ENCYCLOPEDIA OF POLITICAL COMMUNICATION

Volume 1 & 2

LYNDA LEE KAID

CHRISTINA HOLTZ-BACHA

Encyclopedia of Political Communication

Encyclopedia of Political Communication

Volume 1

Lynda Lee Kaid
University of Florida

Christina Holtz-Bacha
University of Erlangen-Nürnberg

A SAGE Reference Publication

Copyright © 2008 by SAGE Publications, Inc.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced or utilized in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

For information:

SAGE Publications, Inc.
2455 Teller Road
Thousand Oaks, California 91320
E-mail: order@sagepub.com

SAGE Publications Ltd.
1 Oliver's Yard
55 City Road
London EC1Y 1SP
United Kingdom

SAGE Publications India Pvt. Ltd.
B 1/I 1 Mohan Cooperative Industrial Area
Mathura Road, New Delhi 110 044
India

SAGE Publications Asia-Pacific Pte. Ltd.
33 Pekin Street #02-01
Far East Square
Singapore 048763

Printed in the United States of America.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Encyclopedia of political communication / editors, Lynda Lee Kaid and Christina Holtz-Bacha.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 978-1-4129-1799-5 (cloth)
1. Communication in politics—Encyclopedias. I. Kaid, Lynda Lee. II. Holtz-Bacha, Christina.

JA85.E65 2008
320.01´4—dc22 2007026514

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

07 08 09 10 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Publisher: Rolf A. Janke
Acquisitions Editor: Todd R. Armstrong
Developmental Editor: Sara Tauber
Reference Systems Manager: Leticia Gutierrez
Production Editor: Tracy Buyan
Typesetter: C&M Digitals (P) Ltd.
Proofreaders: Colleen Brennan, Anne Rogers
Indexer: Julie Sherman Grayson
Cover Designer: Janet Foulger
Marketing Manager: Amberlyn Erzinger

Contents

Editorial Board vi

List of Entries vii

Reader's Guide xvii

About the Editors xxvii

Contributors xxviii

Introduction xxxviii

Acknowledgments xli

Entries

Volume 1: A–L

1–412

Volume 2: M–Z

413–858

Index I-1–I-88

Editorial Board

Editors

Lynda Lee Kaid
University of Florida

Christina Holtz-Bacha
University of Erlangen-Nürnberg

Advisory Board

Professor Doris A. Graber
Department of Political Science
University of Illinois at Chicago

Professor Maxwell E. McCombs
Department of Journalism
University of Texas

Professor Emeritus Kathleen J. M. Haynes
School of Library and Information Studies
University of Oklahoma

Professor Robert E. Denton, Jr.
W. Thomas Rice Chair and Director
Rice Center for Leader Development and Corps of Cadets Center for Leadership Development
Virginia Tech University

Professor Denis McQuail
Department of Politics
University of Southampton

List of Entries

AARP
Abdullah II
Abortion
Adenauer, Konrad
Advocacy Advertising
Ad Watch
Affirmative Action
AFL-CIO. See Unions, Political Activity
Agenda Building. See Agenda Setting
Agenda Melding
Agenda Setting
Aging and Politics
Agnew, Spiro
Ailes, Roger
Al-Asad, Hafiz
Alfonsín, Raúl
Al Jazeera Television
Allende, Salvador
All the President's Men
Al-Sadat, Anwar
Alternative Media in Politics
American Association of Political Consultants
American Association of Retired Persons. See AARP
Americanization
American-Style Campaigning
American Voter, The Apartheid. See Mandela, Nelson
Apathy, Voter
Apologia
Arafat, Yasser
Arendt, Hannah. See Public Communication in Politics
Argentina Democratization Process, Role of the Media
Argumentation, Political
Aristotle
Attack Advertising. See Negative Advertising
Authoritarianism
Aznar, José María

Bachelet Jeria, Michelle
Ballot Initiatives
Banner Ads
Ben Ali, Zine el-Abidine
Bennett, W. Lance. See News, The Politics of Illusion
Berlusconi, Silvio
Bernstein, Carl. See Watergate
Biased Assimilation. See Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory
Big-Character Posters, China
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act
Blair, Tony
Blogs, Blogging
Blumler, Jay G.
Bork, Robert. See Supreme Court and the Media
Bormann, Ernest
Bouteflika, Abdelaziz
Bowling Alone
Brady, James. See Press Secretary, White House
Brandt, Willy
Brazil, Media and the Political System
Broder, David
Buchanan, Patrick
Buckley v. Valeo
Bulgaria, Democratization
Burke, Kenneth. See Dramatistic Approaches to Political Communication
Bush, George H. W.

Bush, George W.
Bush, Laura
Bush–Rather Confrontation

Campaign Finance
Campaigns & Elections Magazine
Candidate, The
Candidate-Centered Communication
Candidate Films, Biographical
Candidates and Their Images
Canvassing. See Grassroots Campaigning
Cardoso, Fernando Henrique
Carrie Chapman Catt Center for Women and Politics
Cartoons, Political
Carville, James
Castro, Fidel
Celebrities in Politics
Censorship, Political
Center for the Study of the American Electorate
Chaffee, Steven H.
Chappaquiddick. See Kennedy, Edward (Ted)
Chávez, César. See Minorities, Role in Politics
Chávez, Hugo
Chechen Conflict, Russian. See Russia, Democratization and Media
Checkers Speech
China, Media and Politics in Chinese Cultural Revolution
Chirac, Jacques
Chisolm, Shirley
Christian, George. See Press Secretary, White House
Churchill, Sir Winston
Cicero. See Rhetoric, Political
Çiller, Tansu
Citizen Journalism
Citizen Kane
Civic Engagement. See Political Engagement
Civic Journalism. See Public Journalism
Civil Rights Movement
Clinton, Hillary Rodham
Clinton, William Jefferson
CNN (Cable News Network)
Coburg-Gotha, Simeon Saxe
Collor de Mello, Fernando
Comejo, Peter. See Nader, Ralph
Commander in Chief
Commentary, Political
Commercial Speech. See Federal Trade Commission
Commission on Presidential Debates
Communications Act of 1934
Communism
Comparing Media Systems
Congress and the Media
Connally, John
Conservative, Conservatism
Conservative Party, Britain
Constructivism
Consultants, Political
Content Analysis. See Methodology
Contract with America. See Gingrich, Newt Conventions, Political Council of Europe, Media Policy
Creating Reality
Critical Theory
Cronkite, Walter
Crosstalk
C-SPAN Network
Cuban Missile Crisis. See Kennedy, John F.; Stevenson, Adlai
Cultivation Theory
Cultural Imperialism
Cultural Studies
Cybernationalism

Daily Show, The Daisy Girl Ad
Dealignment
Dean, Howard
Debates
DebateWatch
Deciding What's News
Defamation of Character. See Libel
de Gaulle, Charles
Deliberation
Deliberative Democracy. See Group Decision, Political; Public Communication in Politics
Demirel, Süleyman
Democracy Theories
Democratic Engagement. See Political Engagement
Democratic National Committee

Democratic Party
Democratization, Role of the Media in Demography
Deng Xiaoping
Denton, Robert E., Jr.
Dependency Theory, Media
Dewey, John. See Public Communication in Politics
Diffusion of Innovations
Digital Divide
Direct Action Protest, Australia
Direct Democracy
Direct Mail
Dole, Elizabeth
Dole, Robert
Donsbach, Wolfgang
Downs, Anthony. See Mass Political Behavior
Dramatistic Approaches to Political Communication
Dukakis, Michael

Eagleton, Thomas. See McGovern, George
Ecevit, Bülent
Economic Theory of Democracy, An. See Mass Political Behavior
Edelman, Murray
Editorials
Effects of Mass Communication, The
E-Government
Eisenhower, Dwight D.
Electoral Systems
E-Mail, Political Uses
Embedded Journalists
Endorsements, Political. See Testimonials, Political Entman, Robert
Equal Time Provision
Erdoğan, Recep Tayyip
Eurobarometer
European Association of Political Consultants
European Commission
European Convention on Human Rights
European Court of Justice
European Parliament
European Parliamentary Elections
European Union
European Union, Media Policy
E-Voting
Experimental Studies. See Methodology

Face-to-Face Communication. See Interpersonal Communication
Fahrenheit 9/11. See Film and Politics
Fairness Doctrine
Falklands-Malvinas War
Fantasy Theme Analysis
Fear Appeals, Use in Politics
Federal Communications Commission. See Communications Act of 1934
Federal Election Campaign Act
Federal Election Commission. See Campaign Finance; Federal Election Campaign Act
Federal Trade Commission
Feminine Style in Communication
Feminist Movement
Feminist Theory. See Feminist Movement
Ferraro, Geraldine
Film and Politics
Fireside Chats
First Amendment
First Ladies, Political Communication of
Fitzwater, Marlin. See Press Secretary, White House
Fleischer, Ari
Focus Groups
Ford, Betty
Ford, Gerald
Four Theories of the Press
Fourth Estate, Media as
Fox, Vicente
Fox News
Framing
Franken, Al
Free Airtime
Freedom Forum Media Studies Center
Freedom of Information
Freedom of Information Act. See Freedom of Information
Freedom of the Press. See Press Freedom
Fundraising. See Campaign Finance

Gallup Polls. See Polls
Gandhi, Indira
Gatekeeping. See News Selection Process
Gender and Politics
Gender Gap. See Gender and Politics

Gerbner, George
German Unification, Role of the Media
Gingrich, Newt
Giscard d'Estaing, Valéry
Giuliani, Rudy
Glasgow Media Group
Glasnost. See Russia, Democratization and Media
Globalization
Goebbels, Joseph
Goffman, Erving. See Presentation of Self in Everyday Life, The Goldwater, Barry
González Márquez, Felipe
Gorbachev, Mikhail
Gore, Albert
Government Communication
Graber, Doris A.
Graduate School of Political Management
Graham, Katherine. See Watergate
Grassroots Campaigning
Great Debates, The Greeley, Horace
Green Party
Group Decision Making, Political
Groupthink in Politics. See Group Decision Making, Political Guggenheim, Charles
Gulf War, Media Coverage of
Gurevitch, Michael. See Uses and Gratifications Approach

Habermas, Jürgen. See Public Sphere
Hagerty, James C. See Press Secretary, White House
Haider, Jörg
Hallin, Daniel C.
Handbook of Political Communication, The
Hanson, Pauline
Hard Money. See Federal Election Campaign Act
Hard News
Harris, Fred
Hart, Gary
Hart, Roderick P.
Hassan II, King
Hate Speech
Havel, Václav
Hearst, William Randolph
Helsinki Process
Heuristics in Political Decision Making
Hill, Anita. See Hill–Thomas Hearings
Hill–Thomas Hearings
Hitler, Adolf
Holtz-Bacha, Christina
Hong Kong Handover
Horserace Coverage
Horton, Willie. See Willie Horton Ad
Hostile Media Effect
Humor in Politics
Humphrey, Hubert H.
Hungary, Communication and Politics
Hussein I, King

Ideology
Image, Political
Image, The
Impression Management
Inaugural Addresses, Presidential Incumbent, Incumbency
Indexing Theory
Information, Political. See Infotainment; Political Knowledge
Information Flow, Global
Information Society
Information Technology in Politics
Infotainment
Inoculation, Political
Intercultural Communication, Dimensions
Interest Groups in Politics
Internet in Politics. See World Wide Web, Political Uses
Interpersonal Communication
Iowa Caucuses
Iraq War, Media Coverage of Isocrates. See Rhetoric, Political Issue Management
Issue Ownership
Issues, Policy. See Mass Political Behavior
Issues in Campaigns. See Mass Political Behavior

Jackson, Jesse
Jamieson, Kathleen Hall
Johnson, Lyndon B.

Jordan, Barbara
Journalism, Political

Kaid, Lynda Lee
Kapital, Das. See Marx, Karl
Katz, Elihu
Kekkonen, Urho
Kennedy, Edward (Ted)
Kennedy, Jacqueline. See Onassis, Jacqueline Kennedy
Kennedy, John F.
Kennedy, Robert F.
Kennedy Assassination
Kenyatta, Jomo
Kepplinger, Hans Mathias
Kerry, John
Khrushchev, Nikita
Kibaki, Mwai
Kids Voting USA
King, Martin Luther, Jr.
King Assassination. See King, Martin Luther, Jr.
Klapper, Joseph
Knowledge Gap
Kohl, Helmut
Kraus, Sidney
Kreisky, Bruno
Kwaśniewski, Aleksander

Labour Party, Britain
LaDuke, Winona. See Nader, Ralph
Lamb, Brian. See C-SPAN Network
Lang, Gladys Engel
Lang, Kurt
Language and Politics
Lasswell, Harold
Late Night Talk Shows. See Talk Shows, Television
Latinos and Politics, Media
Lazarsfeld, Paul F.
Lehrer, Jim
Lenin, Vladímir I.
Le Pen, Jean-Marie
Letters to the Editor
Lewinsky, Monica
Libel
Libertarian Party
Limbaugh, Rush
Limited Effects Theory
Lippmann, Walter
Lobbying, Lobbyist
Loukanov, Andrey

Machiavelli, Niccolò
Malcolm X. See Minorities, Role in Politics
Mancini, Paolo
Mandela, Nelson
Mandelson, Peter
Mao Zedong
Marx, Karl
Mass Nonviolent Protest, Australia
Mass Political Behavior
Matalin, Mary
Matching Funds. See Campaign Finance
Mazzoleni, Gianpietro
McCain, John
McCarthy, Joseph. See McCarthy Hearings
McCarthy Hearings
McClellan, Scott. See Press Secretary, White House
McCombs, Maxwell
McConnell, Mitchell. See McConnell v. Federal Election Commission
McConnell v. Federal Election Commission
McCurry, Michael. See Press Secretary, White House
McGovern, George
McGovern Library and Center for Public Service and Leadership
McLuhan, Marshall
McQuail, Denis
Media Bias
Media Buying in Politics
Media Consultants
Media Events
Media Feeding Frenzy
Media Logic
Mediated Political Realities
Mediatization
Medium Is the Massage, The. See McLuhan, Marshall; Medium Theory
Medium Theory
Meir, Golda
Memory Congeniality Effect. See Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory

Menem, Carlos
Merkel, Angela
Metacoverage
Methodology
Milton, John. See Press Freedom
Minimum Effects Theory. See Limited Effects Theory
Minorities, Role in Politics
Mitsotakis, Konstantinos
Mitterrand, François
Modernization
Mohammed VI
Moi, Daniel Arap
Morales, Evo
Moseley Braun, Carol
Motivated Reasoning. See Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory
Moyers, William (Bill)
MTV Rock the Vote. See Rock the Vote
Mubarak, Hosni
Muckrakers, Muckraking
Muhammed Cartoon Events
Murrow, Edward R.
Music and Politics
Muskie, Edmund
Myers, Dee Dee. See Press Secretary, White House

NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People)
Nader, Ralph
Napolitan, Joseph
Nasser, Gamal Abdel
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. See NAACP (National Association for the Advancementof Colored People)
National Association of Broadcasters
National Public Radio (NPR)
Nature of Prejudice, The Negative Advertising
Negative Campaigning
Negativity in News. See News Coverage of Politics
New Media Technologies
New Right
News: The Politics of Illusion
News Coverage, Politics
News Magazines
News Management
Newspapers, Role in Politics
News Selection Process
New York Times, The Nightline
Nimmo, Dan
Nixon, Richard M.
Noelle-Neumann, Elisabeth
Norris, Pippa. See Virtuous Circle, A
Nyerere, Julius

Obama, Barack
Obscenity and Pornography
Onassis, Jacqueline Kennedy
Op-Ed Piece. See Editorials
Opinion Leaders. See Two-Step Flow Model of Communication
O'Reilly, Bill
Orientation, Need for
Oswald, Lee Harvey. See Kennedy Assassination
Ownership of Media Outlets. See Communications Act of 1934
Özal, Turgut

PAC. See Political Action Committees (PACs)
Pack Journalism
Paid Media. See Political Advertising
Palestine Liberation Organization. See Arafat, Yasser Paletz, David. See Political Communication
Palme, Olof
Papandreou, Andreas
Parasocial Relationships in Politics
Participation, Political Party Election Broadcasts
Party Identification
Party Press
Patterson, Thomas. See Unseeing Eye, The
PBS (Public Broadcasting Service)
Pentagon Papers, The People's Choice, The
Perón, Juan
Perón, María Eva Duarte de
Perot, Ross

Personal Campaigning
Personal Influence
Personalization of Politics
Persuasion, Political
Pew Internet & American Life Project
Pew Research Center for the People & the Press
Pharisee Effect
Plato. See Rhetoric, Political
Pluralistic Ignorance
Poland, Democratization
Political Action Committees (PACs)
Political Advertising
Political Advertising, Independent
Political Advertising, Radio
Political Advertising, Women Candidates. See Women Candidates, Advertising
Political Alienation. See Political Disaffection
Political Ballads, Songs. See Music and Politics
Political Branding
Political Campaign Communication
Political Commercial Archive
Political Communication
Political Communication Center
Political Communication Review. See Political Communication
Political Conflict
Political Consultants. See Consultants, Political Political Correctness
Political Corruption
Political Culture
Political Cynicism. See Political Disaffection
Political Disaffection
Political Efficacy
Political Engagement
Political Information. See Political Knowledge
Political Information Efficacy
Political Information Processing
Political Involvement
Political Knowledge
Political Leadership
Political Marketing
Political Parties
Political Prisoners
Political Satire. See Humor in Politics
Political Scandal
Political Socialization
Political Spin. See Spin, Political Political Trust. See Political Disaffection
Politics, Policy, Polity
Politics, The. See Aristotle
Polls
Pooled Journalism
Populism
Posters, Political
Presentation of Self in Everyday Life, The Presidential Communication
Press and Politics
Press Conferences
Press Freedom
Press Law of 1766, Sweden
Press Secretary, White House
Press Theories
Primaries
Priming
Prince, The. See Machiavelli, Niccolò
Processing the News
Professionalization
Pro-Life Movement. See Abortion
Propaganda
Proportional Representation
Propositions. See Ballot Initiatives
Protests, Political Pseudo-Event
Psychographics in Politics
Psychology of Radio, The Public Address, Political. See Rhetoric, Political Public Affairs, Communication in Public Broadcasting Service. See PBS (Public Broadcasting Service)
Public Communication in Politics
Public Funding. See Campaign Finance
Public Journalism
Public Opinion
Public Relations, Political
Public Service Broadcasting
Public Sphere
Pundits, Punditry
Putin, Vladimir

Quayle, Dan

Rabin, Yitzhak
Race in Politics
Radio, Politics and
Radio Addresses
Radio Free Europe
Radio Political Advertising. See Political Advertising, Radio
Rather, Dan
Rawlings, Jerry
Reagan, Nancy
Reagan, Ronald
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC
Reedy, George. See Press Secretary, White House
Reeves, Rosser. See Eisenhower, Dwight D.
Referendum. See Ballot Initiatives
Reform Party
Religion in Politics
Religious Right. See Religion in Politics
Reporters Without Borders
Republican National Committee
Republican Party
Reputation in Politics
Resonance Theory
Responsive Chord, The Revolution, Political Rhetoric, Political
Rhetoric, The. See Aristotle
Rhetorical Criticism. See Methodology
Rice, Condoleezza
Richards, Ann
Right-to-Life Movement. See Abortion
Rivera, Geraldo
Rock the Vote
Rogers, Everett M.
Roosevelt, Eleanor
Roosevelt, Franklin D.
Royal Commission on the Press
Ruby, Jack. See Kennedy Assassination
Russia, Democratization and Media
Rwanda Genocide, Role of Media

Sabato, Larry
Salinger, Pierre. See Press Secretary, White House
Sanders, Keith R.
Saturday Night Live
Schemas, Political. See Political Knowledge
Schramm,Wilbur
Schröder, Gerhard
Schroeder, Patricia
Schulz, Winfried
Schüssel, Wolfgang
Schwartz, Tony
Schwarzenegger, Arnold
Second-Order Election
Segregation
Selective Attention. See Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory
Selective Elaboration. See Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory
Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory
Selling of the President 1968, The
Senghor, Léopold Sédar
September 11 Attacks. See Terrorism and Media
Sharon, Ariel
Shaw, Donald. See Agenda Setting
Shield Laws
Shriver, R. Sargent. See McGovern, George
Simitis, Konstantinos
Sleeper Effect
Social Marketing
Social Responsibility Theory
Soft Money
Soft News
Solidarity Movement
Sorensen, Theodore C. See Kennedy, John F.
Sound Bite
Speeches, Presidential Spiegel Affair
Spin, Political
Spin Alley. See Spin, Political Spin Doctor. See Spin, Political
Spiral of Silence
Starr, Kenneth. See Lewinsky, Monica
Starr Report. See Lewinsky, Monica
State of the Union Address
Stephanopoulos, George
Stevenson, Adlai
Stewart, Jon. See Daily Show, The
Strategic Communication
Strauss, Franz Josef. See Spiegel Affair
Stringer

Supreme Court, Media and the Survey Research. See Methodology
Survey Research Center
Symbolic Convergence Theory
Symbolic Uses of Politics, The Systems Theory

Tabloids
Talk Radio, Political
Talk Shows, Television
Tampa Incident
TechnoDistortions
Telecommunications Act of 1996. See Communications Act of 1934
Television and Politics. See Debates; Medium Theory; Political Advertising; Talk Shows, Television
Television in Politics
Television Political Advertising. See Political Advertising
Terrorism and Media
Testimonials, Political
Thatcher, Margaret
Third-Person Effect
Thomas, Clarence. See Hill–Thomas Hearings
Ticket Splitting
Tripp, Linda. See Lewinsky, Monica
Trippi, Joe
Triumph of the Will. See Film and Politics
Turnout, Voter. See Center for the Study of the American Electorate
Two-Step Flow Model of Communication

Underground Media
UNESCO Media Policy
Unions, Political Activity
United States Information Agency
Unseeing Eye, The Uses and Gratifications Approach
Uzan, Cem

Vanderbilt Television News Archive
Vargas, Getulio
Verbal Style
Video Games, Political
Videostyle
Viguerie, Richard. See Direct Mail
Virtuous Circle, A
Voice of America
Voter Behavior
Voter News Service
Vranitzky, Franz

Waldheim, Kurt. See Waldheim Affair
Waldheim Affair
Wałęsa, Lech
Wallace, George
War Coverage
War of the Worlds, The
Warren Commission. See Kennedy Assassination
Washington Post, The Watergate
Watts, J. C.
Watts Riots
Weaver, David H.
Web Campaigning
Web Site. See Web Campaigning
Webstyle
Welfare Policy
Wellstone, Paul
West Wing, The
White House Press Corps
Whitewater Scandal. See Clinton, William Jefferson
Why We Fight Series. See Film and Politics
Will, George
Willie Horton Ad
Wilson, Harold
Wolfsfeld, Gadi
Women Candidates, Advertising
Women Candidates, News Coverage
Woodward, Bob. See Watergate
World Association for Public Opinion Research
World Wide Web, Political Uses

Yassine, Abdessalam
Yellow Journalism
Yeltsin, Boris
Youth Voting

Zhelev, Zhelyu
Zhivkov, Todor
Ziegler, Ronald. See Press Secretary, White House

Reader's Guide

This list is provided to assist readers in locating entries on related topics. Some entry titles appear in more than one category.

Biographies

Abdullah II
Adenauer, Konrad
Agnew, Spiro
Ailes, Roger
Al-Asad, Hafiz
Alfonsín, Raúl
Allende, Salvador
Al-Sadat, Anwar
Arafat, Yasser
Aznar, José María
Bachelet Jeria, Michelle
Ben Ali, Zine el-Abidine
Berlusconi, Silvio
Blair, Tony
Blumler, Jay G.
Bormann, Ernest
Bouteflika, Abdelaziz
Brandt, Willy
Broder, David
Buchanan, Patrick
Bush, George H. W.
Bush, George W.
Bush, Laura
Cardoso, Fernando Henrique
Carville, James
Castro, Fidel
Chaffee, Steven H.
Chávez, Hugo
Chirac, Jacques
Chisolm, Shirley
Churchill, Sir Winston
Çiller, Tansu
Clinton, Hillary Rodham
Clinton, William Jefferson
Coburg-Gotha, Simeon Saxe
Collor de Mello, Fernando
Connally, John
Cronkite, Walter
Dean, Howard
de Gaulle, Charles
Demirel, Süleyman
Deng Xiaoping
Denton, Robert E., Jr.
Dole, Elizabeth
Dole, Robert
Donsbach, Wolfgang
Dukakis, Michael
Ecevit, Bülent
Edelman, Murray
Eisenhower, Dwight D.
Entman, Robert
Erdoğan, Recep Tayyip
Ferraro, Geraldine
Fleischer, Ari
Ford, Betty
Ford, Gerald
Fox, Vicente
Franken, Al
Gandhi, Indira
Gerbner, George
Gingrich, Newt
Giscard d'Estaing, Valéry

Giuliani, Rudy
Goebbels, Joseph
Goldwater, Barry
González Márquez, Felipe
Gorbachev, Mikhail
Gore, Albert
Graber, Doris A.
Greeley, Horace
Guggenheim, Charles
Haider, Jörg
Hallin, Daniel C.
Hanson, Pauline
Harris, Fred
Hart, Gary
Hart, Roderick P.
Hassan II, King
Havel, Václav
Hearst, William Randolph
Hitler, Adolf
Holtz-Bacha, Christina
Humphrey, Hubert H.
Hussein I, King
Jackson, Jesse
Jamieson, Kathleen Hall
Johnson, Lyndon B.
Jordan, Barbara
Kaid, Lynda Lee
Katz, Elihu
Kekkonen, Urho
Kennedy, Edward (Ted)
Kennedy, John F.
Kennedy, Robert F.
Kenyatta, Jomo
Kepplinger, Hans Mathias
Kerry, John
Khrushchev, Nikita
Kibaki, Mwai
King, Martin Luther, Jr.
Klapper, Joseph
Kohl, Helmut
Kraus, Sidney
Kreisky, Bruno
Kwaśniewski, Aleksander
Lang, Gladys Engel
Lang, Kurt
Lasswell, Harold
Lazarsfeld, Paul F.
Lehrer, Jim
Lenin, Vladímir I.
Le Pen, Jean-Marie
Lewinsky, Monica
Limbaugh, Rush
Lippmann, Walter
Loukanov, Andrey
Machiavelli, Niccolò
Mancini, Paolo
Mandela, Nelson
Mandelson, Peter
Mao Zedong
Marx, Karl
Matalin, Mary
Mazzoleni, Gianpietro
McCain, John
McCombs, Maxwell
McGovern, George
McLuhan, Marshall
McQuail, Denis
Meir, Golda
Menem, Carlos
Merkel, Angela
Mitsotakis, Konstantinos
Mitterrand, François
Mohammed VI
Moi, Daniel Arap
Morales, Evo
Moseley Braun, Carol
Moyers, William (Bill)
Mubarak, Hosni
Murrow, Edward R.
Muskie, Edmund
Nader, Ralph
Napolitan, Joseph
Nasser, Gamal Abdel
Nimmo, Dan
Nixon, Richard M.
Noelle-Neumann, Elisabeth
Nyerere, Julius
Obama, Barack
Onassis, Jacqueline Kennedy
O'Reilly, Bill

Özal, Turgut
Palme, Olof
Papandreou, Andreas
Perón, Juan
Perón, María Eva Duarte de
Perot, Ross
Putin, Vladimir
Quayle, Dan
Rabin, Yitzhak
Rather, Dan
Rawlings, Jerry
Reagan, Nancy
Reagan, Ronald
Rice, Condoleezza
Richards, Ann
Rivera, Geraldo
Rogers, Everett M.
Roosevelt, Eleanor
Roosevelt, Franklin D.
Sabato, Larry
Sanders, Keith R.
Schramm,Wilbur
Schröder, Gerhard
Schroeder, Patricia
Schulz, Winfried
Schüssel, Wolfgang
Schwartz, Tony
Schwarzenegger, Arnold
Senghor, Léopold Sédar
Sharon, Ariel
Simitis, Konstantinos
Stephanopoulos, George
Stevenson, Adlai
Thatcher, Margaret
Trippi, Joe
Uzan, Cem
Vargas, Getulio
Vranitzky, Franz
Wałęsa, Lech
Wallace, George
Watts, J. C.
Weaver, David H.
Wellstone, Paul
Will, George
Wilson, Harold
Wolfsfeld, Gadi
Yassine, Abdessalam
Yeltsin, Boris
Zhelev, Zhelyu
Zhivkov, Todor

Books, Films, Journals, Television

All the President's Men
American Voter, The
Bowling Alone
Campaigns & Elections Magazine
Candidate, The
Candidates and Their Images
Citizen Kane
Commander in Chief
Comparing Media Systems
Creating Reality
Crosstalk
Daily Show, The
Deciding What's News
Effects of Mass Communication, The Film and Politics
Four Theories of the Press
Great Debates, The
Handbook of Political Communication, The
Image, The
Mediated Political Realities
Nature of Prejudice, The
News: The Politics of Illusion
Nightline
People's Choice, The
Personal Influence
Political Campaign Communication
Political Communication
Presentation of Self in Everyday Life, The Processing the News
Psychology of Radio, The
Responsive Chord, The
Saturday Night Live
Selling of the President 1968, The
Symbolic Uses of Politics, The Television in Politics
Unseeing Eye, The Virtuous Circle, A

War of the Worlds, The
West Wing, The

Democracy, Democratization

Argentina Democratization Process, Role of the Media
Brazil, Media and the Political System
Bulgaria, Democratization
Democratization, Role of the Media in Direct Action Protest, Australia
Direct Democracy
German Unification, Role of the Media
Hungary, Communication and Politics
Poland, Democratization
Russia, Democratization and Media

Education and Nonprofit Organizations

Carrie Chapman Catt Center for Women and Politics
Center for the Study of the American Electorate
Freedom Forum Media Studies Center
Graduate School of Political Management
McGovern Library and Center for Public Service and Leadership
Pew Internet & American Life Project
Pew Research Center for the People & the Press
Political Commercial Archive
Political Communication Center
Survey Research Center
Vanderbilt Television News Archive
World Association for Public Opinion Research

Elections

Electoral Systems
European Parliamentary Elections
E-Voting
Grassroots Campaigning
Iowa Caucuses
Primaries
Proportional Representation
Second-Order Election
Ticket Splitting
Voter News Service
Voting Behavior
Youth Voting

Government Operations and Institutions

Brazil, Media and the Political System
China, Media and Politics in Chinese Cultural Revolution
Communism
Conservative, Conservatism
E-Government
Electoral Systems
Eurobarometer
European Commission
European Parliament
European Parliamentary Elections
European Union
Federal Trade Commission
Government Communication
Hong Kong Handover
Hungary, Communication and Politics
Political Prisoners
Press Secretary, White House
Proportional Representation
Public Affairs, Communication in
State of the Union Address
Supreme Court, Media and the Law and Regulation

Abortion
Affirmative Action
Ballot Initiatives
Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act
Brazil, Media and the Political System
Buckley v. Valeo
Campaign Finance
Censorship, Political
Civil Rights Movement
Communications Act of 1934
Council of Europe, Media Policy
Equal Time Provision
European Commission
European Convention on Human Rights
European Court of Justice
European Union Media Policy

Fairness Doctrine
Federal Election Campaign Act
Federal Trade Commission
First Amendment
Free Airtime
Freedom of Information
Libel
McConnell v. Federal Election Commission
Obscenity and Pornography
Press Freedom
Press Law of 1766, Sweden
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC
Reputation in Politics
Royal Commission on the Press
Shield Laws
Soft Money
UNESCO Media Policy
United States Information Agency

Media

Media Events

Bush–Rather Confrontation
Checkers Speech
Media Consultants
Media Events
Spin, Political Tampa Incident

Media Outlets and Programs

Al Jazeera Television
Campaigns & Elections Magazine
CNN (Cable News Network)
Commander in Chief
C-SPAN Network
Daily Show, The Daisy Girl Ad
Fox News
Freedom Forum Media Studies Center
National Association of Broadcasters
National Public Radio (NPR)
New York Times, The
Nightline
PBS (Public Broadcasting Service)
Radio Free Europe
Reporters Without Borders
Rock the Vote
Saturday Night Live
Tabloids
Underground Media
Voice of America
Voter News Service
War of the Worlds, The
Washington Post, The
West Wing, The
Willie Horton Ad

Role of Media in Political Systems

Argentina Democratization Process, Role of the Media
Brazil, Media and the Political System
China, Media and Politics in Congress and the Media
Democratization, Role of the Media in German Unification, Role of the Media
Hungary, Communication and Politics
Public Service Broadcasting
Rwanda Genocide, Role of Media
Russia, Democratization and Media
Supreme Court, Media and the
UNESCO Media Policy

News Media Coverage of Politics, Political Affairs

Ad Watch
Blogs, Blogging
Citizen Journalism
Commentary, Political
Congress and the Media
Fairness Doctrine
Fourth Estate, Media as
Gulf War, Media Coverage of Hard News
Horserace Coverage
Iraq War, Media Coverage of Media Bias
News Coverage, Politics
News Management
News Selection Process
Pooled Journalism
Press Conferences

Press Secretary, White House
Public Affairs, Communication in Radio, Politics and Soft News
Sound Bite
Stringer
Supreme Court, Media and the
Talk Radio, Political
Talk Shows, Television
Voter News Service
War Coverage
White House Press Corps
Women Candidates, News Coverage

Theoretical Approaches

Agenda Melding
Agenda Setting
Hostile Media Effect
Information Technology in Politics
Infotainment
Media Bias
Media Feeding Frenzy
Media Logic
Mediatization
Metacoverage
Muckrakers, Muckraking
Music and Politics
Political Branding
Press and Politics
Press Freedom
Press Theories
Public Relations, Political
Public Service Broadcasting
Spin, Political
TechnoDistortions
Videostyle
Webstyle

Types of Political Media

Advocacy Advertising
Alternative Media in Politics
Banner Ads
Big-Character Posters, China
Blogs, Blogging
Candidate Films, Biographical Cartoons, Political Debates
DebateWatch
Direct Mail
Editorials
E-Mail, Political Uses
Film and Politics
Fireside Chats
Free Airtime
Letters to the Editor
Media Buying in Politics
Negative Advertising
New Media Technologies
News Magazines
Newspapers, Role in Politics
Party Election Broadcasts
Party Press
Political Advertising
Political Advertising, Independent
Political Advertising, Radio
Posters, Political
Radio, Politics and
Radio Addresses
Talk Radio, Political
Talk Shows, Television
Testimonials, Political
Video Games, Political
Web Campaigning
Women Candidates, Advertising
World Wide Web, Political Uses

Political Attitudes

Apathy, Voter
Authoritarianism
Cybernationalism
Ideology
Mass Political Behavior
New Right
Parasocial Relationships in Politics
Party Identification
Political Branding
Political Correctness
Political Culture
Political Involvement

Political Knowledge
Polls
Populism
Psychographics in Politics
Public Opinion
Race in Politics
Ticket Splitting
Voter Behavior

Political Campaigns

American-Style Campaigning
Ballot Initiatives
Campaign Finance
Candidate-Centered Communication
Candidate Films, Biographical
Celebrities in Politics
Commission on Presidential Debates
Daisy Girl Ad
Debates
DebateWatch
Free Airtime
Grassroots Campaigning
Hate Speech
Iowa Caucuses
Media Consultants
Negative Campaigning
Party Election Broadcasts
Personal Campaigning
Political Advertising
Political Advertising, Independent
Political Advertising, Radio
Primaries
Soft Money
Testimonials, Political
Web Campaigning
Webstyle
Willie Horton Ad
Women Candidates, Advertising
Women Candidates, News Coverage

Political Events

Checkers Speech
Chinese Cultural Revolution
Falklands-Malvinas War
Gulf War, Media Coverage of Helsinki Process
Heuristics in Political Decision Making
Hill–Thomas Hearings
Hong Kong Handover
Inaugural Addresses, Presidential
Iowa Caucuses
Iraq War, Media Coverage of
Kennedy Assassination
Mass Nonviolent Protest, Australia
McCarthy Hearings
Muhammed Cartoon Events
Pentagon Papers, The
Political Conflict
Political Scandal
Protests, Political Revolution, Political Speeches, Presidential
Spiegel Affair
State of the Union Address
Tampa Incident
Terrorism and Media
Waldheim Affair
War Coverage
Watergate
Watts Riots

Political Groups and Organizations

AARP
Advocacy Advertising
Aging and Politics
American Association of Political Consultants
Center for the Study of the American Electorate
Commission on Presidential Debates
Congress and the Media
Conservative Party, Britain
Conventions, Political
Council of Europe, Media Policy
Democratic National Committee
Democratic Party
European Association of Political Consultants
European Parliament
European Parliamentary Elections
European Union
European Union, Media Policy

Feminist Movement
Freedom Forum Media Studies Center
Glasgow Media Group
Green Party
Interest Groups in Politics
Labour Party, Britain
Latinos and Politics, Media
Libertarian Party
Lobbying, Lobbyist
Minorities, Role in Politics
NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People)
National Association of Broadcasters
New Right
Party Identification
Pew Internet & American Life Project
Pew Research Center for the People & the Press
Political Action Committees (PACs)
Political Culture
Political Parties
Reform Party
Religion in Politics
Republican National Committee
Republican Party
Solidarity Movement
UNESCO Media Policy
Unions, Political Activity
Youth Voting

Political Issues

Abortion
Aging and Politics
Ballot Initiatives
Civil Rights Movement
Issue Management
Issue Ownership
Kids Voting USA
Lobbying, Lobbyist
Mass Political Behavior
Minorities, Role in Politics
Political Corruption
Political Knowledge
Segregation
Welfare Policy

Political Journalism

Bush–Rather Confrontation
Commentary, Political
Embedded Journalists
Hostile Media Effect
Journalism, Political
Metacoverage
Muckrakers, Muckraking
Pack Journalism
Pooled Journalism
Public Journalism
Talk Radio, Political
Talk Shows, Television
Women Candidates, News Coverage
Yellow Journalism

Theoretical Concepts

Agenda Melding
Agenda Setting
Americanization
Apologia
Argumentation, Political
Aristotle
Authoritarianism
Communism
Conservative, Conservatism
Constructivism
Critical Theory
Cultivation Theory
Cultural Imperialism
Cultural Studies
Dealignment
Deliberation
Democracy Theories
Demography
Dependency Theory, Media
Diffusion of Innovations
Digital Divide
Dramatistic Approaches to Political Communication
Fantasy Theme Analysis
Fear Appeals, Use in Politics
Feminine Style in Communication
Focus Groups
Framing
Gender and Politics

Globalization
Group Decision Making, Political
Heuristics in Political Decision Making
Hostile Media Effect
Humor in Politics
Image, Political
Impression Management
Indexing Theory
Information Flow, Global
Information Society
Inoculation, Political
Intercultural Communication, Dimensions
Interpersonal Communication
Kids Voting USA
Knowledge Gap
Language and Politics
Limited Effects Theory
Mass Political Behavior
McConnell v. Federal Election Commission
Mediatization
Medium Theory
Methodology
Modernization
Music and Politics
News Management
News Selection Process
Orientation, Need for Participation, Political
Personalization of Politics
Persuasion, Political
Pharisee Effect
Pluralistic Ignorance
Political Conflict
Political Disaffection
Political Efficacy
Political Engagement
Political Information Efficacy
Political Information Processing
Political Involvement
Political Knowledge
Political Leadership
Political Marketing
Political Scandal
Political Socialization
Politics, Policy, Polity
Presidential Communication
Press and Politics
Press Theories
Priming
Professionalization
Propaganda
Psychographics in Politics
Public Communication in Politics
Public Sphere
Pundits, Punditry
Race in Politics
Reputation in Politics
Resonance Theory
Rhetoric, Political
Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory
Sleeper Effect
Social Marketing
Social Responsibility Theory
Speeches, Presidential
Spiral of Silence
Strategic Communication
Symbolic Convergence Theory
Systems Theory
Third-Person Effect
Two-Step Flow Model of Communication
Uses and Gratifications Approach
Verbal Style
Videostyle
Voter Behavior

Women in Politics

Carrie Chapman Catt Center for Women and Politics
Feminine Style in Communication
First Ladies, Political Communication of
Gender and Politics
Hill–Thomas Hearings
Women Candidates, Advertising
Women Candidates, News Coverage

About the Editors

Lynda Lee Kaid is professor of telecommunication in the College of Journalism and Communications at the University of Florida. She received her Ph.D. degree in 1974 from Southern Illinois University. She previously served as the director of the Political Communication Center and supervised the Political Commercial Archive at the University of Oklahoma. Her research specialties include political advertising and news coverage of political events. A Fulbright scholar, she has also done work on political television in several European countries. She is the author or editor of more than 25 books, including The Handbook of Political Communication Research, Videostyle in Presidential Campaigns, The Electronic Election, Civic Dialogue in the 1996 Campaign, New Perspectives on Political Advertising, Mediated Politics in Two Cultures, Political Advertising in Western Democracies, and Political Campaign Communication: A Bibliography and Guide to the Literature. She has also written more than 150 journal articles and book chapters and more than 100 convention papers on various aspects of political communication. She has received more than $2 million in external grant funds for her research efforts, including support from the U.S. Department of Commerce, the U.S. Department of Education, the National Endowment for the Humanities, the Election Assistance Commission, and the National Science Foundation. Kaid is a former chair of the Political Communication Divisions of the International Communication Association and the National Communication Association and has served in leadership roles for the American Political Science Association and the Association for Education in Journalism and Mass Communication.

Christina Holtz-Bacha is professor of communication at the University of Erlangen-Nürnberg, Germany. She received her Ph.D. from the University of Münster in 1978 and her postdoctoral dissertation (habilitation) in Hannover. Prior to her current position she taught at the universities in Mainz (1995–2004), Bochum (1991–1995), and Munich (1981–1991). She was guest professor at the University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, in 1986 and research fellow at the Joan Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics and Public Policy at the John F. Kennedy School of Government, Harvard University, in 1999. She is coeditor of the German journal Publizistik and a member of the board of various other journals. She has published widely in the area of political communication and media policy. Among her most recent publications are The SAGE Handbook of Political Advertising (as editor, with Lynda Lee Kaid); Fußball—Fernsehen—Politik [Football—Television—Politics] (Ed., 2006); Medienpolitik für Europa [Media Politics for Europe] (2006); Wahlwerbung als politische Kultur. Parteienspots im Fernsehen 1957–1998 [Campaign Advertising as Political Culture: Party TV Spots 1957–1998] (2000).

Contributors

Paul J. Achter
University of Richmond

Sean Aday
George Washington University

Saleh A. Ahmed
Cairo University

Jerry L. Allen
University of New Haven

Monika R. Alston
College of Charleston

Kai Arzheimer
University of Essex

Erica Weintraub Austin
Washington State University

Elizabeth Johnson Avery
University of Tennessee

Muhammad Ayish
University of Sharjah

David C. Bailey
Texas A&M University

Terri Ann Bailey
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Paul R. Baines
Cranfield University

R. John Ballotti, Jr.
Texas A&M Commerce

Mary Christine Banwart
University of Kansas

Kaylene Barbe
Oklahoma Baptist University

Kevin G. Barnhurst
University of Illinois at Chicago

Jay Barth
Hendrix College

Thomas Bartl
University of Illinois at Springfield

Jody Baumgartner
East Carolina University

Adrian Beard
York St. John University

Peter-Alberto Behrens
Fundación Konrad Adenauer

Daniel E. Bergan
Yale University

Walther L. Bernecker
University of Erlangen-Nürnberg

Maria Beyrl
Danube-University Krems

Gunnela Björk
Örebro University

Andrew Blick
University of Essex

Heinz Bonfadelli
University of Zurich–Gregory

Gregory A. Borchard
University of Nevada, Las Vegas

Shannon L. Bow
University of Texas

Zachary A. Bowden
University of California, Santa Cruz

Michael P. Boyle
West Chester University

Kees Brants
University of Amsterdam

Sandra Braun
University of Alabama

David W. Bulla
Iowa State University

Stephanie Burkhalter
University of Washington

Lisa M. Burns
Quinnipiac University

Thymian Bussemer
European University Viadrina

Dianne G. Bystrom
Iowa State University

María José B. Canel
Universidad Complutense de Madrid

Diana B. Carlin
University of Kansas

Nur Betül Çelik
Ankara University

Mike Chanslor
Northeastern State University

Sumana Chattopadhyay
Marquette University

Johanna Cleary
University of Florida

Kane M. Click
University of Nebraska, Lincoln

Rita F. Colistra
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Joan L. Conners
Randolph-Macon College

Colleen Connolly-Ahern
Penn State University

Libby Connors
University of Southern Queensland

Grant C. Cos
Rochester Institute of Technology

Raluca Cozma
Louisiana State University

Sean P. Cunningham
University of Florida

Gregory G. Curtin
University of Southern California

Charles Cushman
George Washington University

Wojciech Cwalina
Warsaw School of Social Psychology

Peter Dahlgren
Lund University

Philip Dalton
Stetson University

Paul D'Angelo
College of New Jersey

Juliana Maria da Silva
Kentucky Wesleyan College

Nicolas Demertzis
University of Athens

Karen Lane DeRosa
Consultant

Claes H. de Vreese
University of Amsterdam

Arin Rose Dickerson
Virginia Tech University

Daniela V. Dimitrova
Iowa State University

George N. Dionisopoulos
San Diego State University

Ülkü Doğanay
Ankara University

Tasha N. Dubriwny
University of South Florida

Elizabeth Dudash
Missouri State University

Jill A. Edy
University of Oklahoma

Mark Eisenegger
University of Zurich

Matthew Eshbaugh-Soha
University of North Texas

Frank Esser
University of Zurich

Andrzej Falkowski
Warsaw School of Social Psychology

Jürgen W. Falter
University of Mainz

Rick Farmer
Oklahoma House of Representatives

Juliana de Brum Fernandes
University of Florida

Peter Filzmaier
Danube University Krems

Thomas Fischer
University of Erlangen-Nürnberg

Kirsten A. Foot
University of Washington

Marie-Aude Fouéré
École des Hautes Études en Sciences Sociales, Paris

Kim L. Fridkin
Arizona State University

Robert V. Friedenberg
Miami University (Ohio)

Lewis A. Friedland
University of Wisconsin–Madison

Kristin K. Froemling
Radford University

Curtis Gans
American University

R. Kelly Garrett
University of California, Irvine

John Gastil
University of Washington

Robert Gobetz
University of Indianapolis

Doğan Göçmen
University of London

Ann Gordon
Ohio University

Daniel Gossel
University of Erlangen-Nürnberg

Udo Göttlich
University of Duisburg–Essen

Carl Grafton
Auburn University Montgomery

Lisa M. Gring-Pemble
George Mason University

Albert Gunther
University of Wisconsin

Kenneth Hacker
New Mexico State University

Kai Hafez
University of Erfurt

Lutz M. Hagen
Technical University Dresden

Daniel C. Hallin
University of California, San Diego

Cees J. Hamelink
University of Amsterdam

Uwe Hartung
Institut für Demoskopie Allensbach

Kalisa Lynn Hauschen
Western Kentucky University

Caroline Heldman
Occidental College

John Allen Hendricks
Southeastern Oklahoma State University

Brandon Jay Hersh
University of Florida

R. Lance Holbert
Ohio State University

Rachel L. Holloway
Virginia Tech University

Christina Holtz-Bacha
University of Erlangen-Nürnberg

Michelle Honald
University of Oregon

Junhao Hong
State University of New York at Buffalo

Edward M. Horowitz
Cleveland State University

Alison Dana Howard
Dominican University of California

B. Wayne Howell
Denison University

Christopher C. Hull
Georgetown University

Li-Ching Hung
Mississippi State University

Karla Hunter
Dakota Wesleyan University

Drew Hutton
Australian Greens Leader

Mohammed Ibahrine
Al Akhawayn University

Kurt Imhof
University of Zurich

Karol Jakubowicz
National Broadcasting Council

Sharon Jarvis
University of Texas at Austin

Jan Jirak
Charles University

Bengt Johansson
Göteborg University

Anne Johnston
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Alecea Davis Jones
Western Kentucky University

Clifford A. Jones
University of Florida

John Jones
Pepperdine University

Lynda Lee Kaid
University of Florida

Brian T. Kaylor
University of Missouri

Beybin Kejanlioglu
Ankara University

Kathleen E. Kendall
University of Maryland

Kate Kenski
University of Arizona

Fatih Keskin
Ankara University

Hyoungkoo Khang
Sungkyunkwan University

Nak ho Kim
University of Wisconsin–Madison

Larry Jene King
Stephen F. Austin State University

Spiro Kiousis
University of Florida

Markus Klein
University of Cologne

James F. Klumpp
University of Maryland

Randolph Kluver
Texas A&M University

Thomas Knieper
LMU Munich

Thomas Koch
University of Erlangen-Nürnberg

Eser Köker
Ankara University

Nina König-Reiling
University of Erlangen-Nürnberg

Mona Krewel
University of Mainz

Rebecca A. Kuehl
University of Georgia

Rati Kumar
University of Florida

Michael Kunczik
University of Mainz

Jeff Kurtz
Denison University

Kelli E. Lammie
University of Pennsylvania

Kristen D. Landreville
Ohio State University

Ana Inés Langer
University of Glasgow

Ruthann Weaver Lariscy
University of Georgia

Stephanie Greco Larson
Dickinson College

Dominic L. Lasorsa
University of Texas

Hans-Joachim Lauth
FernUniversität Hagen

Ronald Lee
University of Nebraska–Lincoln

Michael Leff
University of Memphis

Abby Gail LeGrange
University of Florida

David G. Levasseur
West Chester University

Jenifer L. Lewis
Western Kentucky University

Sandra Lieske
University of Mainz

Joon Soo Lim
Middle Tennessee State University

Canchu Lin
Bowling Green State University

Yang Lin
University of Akron

Martin Löffelholz
Technical University Ilmenau

Allan D. Louden
Wake Forest University

José Carlos Lozano
Tecnológico de Monterrey

David M. Luftig
University of Cincinnati

Anker Brink Lund
Copenhagen Business School

John D. Lynch
Vanderbilt University

Justin Lyons
Ashland University

Philippe J. Maarek
University Paris 12

Vered Malka
New York University

Paolo Mancini
University of Perugia

Jimmie Manning
Northern Kentucky University

Frank Marcinkowski
University of Münster

Galit Marmor-Lavie
University of Texas at Austin

Justin D. Martin
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Shannon E. Martin
University of Maine

Axel Mattenklott
University of Mainz

Stephen Maynard Caliendo
North Central College

Gianpietro Mazzoleni
Università degli Studi di Milano

Shannon Custer McAleenan
Flagler College

Kristen McCauliff
University of Georgia

Michael McDevitt
University of Colorado

Charlton D. McIlwain
New York University

Mitchell S. McKinney
University of Missouri

Lori Melton McKinnon
Oklahoma State University

Denis McQuail
University of Amsterdam and University of Southampton

Patrick C. Meirick
University of Oklahoma

Verena Metze-Mangold
German Commission for UNESCO

Jerry Miller
Ohio University

Lisa Mills-Brown
University of Central Florida

Markus Moke
Ruhr-University Bochum

Jason A. Moldoff
Virginia Tech University

Mark P. Moore
Oregon State University

Tom Moring
University of Helsinki

Patricia Moy
University of Washington

Janette Kenner Muir
George Mason University

Marion G. Müller
Jacobs University Bremen

Ralph Negrine
University of Sheffield

Matthew C. Nisbet
American University

Michael Nitz
Augustana College

Dieter Nohlen
University of Heidelberg

Lars W. Nord
Mid Sweden University

Hilary Noriega
University of Florida

Sarah Oates
University of Glasgow

Christopher Odhiambo
Moi University

Christopher J. Oldenburg
University of Memphis

L. Marvin Overby
University of Missouri

Janis Teruggi Page
University of Florida

John Parmelee
University of North Florida

Trevor Parry-Giles
University of Maryland

Yoram Peri
Tel Aviv University

David D. Perlmutter
University of Kansas

Richard M. Perloff
Cleveland State University

Flooh Perlot
Danube University Krems

Jochen Peter
University of Amsterdam

Thomas Petersen
Institut für Demoskopie Allensbach

Gary R. Pettey
Cleveland State University

Michael Pfau
University of Oklahoma

Barbara Pfetsch
University of Hohenheim

Bruce Pinkleton
Washington State University

Tomasz Płudowski
Stanford University

Bernhard Poerksen
University of Hamburg

Monica Postelnicu
Louisiana State University

Larry Powell
University of Alabama at Birmingham

Margaret M. Quinlan
Ohio University

Nadia Ann Ramoutar
Flagler College

William Ratliff
Stanford University

Lilia Raycheva
St. Kliment Okhridsky Sofia University

Tom Reichert
University of Georgia

William Renkus
University of Florida

David M. Rhea
University of Missouri at Columbia

Leslie A. Rill
University of Missouri at Columbia

Terry Robertson
University of South Dakota

Malvina Rodriguez
University of Erlangen-Nürnberg

Lloyd Rohler
University of North Carolina at Wilmington

Hernando Rojas
University of Wisconsin–Madison

Jolán Róka
Budapest College of Communication

Cynthia Roper
Abilene Christian University

Laura Roselle
Elon University

Lars A. Rosumek
Public Relations Officer

Mark J. Rozell
George Mason University

Halford Ryan
Washington & Lee University

Karen Sanders
CEU San Pablo

Keith R. Sanders
Emeritus, Executive Director, Illinois Board of Higher Education

Margaret Roberta Scammell
London School of Economics and Political Science

Dietram A. Scheufele
University of Wisconsin–Madison

H. E. Schmeisser
University of Florida

Rüdiger Schmitt-Beck
University of Duisburg–Essen

Steven M. Schneider
State University of New York, Institute of Technology at Utica-Rome

Harald Schoen
University of Mainz

Steven Schuh
University of Mainz

Eva Johanna Schweitzer
University of Mainz

David K. Scott
Northeastern State University

Holli A. Semetko
Emory University

Richard J. Semiatin
American University

Donald L. Shaw
University of North Carolina

Tamir Sheafer
Hebrew University

Theodore F. Sheckels
Randolph-Macon College

Kristina Horn Sheeler
Indiana University–Purdue University Indianapolis

Feng Shen
University of Florida

Jae-Hwa Shin
University of Southern Mississippi

Danny Shipka
University of Florida

C. Brant Short
Northern Arizona University

Nancy Signorielli
University of Delaware

Arvind Singhal
Ohio University

Cary Stacy Smith
Mississippi State University

Christina M. Smith
Arizona State University

Mira Sotirovic
University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

Fredrick H. Sowder
University of Florida

Doug Spence
Ohio University

John Spinda
Kent State University

Robert J. Spitzer
State University of New York Cortland

Roger Stahl
University of Georgia

James Stanyer
Loughborough University

Guido H. Stempel III
Ohio University

Julianne Stewart
University of Southern Queensland

Hans-Joerg Stiehler
University of Leipzig

Ashli Quesinberry Stokes
University of North Carolina at Charlotte

Thomas Stratmann
George Mason University

Jesper Strömbäck
Mid Sweden University

Jennifer Stromer-Galley
University at Albany, State University of New York

Federico Subervi
Texas State University

José Manuel Talero-Garcia
Hartinger Consulting, Austria

John C. Tedesco
Virginia Tech University

Wisdom J. Tettey
University of Calgary

Nicholas A. Thomas
Pennsylvania State University

Kaye D. Sweetser Trammell
University of Georgia

Michael W. Traugott
University of Michigan

Judith S. Trent
University of Cincinnati

Jan W. van Deth
University of Mannheim

Robert A. Vartabedian
Eastern New Mexico University

Justin S. Vaughn
Texas A&M University

Rebecca M. Verser
University of Missouri–Columbia

Katrin Voltmer
University of Leeds

Gerhard Vowe
University of Düsseldorf

Barbara J. Walkosz
University of Colorado at Denver and Health Sciences Center

Roxanne Watson
University of South Florida

David H. Weaver
Indiana University

Lennart Weibull
Göteborg University

Gabriel Weimann
University of Haifa

Ralph Weiss
University of Düsseldorf

Scott Wells
St. Cloud State University

Bernhard Wessels
Social Science Research Centre (WZB)

Hartmut Wessler
Jacobs University Bremen

Leigh Ann Wheeler
Bowling Green State University

Virginia Whitehouse
Whitworth University

Robert H. Wicks
University of Arkansas

Shirley A. Wiegand
Marquette University

Andrew Paul Williams
Virginia Tech University

Glenda C. Williams
University of Alabama

Lars Willnat
George Washington University

Betty Houchin Winfield
University of Missouri

Jürgen R. Winkler
University of Mainz

Frank Wittmann
Université de Fribourg

Gadi Wolfsfeld
Hebrew University

Stephen C. Wood
University of Rhode Island

Gina Serignese Woodall
Arizona State University

Dominic Wring
Loughborough University

Xu Wu
Arizona State University

Jing Yin
Clemson University

Kyu Ho Youm
University of Oregon

Hyun Jung Yun
Texas State University

Bouziane Zaid
Al Akhawayn University in Ifrane

Reimar Zeh
University of Erlangen-Nürnberg

Mei Zhang
Missouri Western State University

Astrid Zipfel
University of Düsseldorf

Introduction

Political communication began with the earliest studies of democratic discourse by Aristotle and Plato. However, modern political communication relies on an interdisciplinary base that draws on concepts from communication, political science, journalism, sociology, psychology, history, rhetoric, and others. This encyclopedia considers political communication from that broad interdisciplinary perspective, encompassing the many different roles that communication plays in political processes in the United States and around the world. Not limited to communication in electoral contexts, political communication also considers the role of communication in governing, incorporating communication activities that influence the operation of executive, legislative, and judicial bodies, political parties, interest groups, political action committees, and other participants in political processes.

This work contains discussion of the major theoretical approaches to the field, including direct and limited effects theories, agenda-setting theories, sociological theories, framing and priming theories, and other past and present conceptualizations. Considerable attention is devoted to major sources of political communication and to important political messages such as political speeches, televised political advertising, political posters and print advertising, televised political debates, and Internet sites. The channels of political communication encompass interpersonal and public communication, radio, television, newspapers, and the World Wide Web. News media coverage and journalistic analysis of politics, political issues, political figures, and political institutions are important topics included. The audiences for political communications are also central, necessitating concentration on citizen reactions to political messages, how the general public and voters in democratic systems respond to political messages, and the effects of all types of media and message types.

Whereas this encyclopedia provides information that may be helpful in an introductory way for political communication scholars, researchers, and graduate students, it is also designed for libraries, undergraduates, and members of the public with an interest in political affairs. Media and political professionals, as well as government officials, lobbyists, and participants in independent political organizations, will find the volume useful in developing a better understanding of how the media and communication function in political settings.

In developing the list of entry terms to be included in this encyclopedia, we consulted several sources. First, we considered indexes and lists of topics in other types of political communication reference materials. These included The Handbook of Political Communication (Nimmo & Sanders, 1981), The Handbook of Political Communication Research (Kaid, 2004), the Communication Yearbooks sponsored by the International Communication Association, and major journals in the field such as Political Communication. We also consulted other encyclopedias on related topics, such as the Encyclopedia of Politics (Carlisle, 2005), The Encyclopedia of Television (Newcomb, 2004), the Encyclopedia of Radio (Sterling & Keith, 2004), and the Encyclopedia of Media and Politics (Schaefer & Birkland, 2004). We further examined the indexes of many other books and reference materials related to the political communication discipline.

Additional advice on the headword list came from our Advisory Board of distinguished scholars, Max McCombs, Denis McQuail, Doris Graber, Robert Denton, and Kathleen J. M. Haynes. Reliance on Haynes's expertise in library and information science, as well as her work with Lynda Lee Kaid on the development of the Political Commercial Archive database (Kaid, Haynes, & Rand, 1996), allowed us to shape the entry terms in line with Library of Congress Subject Headings (LCSH).

The nearly 600 entry terms in this encyclopedia are comprised of four different levels. The first level contains up to 500 words and is designed for simple concepts, individual persons, a book or reference item, or important political communication events or happenings that are limited in time or scope. These include political leaders whose political communication styles or actions warrant description and classic books in the field. More advanced concepts and those related to other broader concepts in the field generally justified entries at the second level of 1,000 words. Examples of entries at this level include Political Disaffection; Radio, Politics and; Citizen Journalism; and the Kennedy Assassination. The description of a major subfield within political communication or a concept with many different aspects or ties to other theoretical or research concepts called for an entry at the third level of 2,000 to 2,500 words. These included Diffusion of Innovations, Party Identification, Political Engagement, and Campaign Finance. Finally, the longest entries (5,000 words) were reserved for major concepts or topics that overlap many different areas and many different theoretical concepts. Examples of these larger entries include Agenda Setting, Political Advertising, Political Information Processing, and Media Bias.

We also attempted to provide many synonyms or alternative forms of concepts with blind entries. For instance, a user who might be interested in civic engagement would find that term listed with a "See Political Engagement" notation, pointing the user to the entry term under which civic engagement is discussed. Similarly, a user looking for civic journalism would find an entry directing the user to Public Journalism. Entries also include cross-reference information where relevant, thus also pointing the user to other topics or headwords that might yield additional information on the topic. Each entry term also includes, where appropriate, a list of further readings or references that can help a user delve more deeply into a subject or topic.

Three other parameters are particularly important in considering what was and was not included in the headwords for this encyclopedia. First, it is important to stress the importance of communication in our conceptualization. Political topics were not included unless they had some direct and important tie to communication and communication processes. Consequently, every political leader or politician was not included. Only individuals whose communication actions have been particularly important or about whom major communication research or undertakings have revolved were included. Likewise, concepts from political science or sociology that have generated considerable scholarship in those disciplines but have not been advanced greatly by applications of communication theory or research were omitted. Examples of concepts or entities omitted on these grounds included Hegemony, Isolationism, Political Economy, Xenophobia, and Immigration. A second important parameter was the time period covered. In general, this encyclopedia concentrates on headword entries that represent the field of political communication since the middle of the 20th century. A few very classic and central persons and ideas are included from earlier times, including Aristotle and his writings, the persuasion techniques of Machiavelli, the propaganda techniques from World War II, and the fireside chats of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Nonetheless, important work and persons before 1950 were sometimes omitted because of the need to include more recent and timely material.

A third parameter of this encyclopedia is its inherent emphasis on political communication from the point of view of the United States. There is substantial and important research and scholarship on political communication in international contexts. Researchers in Western Europe, particularly in Germany, Britain, and France, have made important contributions to political communication theory and research. Political communication research in Asia and in Australia and New Zealand is expanding rapidly. Latin America and Africa have also yielded important scholarship in recent years, as have expanding new democracies in the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. We have included major developments from these areas where published scholarship and available reference materials yielded sufficient depth for inclusion. Nonetheless, it is still necessary to acknowledge the dominance of U.S. researchers and published scholarship on political communication, and our entry terms and the treatment of them in this volume often represent this U.S. perspective.

Further Readings

Carlisle, R. (Ed.). (2005). Encyclopedia of politics. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Kaid, L. L. (Ed.). (2004). The handbook of political communication research. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Kaid, L. L., Haynes, K. J. M., & Rand, C. E. (1996). The Political Communication Center: A catalog and guide to the archival collections. Norman, OK: Political Communication Center.

Newcomb, H. (Ed.). (2004). The encyclopedia of television (2nd ed.). London: Taylor & Francis.

Nimmo, D., & Sanders, K. R. (Eds.). (1981). The handbook of political communication. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Schaefer, T. M., & Birkland, T. A. (Eds.). (2004). Encyclopedia of media and politics. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press.

Sterling, C. S., & Keith, M. C. (Eds.). (2004). Encyclopedia of radio. New York: Routledge.

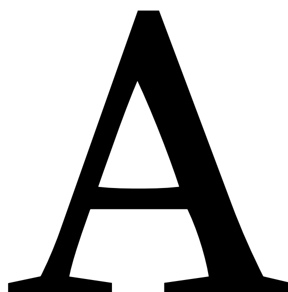
Acknowledgments

This encyclopedia is the joint work of many contributors, and the editors, first and foremost, want to thank our contributors for their hard work and dedication to the project. Without their combined expertise and willingness to share their knowledge of political communication, the encyclopedia would not have been possible.

Our advisory board of distinguished scholars included Robert Denton, Doris Graber, Kathleen Haynes, Max McCombs, and Denis McQuail. They were particularly helpful in developing the headword/entry list and in suggesting possible authors and contributors.

The editorial staff at Sage Publications also made essential contributions to this project. We particularly appreciate the efforts of Margaret Seawell, Leticia Gutierrez, Todd Armstrong, and Yvette Pollastrini. Most especially we are grateful to Sara Tauber for keeping us on track and helping us solve the daily problems, large and small.

As always, we could not have completed this project without the help and support of our spouses, Salah Bacha and Cliff Jones.



AARP

AARP, formally known as the American Association of Retired Persons, is a nonprofit membership organization of persons 50 and older that is dedicated to addressing the needs and interests of older adults. Along with providing information and products/services to its more than 30 million members, AARP is a powerful force in advocating for social change in the political arena.

AARP has considerable political influence partly because of the large number of voters the organization represents. Furthermore, older adults tend to vote more actively than other age groups. Along with representing a large voting constituency, AARP also spends millions of dollars on lobbying. In fact, AARP is often considered to be the most powerful congressional lobby in the United States. For example, Politicalmoneyline (http://www.fecinfo.com/) reported that AARP accounted for the highest lobbying expenditures made by any one group or organization in 2003; they spent over $20 million supporting the proposed prescription drug plan that year. When in 1997 Fortune magazine compiled a ranking of the 25 lobbying groups with the most political influence in Washington, D.C., AARP was ranked No. 1.

AARP's efforts to influence public policy are not limited to lobbying legislators. AARP makes a concerted effort and spends large amounts to reach its membership and the general public to garner support or opposition regarding pending legislation. For example, in regard to privatizing social security, AARP held dozens of forums on the issue, sent mailings to its members, and spent millions of dollars on advertising opposing private social security accounts. AARP's magazine (the largest circulation magazine in the United States), newspaper-styled Bulletin, and Web site provide channels AARP uses, in part, to motivate their vast membership on particular issues. AARP's Web site has an issues and elections section in which they explain where AARP stands on issues, encourage grassroots networking, provide briefs on political candidates, and present directives to members to either support or oppose pending legislation. For example, in 2006, AARP's Web site urged members to "stop TABOR" (the taxpayer bill of rights) and "get involved, fight back against TABOR."

Determination of AARP's public policy is accomplished by a special advisory group of 25 volunteers, the National Policy Council. This group considers members' views on issues obtained through calls and letters, surveys, and town meetings. The National Policy Council then makes recommendations to AARP's Board of Directors, who in turn establish AARP's stance on issues such as social security, health care, retirement, and Medicare.

Even though AARP is officially nonpartisan, it is generally regarded to be moderate to left-leaning. Traditionally, AARP's support has tended to align more closely with Democratic policies. However, AARP stood beside the Republican administration in helping to pass a prescription drug bill in 2003. Perhaps in order to maintain a nonpartisan association, AARP does not have a political action committee (PAC), endorse political candidates, or contribute money to political parties or candidates' campaigns.

Terri Ann Bailey

See also Aging and Politics

Further Readings

AARP Web site: http://www.aarp.org

Washington University Center for Aging—St. Louis. (n.d.). Mission statement. Retrieved September 15, 2006, from http://wucfa.wustl.edu/missionstatement/statement.htm

Abdullah II (1962–)

King Abdullah II ascended to the throne as monarch of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan in February 1999 following the death of his father, King Hussein. Educated at British Sandhurst Military Academy, King Abdullah II has served in the Army as commander of the Jordanian Special Forces (1994). His global views, coupled with his perfect mastery of both English and Arabic, have resulted in positive political communication performances and open orientations to the media. Although Jordanian media were already experiencing some liberalization in their public discourse and structures in the aftermath of King Hussein's death, the realities of both geography and politics seemed to have mitigated against sustainable free practices. Surrounded by politically unstable settings in Palestine, Iraq, and Lebanon, Jordan, under King Abdullah II, has had to cope with multiple challenges that were bound to affect its destiny. Lack of regional stability and the rise of terrorism as the defining features of the new era have cast dark shadows on Jordan's media system.

King Abdullah II proclaimed continuity of his father's path. Addressing a group of international media reporters in 2000, the king noted that "the legacy that I inherited from my late father, His Majesty King Hussein, and from my grandfathers, is one that has always upheld the integrity of human life. It has consistently called for respecting the rights, and the freedom, of the individual." When he assumed his position as king of Jordan in 1999, Abdullah II was perceived by many as a liberalizing force set on changing and restructuring some of the archaic structures of the Hashemite kingdom. He has spoken out in favor of strengthening press freedom and modernizing the media. In a February 2003 speech, the king advocated "transparency in our society, because we have nothing to fear." Yet, the state still controls much of the media even though some positive changes have been initiated. The Jordanian press has seen several positive developments under King Abdullah's reign, including the reform of several articles of the restrictive Press and Publications Law (PPL), the passage of new legislation to allow private broadcast media, and an apparent halt to the practice of arbitrarily detaining journalists.

Muhammad Ayish

Further Readings

Lynch, M. (1999). State interests and public spheres: The international politics of Jordan's identity. New York: Columbia University Press.

Rugh, W. A. (2004). Arab mass media: Newspapers, radio and television in Arab politics. Westport, CT: Prager.

Abortion

Few sociopolitical issues polarize contemporary American politics as much as abortion. Although most polls indicate that a majority of Americans support the legality of abortion, a host of corollary issues remain quite controversial: These include parental and/or spousal notification, the role of states and the courts in crafting abortion policy, and the moral and ethical questions invoked by various abortive procedures such as "partial birth." Contemporary abortion discourse remains emotionally charged on both sides with abortion rights advocates arguing that reproductive choice is a fundamental right of all women and opponents of the practice claiming that nearly any form of abortion for nearly any reason is "murder."

The conflict over reproductive choice in the United States dates back to 1821 when Connecticut became the first state to ban abortion. An array of various state and local laws prohibited or otherwise restricted abortions for the next century and a half, yet the controversy remained somewhat muted because many of these laws were seldom enforced by local officials. In the 1950s and 1960s, many states began to liberalize their abortion laws in light of the American Law Institute's proposal that exceptions to the proscription of abortion should be made in cases of rape, incest, health of the mother, or fetal deformity. Events such as the thalidomide (a popular tranquilizer shown to cause severe birth defects) scare, reports of "back alley" abortions, and the work of a loose confederation of physicians and women's rights activists further influenced many states to repeal or modify their abortion statutes. In the 1960s, the American Medical Association eventually endorsed these efforts after vigorous debates among its membership about the ethical issues involved and the medical utility of abortion. These events permanently forced the issue into the national consciousness.

In 1970, "Jane Roe" (Norma McCorvey) sued the district attorney of Dallas County in Texas claiming that the vagueness and breadth of the state's criminal abortion statute—which permitted abortion only in cases of imminent danger to the mother's life as defined by a physician—violated her privacy rights implicitly guaranteed by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments. Roe sought to terminate a pregnancy which she claimed was the result of rape—a claim she later recanted. The District Court for the Northern District of Texas permitted a Texas physician then under prosecution for providing abortions (James Hallford) and a married couple challenging a similar Georgia statute (John and Mary Doe) to join the suit. While the District Court found for Roe, it refused to grant the injunction against the state of Texas sought by the plaintiffs, prompting an appeal to the Supreme Court. The case was argued before the High Court in December 1971 and reargued in October 1972. In a 7–2 decision, the Court held the Texas law to be unconstitutional in view of the Fourteenth Amendment's protection of personal liberty, which Justice Blackmun argued was "broad enough to encompass a woman's decision" to terminate a pregnancy within the first trimester.

The political effects of the Roe ruling were tremendous. Aside from affirming "a right to choose," which invalidated the remaining state laws restricting abortion, the ruling federalized the creation of abortion policy. In short, Roe (along with the Supreme Court's decisions in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services in 1989 and Planned Parenthood v. Casey in 1992) initiated a new era in abortion politics in which states, the federal government, and the courts would all participate in policymaking. The decades since have produced intense judicial and legislative efforts from both sides of the controversy. The effort to ban late-term or "partial birth" abortions is among the most recent and prominent of these efforts. In the mid-1990s, abortion opponents such as the National Right to Life Committee and the Family Research Council waged an all-out lobbying offensive for state and national legislation banning the procedure. Groups such as the National Organization for Women and Planned Parenthood opposed these efforts with equal vigor. President Clinton twice vetoed such bans citing concerns over a lack of maternal health exceptions. In 2003, abortion opponents again took up the fight in the Republican-controlled Congress and successfully lobbied for passage of the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, which George W. Bush signed in March of that year. However, the legislation was not enforced prior to 2007 because of federal court challenges such as Gonzales v. Carhart. In April 2007, in Gonzales v. Carhart, the Supreme Court upheld the validity of the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act on its face but ruled that the statute might be subject to further challenge as applied to particular situations. As such, the abortion controversy will continue to be engaged at every level of government for the foreseeable future.

Apart from the federal implications, the abortion issue has profoundly affected sociopolitical discourse in the United States. Both sides of the controversy often engage in discourse designed more to mobilize supporters via emotional images and language rather than engage opponents or outsiders in meaningful rhetorical dialogue. For instance, Rev. Randall Terry—founder of the radical antiabortion group Operation Rescue—has been known to display aborted fetuses in jars and boxes and to encourage members to engage in forms of civil disobedience, such as blocking the entrances to abortion clinics, to convey their message that "abortion is murder." Similarly, some radical abortion rights advocates wave wire hangers to invoke the specter of "back alley" self-abortions when arguing against proposed abortion regulations. Although the vast majority of abortion rights supporters and opponents are certainly more nuanced in their views, there can be little doubt as to the polarizing effects of such discourse. Indeed, the ubiquitous and misleading labels of "pro-choice" and "pro-life" serve to create in-group cohesion via slogan as much as they also define, isolate, and vilify the group's enemies. Contemporary abortion discourse reminds one of Henry Kissinger's well-known mantra that "great tragedies occur not when right confronts wrong, but when two rights face each other." In short, the abortion controversy remains a polarizing issue in American politics.

David C. Bailey

See also Schroeder, Patricia

Further Readings

Condit, C. M. (1990). Decoding abortion rhetoric: Communicating social change. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Segers, M. C., & Byrnes, T. A. (Eds.). (1995). Abortion politics in American states. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe.

Tatalovich, R. (1997). The politics of abortion in the United States and Canada: A comparative study. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe.

Adenauer, Konrad (1876–1967)

Konrad Adenauer, the first chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany, used professional media relations to achieve his political goals. With the assistance of professional communication management, he became a legendary leader. Many people still regard him as the most outstanding German statesman. Due to fundamental rebuilding after the Second World War, the Adenauer era (1949–1963) plays a key role as far as political communication in Germany is concerned. Adenauer's party, the Christian Democratic Union (CDU) is considered to be the first people's party in Central Europe. Modern public relations (PR) was a substantial factor in its establishment. In the early fifties the public could not be easily reached through party press or classical environmental organizations such as trade unions or churches. Media-oriented public relations programs were needed to integrate different classes and denominations. The newly created CDU could not depend on a strong party press and therefore had to focus on the developing commercial media in order to mobilize voters.

Media relations were directed toward newspapers and radio. Television played an insignificant role in early media adjustment of political communication: Range and transmission patterns of German television were still too limited. Adenauer's repertoire already contained issues and event management suitable for the media, offering information as well as support for journalists. By 1953 a strategy of media-oriented personalization is recognizable, which let the political program step back behind the person. The most important instrument of Adenauer's media relations was the "tea discussions." Selected journalists participated in these informal background sessions.

Adenauer's party played only a marginal role in the chancellor's communication. The level of organization was clearly underdeveloped until the early seventies. The organizational center was the newly founded Bundespresseamt (Federal Press Office). Substantial impulses proceeded also from the Bundeskanzleramt (Office of the Chancellor). Its first office chief, Otto Lenz, built a network of PR organizations that were seemingly independent but were financed by the Press Office. They conducted lobbying on critical issues such as the rearmament. Adenauer was the first to use commercial agencies: Since 1950 "Allensbach," an institute for public opinion, has provided polls regarding political tendencies. Other polling institutes such as "EMNID" and advertising agencies such as "Dr. Hegemann" followed.

Despite their forward-looking spirit, Adenauer and his staff occasionally used methods of propaganda or national censorship in order to discourage undesirable reporting. For example, the editor of the magazine Spiegel was arrested due to a critical report on the German army.

Lars A. Rosumek

Further Readings

Buchwald, F. A. (1991). Adenauers Informationspolitik. Strategien amtlicher Presse- und Öffentlichkeitsarbeit in der Kanzlerdemokratie [Adenauer's information politics: Strategies for official press and public works in the Chancellor democracy]. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Mainz.

Hoffman, J. J. (1995). Adenauer: "Vorsicht und keine Indiskretion!" Zur Informationspolitik und Öffentlichkeitsarbeit der Bundesregierung 1949–1955 [Adenauer: "Caution and no indiscretions!" To the information politics and public works of the Federal Government 1949–1955]. Aachen: Shaker.

Padgett, S. (Ed.). (1994). Adenauer to Kohl: The development of the German chancellorship. London: C. Hurst.

Rosumek, L. (2007). Die Kanzler und die Medien. Acht Porträts von Adenauer bis Merkel [Chancellors and the media: Eight portraits from Adenauer through Merkel]. Frankfurt: Campus.

Schwarz, H.-P. (1991). Adenauer (2 vols.). Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlagsanstalt.

