, 1:371
New Hampshire primary agenda-setting effect of, 2:651

Patrick Buchanan (1992) and, 1:68
Bush–Dole (1988) and, 1:351 grassroots campaigning effectiveness and, 1:283
Iowa caucuses and, 1:350
Robert Kennedy (1968) and, 1:372
John McCain (2000) and, 1:283, 1:351
Edmund Muskie (1972) and, 2:478
New Labour party (Britain), 1:59
Newman, B. J., 1:295
New media technologies, 2:489–494
activism benefit of, 2:493 alternative media in politics and, 1:27–31
blogs, blogging and, 1:59–61, 1:60,* 2:490
cell phones and, 2:492 communication affected by, 2:492
definitions regarding, 2:489–490
Democratic Party use of, 1:175
democratization and, 1:176–177
e-mail and, 1:127, 1:154, 1:175, 1:176–177, 1:210, 2:490 empowerment from, 2:492–493 fragmentation from, 2:493
information overload from, 2:493 interaction affected by, 2:492 mobilization affected by, 2:492
online feedback, participation and, 2:491
online video sharing, 2:492 organization affected by, 2:492 Pew Internet studies and, 2:550
podcasting and, 2:490–491
polarization from, 2:493
public communication in politics and, 2:668–671
social networking and, 2:491–492, 2:493
See also Web campaigning; World Wide Web, political uses
New Right, 2:494–495
"Conservative Ascendency" and, 2:494 conservative grassroots activist issues of, 1:129–130, 2:494
Barry Goldwater and, 2:494
liberalism attacked by, 2:494 1960s, 1970s growth of, 2:494
Religious Right vs., 2:494–495
Silent Majority and, 2:495
Sun Belt birthplace of, 2:494
News: The Politics of Illusion (Bennett) hard vs. soft news coverage and, 2:495
indexing theory and, 1:329–330, 2:495
news as core of political information system and, 2:495 politicians controlling news images and, 2:495
News Corporation (Murdock), 1:99
News coverage, politics, 2:496–501 actors in the news and, 2:497
ad watch and, 1:8–10, 1:67
agenda setting and, 1:12–19, 2:496–497
Hafiz Al-Asad (Syria) and, 1:21–22
balance of the news and, 2:498
Jay G. Blumler and, 1:61–62
citizen journalism and, 1:105–106
commentary, political and, 1:117–119
commercialization in media factor and, 2:500
confidential source protection and, 1:245
Congressional coverage and, 1:124–128
Creating Reality (Altheide) and, 1:142
Walter Cronkite and, 1:146
C-SPAN Network and, 1:147–148
Deciding What's News (Gans) and, 1:166
Wolfgang Donsbach and, 1:192
economy news and, 2:498–499
effects of, 2:499–500
elections, campaign news and, 2:496–498
embedded journalists and, 1:211, 1:352, 2:721
environment news and, 2:499
EU politics news and, 2:499
"50-50 rule" and, 2:435, 2:498 framing of the news and, 2:497–498
hard news and, 1:296–297 homogenization vs. diversification trends and, 2:500–501 horserace coverage and, 1:310–311
immigration and integration news and, 2:499 importance of, 2:498
incumbency advantage and, 2:497
international, foreign news and, 2:498
L. B. Johnson 1964 "Daisy Girl" ad and, 1:9 media and audience frames and, 1:254–255 media hype, pack journalism and, 2:501
The New York Times and, 2:514 patterns, differences, future directions in, 2:500–501
political commentary and, 1:117–119
priming theory and, 2:499–500 sacerdotal vs. pragmatic journalistic approach and, 2:500 soft news and, 2:750 tone of the news and, 2:497 topics on the news agenda and, 2:496–497, 2:499 visibility of elections and, 2:496 welfare news and, 2:499
See also Journalism, political; News magazines; Newspapers, role in politics; News selection process; Radio, politics and; Television, politics and; Women candidates, news coverage
Newsday, 1:307
Newseum interactive museum, 1:260
The Newshour with Jim Lehrer (PBS), 1:401, 2:452, 2:540
News magazines, 2:501–502
agenda setting by, 1:332
David Broder and, 1:67, 1:68
Campaign and Elections Magazine and, 1:79 circulation decline of, 2:502
Deciding What's News (Gans), 1:166
European news magazines and, 2:502 Internet effect on, 2:502
muckracking by, 2:473–474 nontraditional magazines growth and, 2:502
political advertising and, 2:560
political advertising in, 1:332 political events analysis in, 1:332 traditional news magazines and, 2:501–502
See also Newsweek; Time magazine; U.S. News and World Report

News management, 2:502–503
definition of, 2:502
media consultants vs. pluralist democracy and, 2:502 media- vs. party-centered management and, 2:502–503 person vs. issue management and, 2:502–503
political public relations and, 2:677–680
professionalized process of news flow control, 2:502
Newspapers, role in politics, 2:503–509
Adenauer era, Germany and, 1:4
agenda setting and, 1:12–19, 2:508
Alien and Sedition Act and, 2:504, 2:538
American Revolution and, 2:503–504
Boston News Letter (1704) and, 2:503
Chilean government and, 1:25
citizen journalism and, 1:104–106
congressional campaigns coverage and, 2:507–508
editorials and, 1:198–199
electronic media impact and, 2:506
First Amendment and, 2:503
freedom of the press and, 2:644–646
Gazette of the United States (1789) and, 2:504 historic perspective on, 1:28
information technology in politics and, 1:332
informed consent and, 2:503
international press and, 2:508–509
letters to the editor and, 1:403
Muhammed cartoon events and, 2:474–475, 2:511
New England Courant (J. Franklin, 1721) and, 2:503
New York Times v. Sullivan and, 1:245, 1:405, 2:507
New York Times v. U.S. (Pentagon Papers) and, 1:92, 2:507, 2:513–514, 2:540, 2:644, 2:824 partisan press era and, 2:504
Party Press era and, 2:538–539
penny press and, 1:28, 1:30, 2:433–434, 2:504–505, 2:776
political advertising and, 2:560 political endorsements and, 2:508
Post Dispatch and, 2:505 presidential campaigns coverage and, 2:507–508 presidential coverage and, 2:508
press conferences and, 2:506
public agenda and, 2:508
public journalism and, 2:672–675
Public Occurrence Both Foreign, and Domestic (1690) and, 2:503 pundits, punditry in, 2:686 radio, television and, 2:506
Stamp Act and, 2:504
tabloids and, 2:505–506
Watergate scandal and, 1:26
wire service and, 1:332
yellow journalism and, 1:302,* 1:303, 2:473, 2:505, 2:776, 2:854
Zenger trial (1735) and, 2:503, 2:644
See also Freedom of expression; New York Times, The; Press freedom; *Washington Post, The; specific newspaper
News selection process, 2:509–513
agenda setting and, 1:12–19, 2:499 conflict, personality, prominence, suspense factors of, 2:511
Creating Reality (Altheide) and, 1:142
European selection factors and, 2:512–513
Galtung and Ruge work in, 2:511–512
gatekeeping theory and, 2:510–511
Glasgow Media Group and, 1:270
hostile media effect and, 1:311–312
media agenda and, 1:185–186, 2:499
media partisan bias and, 2:435–436
news value and, 2:511, 2:512
newsworthiness factors and, 2:511–512
Winfried Schulz's work in, 2:734–735 theory of instrumental actualization and, 1:376 theory of newsworthiness and, 2:511–513
See also News selection process: gatekeeping theory; Women candidates, news coverage
News selection process: gatekeeping theory, 2:510–511
agenda setting and, 1:17, 1:18
bloggers as gatewatchers and, 1:61
citizen journalism and, 1:105–106
cultural norms, fashions and, 2:511 economic factors and, 2:511 editorial bias and, 2:510
global information flow and, 1:331
horserace campaign coverage and, 1:310–311 interest groups affecting, 2:511
letters to the editor and, 1:403
micro, organization, macro levels of, 2:510
nominating conventions and, 1:137–138
organizational socialization factor and, 2:511 political news story construction and, 1:361 routines, deadlines structure factors and, 2:510
David Manning White's work and, 2:510
Newsweek
Deciding What's News (Gans) and, 1:166
founding of, 2:501
Monica Lewinsky scandal and, 1:113
political information technology and, 1:332 racial tension focus of, 2:501
New Yorker
Horace Greeley and, 1:285
news and cultural format of, 2:502
New York Journal, 2:854
New York Times, The*, 2:513–514
"All the News That's Fit to Print" and, 2:506, 2:513
Jayson Blair scandal at, 2:453
Hillary Rodham Clinton 2008 presidential bid and, 1:110
Hillary Rodham Clinton senate campaign coverage by, 2:845
CNN Effect and, 1:114–115
Congressional pay increase and, 1:125
corporate ownership bias of, 2:514
Elizabeth Dole candidacy coverage by, 2:847 elite press trend setting by, 2:513
founding of, 2:505
government sources reliance of, 2:514
Iraq War coverage by, 2:514 media agenda set by, 1:185–186
New York Times v. Sullivan and, 1:245, 1:405, 2:507
New York Times v. U.S. (Pentagon Papers) and, 1:92, 2:507, 2:513–514, 2:540, 2:644, 2:824
Party Press era and, 2:539
political information technology and, 1:332

presidential campaign coverage by, 2:514 presidential coverage vs. others in, 2:508 public journalism criticized by, 2:674
Radio Free Europe-CIA story and, 2:699
Whitewater scandal and, 1:113, 2:825–826
New York Tribune, 1:285, 2:504–505
New Zealand
character assassinations in, 1:82
debates in, 1:164
e-government initiatives in, 1:201
institutional ticket splitting and, 2:791
personalized proportional electoral system in, 1:208
Nielsen Designated Market Areas, for television, 1:260
Nightline, 1:138, 2:514–515
Iranian hostage crisis and, 2:514
Ted Koppel and, 2:514 late night news time slot of, 2:514 satellite technology and, 2:514–515
Nimmo, Dan, 1:137, 1:193, 2:515–516
candidate image work of, 2:515 Candidates and Their Images and, 1:85–86, 2:515 fantasy theory work of, 2:515
The Handbook of Political Communication and, 1:295, 1:386, 2:515, 2:730
Mediated Political Realities and, 2:446–447, 2:515
Political Persuaders, 2:515
19th Amendment, 1:87, 1:263, 1:264
Nixon, Richard M., 2:516
Spiro Agnew and, 1:20–21, 2:477, 2:516
Roger Ailes media adviser to, 1:21
All the President's Men (Bernstein & Woodward) and, 1:26
apologia and, 1:38
Patrick Buchanan and, 1:68
Checkers Speech of, 1:38, 1:97–98, 2:516, 2:712
China visited by, 1:101, 2:516, 2:638
communism threat and, 1:123
John Connally and, 1:128–129
economic policy speeches of, 2:633
Eisenhower's vice president and, 2:516
Gerald Ford and, 1:247, 1:249–250, 1:250
Barbara Jordan and, 1:359
Kennedy–Nixon debates (1960) and, 1:159–160, 1:284, 1:333, 1:371, 1:385, 2:516, 2:546, 2:561, 2:742
Khrushchev and, 2:516
"law and order" rhetoric of, 2:516 Man in the Arena image of, 1:326 media relationship of, 2:516
1968 election and, 1:315, 2:477, 2:516, 2:561, 2:741–742
1972 election and, 2:429–430
pardon of, 1:247, 1:249
"Philadelphia Order" of, 1:10
political consultants and, 1:134
press conferences of, 2:643
public opinion diverted by, 2:633
redemptive exile of, 2:638
resignation of, 1:26, 2:753
speech writers of, 2:754
television talk shows and, 1:81, 2:779
testimonials used by, 2:788
visit to China by, 1:101, 2:516 wage and price controls of, 1:406
Watergate scandal and, 1:26, 1:38, 1:262, 1:391, 2:516, 2:633, 2:712
Ron Ziegler, press secretary of, 2:647
See also Watergate
Nobel Prize recipients
Anwar Al-Sadat (Egypt), 1:27
Yasser Arafat (Palestine), 1:38, 1:39, 2:691
Willy Brandt (Germany) and, 1:65
Mikhail Gorbachev (Soviet Union), 1:277, 1:278
Al Gore, 1:279
Daniel Kahneman, 1:255
Mandela and de Klerk (South Africa), 2:415
Czeslaw Milosz (Poland), 2:554
Yitzhak Rabin (Israel), 2:691
Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn (Soviet Union), 1:93
Lech Wałęsa (Poland), 2:555, 2:820
Noelle-Neumann, Elisabeth, 2:516–517
academic career of, 2:517
German opinion research institute and, 2:516–517 media effects research of, 2:517, 2:552, 2:585 newspaper career of, 2:517 representative survey research method and, 2:517 spiral of silence theory of, 2:517, 2:585, 2:676, 2:757–760
World Association for Public Opinion Research and, 2:849
Nominating conventions. See Conventions, political; Democratic National Convention; Republican National Convention
Norris, Pippa, 1:81
North, Oliver, 2:696
North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), 1:111, 2:559, 2:566
North Atlantic media system model, 2:648, 2:650
North/Central European media system model, 2:648, 2:649–650
NOW. See National Organization for Women
NPACT (National Public Affairs Center for Television), 1:401
NPR. See National Public Radio
NTIA (National Telecommunications and Information Administration), 1:186
Nyerere, Julius, 2:517–518
African socialism and, 2:518 liberation movement and, 2:517 media political importance and, 2:517–518 oration skills of, 2:518
United Republic of Tanzania and, 2:517

Obama, Barack, 2:519–520
Democratic National Convention (2004) speech of, 2:519 Democratic senate primary spending (2004) of, 1:58
early political career of, 2:463, 2:519
rhetorical skills of, 2:519
2008 presidential candidacy of, 1:110, 2:519
O'Brian, Conan, 1:313
O'Brien, Soledad, 1:87
Obscenity and pornography, 2:520–521
child pornography and, 2:521 feminist antipornography movement and, 2:520–521
Miller v. California and, 1:245, 2:520, 2:645
New York v. Ferber and, 2:521 postal laws regarding, 2:520 presidential commissions on, 2:520 research regarding, 2:521

Roth v. United States and, 2:520 terminology use and, 2:520
Victorian censorship and, 2:520
Ochs, Adolph, 2:505, 2:513
Office of War Information, 1:232
Ohmynews.com (South Korea), 1:106
Olien, Clarice, 1:383, 2:585
Olympics, 1972 Munich, 1:39
Onassis, Jacqueline Kennedy, 2:521–522
beauty, style, art, fashion talents of, 2:522
"Camelot" myth and, 2:522
as first lady, 2:521–522, 2:522*
J. F. Kennedy's assassination and, 2:522
See also Kennedy, John F.; Kennedy (John F.) assassination
One Nation party (Australia), 1:295–296
Operation Iraqi Freedom, 1:72
Operation PUSH (People United to Save Humanity), 1:357
Operation Rescue antiabortion group, 1:3
Opposite Direction (Al Jazeera television program), 1:23–24
O'Reilly, Bill, 2:523
ABC, CBS, NBC work of, 2:523
books written by, 2:523
No Spin Zone and, 2:757
The O'Reilly Factor and, 1:253, 1:258, 2:523, 2:686
political journalism and, 1:363, 2:523
Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), 1:304
Orientation, need for, 2:524
media agenda setting and, 2:524 need for cognition and, 2:524 relevance, uncertainty factors and, 2:524 test research regarding, 2:524
Orwell, George, 1:313, 2:549
OSCE (Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe), 1:304
Oslo Accords, 1:39, 2:691
Oswald, Lee Harvey, 1:373–374
Outfoxed: Rupert Murdoch's War on Journalism (Greenwald) documentary, 1:253–254 Ownership of media outlets. See Communications Act of 1934
Özal, Turgut, 2:525
broadcasting policy of, 2:525
Süleyman Demirel and, 1:169
economic liberalization by, 2:525
media used by, 2:525
prime minister, president of Republic of Turkey and, 2:525
Cem Uzan and, 2:804

Paar, Jack, 1:81
Packaging the Presidency: A History and Criticism of Presidential Advertising (Jamieson), 1:358
Pack journalism, 2:527–528
campaign trail reporting and, 2:527 erroneous information contained in, 2:501 feeding frenzy and, 2:244, 2:527 media hype and, 2:501 Palestine
Al Jazeera television and, 1:24
Yasser Arafat and, 1:38–39, 2:691
Palestinian Liberation Organization and, 1:38–39
Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO)
Yasser Arafat and, 1:38–39
1972 Munich Olympics and, 1:39
Paletz, David, 2:572
Palme, Olof, 2:528–529
controversy surrounding, 2:528
early political career of, 2:528
media relationship of, 2:528
television used by, 2:528
Pan African movement, 1:375
PAN (National Action Party, Mexico), 1:252
Papandreou, Andreas, 2:529
antidictatorial activity of, 2:529
Panhellenic Socialist Movement and, 2:529 populist administration of, 2:529
"telepolitics" campaign techniques of, 2:529
Parasocial relationships in politics, 2:529–531
education levels and, 2:530
Mark Levy's work and, 2:530 media users-mass media performers relationship and, 2:529–530
Personal Influence (Katz & Lazarsfeld) and, 1:199, 1:349, 1:368, 1:400, 2:545–546, 2:793
political disaffection and, 2:530
presidential candidates research and, 2:530 PSI measurement scale of, 2:530 strategies of, 2:531
talk radio and, 2:530–531 television intimacy and, 2:530 television news and, 2:530 uses and gratification theory and, 2:530
Parks, Rosa, 1:112, 1:381
Parsons, A. T., 1:338
Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act, 1:3
Participation, political, 2:531–532
campaign, protest activities and, 2:532 civil activities and, 2:532 convention vs. unconventional modes of, 2:532 increase, expansion of, 2:531–532 individual resources factors and, 2:532 Internet technologies and, 2:532 minority political participation and, 2:461–464
"New Social Movements" and, 2:532 political, societal changes and, 2:532 quality of democracy and, 2:531 situational factors and, 2:532 voluntary nature of, 2:531
voting and, 2:532
See also Voter behavior; Youth voting
Party election broadcasts (PEBs, United Kingdom), 2:533–535
Broadcasting Act and, 2:533 campaign costs control and, 2:533
effects of, 2:534
freedom of speech and, 2:533 golden age of, commercial television and, 2:533–534 history and development of, 2:533–534 informative, issues trend in, 2:534 leader-biography trend in, 2:534 level electoral playing field and, 2:533 major vs. minor parties and, 2:533