Advocacy Advertising

Advocacy advertising—encompassing issue advertising, legislative issue advertising, editorial advertising, and cause advertising—is a well-established facet of U.S. public policy environments and American political campaigns. Unlike political candidate advertising, advocacy advertising is characterized as ads sponsored by third-party groups, such as corporate entities, issue or cause-related citizen groups, and organized labor. Advocacy ads either promote or denounce a certain policy agenda. Advocacy advertising is likely to escalate whenever the political environment is uncertain or when political situations suggest opportunities or threats to the vested interests of advocacy groups. The uncertainty surrounding political elections makes advocacy advertising during campaign seasons particularly significant.

Rise of Advocacy Advertising

Advocacy advertising surrounding the 1994 health care reform debates changed the landscape not only for political campaigns, but also for the public policy process by significantly altering the mediated strategy advocacy groups used to gain control of mediated messages. President Bill Clinton's appointment of First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton to head the Task Force on National Health Care Reform, and his subsequent address to Congress presenting a proposed universal health care plan, created an uncertain environment for one of the issues with the greatest economic impact in the United States. Political and economic uncertainty for advocacy groups concerned with favorable and unfavorable consequences of the Clinton health care reform proposal resulted in unprecedented levels of televised advocacy advertisements aimed to sway attitudes of citizens and legislative decision makers. The rise of advocacy advertising created debate over issues such as moneyed interests in politics and First Amendment free speech protections for these groups.

An estimated $50 million was spent on health care advocacy advertising by the numerous groups battling over the Clinton plan. The Health Care Reform Project, the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation, the League of Women Voters, the California Wellness Foundation, and the Democratic National Committee were among the groups supporting health care reform; the Health Insurance Association of America (HIAA), the American Medical Association, the National Restaurant Association, and the Project for the Republican Future used advocacy advertising to challenge the proposed plan. The HIAA was the most prominent group to attempt to shape interpretations of the Clinton plan. To oppose the proposed Clinton health care reform proposal, the HIAA organized and created the Coalition for Health Insurance Choices as a nonprofit advocacy group. Creation of the Coalition for Health Insurance Choices allowed the HIAA to funnel unlimited amounts of money to the Coalition for advertising expenditures and other media advocacy.

The HIAA alone spent an estimated $15 million on a television advertising campaign that included the widely publicized "Harry and Louise" ads. Harry and Louise were fictional middle-class characters created to dramatize a typical couple agonizing over a complex and bureaucratic plan. The Healthcare Reform Project, a partnership of consumer, labor, and business entities, was formed to support the Clinton plan and defend against the complexities and fear Harry and Louise created by labeling the proposed plan another huge government bureaucracy. Consequently the impact of Harry and Louise is widely debated; some media credit this couple with bringing down the health care reform proposal and cite this campaign as ushering in a new style of advocacy advertising. Although advocacy ads may sway public opinion, attempts to target messages in media markets of congressional members holding important minority and majority leadership roles on critical congressional committees suggest that the main goal of the ads was to influence policymakers.

The increase in advocacy advertising expenditures from $50 million during the 1994 mid-term elections to more than $500 million during the 2000 elections demonstrates clearly the increasing reliance on advocacy advertising as a means to shape policy agendas and decisions. Reports from 2004—especially considering the increase of advocacy groups under the label of 527 organizations—again revealed significant surges in advertising spending for these types of ads as estimates for advocacy advertising expenditures topped $1 billion. Even though 2005 was considered a light campaign year, with gubernatorial elections in New Jersey and Virginia representing the most high-profile elections, spending by advocacy groups continued. In this case, the advocacy groups advertised to influence Supreme Court nominations, as well as issues such as prescription drug coverage and social security reform.

Advocacy Advertising and Campaign Finance Reform

Controversy about undue individual and corporate financial influence in U.S. political campaigns dates back to some of the earliest presidential campaigns. Although the Tillman Act in 1907 and the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 respectively banned direct corporate and union contributions to federal candidates, these laws were not frequently enforced.

In 1976, the Buckley v. Valeo decision distinguished candidate and advocacy advertising by the labels "express advocacy" and "issue advocacy," respectively. Express advocacy included communication that explicitly asked voters to "vote for" or "vote against," "defeat" or "reject," "elect" or "cast a ballot" for a candidate or referendum. Campaign finances raised specifically for purposes expressly advocating on behalf of a candidate are subject to federal campaign finance laws and require contribution and expenditure records in keeping with legal statutes. Advertising, or other forms of communication, not expressly or explicitly urging voters through use of the express words were classified as issue advocacy. The Supreme Court's Buckley v. Valeo ruling removed issue advocacy advertising from the Federal Election Campaign Act because this form of communication did not expressly advocate on behalf of a candidate. As a result, issue advocacy is interpreted to include communication intended to support or oppose legislative proposals, policy issues, or public policy, but does not specifically mention the goal to elect or defeat candidates or referenda. Based on congressional interpretation of campaign finance laws, advocacy advertising is protected by freedom of speech provisions under the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution.

The Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (BCRA), originally labeled McCain-Feingold after Senators John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Russ Feingold (D-Minn.), was adopted on November 6, 2002, with the intent to prohibit "soft-money" contributions for the purposes of party activities. There were no previous contribution limits on soft money, because it did not directly contribute to a political candidate. The goal of the law, effective immediately following the 2002 election cycle, was to limit severely soft money and to reduce the influence of labor and corporate political action committees by restricting advertising from these groups in the months prior to a general election. However, a significant loophole existed in section 527 of the federal tax code. The 527 loophole allowed for the creation of what are referred to as 527 groups. These groups are able to receive unlimited contributions from any source and spend the contributions on anything other than express advocacy. Groups organized to exploit the 527 loophole are able to raise and spend unlimited amounts of "soft money," which they are able to spend on campaign advertising as long as they do not expressly advocate for the election or defeat of a federal candidate. Many 527 groups exploit the campaign finance loophole and air political advertisements that, although not expressly, present messages that subtly and not-so-subtly attempt to influence the outcome of elections. Reports of fundraising activities by 527 groups demonstrated that some organizations observed more than 100% increases in funds raised and spent in the short time period between 2002 and 2004. Estimates on combined advertising expenditures alone from 527 groups topped $1 billion during 2004, which is up from more than $250 million during 2002.

Advocacy Advertising and 527 Groups

Several 527 groups, such as Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, America Coming Together, The Media Fund, Progress for America, and MoveOn.org, quickly emerged as significant players in the political landscape during the 2004 elections. The top 11 most successful fundraising 527 groups during the 2004 election cycle each raised and spent more than $10 million, largely for advertising purposes. The top 527 groups in order of fundraising during 2004 were: America Coming Together; Joint Victory Campaign 2004; Media Fund; Progress for America; Service Employees International Union (SEIU); American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, Club for Growth, MoveOn.org, New Democratic Network, and Citizens for a Strong Senate. Clearly, the advertising and publicity strategies by some of these groups produced higher name recognition and notoriety during the campaign. The Swift Boat Veterans for Truth advertising strategy that showed former troops and military spouses questioning John Kerry's bravery raised awareness for this group. In addition to spending more than $10 million on ads in key districts during 2004, MoveOn.org gained public awareness through a creative strategy of featuring "real people" ads that documented MoveOn.org members' dissatisfaction with President Bush.

Although these groups do not expressly advocate on behalf of a candidate, their support for or against a candidate is so heavily implied that they may appear indistinguishable from candidate or party ads with the exception of the candidate's endorsement. Basically, any individual or group can start a 527-campaign fund as long as campaign political activities and day-to-day functions are maintained separately.

Progress for America Voter Fund is a 527 group closely aligned with the Bush Administration and the Republican National Committee. Federal Election Commission data shows that the Project for America Voter Fund outspent both the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and The Media Fund by a rate of three to one during the final stretch of the 2004 presidential campaign. Although Project for America aired negative ads against Kerry, it received the most recognition for the ad Ashley's Story. The ad shows President Bush embracing and consoling Ashley Faulkner, the 16-year-old girl whose mother was a victim of the September 11 terrorist attacks. Some political observers identify this ad as the most influential ad of the 2004 election.

During the extremely negative final weeks of the 2004 presidential campaign, Ashley's Story became the definitive ad in the lead up to the election. Its positive message, depicting a compassionate and caring President Bush, provided voters with a message incomparable to other messages in the media environment during this time. Ashley's Story included the following audio message:

Lynn Faulkner—Mason, Ohio:	My wife Wendy was murdered by terrorists on September 11.
Male Announcer:	The Faulkner's daughter Ashley closed up emotionally. But when President George W. Bush came to Lebanon, Ohio, she went to see him, as she had with her mother four years before.
Linda Prince—Family Friend:	He walked toward me and I said, Mr. President, this young lady lost her mother in the World Trade Center.
Ashley:	And he turned around and he came back and he said I know that's hard. Are you all right?
Linda Prince:	Our president took Ashley in his arms and just embraced her, and it was at that moment that we saw Ashley's eyes fill up with tears.
Ashley:	He's the most powerful man in the world and all he wants to do is make sure I'm safe, that I'm okay.
Lynn Faulkner:	What I saw was what I want to see in the heart and in the soul of the man who sits in the highest elected office in our country.
Male Announcer:	Progress for America Voter Fund is responsible for the content of this message.

Progress for American Voter Fund is clearly, although not expressly, advocating on behalf of President Bush's reelection in this spot.

Additionally, advocacy advertising is controversial because the advocacy group names may be difficult to interpret. Take, for example, the Progress for America Voter Fund. To the average voter, the name Progress for America hardly represents anything disagreeable. However, if voters were aware that Progress for America was closely aligned with the Bush administration and the Republican National Committee, they would be in a better position to evaluate the potential bias in the advocacy ads. The Coalition for Health Insurance Choices—although described by the HIAA as a movement including thousands of businesses, groups, and individuals—shared the same office building, advertising and public relations firm with HIAA. As a result of the close affiliation of advocacy groups with candidates, administration, and groups otherwise restricted by campaign finance laws, the loophole for 527 groups creates great controversy between those arguing that changes in campaign finance would infringe upon free speech and those that would like to see moneyed interests in politics diminished.

Advocacy Advertising Impact

Like political candidate advertising, the role of advocacy advertising content and effects is widely debated. Academic research generally fails to demonstrate that advocacy ads directly influence candidate preference among voters, so the worries that advocacy ads come too close to candidate ads may not be so serious. Even during the health care reform debate, many Americans were not familiar with Harry and Louise from the ad campaign, but instead came to recognize these characters based on media coverage of the ads in stories about the debate. Nevertheless, research also appears to show that these types of ads may be more influential among nonpartisans and undecided voters. What appears to be missing from academic research on the topic of advocacy advertising is research attempting to measure how such ads may influence opinion leaders and decision makers in legislative roles.

Nevertheless, substantial criticism remains targeted toward advocacy advertising based on assertions that it is largely sponsored by big corporate, moneyed interests. As long as ad advocacy advertising continues, there is increased need for media organizations to help citizens digest the group names and their affiliations and the message strategies they use in their ads. Advocacy advertising is rarely the focus of media ad watches. Considering the pervasiveness of advocacy advertising in the American political process, the claims advanced in these ads should be subject to media scrutiny to help voters assess the validity of advertising claims.

John C. Tedesco

See also Ad Watch; Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act; Campaign Finance; First Amendment; Political Advertising, Independent

Further Readings

eSymposium: The noncandidate campaign: Soft money and issue advocacy in the 2002 congressional elections. Retrieved June 27, 2007, from http://www.apsanet.org/section_636.cfm

Kaid, L. L., Tedesco, J. C., & Spiker, J. (1996). Mediated conflicts over Clinton policies: Political advertising and the battle for public opinion. In R. Denton & R. Holloway (Eds.), The Clinton presidency: Images, issues, and communication strategies (pp. 103–121). Westport, CT: Greenwood.

Magleby, D., & Monson, Q. (2002). The last hurrah? Soft money and issue advocacy in the 2002 congressional elections. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution.

Pfau, M., Holbert, R. L., Szabo, E. A., & Kaminski, K. (2002). Issue-advocacy versus candidate advertising: Effects on candidate preference and democratic process. Journal of Communication, 52(2), 301–315.

Ad Watch

An ad watch is a media report and evaluation of political advertising content. Washington Post columnist David Broder is credited with urging fellow journalists to be more watchful of political advertising messages and making coverage of advertising claims a standard feature of campaign news. Broder called for more ad watches following the intensely negative nature of the 1988 presidential campaign in which political advertising played a significant role in shaping campaign news coverage. In fact, televised political advertising is a prominent feature in most U.S. political campaigns. Televised ads, also known as spots, comprise a significant portion of presidential candidates' campaign budgets and figure substantially in most statewide and congressional elections. Candidates, political party organizations, and issue advocacy groups rely heavily on televised political advertising because it provides direct control of the messages targeted to voters. Ad watches provide citizens some assistance in processing and evaluating claims made in political ads.

Broder's call following the 1988 presidential campaign, and the negative nature of ensuing presidential campaigns, resulted in more ad watches as journalists attempted to police dishonest or ethically suspect campaigning. Ad watches fit nicely into the dominant horse-race style of political reporting as journalists are able to dramatize the attack and defend interplay of candidate ad strategies. When candidates use political advertising as a form of campaign dialogue—attacking opponents or responding to attacks—journalists are able to create news packages that contribute to political discourse and the fourth estate function of media. Beyond the fourth estate function of questioning true and false claims advanced by candidates and serving as an independent source of information about ad claims, political ad watches took hold as a form of political reporting for several news management considerations.

The dominant nature of political advertising in campaigns means that this campaign format serves as a continual source of political news for journalists. Furthermore, whether aired in their entirety or as an ad bite—or a short clip—ads transfer easily to the news format since they supply journalists with visual components for more appealing news reports. Unfortunately, no systematic approach to political ad watches exists. As a result, it appears that more negative ads become the focus of ad watches. Although history informs us that negative ads are frequently home to misleading claims, it also shows us that ads promoting a candidate tend to mislead the audience.

As far back as the 1952 "Eisenhower Answers America" presidential ad campaign, candidates manipulated messages contained in their spots. Eisenhower's ads manipulated audio and video content to give the impression that Eisenhower was responding to a range of citizen questions. Instead, Eisenhower provided staged answers to a variety of issues on his campaign agenda, and citizen actors later were drafted to ask questions that addressed Eisenhower's previously filmed answers.

By modern standards, Eisenhower's advertising strategy may not appear to be an egregious violation of ethical standards. However, more recent audio and video technological developments provide campaigns with tools capable of more blatant, deceptive, and ethically suspect strategies labeled as technodistortions. A more disturbing example of deceptive audio and video techniques by campaigns in political advertising was uncovered during the 1996 Virginia senate race featuring Senator John Warner and his opponent Mark Warner. One of Senator Warner's televised ads manipulated a 1994 photo that featured former Virginia Governor L. Douglas Wilder and Virginia Senator Charles Robb shaking hands while President Clinton was posed between the two. When the photo appeared in Senator Warner's advertisement, the face of Robb was seamlessly replaced by the face of Mark Warner, misleading voters to perceive that Senator Warner's opponent Mark Warner was shaking hands with Wilder and associating with Clinton. Senator Warner manipulated the photo in an attempt to link his opponent with two unpopular political figures in Virginia. In this case, the manipulation was uncovered and widely reported in media ad watches. It is extremely unlikely that ordinary citizens would pick up on this re-creation of history and virtually impossible for them to detect the photo manipulation techniques used in the spot.

Candidates have long recognized that there are benefits to having their ads covered as news items. When aired in their entirety within a news segment, it is possible that political ads reach millions of voters. Furthermore, ads aired in the context of a news story may be enhanced by the credible news environment. History informs us that some candidates create advertising messages to earn free media coverage. Lyndon Johnson's famous 1964 "Daisy Girl" spot, which contains visual images of an atomic bomb explosion to elicit nuclear war fears, aired only once as a paid political spot but was shown in its entirety by the major news networks in their campaign news coverage at the time. Examples of modern political advertising shaping the news agenda are frequent. Since journalists appear to give more attention to ads that are controversial, dramatic, and evocative, campaigns create ad messages with the intent to maximize the likelihood that their ads will be featured as news.

Academic researchers studying the content and effects of ad watches on voters find that specific reporting strategies are more likely to result in favorable effects. But, ads do not need to use technological manipulations in order to mislead voters. Prior ad watches show the public that candidates play loose with the truth even in advertisements that promote their accomplishments, issue positions, and prior public service records.

Simply including advertising messages in news reports is not sufficient for helping voters discern true or false messages. Academic researchers studying the content and effects of ad watches on voters find that specific reporting strategies are more likely to result in favorable effects. If visual aspects of ads are included in ad watches, stopping or interrupting ads immediately following misleading audio or visual claims through the use of on-screen graphics and voice-overs helps voters understand specific features of advertisements that are questionable. Additionally, rather than showing ad bites or ads full screen, researchers recommend placing ads in downsized, labeled graphics to lessen the visual impact of the suspect ad and to make it less likely that free air time for candidate spots will be provided.

Reliance on paid advertising as a significant form of campaign communication continues in modern political campaigns. Whether purposefully playing loose with facts and attempting to deceive the public with technical manipulations of audio and video content or presenting voters with nonmalicious but questionable claims, the need for ad watches continues as the typical voter is not equipped to fact check many advertising messages independently.

In the future, journalists may wish to create a systematic procedure for evaluating ad claims. Since the high volume of ads aired across political campaigns each election cycle is beyond the number possible for journalists to evaluate, a systematic trigger or random procedure for evaluating ads may help journalists avoid claims that they focus predominantly on negative ads, ads from candidates of a specific party, or ads that are developed specifically to create news attention.

A new direction in ad watches has been the use of the World Wide Web as a channel. Newspaper and television stations are using their Web sites to post ad watch material from their news broadcasts and, in some cases, providing extended coverage and expanded explanations on their Web sites. The University of Pennsylvania's Annenberg School of Communication also maintains a Web site to analyze ads. Called FactCheck, it is available at www.factcheck.org. The increased space available on the Web has also encouraged candidates, political parties, and third-party interest groups to engage in their own adwatch analysis on their Web sites. These trends will surely be useful to voters in providing more information and assistance in evaluating claims.

John C. Tedesco

See also Broder, David; Daisy Girl Ad; Fourth Estate, Media as; Journalism, Political; Negative Advertising; News Coverage of Politics; Political Advertising; TechnoDistortions

Further Readings

Capella, J. N., & Jamieson, K. H. (1994). Broadcast adwatch effects: A field experiment. Communication Research, 21(3), 342–365.

Kaid, L. L., Gobetz, R. H., Garner, J., Leland, C. M., & Scott, D. K. (1993). Television news and presidential campaigns: The legitimization of televised political advertising. Social Science Quarterly, 74(2), 274–285.

Kaid, L. L., McKinney, M. S., Tedesco, J. C., & Gaddie, K. (1999). Journalistic responsibility and political advertising: A content analysis of coverage by state and local media. Communication Studies, 50(4), 279–293.

Kaid, L. L., Tedesco, J. C., & McKinnon, L. M. (1996). Presidential ads as nightly news: A content analysis of 1988 and 1992 televised adwatches. Journal of Broadcasting and Electronic Media, 40, 297–308.

McKinnon, L. M., Kaid, L. L., Murphy, J., Acree, C. K. (1996). Policing political ads: An analysis of five leading newspapers' responses to 1992 political advertisements. Journalism and Mass Communications Quarterly, 73(1), 66–76.

Pfau, M., & Louden, A. (1994). Effectiveness of ad-watch formats in deflecting political attack ads. Communication Research, 21(3), 325–341.

Richardson, G. W., Jr. (1998). Building a better adwatch: Talking patterns to the American voter. The Harvard International Journal of Press/Politics, 3, 76–95.

Tedesco, J. C., McKinnon, L. M., & Kaid, L. L. (1996). Advertising watchdogs: A content analysis of print and broadcast ad watches. The Harvard International Journal of Press/Politics, 1, 76–93.

Affirmative Action

Affirmative action requires employers and college/university admissions procedures to give special consideration to minorities and female applicants. The purpose of affirmative action, as it was originally conceived, is to reverse the detrimental effects that discrimination had on minorities prior to 1964. Through subsequent Supreme Court rulings, affirmative action policies cannot impose quotas or inflict reverse discrimination. The goal of affirmative action policies is to increase diversity in employment and educational arenas.

Affirmative action was first mentioned on March 6, 1961, as part of President John F. Kennedy's Executive Order 10925, which mandated the creation of the Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity. However, it would be four years before affirmative action was brought to the public's attention.

The Civil Rights Act was signed into law on July 2, 1964. The Civil Rights Act prohibited discrimination based on race, creed, color, or national origin. The Act also included the creation of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to oversee the implementation of the Act in the workplace.

President Lyndon B. Johnson introduced affirmative action in 1965 through a speech at Howard University and the subsequent crafting of Executive Order 11246. Through this Executive Order, government contractors were required to show proof that minorities were provided equal access to and equal consideration during the employment process. The order also abolished the Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity and transferred its duties to the Department of Labor. In 1967, the order was amended to include gender as a consideration for equal access to employment.

In 1969, President Richard M. Nixon created the "Philadelphia Order" in which minorities were guaranteed fair hiring practices in construction jobs. The order was so named because Philadelphia was chosen as the test location given the rampant discrimination in the construction industry there. The ultimate goal of the Philadelphia Order was to increase minority employment in construction jobs. President Nixon noted that the order did not enforce racial quotas but, rather, employers were required to show "affirmative action" in meeting the goal of increasing minority employment.

The first test of affirmative action as reverse discrimination to reach the Supreme Court was DeFunis v. Odegaard (1974), involving law school admissions, but the court declared the case moot without deciding the issue because DeFunis (having been admitted to law school pending the appeals) effectively would have graduated from law school before the case was decided. Affirmative action programs were first tested on the merits in the Supreme Court in the case of The Regents of the University of California v. Bakke (1978). Allan Bakke was a white man who had applied for two consecutive years to medical school at University of California at Davis. Both years lesser qualified minority applicants were admitted while his application was denied. The Supreme Court ruled in Bakke's favor (5–4) stating that UC Davis had inflexible quotas that were unacceptable. Later Supreme Court decisions regarding affirmative action stated that "moderate" quotas were acceptable.

Another landmark Supreme Court case was Wygant v. Jackson Board of Education (1986). In this case, nonminority teachers with seniority were laid off in order to retain minority teachers. Ultimately the Supreme Court ruled that the harm inflicted on the nonminority teachers was greater than the benefits to the minority teachers that were retained.

Beginning in 1997, states began passing legislation banning affirmative action. California was the first followed by the state of Washington. In 2000, Florida banned the use of affirmative action in college admissions.

Additional Supreme Court cases brought about rulings regarding local, state, and federal affirmative action guidelines. In 2003, several Supreme Court rulings regarding the affirmative action policies at The University of Michigan set guidelines about the use of affirmative action in the admissions process. In one case, Gratz v. Bollinger (2000), the Supreme Court ruled that the university's undergraduate admissions process was unconstitutional because minority students were given additional credits in their application score for being a "minority."

However, in a similar case against the University of Michigan's law school, Grutter v. Bollinger (2001), the Supreme Court ruled that race can be a factor in the admissions process because a diverse student body adds to the educational experiences of all students. The difference between this case and the undergraduate admissions case is that the law school took race into consideration, while students seeking admissions to the undergraduate programs were given credits for being minorities.

Despite the many Supreme Court rulings and Executive Orders, affirmative action continues to be debatable in both its inception and its effects.

Kristin K. Froemling

Further Readings

Crosby, F. J. (2004). Affirmative action is dead: Long live affirmative action. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Curry, G. E. (Ed.). (1996). The affirmative action debate. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley.

Skrentny, J. D. (1996). The ironies of affirmative action: Politics, culture, and justice in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Sowell, T. (2004). Affirmative action around the world: An empirical study. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

AFL-CIO

See Unions, Political Activity

Agenda Building

See Agenda Setting

Agenda Melding

Agenda melding can be defined as the process by which audience members seek out and blend media agendas from various communication sources to fit their individual preferences and cognitions. Where the media can set the public agenda by influencing the salience of key issues, along with details or attributes about those issues, agenda melding argues that the already established values and attitudes of audience members play a role in how those issues and attributes are sought out and mixed—or melded—into a coherent individual picture of events. Agenda setting focuses on the power of media to set agendas; agenda melding concentrates on the ability of audience members to select among media, issues, and elements of messages. The latter is important because the study of audience interests and needs in acquiring media agendas is a necessary element of true understanding of public opinion formation of all groups.

With agenda melding audiences are not passive but actively select messages from the plethora of those available. More developed countries offer more choices, but there are nearly always informational options, even in controlled states. Individual agenda melding involves individuals expressing, and perhaps reinforcing, their personal values and attitudes through the messages selected. This idea dates back to Leon Festinger's theory of cognitive dissonance in which he posited that individuals seek out information that supports their views while disregarding or avoiding information that does not. Even ancient observers, however, noted that birds of a feather flock together, which individuals can do today via the Web without leaving their homes.

Agenda melding argues that we are attracted to agenda groups, even if we have to find and mix them ourselves. According to Donald L. Shaw and his colleagues, membership may not be formal, such as paying dues and attending meetings, but instead can be informal and exist only in the person's mind, such as if one subscribes to a belief in environmentalism or a particular social theory. Shaw and his colleagues tested David Weaver's argument that audiences exercise more interest in seeking information if there is a need for orientation to a public issue. The authors explain that agenda melding is an ongoing social process in which individuals choose a variety of media, both mass and interpersonal, to relate to other people and meld their own group agenda of issues. In a sense, many chat-group monitors choose to belong to an agenda group, even if secretly. Many groups are organized around social issue agendas. Some examples include Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD) and the progressive political group MoveOn.org. If organized and determined enough, these individuals may organize into groups that may have the power to influence public agendas either with or without the use of traditional mass media.

Donald L. Shaw and Rita F. Colistra

See also Agenda Setting

Further Readings

Festinger, L. (1962). A theory of cognitive dissonance. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press.

McCombs, M. (2004). Setting the agenda: The mass media and public opinion. Malden, MA: Blackwell.

Noelle-Neumann, E. (1984). The spiral of silence: Public opinion, our social skin. Chicago: Chicago University Press.

Shaw, D. L., McCombs, M., Weaver, D. H., & Hamm, B. J. (1999). Individuals, groups, and agenda melding: A theory of social dissonance. International Journal of Public Opinion Research, 11(1), 2–24.

Weaver, D. H. (1977). Political issues and voter need for orientation. In D. L. Shaw & M. E. McCombs (Eds.), The emergence of American political issues: The agenda-setting function of the press. New York: West Publishing.

AGENDA SETTING

Agenda setting is a theory of mass communication effects which holds that news media, through the editorial selection process, transmit to the public the salience of political objects, which affects the relative importance of these objects to the public. According to agenda-setting theory, the news media may not tell the public what to think (for example, what position to take on a political issue or what candidate to support in an election), but they tell the public what to think about (for example, what issues are important or what candidates are viable).

One of the primary services the news media provide to their audiences is their surveillance of the environment to determine what events are occurring in the world that the press believes their audiences should know. Journalists use professional norms called news values, such as proximity, timeliness, conflict, celebrity and human interest, to decide what is newsworthy. News media also prioritize the news, such as giving a banner headline on the newspaper's front page or the lead position on a newscast to signal importance. Agenda-setting theory conceptualizes this ordering of political objects by the news media as the "media agenda." The news media's selection and presentation of news provides an indexing function that helps readers decide where to place their attention. Through this exercise of editorial judgment, newspapers and newscasts make political objects stand out in relief from others. The media agenda directs the public's attention to certain political objects. In this way, the news media change the salience of political issues, persons, or topics. News media tell the public what is important. Agenda-setting theory conceptualizes this ordering of political objects by the public as the "public agenda." Agenda-setting theory holds that as the media agenda changes, the public agenda follows. The news media set the public agenda.

Since the news media's ability to cover events is limited by time and space, only a few issues muscle their way onto the media agenda, shoving aside other issues. Further, because the public's ability to attend to concerns is limited, only a few issues grab the public's attention at any one time. Agenda setting is based on the media's limited ability to cover issues and the public's limited ability to attend to them.

Agenda setting originally focused on the transfer of the salience of political issues from the news media to the public. The earliest agenda-setting studies took place in the context of U.S. presidential election campaigns. They studied how shifts in the occurrence of newspaper and television news stories devoted to campaign issues changed during the course of the race. They compared these changes in the media issue agenda to subsequent changes in voters' concerns. The studies also expanded to investigate the agenda-setting influence of other forms of political communication beyond the dominant mainstream media, including alternative news media and political Web logs. Research also encompassed other political objects, including persons, such as election candidates, and the attributes of objects, such as characteristics of election candidates. Attributes are those characteristics of an object which complete the picture of that object. Attributes can vary widely in scope, from a candidate's age to a candidate's foreign policy experience. The agenda setting of attributes of objects, as opposed to the agenda setting of objects, is also known as "second-level agenda setting." The studies also turned to agenda setting in other types of elections, in non-election times, in other countries, including Argentina, Germany, Japan, and Spain, and in other contexts. Not surprisingly, agenda setting does not occur in the presence of either a closed electoral system, one in which selection of political leaders and policies is patently undemocratic, or a closed media system, one in which the news is strongly government controlled.

Agenda setting also may be regarded as a more general theory of salience transmission. In its most general form, agenda-setting theory may conceptualize an agenda as a list of objects ordered by their salience, and the process of agenda setting may be regarded as the transmission of the salience of one agenda to another agenda. One of the major theoretical contributions of agenda-setting theory is its conceptualization of corresponding agendas of political objects. The world of politics may be regarded as a collection of political agendas, agenda setters, and agenda recipients. Thus, the effects of media agendas have been studied on other types of agendas besides the public agenda, such as the presidential agenda and the congressional agenda. Also, the effects of these and other nonmedia agendas on the media agenda have been studied. This has been labeled "agenda building." Thus, while election campaigns are designed to elect a candidate, part of that process involves trying to influence the media agenda. A working hypothesis might be that the more control a campaign wins over the media agenda, the more likely it will win the election.

As a general theory of salience transmission, agenda setting also has been extended to investigate the effects of nonmedia agendas on other contemporary nonmedia agendas, such as the effects of the public agenda on the congressional agenda. How well Congress's activities (e.g., hearings, legislation) reflect the public's concerns has always been a key question in the study of political representation. Traditional models of representation have mostly examined how well congressional actions match public concerns generally, without considering the specific priority rankings of these concerns. However, if Congress acts upon issues to which the public gives a relatively low priority while neglecting issues with higher priority, then representation may not be as effective as it appears to be. Political leaders' neglect of issues the public considers most important is typically ignored in political science models of representation.

Historical Developments

The empirical study of agenda setting began in 1968 when Maxwell McCombs and Donald Shaw found that the issues emphasized in the news media during that year's U.S. presidential race corresponded to the set of issues of greatest concern among undecided voters. McCombs and Shaw conceptualized the media coverage as the "media agenda" and the voters' concerns as the "public agenda." They coined the term "agenda setting" to refer to their hypothesis that the media agenda sets the public agenda. The media agenda was determined through a content analysis of newspaper coverage of the election campaign. The public agenda was determined through a survey of randomly selected undecided voters. McCombs and Shaw reasoned that if they did not find an effect among undecided voters (whom they reasoned should

Other agendas* → Media agenda → Public agenda

Agenda building | Traditional agenda setting

Object salience → /News norms/ Object salience → Object salience

Opinion strength

Priming

Behavior

Opinion direction

Attribute salience → /News norms/ Attribute salience → Attribute salience

Attribute priming

Attribute agenda setting

Organizations, interest groups, public relations, political campaigns, etc.*

Figure 1 Comprehensive Model of Agenda Setting

Source: Adapted from McCombs (2004).

be most susceptible to influence), then there would be no reason to look for an effect among the general public. On the other hand, if they did find an effect among undecided voters, then there would be good reason to investigate whether the effect held more generally. Based on the promising results of the 1968 study, McCombs and Shaw then expanded their study to all voters in the 1972 presidential election. Additionally, they tested the rival hypothesis that the public agenda set the press agenda, rather than the other way around. By tracking the press and public agendas three times during the election campaign, they demonstrated that changes in the press agenda at one time led to subsequent changes in the public agenda, whereas the changes in the public agenda were not reflected subsequently in the press agenda. The study also indicated that the agenda setting influence of the news media fluctuated during the course of the campaign and that the influence of newspapers and television also changed over time. A third study, of the 1976 presidential election, utilized nine waves of interviewing over an entire year and corresponding analyses of news media content. Meanwhile, other evidence in other settings began to accumulate, including laboratory experiments which could offer compelling supporting evidence that changes in the media agenda caused changes in the public agenda.

A criticism of agenda-setting theory might be that the public agenda dictates the media agenda, rather than the reverse. From the earliest studies, however, attention has been given to study the process over time, so that the chronological order of effects could be observed. Studies consistently show that the media agenda at Time 1 affects the public agenda at Time 2 more than the other way around.

Another criticism of agenda-setting theory might be that a third variable, namely, the set of real-world events, determines both media and audience agendas. It would seem reasonable that both the media and public agendas would be driven by real-world happenings. Studies demonstrate, however, that neither news coverage nor public concerns closely mirror real-world events. A real-world agenda can be constructed from statistical records, such as the Statistical Abstracts of the United States. One investigator constructed such a historical agenda of the United States covering the 1960s. The salience of Vietnam, for instance, was measured in terms of the number of American troops committed there throughout the decade. It was found that both the media agenda and the public agenda were independent of the historical agenda (real-world events). News coverage of the Vietnam War, for instance, peaked 12 to 24 months before troop commitments peaked. Throughout the 10 years, the press agenda was closely correlated with the public agenda, but both of those agendas were far less correlated with the historical record. Another study found a correspondence between the press and public agendas in late 1973 in Germany regarding an energy crisis. Again, though, the "real world," as captured by the actual availability of energy supplies in the country, did not correspond with either the press or public agendas. Supplies in September and October were actually higher than a year earlier, and supplies in November were the same as a year earlier. Yet, the supply "shortage" was high on the press and public agendas during this time and continued until February of the following year. Another study found that although the actual incidence of illegal drug use in the United States in the second half of the 1980s remained relatively stable, the media agenda gave drugs a top priority. The great attention the news media gave to the drug issue was subsequently reflected in the public's agenda, where it became "the most important problem facing this country." Another study conducted in the 1990s in Texas found that when the state's two major newspapers dramatically increased their coverage of crime between 1993 and 1995, public opinion subsequently increased. Yet, while the press and public both were expressing a high fear of crime, the historical agenda, measured by federal crime statistics, was moving in the opposite direction. While the press and the public were growing increasingly concerned about crime, the crime rate was actually declining. Other studies, including one of coverage of the environmental issue from the 1970s to the 1990s, and another on shark attacks in 2001, also have demonstrated how the press agenda drives the public agenda while neither of these agendas corresponds well to the historical record.

How Agenda Setting Works

Agenda setting involves exposure of individual persons to a news media agenda, and individuals do differ both in how frequently they are exposed to news media and in the quality of their attention. However, agenda-setting theory views the news media agenda as essentially ubiquitous, evident to all adult society members. Through something like a two-step flow from opinion leaders to opinion followers, the news media agenda permeates society. Agenda setting occurs because essentially the same stimulus, in a variety of mass communication channels, is distributed to a massive number of individual persons. As a consequence of the high penetration and saturation rates of newspapers, television news, radio news, and other mainstream news media, many different individuals share a similar experience. Despite individual differences, agenda setting occurs because the news media carry highly similar messages to so many individuals.

At the same time, the various news media are not exactly alike in their ability to transmit the salience of political objects. When newspaper and television news are compared, about half the time no significant differences in the agenda-setting effects of these two major news media are observed. Contrary to conventional wisdom, when agenda-setting differences are observed between these two news media, agenda setting tends to be stronger for newspapers than for television news. The reasons for this are still unclear, but it may be due partly to the general capacity of newspapers to cover more and longer stories, compared to television news, and also to the relative lack of governmental control over newspapers in most societies, compared to television news. Which of these news media most affects the public agenda also may depend on other important contextual factors, such as the phase of an election campaign. For example, while newspaper coverage has a stronger effect throughout the campaign, the influence of television coverage increased over the course of the race.

The psychological variable "need for orientation" has been offered as an explanation for the transmission of salience from the press agenda to the public agenda. Need for orientation depends upon, one, relevance of the political object and, two, uncertainty about the political object. If relevancy is low, then need for orientation is low. If relevancy is high but uncertainty is low, then need for orientation is moderate. If both relevancy and uncertainty are high, then need for orientation is high. The higher a person's need for orientation, the greater the likelihood of attention to the media agenda. When need for orientation is high among many in the population, agenda setting is more likely to be strong. Thus, in a social crisis—a time of high relevance and uncertainty—people turn to the media for guidance.

Agenda setting appears to produce stronger effects on "unobtrusive" issues, issues with which a person has little direct personal experience. A military conflict in distant lands would be an unobtrusive issue for most people who have little personal or interpersonal experience with it. In contrast, inflation is an "obtrusive" issue because it obtrudes directly into most people's lives. One does not need the news media to know that inflation is an important issue of the day; one's trips to the grocery and gas station suffice. Obtrusiveness, however, is less a property of the issue and more a property of the person. Furthermore, it is not something that one either possesses or not but is more a matter of degree. To a soldier abroad, a military conflict may be highly obtrusive whereas inflation at home may be unobtrusive. If an issue is obtrusive, it means that uncertainty is low. Personal experience and interpersonal experience lessen uncertainty. In contrast, if an issue is unobtrusive, it means that uncertainty is higher because personal and interpersonal experiences can offer little information to reduce uncertainty. Therefore, need for orientation provides a general explanation for the differences in agenda-setting effects observed for obtrusive and unobtrusive issues. For unobtrusive issues, people look to the media to reduce their uncertainty.

In the early 1920s, journalist Walter Lippmann provided an explanation for how agenda setting works. Lippmann wrote that from the elements which make up the real world (i.e., the real environment), the news media select elements from which they construct a rendition of the environment (i.e., the pseudo-environment). The environment and the pseudo-environment therefore are not isomorphic; the pseudo-environment is a simplified version of the environment. The media thereby create the "pictures in our heads" that represent the political world. According to Lippmann, the public responds not to the real environment but to the pseudo-environment created by the media. Agenda-setting theory holds that the media's pictures of the world may be conceptualized in terms of agendas of items. Those elements of the real world that the media make prominent become those elements the public considers prominent. The public comes to accept as important those elements the media emphasize.

Measuring Agendas

One reason agenda-setting theory attracts scholars is that it makes an explicit connection between specific media content and a specific effect on those exposed to that content. Researchers have become adept at measuring both the media agenda and the public agenda, and showing the relationship between the two. The method of survey research is generally used to measure the public agenda. The public agenda commonly consists of a list of objects ranked by frequency of occurrence. In a typical study, a sample of the adult population is asked what political issues are of greatest concern. The question might be, "What is the most important problem facing this country today?" The Gallup polling organization has been asking a version of the "most important problem" (MIP) question since the 1930s. It has become a mainstay in the measurement of the national public agenda, especially useful in studies of change over time. Other polling organizations have utilized similar MIP questions. Versions have been adapted for state and local populations, as well. The "public agenda" is constructed by ranking the issues by how frequently they are mentioned by respondents. Then, at another time, the process is repeated, usually with a different sample. In this way, changes in the public agenda can be tracked. Besides the MIP survey question, other ways to measure the public agenda include making observations of voting or other political decisions, opinion holding, and conversations. The salience of political issues has been assessed by asking people to recall news stories that appeared in the newspaper and ranking the importance of various sets of news stories. Issue salience also has been estimated by asking people about the extent of their discussion of an issue with friends and the need for more government action on an issue. The salience of attributes has been measured by asking people which aspects of an issue are of most interest and which have been discussed the most. Attribute salience also has been commonly assessed with a question used to measure candidate images in the early agenda setting study of the 1976 U.S. presidential election: "Suppose you had some friends who had been away for a long time and were unfamiliar with the presidential candidates. What would you tell them about [Candidate's Name]?"

Agenda-setting researchers also have begun to use nonresponse as an inverse measure of both object and attribute salience. Thus, the fewer persons who have no opinion about a candidate, the greater the salience of that candidate.

The research method of content analysis is generally used to measure a media agenda. The media agenda commonly consists of a list of objects ranked by frequency of occurrence. In a typical study, a sample of the content of a news medium (or a set of news media) is selected, and the amount of space or time devoted to a political issue is counted. For example, each news story might be coded in terms of the political issue about which it is most concerned. Then the number of stories that are primarily about each issue is counted. The "media agenda" is constructed by ranking the issues by how frequently stories are primarily about them. Then, at another time, the process is repeated, with a different sample of media content. In this way, changes in the media agenda can be tracked. Besides the full-text content analysis of news stories, other ways to measure the media agenda include the use of news indices and abstracts (for example, Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature, Vanderbilt Television News Index and Abstracts), which help simplify the construction of media agendas. These have proven to be particularly useful when dealing with large samples of media content and when examining news coverage over long periods of time. The construction of media agendas also has been simplified by the development of computer software programs (e.g., General Enquirer, VB Pro) that can identify and count the frequency of words and phrases.

Related Concepts

Another reason agenda setting has attracted the interest of scholars is its connections to and, in some cases, overlaps with, other mass communication theories and concepts. Gatekeeping theory deals with how editors open the gates only to selected stories, which relates to which political objects end up on the media agenda. Agenda-setting theorists incorporate gatekeeping theory into agenda-setting theory for its contributions to the question of how the media agenda is formed. Status conferral theory deals with how news coverage confers status on persons, which relates to how candidates and other newsmakers land on the media agenda. Agenda-setting theorists regard status conferral as the setting of an agenda of persons. Cultivation theory deals with how television cultivates an image of a mean and dangerous world, indicating that television may be setting a long-term agenda of crime, violence, and corruption. Spiral of silence theory deals with how the public senses what cannot be said without fear of social ostracism and how silence perpetuates silence, which relates to how—or whether—the news media cover political positions. Framing theory deals with how the news is organized and presented and the effect of this on the public's interpretations of the news, which relates to the frequency with which issues, positions, and other political objects are covered in the news. Some theorists maintain that attribute agenda setting and framing are identical. A frame is often regarded as an organizing principle that gives a person a way to interpret some event, issue, or other political object. As an organizing attribute, a frame is more than the sum of its parts. Successful framers can control political discourse by repeatedly invoking the same frame, which sets the terms of engagement, the words, the vocabulary, and metaphors, by which a political object (e.g., issue, candidate) is discussed. Agenda setting would show that the most important problem in the public's mind is, say, the abortion issue, because the news media have been writing or airing many stories on the topic of abortion, and giving them prominent display. Framing would show that the public thinks of the abortion issue as a matter of, say, an unborn child's right to live, as opposed to a pregnant woman's right to choose what happens to her body, because the news media in their stories on the topic of abortion have treated abortion from a pro-life perspective rather than from a pro-choice perspective. Attribute agenda setting would show that the attribute of the abortion issue that is most salient to the public is, say, the right of a woman to choose what happens to her body, as opposed to the right of an unborn child to live, because the news media in their stories on the topic of abortion have treated abortion from a pro-choice perspective rather than from a pro-life perspective. If one is willing to conceptualize a media frame of the attributes of a political object as a list of those attributes ranked by how frequently they occur in the media content, then a media frame and a media agenda would be essentially indistinguishable. If a frame is conceptualized as an attribute of an object, then it is clear that not all attributes are frames. Only a special type of attribute is a frame. A frame is an attribute that offers a predominant perspective on a political object. A frame has the power to integrate thoughts into a distinctive pattern, that is, a frame organizes thought. A frame can be represented as a cognitive structure, similar to an association network, exemplar, script, schema or other mental representation. Often attributes of an object are relatively microscopic (e.g., a candidate's age) and lack the gestalt qualities of a frame. In contrast, a frame presents a holistic, defining description of a political object. A frame is a macrolevel characterization that usually includes a number of microlevel characterizations. A frame has the power to structure thought. Unlike attribute agenda setting generally, framing draws attention to the dominant perspectives that promote a particular view of things. These can represent causal interpretations, problem definitions, moral evaluations, treatment recommendations and other ways of suggesting social accountability. This gives frames a power role that many other attributes of political objects lack. Agenda-setting theory tends to view the process as a more or less unintentional byproduct of the news production system. Framing theory, in contrast, tends to view the process as more deliberative, with emphasis upon the process of how powerful parties promote powerful frames. Agenda-setting theory recognizes that in a democratic state the ability to set the public agenda is political power. Agenda-setting theory, however, does not limit itself to the study of framing attributes. When agenda-setting research focuses upon those unique attributes with the power to structure thought—frames—then it is engaged in research that is difficult to distinguish from framing research.

Given (a) the large number of events that occur daily, (b) the time and space the news media have to report on them, and (c) the limited capacity of the public to attend to but a select few, the news media's gatekeepers have no choice but to be highly selective in what they report to their audiences. Most events are given scant or no coverage at all. Of the events that are covered, some are given prominent display, some for a day or less, others for a week or more. Gatekeeping theory deals with the question of how this editorial selection process works. Agenda-setting theory treats the formation of the media agenda as a matter of "agenda building." Agenda building deals with the question of what influences the media agenda. Agenda setting is then regarded as an unintentional byproduct of the creation of the media agenda. The news media's effect on the public's perceptions of important current issues is not regarded as a premeditated effort but instead as an unintentional effect of the news media's need to choose only a few stories to report.

Although agenda setting is regarded as a byproduct of the news media's production of news—the need to winnow the world down to a few choice stories—it results in a public which regards some concerns, candidates or criteria as having more currency than others. Certainly, other factors contribute to public opinion, including personal and interpersonal experiences. Still, this indexing function of the news media produces a powerful cognitive effect. Furthermore, agenda setting may occur early in the formation of public opinion, where it opens the possibility to effects on one's attitudes and actions, as well.

An important question in agenda-setting research is what the "time lag" is between when the media adjust their agendas and when the public agenda is subsequently influenced. Time lags utilized in agenda-setting research have ranged from as short as one week to as long as nine months. A too-short time lag risks failing to capture the causal relationship before it has had a chance to form; a too-long time lag risks missing the causal effect, because it may dissipate over time if the researcher waits too long to measure it. A time lag of less than 2 weeks may not give sufficient time for agenda-setting effects to reach all members of the community, while a lag of more than a month may result in audiences beginning to forget the media agenda. Research suggests that a time lag of about 4 weeks might be optimal for observing most traditional agenda-setting effects.

Long-Term Agenda Trends

Although the capacity of the public's agenda (the number of issues on the agenda at any one time) has not changed much from 1939 to 1994, there have been increases in both the diversity of the agenda (how the agenda varies from person to person) and the volatility of the agenda (how quickly the agenda changes). Agenda-setting effects also differ over time between opinion leaders and opinion followers. The media agenda at first had a greater effect on opinion leaders, who then influenced others interpersonally, thereby enhancing the agenda-setting effects on opinion followers. This finding recalls the "two-step flow" model of media effects that was used to explain findings about the role of the media in the U.S. election studies of the 1940s. Opinion leaders first pay attention to the news media and then they subsequently convey media information to their opinion followers.

Among the criteria used to evaluate a theory are the extent to which it is general, predictive, explanatory, parsimonious, and integrative. Agenda-setting theory is relatively general in scope, covering news media influence on the general public's consciousness. The theory is also relatively explanatory, directly connecting a specific media stimulus to a specific media effect on the public. The theory also is relatively predictive in power. If one knows the media agenda and the correct time lag then one can predict the public agenda at a given time. The theory is also relatively parsimonious. Its parts and their connections are few, uncomplicated, and relatively easy to identify. Finally, the theory fits well into more general conceptions of news production processes, information processes, and other social and psychological processes.

Both traditional agenda setting and attribute agenda setting predict important political effects. Both objects and the attributes of objects made prominent in the mass media's portrayal of the world will become the objects and attributes of objects in the media audience's picture of the world. Furthermore, because both first- and second-level agenda setting occur early in the communication process, they also have the potential, indirectly, to influence processes that occur later in the communication process, including changing people's attitudes and behaviors.

Dominic L. Lasorsa

See also Agenda Melding; Cultivation Theory; Framing; Knowledge Gap; News Selection Process; Orientation, Need for; Two-Step Flow Model of Communication

Further Readings

Funkhouser, G. R. (1973). The issues of the sixties: An exploratory study in the dynamics of public opinion. Public Opinion Quarterly, 37, 62–75.

Jones, B. D., & Baumgartner, F. R. (2004). Representation and agenda setting. Policy Studies Journal, 32, 1–24.

Katz, E., & Lazarsfeld, P. (1955). Personal influence. New York: Free Press.

Lippmann, W. (1922). Public opinion. New York: Macmillan.

McCombs, M. (2004). Setting the agenda. Malden, MA: Blackwell.

McCombs, M. E., & Shaw, D. F. (1972). The agenda-setting function of mass media. Public Opinion Quarterly, 36, 176–187.

Shaw, D., & McCombs, M. (Eds.). (1977). The emergence of American political issues: The agenda-setting function of the press. St. Paul, MN: West.

Aging and Politics

As the number of older adults has increased substantially in the U.S. population, their potential to influence politics and policy has also increased. Recognizing older adults as an important voting block is called the senior power model of impact on politics. Statistics show that there are more than 30 million Americans aged 65 or older, and that number is expected to grow to over 50 million by 2020. Much of the projected growth can be attributed to the aging baby boomer generation cohort (those born between 1946 and 1964). There are more than 70 million baby boomers in the United States, and those born in 1946 reached aged 60 in 2006.

Along with large numbers, older adults also vote at higher rates than other age groups. They tend to be politically active. The life experience and life cycle hypotheses suggest that older adults' high democratic participation can be attributed to lifelong learning experiences and community involvement that leads them to view participatory politics as an important endeavor. Another explanation of high voter rates among older adults is that they have additional free time in retirement to pursue democratic involvements. A previous theory, disengagement theory, argued that due to physical limitations and social withdrawal, elderly adults were less likely to participate in political action. Due to increases in life expectancy and advancements in health care, today's senior citizens are leading active lives that contradict disengagement theory.

The senior power model presents older adults as significant in being able to shape public policy on group-specific interests such as Medicare, social security, and health care. As an established group represented by large organizations with strong lobbying power, politicians increasingly need to win support of older adults by focusing attention on issues important to them. Budget reductions and other threats to age-related programs such as social security may serve to further mobilize older adults and enhance their group unity as a political force.

A challenge to the senior power model is the lack of homogeneity among older adults. Indeed, socioeconomic status varies greatly within the older adult population, as do partisan preferences. These and other points of difference tend to fragment the older adult group, thereby lessening their political solidarity and unified power. For example, efforts to reform or improve social security are more important to older adults in lower economic brackets than those with higher incomes. Despite heterogeneity within the older adult population, however, shared interests in age-related issues combined with significant population numbers, high political participation, and group representation by associations such as AARP guarantees this group attention and a voice in shaping public policy in American democracy.

As a result of their numbers and voter turnout, older citizens are often targeted for special communication messages by candidates running for office, as well as by officeholders once elected. In campaigns from the presidency to elections for state house and senate, candidates often address specialized campaign advertising and news messages directly to issues of concern to the aging population.

Terri Ann Bailey

See also AARP

Further Readings

Binstock, R. H. (1997). The old-age lobby in a new political era. In R. B. Hudson (Ed.), The future of age-based public policy (pp. 56–74). Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Binstock, R. H. (2000). Older people and voting participation: Past and future. The Gerontologist, 40(1), 18–31.

Turner, J. M, Shields, T. G., & Sharp, D. (2001). Changes and continuities in the determinants of older adults' voter turnout 1952–1996. The Gerontologist, 41(6), 805–818.

Agnew, Spiro (1918–1996)

Spiro Theodore Agnew was born in Maryland on November 9, 1918, to Margaret Akers and Greek immigrant Theodore Spiros Anagnostopoulos. He attended Johns Hopkins University and later graduated from the University of Baltimore Law School in 1947. Agnew served in the Army during World War II as well as the Korean Conflict. It took a mere 6 years for Agnew to go from his first elected position of county executive in Maryland to vice president of the United States.

Agnew was a controversial politician early in his career. He was raised a Democrat but switched parties and became a Republican to fit in with his Republican law partners in Maryland. In his first campaign in 1960, he ran for circuit court judge, where he came in last of five candidates. Agnew gained public recognition the following year when he protested loudly after he was dropped from the Zoning Board. In 1962, he ran for election as county executive. Running as a Republican outsider in a predominantly Democratic region, he took advantage of a split in the Democratic Party and was elected.

Just 4 years later, Agnew ran for the position of governor of Maryland against the Democratic candidate, George P. Mahoney, who opposed integration. In this election, many Democrats who were opposed to segregation crossed party lines to vote in favor of Agnew, giving him the victory by just 82,000 votes. As governor, he worked to pass tax and judicial reforms as well as antipollution laws. Agnew also signed Maryland's first open-housing laws and succeeded in getting the repeal of an antimiscegenation law, which in turn gained him support in the African American community. However during the riots after Martin Luther King, Jr.'s assassination, many African American leaders became angered when Agnew lectured them to denounce publicly all black racists.

Agnew served as Richard M. Nixon's vice president after being elected in 1968 and reelected in 1972.

Agnew was known for his tough criticisms of political opponents, especially journalists and political activists who opposed the Vietnam War. Some of his unusual epithets are "nattering nabobs of negativism," "pusillanimous pussyfoots," "hopeless, hysterical hypochondriacs of history," and "radiclib" (i.e., radical liberal). In October of 1973, Agnew resigned as vice president. At the end of his vice presidency, he was charged with accepting bribes and falsifying federal tax forms, and he pled nolo contendere (no contest) to the latter charge. Agnew's resignation was the reason for the first use of the 25th Amendment, which led to the appointment and confirmation of Gerald Ford as vice president. Agnew blamed President Nixon for the accusations of tax evasions and bribes in order to distract from some of the publicity of the Watergate Scandal and the Nixon administration.

After his resignation and leaving politics, Agnew became an international trade executive. At the age of 77, he died on September 17, 1996, near his home in Ocean City, Maryland.

Rebecca M. Verser

See also Nixon, Richard M.

Further Readings

Cohen, R. M., & Witcover, J. (1974). A heartbeat away: The investigation and resignation of vice president Spiro T. Agnew. New York: Viking Press.

Kurland, G., & Rahmas, D. S. (1975). Spiro Agnew: Controversial vice-president of the Nixon administration. New York: SamHar Press.

Ailes, Roger (1940–)

Roger Eugene Ailes was born on May 15, 1940, in Warren, Ohio. He graduated with a bachelor's degree from Ohio University and later received an honorary doctorate also from Ohio University. Ailes's career ranged from television property assistant, producer, to executive producer of The Mike Douglas Show from 1962 to 1968; media adviser to Richard M. Nixon's 1968 presidential campaign; media consultant to Ronald Reagan's 1984 presidential campaign; media consultant for George H. W. Bush's 1988 presidential campaign; and television executive.

In 1962 Roger Ailes began his television career as a property assistant on The Mike Douglas Show. Three short years later, he became a producer of the show. Then, in 1967, he became an executive producer. In 1967 and 1968, he won Emmy Awards for The Mike Douglas Show. Ailes caught the attention of Richard M. Nixon and was hired as Nixon's television advisor for his presidential campaign in 1968, thus beginning his career in politics. Ailes also served as a media consultant to Ronald Reagan in the 1984 presidential campaign and is credited with helping Reagan win the second debate after a disastrous first debate against Walter Mondale. During the same year, he co-produced Television and the Presidency, a television program for which he won an Emmy as executive producer and director. Ailes was also a media consultant for George H. W. Bush during the 1988 presidential campaign, and he worked as a political consultant for a number of visible political candidates in elections below the presidency.

Ailes retired from his political consulting career in 1992 but continued his television career. From 1993 to 1996, he was the president of CNBC, the cable channel for NBC. Then in 1996 he became the chief executive officer of Fox News and the Fox News Channel. Since 2005, Ailes has been the chairman of Fox Television Stations.

Rebecca M. Verser

Further Readings

Ailes, R., & Kraushar, J. (1995). You are the message: Getting what you want by being who you are. New York: Doubleday.

Greppi, M. (2006). 10 most powerful people in TV news. Television Week, 25(17), 55–59.

Al-Asad, Hafiz (1930–2000)

Hafiz Al-Asad rose to power in Syria in February 1971 in a bloodless coup known in contemporary Syrian political jargon as The Corrective Movement (Al Haraka Al Tashiheyya) in which the ruling Baath Party consolidated its grip on public life in Syria. At that time, Syria already had a media system comprised of two television channels, two state-owned newspapers, two radio services, and a government-operated news agency (SANA). Under Al-Asad's rule, Syrian media were operating within a tight control system drawing on state-ownership and a pan-Arabist political discourse. It was described as a mobilization media system that harnessed media channels to drum up support for the regime and its brand of Arab nationalism. For many Westerners, Syria under Hafiz Al-Asad was a dictatorship that lacked freedom of speech and freedom of the press. Yet, from a pan-Arabist perspective, "unity," "socialism," and "freedom from colonialism" took precedence over Western-style freedom and liberal democracy at a time when the country was facing serious threats. To promote his pan-Arabist version of politics, the late Al-Asad used media as tools of political mobilization. His speeches were carried live on broadcast media and occupied sizable space in print media in both Syria and in Lebanon, where Syrian troops were stationed since the mid-1970s.

The Socialist system of Syria under Hafiz Al-Asad precluded private media ownership. Print and broadcast media were owned and operated by government agencies, and their staff were virtually state employees. The Ministry of Information and the Ministry of Culture and National Guidance censored domestic and foreign media operations. Media political discourse during Asad's era was characterized as ideological and inflammatory. In theory, the Syrian Constitution provided for the right to express opinions freely in speech and in writing; but in practice, these rights were seriously flawed. Some Western critics argue that Al-Asad followed a "cramped" diplomatic style of speech, drawing on passive constructions and indirectness. The media were apparently contributing to making Al-Asad the object of a state-sponsored cult of personality, depicting him as a wise, just and strong leader of Syria and the Arab World in general. The mobilizing role of the media in Al-Asad's Syria was to communicate the desires of the political leadership in pursuit of its national goals.

By the end of the 1990s, satellite television and the World Wide Web were already becoming integral parts of Syria's political communication environment. The traditional state-controlled media system that dominated Syria under Hafiz Al-Asad was experiencing some transformations as Syrians became more exposed to diverse political views and orientations in countries around them. When Hafiz Al-Asad passed away in June 2000, the stage was set for realizing a more open and liberal political communication setting.

Muhammad Ayish

Further Readings

Boyd, D. A. (1999). Broadcasting in the Arab world: A survey of electronic media in the Middle East and North Africa. Ames: Iowa State University Press.

Rugh, W. (1987). The Arab press: News media and political process in the Arab world. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.

Seale, P. (1990). Asad of Syria. London: I. B. Taurus.

Alfonsín, Raúl (1927–)

Raúl Ricardo Alfonsín, born in 1927, was the president of Argentina from 1983 to 1989 when democracy was restored after the last military dictatorship (1976–1983). As a member of the UCR-party (Radical Civic Union), he projected a charismatic image. Alfonsín's presidential campaign represented the first introduction of typical American methods for political communication in Argentina and one of the earliest in South America.

In 1958, Alfonsín was elected member of the Buenos Aires Provincial Congress. In 1963 he became national legislator. He lost in his party's primaries for the presidential nomination in 1973. During the military dictatorship he worked for the defense of human rights. When running for the presidency in 1983, he emerged as the most competent "media-liked candidate." For the first time in Argentina, television coverage was key to a campaign. Mass meetings were still an important element, but their television coverage was especially decisive for the candidates. Alfonsin's party hired a professional advisor, which represented the beginning of the "spin doctor age" in the campaigns of Argentina.

Alfonsín's run for the presidency took advantage of the strategies of modern campaigns. Although the opponent Peronist Party was presented by the radicals as a continuity of the past (violence, chaos, fanaticism), the candidate of UCR was presented as the keeper of democratic values and peace. Alfonsín's party incorporated a new image of a young and powerful organization, which seemed to be capable of accomplishing the difficult task of transforming the institutional system. People chose the candidate who—they understood—represented a combination of renovation and order. Issues of the campaign were the respect for law and constitution and the generation of a new ethic in politics. His campaign introduced some features of the American style: personalization; targeting (particularly young people and women were segments of interest in the UCR's propaganda); performance of the candidate in front of the cameras; use of emotion and sensitization.

Throughout his administration, his media and communication policy showed shortcomings that contributed to the deterioration of his image. His government was well known for sponsoring the trial of military officers who had participated in the "Dirty War" and the promotion of human rights. However, the mismanagement of the economy ended under Alfonsín's government with a hyperinflation that pushed the country into a financial and institutional crisis. As a consequence, he resigned his post before his term was up. He was succeeded by Peronist Carlos Menem. Despite the continuing decline of his party's performance, Alfonsín remained active in politics and was elected vice president of the Socialist International in 1999 and a senator of Argentina in 2001.

Malvina Rodriguez

See also Argentina Democratization Process, Role of the Media; Menem, Carlos

Further Readings

Borrini, A. (1984). Cómo se hace un presidente [How a president is made]. Buenos Aires: Ediciones El Cronista Comercial.

Waisbord, S. R. (1994). Television and election campaigns in contemporary Argentina. The Journal of Communication, 44(2), 125–135.

Qatari staff work at Al Jazeera's new state-of-the-art newsroom, June 15, 2005. As it marked its 10th anniversary on October 31, 2006, the news channel announced that it was extending its reach to audiences by launching its English-speaking service November 15, 2006.

Source: AFP/Getty Images.

Al Jazeera Television

Founded in 1996, the Qatari satellite broadcasting station Al Jazeera has become the most popular news network in the Arab world and has a worldwide reputation. The channel is generally recognized for making a breakthrough in the history of Arab television by having introduced a liberal TV model that is largely free of government control into the Arab media landscape. The network was founded by Qatar's ruler, Emir Al-Thani, who hired a large number of journalists from BBC's closed-down Arabic service. The "Arab CNN," as Al Jazeera is often called, aims at combining U.S. news and politainment formats with BBC's journalism ethics of "neutrality" and "objectivity" while carrying out an Arab news agenda. After the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, in New York and Washington, D.C., and in the course of its coverage of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, a heated debate over the network broke out and has received enormous attention.

Within the first years of existence Al Jazeera won around 40 international prizes from organizations such as Index on Censorship. What made the network so attractive to Arab viewers, as well as to international observers, was the channel's often rigorous break with social and political taboos. Female circumcision, the Syrian regime, or the West-Sahara conflict: These are just a few of the many issues Al Jazeera covered over the years that no other Arab TV station had ever tackled before. On talk shows such as The Opposite Direction with moderator Faisal al-Kasim, a show based on the Crossfire model, opponents from different ideological camps, representatives of governments, and opposition forces directly confront each other. For many, Al Jazeera has reanimated the idea of free public speech in the Arab world.

As a consequence, Al Jazeera has been strongly criticized by almost all Arab regimes, most of them authoritarian in nature, who fear the loss of their TV monopoly. Many offices of the network in Arab countries have been closed time and again. The Arab States Broadcasting Union (ASBU) denied Al Jazeera a regular membership, and many advertisers close to Arab regimes from Saudi Arabia and other countries boycotted the network.

But governments also understood that such pressure made the network even more popular as a mouthpiece of Arab populations. Although there are no solid figures at hand and research concentrating on media usage patterns is still in its infancy, Al Jazeera is widely considered the leading news network in the Arab world. Thirty-five to 45 million regular viewers who receive the channel through Arabsat and other satellites.

In terms of finance and organization Al Jazeera is a hybrid that fits into none of the standard Western categories of state, public, or private broadcasting. Without the protection and financial engagement of Emir al-Thani and the state of Qatar Al Jazeera would not exist. However, the channel views itself as being independent and indebted to Arab public opinion. It is also "private" in the sense that no institutional checks-and-balances or a clear programmatic seem to exist—as in the case of German public TV, for instance ("Programmauftrag"). Moreover, state subsidies are not guaranteed indefinitely, and the network has frequently proclaimed the need to become commercially independent. On the whole, Al Jazeera's financial and organizational situation remains fragile and vulnerable.

Without a binding legal framework the channel could be closed down from one day to the next, although that is quite unlikely since Qatar's image has profited enormously from Al Jazeera's worldwide standing. Nevertheless, it is hard to imagine how the network can be transformed into a satisfactory public TV model without prior democratization of the Qatari political system. The state is able to prohibit any coverage on Qatar's domestic policies. And the natural ally of the network, its viewers, demands a close orientation toward Arab political culture—a tendency that has been criticized by many as leading to a certain bias in political coverage.

Despite the large debate on the network no comprehensive content analysis has yet been undertaken. However, several long-term phases of the coverage can be discerned. Between 1996 and 2001 the taboo-breaking opening of democratic debate dominated. Also, for the first time Israeli voices could be heard and seen on Arab TV justifying the Israeli government's measures against the Palestinians. But after the outbreak of the second Intifada uprising in the occupied territories in 2000, following the events of 9/11 and the succeeding American interventions in Afghanistan, an inflammatory style of reporting against Israel and the United States predominated. The day-long coverage of the burial of Sheikh Yassin of the Palestinian Islamist organization Hamas, regular shows by leading Islamist preachers such as Yusuf Qaradawi with his sometimes controversial support of Palestinian suicide bombers, and the frequent airing of Al-Qaeda videos showing messages of Osama bin Laden and others have gained the network the aura of a mouthpiece of terrorism—although Western channels have often bought such material from Al Jazeera.

In recent years Al Jazeera has extensively covered the still modest signs of democratic awakening in the Arab world with long reports on the oppositional Kifayah movement in Egypt or the Lebanese popular resistance against Syrian occupation. On the whole, Al Jazeera's political coverage is a mix of professional journalistic neutrality and consumer-oriented populism in times of crisis that seems comparable to the style of the large U.S. television networks.

Such comparison seems to be supported by the fact that Al Jazeera has agreed on a number of cooperation agreements with CNN, ABC, NBC, Fox, and many other Western networks on the exchange of programs. In practice, however, such exchange is often confined to the issue of terrorism and control of images and videos rather than allowing news texts that could help Western audiences understand Arab views on world events. The often applauded reversal of the North-South flow of news and information and the globalizing effects of new Arab satellite broadcasters should not be overestimated.

Kai Hafez

Further Readings

el-Nawawy, M., & Iskandar, A. (2003). Al-Jazeera: The story of the network that is rattling governments and redefining modern journalism. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Hafez, K. (2006). Arab satellite broadcasting: Democracy without political parties? Transnational Broadcasting Studies, 1(2), 275–297.

Zayani, M. (Ed.). (2005). The Al Jazeera phenomenon. Critical perspectives on the new Arab media. London: Pluto.

Allende, Salvador (1908–1973)

Salvador Allende Gossens, born June 26, 1908, was president of Chile from November 1970 until his forced removal from power resulting from a military coup led by General Augusto Pinochet Ugarte on September 11, 1973.

Allende, father of three daughters, attended high school in Santiago and medical school at the University of Chile, graduating with a medical degree in 1933. In the late 1930s Allende became minister of health, and between 1945 and 1969 he was senator for nine provinces.

Both Allende's Marxist-Communist ideology and his friendship with Fidel Castro made him unpopular within the U.S. administration. The United States' attempt to prevent Allende's election by financing political parties aligned with candidates of the opposition did not succeed and thus the leader of the coalition Popular Unity won the Chilean presidential election in 1970, beating conservative right-wing candidate Jorge Alessandri with 36.2% of the votes and Christian Democrat Radomiro Tomic with 27.8% of the votes.

Upon assuming power, Allende started to implement the socialist ideology, known as the Chilean Way to Socialism, in which large parts of industries, especially American-owned copper mines, were nationalized. The implementation of these policies led to strong opposition by the National Party, the Christian Democrats, the Catholic Church, and landowners. The Christian Democrats, who were aligned to the social movement in the 1970 elections, removed themselves more and more from the socialist position of Allende's administration, seeking to form a coalition with the National Party. Allende and the opposition in congress perpetually accused each other of acting undemocratically and so eroding the Chilean Constitution.

In 1972, the economy was greatly weakened by the increasing inflation. The combination of inflation and price-fixing by the government led to the rise of black markets. As a consequence, in 1973 Allende faced the first confrontational strikes organized by the opposition. Due to the rising tension between the government and the public, military movements on the streets increased in the same year and fed rumors of an imminent military coup against Allende's administration.

Finally, on September 11, 1973, the Chilean military, under the leadership of General Augusto Pinochet Ugarte, bombarded the presidential palace, La Moneda, in downtown Santiago. Before the military could arrest the first democratically elected Marxist in the Western Hemisphere, Allende committed suicide. This day was the inception of a 16-year dictatorship of the Chilean military junta.

During his life Allende's relation to the media was ambivalent. During his 1970 presidential campaign he could rely on the support of Clarín, a newspaper that collaborated in a decisive way in the triumph of the Popular Unity. The journalist, Darío Sainte-Marie, then owner of the Clarín, was a personal friend of Salvador Allende, and he used the publication as a campaign tool for the president. Besides, Allende could also rely on El Siglo, Puro Chile, La Nación, and Ultima Hora which were four newspapers that supported the government. All together these media had a circulation of 312,000. However, there where strong attempts to discredit Allende and his government by using the media of the opposition, namely the newspapers La Tercera, El Mercurio, Las Ultimas Noticias, La Segunda, Tribuna, and La Prensa, which were financially supported by the CIA and transnational corporations. An estimated foreign capital of more than $4 million was invested in propaganda against Allende and to support structures of the opposed media.

Markus Moke

Further Readings

Casasus, M. (2006). Entrevista con Victor Pey. La epoca [Interview with Victor Pey. The era]. Retrieved January 25, 2007, from http://gomezw.blogspot.com/2006/12/denuncian-desaparicion-de-medios-de.html

Uribe, H. (n.d.). Prensa y periodismo político en los años 1960/70 [The press and political journalism in the years 1960 to 1970]. Retrieved January 9, 2007, from http://www.lafogata.org/chile/sep_prensa.htm

Vargas, F., & Vergara, J. M. (1975). Coup! Allende's last day. New York: Stein & Day.

All the President's Men

All the President's Men (1974) is a nonfiction book by Washington Post journalists Carl Bernstein and Bob Woodward recounting their experiences investigating the initial Watergate break-in and the subsequent Watergate scandal which led to President Richard Nixon's resignation. The stories written by Woodward and Bernstein won a Pulitzer Prize for The Washington Post. The book was adapted 2 years later for film and starred Robert Redford as Woodward and Dustin Hoffman as Bernstein. The film won four Academy Awards.

The Watergate scandal began when five men broke into the National Democratic Headquarters carrying photographic and electronic equipment on June 17, 1972. Woodward, a new journalist at The Washington Post, was assigned to cover what initially appeared to be a simple burglary. Bernstein, a more experienced journalist, was working on the same story. The two writers joined forces to expose a political scandal that ultimately involved several key members of the Republican Party and the Nixon administration.

The efforts to uncover the conspiracy scandal demanded both journalists to persist in fact finding and interviewing skills against great odds. To discredit The Washington Post's stories, Nixon frequently encouraged the public and the news media to focus their attention on matters other than Watergate. The book and articles led to the resignation of President Nixon in August 1974, just 2 months after the book was published.

The Watergate news stories were controversial for a number of reasons. Woodward and Bernstein uncovered many trails of money and secrecy which led to the Oval Office. Along the investigative journey, they met many obstacles and depended upon unnamed sources in the Nixon Administration who remained anonymous because of fear of repercussions. The book named sources such as Hugh Sloan who had refused to be identified when the stories ran in the Post. The most famous source, Deep Throat, had his identity kept secret for over thirty years. In 2005, the legendary figure of Deep Throat was revealed to be then-FBI Associate Director W. Mark Felt. Felt met secretly with Woodward, giving insider information that made the articles possible. The reporters eventually exposed illegal campaign practices by high-level Republican leaders H. R. Halderman and John Ehrlichman.

The book and movie also feature the legendary role of the Post editor Ben Bradlee who supported the unconventional reporting used to crack the conspiracy. Bradlee was heavily criticized during the coverage of the case early on for allowing Woodward and Bernstein to use unnamed sources.

Following All the President's Men, Woodward and Bernstein also wrote a sequel, The Final Days, which started at the time the previous book ended and covered the last months of the Nixon presidency. The University of Texas at Austin purchased the Woodward and Bernstein papers for $5 million in April 2003. Now housed at the Harry Ransom Center, the papers serve to document the historic events and also provide public availability to the records. Files that could reveal the identity of sources who wish to remain anonymous remain closed until the death of the individual source.

Released in 1976, the movie version of the book starring Redford and Hoffman received considerable acclaim. A new release of the film on DVD with several new features and interviews was available in 2006.

Nadia Ann Ramoutar

Al-Sadat, Anwar (1918–1981)

Muhammad Anwar Al-Sadat was born in 1918 in the village of Meet Abou El-Kom of Al-Menoufeya governorate. When he graduated from the Royal Military Academy in 1938, he was appointed to the Signal Corps. However, his military career was interrupted by vehement political activism. Sadat was accused of spying for the Germans in the Second World War and joined the ranks of several underground military organizations, which finally led to his discharge from the service and subsequent imprisonment. Having escaped prison, Sadat lived as a fugitive from 1945 until 1950 and took several low-status jobs. After charges against him of assassinating a pro-British minister were dropped, he worked as a journalist and was readmitted to military service. Then Nasser invited him to join the ranks of the leadership committee of the Free Officers Organization. It was Al-Sadat, on July 23, 1952, who read on air the first communiqué of the Revolutionary Command Council, informing the Egyptian people that the armed forces were in control of their country.

During Nasser's reign, Sadat remained on the margins of the political arena, sidestepping various power struggles and occupying quite insignificant political positions. He gradually reached the top of the political ladder; he was appointed as Minister of State, editor of Al-Jumhuriya newspaper, secretary to the National Union, and the speaker of the People's Council, and finally was appointed by Nasser to vice president in 1964. Upon Nasser's death, Sadat was elected as president of Egypt in 1970.

The impact of President Sadat on Egyptian and Middle Eastern history was both powerful and unique. What he undertook during his presidency (1970–1981) changed the economic, political, and social maps of his world. These included imprisoning Nasser loyalists in the so-called Corrective Revolution on May 15, 1971; expulsion of the Soviet advisors in 1972; the October 1973 War victory; shifting Egypt's strategic alliance from pro-Soviet to pro-American; the "open-door policy" or liberalization of the economy in 1974; the two disengagement agreements between Egypt and Israel in 1974 and 1975, respectively; the re-opening of the Suez Canal in 1975; establishing a multiparty political system; the trip to Jerusalem in 1977; the Camp David Accords in 1978; the Israel-Egypt Peace Treaty in 1979; winning the Nobel Peace Prize; boycotting Egypt by a number of Arab countries are some of the cornerstone events that altered his presidency.

Remarkably, Sadat's internal and external policy did not attain the desired goals, and his harsh tactics antagonized all political parties and groups, whose leaders were all arrested in September 1981. Consequently, he was assassinated on October 6 of the same year by the hands of young military officers with an Islamic ideological orientation. Sadat authored several books, including The Full Story of the Revolution, Son, This Is Your Uncle Gamal, and In Search of Identity.

Saleh A. Ahmed

Further Readings

Heikal, M. (1983). Autumn of fury: The assassination of Sadat. New York: Random House.

Ibrahim, S. (1992). e-aadet al-eetbar lil-ra'is al-Sadat [Vindication of Al-Sadat]. Cairo: Dar al-Shuruq.

Sadat, J. (2002). Jihan al-Sadat shahidah ala alasr al-Sadat/hiwar with Ahmad Mansur [Jehan el-Sadat Witness to el-Sadat Era/Dialog with Ahmad Mansur]. Cairo: Dar al-Shuruq.

Stein, K. W. (1999). Heroic diplomacy: Sadat, Kissinger, Carter, Begin and the quest for Arab-Israeli peace. New York: Routledge.

Alternative Media in Politics

Alternative media in politics (AMP) are defined as media practices falling outside the mainstream of corporate communication or using traditional media forums other than news outlets to communicate with citizens. AMP platforms are often unabashedly politically biased, leading to a form of advocacy journalism that promotes specific political views and dissenting perspectives. Advocates of such communication argue that the mainstream media are heavily biased as a consequence of profit-driven media corporations and political or governmental influence.

The Development of Alternative Media in Politics (AMP)

AMP is often thought of as a new direction for political communication. Candidates for the presidency who once relied almost exclusively on traditional news outlets (radio, television, and print) can now make appeals to specific audience segments by appearing on a wide range of cable and/or satellite channels and Internet platforms. During the 1992 presidential campaign, viewers witnessed hopeful Bill Clinton playing Heartbreak Hotel on his saxophone on The Arsenio Hall Show. The phenomenal growth in radio and television talk shows featuring candidates and political commentary, candidates appearing on programs such as MTV's Choose or Lose, and the advent of Internet Web logs (commonly known as blogs) are examples of how AMP platforms have changed the nature of political communication in recent years. Citizens who once discussed politics with friends or coworkers can now establish or participate in dialogues on blogs. In short, the political communication environment of the 21st century offers new and provocative ways in which AMP can play a role in political discourse.

However, each new media information dissemination system from the advent of the printing press to the introduction of the Dailykos.com blog represents an example of how the interplay between political, economic, technological, and audience factors have an influence on political communication processes. Therefore, to understand the contemporary significance of AMP, it is essential to consider how these variables have historically influenced media information.

The Impact of Politics, Economics, Technology, and the Audience on AMP

Before the 1830s, newspapers generally had circulations of 2,000 to 3,000 and contained content that was intended to appeal to members of the upper class who often held elective office and/or ran businesses. These newspapers often provided a forum for the members of the upper class to engage in political arguments and debates. But in the 1830s several factors converged that would result in a transformation of the media landscape and political communication. First, cities had grown large enough to support media marketed for ordinary citizens. Second, literacy skills had increased, making media produced for the mass audience an economically appealing enterprise. Finally, technology had developed such that newspapers could be produced quickly and inexpensively on efficient printing presses.