negative advertising and, 2:534
Ofcom code and, 2:533
political advertising and, 2:533
principles and regulations of, 2:533
Saatchi & Saatchi agency and, 2:534, 2:604
"stopwatch balance" allocation and, 2:534 trends over time and, 2:534 voter attitudes affected by, 2:534
Party identification, 2:535–538
aggregate-level ramifications of, 2:537 campaign efforts and, 2:537
dealignment and, 1:156–158, 2:537, 2:657 declining trend in, 2:537–538 directional, intensity components of, 2:535 family factors and, 2:536–537, 2:617
ideology and, 1:321
independence identification vs., 2:535 life-cycle factors and, 2:536–537
mass political behavior and, 2:419–421
multiple party identifications vs., 2:535 other political systems and, 2:535–536 perceptual filter and, 2:535
political information processing and, 2:587–588
realigning election concept and, 2:537 seven-point measurement scale of, 2:535 social psychological electoral choice model and, 2:535 stability over time of, 2:536, 2:617
Survey Research Center and, 2:766–767
ticket splitting and, 2:790–792
voter behavior and, 1:35–36
voter heuristic device and, 2:536
See also American Voter*, *The (Campbell, Miller, Converse, & Stokes); Voter behavior
Party Press, 2:538–539
fourth estate and, 1:252
Thomas Jefferson and, 2:538
James Madison and, 2:538
media partisan bias and, 2:433–436
penny press and, 2:538
political party patronage and, 2:538 politician owned newspapers and, 2:539
Sedition Act and, 2:538
Theory of Party Press (Lenin) and, 1:252 two party system and, 2:538–539
Patrick, Deval, 2:463
Patterson, T. E., 1:364, 2:750, 2:800
PBS (Public Broadcasting System), 2:539–540 autonomous, community-centered, anticommercial media, 2:539
Commission on Presidential Debates and, 1:120
Walter Cronkite and, 1:146
educational programs and, 2:539
Hill–Thomas hearings and, 1:306 media liberalism of, 2:539
metacoverage by, 2:452
Bill Moyers and, 2:471
The Newshour with Jim Lehrer on, 1:401, 2:452, 2:540
1996 election free airtime and, 1:259
nominating conventions and, 1:138
nonprofit partner affiliations of, 2:539
Vanderbilt Television News Archive and, 2:806
PCA. See Political Commercial Archive
PEBs. See Party election broadcasts (PEBs, United Kingdom)
Pels, Dick, 1:81
Penn, Mark, 1:59
Penny press newspapers, 1:28, 1:30, 2:433–434, 2:504–505, 2:776
Party Press era and, 2:538
Pentagon Papers, The, 2:540
Daniel Ellsberg and, 2:540
free press and, 2:540, 2:644
New York Times Co. v. U.S. and, 2:540
political censorship and, 1:92, 2:507, 2:513–514
Washington Post and, 2:824
The People's Choice (Lazarsfeld) book, 1:199, 1:400, 2:540–542, 2:783, 2:813
The People's Choice study, 2:540–542
1940 election and, 2:541, 2:813 opinion leadership results of, 2:419–420, 2:541, 2:793, 2:813 panel technique used in, 2:541
The People's Choice (Lazarsfeld) book and, 1:199, 1:400, 2:540–542, 2:783, 2:813 political predispositions results of, 2:541 relevance of group communication hypothesis and, 2:541 twofold relativized media influence hypothesis and, 2:541–542 two-step flow group communication findings of, 2:541–542 voter behavior study, 2:540–542
People's Party (Spain), 1:47
Perloff, Richard, 1:322
Perón, Juan, 2:542
early political career of, 2:542
media control and use by, 2:542
María eva Duarte de Perón and, 2:542–543
Peronism, Justicialista Party and, 2:542 political advertising by, 2:542 populist dictator and, 2:542 social reforms of, 2:542
Perón, Maria Eva Duarte de, 2:542–543 media relationships with, 2:543 mythic image of, 2:542–543
Juan Perón and, 2:542
social reform policies of, 2:543 women's rights focus of, 2:543
Peronist Party (Argentina), 1:22, 1:40, 2:542, 2:543
Perot, Ross, 2:543–544
alternative media used by, 1:29
business interests of, 2:543–544
1992, 1996 elections and, 1:29, 1:78, 1:111, 1:120, 1:163, 2:543–544, 2:706
presidential debates and, 2:543, 2:544
public campaign funding and, 1:78
Reform Party and, 2:543–544, 2:706
Saturday Night Live and, 2:731
Persian Gulf War. See Gulf War, media coverage of

Personal campaigning, 2:544–545 candidate vs. candidate representatives and, 2:544 canvassing and, 2:544
cyber campaigning and, 2:545 effectiveness research on, 2:544–545
grassroots campaigning and, 2:544
Iowa caucuses, New Hampshire primary and, 2:544 Personal Influence (Katz & Lazarsfeld), 1:199, 1:349, 1:368, 1:400, 2:545–546
information flow through public sphere and, 2:545
The Part People Play in the Flow of Mass Communication focus of, 2:545 social interaction focus of, 2:545, 2:617 two-step flow communication model and, 2:545, 2:793–794 Personality and Interpersonal Behavior (Bales), 1:229
Personalization of politics, 2:546
Adenauer era, Germany and, 1:4
Raúl Alfonsín in Argentina and, 1:23
candidate-centered communication and, 1:80–83
The Candidate film and, 1:79–80
definition of, 2:546
electronic media and, 2:546
Gianpietro Mazzoleni's (Italy) work and, 2:423
media logic and, 2:446
personifying party policy platforms and, 2:546 political leadership and, 2:600–602
political public relations and, 2:677–680, 2:679
"Reagonomics" example of, 2:546
television role in, 2:546
Persuasion, political, 2:547–549
attitude change goal of, 2:547 attitude formation goal of, 2:547 attitude reinforcement goal of, 2:547–548 broad issue context of, 2:547 continuities and changes in, 2:548 control focus in, 2:548 Elaboration Likelihood Model of, 2:547 foundations of, 2:547 freedom of choice and, 2:547
Joseph Goebbels and, 1:274–275
Adolf Hitler and, 1:307–308
individual, group, organization, and system levels of, 2:547
John Kerry and, 2:547–548
Limited Effects Model and, 2:548
Lincoln–Douglas debates and, 2:547 negative message and, 2:547 presidential persuasion and, 2:548–549
propaganda and, 2:658–661
purposes and functions of, 2:547–548
Reagan "Teflon president" image and, 2:548 reinforcement and motivation focuses and, 2:548
Republican Contract with America example of, 2:548
Roosevelt's fireside chats and, 2:548, 2:636, 2:697, 2:712, 2:724, 2:754
short-term marketing goals of, 2:547 study of contrasts and, 2:547
Peterson, Theodore, 1:79, 1:123, 1:250, 2:641
Petzel, T., 1:46
Pew Internet & American Life Project, 1:60, 2:491, 2:550
Internet trends studies of, 2:550
Pew Center for Civic Journalism and, 2:673–674
Pew Research Center for the People & the Press and, 2:550–551
2004 election studies and, 2:550
YouTube research by, 2:550
Pew Research Center for the People & the Press, 2:550–551
demographic specific information and, 2:551
Pew Center for Civic Journalism and, 2:673–674
Pew Charitable Trusts "fact tank" and, 2:550 public opinion factual research and, 2:550 random digital dialing method of, 2:550–551
Pfau, M., 1:336–337
Pharisee Effect, 2:551
attribution effects of, 2:551 biblical reference of, 2:551
examples of, 2:551
game theory and, 2:551 voter backlash and, 2:551
Phillips, David Graham, 2:473
PICN. See Public interest, convenience, and necessity (PICN) criteria, of Communications Act of 1937 Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 1:3
Plato
active citizenship training and, 2:616
Aristotle and, 1:42, 1:44 health of the body politic and, 2:717
moral education, active citizenship and, 2:617, 2:619
music as powerful political weapon and, 2:476
"philosopher kings" leadership concept of, 2:600 political rhetoric and, 1:42, 1:44, 1:392, 2:718
public opinion and, 2:675
Sophists vs., 2:717
Plessy v. Ferguson, 2:739
PLO. See Palestinian Liberation Organization
Pluralistic ignorance, 2:551–552 absolute vs. relative pluralistic ignorance and, 2:552 false beliefs patterns and, 2:552 media role in, 2:552 psychological, external factors and, 2:552
Podcasting
new media technology of, 2:490–491
Abdessalam Yassine (Morocco) and, 2:853 Poland
debates in, 1:164
Aleksander Kwaśniewski and, 1:386–387
Poland, democratization, 1:178, 2:552–556
"contract parliament" and, 2:555
European Union membership and, 2:555
fall of Communist bloc and, 2:555, 2:751 free election and, 2:555 government-in-exile and, 2:552–553 media function in, 2:555–556
NATO membership and, 2:555
Polish Constitution and, 2:552
Polish Workers' Party and, 2:553, 2:751 political communication, marketing in, 2:555–556
Pope John Paul II and, 2:554, 2:555
Potsdam Conference and, 2:553
"propaganda of success" period and, 2:554
Provisional Government of National Unity and, 2:553

Radio Free Europe and, 2:554 resistance against communism and, 2:554–555
Roman Catholic Church and, 2:553–554, 2:555
Round-Table Talks, 2:555
Solidarity Movement in, 1:304, 2:554–555, 2:751
Soviet perestroika and, 2:555
Soviet reconstruction program and, 2:553
Soviet Russia and, 2:552–555
Joseph Stalin and, 2:553 underground resistance organizations and, 2:553, 2:751
Voice of America and, 2:554
Lech Wałęsa and, 2:552–553, 2:554–555
workers' riots, strikes and, 2:553–555, 2:751
Yalta Conference and, 2:553
Polarized Pluralist media system model, 2:648, 2:649
Political action committees (PACs), 2:555–556
AARP and, 1:1
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:6, 2:557
Buckley v. Valeo and, 2:556–557, 2:566
Howard Dean and, 1:159
Federal Election Campaign Act and, 1:233, 1:234, 2:556–557, 2:566
incumbents vs. challengers and, 2:557 legislative decision making impacted by, 2:557 of National Association of Broadcasters, 2:482 National Conservative Political Action Committee and, 2:566 political advertising sponsored by, 2:557 political communication role of, 2:557
political interest groups and, 2:556–557
Larry Sabato's study of, 2:729
segregated fund vs. "nonconnected" political committee and, 2:556
Taft-Hartley Act and, 1:5, 2:556
Willie Horton ad and, 2:839
See also Unions, political activity
Political advertising, 2:558–566
ad ownership and, 2:562
advocacy advertising and, 1:4–8
ad watch and, 1:4–8, 1:67
agenda setting and, 1:12–19
ballot initiatives and, 1:50–52
banner ads and, 1:52–53
big-character posters, China and, 1:55–56
Bulgarian democratization and, 1:71
G. W. Bush congressional campaign poster and, 2:558* candidate, party, independent group as source of, 2:559
candidate biographical films and, 1:83–85
candidate-centered communication and, 1:80–83 candidate evaluation effects of, 2:564 channels for, 2:559–560
Süleyman Demirel (Turkey) and, 1:169 democracy role of, 1:50–52
Democratic National Committee and, 1:174
Democrats for Nixon, 1972 campaign and, 2:566
Robert Dole and, 1:191–192
Eisenhower and, 1:204–205, 1:205–206 (figures), 2:561, 2:628 election advertising and, 2:558–559 general election advertising and, 2:558
Al Gore and, 1:278
Charles Guggenheim and, 1:290
The Handbook of Political Communication (Nimmo & Sanders) and, 1:295
Willie Horton ad and, 1:194, 2:485, 2:561, 2:567, 2:695, 2:838–839
Hungarian democratization and, 1:317, 1:318 impression management and, 1:326–327
information effects of, 2:564
informative advertising and, 1:50–51
international political advertising and, 2:565
Internet and, 2:560
issue orientation of, 1:34, 2:566
Kathleen Hall Jamieson study of, 1:358
L. B. Johnson 1964 "Daisy Girl" ad and, 1:9, 1:156, 1:276, 1:333, 2:561, 2:604, 2:736, 2:782 legal, regulatory environment of, 2:561–562 legislative policy advertising and, 2:559 negative advertising effects of, 2:564–565
negative campaigning and, 2:488–489
news magazines and, 1:332
newspaper/magazine advertising and, 2:560 nonverbal content of, 2:563–564
PACs and, 2:557
paid nature of, 2:558
parasocial relationship techniques and, 2:531 party election broadcasts and (United Kingdom), 2:533–534
political information efficacy and, 2:583
political inoculation and, 1:336–337, 2:565
political interest groups and, 1:340
political journalism and, 1:362–363
political posters and, 2:626–630
political public relations and, 2:677
political testimonials and, 2:787–788 presidential television advertising and, 2:561, 2:563 (table) primary campaign advertising and, 2:558
priming and, 2:654
print, display advertising and, 2:560 radio commercials and, 2:560–561, 2:567–568 referendum, proposition election advertising and, 2:558–559 runoff election advertising and, 2:558
The Selling of the President 1968 (McGinniss) and, 2:741–742
sources of, 2:559
strategic communication and, 2:764–765
TechnoDistortions and, 2:781–782 television commercials and, 1:333, 2:560 television production techniques and, 2:563–564
The Unseeing Eye (Patterson & McClure) and, 2:800
verbal content of, 2:562–563
videostyle analysis of, 2:562, 2:808–810
Videostyle in Presidential Campaigns (L. L. Kaid & A. Johnston), 1:326, 1:367, 2:809 voting behavior effects of, 2:564
voting behavior impact and, 1:94
See also Advocacy advertising; Negative advertising; Negative campaigning; Political advertising, independent; Political advertising, radio; Women candidates, advertising; specific media, specific subject
Political advertising, independent, 2:566–567
advocacy advertising and, 1:4–8, 2:566

Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 2:567
Buckley v. Valeo and, 2:566
electronic media and, 2:566
Federal Election Campaign Act and, 2:566
Willie Horton ad example of, 2:567 individuals' participation in, 2:566–567 legislative proposals and, 2:566
PACs and, 2:566
See also Political advertising
Political advertising, radio, 2:567–569 cost effectiveness of, 2:568
demographic targeting by, 2:568
Federal Communications Act and, 2:568
Paul Lazarsfeld work in, 2:568 narrowcasting efforts of, 2:568 persistence of, 2:567–568
radio, politics and, 2:696–697
television vs., 2:568
See also Political advertising Political advertising, TechnoDistortions and
ad watch and, 1:9, 1:363
"Eisenhower Answers America" ad and, 1:8–9, 1:205 (figure), 2:561
Reuters photo manipulations and, 1:61
Videostyle analysis of, 2:563–564
Political Advertising in Western Democracies (Kaid & Holtz-Bacha, eds.), 1:386
Political branding, 2:569–570
brand essence, identity, value and, 2:569 brand positioning, management and, 2:569
grassroots campaigning and, 2:569
image in voter's mind and, 2:569 Political Campaign Communication (Trent & Friedenberg), 2:570 analysis of principles and practices in, 2:570 changes in politics and campaigns examined in, 2:570 election importance examined in, 2:570 Political commentary. See Commentary, political Political Commercial Archive (PCA), 2:570–571 advocacy commercials in, 2:571 cataloging, archival management system of, 2:571 elections scope of, 2:571
endorsements of, 2:571
Kaid founding director of, 2:571
Political Communication Center and, 2:571, 2:572
video, audio recordings in, 2:571 Political Communication (journal), 2:571–572
editors of, 2:571–572
Political Communication Review and, 2:571 quarterly peer review of, 2:571 sponsors of, 2:571
Political Communication: Issues and Strategies for Research (Chaffee), 1:96 Political Communication Center (PCC), 2:572
founding of, 2:572
Political Commercial Archive (PCA) of, 2:570–571, 2:572 special publications of, 2:572 study and career focus areas of, 2:572
Political conflict, 2:572–574
"CNN effect" and, 2:573
definition of, 2:572
international vs. domestic conflict and, 2:573
media legitimacy and, 2:573–574 minorities coverage and, 2:573–574 news media independence during wars and, 2:573 news media role in, 2:572 peace processes and, 2:573 terrorism, media, freedom of speech issue and, 1:273 Political consultants. See Consultants, political Political conventions. See Conventions, political Political correctness, 2:574–575
censorship and, 2:574–575
liberal and conservative use of term and, 2:574 party line (Marxist-Leninist vocabulary) and, 2:574
political censorship and, 1:91–94
reality shaped by language and, 2:574
Sapir-Whorf hypothesis and, 2:574
Political corruption, 2:575–576 abuse of office for private gain and, 2:575
Spiro Agnew and, 1:21
campaign costs increase and, 2:575 media as Fourth Estate, exposure of, 2:575, 2:614, 2:615 money focus in, 2:575
Nixon Checkers Speech, 1:38, 1:97–98, 2:516, 2:712
political scandal and, 2:575–576, 2:613–616
Jerry Rawlings (Ghana) and, 2:700–701
Watergate era and, 2:575
See also Political scandal; Watergate
Political culture, 2:576–577
The Civic Culture (Almond & Verba) and, 2:576–577, 2:580 collectivity property of, 2:577
definition of, 2:576
democratic principles support and, 2:577 distinctive patterns of assumptions and, 2:577 parochial vs. subject vs. participant political culture and, 2:576 popular vs. effective governance tension and, 2:576 skeptical and instrumental attitude trends in, 2:577 subnational levels of, 2:577
Political disaffection, 2:577–579
Bowling Alone (Putnam) and, 1:64, 2:581, 2:670
Center for the Study of the American Electorate and, 1:94–95
consequences of, 2:578
debates' effect on, 1:164
demographic factors affecting, 1:180 diffuse vs. specific support and, 2:577
direct mail and, 1:191
entertainment merged with politics and, 2:578
negative advertising and, 2:421, 2:486
negative campaigning and, 2:488–489
political alienation and, 2:578 political culture and, 2:576–577
political efficacy and, 2:579–580
political engagement and, 2:580–583 political participation and, 2:531–532 spiral of cynicism concept and, 2:578–579, 2:592 television reliance for political information and, 2:578 trust of America's leaders and, 1:95
"videomalaise hypothesis" of television and, 1:309, 2:577–578, 2:580
A Virtuous Circle (Norris) and, 2:578, 2:810–811