Instead of focusing on producing newspapers with a relatively small upper-class target audience in mind, it made sense for newspaper publishers to produce newspapers with widespread appeal directed toward the working and growing middle class. In a relatively short period, newspapers competed fiercely for audience members, often resorting to sensational political content designed to attract the mass audience. Thus, the Penny Press newspapers represented an alternative voice to the papers that had been consumed primarily by the political elite of the day.

Another precursor to contemporary AMP was the advent of radio in the early 20th century which gave politicians a voice. Beginning in 1933 and continuing throughout World War II, Franklin Roosevelt skillfully used this new medium to engage the audience through his fireside chats. Many observers believe that broadcasts helped the popular World War II General Dwight D. Eisenhower defeat Illinois Governor Adlai Stevenson in the 1952 presidential election because the governor tended to bore listeners with long-winded commentaries. In response to the growing importance of broadcasting in the political communication process, the Federal Communications Commission adopted rules in the 1940s that charged broadcasters with the responsibility of acting as custodians of the spectrum.

The rationale for broadcast regulation hinged on the concept of spectrum scarcity. In theory, anyone with the necessary resources could produce a newspaper or magazine. By contrast, the broadcast spectrum could accommodate only a limited number of stations. Thus, in exchange for the exclusive use of limited public airwaves, licensees were charged with acting as a trustee of a scarce resource and operating in the public interest. Obligations to society could be met through news segments, public affairs shows, or editorials. Another obligation was to uphold the Fairness Doctrine adopted by the FCC in 1949. The Fairness Doctrine required broadcasters to devote some of their airtime to discussing controversial matters of public interest, and to air contrasting views regarding those matters. As a result, broadcasters tended to be quite conservative in the presentation of political information fearing that excessive editorializing might produce complaints from the public that could potentially lead to challenges to their broadcast licenses.

New technology in the 1980s, however, enabled 50 or more radio stations and more than a dozen television stations in large markets to broadcast without any signal overlap. Cable had become a viable distribution system and the introduction of new information sources, such as CNN in 1980, increased access to political information. In 1987 the Fox network joined the three established broadcast networks. These and other factors led the FCC to conclude during the administration of President Ronald Reagan that spectrum scarcity was no longer an issue, leading to the repeal of the Fairness Doctrine in 1987.

By the early 1990s, direct satellite broadcasting to 18-inch dishes appeared on the scene providing rural areas with access to more programming. Furthermore, the Internet began to make significant strides in the 1990s as both an entertainment and information source. Finally, the FCC passed The Telecommunications Act of 1996, the first major overhaul of telecommunications law in almost 62 years. The FCC believed that, by promoting competition, the Telecommunications Act of 1996 could change the way we work, live and learn, affecting telephone service, cable programming and other video services, as well as broadcast services. The new distribution systems combined with deregulation and the availability of more types of programs and programmers looking for narrower niche audiences produced an environment in which AMP could thrive.

AMP Platforms

Broadcasting

Although it is not possible to establish a precise point on a timeline for the beginning of AMP, the introduction of programs such as Larry King Live on CNN in June of 1985 laid the groundwork. Only two radio stations in the United States had talk shows in the 1960s. The format, however, became very popular in the 1980s, boosted by many events including the advent of cheap satellite technology and the foundation of the National Association of Talk Show Hosts. AM radio was also making a comeback led by the phenomenal popularity of the edgy conservative talk show host Rush Limbaugh who began broadcasting a nationally syndicated 2-hour radio program in 1988 that eventually expanded to 3 hours. Unshackled by the Fairness Doctrine, the host led the way in pushing the limits of partisan political talk, spawning other similar programs.

By the early 1990s, entertainment-oriented media started to act as a conduit for political communication as Jay Leno, David Letterman, and other late night hosts increasingly relied on political news for monologue jokes. However, 1992 is often considered a watershed year for AMP as presidential candidates George Bush, Bill Clinton, and Ross Perot increased their use of non-news programs significantly in an effort to receive more exposure, more coverage, and direct access to the audience. In 1994 Bill Clinton addressed eligible voters and underage drinkers on MTV. In 1999, Comedy Central introduced The Daily Show, a parody of news programs containing nearly nonstop political satire.

Call-in radio and television shows also became important AMP platforms. However, unlike talk shows, the hosts take live phone calls from people listening at home, at work, or in their cars, who want to voice their opinion on a specific topic, ask questions, or seek clarification. Research indicates that such media formats can encourage public discussion of political issues and concerns.

Internet Resources

The Internet has assumed a prominent role in the evolution of AMP. Web sites, listservs, and chat rooms that distribute information and enable users to communicate with each other have grown steadily since 1990. Users discuss issues by sending electronic messages to each other, often in real time, with the option of revealing or concealing their identities. Although Internet resources were used in the 1990s and before by presidential candidates, campaign Web sites began to take on major importance in 2000 as the number of users with access increased and as Web sites became more sophisticated and more diversified in content and structure.

Campaign Web sites post news releases prepared by campaign staff members. Although news releases are traditionally directed at journalists with the purpose of announcing an event or something newsworthy, Web site news releases target both news organizations and the public at large. Further, campaign news releases appear as a supplement to other media and represent candidate communication directly with voters. Hence, they may contain general information about the candidates on the campaign trail or they may supply reprints of editorials placed in prominent newspapers. They may present results of public opinion polls measuring the competitive position of candidates in the campaign horse race or they may present transcripts of radio or television advertisements. In sum, online news releases enable candidates to focus on election issues they prefer, attack each other, or concentrate on the personality characteristics of the opponent.

Web Logs

Blogs are one of the most innovative and influential alternative media developments. In a blog entries are made for public display on a Web site, much as one would write in a personal journal. Although early blogs were primarily individual personal chronicles, by 2000 blogging developed into a popular Web content that embraced recurring political themes. Political blogs now typically provide commentary or news and information on a particular subject. Most blogs are textual and consist mainly of narrative discussions, but some blogs include other media and links to other blogs as part of their regular content. For instance, some blogs emphasize photographs (photoblog), videos (vlogs), or audio (podcasts).

As blogging became more common, blogs emerged that enabled Internet users to interact with each other and to discuss political issues. By 2001, political blogs had become regular Web content, spurring research on the differences between blogging and traditional journalism. In 2002, Markos Moulitsas Zuniga started a blog called DailyKos. With about 600,000 visits a day in 2006, it quickly became one of the Internet's most trafficked and influential blogs.

Since 2003, blogs have emerged as a major force in the dissemination of news stories, sometimes responsible for breaking new stories on controversial political topics. For instance, bloggers were responsible for opening up many, sometimes passionate, viewpoints during the Iraq War, and bloggers with Médecins Sans Frontières used blogs as a way to report from areas in Sri Lanka and Southern India during the December 2004 Tsunami. During the 2004 election, political consultants, news services, and candidates used blogs as a way to sway public opinion and reach out to constituents.

The Impact of AMP on American Politics

Many characteristics of the American contemporary media environment facilitated the evolution of AMP platforms and their transformation into forces that are impacting the American media landscape as well as its political process. Some bloggers argue that they initiated their blogs and joined the political dialogue as a response to conservative talk show hosts such as Rush Limbaugh. These bloggers believe that blogs give people a voice that would otherwise not be heard. Technology and the growing number of Internet users make blogs and other Internet resources a viable means of expression for political communication.

AMP may also represent the failure of mainstream media to reconcile both their commercial and their professional needs. Trust in traditional media continues to decline, especially with respect to election news. To some extent, the surge of new AMP platforms is a response to the public dissatisfaction with campaign news provided by the traditional media. However, distrust in old media coverage of election campaigns is certainly not the only factor that helped spur the increasing success of alternative media. As was the case with the advent of the Penny Press two centuries ago and broadcasting in the 20th century, variables associated with politics, economics, technology and the audience combined to make AMP possible. Without audience demand or the technological wherewithal to provide an alternative political expression, AMP would not have evolved. Ironically, some of these AMP platforms are now becoming enormously profitable in their own right, suggesting that they may be well on the way to becoming mainstream media platforms in the future.

The Effects of AMP on Citizens

The use of AMP platforms in contemporary society is a major component of candidates' campaign communication strategy. However, one must question if they influence voters' knowledge of the issues, their perception and attitude toward candidates, and even the political process of democracy itself. Research in political communication offers conflicting results in this regard. Some of the nontraditional news media platforms (e.g., call-in shows, talk shows) are very useful and helpful in the strengthening of democracy, in the sense that they help promote issue discussions among citizens, thereby fostering a meaningful level of deliberative dialogue within the political sphere, and the society as a whole.

Analyzing the influence of both the traditional and the nontraditional news media on voters' attitudes and perceptions of candidates in the 1992 presidential election campaign, researchers concluded that neither one really exerts a direct influence. However, because of their highly personal nature, the nontraditional news media generate a greater impact on voters' evaluation of candidates' competence and relational abilities. For other alternative media audience members such as radio talk show listeners, the format can have a negative effect. Research findings suggest that radio talk shows can produce passion among listeners who may be swayed in their political positions by such oratory.

Elsewhere, the impact of nontraditional media outlets on voters' political knowledge seems to vary according to the platform considered. Thus, while watching talk shows has been linked to increased campaign knowledge, exposure to MTV and late night talk shows is negatively related to campaigns. Talk show listeners are also more interested in politics than non-listeners. Hence, they tend to vote in greater numbers and they can be more politically knowledgeable.

Commenting on these mixed findings about the impact of AMP on audience members' political participation and knowledge, researchers such as William Eveland suggest that they might be related to the "growing pains" inherent to the new media. The nontraditional political communication forms are finally producing consistent positive effects equivalent to newspapers and television news. Hence, they can no longer be ignored and should be recognized for their potential impact on political communication in the future.

Robert H. Wicks

See also Blogs, Blogging; Clinton, William Jefferson; Communications Act of 1934; New Media Technologies; Talk Shows, Television

Further Readings

Chaffee, S. H., Zhao, X., & Leshner, G. (1994). Political knowledge and the campaign media of 1992. Communication Research, 21, 305–324.

Crittenden, J. (1971). Democratic functions of the open mike forum. Public Opinion Quarterly, 35, 200–210.

Eveland, W. P., Jr. (2006, August). The benchwarmers hit a home run: Non-traditional political communication effects in 2004. Paper presented at the annual meeting of the Association for Education in Journalism & Mass Communication, San Francisco, CA.

Federal Communications Commission. (2004). Telecommunications Act of 1996. Retrieved June 27, 2007, from http://www.fcc.gov/telecom.html

Hollander, B. A. (1995). The new news and the 1992 presidential campaign: Perceived versus actual political knowledge. Journalism & Mass Communication Quarterly, 72(5), 786–798.

Johnson, T. J., & Kaye, B. K. (2004). Wag the blog: How reliance on traditional media and the Internet influence credibility perceptions of Web logs among blog users. Journalism & Mass Communication Quarterly, 81(3), 622–643.

Kaltz, J. L. (1991). The power of talk. Governing, 4, 36–42.

The Museum of Broadcast Communications. (n.d.). Fairness doctrine. Retrieved from http://www.museum.tv/archives/etv/F/htmlF/fairnessdoct/fairnessdoct.htm

Newhagen, J. E. (1994). Self-efficacy and call-in political television use. Communication Research, 21, 366–379.

Pfau, M., & Eveland, W. P., Jr. (1994). Influence of traditional and non-traditional news media in the 1992 election campaign. Western Journal of Communication, 60(3), 214–233.

Reynolds, D., Roth, D., & Ryan, D. (2005). Why there's no escaping the blog. Fortune, 151(1), 44–50.

Vermeer, J. P. (1982). For immediate release: Candidate press releases in American political campaigns. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.

American Association of Political Consultants

The American Association of Political Consultants (AAPC) is a professional organization for those who work in various aspects of political campaigns. Political consultants are involved in the organizational and media aspects of all types of political campaigns for candidates and political issues at all levels of elections. Members include campaign managers, pollsters, media producers, fundraising specialists, lobbyists, and other political professionals. Members of all political parties, as well as independents, are included.

The AAPC was formed in 1969, although political consulting as a career existed decades before the official organization was chartered. Joseph Napolitan is credited by the organization with inventing the term "political consultant." Napolitan served as the first president of the AAPC. The organization now has more than 1,100 members and maintains a permanent office in Washington, D.C.

All members of the AAPC agree to abide by a Code of Professional Ethics. The code establishes basic rules of ethics for consultants and lays out expectations for financial and public dealings with clients.

The AAPC regularly holds campaign-training workshops for its members. The organization also publishes a regular newsletter for its members. The AAPC provides on its Web site links to other national and international organizations that specialize in political consulting, including the International Association of Political Consultants, the European Association of Political Consultants, the Latin American Association of Political Consultants, and the Asia Pacific Association of Political Consultants.

Every year the AAPC conducts the Pollie Awards which reward excellence in the production of campaign materials for candidates and other public campaigns. Awards are given for direct mail pieces, advertising on radio, television, newspaper, and Internet, and for promotional materials of all kinds. Entries are judged by panels of campaign professionals, and awards are presented at an annual ceremony.

The AAPC maintains an active oral history project. Interviews have been recorded with political consultants such as Matt Reese, Bill Hamilton, Stu Spencer, Bob Goodman, Charles Guggenheim, Walter DeVries, Joe Napolitan, Peter Hart, Ray Strother, Richard Wirthlin, and many others. The tapes for these oral histories have been deposited at the Gellman Library at George Washington University and are available for study.

Lynda Lee Kaid

Further Readings

American Association of Political Consultants. (2007). Code of ethics. Retrieved June 27, 2007, from http://www.theaapc.org/content/aboutus/codeofethics.asp

Guzzetta, S. J. (2006). The campaign manual (7th ed.). Alexandria, VA: Political Publications.

Nelson, C. J., Dullin, D. A., & Medvic, S. E. (Eds.). (2002). Shades of grey: Perspectives on campaign ethics. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

Sabato, L. (1981). The rise of political consultants. New York: Basic Books.

American Association of Retired Persons

See AARP

Americanization

In general, the term Americanization is used to denote a process of adaptation to the way things are or look like in the United States. Mostly, this qualification is used with a negative connotation, criticizing the process and/or the object of adaptation. However, there is quite a variety in what is diagnosed with this adaptation process: Americanization has been used for different things such as culture in general, the film industry, media systems or some of its parts or its contents, political communication in general, and electoral campaigns in particular. Terms like McDonaldization, Hollywoodization, Coca Cola Culture and Mickey Mouse Culture are expressions that demonstrate how symbols of U.S. culture are used to qualify actual or feared trends. Contrary to what the discussion sometimes seems to suggest, Americanization is not a process that has been discovered only in recent years. In Germany, for instance, such trends have been diagnosed since the 1920s.

In political communication, Americanization has been primarily used to discuss trends in election campaigning in countries outside the United States, mostly in Europe and Latin America. At the same time, the term has elicited much critique based on the fact that no satisfying definition of Americanization has been presented or can be agreed upon. Attempts at defining what was meant by Americanization often were simple catalogues of characteristics of what was seen as typical for American-style campaigning: engaging political consultants and other experts from the marketing industry, poll-driven campaigning, a media- or television-centered campaign, negative campaigning, personalization, de-politicization, to name just a few. While these are attributes that refer to the organization of campaigns and the strategies that are applied, German strategist Peter Radunski added a new angle by pointing to the fact that voters, in their new unpredictability, also have become more Americanized. Researchers Jay Blumler and Michael Gurevitch further broadened the perspective by emphasizing that, in the Americanized environment, journalists tend to react by "mediating" the campaign more in order to avoid being made the mouthpiece of campaigners.

Although many researchers were unhappy with the term, Americanization has proved to be a useful descriptive paradigm. In fact, several studies have used Americanization as a reference. However, only few employed the comparative perspective that is inherent in the term Americanization but were rather single country studies. Thus, it is mostly unsettled if and how the Americanization hypothesis can be operationalized for empirical research.

It was another point of critique that the idea of other systems adapting more and more to the U.S. model of political communication made the United States an inevitable yardstick for research, thus neglecting the fact that the United States is an exceptional case and therefore comparisons with the United States are problematic because of the obvious differences in the political and media systems. From there, it was a short way to discuss whether what could be observed in other countries was indeed a process of Americanization or rather a general trend that was, sooner or later, going on in all countries. This led to new terms being offered instead of Americanization, such as professionalization or modernization, thus abandoning the use of U.S. campaigns as role models. This view places the United States at the forefront of a development that is going on everywhere and acknowledges that a multitude of intervening variables, such as national specifics of the political system and the media system, prevents the adoption of recipes for effective campaigning from one country to another. Similarities in social developments cause similar reactions by political actors which leads us to assume convergence, but there is still much room for national variance, particularly in comparison with the United States. Campaigners in other countries take over from the United States what has proved to be effective but adapt it to national conditions.

Christina Holtz-Bacha

See also American-Style Campaigning; Professionalization

Further Readings

Blumler, J. G., & Gurevitch, M. (2001). "Americanization" reconsidered: UK-US campaign communication comparisons across time. In W. L. Bennett & R. M. Entman (Eds.), Mediated politics: Communication in the future of democracy (pp. 380–403). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Holtz-Bacha, C. (2000). Wahlkampf in Deutschland. Ein Fall bedingter Amerikanisierung [Election campaign in Germany: A case of conditioned Americanization]. In K. Kamps (Ed.), Trans-Atlantik—Trans-Portabel? Die Amerikanisierungsthese in der politischen Kommunikation [Trans-Atlantic—trans-portable? The Americanization thesis in political communication] (pp. 43–55). Wiesbaden: Westdeutscher Verlag.

Holtz-Bacha, C. (2004). Political campaign communication: Conditional convergence of modern media elections. In F. Esser & B. Pfetsch (Eds.), Comparing political communication: Theories, cases, and challenges (pp. 213–230). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Kaid, L. L., Gerstlé, J., & Sanders, K. R. (Eds.). (1991). Mediated politics in two cultures. Presidential campaigning in the United States and France. New York: Praeger.

Mancini, P., & Swanson, D. L. (1996). Politics, media, and modern democracy: Introduction. In D. L. Swanson & P. Mancini (Eds.), Politics, media, and modern democracy: An international study of innovations in electoral campaigning and their consequences (pp. 1–26). Westport, CT: Praeger.

Plasser, F., Scheucher, C., & Senft, C. (1999). Is there a European style of political marketing? A survey of political managers and consultants. In B. I. Newman (Ed.), Handbook of political marketing (pp. 89–112). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Radunski, P. (1996). Politisches Kommunikationsmanagement. Die Amerikanisierung der Wahlkämpfe. In B. Stiftung (Ed.), Politik überzeugend vermitteln. Wahlkampfstrategien in Deutschland und den USA (pp. 33–52). Gütersloh: Bertelsmann Stiftung.

Swanson, D. L., & Mancini, P. (1996). Patterns of modern electoral campaigning and their consequences. In D. L. Swanson & P. Mancini (Eds.), Politics, media, and modern democracy: An international study of innovations in electoral campaigning and their consequences (pp. 247–276). Westport, CT: Praeger.

Swanson, D. L., & Mancini, P. (Eds.). (1996). Politics, media and modern democracy: An international study of innovations in electoral campaigning and their consequences. Westport, CT: Praeger.

American-Style Campaigning

The practice of political campaigning in the United States is regarded as the cutting edge of the electioneering industry. Thus, it is no exaggeration to say that the United States is an international "role model of campaigning." The world is following American-style campaigning, applying the methods, concepts, strategies, and tactics. Many now identify this "new politics" with postmaterial norms, cognitive mobilization (media manipulation), and pragmatism—modeled on or influenced by the American style of politics. The global diffusion of U.S. campaign and marketing techniques is fostered by the internationalization of the campaign consulting business and is promoted by ideologically kindred political parties and by the world mass media.

In the United States, several studies documented the decline of the "old style" campaigns and the emergence of "new style" campaigning. The new style campaign is perceived to consist of four dimensions: new players, new incentives, new tactics, and new resources. First, the new players are the political consultants. Although political parties, candidates, and voters are still a part of the electoral process, contemporary campaigns are now "consultant centered." The centrality of the political consultants (or "spin doctors") is certainly American, but the pattern is exported worldwide: in the Israeli 1999 election campaign top American consultants such as James Carville, Bob Shrum, Stanley Greenberg, and Arthur J. Finkelstein were hired by the leading candidates. U.S. political consultants have designed electoral campaigns all over the world. The Global Political Consultancy Survey (1998–2000), for instance, shows that 57% of the top U.S. political consultants offered their services to foreign institutions in the 1990s. Two thirds of these consultants were engaged in consultancy activities in more than one geographic region. Latin America was the most important foreign market for the U.S. consultant industry. About 64% of the top U.S. consultants involved in foreign electoral campaigns worked there. The second important market was Europe, followed by postcommunist countries. The least important but still profitable markets were in Asia, Africa, and the Middle East.

The new players are in fact representing the professionalization of the campaigns, a process based on the apolitical assumption that the "modernization" of politics requires management of its processes, including elections, by professionals, who represent advancement over a reliance on citizen participation (amateurs). Professionalization is concerned more about "winning" elections and less about the long-term qualities of democracy and citizenship.

Second, patronage, loyalties, or ideologies are no longer the only incentives for people to be involved in campaigns. American campaigns are more of a "political marketing" system, thus focusing on public opinion polling, market research, and campaign testing to find the appealing message tailored to the voters' opinions and concerns. This gives rise to an emphasis on candidate personalities. This "marketingization" of political campaigns includes personalization of the political debate, "carnivalization" of the campaign (emphasizing entertainment over the message), and the reliance on and influence of polls, surveys, and focus-groups testing.

Third, contemporary campaigns focus on "targeting" voters with specific messages. Computers now allow campaigns to engage in fundraising, survey research, demographic research, and direct mail efficiently. The content of the campaigns is designed and tested to affect voters regardless of the political value. Thus, emotions such as fear, pride, joy, or hate are common elements in American political ads, as well as in other "Americanized" campaigns. An additional feature of Americanized campaigns is the emphasis on image in political ads over issues and substance. However, and perhaps surprisingly, Lynda Lee Kaid and Anne Johnston have shown that ads remain largely issue-oriented. Nevertheless, the fact that ads are issue-oriented does not mean that they provide specific recommendations, substantive arguments, or that they engage in explaining complex policy issues. Moreover, comparative studies of the American campaigns find that although the presence of issues in ads has increased, the tone of the campaigns has become more negative. Researchers have also found that the specific issue content of political advertising may be related to the political party of the presidential candidate. For instance, Republicans are often thought to "own" foreign policy issues, while Democrats fare better on claims about domestic policy. Candidates appear to be more successful when they emphasize in their advertising the specific issues over which they can claim ownership.

Finally, new style campaigns are expensive. Politicians and parties are now spending more on advertising than on anything else, and with each cycle the amount they spend grows dramatically. Running a campaign can be costly. Candidates must pay for all costs related to their campaigns from buttons and bumper stickers to television production, from costly research and polling to expensive consultants, from phone bills to travel expenses. Throughout the rise of television as a popular medium, the demands for political money have skyrocketed. In the 1956 U.S. elections, total campaign spending for all candidates was approximately $155 million. In today's elections, it is not uncommon for one single candidate to raise over $200 million by himself/herself. Campaign finance is a controversial issue, with free speech cited as an argument against legal restrictions and allegations of corruption from those who favor existing or further restrictions. Individuals and groups support candidates with their money but, in return, those individuals and groups expect that the candidate will reward them. In turn, it is widely believed that these individuals and groups wield an inordinate amount of power in government.

The "Americanization" of political campaigning throughout the world raises certain concerns regarding the impact of this process. The professionalization of the campaign, combined with heavy emphasis on personification of the political system, may lead to devaluation of the traditional structure of party organizations. More worrisome is the evidence that American news and broadcast media coverage of the political issues and focus on campaign-issues directly causes increased voter cynicism and nonparticipation. The focus on the game of politics, rather than its substance, may fuel a cycle of cynicism, trapping media, politicians, and voters. Several researchers have also concluded that negative campaigns are demobilizing voters and alienating them from politics. This may make American-style campaigning more harmful to political participation and thus to the well-being of democratic systems.

Gabriel Weimann

See also Consultants, Political; Media Consultants; Spin, Political

Further Readings

Ansolabehere, S., & Iyengar, S. (1995). Going negative: How political advertisements shrink and polarize the electorate. New York: Free Press.

Cappella, J., & Jamieson, K. H. (1997). Spiral of cynicism: The press and the public good. New York: Oxford University Press.

Caspi, D. (1996). American-style electioneering in Israel: Americanization versus modernization. In D. L. Swanson & P. Mancini (Eds.), Politics, media, and modern democracy: An international study of innovations in electoral campaigning and their consequences. London: Praeger.

Kaid, L. L., & Holtz-Bacha, C. (1995). Political advertising in Western democracies: Parties and candidates on television. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Kaid, L. L., & Johnston, A. (2001). Videostyle in presidential campaigns: Style and content of televised political advertising. Westport, CT: Praeger/Greenwood.

Marmor-Lavie, G., & Weimann, G. (2006). Measuring emotional appeals in Israeli election campaigns. International Journal of Public Opinion Research, 18(3), 1–26.

Plasser, F. (2000). American campaign techniques worldwide. Harvard International Journal of Press/Politics, 5(4), 33-54.

Plasser, F., & Plasser, G. (2002). Global political campaigning: A worldwide analysis of campaign professionals and their practices. New York: Praeger.

Shea, D. M. (1996). Campaign craft: The strategies, tactics, and the art of political campaign management. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Swanson, D. L., & Mancini, P. (1996). Patterns of modern electoral campaigning and their consequences. In D. Swanson & P. Mancini (Eds.), Politics, media, and modern democracy (pp. 247–276). Westport, CT: Praeger.

American Voter, The

First published in 1960 by Angus Campbell, Warren Miller, Philip Converse, and Donald Stokes of the Survey Research Center at the University of Michigan, The American Voter (AV) is considered an icon in the study of voting behavior theories and forms the foundation of the National Election Studies. The work is primarily concerned with the fundamental processes of political decision making by individual voters in the election of the American president, specifically as found during the 1956 Eisenhower-Stevenson presidential vote.

The work defines a political system as a collection of processes for the making of decisions. As such, the authors seek to comprehend the electoral process itself, as office holders in a democratic government are guided in many of their actions by what the work terms a calculus of electoral effect. Overall, the stated aim of American Voter is to understand the voting decisions of the national electorate in a manner that transcends some of the specific elements of historical circumstance.

Data for this endeavor, which has become controversial over time, was collected through interviews with randomly selected individuals in an effort to represent the national electorate on three presidential elections (1948–1956). Though most of the data represents individual recollections of behavior from the two Eisenhower-Stevenson elections, the authors attest that their data have the capacity to extend historical intervals, as they believe people are able to recall accurately past political actions. This methodology was chosen due to the authors' view that voters have a picture of the world of politics in their head, and that this picture is a key to understanding what voters do at the polls.

Of the book's major findings, AV depicts an individual's political decision process, in terms of partisan choice and turnout, as highly influenced by psychological factors as broken down into six dimensions. These dimensions include perceptions of a candidate's personal attributes, the comparative record of the two parties in managing the affairs of government, and informal political discussion between individuals or between individuals and the mass communications media. Thus, overall the model of voting behavior posited by AV described voting decisions as being determined by long-term forces (party identification and group affiliations) and short-term forces (candidate images and issues). Partisan identification is represented by the model as the dominant factor in determining voting outcomes for presidential elections.

Other forces are found to play a role in the political decision process including sustained party identification between elections. AV concludes that the orientation to party identification begins long before an individual reaches voting age and is found to be a strong reflection of one's social surroundings, especially family. The authors attest that stability in party identification is so strong that cumulative intense and widespread experiences (such as found during a great national crisis) are required to produce profound political consequences. Finally, external factors such as membership in social groupings, social class, and economic antecedents are further determinants of a citizen's voting behavior.

As a seminal work in political behavior studies, AV has posited both revolutionary and controversial findings. Debate has centered upon the true level of vote-rationality possessed by individuals, and on the notion that participation in political processes is often determined by partisan intensity. Finally, some have criticized that certain findings have not been sustainable over time, especially in the face of modern dealignment and a decline in partisan identification by voters.

H. E. Schmeisser

See also Mass Political Behavior; Voter Behavior

Further Readings

Campbell A., Converse, P., Miller, W., & Stokes, D. (1960). The American voter. New York: John Wiley & Sons.

Apartheid

See Mandela, Nelson

Apathy, Voter

Apathy reflects a lack of engagement in even the most basic forms of public affairs participation. Apathy also has been described as a lack of interest and involvement in political affairs and a separation from matters political. Studies, however, have shown that interest is an effect rather than a characteristic of apathy. In addition, people can decline to participate for reasons other than apathy.

Reports of apathy have been inflated by flawed reporting of turnout rates. The most common method for reporting turnout, based on the "voting age population" from the U.S. census, includes noncitizens and ineligible felons. The number of ineligible citizens has increased markedly since 1972, but turnout among eligible voters has remained fairly steady.

Apathy often is considered one aspect of "political alienation," which is said to include the four dimensions of normlessness or distrust (cynicism), powerlessness or efficacy, meaninglessness (seeing little difference among candidates, parties or policies), and apathy. It is common for party officials and commentators to combine apathy with other aspects of political alienation, and to blame deficiencies in high school civics education, negative campaigning, and poor media coverage for disengagement.

Education matters a great deal, but research does not bear out perceptions about the role of negative campaigning, media coverage, and cynicism. For example, some estimates indicate that negative advertising has tripled since the 1960s. Yet voting rates have not decreased proportionately. Turnout in 2004 was 77% (86% of registered voters), the highest since 1964.

Apathetic individuals may be somewhat immune to negativism in ads due to their lack of involvement and attention to the political process. Citizens who blame negative campaigning for their apathy also might not be accurately reporting the roots of their own lack of interest.

Cynicism also cannot shoulder the blame for apathy. Research has confirmed that apathy and cynicism form distinct constructs, meaning that someone who is cynical may not be apathetic. Instead, political disaffection can lead to action among those with higher efficacy. Action is most likely among those with the highest efficacy and highest disaffection.

Research suggests that disengagement results more from low efficacy and satisfaction with the status quo. Political efficacy has decreased markedly since the 1960s, when it was as high as 74%. In 2004 it was at 47% although it has increased gradually since the early 1990s. Those with conservative outlooks, higher incomes, more education, and Caucasian ethnicity tend to have higher efficacy. Partisans, the more advantaged, and Caucasians also tend to vote more reliably.

Apathy is most appropriately viewed as a separation from civic involvement that reflects a negative valence (I don't feel like caring; it doesn't matter; it's too much trouble to care). It differs substantially from complacency, which reflects a positive valence (I don't need to care because things are fine the way they are) based on comfort with the status quo.

This distinction explains problems with the view that a lack of substance in television coverage contributes to apathy. For example, satisfaction with television as an information source associates with more disengagement while increased use and attention to news—including on television—consistently associates with higher levels of political knowledge, efficacy, and public affairs involvement. It seems that television, a low-involvement medium, can cultivate interest and lead to more goal-oriented information seeking from additional sources. This then boosts efficacy, giving media a role to play in a positive cycle of increasing involvement.

On the other hand, citizens—and especially younger ones—can get trapped in a more negative cycle in which cynicism toward the political system diminishes efficacy, which cultivates apathy, which limits information seeking and which then reinforces cynicism. This makes it especially important to consider the causes and cures of apathy and complacency among young people.

Turnout is higher among citizens over 25, but complacency and a lack of efficacy appear to be more to blame than apathy. Surveys show that a strong majority of young citizens care about some issues and candidates. They tend to vote if they think their voter will matter and if the process is made easier such as through Election Day registration, early voting, convenient locations, and motor-voter registration. Unfortunately, younger people are often ignored by public officials and campaigns, which can trigger a cycle that cultivates apathy. Although local party leaders overwhelmingly cite a lack of youth political engagement as a problem, for example, they cite senior citizens almost three times more often than young people as the demographic group most important to the "long-term success" of their party.

This may be changing. In late 2003, the belief among 15- to 25-year-olds that they could make a difference was declining. Young people also expressed less trust of the government, and studies consistently show that cynicism toward the political system diminishes efficacy. In 2004, however, parties and nonpartisan get-out-the-vote campaigns targeted young voters more energetically, and young citizens responded. The use of celebrities to attract attention to messages, which focused on boosting efficacy, diminishing complacency, and making registration easy, contributed to an 11% increase in youth turnout after declining 16% between 1972 and 2000 (other than a 1992 spike attributed to Bill Clinton's novel and active campaigning among young people). This represented an increase almost triple that among older citizens.

In sum, apathy and complacency, while related, appear to have different causes. Complacency seems more likely than apathy to respond to campaigns focused on the relevance of civic issues and the value of civic involvement. Apathy may require more concerted efforts due to its roots in a lack of knowledge and efficacy. Although discussion at home makes a big difference in political socialization, for example, many young people report they have never talked about politics, government, or current events with their parents while living at home. In addition, young people generalize from how seriously student governments in schools are taken. Overall, lessons learned early, in and out of civics classes, seem more responsible for the development or prevention of apathy than do characteristics of campaigns and media coverage.

Erica Weintraub Austin

See also Negative Campaigning; Political Efficacy; Political Involvement; Political Socialization

Further Readings

Delli Carpini, M. X. (2004). Gen.com: Youth, civic engagement, and the new information environment. Political Communication, 17, 341–349.

McCluskey, M., Deshpande, S., Shah, D., & McLeod, D. (2004). The efficacy gap and political participation: When political influence fails to meet expectations. International Journal of Public Opinion Research, 16(4), 437.

McDonald, M. P., & Popkin, S. L. (2001). The myth of the vanishing voter. American Political Science Review, 95, 963–974.

Pinkleton, B. B., & Austin, E. W. (2004). Media perceptions and public affairs apathy in the politically inexperienced. Mass Communication & Society, 7, 319–337.

Pinkleton, B. E., Um, N., & Austin, E. W. (2002). An exploration of the effects of negative political advertising on political decision making. Journal of Advertising, 31, 13–22.

Apologia

Apologia is a formal act associated with self-defense or self-justification. It is generally in the form of a personalized discourse. A convincing defense of one's character or ethics is a central concern of the apologist and has been an important rhetorical ritual of past as well as contemporary society. Many scholars have argued that the successful or unsuccessful use of apologia can even alter the course of history.

Although the circumstances and outcomes of apologia vary greatly, its traditional form has not significantly deviated since its use by the ancients. First, a statement of the case at hand is given. Then, a refutation of the charges is advanced. Next, an explanation unfolds—particularly stressing the speaker's character. Finally, a conclusion is given bolstering the apologist's integrity.

Research on apologia has yielded a number of findings. Apologia results from moral choices that have been subjected to ethical challenges. Unless character repair is made, there can be negative future consequences. Apologia often involves focusing the audience on how the apologist wants them to perceive his/her character. Finally, the apology is seemingly context or accusation bound.

In the history of public address there are many cases of well-known public apologies. For example, in the Greek tradition, Socrates, Isocrates, and Demosthenes all presented noteworthy self-defense discourses. Examples of contemporary apologists include Richard Nixon, Edward Kennedy, and Bill Clinton. Nixon's 1952 "Checkers" or Fund speech is, perhaps, the most famous apologetic discourse in modern times. Using the new medium of television, Nixon went face-to-face with the American people and defended his character to the largest television audience of that time, 60 million people.

In 1973, communication scholars B. L. Ware and Wil A. Linkugel wrote a pioneering article on apologia. Their article established apologia as an important speech genre. Moreover, they posited that four primary strategies consistently appear in self-defense rhetoric: denial, bolstering, differentiation, and transcendence.

The Watergate scandal of 1973 to 1974 served to further heighten interest and scholarship in the apologetic form. Identifying key apologetic strategies and noting their frequency and implications in selected apologia became a popular scholarly focus during the Watergate scandal and in the aftermath of Nixon's forced resignation from the presidency in 1974.

Similarly, Clinton's involvement with various scandals and his subsequent impeachment trial in 1999 provided additional focus on the importance of effective apologia. Clinton's internationally televised August 17, 1998, apologia on the Monica Lewinsky case received a considerable amount of scholarly and popular attention. As such, the subgenres and strategies inherent in the apologetic form continue to captivate a wide variety of critics of public communication.

Robert A. Vartabedian

See also Checkers Speech

Further Readings

Benoit, W. L. (1995). Accounts, excuses, and apologies: A theory of image restoration strategies. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Kennedy, G. (1963). The art of persuasion in Greece. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Ware, B. L., & Linkugel, W. A. (1973). They spoke in defense of themselves: On the generic criticism of apologia. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 59, 273–283.

Arafat, Yasser (1929–2004)

Yasser Arafat, born as Mohammed Abdel Raouf Arafat al-Qudwar Al-Husseini, was a Nobel Prize–winning political leader as well as a guerrilla warfare soldier. Arafat's political career and personal life were riddled with controversy.

Born to Palestinian parents in Cairo, he was one of six children. Arafat was an active student leader who graduated with a degree in Civil Engineering in 1956. Thereafter, he went on to serve in the Egyptian Army. His political career began with the formation of al-Fatah, the largest group in the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO). His main objective in forming the PLO was the liberation of Palestine from Israel.

Arafat's relationship with the media was complex. He used communications, such as speeches and leaflets, for generating propaganda as a recruiting tactic for the PLO. These communications were carried out on militaristic, psychological, and political levels.

Some of the improvements Palestinians had hoped for after the PLO took over Gaza in 1994 were free speech and expression. However, Arafat turned the Palestinian press into another channel of control for the PLO. Editors and journalists were threatened and beaten into submission to make sure they supported the "regime mentality" of the PLO. They were forced to reflect only the political agenda supported by Arafat. Political communication became narrow and one-sided. Reporters for independent news agencies in the region, too, were forced to send positive reports of the PLO to the outside world.

Arafat's political career was based on adept diplomatic communication and suppression of opposition. After the victory of the Palestinian Liberation Army over Israeli troops at Karameh in 1968, Arafat started systematic efforts to obtain recognition for the Palestine state on the world stage. Despite the killing of 11 Israeli Olympic athletes by PLO-sponsored terrorists at the 1972 Munich Olympics, Arafat secured an observer berth for the PLO at the United Nations in 1974.

After being driven to Tunis in 1982, Arafat launched the First Intifada in 1987. Intifada is essentially an Arab word for uprising. Arafat made sure that the world media picked up on the killing of children during the Intifada, which put the PLO's agenda back on the world map. The 1990s witnessed a series of diplomatic political communications between the Israeli and Palestinian leaderships. The first peace treaty, the Oslo Accords, secured Arafat the Nobel Peace Prize for his "efforts to create peace in the Middle East."

In 1996, Arafat was elected as the head of the Palestinian Authority, an entity created by the Oslo Accords. However, the then prime minister of Israel, Benjamin Netanyahu, refused to recognize Palestinian statehood despite the Oslo agreement. This led to further communication about the peace process between Netanyahu and Arafat, mediated by Bill Clinton, resulting in the Wye River Memorandum of 1998. More negotiations followed in 2000 and 2001. However, it is alleged that Arafat continued to use the Palestinian media to further his political agenda and to continue terrorist activities against Israel despite the façade of the peace talks. He launched the Second Intifada in 2001.

When Ariel Sharon secured power in Israel in 2001, he refused any further peace talks. He used military force to put Arafat under house arrest in 2002 at his headquarters at Ramallah. Arafat died in 2004 in a hospital near Paris. The cause of his death remains unclear.

Rati Kumar

Further Readings

Livingstone, N. (1990). Inside the PLO. Pleasantville, NY: Reader's Digest Association.

Rubin, B., & Rubin, J. C. (2003). Yasir Arafat: A political biography. London: Oxford University Press.

Arendt, Hannah

See Public Communication in Politics

Argentina Democratization Process, Role of the Media

Democracy returned to Argentina in 1983 after many interruptions of the constitutional system during the 20th century, culminating with the last military dictatorship (1976–1983). The media have had a limited influence on the process of transition to democracy, mainly because they worked under censorship. Another reason for this limited influence was the lack of partnership between the media and political parties. However, the media played an important role as a trustworthy political actor respecting the consolidation of democracy.

The return to democracy happened, in large part, due to the decay of the military regime. Characteristics of this transition were economic crises and political decline, caused primarily by a lost war. Furthermore, numerous internal and external claims existed against the government based on egregious human rights violations. Argentineans demanded democracy but possessed a weak civic and political culture since citizen participation had been restricted, or even forbidden. Political parties lacked experience due to many years of prohibition and persecution. The media were accustomed to extreme censorship. Opponents of the government disappeared or were forced into exile.

Upon return to democracy, a new relationship developed between the government and media. The Radical Civil Union (UCR) candidate, Raúl Alfonsín, won the presidential election in 1983, and the radical party demonstrated a high professional performance in electoral communication. Polls, merchandising, and visual innovations were the features of this run for the presidency. It was the first campaign which showed a high degree of Americanization in terms of political communication.

This first experience of postdictatorship democracy was characterized by a combination from the government of confrontation and agreement attempts with the opposition. Nevertheless, some mistakes of Argentinean politics were soon reproduced: the ruling party tried to become hegemonic; corporations' power was underestimated; congress lacked autonomy for decision making; and corruption abounded. Additionally, the economy experienced a severe crisis. Some indicators at the earlier end of Alfonsín's administration showed the consequences of extraordinary economic mismanagement: real wages dropped 50%; unemployment and underemployment doubled; and a high and constant inflation turned into accelerating hyperinflation.

The transfer of power in 1989 was the first step toward maintaining the constitutional system. The continuity of this process by consecutive elections changing ruling parties is a sign that democracy has been, at the present, consolidated in Argentina. The 1989 election results followed the Latin American trends at those times, because the voters supported candidates who carried out economic liberalism's policies. At the time of the presidential elections of 1989, the media began a new phase in their relations with government. President Menem's reform to broadcasting law liberalized the market. As a result, media conglomerates emerged and increased the level of concentration. The next trend was a progressive convergence between media and telephone companies. Menem was reelected in 1995.

In 1999, a new political coalition between a center-left party and Radicalism won the presidential elections. The coalition's discourse seemed to fulfill demands of citizens after 10 years. Although the Argentinean society had manifested a willingness to maintain the convertibility plan and the free-market economic policy, the way in which these transformations were implemented was not so widely accepted. Corruption scandals and signs of abuse of power placed serious expectations on the new political faction.

However, the coalition failed to accomplish promises, and radical President Fernando De la Rua found increasing difficulties in governing. The 2001 legislative elections showed a general distrust due to a high level of electoral absenteeism in addition to null and blank votes. This election testified to the disintegrated links between citizens and politicians, as well as political parties. President De la Rua was unable to control this state of affairs. The popular media mocked him because of his incompetence. Mass demonstrations in the capital city and other important metropolises pushed the president to resign. As a consequence, the Argentinean institutions experienced one of the most difficult situations in their history, having five presidents in a month, since the possible successors were forced to step down due to many reasons. The last one was the Peronist Eduardo Duhalde, who ruled the country until the next national elections, finally called for 2003, when Peronist Nestor Kirchner became president.

The media did not encourage the process of transition to democracy in Argentina but accompanied it. Television played an active role in campaigns and by popularization of the political debate. The media system experienced a slow expansion, from press to broadcasting, from public to private property, from control to liberalization, and to concentration in multimedia. Journalists recovered the press freedom when democracy returned, but they still denounced a growing influence of government over media.

Whereas some participants (e.g., the military) lost power, others (e.g., political parties and labor unions) lost credibility. The media progressively took sides with the people in two main ways: as "watchdogs," developing investigative journalism, and as advocates, performing a symbolic substitution of discredited police and justice system officials. People requested that the media report corruption and criminal affairs specifically involving public officers. By televising illegal agreements involving politicians, by live transmissions of judicial processes, or by appearing on the scene before police and other authorities, the media evolved into a role as jury for the public opinion. The dynamics of political television shows contributed during the transition to democracy by familiarizing people to political issues through trivialization and entertainment.

Malvina Rodriguez

See also Alfonsín, Raúl; Democratization, Role of the Media in; Falklands-Malvinas War; Menem, Carlos

Further Readings

Landi, O. (1994). Desventuras y consuelos de la democracia letrada. El caso argentino [Misfortunes and consolations in the literate democracy. The Argentine case]. In C. H. Filgueira & D. Nohlen (Eds.), Prensa y transición democrática. Experiencias recientes en Europa y América Latina [Press and transition to democracy. Recent experiences in Europe and Latin America]. Madrid: Iberoamericana.

Park, D. J. (2002). Media, democracy and human rights in Argentina. Journal of Communication Inquiry, 26, 237–260.

Waisbord, S. R. (1996). Secular politics: The modernization for Argentine electioneering. In D. L. Swanson & P. Mancini (Ed.), Politics, media and modern democracy. An international study of innovations in electoral campaigning and their consequences (pp. 207–225). New York: Praeger.

Argumentation, Political

Democracy, governance by the people collectively, entails collective thoughts and actions—realities in rhetoric alone. Therefore, adapting to the fluid political needs and desires of a free society necessitates freedom of individual expression via argumentation. In this regard, political argumentation's foundations were laid in 339 B.C., when Aristotle's Rhetoric advocated use of "all available means of persuasion," to maintain a free society.

Academic definitions of argumentation emphasize its "logocentricity," or focus on logic and reasoned argument. Politics, by nature, however, has always been schizophrenic, part reason-governed or substantial and part illusory. Political communication's ever-increasing reliance on mass media in the past half century has exacerbated this duality, making emotional images all but inseparable from logical claims. Scholars agree, however, that argumentation involves controversy between an advocate and an opponent who each wish to influence the thoughts or behaviors of others.

Even while the Mayflower lay in Plymouth Harbor, its compact's adherence to the desires of "the most voices," laid the foundation for argumentation as a central feature of the U.S. political system as a democratic entity. Since that time, the evolution of political argumentation in the United States has followed the trajectory of the forum by which "the most voices" could be heard.

Therefore, public political argumentation has evolved in three nondiscrete stages:

1. The New England town meeting, dominant from 1641 until the mid-19th century, in which a nearly pure form of direct democracy was possible due to the small population and large proportion of available time (and attention spans) for lengthy and compulsory weekly meetings,
2. The "Great Debates" of the general assembly of the Constitutional Convention and early legislature creating the U.S. government as a representative democracy, and
3. The virtual democracy created by media technology in the 20th century, wherein a greater proportion of the citizenry engaged in argumentation less as advocate or opponent, and more as audience or critic.

A political argument is a two-way process employing symbolic interaction to influence others' thoughts or actions. Three components embody this definition and, hence, distinguish it from related terms such as "rhetoric," "discourse," and "political debate":

1. A political argument is a two-way process. Whereas rhetoric may only involve one party's persuasive attempts, argumentation implies that at least two parties are involved either in mutual persuasive attempts, or attempts to influence a mutual audience. The AIDS Quilt, a traveling fabric collage whose stories were vital to the rhetorical humanization of "People With Aids," for example, can be considered political rhetoric due to its persuasive nature, but not necessarily political argumentation, due its lack of a defined opponent.

2. Political argument involves the use of symbolic interaction (communication). Debate, however, as a subset of argumentation, is more limited to verbal/linguistic communication, and (notwithstanding the joint press conferences currently labeled as debates in modern political campaigns) is considered specifically a decision-making process with a defined endpoint and, presumably, a distinct outcome—a "win" by either advocate or opponent in the eyes of a particular audience or critic. Political argument often involves a more ongoing controversy such as party identification or social issue stances and less simply-defined or measured goals. Political argument may include political ads, bumper stickers, and films such as Fahrenheit 911. Therefore, a debate is a form of argumentation; but not all argumentation can be considered debate.

3. The purpose of influencing others' thoughts or actions is paramount as a distinguishing characteristic of political argumentation. Political discourse, however, may be simply for the purposes of information-dissemination or entertainment, as in the after-dinner speech.

Much of today's public political argumentation is not only depicted in the mass media, but is often created specifically for broadcast, thus further changing the nature of what is political argumentation. The interim between the "Great Debates" and modern televised political debates traces political argumentation through the more classic forms of argument of Chautauqua groups (traveling troupes of political and social activists seeking to educate the public and rally support for social issues) and Lincoln-Douglas debates to Roosevelt's fireside chats—the first forum of real-time mass consumption of political argument.

In the 1950s, when television literally leapt into the lives of American households, dominating political argumentation and information dissemination, new forms of political argument allowing far greater mass consumption and image-representation were possible. The savvy political arguer adapted to rich formats such as televised political advertisements, network news, and the new "Great Debates" (which J. Jeffery Auer argues are neither great nor debates), while unfortunates soon learned that reliance on purely reasoned argument was unwise in a society where governance and communication so diverged from the direct democracy of earlier generations.

Despite vast alterations in the forums of public political argumentation, private forums of "cracker barrel democracy" (so-named for its occurrence around the cracker barrels in grocery stores of old) have always been accessible through interpersonal channels, in local homes, and businesses. This forum's true influence over public policy has vacillated; however, since the advent of the Internet, the genuine democracy of the town hall meeting may once again be accessible, this time through mass-mediated interpersonal communication. While current Internet argumentation may not measure up to the power of the face-to-face interactions of the "cracker-barrel" days, the sheer interactivity of cyberspace makes hearing "the most voices," once again possible for the people collectively.

Karla Hunter

See also Debates; Rhetoric, Political

Further Readings

Ewbank, H. L., & Auer, J. J. (1941). Discussion and debate. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts.

Hellweg, S. A., Pfau, M., & Brydon, S. R. (1992). Televised presidential debates: Advocacy in contemporary America. New York: Praeger.

McKinney, M. S., & Lamoureux, E. R. (1999). Citizen response to the 1996 presidential debates: Focusing on the focus groups. In L. L. Kaid & D. G. Bystrom (Eds.), The electronic election: Perspectives on the 1996 campaign communication (pp. 163–177). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Aristotle (384–322 B.C.)

Aristotle, a Greek philosopher and protégé of Plato, is considered the Father of the Scientific Method, the creator of formal logic, and one of the greatest thinkers in the history of the Western world. He was born in Stagiros in northeastern Greece near the neighboring kingdom of Macedonia. In 367 B.C. he traveled to Athens and joined Plato's philosophical school, the Academy. Aristotle remained in the Academy for approximately 20 years, first as a student and, later, as a teacher. One of the subjects he taught was rhetoric (rhētorikē). Notes used for his lectures on rhetoric at the Academy are thought to form, in large part, the contents of what is today the text titled Rhetoric. Around the time of Plato's death in 347 B.C., Aristotle left Athens. Over the next 3 or 4 years, he researched the natural history of the eastern Aegean Sea coast and apparently began work on lecture notes that would later be compiled into the text known today as Politics.

Sometime in 343 or 342 B.C., Aristotle joined the court of King Philip of Macedonia. Aristotle's father, Nicomachus, had served as personal physician to Philip's father, King Amyntas. Aristotle tutored the king's teenage son, Alexander, who later became the Macedonian hegemon, Alexander the Great. However, Aristotle only remained on as royal tutor until 340 B.C. Two years later, Philip's army defeated the Greek city-states at the Battle of Chaeronea. Following Philip's assassination in 336 B.C., Alexander ascended the throne, and Aristotle maintained positive relations with him for the next decade.

In 335 B.C. Aristotle founded a school of philosophy in the Lyceum, a gymnasium attached to the temple of Apollo Lyceus, just outside of Athens. Aristotle's proclivity for walking the colonnaded portico (peripatos) while teaching his students resulted in the school's common name, the Peripatetic School. At the Lyceum, Aristotle maintained an open library that was encyclopedic in scope and included his writings on rhetoric, logic, politics, ethics, psychology, biology, zoology, physics, meteorology, metaphysics, and poetry. Aristotle accepted Macedonian subsidies for his school and made no secret of his friendship with Antipater, an Alexandrian general appointed by the Macedonian king to serve as ambassador to Athens and later as regent over Greece. Thus, when the sudden death of Alexander the Great in 323 B.C. resulted in increased anti-Macedonian sentiments, Aristotle fled to the ancient city of Chalcis on the island of Euboea, leaving his school and its library under the direction of one of his students, Theophrastus. Aristotle died the following year.

Unfortunately, much of what Aristotle published during his lifetime has been lost, and most of the extant texts of Aristotle's works, including Rhetoric and Politics, are thought to be compilations of Aristotle's lecture notes combined, in some cases, with the writings of some of his students. Aristotle's notes on rhetoric seem to have been made available to the public in an organized hand-written format by Andronicus of Rhodes in the mid-first century B.C., but this work was not widely published in print form in the Western world until the latter part of the 15th century A.D.

Aristotle's extant writings indicate that, like Plato, he was interested in the good life, which Aristotle defined as human happiness (eudaimonia) or human flourishing. However, Aristotle rejected Plato's approach to gaining the knowledge (epistēmē) necessary to understand how to live the good life. According to Plato, understanding the world in which humans lived and obtaining knowledge about how to live well in it depended upon human comprehension of a transcendent world of ultimate and universal ideas (eide). Aristotle rejected this otherworldliness and insisted that only the knowledge gained through the human senses could be considered true knowledge. Thus, Aristotle's pragmatic empiricism: collecting, classifying, and systematizing data that were accessible through the human senses. That which motivated Aristotle to study plants and animals, including the human animal, also apparently impelled him to examine the forms of reasoning men used in efforts to persuade others as well as the political systems men had created to govern their fellows.

Both the Politics and the Rhetoric are concerned with human affairs and the means of achieving the good life. Essentially, in the Politics, Aristotle is concerned with which state (i.e., political system) is best for creating conditions conducive to human flourishing. In the Rhetoric, he is concerned with the methods of human reasoning in argumentation that can influence decision making toward human happiness. In both works Aristotle relies on empirical data. His political philosophy developed in the Politics is grounded in examination of 158 political constitutions. In the Rhetoric, Aristotle's rhetorical theory draws from the Synagoge Tekhnon, his collection of writings by Greek Sophists on the arts of logos and rhetoric, as well as other data.

The Rhetoric begins as a philosophical work and shifts to a technical handbook examining practical reasoning in argumentation within contingent circumstances, or where conditions of uncertainty exist because absolute knowledge is unattainable. Aristotle opens by describing rhetoric as a counterpart (antistrophos) to dialectic (i.e., formal logical discussions), and justifying the study of rhetoric based on its practical usefulness in human affairs. He defines rhetoric "as the faculty of observing in any given case the available means of persuasion." For Aristotle, there are two primary modes of persuasion, or proofs (pisteis): inartistic and artistic proofs. Because inartistic proofs exist prior to the creation of a speech (rhēsis) in various forms of testimonial, physical, and written evidence and need only to be used by the speaker (rhētōr), Aristotle focuses on the artistic proofs which must be invented by the speaker and demonstrated through speaking. Aristotle describes the three species of artistic proofs as ēthos (the character, knowledge, and good will toward the audience that the speaker demonstrates in a given speech), logos (the general case or argument(s) in any given speech), and pathos (the combination of ethos and logos to produce certain emotions in an audience).

Because, for Aristotle, rhetoric is a counterpart to dialectic (i.e., formal logic), he describes two forms of informal logic in which humans engage: the example (paradeigma), which involves inductive reasoning, and the enthymeme (enthymēma) which involves deductive reasoning. The reliance upon examples allows a rhētōr to generalize from several experiential instances and also to reason from one specific case or instance to another. The enthymeme, on the other hand, with its three-part form—major premise, minor premise, and conclusion—allows the rhētōr to move from a probability through a factual or material claim to a specific conclusion. What Aristotle's syllogism is to formal logic, the enthymeme is to rhetoric. The enthymeme differs from the syllogism in that: (1) it is informal reasoning (i.e., premises may be suppressed or unstated and, thereby, the overall form of the argument truncated); (2) it is designed to be comprehensible by a popular or mass, nonexpert audience; thus, it draws upon generally held principles, common beliefs, or values accepted by audiences as "probably" true or best (which also allows the suppression of a premise); and, (3) it is participatory in that it is designed to encourage the audience to supply or "fill in" what is unstated (i.e., the suppressed premise). For example, consider the following: [Major premise:] We need more honest politicians. [Minor premise:] "Candidate A" has a record of honesty. [Conclusion:] Therefore, we need to re-elect "Candidate A." If a particular audience accepts the view that there are too many dishonest politicians, the rhētōr making this case can leave the major premise unstated, and argue: We need to reelect "Candidate A," because s/he is an honest politician.

Aristotle claims that there are three species of rhetoric: deliberative, forensic (or judicial), and ceremonial (epideictic). Deliberative speeches are often political, especially legislative, addressing future actions on the basis of the likelihood of advantage/benefit or disadvantage/harm. Forensic speeches are often, though not always, legal speeches involving accusations (kategoria) or defenses (apologia), addressing past actions on the basis of their apparent justice or injustice. Epideictic addresses are ceremonial speeches, addressing present, existing conditions through praise (eulogistic) or blame (dyslogistic), often of an individual or community's virtue or vice. Aristotle offers both common topics (topoi) for use in any type of speech as well as special topics for each type of speech to which a rhētōr can turn in order to invent arguments for a public address.

In addition to modes of proof and types of reasoning in the three species of rhetoric addressed in Book I and the latter half of Book II, much of Book II addresses the roles of character and human emotions in persuasion. Aristotle stresses the importance of understanding how to arouse and subdue certain emotions in an audience as well as how a speaker can adapt his/her character to the character of the audience. Much of Book III addresses the delivery of a speech in terms of style and arrangement of the parts of the speech. Although Aristotle does not delineate what have come to be known as the "Five Classical Canons of Oration" (Invention, Arrangement, Style, Memory, and Delivery), his Rhetoric provided a foundation for later rhetorical theorists, particularly those in Rome, to develop those canons as the guidelines for the production and delivery of public speeches.

In the Rhetoric, Aristotle counsels that a rhētōr's effectiveness in deliberative speaking depends upon an understanding of the four forms of political constitutions and the differences between them. The Politics treats the subject of types of political systems in much more detail, examining the structures and practices of various types of states with the purpose of recommending that system which Aristotle sees as ideal as providing the most likely circumstances for human flourishing. In Book I, Aristotle argues that the state (i.e., the Greek city-state, or polis) is the result of several natural associations. First is the family, constituted by marriage and slavery to meet daily needs. When greater needs are to be met several families associate in a village. Finally, when several villages unite they create a new association, a state (polis). According to Aristotle, the state originates out of natural needs and continues to exist in order to provide the highest end (telos) of human life, the good life. Thus, for Aristotle, the state is a natural association and "man is by nature a political animal," fitted by nature with the ability to reason and speak about justice and injustice and, therefore, to live in association with others in a state. In the remainder of Book I, Aristotle addresses issues related to slavery, private versus common property, and the rule of men over children and wives.

In Book II, Aristotle criticizes Plato's ideas expressed in his writings, the Republic and the Laws, as well as the ideas of others about utopist states. He singles out for specific examination the structures and practices of political systems in Sparta, Crete, and Carthage, and comments on previous and present lawgivers from Solon to Draco before concluding his commentary on the strengths and weaknesses of existing and theoretical political systems.

Books III and IV are the heart of the Politics and deal with definitions of citizenship, the virtues of citizens, the number and types of governments and those that are true and those that are perverted, an examination of monarchy (kingship) versus the rule of law, and the difficulty of simplifying types of regimes into good and bad, and an introduction to Aristotle's ideal state.

For Aristotle, the citizen is one who participates directly in public deliberations and decisions about public affairs and serves in public offices of the state; citizenship carries both rights and responsibilities. Here rhetoric is involved as each citizen develops toward his end (telos) as a political animal, reasoning and deliberating about justice. Aristotle argues that the virtue of the good citizen differs from the virtue of the good man in that the function of the virtue in the good citizen is to preserve the state. However, in the best state, the virtue of the good citizen is the virtue of the good human being, because the purpose and function of the best state is to lead to the highest form of virtue, the human being living the good life. Thus, Aristotle deems it significant to characterize the different types of regimes. In essence, there are six, three major types which can take a good and bad form: (1) when good, rule by one is a kingship; when bad, a tyranny; (2) when good, rule by the few is aristocracy; when bad, an oligarchy; and, (3) when good, rule by the many is a polity (politeia); when bad, a democracy. Aristotle concludes Book III by advocating what has become a fundamental principle of liberal democracy: the rule of law. Established law is like the rule of reason, whereas rule by a single individual allows for error due to the passions. The most common types of constitutions are democratic and oligarchic and the various forms of these types of regimes provide evidence of their strengths and weaknesses. Thus, Aristotle offers polity as the best form of government, a mixture of aspects from democracies and oligarchies in a state that avoids extreme disparities between rich and poor and has a large middle class that can moderate potential political extremes by either the wealthy or the poor.

Thus Book V deals with the causes of revolutions and means of avoiding them, and Book VI addresses in greater detail aspects of democracies and oligarchies and how people framing new constitutions can learn from the best forms of democracy. Books VII and VIII address Aristotle's conception of the good life, what is needed in the ideal state for citizens to pursue the good life, and the importance and significant aspects of educating the young in the ideal state. For Aristotle, the relationship between a state functioning to assist individuals in fulfilling their telos in living the good, virtuous life and the practice of the good and virtuous life of a state's citizens in preserving the ideal state is a symbiotic one.

B. Wayne Howell

Further Readings

Aristotle. (1988). The politics (S. Everson, Ed., & B. Jowett, Trans.). New York: Cambridge University Press.

Aristotle. (1991). On rhetoric: A theory of civic discourse (George Kennedy, Trans.). New York: Oxford University Press.

Black, E. (1965). Rhetorical criticism. New York: Macmillan.

Enos, R. L., & Agnew, L. P. (Eds.). (1998). Landmark essays on Aristotelian rhetoric. Mahwah, NJ: Hermagoras Press/Lawrence Erlbaum.

Attack Advertising

See Negative Advertising

Authoritarianism

Authoritarianism is a concept central to understanding modern politics, as well as contemporary social life. The term authoritarian is not only used to describe political beliefs and the structure of political systems, but also individual psychological dispositions and interpersonal relationships.

The discussion of an "authoritarian character" can be traced back to Erich Fromm's Escape from Freedom. Authoritarianism was then elucidated by critical theorists of the Frankfurt School. In The Authoritarian Personality, T. W. Adorno and his colleagues attempted to explain anti-Semitism and the rise of Fascism throughout Europe in the 1940s, by combining Freudian psychoanalytic conceptions with Marxist theory. They developed the notion of the "authoritarian personality" in which one's fear and aggressiveness deriving from a specific familial socialization is a byproduct of the social structure of capitalistic society. This personality is forced to obey social authorities, accept societal norms, and release individual hatred toward members of weaker societal groups. Thus, authoritarians tend to have an anxious veneration of authority while expressing vindictiveness toward subordinates and so-called "deviants."

This Freudian approach was rejected by Bob Altemeyer whose Right-Wing Authoritarianism (RWA) Scale was rooted in Albert Bandura's social learning theory. Altemeyer assumed that like other attitudes, people would acquire RWA from interactions with others or through various direct or indirect experiences with attitudinal objects. Parents could be the most important source of right-wing authoritarian attitudes. Several empirical studies show that religion apparently enhances authoritarian attitudes.

According to Altemeyer, RWA is a unidimensional measure of three attitudinal clusters in a person—authoritarian submission, authoritarian aggression, and conventionalism. First, authoritarian submission is one's willingness to comply with established authorities placing very narrow limits on people's rights to criticize authorities. Second, authoritarians advocate sanction against those whom they deem detrimental to established authorities. Authoritarian aggression is enhanced by the belief that established authority at least tacitly approves it or that it will help preserve established authority. Thus, the theory of authoritarianism is closely related to the theory of social dominance. Finally, authoritarians tend to commit to the traditional social norms that are endorsed by society and its established authorities. Targets of authoritarian aggressiveness are often directed toward unconventional people or those defined as social deviants, such as homosexuals.

Since Altemeyer's conceptualization and development of the RWA Scale, authoritarianism has been used as a robust predictor of various political phenomena. It is especially noteworthy that the RWA Scale has correlated positively with a variety of conservative attitudes, such as those attacking environmentalism and abortion and in support of the death penalty. Thus, the question has arisen as to whether authoritarianism is any different from conservatism, which could be defined as the disposition to maintain existing orders and to resist change. Researchers who examined this issue have found that there has been a strong correlation between the RWA Scale and political conservatism. Indeed, authoritarianism and conservatism share two core dimensions—resistance to change and acceptance of inequality. However, the two are not isomorphic because among the traditions and established system that the conservatives wish to preserve are freedom of speech, freedom of opportunity, law-abiding principle, and so on. Those who embrace these values are not expected to score high on the RWA Scale.

One irony is that left-wing authoritarianism also resists change, allegedly in the name of egalitarianism. Relatively little literature has focused on left-wing authoritarianism, although the former Soviet Union could be considered as the clearest case of an authoritarian on the left. Milton Rokeach criticized that the original authoritarianism scales were so ideologically motivated and oriented that it could measure only authoritarianism on the right. This is a valid criticism, as some samples of communists in Altemeyer's study scored very low on the RWA Scale.

Thus, Rokeach came up with the Dogmatism Scale to provide a measure of general authoritarianism, irrespective of one's ideological stance. Dogmatism was defined as a closed cognitive organization of beliefs and disbeliefs about reality. Individuals who are high in dogmatism are inclined to be close-minded, intolerant of others, and deferential to authority. Though this concept was developed to encompass diverse ideological spectrums, people who score high on Dogmatism Scale also tended to register high on the RWA Scale. Although studies of authoritarianism started with the challenge to explain generalized prejudice in terms of personality traits, scholars have pointed out that authoritarianism can be more appropriately conceptualized if social or ideological contexts are taken into account. For instance, Hitler's popularity could be attributed to various national crises that affected Germany after World War I. Among these crises, Altehmeyer contended that the emergence of the radical left in Germany during the Great Depression helped drive many moderates and conservatives to the swastika. In this sense, authoritarianism may not be an unvarying psychological status but rather something that is affected by societal and ideological circumstances. Thus, recent scholars such as Stellmacher and Petzel view authoritarianism as a group phenomenon that is influenced by both authoritarian dispositions and situational factors, explaining that it reflects "the situation-specific activation of authoritarian beliefs."

Joon Soo Lim

Further Readings

Adorno, T. W., Frenkel-Brunswik, E., Levinson, D. J., & Sanford, R. N. (1950). The authoritarian personality. New York: Harper.

Altemeyer, R. A. (1981). Right-wing authoritarianism. Winnipeg, Canada: University of Manitoba Press.

Altemeyer, R. A. (1988). Enemies of freedom: Understanding right-wing authoritarianism. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.

Arendt, H. (1951). The origins of totalitarianism. New York: Harcourt.

Crowson, H. M., Thoma, S. J., & Hestevold, N. (2005). Is political conservatism synonymous with authoritarianism? Political Psychology, 145(5), 571–592.
Fromm, E. (1941). Escape from freedom. New York: Farrar & Rinehart.
Germani, G. (1978). Authoritarianism, fascism, and national populism. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Books.
Jost, J. T., Glaser, J., Kruglanski, A. W., & Sulloway, F. J. (2003). Political conservatism as motivational social cognition. Psychological Bulletin, 129(3), 339–375.
Peterson, B. E., Smirles, K. A., & Wentworth, P. A. (1997). Generativity and authoritarianism: Implications for personality, political involvement, and parenting. Journal of Personality & Social Psychology, 72(5), 1202–1216.
Rokeach, M. (1960). The open and closed mind. New York: Basic Books.
Stellmacher, J., & Petzel, T. (2005). Authoritarianism as a group phenomenon. Political Psychology, 26(2), 245–274.
Whitley, B. E., Jr. (1999). Right-wing authoritarianism, social dominance orientation, and prejudice. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 77(1), 126–134.

Aznar, José María (1953–)

José María Aznar López (born in Madrid on February 25, 1953) worked as a Spanish Tax Authority inspector after his law studies and before his political career. From 1982 to 1987 he was the Secretary General of the People's Alliance (Alianza Popular, AP); for the next two years he was president of the Autonomous Region of Castile-León. In 1989 the People's Alliance was re-founded as People's Party (Partido Popular, PP) and Aznar became its new leader.

In 1995 Euskadi Ta Askatasuna (ETA), or Basque Homeland and Freedom, attempted to assassinate him, but he was not injured seriously. One year later, in March 1996, the PP won the general elections with a small majority; Aznar had to reach agreements with small nationalist parties in order to form a minority government. On May 5, 1996, he was sworn in as prime minister and began to support the efforts of the Regions for their autonomy. Concerning home affairs, Aznar tried to consolidate national finances, to achieve a strong economic growth and to struggle against the terrorism of ETA. In March 2000 the PP was reelected with an outright majority, thus Aznar held the office of prime minister for 8 years.

Aznar's presidency was identified with positive economic development of the country and a successful struggle against the terrorism of ETA, but he was reproached for being stubborn and high-handed. The opposition often criticized his policy; for example, the disastrous handling of the wreckage of the Prestige tanker, the military support of the war in Iraq even though the majority of the Spanish population was against it, and misrepresenting the investigations into the Madrid train bombings on March 11, 2004. Three days after the train bombings, on March 14, the PP lost the general elections.

Already in 2003, Aznar decided not to stand for reelection as prime minister for a third term, proposing Mariano Rajoy as his successor for the office of leader of the party. Due to his responsibility for the election defeat of the PP, the relationship of Aznar to his party worsened. In autumn 2004, he was appointed visiting lecturer at the Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., leading weeklong seminars on contemporary European politics and trans-Atlantic relationships.

As opposed to his predecessor Felipe González, José María Aznar never seemed to possess the qualities of a charismatic leader. The press always stressed his self-awareness of being "average" and "normal." After the failed assassination attempt in 1995, it is reported that he said: Now I have charisma, too. In spite of the undisputed successes of his government, his personal popularity was small, although the rightist press flattered him. His serious public image problem was enduring; his TV image was not convincing.

Unlike his first legislative period, Aznar developed a very authoritarian style in his second presidential period (from 2000), when he governed with an absolute majority; he also behaved arrogantly in his treatment of the media but only with partial success. His relationship with the media hit rock bottom after the train bombings of March 11, 2004. Aznar personally called the chief editors of the leading daily newspapers and radio stations and pushed them to announce the (wrong) statement by the government that Spain was the victim of a gigantic ETA terror attack. Although the truth was unearthed in the following weeks and months, Aznar refused to apologize for his misconduct to the victims and the Spanish population. Aznar was convinced not only of his abilities but also of the greatness and the importance of Spain. So his aim for Spain was to stay on the same level with the mightiest states of the continent. With toughness and tenacity he tried to realize his idea (also against the majority of the population).

Walther L. Bernecker

Further Readings

Aznar, J. M. (1994). La segunda transición [The second transition]. Madrid: Espasa Calpe.

Aznar, J. M. (2004). Ocho años de gobierno: una visión personal [Eight years of government: A personal vision]. Barcelona: Planeta.

Palomo, G., & Martínez Vega, J. A. (1996). La tierra prometida [The enraged earth]. Madrid: Javier Vergara.

Tusell, J. (2004). El Aznarato: El gobierno del Partido Popular 1996–2003 [The Aznarato: The government of the Popular Party 1996–2003]. Madrid: Aguilar.

B

Bachelet Jeria, Michelle (1951–)

Michelle Verónica Bachelet, born on September 29, 1951, is the current president of Chile and the first woman to hold this position in Chile. Bachelet, candidate of the Coalition of Parties for Democracy, was sworn in as president of the Republic of Chile on March 11, 2006. In 2006 Bachelet, a surgeon and pediatrician, won the election in a runoff, beating center-right candidate Sebastián Piñera.

Michelle Bachelet, daughter of Air Force brigadier Alberto Bachelet Martínez, who was tortured and killed by the Pinochet regime, was exiled in 1975. Together with her mother she moved to the German Democratic Republic where she studied medicine at Humboldt University of Berlin. During her exile Bachelet got married and her first son, Sebastián, was born.

In 1979 Bachelet returned to Chile, where she graduated as a medical doctor at the University of Chile. After a specialization in pediatrics and public health in the mid-1980s her second child, Francisca, was born.

Between 1986 and 1990, Bachelet was head of the Medical Department for a foundation to aid injured children. After restoring democracy in Chile in 1990, she began to work for the Ministry of Health and acted as a consultant for the German Corporation for Technical Cooperation, the Pan-American Health Organization, and the World Health Organization. In the early 1990s her third child, Sofia, was born. Between 1994 and 1997, Bachelet worked as senior assistant to the deputy health minister before she completed a defense course in military strategy in Washington, D.C., in 1997.

Her political career began in 1970, when she became a member of the Socialist Party of Chile. Her first public appearance on the political stage was in the mid-1990s, when she campaigned against Joaquin Lavín, a future presidential candidate, for the mayorship of Las Condes, a suburb of Santiago. In 1999 she worked in the campaign of Ricardo Lagos of the Coalition of Parties for Democracy, Chile's governing coalition since 1990.

In early 2000 Bachelet was appointed minister of health. During her tenure she became a central political figure in Chile and started several reforms of the public health care system. Only 2 years later, president Ricardo Lagos appointed her defense minister, and she became the first woman to hold this position in the country.

Due to her rising popularity, in 2004 Bachelet was asked to become the Socialists' candidate for the presidency. The only presidential competitor within the coalition, Christian Democrat Soledad Alvear, resigned due to a lack of support within her own party.

Bachelet's personal history made her into a popular figure preferred by the media. Her popularity derives from repeated initiatives to attract media attention. In response to a flooding of a slum of Santiago some years ago, Bachelet coasted on a tank into the crisis zone. This image created a furor and finally made a star of her. Michelle Bachelet has an intense empathy toward the media and knows how to deal with it. Bachelet was one of the first politicians in Chile to use a Web log as a succesful tool within her presidential campaign.

In the first round of the presidential elections in December 2005, Bachelet faced the center-right candidate Sebastián Piñera, the right-wing candidate Joaquín Lavín, and the far-left candidate Tomás Hirsch.

She failed to obtain the absolute majority, winning 46% of the vote. In the runoff election on January 15, 2006, Bachelet faced Piñera and won the presidency with 53.5% of the vote.

Markus Moke

Further Readings

Paul, U. (2006). Chile: Zeichen für eine neue Zeit [Chile: Signs of a new time]. Retrieved November 11, 2006, from http://www2.amnesty.de/internet/deall.nsf/51a43250d61caccfc1256aa1003d7d38/efd9e71106b0178ac125711c00555a90?OpenDocument

Quiroga, Y. (2006). Chile vor einem politischen Umbruch? Kurzberichte aus der internationalen Entwicklungszusammenarbeit [A new political page for Chile? Short reports on international development cooperation]. Friedrich-Ebert-Stiftung. Retrieved November 11, 2006, from http://library.fes.de/pdf-files/iez/03515.pdf

Simon, P. (2005). Eine Präsidentin zum anfassen? Wahlkampf in Chile—ein Stimmungsbild. Lateinamerika Nachrichten [A president to touch? Election campaign in Chile—the atmosphere. Latin American News]. Retrieved November 11, 2006, from http://www.lateinamerikanachrichten.de/?/artikel/701.html

Velasco, J. J. (2006). Michelle Bachelet y los vientos del cambio en Chile [Michelle Bachelet and the winds of change in Chile]. Working paper No. 11. Centro Argentino de Estudios Internacionales. Retrieved January 3, 2007, from http://caei.com.ar/es/programas/latam/11.pdf

BALLOT INITIATIVES

Ballot measures are either initiatives, which are drafted by citizens, or referenda, which are written by government officials. There is a perception that interest groups control the initiative process, and that interest groups can influence ballot measure elections through their campaign spending.

Importance of Campaign Spending on Ballot Measures

Real campaign spending on ballot measures has been steadily rising for decades and reached new heights in the 1990s. In 1992, $117 million was spent in 21 states on supporting and opposing measures on ballots, but in 1998 interest groups spent close to $400 million in 44 states. In comparison, in the 2000 presidential elections, all presidential candidates combined, for both the primary and the general election, spent $326 million. Candidates for the U.S. House and U.S. Senate spent $740 million on their campaigns for the 1998 election.

For the November 2004 election, $400 million was spent on 59 initiatives on the ballots in 18 states, and $269 million of this amount was spent on 10 campaigns. In comparison, senate and house candidates spent $911 million in primary and general election races in 2004. Presidential candidates Bush and Kerry spent $493 million combined on their 2004 presidential campaigns, although this does not include spending by parties and others in support of these candidates.

Californians spend more money on passing or defeating ballot measures than the citizens of any other state. For example, in 2004, gambling interests spent $100 million in California to influence passage of two propositions alone. This was about one fourth of what George W. Bush and John Kerry each spent in their 2004 presidential campaigns.

The Role of Campaign Advertising in a Direct Democracy

One can think of ballot measures in unidimensional space where one point on this space is the policy status quo, and the other is the proposed policy by the ballot measure. The policy which is closest to the median voter will be chosen. Assuming all voters cast a ballot, and all voters are fully informed, it is not clear what role campaign expenditures play. In order for campaign expenditures to have a role, we need to relax one or both of the two assumptions.

One type of advertising may be called informative. Informative campaign spending educates voters about the position of the proposed policy (X) on the single-dimensional space, and it can also provide information about the position of the status quo (S). Suppose there are two interest groups, one group S which supports the status quo, and group X which supports the ballot measure. If uninformed voters abstain, each group has an incentive to inform voters with ideal points closest to the groups' preferred policy.

With informative advertising, opponents and supporters of ballot propositions inform the voter of the position of the status quo and the proposition on the single dimension. The voter then compares his ideal point to that of the points where the status quo and the ballot proposition is located and makes his decision. Informative advertising assures that the option closest to the ideal point of the median voter wins. Informative campaigning by both interest groups increases the likelihood that the policy closest to the median voter will be chosen.

Informative advertising may be more important in ballot measure campaigns than in races for well-known offices (such as the presidency or governorships) because voters often have little information about the consequences of ballot measures, although they are more likely to be familiar with candidates.