Political efficacy, 2:579–580
American National Election Studies and, 2:579–580
debates' effect on, 1:164
external vs. internal attributes of, 2:580 international studies of, 2:579
measurement of, 2:580 political alienation vs., 2:579–580
political disaffection and, 2:577–579, 2:580
political engagement and, 2:580–583
political information efficacy and, 2:583–584
political involvement and, 2:592
political participation and, 2:531–532
Rock the Vote and, 2:721–722
socioeconomic status factor in, 2:579 television as information source and, 1:37
"videomalaise hypothesis" and, 1:309, 2:577–578, 2:580
A Virtuous Circle (Norris) and, 2:810–811
voter apathy and, 1:36–37, 2:592–593
Political engagement, 2:580–583
activities of, 2:580
The American Voter (Campbell, Miller, Converse, & Stokes) and, 1:35–36, 2:419, 2:581, 2:766, 2:815
Bowling Alone (Putnam) and, 1:64, 2:581, 2:670
Center for the Study of the American Electorate and, 1:94–95 democracy, citizenship component and, 2:580 education of civic affairs and, 2:582, 2:617–618 electoral process reform and, 2:583
Kids Voting USA and, 1:380
nonvoter demographics and, 2:581–582
political disaffection and, 2:577–579
political socialization and, 2:616–620
public opinion and, 2:675–676 skills necessary for, 2:580–581 spiral of disaffection and, 2:581
the state of, 2:581 voter research work and, 2:581 voting participation decline and, 2:581
young voters and, 2:581
See also Political involvement
Political information efficacy, 2:583–584
individual political power and worth feelings and, 2:583
young voters and, 2:583
Political information processing, 2:584–590
agenda setting and, 2:585, 2:587, 2:589 audience interpretation processes and, 2:586, 2:589 candidate character and, 2:585
"cognitive revolution" and, 2:585
conclusions regarding, 2:589–590
controlled vs. automatic memory processes and, 2:586, 2:589
cultivation analysis and, 2:585
The Effects of Mass Communication (Klapper) and, 2:585, 2:793
heuristics in political decision making and, 1:304–305 issue relevance and, 2:585
knowledge gap and, 2:585, 2:589
Walter Lippmann's work and, 2:585–586
media content, structure and, 2:587
media framing and, 2:585, 2:587, 2:589
media priming and, 2:585, 2:587, 2:589 memory system and, 2:586–587 messages and individuals relationship and, 2:585, 2:589 opinion leader attention and, 2:588–589, 2:813 parties, candidates, issues and, 2:587–588
party identification and, 2:585 political sophistication level and, 2:588 schemas and, 2:586–587, 2:589, 2:598, 2:655–656 selective portrayal by newspapers and, 2:585–586 spiral of science and, 2:585
SR to SOR model transition and, 2:584, 2:586 uses and gratifications and, 2:585 Political involvement, 2:591–593
apathy and, 2:592–593
Center for the Study of the American Electorate and, 1:94–95 cynicism and, 2:592 efficacy and, 2:592 event characteristic and, 2:591 individual characteristic and, 2:591 media use and, 2:591–592
political engagement and, 2:580–583 political protests and, 2:662–664
public opinion and, 2:675–676
voter apathy and, 1:35–36, 1:36–37
See also Political engagement; Voter behavior
Political knowledge, 2:593–600
ANES definition of, 2:593–594 cognitions and, 2:594–595, 2:598–599 differentiation, relatedness, integration and, 2:599 education factor and, 2:595
equivalence of informed participation and, 2:595 exemplars structure and, 2:598 functional political knowledge and, 2:597–599
gender factors and, 2:594
general vs. domain-specific knowledge and, 2:594 hard news source of, 1:296–297
horserace campaign coverage and, 2:596
Internet source of, 2:595, 2:596
interpersonal communication and, 2:596–597 knowledge for democracy and, 2:594 media as source of, 2:594–596 media coverage inadequacies and, 2:596 media exposure effects and, 2:595
media framing and, 2:597–598
political engagement and, 2:580–583
political socialization and, 2:616–620
priming and, 2:653–655
processing strategies of, 2:598–599
radio talk shows and, 2:778
Saturday Night Live and, 2:731
schemas structures and, 2:586–587, 2:589, 2:598, 2:655–656 soft news source of, 2:595, 2:750 standards used to measure, 2:594 structures of, 2:597–598, 2:599
trends in, 2:595–596
See also Knowledge gap; Political advertising; Political information efficacy; Political information processing; World Wide Web, political uses
Political leadership, 2:600–603
charisma and, 2:601 commitment produced by, 2:601

definition difficulties regarding, 2:600 dynamic interaction within groups and, 2:600 effectiveness research and, 2:601
"great man theories" of, 2:601 influence focus in, 2:600 interactionist perspective on, 2:600–601, 2:602 leadership characteristics and, 2:600–601 opinion leadership and, 2:419–420, 2:451, 2:602, 2:793, 2:813 personal characteristics and, 2:601
political communication and, 2:601–602 positive and negative normative views on, 2:600 power-based approach to, 2:600 situational approach to, 2:600
two-step flow model of communication and, 2:602
Political marketing, 2:603–604
Silvio Berlusconi (Italy) and, 1:54–55
consultants, PR agencies and, 2:604
"Daisy Girl" ad example of, 2:604 election spending and, 2:604
Giscard d'Estaing (France) and, 1:268–269
in Great Britain, 2:603, 2:604
in Hungary, 1:318
lobbying and, 2:604
market positioning and, 2:603 market segmentation and, 2:603
negative campaigning and, 2:603 political branding and, 2:569–570 political participation decline and, 2:603–604 political psychograhics and, 2:665
political public relations and, 2:677
professionalization and, 2:656–657
Political-moneyline, 1:1
Political parties, 2:604–611
candidate vs. party image and, 1:323 classification characteristics of, 2:605 concept of, 2:605 heterogeneous interests and, 2:605
ideology and, 1:321
institutional form of political systems and, 2:607 internal party democracy and, 2:607
issue ownership and, 1:354–355, 2:654
labels regarding, 1:392–393
Libertarian Party and, 1:406
membership trends and, 2:608 nationalist independence movements and, 2:606 one-, two-, and multi-party systems and, 2:608–609 parliaments development, franchise expansion and, 2:605–606 parties as organizations and, 2:607–608 party formation and, 2:605–606 party functions and, 2:606–607 party literature and, 2:605 party system change and, 2:610 party system classification and concepts and, 2:608–609 party system development and, 2:609–610 party system literature and, 2:605 perspectives regarding, 2:610–611 political conventions and, 1:134–138
political image and, 1:322
postcommunist political systems and, 2:606
proportional representation and, 2:609, 2:661–662 psychological predisposition of party identification and, 1:157
race affecting, 2:695
relationships between parties and, 2:605
social movements and, 2:606
social organizations within, 2:608 socioeconomic relationships and, 2:609 stability of political system and, 2:607 state resources and, 2:608
Political prisoners, 2:611–613
Amnesty International and, 2:612
Winston Churchill and, 2:612
in Great Britain, 2:612
Hitler and, 2:612
human rights organizations and, 2:612
Japanese Americans internment and, 2:612, 2:723*
kangaroo court and, 2:611
Operation Condor and, 2:612
September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and, 2:612
in South America, 2:612
Stalin's Great Purge and, 2:612
Political scandal, 2:613–616
carnival theory of, 2:614, 2:615
Clinton–Lewinsky and, 1:38, 1:110, 1:112–113, 1:127, 1:268, 1:363, 1:404, 2:439, 2:615, 2:633
consequences of, 2:614–615
"corruption revealed" and, 2:575–576 development process of, 2:613–614 financial scandals and, 2:613, 2:615 first and second order transgressions and, 2:613–614 Fourth Estate watchdog media function and, 2:575, 2:614, 2:615, 2:826 functionalist theory of, 2:614
Gary Hart and, 1:298
image restoration after, 2:576
Ted Kennedy, Chappaquiddick accident and, 1:370, 2:444 media feeding frenzy and, 2:444–445
media malaise and, 2:615
Carlos Menem (Argentina) and, 2:450–451 narrative power of media and, 2:615–616
news scandals and, 2:453–454
"no-consequence theory" of, 2:614 political corruption and, 2:575–576 power scandals and, 2:613 reputation harm element of, 2:614, 2:615
Arnold Schwarzenegger and, 2:737
sex scandals and, 2:613, 2:615 social theory of, 2:614–615 symbolic power and, 2:614–615 trivialization theory of, 2:614, 2:615 trust, accountability and, 2:613, 2:615
Watergate and, 1:26, 1:38, 1:262, 1:391
Whitewater affair and, 1:110, 1:113
See also Political corruption; Watergate
Political socialization, 2:616–620
communication in civic development and, 2:617–619 crisis vs. opportunity, 2:619–620 democratic culture renewing itself and, 2:616
empirical research on, 2:616
high school civic education and, 2:619

ideology and, 1:321
Kids Voting USA and, 1:380
learning functions of different media and, 2:618 limited effects theory and, 2:617 media contribution documentation and, 2:618 media contribution to, 2:617, 2:618 media literacy programs and, 2:619 news media avoidance and, 2:618 newspaper reading habits and, 2:618 news shows vs. entertainment programming and, 2:618 online media participation and, 2:619 parents influenced by children and, 2:619–620
political satire and, 2:619
primacy of parents, family and, 2:617
"primary principle" of, 2:616, 2:617 public school system and, 2:617 television vs. print media and, 2:618 volunteering trends and, 2:619
voter apathy and, 1:35–36, 1:36–37
youth disengagement and, 2:618–619 youth empowerment framework of, 2:616 youth impressions of relative influence and, 2:618 Politics, policy, polity, 2:620–621
content analyses of political media and, 2:621 German language differences in, 2:620–621 nuance differences in, 2:620 political attitude differences and, 2:621 Politics & Television (Lang & Lang), 1:390, 1:391
Polk, James K., 2:627
Polls, 2:621–624
on abortion, 1:2
Adenauer era, Germany and, 1:4
American-style campaigning and, 1:34
bandwagon vs. underdog effect and, 2:624, 2:758 benchmark polls and, 2:622 on campaign finance, 1:94
Campaigns & Elections Magazine and, 1:79
campaign web sites and, 1:29
candidate poll standing and, 2:622 citizen deliberative poll and, 1:288 of debates and election results, 1:163 deliberative poll research and, 1:342 early efforts of, 1:133
Eisenhower 1952 ad campaign and, 1:204, 2:441 election newsworthiness and, 2:622 entertainment value of, 2:623–624
exit poll projections and, 1:94, 2:622, 2:623, 2:624, 2:817
George Gallop and, 2:441, 2:621
Gallup polling organization and, 1:16, 1:204 government use of, 2:623
horserace coverage and, 2:622
interest groups use of, 2:623
Iowa caucuses and, 1:350–351
issue salience and, 1:16–17
Labour Party (Great Britain) and, 1:389
mass preference information and, 2:623 most important problem question and, 1:16–17 news media relationship with, 2:621–622 news media use of, 2:622–623
"no contest" vs. "too close to call," voter turnout and, 2:622
Pew Research Center for the People & the Press and, 2:550–551 in political campaigns, 2:622
political commentary and, 1:118
polling process description and, 2:621 pseudo polls illegality and, 2:623
public opinion polls and, 2:623, 2:654, 2:766 public reaction to, 2:623–624
Elmo Roper and, 2:621
sampling procedures and, 2:622
"spiral of silence" concept and, 2:623–624 tracking polls and, 2:622 voter behavior affected by, 1:94, 1:390
Voter News Service and, 2:817
Pooled journalism, 2:624–625
DOD National Media Pool and, 2:624
embedded journalists and, 2:625, 2:721
Gulf War and, 2:624–625, 2:644
Iraq War and, 2:625
military security review system and, 2:624–625 political, military censorship and, 2:624–625 pool-and-review system and, 2:625
U.S. invasion of Panama and, 2:624
Vietnam War and, 2:624, 2:644
Popkin, Samuel, 1:304
Popular Unity party (Chile), 1:25
Populism, 2:625–626
Silvio Berlusconi (Italy) and, 1:54
Ecevit Bülent (Turkey) and, 1:197
centrality of the leader and, 2:625
Hugo Chávez (Venezuela) and, 1:97
Shirley Chisholm and, 1:102
Tansu Çiller (Turkey) and, 1:104
democratization and, 1:178
elusive definition of, 2:625
Vicente Fox (Mexico) and, 1:253
Jörg Haider (Austria) and, 1:293–294, 2:625, 2:818
Pauline Hanson (Australia) and, 1:296
Fred Harris and, 1:297–298
John Howard (Australia) and, 1:296
Jean-Marie Le Pen (France) and, 1:402–403, 2:625
The Media and Neo-Populism (Mazzoleni, Italy) and, 2:423
media relationships of, 2:626
Carlos Menem (Argentina) and, 2:450–451, 2:625
National Public Radio and, 2:483
"new populism" and, 1:297–298, 2:625–626
Andreas Papandreou (Greece) and, 2:529 people vs. social groups in power and, 2:625 radical nature of, 2:625
Jerry Rawlings (Ghana) and, 2:700–701
Tampa incident (Australia) and, 2:780–781
Telepopulism and, 2:626
20th century Americans and, 1:123
Getulio Vargas (Turkey) and, 2:806
George Wallace and, 2:821
Western conservativism and, 1:129
Porat, Marc, 1:331
Post Dispatch, 2:505
Posters, political, 2:626–630
campaign, public relations, public protests and, 2:626

Chinese big-character posters and, 1:55–56
Coffin Handbills (1828) and, 2:627 in Germany and France, 2:626, 2:628–629 history of: 1828-1840, experimental phase, 2:626–627 history of: 1844-1880, commercialization phase, 2:627 history of: 1864-1948, mass printing, partisanship, 2:627–628 history of: 1952-present, TV commercials takeover, 2:628 lithography technology and, 2:626, 2:627 mass reproducibility component of, 2:626
propaganda and, 2:629
protest posters and, 2:626, 2:629
strategy of silence and, 2:628 visual strategy types of, 2:628 Powell, Colin
on The Daily Show, 1:155
as secretary of state, 2:720
PR. See Proportional representation
Presentation of Self in Everyday Life, The (Goffman), 2:630–631 human interaction focus in, 2:630 impression management and, 1:326–327 reality is a social construct and, 2:630 social constructionism and, 2:630 Presidential communication, 2:631–639
of G. W. Bush, 1:72–73
of Bill Clinton, 1:111–112 communicative influence of, 2:632 crisis rhetoric and, 2:635
Deeds Done in Words (Campbell & Jamieson) and, 2:634 definition/transcendence and, 2:634
DICTION speech analysis program and, 1:299, 2:634, 2:807 empty rhetoric and, 2:631 executive orders and, 2:637
farewell address and, 2:635
"going public" and, 2:631–633 history/memory/narrative strategies and, 2:633–634 inaugural addresses and, 2:634
indirect communication context of, 2:638
Internet venue for, 2:636
Iowa caucuses and, 1:350–351
of John F. Kennedy, 1:370–372 local speeches and, 2:636–637 newspaper venue for, 2:636
Nixon Checkers Speech and, 1:38, 1:97–98, 2:516, 2:712 policy implementation tool of, 2:631 political capital and, 2:631
political image and, 1:322
post presidency context of, 2:638 presidential inaugural addresses and, 1:327–328 presidential personal persuasion and, 2:548–549 press apparatus structure of, 2:635
press conferences and, 2:506, 2:635, 2:642–644
proclamations and, 2:637 public opinion focus and diversion by, 2:633 radio venue for, 2:636
research regarding, 2:632
rhetorical perspective on, 2:631–632 of Franklin Roosevelt, 2:724–725 of Franklin Roosevelt, Fireside chats and, 1:28, 1:42, 1:243–244, 1:333, 2:548, 2:636, 2:696, 2:697, 2:724, 2:754
"Rose Garden strategy" of, 2:637
self-presentation context of, 2:637–638 signed statements and, 2:637 silence context of, 2:638 space and place context of, 2:638 speeches and, 2:632–633
speechwriting and, 2:636
State of the Union Address and, 2:634–635
televised address venue for, 2:636
Thousand-Points-of-Light speech (G. H. W. Bush), 1:72
trends in, 2:634
verbal style analysis and, 2:806–807
war rhetoric and, 2:635
White House press secretary and, 2:635 written communication and, 2:637
See also Radio, politics and; Radio addresses; Speeches, presidential Presidential Election Campaign Fund, 1:77–78
Presidential Election Issues Access Act, 1:259
Press and politics, 2:639–642
authoritarian responsibility theory of the press and, 1:250, 2:509, 2:541, 2:648
Winston Churchill and, 1:103–104
Commission on Freedom of the Press and, 2:640–641
Congress and the media and, 1:124–128
Democratic Corporatist model of, 2:641–642
Robert Denton, Jr. and, 1:181
Four Theories of the Press (Siebert, Peterson, & Schramm), 1:79, 1:123, 1:250–251, 2:641, 2:647–648
Freedman v. Maryland and, 2:645 freedom of speech, press, democracy and, 2:640–641 Liberal model of, 2:641 libertarian theory of the press and, 1:250, 2:509, 2:641, 2:648 media obligations in a democracy and, 2:640 normative assumptions regarding, 2:639 other government officials use of, 2:643
"partisan press" newspapers and, 2:639–640
Polarized Pluralist model of, 2:641–642
political public relations and, 2:677–680
rational-legal authority and, 2:641
Social Responsibility theory of the press and, 1:250, 2:509, 2:641, 2:648, 2:732, 2:748–749
Soviet communist theory of the press and, 1:250, 2:509, 2:641, 2:648 symbolic relationship of, 2:640 terminology use and, 2:639
three models of media and politics and, 2:641–642
See also Press theories
Press and Publications Law (PPL, Jordan), 1:2
Press conferences, 2:642–644
newsworthiness of, 2:643 presidential communication and, 2:506, 2:635
president speaking to Americans through, 2:643 president's policy agenda and, 2:643 prewritten introductory statement in, 2:642 reporter questions in, 2:642
Press freedom, 2:644–645
Alien and Sedition Act and, 2:504, 2:538
colonial censorship and, 2:644
democracy and press relationship and, 2:640
democracy theories and, 1:169–175

exit polling information and, 2:624
First Amendment and, 2:644
fourth branch of government and, 2:644
Freedom Forum Media Studies Center and, 1:260 gathering of information and, 2:644
informed consent and, 2:503
libel and, 1:404–405, 2:562, 2:644
Miller v. California and, 1:245, 2:520, 2:644
John Milton and, 2:644
Near v. Minnesota and, 2:644
New York Times v. U.S. (Pentagon Papers) and, 1:92, 2:507, 2:513–514, 2:540, 2:644
obscenity, pornography and, 2:520–521
Party Press era and, 2:538–539
Press Law of 1766 (Sweden) and, 2:645–646
printing press technology and, 2:644
Jerry Rawlings (Ghana) and, 2:700–701
Reporters Without Borders and, 2:644, 2:710–711
Royal Commission on the Press (U.K.) and, 2:725–726
shield laws and, 2:744–745
Zenger trial (1735) and, 2:503, 2:644
See also First Amendment; Press freedom
Press Law of 1766, Sweden, 2:645–646
King Gustaf III and, 2:646
Parliament and, 2:645–646 writing against the state, king and, 2:645
Press secretary, White House, 2:646–647
Ari Fleischer (G. W. Bush administration), 1:247–248 government communication and, 1:280
Scott McClellan (G. W. Bush administration), 1:247
Bill Moyers (Johnson administration), 2:471 no-quote rule and, 2:646
presidential communication and, 2:635
press conferences and, 2:642
press gaggles and, 2:646
George Stephanopoulos (Clinton administration), 2:763
White House Press Office and, 2:646
Press theories, 2:647–651
Comparing Media Systems: Three Models of Media and Politics (Hallin & Mancini) and, 1:123–124 developmental journalism and, 2:648
Four Theories of the Press (Siebert, Peterson, & Schramm) and, 1:79, 1:123, 1:250–251, 2:508–509, 2:641, 2:647–648 globalization, convergence of media systems and, 2:650–651 media systems classifications and, 2:648
Mediterranean or Polarized Pluralist media system model and, 2:648, 2:649
North Atlantic or Liberal media system model and, 2:648, 2:650
North/Central European or Democratic Corporatist media system model and, 2:648, 2:649–650
Northern European social democratic theory and, 2:648
Price, V., 1:255, 1:256
Primaries, 2:651–653
candidate funding of, 2:652
"fighter" focus of, 2:652
"front loading" process of, 2:652
horserace coverage in, 1:362, 2:652
Iowa caucuses and, 1:350–351, 2:651
McGovern-Fraser Commission, Democratic Party and, 2:651
1968 nominating convention and, 1:136, 1:372
1972 New Hampshire primary and, 2:478
1996, radio talk shows and, 2:777
personal campaigning and, 2:544
political conventions and, 1:134–138
Progressive Movement and, 2:651 proposed reform of, 2:652
Larry Sabato study of, 2:729
2004 Democratic nomination and, 2:651, 2:792 2008 schedule of, 2:652
voter turnout and, 1:95
winnowing of candidates in, 2:651
See also Iowa caucuses; New Hampshire primary Primary Colors, 1:114
Priming, 2:653–655
accessibility bias and, 1:305
agenda setting consequence of, 2:653, 2:654
attribute priming and, 2:654
availability heuristics and, 1:305
G. W. Bush–Gulf War studies of, 2:653 candidate image and, 2:654
Jimmy Carter job performance study of, 2:653 entertainment media and, 2:654 euro introduction in Denmark and, 2:653
heuristics in political decision making and, 1:304–305
issue ownership and, 1:354–355, 2:654
metacoverage and, 2:453
Muhammed cartoon events and, 2:475, 2:511
news media impact on audience perceptions and, 2:653 news topics selection and, 2:499–500 political advertisements and, 2:654 political campaigns and, 2:654
political information processing and, 2:585, 2:587
political knowledge and, 2:655
political predispositions and, 1:157 psychological explanations of, 2:653–654 Reagan-Iran-Contra scandal studies of, 2:653 television focus of, 2:653 variables affecting, 2:654–655
voter behavior and, 2:654–655
See also Presidential communication
PRI (Revolutionary Institutional party, Mexico), 1:252 Processing the News (Graber), 1:281, 2:655–656
agenda setting and, 2:656
cognitive psychology and, 2:655–656 media use and audience behavior focus of, 2:655–656 Processing Politics (Graber) and, 2:656 schema theory and, 2:655–656
two-step flow hypothesis and, 2:656
uses and gratifications theory and, 2:656
Professionalization, 2:656–658
Americanization concept and, 1:31–33, 2:657
American-style campaigning and, 1:33–35
campaign finance and, 1:77
The Candidate (Ritchie, Dir.) film and, 1:79–80, 1:241 election campaigns and, 2:497, 2:656–657
European Association of Political Consultants and, 1:215–216
Giscard d'Estaing and, 1:268
marketing techniques of, 2:657 political communication transformation and, 1:172

political consultants and, 2:657 society modernization and, 2:657 sociology of labor and professions and, 2:656 voter dealignment and, 2:657 winning elections focus of, 1:34
Progress for America Voter Fund, 1:6, 1:7, 2:559, 2:567 Progressive Era, 1:129
muckrakers of, 2:473
primary elections and, 1:135–136
Propaganda, 2:658–661
advertising industry professionalization and, 2:659 against Salvador Allende, 1:25
Yasser Arafat and, 1:38–39
Audenauera era, Germany and, 1:4
Cold War and, 2:660–661, 2:764
content analysis of, 1:395
French Revolution and, 2:659, 2:715
global information flow and, 1:331
Joseph Goebbels and, 1:274–275
Adolf Hitler and, 1:307–308
ideology linked to, 2:660–661 impact of in modern democracies and, 2:660–661
labor movement and, 2:659
Harold Lasswell's work on, 1:395 mass psychology analysis and, 2:659–660 modern propaganda emergence and, 2:659–660 Nazi propaganda and, 1:239, 1:240, 1:274–275, 1:275, 1:293, 1:308, 1:408
origins of, 2:659
political posters and, 2:629
political propaganda, in democracies, 2:658–659
political public relations and, 2:677
political testimonials and, 2:787–788 pseudo-event vs., 2:664 public opinion as irrational force and, 2:659
radio as tool of, 2:666, 2:696
Radio Free Europe and, 2:698–699
"sociological" propaganda, in totalitarian regimes, 2:658 of UCR (Radical Civic Union, Argentina), 1:23
unidirectional communication of, 2:658
United States Information Agency and, 2:799 war propaganda, 2:658, 2:660 Proportional representation (PR), 2:661–662 consensus model of democracy and, 2:661 districting, thresholds, electoral formulae and, 2:662 diversity of proportional systems and, 2:661–662 empirical evidence of, 2:662 majority, plurality representation vs., 2:661 normative advantages of, 2:661 political systems affected by, 2:661
See also Political parties
Prospect theory, 1:255
Protestant evangelicalism, 1:129
Protests, political, 2:662–664 communication process role in, 2:662 critical mass research on, 2:663 form variations of, 2:662 individual decision to participate in, 2:662–663 journalistic paradigm (protest paradigm) effect and, 2:663–664 news coverage role in, 2:663–664
"public screen" used by, 2:671 rhetoric of social movements and, 2:663 social network research on, 2:663
Web use and, 2:851
See also Direct action protest, Australia
Pseudo-event, 2:664
ambiguous truth concept and, 2:664 candidates use of, 2:664
The Image (Boorstin) and, 1:325–326, 2:664 media attention, publicity generated by, 2:664 political dialogue reduced by, 2:664 propaganda vs., 2:664
public relations tactic of, 2:664
Psychographics in politics, 2:665
Eisenhower 1952 campaign and, 2:665
Harold Lasswell's work in, 2:665 psychological mapping of voters' perceptions and, 2:665
Psychology of Radio, The,* 2:665–666
higher mental processes, mediated communication and, 2:666 programming dimensions analysis and, 2:666 radio as agent of democracy and, 2:666 radio for education, propaganda and, 2:666 radio's sense of participation and, 2:666 social psychology focus of, 2:665 social utopia possibilities of radio and, 2:665–666
Public affairs, communication in, 2:666–668
government information objectives of, 2:666–667 government lobbying and, 2:667–668 increased need for, 2:667 inform citizens function of, 2:666 Internet used for, 2:667 inter organization communication and, 2:667 issue management and, 1:353–354 media platforms of, 2:667
political marketing and, 2:603–604
political public relations and, 2:677–680, 2:679
Public Affairs Council and, 2:668 Public agendas
blogs, bloggers and, 1:61 campaigns and, 2:420
diffusion of innovations and, 1:185–186
Wolfgang Donsbach and, 1:192
long-term capacity of, 1:19
measurement of, 1:16–17
media agenda setting and, 1:13–15, 1:18, 1:185–186, 2:420, 2:499 polling data and, 2:623
time lag in, 1:18–19
Vietnam War and, 1:15
Public Broadcasting System. See PBS (Public Broadcasting System)
Public communication in politics, 2:668–671
Bowling Alone (Putnam) and, 1:64, 2:581, 2:670
counterpublics and, 2:669
cultural norms and, 2:669
definitions regarding, 2:668

deterioration of, 2:670
Internet use in, 2:671
Walter Lippmann's work in, 1:408–409
mass media effect on, 2:670
new media and, 2:670–671
postmodernism and, 2:670 public, private, technical spheres of communication and, 2:669
"public screen" concept and, 2:671 publics formation necessitating communication and, 2:668–669 public sphere and, 2:682–685
rationality and, 2:669 role of public in deliberative democracy and, 2:668 systems theory and, 1:172
zine publishers and, 2:669
Public interest, convenience, and necessity" (PICN) criteria, of Communications Act of 1937, 1:120–121, 1:122, 1:227
Public journalism, 2:672–675
citizen journalism and, 1:104–106
civic journalism bias and, 2:672 community connectedness and, 2:672
criticisms of, 2:674
decline of, 2:674–675
history of, 2:672–673
international spread of, 2:675
Knight-Ridder newspapers and, 2:672–673, 2:674 national networks of, 2:673–674
Pew Center for Civic Journalism and, 2:673–674
philosophy of, 2:672 present trends in, 2:674–675
Project on public Life and the Press and, 2:673
public service broadcasting and, 2:680–682
"Taking Back Our Neighborhoods" projects and, 2:672–673
"We the People Project" and, 2:673
Public opinion, 2:675–677
citizen competence and, 2:676
definition difficulties regarding, 2:675–676
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
in The Handbook of Political Communication (Nimmo & Sanders), 1:295 interdisciplinary study of, 2:676
letters to the editor and, 1:403
Walter Lippmann's work and, 1:408–409
Muhammed cartoon events and, 2:474–475, 2:511
orientation need and, 2:524
The People's Choice study and, 2:541–542
Pew Research Center for the People & the Press and, 2:550–551
pluralistic ignorance and, 2:551–552
political image and, 1:322
political interest groups and, 1:340
public sphere enlargement and, 2:676 spiral of silence theory and, 2:516–517, 2:676, 2:757–760 venues for expression of, 2:676
See also World Association for Public Opinion Research (WAPOR)
Public Opinion (Lippmann), 1:408–409
Public relations, political, 2:677–680 activity-oriented approach to, 2:678 actors in, 2:678
Adenauer era, Germany and, 1:4
agenda building and, 2:679
dethematization and, 2:679 direct vs. indirect, 2:679 event management and, 2:679
history of, 2:677–678
image building and, 2:679 internal vs. external public relations and, 2:678–679 international communication and, 2:680 issues management and, 2:679 micro-, macro-perspectives on, 2:677 need-oriented approach to, 2:678 organization theory and, 2:677 personalization and, 2:679 political advertising vs., 2:677 political marketing vs., 2:677 political spin and, 2:756–757 profession-oriented approach to, 2:678
propaganda vs., 2:677
public, cultural diplomacy and, 2:680
public affairs communication and, 2:666–668, 2:679
strategic communication and, 2:764–765 symbolic message of, 2:679 target groups and, 2:678–679
Public service broadcasting (PBS), 2:680–682 collectivistic, social-democratic social arrangements and, 2:681 digital age realities and, 2:681–682 noncommercialism element of, 2:681 paternalistic vs. emancipatory vs. systemic, 2:680 program obligations of, 2:681 public interest protection, democracy enhancement by, 2:681 systemic parallelism of, 2:681
Public sphere, 2:682–685
communicative spaces, public opinion and, 2:682 conceptual issues, debates and, 2:684–685
counterpublics and, 2:669
democracy theories and, 1:169–175
enlargement of, 2:676 Enlightenment ideals and, 2:683 face-to-face communication in, 2:682 Habermas's work and, 2:669, 2:671, 2:682–683 interactional dimension of, 2:683–684
in political revolutions, 2:715 politics and, 2:685 public, private concepts and, 2:685
public communication in politics and, 2:668–671
representational dimension of, 2:683 structural dimension of, 2:683
Pulitzer, Joseph, 1:252
Democratic Party and, 2:854
yellow journalism and, 2:505, 2:775, 2:854
Pundits, punditry, 2:685
cable news channels and, 2:686
commentary, political and, 1:117–119
debates as political argumentation and, 1:161

Al Franken and, 1:258
journalism objectivity damaged by, 2:686 negative connotation on, 2:686 political bias and, 2:686
political commentary and, 1:117–119
political journalist analysis and, 1:363 in print news media, 2:686
talk shows and, 1:363
PUSH (Operation PUSH [People United to Save Humanity]), 1:357
Putin, Vladimir, 2:685–687
Chechen crisis and, 2:686
economic policies of, 2:687
foreign policies of, 2:687
human rights violations of, 2:687 international criticism of, 2:687
KGB career of, 2:686 law-and-order image of, 2:686 media control by, 2:687, 2:727
Boris Yeltsin and, 2:686, 2:727, 2:854–855
Putnam, Robert, 1:64, 2:581

Qatar
Al Jazeera television and, 1:23,* 1:23–25
Quarterly Journal of Speech, 1:62
Quayle, Dan, 2:689–690
G. H. W. Bush's vice president and, 2:689
Congressional career of, 2:689
media distortions regarding, 2:689–690

Rabier, Jacques-René, 1:214
Rabin, Yitzhak, 2:691–692
assassination of, 2:692
media relationships of, 2:691–692
military career of, 2:691
Oslo Accords and, 2:691
peace efforts of, 2:691
Ariel Sharon and, 2:743
Race in politics, 2:692–696
affirmative action and, 1:10–11
American political heritage and, 2:693–694
Shirley Chisholm and, 1:102–103
Civil Rights movement and, 1:108–109, 1:109,* 2:693–694
definitions regarding, 2:692
"deracialized campaigns" and, 2:694
Robert Entman's work in, 1:212
group rights prioritized, recognized and, 2:694
Willie Horton ad and, 1:194, 2:485, 2:561, 2:567, 2:695, 2:838–839
Indian Bill of Rights and, 2:693
inherently political nature of, 2:692–693
Jesse Jackson and, 1:357, 2:695
Jim Crow laws and, 2:693
Johnson-Reed Act quota system and, 2:693
Barbara Jordan, political career of, 1:359 liberal nationalism and, 2:693
local elections success and, 2:694
Mexican Americans and, 2:693 national identity among diverse people approach and, 2:693
Native Americans and, 2:693
Barack Obama, political career of, 1:58, 1:110, 2:463, 2:519
political campaigns and, 2:694–695
political party system and, 2:695
"race baiting" concept and, 2:694 self-identity, identity politics and, 2:692 symbolic racism, modern racism concepts and, 2:693
3/5 Compromise and, 2:693
J. C. Watts, political career of, 2:826–827
Watts riots and, 2:827
"whiteness" identification, power and, 2:692–693 Racism
in electoral communication, 2:463
Pauline Hanson (Australia) and, 1:296
NAACP and, 2:479–480
The Nature of Prejudice (Allport) and, 2:484
Watts riots and, 2:827
See also Segregation
Radical Civic Union (UCR, Argentina), 1:22–23, 1:39–40
Radio, politics and, 2:696–697
Adenauer era, Germany and, 1:4
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:58
Clear Channel Communications and, 1:122
Communications Act of 1996 and, 1:122
Coolidge, Harding and, 2:696, 2:753
Charles de Gaulle and, 1:167
"Eisenhower Answers America" ad and, 1:8–9, 1:204–205, 1:205–206 (figures), 1:333, 2:441, 2:546, 2:561
FCC, Fairness Doctrine and, 1:227
Federal Radio Commission (FRC) and, 1:120–121, 1:122
Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Brothers and, 1:121 historic perspective on, 1:28
Herbert Hoover campaign and, 2:696
information technology in politics and, 1:332–333
Rush Limbaugh and, 1:406–407
local, regional politics and, 2:696 Mercury Theory on the Air and, 1:107
news source and, 2:506
1924 national conventions and, 2:636, 2:696
1928 election and, 2:696
nominating conventions and, 1:137
party election broadcasts and (United Kingdom), 2:533–534
Pearl Harbor invasion, F. D. Roosevelt and, 2:636
political advertising and, 2:560–561, 2:567–568
presidential press conferences and, 2:696
The Psychology of Radio (Cantril & Allport) and, 2:665–666
Radio Act of 1912, 1927 and, 1:120–121, 1:212
radio addresses and, 2:697–698
"Radio Priest" Father Charles Coughlin and, 2:696
radio talk shows and, 1:29, 1:30, 1:113, 1:126, 1:333, 2:696
resonance theory and, 2:713–715
specialized audiences and, 2:697
Truman Doctrine and, 2:636
Getulio Vargas (Turkey) and, 2:806
War of the Worlds and, 1:107, 2:823
World War I, II and, 2:696
See also Political advertising, radio; Radio addresses; Radio Free Europe; Talk radio, political; Voice of America (VOA)

Radio Act of 1927, 1:120–121, 1:212
Radio addresses, 2:697–698
G. H. W. Bush and, 2:698
G. W. Bush and, 2:698
Winston Churchill and, 1:104
Bill Clinton and, 2:698
direct public communication through, 2:697–698
Ronald Reagan and, 2:636, 2:696, 2:698
Roosevelt fireside chats and, 1:28, 1:42, 1:243–244, 1:333, 2:548, 2:636, 2:696, 2:697, 2:712, 2:724, 2:754
Radio Free Europe, 2:697, 2:698–699
CIA role in, 2:698–699
criticism of, 2:698–699
funding and reporting structures of, 2:698 Hungarian uprising and, 2:699 political change through propaganda and, 2:698
Solidarity Movement (Poland) and, 2:554
United States Information Agency and, 2:799
Voice of America and, 2:698
Radio-Television News Directors Association, 1:361
Radunski, Peter, 1:32
Rainbow Coalition, 1:357
Rand, Ayn, 1:406
Randall v. Sorrell, 2:428
Rather, Dan, 2:699–700
books written by, 2:700
Bush–Rather confrontation and, 1:75, 2:490, 2:699
CBS Evening News career of, 2:699–700 presidential, notables interviewed by, 2:700
"Rathergate," G. W. Bush and, 2:700
September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and, 2:699
2000 election and, 2:699
Watergate scandal and, 2:825
Rational voter model of mass political behavior, 2:419–421
Rawlings, Jerry, 2:700–701
constitutional rule and, 2:700–701
"culture of silence" and, 2:700 human rights violations and, 2:700–701 National Democratic Congress and, 2:700–701 populism of, 2:700
press freedom and, 2:700–701
Provisional National Defense Council and, 2:700–701
Raymond, Henry, 2:505, 2:513, 2:539
Reagan, Nancy, 2:701–702
antidrug campaign of, 2:701, 2:702
as first lady, 1:246, 1:247
media criticism of, 2:701–702 presidency influence of, 2:702
Reagan, Ronald, 2:702–705
AIDS epidemic and, 1:185
Roger Ailes as media consultant to, 1:21
Alzheimer's disease and, 1:246
Berlin Wall speech of, 2:638
Bork Supreme Court nomination and, 2:766
G. H. W. Bush Vice President and, 1:72, 1:75
California governor, 2:703 campaign skills of, 2:704 candidate film of, 1:84 celebrity status of, 1:90 ceremonial speeches of, 2:704
Challenger crew eulogy of, 2:635, 2:704, 2:707
Bill Clinton criticism of, 1:112
communism threat and, 1:123
John Connally and, 1:129
conservativism of, 1:129
Elizabeth Dole and, 1:190
domestic, foreign policies of, 2:704
FCC and, 1:28, 2:670
Rudy Giuliani and, 1:269
Barry Goldwater and, 1:276, 2:703
good vs. evil, Soviet Union and, 2:707
Mikhail Gorbachev and, 1:278, 2:704
"Great Communicator" reputation of, 2:647, 2:698
inaugural address of, 2:704
Iran-Contra affair and, 1:75
Japanese Americans reparations and, 2:612
Robert Kennedy and, 2:703
"Morning in America" theme of, 2:561, 2:704
National Association of Evangelicals and, 2:707*
New Right and, 2:494
1970, 1976 elections and, 2:703
1980, 1984 elections and, 1:313, 2:436, 2:561, 2:703, 2:704
1986 Freedom of Information Reform Act and, 1:262
nominating conventions and, 1:137, 1:138, 2:704 nuclear arms reduction and, 2:704
oratory skills of, 2:702, 2:703–705, 2:712 political transition of, 2:702–703
press conferences of, 2:506, 2:643
press secretary of, 2:647
radio, film, television career of, 2:702–703
radio addresses of, 2:636, 2:696, 2:698
Nancy Reagan and, 1:246, 1:247, 2:701–702
Reagan-Anderson debates and, 1:161
Reagan-Carter debate and, 1:161, 2:561
Reagan-Mondale debates and, 1:21, 1:161, 1:313, 2:704
Reagonomics label and, 1:393, 2:546 reframing Marine Lebanon deaths and, 2:634 religious right and, 2:707
Saturday Night Live and, 2:731
self-deprecating humor and, 1:313
speechwriting and, 2:636
strategy of silence campaign poster of, 2:628 television image of, 2:561
testimonials used by, 2:788
trickle down economics of, 1:112
Really Bad News (Glasgow Media Group), 1:270
Redford, Robert, 1:79–80, 1:241
Red Guard, of Chinese Cultural Revolution, 1:100
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 2:705
Communications Act of 1934 and, 2:705
FCC fairness doctrine and, 1:227, 2:705
First Amendment and, 2:705
Reed, Stanley Foster, 1:79
Reese, Matt, 1:31
Reeves, Rosser, 1:204
Referenda. See Ballot initiatives
Reform Party (U.S.A.), 1:68, 1:111, 2:706
Pat Buchanan and, 2:706