With informative advertising, an advertiser tries to increase his support among voters close to his position, but decrease it among voters closer to the alternative. An alternative way of thinking about persuasive advertising is that advertising is directed toward impressionable voters. Advertising to target impressionable voters may be more pronounced on complex issues, such as insurance regulation, as opposed to simple or emotional issues on which many voters have already formed an opinion, such as abortion. It may also be more common when the status quo is not very different from the proposed measure, and therefore many voters are indifferent to the two alternatives.

There is little direct evidence linking campaign spending to the level of knowledge or competency of voters. One potential, albeit poor, measure of whether campaign spending provides information is whether voters are aware of the ballot measure. Some evidence points to the fact that campaign spending makes voters aware of ballot measures. Studies of ballot elections in California between 1956 and 2000 found that campaign spending led to more ballot measure awareness. Importantly, negative spending increased voter awareness while positive spending had no effect on awareness.

Evidence linking competency and campaign spending is even less available than that between awareness (as a measure of being informed) and campaign spending. However, voters may get information cues on how to vote from endorsements of ballot measures. For example, knowing whether someone like Ralph Nader opposed a measure was sufficient to cast a vote mimicking the voting pattern of informed voters.

Turnout in candidate elections is higher when initiatives and referenda are also on the ballot. Most evidence for this claim is, of course, indirect, showing that turnout is higher in many elections that coincide with higher spending on ballot questions in the same elections.

It is also more likely that laws are enacted that reflect the wishes of the majority when there is direct democracy. For example, evidence suggests that states with the direct democracy option have laws and policies that are closer to the desires of the majority of voters than those states that do not have that option. These findings suggest that, at least on average, interest groups do not have a detrimental effect on policy outcomes. The older literature on the effects of campaign spending on initiatives calculates whether the side that has spent more is also more likely to obtain a majority vote for their position.

The role that interest groups play in ballot initiatives is complex. Citizen groups are groups who receive their support from personal and monetary resources, and economic groups are groups who rely on monetary resources only. Businesses and corporations are considered economic interest groups and trade unions and citizen interest groups are included in the citizen group category. Professional interest groups, such as the California Trial Lawyers Association, may be considered hybrid groups. Economic interests groups are effective in blocking the passage of ballot measures; they are especially effective in maintaining the status quo but not in changing it. On the other hand, citizen groups often succeed in using ballot initiatives to change existing situations. For instance, although 40% of all initiatives on California ballots from 1986 to 1996 passed, only 14% of initiatives pushed by special interests passed. Sometimes economic interest groups have been influential in blocking initiatives they oppose, but they cannot purchase their preferred changes in the status quo.

Analysis of initiatives between 2000 and 2004 in California, however, suggest that supporting TV campaign advertising can be at least as productive as opposition spending. For example, 100 extra supporting television advertisements increased the ballot's vote percentage between 1 and 2 percentage points and, for the most part, positive and negative advertising is equally productive.

Overall, then, it is important to consider whether television advertising has a big effect on the outcome of ballot measure elections. Again, there is mixed evidence, but recent research suggests that interest groups do not have a disproportionate influence on the initiative and referendum process. The results show that the effect of interest groups on outcomes is somewhat offsetting. Although spending taken by itself has an influence on whether a ballot proposition is passed or defeated, the results suggest that the other side can adopt a counter campaign and thereby partially—and sometimes completely—offset the influence of the other group. These results suggest that if only one side spends it has the advantage. However, if both sides spend, their spending is largely offsetting.

In summary, early work showed that money might be most successful in maintaining the status quo. Later work showed that economic groups are more successful than citizen groups in maintaining the status quo, and that citizen groups are more successful in pushing for a change from the status quo. Overall, the academic literature has found little evidence that interest groups can purchase their preferred policies through the initiative process and that money has only a small influence on whether initiatives pass.

Evidence that the side that spends more money is also more likely to win does not necessarily imply an inequality in access to political participation. The reason that the winning side outspends the other side may simply reflect that the winning side represents the views of the majority and thus was able to attract many funds. Recent work showed that campaign spending for both sides is equally effective, but that this effect is small. Campaign spending can have benefits such as informing voters and reducing uncertainty, but if it is deceptive and no opposition group is formed, the outcome may not be the one preferred by the median voter.

Thomas Stratmann

See also Political Advertising

Further Readings

Bowler, S., & Donovan, T. (1998). Demanding choices: Opinion and voting in direct democracy. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Broder, D. S. (2000). Democracy derailed. Initiative campaigns and the power of money. New York: Harcourt.

Gerber, E. R. (1999). The populist paradox: Interest group influence and the promise of direct legislation. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University.

Figueiredo de, J. M. (2005). How much does money matter in a direct democracy? Southern Law Review, 78, 1065–1073.

Lowenstein, D. H. (1982). Campaign spending and ballot propositions: Recent experience, public choice theory and the First Amendment. UCLS Law Review, 29, 505–641.

Magleby, D. B. (1984). Direct legislation: Voting on ballot propositions in the United States. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Matsusaka, J. (2004). For the many or the few: The initiative process, public policy, and American democracy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Owens J. R., & Wade, L. W. (1986). Campaign spending on California ballot propositions, trends and effects, 1924–1984. Western Political Quarterly, 39, 675–689.

Smith, D. A. (2000). Campaign financing of ballot initiatives in the American states. In L. J. Sabato, H. R. Ernst, & B. A. Larson (Eds.), Dangerous democracy? Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Stratmann, T. (2006). Is spending more potent for or against a proposition? Evidence from ballot measures. American Journal of Political Science, 50, 788–801.

Banner Ads

A banner ad is an advertisement that appears on the Internet. Banner ads vary considerably in size, shape, appearance, and subject matter, but all banner ads take you to the advertiser's Web site if you click on them.

Banner ads are made of hypertext markup language (HTML) that instructs a Web server to call a particular Web page when a user clicks on the ad image, ad text, or ad animation. Banner ads are different from television, newspaper, or radio ads because banner ads take the potential customer directly to the advertiser's Web site. Another difference between newspaper ads and banner ads is the possibility for animation. Banner ads are similar to newspaper ads in that banner ads stay in one place on a Web page.

The Internet Advertising Bureau specifies eight different banner sizes that vary in pixel dimensions. Most Web sites impose their own restrictions on memory size for banner ads in order to maintain a reasonable file size for the Web page. A larger banner ad increases the time it takes for a browser to load that Web page. The simplest banner ad features one static GIF or JPEG image linked to the advertiser's Web site. A more common type of banner ad is the animated GIF banner ad, which creates the effect of motion by displaying several different images in succession. The most complex banner ads use audio, video, or Java or Shockwave programming, which causes the Web page to have a larger file size.

The goal of banner ads is to lure the user to click on the ad that takes the user to the advertiser's Web site. Once the user is on the advertiser's Web site, the user would ideally purchase something. However, even if the user does not click on the banner ad, the advertiser hopes that the user will see the banner ad, and the ad will register in their minds. Perhaps the user will visit the advertiser's Web site in the future, or is more aware of the advertiser's product or service, or will tell others about the advertiser's product or service. This is also branding, where users are made familiar with an advertiser's product or service so that in the future the user may choose their product or service over a competitor's.

In regard to their political use, banner ads have been found on traditional and alternative news media Web sites, interest group Web sites, nonpartisan group Web sites, nonprofit organization Web sites, networking Web sites (e.g., MySpace.com), and popular Web logs. Politicians have also placed banner ads on other like-minded politicians' Web sites and party Web sites.

The advertiser will pay money to the Web site that is hosting the ad (publisher site). To measure banner ad success, advertisers look at the number of users who click on the banner ad (click-through), the number of users who view the page (page impression), the ratio of page views to clicks (click-through rate), and the amount of advertising money that is spent making one sale. Most advertisers consider all of these measures when deciding where to publish banner ads and when judging the effectiveness of a banner ad.

Kristen D. Landreville

See also Political Advertising; Web Campaigning; World Wide Web, Political Uses

Further Readings

Davis, S., Elin, L., & Reeher, G. (2002). Click on democracy: The Internet's power to change political apathy into civic action. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Geidner, N. W. (2006). Looking toward 2008: The effects of new media on the political process. Review of Communication, 6(1–2), 93–100.

Ben Ali, Zine el-Abidine (1936–)

Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali has been the president of Tunisia since being elected on November 7, 1987. Ben Ali, the chairperson of the Democratic Constitutional Rally (formerly Neo-Destour party) was elected by a landslide in 1994 and 1999, and in 2004, he was reelected to a fourth 5-year term with nearly 95% of the vote. During these election campaigns, Tunisia's voters do not have the right to any independent news or information. The information they have been offered in the Tunisian media was filtered, controlled, and partial.

Ben Ali's iron grip on state and privately owned media, his wide-ranging crackdown on journalists, and his instrumental use of the Tunisian media for his propagandist objectives have made him one of the predators of press freedom according to Reporters Without Borders.

On November 7, 1987, Ben Ali announced on the national broadcasting channels that with his election, Tunisia was entering a new era of modernity and democratization. This announcement reflected his full awareness that media matters in politics. In his political communication, he uses a wide range of media to channel his messages and images. However, the November 7 anniversary speeches and national and international press conferences remain critical to his political communication with local and international audiences. In the Arabic political context, where charisma still counts, political leaders cultivate their personality cult by placing their portraits everywhere, including the press. Ben Ali is no exception.

Ben Ali has endlessly repeated that Tunisia under his reign has made a number of efforts to liberalize the print-press sector (245 privately owned newspapers and magazines). However, the private media are owned by the presidential clan, and they are by definition nonindependent. The Reporters Without Borders journalist organization contests the characterization of an independent press in Tunisia, insisting that the president's control prevents free and open reporting. Self-censorship is a common practice among journalists in Tunisia, who work under an ubiquitous apparatus of repression including restrictive laws, bureaucratic harassment, withdrawal of state advertising, corruption, and police violence. A new antiterrorism law adopted in December 2003 imposed additional limitations on freedom of the press. No wonder that in a press conference, Ben Ali encouraged the media to play its role as a watchdog without "hiding behind unthinking fear or self-censorship." The decision of the Association of Tunisian Journalists to award Ben Ali the Golden Pen award in 2003 has brought condemnation from other press and journalism organizations throughout the world.

Ben Ali said in his 19th anniversary political speech that he regarded the media as "particularly important" and that he would help the media to improve its content and establish freedom of the press. In the same context, he pledged to be personally engaged in restructuring and liberalizing the audiovisual system to face the new challenges posed by the information and communication technologies. In the digital age, the president has launched his own Web site which features online brochures consisting of a collection of his speeches and ads from the presidential campaign and other information.

Since his accession to power in November 1987, Ben Ali has been engaged in polishing Tunisia's image abroad. He launched a number of international public relations campaigns in the international press which targeted tourists and investors. He wanted to frame Tunisia as an oasis of stability, modernity, and the region's most solid bulwark against fundamentalism and terrorism. Due to Ben Ali's adroitness with communication, Tunisia, despite the protest of a number of international organizations such as Amnesty International and Reporters Without Borders, hosted the United Nations World Summit on the Information Society (WSIS) in November 2005.

Mohammed Ibahrine

Further Readings

Ibahrine, M. (2004). Das Tunesische Mediensystem [The Tunisian media system]. In Hans-Bredow-Institut (Ed.), Internationales Handbuch für Medien 2004/5 [International media handbook 2004/5] (pp. 729–741). Baden Baden: Nomos Verlagsgesellschaft.

Bennett, W. Lance

See News: The Politics of Illusion

Berlusconi, Silvio (1936–)

Silvio Berlusconi, an Italian self-made media tycoon and the richest man in Italy, entered politics and became prime minister in 1994 and 2001. He epitomizes the modernization of Italy's politics and political communication. Following the collapse of the old political class in 1992 to 1993 that had ruled the country since the end of World War II, Berlusconi decided to enter into the political arena by creating a brand-new party, Forza Italia. This party filled the vacuum in the center-right political spectrum, and in the general elections of 1994, with a new majoritarian electoral law, won an unexpectedly large support. His victorious bid was backed by an unprecedented television campaign to launch the new party and by a well-designed marketing strategy. He relied on his in-house resources, owning practically the entire commercial television sector (through Finivest-Mediaset) and controlling most of the advertising investments (through Publitalia 80).

He did not enjoy the same success in the general elections of 1996 but regained power in 2001 and lost again in 2006. A flamboyant and charismatic personality, Berlusconi in and out of government has dominated the country's political scene since his decision to run for office. His popularity among conservative voters has been consistently high, in spite of the electoral ups and downs. His amiability and showmanship has helped him to escape several embarrassing moments of his political life. His populist appeal has even been acknowledged by his political foes. Berlusconi's speech has often been politically incorrect, undiplomatic, and even offensive, but it did not appear to damage his political leadership nor his personal image among his supporters. On the contrary, he appeared to be a tough combatant, capable of putting his adversaries in disarray. He has been the target of strong criticism at home and abroad for his conflict of interests, especially when serving as prime minister. His direct control of the three main commercial television networks and indirect influence on the three public service channels when in power raised strong concerns about the freedom of information. His control of a significant portion of the publishing industry (through Mondadori) and of the new sector of digital television channels, plus a large slice of the film industry, involved the state of the country's media pluralism. In the longest period of a governing coalition since World War II (2001 to 2006), Berlusconi was able to convince a docile parliament to pass legislation that served many of his personal interests, including several touching upon his judicial troubles. The communications bill of 2004 represented the most significant example of the conflict of interest. It left intact his control over his three television networks and further strengthened Mediaset's position in the country's media marketplace.

Berlusconi is credited with changing political communication in Italy, thanks to his market-oriented savvy. With his unconventional ways to "sell" a new party and to rally supporters, marketing techniques have become increasingly popular among public office seekers, television has become pivotal, and candidate's image building a common feature in Italian election campaigns. Also political news reporting has changed since Berlusconi entered the domestic political arena and especially when in power. Broadcast news (Rai and Mediaset) became increasingly vulnerable to Berlusconi's idiosyncrasies and spinning, whereas the printed media exhibited independence and criticism.

Gianpietro Mazzoleni

Further Readings

Ginsborg, P. (2004). Silvio Berlusconi: Television, power and patrimony. London: Verso.

Mazzoleni, G. (1995). Towards a videocracy? Italian political communication at a turning point. European Journal of Communication, 10, 291–319.

Mazzoleni, G. (2004). With the media, without the media. Reasons and implications of the electoral success of Silvio Berlusconi in 2001. In I. Blondebjerg & P. Golding (Eds.), European culture and the media (pp. 257–266). Bristol, UK: Intellect.

Bernstein, Carl

See All the President's Men; Watergate

Biased Assimilation

See Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory

Big-Character Posters, China

Big-character posters are handwritten posters prominent in Chinese politics, typically comprising complaints about governmental officials or policies. The posters are usually just a large piece of white paper, on which the author has written slogans, poems, or even longer essays with ink and brush. The posters are hung on a wall or a post and have historically been a major aspect of political communication in China, used as a means of protest against governmental incompetence or corruption. Because the posters are typically written anonymously, it is a popular means of expressing dissatisfaction with local officials who might be able to exact revenge if a complaint were made in a more public setting. Moreover, because of the low expense of creating a poster, they effectively provide a mechanism for political communication and, if placed in a prominent place, such as a university bulletin board or a city wall, might be viewed by hundreds of people or even reprinted in an official press venue. The term "big- character poster" refers to large posters written in large Chinese characters, but some use it to include "small character posters," which are written in smaller script (such that it would be difficult to see from a distance of more than a few feet) but are of a typically greater length in terms of content.

Historically, big-character posters have been influential in several important social movements during the communist era, including the Anti-rightist campaign of 1957, the Cultural Revolution, which lasted from 1966 to 1975, and the Democracy Wall movement of 1978 to 1980. During the Cultural Revolution, a poster which claimed that Peking University was controlled by antirevolutionaries came to the attention of Mao Zedong, who had its contents re-published nationally. Big-character posters soon became common throughout the nation and typically attacked local officials. Officials who found themselves accused in a poster might find themselves suspended from their jobs, under arrest, or even under physical attack. The famous "Democracy Wall" movement of Beijing began with a big-character poster titled "The Fifth Modernization," written by a dissident. The right to write big-character posters was guaranteed as one of the "four great rights" in the 1975 state constitution of the People's Republic of China (PRC), but in 1980 this right was removed. During the 1989 Tiananmen Square movement, and in spite of their illegality, big-character posters again became a symbol of democratic sentiment, as the posters sprang up around the country to mourn the death of Hu Yaobang and to criticize Chinese political leaders.

Randolph Kluver

See also China, Media and Politics in; Mao Zedong

Further Readings

Kluver, R. (2001). Political culture and political conflict in China. In G. Chen & R. Ma (Eds.), Chinese conflict management and resolution (pp. 223–240). Westport, CT: Greenwood.

Leijonhufvud, G. (1990). Going against the tide: On dissent and big character posters in China. London: Curzon Press.

Sheng, H. (1991). Big character posters in China: A historical survey. Journal of Asian Law, 4(2), 234–256.

Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act

The Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA), 116 Stat. 81, also known as the Shays-Meehan or McCain-Feingold Bill, after some of its congressional sponsors, was the first major amendment of the earlier Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (FECA) since the extensive 1974 amendments that followed the Watergate scandal. The legislative scheme of the 1974 Amendments to FECA had been substantially altered by the Supreme Court's decision in Buckley v. Valeo, which, in 1976, struck down several provisions of the 1974 Amendments limiting campaign finance expenditures as violations of the First Amendment's protections of freedom of speech and freedom of association. The constitutional framework established in Buckley v. Valeo allowed contributions to be limited, but expenditures (including political advertising) were not limited in order to protect political expression under the First Amendment.

BCRA and Soft Money

A primary purpose of the BCRA was to eliminate the use of so-called soft money to fund the explosion of advertising by political parties on behalf of their candidates. Pre-BCRA, money was "hard" if it was raised in accordance with the limits concerning sources and amounts specified by FECA (1974); for example, a maximum of $1,000 per election and no contributions by corporations or unions. However, because state campaign finance rules differed from the federal rules, many states allowed corporations and unions to donate and to do so in larger, sometimes unlimited, amounts. These "soft" money expenditures were allowed by the FEC because federal and state and local candidates all appeared on the ballot in the same election year, and the funds paid for advertising and other activities that benefited state and federal candidates, such as generic "get out the vote" (GOTV) drives. Most notably in the 1996 and 2000 elections, state party-financed presidential campaign ads were purchased with soft money raised by state parties.

By funding advertising for federal candidates with "soft money" raised outside the strictures of FECA, parties and candidates were able to evade the federal limits on the size and type of campaign contributions. This was particularly apparent in the presidential race, where candidates accepted public money to finance their campaigns and agreed to abide by contribution and expenditure limits but then evaded them through large soft money contributions from corporations and labor unions routed through state party organizations. For example, while federal law then limited contributions to $1,000 per election and prohibited corporate and labor union contributions, corporations and unions could and did give, in some cases, many thousands or hundreds of thousands of dollars to state party organizations which then spent them to fund advertising for the benefit of federal candidates for office. In the 1996 presidential election, federal law limited the Democratic Party candidates to about $30 million in total spending for the presidential primaries. The Clinton campaign arranged $44 million in primary soft money expenditures for advertising alone, greatly exceeding the hard money limits specified by law. In the 2000 election, the Democratic and Republican National Party Committees collectively raised over $460 million in soft money contributions. In addition, corporations and unions spent directly for televised advertisements which stopped short of expressly advocating the election or defeat of specific candidates but which nonetheless conveyed messages of support or opposition; under the ruling in Buckley, such ads, which eschewed express advocacy, were not prohibited to corporations or unions because they were not "in connection with federal elections" within the meaning of the FECA. These developments helped lead to the adoption of BCRA.

BCRA attacked these loopholes in several ways. First, it raised the amounts of permitted, lawful "hard money" contributions for individuals from $1,000 per candidate per election, where it had remained since 1974, to $2,000 per candidate per election (primary and general elections count separately, so $4,000 per election cycle is allowed), and provided for future adjustments in accordance with inflation. This was intended to reduce the incentive for candidates to evade the limits.

Second, BCRA provided, with limited exceptions, that federal candidates, parties, officeholders, and their agents are prohibited from soliciting, receiving, or directing soft money to another person or organization, or from raising or spending any money not subject to the FECA limits. The law is intended to prevent the national parties from raising money and then directing that it be contributed to others in order to avoid federal limits. Accordingly, parties are prohibited from donating funds to so-called tax-exempt "527" groups, named after a provision in the Internal Revenue Code. Moreover, any funds spent on "federal election activity" as defined in BCRA are required to be raised in accordance with FECA limits. Federal election activity includes any activity within 120 days of an election in which a federal candidate is on the ballot, including get-out-the-vote activity, generic campaign activity, and public communications which refer to a clearly identified federal candidate and which support or oppose a candidate for office. This new rule reverses the former practice of allowing parties to allocate generic expenses between hard and soft money depending on the number of state candidates versus federal candidates on the ballot: Now, if a federal candidate is on the ballot, all of the money spent (with only a few exceptions) must be hard money raised in accordance with FECA limits.

In BCRA, Congress also sought to force political parties to choose between making potentially unlimited advertising expenditures independent of its candidates, or making coordinated expenditures that could be treated as contributions and limited in amount. However, the Supreme Court in McConnell v. FEC struck down these provisions, thus leaving party committees free to make both limited coordinated expenditures and unlimited independent expenditures, although the ban on solicitation or expenditure of soft money was upheld.

Third, BCRA prohibited "electioneering communications" by corporations and unions in an effort to halt the corporate and union practice of airing ads which were intended to influence federal elections but stopped short of express advocacy—urging the audience to vote for or against a federal candidate. Ads meet the definition of "electioneering communications" in BCRA if they are broadcasts that (1) refer to an identified federal candidate, (2) are made within 60 days of a general election or 30 days of a primary election, and (3) are targeted to the electorate of a federal candidate (except president/vice president for whom the whole country is the electorate). Persons other than corporations or unions are not prohibited from making electioneering communications, but are required to file disclosures with the Federal Election Commission if they spend over $10,000 in a calendar year in making them. By defining electioneering communications in terms of when they are made, to whom they refer, and at whom they are aimed, the BCRA removed the ability of unions and corporations (except media corporations which remain free to express political opinions) to air issue ads during election periods by avoiding express advocacy. This provision was initially upheld on its face by the Supreme Court in McConnell v. FEC against the claim that First Amendment rights were violated, but in Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. (WRTL), the court found the provision unconstitutional as applied to particular ads. In McConnell, the court had allowed electioneering communications by corporations and unions to be banned if they were the functional equivalent of express advocacy. The court in WRTL said that an ad is the functional equivalent of express advocacy only if the ad is susceptible to no reasonable interpretation other than as an appeal to vote for or against a specific candidate. It appears that the Supreme Court may have gone far toward restoring the express advocacy doctrine first announced in Buckley and may be willing to consider reversing its decision in McConnell, upholding the BCRA electioneering communication provision.

Millionaire's Amendment

Some provisions of BCRA appear to be aimed more at protecting incumbent politicians than avoiding possible corruption or the appearance of corruption. The so-called Millionaire's Amendment provision of BCRA allows candidates whose opponents spend more than certain amounts of their own money (determined by application of a complex formula) to accept contributions in excess of the FECA limits, normally $2,000 per candidate per election, before adjustments for inflation. The concept seems to be that if a candidate (often an incumbent) has a wealthy opponent who spends his own money rather than having to raise it in contributions, the candidate should be able to ask supporters for larger contributions to offset this "unfair" advantage.

Accordingly, in the Illinois 2004 Democratic senatorial primary (an open seat with no incumbent), Barack Obama faced a multimillionaire, Peter Hull, who spent $15 million of his own money. Obama (the eventual winner) was able, because of this provision, to raise $3 million in contributions larger than $2,000 (over one third of his total campaign fund), whereas he could only have raised $960,000 from the same donors under the normal limits. The Millionaire's Amendment allows contributions up to six times the normal limit in the Senate and three times for House races, depending on the amount of self-funding by wealthy candidates, or up to $12,000 per election. In addition, another part of the Millionaire's Amendment prohibits candidates who loan their own money to the campaign from repaying themselves more than $250,000 from funds raised after the election. This provision seems intended to discourage candidates from self-funding their campaign at all in any amount over $250,000.

The irony of this Millionaire's provision is that limits on contributions are supposedly justified in all campaign finance regulations by the concept that contributions larger than the statutory limits might result in corruption or the appearance of corruption. The Millionaire's provision suggests that larger contributions have a potential for corruption only if the opponent is not willing or able to fund his or her own campaign—and since self-funding accounted for 24% (in 2002) of challengers' campaign funds compared to .5% (in 2002) of incumbents' campaign funds—the conclusion that the provision is intended to protect incumbents is virtually irresistible. In McConnell v. FEC, a constitutional challenge to this provision was ruled premature, but the Supreme Court could revisit the question in the future.

BCRA Specialized Provisions

Another provision of BCRA prohibited minors from making any political contributions at all, apparently assuming that minors who did so were merely serving as a subterfuge for excessive contributions by adults. In McConnell v. FEC, the Supreme Court ruled this provision unconstitutionally impaired the First Amendment rights of minors to associate with candidates of their choice where the minors had their own funds. Congress cannot impose a blanket prohibition without regard to the source of the funds.

BCRA also imposed new detailed disclaimer requirements on political advertisements requiring, in the case of television ads, that a candidate must appear visually in the ad, state his identity, and declare that he approved the ad. The candidate's identity must also appear in writing at the end of the ad for at least four seconds, in a clearly readable manner and with a reasonable degree of color contrast. For radio ads, there must be an audible statement in the ad by the candidate that identifies the candidate and states his approval. These disclaimers were aimed at discouraging negative advertising by requiring the candidate to associate himself or herself personally with the ad, apparently on the theory that candidates would not want to be perceived as directly sponsoring negative ads, so this would result in fewer such ads. The proponents of this provision were congressional incumbents who thought it would help reduce political ads critical of incumbent officeholders. Based on the content of ads appearing in the 2004 election, this does not appear to have had the desired effect of reducing negative political advertising.

Clifford A. Jones

See also Buckley v. Valeo; Campaign Finance; Federal Election Campaign Act; McConnell v. Federal Election Commission

Further Readings

Bauer, R. B. (2003). More soft money, hard law (2nd ed.). Washington, DC: Perkins Coie.

BeVier, L. R. (2004). McConnell v. FEC: Not Senator Buckley's First Amendment. Election Law Journal, 3(2), 127–145.

Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976).

Corrado, A., Mann, T. E., Ortiz, D., & Potter, T. (2005). The new campaign finance sourcebook. Washington, DC: The Brookings Institution Press.

Hasen, R. L. (2004). Buckley is dead, long live Buckley: The new campaign finance incoherence of McConnell v. Federal Election Commission. University of Pennsylvania Law Review, 153, 31–72.

Jones, C. A., & Kaid, L. L. (2004, Spring). After McConnell: Candidate advertising and campaign reform. Political Communication Report, 14(2). Retrieved June 4, 2007, from http://www.ou.edu/policom/1402_2004_spring/Jones_kaid.htm

Schotland, R. A. (2004). Act I: BCRA wins in Congress. Act II: BCRA wins big at the court. Act III: BCRA loses to reality. Election Law Journal, 3(2), 335–343.

Smith, B.A. (2003). Unfree speech: The folly of campaign finance reform. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
Smith, B. A. (2004). McConnell v. Federal Election Commission: Ideology trumps reality, pragmatism. Election Law Journal, 3(2), 345–353.

Blair, Tony (1953–)

Tony Blair became British prime minister in 1997 having been elected Labour leader in 1994. He entered parliament at the 1983 general election, a party defeat that influenced his support for new leader Neil Kinnock and his communications director Peter Mandelson. They reciprocated by rapidly promoting the member of Parliament as a representative of their "new model" party. Blair also formed a close working relationship with fellow parliamentarian Gordon Brown and formed a relationship with Labour's chief strategist Philip Gould and leading media supporter Alastair Campbell. These five (and, indirectly, Kinnock) have been credited with rebranding the party "New Labour" during Blair's early leadership, which was a logical consequence of their affinity with Bill Clinton and his "New Democrat policy" repositioning (or triangulation), and strategic communication. The group blamed Labour's defeats on its supposed "tax and spend" image, lack of credibility, and links to "minorities" and organized labor. Yet there was continuity between the Kinnock and Blair leaderships and attempts to represent the period 1994 to 1997 as a watershed in party history have involved a characteristically large degree of "spin." Blair emphasized this when, in his first party conference speech as leader, he argued Labour needed to "mean what we say and say what we mean" yet he relied on spin doctors to brief journalists of his undeclared intention to rewrite Clause 4, Labour's mission statement committing it to public ownership.

Blair greatly expanded the "public relations state" on taking office, and it came as little surprise when a 2004 government report stated communication was now as important as policy formulation and delivery. The prime minister endorsed this not least because, as a former cabinet colleague argues, "he thinks in soundbites." Characteristically presidential in style, Blair has nevertheless been reliant on colleagues in promoting the "new" Labour "project": thus Brown cultivated business, Mandelson policed the party, Campbell forged relations with a once hostile British press (particularly Rupert Murdoch's newspapers), and Gould monitored public opinion through focus groups. In 1997 they worked together in a Clintonesque "war room" from which they oversaw Labour's return to government after 18 years of opposition. Several American Democratic consultants (including Stan Greenberg, Bob Shrum, and Mark Penn) also played an influential role in this and subsequent victories. And whereas 2001 was a rerun of 1997, 2005 was a considerably more fraught election. The tensions regarding Iraq proved especially contentious because of the way Blair and Campbell had "spun" the threat from weapons of mass destruction. A BBC claim that the evidence justifying war had been "sexed up" provoked a major argument and the death of the alleged government source for the story led to an official inquiry which criticized the broadcaster. But public trust in the once hugely popular Blair has never recovered from an Iraq crisis that may dominate his legacy. Blair stepped down as Labour Party leader in 2007.

Dominic Wring

See also Labour Party, Britain

Further Readings

Wring, D. (2005). The politics of marketing the Labour Party. Hampshire, UK: Palgrave Macmillan.

Blogs, Blogging

Web logs, or blogs, began popping up on the Internet as early as 1997, and there have been several noted attempts at defining the technology and differentiating the medium from standard Web pages. One of the earliest definitions of blogs actually came from a blogger in 1999 as he struggled to classify the content on his frequently updated Web site. Cameron Barrett published a short essay on his blog called "Anatomy of a Weblog" in which he defined a blog as a small, frequently updated Web site maintained by a single individual with many repeat visitors.

The current technical definition of a blog asserts that it is a Web page with a series of dated entries arranged in reverse chronological order. Every blog includes standard elements along with several optional features. Bloggers incorporate the optional features as access to the various technologies, expertise, and interest level allow. Today, there is still disagreement about which elements must be present in order for a Web page to be called a blog. Elements of blogs can include, but are not limited to, the post itself where the blogger publishes content, permalinks which represent the permanent links to the blog post (to be used after the blog post has been archived), the comment features where some bloggers allow readers to respond to the post and the comment is threaded into the original post, and trackbacks where other bloggers link to a particular blog post and the context and/or link is then threaded back into the original post.

Internet bloggers work on their Web log stories during the Democratic National Convention at the Fleet Center, July 26, 2004, in Boston, Massachusetts.

Source: Getty Images.

The social definition is more representative of describing what blogs really are. Bloggers are often described as opinionated people who use the outlet as a means to communicate their thoughts, ideas, reflections, and politics, resulting in the frequent label of "a soapbox."

Bloggers and Blog Readers

Current estimates by the Pew Internet and American Life Project, a frequently cited source for measuring the blogosphere, suggest that there are 12 million adult American bloggers writing for an audience of about 57 million people online. With each year, these numbers rise dramatically. While these blogs run the gamut from fun personal blogs to political and serious, those who write blogs can be considered the "new influencers" as blog readers believe blogs are credible sources of news and information. In fact, 9% of those online during the 2004 U.S. presidential election used blogs to find political information, and those involved with campaigns online were more likely to read political blogs, thus making the study of political communication on blogs a worthy area of inquiry.

Campaign Blogs

Blogs were first used on the campaign trail during the primary season of the 2004 election, when 10 Democrats were vying for their party's nomination. Some observers believe that the introduction of blogs marked the biggest advancement in campaign interactivity since 1996 because the blogs provided the opportunity for communication between citizen supporters and opponents and campaign staff.

The campaign of Democrat Howard Dean brought the power of the blog to the spotlight, as his supporters became a vocal part of online discourse, catching the attention of the media and allowing a new type of civic and political engagement where citizens could inform themselves and become a part of the discussion without having to leave their desks. This approach to civic engagement differed substantially from the traditional paradigm view that "being active in politics" meant voting or volunteering for a campaign.

Even in this early use, it became evident that there was not a "one-size-fits-all" blog style; official campaign blogs varied in the type of content posted, level of personalization, and interactive features incorporated. Later analyses comparing the Democratic and Republican candidates found that such differences in approach and content on blogs has continued.

Blogs and Media

The most discussed political impact of blogs relates to the possible agenda-setting effect they may have on the mainstream media. Indeed, academics and journalists both cite anecdotes where blogs are said to have either

(a) broken a scandal or introduced a story to the elite media or (b) created a buzz about a story bloggers felt was getting too little attention in the media.

In the first instance, bloggers are more closely aligned with journalists, as they are the ones telling the story and disseminating information. This was the case when a blogger reported off the record remarks made by CNN's Eason Jordan during a public speech when he suggested that the military had murdered journalists in the Middle East—comments which subsequently led to the resignation of the cable news executive.

The second instance, in which bloggers pick up information from the mainstream media, occurs more frequently as bloggers act as "gatewatchers" constantly watching news reported by the mainstream media and placed by gatekeepers. Examples of this so-called gatewatching occurred in the case of Senator Trent Lott who made racist comments at fellow Senator Strom Thurman's 100th birthday party. In this case, Lott's speech aired on CSPAN, and the comment was repeated in an early morning network newscast, but it went largely unnoticed by mainstream media for several days. Here, bloggers are often credited with reintroducing the topic onto the public agenda. More recently, bloggers have evolved gatewatching into an act of being watchdogs of the watchdog media. That is, bloggers have been known to question the accuracy of mainstream media reporting ranging from the authenticity of documents used as source material in a news story during the 2000 presidential election on U.S. President George W. Bush's military service to the doctoring of photos from Israeli bombings of Lebanon in the 2006 attack against Hezbollah when Reuters was found to have manipulated a picture of the attacks.

Kaye D. Sweetser Trammell

See also New Media Technologies

Further Readings

Barrett, C. (1999). Anatomy of a weblog. Retrieved October 23, 2007, from http://www.camworld.com/archives/001177.html

Blood, R. (2002). The weblog handbook: Practical advice on creating and maintaining your blog. Cambridge, MA: Perseus.

Bruns, A. (2005). Gatewatching. New York: Peter Lang.

Gronbeck, B. E., & Wiese, D. R. (2005). The repersonalization of presidential campaigning in 2004. American Behavioral Scientist, 49, 520–534.

Johnson, T. J., & Kaye, B. K. (2004). Wag the blog: How reliance on traditional media and the Internet influence credibility perceptions of weblogs among blog users. Journalism & Mass Communication Quarterly, 81, 622–642.

Pew Internet & American Life Project. (2005). The state of blogging. Retrieved from http://www.pewinternet.org/PPF/r/144/report_display.asp

Trammell, K. D., & Keshelashvili, A. (2005). Examining the new influencers: A self-presentation study of A-list blogs. Journalism & Mass Communication Quarterly, 82(4), 968–982.

Trammell, K. D., Williams, A. P., Postelnicu, M., & Landreville, K. D. (2006). Evolution of online campaigning: Increasing interactivity in candidate Web sites and blogs through text and technical features. Mass Communication and Society, 9(1), 21–44.

Tremayne, M. (Ed.). (2006). Blogging, citizenship and the future of media. New York: Routledge.

Blumler, Jay G. (1924–)

Jay Blumler was an influential figure in the development of research and theory in political communication. He was born in New York and graduated from Antioch College before military service in Europe at the end of World War II. He began his career teaching political theory at Ruskin College Oxford, gaining a D.Phil. from Oxford University. He came to specialize in political communication only after appointment to the Granada Fellowship (Centre for Television Research) at the University of Leeds in 1963, later holding a personal chair in Broadcasting Policy. For a number of years he held a joint appointment in the College of Journalism, University of Maryland. His work on the influence of television in British elections pioneered the application of the "uses and gratifications" approach, and he directed a series of empirical inquiries within this framework during the 1960s and 1970s. He played a key role in the United Kingdom in the development of communication studies and subsequently in the growth of collaborative communication research in Europe, initially by way of a large-scale cross-national study of the role of television in the first elections to the European Parliament. The University of Leeds became the unlikely hub of an international network of communication scholars that has left its mark on the larger international community of scholars. His influence bridged linguistic and national divisions in Europe as well as the Atlantic. He was the driving force behind the launching of the European Journal of Communication in 1986 and its first editor. He also served as president of the International Communication Association (ICA).

Although a meticulous scholar, Jay Blumler was driven by normative impulses, seeking to engage research in support of democracy and of what he conceived of as the public interest in communication, with particular reference to the public service obligations of broadcasting in the area of news and current affairs, political coverage, and children's programming. A later preoccupation, evidenced in the Crisis of Public Communication, was with the widely perceived threat to the integrity of public communication stemming from forces of liberalization and commercialization. In his time, his work as a communication scientist and as a public intellectual came into conflict both from the Marxist left and the libertarian right.

Blumler's legacy is to be found partly in the institutional development of the field of communication in Europe (although he remained an American citizen), partly in giving intellectual support to the public communicative role of television but mostly by way of his many contributions to communication theory and research. The latter included: studies of election campaigns and of news coverage of politics, both by way of surveys and participant observation, often based on cross-national inquiries; significant contributions to the theory of uses and gratifications research and the general links between media systems and political systems; clearly formulated statements of principle for the role of public communication.

Denis McQuail

See also European Parliamentary Elections; Television in Politics

Further Readings

Blumler, J. G. (Ed.). (1992). Television and the public interest. London: Sage.

Blumler, J. G., & Gurevitch, M. (1995). The crisis of public communication. London: Routledge.

Blumler, J. G., & McQuail, D. (1968). Television in politics: Its uses and influence. London: Faber and Faber.

Bork, Robert

See Supreme Court and the Media

Bormann, Ernest G. (1926–)

Ernest G. Bormann is best known as the originator of symbolic convergence theory (SCT) and its attendant method, fantasy theme analysis, which both explore how the sharing of narratives or "fantasies" can create and sustain group consciousness. For Bormann, these communal narratives encouraged group cohesion and fostered the development of a shared social reality among group members. While his initial conception of symbolic convergence stemmed from his research of small group communication, he argued that group consciousness can occur at any level of communication, from small group to public to mass media. Thus, he identified symbolic convergence as a general theory of communication.

Bormann received his bachelor's degree from the University of South Dakota in 1949, graduating magna cum laude. By 1953, he had received both his master's and doctorate from the University of Iowa. For the next 6 years, he taught briefly at the University of South Dakota, Eastern Illinois University, and Florida State University. He began his long and distinguished career at the University of Minnesota in 1959, where he is currently Professor Emeritus in the Department of Speech Communication.

Bormann served as the president of the Central States Communication Association as well as the director of Graduate Studies at the University of Minnesota. In addition, he has served as an associate editor for the Central States Speech Journal, Communication Monographs and the Quarterly Journal of Speech. He has received several awards, including those honoring him for outstanding teaching, scholarship, service, and mentoring.

Throughout his extensive career, Bormann has authored numerous scholarly articles, including several that sought to clarify and even defend symbolic convergence theory since its inception in 1972. In a 1994 publication, he refuted the theory's most persistent criticisms, namely that it borrows and needlessly relabels concepts from other theories and that its application is limited to small group communication. In 2001, along with John F. Cragan and Donald C. Shields, he published a retrospective look at the last three decades of symbolic convergence research and development while speculating on its future applications.

Bormann has successfully applied symbolic convergence theory and fantasy theme analysis to a variety of topics and issues such as inaugurals, campaigns, and even political cartoons. In a case study of the Cold War paradigm, for example, he joined Cragan and Shields to identify three stages in the life cycle of a rhetorical vision. In addition, he has published several books addressing a range of topics, from interpersonal and small group communication to speech communication. The Force of Fantasy, for example, is an extended case study of America's attempts to restore the American Dream from the 17th to 19th centuries.

Arin Rose Dickerson

See also Fantasy Theme Analysis; Symbolic Convergence Theory

Further Readings

Bormann, E. G. (1972). Fantasy and rhetorical vision: The rhetorical criticism of social reality. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 58, 396–407.

Bormann, E. G. (1982). Fantasy and rhetorical vision: Ten tears later. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 68, 288–305.

Bormann, E. G., Cragan, J. F., & Shields, D. C. (1994). In defense of symbolic convergence theory: A look at the theory and its criticisms after two decades. Communication Theory, 4, 259–294.

Bormann, E. G., Cragan, J. F., & Shields, D. C. (2001). Three decades of developing, grounding and using symbolic convergence theory. Communication Yearbook, 25, 271–313.

Bouteflika, Abdelaziz (1937–)

Abdelaziz Bouteflika, born in 1937 in Morocco, has been president of Algeria since 1999. He lived and studied in Morocco until he joined the National Liberation Army (ALN), which later became the National Liberation Front (FLN), the ruling party in Algeria from independence until today. At the age of 25, in 1962, he was minister for youth and sport in the government led by Ahmed Ben Bella. The next year, he was appointed minister for foreign affairs and remained in this position until the death of President Houari Boumedienne in 1978. In 1989, he returned to Algeria after 6 years abroad, and he became a member of the Central Committee of the National Liberation Front (FLN).

The Algerian army placed him in the presidency in 1999 in a fraudulent and much contested election but claimed neutrality in his 2004 landslide reelection victory for another 5-year mandate. During both elections, television and radio, both government-owned, broadcasted special election programs in which all presidential candidates had the chance to present their electoral programs (required under article 10 of the 1990 press law), but the stations relayed enormous coverage in favor of Bouteflika's campaigns. The rival political parties and civil society groups, with no access to state media, have turned to foreign satellite stations to speak to their citizens..

According to Reporters sans frontières, much of the privately owned press criticized the fraudulence of the 2004 elections and attacked the president for his abuse of state institutions, public money, and media to win the elections. Bouteflika responded by saying the journalists were harming the country the same way terrorists were and vowed to fight what he called "press mercenaries." With regard to television and radio, Bouteflika made it clear that the state would keep its monopoly. In early April 2005, Bouteflika said, "I don't want to put these weapons of mass destruction in irresponsible hands."

During the first year of his second mandate, President Bouteflika held a referendum on his "National Reconciliation Plan," a plan that would put an end to the 1990s Algerian Civil War from a political and judicial point of view. The civil war was an armed conflict between the Algerian government and various Islamist rebel groups which began in 1991 and ended in 1998. The surprising first round success of the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) in the December 1991 elections prompted the Algerian army to intervene and began a crackdown on the FIS that spurred FIS supporters to begin attacking government targets. The struggle escalated into an insurgency, which witnessed intense fighting from 1992 to 1998 and resulted in over 100,000 deaths. According to Reporters Without Borders, many journalists were targets of Islamist militia, and about 70 were killed during the insurgency. The government gained the upper hand by the late 1990s, and FIS's armed wing, the Islamic Salvation Army, disbanded in January 2000.

Bouteflika's plan for reconciliation and his role in ending the civil war have certainly helped in securing a much more stable environment for journalists.

Bouziane Zaid

Further Readings

Aghrout, A., & Bougherira, M. R. (2004). Algeria in transition: Reforms and development prospects. London: Routledge.

Benchicou, M. (2004). Bouteflika: Une imposture Algérienne [Bouteflika: An Algerian imposture]. Algiers: Éditions Le Matin.

Draï, R. (2000). Lettre au Président Bouteflika sur le retour des Pieds-Noirs en Algérie [Letter to President Bouteflika on the return of the Pieds-Noirs to Algeria]. Paris: Éditions Michalon.

East, R., & Thomas, R. (2003). Profiles of people in power: The world's government leaders. London: Routledge.

Kechad, H. (2000). Agreement Bouteflika—Madani. The peace of the cemetery. Paris: Publisud.

Robert, H. (2003). The battlefield: Algeria 1988–2002, Studies in a broken polity. London: Verso.

Bowling Alone

Bowling Alone is a book written by Harvard sociologist Robert Putnam. In this book, Putnam talks about the decline in civic life in America. He specifically talks about the erosion in relationships, networks, and interactions, a concept which he refers to as social capital, which is somewhat similar to financial or human capital. Social capital allows greater productivity, promotes volunteerism, and instills concern about the society as a whole. Putnam points to evidence of decline in participation in a variety of civic arenas—politics, churches, labor unions, parent-teacher organizations, and fraternal organizations. The title of the book derives from Putnam's observation that civil society is breaking down as Americans are becoming more disconnected from their families, neighbors, and communities. Thus the organizations that sustain democracy are fast disappearing. Putnam uses the bowling metaphor to highlight the difference between the past and the present—there was a time when thousands of people belonged to bowling leagues, but today, they are more likely to bowl alone.

In Bowling Alone Putnam identifies two kinds of social capital—bridging and bonding social capital. The former, he says, refers to the value assigned to social networks between homogeneous groups of people and the latter to social networks between socially heterogeneous groups. Typical examples could be that criminal gangs create bonding social capital, while choirs and bowling clubs create bridging social capital. Putnam argues that bridging social capital in particular is more beneficial for societies, governments, individuals, and communities.

Despite suggesting the two kinds of social capital, Putnam's Bowling Alone is not a treatise on social capital. In this book, Putnam first raises his concern about the civic decline and then goes on to provide possible explanations for why this kind of phenomenon is taking place. He identifies television, both parents working, and the growth of suburbs leading to longer commutes as a few probable culprits leading to this decline in civic life.

Putnam's thesis, however, has been heavily criticized in recent years. One criticism that has particularly been noted is that by focusing on formal membership in organizations such as the League of Women Voters, the Boy Scouts, and the Elks, Putnam has overlooked other, newer forms of civic engagement which have compensated for the fall in membership in these particular organizations. Critics suggest that declining church attendance may have actually been offset by increased participation in small support groups and that shrinking membership in the League of Women Voters and the Shriners may have been replaced by increase in membership in other forums such as the Sierra Club or the American Association of Retired Persons. Bowling leagues might be shrinking, but perhaps other sports clubs are gaining in popularity. So the harshest criticism is that Putnam mistook change for decline, failing to recognize that the vessels through which Americans channel their civic engagement may have changed, but the overall level of engagement remains stable. However, despite these criticisms, Bowling Alone continues to be a popular book on civic participation

Sumana Chattopadhyay

See also Political Engagement

Further Readings

Chaves, M. (2000). [Review of the book Bowling alone: The collapse and revival of American community]. Christian Century, 754–756.

Putnam, R. D. (2000). Bowling alone: The collapse and revival of American community. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Brady, James

See Press Secretary, White House

Brandt, Willy (1913–1992)

Willy Brandt was German chancellor from 1969 to 1974. In the course of his political career he also was the mayor of West Berlin from 1957 to 1966, secretary of state from 1966 to 1969, and chairman of the Social Democratic Party from 1964 to 1987. In 1971 he was honored with the Nobel Peace Prize. Due to his achievements in the field of foreign politics, he was especially known as the "peace chancellor."

When Brandt first ran for chancellor in 1961, he was the first candidate supported by intellectuals such as authors, composers, and artists. Furthermore, Brandt's team organized a tour across the whole republic in a white Mercedes convertible so that the people could meet the candidate in person. "Smiling Willy" also challenged his competitor Konrad Adenauer to a U.S.-style television debate, but the Christian Democrat refused. These campaign strategies, in some respects similar to the American style of campaigning, as well as the fact that Brandt's consultants visited the United States when planning his campaign, made the media, along with large parts of the social science community, quickly characterize this as the first American-style political campaign in Germany. Regardless of whether the 1961 Brandt campaign can truly be called "New politics" and the Social Democrats really advised Brandt to copy the style of John F. Kennedy or whether the comparison merely resulted from the fact that Brandt was youthful and telegenic in contrast to the incumbent chancellor Adenauer, it was doubtless this campaign that initiated the myth of the "German Kennedy."

During this electoral campaign as well as in the following ones the Christian Democrats started unprecedented negative campaigning against Brandt and tried to present him as a traitor to his fatherland, a Casanova, a communist, and an illegitimate child.

During his chancellorship, Brandt was especially successful in creating and denoting catchwords such as the emotional term peace policy for the more neutral foreign policy. In addition to using these catchwords on the rhetorical level, Brandt was filling them with life too: When he fell to his knees at the Warsaw monument, it was an unforgettable moment of symbolic politics that solidified his reputation as the "peace chancellor" to the world.

Because Brandt himself worked as a journalist before his political career and knew the rules of this profession well, his relationship to the national and especially the foreign media—the latter mostly saw him as "The good German"—can be regarded as a good one most of the time. The only exception was the powerful German media empire Springer which supported Brandt at the beginning of his career but later tried to heavily boycott his policy regarding the Communist countries for years.

Mona Krewel

See also Americanization; Kennedy, John F.

Further Readings

Münkel, D. (2005).Willy Brandt und die "vierte Gewalt." Politik und Massenmedien in den 50er bis 70er Jahren [Willy Brandt and the "fourth power." Politics and mass media in the '50s and '70s]. Frankfurt: Campus-Verlag.

Brazil, Media and the Political System

Brazil is a federation with 26 states and one federal district. The executive government is headed by the president, who is elected by popular vote every 4 years and can be reelected once. At the state and local level, the governor, the mayor, and the local representatives are elected by popular vote every 4 years along with the chamber of deputies. In addition, the senators are elected by popular vote every 8 years. In the past, Election Day was always considered a holiday. The first round would be held on October 3, and the runoff, when necessary, would be held on November 15. As of 1998, first-round elections are held on the first Sunday of October, and the runoff is held on the last Sunday of October. Voting in Brazil is considered a right and is also mandatory. Every Brazilian between the ages of 18 and 70 should be registered to vote. Illiterates and 16- and 17-year-olds are also eligible to vote.

Brazil has a multiparty system whose origins date from 1945 when parties and elections were permitted. At that time, groups associated with the Vargas government since 1930 from the urban and rural areas of the country formed the Brazilian Labor Party (Partido Trabalhista Brasileiro—PTB) and Social Democratic Party (Partido Social Democrático—PSD), respectively. The other groups that opposed the Vargas government founded the National Democratic Union (Uniao Democratica Nacional—UDN). In October 1965, President Castelo Branco (1964–1967) announced the end of the multiparty system and created a two-party system. Having a multiparty system did not contribute to a strong and loyal allegiance to the president, therefore, the National Renewal Alliance (Alianca Renovadora Nacional—Arena) and the Brazilian Democratic Movement (Movimento Democratico Brasileiro—MDB) were formed. However, the two-party system was abolished in December of 1979 as a result of voting trends in previous elections. Since then, a multiparty system exists in Brazil with 29 active parties.

The media, and in particular television, have a great influence on public opinion. The media have played a decisive role in politics during the last few years. Particularly, the media played an influential and critical role in the impeachment of the president Fernando Collor de Mello in 1992. Special issues of magazines and newspapers were created to disseminate information to the population. In 2005, a series of scandals and a network of corruption emerged in the government of President Luis Inacio Lula da Silva, and the media's investigative character resurfaced.

Political advertising, especially televised political advertising, has undergone a great deal of change over the years. These changes are attributed, in part, to the various electoral codes established over the years and to the different political regimes that Brazil endured. For example, between 1945 and 1964, Brazil experienced almost two decades of democratic governments. As a consequence, the access to political advertising by the candidates became less strict. In addition to the introduction of the "single ballot" where the names of the candidates would be printed in a single ballot instead of candidates printing their own ballots, the 1950 electoral code introduced a chapter about political advertising. It guaranteed that the prices charged for airtime were the same for all candidates. Radio stations were required to broadcast political advertising 2 hours daily during the 90 days before the election.

In 1962, a new law established that candidates should have free airtime. As a consequence, radio and television were required to broadcast 2 hours daily of political advertising during the 60 days before the election. Moreover, the new law established that candidates could continue campaigning until 8 days before Election Day. Although the access to political advertising seemed to be following a more liberal path, the military coup of 1964 stopped the democratic process, and Brazil returned to the control of a military dictatorship. As a result, the two-party system was created, and all forms of political expression were banished to suit the interests of the military government. In 1976, envisioning a severe control over the content of political advertising, the Lei Falcao (Falcao Law) established strict regulations regarding the broadcasting of political advertising. On radio, candidates were allowed to broadcast only their names, party, identifying ballot numbers, and brief curriculum vitae. On television, candidates could broadcast their close-up photograph and the place and time of their political rallies.

In 1985, the democratic regime returned with the movement called Diretas Ja ("Direct vote" movement), and the strict rules regarding political advertising were abolished. Brazil adopted the Horario Gratuito de Propaganda Eleitoral—HGPE (Free Electoral Political Advertising Time) model. This model is mandatory, and all television and radio stations must broadcast ads 2 hours per day at the same time and during fixed time slots. This model also establishes that candidates and political parties have free access to broadcast their political advertisements 45 days preceding Election Day. Since the adoption of the HGPE, airtime on radio and television cannot be purchased. Candidates and parties, conversely, can buy space in newspapers. The amount of airtime that the candidates and parties receive depends upon the number of seats that these parties have in the Chamber of Deputies. Usually, parties such as PMDB, PT, and PSDB receive more airtime than other parties. Therefore, electing many deputies will help that specific party (and coalition) to receive more airtime on television and on radio. The content of the HGPE can be categorized as follow: (a) programs that discuss the candidate's positions on issues; (b) programs that present what the candidate has done for the country, state, or city; (c) programs that accentuate the good qualities of the candidate; (d) programs that denigrate the image of the opponents; and (e) programs that respond to an attack made by another candidate. Additionally, since 1996 the use of commercials or spots has become a powerful tool in the Brazilian political scenario.

Juliana de Brum Fernandes

Further Readings

Albuquerque, A. de, & Dias, M. R. (2000). Propaganda política e a construção da imagem partidária no Brasil: Considerações preliminares [Political propaganda and the construction of party images in Brazil: Preliminary considerations]. Retrieved November 15, 2006, from http://www.cienciapolitica.org.br/encontro/reppol3.3.doc Azevedo, F. A. (2006). Midia e democracia no Brasil: Relacoes entre o sistema de midia e o sistema politico [Media and democracy in Brazil: The relationship between the media system and the political system]. Opiniao Publica, 12(1), 88–113.

Levine, R. M. (2003). The history of Brazil. New York: Palgrave.

Porto, M. P. (2006). Political advertising and democracy in Brazil. In L. L.Kaid & C. Holtz-Bacha (Eds.), The SAGE handbook of political advertising (pp. 129–144). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Schneider, R. M. (1996). Brazil: Culture and politics in a new industrial powerhouse. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Straubhaar, J. D. (1989). Television and video in the transition from military to civilian rule in Brazil. Latin American Research Review, 24(1), 140–154.

Broder, David (1929–)

David Salzer Broder is a well-known journalist for The Washington Post, a news organization he joined in 1966. He was born and raised in Chicago Heights, Illinois, and attended the University of Chicago, where he received both a bachelor's degree and a master's degree in political science. After serving 2 years in the U.S. Army, he began his journalism career with the Bloomington Pantograph. From those modest beginnings, Broder became a staple for the coverage of national politics, writing a syndicated column (carried in more than 300 newspapers) read avidly by Americans from all walks of life. Prior to 1966, he covered national politics for The New York Times (1965–1966), The Washington Star (1960–1965), and Congressional Quarterly (1955–1960). He has written several popular books, including Democracy Derailed: Initiative Campaigns and the Power of Money, Behind the Front Page, and The System: The American Way of Politics at the Breaking Point. In addition to print journalism, Broder has also made his mark on television, becoming a common fixture on NBC's weekly Sunday news show Meet the Press, as well as CNN's Inside Politics. He is also an academician. In 2000, he became a tenured, salaried full professor at the University of Maryland's Philip Merrill College of Journalism, teaching a course on politics and the press; interestingly, the class meets at the offices of The Washington Post. Broder has won numerous awards, including the White Burkett Miller Presidential Award in 1989, and in 1990 he won two honors: The National Press Foundation awarded him with the esteemed Fourth Estate Award, and Colby College awarded him with the Elijah Parrish Lovejoy Award. He was also elected to Sigma Delta Chi's Hall of Fame. During the remainder of the 1990s, the honors continued. In 1993, the National Press Foundation awarded him for a second time, honoring him with the Distinguished Contributions to Journalism Award. In 1997 Broder won the prestigious William Allen White Foundation's award for distinguished achievement in journalism and received the National Society of Newspaper Columnists Lifetime Achievement Award. Moreover, in 1997, the National Journal counted him as among the 25 most influential Washington journalists; also, the Washingtonian magazine ranked him as one of Washington, D.C.'s top journalists (an honor he has won every year since). Broder's highest honor came in 1973, when he was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for distinguished commentary.

In addition to his general political accomplishments in journalism, Broder can be credited as a leader in suggesting that the news media have an obligation to "police" the political advertising of candidates. His call for the importance of this watchdog function for journalists in the late 1980s led to the increased frequency of "ad watches," in which journalists scrutinize and evaluate the claims in candidates' political advertising. One primary reason for Broder's popularity centers on his integrity and his sense of fairness regarding politics. In a Washingtonian magazine poll, Broder was highly regarded by his peers and members of Congress from both sides of the aisle. In 1990, the same magazine surveyed the op-ed editors othe nation's 200 largest newspapers, once again finding that Broder was considered a class act by his peers, being labeled as "Best Reporter," "Hardest Working" and "Least Ideological" among 123 columnists.

Cary Stacy Smith and Li-Ching Hung

Further Readings

Gale Reference Team. (2006). Biography: Broder, David S. (1929–): An article from Contemporary Authors [HTML] (Digital). Farmington Hills, MI: Thomson Gale.

Johnson, H., & Broder, D. (1997). The system: The American way of politics at the breaking point. Boston: Back Bay Books.

Buchanan, Patrick (1938–)

Patrick Joseph Buchanan is an author and columnist, former television commentator and presidential advisor, and three-time unsuccessful presidential candidate.

Born in Washington, D.C., he graduated from Georgetown University and received a master's in journalism from Columbia University in 1962. Upon graduation he began writing for the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

In 1966, Buchanan began working for Richard Nixon as the first full-time staffer in preparation for the 1968 presidential election. Following Nixon's election, Buchanan worked as a White House advisor and speechwriter for Nixon and Vice President Spiro Agnew. After Nixon's resignation in 1974, Buchanan briefly continued his duties under President Gerald Ford until leaving later that year.

After leaving the White House, Buchanan became a syndicated political columnist and a commentator on a radio program and television shows The McLaughlin Group and Crossfire. In 1985, Buchanan returned to the White House as communications director for Reagan. He remained there until 1987, at which point he returned to Crossfire. He would leave Crossfire two more times to run for president but returned between elections until his final departure in1999.

Buchanan challenged incumbent President George H. W. Bush for the 1992 Republican nomination for president. Buchanan enjoyed early success by winning the New Hampshire primary before losing the nomination. Buchanan later supported Bush and delivered his famous "culture war" speech at the Republican National Convention.

In 1996, Buchanan again ran for the Republican nomination for president. Buchanan won New Hampshire before ultimately being defeated by Senator Bob Dole. During the campaign he gained the nickname "Pitchfork Pat" because of his slogan, "the peasants are coming with pitchforks." He also ran on his opposition to NAFTA. He threatened to run as the U.S. Taxpayer's Party candidate if Dole chose a pro-choice running mate. After Dole's selection of Jack Kemp, Buchanan offered his endorsement.

In 2000, Buchanan sought the Reform Party nomination for president against Iowa physicist John Hagelin. Although Buchanan easily won the primaries, Hagelin's supporters challenged the results. Some were also concerned about Buchanan's strong comments against abortion and homosexuality, as well as accusations of racism and anti-Semitism. The two sides held competing and simultaneous national conventions in the same convention center. Ultimately, the courts ruled Buchanan's nomination was valid, which placed his name on the ballot and granted him the $12.6 million in matching federal funds.

In his nomination address, Buchanan advocated that the United States leave the United Nations, abolish the IRS, Department of Education, capital gains and inheritance taxes, and affirmative action. He took fourth in the national election, garnering just 0.4% of the votes.

In 2004, Buchanan announced he was once again a Republican and endorsed the reelection of President George W. Bush. Buchanan continues to write and is a frequent guest on television news shows. He has written six books, including the New York Times best-seller A Republic Not an Empire.

Brian T. Kaylor

See also Commentary, Political; Republican Party

Further Readings

Buchanan, P. R. (1990). Right from the beginning. Washington, DC: Regnery Gateway.

Buchanan, P. R. (1992). 1992 Republican National Convention speech. Retrieved from http://www.buchanan.org/pa-92-0817-rnc.html

Buckley v. Valeo

The Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 and its 1974 amendments faced a constitutional challenge in Buckley v. Valeo (1976). The resulting decision of the U.S. Supreme Court has set the parameters of constitutionally permissible regulation of political campaigns for over 30 years. Political campaigns depend on the mass media and require the spending of money. The relationship between political communication in the modern age and the raising and spending of money thus assumes constitutional dimensions:

> [V]irtually every means of communicating ideas in today's mass society requires the expenditure of money. The distribution of the humblest handbill or leaflet entails printing, paper, and circulation costs. Speeches and rallies generally necessitate hiring a hall and publicizing the event. The electorate's increasing dependence on television, radio and mass media for news and other information has made these expensive modes of communication indispensable instruments of effective political speech. (Buckley, 1976, p. 19)

The Supreme Court in Buckley considered that two aspects of First Amendment freedom were potentially impaired by FECA. First, limits on campaign expenditures by candidates and others were held to "heavily burden core First Amendment expressions" because they represented "substantial rather than merely theoretical restraints on the quantity and diversity of political speech" (Buckley, p. 19). Accordingly, limits on campaign expenditures were struck down as unconstitutional because they were direct limits on political speech.

Second, the Buckley court upheld restrictions on the size of campaign contributions. The court considered that making a contribution of money to a candidate, like joining a political party, served to affiliate a person with a candidate and to enable like-minded persons to pool their resources in furtherance of common political goals. This right of free association is a "basic constitutional freedom" that is "closely allied to freedom of speech and a right which, like free speech, lies at the foundation of a free society." In view of the fundamental nature of the right to associate, governmental "action which may have the effect of curtailing the freedom to associate is subject to the closest scrutiny" (Buckley, p. 25).

However, the limits on contributions were upheld because the restraints on political speech were "marginal" in that the contributor remained free to spend independently, associate with candidates in other ways, and "the transformation of contributions into political debate involves speech by someone other than the contributor," viz. the candidate (p. 21). The Supreme Court concluded that a compelling governmental interest in the prevention of corruption or the appearance of corruption from large contributions justified these less serious impairments of First Amendment activity.

The Buckley decision substantially altered the campaign finance landscape envisaged by Congress. Major features in FECA 1974 were declared unconstitutional: limits on candidate spending, limits on independent spending, and limits on expenditures of candidates' personal funds. While one goal of the legislation had been to limit the cost of election campaigns, the Buckley court found this to be impermissible: "The First Amendment denies government the power to determine that spending to promote one's political views is wasteful, excessive, or unwise" (p. 57). The court did uphold expenditure limitations in the context of the public funding of presidential election campaigns because candidates could voluntarily choose to limit their expenditures in return for public funds.

FECA purported to broadly regulate all spending "in connection with," or "for the purpose of influencing" a federal election, or "relative to" a federal candidate. It was argued that these phrases were so vague and overly broad that they provided an unconstitutional lack of notice to persons potentially affected by the FECA. In order to avoid declaring these provisions unconstitutional, Buckley held that "explicit words of advocacy of election or defeat" are required. The court listed certain explicit advocacy terms as satisfying the strict "express advocacy" test: "vote for," "elect," "support," "cast your ballot for," "Smith for Congress," "vote against," "defeat," "reject" (p. 44, note 52). The court considered that such precision was required to avoid "chilling" speech involving public discussion of political issues:

> [T]he distinction between discussion of issues and candidates and advocacy of election or defeat of candidates may often dissolve in practical application. Candidates, especially incumbents, are intimately tied to public issues involving legislative proposals and governmental actions. Not only do candidates campaign on the basis of their positions on various public issues, but campaigns themselves generate issues of public interest. (p. 42)

The result of the Buckley decision was to free "issue advocacy" advertisements from regulation as either contributions or expenditures except for the reporting requirements: "So long as persons and groups eschew expenditures that, in express terms advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate, they are free to spend as much as they want to promote the candidate and his views" (Buckley, p. 45). In 1976, Congress amended the statute to conform to the Buckley court's interpretation. Further statutory amendments changing this rule were contained in the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and were the subject of Supreme Court decisions in McConnell v. Federal Election Commission and Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc.

Another consequence of Buckley in combination with other aspects of federal law was the use of soft money by political parties to run television ads which, although not expressly advocating election or defeat of candidates, served the purpose. Soft money is money contributed (usually to political parties) which is not subject to the hard limits of the FECA, such as the limits on amounts of contributions and prohibitions of contributions by corporations or labor unions. By the 1996 election, parties were spending more soft money than hard money, and parties spent more running issue ads for their presidential candidates funded by soft money than the entire amount permitted by the public funding expenditure limits for presidential campaigns. Such contributions were legal because the contributions were raised under more permissive state laws and then routed by state parties through the national party committees. Such evasion of FECA limits led to the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act.

Clifford A. Jones

See also Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act; Campaign Finance; Federal Election Campaign Act; McConnell v. Federal Election Commission

Further Readings

Bauer, R .B. (2003). More soft money, hard law (2nd ed.). Washington, DC: Perkins Coie LLP.

BeVier, L. R. (2004). McConnell v. FEC: Not Senator Buckley's First Amendment. Election Law Journal, 3(2), 127–145.

Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976).

Corrado, A., Mann, T. E., Ortiz, D., & Potter, T. (2005). The new campaign finance sourcebook. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

Jones, C. A. (2000). Soft money and hard choices: The influence of finance rules on campaign communication strategy. In R. Denton (Ed.), Political communication ethics (pp. 179–201). Westport, CT: Praeger.

Jones, C. A., & Kaid, L. L. (1976). Political campaign regulation and the Constitution. Oklahoma Law Review, 29, 684–711.

Bulgaria, Democratization

The years after the 1989 collapse of the ruling communist government in Bulgaria, along with the profound political changes throughout Eastern European countries, resulted in a fundamental restructuring of the society. Prior to that, an atmosphere encouraging social obedience in line with Party-State propaganda priorities reigned in the country. Freedom of expression was totally controlled. The idea of glasnost (openness) and perestroyka (restructuring) launched by Russian President Mikhail Gorbachev in 1985 opened the doors for pluralistic discussion clubs in Bulgaria. The first dissident associations, however small, found support among the public. Communist Party leaders, fearing the threat of social unrest, tried to reform the party along Soviet perestroika lines. The general secretary of the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP) and chairman of the State Council, Todor Zhivkov, was removed from power in a November 10, 1989, party coup.

Political activity among the population surged dramatically, and its legality was no longer questioned. Political rallies and demonstrations became the events of the day. Encouraged by the landslide of totalitarian collapse throughout Central and Eastern Europe, on December 7, 1989, the opposition set up The Union of Democratic Forces (UDF); a coalition of 16 pro-democratic parties and organizations. One major political achievement of the UDF was the abolishment of Article I of the Constitution, which legitimized the leading role of the Communist Party in societal and state affairs. The consensus achieved by political forces in the round-table discussions (1990) for convocation of a Grand National Assembly marked the start of legalization of the democratic processes in Bulgaria. The Grand National Assembly adopted a new constitution on July 12, 1991. It was the first democratic constitution in the former Eastern Bloc countries. It proclaimed that Bulgaria would be governed by the rule of law and set up the fundamental principles of a civil society. Zhelyu Zhelev, the leader of the UDF and a longtime dissident, was elected president of the National Assembly on August 1, 1991.

Under the terms of the new constitution, Bulgaria is a parliamentary Republic. The National Assembly is composed of 240 deputies elected for a term of 4 years. The president, as the head of state of the Republic of Bulgaria, is elected with majority vote for a term of 5 years.

The long years of one-party dominance were replaced by an ever-growing host of new political parties, unions, and organizations, which constantly split, regrouped, and entered into coalitions, especially on the eve of forthcoming elections. However, the model of democracy that was forming in the country delegated the difficult tasks of transition to the political elite and eliminated the broad participation of the people in the process of transformation.

The period of transformation to democracy and a market economy posed significant social challenges to the population in Bulgaria. The transition was slowed down by delayed legislation, aggressive political behavior, and underdeveloped markets. All of this caused a rapid impoverishment, a high rate of unemployment, and a loss of established social benefits such as free health care and free education. Thus, the country entered the 21st century under the Currency Board. The encouraging sign is that the political processes and changes in the country are carried out peacefully and in spite of significant differences between the political forces, their reasonable behavior has so far not allowed any disastrous display of violence.

Currently, the list of the main political organizations include the left-wing Bulgarian Socialist Party (direct successor of the Bulgarian Communist Party), The Union of Democratic Forces (nowadays fragmented into small right-wing formations), The National Movement Simeon the Second (political centrist formation of the former Bulgarian Tsar), The Movement for Rights and Freedoms (party of the ethnic Turks with a traditional role as a balancing factor in the political area), and Attack (party with a markedly nationalistic character, challenging the role of the MRF in power).

The past period of over 15 years witnessed four presidential elections (in 1992, 1996, 2001, and 2006), six parliamentary elections (in 1990, 1991, 1994, 1997, 2001, and 2005), four local elections (in 1991, 1995, 1999, and 2003), and the appointment of ten governments. An encouraging sign is that the two last of these successfully finished their mandate.

The comparative stability in the executive power during the last 8 years had spread relief in terms of the political and economic development of the country. Nevertheless, the election apathy started to displace the initial political euphoria in the society. After the elective boom triggered by the political changes, launched in 1989, the relative share of people who refused to vote gradually but unswervingly began to increase, reaching, within a decade, half the voting public at the time of the local elections of 1999. Since that time all the elections (parliamentary, presidential, and local) have become a protest vote of the Bulgarians against the political class. Apparently, Bulgarian voters were not influenced by any mass media or political and sociological propaganda, especially when dished out along negative lines.

January 10, 1992, will remain important in the history of Bulgarian political life as a date marking the first presidential debate televised "live." The opponents were Dr. Zhelyu Zhelev, the candidate of the UDF, and Prof. Velko Vulkanov, an independent candidate backed by the BSP. In the process of transformation to democracy the foundations of televised political advertisement were laid down. Thus, with debates and ads, television has great possibilities for molding the public opinion, especially in view of the fact that Bulgarians maintain greatest confidence in public television as compared to the other mass media.

Bulgaria still experiences the difficulties of the transition to a democratic society and a market economy. The country has achieved considerable progress toward democratization and economic growth, but many political difficulties remain. The mass media often operate as the fourth estate, strongly influencing the political, economic, social, and cultural leanings of the public.

Since the turn of the century Bulgaria has begun to improve its legislative, economic and social policies. It joined NATO in 2004 and became a member of the European Union on January 1, 2007.

Lilia Raycheva

Further Readings

Dmitriy, V. (n.d.). "Autobiography" of the Bulgarian transition. Retrieved from http://formulata.hit.bg/kniga.html

Petko, G. (2000, February). The Bulgarian transition 1989–1999—Revolution and contrarevolution, transformation and restoration. Philosophical Alternatives Magazine, 86–90.

Zhelev Z. (2000, February). Ten years after. Philosophical Alternatives Magazine, 69–76.

BURKE, KENNETH

See DRAMATISTIC APPROACHES TO POLITICAL COMMUNICATION

BUSH, GEORGE H. W. (1924–)

George Herbert Walker Bush was elected 41st president of the United States (serving from 1989 to 1993) after a highly decorated career in public service. He enlisted in the Navy on his 18th birthday as a naval aviator serving in World War II. Following his father's footsteps, he later went on to run for the Senate in 1964 and lost. He won a subsequent election to Congress, representing Texas's 7th district but lost a U.S. Senate election to Lloyd Bentsen in 1970. He became a United Nations Ambassador, chairman of the Republican National Committee, and worked as the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) director under the Ford administration. He also taught as an adjunct professor at Rice University.

Bush ran against Ronald Reagan for the Republican primary in 1980, but after his famous campaign-trail criticisms of Reagan's "voodoo economics" and other noteworthy salvos, he was thought by the Republican Party to be too moderate. Reagan came out on top as the party nominee for president, but Bush was selected as the vice president, a position he held during both Reagan presidential terms (1981 to 1989).

When Bush again sought the White House in the 1988 election he made a number of speeches with memorable and catchy phrases, including "Weakness and ambivalence lead to war," "They talk, we deliver! They promise, we perform," and "Read my lips, NO NEW TAXES." At the Republican National Convention he made his most famous speech (Thousand-Points-of-Light): "For we're a nation of community; of thousands and tens of thousands of ethnic, religious, social, business, labor union, neighborhood, regional, and other organizations, all of them varied, voluntary and unique. This is America: the Knights of Columbus, the Grange, Hadassah, the Disabled American Veterans, the Order of Ahepa, the Business and Professional Women of America, the union hall, the Bible study group, LULAC, Holy Name—a brilliant diversity spread like stars, like a thousand points of light in a broad and peaceful sky."

Bush's opponent in the 1988 election was former Massachusetts Governor Michael Dukakis. This campaign season was noted for its high density of negative campaign ads. Bush defeated Dukakis by both the popular vote and the electoral college totals. At his inaugural address he proclaimed, "I come before you and assume the presidency at a moment rich with promise. We live in a peaceful, prosperous time, but we can make it better. For a new breeze is blowing, and a world refreshed by freedom seems reborn; for in man's heart, if not in fact, the day of the dictator is over. The totalitarian era is passing, its old ideas blown away like leaves from an ancient, lifeless tree. A new breeze is blowing, and a nation refreshed by freedom stands ready to push on. There is new ground to be broken, and new action to be taken."

Leading up to the Gulf War, President Bush said in 1990, "Out of these troubled times, our fifth objective . . . a new world order can emerge—a new era!" It is interesting to note that his secretary of defense, Dick Cheney, warned against invading Iraq in the early 1990s, only later to become a key architect of Operation Iraqi Freedom.

Bush was often ridiculed by the media for some of his awkward moments, gaffes, and mishaps. He had an aversion to broccoli, famously noting "I am the president of the United States, and I am not going to eat any more broccoli." In a separate incident, at a state dinner, he vomited on the lap of the Japanese prime minister. This caused a wave of late night television jokes and ridicule in the international community, even coining new terms such as Bushu-suru which literally means to "do the Bush thing."

In addition to the successful Gulf War effort, Bush's presidency will be remembered for presiding over the fall of the Berlin Wall and the end of communist control in much of Eastern Europe. Despite Bush's foreign policy successes, however, the declining state of the national economy gave ammunition to his opponent in 1992. Bill Clinton's extremely negative campaign advertising scored many successful hits against Bush, and Clinton also performed well in the presidential debates. Although Bush lost the 1992 election, he left office with a 56% approval rating. He is the father of the 43rd president of the United States, George W. Bush.

Brandon Jay Hersh

See also Bush, George W.; Bush–Rather Confrontation

Further Readings

Bush, G. H. W., & Snowcroft, B. (1998). A world transformed. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

Feldman, L. D., & Perotti, R. (Eds.). (2002). Honor and loyalty: Inside the politics of the George H. W. Bush White House. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.

Runkel, D. R. (1989). Campaign for president: The managers look at 1988. Dover, MA: Auburn House.

Bush, George W. (1946–)

The 43rd president of the United States (2001–2009) and son of the 41st president, George H. W. Bush, George Walker Bush was an unsuccessful candidate for the House of Representatives in 1978, and instead of running again he worked as an oil entrepreneur. In 1989 he became a shareholder of the Texas Rangers baseball team and worked with the team's media relations, which secured him both exposure and media attention that later garnered public and political support. He was inspired by Rev. Billy Graham and became a self-proclaimed "born-again Christian" after giving up alcohol in 1986. He and his family moved to Washington, D.C., in 1988 to work on his father's presidential campaign. George W. Bush networked to ensure an evangelical base in the primaries, which was considered key to the Republican presidential nomination. In 1994, his nickname, Dubya, became a household name in Texas, where Bush campaigned against and defeated the highly popular Governor Ann Richards. Richards was considered an easy front-runner in the campaign given "W's" lack of polished political experience. With the help of Karen Hughes, John Albaugh, and Karl Rove, Bush successfully campaigned against Governor Richards's record on law enforcement, education, tort reform, and questionable political appointments. The Bush campaign was accused of using brutal and often-controversial attack ads to win the election with a margin of 52% to Richards's 48%. Quickly becoming one of the nation's most popular governors, alongside his brother Jeb Bush in Florida, he was reelected in 1998 with 69% of the vote.

As governor, Bush focused on reforming the criminal justice system, set higher standards for education, and solidified his reputation as both a fiscal and social conservative. He was criticized for his often foggy separation of church and state. In 2000 he declared June 10th Jesus Day in Texas, where he urged Texans to "answer the call and serve those in need."

Bush was considered an early favorite for the Republican presidential nomination in 2000. On a televised interview in Iowa, all primary candidates were asked, "What political philosopher or thinker do you identify most with and why?" Bush responded, "Christ, because he changed my heart." He labeled himself a "compassionate conservative" and out-raised John McCain and others in campaign funds. Upon his acceptance of the Republican nomination, Bush promised to "restore honor and dignity to the White House." He chose former Secretary of Defense Dick Cheney as his running mate.