Ralph Nader and, 2:706, 2:851
1992, 1996 elections and, 2:706
Ross Perot and, 2:543–544, 2:706
2000 election and, 2:706, 2:851
2006 state elections and, 2:706
2008 election and, 2:706
Jesse Ventura, 2:706
The Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 1:11
Religion in politics, 2:706–709
American Jewish community and, 2:708
conclusions regarding, 2:709 good vs. evil concept and, 2:707 intelligent design vs. evolution issue and, 2:709
Thomas Jefferson and, 2:707 journalism trends in, 2:708–709 modern political age and, 2:707–708
New Right and, 2:494–495
Pharisee Effect and, 2:551
Ronald Reagan and, 2:707*
Religious Right and, 2:494–495
religious right and, 2:707 same sex marriage issue and, 2:708
"separation of church and state" and, 2:707
stem-cell research, 2:708
"values voters" and, 2:708
Reno, Janet, 1:113
Reporters Without Borders, 2:710–711
Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali (Tunisia) and, 1:53–54
Abdelazia Bouteflika (Algeria) and, 1:63
criticism of, 2:710–711
Damocles Network judicial activities of, 2:710 objectives of, 2:710
political censorship and, 1:94
press freedom and, 2:644, 2:710–711 public interest served by, 2:709
Web site of, 2:710
Republican National Committee (RNC), 2:711–712 chairs of, 2:711
Commission on Presidential Debates and, 1:119
527 groups and, 2:711
fundraising, turnout, message development activities of, 2:711 legislative committees of, 2:711
1952 election and, 1:204
Progress for America Voter Fund and, 1:7 state activities and, 2:711 state representatives to, 2:711
Web site used by, 2:491
Republican National Convention
C-SPAN and, 1:148
Elizabeth Dole and, 1:190–191
Gerald Ford and, 1:135*
Barry Goldwater and, 1:275–276
mass media and, 1:137–138
1944 nominating convention and, 1:137
1964 nominating convention and, 1:136, 1:275–276
1992, Pat Buchanan and, 1:68, 2:704
1992, Ronald Reagan and, 2:704
1996 nominating convention and, 1:138
2004 nominating convention and, 1:269
Republican Party, 2:712
Patrick Buchanan and, 1:68
color-coded system (red) and, 2:712
conservativism and, 1:129
Democratic Party and, 1:174–175
Elizabeth Dole and, 1:190–191
1860 election and, 1:175, 2:505, 2:712
foreign policy issue ownership by, 1:34
Gingrich, "Republican Revolution" and, 1:267–268
Barry Goldwater and, 1:275–276
"Grand Old Party" and, 2:712
Horace Greeley and, 1:285, 2:505
issue ownership of, 1:354, 2:654
Thomas Jefferson and, 2:504
Latino vote and, 1:399
Rush Limbaugh and, 2:712
Abraham Lincoln and, 2:712
National Gazette newspaper and, 2:504, 2:636 negative media coverage and, 2:712
New Right and, 2:494–495
1968 to 2004 elections and, 2:712
1994 midterm elections and, 2:712
nominating conventions of, 1:135–138
Party Press era and, 2:538–539 patriotism, family values and, 2:712
race affecting, 2:695
Henry Raymond and, 2:505 religiosity and, 1:180
television used by, 2:712
2008 election, Giuliani and, 1:269
Watergate scandal and, 1:26, 2:712
Republican People's Party (Turkey), 1:169, 1:197
A Republic Not an Empire (Buchanan), 1:68
Republic of Kenya, 1:375
Reputation in politics, 2:712–713 diffusion process, media role in, 2:712–713 functional reputation and, 2:713
libel and, 1:404–405
media scandal-mongering and, 2:713
political scandal and, 2:614–615 social power legitimization and, 2:713 social reputation and, 2:713
Resonance theory, 2:713–714
"Daisy Girl" spot and, 1:9, 1:156, 2:714, 2:736 Gerbner's work and, 2:714
mainstreaming process and, 2:714
media cultivation theory and, 2:714 message affected by real-world experience and, 2:714
The Responsive Chord (Schwartz) and, 1:156, 2:714–715 Responsive Chord, The (Schwartz), 1:156, 2:714–715 candidate campaign strategies in, 2:715
"Daisy Girl" ad and, 2:714, 2:736
interactivity of electronic media process and, 2:715 receiver's stored past experience focus of, 2:714–715
resonance theory and, 2:713–715
Revolution, political, 2:715–716
in Bolivia, Hugo Chávez and, 1:96–97
Bolshevik Revolution, 1:238, 1:241 in Cuba, Castro and, 1:89–90

cybernationalism and, 1:153–154
in Egypt, Al-Sadat and, 1:26–27 either-or conflicts in, 2:715, 2:716
French Revolution, 1:129, 2:715, 2:716
German unification and, 1:266–267
political communication in, 2:715–716
public sphere in, 2:715
Russian Revolution, 1:123, 1:401, 2:660 semantics of difference and, 2:716 social movement importance in, 2:716
See also Chinese Cultural Revolution
Revolutionary Institutional party (PRI, Mexico), 1:252 Revolutionary Offensive (Cuba), 1:89
Reyes, Sylvestre, 2:463
Rhetoric, political, 2:716–718
AIDS Quilt example of, 1:41
apologia and, 1:38
argumentation, political and, 1:41–42
Aristotle and, 1:42–45, 1:393, 2:717
Cicero and, 2:717–718
classical western traditions in, 2:717–718 contemporary rhetoric and, 2:718–719
deliberation and, 1:167–168
Eisenhower farewell address and, 1:206 examination of, 1:377–378 forensic genre of, 2:717 genres of, 2:717, 2:718
in The Handbook of Political Communication (Nimmo & Sanders), 1:295, 2:515, 2:730 identity, image connected to, 2:719
ideology and, 2:718
Barbara Jordan and, 1:359
John Kerry and, 1:377–378
Martin Luther King, Jr. and, 1:381
language and, 1:391, 1:393
Machiavelli and, 2:718
Barack Obama and, 2:519
Plato and, 1:42, 1:44, 1:392, 2:717, 2:719 political styles and, 2:718–719
presidential inaugural addresses and, 1:327–328
Sophists and, 2:717
symbolic convergence theory and, 1:63
See also Presidential communication
Rice, Condoleezza, 1:117, 2:719–720
academic career or, 2:719
G. H. W. Bush administration and, 2:719
G. W. Bush administration and, 2:720
publications of, 2:720
as Secretary of State, 2:508, 2:720, 2:848
Richards, Ann, 1:73, 2:720–721
humor of, 2:720 leadership style of, 2:720 public service of, 2:720
Texas governor and, 2:720
Right-Wing Authoritarianism (RWA), 1:45–46
Riis, Jacob A., 2:473
Rivera, Geraldo, 2:721
sensationalist reporting of, 2:721
television career of, 2:721
RNC. See Republican National Committee
Robb, Charles, 1:9
Robertson, Pat, 1:351
Robinson, Michael J., 2:516, 2:577, 2:580
Rock the Vote, 2:721–722
criticism of, 2:722
draft issue and, 2:722 freedom of speech, expression and, 2:721
Kids Voting USA and, 1:380
nonprofit, nonpartisan political advocacy of, 2:721–722 presidential debates of, 2:722
2004 election and, 2:722
youth voting focus of, 2:721–722, 2:856
Roe v. Wade, 1:3, 1:264
Rogers, Everett M., 1:183, 1:184, 2:722–723
diffusion of innovations theory of, 2:722–723 macro-, micro-level system change processes and, 2:723
Rogers, Will, 1:313
Rokeach, Milton, 1:46
Rokkan, S., 1:156–157, 2:814
Roman Catholic Church
Polish democratization and, 2:553–554, 2:555
Roosevelt, Eleanor, 2:723–724
as first lady, 1:246, 1:247, 2:723*
media used by, 2:723–724
political activities of, 2:723–724 progressive reform focus of, 2:723
Roosevelt, Franklin D., 2:724–725 campaign posters of, 2:628 celebrity support of, 1:90
Churchill and, 1:104
Communications Act of 1934 and, 1:121
Democratic Party and, 1:175
extramarital affairs of, 1:83
fireside chats of, 1:28, 1:42, 1:243–244, 1:333, 2:548, 2:636, 2:696, 2:697, 2:724, 2:754
William Hearst and, 1:303
inaugural address of, 1:328
information control, political power and, 2:724–725
Japanese Americans internment and, 2:612, 2:637, 2:723*
New Deal of, 1:129, 1:137, 1:243–244, 1:303, 1:333, 2:697, 2:724, 2:833
"New Deal" voting cohort and, 2:421
1932 nominating convention and, 1:137, 1:175
1936 election and, 2:477
1940 election and, 1:408, 2:541, 2:777
papers, materials of, 2:752
Pearl Harbor invasion and, 2:636
political communication skills of, 2:724–725
press conferences of, 2:506, 2:635, 2:643, 2:724
press corps and, 2:837
press secretary of, 2:646, 2:724
reframing of Depression and, 2:633 righteous Western way of life and, 2:707
Eleanor Roosevelt and, 2:723,* 2:723–724
speech writers for, 2:754
State of the Union Address of, 2:761, 2:762
Roosevelt, Theodore
"Bully Pulpit" going public and, 2:631, 2:646, 2:755

"Great White" Fleet actions of, 2:633 muckrakers, yellow journalists and, 2:473 political agenda control by, 2:548
press corps and, 2:835–836
primary elections and, 2:651
speeches of, 2:754, 2:755
State of the Union Address of, 2:762
Roth v. United States, 2:520
Rousseau, Jen-Jacques, 1:287
Rove, Karl, 2:548
Royal, Segolene, 1:83
Royal Commission on the Press (RCP, United Kingdom), 2:725–726
antimonopoly measures of, 2:725 economic structure and, 2:725
press freedom and, 2:725
self-regulation and, 2:725–726
Ruby, Jack, 1:373–374
Rupert Murdoch's News Corporation, 1:99, 1:253
Rush Limbaugh Show, 1:29, 1:30, 1:113
Russell, Charles E., 2:473, 2:727
Russert, Tim, 1:363
Russia, democratization and media, 2:726–727
Chechen War coverage and, 2:726–727
debates in, 1:164
glosnost and perestroika in, 1:70, 1:177, 1:266, 2:726
Gorbachev and, 1:277–278
Nikita Khrushchev and, 1:378–379
media as fourth estate and, 2:726 media restructuring and, 2:726
1996 presidential election coverage and, 2:727
NTV and, 2:726–727
Vladimir Putin and, 2:686–687
segmented electoral system in, 1:209
television as a socialization force and, 2:726 television government and corporate ownership and, 2:726
Boris Yeltsin and, 2:854–855
Russian Revolution, 1:123, 1:401, 2:660
RWA. See Right-Wing Authoritarianism
Rwanda genocide, role of media, 1:114, 2:727–728
civil war and, 2:727
independence from Belgium and, 2:727
Rwandan Patriotic Front and, 2:727
Tutsi minority and, 2:727–728

Saatchi and Saatchi, 1:130, 2:534, 2:604
Sabato, Larry, 2:728–729
books of, 2:729
elections research, political analysis focus of, 2:729
media feeding frenzy and, 2:444
political consultant power and, 2:729
Sage Handbook of Political Advertising (Kaid & Holtz-Bacha, eds.), 1:386
Sahl, Mort, 1:313
Salinger, Pierre, 2:647
Sanders, Keith R., 2:729–730
academic career of, 2:730
bibliographic work of, 2:730
The Handbook of Political Communication and, 1:295, 2:515, 2:730 interdisciplinary approach of, 2:730
International Communication Association and, 2:730
Political Communication Review and, 2:571, 2:730
Sarcinelli, Ulrich, 1:172
Sarkozy, Nicolas, 1:83 Satellite broadcasting access barriers of, 1:273
Al Jazeera television and, 1:23,* 1:23–25, 1:273
democratization process role of, 1:176, 1:179
Nightline and, 2:514–515
talk shows and, 1:29
transnational communication and, 1:271, 1:272
Saturday Night Live,* 2:731–732
debate satires of, 2:731
Gerald Ford and, 1:250
Al Franken and, 1:257
Rudy Giuliani on, 1:269 humor in politics and, 1:313–314, 2:731
impact of, 2:731
personalization of candidates on, 2:731 political knowledge from, 2:731
2000, 2004 elections and, 2:731
young voters and, 2:731
Savage, Robert, 1:85, 2:515
The Scaffolding of Rhetoric (Churchill), 1:104 Scandal. See Political scandal
Scharsach and News Verlagsgessellschaft v. Austria (European Court of Human Rights), 1:216
Scheufele, D. A., 1:254
Schiller, Herbert I., 1:151
Schlafly, Phyllis, 2:494
Schlenker, Barry, 1:326
Scholozman, Kay Lehman, 2:582
Schramm, Wilbur, 2:732–733
academic career of, 2:732
books of, 2:732–733
Steven Chaffee and, 1:95
Four Theories of the Press and, 1:79, 1:123, 1:250, 2:509, 2:641, 2:647–648 free information and, 2:467
Mass Media and National Development and, 2:467 media effects on public research of, 2:732–733 media message research work of, 2:732 national development and information flow relationship and, 2:467 social responsibility model of mass communication and, 2:732
"social" temperature control by mass media and, 2:467
Schrewner, Michael, 1:109
Schröder, Gerhard, 2:733
early political career of, 2:733
media used by, 2:733
Angela Merkel and, 2:451–452
Vladimir Putin (Russia) and, 2:687 showman image of, 2:733
Schroeder, Patricia, 1:87, 2:733–734
Congressional career of, 2:733–734
early political career of, 2:733
House Armed Services Committee work of, 2:734
1988, 1996 elections and, 2:734
women's and children's issues work of, 2:734

Schulz, Winfried, 2:734–735
construction of reality work of, 2:735 content analysis work of, 2:734–735
German reunification, democratization focus of, 2:735 media reception, effects and, 2:734–735 media systems changes and, 2:734–735 news selection and media reality and, 2:734–735 news selection process and, 2:512–513
Schüssel, Wolfgang, 2:735–736
early political career of, 2:735
economic policies of, 2:736
European Union and, 2:735
Jörg Haider and, 1:293–294, 2:735–736 leadership and verbal skills of, 2:736 media relationship with, 2:736
Peoples Party and, 2:735–736
Franz Vranitzky and, 2:735, 2:818
Schwartz, Tony, 2:430, 2:547, 2:736–737
"Daisy Girl" ad and, 1:9, 1:156, 1:232, 1:276, 1:333, 2:561, 2:604, 2:714, 2:736, 2:782
modern political advertising and, 2:736
resonance theory and, 2:714, 2:736
The Responsive Chord and, 2:714–715, 2:736 shared TV exposure effects and, 2:714 television focus of, 2:736
Schwarzenegger, Arnold, 2:643, 2:737–738
California governor election and, 2:737
a celebrity in politics and, 1:90
on The Daily Show, 1:155
film career of, 2:737
Kennedy family and, 2:737
media relationship with, 2:737–738
sexual scandals of, 2:737
The Tonight Show with Jay Leno and, 2:737
Scientific Advisory Committee on Television and Social Behavior, 1:265
SCT. See Symbolic convergence theory
Second-order election, 2:738
characteristics of, 2:738
European Parliament and, 1:218, 2:738
European Parliament elections and, 1:219
first-order elections vs., 2:738 institutional framework and, 2:738
Seducing America: How Television Charms the Modern Voter (R. P. Hart), 1:299
Segregation, 2:738–739
Spiro Agnew and, 1:20
Brown v. Board of Education, Topeka, KS, 1:108, 2:479, 2:694, 2:739
civil rights movement and, 1:108–109, 1:109,* 2:739
conservativism and, 1:129
definition of, 2:738
de jure segregation and, 1:108
Jim Crow laws and, 2:739
John F. Kennedy and, 1:371
in the military, 2:739
NAACP and, 2:739
The Nature of Prejudice (Allport) and, 2:484
Nine From Little Rock film on, 1:290
Plessy v. Ferguson and, 2:739
Reconstruction and, 2:739
George Wallace and, 2:739*
See also Civil rights movement
SEIU (Service Employees International Union), 1:6
Selective processes, exposure, perception, memory, 2:740–741 cognitive dissonance factor and, 2:740
The Effects of Mass Communication (Klapper) and, 1:199–200, 2:584
hostile media effect and, 1:311–312
information environment complexity factor and, 2:740
limited effects theory and, 1:407–408 memory system, political information processing and, 2:586 motivated reasoning and, 2:740 opinion-motivated selective exposure and, 2:740 preexisting beliefs shape information use and, 2:740 selective exposure, attention and, 2:740 selective judgment, biased assimilation and, 2:741 selective memory and, 2:741 selective perception and, 2:741
Self-Presentation (Leary), 1:326
Selling of the President 1968, The (McGinniss), 2:741–742
Senegal, 2:742–743
Senghor, Léopold Sédar, 2:742–743
academic career of, 2:742
economic policies of, 2:743
mass media liberalization and, 2:743 monopolized media market and, 2:742 multi-party transformation and, 2:743 national unity focus of, 2:742
Negritude movement and, 2:742 socialist one-party system and, 2:742
Senior power model of impact on politics, 1:19, 1:20
September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks
Al Jazeera television and, 1:23, 1:24
G. W. Bush and, 1:73, 1:242, 2:588, 2:633, 2:647 political prisoners after, 2:612
Dan Rather and, 2:699
U.S. news media, international terrorism and, 2:784, 2:784,* 2:785–786
The West Wing episode about, 2:835
Service Employees International Union (SEIU), 1:6
Seward, William H., 1:285
Shapiro, R. Y., 1:363
Sharon, Ariel, 2:743–744
Yasser Arafat and, 1:39
Lebanon War and, 2:743–744
media relationship of, 2:744
military career of, 2:743
as Prime Minister, 2:744
Yitzhak Rabin and, 2:743
Settlements Movement and, 2:743
Shaw, Bernard, 1:114
Shaw, Donald L, 1:12, 2:425
Shaw, George Bernard, 1:313
Sheehan, Neil, 2:540
Sherr, Lynn, 1:87
Shield laws, 2:744–745
Branzburg v. Hayes and, 2:745 confidentiality of sources protection and, 2:744 Judith Miller case and, 2:745

press freedom and, 2:644–645, 2:744–745 state vs. federal laws and, 2:745 subpoenas protection and, 2:744, 2:745 Shields, Donald C., 1:63, 1:230, 1:231
Shils, E., 1:338
Shriver, R. Sargent, 2:430
Shrum, Bob, 1:33, 1:59
Siebert, Fred S., 1:79, 1:123, 1:250, 2:508–509, 2:641
Silent Majority, 2:495
Simitis, Konstantinos, 2:745–746
academic career of, 2:745 antidictatorial struggle and, 2:745–746
economic policies of, 2:746
as prime minister, 2:746
Simons, Herbert, 1:295
Simpson, Carole, 1:87
The Simpsons, 1:314
Sinclair, Upton, 2:473
Singapore
e-government initiatives in, 1:201
political censorship in, 1:92, 1:93, 1:99
60 Minutes, 1:333
Dole-Clinton on, 1:192
Betty Ford, ERA controversy and, 1:279
Watergate scandal and, 2:825
Sleeper Effect, 2:746–747 communicator's image and, 2:746 critiques of, 2:746–747
Forgetting Effect and, 2:746
Carl Hovland and, 2:746 of negative advertising, 2:487
Why We Fight film and, 2:746
Sloan, Hugh, 1:26
Smith, Alfred, 1:137, 2:636, 2:696
Smith, Hendrick, 2:540
Smith, Ian Duncan, 1:131
Smith, Larry David, 1:137
SNCC (Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee), 1:108
Social capital, 1:64
Social Democratic Party (Brazil), 1:66
Social Democratic Party (Germany), 1:65 Socialism of Fidel Castro, 1:89–90
propaganda and, 2:659, 2:660
Socialist Party (Chile), 1:49
Social learning theory, 1:45–46
Social marketing, 2:747–748
Ad Council ads and, 2:747–748 audience segmentation and, 2:747 creative message construction and, 2:747 efficacy of, 2:748 health-related campaigns of, 2:748 message delivery focus of, 2:747 Pay Attention and Vote and, 2:747 peer influences, word-of-mouth techniques and, 2:747 public communication, public service campaigns and, 2:747 public service announcements and, 2:747
Rock the vote and, 2:747 social idea acceptance through, 2:747 traditional marketing vs., 2:747 Social-psychological model of mass political behavior, 2:419
Social reputation, 2:713
Social Responsibility theory of the press, 2:748–749
American Society of Newspaper Editors and, 2:748 broadcasting and media ethics focus of, 2:748 Committee on a Free and Responsible Press and, 2:748 contemporary usage changes to, 2:749
Four Theories of the Press (Siebert, Peterson, & Schramm), 1:250, 2:509, 2:641, 2:648, 2:732
information source accuracy and, 2:749 Social Security, 2:833
older voting adults and, 1:20
privatization of, AARP and, 1:1
Society of Professional Journalists, 1:361
Sociological model of mass political behavior, 2:419
Socrates, 1:91
Soft money contributions, 2:426–427, 2:562, 2:749–750
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:6, 1:56–57, 1:259, 2:567, 2:749
Buckley v. Valeo and, 1:70, 1:233
527 groups and, 2:749
hard money vs., 2:749 issue advertisements and, 2:749
Soft news, 2:750–751
effects of, 2:750
feminization of the media and, 2:750 gender differences in, 2:750
Global Media Monitoring Project and, 2:750 hard news vs., 1:295–296, 2:439, 2:495, 2:750 media profits and, 2:750
Thomas Patterson's work on, 2:750
political knowledge from, 2:595, 2:750
statistics regarding, 2:750
Solidarity movement, 2:751
Eastern Bloc communist regimes and, 2:751 first post-communist government and, 2:751 shipyard labor strikes and, 2:751
Soviet Union collapse and, 2:751
Lech Wałęsa and, 2:552–553, 2:554–555, 2:751, 2:820
See also Poland, democratization
Solzhenitsyn, Aleksandr, 1:93
Sophists, 1:393, 2:717
Sorensen, Theodore, 1:371
Sound bite, 2:752
criticism of, 2:752
journalist structural bias and, 1:362 media logic of, 2:446
François Mitterand and, 2:466
political spin and, 2:756
of politicians vs. other actors, 2:497 shrinking sound bite and, 2:752, 2:779 voiceover narration connection of, 2:752
Harold Wilson's Labour Party (Great Britain) and, 1:389
The Sound of Leadership (R. P. Hart), 1:299
South Africa
character assassinations in, 1:82
debates in, 1:164
Nelson Mandela and, 2:414–415
Southern Christian Leadership Conference, 1:357, 1:381, 2:462

South Korea
cell phones, text messaging in, 2:492 citizen journalism in, 1:106
debates in, 1:164
democratization process in, 1:179
e-government initiatives in, 1:201
Ohmynews.com and, 1:106
South Park, 1:314
Soviet communist theory of the press, 1:250, 2:509, 2:641, 2:648
Soviet Union
collapse of, 1:114, 1:123, 1:176, 1:177, 1:184
Cuban Missile Crisis and, 1:289, 1:371–372, 1:378, 2:763
democratization and, 1:176, 1:177, 1:266
Engels and, 1:123, 1:402, 2:417
Finnish neutrality and, 1:369
The Gulag Archipelago (Solzhenitsyn) and, 1:93
Vladímir Lenin and, 1:401–402
Andrey Loukanov (Bulgaria) and, 1:410–411
Moscow Helsinki Group and, 1:304
Poland democratization and, 2:552–555
preview censorship practice in, 1:93
propaganda and, 2:658
Russian Revolution and, 1:123
Boris Yeltsin and, 2:854–855
See also Gorbachev, Mikhail; Soviet communist theory of the press
Spain
José María Aznar and, 1:47–48
debates in, 1:164
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
González Márquez and, 1:276–277
Sparkman, John, 1:98
Speeches, presidential, 2:589, 2:752–755
G. H. W. Bush, Thousand-Points-of-Light speech, 1:72 campaign speeches and, 2:589–590
of Bill Clinton, 1:112
creation of, 2:754–755 domestic and international implications of, 2:755
Eisenhower farewell speech, 1:205 “going public” concept and, 2:755 inaugural addresses and, 2:752
of L. B. Johnson, 2:753*
National Records and Archives Administration and, 2:752
Nixon Checkers Speech (vice president), 1:38, 1:97–98, 2:516, 2:712
Richard Nixon’s resignation and, 2:753 presidential inaugural addresses and, 1:327–328 presidential style and, 2:755 public communication through, 2:755 Public Papers of the President and, 2:752
speechwriting process and, 2:754–755
State of the Union Addresses and, 2:753, 2:761–762 study of, 2:754–755
surrogate campaign speeches and, 2:589 televised addresses and, 2:753–754, 2:755
Truman farewell speech, 1:205
See also Fireside chats; Inaugural addresses, presidential; Press conferences
Spencer, John, 1:110
Spencer, Stu, 1:31, 2:441
Spiegel affair, 2:756
Conrad Ahlers and, 2:756
Rudolf Augstein and, 2:756
Der Spiegel news magazine and, 2:756
German press as fourth estate and, 2:756 treason charges and, 2:756
Spin, political, 2:756–757
American-style campaigning and, 1:33–35
Argentinean political campaigns and, 1:22–23
Tony Blair (Britain) and, 1:59
candidate-centered communication and, 1:80–83
criticism of, 2:757
e-mail use and, 1:210
government communication and, 1:279
government press conferences and, 2:756
Peter Mandelson (Great Britain), 2:757
Mike McCurry (Clinton administration) and, 2:756–757 pejorative term of, 2:756
political rhetoric and, 2:718–719
professionalization and, 2:497, 2:656–657 selling of biased message and, 2:756 techniques of, 2:756
White House press corps and, 2:837
The Spiral of Cynicism: The Press and the Public Good (Jamieson & Cappella), 1:358 Spiral of silence theory, 2:757–761
agenda setting and, 1:17 communications research affected by, 2:760 elements of, 2:759
empirical testing of, 2:760 fear of rejection, isolation and, 2:759 inoculation against, 1:337 mass media influence on, 2:759 moral component issues and, 2:759
1965 German federal election and, 2:758–759
Elisabeth Noelle-Neumann and, 2:516–517, 2:585, 2:676, 2:757, 2:758, 2:760
origins of, 2:758–759
pluralistic ignorance and, 2:551–552, 2:757
polls’ entertainment value and, 2:623–624 public opinion, as form of social control and, 2:757, 2:759 “quasi-statistical sense” regarding, 2:760 social nature of man concept and, 2:757–758 time and place limitations and, 2:759
SRC. See Survey Research Center
SRT. See Social Responsibility theory of the press
Stalin, Joseph
Nikita Khrushchev and, 1:378
Sovietization of Poland and, 2:553–554
Stanton, Frank, 1:400
Stanyer, James, 1:82
Starr, Kenneth, 1:113, 1:404
StarTV, 1:99
State of the Union Address, 2:634–635, 2:761–763
of Bill Clinton, 2:761*
Constitution and, 2:753, 2:761
content analysis of, 2:762
of Calvin Coolidge, 2:753
of Thomas Jefferson, 2:753, 2:761
of L. B. Johnson, 2:762

policy agenda focus of, 2:761–762 President, Congress and, 2:761–762 public's "expectations gap" and, 2:762 of F. D. Roosevelt, 2:761, 2:762 of Teddy Roosevelt, 2:762 of Harry Truman, 2:753
of George Washington, 2:753, 2:761
of Woodrow Wilson, 2:753, 2:761, 2:762 States abortion legislation in, 1:2–3 affirmative action legislation banned by, 1:11 free speech laws and, 2:745 public funding for state candidates and, 1:78
shield laws and, 2:745
Status conferral theory, 1:17
Steffen, Lincoln, 2:473
Stellmacher, J, 1:46
Stempel, G. H., 2:507
Stephanopoulos, George, 2:763
ABC career of, 2:763
academic career of, 2:763
All Too Human memoir of, 2:763
Clinton administration and, 2:763
Stevenson, Adlai, 2:763–764
academic career of, 2:763
Checker's Speech (Nixon) and, 1:98
Cuban missile crisis and, 2:763
early political career of, 2:763
Guggenheim and, 1:290
1952, 1956 elections and, 1:28, 1:204, 2:507, 2:546, 2:763–764
testimonials used by, 2:788
as U. N. ambassador, 2:763 Stewart, James, 1:238*
Stewart, Jon, 1:155
See also Daily Show, The Stokes, Donald, 1:35–36, 2:419, 2:581, 2:767
Strategic communication, 2:764–765 audience research importance in, 2:766 Cold War efforts of, 2:764
impression management and, 1:326–327
increase knowledge, change attitudes or behavior goals of, 2:764 message consistency, clarity and, 2:764 multiple strategies used in, 2:764, 2:765
Voice of America and, 2:764
Strauss, Franz Josef, 1:369
Streisand, Barbra, 1:90
Stringer, 2:765–766
categories of, 2:765 danger faced by, 2:765
low wages of, 2:765
new technology used in, 2:765 part-time, freelance journalist as, 2:765 Strodbeck, F. L., 1:338
Strother, Ray, 1:31, 2:441
Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), 1:108, 2:462
Suez Canal, 1:27
Suffrage movement, 1:87
Süleyman, Demirel, 1:104
Supreme Court, media and the, 2:766–767
Bork nomination and, 2:766
Branzburg v. Hayes and, 2:745
Bush v. Gore, 2000 election and, 1:73, 2:765 deference shown by media and, 2:765
hate speech and, 1:301
Hill–Thomas hearings and, 1:306–307
libel and, 1:405
political advertising and, 2:566
salient public issue cases and, 2:765 vacancy, nomination, confirmation process and, 2:765–766 writ of certiorari and, 2:765
See also Hill–Thomas hearings
Survey Research Center (SRC), 2:767–768
The American Voter (Campbell, Converse, Miller, & Stokes) and, 1:35–36, 2:419, 2:766, 2:815
Center for Political Studies and, 2:767–768
National Election Studies and, 2:768
1948 election and, 2:766
Political Behavior Program of, 2:766
Suskind, Ron, 2:548
Sutherland, Donald, 1:117
Swanson, David, 1:295, 2:414
Sweden
debates in, 1:164
Eurobarometer survey and, 1:214
Olof Palme and, 2:528–529
Press Law of 1766 in, 2:645–646
Swift, Jonathan, 1:313
Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, 1:6, 1:7, 1:340, 1:364, 2:567, 2:749
Symbolic convergence theory (SCT), 2:768–769
Ernest G. Bormann and, 1:62–63, 2:768–769
"chaining out" concept and, 2:768, 2:769 communal narratives, shared social reality and, 2:768
criticism of, 2:769
dramatism in political communication and, 1:193, 2:768 fantasy theme analysis and, 1:62–63, 1:193, 1:229–231, 2:768
group consciousness and, 2:768–769
Mediated Political Realities (Nimmo & Combs) and, 2:446–447 rhetorical vision, rhetorical community and, 2:768–769 symbolic cues and, 2:768 Symbolic Uses of Politics, The (Edelman), 1:198, 2:769–770 democratic action is a symbolic function, 2:769
Edelman's writings and, 2:770
Harold Lasswell review of, 2:769 political reality distortions and, 2:769
Syria, 1:21–22
Systems theory, 2:770–773
AGIL scheme and, 2:771
autopoietic systems theory and, 2:771–772, 2:772–773
Ludwig von Bertalanffy founder of, 2:770 cybernetic systems theory and, 2:771 democracy theories and, 1:169–175
feedback loops and, 2:770
Neinz von Foerster's work and, 2:771 functional imperatives and, 2:771 general systems theory and, 2:770 holistic social theories and, 2:770

Niklas Luhmann's work and, 2:771–772 media structural functional analysis and, 2:772 Talcott Parsons's work in, 2:770
public communication and, 1:172 public-non public processes and, 2:772–773 reduction of complexity concept and, 2:771 second-order cybernetics theory and, 2:771, 2:772 structural functionalism and, 2:770–771 theory building in communication science and, 2:772 whole is irreducible to sum of its parts and, 2:770
Norbert Wiener's work and, 2:771

Tabloids, 2:775, 2:775–777
American Media Inc. and, 2:776
British tabloids and, 2:776
candidate-centered communication and, 1:82–83
in China, 1:99
Daily Mirror (London) and, 2:776
Alfred Harmsworth (Great Britain) and, 2:775–776
Hearst, New York Daily Mirror and, 2:776
horserace coverage and, 1:310–311
Illustrated Daily News (New York) and, 2:776
infotainment and, 1:335
1920s New York tabloids and, 2:505–506
penny press and, 2:776
Joseph Pulitzer, New York World and, 2:775, 2:854 reduced size format and, 2:775 sensationalistic journalism and, 2:775
TV tabloidism and, 2:776
yellow journalism and, 2:776
See also Yellow journalism
TABOR (taxpayer bill of rights), 1:1
Taft, William Howard
presidential communication of, 2:638 press communication of, 2:646
press conferences of, 2:506
surrogate campaign speeches for, 2:753
Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 and, 1:5, 2:556 Taiwan
debates in, 1:164
democratization process in, 1:179
high-context culture in, 1:338
Talk radio, political, 2:777–779 audience demographics and, 2:778 call-in format element of, 2:777
conservativism and, 2:777
content analysis of, 2:777
effects of, 2:778
emergent democracies and, 2:778 empirical study of, 2:777
humanistic study of, 2:777
Rush Limbaugh and, 1:29, 1:30, 1:113, 1:363, 1:406–407, 2:696
news sensationalism and, 1:126
1940, 1960 elections and, 2:777
1994 Congressional elections and, 1:333, 1:407, 2:712
1996 primaries and, 2:777
nominating conventions and, 1:138
parasocial political relationships and, 2:530–531
The People's Choice study of, 2:540–542, 2:777, 2:783
political knowledge from, 2:778
as a social force, 2:777
World War I, II and, 2:776
See also Fireside chats
Talk shows, television, 2:779–780
alternative media in politics and, 1:29–31, 1:333
Arsenio Hall, 1:27, 1:114, 1:155, 2:799
Hugo Chávez (Venezuela) and, 1:97
Bill Clinton on, 1:27, 1:147, 2:779
content analysis of, 2:780
Crossfire, 1:68, 1:88
effects of, 2:780
history of, 1:29
infotainment and, 1:335
The Jack Paar Show, 1:81
Larry King Live, 1:29, 1:333
Laugh In, 2:779
Rush Limbaugh and, 1:29, 1:30, 1:113
The McLaughlin Group, 1:68
1968 election and, 1:81
Richard Nixon on, 2:779 positive treatment on, 2:779
Geraldo Rivera and, 2:721
The Tonight Show and, 1:333, 2:737, 2:779
2000 election and, 2:780
viewer political feedings, behaviors and, 2:780
See also specific program
Tampa* Incident (ship), 2:780–781
Afghan refugees aboard, 2:781
"dog whistle politics" and, 2:781
Pauline Hanson and, 2:781
John Howard and, 2:781 populist cause and, 2:781
Tarbell, Ida, 2:473
Tarde, Gabriel, 1:368
Task Force on National Health Care Reform, 1:5, 1:110
Taxpayer bill of rights (TABOR), 1:1
Taylor, Paul, 1:259
TechnoDistortions, 2:781–782
computerized alterations in, 2:782 dramatizations used in, 2:782 editing techniques of, 2:781–782 1952 election television ads and, 2:781 special effects used in, 2:782
statistics regarding, 2:782
subliminal techniques in, 2:782
Ted Bates Agency, 1:204
Telecommunications Act of 1996, 1:28, 1:122
Telemarketing Sales Rule (TSR), 1:235
Televised Presidential Debates and Public Policy (Kraus), 1:385 Television, politics and
ad watch and, 1:8–10, 1:67
agenda setting and, 1:12, 1:15–16, 2:783
Al Jazeera television and, 1:23,* 1:23–25
Argentinean democratization process and, 1:22–23, 1:40 argumentation and, 1:42
balance of the news and, 2:498
ballot initiatives and, 1:51–52
Silvio Berlusconi (Italy) and, 1:54