In a bitterly contested campaign against the sitting vice president, Al Gore, Bush rallied the support of much of the religious right. On election night, November 7, 2000, Bush carried key swing states such as Missouri and Ohio, as well as Gore's home state, Tennessee. Initially some networks called Florida for Gore but then retracted that claim and popularized the phrase "too close to call." Florida law required multiple hand recounts, and the case Bush v. Gore took 2 months to get to the Supreme Court, where the recounts were stopped and Florida was called in favor of Bush, albeit narrowly. Bush became the first president since Benjamin Harrison (1888) to win the Electoral College but lose the popular vote (by about a half million votes).

The terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, signified a turning point in Bush's presidency. On September 14, Bush made one of his most famous speeches and rallied support from a wounded nation, saying, "I can hear you. The rest of the world hears you. And the people who knocked these buildings down will hear us all soon!" He famously declared a War on Terror and subsequently made the decision to invade Afghanistan and later Iraq to depose the dictatorial president Saddam Hussein.

Bush's reelection campaign in 2004 was characterized by the repeated use of an F. D. R. quote that noted the danger involved with "changing horses midstream." He also repeatedly noted that "the world changed on 9/11," and that his opponent, Massachusetts Senator John Kerry, did not understand the gravity or nature of the threat that terrorist groups caused. In a shockingly more controversial campaign than most were used to, the American public was subjected to a smattering of attack ads from all sides. John Kerry was defeated at the polls by both the popular vote and the Electoral College.

"I have earned political capital . . . and I intend to use it." Bush furthered his agenda with increased war spending, tax cuts, and a rallying of the Christian conservative base against social liberalism. Bush's approval ratings began to plummet after a myriad of scandals captured media attention: a slow and incomplete response to hurricane Katrina; the Jack Abramoff scandal; increasing violence and uncertainty in Iraq; intelligence leaks; an alleged Republican culture of corruption; and the unfulfilled vow to catch Osama bin Laden.

Despite his plummeting poll numbers, Bush insisted that "America is headed in the right direction." He famously dubbed himself "the Decider," amid media scrutiny of his War in Iraq and War on Terror.

Brandon Jay Hersh

See also Bush, George H. W.; Bush, Laura; Iraq War, Media Coverage of

Further Readings

Hetherington, M. J., & Nelson, M. (2003). Anatomy of a rally effect: George W. Bush and the war on terrorism. PS: Political Science and Politics, 36, 37–42.

Kaid, L. L., Tedesco, J., Bystrom, D., & McKinney, M. (Eds.). (2003). The millennium election: Communication in the 2000 campaigns. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Kellner, D. (2001). Grand theft 2000: Media spectacle and a stolen election. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Bush, Laura (1946–)

Laura Welch Bush, First Lady of the United States from 2001 to 2009, has been one of the most well-liked first ladies in recent history. She has used her popularity on the campaign trail, as well as to promote causes ranging from education and literacy to women's health.

Laura Welch was working as a school librarian when she met George W. Bush in 1977; the two married a few months later. In speeches, Bush often tells audiences that she agreed to marry her future husband only after he promised that she would never have to give a political speech. He broke that promise just a few months after their wedding when he ran for his first political office, and she has been giving speeches ever since. Laura Bush has become one of the most sought-after campaign speakers. During her husband's presidential campaigns of 2000 and 2004, Bush toured the country, often speaking to women's groups and smaller community gatherings. She has also stumped on behalf of various Republican candidates and spoken at many RNC fundraisers, often drawing "standing room only" crowds.

Despite her popularity, Bush has, for the most part, been successful in staying out of the media spotlight focused on first ladies. Her media coverage has been primarily positive, centering on her advocacy work. However, after September 11th, Bush was cast in the role of the nation's "comforter-in-chief." She did numerous interviews, advising families and teachers on how to talk to children about the terrorist attacks. She also met with survivors, attended memorial services, and visited classrooms around the country. Bush played a similar role in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, touring the devastated areas and meeting with victims.

For most of her tenure, Bush has worked quietly in the background, offering support to a number of causes and garnering limited media attention. Her earliest White House initiatives, on literacy and education, drew upon her background as a librarian and elementary school teacher. During her first year in office, she launched the National Book Festival and hosted a summit on Early Childhood Development. She has also supported various literacy and teacher recruitment programs, as well as organizations aiding underprivileged youth. In later years, Bush expanded her efforts beyond the United States, hosting a conference on Global Literacy and becoming an Honorary Ambassador for the United Nation's Literacy Decade. She has called for equal access to education for girls and women around the world, visiting programs in Africa, the Middle East, and Southern Asia that promote education and literacy.

Bush has also become an advocate for women's health programs both at home and abroad. She supports programs that educate American women about the risks of heart disease and breast cancer. Abroad, she has toured women's health clinics and promoted her husband's AIDS Relief plan.

Lisa M. Burns

See also Bush, George H. W.; First Ladies, Political Communication of

Further Readings

Beasley, M. H. (2005). First Ladies and the press: The unfinished partnership of the media age. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press.

Bush–Rather Confrontation

During early 1988, CBS Evening News began to air a series of profiles of the individuals who were running for the Republican and Democratic nominations for president. A major contender for the Republican nomination was George H. W. Bush, the sitting vice president under then-president Ronald Reagan. When CBS attempted to schedule time with Bush for interviews and material to construct his profile, the Bush campaign refused to participate unless the vice president could appear on the evening news live and unedited. His staff indicated that he was not willing to be interviewed on tape and have his remarks edited for broadcast by CBS.

Although unhappy about this restriction, CBS agreed and scheduled Bush's live appearance for the regular evening news on January 25, 1988. However, CBS prepared a 5-minute segment to precede the interview that focused on Bush's involvement in the Iran-Contra affair that had been plaguing the Reagan administration for several months. The tone and focus of this 5-minute prerecorded segment was clearly negative and confrontational toward Bush, placing him in an immediately defensive position as CBS anchor Dan Rather began the live interview portion of the program.

The live sparring match between Bush and Rather consumed approximately 9 minutes of additional airtime, an extraordinary amount of uninterrupted airtime for any evening news segment. As Rather continuously pushed and challenged and accused, Bush fought back strongly and firmly, establishing a powerful presence for the vice president who had sometimes been characterized as a "wimp" prior to this encounter.

The interview itself took on the flavor of an intense argument between two contenders. Neither combatant gave much respect to the other, as they constantly interrupted and overlapped each other, each trying to score the next verbal jab. In the aftermath, Rather received more of the blame for allowing the encounter to go so far out of the norms of a public display and for his obvious refusal to show any respect or deference to the vice president of the United States.

It is always difficult to pinpoint the effects of a single campaign event, but this one certainly came at a critical time for Bush, and many observers believe it had a major role in securing Bush's future position. Coming into this interview, Bush had been trailing Senator Bob Dole in the polls as the Republican choice for the presidential nomination. Research after the encounter has suggested that Bush probably gained more from the encounter and that Rather's behavior violated viewer norms and expectations of journalistic objectivity. The use of the "surprise" anti-Bush documentary preceding the interview gave the impression that Bush had been "set up" and created sympathy for him that helped bolster his position.

Bush, of course, went on to win the Republican nomination in 1988 and eventually the presidency. In the aftermath of the final election results, many observers pointed back to this encounter with Rather as a major turning point for Bush, who was unlikely to ever again be referred to by the media as a "wimp."

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Bush, George H. W.; Rather, Dan; Journalism, Political

Further Readings

Downs, V. C., Kaid, L. L., & Ragan, S. (1990). The impact of argumentativeness and verbal aggression on communicator image: The exchange between George Bush and Dan Rather. Western Journal of Speech Communication, 54(Winter), 98–112.

Kaid, L. L., Downs, V. C., & Ragan, S. (1990). Political argumentation and violations of audience expectations: An analysis of the Bush-Rather encounter. Journal of Broadcasting & Electronic Media, 34(Winter), 1–15.

Schegloff, E. A. (1988–1989). From interview to confrontation: Observations on the Bush/Rather encounter. Research on Language and Social Interaction, 22, 215–240.

Campaign Finance

Campaign finance refers to the methods and governing rules under which candidates and political parties obtain the funds necessary to organize political parties and carry out campaigns for public office. In the United States, for example, campaign finance is largely achieved through private fundraising by both candidates and parties. Public finance of candidates or parties is exceptional, although it does exist in limited circumstances. In contrast, many democracies in other parts of the world rely almost exclusively on public funding of political parties and candidates, and many utilize a combination of public and private funding.

Political parties require funding—more in election years than in others—to create and maintain their organizations, pay staff, recruit candidates and volunteers, and to engage in election campaigns. Over the years political campaigns, especially in Western democracies, have become more and more professionalized. The need for funds has increased to hire services such as pollsters, advertising agencies, production companies, political consultants, and media time, including everything from campaign buttons to yard signs to billboards, posters, radio and television ads, Web sites, and Internet-based advertising and distribution of spots, position papers, and other campaign materials. In addition, engaging accountants and lawyers to aid in compliance with campaign finance regulations is a necessary expense. Campaign finance has assumed constitutional dimensions in countries such as the United States, where the Supreme Court declared in Buckley v. Valeo in 1976 that > virtually every means of communicating ideas in today's mass society requires the expenditure of money. The distribution of the humblest handbill or leaflet entails printing, paper, and circulation costs. Speeches and rallies generally necessitate hiring a hall and publicizing the event. The electorate's increasing dependence on television, radio and mass media for news and other information has made these expensive modes of communication indispensable instruments of effective political speech.

In the United States, political parties and candidates either provide their own campaign funds from personal wealth or have them donated by supporters. The principal exception to this is the limited public financing provided by the federal government for candidates for president of the United States. The 1974 Amendments to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 established a system of partial public funding of presidential campaigns and party conventions funded by a voluntary tax check-off system in which taxpayers may designate on their federal income tax returns that $3.00 (originally $1.00) of their tax liability should go to the Presidential Election Campaign Fund. This fund provides funding for the national nominating conventions of qualifying political parties, primarily the Democratic and Republican Parties. In 2004, each major party received $14.924 million for their party convention from public funds. Parties do not receive public funding for the campaign itself or for their general operation.

This fund also provides partial funding for candidates for president. Under the presidential funding scheme, candidates are allowed to choose whether to participate in public funding. Those who do not participate do not receive public funds but are not restricted as to the amounts that may be expended on their campaign. Those who do participate receive partial matching public funds during the primary in proportion to certain eligible private contributions that they receive and full funding during the general election campaign (private contributions may not be accepted) if they win their party's nomination. In 2004, each major party nominee received $74.62 million in public funds for the general election campaign. For the primary, nine candidates (not including Kerry, Bush, and Dean who declined public funding) received a cumulative total of approximately $28 million. The exact 2008 election amounts will not be determined until early 2008, but the major parties' candidates can expect to receive over $82 million for the general election in 2008, assuming they accept public funds.

Candidates who are participants in the public funding system are limited in the amounts they may spend during the primary season and in each state. In the general election, candidate spending is limited to the amount of the public grant. In 2004, the primary spending limit was $37.31 million, and it is expected to exceed $42 million in 2008. Candidates may choose to decline public funding in the primary and still receive it in the general election. Ross Perot declined public funding in 1992, and the first major party candidate to do so was George W. Bush in 2000. In the 2004 election, several major party candidates declined public matching funds in the primary, including Bush, Howard Dean, and John Kerry, but Bush and Kerry accepted full public funding for the general election. The reason for declining the matching funds in the primary was to avoid being bound by the spending limits in the primary, which were considered insufficient to mount a competitive campaign.

The future of the presidential public funding system has been called into question by the fact that increasingly, insufficient numbers of the general public choose to check off and donate $3 to the fund, which reduces the amounts available. In addition, the fact that so many candidates now choose to decline public funding in the primary indicates that the limits of the program are now exceeded by the needs of the most competitive candidates. So far, no major party candidates have declined public funding in the general election, but this may yet happen. On the other hand, bills to provide public funding for congressional and Senate candidates have been introduced, but so far have not seemed likely to pass. A few states, including Maine and Arizona, have partial public funding systems for state candidates, but this is the exception rather than the rule.

Outside the United States, public funding, direct and indirect, is more common. For example, in-kind subsidies prevalent in European democracies include official publicly prepared voter registry lists, as opposed to the U.S.-style voter registration drive, and free provision of media time for party election broadcasts. Where free media time is provided, some countries permit parties or candidates to purchase additional broadcast time, though many do not, or allow such purchases only on privately owned channels but not public channels. (Public channels in foreign countries, unlike in the United States, often have the highest viewership numbers.)

A study of 111 countries showed that 71 have a system of party finance, another seven have assorted rules but no system, and 12 have a candidate-oriented system rather than a party-oriented one. Sixty countries in the study had rules on disclosure of income, either by the political party (54) or by the donor (14). The disclosures are not made public in all of these countries. Thirty countries set a ceiling on how much a donor can contribute to political parties and nine countries limit how much money a party can raise. Fifty-four of the countries have requirements that political parties disclose their expenditures, and 27 countries limit party expenditures. Corporate contributions are banned in only 22 of 111 countries, and labor union contributions are banned in only 17.

The most common form of political party regulation is public funding; 65 countries have provisions for direct public funding of political parties, and 79 have provisions for indirect public funding. Direct public funding is allocated among parties by a mixture of methods. In 57 of the 65 countries, the basis for funding allocation is the number of seats or votes in the current or previous election; in 12 countries an equal allocation among parties is either the sole basis or one of the criteria for direct funding allocation. Eight countries allocate funds based on the number of candidates fielded in the election. Direct funding is allocated to election expenses in 45 countries and/or to general party administration costs in 29 countries, and 20 countries do not designate a purpose.

Indirect party funding is provided more often than direct funding and takes many forms, such as favorable tax rules for parties or donors (32 countries), free or subsidized franking of letters and use of telephones (7 countries), free transportation (4 countries), free use of government buildings (4 countries), and free printing of party ballot papers (3 countries). Free access to state-owned media is the most common form of indirect public funding (71 countries). The allocation of broadcast time is based on a principle of equal time for all parties in 49 countries, performance in the previous elections in 20 countries, the number of candidates fielded in the current election in 13 countries, or a combination.

Clifford A. Jones

See also Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act; Buckley v. Valeo; Federal Election Campaign Act; McConnell v. Federal Election Commission

Further Readings

Austin, R., & Tjernström, M. (Eds.). (2003). Funding of political parties and election campaigns. Stockholm: International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance.

Corrado, A., Mann, T. E., Ortiz, D., & Potter, T. (2005). The new campaign finance sourcebook. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

Gunlicks, A. (Ed.). (1993). Campaign and party finance in North America and Western Europe. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Hayward, A. (2005). Rethinking campaign finance prohibitions. Engage, 6, 62–69.

Jones, C. A., Tedesco, J., & Chanslor, M. (1999). Political television in evolving European democracies: Political, media, and legal system issues. In L. Kaid (Ed.), Television and politics in evolving European democracies (pp. 11–32). Comstock, NY: Nova Science.

Smith, B. A. (2003). Unfree speech: The folly of campaign finance reform. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Campaigns & Elections Magazine

A nonpartisan monthly magazine based out of Arlington, Virginia, the mission statement of Campaigns & Elections Magazine is "Covering the business and trends of politics." It was founded in 1980 by Stanley Foster Reed in an effort to enlighten the politically savvy as well as the general public. It gives up-to-date campaign polls and information alongside the latest news about known political consultants. It is a meld of political polling information, campaign suggestions, political analysis and a general Who's Who behind the scenes in state/national politics. For example, William Berry Campaigns (WBC, Inc.) is frequently mentioned as a successful firm that any California progressive should consult. The magazine goes out of its way to help out political neophytes and provides training seminars around the nation. Advertisements in the magazine promote some of its seminars and services, and it promotes its services as providing access to the top campaign professionals in the country. The magazine's seminars and information materials cover all aspects of political campaigning, including strategy, polling, direct mail, media, and the Internet.

Campaigns & Elections Magazine is edited by Morgan E. Felchner and has an estimated circulation size of nearly 20,000. It consistently features sections like Inside Politics, Consultant Sign Ups, Movers & Shakers, People and Organizations, Across State Lines, Tech Bytes, Voting Matters, Campaignland, Proving Ground, Consultants' Corner, The High Road, and International Politics. The magazine also publishes lists of campaign consultants and media professionals.

The magazine also publishes a weekly newsletter, Campaign Insider, which goes to more than 10,000 political and media professionals.

Brandon Jay Hersh

Further Readings

Campaigns & Elections Magazine Web site: http://www.campaignline.com

Candidate, The

The Candidate, a movie released in 1972, offers a behind-the-scenes look at the political campaign process in the age of television. The film examines the candidacy of an idealistic young lawyer, Bill McKay, who is running for the United States Senate from the state of California. In contrast to the heroic depiction of political leaders contained in such Hollywood classic era films as Mister Smith Goes to Washington (1939), The Candidate adopts a more cynical view of politics. In the film, McKay, albeit reluctantly, eventually compromises his beliefs in exchange for victory. This depiction of political expediency is reflective of post-1960s American pessimism toward government.

Director Michael Ritchie and leading actor Robert Redford envisioned The Candidate to be part of a trilogy they would produce on the American obsession with winning. In the film, McKay initially pursues office with noble intentions and little chance of success. He is unafraid to speak his mind on the issues. As the campaign proceeds and his polling numbers increase, McKay realizes that he might indeed stand a chance at victory. Unwilling to antagonize potential voters, his positions on issues become more vague, and he begins to mistrust his political instincts. McKay becomes increasingly dependent on the advice of his campaign manager and media consultants. He comes to realize that, in the television era, platforms are no longer as important as image.

The Candidate provides critical insight into how a modern, image-based campaign is run. Political staffers coach McKay on how best to answer reporters' questions, the candidate practices canned responses for supposedly spontaneous televised debates, film editors piece together video clips designed to portray McKay in the most positive light, and influential party leaders hobnob with celebrities at campaign dinners. Above all, campaigning is laborious work designed to market the candidate as advertisers would sell a bar of soap. Thanks to his media-driven campaign, McKay wins an upset victory in the senatorial election but is left with a sense that he has lost touch with his motivation to run for office in the first place.

Jeremy Larner, who won an academy award for the film's screenplay, was active in politics. In 1968, he worked as a speechwriter for the presidential campaign of Senator Eugene McCarthy, and his political experience provided the film with a great amount of authentic detail. Larner was deeply committed to the McCarthy campaign but was ultimately disappointed with the experience, finding campaign coworkers to be petty and McCarthy indecisive. Larner's frustration at the political process set the tone for the film and mirrored the public's wish for better government. The early 1970s were a contentious time in America. Domestic and foreign policy conflicts polarized the country and eroded public confidence in the credibility of its leaders. The Candidate captured that erosion of confidence.

William Renkus

See also Film and Politics

Further Readings

Gianos, P. (1998). Politics and politicians in American film. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Larner, J. (1969). Nobody knows. New York: Macmillan.

Candidate-Centered Communication

Candidate-centered, or personal, campaigning is an increasingly common feature of elections in many democracies. The term usually refers to two key developments in electioneering. First is the degree to which leading political actors, rather than parties, have become the visible focus of election campaigns. This trend can be seen most clearly in presidential elections in the United States, where candidates for the presidency use the electronic media to sell themselves to voters. Second, personal campaigning can be understood as the extent to which personal information and imagery about a candidate or party leader, rather than policy programs, has become a major element of campaigns. Personal information includes: candidates' biographies, their appearances, beliefs, tastes, values, and any past or current misdemeanors—that is, all information concerning the candidates themselves, not their record or what they propose to do if elected.

Although there has been a tendency to see personal campaigning as concentrated in presidential political systems, where individuals are directly elected to high office, there is a widely observed trend toward increased personal campaigning in parliamentary democracies. Party leaders have assumed an increasingly central position in parties' campaigns for office. The leaders have come to embody their respective parties and dominate the national media campaign. Often the heart of the campaign is a leader's tour of the country, with a series of staged photo opportunities. At the same time there has been a trend toward greater self-disclosure by leaders and personal attacks on leaders of rival parties.

The Visibility of Candidates and Party Leaders

A growing number of observers suggest one of the key factors contributing to the personalization of campaigning is greater media visibility, especially with the emergence and spread of television. Election campaigns in most democracies are fought mainly on television, which provides contestants with an opportunity to communicate directly with millions of households. Office seekers have, over the years, become adept at utilizing this technology, and as a result their routine appearances have rendered them familiar to a mass audience of voters. It could be argued that leading politicians have even gained the status of celebrities.

Television has provided leading politicians with an increasing number of outlets on which to appear. In many democracies televised debates between the leading contestants have become a permanent feature of campaigns. Research by Pippa Norris found that of 24 OECD democracies examined in the mid-1990s, 16 had televised candidate debates. In addition, there are political advertisements, news bulletins, and non-news outlets, such as talk shows. The first appearance of a candidate on a talk show came in the 1960 U.S. presidential campaign, when both John F. Kennedy and Richard M. Nixon were guests on Jack Paar's television show. By the 1992 U.S. presidential campaign, the television talk show had become a routine campaign stop for presidential candidates. Liesbet van Zoonen and Christina Holtz-Bacha observe that the appearance of party leaders on the talk show sofa is now a feature of campaigns in parliamentary democracies too. In addition to television exposure, representatives and parties in many democracies maintain a permanent Web presence. For example, Pippa Norris notes that a 2000 comparison of 1,244 parties in 179 countries found that 39% had developed their own Web site. The home page can be seen as a cost-efficient self-advertisement, where office seekers are free to construct and present an image of themselves to voters.

It is not only major election campaigns that are media events but also the process of candidate or leadership selection. Whereas once such procedures were largely invisible to media audiences, now they have become visible in an unprecedented way. This can be seen most starkly in the United states, with the introduction of primary elections and media coverage of them. This has led to an almost-year-long contest for the nomination of the two main political parties. In some parliamentary democracies, the process of leadership selection, which once took place behind closed doors, now attracts media attention, with contestants for the post of leader conducting a personal campaign for membership support. Increasingly, the key qualities party members look for in a candidate are photogenic looks and an ability to perform in front of the cameras.

Personal Attributes and Voter Choice

Not only are politicians more visible, but with an increasingly nonaligned electorate, the personality, appearance, and overall style of politicians have become an important criteria affecting electoral choice. In this electoral environment, John Corner and Dick Pels have observed that old ideological and partisan allegiances have given way to choices based on style. The decision of who, of the continually visible political office seekers, to vote for is related to an audience's reading of their style. For others, it is not so much a case of the electorate's visual and emotional literacy but the need to decide who of the candidates available is most competent to govern. Although there is much debate about the extent to which choices are shaped by personal attributes and style, there is an emerging consensus that electoral judgments in some mature democracies are increasingly based on personal nonpolicy factors rather than purely programmatic ones. One democracy where the personal characteristics of candidates are argued to sway the electorate is the U.S.; research carried out there has shown that voters are prone to make their choices on the basis of a politician's personality and appearance, rather than his or her policy platform. Outside the candidate-centered political culture of the United States, some research has found that in certain countries' elections, leaders' personal traits have been influential.

Going Personal

It could be argued that as office seekers have become more visible, and personal attributes and style more important to voters, so issues of personality increasingly become central to an election campaign. In turn, campaigns develop into a battle over the competencies and traits of those who seek to govern. Across a range of presidential and parliamentary democracies elections are more and more characterized by two simultaneous and interconnected processes: contestants selling themselves to voters and attacking each other. These processes are almost continuous throughout the campaign, with information repeatedly re-disclosed in a variety of different media arenas. This information can often be highly personal, with political actors' private lives becoming a feature of the campaign communication.

Selling the Self

Office seekers and their advisors spend a great amount of time building an image that will appeal to the electorate. Such a strategy can be seen as part of a wider approach to garner support. Candidates' and party leaders' appearances are carefully constructed from the clothes they wear to their hairstyles. Indeed, the well-groomed and suited candidate has become a standard feature of nearly all electoral contests.

The strategy goes beyond outward looks though. Contestants are eager to establish a personal bond with voters. Their autobiographies are an important element in establishing this link. Autobiographies present voters with an insight into the person behind the image. Presidential candidates and party leaders reveal much about themselves to the electorate through a variety of media outlets. For those campaigning for high office it is important that their autobiographies match public expectations of what a leader should be. Across a range of democracies, certain themes appear in these personal narratives: self-made achiever, overcoming personal adversity, a family person, a person of principle. Party and candidate advertisements and public relations offensives attempt to draw on and amplify these themes. For example, former Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi issued all voters a glossy brochure about himself in the 2006 Italian general election campaign. In the United Kingdom, the Conservative leader, David Cameron, used his own personal video Web log to highlight his family life.

Contestants are also keen to signal what they have in common with the electorate. An area where commonality can be established is through sport or popular culture. Taking part in popular activities or supporting a sports team reinforces the sense that contestants share the same pleasures as voters. In the United Kingdom, Tony Blair reminds the public from time to time that he is a fan of Newcastle United Football Club. In Ireland, it is important for politicians to be seen attending sporting and cultural events and taking part in the activities of those that elected them. At the same time office seekers endeavor to be seen as socially successful and to have a wide coterie of high-achieving friends. Presidential candidates and party leaders seek to exploit relations with celebrities from the worlds of music, sports, film, and television, hoping that some of their appeal will rub off on them.

In addition, contestants and their campaign teams seek to differentiate themselves from their rivals on a range of traits and competencies. A challenger's teams may look to position their candidates as newcomers or outsiders, distancing them from the political establishment. In Mexico, candidate Vicente Fox's team made a virtue of his lack of political experience in the 2000 presidential election campaign, portraying him as untainted by corruption of political establishment. The incumbents' image managers may in turn seek to emphasize their experience, record in office, and their roles as international statesmen, vis-à-vis their rival's inexperience. For example, in Taiwan, President Chen Li-an effectively used such a strategy in the 2000 presidential campaign.

Character Assassination and Media Exposés

Although contestants and their campaign teams choose to "go personal" they are not in control of all the information that circulates about them in the media during a campaign. Character assassination and tabloid exposé are now a quintessential part of many campaigns. Personal attack advertising increasingly dominates races. Personality assassination has reached its apex in U.S. election campaigns, where 30-second advertisements are used to construct a damaging image of a candidate's opponents. U.S. presidential election campaigns tend to be dominated by hard-hitting, often factually inaccurate, attack advertisements. Outside the United States, a host of studies on campaign advertising have reported the presence of negative personal adverts. For example, in the United Kingdom, there have been regular complaints about advertisements personally attacking rival party leaders.

Over the last 30 years, James Stanyer and Dominic Wring observe, there has been a trend toward intrusive political reporting in a large number of democracies. This inclination is perhaps more developed in some democracies than others. If one was to imagine a continuum between two poles, one where privacy intrusion is a common feature of political reporting and the other where it is rare due to legal and other measures, then the United States and the United Kingdom would probably be close to the first extreme with a range of countries such as South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and India not far behind. At the other extreme would sit several continental European countries, notably Germany and France, which have strict privacy laws.

However, there has been some movement along this axis over time. Indeed, in the United States and the United Kingdom intrusion is more widespread than 40 or so years ago. Candidates' and leaders' personal histories provide material for journalistic investigation, and there is increasing revelation about contestants past financial and sexual indiscretions. In the United States, recent presidential campaigns have seen media exposés of candidates' extramarital sex lives. In 1988, front-runner Senator Gary Hart was forced to withdraw from the Democrat primaries, after revelations that he was having an extramarital affair. A similar exposé nearly derailed Bill Clinton's bid for the White House in 1992. In 2004, Democrat presidential candidate John Kerry denied widely circulating rumors that he had an affair with an intern. Compare this to the absence of reporting on President Harding's affairs with Carrie Phillips and Nan Britton, Franklin D. Roosevelt's relationships with Lucy Mercer and Missey LeHand, Dwight D. Eisenhower's romance with Kay Summersby, Kennedy's various affairs, and Lyndon B. Johnson's affair with Helen Gahagan Douglas.

There has been an emergence of a journalistic culture which is hostile toward political elites and keen to expose activities they see as hypocritical. This is often done in the context of the importance of personal issues in voter decision making. Although this trend is less developed in some democracies such as France, as noted, some have observed the beginning of intrusive journalism there. In 2006, the potential candidates for the French presidency, Segolene Royal and Nicolas Sarkozy, found themselves the subjects of intrusive photography in popular tabloid magazines. These and other intrusions have been attributed to the spread of a tabloid journalistic culture and the growth of the Internet. Indeed, with the spread of the Internet there are many Web sites and blogs devoted to political gossip that lie outside direct legislative control. In such an environment, revelations about contestants seeking or holding elected office, however tangential to their abilities, if not printed in the press, are revealed online.

In summation, personal campaigning can be said to be a feature of many democracies, especially in relation to the extent to which leading political actors, rather than parties, have become the visible focus of televised elections. That said, in terms of negative advertisements and journalistic intrusion, it could be argued that the extent of personal campaigning varies quite considerably between democracies. It is this second dimension of personal campaigning, and its spread, that may pose the greatest challenge for democracies though.

James Stanyer

See also Berlusconi, Silvio; Blair, Tony; Bush, George W.; Clinton, William Jefferson; Kennedy, John F.; Negative Advertising; Negative Campaigning; Personalization of Politics; Political Advertising; Putin, Vladimir; Schröder, Gerhard; Spin, Political

Further Readings

Corner, J., & Pels, D. (2003). Introduction: The re-styling of politics. In J. Corner & D. Pels (Eds.), Media and the restyling of politics (pp. 1–18). London: Sage.

King, A. (2002). Do leaders' personalities really matter? In A. King (Ed.), Leaders' personalities and the outcomes of democratic elections. (pp. 1–43). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

McAllister, I. (2007). The personalization of politics. In R. J. Dalton & H. D. Klingemann (Eds.), Oxford handbook of political behavior. New York: Oxford University Press.

Mughan, A. (2000). Media and the presidentialization of parliamentary elections. Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave.

Norris, P. (2002). Campaign communication. In L. LeDuc, R. G. Niemi, & P. Norris (Eds.), Comparing democracies 2: New challenges in the study of elections and voting (pp. 127–147). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Stanyer, J. (2007). Modern political communication: National political communication systems in a fragmented, uncertain and unequal age. Cambridge, UK: Polity.

Stanyer, J., & Wring, D. (2004). Public images and private lives: An introduction. Parliamentary Affairs, 57, 1–8.

Van Zoonen, E., & Holtz-Bacha, C. (2000). Personalisation in Dutch and German politics: The case of the talk show. Javnost—The Public, 7, 45–56.

Wattenberg, M. P. (1991). The rise of candidate-centered politics. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Candidate Films, Biographical

Candidate films are a form of political advertising that candidates use to present their biographies and issues to voters. These films, which usually run about 10 minutes, give campaigns the ability to flesh out who candidates are and what they stand for. Candidate films resemble short documentaries and are usually the longest piece of advertising that a campaign uses to present its candidate and policy positions to voters. This is an important component because the other options that candidates have to get their messages across—such as TV ad spots from campaigns and candidate coverage on TV news—have become ever shorter.

Candidate films tend to focus on personal and professional aspects of the candidate, including the values they learned from their parents, their relationship with their children, their duty to country, and their vision for the future. The biographical and issue-oriented information in candidate films usually revolves around one dominant theme, thereby creating an efficient package for audiences to absorb and interpret. Producers of candidate films often use focus groups and survey data to help make the films more persuasive to voters.

Unlike 30-second TV ad spots, a candidate film is generally not broadcast over and over again on television. Instead, it is targeted to voters via direct mail and is shown at political party conventions and on candidates' Web sites. Select footage from candidate films is often later included in a candidate's 30-second TV ad spots, creating visual and verbal consistency in the campaign's overall message to voters. Candidates for president, governor, and senator have made and distributed these films.

Types of Candidate Films

There are distinct differences among candidate films depending on what type of race it is being used for. At the presidential level, there are films made for the general election and films made for the primary campaign. General election candidate films, often called "presidential campaign films," are broadcast to a national TV audience during the Democratic and Republican national conventions, usually right before the presidential nominee's acceptance speech. This type of candidate film focuses mostly on biography and promoting pleasant images of the presidential nominee.

Candidate films that are used during the primaries, called "primary campaign videos" or "meet the candidate videos," are put on videocassette or DVD and mailed to party faithful and potential donors during the early months of the primary campaign season. Also, the videos typically are shown to small groups of supporters who gather in living rooms at the thousands of house parties that are conducted during the primaries. Journalists also receive the videos in an attempt to spur positive coverage.

Candidate videos at the primary level concentrate far more on specific issues of the day to move potential voters to the polls. The reason for the different approach is that primary candidates deal with voters who are, on average, more involved in the political process and are more interested in complex issue discussion. Also, because primary campaigns are intraparty contests, playing up issue differences helps voters differentiate between a host of candidates who at first might not seem that different from each other. Because candidate videos are usually the first advertising run by a campaign during the primaries, the appeals found within lend insight into how candidates choose to shape the image that they first present to the public.

Candidate films that are used for gubernatorial and senate races tend to be similar in structure to presidential candidate films in that the films combine biographical information during the first half of the film and then move into a discussion of issues.

History of Candidate Films

Today, candidate films are disseminated via almost every medium except film. In addition to being broadcast on television, this form of political advertising can be distributed on videocassette, DVD, or the Internet. However, the first presidential campaign films, which began in 1924 with Calvin Coolidge, ran in movie theaters. Presidential campaigns later switched to buying time to broadcast them on television. The modern era of presidential campaign films began in 1984, with Ronald Reagan's reelection film, A New Beginning. Reagan's 1984 film was the first to be shown directly before the candidate gave his acceptance address at the nominating convention. Because the TV networks generally cover the acceptance speeches, the film's new placement increased the chances of the film reaching millions of TV viewers. The ploy worked. All Democrat and Republican presidential candidates have since followed this strategy.

Candidate films at the primary campaign level began with George H. W. Bush's 1980 presidential race. The 1980s was the first time that creating and disseminating this type of advertising on videocassette became cost-effective and the first time that a majority of U.S. households contained VCRs on which to play the films. In every election year since 1988, a majority of presidential candidates have used candidate videos in their advertising strategy, spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to produce and distribute them. Several candidates, including Bill Clinton in 1992, have found these videos crucial to their nomination victory.

How Voters Interpret Candidate Films

Voters who watch candidate films tend to construct their own meaning from the prepackaged biographical and issue elements contained within the 10-minute ad. Viewers draw on their pre-existing knowledge of how a candidate should look and sound, as well as news coverage of the general political climate, to make their interpretations. Such a process results in viewers accepting, ignoring, or transforming the films' messages.

John Parmelee

See also Political Advertising; United States Information Agency

Further Readings

Morreale, J. (1991). A new beginning: A textual frame analysis of the political campaign film. Albany: State University of New York.

Morreale, J. (1993). The presidential campaign film: A critical history. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Novak, J. (1997). Hope springs eternal: The reinvention of America in Bill Clinton's 1996 campaign biography video. American Behavioral Scientist, 40, 1049–1057.

Parmelee, J. (2002). Presidential primary campaign videocassettes: How candidates in the 2000 U.S. presidential primary elections framed their early campaigns. Political Communication, 19, 317–331.

Parmelee, J. (2003). Meet the candidate videos: Analyzing presidential primary campaign videocassettes. Westport, CT: Praeger.

CANDIDATES AND THEIR IMAGES

Candidates and Their Images: Concepts, Methods and Findings, by Dan Nimmo and Robert Savage, is the seminal work in the specific research area of candidate image. Published in 1976, Nimmo and Savage utilized an expansive approach in their examination that not only produced useful findings in regard to candidate image but also helped direct the course of future research in the subject. Nimmo and Savage made significant contributions such as defining candidate image, providing a conceptual framework for study, and offering methodologies conducive to exploring candidate image.

Nimmo and Savage define an image as "a human construct imposed on an array of perceived attributes projected by an object, event, or person." Interested in the relationship between images and messages, the authors offered a transactional view of candidate images as consisting of voter perceptions based on subjective voter knowledge and candidate messages. Nimmo and Savage concluded that political images "reflect relationships in which leaders not only project selected attributes but must also imagine how followers perceive them; followers not only perceive leaders but also imagine how leaders perceive them."

In Candidates and Their Images, Nimmo and Savage studied a comprehensive range of issues related to the topic. These included candidate image content, in-depth examination of the transactional nature of candidate images, how candidate images change, the relationship between electoral outcome and candidate image and the relationship between voting behavior and candidate image. Besides thorough investigation of previous research on image, the authors employed a variety of methodological techniques in generating original findings. These included Q-sorts, factor analysis, and regression analysis.

Nimmo and Savage were able to draw several important conclusions from their original findings. Included in these is the idea that candidates usually have more than one varying image. They also found that although images can be complex, voters usually assess candidates on only a few traits. Empathy, strength, and integrity were popular traits on which voters made these assessments. The authors were interested in how these image traits might be combined into broader image types and found in their research only a few types (three to five) emerging. Nimmo and Savage found that candidate images can change both during and between campaigns and that images change in relation to whether candidates win or lose elections. In terms of voting, the authors conducted a study of the 1972 presidential election and found that the candidate image aspect of candidate evaluation was the most important factor in explaining voting behavior. Nimmo and Savage also offer up the idea that candidate image can be divided into political and stylistic components, with the former consisting of "leadership, partisanship and issue traits" and with the latter composed of "personality and performance traits." The authors offer an educated guess that personality is more important to voters during a campaign with political qualities being more influential post-election.

Mike Chanslor

See also Image, Political

Further Readings

Nimmo, D., & Savage, R. L. (1976). Candidates and their images: Concepts, methods, and findings. Pacific Palisades, CA: Goodyear.

Canvassing

See Grassroots Campaigning

Cardoso, Fernando Henrique (1931–)

Fernando Henrique Cardoso was the president of Brazil from 1995 to 2003. He was the first president to govern for two consecutive terms. FHC, as he is also known, was trained as a sociologist at the University of São Paulo, where he became a professor in 1953. In the late 1960s, FHC was considered an influential intellectual, interested in analyzing democracy, international development, and social changes. Since the beginning of the 1960s, FHC was a regular collaborator in the main newspapers and magazines in the country. During the 1980s, he maintained a weekly column in the Folha de S. Paulo newspaper, and since 2003, he has written a monthly column in O Globo, O Estado de S. Paulo, and Zero Hora newspapers.

With an intense presence in protests aimed at the development of public schools, the modernization of universities, and the effort to overcome the authoritarian military regime, FHC was persecuted after the military coup of 1964. To escape the persecution, he spent the 1970s and early 1980s teaching, researching, and writing in France and Chile. In 1968, he returned to Brazil and assumed the Political Science chair at the University of São Paulo. In 1969, he is compulsorily retired, having his political rights revoked. In order to stay in Brazil, FHC and other professors founded the Centro Brasileiro de Analise e Planejamento (Brazilian Center of Analysis and Planning), which became an important center for the analysis of Brazilian public policy. FHC was an important participant in a peaceful transition from the military regime to the democracy.

As a supporter of the democratic reform, FHC was elected senator in 1982. In addition, he was a founding member of the Partido da Social Democracia Brasileira—PSDB (Brazilian Social Democratic Party). Before being elected as the president of Brazil, he served as the minister of foreign relations from 1992 to 1993 and as the minister of finance from 1993 to 1994.

In June 1994, as the minister of finance, FHC directed the creation of the Plano Real (Real Plan), a set of measures taken to stabilize the economy. The objective of this plan was to create a strong currency that would help to decrease inflation indices in Brazil. As a result, a new currency was created: the real.

After the creation of the new currency, the opinion polls indicated a growth in FHC's popularity. Due to the positive impact of the real on the population, FHC surpassed his opponent and won the election later that year. FHC's presidential terms were marked by economic stability and growth, economic reforms, privatizations, and educational expansion.

After his terms as the president of Brazil, FHC has dedicated his time to giving presentations and to the Fernando Henrique Cardoso Institute. In 2002, FHC was nominated by the United Nations as the authority with the most remarkable work in human development.

Juliana de Brum Fernandes

Further Readings

Cardoso, F. H. (2006). The accidental president of Brazil: A memoir. New York: Public Affairs.
Cardoso, F. H. (2006). A arte da politica: A historia que viv [The art of politics: History that I lived]. Rio de Janeiro, Brazil: Civilizacao Brasileira.
Goertzel, T. G. (1999). Fernando Henrique Cardoso: Reinventing democracy in Brazil. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.

Carrie Chapman Catt Center for Women and Politics

The Carrie Chapman Catt Center for Women and Politics was founded in 1992 at Iowa State University to interest, educate, and engage citizens in the political process. The center honors Carrie Chapman Catt, a distinguished alumna of Iowa State University and longtime suffragist who led the campaign to ratify the 19th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution giving women the right to vote. Catt also founded the League of Women Voters.

The center offers leadership development, mentoring, and educational opportunities through a freshman learning community, courses on leadership, the Catt Associates student organization, and the Legacy of Heroines scholarship program. It is developing a certificate program on Community Leadership and Public Service. The center fosters scholarship on issues related to women and politics through the annual Carrie Chapman Catt Prize for Research on Women and Politics and the only existing Archive of Women's Political Communication.

Through the Mary Louise Smith Chair in Women and Politics, the center brings prominent women leaders, scholars, and activists to campus. Chairs have included current and former members of Congress (Elizabeth Dole, Carol Moseley Braun, Pat Schroeder, and Nancy Kassebaum Baker); former Gov. Christine Todd Whitman; and journalists Soledad O'Brien, Lynn Sherr, Carole Simpson, and Eleanor Clift. The center also offers campaign schools for women interested in running for public office.

The center's programs blend the resources and scholarship of the academic community with the experiences of practitioners in fields important to the political process.

Dianne G. Bystrom

Further Readings

Archive of Women's Political Communication Web site: http://www.womenspeecharchive.org/

Carrie Chapman Catt Center for Women and Politics Web site: http://www.iastate.edu/~cccatt/

CARTOONS, POLITICAL

Political cartoons are an inherent part of a free society. In any society where freedom of speech and the press is constitutionally guaranteed, the political cartoon occupies a special place. A political cartoon is a visual commentary. Therefore, a political cartoon is primarily an opinion-oriented journalistic medium and can usually be found on the editorial pages. Its subject matter is devoted to a contemporary and newsworthy political issue. However, its readers are required to possess some basic background knowledge about its subject matter. The underlying assumptions must be clear and provided by the media coverage of at least the supporting medium. Otherwise, the audience might have problems decoding the depiction due to the gap in knowledge.

Political cartoons are a regular occurrence in media coverage. They mainly appear within the pages of newspapers. Undoubtedly, political cartoons are shown in other media, too, but it is critical that the media in which the cartoon is published be current and up-to-date or the meaning and context may be lost.

From a more technical point of view a political cartoon is an artistic vehicle, which is characterized by both metaphorical and satirical language and the use of wit techniques. In some ways, it is a journalistic and artistic hybrid. Ideally, the political cartoon is able to point out contexts, problems, and discrepancies of a political situation. In their drawings, political cartoonists judge the political course of life and are only concerned with the cartoonists' points of view, but this does not mean that they are allowed to alter facts. Even here, facts are sacred and only the visual comments are free to exaggerate. To do so, political cartoonists must choose and encode specific information related to an issue. During the visual transformations, many decisions (e.g., statement, symbols, allegories, wit techniques, composition) must be made. While doing so, the cartoonist must keep in mind whether his or her audience will be able to understand the editorial cartoon. When successful, political cartoons can fulfill an important criticizing and controlling function in society. In addition, the political cartoon can encourage the process of opinion formation and decision making. And last but not least, political cartoons are entertaining and recreational.

This 1998 cartoon calls attention to the air pollution caused by vehicle emissions.

Source: Clay Bennett / © 1998 The Christian Science Monitor (www.csmonitor.com). All rights reserved.

Thomas Knieper

See also Humor in Politics

Further Readings

Coupe, W. A. (1969). Observations on a theory of political caricature. Comparative Studies in Society and History, 11, 79–95.

Hess, S., & Northrop, S. (1996). Drawn & quartered: The history of American political cartoons. Montgomery, AL: Elliott & Clark.

Knieper, T. (2002). Die politische karikatur: Eine journalistische darstellungsform und deren produzenten [The political cartoon: A journalistic format and their authors]. Köln, Germany: Herbert von Halem Verlag.

Lamb, C. (2004). Drawn to extremes: The use and abuse of editorial cartoons in the United States. New York: Columbia University Press.

Somers, P. P., Jr. (1998). Editorial cartooning and caricature: A reference guide. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.

Carville, James (1944–)

James Carville is a political consultant and Democratic strategist who came to fame working as the campaign manager for President Bill Clinton's 1992 and 1996 election campaigns. The "Ragin' Cajun," as Carville came to be known, because of his feisty debating style, was born in Carville, Louisiana (named for his grandfather). He received a bachelor's degree and a law degree at Louisiana State University. His career as a campaign manager did not start well, as his first three candidates lost the elections that he managed.

Carville's work as a campaign manager was unsuccessful until Robert Casey's victory in the 1986 Pennsylvania gubernatorial race. Subsequent campaigns for Frank Lautenberg's Senate campaign in 1987 and Zell Miller's Georgia gubernatorial campaign in 1990 also proved successful. As a result, Carville was beginning to make a name for himself in the Democratic party. But the defining moment in his career was his management of Harris Wofford's come-from-behind victory for U.S. Senate in Pennsylvania in 1991 over well-known former governor and U.S. Attorney General Richard Thornburgh. Carville led Wofford's campaign from a 40-point deficit to an upset landslide win.

After the successful 1992 presidential campaign with Clinton, Carville was awarded "Campaign Manager of the Year" from the American Association of Political Consultants. It was during the 1992 campaign that he met his wife, Mary Matalin, who was serving as President George H. W. Bush's campaign manager. They coauthored a book about the 1992 campaign titled All's Fair: Love, War, and Running for President. Matalin and Carville were married in 1993, and they have two daughters.

More recently, Carville served as a host of CNN's "Crossfire" from April 2002 to June 2005. He also shifted his attention from national political campaigns to international political campaigns. His most notable international campaign was the successful 1999 election of Ehud Barak as prime minister of Israel. His consulting firm no longer works on domestic political campaigns.

In 2003, Carville and his wife served as consulting producers and cast members of the HBO series K Street, which portrayed current events in a pseudo-reality framework (the dialogue was largely ad-libbed). Carville also appeared in the Academy Award nominated documentary The War Room.

His book credits include: Buck Up, Suck Up ... and Come Back When You Foul Up with Paul Begala; We're Right, They're Wrong: A Handbook for Spirited Progressives; The Horse He Rode In On: The People vs. Ken Starr; and Stickin—The Case for Loyalty.

Kristin K. Froemling

See also Matalin, Mary

Castro, Fidel (1926/1927–)

Fidel Castro Ruz may be the most famous Latin American of the past century, though he has ruled only a Caribbean island about the size and shape of the state of Tennessee in the United States. He became Cuba's undisputed commander-in-chief in January 1959 by overthrowing his military predecessor in a 2-year guerrilla war. By mid-2006, when major surgery forced him to temporarily step down in favor of his brother, Raúl Castro Ruz (1931–), he had held power longer than any other current leader in the world.

Even before 1959, Castro's declarations and activities attracted world attention, and for many he soon became what the BBC in 2006 called a "world icon." Many others in the Miami exile community of more than one million, and others elsewhere, saw him as the embodiment of Satan. His international stature was based on his claims to be building socialism in Cuba and his constant verbal and often indirect military attacks on the United States and imperialism in general. (Castro supported "Marxist imperialism," however, such as Che Guevara's 1966–1967 war in Bolivia and the 1968 Soviet-bloc invasion of Czechoslovakia, the latter to the profound dismay of many leftists worldwide.) Among the manifestations of his internationalism were decades of active involvement in the so-called Nonaligned Movement (NAM). In September 2006 Cuba hosted the NAM's 14th summit, and Cuba was made chairman for the next 3 years.

Although some have argued that Washington's hostility in 1959 pushed Castro into the Soviet bloc, earlier actions and comments had signaled his long-term intentions. Most pointedly, a 1958 letter (now displayed on the top floor of the Museum of the Revolution in Havana) to his closest comrade, Celia Sanchez, declared that his "true destiny" would be a prolonged war against the United States. In order to do this he proclaimed himself a Marxist-Leninist, Cuban communist and forged an alliance with the Soviet bloc, which eagerly sought its first ally in the Western Hemisphere. This alliance provided Cuba with both a military shield against the United States and a multibillion dollar annual subsidy amounting to more than a quarter of the annual GDP's budget. In exchange, and out of conviction, Castro supported many Soviet-initiated international policies. During his first 2 decades in particular, he trained thousands of guerrillas from Latin American and other areas, proclaiming in 1962 that "the duty of every revolutionary is to make revolution." Between the mid-1970s and late 1980s he sent hundreds of thousands of Cuban troops to help allies in Africa, particularly in Angola and Ethiopia.

Although Castro's main international alliance during the cold war was with the Soviet bloc, and for decades with sometimes anti-Soviet "Fidelista" guerrillas, his fundamental beliefs (like Guevara's) were more in line with those of China's Mao Zedong. During the 1950s Castro had promised to restore Cuba's progressive 1940 constitution and hold elections, but he did not relinquish any power until 2006 and then only to his brother and several colleagues. Like Mao, and contrary to Marx, Castro was convinced that history is driven more by personal will than by economic forces. This led him to try to cultivate a "new socialist man" who was motivated by moral (not material) incentives and a selfless devotion to socialist egalitarianism. His most militant campaigns toward this egalitarianism were the Revolutionary Offensive (1966 to 1970), which stressed revolution supported socialism, not private venders and overlapped Mao's much more brutal Cultural Revolution (1966 to 1976), and the Rectification Program launched in 1986. In the 1990s, after the collapse of the Soviet bloc, Cuba entered a deep economic crisis caused by Castro's own economic policies and the disappearance of bloc subsidies and trade. As during earlier economic crises, Castro briefly permitted some small private businesses, which he eliminated again when a degree of economic stability and growth were restored in the new millennium.

Castro's supporters note correctly that Cuba became absolutely independent of the once-dominant United States, though the island then became dependent on aid from the Soviet bloc and, currently, Venezuela. His most admired policies have been health and education programs, their successes being built on what were already among the best (if unevenly available) health and education systems in Latin America. He also denied Cubans the freedom to read or act on ideas that differed from his own. From 1959 on, Castro repressed anyone he thought might threaten his absolute power, however insignificant or prominent the person might be, in the name of the people. Castro's denial of political and economic freedoms contributed to economic stagnation that brought rationing and dependence of up to half the population on remittances from exiles (whom Castro calls "worms") and increasing disparities among Cubans on the island. Thousands have died at sea seeking exile.

Castro's pursuit of his destiny in the context of the cold war guaranteed constant tension with the United States and some other governments. His confiscations of U.S. properties and Soviet alignment were the main factors leading to Washington's breaking diplomatic relations in 1961, as well as imposing a trade embargo and half-heartedly supporting the abortive Bay of Pigs invasion by Cuban exiles. In 1962, the Soviet Union tried to place ICBMs in Cuba and a global nuclear confrontation was averted only when a U.S.-Soviet agreement was reached, without consulting an infuriated Castro. U.S.-Cuban tensions surged and fell thereafter, periodically peaking, as when Castro allowed 125,000 Cubans to flee to Florida from the port of Mariel (1980) and when Soviet-Cuban MiGs shot down two unarmed U.S. Cessnas (1996). Castro's relations with his Soviet-bloc patrons began deteriorating even before the bloc collapsed because Castro rejected their emerging domestic and international reforms. The end of the cold war did not bring a lifting of the embargo. In fact, the 1996 Helms-Burton Law, coupled with the pressure of Miami's Cuban American population, have resulted in tightening of the embargo several times.

By 2007 the prospects for Fidel's domestic revolution were in doubt as Raúl seemed to favor more market-oriented economic policies. Meanwhile, Castro's leadership of resurgent Latin American anti-Americanism was passed willingly to Venezuela's dynamic new president, Hugo Chávez.

William Ratliff

See also Mao Zedong

Further Readings

Coltman, L. (2003). The real Fidel Castro. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Geyer, G. A. (2001). Guerrilla prince. Kansas City, MO: Andrews McMeel.

Quirk, R. E. (1993). Fidel Castro. New York: Norton.

Skierka, V. (2000). Fidel Castro. Malden, MA: Polity Press.

Thomas, H. (1977). The Cuban revolution. New York: Harper Torchbooks.

Celebrities in Politics

Although their fame is achieved outside of the political realm, celebrities (those who derive their fame from entertainment media, such as television, film, music, and sports) are increasingly becoming involved in various aspects of the political process. They commonly associate with elected officials, run for elected office, or attempt to influence policy and elections. This transition into politics has been eased by the emergence of radio and television, a democratization of fame, and structural changes in the news media.

Beginning in 1918 when Woodrow Wilson entertained silent movie stars, politicians have reaped the benefits of associating with celebrities. Celebrities attract media attention and provide visibility to candidates and causes. They also have the potential to increase and improve fundraising efforts as well as draw in other participants and potential supporters. Politicians also benefit simply by uniting with a glamorous name. Presidents often invite winning sports teams to the White House, for example, hoping that people will also deem them winners.

Celebrities also become involved in politics by running for elected office. Aided by their fame, celebrities have run for office since the 1940s. The most prominent example, however, is the actor Ronald Reagan, who twice was elected president. A more recent example occurred in 2003 when former movie star Arnold Schwarzenegger was elected governor of California.

More commonly, celebrities endorse candidates for office or lobby on behalf of specific causes. The first significant instance was during the 1920 election when entertainers rallied to support Warren Harding, and the first formal endorsement occurred in 1940 when actors gathered to form the Hollywood for Roosevelt Committee. This type of involvement became prominent in the late 1960s when many celebrities began to feel it would be irresponsible not to wield their celebrity status for political purposes. A number of celebrities, most notably Jane Fonda, became vocal antiwar activists. Today, this type of celebrity involvement in politics has become commonplace. Charlton Heston, for example, has become almost synonymous with the gun lobby and Barbra Streisand is well known for her support of liberal causes and candidates.

Although historically there has always been a connection between Hollywood and Washington, D.C., celebrity involvement in politics has been increasing for a number of reasons. The emergence of radio and television allows for intimate communication with the general public, leading to a democratization of fame. Due to the proliferation of the mass media, fame is not restricted to royalty; ordinary people can now achieve prominence. Structural changes in the news media have also eased celebrities' entrance into politics. Celebrity involvement in politics fits the needs of a news media focused on human interest stories, not detailed and substantive policy reports. As long as the public enjoys hearing news and gossip about celebrities, journalists will continue to cover celebrity involvement in politics.

Kelli E. Lammie

Further Readings

Lammie, K. E. (2007). The (not-so) "powerless elite": Celebrity endorsements of political candidates. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.

West, D. M., & Orman, J. (2003). Celebrity politics. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall.

Censorship, Political

Political censorship is as old a social phenomenon as politics itself. It normally refers to the mechanism, process, or system employed to restrict people's expression of ideas deemed subversive, seditious, unorthodox, or politically incorrect. To a different degree and through a variety of measures, all political entities in human history used some type of political censorship to reinforce their ruling ideology, governing legitimacy, and social order. The objectionable materials were either deleted by the censors, banned from publication, or totally destroyed, and the violators were subject to different types of punishment, ranging from fines, prosecutions, tortures, jail terms, or even execution. The censoring process can be carried out by a government-appointed agency, by the editors and managers of a medium, or by the authors themselves. Political censorship targets all publication forms and communication channels, including but not limited to books, newspapers, radio programs, television programs, theatres, films, cartoons, advertisements, speeches, photographs, and various information on the Internet. The practice of political censorship intervenes in and infringes upon the freedom of press and the freedom of expression. Although many countries in the present world still rely on political censorship to regulate public opinion, its effect has been questioned and its rationale has been criticized.

The History of Political Censorship

The practice of political censorship can be traced back to the early ages of human civilization. In ancient Athens, the great Greek philosopher Socrates, who is widely regarded as the father of political philosophy, was found guilty of impiety and of corrupting Athenian youth through his teaching of unorthodox political ideas. To quell his voice, the Athenian authority sentenced him to death by drinking a cup of poison in 399 B.C. Half a world away, China's first emperor, Shi Huang Di, defeated six rival states and established China's first unified empire, the Qin Dynasty in 221 B.C. To reinforce the authority of the central government, he ordered that all history and literary works, excluding books about agriculture, divination, and medicine, be burned. The next year, more than 400 dissenting scholars were buried alive for their treasonable words.

The Middle Ages of Western Europe had been suffocated by the widespread political censorship in the disguise of religious oppressions and persecutions. The printing technology developed in the 15th century in Western Europe triggered the mass production of printed books. In the meantime, the censorship of the printed publications also intensified. Most of the well-known writers, thinkers, and philosophers living in the Enlightenment and Industrialization periods, such as John Milton, Montesquieu, Rousseau, Voltaire, Immanuel Kant, Friedrich Schiller, Karl Marx, etc. were the victims of political censorship. For example, King Charles II of Great Britain issued a Proclamation in 1660, ordering the burning of John Milton's works for treasonable passages against authorities. In France, the books written by Voltaire, the famous Enlightenment writer and philosopher, were burned in public. Rousseau's book Social Contract was banned as being subversive and impious. In sum, it is estimated that between 1600 and 1756, about 900 French authors, printers, and booksellers, including Voltaire and Diderot, the chief editor of the famed Encyclopedie, were jailed in the Bastille for their treasonable works.

The modern age of human history also witnessed extensive and institutionalized political censorship. Two World Wars and the enduring cold war in the 20th century had been fought not only on the battlefield but also in people's minds and in the political arena. In May 1933, a wave of book-burning movements engulfed Nazi Germany. The propaganda minister

Joseph Goebbels declared that the German nation needed to clean itself internally and externally by destroying those degenerate, unpatriotic, treasonable books written by Communists and Jewish authors. From the late 1940s to mid-1950s, under the perceived threat of Communist subversion, U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy initiated a series of investigations on the loyalty of U.S. government officials, scholars, and artists. During this time, a lot of books were taken off the shelves, hundreds of people were sent to prison, and numerous authors, film actors, directors, and screenwriters were labeled "un-American" because of their supposedly procommunist beliefs or activities. At the same time, the Soviet Union and China implemented explicit and implicit measures to systematically suppress opposing opinions on the media and to purge those political dissidents. For example, in the Soviet Union, multiple layers of political censorship organs were institutionalized to monitor and examine various media and publications. In China, during the anti-Rightist campaign in 1957, more than half a million intellectuals were sent into concentration camps where hundreds of them died, because of their so-called anticommunism and antirevolutionary speeches, articles, or thoughts.

The end of the cold war did not end the practice of political censorship. Moreover, the advent of the Internet and online technology expanded the practice of political censorship onto the nascent cyber sphere.

The Purposes of Political Censorship

Most of the censoring practices were carried out in the name of reinforcing government legitimacy, maintaining social order, or protecting national security.

For those nondemocratic governments, political censorship has been widely used to suppress the publication of opposing political ideologies, or any information that might hurt the legitimacy of the authorities. For example, in Nazi Germany, books written by Jack London, Thomas Mann, Karl Marx, Sigmund Freud were labeled as degenerate, treasonable, and un-German. Huge piles of these works, normally covered with Communist flags, were burned in public. During the cold war, news stories or literatures that were considered critical of the socialist system were routinely censored by the Soviet Union government. In some incidents, a publicly used photograph was altered to remove people who had been purged in the political movement. After the Tiananmen Square incident of 1989, the Chinese government forbade any public discussions or media coverage about this event. Meanwhile, systematic measures have been implemented in China's traditional and online media to censor materials on issues of democracy, human rights, Tibet independence, and foreign policy.

To maintain a peaceful social order and racial harmony, many governments explicitly prohibited the publication and dissemination of subversive messages and hate speeches, especially through the mass media. For example, many European countries today outlaw Holocaust denial as a form of hate speech. In France, specific laws were passed to restrict the open expression of anti-Semitism and ethnic bias in public. Since 1999, China banned any publicity by the religious group Falun Gong, and denounced it as an evil cult that spread rumors and harmful information. The government of Singapore has imposed tight restrictions on political contents in the mass media. It claimed that the racial and religious conflicts in the past justified these censorship measures.

In time of war, many governments also relied on political censorship to filter out information that might hurt national security, assist an enemy, or simply cause embarrassment. For example, it is a routine procedure for military authorities to monitor, control, or even manipulate media's coverage of warfare. The censorship was so common and extensive that it led to the notion that the first casualty of war is truth. A widely covered case of the wartime political censorship is the so-called Pentagon papers. In 1971, the U.S. government asked the Supreme Court to restrain two newspapers, The New York Times and The Washington Post, from publishing a classified study on the U.S. government's decision-making process during the Vietnam War. The confrontation led to clamorous controversy and major legal battles, which the newspapers eventually won. A recent example of military restriction on information involved the photographing or filming of dead U.S. soldiers and their caskets carried back from the Iraq war.

The Measures of Political Censorship

Political censorship can be enforced through government licensing, prior censorship, and postpublication censorship.

In the past, governments in Western Europe required newspapers, publishers, broadcasting networks, booksellers, and theater directors to apply for authorization to operate. The licensing requirement was often supplemented by a mandatory deposit of money as security. This procedure not only prohibited political dissidents from reaching the general public via the mass media, but also reduced their ability to use the media as any kind of outlet for their complaints. Today, many governments continue to use licensing as a tool, though with some modifications, to control the operation of mass media. For example, the Chinese government recently granted the online search engine Google.com an operation license in China, only after the company agreed to comply with the government's Internet censorship regulations. Also, it was disclosed that the Chinese government kept a blacklist of foreign correspondents who had been critical of China and banned them from getting a visa to China. In August 2006, the Singapore government required that all foreign media operating on its land have a legal representative in the country and pay a deposit of about 125,000 U.S. dollars. This policy imposed pressure on those foreign publications that had been critical of the Singapore government.

Governments in different times of history also used the method of prior censorship. Prior to the publication of a book, magazine, or newspaper, or prior to the release of a movie or performance of a play, the government-appointed censors inspected the content, and determined if it was appropriate for the general public. For example, in 1820, authorities in Germany imposed prior censorship on all periodicals and books of fewer than 320 pages. In the Soviet Union, and former communist countries in Eastern Europe, all movies, books, newspapers, and magazines had to be previewed by the designated censoring department within the government. However, prior censorship has its weaknesses. For example, the shifting political reality and constantly changing press regulations made the criteria of censorship highly unpredictable and often arbitrary. Normally, there were no specific guidelines for censors to follow; most decisions were made by individual censors on a case-by-case basis, which often led to the abusing of power and overreacting. Moreover, prior censorship required a lot of time and people to enforce it. In the Soviet Union, every large publishing house, major newspaper, and broadcasting studio had government appointed censors to review and control information before it was disseminated. The main organ for official censorship employed over 70,000 censors to handle this state-imposed censorship.

Most authorities relied on the postpublication censorship to control the objectionable information that was already in the public domain. In many cases, a book, an article, or a movie, was found subversive, unorthodox, or harmful by the authorities only after it had been released or published. The authorities might resort to the postpublication censorship to withdraw the documents, destroy the copies, prohibit its publication, block people's access to the materials, and punish the violators. The postpublication censorship is an old and widely used political censorship method. In fact, it is not an exaggeration to say that most of the classic works on politics and philosophy in human history have been banned, denounced, or burned by authorities during certain periods. The authors or publishers who offended the authorities might lose their jobs, their credibility, their citizenship, or even their lives. For example, between 1958 and 1968, Russian novelist Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn secretly finished the writing of a monumental first-hand narrative, The Gulag Archipelago, in which he documented in great and shocking detail the Soviet Union's prison camp system. Because his previous works were banned by the government, Solzhenitsyn could not and dared not find a publisher within his own country. The manuscript of this three-volume book was microfilmed, smuggled out of the Soviet Union, and published in the West in 1973. Solzhenitsyn was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature for his writings. However, he was deported from the Soviet Union and stripped of his Soviet citizenship for treason. The Russian version of his work was not officially published until 16 years later.

Since the 1990s, the spread of Internet technology has given rise to a new form of postpublication political censorship, in which the authorities simply block people's access to the online information deemed s editious or harmful. The decentralized and instantaneous nature of Internet and online technology led some people to believe that the cyber sphere may pose an insurmountable threat to political censorship. However, the authorities can counter the challenges posed by the Internet through a variety of censorship measures, including restricting Internet access, filtering content, monitoring online behaviors, prohibiting Internet use entirely, and punishing those violators. For example, China claimed that it has recruited more than 30,000 so-called Internet police to monitor its fast-growing cyber sphere. It has established a firewall that prevents Internet users from accessing numerous Web sites that are run overseas by political dissidents, followers of banned religions, and exiled ethnic groups. In online chat rooms, the Web masters normally use keyword search software to filter out messages considered "subversive" or "harmful to state's security."

It should be noted that many political censorship practices were conducted by the authors or media editors themselves. Authors and publishers might have voluntarily removed materials from their publications or refrained from expressing certain views for fear of government punishment or public pressure. In authoritarian countries, authors and editors normally avoid direct criticism of the government in their publications. In democratic countries, authors and editors use self-censorship to avoid socially undesirable or politically incorrect expressions or thoughts. For example, on September 30, 2005, a Danish newspaper published twelve editorial cartoons, most of which depicted the Islamic Prophet Muhammad. This incident sparked violent demonstrations throughout Muslim countries, where people saw these portraits as blasphemy to the Muslim faith. While covering this controversy, major American print media chose not to reprint the cartoons. In this case, the editors self-censored the materials deemed offensive or socially undesirable.

The Results of Political Censorship

Political censorship contradicts the freedom of the press and the freedom of expression. German poet and journalist Heinrich Heine, whose works were banned in his native land in the 1830s and 1930s, once wrote that where men burn books, they will burn people in the end. In general, undemocratic regimes have been more inclined to enforce strict political censorship to repress unorthodox and rebellious ideas. However, as society becomes more open and modern, and as communication technology becomes more advanced and accessible, the restriction of political expressions not only discredits the government that exercises this policy but also magnifies the influence and dissemination of the censored materials. Several nongovernment organizations, such as Reporters Without Borders and Freedom House, have been actively fighting against all kinds of political censorship in the world.

Xu Wu

See also Hate Speech; Pentagon Papers, The; Political Correctness

Further Readings

Bosmajian, H. (2006). Burning books. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.

Chase, M. S., & Mulvenon, J. C. (2002). You've got dissent! Chinese dissent use of the Internet and Beijing's counter-strategies. Washington, DC: Rand Corporation.

Goldstein, R. J. (Ed.). (2000). The war for the public mind: Political censorship in nineteenth-century Europe. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Goldstein, R. J. (2001). Political censorship. Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn.

Haight, A. L., & Grannis, C. B. (1978). Banned books: 387 B.C. to 1978 A.D. New York: R. R. Bowker.

Knightley, P. (1975). The first casualty. New York: Harvest.

Center for the Study of the American Electorate

The Center for the Study of the American Electorate, now affiliated with American University and its Center for Democracy and Election Management, has been for the past 31 years (for 30 years as an independent nonprofit) the principal source for data on voter registration and turnout in the United States. Over those 31 years, it has, each biennium, issued reports on registration and voting in primary and general elections for all elections for which there is a valid denominator of voting population for analyses. The center's analyses of election related matters have appeared in every major publication and broadcast media in the nation.

The center has also conducted discrete studies on a variety of issues, among them: the efficacy of changes in registration and voting laws in enhancing voter turnout; the impact of televised political advertising on campaign cost and citizen attitudes; campaign finance, particularly with respect to the impact of limits on accountability, systemic flexibility and creating a level political playing field; on the uses and abuses of exit polls in projecting winners; on media coverage of politics. It has commissioned polls on campaign finance, election-night projections, and the overall question of citizen participation in politics. It has commissioned studies on such issues as how other nations address the issue of televised political advertising, the efficacy of voluntary approaches to dealing with the deleterious effects of such advertising, the content of that advertising, and both national and international literature on citizen disengagement from political life. The center has held conferences and testified before Congress on numerous occasions. Its works are often used by policymakers, political practitioners and the academic community. It was instrumental in the passage of the National Voter Registration Act (the so-called motor voter registration bill). It is currently working on a database of turnout for president, state governors, U.S. Senate and aggregate U.S. House of Representatives in primaries (where relevant) and general elections based on citizen-eligible turnout as of the election date each year from 1860 to the present, and turnout prior to that based on the best available data.

The initial and present motivation for the center's existence is a concern about what has been a continuing disengagement of citizens from political involvement in general and voting in particular. With the exception of certain elections driven by fear of economic conditions (1982 and 1992), hostility toward a particular president (1994), or the polarization of the nation (2004 to 2006), turnout has been declining since it reached its apex in 1960. With the exception of people over the age of 65 (and particularly people over the age of 75 as modern medicine has made their participation possible), turnout has been declining among every age with every new generation participating less than previous generations. And with the exception of the South (due to the Voting Rights Act, the enfranchisement of African Americans and the resultant two-party competition), voting has been declining in every region. Voter participation has declined by more than 20% nationally since 1960, more than 25% outside the South. The young (aged 18–24) vote at about a 30% rate in presidential elections and a 15% rate in midterm elections. The United States now stands 139th of 172 democracies in the world in its rate of voter participation.

What the center has learned in its 31 years of study is that the decline in participation is not a matter of registration and voting procedure—the nation has been liberalizing those procedures for most of the last 40 decades, and participation has declined. This also means that there are no procedural quick fixes to citizen disengagement, and many of those which have been proposed or tried—early voting, no excuse absentee voting, mail voting or Election Day holidays—do not enhance participation and carry with them serious downside risks. The problem is not a matter of demography because three of the four demographic indicators of higher participation—education (more than twice as many attend and graduate college now than in 1960), age (our population has been aging since 1969), and mobility (our mobility rates are lower than in the 1960s)—all should have produced higher turnout. Nor is it a matter of competition, because the elections which draw the highest turnout are those for president, governor, and U.S. Senate, the latter two of which had been decided, until the Voting Rights Act, by a one-party whites-only Democratic primary in the South.

What is incandescently clear is that the decline in citizen engagement in politics is due to declining motivation, for which many causes could be ascribed, including, but not limited to: the physical and media fragmentation of American society; a decline in public trust of America's leaders; diminished quality in education and diminished quantity and quality in civic education; polarization and gridlock in public policy; the execrable conduct of campaigns; the weakening of society's integrating institutions; and dominant values that enhance self-seeking and consumer choice at the expense of community and civic engagement values. The continuing work of the center, beyond its staple of studies, is to attempt to identify those problems that most affect civic engagement and to explore methods of addressing them.

Curtis Gans

See also Political Disaffection; Political Engagement; Political Involvement; Youth Voting

Further Readings

Center for the Study of the American Electorate Web site: http://spa.american.edu/ccps/pages.php?ID=23

Center for the Study of the American Electorate. (2005). Turnout exceeds optimistic predictions: More than 122 million vote. Retrieved April 2, 2007, from http://spa.american.edu/ccps/files/File/csae/csae011405.pdf/

Chaffee, Steven H. (1935–2001)

Steven H. Chaffee received his Ph.D. from Stanford University where he studied communication under mass communication icon Wilbur Schramm. His particular expertise was in political communication theory, especially in regard to news.

Chaffee was on the faculty of the School of Journalism and Mass Communication at the University of Wisconsin-Madison from 1965 until 1981. In 1982 he joined the faculty at Stanford University where he remained until retiring from Stanford in 1999 to become the first holder of the Arthur N. Rupe Chair in Social Effects of Mass Communication at the University of California, Santa Barbara.

A prolific writer and scholar, Chaffee published 13 books and more than 100 journal articles and book chapters. In 1975 he edited Political Communication: Issues and Strategies for Research, an early resource for students and scholars of the developing field of political communication. Among his best-known works was the graduate text, Handbook of Communication Science which he coedited with Charles Berger. Chaffee also served for several years as the editor of the journal, Communication Research.

A recognized leader in the communication discipline, Chaffee served as president of the International Communication Association (ICA). He also spearheaded the development of research for the Kids Voting project, an effort to encourage children to become involved in elections. Part of his interest in these efforts derived from findings that the involvement of children made their parents more likely to vote.

In addition to being named an ICA fellow, Chaffee received the B. Aubrey Fisher Award for service to students in 1992 and the Paul Deutchmann award for research excellence from the Association for Education in Journalism and Mass Communication in 1999. In 2001 the American Political Science Association awarded him the Murray J. Edelman Career Achievement Award.

Lynda Lee Kaid

Further Readings

Berger, C. R., & Chaffee, S. H. (Eds.). (1987). The handbook of communication science. Newbury Park, CA: Sage.

Chaffee, S. H. (Ed.). (1975). Political communication: Issues and strategies for research. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Chaffee, S. H. (1991). Communication concepts. Newbury Park, CA: Sage.

Chappaquiddick

See Kennedy, Edward (Ted)

Chávez, César

See Minorities, Role in Politics

Chávez, Hugo (1954–)

Hugo Chávez Frías, born in 1954 in the town of Sabaneta (Andean State of Barinas) to two schoolteachers of mestizo descent, has been president of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela since 1999. Before assuming the Venezuelan presidency Chávez was trained as a military officer at the Venezuelan Academy of Military Science. He was also the founding member and leader of the nationalist Revolutionary Bolivarian Movement (1983) that criticized the corruption of the Venezuelan elite, the two-party system (conservative COPEI and social democratic Acción Democrática, AD), the government, and parliament. In 1992, Lieutenant Colonel Chávez participated in a failed coup d'état against the corrupt AD President Carlos Andrés Pérez (1989–1993). After being in jail for almost 2 years, he became the leader of the Fifth Republic Movement that went on to win the presidential election of 1998.

Chávez can be characterized as a politically motivated military man who operates outside the traditional Venezuelan establishment. As president, he claimed to promote the Bolivarian Revolution in Venezuela. The main points of Chavéz's Bolivarianism are national sovereignty (because of United States aggression), the people's political participation through plebiscites and referendums (socialismo democrático), economic independence in opposition to business domination, moral obligations of all politicians (they must be servants of the people), and redistribution of petroleum benefits (according to principles of social justice). Chávez's major success was the new constitution in 1999 that addresses important elements of Bolivarianism and gives the president extensive power. It should be mentioned that private property rights have not been eliminated so far. However, when Chávez was inaugurated for a new term in January 2007, he announced the nationalization of CANTV, Venezuela's largest telephone company. This enterprise is controlled by Verizon. Moreover, the production and distribution of electricity will be state owned. Since the 2000 election, chavistas control the national parliament and most governments of the key states. They control the petroleum industry.

Chávez not only has a capacity for strategic thinking and a talent for organizing but also has remarkable rhetorical skills. These abilities turned him into a leader during a time of social unrest, and he instigated an anticorruption movement with much popular support in the 1990s. He won the elections in 1999 with an antioligarchy and anticorruption campaign, claiming to be the real leader and representative of the poor. Chávez talks like the pueblo, he dresses like the pueblo, and he behaves like the pueblo. When he wears a uniform he tries to show efficiency and well-organized management capacity, qualities that real political leadership require to manage crises. He makes excessive use of the national flag and the national colors wherever he appears in public, and the untouchable Libertador Simón Bolívar is omnipresent. Chávez tries to emphasize his personal warmth by giving the impression that his government supports excellent welfare programs to assist needy persons.

Chávez and chavistas are opposed by the commercial press such as the mainstream newspaper El Universal and the television channels Venevisión, Globovisión, Televen, and Radio Caracas Televisión. He and his followers are constantly accused of violating the freedom of speech. That means that the political opposition still has the power to influence public opinion by some mainstream mass media. But Chávez continues to attempt to intimidate the press—for instance, he recently announced that the license of Radio Caracas Televisión, the oldest television channel of Venezuela, would not be renewed. He accused the company of having backed an attempted coup against him in 2002. In response, Chávez founded his own Bolivarian Circles to promote Bolivarian ideology in the barrios (districts) and cuadras (blocks). Moreover, the president of Venezuela relies on his own trade union, Unión Nacional de Trabajadores (National Union of Workers) and the Army.

Chávez makes innumerable addresses to the nation on television, and he has had his own television talk show Aló Presidente on the state-owned Venezolana de Televisión each Sunday since 1999. In Aló Presidente Chávez sings patriotic songs (sometimes with his close friend Fidel Castro), addresses topics of the day, and makes important decisions. He gives the show spontaneity by answering phone calls from common people and promising effective and quick help for their personal problems. Chávez's language includes aspects of leftist and nationalist rhetoric. Moreover, he addresses elements of Latin American culture such as collectivism, masculinity, and the Christian faith. The polarization of Venezuelan public opinion encourages the use of radical populist language without precise content. International mass media perception is diverse: Some consider him a new Libertador for Latin America, others perceive him as a political clown who likes to provoke U.S. hegemony, and still others think that he is a dangerous dictator close to Bush's "axis of evil." Yet Chávez has survived impeachment (2000), an attempted coup d'état (2002), two general strikes (2002, 2003), one referendum to remove him from office (2004), and free presidential elections (2006).

Thomas Fischer

Further Readings

Boeckh, A., & Sevilla, R. (Eds.). (2005). Venezuela—die Bolivarianische republik [Venezuela—the Bolivarian republic]. Bad Honnef, Germany: Horlemann.

Ellner, S., & Hellinger, D. (2004). Venezuelan politics in the Chávez era: Class, polarization, and conflict. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.

Gott, R. (2005). Hugo Chávez and the Bolivarian revolution. London: Verso.

Chechen Conflict, Russian

See Russia, Democratization and Media

Checkers Speech

Republican Senator Richard M. Nixon's Checkers Speech, Tuesday, September 23, 1952, was one of the most problematical addresses ever delivered. The televised speech, watched by 55 million people, demonstrated the power of television to mediate political communication. Nixon was accused of maintaining an $18,000 slush fund from contributors who wanted political favors. As Republicans were running up against corruption in the Truman administration, Nixon, the party's vice-presidential candidate, felt he had to give a speech to defend the fund and to clear his name.