bias in, 1:270, 1:362
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:58
J. G. Blumler and, 1:61–62
in Brazil, 1:66
British elections and, 1:61–62 broadcast alternative media and, 1:28–29
Bulgarian democratization and, 1:71
G. W. Bush and, 1:73–74
Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act and, 1:122
The Candidate film and, 1:79–80
children affected by, 1:148–150
civic decline and, 1:64
civil rights movement and, 1:333
CNN and, 1:28, 1:29, 1:114–115
Commander in Chief television drama and, 1:117
Communications Act of 1934 and, 1:120–122, 1:212
Communications Act of 1996 and, 1:122
Walter Cronkite and, 1:146
C-SPAN Network and, 1:147–148
cultivation theory and, 1:17, 1:148–150, 1:265–266
debates and, 1:81, 1:159–165
Deciding What's News (Gans) and, 1:166
decoupling of parties and society concept and, 1:157–158
Charles de Gaulle (France) and, 1:167
Eisenhower 1952 ad campaign and, 1:204–205, 1:205–206 (figures), 2:441, 2:546, 2:561, 2:628, 2:712 equal opportunity concept and, 1:212–213 equal time concept, 1:212–213, 2:420 European cross-border television regulation and, 1:221–222
exit poll projections and, 1:94, 2:622, 2:623, 2:624
free airtime and, 1:258–260
German unification and, 1:266–267
Glasgow Media Group and, 1:270
the Great Debates and, 1:284, 1:385
health care reform issue and, 1:5
information technology in politics and, 1:333–334
infotainment and, 1:335–336
Kennedy–Nixon debates (1960) and, 1:159, 1:160, 1:284, 1:333, 1:371, 1:385, 2:516, 2:546, 2:561, 2:742
knowledge gap and, 1:382–384
mass- and group-mediated politics and, 2:446–447
McCarthy hearings and, 1:243, 1:333, 2:424–425
The Mike Douglas Show and, 1:21 miseducation of voter and, 1:300
negative advertising and, 1:8, 1:72, 2:564–565
new populism and, 2:626
news source and, 2:506
Nielsen Designated Market Areas for, 1:260
1988 election and, 1:8, 1:72
Nixon 1968 campaign image and, 2:742
Nixon Checkers Speech and, 1:38, 1:97–98, 2:516, 2:712
party election broadcasts and (United Kingdom), 2:533–534
personalization of politics and, 2:546
political advertising and, 2:560, 2:564–565
political commentary and, 1:118
political disaffection and, 2:577–579
political satire and, 1:313–314
presidential televised addresses and, 2:636
press conferences and, 2:642–644 public communication decline and, 2:670 radio vs., 2:568
resonance theory and, 2:713–715
TechnoDistortion television ads and, 2:781
telepopulism and, 2:626
Television and the Presidency and, 1:21
Television in Politics (McQuail & Blumler) book and, 2:432, 2:782
Television Without Frontiers (TWF) Directive (European Union) and, 1:222–223
The Unseeing Eye (Patterson & McClure) and, 2:800
in Venezuela, 1:97
verbal content of political advertising and, 2:562–563
"videomalaise hypothesis" of television and, 1:309, 2:577–578, 2:580
Vietnam War and, 1:333
voter apathy and, 1:37
voting behavior impact and, 1:94
The War Room HBO documentary and, 1:88
Watergate scandal and, 1:333, 1:391, 2:712, 2:825–826
The West Wing, 1:114, 1:117, 1:335, 2:654, 2:835–836
Yes, Prime Minister, 1:335
See also Cable television, politics and; Talk shows, television; specific networks and programs
Television and the Presidency, 1:21
Television in Politics (Blumler & McQuail), 2:783
agenda-setting and, 2:783
British parliamentary election campaign focus of, 2:783
Party Election Broadcasts focus of, 2:783
The People's Choice (Lazarsfeld, Berelson, & Gaudet) and, 2:540–542, 2:783 three-wave panel design of, 2:783
Television Without Frontiers (TWF) Directive (European Union), 1:222–223
Terrorism and media, 2:783–787
Al Jazeera television and, 1:23, 1:24, 2:799
José María Aznar of Spain and, 1:47
Clinton administration and, 1:111
freedom of speech issue and, 1:273
Rudy Giuliani and, 1:269
Gary Hart expertise and, 1:298–299
Internet and, 2:573
London underground bombings, British media and, 2:786–787
Nelson Mandela as terrorist and, 2:784 media dilemmas and, 2:784 media events and, 2:442, 2:443, 2:784
Muhammed cartoon events and, 2:474–475
Northern Ireland: British media, domestic terrorism and, 2:784–785
Oklahoma City federal building bombing and, 2:785
Pan Am Flight 103 bombing and, 2:786
"patriotic" news coverage approach and, 2:786 September 11, 2001: U.S. media, international terrorism and, 2:784, 2:784,* 2:785–786 sympathy levels and, 2:784 terrorism defined and, 2:783
War on Terror and, 1:73–74, 2:612, 2:634, 2:785–786
War on Terrorism, political prisoners and, 2:612
Terry, Randall, 1:3

Testimonials, political, 2:787–788
analysis of, 2:787–788 campaign use of, 2:788
celebrities and, 2:787
editorials and, 1:198–199
endorsements intended to influence others and, 2:787
propaganda and, 2:787–788
Tewksbury, D., 1:255
Texas
abortion legislation in, 1:3
George W. Bush as Governor of, 1:73
Thatcher, Margaret, 2:788–789
books by, 2:789
Conservative Party and, 1:130, 2:788
Falklands-Malvinas War and, 1:228
Hong Kong and, 1:309
Bernard Ingram and, 1:130
labels regarding, 1:392–393
Labour Party and, 1:389
leadership style of, 2:788–789
1979 general election and, 2:604
Northern Ireland: British media, domestic terrorism and, 2:784–785
Parliamentary career of, 2:788
Gordon Reece and, 1:130
Theory of cognitive dissonance, 1:13, 2:740
Theory of newsworthiness, 2:511–513
Theory of salience transmission, 1:13, 1:408
Third-person effect, 2:789–790 behavioral components of, 2:790 characteristics of self, other and, 2:789
empirical research on, 2:789 media content regulation and, 2:789 media message features and, 2:789 perceptual components of, 2:789 self-other perceptual bias and, 2:789 theoretical frameworks of, 2:790
Thomas, Clarence nomination hearings of, 1:148
See also Hill–Thomas hearings
Thomas, Helen, 2:837*
Thompson, E. P., 1:152
Thousand-Points-of-Light speech (G. H. W. Bush), 1:72
Tiananmen Square movement
big-character posters in, 1:55
censorship and, 1:92
CNN and, 1:114
Deng Xiaoping and, 1:180–181
Tichenor, Philip, 1:383, 2:585
Ticket splitting, 2:790–792 divided partisan attachments and, 2:791 intra-institution ticket splitting and, 2:790–791 lopsided campaigns and, 2:791
party identification and, 2:535–538
political consequences of, 2:791 presidential, congressional split votes and, 2:791 sincere or affective ticket splitting and, 2:791 straight-ticket voting vs, 2:790 strategic decision making and, 2:791 voter confusion and, 2:791
Tillman Act of 1907, 1:5
Time magazine, 1:155
Deciding What's News (Gans) and, 1:166
Betty Ford and, 1:249
founding of, 2:501
Rudy Giuliani and, 1:269
Mikhail Gorbachev and, 1:278
light tone of, 2:501
"man of the year," women as, 2:844
Mohammed VI (Morocco) and, 2:468
"Person of the Year" feature of, 2:501 political information technology and, 1:332
Time Warner Company, 1:114
Tocqueville, Alexis de, 1:288
Today, 1:333
Tomlinson, John, 1:151
The Tonight Show (Carson), 2:779
The Tonight Show with Jay Leno, 1:333, 2:737, 2:779
Treaty of Rome, 1:220
Trent, Judith, 1:329, 2:570
Tripp, Linda, 1:113
Trippi, Joe, 2:792
Blog for America blog of, 2:792
MeetUp.com web site and, 2:792
The Revolution Will Not Be Televised and, 2:792
2004 Dean campaign and, 2:792
Trudeau, Gary, 1:313
True Path Party (TPP, Turkey), 1:104, 1:169
Truman, Harry S.
classification system and, 1:92
executive privilege and, 1:261
farewell speech of, 1:205
Guggenheim biographical film on, 1:290
inaugural address of, 1:328
military information classification system and, 1:261
1948 election and, 2:507
Nixon Checkers Speech and, 1:98
press conferences and, 2:506, 2:696
press secretary of, 2:646
public opinion moved by, 2:632
State of the Union Address of, 2:753
television addresses of, 2:754
Truman Doctrine, radio address and, 2:636
"You Never Had It So Good!" slogan of, 1:204
TSR (Telemarketing Sales Rule), 1:235
Tuchman, Gaye, 1:142, 2:454, 2:750
Tunisia
Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali and, 1:53–54
Abdelaziz Bouteflika and, 1:63–64 media control in, 1:53–54
Turkey
Tansu Çiller and, 1:104–105
Süleyman Demirel and, 1:168–169
Bülent Ecevit and, 1:197
Recep Tayyip Erdoğan and, 1:213, 2:804
European Union membership of, 1:220
Turgut Özal and, 2:525, 2:804
Cem Uzan and, 2:804
Turner, Ted, 1:114
Turner Broadcasting System, Inc., 1:115

Tversky, Amos, 1:255, 1:304–305
Twain, Mark, 1:313
20/20, 1:333, 2:721
25th Amendment
  Spiro Agnew and, 1:21
Twin Cities Daily Planet citizen journalism, 1:106
Two-step flow model of communication, 2:793–794
  agenda setting and, 1:19
  criticism of, 2:793–794
  The Effects of Mass Communication (Klapper) and, 2:793
  Doris Graber's work and, 2:656 limited effects paradigm and, 2:793
  mass political behavior and, 2:419, 2:541–542 opinion leaders concept and, 2:793, 2:813
  The People's Choice (Lazarsfeld, Berelson, & Gaudet) and, 2:793, 2:813
  Personal Influence (Katz & Lazarsfeld) and, 1:199, 1:349, 1:368, 1:400, 2:545–546, 2:793
  political leadership and, 2:602
  word-of-mouth information transmission and, 2:793

UCR (Radical Civic Union, Argentina), 1:22–23, 1:39–40
Underground media, 2:795
  Los Angels Free Press and, 2:795 of 1960s, 1970s, 2:795 online news resources and, 2:795 subject examples of, 2:795 Underground Press Syndicate and, 2:795
  Utne Reader magazine and, 2:795
UNESCO media policy, 2:796–798
  Communication in the Service of Man program of, 2:797 core programs of, 2:797
  cultural imperialism and, 1:151
  Declaration of Windhoek, Namibia and, 2:797 Declaration on Cultural Diversity and, 2:797 defense of peace focus of, 2:796 development to diversity focus transition and, 2:797 free flow of ideas in word and images principle of, 2:796
  Glasgow University Media (GUM) Unit and, 1:270 global media policy and, 2:796
  history of, 2:796
  International Convention on the Protection and Promotion of Cultural Expressions and, 2:797 media policy and, 2:796–797 membership composition and, 2:796
  new concept and, 2:797
  New World Information and Communication Order and, 2:796 recommendations, declarations, conventions and, 2:796 structural problems of, 2:797 World Culture Conference and, 2:797
  World War I, II and, 2:796
The Union of Democratic Forces (Bulgaria), 1:70–71
Unions, political activity, 2:798–799
  advocacy advertising and, 1:6
  AFL-CIO and, 2:559, 2:566, 2:798
  in Argentina, 2:542–543
  ballot initiatives and, 1:51
  Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and, 1:56–57, 2:427–428, 2:562
  in Bulgaria, 1:71
  campaign activities and, 2:798 campaign contributions and, 1:5, 1:233–234, 2:798 civic participation decline and, 1:54 collective bargaining power of, 2:798
  Democratic party and, 2:798
  "dues of disorder" media coverage and, 2:573 in Italy, 2:414
  legislation, issues information to members and, 2:798 National Relations Act of 1935 and, 2:798 objectives by union variation and, 2:798
  PACs and, 2:556–557
  political advertising by, 2:559, 2:566 political candidate endorsement and, 2:798
  public communication and, 2:798–799 service and public sectors and, 2:798
  Solidarity Movement (Poland) and, 1:386, 2:554–555, 2:751
  United Farm Workers and, 2:462
  in Venezuela, 1:97
United Farm Workers, 2:462
United Kingdom. See Great Britain
United Nations
  e-government defined by, 1:201
  e-participation defined by, 1:203
  Geraldine Ferraro ambassador of, 1:237
  Iraq sanctions of, 1:291
  Mandela's release and, 2:415
  UNESCO media policy and, 2:796–798
  World Summit on the Information Society (WSIS) and, 1:54, 1:186*
United States Information Agency (USIA), 2:799–800
  Al Jazeera and, 2:799
  candidate biographical films and, 1:83–85
  Cold War end and, 2:799
  Eisenhower administration and, 2:799 Fulbright Fellowships and, 2:799 global news networks and, 2:799 propaganda accusations regarding, 2:799 public diplomacy focus of, 2:799–800
  Radio Free Europe and, 2:799
  State Department merger with, 2:799
  Voice of America and, 2:799
Unseeing Eye, The (Patterson & McClure), 2:800
  mass communication study impact of, 2:800 1972 election, four-wave panel study of, 2:800 political knowledge from political ads and, 2:800 television impact on election outcomes focus of, 2:800 U.S. News and World Report college, university rankings in, 2:501 information technology and, 1:332 serious-mindedness of, 2:501
U.S. Taxpayer's Party, 1:68
USA Today, 1:332
Uses and gratifications approach, 2:800–804 audience motivations and, 2:801
  Jay Blumler's work and, 1:61–62, 2:432–433, 2:585, 2:802 central tenets of, 2:801 communications functions and, 1:395 contemporary relevance of, 2:803 cross-national validity of, 2:802–803 definition limitations of, 2:803

election Champaign studies and, 2:801–803
Doris Graber's work and, 2:656
The Handbook of Political Communication (Nimmo & Sanders) and, 1:295
Elihu Katz's work and, 1:368, 2:585, 2:801
knowledge gap and, 1:383
Denis McQuail's work and, 2:432, 2:802 methodological problems in, 2:803 1972 U.S. election and, 2:802
political information processing and, 2:585
"propaganda" model and, 2:801 receiving audience focus in, 2:800–801
structural-functionalism and, 2:801 television impact and, 2:802
Television in Politics (Blumler & McQuail) and, 2:432, 2:783
transactional model of additive media effects and, 2:802
The Uses of Literacy (Hoggart), 1:152
USIA. See United States Information Agency
Utopist states, 1:44
UWM Post v. Board of Regents of University of Wisconsin, 1:301
Uzan, Cem, 2:804 corruption of, 2:804 de facto broadcasting deregulation and, 2:804 Turgus Özal and, 2:804
Turkish private TV channel and, 2:804
Youth Party and, 2:804

Van Buren, Martin, 1:133
Van Deerlin, Lionel, 1:121–122
Vanderbilt Television News Archive, 2:805–806 cable news recordings and, 2:805
the collection of, 2:805 evening news shows collection of, 2:805
history of, 2:805–806
searchable database format of, 2:805
Paul Simpson founder of, 2:805 special news programs collection of, 2:805
U.S. National network news programs archive and, 2:805
Van Zoonen, E., 1:81
Vargas, Getulio, 2:806
Constitutional Government and, 2:806 deposition of, 2:806
economic policies of, 2:806
media relationships of, 2:806
New State dictator and, 2:806 populist ideas of, 2:806 radio tool used by, 2:806 three political periods of, 2:806
Velazquez, Nydia, 2:463
Venezuela
Fidel Castro and, 1:90, 1:97
censorship in, 1:97
Hugo Chávez's presidency in, 1:96–97
Evo Morales (Bolivia) and, 2:470 political television activities in, 1:97 union political activity in, 1:97
Ventura, Jesse, 1:334, 2:706
Verba, S., 2:576–577, 2:580, 2:582
Verbal style, 2:806–807
activity, certainty, optimism, realism elements and, 2:807
DICTION speech analysis program and, 2:807 election winner prediction using, 2:807 heuristic value inherent in, 2:807
presidential debates and, 2:807
Vibbert, Stephen, 1:353, 1:354
Vico, Giambattista, 1:133
Video games, political, 2:807–808
activist games and, 2:808 adolescent gun fantasies and, 2:807–808 military war games and, 2:808 moral panic, violence and, 2:807–808 online multiplayer games and, 2:808 political activist games and, 2:808 specific games of, 2:808 watercoolergames.com forum and, 2:808
"Videomalaise hypothesis" , of television
Christina Holtz-Bacha and, 1:309
political disaffection and, 2:577–578
political efficacy and, 2:580
A Virtuous Circle (Norris) and, 2:810
Videostyle, 2:808–810
coding instrument of, 2:809 early style studies and, 2:809
gender factors and, 2:810
impression management and, 1:326–327
incumbency vs. challenger factors and, 2:809–810
international studies of, 2:810
The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life (Goffman) and, 2:630–631 television production techniques and, 2:563–564, 2:809 verbal, nonverbal, production elements of, 2:809, 2:832 verbal content analysis and, 2:562–563, 2:808–809
Videostyle in Presidential Campaigns (L. L. Kaid & A. Johnston) and, 1:326, 1:367, 2:809
Webstyle and, 2:832
women candidate advertising and, 2:841
Vietnam War
Spiro Agnew and, 1:21
Australian mass nonviolent protest against, 2:418
censorship during, 1:92
Shirley Chisholm and, 1:102
Communism and, 1:123
Walter Cronkite and, 1:146
groupthink policy-making errors in, 1:289
Fred Harris and, 1:298
L B. Johnson and, 1:358, 1:359, 2:589, 2:753*
Robert F. Kennedy and, 1:372
John Kerry and, 1:6, 1:7, 1:340, 1:364, 1:377, 2:547–548, 2:808
*M*A*S*H (Altman, Dir.) and, 1:241 media, public agendas and, 1:15, 1:291, 1:294, 1:333
My Lai massacre and, 2:474
New York Times v. U.S. (Pentagon Papers) and, 1:92, 2:507, 2:513–514, 2:540, 2:644, 2:824
1968 nominating convention and, 1:136
political journalism and, 1:360
pooled journalism and, 2:625, 2:644
Viguerie, Richard, 2:494
Virgin Earth Competition, 1:279