Nixon's speech had two sections. The first part addressed questions that he framed to his benefit, such as why the fund was necessary and whether or not he feathered his own nest. The speech takes its name from Nixon's mention of his dog Checkers as the only gift he received. Relying on the emotional attachment of his young daughters to the dog, he bluntly told the audience that he would keep Checkers. The only evidence that he offered was an audit of his finances. He never substantiated his claim that he had not given political favors to his contributors.

The second part of the speech was an aggressive assault on Democrats. He attacked Illinois Governor Adlai Stevenson, the Democratic presidential candidate, for being rich and for having a slush fund. Nixon assailed John Sparkman, the vice-presidential candidate, for having Sparkman's wife on the government payroll. Nixon used tu quoque, a technique that means "and you, too," as he demonstrated his opponents were worse than he was.

For President Harry Truman, Nixon used guilt by association to malign Stevenson and Sparkman. Nixon linked them with Truman's unpopular Korean War and with Truman's alleged softness on communism. Nixon averred that he and Eisenhower would clean up the Democratic mess in Washington.

Nixon concluded his address by appealing to the audience. He asked listeners to telegraph or write the Republican National Committee regarding whether he should stay on the ticket or resign. About 2 million telegrams and 3 million letters supported Nixon, and $75,000 in gifts covered the cost of the telecast.

Nixon's delivery was impressive. Without a teleprompter and relying minimally on notes, he established direct eye contact with the camera, hence with his listeners. When he attacked the Democrats, he arose from the desk, went in front of the camera, and used clenched-fist hand gestures to reinforce his language.

Nixon attended to the speech's word choice. He used personal pronouns to gain identification with his audience; he chose homey language, such as "folks," to speak to ordinary Americans; and he sprinkled verbal fillers, such as "now" and "well," to communicate down-to-earth talk.

Republican media supported Nixon's defense of his fund, but Democratic papers were not thoroughly persuaded. The best epilogue is left to critics who observed that Nixon did not deal with the appropriateness or propriety of maintaining the fund in the first place.

Halford Ryan

See also Nixon, Richard M.

Further Readings

McGuckin, H. E., Jr. (1968). A values analysis of Richard Nixon's 1952 campaign-fund speech. Southern Speech Communication Journal, 33, 259–69.

Nixon, R. M. (1968). Six crises. New York: Pyramid Books.

Ryan, H. R. (1988). Senator Richard M. Nixon's apology for "The Fund." In H. Ryan (Ed.), Oratorical encounters (pp. 99–120). Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.

China, Media and Politics in

The development of China's media is inseparable from the transformation of China's political system. After the victory over the Kumingtang (KMT, the Chinese Nationalist Party) during the Chinese Civil war, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) established power in China. The communist government demolished the media system set up by the KMT. It also banned commercial media and advertising in the media in the 1950s. The Chinese Communist State developed a communication system modeled on the Soviet Union's communication system. For the Chinese Communist State, news is not the latest report of an event. Rather, it is any information that can be used to build socialism. Mao Zedong, the principle leader of the CCP, claimed four tasks for the media: to propagate the policies of the Communist Party, to educate the masses, to organize the masses, and to mobilize the masses.

From the 1950s to the1970s, the state subsidized all media operations. However, as time went by, the state was unable to catch up with the increasing funds needed by the media. In the 1980s the state could provide only 50% to 70% of the media's operating budget. Some newspapers lost complete state subsidy in the early 1980s. As a result, the government began to allow the media to use advertising, sponsorship, and other forms of financing to make up what governmental subsidies were not able to cover, known as the "multi-channel financing" policy. In 1978 the Ministry of Finance approved the introduction of a business management system to People's Daily and some other newspapers in Beijing. The party and government first permitted broadcasting media to rely on multiple forms of financing in 1988. A 1992 ruling required all newspapers to be self-sufficient by 1994.

Advertising was reintroduced to the media in 1979, and it became the most important nongovernmental form of media financing. By the early 1990s, advertising revenue began to surpass state subsidy for television. National or "party organ" media, which traditionally have enjoyed semi-governmental status, have enormous advantages in securing advertising income. The profits from advertising enable them to buy regional or other smaller media. As a result, although the government does not officially allow cross-ownership, by the 1990s many national media organizations had multiple outlets.

In addition to explicit advertisements, paid news, known as Type II or soft advertising, has been practiced by the Chinese media. Paid news is disguised as news and conceals its advertising nature from the audience by packaging programs as simply informational. Journalists also participate in the soft advertising practice individually. It is not uncommon for journalists to receive "red-packet" money from businesses for product placement and soft advertising. Private companies also get involved with media through sponsorship. Thus corporations can exert their influence on editorial policies through sponsorship, despite the fact that they cannot legally own the media.

In addition to the "multi-channel financing" policy, the Chinese government initiated the Property Rights Reform in the late 1970s. This reform separates economic rights from legal rights over properties. Economic rights in this context refer to the right or the power to utilize and obtain income from the properties that are still under the ownership of another party. In the case of media, the Chinese government prevents a complete privatization by maintaining legal ownership over media and telecommunication infrastructures; nevertheless, it grants rights to managers and private investors to make use of media resources to generate profits. Although the government, in practice, still legally owns media, managers and investors have full editorial and financial rights and responsibilities. Some local government entities also "contract out" their publishing licenses to private investors. Media organizations also rush into other business sectors, such as real estate, tourism, and sports, which in many cases generate more revenue than media-related businesses.

This particular situation poses dual challenges to Chinese journalists. On the one hand, the bottom line, profit, is a necessity for the media to survive, but on the other hand, the party line is the prerequisite for the very existence of the media. Thus the Chinese media in the post-Mao era can be characterized as "economic liberation without political democratization."

The changes in media financing, nevertheless, have made it possible for Chinese journalists to challenge governmental control and to search for democratic media. Journalistic practitioners have started to emphasize professionalism and the many purposes of the media. The need for profits also has resulted in a de-emphasis on political issues. Growing diversity or de-ideologizing can be seen in overall media structure and content. Highly commercialized tabloid daily newspapers catering to urban readers have also emerged in major cities such as Beijing, Guangzhou, and Shanghai. China also witnessed a rapid growth of the Internet. The number of Internet hosts in China has increased 48.7% since 2000, and the number of people using the Internet reached 94 million in 2004. The Chinese government has built an Intranet to block the Chinese people from the Internet and, in the future, is planning to use proxy servers like those used in Singapore.

As part of China's economic reform and its effort to gain a membership in the World Trade Organization, China allowed transnational corporations into service areas such as media and telecommunications. Rather than challenging the authoritative control of the Chinese government, transnational media corporations are more than willing to cooperate with the Chinese government for profits. For example, Rupert Murdoch's News Corporation dropped BBC World Television News from its satellite television StarTV in April 1994 because BBC had offended China's leadership. AOL Time-Warner, MTV, and CETV were also willing to participate in the Chinese government's efforts to cultivate "new cultural ideologies." More recently, in order to enter the Chinese market, Yahoo and Google also complied with the Chinese government's regulation of blocking access to certain Internet sites in their service in China. The collaboration between the government controlled media and transnational media corporations in China has contributed to increasing inequalities by cultivating an elite consumer class and further excluding the poor. As a result, the democratizing of Chinese media involves more than eliminating governmental control. It has to simultaneously address the issues and problems brought on by neoliberal globalization.

Jing Yin

See also Censorship, Political; Chinese Cultural Revolution

Further Readings

Chu, L. L. (1994). Continuity and change in China's media reform. Journal of Communication, 44(3), 4–12.

Huang, C. (2003). Transitional media vs. normative theories: Schramm, Altschull, and China. Journal of Communication, 53(3), 444–459.

Lee, C. C. (2003). The global and the national of the Chinese media: Discourses, markets, technology, and ideology. In C. C. Lee (Ed.), Chinese media, global context (pp. 1–31). New York: Routledge.

Liu, H. (1998). Profit or ideology? The Chinese press between party and market. Media, Culture, and Society, 20, 1–41.

Lynch, D. C. (1999). After the propaganda state: Media, politics, and "thought work" in reformed China. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Yin, J. (2006). China's second long march: A review of Chinese media discourse on globalization. Review of Communication, 6(1/2), 32–51.

Yin, J. (in press). The clash of rights: A critical analysis of news discourse on human rights in the United States and China. Critical Discourse Studies.

Zhao, Y. (1998). Media, market, and democracy in China: Between the party line and the bottom line. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

CHINESE CULTURAL REVOLUTION

The Chinese Cultural Revolution started in October 1966 and ended in October 1976. It was launched by Mao Zedong, the late chairman and the founder of the Chinese Communist Party, during his last decade in power in an attempt to renew the spirit of the Chinese revolution. It began as a civil war of sorts—a war of slogans, ideology, and ideas, but later it became almost a nationwide military conflict among different "revolutionary units" of workers, peasants and college students. The purpose of the Cultural Revolution, as Mao claimed, was to guarantee China would never change its "Marxist color," and in order to achieve this goal Mao said that China had to engage in class struggle at all levels, in all aspects, for all times, and the Cultural Revolution was the new format of class struggle in China's new historical stage.

Unfortunately, the Cultural Revolution was, in fact, a distorted and atypical phase of political extremism and forced mobilization. It was not only iconoclastic but also barbaric in its efforts to destroy Chinese culture. The Maoist slogan po si jiu—meaning break the four olds: old ideas, old customs, old culture, and old habits—was used by hundreds of millions of people to destroy the "old world" in order to establish a "new world." Virtually speaking, the Cultural Revolution was a mixture of a power struggle among party leaders, an ideological campaign for Mao's revolutionary ideas, and a massive "re-education" movement of every person in China. When the Cultural Revolution started, Mao closed all schools and called students to join Red Guard units. Millions of the young Red Guards were used for criticism of party officials, intellectuals, and anything that was perceived to contain "bourgeois values." The Red Guards became a "shock force" and began to "bombard" both the regular party headquarters in Beijing and those at the regional and provincial levels across the whole nation. The "four big rights"—speaking out freely, airing views fully, holding great debates, and writing big-character posters—became the revolutionary weapon of Mao's youthful followers to criticize all kinds of "class enemies."

The effects of the Cultural Revolution directly or indirectly touched essentially all of China's populace. During the Cultural Revolution, much economic activity was halted, with revolution being the primary objective of many. But the Cultural Revolution mostly affected and changed the realms of culture, education, ideology, and communication and media. Mao long believed that although the bourgeoisie had been overthrown, it was still trying to use the old ideas, culture, customs, and habits of exploiting classes to corrupt the masses, capture their minds, and endeavor to stage a comeback; therefore, the proletariat must do just the opposite: it must meet head-on every challenge of the bourgeoisie especially in the ideological field. Consequently, the media was a key battleground of ideology and became a particularly important site of class struggle. One of the first moves Mao and his allies made was to gain control over the propaganda apparatus. Media was used to safeguard the directions of the Cultural Revolution and to give its partisans powerful psychological and political support. All communication means and media outlets were exclusively used to propagate an ultraleftist ideology and mass culture, and all of the media's functions became a single one, that is, to publicize, explain, and express the theory and practice of "class struggle."

For most of the years during the Cultural Revolution, people were forbidden to read anything except Mao's little Red Book, a book of the excerpts from Mao's works that propagate both the Marxist doctrine and Mao's revolutionary theory. Feudalistic, fascist, journalistic control reached its climax. Anyone who expressed ideas even minimally different from Mao's was condemned as a "class enemy." Every editorial, critique, commentary, and signed article is written according to the desires of the power holders. Moreover, when writing their articles, some journalists just copied Central Party Committee or Provincial Party Committee documents, or the speeches of their leaders, because it was politically safe to copy the Central Party Committee-inspected important manuscripts at the People's Daily—the mouthpiece of Mao and his allies—and to copy the Provincial Party Committee-inspected provincial newspaper articles. The press thus became a thousand newspapers with one face. Many broadcasters were dismissed—some were sent to factories to do physical labor, some moved to the countryside to receive "re-education" by peasants, and others stayed in radio and television stations to criticize themselves for being bourgeois-influenced and to prepare for new "people's broadcasting stations." The broadcasting media's newscasts were nothing but what the People's Daily reported. Television entertainment programming was reduced to a minimum and consisted exclusively of ideological content. All feature film production was closed down from 1966 to 1970, and all but a handful of the movies made in China in the previous 17 years between 1949 and 1966 were banned. Many older artists suffered imprisonment, violence, and physical deprivation. During the whole Cultural Revolution, the only films made were of the "model performances" endorsed by the party's new cultural leaders.

To the outside world, China was implementing Mao's anti-imperialism, antirevisionism, and anticapitalism principles. There were very few foreign programs on television and cinema screens. Importing media and cultural products from foreign countries—imperialist countries such as the United States, revisionist countries such as the former Soviet Union, and capitalist countries such as Japan and Britain—were thought only to poison the Chinese people, change China's socialist color, and destroy the communist ideology. Thus, the importation of foreign television programming and film was almost at zero. Although foreign contacts were gradually reestablished after 1969, and this situation improved to a large extent when President Nixon visited China in 1972, large-scale, major changes in television program importation were not seen until China entered the reform era after 1978.

Fortunately, in October, 1976, just less than a month after Mao's death on September 9, Mao's wife Jiang Qing and her three principal associates, Wang Hongwen, Zhang Chunqiao, and Yao Wenyuan—denounced as the Gang of Four—were arrested by Hua Guofeng, the Mao-appointed successor, with the assistance of two senior political bureau members, Minister of National Defense Ye Jianying and Wang Dongxing, which symbolized the end of the Cultural Revolution. Today, the Cultural Revolution is seen by most people inside and outside of China, including the Communist Party of China and Chinese democracy movement supporters, as an unmitigated disaster, the bloodiest and darkest period in contemporary Chinese history and an event to be avoided in the future.

Junhao Hong

See also Big-Character Posters, China; Censorship, Political; China, Media and Politics in; Mao Zedong

Further Readings

Cheek, T. (2002). Mao Zedong and China's revolutions. Boston: Bedford/St. Martin's.

Chong, W. L. (Ed.). (2002). China's great proletarian cultural revolution: Master narratives and post-Mao counternarratives. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Esherick, J., Pickowicz, P., & Walder, A. (Eds.). (2006). The Chinese cultural revolution. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Hong, J. (1998). The internationalization of television in China: The revolution of ideology, society, and media since the reform. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Lu, X. (2004). Rhetoric of the Chinese cultural revolution: The impact on Chinese thoughts, culture, and communication. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.

Lubell, P. (2002). The Chinese Communist Party during the cultural revolution. New York: Palgrave.

Chirac, Jacques (1932–)

Born on November 29, 1932, Jacques Chirac's activity in French politics started in 1965 with a local mandate. His first job as assistant minister (secrétaire d'état) came in May 1967, and thereafter, he never stopped holding prominent political mandates or offices. Prime minister from 1974 to 1976, then from 1986 to 1988, he was elected president of the French Republic in 1995 and reelected in 2002. He also held the office of mayor of Paris from 1976 to 1995.

His communication skills are variable. Gifted with a strong direct personal charisma, Jacques Chirac is at the height of his communicating talent when personally canvassing or rallying in small French villages. His popularity among farmers has been particularly constant thanks to his legendary appearances in the Paris National Farmshow where he is able to walk for hours and to adapt from wine tasting to patting every cow or horse in sight.

His television skills have been uneven: It was not until October 27, 1985, that he appeared for the first time to clearly defeat a political opponent during a direct televised debate, when he triumphed over then-Prime Minister Laurent Fabius, who was supposed to be a first-rate media performer.

His 1995 winning electoral campaign was a model of strategic planning. Instead of carrying out a quick media-oriented campaign, Jacques Chirac, well advised by his own daughter, Claude Chirac, undertook a strenuous tour deep into France, and is said to have shaken hands with more than 2 million people. It led him to victory and gained him a grassroots popularity that his conservative opponent, Edouard Balladur, prime minister at the time, had considerably underestimated. A bold and well-devised slogan targeted at the left, "reducing the social breach," was also quite helpful.

As president, Jacques Chirac changed his communications strategy by hiring none other than his predecessor's main communications consultant, Jacques Pilhan—a bold move by the latter, who agreed to advise the former opponent of his long-time client (François Mitterrand). Jacques Chirac's public appearances consequently became much less frequent and highly controlled. When Pilhan died, Claude Chirac officially took the job of the president's communications director and kept faithfully within the framework of the consultant's ideas.

In more recent years, Jacques Chirac's failure to reach younger generations became apparent at the 2005 European Referendum for the so-called European Constitution. During a televised rendezvous with some youngsters he failed to convince the selected youth representatives that they should vote in favor of the Constitution—a failure that was verified on the voting day. His televised appearances were then kept to more formal situations—National Day interviews with selected anchormen, New Year's Eve wishes, and so on.

Altogether, his political communication skills could qualify him as one of the last representatives of the old-fashioned politicians for whom a meeting and direct contact with the people is the best way of campaigning.

Philippe J. Maarek

Further Readings

Basset, M., & Basset, M. (2005). Jacques Chirac: une éternelle jeunesse [Jacques Chirac: An eternal youth]. Paris: JC Gawsewitch.

Collovald, A. (1999). Jacques Chirac et le gaullisme [Jacques Chirac and Gaullism]. Paris: Belin.

Michaud, Y. (2004). Chirac dans le texte (La parole et l'impuissance) [Chirac in the text (The word and the impotence)]. Paris: Stock.

Chisholm, Shirley (1924–2005)

Shirley Anita St. Hill Chisholm was the first African American woman elected to the U.S. House of Representatives and the first African American woman to run for president of the United States. Chisholm was a liberal political activist who advocated for greater spending on education, health care, and social services, promoted civil rights and women's rights, and criticized the Vietnam War and the draft. Chisholm's public political career began in 1964 with a successful campaign for a seat in the New York State Legislature. In 1968 Chisholm defeated Republican James Farmer for New York's Twelfth District congressional seat. Chisholm held that seat until retiring in 1982. In 1972, Chisholm shocked the political world by campaigning for the Democratic presidential nomination as the "unbought and unbossed" candidate.

Chisholm decided to run for president in 1972 not to win the election but to change the face of American politics. Chisholm openly campaigned for the outsiders of the American political system: women, minorities, and the working class. Although many Americans supported Chisholm's populist ideas, Chisholm's campaign was not without its critics, including those within the Democratic Party. Feminists who felt George McGovern had a better chance of winning the final election worried that they would be throwing away their influence if they voted for Chisholm. African American political leaders were also divided and at times openly hostile to Chisholm's candidacy both because a woman had stepped into the race and because of the concern that Chisholm could derail a successful Democratic candidate and thus give Nixon the edge in the national election.

Although frequently not taken seriously by the American press, the Chisholm campaign worked diligently for national visibility—winning a court order, for example, to allow Chisholm to participate in a nationally televised debate with George McGovern and Vice President Hubert Humphrey—and had strong showings in several state primaries. In the California primary, for example, Chisholm received 5% of the votes on a 7-month budget of $50,000. At the Democratic National Convention in Miami, Chisholm earned an impressive 151 delegate votes.

After retiring from Congress, Chisholm taught at Mount Holyoke College and Spelman College. Chisholm was a popular figure on the lecture circuit and actively campaigned for Rev. Jesse Jackson's presidential campaigns in 1984 and 1988. Although Chisholm never reached the office of the president, she is credited with opening the doors of the presidency to all Americans.

Tasha N. Dubriwny

See also Feminist Movement; Gender and Politics; Race in Politics

Further Readings

Chisholm, S. (1970). Unbought and unbossed. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

Gutgold, N. D. (2006). Paving the way for Madam President. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.

Christian, George

See Press Secretary, White House

Churchill, Sir Winston (1874–1965)

Sir Winston Churchill is best known for his leadership of Great Britain as prime minister during the Second World War, but that was the high point of a long and varied career in British politics. Churchill was elected to the House of Commons in 1900 as the representative for Oldham. He was to continue as a member of the House for 64 years, holding every major cabinet post except the foreign ministry post and ascending to the office of prime minister twice.

By the time he was elected to Parliament at the age of 25, Churchill was already a well-known soldier, journalist, and author. During his time in the British army, Churchill served in several of Queen Victoria's "Little Wars," seeing action in India, the Sudan, and South Africa as well as traveling on his own to observe Spanish operations in Cuba. He made good use of these experiences, serving as a war correspondent for such prominent British newspapers as the Daily Telegraph and the Morning Post. Churchill's dispatches, much praised for their clarity, detail, and colorful style, earned him both financial stability and public acclaim. His reports were not so popular with his commanders, however, who disliked his tendency to criticize military decisions with which he disagreed. In addition to his articles, Churchill recorded his experiences and reflections in several books: The Story of the Malakand Field Force, The River War, London to Ladysmith, and Ian Hamilton's March. Churchill's exploits, especially in the Boer War, brought him a fame which played no small share in his first campaign victory. These accounts of recent wars also had larger political import because they occurred in the context of debates about British imperial goals and involvement around which the election revolved.

Churchill remained involved in publishing and journalism throughout his career. He continued to write articles and essays for the public press on a great variety of topics, publishing more than 800 in his lifetime. Many of these were explicitly political, such as his defense of the British Empire in India, but many were of broader theme, reflecting on human nature, technology, the proper ordering of society, the role of chance in human affairs, and education, among other topics. During the political isolation of the "wilderness years" (1930–1939), when Churchill was a member of the majority Conservative Party but did not hold a post in the government, he waged his long and unpopular fight against the policies of disarmament and appeasement not only in Parliament but in Britain's newspapers. In addition to authorship, Churchill also had experience with newspaper production and editing, producing a governmental newspaper, the British Gazette, during a national strike of trade unionists in 1926.

It is particularly for his oratory that Churchill is remembered. The speeches that he delivered to rally the British people during the first dark years of the Second World War are among the most famous, but Churchill's practice of the art of political speech was foundational to his entire career. As a young man (1897), Churchill wrote an essay on the power of oratory, The Scaffolding of Rhetoric, placing it first among the political virtues. He laid down four principles of effective political communication: correctness of diction, rhythm, accumulation of argument, and analogy. Churchill was to employ these principles to great effect. Although his parliamentary career had its share of setbacks, often because he took strong stands on controversial issues, overall it must be considered a tremendous success. The foundation of his success was his ability to speak well. Whether he was in line with majority opinion or not, Churchill's speeches usually received great attention in the House and in the press for their forcefulness, imagery, and beauty of language. In the fullness of his powers, he must be considered an orator of the first rank. The Second World War and the office of prime minister provided the grandest stage for his rhetorical abilities. When Britain's survival hung by a thread, Churchill's speeches, often broadcast to the nation by the BBC, roused the British people to face the dangers which confronted them. Indeed, Churchill himself became a political symbol of perseverance and courage, his well-known face appearing on posters all over Britain.

Churchill also reached out in speech to the British Commonwealth countries and to the United States, seeking their aid. In both cases, he appealed to shared traditions and ways of life. His attempts to overcome American isolationism centered on the ideas of a union of the English-speaking peoples and a special relationship between America and Britain based on common political heritage and devotion to freedom. Churchill had long felt a connection to the United States that ran deep. His mother was American, he had prominent American friends, and he had traveled extensively in the United States in his younger days on speaking tours. He strove to strengthen the ties and sense of friendship between the two peoples. Several of Churchill's speeches in the early days of the war were aimed at encouraging American involvement, and he spoke directly to Congress after American entry into the war. Above all, Churchill relied on his friendship and personal correspondence with the American president, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, to gain U.S. support and to foster common purpose and strategy throughout the war.

In 1946, Churchill spoke at Westminster College in Fulton, Missouri. In what is usually referred to as the "Iron Curtain Speech," he warned that the postwar world had to confront the next rising threat, Soviet Communism, which had already seized large parts of Eastern Europe. Once again, he called for unity of purpose in action among freedom-loving nations in what would quickly come to be known as the cold war. His efforts to forge and maintain political and moral connections between Britain and America were honored in 1963 when he was made an honorary citizen of the United States.

Justin D. Lyons

Further Readings

Best, G. (2001). Churchill: A study in greatness. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Churchill, W. S. (2003). Never give in! The best of Winston Churchill's speeches. New York: Hyperion.

Weidhorn, M. (1987). Churchill's rhetoric and political discourse. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press.

CICERO

See RHETORIC, POLITICAL

ÇILLER, TANSU (1946–)

A political leader born in Istanbul, Turkey, in 1946, Tansu Çiller left her position as the chairperson of the True Path Party (Do?ru Yol Partisi–TPP) after a destructive defeat in the November 2002 elections, and thus brought to an end her active political life which began on November 24, 1990, in the TPP.

A representative of a political tradition pursuing conservative, nationalist, populist policies and relying heavily on rural and provincial constituencies, the TPP, with the aim of reaching women's votes and strengthening the image of a democratic Turkey, elected Çiller who, as a professor of economics, of bourgeois background, having a higher education and a career, happened to be the distinctive choice of Süleyman Demirel, a permanent leader in Turkish politics since the 1960s who used to be called "the father." Although Çiller did not come into politics via the father-spouse-brother route, a route familiar to women, she managed to create for herself the position of Demirel's "daughter." Working together with many national and international media and PR advisors who fabricated a public scenario based on an uneasy father and daughter relationship and preparing for party congresses and elections, she became Turkey's first female prime minister in 1993 and stayed there for 3 years.

Çiller has become famous for her political speeches filled with blunders. Her mistakes in language usage, including calling one of her fellow party members by the name of a funny character in a famous TV series, means she could not render "Turkish" her speeches prepared by consultants, which were full of plagiarized and recruited statements like "I have a dream" or "that soldier will go, that flag will come down." Çiller, with her linear reasoning process, her expressions full of judgments of certainty, and her emphasis on science, adopted masculine rhetorical strategies.

In four general election campaigns (1991, 1995, 1999, and 2002) Çiller adopted aggressive and negative strategies while bringing forth her outlook, personal characteristics and family status. Her aggression toward political rivals was reduced by close-up camera shots showing her smiling face in political ads. The inevitability of privatization, the idea that the Kurdish problem could only be solved by militaristic measures, and programs against inflation have been unchanging themes she brought to the fore in election campaigns. She gave up using the image of integrity and honesty when her possessions gained publicity as a result of a parliamentary investigation. As the woman with "steel eyes," she joined military maneuvers wearing heavy shoes. In the coalition governments after the 1995 elections, especially the one she took part in with the Islamic Welfare party, she held the offices of foreign minister and deputy prime minister and was attacked with moral and political accusations directed against her partner. Thus, her speeches began more frequently with "the name of God."

During the first 2 years of her term as prime minister (and as a result of her connections to owners and higher-ups in the media and her ability to allot these institutions promotion credits), she was publicized as "the beautiful blonde woman" and "the most beautiful prime minister in the world" to reflect Turkey's modern face. Çiller's campaign featured the slogan "I want my radio" and was supported by private TV and radio broadcasting; she was in turn backed by prominent columnists who argued that a female politician would bring elegance, refinement, and renewal to Turkey. The media attributed a value to each and every single personal detail of her life. She was promoted as the most promising candidate on the rise, the most likely to win, the candidate who reached the highest percentage in the most recent public opinion polls. In the 2002 elections, voters did not forgive the pragmatism of Turkey's modern face. She and her party could not make their way into the parliament.

Eser Köker

Further Readings

Brown, J. M. (1994). Tansu Çiller and the question of Turkish identity. World Policy Journal, 11, 55–60.

Erel, N. (1999). *Tansu Çiller in Siyaset Roman*ı [Tansu Çiller's novel of politics]. Ankara: Bilgi Yayinevi.

Özden Firat, B. (2002). The press coverage of women politicians in Turkey: A case study on Tansu Çiller, Merve Kavakçi, Rahşan Ecevit. Unpublished master's thesis, Institute of Social Sciences, Middle-East Technical University, Ankara.

Citizen Journalism

The notion of citizen journalism encompasses a wide range of practices and experiments running from opening traditional media to citizen participation in the news process, to locally based reporting for local or global networks, to citizen expression in the blogosphere (and more recently in the vlogosphere, or video blogosphere) that can be characterized as a networked structure of storytelling.

With roots in the civic journalism movement of the 1990s as well as earlier Deweyan inspired forms of community journalism, citizen journalism gained momentum from the explosion of Web-enabled forms of citizen expression. Partly a reaction to critiques of news coverage by traditional media, partly a process of individual expressive motivation, and partly exploration of new business models for news, different forms of citizen journalism are emerging worldwide. Therefore, rather than specific content, a particular business model, or the adoption of certain journalistic routines, what defines citizen journalism is a move toward openness of information; horizontal structures of news gathering and news telling; blurred lines between content production and use; and diffused accountability based more on reputation and meaning than on structural system hierarchies.

Due to its broad scope, the current prevalence of citizen journalism is hard to quantify. Yet, with most traditional media accepting some form or other of citizen participation in their content, and the explosion of citizen expression in the blogosphere (where millions of active Internet blogs are doubling every 6 months), the contribution of citizen journalism to the news environment is substantial, and the potential for its continued growth is high. Some prominent examples of the contribution of citizen journalism to the new news environment can be found in the leading discursive role of Ohmynews (www.ohmynews.com) in the 2003 presidential election in South Korea, the on-spot reporting of Hurricane Katrina, and alternative news source functions in the "Rathergate" case in 2005.

To characterize this vast scope of citizen journalism practices, multiple dimensions have to be considered. One dimension is the level of citizen participation in the news production process. On one side of this spectrum would be mainstream media institutions that systematically incorporate the views expressed by the readers in response to their articles in the forms of comments or other city issues in the form of citizen blogs. Along these lines, increased citizen participation would include the opening of the editorial process for citizen review as well as citizen contributions in reporting and editorial decision, as exemplified by the Spokane Spokesman Review (www.spokemanreview.com). On the other side of this spectrum are news media that rely fully on the citizen contributors for editorial decisions and contents production, such as Wikinews (www.wikinews.org) as well as most independent blogs.

In terms of content, citizen journalism projects alternate fact-oriented reporting of locally based participants in the context of a global network, as well as self-expression of opinion. For example, Ohmynews uses a collaboration model where a professional writing and editing staff of 60 people work together with over 43,000 citizen journalists that write news reports for their initial Korean version as well as for their two new International and Japanese versions. The other side of this content dimension would be exemplified by the millions of blogs that are devoted to opinion expression, rather than fact-oriented reporting.

In terms of the interaction between media and society, citizen journalism can be categorized by its relationship with the target community. Projects target from small local communities, through metropolitan areas such as the Twin Cities Daily Planet (www.tcdailyplanet.net) or the Voice of San Diego (www.voiceofsandiego.org) to the global efforts of Wikinews and Ohmynews International. Also, their content can be characterized in terms of an inclination to build local identity or one aimed at solving civic problems. The Gotham Gazette (www.gothamgazette.com) in New York is one example of a metropolitan-level civic-inclined citizen journalism project, whereas the blog-based Baristanet (www.baristanet.com) in Montclair, New Jersey, aims to reach a smaller community and focuses instead on local identity.

The potentials and weaknesses of citizen journalism are being widely discussed, though mainly on the normative level. The main critiques come from the advocates of traditional journalism arguing citizen journalism is short of or lacking journalistic ethics, reliability and quality of reporting, along with effective gatekeeping. On the other hand, practitioners of citizen journalism emphasize the democratic importance of alternate news sources, plurality of viewpoints, open discussion and bringing community networks closer to enhance public life. Efforts by citizen journalism advocates to address these criticisms include the mixed models of professional citizen collaboration and the training of citizens to enhance the quality of their writing and their reporting orientation (www.madisoncommons.org).

Of all the challenges that the citizen journalism movement faces, the most important is sustainability, which requires time, attention and skills from both the producers and contributors/readers. Because citizen journalism incorporates distributed participation from nonprofessional contributors, sustainability involves strong motivational issues which can be as complex as the financial ones, as demonstrated by Bayosphere's demise in San Francisco. The second challenge is quality control of the news articles in terms of accuracy as well as journalistic ethics. The third challenge refers to inclusion and to how to interconnect a broader community dialogue rather than an exponential series of monologues. The fourth challenge is that citizen journalism could accelerate the erosion of traditional journalism practices without replacing their function of bringing attention to core social problems and providing a rational reconstruction of social life.

Citizen journalism attempts to incorporate the values of open participation and discussion into the closed hierarchy of traditional journalism. Ultimately, what forms of citizen journalism will succeed is still an open question, one that depends on the lively ongoing efforts of citizen journalism projects all over the world. What is clear at this point is that citizen journalism offers an intriguing alternative to building a vital and vibrant public sphere.

Hernando Rojas and Nak ho Kim

See also Blogs, Blogging; Public Journalism

Further Readings

Bowman, S., & Willis, C. (2003). We media: How audiences are shaping the future of news and information. Media Center at the American Press Institute. Retrieved from http://www.hypergene.net/wemedia/weblog.php Gillmor, D. (2004). We the media. Sebastopol, CA: O'Reilly Media.

Gillmor, D. (2006, January 24). From Dan: A letter to the Bayosphere Community. Blog posted to http://bayosphere.com/blog/dan_gillmor/20060124/from_dan_a_letter_to_the_bayosphere_community

Maher, V. (2006). Towards a critical media studies approach to the blogosphere. South Africa: New Media Lab, School of Journalism & Media Studies, Rhodes University.

Outing, S. (2005, June 15). The 11 layers of citizen journalism. Retrieved from http://www.poynter.org/content/content_view.asp?id=83126

Rosen, J. (2004, March 25). What is journalism? And what can Weblogs do about it? Blog posted to http://journalism.nyu.edu/pubzone/weblogs/pressthink/2004/03/25/con_prep.html

Sifry, D. (2006, November 6). State of the blogosphere, October, 2006. Blog posted to http://technorati.com/weblog/2006/11/161.html

Walsh, J. (2005, March 9). Who killed Dan Rather? Retrieved from http://dir.salon.com/story/opinion/feature/2005/03/09/rather/index.html

Citizen Kane

Citizen Kane (1941), regarded by many to be one of the greatest motion pictures of all time, was the first feature film directed by Orson Welles (1915–1985). Its innovative use of narrative structure, camera angles, and deep focus photography marked the film as a groundbreaking effort in cinematic history. At the time of its release, the film was highly controversial for its alleged portrayal of newspaper publisher William Randolph Hearst (1863–1951). Citizen Kane recounts the life and death of a similarly powerful newspaper owner, Charles Foster Kane. In the film, Kane's deep-seated psychological flaws compel him to seek political influence through manipulation of the press, ultimately resulting in his defeat and disappointment.

Prior to his motion picture directorial debut, Orson Welles had received national notoriety for his 1938 Mercury Theatre on the Air radio production of Jules Verne's The War of the Worlds. This Halloween broadcast created panic among many radio listeners who thought the program's fictional news reports of a Martian invasion to be real. Because of his notoriety, RKO Pictures gave Welles an opportunity to direct his first motion picture and allowed him unprecedented artistic and thematic control. Welles utilized this opportunity to challenge the way classic Hollywood films were made. Welles studied the deep focus photography in John Ford's Stagecoach (1939) and employed its cinematographer, Greg Toland, to incorporate the technique in Citizen Kane. This technique allowed Welles to tell the story with fewer cuts, by utilizing longer takes of a single shot where all of the action remained in focus.

Screenwriters Welles and Herman J. Mankiewicz received Academy Awards for their work. The film's story centers on an investigation of Kane's deathbed utterance. During the course of this investigation, we learn of Kane's traumatic childhood removal from his parent's home after they strike it rich in silver mining, and of Kane's later establishment of a publishing empire. Seeking to substitute the public's love for that denied him by his parents, the adult Kane pledges to use his newspaper only to further the public good.

The increasingly influential Kane decides to run for governor but is caught in an extramarital affair with a young singer. Kane then uses his newspapers in an attempt to favorably recast the singer's musical ability. Ultimately, Kane loses the race, as well as his journalistic integrity. It is Kane's extramarital relationship that most nearly mirrored the life of Hearst, who also had conducted a long-term affair with a much younger motion picture performer, Marion Davies. Because of his displeasure at the film's depictions, Hearst mounted an intense publicity campaign against Citizen Kane, which resulted in mediocre box office revenues and denied it victory in all but one Academy Awards category. Over the years, however, the film has grown in reputation. In 1998, The American Film Institute named Citizen Kane the greatest film of all time.

William Renkus

See also Film and Politics; War of the Worlds, The

Further Readings

Pizzitola, L. (2002). Hearst over Hollywood: Power, passion and propaganda in the movies. New York: Columbia University Press.

Civic Engagement

See Political Engagement

Civic Journalism

See Citizen Journalism; Public Journalism

Civil Rights Movement

Through marches, sit-ins, boycotts, songs, and speeches, the civil rights movement (1954–1972) challenged America's hypocrisy between its founding ideals of freedom and quality and its systemic disenfranchisement of African Americans. Two factors contributed to the movement's success: Gandhian nonviolent direct action, which shifted arguments over equality from legal abstractions to the individual protestors themselves; and its ability to capitalize upon media coverage to publicize the struggle for civil rights. Ruptures in three cities highlight this relationship between political and moral argument, nonviolence, and how the media framed civil rights.

Following the U.S. Supreme Court's Brown v. Board of Education, Topeka, KS (1954) decision, which stipulated that public schools should integrate with "all deliberate speed," movement leaders realized they could not wait for politicians to fulfill this legal promise. During the Montgomery Bus Boycott (1955–1956), African American domestic laborers and their supporters refused to ride the city's mass transit system. The economic pressure of the boycott caused the city's leaders to make concessions that, among other things, resulted in more equal treatment of African Americans aboard the city's buses. The symbolic gains of the boycott cannot be overstated: Participants had successfully called attention to the de jure segregation that pervaded Montgomery and reminded America of the inherent dignity and rights that should be accorded all of the country's citizens.

The momentum of Montgomery was checked 7 years later in Albany, Georgia. There, protestors encountered a white power structure that parried every thrust from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), an organization dedicated to voter registration and education. SNCC participants, seeking the desegregation of the city's transportation systems, as well its libraries, parks, and medical facilities, were outmaneuvered by Sheriff Laurie Pritchett, who used the threat of jail to demoralize participants and sequester city officials from having to concede to any demands.

If Albany signaled the movement's low point, its apogee came less than 2 years later, in June 1963, in Birmingham, Alabama. There, civil rights leaders punctuated a massive nonviolent campaign by using children to march against segregation. Like never before, the moral force of the movement was captured and framed through media portrayals of the brutality civil rights participants suffered. The images of women and children suffering dog attacks, the sting of fire hoses, and beatings by police mobilized public opinion. It was also in Birmingham where Martin Luther King, Jr., drafted his "Letter from Birmingham Jail," in which he justified the risks and rewards of nonviolent direct action.

In late August 1963, the movement held its largest gathering in Washington, D.C. Over the course of 3 days, people from across the United States gathered to demonstrate for equal rights and equal treatment under the law. The event was punctuated by numerous speeches from the movement's leadership; none was more eloquent than King's "I Have a Dream."

Signing of the Voting Rights Act, August 6, 1965. President Lyndon B. Johnson moves to shake hands with Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., while others look on. Lyndon Baines Johnson has been credited with being one of the most important figures in the civil rights movement.

Source: LBJ Library photo by Yoichi R. Yokamoto.

But the energy and wonder from those August days did not last. In September 1963, four African American girls were murdered when the 16th Avenue Baptist Church in Birmingham was bombed. In June 1964, voter registration workers Andrew Goodman, Michael Schrewner, and James Chaney were murdered in Mississippi. Malcolm X was assassinated in February 1965. James Meredith's march across Mississippi in 1966 for civil rights instead highlighted the tensions within the movement between nonviolence and Black Power. With King's assassination in April 1968, the remainder of the 1960s and the early 1970s saw a movement mired in dissonance, no longer able to hold the nation's moral center. It never recovered.

Researchers have examined the movement through three lenses. Following the examples of Claybourne Carson and Aldon Morris, scholars have viewed the civil rights movement through a grassroots perspective, focusing upon the words and actions of so-called ordinary persons who were instrumental in helping the movement meet its goals. A second lens has focused upon the major leaders of the movement, from Martin Luther King, Jr., to Ella Baker to Malcolm X, plumbing their respective intellectual contributions to social protest and American civic ideals. Finally, researchers have examined the symbolic dimensions of the Movement, undertaking analyses of how argument, metaphor, and other linguistic devices were marshaled to fashion public understandings of equality, justice, and democracy. Scholars also have worked diligently to recover the primary voices from the movement in volumes of collected speeches.

The civil rights movement stands as the most successful social protest of the 20th century. This success may be attributed to the ways it communicated its messages of equality, dignity, and hope against cries of racism, violence, states' rights, and public indifference. Words, music, and images together made a picture of moral clarity from which America could not look away.

Jeffrey B. Kurtz

See also King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Minorities, Role in Politics; Race in Politics; Segregation

Further Readings

Carson, C. (1981). In struggle: SNCC and the black awakening of the 1960s. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Chappell, D. (2004). A stone of hope: Prophetic religion and the death of Jim Crow. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Condit, C. M., & Lucaties, J. L. (1993). Crafting equality: America's Anglo-African word. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Garrow, D. (1986). Bearing the cross: Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. New York: W. Morrow.

Houck, D. W., & Dixon, D. E. (Eds.). (2006). Rhetoric, religion, and the civil rights movement, 1954–1965. Waco, TX: Baylor University Press.

Morris, A. (1984). The origins of the civil rights movement: Black communities organizing for change. New York: Free Press.

Van Deburg, W. L. (1992). New day in Babylon: The black power movement and American culture, 1965–1975. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Clinton, Hillary Rodham (1947–)

Hillary Rodham Clinton was born in Chicago, Illinois. After growing up in Park Ridge, Illinois, Rodham Clinton graduated from Wellesley College and went on to attend Yale Law School. Rodham Clinton accomplished many firsts. She was the first First Lady to hold a postgraduate degree and to have her own professional career. She was the first First Lady to be elected to the U.S. Senate. She was the first woman to be a major political party's front runner for nomination as the party's presidential candidate.

After Bill Clinton was elected president in 1992, Rodham Clinton was appointed to head the Task Force on National Health Care Reform. As the head of this task force, Rodham Clinton spearheaded the president's complex proposal that never received enough support for a floor vote in either the House or the Senate. Rodham Clinton's active role as an advisor to the president was often cause for both criticism and praise for the administration.

Rodham Clinton was also the first First Lady to be subpoenaed to testify before a Federal Grand Jury in connection to the Whitewater affair, but she never faced criminal charges related to Whitewater. Rodham Clinton played a role in a public sex scandal at the White House. During the scandal related to Bill Clinton's extramarital affair with White House intern Monica Lewinsky, Rodham Clinton remained steadfast in her commitment to the president.

As First Lady, Rodham Clinton supported women's rights and children's welfare around the world. She was one of a limited number of international figures who spoke out against the treatment of women in Afghanistan by the Taliban. As her time as First Lady drew to a close, Rodham Clinton turned her attention to competing for the U.S. Senate seat being vacated by retiring Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan.

In her campaign for the Senate, Rodham Clinton had to overcome accusations of carpetbagging, as she had never lived in New York and had never participated in the state's politics. She launched a "listening tour" during which she visited every county in the state. The race garnered much national attention, and Rodham Clinton eventually won the election.

Rodham Clinton sits on five Senate committees with nine subcommittee assignments. After the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001, Rodham Clinton worked to generate funds for the recovery efforts in her state as well as improvements to the security efforts in New York. Rodham Clinton strongly supported military action in Afghanistan and also voted in favor of the Iraq War Resolution. After the Iraq War began, she visited both Iraq and Afghanistan. Rodham Clinton has criticized President Bush's pledge to stay indefinitely but has said that immediate withdrawal from Iraq would be a mistake.

In 2004, Rodham Clinton announced she would seek reelection to the Senate in 2006. In a race against John Spencer, former mayor of Yonkers, Rodham Clinton spent more money than any other Senate candidate in the 2006 race and easily won reelection. Soon after that race concluded, the excitement over a possible presidential bid for the Senator and former First Lady escalated.

Rumors and speculation about the possibilities of her candidacy can be seen as early as an October 2002 New York Times article. Rodham Clinton used her campaign Web site to announce her presidential candidacy on January 20, 2007, with the formation of a presidential exploratory committee. In early 2007, Rodham Clinton led the field of Democratic candidates for president, with Illinois Senator Barack Obama and former North Carolina Senator John Edwards being her closest competition. Rodham Clinton's campaign for the Democratic nomination will be the largest bid for a presidential nomination conducted by a woman. Her career of firsts may continue into the White House.

Abby Gail LeGrange

See also Clinton, William Jefferson

Further Readings

Bozell, L. B., with Graham, T. (2007). Whitewash: How the news media are paving Hillary Clinton's path to the presidency. New York: Crown Forum/Random House.

Burrell, B. (2001). Public opinion, the First Ladyship, and Hillary Rodham Clinton (2nd ed.). New York: Taylor & Francis.

Flaherty, P., & Flaherty, T. (1996). The First Lady: A comprehensive view of Hillary Rodham Clinton. Lafayette, LA: Huntington House.

Muir, J. K., & Benitez, L. M. (1996). Redefining the role of the First Lady: The rhetorical style of Hillary Rodham

Clinton. In R. E. Denton, Jr., & R. L. Holloway (Eds.), Clinton presidency: Images, issues, and communication strategies (pp. 139–158). Westport, CT: Praeger.

Clinton, William Jefferson (1946–)

William Jefferson Clinton was the 42nd president of the United States. He held office from 1993 to 2001. Prior to his election as president, Clinton served one term as Arkansas attorney general (1977–1979). He was governor of Arkansas for 5 terms, elected in 1978, lost in 1980, and reelected in 1982, 1984, 1986, and 1990. Clinton was among the wave of young progressive Southern Democrats who began to change the face of the Old South.

In 1992, Clinton won the presidency, defeating incumbent George H. W. Bush and Reform Party candidate Ross Perot with 43% of the popular vote. He was reelected in 1996, defeating Republican Robert Dole and Ross Perot with 49% of the popular vote.

As the first post-cold war president, Clinton campaigned on domestic issues. The phrase—"It's the economy, stupid"—became the mantra of his 1992 campaign staff. Many of his major failures and accomplishments involved domestic initiatives. The administration failed to pass a national health care proposal, but Clinton succeeded in winning congressional passage of welfare reform legislation and in balancing the budget with the largest surplus in U.S. history. During his presidency, the country experienced robust economic growth fueled by emerging computer technologies. Clinton signed the controversial 1994 North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA).

Despite this domestic emphasis, his administration faced vexing foreign policy challenges. The United States intervened militarily in Somalia, Haiti, and the Balkans. In addition, terrorist attacks escalated during the Clinton presidency. These attacks included the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, the 1996 military apartment bombing in Saudi Arabia, the 1998 African embassy bombings, and the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole in Yemen. These terrorist actions culminated on September 11, 2001, after Clinton left office.

For students of political communication, Clinton is a compelling figure because of his populist story, his reinvention of a Democratic centrist discourse, his rhetorical vision of racial reconciliation, his weathering of scandal, and the overlap of his presidency with the emerging new media.

Telling the Clinton Story

Clinton's telling of his own story was an important element of his appeal. The 1992 biographical campaign film, A Man From Hope, chronicled Clinton's life. In the film Clinton's oft-checkered personal life is replaced with a persona of a loving husband and father. His wife Hillary, his mother Virginia Kelley, his mother-in-law Dorothy Rodham, and his daughter Chelsea, along with Bill himself, are the principal speakers. The film was photographed in Clinton's own home. The warm, domestic imagery, accentuated by the use of soft focus, is an example of the increasingly intimate presentation of political candidates.

The campaign narrative emphasized Clinton's modest upbringing in small-town Arkansas and his difficult childhood growing up with a single mother and, later, an alcoholic stepfather. Clinton overcame these obstacles and attended Georgetown University, became a Rhodes Scholar, and graduated from Yale Law School. His biography is a populist retelling of the Lincoln log cabin and Horatio Alger myths. This story stood in stark contrast with the incumbent president's privileged New England background.

This portrayal participated in and critiqued the Republican rhetoric of "family values." Clinton's less than idyllic boyhood and his own subsequent success stood as a repudiation of this often judgmental discourse. This framing of family provided Clinton with a sympathetic explanation of his own frequently troubled marriage. In this story, Bill and Hillary are virtuous for staying together and overcoming their difficulties.

Centrist Politics and the Rhetoric of the "New Covenant"

In his 1992 Democratic National Convention address, Clinton articulated the centrist ideology of the New Democrats. He spoke of "a new approach to government, a government that offers more empowerment and less entitlement. . . . A government that is leaner, not meaner; a government that expands opportunity, not bureaucracy; a government that understands that jobs must come from growth in a vibrant and vital system of free enterprise." He called for a "'New Covenant"—"a solemn agreement between the people and their government based not simply on what each of us can take but what all of us must give to our nation."

Clinton distanced himself from the liberal policies of the Great Society. As a founding member of the Democratic Leadership Council (DLC), he was dedicated to reviving the Democratic Party through the adoption of centrist policies. In his presidential memoir, he described the DLC as a group committed to "forging a winning message . . . based on fiscal responsibility, creative new ideas on social policy, and a commitment to a strong national defense."

Clinton distinguished his vision from conservative Republican policies. His message emphasized government investment in education, infrastructure, and research. He did not favor the trickle-down, supply-side economics of Reaganism. His campaign characterized the Reagan-Bush era as a new Gilded Age in which the rich prospered at the expense of the middle class. "For too long," he told the 1992 convention delegates, "those who play by the rules and keep the faith have gotten the shaft, and those who cut corners and cut deals have been rewarded."

Welfare reform was a prominent public policy expression of the "New Covenant." In the 1996 State of the Union address, Clinton promised to "end welfare as we know it." The legislation, which put a time limit on welfare benefits and established work incentives, embodied the ideology of the New Democrats. This 1996 act was bitterly opposed by the liberal wing of Clinton's own party and embraced by many Republican members of Congress.

This new centrist rhetoric had a significant influence abroad. Tony Blair and his aides attended closely to the positions Clinton promulgated in his effort to move the Democratic Party to the center. Blair followed a similar path in moderating the socialist impulses of the British Labor Party.

The Discourse of Racial Reconciliation

In 1998, Nobel Laureate Toni Morrison named Clinton the "first black president." She wrote that he "displays every trope of blackness: single-parent household, born poor, working-class, saxophone-playing, MacDonald's-and-junk-food-loving boy from Arkansas." She believed the scrutiny of Clinton's sex life resembled the stereotypes and double standards blacks have historically endured. In 2001, members of the Congressional Black Caucus honored Clinton as the "first black president."

Clinton trumpeted the theme of racial reconciliation in some of his most memorable public speeches. On November 13, 1993, he spoke to 5,000 African American ministers at the site of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s final sermon. "I've looked out," he told the Memphis audience, ". . . over this vast crowd and I see people I've known for years." As a Southern Baptist, Clinton was comfortable with the preaching style of the black church. It is difficult to imagine another white politician feeling comfortable asking a black congregation, "If Martin Luther King . . . were to reappear by my side today and give us a report card on the last 25 years, what would he say?" Clinton delivered a pointed answer, "'I fought for freedom,' he would say, 'but not for the freedom of people to kill each other with reckless abandon, not for the freedom of children to have children and the fathers of the children walk away from them and abandon them as if they don't amount to anything. . . . This is not what I lived and died for.'" At the conclusion of Clinton's speech, he called for a partnership between government and the black church. "We will, somehow, by God's grace," he said, ". . . will turn this around. We will give these children a future. . . . We will take away their despair and give them hope."

On May 16, 1997, the president spoke from the White House Rose Garden and apologized to African Americans for their government's complicity in the Tuskegee syphilis experiments. "Men," he said, ". . . without resources and with few alternatives . . . believed they had found hope when they were offered free medical care by the United States Public Health Service. They were betrayed."

Clinton devoted considerable energy appealing to his African American constituents. In every year of his presidency he delivered a speech to the Congressional Black Caucus. In 1998, he commemorated the 35th anniversary of the March on Washington. In 1999, he presented Rosa Parks with the Congressional Medal of Honor. After leaving the White House in 2001, he located the Clinton Foundation headquarters in Harlem.

Scandals, Impeachment, and Image Restoration

Scandal enveloped the Clinton presidency. These incidents ranged from minor missteps, such as the 1993 misuse of the White House travel office, the 1996 improper access to FBI security-clearance documents, and the 2001 last-day pardons of some seemingly unworthy recipients, to major charges of wrongdoing, which included the Whitewater and the Monica Lewinsky investigations.

In 1979, Bill and Hillary Clinton invested in the Whitewater Development Corporation, an Arkansas real estate venture. In 1992, The New York Times published material critical of the Clintons' land dealings. In 1994, the Attorney General Janet Reno appointed a special prosecutor to investigate the Whitewater matter. In 2000, the special prosecutor concluded that there were insufficient grounds to file charges.

In November 1995, the president became involved in an improper relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky. Upon public exposure in 1998, this revelation sparked a scandal that consumed Clinton's second term of office.

On May 6, 1994, Paula Jones, a former Arkansas state employee, filed a sexual harassment lawsuit against Clinton regarding his conduct while governor of Arkansas. On January 7, 1998, Lewinsky filed an affidavit in the Jones case denying a sexual relationship with Clinton.

Lewinsky had confided in friend and coworker Linda Tripp about her affair with Clinton. Tripp had taped her telephone conversations with Lewinsky. In October 1997, Tripp gave these tapes to Michael Isikoff of Newsweek. The magazine delayed publishing information on the alleged affair. Later, when Tripp learned of Lewinsky's false affidavit in January 1998, she contacted the office of Whitewater Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr. On January 17, 1998, the same day that Clinton gave his deposition in the Jones lawsuit denying any sexual involvement with Lewinsky, Drudge Report, a news Web site, reported that Newsweek "killed a story that was destined to shake official Washington to its foundation." The following day Matt Drudge identified Monica Lewinsky. On January 21, The Washington Post published the story.

On January 26, 1998, Clinton proclaimed at a White House press conference, "I want to say one thing to the American people. . . . I did not have sexual relations with that woman, Miss Lewinsky. I never told anyone to lie, not a single time; never. These allegations are false."

On August 17, 1998, Clinton became the first sitting president to testify before a grand jury investigating misconduct. In his testimony, he admitted to a sexual relationship with Lewinsky. Later that evening, the president delivered a national address of slightly over 500 words. Clinton took responsibility for the "inappropriate relationship" and for having misled people, but he maintained that he had he not asked anyone to lie, destroy evidence, or take any unlawful action. In the final section, he criticized the Independent Counsel for carrying out an investigation of 20-year-old business dealings and then had moved into unrelated matters involving his private life. Clinton insisted that this matter was between him, his family, and his God.

That same year, Clinton gave two subsequent addresses on August 28 in Martha's Vineyard and on September 11 at the National Prayer Breakfast. These three rhetorical efforts have received considerable scholarly attention as instances of political image repair.

On December 19, 1998, the Republican-controlled House of Representatives forwarded two articles of impeachment—perjury before the grand jury and obstruction of justice—to the United States Senate. On February 12, 1999, the Senate rejected both articles of impeachment. Although Clinton's conduct was unfortunate, it was generally believed that it did not rise to the level of "high crimes and misdemeanors." Interestingly, Clinton's public approval ratings stayed well above 50% during this period.

The impeachment and its aftermath have engendered an ongoing debate about the boundaries between the public and private lives of politicians. The increasing intimacy of American politics has faded the old lines between the official and the personal.

The Emerging New Media and Politics

The Clinton presidency coincided with a changing media environment. The conservative talk-radio era began in earnest with the national syndication of the Rush Limbaugh Show in 1988. By 1993, the Internet had gained critical mass. In 1996, MSNBC and Fox News joined CNN as providers of 24-hour cable news programming.

The Drudge Report first reported Clinton's affair with Lewinsky. The scandal became a mainstay of emergent new broadcast media. In this environment, conspiracy stories circulated about the Clintons. These controversies included their alleged involvement in the murder of presidential aide Vince Foster and Bill Clinton's serial promiscuity assisted by Arkansas state troopers.

Critics have examined the Clinton presidency through a postmodern lens. Whether talking of "boxers or briefs" on MTV, playing saxophone on Arsenio Hall, or being represented as a character type in The West Wing, Primary Colors, Wag the Dog, and The American President, Clinton's image was obviously constructed from both material and simulated discourses.

Clinton and the Post-Presidency

Clinton's post-presidency has focused on four areas: bringing economic opportunity to the poor, promoting education and citizen service for young people, fighting HIV/AIDS, and advancing religious, racial, and ethnic reconciliation. Clinton is most recognized for his HIV/AIDS efforts in Africa and joining former President George H. W. Bush in fundraising for tsunami relief in Asia and for Hurricane Katrina victims in the United States.

Clinton's post-presidential years are strongly connected to his wife's rise to political prominence. Hillary was elected U.S. Senator from New York in 2000 and 2006. She is a frontrunner for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination. Positioned as a moderate, Senator Clinton is the heir to her husband's political legacy.

Ronald Lee and Kane M. Click

See also Clinton, Hillary Rodham; Lewinsky, Monica; Political Advertising

Further Readings

Bennett, W. L. (2006). News: The politics of illusion (7th ed.). New York: Longman.

Blaney, J. R., & Benoit, W. L. (2001). The Clinton scandals and the politics of image restoration. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Clinton, W. J. (2004). My life. New York: Vintage Books.

Denton, R. E., Jr., & Holloway, R. L. (Eds.). (2003). Images, scandal, and communication strategies of the Clinton presidency. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Harter, L. M., Stephens, R. J., & Japp, P. M. (2000). President Clinton's apology for the Tuskegee syphilis experiment: A narrative of remembrance, redefinition, and reconciliation. Howard Journal of Communication, 11, 19–34.

Morrison, T. (1998). Clinton as the first black president. New Yorker, 74, 31–35.

Murphy, J. M. (1997). Inventing authority: Bill Clinton, Martin Luther King, Jr., and the orchestration of rhetorical traditions. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 83, 71–89.

Parry-Giles, S. J., & Parry-Giles, T. (2002). Constructing Clinton: Hyperreality and presidential image-making in postmodern politics. New York: Peter Lang.

Parry-Giles, T., & Parry-Giles, S. J. (1996). Political scopophilia, presidential campaigning, and the intimacy of American politics. Communication Studies, 47, 191–205.

Starr, K. W. (1998). The Starr report: The findings of Independent Counsel Kenneth W. Starr on President Clinton and the Lewinsky affair. New York: Public Affairs.

CNN (Cable News Network)

The Cable News Network (CNN), a division of Turner Broadcasting System, Inc., a Time Warner Company, is a major global news network that delivers 24-hour news around the world via satellite and cable television outlets. Founded in June 1980 by Ted Turner, the network currently has 24 networks and services, including CNN Headline News, CNN/U.S., CNN International, and CNN.com.

CNN dominates international news coverage thanks to a series of dramatic events that occurred in the post-cold war era, such as the Rwanda genocide in 1994 that killed almost 1 million people, the Chinese government's crackdown on prodemocracy demonstrators in Beijing's Tiananmen Square in 1989, the collapse of East Germany's Communist regime with the Berlin Wall, and the subsequent fall of the Soviet Union.

However, it was with the first live war in the Persian Gulf that CNN emerged as a major global actor in international relations as well as global news coverage. Though the government warned American correspondents to get out of Baghdad, CNN aired the voices of three correspondents, Peter Arnett, John Holliman, and Bernard Shaw, from a Baghdad hotel as they described the sights and sounds of the missile and bomber attacks. Its successful coverage inspired other news networks and agencies to challenge the dominance of the big three American television networks (at that time, CBS, NBC, ABC). For example, in January 1995, BBC launched BBC World, a 24-hour international news channel. In 1996, Al Jazeera, financed by the state of Qatar, was started as the independent Arab news channel and has quickly become the most widely watched television network in the Arab world.

Interestingly, the term "CNN Effect" was coined in an anecdotal story that appeared in The New York Times regarding the impact of CNN's coverage of the Persian Gulf War on the lodging industry. Some scholars have extended the meaning of the CNN Effect, suggesting that the coverage of CNN and other global news networks has influenced global international relations and policy/decision making. Those who study the "CNN Effect" pay special attention to CNN's compelling images that have evoked emotional outcries. They assume that those images force policymakers to intervene militarily in humanitarian crises. However, it is difficult to verify whether the impact on policymakers' decision-making process can be solely attributed to the coverage from CNN. Some anecdotal stories do lend credence to this theory, however. For instance, George Bush, Sr. said that he learned more from watching CNN than from listening to the C.I.A.

CNN now faces numerous challenges from both domestic and foreign competitors. Indeed, its growth has stalled owing to competition from other cable news channels, especially Fox News, established in 1996 by Rupert Murdoch. The Annual Report on American Journalism in 2006 indicated that Fox News not only has taken viewers from other news channels but also that the network has a more loyal audience that watches for longer periods of time.

Joon Soo Lim

Further Readings

Auletta, K. (1993, August 2). Raiding the global village. The New Yorker, pp. 25–30.

Boyer, P. (1998, August 3). The people's network. The New Yorker, pp. 28–33.

Gilboa, E. (2005). Global television news and foreign policy: Debating the CNN effect. International Studies Perspectives, 6, 325–341.

Gilboa, E. (2005). The CNN effect: The search for a communication theory of international relations. Political Communication, 22, 27–44.

Neil, H. (Nov/Dec, 2001). Enter CNN. Columbia Journalism Review, 40(4), 88–89.

Project for Excellence in Journalism. (2007). The state of the news media 2007: An annual report on American journalism. Retrieved July 5, 2007, from http://www.stateofthenewsmedia.org/2007/narrative_newspapers_audience.asp?cat=2&media=3

Whittemore, H. (1990). CNN: The insider story. Boston: Little, Brown.

Coburg-Gotha, Simeon Saxe (1937–)

Simeon II was the Bulgarian monarch from 1943 to 1946. Also known as Simeon Borisov Sakskoburggotski, he served as prime minister of Bulgaria from 2001 to 2005 and is leader of the party National Movement for Simeon the Second.

Simeon II was heir to the crown of Tsar Boris III (1894–1943) and Tsarina Giovanna (1907–2000), daughter of the Italian King Victor Emmanuel III (1869–1947). On his father's side he is a descendent of the Saxe-Coburg and Gotha line. He was the last Tsar of the Third Bulgarian Kingdom, which, because of his young age, was ruled on his behalf by a Regency Council. After the monarchy was abolished by the 1946 Referendum (its validity is still being disputed), the royal family was expelled from the country without any Act of Abdication or Deposition, though Simeon II was allowed to keep his Bulgarian citizenship. He and his family went to Egypt and in 1951 settled in Spain, where he became involved in business and consultancy. After coming of age (1955), Simeon II proclaimed himself a Tsar in line with the 1884 Turnovo Constitution of Bulgaria. However, the proposals for a referendum to restore the monarchy in the country never gained any large-scale support.

In Madrid, Simeon II graduated from Lycée Francais, and studied law and political sciences. He is married to the Spanish aristocrat Dona Margarita Gomez-Acebo y Cejuela (born 1935), and they have four sons and one daughter. After half a century of exile Simeon II came to Bulgaria for the first time in 1996 and was enthusiastically hailed in all towns and villages on his tour. He had great plans to become involved in Bulgarian politics and ran in the 2001 presidential elections but was impeded by the decision of the Constitutional Court that he had not lived permanently in the country in the last 5 years. In April 2001 he created the political organization, National Movement for Simeon the Second (NMSS) and 3 months later won a staggering victory at the parliamentary elections. Simeon II headed the 85th Government of Bulgaria (2001–2005) in coalition with the Movement for Rights and Freedoms (the invariable power balancer in the country after 1989). The major achievements of his government were the adoption of the country by NATO (2004) and the signing of the Accession Act of the European Union (2005). During his term most of the nationalized royal estates were restored. NMSS ranked 2nd in the 2005 parliamentary elections and together with MRF were represented in the coalition cabinet, headed by winner BSP. The first Bulgarian EU Commissioner comes from the ranks of NMSS: Meglena Kouneva (born 1957), minister for European affairs and chief negotiator for Bulgaria with the EU.

Lilia Raycheva

See also Bulgaria, Democratization

Collor de Mello, Fernando (1949–)

Fernando Collor de Mello was the president of Brazil from 1990 to 1992. Collor was a reporter and heir of a communication company, as well as the founder of the Partido da Reconstrucao Nacional—PRN (National Reconstruction Party). Collor was the first president of Brazil elected by popular vote since 1960.

Collor's objective was well known to the Brazilian electorate. During his political campaign, he portrayed himself as the cacador de marajas, a person who would combat inflation and corruption and defend the poor. His entire political campaign involved the divulgation of these characteristics. In addition, due to his enthusiasm in combating corruption in Brazil, he was portrayed by the media as a young, vigorous candidate. Collor always tried to maintain a good relationship with the media because he knew the media were the channel to communicating with the electorate. As a result, he became known by the electorate through newspapers, magazines, and TV stations.

On his second day in office, Collor announced the Plano Collor (Collor Plan), which aimed to reorganize the national economy. Because of the plan, prices and salaries were frozen temporarily, consumers' checking and savings accounts were confiscated by the government, and layoffs in the government and privatizations of public companies were implemented to reduce wasted government funds. In addition, the plan established that people who had money in the bank could only withdraw a certain amount instituted by the government.

The objective of the Plano Collor was to stop government spending, prevent inflation, and modernize the economy. Although the confiscation drastically reduced inflation, it also triggered an economic recession, a collapse in industrial production, the closure of industries, and an increase in unemployment.

At the end of 1990, a second plan was employed to stop the economic recession: the Plano Collor II (Collor Plan II). This plan failed to accomplish its objectives as well, and led the country deeper into an economic recession and aggravated current social problems.

In 1992, Collor's brother revealed a network of corruption in Collor's government that led to investigations by the National Congress and the press. In September of 1992, the Chamber of Deputies authorized the Senate to press charges against Collor, accusing him of corruption and announcing his impeachment. Throughout the country several rallies took place to support the impeachment of the president. During this period, students formed their own rallies and painted their faces with green and yellow. This movement was known as Os Caras Pintadas (The Painted Faces).

In December of 1992, Collor resigned as president of Brazil hours before the Senate declared him guilty of corruption. Because of his impeachment, Collor was not allowed to run for any political position for 8 years.

Juliana de Brum Fernandes

See also Brazil, Media and the Political System

Further Readings

Conti, M. S. (1999). Noticias do Planalto: A imprensa e Fernando Collor [News from the Planalto: The press and Fernando Collor]. São Paulo, Brazil: Companhia das Letras.

Rosenn, K. S., & Downes, R. (1999). Corruption and political reform in Brazil: The impact of Collor's impeachment. Miami, FL: University of Miami Iberian Studies Institute.

Comejo, Peter

See Nader, Ralph

Commander in Chief

The short-lived evening drama, Commander in Chief, lifted the glass ceiling from the White House for President Mackenzie Allen, played by Oscar-winning actress Geena Davis. As the standing vice president of the United States, Mackenzie Allen is promoted to the oval office following the death of President Bridges, played by Will Lyman. Mackenzie Allen's ascent is marred by controversy as the dying president and Allen's entire party ask for her resignation. The pilot focuses on the difficult decision Allen must make: to comply with the wishes of her own party or take the oath of office. Episode plots are driven by numerous events that explore potential problems often associated with women in leadership positions and potential concerns political constituents may have with respect to women in high-level political positions. Many of the episodes explore the challenging roles President Mackenzie faces serving as the commander in chief, mother, and wife simultaneously. In addition, her family must adjust to their new roles as the children of a standing president and the First Gentleman. The drama explored in this series questions the conflicting roles, stereotypes, and assumptions the characters, and general public, may hold about women in leadership positions.

The pilot aired on September 27, 2005, and the final episode aired on June 6, 2006. Commander in Chief opened with rave reviews a large audience. It drew national attention to the possibility of a woman being elected to serve as the commander in chief of the United States, and particularly to the political viability of Hillary Clinton and Condoleezza Rice. The early episodes of the show attracted an audience of 14.7 million viewers, and these high numbers were attractive to advertisers. Geena Davis received a Golden Globe Award for Best Performance by an Actress in a Television Series, Drama. Donald Sutherland also received acclaim in the role of the president's constant antagonist, the Speaker of the House in the series. Although the series practically exploded onto the air, it quickly lost an audience and was plagued by production and directorial changes. The show received high initial ratings from a select audience during its short run and was considered by many to be a potential counterpoint to the popular West Wing series on NBC. Rod Lurie, responsible for the writing and directing of the first three episodes (exclusively and in partnership with others) was replaced by numerous executives, which also affected the continuity and viability of the series.

Jerry Miller

Further Readings

Commander in Chief Web site: http://abc.go.com/primetime/commanderinchief/summaries/overview.html

Commentary, Political

Political commentary is a journalistic genre in press, radio, television, and Internet where journalists analyze or discuss current events. Political commentary often appears in news contexts but is also frequently in opinion sections in newspapers and in special programs or shows in broadcast media. Notably, it has become more common to see political commentaries by non-journalists, such as lobbyists and former politicians.

Political commentary has been an important aspect of political journalism in most democratic countries. Besides the informative role of providing political news and mirroring alternative political positions, the argumentative role of journalists to comment or analyze political developments has been widely acknowledged as a basic professional function and a necessary complement to objective reporting. Comparative studies of journalist perceptions of political commentary show that a majority in most countries considers the analytical function of the media to be important or very important.

The political commentary has similarities to both news and views pieces in the media; like editorials and debate articles it expresses opinions, and like news articles it focuses on current events. However, the distinctive feature of the political commentary is its free role of commenting and expressing opinions about what is going on in society, without a declared political party affiliation or an ideologically consistent perspective in the long run. Political commentators do evaluate parties or candidates but not with the intention of changing public opinion in a certain political direction.

Historically, the strengths of such commentary-oriented journalism have varied in different parts of the world. Media systems in continental Europe, and especially in the Mediterranean area, have been characterized by political parallelism, with strong advocacy journalism, a more active journalistic role, and a party press system reflecting the institutional ties between media and politics. In liberal media systems, such as the United States and Britain, political commentary was initially more controversial with regard to existing professional and neutral journalistic values. However, political commentary soon developed as a natural part of more market-oriented media systems.

Today, political commentary appears frequently in most media systems around the world, and it is a distinct feature of contemporary political communication. The global rise of the commentary function of the media has different explanations. In times of declining political trust in the most advanced democracies, the neutral reporting position has come under pressure and encouraged a more active and critical journalistic role. Furthermore, structural media changes, such as increased competition, commercialization and production demands, have facilitated the transformation of journalists and journalistic formats toward a more interpretative and speculative direction.

Gradually, television has developed as the most important arena for the political commentary in modern democracies. Commentaries appear in both ordinary daily newscasts and in special weekly television shows focusing on current affairs. One form of television journalism with its roots in political commentary is the so-called punditocracy, a term first developed by the American columnist Eric Alterman, who describes a special group of political commentators in television offering inside political opinions and forecasts in the elite national media. The concept of "political pundit" has become central when explaining the rapid development of political commentary as somewhat of an opinion industry in media societies.

The political commentary is nowadays a prominent feature of election campaign news, in the form of news analysis pieces in newspapers, journalists interviewing journalists, sections in broadcast media, and blogs on the Internet. The analyst's role, further strengthened by the more frequent use of opinion polls, has come to overshadow other journalistic functions. Such commenting on polls is a fairly easy type of political journalism, not too expansive and with great possibilities to dramatize the stories and attract the audience. One main explanation for this coverage is that a focus on the "horse race" and comments on polls often avoids the accusations of being biased, as the polls reflect a constructed picture of reality form which interpretations can be drawn. Another explanation is the desire by newspaper columnists and broadcast commentators to demonstrate their skills and to be recognized for their success in predicting election outcomes.

The political commentary is not uncontroversial. Some research indicates that the distinction between news and views has become more obscure in modern media culture. This kind of material often appears in conjunction with news, without being explicitly labeled as news analysis or commentary, thus making it more difficult to be recognized by the public. Today, opinion journalism coexists with objective journalism in most parts of the world, sometimes clearly differentiated, but sometimes mixed more freely. Generally, political commentary is characterized by the lack of a recognizable code of ethics.

Similarly, research has focused on the effects of the rise of the 24-hour news cycle and the increased media competition for public attention. In order to fill the news hole and attract the audience, there is a constant need for provocative, deviating and entertaining political commentary. Content analyses of political commentators confirm that appearance on television encourages extreme opinions, shortcuts and entertainment values. This has raised a debate whether such political commentaries actually represent and serve the public or mislead and distort public opinion.

The defense of the political commentary often focuses on the fact that these kinds of analyses and interpretations in the media actually offer greater opportunities to understand complex societal issues. The argument is based on the need for guidelines and recommendations in a more complex society, which enables the public to be increasingly aware of the majority of the issues. This is perceived as particularly important, as journalistic communication in general is increasingly 'chaotic' in its structure and effects.

Finally, the degrees of effect that political commentary has on public opinion are disputed, but some research indicates a very strong effect. An American study comparing different factors influencing changes in public opinion found that political commentators were the most important category, along with popular presidents.

Lars W. Nord

See also Editorials; Journalism, Political; News Coverage of Politics; Pundits; Punditry

Further Readings

Alterman, E. (1999). Sound and fury. The making of the punditocracy. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Hallin, D. C., & Mancini, P. (2004). Comparing media systems. Three models of media and politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Hamilton, J. T. (2004). All the news that's fit to sell. How the market transforms information into news. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Kovach, B., & Rosenstiel, T. (1999). Warp speed. America in the age of mixed media. New York: Century Foundation Press.

Lippman, W. (1997). Public opinion. New York: Free Press. (Original work published 1922)

Page, B. I. (1996). Who deliberates? Mass media in democracy. Chicago: Chicago University Press.

Patterson, T. E. (1993). Out of order. New York: Vintage Books.

Weaver, D. H. (1998). The global journalist. News people around the world. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press.

Commercial Speech

See Federal Trade Commission

Commission on Presidential Debates

The Commission on Presidential Debates (CPD) has sponsored U.S. general election presidential debates since 1988. The CPD's stated mission is found on its Web site (www.debates.org):

> The Commission on Presidential Debates (CPD) was established in 1987 to ensure that debates, as a permanent part of every general election, provide the best possible information to viewers and listeners. Its primary purpose is to sponsor and produce debates for the United States presidential and vice presidential candidates and to undertake research and educational activities relating to the debates. The organization . . . is a nonprofit, nonpartisan corporation.

As noted in the mission statement, the CPD was formed in 1987. The then chairs of the Republican and Democratic National Committees, Frank Fahrenkopf and Paul Kirk, created the Commission based on recommendations from two studies—the 1985 National Election Study and a 1986 Twentieth Century Fund study of presidential debates chaired by former Federal Communications Commission chair Newton Minow. Both concluded that presidential debates needed to be institutionalized and that a new entity, with the sole purpose of sponsoring general election presidential debates, should be formed. The recommendations included having the two parties start the Commission as a way of ensuring participation by candidates. Although the party chairs were involved in the CPD's formation, the political parties have no relationship to the CPD because it was chartered as a nonprofit, nonpartisan 501(c)(3) education organization.

Currently, Fahrenkopf and Kirk continue to chair the CPD and are guided by 10 directors. An executive director oversees the day-to-day functioning of the CPD and the production of the debates. As a 501(c)(3), the CPD cannot accept funds from political organizations, and it does not participate in any partisan activities, nor does it lobby. Funding to run the CPD and to produce the debates comes from private funding sources. Examples of past sponsors include the American Association of Retired Persons (AARP), American Airlines, Discovery Channel, the Ford Foundation, the Century Fund, and the Knight Foundation. Communities bid for the opportunity to host a debate and are also required to raise local funds to offset costs of the production. Information on how to be a debate site is also found on the CPD's Web site.

In addition to staging general election presidential and vice presidential debates, the CPD also engages in a variety of voter education projects. Its most prominent is DebateWatch. Through a set of over 100 voter education partners, the CPD has enabled researchers to gather reactions to the debates in both survey and focus group formats. The CPD has relied on academic research in preparing its formats. The CPD has also sponsored a variety of forums after the debates at which panelists, campaign staffers, and academic researchers discussed the impact of the debates and how to improve them in subsequent election cycles. The CPD staff has produced a video and print material to assist sponsors of local and state debates and has advised the media in new democracies on how to develop their own debate traditions.

Although the CPD has successfully produced debates since 1988, thus achieving the goal of institutionalizing debates, the process has not been without its problems or detractors. Because candidates stage campaigns independent of even party control, it is difficult for an entity such as the CPD to guarantee that candidates will debate or will debate on the dates selected and with the formats proposed. With the exception of 2000, the CPD was not at the negotiating table with the candidates when they either accepted or rejected the CPD's proposal, and the debate over the debates has occurred in each cycle. Although the CPD has no direct ties to political parties, it is referred to as bi-partisan rather than non-partisan by most media because of its origins and its co-chairs' identification with the major parties. Even though the CPD put Ross Perot into the 1992 debates, it has been criticized for not providing minor party and independent candidates with an equal opportunity for participation even though they currently use the same criteria that the League of Women Voters used when they sponsored debates.

Despite criticisms, the record shows that the CPD successfully produced debates over five election cycles that introduced new formats, emphasized voter education and research, and included citizen participants. The CPD has preserved the historical record of all televised general election debates on its Web site and, through a series of interviews with debate participants, provided material for a Public Broadcasting System (PBS) special in 2000.

Diana B. Carlin

See also Debates; DebateWatch

Further Readings

Carlin, D. B., & McKinney, M. S. (1994). The 1992 presidential debates in focus. Westport, CT: Praeger/Greenwood.

Kraus, S. (Ed.). (2000). Televised presidential debates and public policy. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Communications Act of 1934

The Communications Act of 1934 and its amendments is the foundation upon which contemporary U.S. telecommunication policy is built. The 1934 act borrowed heavily from the Radio Act of 1927, a temporary measure when it was passed, intended to stabilize the burgeoning but chaotic radio industry of the mid-1920s. The 1927 act was written into the 1934 act, adding communications via common carrier and television.

The Radio Act of 1927

By the early 1920s radio was a worldwide craze. Public demand for receivers was high with technology available to nearly everyone to make their own home-made receiver. New radio stations were signing on at a rapidly accelerating rate simply because they could; the Radio Act of 1912 declared the secretary of commerce to be the regulatory authority over radio, but the secretary was compelled by law to issue licenses to all who applied for one. In 1922 there were 5 radio stations on the air; in 1923 there were 556. To avoid interference with other stations, broadcasters changed frequencies, raised operating power, and/or moved their facilities. The result was an industry headed for mutually assured destruction. Attempts at self-regulation failed in a series of radio conferences convened at the behest of then–Secretary of Commerce Herbert Hoover.

The Radio Act of 1927 was enacted on February 23 to address the crisis. The legislation conceptualized radio broadcasting as an industry in its own right, not as a means of point-to-point communication or as a means of ensuring public safety (as did the Wireless Ship Act of 1910 and the Radio Act of 1912). The 1927 act created a five-member Federal Radio Commission (FRC) with the discretionary authority the secretary of commerce lacked under the 1912 act. Commissioners were nominated by the president of the United States and confirmed by Congress and served overlapping terms to maintain operational continuity. No more than three commissioners were permitted to represent any single political party. The FRC was to share regulatory authority with the secretary of commerce (although authority was never vested in the secretary of commerce) and after 1 year the FRC was to sunset, leaving the secretary of commerce as the sole regulatory authority. Sorting out the chaos was a daunting task, and Congress extended the sunset deadline twice. Congressional attempts to make the FRC a permanent body failed.

The legislation created the FRC's guiding regulatory criterion—the "public interest, convenience, and necessity" (PICN). The act did not define PICN, though, and the FRC gave much attention to clarifying PICN in the first 2 years of its existence. Congress did not define the PICN standard in specific terms, leaving it to be defined by case law. The legislation declared the airwaves were a utility owned by the public and charged the FRC to regulate broadcasters so as to guard the interests of the owners of the airwaves by issuing licenses to operators who wished to use that utility. The Commission was forbidden to censor radio broadcasters (in Section 29 of the 1927 act, in Section 326 of the 1934 act), but was given the discretion to create regulations and to punish broadcasters' subsequent offensive actions. Further authority was given to the Commission to renew the licenses of broadcasters who served the public interest: to revoke the licenses, fine, and/or imprison broadcasters who did not; to classify stations; to prescribe the nature of service to be provided; to assign frequencies; to determine transmitter power; to create regulations to prevent interference; and to set up zones of coverage areas. Upon enactment, the Radio Act of 1927 revoked all existing commercial radio licenses and required all operators to re-apply for new ones. All but a handful were granted, but the exceptions are notable; among them was Dr. John Brinkley, the infamous "goat gland" doctor who operated KFKB in Milford, Kansas. Brinkley invited ailing radio listeners to send letters describing their symptoms, and after reading them on the air Brinkley prescribed medical cures that required his own widely available patent medicines. The FRC found Brinkley's actions to fail the public interest standard and did not renew his radio license, the first to fail re-application. In 1933, the Supreme Court affirmed the PICN standard along with the FRC's authority to use PICN as an administrative yardstick (Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Brothers, 1933).

The Communications Act of 1934

The transition from the Radio Act of 1927 to the Communications Act of 1934 was relatively uneventful compared to the transition from the Radio Act of 1912 to the Radio Act of 1927. There was already order on the airwaves, and an apparatus by which to administer law already existed. The Communications Act of 1934 did, however, bring change.

Enacted on June 19, the 34-page Communications Act of 1934 created a permanent administrative body, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), at the request of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, and incorporated virtually all of the Radio Act of 1927, including the cornerstone principles of public ownership of the airwaves and the PICN standard. The FCC was vested with broader regulatory authority that included all radiotelephone activity, including the newly developing broadcast media FM radio and television, and added interstate telegraph and telephone communication (which had previously been under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission) and wire and wireless common carrier industries (which had been under the control of the Department of Commerce).

The 1934 act was organized in a series of six titles. Title I outlined general provisions, including the responsibilities and organization of the FCC. Title II dealt with telephone and telegraph common carriers. Title III contained the provisions retained from the Radio Act of 1927. Title IV described procedural and administrative provisions. Title V dealt with the range of forfeitures the FCC could assess. Title VI dealt with miscellaneous provisions, including the repeal of the Radio Act of 1927. When the Cable Communications Policy Act (see below) was enacted in 1984, it was added as Title VI to the 1934 act. It details regulations for the cable television industry, including video delivery by telephone companies.

Two sections of the Communications Act of 1934, both found in Title III, are directly relevant to political communications on the broadcast media. Section 312 indicates the commission may revoke a broadcast license "for willful or repeated failure to allow reasonable access or to permit purchase of reasonable amounts of time for the use of a broadcasting station by a legally qualified candidate for Federal elective office." And Section 315 (Section 18 in the 1927 act) states "if any licensee shall permit any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, he [sic] shall afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station." These sections are relevant only to radio and television broadcasters, who use the public utility to disseminate their messages.

Significant Amendments to the Communications Act of 1934

The Van Deerlin 1978 Rewrite Attempt

On June 7, 1978, Congressman Lionel Van Deerlin, then chair of the U.S. Subcommittee on Communication, unveiled draft legislation that proposed a "basement-to-attic" rewrite of the Communications Act of 1934. The major proposals in the rewrite included:

1. Total deregulation of radio, including elimination of the Fairness Doctrine and the equal time rules.
2. Extension of TV licenses and replacement of the Fairness Doctrine for television with broader expectations of "equitable" coverage and elimination of the equal time requirements.
3. Imposition of limitations on station ownership (maximum of 10—5 radio and 5 TV).
4. Deregulation of cable TV at the federal level.
5. Establishment of a license fee for spectrum.

Although Congress took no action on the Van Deerlin bill, it remains an important landmark. Many of the recommendations proposed by Van Deerlin eventually became FCC policy, either by an act of Congress (the extension of broadcast licenses, raising broadcast station ownership caps, and to some extent deregulating cable TV at the federal level) or unilateral FCC action (ending enforcement of the Fairness Doctrine).

The Cable Communications Policy Act

This legislation fundamentally deregulated the cable industry in 1984, placing primary regulatory authority upon the municipality. Programming rules and subscription fee limits were lifted.

The Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act

A result of the Cable Communications Policy Act was rapidly increasing cable subscription fees. Reacting to public outcry, Congress passed the Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act in November 1992, a bill which restored cable TV rate regulation. It also contained program access provisions and required that cable system operators must gain retransmission consent from local broadcast television stations even if the cable system had to compensate the TV station. On the other hand, TV stations licensed to the city served by the cable system could forfeit compensation and evoke the long-standing "must-carry" clause, earning channel on the cable system.

The Communications Act of 1996

Alternatively known as the Telecommunications Act of 1996, the purpose of the legislation was "to promote competition and reduce regulation in order to secure lower prices and higher quality services for American telecommunications consumers and encourage the rapid deployment of new telecommunications technologies." Although leaving the mandate to serve the public interest in place, the act's effects were manifest primarily in the radio broadcasting industry. Three important provisions of the act provided the following:

1. Radio and television broadcast station ownership limits were increased to 35% of the total potential nationwide audience, with market-by-market numeric limits established for radio; the more stations licensed to a market, the higher the number of licenses a single owner may hold (the cap was later raised to 39%).
2. The duopoly (a.k.a. "one-to-a-market") rule for radio was removed.
3. A broadcaster should expect license renewal (and competing licenses would not be allowed) provided the broadcaster had no serious violation of PICN standards; the licensing period was extended to 8 years for both radio and television broadcasters.

With an assurance of license renewal and the removal of key ownership limits, large radio chains grew in historic proportions as a result, the most salient among them Clear Channel Communications, growing to over 1,200 radio stations by 2001. Other provisions of the act removed regulatory barriers between common carrier systems and cable television operators, established a TV program rating system, required the V-chip to be installed in all new television receivers, and removed cross-ownership barriers between broadcast television networks and cable networks.

Robert Gobetz

See also Equal Time Provision; Fairness Doctrine

Further Readings

Communications Act of 1934, Pub. L. No. 416 (June 19, 1934). Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.

Communications Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104–104, 110 Stat. 56 (1996). Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.

Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Brothers Bond & Mortgage Company, 289, U.S. 266 (1933, May 8).

Francois, W. E. (1986). Mass media law and regulation (4th ed.). New York: Macmillan.
Kahn, F. J. (1984). Documents of American broadcasting (4th ed.). Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.
Radio Act of 1927, Pub. L. No. 632 (February 23, 1927). Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.
Sterling, C. H., & Kittross, J. M. (2002). Stay tuned: A concise history of American broadcasting (3rd ed.). Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.

Communism

Communism is a political and economic system that emerged in the 19th century and gained currency as a response to the problems of industrialization in Western Europe and the United States. Communism centered upon common ownership of property and distribution of goods and services based on need and not individual wealth or social class. Based in part upon utopian and socialist writings, communism was presented as a form of socialism in the Communist Manifesto, written by Karl Marx and Fredrich Engels in 1848.

With the Russian Revolution in 1917, communism became the ideological framework that would guide the Soviet Union and eastern bloc nations for the next 60 years. Revolutionaries in China turned to a form of communism in their rise to power in 1949 and activists in Korea, Vietnam, and Cuba adopted communism in the 1950s and 1960s to justify their crusade and offer a form of governing. In the United States and Western Europe, small, organized communist organizations sought political power at various times but never achieved any significant degree of electoral success. With economic pressures and demands for democratic reforms, the Soviet Union collapsed in the early 1990s and communism became a minor political party in Russia, in former Soviet satellite nations, and in eastern bloc nations.

Although many Americans in the early 20th century objected to hardships faced by the working class and excessive consumption by the wealthy, they did not turn to communism in large numbers. Most sought reform, not revolution, either by joining socialist organizations and/or labor unions or by supporting the reforms offered by the populists of the late 19th century and later the progressive movement platform in the early 20th century. Even the Great Depression of the 1930s, with massive unemployment and economic dislocation, failed to energize a significant communist movement in the United States.

After World War II, the United States and the Soviet Union competed for global power in a "cold war" which pitted the values of Western democracy against communism. In American political culture, communism became a dominant theme in both campaign and policy-making communication. Conservative leaders in the United States, beginning with Richard Nixon in the 1950s, Barry Goldwater in the 1960s, and Ronald Reagan in the 1970s and 1980s, presented the battle against communism as the defining ideological crisis of the age. Powerful metaphors describing the destructive force of communism were pervasive in political debates in post–World War II America, including such terms as the iron curtain, containment, the domino theory, and the cancer of communism.

The dismantling of the Soviet Union in the early 1990s and economic reforms in China and Vietnam left few communist governments in power around the world and no organized effort to install communism in Western democracies.

C. Brant Short

See also Castro, Fidel; Marx, Karl; McCarthy Hearings; Russia, Democratization and Media

Further Readings

Black, E. (1970). The second persona. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 56(2), 109–119.
Ilkka, R. J. (1977). Rhetorical dramatization in the development of American communism. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 65(4), 413–427.
Marx, K., & Engels, F. (1848). Communist manifesto. New York: Signet.

Comparing Media Systems

Published in 2004, Comparing Media Systems: Three Models of Media and Politics is probably the most significant and ambitious theoretical analysis of the relationship between media systems and democracy since the Four Theories of the Press by Siebert, Peterson, and Schramm (1956). Based on a survey of media institutions, particularly the press, in 18 West European and North American democracies, the book offers an updated set of models for analyzing and comparing media systems.

Building on their own long-time cooperation and on work by other scholars (particularly Jay Blumler and Michael Gurevitch), authors Daniel C. Hallin, a University of California, San Diego, professor, and Paolo Mancini, an Italian scholar, base their typology on four dimensions by which to carry out comparisons: (1) economic—that is, the development of media markets, particularly low or high levels of a mass circulation press; (2) the degree to which each media system mirrors the main political divisions in the country, which the authors call political parallelism; (3) the level of journalistic professionalization; and (4) the degree of state involvement in the media system.

Historic patterns of difference and similarity among the countries under study have led Hallin and Mancini to arrive at three basic models they call (1) the Mediterranean or polarized pluralist model (Greece, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and, to a lesser degree, France), which, with a high level of political parallelism and high government intervention, is characterized by low professionalization and low levels of media development; (2) the North/Central European or Democratic corporatist model (the Netherlands, Finland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Belgium, Switzerland, Germany, and Austria which is high on all four dimensions; and (3) the North Atlantic or liberal model (Britain, Ireland, the United States, and Canada), which, with low political parallelism and state intervention, is high in levels of professionalism and media development.

The authors show connections between media systems and political systems of the analyzed countries, arguing there is no "mechanistic, one-to-one correspondence." Political system variables influence media systems, interacting with other kinds of factors, such as economic and technological, but the opposite influence can also be detected. At the same time, the political variables discussed reflect patterns of political culture influencing journalists' thinking about their role in society and their professional values. Hallin and Mancini summarize their research by saying these connections "do not arise from one-way causal relationships" and the process described "is really one of co-evolution of media and political institutions within particular historical contexts."

In comparison with the Four Theories of the Press, Hallin and Mancini's book clearly moves beyond, if not outside, the cold war context but at the same time leaves former communist countries out altogether, which admittedly diminishes the number of variables under study and facilitates the analysis.

Although the book is theoretically impressive in scope, the authors admit the media systems of individual countries fit the ideal types they propose "only roughly" and "many media systems must be understood as mixed cases." Reflecting its quality and impact, Hallin and Mancini's work is one of the most highly acclaimed political communication publication in recent years, and as such, it has received awards from Harvard's Kennedy School of Government Center for Press, Politics, and Public Policy, the National Communication Association, and the International Communication Association (Outstanding Book of the Year award for 2005).

Tomasz Płudowski

See also Four Theories of the Press; Press and Politics; Press Theories

Further Readings

Hallin, D. C., & Mancini, P. (2004). Comparing media systems. Three models of media and politics. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Siebert, F. S., Peterson, T., & Schramm, W. (1956). Four theories of the press. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Strömbäck, J. (2005). In search of a standard: Four models of democracy and their normative implications for journalism. Journalism Studies, 6(3), 331–347.

Congress and the Media

Usually the public learns very little from the media about Congress, or at least very little that is favorable to the institution. Numerous academic studies arrive at the same conclusion: Congress receives little respect from the national media. Nonetheless, there is evidence that individual members of Congress do not fare so poorly in local press coverage of their activities. Thus, national press coverage may certainly contribute to the phenomenon of public disdain for Congress even though it has had no effect on the extraordinary high reelection rates for members.

Members of Congress bear some responsibility for the negative coverage of the institution. Members protect their own political interests by attacking the institution in which they serve. Also, candidates for Congress use negative advertising appeals to exaggerate claims of incompetence or impropriety on the part of their opponents. Because the media focus so heavily in campaigns on candidate attacks and accusations of wrongdoing, these communications often become the focus of coverage in elections.

How the Media Cover Congress and Its Members

Studies of media coverage of Congress primarily reveal that members of Congress are either incompetent, corrupt, or both, and that the legislative process does not work as it should. For example, an analysis of all articles on Congress in 10 news dailies during 1 month in 1978 found that journalists focused on conflict, malfeasance, and breach of public trust. Overall, this research suggested that the media generally report little that is good about Congress, reinforcing the view that Congress is a defective institution.

A major study of the impact of newspaper coverage on public confidence in institutions in the late 1970s found that coverage of Congress was much more unfavorable than was coverage of either the presidency or the Supreme Court. An analysis of network news coverage of Congress during a 5-week period in 1976 found that all news stories that presented a point of view about the institution were critical of it.

Another study of congressional coverage during a period in the late 1980s showed that the coverage emphasized scandal and contributed to the legislature's weak reputation. A study of network news reporting on Congress in 1989 concluded that two thirds of the coverage focused on a few episodes of scandal that were unrelated to the normal functions of Congress as a legislative body. Further research conducted in the 1990s also confirmed that press reporting of Congress was generally negative.

Press coverage of Congress over the years has moved from healthy skepticism to outright cynicism. When Congress enacted a 25% pay increase for its members in 1946, for example, both The New York Times and The Washington Post commented that the pay increase was needed to attract top-quality people to public service and that political leaders must be paid a salary commensurate with the responsibilities of public service. The few criticisms of the raise emphasized either the principle of public service as its own reward or the need for an even larger pay increase. More recently, however, the story has been far different. Modern congressional coverage says that the nation's legislators are egregiously overpaid, indulged, and indifferent to the problems of constituents who lack six-figure incomes and fantastic job perquisites. The press portrait of congressional members is one of self-interested, self-indulgent politicians who exploit the legislative process for personal gain. Studies identify the emergence of an aggressive, scandal-conscious media after Watergate as the leading reason for the intense interest in governmental misdeeds, rivalry, and conflict. Many political observers consider the tendency of journalists to focus on scandal and personal wrongdoings to be an investigative reporter mentality fostered by Watergate and inspired by Washington Post reporters Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein.

Journalists confirm this tendency. A Times-Mirror survey found that two thirds of journalists downplay good news and emphasize public officials' failings. Many fear being perceived by their colleagues as "in the tank" with politicians. Furthermore, journalists are all too aware that conflict and scandal interest the public. Intense competition within the print media—which more recently has seen declining revenues—has driven many journalists toward increased scandal coverage to satisfy what they perceive as the public's appetite for such a focus. Scandal, rivalry, and conflict may also be emphasized because the legislative process is tedious and boring. Consequently, reporters avoid writing process and policy stories except when they are related to inter-branch conflicts, rivalries among colorful personalities on Capitol Hill, or scandal.

Journalist David Broder admits that personal scandals are exciting and interesting; stories about institutional reform will put reporters to sleep before they get to the typewriter. He explains that a reporter will have an easier time selling to his or her editor a story of petty scandal than one of substance or consequence. Junket stories fit editors' stereotypes and preconceived notions of congressional behavior.

In addition to being less exciting than scandal, institutional matters are more complicated to understand and to write about in single news stories and columns. Besides, the presidency is the focus of Washington journalism. Journalists often cover lawmaking from the vantage of how the legislature is responding to presidential initiatives. The press perceives Congress as generally incapable of leadership. Media coverage emphasizes that Congress works best under the guiding hand of a strong president attuned to the national interest. Members of Congress, according to much of the media coverage, are primarily concerned with parochial issues.

A partial explanation is the difficulty of identifying a focal point in Congress. The presidency by contrast is easily personalized. Congress lacks a single voice. It presents a cacophony of perspectives, often in conflict. With many leaders and a complicated committee structure, Congress has difficulty competing with the unified and more consistent viewpoint of the presidential branch of government.

Congress and the New Media: 1990s to the Present

The new media today offer the potential for Congress to communicate more effectively with the public—not merely to service the electoral needs of individual members but also to enhance the broader institutional reputation. To date, Congress has made significant advances in the uses of new media. Congressional Web pages, for example, vary substantially in quality. Some offer detailed and useful information that is updated regularly. A positive development in congressional communications is the growing public use of government and public organization Web sites that provide information for citizens on the workings of government, the voting records of elected officials, and information on how to contact legislative offices and federal agencies. Although many Americans with a need for government assistance do not have Internet access, more and more citizens are finding useful information about their government through new means of communications.

Perhaps the greatest difficulty created by new means of communications is the increasingly competitive nature of a news industry driven by the perceived need to deliver information to the public as rapidly as possible. Various Web sites, perhaps most notably the conservative Drudge Report, have frequently "scooped" the leading mainstream media outlets on big stories and thus precipitated a trend whereby more and more of these outlets seek to outpace the competition to break stories. An unfortunate result has been that many respectable news outlets are not as careful as they used to be in sourcing information before reporting to the public. Consequently, increasingly unconfirmed rumors about government officials and activities have been reported, and little of this kind of information has helped in educating the public about Congress and its members. If anything, much of this current trend exacerbates the media tendencies toward sensationalism and distortion of reality.

Another relatively new phenomenon is the rise of the talk radio format, largely a vehicle for communications among conservatives. Talk radio programs tend to be overwhelmingly negative toward Congress, whether Democrats or Republicans control the institution. This information outlet is especially well suited to the presentation of sensational and scandal stories.

Americans thus are relying on a greater variety of sources of information about Congress than ever before, but there is little evidence that the quality of information has overall improved. Without a doubt, for the motivated news consumer, good and reliable information about Congress and its workings is available. The Internet indeed has spawned an unfortunate rush by competing news organizations to produce stories, and thus the reliability of much information about Congress has been compromised. The credibility of news organizations also suffers from this tendency to produce stories too quickly. Yet the Internet is also full of excellent information about the workings of government and is a vast resource for news consumers who understand how to sift though the Web for credible material.

The growth of new media and the election of a Republican majority in Congress in 1994 modernized political communication and institutional response. The emergence of cable television news providing 24/7 coverage meant that news organizations such as MSNBC, CNN, and FOX closely scrutinized every activity on Capitol Hill.

Congressional responsiveness to media attention became more prevalent from the mid-1990s to the present. Newt Gingrich's ascension to Speaker of the House of Representatives also elevated him to celebrity status. Not only were mainstream media (e.g., the networks and major newspapers) covering Congress, but the cultural media were as well (e.g., People, Entertainment Tonight). Moreover, declining ratings by the national networks and waning circulation of the major newspapers meant that traditional media had to compete for a smaller audience. As a result, network news programs featured more personality-driven coverage, and newspapers were promoting more feature pieces in the front section on politicians. For example, the dramatic shutdown of the government in 1995 to 1996 was viewed as a titanic battle between Speaker of the House Gingrich and President Bill Clinton. Gingrich had become such an iconic figure representing the Republican Party that he even appeared on the CBS comedy show Murphy Brown. Thus, congressional politics had transcended the traditional venues of reportage and had become part of cultural and entertainment news.

The rise of personality-driven politics also had a second consequence: declining civility. In the past, congressional relationships had been nurtured, as Democrats and Republicans practiced the norm of mutual respect, and many members even socialized together after work hours. Members may have liked to attack their institution, but they were civil toward one another in Washington. Partisan rancor and incivility eventually displaced the civility that had characterized life on Capitol Hill. The growing partisan divide in Congress was a product of 40 years of nearly uninterrupted Democratic control of the House that was upended in the highly partisan and charged election campaign of 1994. Republicans unveiled an exceedingly negative set of national ads within the last week of the campaign that attacked Clinton and the Democratic Congress. The results created a political and public chasm where the parties and candidates staked claims from which they could not back down. Such public position taking made it difficult to overcome the partisan divide through cooperation.

Thus, the governing and elections processes have been driven further apart; the expectations and promises from election campaigns have not been fulfilled through legislation. For example, although House Republicans did deliver on their "Contract with America"—a 10-point policy platform that Republican House candidates ran on in 1994—their Republican Senate counterparts did not (with few exceptions, such as welfare reform). The publicity about that failure was widely reported in national and local media, enabling Clinton to regain political mobility following the many predictions of his political demise.

Since the mid-1990s, the growth of the Internet has meant that news stories about Congress and other institutions appear instantly and frequently without being vetted for their accuracy across an electronic transom. Politicians oftentimes are forced to react without an opportunity to reflect. This hyper-paced news environment may not only have a deleterious effect on public understanding of government but can also force members of Congress to react through the prism of their party and personal emotiveness rather than reflect rationally.

Television news focuses on an affective-negative emotional reaction rather than a cognitive evaluation of Congress's performance. That same emotive reaction could be heightened further through the immediacy of new media. For example, the 1998–1999 Clinton-Lewinsky scandal first surfaced online through Drudge Report. Reaction was instantaneous and members of Congress became immediate stakeholders to save Clinton's presidency (congressional Democrats) or remove him from office (congressional Republicans). The impending debate, impeachment, and trial of Clinton were highly partisan and created a gulf not only between rank-and-file members of the parties in Congress but also among the leadership.

The growing impact of new media coupled with traditional media has driven members further from the institutional norms that made Congress functional in the past, particularly reciprocity. Reciprocity was the golden rule of congressional comity that bound members to an institutional loyalty that transcended party support. Institutional norms declined precipitously in the 1970s through the 1980s with growing individuation of members who became policy and political entrepreneurs. However, growing partisanship in the late 1990s and early 2000s completely unhinged institutional norms. Political communication by party leaders and rank-and-file members became more message oriented and less policy driven. Ideological conformity became a more important congressional norm than reciprocity; members who advertised independence from partisan norms were sometimes punished. For example, Jane Harman (D-CA), who was the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, was highly supportive of the Bush administration's position on foreign and domestic intelligence gathering following the events of September 11, 2001. Her position angered many of her liberal congressional allies who believed that such activities violated individual civil rights. Such outspoken public support for Bush's policies made it impossible for the incoming Speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi (D-CA), to appoint Harman as chair of the House Intelligence Committee when Democrats recaptured majority control of the House of Representatives in the 2006 election. Pelosi's actions were consistent with the Democrats' communication theme of "a new direction" in the fall campaign. Harman's direction was viewed as obsolete, even if informed by a national tragedy just 5 years earlier.

Implications

The explosion of Web sites, cable and satellite television, and e-mail has made Congress an even more political body. Whereas September 11 provided a temporary diversion from the congressional partisanship that has accelerated from the 1990s to the present, the fact is that congressional members and leaders have become less focused on building institutional structures and more focused on position-taking and image-making. That is not to say that Congress is barren of institutional structures and processes, but instead it places a stronger emphasis on communications and strategy to maximize political support—thus, there is less reflection on issues and a deferral of institutional responsibilities in favor of partisanship.

Mark J. Rozell and Richard J. Semiatin

See also New Media Technologies

Further Readings

Broder, D. (1987). Behind the front page: A candid look at how the news is made. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Davis, R. (1992). Press and American politics: The new mediator. New York: Longman.

Denton, R. E., Jr., & Woodward, G. C. (1990). Political communication in America (2nd ed.). New York: Praeger.

Dye, T. R., & Zeigler, H. (1986). American politics in the media age (2nd ed.). Monterey, CA: Brooks/Cole.

Hess, S., (1994). The decline and fall of congressional news. In T. Mann & N. Ornstein (Eds.), Congress, the press and the public. Washington, DC: Brookings/American Enterprise Institute.

Hibbing, J. P., & Theiss-Moore, E. (1998). The media's role in public negativity towards Congress: Distinguishing emotional reactions and cognitive evaluations. American Journal of Political Science. 42, 475–498.

Mann, T. E., & Ornstein, N. J. (2006). The broken branch: How Congress is failing and how to get it back on track. New York: Oxford.

Maraniss, D., & Weisskopf, M. (1996). Tell Newt to shut up! New York: Simon & Schuster.

Miller, A., Goldenberg, E., & Erbring, L. (1979). Type-set politics: Impact of newspapers on public confidence. American Political Science Review, 73, 67-84.

Norman, J. O. (1983). The open Congress meets the president. In A. King (Ed.), Both ends of the avenue: The presidency, the executive branch, and Congress in the 1980s (pp. 195–211). Washington, DC: American Enterprise Institute.

Price, D. E. (2004). The congressional experience: Transforming American politics. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Rozell, M. J. (1996). In contempt of Congress: Postwar press coverage on Capitol Hill. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Connally, John (1917–1993)

John Bowden Connally was governor of Texas, secretary of the navy, secretary of the treasury, and advisor to both Democratic and Republican presidents. A Democrat and advisor to Lyndon Johnson for most of his political career, he was appointed secretary of the treasury by Richard Nixon. He switched to the Republican Party and was a candidate for president in 1980.

Born near Floresville, Texas, Connally earned a law degree from the University of Texas. In 1937, he volunteered in Johnson's campaign for Congress and was appointed to be his administrative assistant. He managed Johnson's unsuccessful campaign for the Senate, in 1941, and their relationship continued for the next 30 years.

A naval officer on Eisenhower's staff, Connally helped plan the invasion of Italy in 1943. Later, while serving aboard the USS Essex, he was awarded the Bronze Star. In 1946, he founded radio station KVET, joined an Austin law firm, and managed Johnson's reelection to Congress. In the 1948 U.S. Senate election, he was linked to the suspicious late report of 200 votes that provided Johnson the margin of victory. He was in the center of political skirmishes that enabled Johnson to gain control of the Democratic Party in Texas. He continued to function as a key operative for Johnson, managing Johnson's bid for the presidential nomination in 1960 and later managing his successful presidential campaign in 1964.

Handsome and personable, Connally made effective use of speech, debate, and theater training received in high school and college. He benefited politically from Johnson's patronage and financially from ties to wealthy clients.

In 1961, at Johnson's request, President Kennedy appointed Connally as secretary of the navy. He resigned 11 months later to run for governor, his only elective office. Connally was seriously wounded riding in President Kennedy's limousine when Kennedy was assassinated on November 22, 1963. He believed that both Kennedy and he were targeted and refused to accept the Warren Commission's conclusion of only one assassin. Though Connally and Kennedy differed significantly on issues, Connally benefited because they were linked in the public's mind.

Connally, a "hawk" on Vietnam, was named to Nixon's foreign intelligence advisory board in 1969.

In 1971, Nixon named him secretary of the treasury, but amid conflicts with international trading partners and key cabinet members, he resigned in 1972. His name was associated with Nixon's 1972 reelection campaign when he headed a group called Democrats for Nixon. The group sponsored a series of successful television commercials for Nixon's campaign. However, in 1973, Connolly became a Republican and was one of Nixon's choices for vice president when Spiro Agnew resigned, but at the height of the Watergate scandal, Nixon picked Gerald Ford, who was more likely to get congressional confirmation.

There were allegations of involvement in Watergate, and in 1975, Connally was acquitted of bribery and conspiracy in a "milk price" fixing case. Connally was announced for the GOP presidential nomination in 1980, and though he raised more money than the other candidates, he lost in the early primaries and threw his support behind Ronald Reagan to ensure that George Bush did not get the nomination.

In the late 1980s, Connally filed for bankruptcy, and he died on June 15, 1993, of pulmonary fibrosis, likely caused by the gunshot wounds received in 1963.

Jerry L. Allen

See also Johnson, Lyndon B.; Kennedy Assassination

Further Readings

Connally, J., & Herskovitz, M. (1993). In history's shadow: An American odyssey. New York: Hyperion Books.

Connally, N., & Herskovitz, M. (2003). From Love Field: Our final hours with John F. Kennedy. New York: Rugged Land Books.

Reston, J. (1989). The lone star: The life of John Connally. New York: Harper & Row.

Conservative, Conservatism

A conservative is generally defined as a person adhering to or advocating a political philosophy known as conservatism. As a term, conservatism has been used to describe a wide array of ideological viewpoints and has incorporated, to varying degrees, a host of political, social, cultural, and economic ideas. Conservatism's roots extend back to the Enlightenment. Many of the philosophy's particulars were defined by Anglo-Irish political observer Edmund Burke, whose critique of the French Revolution elevated the stage upon which conservative thought began to evolve. American conservatism in the 20th century is no less easily defined and includes strands of free-market liberalism, social and religious conservatism, anticommunism, anti-Statist libertarianism, isolationism, and neoconservatism. Throughout the 20th century, both major political parties in the United States have been associated with conservatism to varying degrees, although by the 1970s, Republicans were generally considered to be more uniformly conservative than Democrats.

Twentieth-century American conservatism has, in many ways, responded to changes in American liberalism and, specifically, expansions in the size and scope of the federal government. For instance, conservatives reacted to expansions in federal power during the Progressive Era (1900 to 1920), the Great Depression and New Deal (1930s), World War II (1941 to 1945), cold war (1945 to 1991), and Great Society (1964 to 1969) eras. Modern American conservatism began to take shape after World War II, when isolationist conservatives lost control of the Republican Party. Cold war anticommunism unified many conservatives in the 1950s and served as a springboard for political leaders like Barry Goldwater, who, in 1964, unsuccessfully ran for the presidency on a platform of anticommunism and smaller government. Other prominent contributors to the coalescence of modern conservative thought include Russell Kirk, William F. Buckley, and Ronald Reagan.

Regional distinction also helped shape modern American conservatism. For many years, conservatism was stereotypically identified as a philosophy of wealthy northeastern elites. Conversely, southern conservatism was long identified with the Democratic Party, the Ku Klux Klan, segregation, and massive resistance to the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s. Beginning in the 1960s, Western conservatism exposed numerous divisions within both major political parties and infused the ideology with a more color-blind, populist, antitax, and antigovernment ethos. Demographic and social changes have also played enormous roles in defining modern conservatism. During the 1960s, a revival in American Protestant evangelicalism coincided with the rise of suburbs. The electoral coalition that arose as a result of widespread dissatisfaction with the nation's moral character and financial health was referred to by many as the "New Right."

More recently, American conservatism has been buoyed by the rise of conservative talk radio hosts such as Rush Limbaugh, who, during the 1990s, gained popularity as the recognized nemesis of the Bill Clinton presidency. During the administration of George W. Bush, conservatism was primarily viewed as a combination of neoconservative foreign policy and social conservatism. Bush's victory in 2004 was credited to adherents from these two conservative strands. After 2004, the conservatism's electoral appeal encouraged a renewed interest in "moral leadership" among political candidates from both parties.

Sean P. Cunningham

See also New Right; Reagan, Ronald; Republican Party

Further Readings

Brands, H. W. (2001). The strange death of American liberalism. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Lassiter, M. D. (2005). The silent majority: Suburban politics in the Sunbelt South. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Schoenwald, J. M. (2001). A time for choosing: The rise of modern American conservatism. New York: Oxford University Press.

Conservative Party, Britain

The Conservative Party, or Tory party, was formed in the late 19th century, and it has shared power alternately with the Labour Party for most of the 20th century. Since 1945, it has been in office for two long periods: 1951 to 1964 and 1979 to 1997. The latter period is particularly significant as it includes the 1979 to 1990 period when Margaret Thatcher was prime minister. The Conservative Party's dominance in the 1980s and 1990s also marked a period in which there were some significant developments in political communication. Moreover, it was a period in which television gradually overtook the press as the new means of mass communication and began to challenge the dominance of the political system. From a different perspective, one could also argue that politicians were beginning to learn to use the media to their advantage.

In the immediate post-1945 period, it was generally acknowledged that the Conservative Party was better organized to exploit the media to its advantage. Unlike the Labour Party, it had no reservations about using outside professional help in achieving its goals, and it was not until the mid-1980s that the Labour Party began to challenge the dominance of the Conservatives. A good illustration of the Conservative Party's use of professionals is the employment in 1948 of Colman, Prentis, and Varley (CPV) to design and place advertisements on its behalf. The use of CPV reflects how the party was able to draw on lessons from the world of business and advertising to achieve its objectives.

Despite these advantages, the party lost power in the 1964 election to a Labour Party with a more modern leader, Harold Wilson, and it was to remain in opposition until 1970. After another period out of office, the party returned to power in 1979 under Margaret Thatcher. In many important ways, Thatcher brought about a change in the way media-politics relations developed. A few examples will illustrate this claim:

- Thatcher famously used Gordon Reece to advise her on how to modulate her voice for public speaking.
- The party successfully used publicists Saatchi and Saatchi in the 1979 election to produce campaign advertising material, some of which is still considered to be of high quality (see http://politics.guardian.co.uk/election2001/images/0,,449826,00.html).
- At a different level, Thatcher employed Bernard Ingham as her press secretary from 1979 to 1990. Ingham was the political (lobby) journalist's bête noir in the 1980s. He used the lobby skillfully to carry out the prime minister's wishes, to bully journalists, and to knife ministerial colleagues in a fashion that occasioned both admiration and hostility. In some respects, he can be seen as a predecessor of Tony Blair's Alastair Campbell in the ways in which he ably controlled the flow of information to the media.

The fall of Thatcher in 1990—at the hands of the party—gave John Major an opportunity to lead the party to victory in 1992, but an economic crisis in 1992 and much scandal paved the way for a modernized and slick new Labour Party, under Tony Blair, in 1997.

The end of the Thatcher period created a major political problem for the Conservative Party as New Labour gradually eroded its traditional middle-ground and middle-class appeal. Its efforts to redefine and to reposition itself brought nothing but failure: It lost three elections in a row (1997, 2001, and 2005) under three leaders, William Hague, Ian Duncan Smith, and Michael Howard. The 2005 election was lost in spite of the employment of the Australian professional campaign manager, Lynton Crosby, to help run the campaign.

Each change of leader exposed a different problem but crucially highlighted the changing dynamics of British politics. With the parties converging in philosophy and each attempting to sway the middle ground where elections are now won and lost, the problem of providing a clear and definitive political strategy remains as difficult as ever. The election of yet another new leader, David Cameron, in 2005 has raised hopes: With Blair suffering from the Iraq issue, among other things, Cameron—young, media savvy, and fresh-faced, not unlike Blair in his day—poses a real challenge. Expectations are high, but polls continue to show that a new face has made little impact on the prospects of voters radically shifting their allegiances. Because Blair stepped down as prime minister in June 2007, Conservatives face a new Labour leader in Gordon Brown.

Ralph Negrine

Further Readings

Ball, S. (n.d.). A brief history of the Conservative Party. Retrieved from http://www.conservatives.com/tile.do?def=party.history.page

Seymour-Ure, C. (1991). The British press and broadcasting since 1945. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

Constructivism

Constructivism is an interdisciplinary school of thought firmly rooted in science, especially biology, and of particular relevance to the understanding of media-generated realities. The champions of this school of thought emphatically reject representationist theories and realist conceptions of perception and share the conviction that objective knowledge is essentially unobtainable. They do not deny the existence of an external world; they negate, however, its unconditional cognitive accessibility and, therefore, insist on a critical examination of how concepts of reality are manufactured. All the varieties of constructivist theorizing, whether centered in neurobiology, psychology, the sociology of knowledge, or communication science, additionally share the fundamental conviction that knowledge does not consist of a direct correspondence with an external reality (correspondence theory of truth) but exclusively and inevitably in the constructions of an observer, a knowing subject. However, these constructions are neither arbitrary nor capricious; on the contrary, they are massively dependent on all sorts of preconditions. Construction is not an individual act of creation, nor a process under conscious control, but something conditioned by nature and culture, history, language, and particularly also by the media that operate as central illustrations of socialisation in modern societies.

Traditions of Constructivism

The central roots of constructivism, to which a particular German brand of communication science specifically relates itself, lie in neurobiology, the sociology of knowledge, cybernetics, and the history of philosophy. The protagonists of a neurobiologically oriented constructivism (e.g., Humberto R. Maturana), when engaged in exploring the processes of color and gestalt perception, came to the conclusion that the brain (of a human) cannot make direct contact with the environment; consequently, they hold the nervous system to be operatively closed. Their claim is that only the brain can construct an infinitely nuanced perceptual world out of the unitary language of neuronal events. In contrast, the approaches of social-constructionism and the sociology of knowledge are based on the thesis that the decisive producer of realities is not the (individual) brain but that reality arises through the structure of a society and its specific culture. Individuals thus appear to be formed and molded by their all-encompassing culture, perceive the world against the background of their origins, and remain receptive to external impressions that may become increasingly hardened and rigidified in the process of socialization. The mathematician and physicist Heinz von Foerster is the founder of the cybernetic variety of constructivism; he completed the exploration of the fundamental principle of cybernetics—the idea of circularity and especially of circular causality—and established its self-application. The result is a dynamic style of thinking, operating with paradoxes and circular theorems, now known as cybernetics of the second order. This style of thinking has certainly left its mark on constructivism as it is perpetually confronted by the logical and methodical problems which inevitably arise from the observation of the observer. Finally, constructivists interested in the history of philosophy (e.g., Ernst von Glasersfeld) have busied themselves with erecting a kind of ancestral gallery: They have been able to show that elements of constructivist thinking can already be found in the work of the early sceptics, in the writings of Giambattista Vico, Immanuel Kant, and Benjamin Lee Whorf. From this angle, constructivism proves to be a variant of scepticism that provides up to date underpinnings to fundamental doubts about human knowledge.

Applications in Communication Science

Constructivist ideas have been discussed intensively in German communication science since the early 1990s; although often attacked vehemently as a kind of baseless subjectivism, they have by now become an indispensable part of the relevant canon of viable theories as they offer new arguments for the critical evaluation of trivial conceptions of communication and communication effects. Constructivism, evidently, focuses our awareness on the normality of misunderstanding, the improbability of successful communication, and the multitude of preconditions affecting every act of communication. A constructivist point of view forces us to revise linear-causal models of communication, which operate with a direct transfer of information and negate the recipient as the central instance of processing: Channel, transmission, transmitter and receiver are misleading metaphors with regard to conceptual content. A constructivist view of things rules out any expectation that an utterance will trigger exactly those thoughts in another person which the speaker had in mind when formulating it, and that, therefore, any content can be expressed in such a way that the addressee must receive precisely what the sender intended.

Finally, constructivism is of importance to the scientific exploration of the effects of communication: it replaces the all too simple (and obviously, quite independently of constructivist criticism, long obsolete) stimulus-response model and the misguided idea of an almighty medium by the concept of the influential receiver. The basic assumptions of meanwhile obsolete concepts of communicative effects should be revised accordingly: Identical stimuli (causes) need not produce identical effects; a (potential) effect is not necessarily dependent on the intensity and the frequency of the stimulus used; stimuli are simply not smoothly transferable parcels of information. In the constructivist perspective, the recipients are the controlling instances that decide the success or failure of media effects: Whatever reaches them is sorted out according to the eigenlogic of their cognitive system. The user-oriented approach is thus supplied with an epistemological foundation; the often quoted key question as to what humans do with the media, what specifics of a medial offer are in fact taken up and made use of by a particular receiver in a specific situation, is once more revitalized.

The greatest provocation—despite the broad compatibility of constructivist insights—in the professional debate seemed to be the assertion that it is essentially unknowable whether an individually generated reality or an image of the world as created by the mass media could be true in an absolute, ontic, sense. The ranking and assessing of images of the world by degrees of verisimilitude, as is characteristic of realist positions, should instead be replaced by the comparative evaluation of different and inevitably observer-dependent realities. Judging by the research activities of constructivistically inspired authors, their dominant interests do indeed concern patterns of selection, different forms of presentation, and variants of the dramatization of reality. The champions of this school of thought insist (among other things, to forestall being reproached with baseless relativism) that their emphasis on the observer-dependence of all knowledge entails accepting responsibility for one's own reality constructions as well as tolerance toward other realities (while, at the same time, rejecting all dogmatic claims to truth).

This means, however, that the constructivist insights themselves cannot claim to be new truths; they provide new up to date arguments in favor of the old sceptical tradition that we must generally distrust human knowledge. They pull the rug from underneath any naive dogmatic belief in science and facts. They sharpen our awareness of the multidimensionality of experience—and make us wary of the truth claims by certain groups that want to impose their descriptions of reality (using all possible ways and means, if considered necessary).

Bernhard Poerksen

Further Readings

Glasersfeld, E. V. (1996). Radical constructivism. A way of knowing and learning. London: Falmer Press.

Merten, K. (1999). Einführung in die Kommunikationswissenschaft. Band 1/1: Grundlagen der Kommunikationswissenschaft [Introduction to communication science. Vol.1/1: Foundations]. Münster: LIT.

Poerksen, B. (2004). The certainty of uncertainty—Dialogues introducing constructivism (A. R. Koeck & W. K. Koeck, Trans.). Exeter, UK: Imprint Academic.

Scholl, A. (Ed.). (2002) Systemtheorie und Konstruktivismus in der Kommunikationswissenschaft [Systems theory and constructivism in communication science]. Konstanz: UVK.

Consultants, Political

By the time political campaigns were national in scope—the first was the campaign to secure ratification of the Constitution, which began in 1787—political consulting was a part of American politics. Candidates received help with their speech making and printed material from unpaid friends and political associates. Candidates also had help in staging what today would be called pseudo-events, often providing food and drink to voters. The first true political consultant was John Beckley. Beckley was the first clerk of the Virginia House of Delegates and the first clerk of the House of Representatives, but he is best remembered as America's first political campaign manager. A close personal friend of Thomas Jefferson, Beckley wrote campaign materials on behalf of the Virginian. Additionally, he arranged for the distribution of pamphlets and copies of Jefferson's speeches, as well as surrogate speakers on behalf of Jefferson in Jefferson's ill-fated 1796 presidential campaign, and again in his successful presidential race of 1800. Determining that Pennsylvania would be the key state in the election, Beckley launched a media blitz flooding the keystone state with Jeffersonian literature, sample ballots, and carefully selected surrogate speakers, who today would be called opinion leaders. Although Jefferson carried Pennsylvania, he lost in 1796. Thus, in Jefferson's successful 1800 race, Beckley organized yet another massive effort on Jefferson's behalf in Pennsylvania but this time extended his operations to parts of New York, Connecticut, and Maryland.

The presidential election of 1828, won by Andrew Jackson, saw sharp advances in electioneering procedures, often engineered by individuals who today would be thought of as consultants. In 1828, New York Senator Martin Van Buren became Jackson's campaign manager. Van Buren pulled together a host of statewide and regional political leaders on Jackson's behalf. He cobbled together a national political organization and in effect was the forerunner of both the modern general consultant and the field operations consultant. Van Buren's organization of statewide and urban leaders eventually reached down to the county and precinct levels. Here local supporters, known as hurrah boys because they constantly punctuated campaign speeches and rallies with cheers of "Hurrah for Jackson," provided a host of functions often served today by political consultants, among them a strong get-out-the-vote effort, which identified potential Jackson voters and made every effort to get them to the polls. They distributed pamphlets, handbills, broadsides, and other printed literature and did advance work for countless parades, dinners, and rallies.

Perhaps the first true contemporary political consultant was Edward Bernays. Best known as the father of public relations, Bernays had become active in government when he was asked to help promote the sale of World War I Liberty Bonds. Virtually every president from Coolidge through Eisenhower asked Bernays for advice, though his advice was not always followed. His last major book, The Engineering of Consent, suggested that government and political leaders could win consent in a rational, scientific, precise manner. He was among the earliest advocates of political polling. However, Bernays offered political advice as an adjunct to his public relations business. It was not until the California husband-and-wife team, Clem Whitaker and Leone Baxter, that a firm was formed and served as the model for contemporary political consulting businesses. Whitaker and Baxter ultimately ran 75 campaigns, from 1934 when they helped elect Republican gubernatorial candidate Frank Merriam until their failed 1967 congressional campaign on behalf of former child star Shirley Temple Black. Among their many successful campaigns were those for California governors Frank Merriam, Earl Warren, and Goodwin Knight.

In 1946 New Yorker Jacob Javits, running for Congress, became the first congressional candidate to rely heavily on a polling firm when he utilized the Elmo Roper organization. Javits subsequently explained that he wanted polls to help him determine the issues to speak upon, not what to say about them. By the 1950s and 1960s candidates were drawing on individuals with a host of consulting specialties. To help them develop and perfect a message, perhaps the most prominent consultants were pollsters and speechwriters and, subsequently, debate coaches. To transmit their messages to the electorate, specialists in radio and television writing and production, often initially drawn out of the advertising industry, were utilized. Moreover, candidates continued to rely heavily on local party precinct organizers and advance people who, much like Jackson's hurrah boys over a century earlier, still did the unglamorous but critical work of identifying the candidate's voters and getting them to the polls and making the arrangements for a variety of public appearances.

With the decline of political parties, the growth of communications technology, and the changes in fundraising and campaign finance laws, campaigns have grown ever more sophisticated. The contemporary era of political consulting is often dated to the 1960s, which saw the presidential campaigns of John F. Kennedy in 1960, Richard Nixon in 1968, and the 1969 creation of the American Association of Political Consultants (AAPC). Since the 1960s, political consulting has become a full-time occupation, as major campaigns now often take 2 or more years and the money involved has grown dramatically. Today, the AAPC recognizes at least 45 different consulting specialties, ranging from advance and event planning, aerial advertising, and Web logs, through video/CD/DVD duplication, voice-over talent, and voter lists. Within the last 20 years the number of firms providing consulting services to political candidates has grown from approximately 250 to over 3,000, and the amount of money spent on political campaigns, at all levels, now well exceeds 4 billion dollars in presidential election years, much of which is utilized to employ the skills of political consultants. Moreover, in recent years American consultants have begun to develop overseas markets, selling their services to candidates in a host of other countries.

Robert V. Friedenberg

See also American Association of Political Consultants; European Association of Political Consultants; Media Consultants

Further Readings

Bimber, B., & Davis, R. (2003). Campaigning online: The Internet in U.S. elections. New York: Oxford University Press.

Friedenberg, R. V. (1997). Communication consultants in political campaigns: Ballot box warriors. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Herrnson, P. S. (2005). Guide to political campaigns in America. Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Jamieson, K. H. (1984). Packaging the presidency: A history and criticism of presidential campaign advertising. New York: Oxford University Press.

Newport, F. (2004). Polling matters: Why leaders must listen to the wisdom of the people. New York: Warner Books.

Perlmutter, D. D. (1999). The Manship School guide to political communication. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

Sabato, L. (1981). The rise of political consultants. New York: Basic Books.

Trent, J. S., & Friedenberg, R. V. (2004). Political campaign communication: Principles and practices (5th ed.). Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Content Analysis

See Methodology

Contract with America

See Gingrich, Newt

Conventions, Political

The nominating convention is the institutionalized mechanism through which political parties in the United States formally nominate candidates for president and vice president during each presidential election cycle. Once primarily instrumental in function, contemporary nominating conventions are predominantly media events serving symbolic and communicative functions. They provide the transition between the primary campaign and the general election. Nominating conventions legitimize the democratic electoral process and the party's candidates, demonstrate party unity, rally party workers, and establish the key issues and positions for the general election campaign.

Nominating Convention Evolution

The 12th amendment of the U.S. Constitution, ratified in 1804, established the Electoral College to govern

President Gerald Ford's supporters at the Republican National Convention, Kansas City, Missouri (August 1976).

Source: Library of Congress, Prints & Photographs Division, LC-DIG-ppmsca-08486.

election of the president and vice president of the United States. The constitution failed to offer specific guidance for nomination of Electoral College delegates or for the process through which the delegates would nominate candidates. Thus, states adopted a range of approaches over time with various degrees of success. Eventually, the nominating convention emerged as the institutionalized approach for nominating presidential and vice-presidential candidates.

Prior to 1832, each party's members of Congress nominated the party's candidate for president. These congressional caucuses thus wielded significant control over who was nominated and ultimately elected. Throughout the early 1800s opposition to the congressional caucus grew, culminating in an open challenge to the process in 1824. The congressional caucus nominee, William Crawford, was nominated by slightly more than one quarter of the Democratic-Republican Party caucus. Three nominees backed by state legislatures challenged Crawford. They were Andrew Jackson, John Quincy Adams, and Henry Clay. In the end, the non-caucus candidates received more support than the congressional caucus nominee did. Crawford ranked third in the electoral vote and fourth in the popular vote for president. As a result, pressure to develop a more open, broad-based, and democratic mechanism for nominating presidential candidates increased and resulted in the move to the political nominating convention in the 1832 presidential election. The Anti-Mason party held the first nominating convention in September 1831, followed by the Democrats and the National Republicans in early 1832.

Party leaders adjusted convention rules as new circumstances introduced new problems, but by 1860, the four instrumental or pragmatic functions of conventions were established as described by Paul T. Goldman, Ralph M. Bain, and Richard C. David. The first pragmatic function was to nominate a united ticket for president and vice president. The second function was to produce a party platform to be shared with the general electorate. A third function was to create a continuous structure to govern political parties; the national committee of each party issued the call to the convention every 4 years and addressed party issues between conventions. The final function, the campaign rally function, opened the nomination processes to public and media scrutiny and energized party members for the general election.

Throughout the latter half of the 19th century, despite the appearance of greater involvement and participation through convention delegations, nominating conventions still primarily legitimized and validated the negotiations of party leaders conducted well before the convention. Delegates were selected through a local or state caucus or convention or were appointed by state party leaders. No formal process linked delegate's voting to the broader voting public. Thus, nominations through conventions were more strongly influenced by the political bosses of the day than by the voters throughout the country.

The Progressive movement of the early 20th century led to multiple election reforms, including the rise of primaries. Throughout most of the early to mid-1900s, party leaders still directed convention outcomes, although primaries provided presidential candidates an opportunity to gather support and to demonstrate their abilities to party leaders, in some cases raising their profile sufficiently to gain nomination (i.e., Dewey in 1948, Eisenhower in 1952). The clash between a nominating convention system and a primary system reached its climax in the 1964 and 1968 presidential elections. In 1964, Republican presidential candidate Barry Goldwater used party caucuses to secure sufficient delegates to win the presidential nomination, despite having won only one contested primary and with low support from Republicans generally. In 1968, presidential candidates Robert F. Kennedy, Jr. and Eugene McCarthy ran strong primary campaigns in an attempt to unseat Vice President Hubert Humphrey as the presumptive Democratic nominee. Following Kennedy's assassination, dramatic confrontations both within and outside the convention hall created vivid images of division within the Democratic Party. Vietnam War protestors, vehement opponents of the Johnson-Humphrey administration war policies, demonstrated in the streets near the convention hotels. Police officers, National Guard troops, and FBI and Secret Service agents met the protestors with force and tear gas. The anti-war factions within the convention, led by Senator Eugene McCarthy and George McGovern, launched multiple challenges on credentials and rules. Despite open division within the convention and without participating in a single primary, Vice President Hubert Humphrey secured the presidential nomination on the first ballot. Not surprisingly, the minority in the Democratic Party challenged the convention nomination system as anti-democratic, with exclusionary state delegate selection practices and party control usurping power from the rank-and-file voter. In response to dissent within the party and the horrible images created in Chicago, the Democratic National Committee formed two commissions to study the nominating process. One of the two, the McGovern-Fraser Commission, proposed 18 rules that ultimately increased the number of state primaries and thereby reduced the influence of national nominating conventions. The rise of primaries eventually changed nominee selection for both Democrats and Republicans and was a major factor in transforming nominating conventions from instrumental to symbolic functions.

Communication Functions of Nominating Conventions

As primaries increased in importance, nominating conventions transformed from gatherings designed primarily to perform the instrumental functions of selecting the nominee and conducting the party's business into media events focused on the symbolic functions of establishing party unity and legitimacy for the general election. This change was exacerbated by the increasing role of the mass media in election campaigns.

Judith Trent and Robert Freedenberg identify four communication functions of nominating conventions. The first is to reaffirm and legitimize the electoral process. Convention rituals, including the nominating and acceptance speeches, roll call of votes, prayers, music, and even video introductions of candidates, symbolize the values and traditions of the nation, the election process, and its inclusion of the American people. The convention also marks the transition from the primary campaign to the general election, demonstrating the supposedly effective and efficient means of selecting national leadership. An organized and orderly convention symbolizes the smooth working of democratic processes.

The nominating convention also legitimizes nominees. Through the convention, candidates assume the roles of presidential and vice-presidential nominees, carrying the party's mantle of support. This function is especially important after intense primary competition, in cases when the nominee is a relative newcomer or in some way non-traditional, or whenever a political party selects a nominee that could be deemed politically risky or weak.

The convention serves a third symbolic function, to demonstrate party unity. Intense and often highly negative primary campaigns produce internal tensions within the party that are detrimental to general election success. The convention, then, is an instrumental and symbolic moment of demarcation in the campaign. The convention places the intense internal rivalry of the primaries in the past and refocuses the party's faithful on uniting to defeat their opponent in the general election. Unity may be demonstrated in a range of ways, such as including defeated candidates in celebration and support of the nominee, explicitly calling for unity from party leaders, expressing the party's central values and goals, and promoting images of enthusiastic convention delegates.

The nominating conventions also offer images of inclusiveness. The individuals speaking at the podium, the guests in the gallery, and the delegates themselves all provide visual representation of the party and its commitments. For instance, in 2004, both political parties featured tributes to heroes of September 11, 2001;

both invited party leaders of diverse race and gender to address the convention; both featured representatives of immigrant heritage; and both highlighted their strong political traditions through the presence and recognition of former presidents. Conventions thus offer a symbolic moment not only to unify the faithful but to reach out to independent voters as well.

The final communicative function of the nominating convention is to introduce the candidate's campaign issues. The key ideas central to the nominee's success are crystallized into a strategy for the general election and are central to the nominee's acceptance speech. Franklin Delano Roosevelt's announced a "New Deal" in 1932; John F. Kennedy introduced a "New Frontier"; Bill Clinton called for a "New Covenant." In a more elaborate strategy in 2004, both Democratic and Republican parties adopted an issue theme for each day of the convention and used all convention activity to focus media coverage on the key message of the day. Such strategies demonstrate the convention's communicative potential as it carries messages to the voting public.

Nominating Conventions and the Mass Media

These symbolic functions would be impossible without mass media coverage of conventions. The emergence of national media coverage of political election campaigns contributed significantly to the evolution of political nominating conventions in the United States. In the earliest conventions, newspapers and then phonograph recordings and newsreels shared convention events with broader audiences. However, the radio and television era transformed convention practice. The first convention covered in its entirety on radio was the Democratic Party's 1924 convention in New York City's old Madison Square Garden. Just 4 years later, the network of radio stations broadcasting Alfred Smith's acceptance speech influenced the day and time of his acceptance. Then, in 1932, Franklin Delano Roosevelt demonstrated his understanding of potential for the convention to reach a large audience of voters. Roosevelt broke with tradition by becoming the first presidential nominee to deliver his acceptance address in person before the convention. The Republicans adopted the practice in 1944. Since then, each party's national convention culminates with the nominee's acceptance address before the convention. Not surprisingly, the speech is always scheduled to receive the largest possible television audience.

The live, mediated acceptance address is only one of many changes made to conventions in response to media coverage. Television coverage of nominating conventions began in 1952 and accelerated changes in nominating conventions to adapt to media practices. Political party leaders responded with orderly, structured gatherings timed and organized to maximize the messages conveyed to the American voting public. Most true discussion and decision making was moved to pre-convention meetings. The positioning of the stage and podium, seating of leaders in the gallery, and placement of delegations accommodated camera angles. Party leaders directed delegate behavior, reminding them to be conscious of their representation of the party to the American people. Campaign operatives directed the delegate celebrations on the convention floor. The number and length of speeches decreased, and the style of oratory adapted to a mediated audience. The roof-raising oratory of William Jennings Bryan was replaced with the more intimate, familiar style of Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Ronald Reagan. Eventually, the national political parties turned to television professionals—producers, directors, stage and lighting designers, and others—to assist in the impact of conventions for a television audience.

Larry David Smith and Dan Nimmo describe the relationships between party leaders, candidates and their campaign workers, and media decision makers and personalities as a "cordial concurrence." The early adjustments between those invested in the convention were primarily cooperative. A more structured convention provided more interesting content and greater predictability for television producers. The conventions also gave media outlets opportunities to showcase their own talent, building the credentials of anchors, reporters, and guest political analysts. Political parties also benefited. Larger audiences provided greater opportunity to build support for candidates, to create political stars through primetime convention performances, and to showcase the party's issues and ideas.

Yet, as conventions became more highly orchestrated and predictable, media representatives balked at providing free coverage for what appeared to be no more than an extended political advertisement. Media decision makers increasingly exerted their gatekeeper function through controlling what aspects of the convention would reach the public. Producers could choose to air their own interviews of notable political figures or celebrities rather than cover the speaker at the podium, often dedicating more airtime to their own reporters and anchors than to convention floor and podium events. They also controlled the camera shots and presentation to the audience. During the 1968 Democratic convention, CBS News juxtaposed Chicago Mayor Richard Daley's praise for the Chicago police force with images of officers using force to subdue protestors on the streets outside the convention, resulting in a clear editorial commentary. In other cases, speeches or other convention events were ignored in favor of other content. For instance, in 1984, only two networks, NBC and CNN, showed President Reagan's introductory film in its entirety.

Over time, the broadcast networks also reduced the amount of time they devoted to the conventions. From 1956 to 1976, the broadcast networks ABC, CBS, and NBC covered the Democratic and Republican conventions gavel to gavel. Networks began to reduce coverage in 1980. In a rather dramatic representation of the news media's growing antipathy to the conventions, veteran journalist Ted Koppel described the 1996 Republican National Convention as an "infomercial," announced that ABC's Nightline was leaving the convention and would not cover the upcoming Democratic convention. By the 2004 election, ABC, CBS, and NBC limited their primetime coverage of each convention to 3 hours over 4 days, all between 10 p.m. and 11 p.m. eastern standard time, thus failing to cover at least 1 day of each convention and airing only a small portion of the convention on the other 3 days.

At the same time, radio, cable television channels, and the Internet provide additional new outlets for individuals who want more information. In 2004, National Public Radio (NPR) scheduled 3 hours of convention coverage each day. PBS offered 3 hours of coverage every night of the convention in prime time; CNN covered the conventions from 8 p.m. to 1 a.m. each night; MSNBC focused on the conventions from 6 p.m. to 2 a.m.; Fox News provided convention coverage from 6 p.m. to 1 a.m. every night as well. C-SPAN began coverage in the late afternoon with uninterrupted coverage until the conclusion of the convention each day. ABC supplemented its broadcast coverage by offering gavel-to-gavel coverage on its digital channels. The Democratic National Committee made its entire convention available through a Webcast. Thus, although the networks decreased coverage, the range of available media outlets and total coverage increased.

The increasing numbers and types of media outlets will continue to shape nominating conventions. In 2004, the political parties and convention planners placed the most important convention elements in the narrow 1-hour window of broadcast network coverage, shortened speeches, and carefully orchestrated transitions to attempt to prevent the networks from breaking away from podium coverage. At the same time, convention planners recognized the changing media environment by catering more to local television stations, radio talk show hosts, and Internet outlets, offering media credentials to bloggers for the first time at the 2004 conventions. As the range and type of media outlets continues to change, nominating conventions will change as well.

Rachel L. Holloway

See also Political Parties; Primaries

Further Readings

Cook, R. (2004). The presidential nominating process: A place for us? Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

David, P. T., Goldman, P. M., & Bain, R. C. (1984). The politics of national party conventions (Rev. ed.). Lanham, MD: University Press of America.

Fant, C. H. (1980). Televising presidential conventions, 1952–1980. Journal of Communication, 30, 130–139.

Smith, L. D., & Nimmo, D. (1991). Cordial concurrence: Orchestrating national party conventions in the telepolitical age. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Trent, J. S., & Friedenberg, R. V. (2004). Political campaign communication: Principles and practices (5th ed.). Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Council of Europe, Media Policy

The Council of Europe (CoE)—now affiliating 46 countries—was established in 1949 to defend human rights, parliamentary democracy, and the rule of law; promote standardization of member countries' social and legal practices; and promote awareness of a European identity based on shared values. It also considers itself a guardian of democratic security as a complement to military security. Its mandate also covers social cohesion, the security of citizens, democratic values, and cultural diversity; strengthening the security of European citizens, in particular by combating terrorism, organized crime, and trafficking in human beings; and fostering cooperation with other international and European organizations. It is increasing its monitoring to ensure that all members respect their obligations and commitments.

CoE's main components are the Committee of Ministers (CM), the decision-making body; the Parliamentary Assembly (PACE); and the Congress of Local and Regional Authorities. They are supported by the 2,200-strong Secretariat, headed by the Secretary General. International non-governmental organizations enjoy participatory status with the Council of Europe and their annual conference is an important partner.

Article 10 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR)

Article 10 underpins all CoE media policy standards and activities. It enshrines freedom of expression (which must be exercised without interference by public authorities and regardless of borders) and comprises the freedom to hold opinions, to impart information and ideas, and to receive information and ideas. Under Article 10 a state may interfere with this freedom to protect the public interest (national security, territorial integrity, public safety, prevention of disorder or crime, protection of health or morals); to protect other individual rights (protection of the reputation or rights of others, prevention of the disclosure of information received in confidence); and to maintain the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.

The European Court of Human Rights (also operating within CoE) holds that the necessity for restricting freedom of expression must be convincingly established; the national margin of appreciation in assessing the need for that must be circumscribed by the interest of a democratic society in ensuring and maintaining a free press. Any limitation of, or interference with, such freedom must be provided for by law, which must be narrowly interpreted, have a legitimate purpose, and be necessary in a democratic society; that is, must respond to a pressing social need and be proportionate to the legitimate purpose it pursues.

Council of Europe Media Policy

CoE's work in the media serves to strengthen freedom of expression and information and the free flow of information and ideas across borders. It also serves to strengthen pan-European policy measures and legal and other instruments for this purpose, as well as to make sure they keep pace with technological, economic, and regulatory change in the media sector.

CoE helps Member States establish or consolidate free, independent and pluralistic media capable of collecting and delivering information in a professional and ethical manner and, where necessary, to persuade public authorities to provide the necessary conditions for the media to work in. In the years 2004–2008, priorities include

- the balance between freedom of expression and right to privacy, right to a fair trial, and so on.
- online services and democracy (harmful and illegal cyber content, Internet literacy)—the convergence of communications technologies and services and its impact on media regulation;
- media pluralism and diversity in light of the development of concentrations and new communications technologies and services; and
- the interrelationship between freedom of expression and information and the fight against terrorism.

Freedom of Expression and Information

Several CoE documents develop the ideal of freedom of expression and access to information and ideas for all. The 1992 European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages and the 1995 Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities require states to take positive measures to protect and promote the use of regional or minority languages in public and private life and to prevent discrimination against persons belonging to a national minority in their access to the media.

In turn, the 1989 European Convention on Transfrontier Television promotes the free flow of information and ideas across borders and puts parties under an obligation to guarantee freedom of reception and to not restrict the retransmission on their territories of program services which comply with the terms of this convention.

A 2003 CM Declaration on freedom of communication on the Internet states that Internet content should not be subject to restrictions other than media content. There should also be no prior state control, and self-regulation, or co-regulation, is preferable to any state regulation of the Internet.

New circumstances necessitated the adoption of a 2005 CM Declaration on freedom of expression and information in the media in the context of the fight against terrorism, which called for no new restrictions on freedom of expression and information to be introduced and for the editorial independence of the media to be strictly respected.

The 1974 CM Resolution on the Right of Reply—the position of the individual in relation to the press—and the 2004 CM Recommendation on the right of reply in the new media environment provide a corrective and a remedy in cases when freedom of expression in the media is abused to provide inaccurate information.

Free and Democratic Media System

In the Lingens case, the court stated that "freedom of the press affords the public one of the best means of discovering and forming an opinion of the ideas and attitudes of political leaders," hence its many judgments serving to protect that freedom. The European Commission of Human Rights found in the Verein Alternatives Lokalradio Bern and Verein Radio Dreyeckland Basel case that "States do not have an unlimited margin of appreciation concerning licensing systems . . . a licensing system not respecting the requirements of pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness without which there is no democratic society would thereby infringe Article 10." In the 1993 Informations-verein Lentia and others case, the court found that the Austrian public monopoly on broadcasting was "not necessary in a democratic society."

In addition to ECHR, basic goals to be pursued by the organization and its Member States in this field were defined in the 1982 CM Declaration on the Freedom of Expression and Information:

1. Protection of the right of everyone to exercise the rights enshrined in Article 10;
2. Absence of censorship or arbitrary constraints on participants in the information process, on media content or on the dissemination of information; access to public information;
3. The existence of a wide variety of independent and autonomous media, permitting the reflection of diversity of ideas and opinions;
4. The availability and access on reasonable terms to adequate facilities for the domestic and international transmission and dissemination of information and ideas;
5. The Declaration also says it is the duty of States to guard against infringements of the freedom of expression and information and to foster a variety of media and a plurality of information sources.

On this last issue, a 1999 CM Recommendation on Measures to Promote Media Pluralism noted that the existence of a multiplicity of autonomous and independent, politically and culturally diverse media outlets at the national, regional, and local levels generally enhances pluralism and democracy. It encouraged Member States to take measures to promote pluralism and/or anti-concentration mechanisms. Also, a 2000 CM Declaration on cultural diversity noted the role of the media in promoting it. A 1994 CM Recommendation on Measures to Promote Media Transparency additionally called for measures to promote media transparency.

CoE consistently promotes public service broadcasting and its independence and special remit. This is defined as offering news, educational, cultural, and entertainment programs aimed at different categories of the public and supporting the values underlying the political, legal, and social structures of democratic societies, in particular respect for human rights, culture, and political pluralism. A 2003 CM Recommendation on Measures to Promote the Democratic and Social Contribution of Digital Broadcasting calls on members to create the conditions required to enable public service broadcasters to fulfill their remit in the best manner as well as adapting to the new digital environment. This may include the provision of new digital and online services. Public service broadcasters should play a central role in the transition process to digital terrestrial broadcasting.

In order to safeguard the independence of broadcasters, a 2000 CM Recommendation on the Independence and Functions of Broadcasting Regulatory Authorities specifies that these authorities should not be under the influence of political power, should be appointed in a democratic and transparent manner, and may not receive any mandate or take any instructions from any person or body.

Freedom of Political Debate

CoE has specifically promoted political communication through the media. Their role as political watchdog was emphasized by the court in Lingens, where it also underlined the importance of freedom of the press in imparting "information and ideas on political issues just as on those in other areas of public interest; . . . the public has a right to receive them." Freedom of the press, said the court, affords the public a means of discovering and forming an opinion of the ideas and attitudes of political leaders. Consequently, the freedom of political debate is at the very core of the concept of a democratic society. This is why political debate by the press enjoys strong protection under Article 10: "The limits of acceptable criticism are accordingly wider as regards a politician as such than as regards a private individual." The politician "must consequently display a greater degree of tolerance."

A 2004 CM Declaration on freedom of political debate in the media stated further that pluralist democracy and freedom of political debate include the right of the media to disseminate negative information and critical opinions concerning political figures and public officials; that the state, the government, or any other institution of the executive, legislative, or judicial branch may be subject to criticism in the media, though individuals remain protected as such. Satire is protected by Article 10 of the Convention, and it allows for a wider degree of exaggeration and even provocation.

In defamation cases the court has pointed out, as in Lingens, that "the existence of facts can be demonstrated, whereas the truth of value-judgments is not susceptible to proof . . . As regards value judgments this requirement is impossible to fulfil, and it infringes freedom of opinion itself." Equally, in Dalban, the court held: "It would be unacceptable for a journalist to be debarred from expressing critical value judgments unless he or she could prove their truth."

The court has consistently held that there must be a "reasonable relationship of proportionality" between a sanction imposed for defamation and the injury to the reputation which has been sustained. It has emphasized the impact of criminal sanctions themselves due to their enduring and stigmatizing effect (e.g., through criminal records), noting that the threat of criminal sanctions can discourage imparting information or voicing opinions on issues of public concern.

Serving the Democratic Process, Journalism, and Other Standards

A 1999 CM Recommendation on Measures Concerning Media Coverage of Election Campaigns called on Member States to ensure respect for the principles of fairness, balance, and impartiality in the coverage of election campaigns by the media. Later, a 2004 CM Recommendation on legal, operational and technical standards for e-voting stated that it must respect all the principles of democratic elections and referendums and be as reliable and secure as democratic elections and referendums which do not involve the use of electronic means. Only secure, reliable, efficient, and technically robust e-voting systems, open to independent verification and easily accessible to voters, will build public confidence in e-voting. A 2004 CM Recommendation on electronic governance specified requirements for e-democracy, public e-services, and generally e-governance in a democratic society.

Standards relating to the work and protection of journalists include the 2000 CM Recommendation on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information, the 1996 CM Recommendation on the Protection of Journalists in Situations of Conflict and Tension, and the 2003 CM Recommendation on the provision of information through the media in relation to criminal proceedings.

Monitoring Activities

Monitoring is done by the CM, PACE, the Secretary General, the European Court of Human Rights, the Commissioner for Human Rights, and specialized monitoring mechanisms.

CM has developed a whole range of procedures, including specific post-accession monitoring of selected new Member States, as well as thematic monitoring (including the field of freedom of expression and information).

CM is required to ensure that states comply with the court's judgments concerning them, in particular by verifying that the necessary steps are taken to stop ongoing violations and prevent new violations in future (changes in legislation, judicial doctrine, and administrative practices, etc.), as well as to remedy the situation of the applicants (payment of damages and, in certain circumstances, reopening of proceedings, the granting of residence permits, etc.).

PACE set up a committee on the honoring of obligations and commitments by Member States of the Council of Europe (Monitoring Committee) in 1997. The Assembly may sanction persistent failure to honor obligations and commitments accepted and/or lack of cooperation in its monitoring process, or recommend that the Committee of Ministers take the appropriate action.

The Secretary General has the right to request from any State Party an explanation of the manner in which its internal law ensures the effective implementation of the provisions of ECHR. The European Court of Human Rights and the Commissioner for Human Rights have to review compliance with a number of obligations and commitments, which also touch upon issues related to the rule of law and respect for democratic principles in Member States.

The Commissioner may alert the organs of the Council of Europe through reports, opinions, and recommendations. Where the Commissioner found that a State has not undertaken adequate efforts to implement a recommendation, he/she may inform PACE or CM, enabling them to take appropriate action.

Various conventions have called into being committees charged with overseeing their implementation.

Assistance Programs

The program for Assistance and Technical Co-operation in the media field covers a wide range of issues such as the rights and responsibilities of journalists; the regulation of the press, radio, and television sectors; access to information, and so forth. It includes training in Article 10 ECHR for judges, prosecutors, and lawyers, as well as various state officials (e.g., information officers).

Implemented in collaboration with the authorities of the States concerned, these programs take the form of legal expertise of new draft laws or amendments to existing national legislation; training, information, and awareness-raising workshops, seminars, and conferences; training of media professionals (journalists, editors, managers of press, and radio-television enterprises, etc.).

Karol Jakubowicz

Further Readings

Directorate General of Human Rights. (2001). Case Law Concerning Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Human rights files, No. 18. Strasbourg, France: Council of Europe Publishing.

Karaca, K. (2003). Guarding the watchdog—the Council of Europe and the media. Strasbourg, France: Council of Europe Publishing.

Creating Reality

David L. Altheide's book Creating Reality is one of several studies from the 1970s that addressed the question of how the mass media construct a reality. Many of these books used methods comparable to field studies in cultural anthropology, in the sense that researchers observed a culture unfamiliar to them—in this case the culture of news production. Altheide's book, which appeared in 1976, shares this method with other eminent works in communication from the 1970s by James D. Halloran and colleagues, by Gaye Tuchman, and by Mark Fishman, to name but a few.

Altheide conducted his fieldwork mostly in 1971 and 1972. For about a year, he spent several days a week in the newsroom and with reporters of a California network affiliate television station, observing the production of a local news show. The station also sent him to the 1972 party conventions, where he continued his observation. Altheide also relied on another researcher's field notes and visits to other broadcasting institutions.

The major subject of the book is how the conditions under which a news show is produced affect its product (the show) as it is broadcast. External conditions include the necessity to make profits, the competition, and the relationships between journalists and politicians. Internal conditions include time management, format, the availability of sources, the necessity to relate a structured narrative, and the limits of editing techniques. Illustrating these factors with many examples from his observations, Altheide depicts the news show as the consequence of decisions, many of which have a lot to do with the production process and little to do with the content that is communicated.

The book's key term is news perspective. It is the ability to encounter events with expectations that enable a person to make a structured narrative of it (and one that is suited for the medium the person works for). In positive terms, this is what young journalists have to learn in their training. Negatively speaking it is a professional deformation because no one except journalists looks at events in terms of their capacity to be narrated. News perspective (the special way journalists look at the world) has not become an established term in political communication. But it entails many aspects that were discussed under the concept of framing 20 years after Altheide had written his book.

The book also includes two case studies on the framing of two political scandals in the 1972 presidential election campaign in the United States: the news about Democratic vice presidential candidate Thomas F. Eagleton's psychiatric treatment and Watergate.

Uwe Hartung

See also Framing; Journalism, Political; News Coverage of Politics; News Selection Process; Watergate

Further Readings

Altheide, D. (1976). Creating reality: How TV news distorts events. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.
Fishman, M. (1980). Manufacturing the news. Austin: University of Texas Press.
Halloran, J. D., Elliott, P., & Murdock, G. (1970). Demonstrations and communication: A case study. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin.
Tuchman, G. (1978). Making news. A study in the construction of reality. New York: Free Press.

CRITICAL THEORY

Critical theory aims to articulate an overall theory of society by using an interdisciplinary approach to the practical conditions of historic ways of life. The designation critical theory is intimately tied to the work of the Frankfurter Institut für Sozialforschung (Frankfurt Institute for Social Research), later called the Frankfurter Schule (Frankfurt School). At the same time, critical theory represents a philosophical and theoretical paradigm that extends beyond that circle and that follows from, along with continental Marxist thinking and theory, both the philosophical analysis and criticism of rationality practiced by Kant and Hegel and the psychoanalysis of Freud.

The circle of researchers around Max Horkheimer at the Institute undertook a fundamental and interdisciplinary approach to establish, on a scientific basis, the necessity and possibility of changing society. To be closely investigated, along with social institutions and practices, were the convictions and attitudes of the members of society. In this setting, social theory (to the extent that it is concerned with the society in which it exists) constitutes a portion of its own subject matter. Even science is a component of society and accordingly must take account of this in self-criticism. This position is in contrast with the image of bourgeois science, which in Horkheimer's view fits itself unquestioningly into the process of investigation and participation in solving problems prescribed for it by dominant social organs. Critical theory was not directed simply toward resolution of this or that injustice but took as its object society itself. In his inaugural lecture of 1931, in which he also addressed the duties of an institute for social research, Horkheimer understood the goal of social philosophy as the philosophical interpretation of man's fate to the extent that men are not simply individuals but members of society. Social philosophy thus was required to concern itself with those phenomena that can be understood only in the context of man's life in society: the state, law, polity, economics, religion—in short, all human material culture.