Virtuous Circle, A (Norris), 2:810–811 control loop of mutual strengthening processes and, 2:810, 2:811 effect theory and, 2:810 mutual positive correlations in, 2:811 political disaffection and, 2:578 vicious circle opposite and, 2:811
videomalaise theory and, 2:810
VNS. See Voter News Service
VOA. See Voice of America
Voice of America (VOA), 2:811, 2:811–812 balanced news coverage goal of, 2:810–811
Cold War and, 2:764
criticism of, 2:811
Joseph Klapper research on, 1:382
Edward R. Murrow and, 2:811
Radio Free Europe and, 2:697, 2:698
Solidarity Movement (Poland) and, 2:554
United States Information Agency and, 2:799–800, 2:811
Voice of San Diego citizen journalism, 1:106 von Foerster, Heinz, 1:131
Voter behavior, 2:812–817
age factors and, 1:37, 2:420
Americanization and, 1:32
The American Voter (Campbell, Miller, Converse, & Stokes) and, 1:35–36, 2:419, 2:581, 2:766, 2:815
apathy, voter and, 1:36–37, 2:592–593
ballot initiatives and, 1:50–52 candidate films and, 1:85 candidate personality attributes and, 1:81
Candidates and Their Images (Nimmo & Savage) and, 1:85
Center for the Study of the American Electorate and, 1:94–95
cleavage theory and, 2:814
dealignment and, 1:156–158, 2:657
declining motivation causes and, 1:95
direct mail and, 1:191
An Economic Theory of Democracy (Downs) and, 2:419, 2:815–816 female voting bloc and, 1:263–264 game of politics effects on, 1:34–35 get-out-the-vote contact and, 1:283, 2:420
grassroots lobbying and, 1:283
heuristics in political decision making and, 1:304–305
intergenerational value change and, 1:287 interpersonal political communication affects on, 1:347
Langs' work on, 1:390
macrosociological model of, 2:813–814
mass political behavior and, 2:419–421
media dependency theory and, 1:181–182
microsociological model of, 2:813
minority voting statistics and, 2:463
negative advertising, campaigning and, 2:421, 2:486, 2:488, 2:564–565 news reports of advertising messages and, 1:9 of older adults, 1:19–20
party identification and, 2:535–538
The People's Choice (Lazarsfeld) book and, 1:199, 1:400, 2:540–542, 2:783, 2:813
The People's Choice study, 1:419–420, 2:540–542, 2:783
political advertising and, 2:564–565
political engagement and, 2:580–583 political images and, 1:322–325
political information efficacy and, 2:583–584
priming and, 2:654–655
rational voter model of, 2:815–816 social conflict and, 2:814 sociopsychological model of, 2:814–815 socio-structural variables and, 2:813
ticket splitting and, 2:790–792
The Voter Decides (Campbell) and, 2:814
See also Apathy, voter; Dealignment; Get-out-the-vote campaigns; Grassroots campaigning; Mass political behavior; Youth voting
Voter News Service (VNS), 2:817
Murray Edelman and, 2:817
exit poll data collection and, 2:817
National Election Poll and, 2:817
2000 election controversy and, 2:817
2002 midterm election and, 2:817
2004 election and, 2:817
2006 midterm election and, 2:817
Votes, voters, voting. See Apathy, voter; Mass political behavior; Voter behavior; Youth voting
Voting Rights Act, 1:95, 1:109,* 2:462, 2:463, 2:479, 2:634, 2:694
Vranitzky, Franz, 2:818
broken election promises and, 2:818
domestic policies of, 2:818
European Union membership and, 2:818
Jörg Haider and, 1:294
Wolfgang Schüssel and, 2:735
Kurt Waldheim and, 2:818

Wag the Dog (Levinson, Dir.), 1:114, 1:242, 2:633
Waldheim affair, 2:819–820
Austrian anti-Semitism and, 2:819
Jörg Haider and, 2:819
U.S. Watch List and, 2:819
Franz Vranitzky and, 2:818
war crimes allegations and, 2:819 Wałesa, Lech, 2:820 arrest, imprisonment of, 2:820
Aleksander Kwaśniewski and, 1:386, 1:387
Nobel Peace Prize to, 2:555, 2:820 non-communist coalition government and, 2:820
Poland transition under, 2:820
Solidarity Movement and, 2:552–553, 2:554–555, 2:751, 2:820
Wallace, George, 2:820–821
Alabama governor and, 2:821
1968 election and, 1:371, 2:477, 2:516, 2:695, 2:821 populist rhetoric of, 2:821 segregation and, 2:739,* 2:820–821
Wallas, Graham, 1:389
Wang Dongxing, 1:101
Wang Hongwen, 1:101
WAPOR. See World Association for Public Opinion Research
War and Peace News (Glasgow Media Group), 1:270
War coverage, 2:821–823
British war propaganda and, 2:441 changes in over time and, 2:822

"CNN effect" and, 1:114–115, 1:273
definitions regarding, 2:821
embedded journalists and, 1:211, 1:352, 2:721, 2:822
empirical research on, 2:822
Falklands-Malvinas War and, 1:228
news media independence during wars and, 2:573 objective reporting focus of, 2:821–822 peace journalism and, 2:822
pooled journalism and, 2:624–625, 2:644
propaganda and, 2:658
secrecy of security information and, 2:822 17th-century press and, 2:821 of Vietnam War, 1:291, 1:333
War on Terror and, 1:73–74, 2:612, 2:634, 2:635
See also Gulf War, media coverage of; Iraq War, media coverage of; Propaganda; Terrorism and media; Video games, political; Vietnam War
Ware, B. L., 1:38
Warner, John, 1:9
Warner, Mark, 1:9
War of the Worlds, The (radio play), 1:107, 2:823–824
authenticity impression of, 2:823
Princeton Radio Research Project and, 2:823 variance in reactions to, 2:823
Orson Welles and, 2:823
Warren, Earl, 1:374
Warren Commission, 1:374
The War Room HBO documentary, 1:88
Warson, David S., 2:572
Washington, George
Farewell Address of, 2:635, 2:754
inaugural address of, 1:328
media used by, 2:632
speech writers for, 2:754
State of the Union Address of, 2:753, 2:761
Thanksgiving holiday proclamation of, 2:637
Washington, Martha, 1:247
Washington Post, The*, 2:824
All the President's Men Pulitzer Prize and, 1:26, 2:824
David Broder journalist for, 1:8, 1:67–68
Congressional pay increase and, 1:125
Janet Cooke scandal and, 2:453
Elizabeth Dole campaign coverage by, 2:847 elite press trend setting by, 2:515, 2:824
growth of, 2:506
Stilson Hutchins and, 2:824
Monica Lewinsky scandal and, 1:113
liberal bias of, 2:824 metacoverage in, 2:452
Pentagon Papers and, 2:540, 2:824
political information technology and, 1:332
public journalism criticized by, 2:674
See also Watergate
Watergate, 2:824–826
All the President's Men and, 1:26
apologia and, 1:38
campaign finance reform after, 1:56
Congressional media coverage affected by, 1:125
John Connally and, 1:129
Creating Reality (Altheide) and, 1:142
Federal Election Campaign Act and, 1:233
Gerald Ford and, 1:249–250
journalism role in, 2:825 media feeding frenzy on, 2:444
New York Times and, 2:825–826
Nixon enemy list and, 2:826
Nixon impeachment, resignation and, 2:824, 2:825
Nixon self-defense apologia and, 2:633 political journalism and, 1:360
public esteem and, 1:262
television coverage of, 1:333, 1:391, 2:825–826 television investigative news shows and, 2:825
Woodward and Bernstein investigative reporters and, 2:825
Watts, J. C., 2:826–827
charisma, leadership skills of, 2:826
conservativism of, 2:826 football career of, 2:826
political career of, 2:826 political consultantancy of, 2:827
Watts riots, 2:827
civil rights demonstrations and, 2:827 Marquette Frye's arrest and, 2:827 media conflicting depictions of, 2:827 police brutality and, 2:827
War on Poverty program and, 2:827
The Way Things Ought to Be (Limbaugh), 1:407
WBC, Inc. (William Berry Campaigns), 1:79
Weaver, David H., 2:827–828
academic career of, 2:828
The American Journalist in the 21st Century and, 2:828 media agenda setting work of, 2:827–828 need for orientation concept of, 1:12, 2:828 professional achievements of, 2:828
Webb, Sidney, 1:389
Web campaigning, 2:828–831
Advanced Research Projects Agency Network and, 2:829 advertising analysis need and, 1:363
banner ads and, 1:52–53
David Cameron and, 1:82
candidate-centered communication and, 1:81
characteristics of, 2:828–829
citizen involvement, mobilizing and, 2:830–831
Howard Dean use of, 2:829–830, 2:851 decentralizing dynamic of, 2:829
definitions regarding, 2:828
history of, 2:829–830
issue advocacy and, 2:831
Mosaic web browser and, 2:829
1996 election and, 1:334, 2:829
pre-Web Internet and, 2:829 production practices of, 2:829 production technology advancements and, 2:830–831 sociopolitical contexts of, 2:828–829
trends in, 2:830–831
2000 election and, 2:829
2004 election and, 2:829–830
Usenet and, 2:829
webstyle and, 2:831–833
See also World Wide Web, political uses
Weber, Marx, 1:172, 2:601, 2:605

Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 1:3
Webstyle, 2:831–833
controllability of, 2:831
definition of, 2:831
mixed gender races and, 2:832–833
2000 election and, 2:832
verbal, nonverbal, production, interactive elements of, 2:832
Videostyle and, 2:832
Weed, Thurlow, 1:285
The Week news magazine, 2:502
Welfare policy, 2:833–834
Aid to Families with Dependent Children and, 2:833 class, gender, race factors in, 2:833
Clinton legislation regarding, 2:833–834 controversial history of, 2:833
New Deal, Social Security and, 2:833
Welles, Orson, 1:107–108, 2:823
Wellstone, Paul, 2:834
"conscience of the Senate" reputation of, 2:834 grassroots campaign of, 2:834 legislative record of, 2:834
West Wing, The*, 2:835–836
awards received by, 2:835
cast of, 2:835
Commander In Chief and, 1:117 creative consultants of, 2:836 crises, issues plotlines of, 2:835
criticisms of, 2:835–836
9/11 special episode of, 2:835 president, presidency portrayed in, 1:114, 1:335 priming effects of, 2:654
progressivism of, 2:836
Aaron Sorkin and, 2:835 women, minorities depicted in, 2:835–836 Whig Party
Henry Clay and, 2:627
1840 election and, 2:627
Horace Greeley and, 1:285
Party Press era and, 2:538–539
Whitaker, Clem, 1:133
White, David Manning, 2:510
White, Ryan, 1:185
White House press corps, 2:836–837 confidentiality, off-the-record issues and, 2:837 spin and, 2:837
technology and, 2:837
White House Correspondents' Association and, 2:837
White House Web site and, 2:837
Whitman, Christine Todd, 1:87
Whittaker, Clem, 2:441
Whorf, Benjamin Lee, 1:132
Why We Fight film (Capra, Dir., World War II), 1:232, 1:239, 1:360, 2:746–747
Why We Fight film (Jarecki, Dir., Iraq War), 1:243
Wikinews.org, 1:106
Wilder, Douglas L., 1:9
Wilkie, Wendell, 2:541, 2:777
Will, George, 2:838
awards received by, 2:838
newspaper career of, 2:838 political theory work of, 2:838 syndicated newspaper columnist and, 2:838 television commentary career of, 2:838
William Berry Campaigns (WBC, Inc.), 1:79
Williams, Raymond, 1:152
Willie Horton ad, 2:838–839
Americans for Bush and, 2:839
G. H. W. Bush political ad and, 2:838–839
Michael Dukakis, negative advertising effects and, 1:194, 2:485, 2:561, 2:567, 2:695, 2:838–839
Massachusetts weekend furlough program and, 2:839
Larry McCarthy author of, 2:839 racism allegations of, 2:839
"Revolving Door" analogy of, 2:839
Willkie, Wendell, 1:408
Wilson, Edith, 1:246, 1:247
Wilson, Harold, 2:839–840
economic policies of, 2:840
Labour Party (Great Britain) and, 1:130, 1:389, 2:839–840 media impact of, 2:839–840
"New Britain" program of, 1:389
Wilson, Woodrow, 1:90 motive force of presidency and, 2:631
press conferences and, 2:506
press corps and, 2:837
press secretary of, 2:646
State of the Union Address of, 2:635, 2:753, 2:761, 2:762 war propaganda and, 2:660 Wirthlin, Richard, 1:31
Wittgenstein, Ludwig, 1:193
Wolfsfeld, Gadi, 2:840–841
Israeli-Palestinian conflict focus of, 2:840 political contest model and, 2:840, 2:841 politics media politics model and, 2:841 role of media in conflict and, 2:840 role of media in peace processes and, 2:840–841 Women and politics
abortion issue and, 1:2–3
affirmative action and, 1:10–11
Laura Bush health program work and, 1:74–75
Carrie Chapman Catt Center for Women and Politics and, 1:86–87
Commander in Chief television drama and, 1:117
Democratic Party and, 1:175
female candidates and, 1:263
female voters and, 1:263
feminist movement and, 1:236, 1:288
Hill–Thomas hearings and, 1:306–307
Barbara Jordan political career and, 1:359
Condoleezza Rice and, 2:719–720
Ann Richards and, 2:720–721
Eleanor Roosevelt and, 2:723–724
Patricia Schroeder and, 2:733–734
Margaret Thatcher and, 2:788–789
See also Women candidates, advertising; Women candidates, news coverage
Women candidates, advertising, 2:841–844 appeal strategies of, 2:842–843 candidate-controlled television ads and, 2:841 character attacks and, 2:842

Hillary Rodham Clinton and, 1:110
Elizabeth Dole and, 1:190–191
family, children and, 2:843
feminine communication style and, 1:235–236
gender differences and, 2:841–842
images, traits emphasis and, 2:842
Carol Moseley Braun and, 2:470
negative advertising and, 1:264, 2:485, 2:565, 2:841–842, 2:843 1980s social issues and, 2:841
1990s to present and, 2:841 nonverbal communication and, 2:841, 2:843 party affiliation, election outcome gender differences and, 2:843 production content and, 2:843 social stereotypes and, 2:843 stereotypic female issues and, 2:842, 2:844 verbal communication strategies and, 2:842
Videostyle analysis and, 2:841
videostyle and, 2:810
See also Negative advertising; Political advertising; Women and politics; Women candidates, news coverage; specific candidate, politician

Women candidates, news coverage, 2:844–848
"agents of change," Congressional women as, 2:844–845
Michelle Bachelet Jeria (Chile) and, 1:49–50
Kathlee Blanco and, 2:846 campaign theme gender differences and, 2:846 candidate message and coverage disconnect and, 2:846
Carrie Chapman Catt Center for Women and Politics and, 1:86–87
Shirley Chisholm and, 1:102–103
Tansu Çiller (Turkey) and, 1:104–105
Hillary RodhamClinton and, 2:845, 2:845*
conclusions regarding, 2:847–848
content of coverage and, 2:845
Elizabeth Dole presidential campaign and, 1:190–191, 2:846–847 dominance of men in the newsroom and, 2:844 gender stereotypical coverage of, 1:264, 2:845–846 Christine Gregoire and, 2:846 issue stereotypes and, 2:846 marital status focus and, 2:845
National Organization for Women and, 1:3, 1:236, 2:845* negative coverage and, 2:845 scarcity of women newsmakers and, 2:844 trait stereotypes and, 2:845–846
See also Women and politics; Women candidates, advertising; specific candidate, politician

Women's Equity Action League and, 1:236
Woodward, Bob, 1:26, 1:125, 2:516, 2:689, 2:825–826
Woodward, Gary C., 1:181 World Association for Public Opinion Research election supervision projects and goals of, 2:848

World Association for Public Opinion Research (WAPOR), 2:848–849
Wolfgang Donsbach and, 1:192, 2:849 freedom to conduct, publish polls and, 2:848
goals of, 2:848
public opinion theory, research and, 2:849 survey researcher association and, 2:848 weekly journal of, 2:849

World Bank, 1:201
World Trade Organization
China and, 1:99
as global player, 1:271

World Wide Web, political uses, 2:849–852
ad watch and, 1:9–10
agenda mending and, 1:12
banner ads and, 1:52–53
blogging and, 2:849, 2:850–851
campaign web sites and, 1:29, 2:850, 2:851
citizen journalism and, 1:105–106
Congressional Web pages and, 1:126
cybernationalism and, 1:153–154
DebateWatch results and, 1:165
digital divide and, 1:186–187
digital information relay standards and, 2:849 discussion and, 2:849, 2:850–851
Environmental Defense Fund and, 2:851
E-thepeople.org and, 2:850
Google groups and, 2:850
"hactivism" and, 2:851
HTML encoding standards and, 2:849
Huffington Post Web site and, 1:146, 1:258
Hypertext Markup Language (HTML) and, 2:849
Hypertext Transfer Protocol (HTTP) standards and, 2:849 information dissemination and, 2:849, 2:850 mobilization and, 2:849, 2:851
nominating conventions and, 1:138
parody sites and, 2:851 political activism and, 2:849, 2:851–852 political conversation and, 2:850–851 political gossip on, 1:83
Slashdot.org and, 2:850 social organizations use of, 2:850, 2:851 Syria and, 1:22
trends in, 2:851–852
Joe Trippi and, 2:792
2000 election and, 2:851
Uniform Resource Locator (URL) naming convention and, 2:849
Usenet, 2:850
Yahoo! chat and, 2:850
See also Blogs, blogging; Web campaigning

Wring, Dominic, 1:82
WSIS (World Summit on the Information Society, United Nations), 1:54, 1:186*
Wygant v. Jackson Board of Education, 1:11

Yahoo, 1:99
Yao Wenyuan, 1:101
Yassine, Abdessalam, 2:853–854
cassettes, video media of, 2:853 imprisonment of, 2:853
Internet used by, 2:853
podcasting by, 2:853

Yellow journalism, 2:854
of W. R. Hearst, 1:302,* 1:303, 2:505, 2:776, 2:854 modern sensationalism and, 2:775, 2:854

New York Journal and, 2:854
New York World and, 2:775, 2:854
political satire and, 1:313
Joseph Pulitzer and, 2:505, 2:775, 2:854
tabloids and, 2:776
Yellow Kid comic strip and, 2:854
Yeltsin, Boris, 2:854–855
Chechnya invasion and, 2:855
Commonwealth of Independent States and, 2:855
early career of, 2:854
economic policies of, 2:855
free election of, 2:854
glosnost, perestroika policies of, 2:854–855
Mikhail Gorbachev and, 1:278, 2:854–855
Nikita Khrushchev and, 1:378
media relationship of, 2:855
1996 election media coverage and, 2:727
Vladimir Putin and, 2:686, 2:727, 2:854
resignation of, 2:854, 2:855
Russia's democratization, free-market economy and, 2:854
Yes, Prime Minister political satire TV program, 1:335
You Are There news program, 1:146
Youth voting, 2:855–856
Center for the Study of the American Electorate and, 1:94–95
Steven Chaffee's work in, 1:96
Bill Clinton and, 1:37
18- to 24-year-old voting behavior and, 2:855 gender and education factors of, 2:856
get-out-the-vote campaigns and, 1:283
Internet as political knowledge source and, 2:596
Kids Voting USA and, 1:96, 1:380
minority youth vote and, 2:463 MySpace, Facebook and, 2:491–492, 2:493 organizations to foster, 2:856
Pay Attention and Vote and, 2:747
political information efficacy and, 2:583
political socialization and, 2:616–620
Rock the Vote and, 2:721–722, 2:747, 2:856
Saturday Night Live and, 2:731
social marketing and, 2:747–748
trends in, 2:581, 2:855–856
trends in, international, 2:856
2004 election and, 2:856
U.S. Census Bureau measure of, 2:855
voter apathy and, 1:37
See also Political socialization
YouTube, 2:492, 2:550

Zapruder Film, 1:374
Zhang Chunqiao, 1:101
Zhelev, Zhelyu, 2:857–858
academic career of, 2:857
Balkan Political Club and, 2:857
Bulgarian democratization and, 1:71, 2:857
Liberal International and, 2:857
Union of Democratic Forces and, 2:857
Todor Zhivkov and, 2:857
Zhivkov, Todor, 2:858
Bulgarian Communist Party and, 2:858
communism building goal of, 2:858
Regeneration Process and, 2:858
Zhelyu Zhelev and, 2:857
Ziegler, Ron, 2:647
Zine publications, 2:669
Zukin, Cliff, 1:295
Zuniga, Markos Moulitsas, 1:29–30