The Institute for Social Research was founded in 1924 as an independent investigative body associated with University of Frankfurt am Main. When in 1930 Max Horkheimer succeeded Carl Grünberg as the Institute's director, the conditions were established for the supra-disciplinary studies that were published in the Zeitschrift für Sozialforschung (Studies in Philosophy and Social Science) from 1932 until 1941 (vol. 9). Forced to dissolve in 1933 when National Socialism came to power, the Institute emigrated first to Geneva, where a branch already had been sited, and then to Paris, as the Société Internationale de Recherches Sociales. In 1934 it arrived in New York, where, as the Institute for Social Research, it was associated with Columbia University. In later years of its exile in America, some members, like Theodor W. Adorno and Horkheimer, moved to Los Angeles, though the Institute maintained its headquarters in New York. Marcuse and Lowenthal worked from 1943 or 1944 for the Office of War Information. After the war Horkheimer and Adorno returned to Germany, while Marcuse, Lowenthal, and others stayed in America to begin academic careers at Brandeis University and the University of California, Berkeley.

In this research context, the task of those representing individual scholarly perspectives—along with Max Horkheimer, they included Herbert Marcuse, Leo Lowenthal, Erich Fromm, Theodor Adorno, and others—was the specialized scientific analysis of society and culture. In the work of the Institute can be identified, alongside the phase of research activities specifically critical of capitalism (which persisted into the first years after emigration and which were founded on Marxist criticism of political economy), a phase which followed immediately thereafter, extending from 1937 into the early 1940s, and which was based on Horkheimer's essay "Traditionelle und kritische Theorie" (Traditional and Critical Theory). Directly succeeding this was a phase oriented toward a dialectic theory of society and culminating in the Dialektik der Aufklärung (Dialectic of Enlightenment; DE); it lasted into the period of re-migration to Germany and was then supplanted by new problems of industrial society and of technical civilization during a period when younger co-workers like Ludwig von Friedeburg and Jürgen Habermas joined the Institute.

A central motive for these shifts among distinct phases of attitude toward social theory and cultural theory is already embodied in the theory's concept, which viewed itself as "reflection and expression of historic experience" and required continuous evaluation of both the theory and its concepts as a result of social and cultural changes. Here Horkheimer's essay "Traditional and Critical Theory" represents the first decisive shift for interdisciplinary research aimed at a dialectic theory of society in view of the cataclysmic political experiences in Europe. In this respect critical theory is based on a separation from traditional theory. The term critical, although directly referring to Marx's criticism of political economy, replaces the term materialistic. This was assuredly an advantage when introducing the theory in America, as direct reference to Marxist tradition could thereby be avoided (even though the theory followed the lines of historic materialism). Horkheimer laid special weight on the significance of cultural phenomena as part of the social process; that is, their effects on the individual and their alterations under the influence of shifting economic and social power structures, as it is most prominently manifested in criticisms of mass culture and the culture industry. Until the end of the 1930s—particularly in early individual studies—culture was viewed within the theory of contemporary times as the ideological glue of society, and cultural phenomena thus came to be simply objects of criticism. Individual studies of literature, art, and music (and, albeit only at the margin, of the products of mass culture as well) analyzed the role of culture in the transition from liberalism to fascism (e.g., Leo Lowenthal's essay on Knut Hamsun). As a consequence of the assumption of power by National Socialists in Germany, the objects of sociologic study became those features that could help to explain this event. Such questions included authoritarian consciousness, the collapse of the family, the structures of bourgeois consciousness, and developments in political economy. Individual studies and investigations along these lines supplied the background for the dialectic project whose product, appearing in 1944, was the DE. In this work, critical theory explicitly takes issue with the principles of traditional experience, and critical theory views the processes of synthesis as imbued with violence and with fear of the other.

It is no accident, then, that DE's chapter on the culture industry (with the subtitle "Enlightenment as Betrayal of the Masses") is closely coordinated with the chapter titled "Elements of Antisemitism: Boundaries of Enlightenment." The background for comparisons between the structures of anti-Semitism and the structures of mass production of cultural goods within the culture industry was undoubtedly shaped by exerting influences on the masses. These were apparent not only in the press but also generally in the cinema and radio, which were associated with wholly novel possibilities of disseminating specific attitudes and behaviors within mass culture.

The chapter on the culture industry in DE, which concentrates substantially on the experience of the development of mass culture in Germany in the 1930s and 1940s and specifically on the development of the capitalist media system in North America, is a compact assembly of the determinants within culture theory and social theory that apply, according to Horkheimer and Adorno, not only to analysis of the effect of mass communications in capitalism. The effect of instrumental reasoning extends uniformly over nearly all fields within society and culture and is disseminated more widely via mass culture.

From the point of view of communications science, criticism of the culture industry depends on the development of media in the Weimar Republic and the hope then articulated for democratic evolution of the communications media. These appear as a sort of benchmark, from which the employment of media both in totalitarian fashion (Germany, Spain, Italy) and by monopoly capital (North America) has fallen away.

The transition from the democratic phase of the technological development of the mass media into the phase of its use for both totalitarian ends and the purposes of monopoly capitalism thus constitutes the point from which further criticism and analysis begins. Although Benjamin and Brecht continued to suggest novel (and rather utopian) possibilities for electronic media, proposing a dialogue in which receivers became broadcasters ("radio theory"), these degenerated through subjection to the totalitarian state—as well as, finally, to monopoly capitalism—solely into instruments of domination.

Taking this experience in Europe as a background, the manner in which the media were employed in the United States represents only a variation on the same apparently unavoidable enthrallment of the subject by the system. In one instance it is the totalitarian state which controls the individual; in the other it is the monopoly-dominated sphere of consumption. The circle is closed, in this analysis, with articulation of critical-materialist theory. According to this theoretical position, progress in the culture industry arises, for Adorno, from the general laws of capitalism, which tend toward monopoly. The concept of a unitary system within the culture industry, which inheres in such ideas, views both the aspects of production and distribution as well as progress in technical evolution as inseparably related, a relationship from which the criticism of rationalism within the DE took inspiration.

Critical-materialist theory takes shape from the premise that the social system is rationalistic and that its logic is expressed in the dominance of an economic selection mechanism as well as in the style and organization of the culture industry that this dominance shapes. In this analysis, the culture industry comprises the technically industrialized production and distribution of mass-culture or popular-culture offerings of whatever origin or form via every available media route. The concept of the economic selection mechanism constitutes the decisive origin that determines trends in development of the culture industry as well as the incorporation of criticism directed against rationalism.

In technology and technological rationality, then, can be found one of the principal themes that forms the setting for works by the other members of the Institute for Social Research and that addresses questions of the technological transformation of communication and its influence on the production of art and of culture in late capitalism. The contrast between artistic technology and technical rationality already constitutes (in the introductory definitions of the chapter on the culture industry) the caesura at which Adorno could meld the DE with aspects of his previous work on changes in art production and in the culture of the 1920s and 1930s.

Adorno dealt with the theme of technology in the culture industry, as did Walter Benjamin in his essay "Art in the Era in Which Art Can Be Reproduced by Technology." The two authors clearly differ, however, in their assessment of the consequences of this development. Adorno criticizes changes in means of artistic representation, with a view toward the acceptance of technological rationality, and Benjamin is interested in the question of what opportunities technical progress confers in the process of destroying what is old.

The concept of the culture industry was uncoupled from criticism of rationalism in the 1960s, when it was rediscovered together with the writings of critical theory from Adorno's period of exile. It became a general term used to criticize mass communication and mass culture in contemporary society.

The actions and accomplishments of the culture industry, according to the standards of this criticism, consist principally in the calculus of the effects and the technology of production and dissemination; according to its own content, ideology is exhausted in idolizing both that which exists and the power that controls technology.

Given the theoretical elaboration of the term culture industry, which is rooted in the social-theory analyses of the Institute for Social Research during its exile, to nowadays employ it as metaphorical is not improper. Even Adorno, in his analyses of jazz (which can be read as culture-industry criticisms avant la lettre) made no bones about the suitability of the term in metaphorical distinctions, such as in the organization of art and culture as goods. The term mass culture thus embraces all fields of cultural production and communication that are not art. With such breadth, however, the term mass culture nowadays tends to lack impact and is only marginally useful in analysis of popular culture to the extent that it excludes a differentiation that already permeates the production of culture goods in many more forms than in the 1940s and 1950s.

Initiatives toward reformulation have occurred since the 1970s. Enzensberger's famous essay "Baukasten zu einer Theorie der Medien" (Building Blocks for a Theory of Media) broadened the term to encompass the consciousness industry, which he held as a pacemaker for the socioeconomic development of late industrial societies. In fending off the thesis of manipulation, Enzensberger emphasizes—not least in taking up Benjamin's thoughts on positive barbarism—the possibility that the media, in the sense of using them as emancipators, can be made into a means of production for the masses. The intention here is not a shift in the goal of criticism; instead a strategy is addressed for turning means of domination against those means themselves and to seize the possibilities for emancipation that inhere in them. Accordingly, if one wishes to continue to employ the term culture industry for purposes of analysis of popular culture—which appears reasonable, given the advanced industrial production of entertainment offerings—one must use a terminological reconstruction to distinguish the polemic rejection of mass culture that is manifest in the concept from uses that pursue an analytic interest in the concept. This has been the particular success of Douglas Kellner in his various works that manage to connect culture-industry criticism with themes in cultural studies.

Udo Göttlich

Further Readings

Adorno, T. W., & Horkheimer, M. (1979). Dialectic of Enlightenment. London: Verso.

Jay, M. (1973). The dialectical imagination. A history of the Frankfurt School and the Institute of Social Research 1923–1950. Boston: Little, Brown.

Kellner, D. (1989). Critical theory, Marxism and modernity. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Lowenthal, L. (1987). An unmastered past. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Marcuse, H. (1964). The one-dimensional man. Studies in the ideology of advanced industrial society. Boston: Beacon Press.

Wolin, R. (2006). The Frankfurt School revisited. New York: Routledge.

Cronkite, Walter (1916–)

Walter Leland Cronkite, Jr. spent nearly 19 years as anchor of CBS Evening News and became known as "the most trusted man in America." Over the years, he won numerous journalism awards.

Born in St. Joseph, Missouri, Cronkite grew up in Houston, Texas. He attended the University of Texas in Austin, though he did not graduate. After working for several small newspapers and radio stations, he joined United Press in 1937. For them he reported on World War II in Europe and North Africa, covered the Nuremberg Trials, and spent 2 years reporting in Moscow.

In 1950, Cronkite joined CBS News after being recruited by Edward R. Murrow. Two years later, Cronkite reported for CBS at the Democratic and Republican presidential conventions where the term anchorman was first used for news presenters. CBS coined the term by drawing on a sports metaphor with Cronkite handling the anchor leg of the relay race. From 1953 to 1957, Cronkite hosted CBS's You Are There, a news program that included reenactments of historical events. He also briefly co-hosted the CBS Morning Show with a puppet.

On April 16, 1962, Cronkite began his tenure as the CBS Evening News anchor. The following year the broadcast expanded from its 15 minutes format to become the first half-hour evening news program. From 1967 until he left the anchor chair in 1981, Cronkite would dominate his competition in the ratings. Cronkite's famous closing line for the show was "and that's the way it is."

After being handed a piece of paper while on the air, Cronkite became the first to report that President John F. Kennedy had died. During the Apollo 11 moon landing, Cronkite remained on the air for 27 of the 30 hours. As the spacecraft landed on the moon he shouted on the air, "Wow!" Cronkite considers the event the most important one he witnessed.

After a trip to Vietnam during the Tet Offensive, Cronkite stated that the war was a stalemate. This led to President Lyndon Johnson's response, "If I've lost Cronkite, I've lost Middle America." Johnson dropped his bid for reelection shortly thereafter. Cronkite's broadcasts have been used in historical movies, such as Apollo 13 and JFK.

Following his retirement as CBS Evening News anchor on March 6, 1981, Cronkite continued to offer reports for CBS, CNN, NPR, and PBS. Among his other projects, Cronkite has voiced kids' television shows and movie characters, provided the voice for a character in a Broadway play, narrated advertisements for the University of Texas, and provided the voice-over for a Disney World ride.

More recently, Cronkite has spoken out against the 2003 invasion in Iraq, appeared in the documentary Outfoxed, and penned a blog at The Huffington Post. The Cronkite School of Journalism & Mass Communication is located at Arizona State Unviersity. In Sweden and Holland, news anchors are called Kronkiters and Cronkiters, respectively.

Brian T. Kaylor

Further Readings

Cronkite, W. (1996). Reporter's life. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

Rottenberg, D. (1994, May). "And that's the way it is." American Journalism Review, 16, 34–37.

Crosstalk

Crosstalk: Citizens, Candidates, and the Media in a Presidential Campaign by Marion R. Just, Ann N. Crigler, Dean E. Alger, Timothy E. Cook, Montague

Kern, and Darrell M. West was published in 1996. The book reports the results of an extensive research project on the 1992 U.S. presidential campaign. In the book, the authors contend that to understand a presidential campaign, one must understand the interaction among all of the major actors in the process, the candidates, the media, and the public.

The authors describe the various aspects of the campaign, with particular emphasis on the candidate's messages via their campaign commercials and the news media's presentation of the candidates' issues and personal qualities. Content analysis of a wide variety of media messages, newspapers, and television form a major part of the underlying data of the book. The authors took advantage of their own diverse locations to provide a broad geographic distribution of media market coverage (Massachusetts, North Carolina, California, and Minnesota). Although some variation in news availability was apparent, the authors confirmed the dominance of journalistic styles and patterns such as a focus on horserace coverage. With these parts of the process, the authors then address how the public uses these information sources and the differences among them to construct their own view of the candidates and campaign issues.

Analysis of candidate messages also focused on the television ads sponsored by both campaigns. Noting the negative nature of the advertisements, the authors point to the differences in candidate handling of foreign policy and economic concerns.

The citizen or public view was considered by the authors through the conduct of interviews and focus groups. The analysis of the citizen viewpoints and the evolution of citizen views across the campaign suggests that the interaction of information throughout the campaign can affect how citizens come to view the candidates and the issues in the campaign. Citizens are not immune to media representations of issues and candidate character and personality.

Overall, the book offers some strong evidence for the premise that campaigns do matter to citizen perceptions. In 2003, the book won the American Political Science Association's Political Communication Division Doris Graber Award for best book.

Lynda Lee Kaid

Further Readings

Just, M. R., Crigler, A. N., Alger, D. E., Cook, T. E., Kern, M., & West, D. M. (1996). Crosstalk: Citizens, candidates, and the media in a presidential campaign. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

C-SPAN Network

C-SPAN is the Cable-Satellite Public Affairs Network. It was launched March 19, 1979, by the cable industry as a nonprofit network devoted to televising sessions of the U.S. House of Representatives. It has since expanded to air nonstop coverage of government proceedings and public affairs programming. CEO and chairman of C-SPAN, Brian Lamb, came up with the idea for C-SPAN while working at a cable industry trade magazine. C-SPAN has won many journalism awards, including the 1993 Peabody award for overall excellence by an institution.

Contrary to public belief, C-SPAN does not receive funding from the government; its operating revenues are paid by license fees collected from the cable systems that offer the network to their customers. Its board of directors is comprised of executives from television operating companies. Adhering to its policy on neutrality, C-SPAN does not sell advertisements or sponsorships. By airing unfettered video coverage of speeches and legislative proceedings, C-SPAN gives those in office, and other figures of public interest, a channel through which they can reach the public without the filters of traditional media outlets.

Eighty-six million households in the United States have access to C-SPAN networks. The network has grown significantly since it started, launching C-SPAN2 and C-SPAN3 to expand its coverage of government. C-SPAN2 covers Senate proceedings, and C-SPAN3 covers live political events and airs archived historical programming. In addition to its coverage of the U.S. government, the network also occasionally airs proceedings from the British Parliament, Canadian Parliament, and other governments whose proceedings might be of some importance to viewers.

C-SPAN has emphatically stated their video is not for use in the public domain but has allowed its use in classrooms and engages in a vigorous educational outreach program. Major television networks routinely use clips from C-SPAN, but it has filed claims against Internet users who post segments of C-SPAN broadcasts on Web pages.

Though viewing levels comparable to entertainment cable networks will never be reached, the network does reach an average of 22 million viewers weekly. C-SPAN has covered both Democratic and Republican nominating conventions since its conception. The Clinton impeachment trials, Clarence Thomas's Supreme Court nomination hearings, and the 2000 election recount were all covered in entirety by the network.

C-SPAN has tried to gain access to Supreme Court Hearings, but so far their cameras have been denied access. However, the court did allow them to audio record their reading of the decision on Bush v. Gore in December 2000. The network has covered, with audio only, other seminal cases and often airs live coverage of speaking events that the justices engage in.

Even though the network was not initially successful, in terms of viewers, it built up a cult following of political junkies, members of the news media, and legislators themselves. Avid watchers of C-SPAN call themselves SPANners or SPANheads.

Shannon Custer McAleenan

Further Readings

Frantzich, S., & Sullivan, J. (1996). The C-SPAN revolution. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

Lamb, B. (2001). Booknotes: Stories from American history. Cambridge, MA: Perseus.

Cuban Missile Crisis

See Kennedy, John F.; Stevenson, Adlai

Cultivation Theory

Cultivation theory, also known as cultivation analysis, is one approach to finding answers to broad questions concerning television and its effects on children. It is the third component of a research paradigm that investigates (1) the institutional processes that underlie the media and the production of its content, (2) the prevalent images in media content, and (3) the relationships between watching television and audience beliefs and behaviors. Simply, cultivation analysis is designed to assess the contributions television viewing makes to people's conceptions of social reality. In its simplest form, cultivation analysis asks if those who watch more television have views that are more reflective of what they see on television compared to people with similar demographic characteristics but who watch less television.

Television is the United States' and the world's storyteller, telling most of the stories to most of the people, most of the time. As such, it has become our most common and constant learning environment, one that very few can or even want to escape. Children today are born into homes in which most stories are told by a centralized commercial institution rather than parents, peers, schools, or the church. Television is only one of many venues that help explain the world. Television's version of reality, however, bombards everyone with basically the same perspectives at the same time. These views are not much different from those found in other media or imparted by other powerful socialization agents. Yet, television is unique not only because it provides a common set of images to virtually all members of society but also because people tend to spend more time with television than other media. Since television's inception there have been concerns about its effects. The popular press and the government continue to ask, What does television do to us? Teachers and parents wonder if television makes children more aggressive or if it helps or hinders learning. Although seemingly simple, these questions are complex and the answers are far from simple or straightforward.

The methods and assumptions of cultivation analysis differ from those typically found in mass communication research. Research on media effects has often focused on a stimulus-response model—how specific messages produce immediate change in people's behaviors or attitudes. Cultivation analysis, on the other hand, is concerned with the long-term, general, and pervasive consequences of cumulative exposure to television's messages. Cultivation does not imply immediate short-term responses to exposure. Rather, cultivation is concerned with the long-term cumulative exposure to television's repetitive and stable messages that persist despite the increased channel offerings available today to most people. Cultivation implies that some viewers may develop new conceptions of social reality though viewing for others may result in the maintenance of existing conceptions of social reality, all of which may be traced to their cumulative and steady exposure to the world of television.

Cultivation studies typically begin with identifying and assessing the most recurrent and stable patterns in television content by looking for those images and values that cut across most program genres. These findings are then used to generate questions that ask about people's conceptions about social reality. Using surveys, these questions are posed to samples of children, adolescents, or adults. In addition, some cultivation analyses are secondary analyses of large data sets. A key element in these surveys is the assessment of television viewing. Viewing questions typically ask how much time the respondent watches television on an average day, with the analyses determining light, medium, and heavy viewers on a sample-by-sample basis. The analyses look for differences in amount of viewing, not specific amounts of viewing. The questions of cultivation analysis do not mention television but rather provide answers that reflect (a) the dominant views or images seen on television and (b) reality. The resulting relationships between amount of viewing and the tendency to respond in terms of what is seen on television reflects television's contribution to viewers' conceptions of social reality (cultivation).

As is true for many studies in media effects, cultivation analyses typically generate small effects. As even those who watch the least television may watch 7 to 10 hours a week and certainly interact with those who may watch more television, the cards are stacked against finding evidence of cultivation. Consequently, finding even small differences between light and heavy viewers may indicate far-reaching consequences. Moreover, small effects may have profound consequences. For example, a difference of one percentage point in ratings may indicate the success or failure of a program; a difference of a few percentage points in an election may make a difference in who wins or who loses.

Variations in Cultivation

Cultivation is a continual, dynamic ongoing process, not a unidirectional flow of influence from television to viewers, and there are two processes that reflect differences in how cultivation may work. Direct experience may be important for some viewers, and the phenomenon called "resonance" illustrates how a person's everyday reality and patterns of television viewing may provide a double dose of messages that resonate and amplify cultivation. For example, those who live in high-crime urban areas often show stronger relationships between amount of viewing and a stated fear of crime.

Television provides a shared daily ritual that is highly compelling and contains informative content for diversified viewers; in other words, a mainstream. Television programs typically eliminate boundaries of age, class, and region. Consequently the mainstream is a relative commonality of outlooks and values that is cultivated by consistent and heavy exposure to the world of television. The phenomenon of mainstreaming means that heavy viewing may override differences in perspectives and behavior that typically result from numerous factors and influences. In other words, attitudes or behaviors that would ordinarily be attributed to different social or political characteristics may be diminished or absent in groups who watch more television. In short, mainstreaming reflects the sense that television cultivates common perspectives, representing a relative homogenization that makes television viewing the true melting pot of the American people and, increasingly, the world. For example, the beliefs of those who designate themselves as liberals or conservatives are often quite different when there is little television viewing. But, when heavy television viewers who call themselves liberals or conservatives are asked about these same topics, the liberals may give responses that are somewhat more conservative and the conservatives may give responses that are somewhat more liberal, essentially resulting in both groups reflecting beliefs that are more moderate or middle-of-the-road.

Evidence of Cultivation

The world of television tends to present a stable yet somewhat warped demography, with prime-time programs populated with characters who are 60% male and 40% female. Moreover, both younger and older characters are practically invisible compared to the overabundance of characters between 21 and 50. Prime-time television is also largely segregated. Although African Americans are seen in proportions that reflect their numbers in the U.S. population, this is due primarily to their presence in programs whose characters are mostly African American. Other racial groups such as Hispanics/Latinos, Asians, or American Indians are practically invisible. Similarly, whites are also most often found in programs with mostly white characters. There are few programs showing an adequate mixing of characters from different races.

Cultivation studies using data from the National Organization for Research at the University of Chicago's General Social Survey examined self-designated liberal, moderate, and conservative respondents' desires to keep African Americans and whites separate. Overall, light-viewing liberals are always least likely to endorse segregationist statements. The views of light-viewing moderates and conservatives are often very similar and somewhat more likely to endorse racial segregation. However, heavy television viewers are more homogenous across political groups and show clear evidence of mainstreaming. Heavy viewing conservatives become more liberal and heavy viewing liberals become more conservative in relation to these issues. In short, the television mainstream, in terms of attitudes toward African Americans, clearly runs to the right.

Television viewing also contributes to a blurring of class lines. Respondents who have a low socioeconomic status are most likely to call themselves working class only when they are light television viewers. Heavy viewers in this socioeconomic group, on the other hand, are more likely to call themselves middle class. Similarly those heavy-viewing respondents who are in the high socioeconomic group tend to call themselves working class compared to the light viewers in this group. Television viewing thus tends to blur class distinctions and make more affluent heavy viewers think of themselves as just working people of average income.

The cultural and political television mainstream tends to absorb the divergent tendencies that traditionally have shaped the political process. Heavy television viewers, compared to comparably light viewers, tend to call themselves moderate but take positions that are unmistakably conservative. Although television viewing tends to bring the views of conservatives, moderates, and liberals closer together, the liberal position diminishes most among heavy viewers. Viewing thus blurs traditional differences moving it into a more homogeneous mainstream and, at the same time, moves the mainstream toward a more conservative or hard-line position on issues dealing with personal rights and minorities. Thus, as television may have come to serve as the current melting pot of Americans, assumptions of what constitutes the current mainstream must be continually monitored and revised to fit the images in the media, particularly those found on television.

Nancy Signorielli

See also Gerbner, George

Further Readings

Gerbner, G. (1973). Cultural indicators: The third voice. In G. Gerbner, L. P. Gross, & W. Melody (Eds.), Communication technology and social policy. New York: John Wiley & Sons.

Gerbner, G., Gross, L., Morgan, M., & Signorielli, N. (1982). Charting the mainstreaming: Television's contributions to political orientations. Journal of Communication, 32(2), 100–127.

Gerbner, G., Morgan, M., Gross, L., Signorielli, N., & Shanahan, J. (2002). Growing up with television: Cultivation processes. In J. Bryant & D. Zillmann (Eds.), Media effects: Advances in theory and research (2nd ed.). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Signorielli, N., & Morgan, M. (Eds.). (1990). Cultivation analysis: New directions in media effects research. Newbury Park, CA: Sage.

Cultural Imperialism

The word imperialism refers to the politics of states to expand their empire and thus their sphere of power and influence. Cultural imperialism refers to the historical

A Coca-Cola billboard is on display near an anti-imperialist mural June 15, 1999, at La Paz Public University, Bolivia. The population of Bolivia is composed of Native Americans mainly following ancestral customs and Spanish-speaking people of European ancestry who generally follow Western traditions.

Source: Getty Images.

fact that in imperial expansion, cultural forces have always played a significant role. Illustrations are Christian missionary activities, the introduction of Western-style school systems, forms of colonial administration, modern conceptions of professionalism, and the use of European languages in overseas colonies. The essence of cultural imperialism is that in achieving the domination of one nation over other nations, cultural sources of power and influence are of key importance. Cultural imperialism has different names in academic literature. It has been called media imperialism, cultural colonialism, communication imperialism, cultural synchronization, and ideological imperialism.

The combination of culture and imperialism achieved common currency in academic and political debates on North-South relations in the late 1960s and continued to be a recurrent topic on academic and political agendas throughout the 1970s and 1980s, particularly in Latin America. The notion of cultural imperialism played a central activist role in the 1970s debates at UNESCO on the creation of a New International Information Order, later to be renamed a New World Communication and Information Order. Toward the late 1980s, cultural imperialism lost its evocative attraction to the notions globalization and alternative globalization.

Defining cultural imperialism is made difficult by the combination of two highly complex concepts. Culture is defined and interpreted in myriad ways, as is imperialism.

A definition that is often used was given by Herbert I. Schiller in his book Communication and Cultural Domination (1976). This definition stresses how the different aspects and processes of a society converge to adapt to the values and structures of the dominant elements of the society. Essential in this definition is the notion of dominance. Cultural imperialism is seen as a process of imperial control that operates through forms of culture and that is more effective than earlier forms of colonial domination through military occupation, foreign administration, and economic dependency.

John Tomlinson has distinguished different discourses on cultural imperialism, which include the following:

- Cultural imperialism as a discourse on media imperialism. International media—as producers and disseminators of foreign cultural content—are seen as the key culprits in a process in which foreign cultural contents are imposed upon local cultural traditions. This is contested by scholars who question whether media are the central forces in processes of domination. They ask whether the media are indeed the key cultural points of reference in Western modern societies and whether foreign pressures (particularly from the United States) on structure, ownership, and content of national media effectively constitute a form of foreign domination.
- Cultural imperialism as a discourse on nationality. This is a process by which indigenous cultures are invaded by foreign cultures and either synchronize with the invaders or disappear altogether. This discourse raises critical questions around the notion of national cultural identity.
- Cultural imperialism as a critique of global capitalism. The challenge for this discourse is to demonstrate that capitalism is a homogenizing cultural force and that the global spread of consumerism constitutes a form of domination.
- Cultural imperialism as a critique of modernity. This discourse perceives of modernity as a way of life that spreads globally and that creates cultural homogeneity. The critical issue here is that the resistance against modernity may romanticize traditional forms of life.

Critics of the cultural imperialism perspective have contested what they saw as its main flaw: the assumption that receivers would be passive and non-resisting actors. They have argued that this assumption was empirically falsified in studies that demonstrated that audiences have an active ability to interpret cultural products in their own ways. According to these authors, the active audience frame of analysis shows that viewers actively produce meaning while consuming foreign TV products. Critics have also focused on the assumption of the single nature of the invading culture and the single nature of the indigenous culture. They have argued that the cultural imperialism perspective has too little attention for the multiple constructs that cultures are and for the mutuality, in processes of influence.

Critics have also addressed the lack of precision, measurability, testability, and inconsistency of the cultural imperialism perspective. The response to this has been that cultural imperialism is a macro-theoretical insight in societal processes that by its very nature lacks precision, quantification, or consistency. The defenders of cultural imperialism have argued that their macro-analysis could be neither falsified nor verified by the micro-type level analysis of individual cultural consumption.

Many studies on cultural imperialism have criticized the shortcomings of the cultural imperialism perspective and have suggested that authors defending this perspective failed to provide empirical support. However, most of the authors who have used the concept cultural imperialism in their efforts to understand domination in international relations have argued that they never formulated their work in operational and testable formats.

Cees J. Hamelink

See also Globalization; UNESCO Media Policy

Further Readings

Beltran, L. R. (1978). Communication and cultural domination: USA-Latin America case. Media Asia, 5(4), 183–192.

Boyd-Barrett, J. O. (1977). Media imperialism: Towards an international framework for an analysis of media systems. In J. Curran, M. Gurevitch, & J. Woollacott (Eds.), Mass communication and society (pp. 116–135). London: Edward Arnold.

Fejes, F. (1981). Media imperialism: An assessment. Media, Culture and Society, 3, 281–289.

Hamelink, C. J. (1983). Cultural autonomy in global communications. New York, Longman.

Lee, C. C. (1980). Media imperialism reconsidered: The homogenizing of television culture. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Liebes, T., & Katz, E. (1990). The export of meaning: Cross-cultural readings of "Dallas." Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Mattelart, A. (1994). Mapping world communication. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

McPhail, T. L. (1987). Electronic colonialism: The future of international broadcasting and communication. Newbury Park, CA: Sage.

Said, E. W. (1993). Culture and imperialism. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

Schiller, H. I. (1976). Communication and cultural domination. New York: International Arts and Sciences Press.

Sui-nam Lee, P. (1988). Communication imperialism and dependency: A conceptual clarification. Gazette. The International Journal of Mass Communication Studies, 41, 69–83.

Tomlinson, J. (1991). Cultural imperialism: A critical introduction. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Cultural Studies

Cultural studies is now well known as a title for a scientific project with different formations researching cultural processes. The essential characteristic of cultural studies is the analysis of cultural contexts, with research into and criticism of the conditions under which individuals as well as groups and classes within society can become culturally self-aware, both in everyday life and in their cultural practices.

Its institutional origins were initially most closely associated with the Centre for Contemporary Cultural Studies (CCCS) in Birmingham, United Kingdom, founded in the early 1960s with Richard Hoggart as its first director (1964–1968). Cultural studies simultaneously, however, calls to mind many persons and formations mainly with stances in cultural analysis in the United Kingdom, the United States, and Australia. Critical association with this tradition is linked with three central authors of the British postwar era: Hoggart, whose book The Uses of Literacy (1957) definitively set into motion enquiries into the influence of mass culture on working-class culture and on daily life; Raymond Williams, whose book Culture and Society (1958) set decisive terminological, conceptual, and theoretical positions in disputing the traditional positions of Arnold, Eliot, Richards, and Leavis, followed shortly by The Long Revolution (1961); and E. P. Thompson, whose book The Making of the English Working Class (1963) further delved into the historic background against which these matters were set.

Williams's contemporary role in cultural studies is undoubtedly based on his having achieved within the debate on English culture—a debate from which he drew concepts that are nowadays still significant for the analytical work of cultural studies—an independent perspective whose goal was to make it possible to apprehend culture as an integrated process, as "a whole way of life." The meaning and role of this concept (which is, to be sure, problematic but is nonetheless central to Williams's criticism), to which further phrases such as "common culture" or "culture is ordinary" are associated, can be understood, not surprisingly, as having arisen in reaction to the conservative cultural criticism that then dominated the academic realm.

In this conflict cultural debate appeared deadlocked between the cruder economic determinisms of much Communist Marxism and the political conservatism and cultural elitism. It was—together with other stimuli that led to the founding of the New Left, among them the uprising in Hungary and the Suez crisis—the postwar climate in English society to which this circle was opposed and which prompted its new positions.

Since the 1970s, a culturalist and a structuralist approach to cultural analysis in the context of cultural studies have developed. These two theoretical strains still determined the cultural analyses carried out under Stuart Hall, second director of the CCCS (1968–1979), from which the driving forces that were at the heart of research emanated into both everyday culture and popular culture since the mid-1970s. These analyses dealt with the media and with the theory of media, with the question of ideology, and with youth subcultures. The significance of the culturalist stance consists, above all else, in having used a new, expanded definition of culture (culture as a whole way of life) to prepare the way for the perspective on everyday culture and popular culture that is typical for cultural studies. The contribution of the structuralist paradigm lies in its acceptance of cultural or, later, discursive constructions of reality. The origins of both approaches exhibit a clear relationship to Western Marxism which thereafter, for later generations in particular, receded behind the designations of culturalism and structuralism. Althusser and later Gramsci and Foucault came to the fore, with whom the analysis of ideologies and of social hegemony and power is linked in different phases of the 1980s and 1990s.

Williams, and after him Hall, who both set into motion many of the innovations in cultural theory within cultural studies, maintains that the social creation of meanings through the use of formal signs is a practical material activity. The specific form of that practical consciousness is for Williams inseparable from all social material activity. It is at once a distinctive material process—the making of signs—and, in the central quality of its distinctiveness as practical consciousness, is involved from the beginning in all other human social and material activity. Relative to social analysis, this means that as culture and ideology emerge in various manifestations, they must continually be deconstructed and reconstructed anew. This has its foundation in the encoding and decoding model that Hall already had articulated in the early 1970s, which has primarily influenced audience studies. In the setting of everyday culture as well, however, society constitutes a structure in dominance, whose elements are also to be understood as autonomous and as existing in contradictory and asymmetric relation to one another. Following from this is the requirement that the status of research continually be defined anew, to keep pace with the alterations in the social and historical conditions that permit its existence and, most of all, to take account of its limitations and relationships, a requirement in which a pluralist perspective inheres.

Cultural studies is not only a matter of using ethnographic methods to discover a set of different cultural practices, but also of tracing the ongoing process of adopting and shifting positions. But although cultural studies carries the same name all over the English speaking world, debate today continues on what can be understood as cultural studies or what such studies really are. The multiplicity of themes addressed by cultural studies, particularly in the past 4 years, makes clear that the work of analysis of the relationships among culture, politics, economics, power, and domination is, in principle, not concluded and that this work constitutively must remain open to new questions and problems.

Udo Göttlich

Further Readings

Grossberg, L., Nelson, C., & Treichler, P. (Eds.). (1992). Cultural studies. London: Routledge.

Hall, S. (1980). Cultural studies—two paradigms. Media, Culture and Society, 2, 57–72.

Milner, A. (2002). Re-imaging cultural studies. The promise of cultural materialism. London: Sage.

Storey, J. (Ed.). (1996). What is cultural studies? A reader. London: Arnold.

Turner, G. (2003). British cultural studies. London: Routledge.

Williams, R. (1958). Culture and society, 1780–1950. London: Penguin.

Cybernationalism

Cybernationalism refers to a new type of ideological movement that has originated, existed, and developed on the World Wide Web since the mid-1990s. It is a natural extension of the traditional nationalistic movement, but it distinguishes itself in its organizational structure, operational pattern, and political implications. Through various Internet-based communications and activities, cybernationalists promote collective identity, cultural cohesion, political autonomy, and national interests among like-minded people in the cyber sphere. Taking advantages of the global reach and decentralized nature of online communication technologies (Internet media, e-mail, online chat rooms, online forums, bulletin board systems, personal Web logs, etc.), cybernationalists can advocate their cause with fast speed, low cost, and tremendous impact.

Nationalism is an exclusive, unsettling, and deep-rooted ideology, whereas the cyber sphere is an all-embracing, dynamic, and unconventional domain. The marriage of a powerful ideology and a revolutionary communication technology resulted in a new political phenomenon—cyber nationalism. This mergence takes three general forms. First, the cyber sphere serves as an information center for people to gather and disseminate nationalism-related information. Such a feature is more salient in countries where traditional mass media cannot be accessed by the nationalist groups. Second, the cyber sphere serves as an organizational platform for those nationalistic movements to exist, survive, and expand. The Internet not only enables those nationalists to form a virtual community in the cyber sphere but also provides them with an organizational medium to coordinate plans, mobilize people, and rally public support. Third, the cyber sphere serves as an execution channel for the nationalist groups to achieve those actionable objectives. A determined individual or a group of well-organized Internet users can inflict damage to the computer system of a targeted country through hacking or service blocking.

The following incident exemplifies the characteristics of cybernationalism. On April 1, 2001, a Chinese fighter jet collided with a U.S. surveillance plane over the South China Sea. The Chinese pilot was missing and the U.S. EP-3 plane made an emergency landing at one of China's military airports. The Chinese government initially withheld the information about this crisis on its state-controlled media. However, when Internet surfers picked up a report from American media and translated it into Chinese, the news was quickly spread across China's numerous online chat rooms. As the American crew members were still being held in China, the U.S. computer hackers initiated a series of retaliation campaigns, knocking hundreds of Chinese Web sites out of service. In response, several nationalism-oriented Chinese hacker organizations were formed in China's Internet-based communities. After an online emergency meeting that attracted thousands of Chinese Internet users, several Chinese hacker groups declared an all-out cyber war against the U.S. Web sites. Within weeks, thousands of Chinese and American Web sites in the government, military, and education sectors were defaced or taken out of service. An estimated 80,000 Chinese cybernationalists participated in this operation.

Xu Wu

Further Readings

Wu, X. (2007). Chinese cyber nationalism: Evolution, characteristics, and implications. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.

D

Daily Show, The

The Daily Show is a nightly news satire program on the cable network Comedy Central that is usually seen by a total of more than 4 million viewers Monday through Thursday. The show was spawned in 1996 with comedian Craig Kilborn as the lead anchor, followed by Jon Stewart in 1999 when Kilborn left to host a late night program on CBS.

Unlike other nightly comedy shows such as The Late Show with David Letterman and The Tonight Show with Jay Leno, The Daily Show stands out as a program that satirizes the traditional TV news format, simultaneously jabbing contemporary journalism and the current events it covers. The show begins with a 6- or 7-minute monologue from host Jon Stewart, sitting at an official-looking desk much like Tom Brokaw or Peter Jennings did during their respective nightly newscasts. The monologue consists of brief jokes beginning with factual current events information, followed by a sarcastic or satirical punch line.

So, whereas some media critics may lament young Americans' loyalty to a farcical news program, viewers must actually be briefed to some extent on pertinent current events in order to understand the humor and find it amusing.

The monologue is usually followed by a "mockumentary" which mixes clever and frequent off-color reporting with unusual or scandalous topics. This portion of the show has in the past covered topics ranging from online divorce proceedings to turtle festivals in the southeastern United States.

A celebrity interview segment is the last portion of the program, and this is where The Daily Show demonstrates its importance in contemporary politics. From the time a sunglasses-wearing Bill Clinton played the saxophone on The Arsenio Hall Show in the early 1990s, politicians have recognized more and more the utility of appearing on entertainment programs, particularly comedy shows. The Daily Show has been frequented by such political dynamos as Senators John Kerry and John McCain, Secretaries of State Madeleine Albright and Colin Powell, U.S. Presidents Clinton and Carter, and Arnold Schwarzenegger, who announced his gubernatorial candidacy in California sitting next to Stewart. Similarly, Senator John Edwards declared on The Daily Show his intention to run for president.

So well known is The Daily Show that anchor Jon Stewart has been headlined by Larry King; hosted the 2006 Academy Awards; and, along with other writers from Comedy Central, authored a bestselling book in 2004 titled America (the Book): A Citizen's Guide to Democracy Inaction. Time magazine listed Stewart as one of the 100 most influential people in the world in 2005. The show has also received considerable attention from scholars because it appears to be a major source of political information for young citizens.

Justin D. Martin

See also Humor in Politics

Further Readings

Baym, G. (2005). The Daily Show: Discursive integration and the reinvention of political journalism. Political Communication, 22, 259–276.

Brokaw, T. (2005, April 17). The Time 100: The lives and ideas of the world's most influential people. Retrieved

June 26, 2007, from http://www.time.com/time/subscriber/2005/time100/artists/100stewart.html
Cornfield, M. (2005). The Daily Show revolution. Campaigns & Elections, 26(8), 34.
Stewart, J., et al. (2004). America (the book): A citizen's guide to democracy inaction. New York: Time Warner.

Daisy Girl Ad

Since 1952 when televised political advertising became a staple of presidential elections, no single advertisement has achieved the notoriety of the 1964 spot known as the "Daisy Girl" ad, which was aired as part of Democrat Lyndon Johnson's campaign against Republican Barry Goldwater.

The 60-second advertisement opens with a young girl counting as she picks petals off of a daisy. Approximately 20 seconds into the spot the audio switches to an adult male voice going through a more ominous-sounding countdown. The image of the girl is frozen, and the camera zooms all the way into the pupil of her eye. At this point the countdown reaches "zero" and the next image the viewer sees is an atomic bomb exploding. President Johnson provides the voice over, "These are the stakes, to make a world in which all of God's children can live, or to go into the dark. We must either love each other, or we must die." The spot ends with a slide that reads, "Vote for President Johnson on November 3," as an anonymous announcer says, "Vote for President Johnson on November third. The stakes are too high for you to stay home." Though simple in its construction, the "Daisy Girl" ad, through its juxtaposition of the image of a young girl and an exploding atomic bomb, retains a powerful effect, even in an era of jaded voters accustomed to negative advertising.

The lasting historical impact of the "Daisy Girl" ad is impressive given that it was broadcast only one time. Formally titled "Peace, Little Girl," it aired September 7 during Monday Night at the Movies on CBS. The ad was part of the Johnson campaign's strategy to depict Goldwater as a radical too quick to resort to drastic action, such as using an atomic bomb. Not surprisingly, the airing of the spot sparked widespread criticism from Republicans, who considered the ad dirty politics.

The real genius of the advertisement is best explained by its creator Tony Schwartz. In his book, The Responsive Chord, Schwartz argues that effective political advertising does not tell the viewer what to think or believe but rather taps into what they already think and believe. The idea of political advertising from Schwartz's perspective is to get something "out" of the viewer, not "across" to them.

Commenting particularly on the "Daisy Girl" ad, Schwartz notes that despite protests from Republicans that the spot was an attack on their candidate, it contains no reference whatsoever to Goldwater. It was effective in that it "evoked a deep feeling in many people that Goldwater might actually use nuclear weapons. This mistrust was not in the Daisy spot. It was in the people who viewed the commercial." In other words, Schwartz is saying the spot did not necessarily create suspicion of Goldwater but merely tapped into what already existed in many viewers' psyches. This ad is a classic example of Schwartz's resonance theory of communication.

Mike Chanslor

See also Resonance Theory; Responsive Chord, The; Schwartz, Tony

Further Readings

Diamond, E., & Bates, S. (1984). The spot: The rise of political advertising on television. Cambridge: MIT Press.
Schwartz, T. (1973). The responsive chord. Garden City, NY: Anchor Press/Doubleday.

Dealignment

Dealignment refers to a secular process of generally eroding political predispositions among the citizens of advanced industrial democracies. The notion that voters' behavior is essentially guided by stable political predispositions dates back to Lazarsfeld's classic study of the 1940 U.S. presidential election. In this pathbreaking analysis, voters' electoral choices could be successfully predicted from a simple "Index of Political Predisposition," consisting of measures of socioeconomic status, religious affiliation, and place of residence, leading to the conclusion that "a person thinks, politically, as he is, socially. Social characteristics determine political preference." Lipset and Rokkan's social-historical cleavage model made plausible how long-standing group conflicts structured modern societies, how they became politicized, and how particular groups of voters came to be affiliated with certain parties. Various ways are conceivable how structural predispositions are translated into individual political attitudes and behavior. Through processes of political socialization, groups may impose specific voting norms on their members. While interacting with structurally similar persons who display certain political preferences, individuals may learn which parties are best suited for people like themselves. Group-specific values and ideologies serve as interpretive tools for politicized social structures, helping make sense of political information and lending meaning to structurally guided political behavior.

The psychological predisposition of party identification is the core component of the Michigan School's model for explaining political behavior. It is conceived as an individual's affective orientation to an important group-object in her environment, with the group being a political party. Comparable to religious identities, partisanship is seen as deeply rooted in individuals' personalities and thus very stable. In voters' minds, it lends order to the complexities of the political sphere by defining certain elements of it as more or less relevant and by providing cues for normative assessments of these elements. Thus, it serves as a "perceptual screen," filtering the information individuals encounter in their environment in a way that is favorable to their party. Partisanship is therefore highly functional, providing structure and meaning to ordinary persons' understanding of politics. Its roots are seen mostly in early-life, primarily familial, socialization processes.

Political predispositions are important mediators of political communication effects. Through selective exposure, reception, acceptance, and retention, they guide how information from the mass media and other sources is processed. Messages from the media, personal communication, or communication campaigns will be readily processed if they are in accordance with citizens' political predispositions but will be blocked out if they contradict these predispositions. Thus, political predispositions may be activated through congenial political communication, leading to manifest behavior that corresponds to these predispositions. At the same time, conversion through persuasive messages that are not in line with existing predispositions is a rather unlikely phenomenon, except for specific circumstances, such as a high degree of consonance in the content of political communications, and low levels of political awareness that prevent citizens from recognizing that messages they are exposed to are actually not in line with their predispositions. The moderating role of partisanship extends also to indirect forms of media-generated persuasion, such as priming. Concerning purely cognitive effects, most notably agenda-setting, its mere existence is important: Partisans are generally less susceptible to this kind of media influence. Thus, political predispositions channel the impact of political communication and lead to a high degree of stability in citizens' political attitudes and behavior, both at the micro level of individuals and at the macro level of entire societies.

Against this background, there are far-reaching implications for political communications in modern societies if political predispositions are eroding. Although not undisputed, findings from many studies indicate that both structural and psychological predispositions are less important now than they were 3 or 4 decades ago. Two different processes are responsible for this secular trend. First of all, the shares of citizens that are characterized by structural or psychological predispositions are shrinking. Due to processes of social modernization, especially secularization, social and geographical mobility, and the tertiarization of the workforce, more and more citizens no longer belong to the groups that have solidly defined the conflict lines of cleavage politics since the late 19th century—groups such as farmers, industrial workers, or faithful Catholics. Similarly, in many societies the share of citizens who are not psychologically tied in any lasting ways to political parties is increasing. Generational turnover, rather than individuals distancing themselves from previously held party or cleavage group bonds, is the main source of this trend. Although the general decline of political predispositions is certainly the more important aspect of dealignment, it can also not be overlooked that even the grip of the remaining predispositions has been loosened. Members of the traditional cleavage groups, and partisans more generally, are less reliable now as supporters of particular parties than they used to be.

For a while it was disputed whether these phenomena indicated a "realignment"; that is, a reorientation of certain groups in the party system. But now it seems clear that the direction of the trend is toward a general decoupling of parties and society, setting more and more citizens free for persuasive, instead of merely activating, communication effects. From a functional perspective it was argued that the expansion of the media, especially television, together with rising levels of education created "cognitively mobilized," politically competent citizens who became "new partisans" simply because they no longer needed political predispositions as guidelines to find their ways in the complicated world of politics. However, it is not clear yet whether the "individualization" of politics that was caused by dealignment is a blessing or rather a curse for the rationality and accountability of the modern political process. Voting decisions appear more strongly guided by short-term considerations than before. Hence, issues and candidates—and the communication flows that concern these—may become more important. Phenomena like split-ticket voting and electoral volatility are now generally more widespread, and more voters make up their minds during campaign periods rather than months in advance. Whether most electors indeed make wise use of the vast information resources available to them to cast intelligent votes, or whether they instead more easily fall victim to demagogues and campaign manipulation, remains to be seen.

Rüdiger Schmitt-Beck

See also Voting Behavior

Further Readings

Campbell, A., Converse, P. E., Miller, W. E., & Stokes, D. E. (1960). The American voter. New York: Wiley.

Dalton, R. J. (2005). Citizen politics: Public opinion and political parties in advanced industrial democracies (4th ed.). Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Dalton, R. J., Flanagan, S. C., & Beck, P. A. (Eds.). (1984). Electoral change in advanced industrial democracies. Realignment or dealignment? Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Dalton, R. J., & Wattenberg, M. P. (Eds.). (2002). Parties without partisans. Political change in advanced industrial democracies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Franklin, M., Mackie, T., Valen, H. (Eds.). (1992). Electoral change. Responses to evolving social and attitudinal structures in Western countries. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Lazarsfeld, P., Berelson, B., & Gaudet, H. (1968). The people's choice. How the voter makes up his mind in a presidential campaign (3rd ed.). New York: Columbia University Press.

Lipset, S. M., & Rokkan, S. (Eds.). (1967). Party systems and cleavage structures: Cross-national perspectives. New York: Free Press.

Dean, Howard (1948–)

Howard Dean was a candidate in the 2004 presidential election and currently serves as the chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Dean was born in New York and studied at the Albert Einstein School of Medicine before moving to Vermont and establishing a medical practice. He began his political career as a state representative in the Vermont House and was then elected as lieutenant governor in 1986. Dean became Vermont's governor on August 14, 1991. He served as governor for 11 years, during which time he achieved a balanced budget and implemented a program that provided universal health care for children and pregnant women in the state.

On June 23, 2003, Dean officially announced his candidacy for the Democratic nomination in the presidential election of 2004. He was the first officially declared candidate against incumbent president George W. Bush. Dean had already been unofficially campaigning for 2 years, after his decision not to run for another term as governor. The Dean campaign firmly committed to the issues of health care, a balanced budget, and a restructuring of the war in Iraq. In fact, Dean was the only Democratic candidate to oppose the war in Iraq from the outset of his campaign.

Dean also stressed the importance of the Democratic Party maintaining its core beliefs and not moving to the right to secure more votes. One of the speech modules that he used in almost every campaign speech was that he represented the "Democratic wing of the Democratic party," and he often discussed how centralizing the party's beliefs could be dangerous and ineffective. This message resonated with some Democratic voters who were seeking a candidate outside the influence of the Washington beltway.

Though Dean was initially dismissed by political pundits, his ability to fundraise and mobilize loyal constituents helped him gain recognition in the surfacing (preprimary) stage. Much of his initial success came from his unequaled ability to utilize the Internet. Dean exploited the full potential of the Internet, harnessing its power to present the issues, collect donations, and most importantly, to dispense information to constituents. Despite his early success in surfacing, victory in the primary eluded him. His zeal and excitement ultimately resulted in a notorious scream at a campaign speech following his devastating primary loss in Iowa. John Kerry soon clenched the Democratic nomination, although he eventually lost the 2004 election to the incumbent, George W. Bush.

Subsequent to his attempt at the presidency, Dean continued his grassroots approach to political organizing with the establishment of Democracy for America. This political action committee's mission is to rebuild the Democratic Party from the ground up. In February 2005, Dean was nominated to be the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, where he is currently fostering Democratic competitiveness in all 50 states and refocusing the party on traditional Democratic values.

Christina M. Smith

See also Democratic National Committee

Further Readings

Kerbel, M. R., & Bloom, J. D. (2005). Blog for America and civic involvement. Harvard International Journal of Press and Politics, 10, 3–27.

Debates

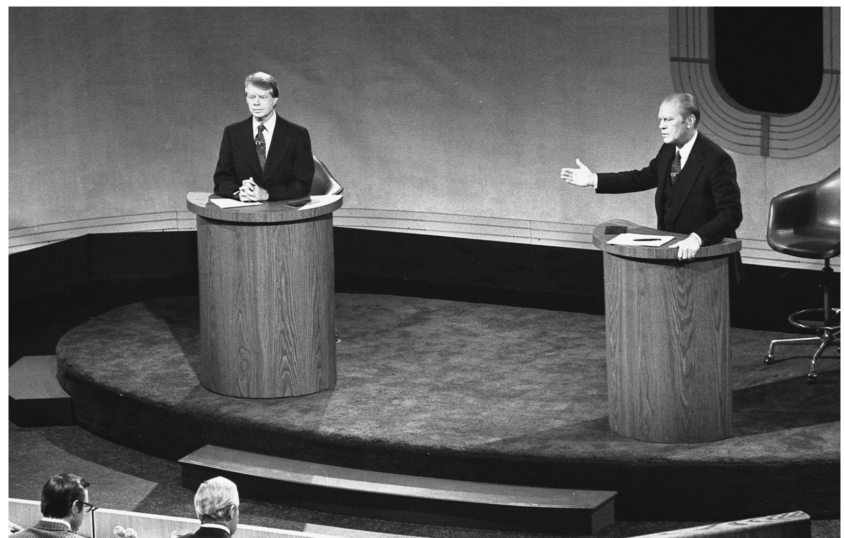
Although various types of political campaign debate had taken place in the United States since the 18th century, it was regarded a major innovation in campaign communication when televised face-to-face debates between presidential candidates John F. Kennedy and Richard M. Nixon occurred in 1960. The televised campaign debate has now become an expected institution in U.S. presidential campaigns, and candidate debates are now common for all levels of elective office. Within the pantheon of political message types, the televised presidential debate is viewed as one of the most important forms of campaign communication by the public, political candidates, and the media, as well as political communication scholars.

Perhaps the most often cited justification for the great attention paid to presidential debates is the fact they reach large audiences. For example, approximately 80% of the U.S. adult population viewed or listened to at least one of the 1960 Kennedy-Nixon debates. Although viewership has declined somewhat for more recent debate series (see Table 1), presidential debates still generate the largest viewing audience of any single televised campaign event.

For the media, a presidential debate series is often treated as the "super bowl" or "prize fight" event of the general-election campaign, providing a convenient news script to perpetuate the media's typical horserace campaign coverage with candidates "dueling" or "sparring" in the debate arena. Such journalistic appeal explains why debates typically attract the largest amount of media coverage of any campaign-related news story during a presidential general election.

For voters, debates serve as a convenient focal point for what now seems to be a never-ending presidential campaign. Indeed, in one setting, voters can receive more direct-candidate information—focused largely on candidate issue positions—than they may receive throughout an entire campaign from other media and information sources. Also, for voters, debates generate the greatest amount of public interest in the ongoing campaign and spur more citizen-to-citizen discussion than any other single campaign event.

The televised presidential debate has evolved significantly since 1960, and compelling evidence suggests that U.S. democracy and voters have benefited from presidential candidates' willingness to meet, face-to-face,



President Ford and Jimmy Carter meet at the Walnut Street Theater in Philadelphia to debate domestic policy during the first of the three Ford-Carter debates, September 23, 1976.

Source: Gerald R. Ford Library.

Table 1 Presidential Debate Series and Average Viewing Audience

Debate Year	# of Presidential Debates	# of VP Debates	*Average Viewers
1960	4	0	63.1
1976	3	1	59.8
1980	1	0	80.6
1984	2	1	63.0
1988	2	1	59.7
1992	3	1	62.6
1996	2	1	36.3
2000	3	1	37.6
2004	3	1	50.9

Source: Data from Nielsen Media Research (see www.debates.org).
*Average viewership expressed in millions.

seeking the public's support. The following discussion of campaign debates will provide a brief historical synopsis of presidential debate encounters from 1960 to the present, discuss the evolution of presidential debate formats, and, finally, discuss the various effects of debate viewing.

History of U.S. Presidential Debates

To understand the evolution and practice of U.S. presidential debates, one must appreciate the candidate debate as it functions within the context of campaign politics. U.S. presidential candidates—not obligated to debate by force of law or campaign regulation—engage in a quadrennial "debate over the debates," struggling to fashion debate encounters that support their own electoral strategy or compliment their personal communicative strengths. Conversely, candidates attempt to negotiate debate particulars that somehow disadvantage their opponent. As previously noted, with public expectations for debates now firmly established, the key question in presidential campaign debates has become not if debates will happen, but rather how they will occur (including when and where they take place, who will participate, how they are structured, etc.).

In 1960, it literally took an act of Congress for John Kennedy and Richard Nixon to meet in debate. With the nascent TV networks arguing for televised debates, and with Senator Kennedy, the Democratic nominee, agreeing that such exchanges might be to his advantage, the Democratic controlled Congress obliged and authorized a temporary suspension of Section 315 of the Federal Communications Act (the so-called Equal Time Rule) thus allowing the networks to broadcast debates that included only the two major-party candidates. The first-ever televised debates were sponsored jointly by the three networks (ABC, CBS, and NBC) which negotiated the specific debate structure with the candidates.

In 1964, incumbent president Lyndon Johnson—no fan of the TV camera and eminently aware of his shortcomings as a public communicator in relation to the sophisticated John Kennedy—stopped congressional attempts to again suspend Section 315 regulations that would have allowed a second installment of televised presidential debates. Next, debates were quashed in both 1968 and 1972 by first candidate and then incumbent president Richard Nixon, believing his defeat in 1960 was due largely to his poor debate performance.

Televised debates finally resumed in 1976 due to a confluence of political and regulatory factors. First, interpretation of Federal Communications Commission regulations allowed for an independent debate sponsor to apply its own candidate selection criteria, and thus the networks could broadcast this televised affair as a bona fide news event. The political environment in 1976 was also ripe for the resumption of presidential debates. With a weak incumbent president (Gerald Ford) desiring to appear in command, and an anti-establishment challenger (Jimmy Carter) eager to appear side by side as a presidential equal, both candidates saw the televised debate option benefiting their candidacy. The League of Women Voters (LWV) took on the role of independent debate sponsor when debates resumed in 1976, yet struggle for debate control between the candidates and the sponsor would eventually lead to the league's replacement by the newly formed Commission on Presidential Debates in 1988.

The ongoing battle between candidates and the LWV for control of the debates became most apparent in 1984 when the league struggled with the Ronald Reagan and Walter Mondale campaigns over the specific format to be used, and particularly the selection of journalists who would serve as questioners. The league initially submitted a list of nearly 100 names of potential journalist-questioners to the two campaigns, seeking to impanel a group of four journalists. Eventually, the candidates could agree on only three journalists. On behalf of herself, her fellow journalists, and the LWV, debate moderator Barbara Walters of ABC News began the first 1984 debate with a pointed rebuke of the two candidates for their failure to agree on at least four journalists whom they deemed acceptable to serve as part of the debate panel.

Following the 1984 clash between the campaigns and the LWV, representatives of the Democratic and Republican parties joined in 1987 to form an alternative organization to sponsor debates, originally dubbed the "bi-partisan"—and now "nonpartisan"—Commission on Presidential Debates (CPD). In 1988, candidates George H. W. Bush and Michael Dukakis had originally agreed to participate in debates sponsored by both the LWV and the newly formed CPD. However, the LWV withdrew as debate sponsor in 1988, and league president Nancy Neuman publicly proclaimed the LWV was unwilling to serve as an "accessory to the hoodwinking of the American public" by acquiescing to candidate demands regarding debate structure and journalist participants. Following the league's withdrawal, the CPD sponsored all of the 1988 debates and continues to serve as the only general-election presidential debate sponsor.

As Table 1 illustrates, once debates resumed in 1976—with the exception of 1980—the quadrennial debate series has included at least two, and most often three, debates. In 1980, Republican challenger Ronald Reagan agreed to debates that included independent candidate John Anderson. Incumbent president Jimmy Carter, however, refused to participate in three-way debates, and Reagan and Anderson held one debate without Carter (not reflected in the Table 1 count of 1980 presidential debates). With little more than 1 week remaining until Election Day, Jimmy Carter met Ronald Reagan in a single 1980 debate. Table 1 also reveals that vice presidential debates began in 1976, and—with the exception of 1980—each debate series has featured a single vice presidential debate.

Presidential Debate Formats

Perhaps the most often-heard refrain regarding presidential debates is the charge that these staged-for-TV encounters between the major aspirants for the U.S. presidency are anything but "true" debates. In fact, scholars, political pundits, and candidates all frequently complain that these quadrennial exchanges do not reach their full potential as exercises in political argumentation. At the heart of such criticism is usually some quarrel with the actual debate structure or format.

Common criticisms include the inability of candidates to develop sustained and in-depth argument due to abbreviated response times, as well as multiple and often unrelated topics discussed in a single debate. Candidate responses in a typical presidential debate can be as short as 30 or 60 seconds and rarely longer than 2 to 3 minutes. Interestingly, it has traditionally been the candidates themselves who have insisted in their debate negotiations to limit response times (and then these very same candidates during a debate lament they have limited time to fully respond to journalists' questions or to an opponent). Also, U.S. presidential debates, normally 90 minutes in length, typically deal with a host of issue topics in a given debate, covering both foreign and domestic policies, and although a single presidential debate has been devoted to a particular subject area (i.e., international or domestic policy), a full debate has never been devoted to a single issue topic.

Other debate format flaws frequently noted include insufficient opportunity for follow-up questioning, thus allowing candidates to avoid responding to particular queries, and tight controls on candidate responses that prohibit direct candidate exchange or clash, thus limiting comparison of campaign issues. Finally, one of the most frequent complaints of the traditional televised debate structure has focused on the role and performance of the panel of journalist questioners. Often, instead of debating one's opponent, presidential candidates have found themselves arguing with a journalist engaged in a game of "gotcha" with questions deemed convoluted or irrelevant by the public.

When examining the practice of presidential debates from 1960 to the present, one finds the actual structure of these exchanges remained virtually unchanged until the 1990s. Since that time, however, the design and practice of presidential debates has evolved significantly. Once the CPD took control of debates from the LWV in 1988, there was a steady evolution away from the original Kennedy-Nixon debate model—the much criticized "joint press-conference" format—to debates that are now very different in their design and incorporate many elements advocated by debate scholars. Innovations in presidential debate formats include the exclusion of the journalist panel and adoption of a single moderator to facilitate greater candidate interaction, extended and less-rigid candidate response sequences that allow for more in-depth issue discussion, and also greater inclusion of direct public participation in the actual debate process with undecided citizens participating in the Town Hall debate.

When considering different debate formats, a key question—especially for the debate scholar—is whether or not debate structure actually matters. Does it matter, for example, how long candidates are allowed to respond, or if the debate questions are asked by a citizen or a journalist? Do certain formats contribute to greater voter learning? Also, does debate structure affect the actual content of a debate, or more precisely, does a debate format affect the communicative performance of the candidates? Here, a limited amount of empirical analysis has been conducted to better understand possible relationships between debate format and content, and the answer is becoming increasingly clear that debate format does, in fact, matter in several important ways.

Content-analytic studies have found that candidate clash (debate dialogue that features a direct comparison of candidates' competing issue positions) is limited when format design limits rebuttal times or when the same or similar questions are not posed to both candidates. Also, the actual type of question asked of candidates influences candidate clash. Specifically, "comparative" questions results in greater candidate clash. A "comparative" debate question, for example, is illustrated by debate moderator Jim Lehrer's opening question of the first 1992 debate when he asked, "The first question tonight is what separates each of you from the other? Mr. Perot, you first, what do you believe tonight is the single most important separating issue of this campaign?" Finally, when comparing the amount of candidate clash that occurred in the three distinct debate formats utilized in the 2000 debate series (including a Town Hall debate, a more formal "podium" debate, and candidates seated around a table for a more informal and less structured "chat" debate), the more formal "podium" debate contained the greatest overall level of candidate clash, and the more conversational "chat" debate contained the least amount of clash.

In 1996, with two distinct debates held between President Bill Clinton and Senator Bob Dole—the first a more traditional "podium" debate with questions asked by single-moderator Jim Lehrer and the second a Town Hall debate with questions asked by undecided citizens—a comparative content analysis of the two debates found three important content differences. First, the Town Hall debate contained significantly less candidate attack; also, the two candidates developed significantly more issue (versus image) appeals in the Town Hall debate than in their "podium" debate; and finally, the Town Hall debate featured significantly more candidate-positive (versus opponent-negative) discourse than did the "podium" debate. Also, when examining the relationship between debate format and issues discussion, studies have found that questions asked by citizens in Town Hall debates correspond more directly to the issue priorities—or issue agenda—of citizens than do debate questions asked by journalists.

Overall, the limited amount of debate format research suggests that the actual structure of a debate does, indeed, matter. The extant content-analytic research suggests different debate formats produce different communicative outcomes. These studies typically reveal that the more formal "podium" debates conducted by a moderator or panel of journalists seem to encourage greater candidate clash as well as more aggressive and attack-oriented discourse. When the public is included in the debate dialogue, however, candidates seem to reduce their level of clash and attack, adopt a more personable or "humanizing" style, focus more on issue (rather than image) discussion, and engage in the debate of issues that are of greatest concern to the public.

Presidential Debate Effects

To inform our understanding of specific debate viewing effects, much debate scholarship has been generated guided by a central question: "Do debates matter?" The short answer to the question of whether or not, or actually how, debates matter is the typical scholarly response, "It depends." In brief, decades of presidential debate research has concluded that debate effects are dependent largely on the contextual dynamics of a given campaign, including the particular candidates engaged in debate, and also highly dependent upon the different types of debate viewers.

First, the overall campaign context in which a debate takes place influences the debate's usefulness or impact. Scholars have delineated four conditions under which voters are most likely to find debates useful in making their vote choice: (1) when at least one of the candidates is relatively unknown, (2) when many voters remain undecided, (3) when the race appears close, and (4) when party allegiances are weak. Findings from the 1992 and 1996 presidential debate series illustrate well the application of these conditions. Polling before the 1992 debates, which included incumbent president George H. W. Bush, Democrat challenger Bill Clinton, and independent candidate Ross Perot, revealed that a significant segment of the electorate remained undecided at the time of the debates; and the debates were judged by many citizens in post-election polling as the single most important campaign event in their decision for whom to vote in 1992. Yet just 4 years later a popular incumbent president (Bill Clinton) debated a lifelong and well-known national political leader (Bob Dole) in a race where the incumbent's lead in pre-election polls never dipped below 10%. Polling before and after the 1996 presidential debate series found viewers learned little new information, and the debates changed few minds as most citizens had made their vote choice well before the October debate series.

In addition to campaign context, the disposition of viewers also influences debate effects. Debates will have their greatest influence on highly interested, yet undecided, voters who might be classified as regular debate viewers (those who view an entire debate or series of debates). Debates will have much less influence on those marginally interested voters, or the "occasional" debate watchers, as well as those committed partisans who view debates for reassurance that theirs is indeed the superior candidate. Finally, debates have little to no effect on the uninterested voter who may not attune at all to the actual debate program or who might be exposed only to media coverage of the event.

Even with these caveats, numerous studies have found substantial debate viewing effects. In general, the extant literature reveals that debates work more to reinforce rather than change voters' minds, debates facilitate the acquisition of issue information, and debate viewing influences perceptions of candidates' character or image traits. The following sections provide a brief review of the specific behavioral, cognitive, and image evaluation effects and conclude with a discussion of the various latent influences of debates on citizens and the democratic process.

Behavioral Effects

Little change in voting intentions is typically recorded following exposure to debates. Yet whereas debates may not alter the voting preferences of the vast majority of previously committed viewers, several studies have found that among the undecided, conflicted, or weakly committed, debates do help these viewers form their voting preference or even change candidate selection. Although the undecided and uncommitted citizen may constitute a smaller segment of the debate viewing audience, it is exactly this slice of the electorate to which most general-election campaign messages are targeted and, in very close contests, the voters that ultimately decide the outcome of an election. In fact, from the nine presidential campaigns that have featured general-election debates, post-debate Gallup polling data suggest that televised debates played a decisive role in the outcome of more than half of these contests (including the 1960, 1976, 1980, 1992, and 2000 debate series and elections).

Cognitive Effects

That debates are an "information-rich" source of campaign communication facilitating viewers' acquisition of issue knowledge is a well-established finding. In addition to the many studies identifying general knowledge acquisition from debate viewing, a number of studies also provide clear evidence refuting the "selective exposure" thesis that suggests political partisans may attune only to those messages from candidates they support. Instead, the comparative nature of debate dialogue encourages citizens to overcome any tendency for selective exposure as viewers report roughly equal levels of learning from both the candidate whom they support as well as from the opposition candidate. Also, issue learning from debates may not be even across multiple debates. In a multi-debate series, viewers report learning more from the first debate, with less issue knowledge acquired from subsequent debate viewing. Finally, studies that have compared voters' issue knowledge in those presidential elections with debates versus election years without (i.e., 1964, 1968, and 1972) find that respondents were much more knowledgeable about campaign issues during those years with debates; also, respondents who report watching more debates are able to recall more specific issue information and identify more policy differences between the candidates.

Candidate Image Evaluation Effects

A number of studies have found that debate exposure influences viewer perceptions of candidate character or image traits. Yet, within the debate effects research, the relative or proportional nature of issue knowledge and image perception effects has remained a somewhat persistent and unresolved question. In short, the matter remains as to which influence is greatest—does debate exposure have a larger impact on viewers' perceptions of candidate image or on the acquisition of issue knowledge? Clearly, one answer to this question might be that issue and image learning are two message components that work in tandem. Scholars have argued, for example, that candidates' debate messages incorporate a dual strategy of highlighting issue differences while also emphasizing a positive self-image and a negative opponent image.

Latent Effects

Several studies have examined campaign debates' possible latent effects whereby exposure to candidates in debate may activate citizens' various civic and democratic tendencies. In general, these studies have found that debate viewing promotes civic engagement and thus strengthens the electoral process. Specifically, debates have been found to heighten viewers' interest in the ongoing campaign, encourage citizens to seek out additional campaign information following their debate viewing, encourage greater participation in the campaign through such activities as talking to others about one's preferred candidate, and lead to increases in reported likelihood of voting. Also, a few studies have found debate viewing enhances citizens' sense of political efficacy, decreases political cynicism, and strengthens support for political institutions.

Televised Debates Around the World

Following the advent of general-election televised presidential debates in the United States in 1960, many nations followed this lead by establishing their own tradition of televised campaign debates. Although the vast majority of these countries represent Western democracies, a smaller number of Eastern nations, now including Japan, Taiwan, and South Korea, have adopted the televised debate as a feature of their nation's campaign communication system. Although there exists no definitive source, the following countries are among those nations where televised debates have taken place, and when available, the year is noted when debates were first televised: Australia (1984), Canada (1968), Denmark, Finland (1974), France (1974), Germany (2002), Holland (1977), Israel (1977), Italy, Japan (1969), Mexico (1999), New Zealand (1984), Norway, Poland, Russia, South Africa (1994), South Korea (1997), Spain (1993), Taiwan, Sweden, United States (1960), and West Germany (1969). Interestingly, some sources have suggested that Sweden may have in fact preceded the United States in televising debates as party leader "debates"—or the so-called Swedish joint press appearances—were first broadcast in the late 1950s.

Certainly, most of the extant scholarly analysis examining televised debates emanates from analysis of U.S. presidential debates. Yet, available analysis of non-U.S. debates now suggests that empirical findings based on the study of U.S. debates may certainly differ when compared to the unique debate dialogues and structures of other countries and cultures. As communication is so closely tied to cultural norms, it is imperative to include cultural variables when examining debates from differing nations. The candidates participating in debate forums and the viewers of these communicative events are all embedded in a specific culture, and thus debate dialogue, as well as interpretations of the interaction, will be influenced by the culture's style of thinking and feeling, value systems, and attitudes.

The U.S. electorate has now witnessed debates in eight successive presidential elections, and there is ample evidence to suggest that the public uses these key campaign events in making their voting decisions. Recent innovations in the design and practice of these debates also demonstrate that debates are becoming increasingly responsive to public needs. With so much thought to be so wrong with the U.S. electoral system, televised presidential debates may well represent a true success story in campaign communication. Indeed, the very principle of a participatory democracy is perhaps best demonstrated in campaign debates in which those desiring to be our leaders must stand before the public and argue why we, the people, should grant them one of the greatest expressions of power we have—our vote.

Mitchell S. McKinney

See also Commission on Presidential Debates; DebateWatch; Great Debates, The

Further Readings

Benoit, W. L., McKinney, M. S., & Holbert, R. L. (2001). Beyond learning and persona: Extending the scope of presidential debate effects. Communication Monographs, 66, 259–273.

Carlin, D. B., & McKinney, M. S. (Eds.). (1994). The 1992 presidential debates in focus. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Hellweg, S. A., Pfau, M., & Brydon, S. R. (1992). Televised presidential debates: Advocacy in contemporary America. New York: Greenwood Press.

Jamieson, K. H., & Birdsell, D. S. (1988). Presidential debates: The challenges of creating an informed electorate. New York: Oxford University Press.

Kraus, S. (Ed.). (1962). The great debates: Background, perspective, effects. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Kraus, S. (2000). Televised presidential debates and public policy. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Lanoue, D. J., & Schrott, P. R. (1991). The joint press conference: The history, impact, and prospects of American presidential debates. New York: Greenwood Press.

McKinney, M. S. (2005). Let the people speak: The public's agenda and presidential town hall debates. American Behavioral Scientist, 49, 198–212.

McKinney, M. S., & Carlin, D. B. (2004). Political campaign debates. In L. L. Kaid (Ed.), Handbook of political communication research (pp. 203–234). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

The Racine Group. (2002). White paper on televised political campaign debates. Argumentation and Advocacy, 38, 199–218.

DebateWatch

DebateWatch is a voter education project of the Commission on Presidential Debates (see www.debates.org) that encourages citizens to view debates in groups and discuss what they learn after each of the debates. DebateWatch grew out of research conducted by communication scholars in 1992. In the course of conducting 60 focus groups in 18 cities to learn how debates function as voter education tools, how they compare to other political communication channels, what formats are most informative, and how citizens talk about politics, researchers discovered that most participants had not carried on extended political discussions with individuals outside of family. Many participants found the discussions to be as educational as the debates themselves and suggested that the focus group project be continued in future elections.

Through a grant from the Ford Foundation in 1996, Diana Carlin, the team leader of the 1992 study, developed DebateWatch '96. The project included publication of a packet that explained the concept, how to organize a group, questions to ask, and how to provide feedback about the usefulness of topics discussed to the Commission. Through a network of 125 partner organizations, media stories, public service announcements, and information on the Commission's Web site, individuals requested DebateWatch packets. Results of answers to three key questions were sent to the DebateWatch headquarters where they were compiled and released to the media. The questions were: which issues were most useful to you as a voter, which were least useful, and what topics do you want discussed in future debates or in the campaign? Thousands of individuals' viewpoints were represented by facilitator reports. More than 100 research groups were conducted by members of the National Communication Association that provided additional information about sources of political information, the impact of the debates on voter choice, and the value of DebateWatch as a political education tool. DebateWatch was continued in 2000 and 2004. With the extended use of the Web and e-mail, all instructions and forms were provided only on the Web, and results were returned via e-mail or directly online. The Commission released results on its Web site after each debate.

Key findings from DebateWatch were published in journals, books, and conference papers. Findings included the following: (a) Viewers prefer multiple formats, with the panelist format preferred by the least number of respondents; (b) participants in the town hall format are viewed as surrogates who ask questions that resonate with voters; (c) follow-up questions are considered key to making the candidates responsive to questions; (d) viewers consider a candidate's record in office as the best indicator of character because it reveals priorities, willingness to compromise, and ability to deliver on promises; (e) viewers prefer questions and formats that make comparisons and contrasts clear; (f) participants wanted fewer topics per debate and different topics in each debate; (g) debates were considered a far better way to learn about the candidates than other information sources; (h) all participants learned something new from the debates, but those who had not followed the campaign until prior to the debates learned the most; (i) the debates served to reinforce previous voter choices rather than change candidate preference for nearly all who came into the debates with a preference; however, high percentages of undecided voters did indicate movement toward a candidate—the percentages varied by year; and (j) participants indicated that as a result of participating in DebateWatch they were more likely to seek out additional information about the candidates.

Diana B. Carlin

See also Commission on Presidential Debates; Debates

Further Readings

Carlin, D. B., & McKinney, M. S. (Eds.). (1994). The 1992 presidential debates in focus. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Deciding What's News

In 1970, sociologist Herbert Gans released his book Deciding What's News: A Study of CBS Evening News, NBC Nightly News, Newsweek, and Time, which combines content analysis and ethnographic analysis to explore news and journalists. Twenty-five years later the book was re-released with a new preface by the author. Whereas the first text was depicted as an exploration of current news operations, the new one is recast as a close look at the "golden age" of news.

Gans introduced the new edition by talking about the changes in the news media environment. He noted the fragmentation due to more national news sources, the declining ratings for the four news outlets he examined, large corporate ownership of news outlets, increasing coverage of soft news items, the opinionated approach of cable news, and the impact of technological advancements.

Gans argued that his conclusions are still accurate today because the nature of news organizations has not significantly changed, and journalists are still driven by the same values. Additionally, Gans contends that despite the conglomeration of news, journalists are free from commercial and political influence on what they report.

The original analysis is then presented in three parts. The first is the result of a content analysis of the four news sources he studied. The second, and most extensive, comes from his ethnographic look at these news organizations, and the final part offers suggestions for the future.

In his content analysis, Gans demonstrates that public officials dominate whereas ordinary individuals receive less attention. He argues that poor and lower-class Americans are underrepresented; thus the upper middle class is presented as the norm—an issue he would further develop in his later work The War Against the Poor. Gans also explores coverage of various activities, race, sex, age, ideology, and foreign issues. Finally, he outlines several values that he believes guide the development of the news, such as ethnocentrism, altruistic democracy, responsible capitalism, and moderatism.

In the second part of the book, Gans details the results of his ethnographic analysis in which he spent months observing journalists in the newsrooms of the four organizations. He discusses how the news outlets are organized, how journalists find and work with sources, how stories are developed, how journalists deal with their personal values and ideologies, considerations about profits and audiences, and censorship issues.

After offering some conclusions about media and journalists and their role in society, Gans then argues for the development of multiperspectival news, which presents more perspectives than traditional news. For Gans, this includes more coverage of other nations and ordinary citizens, more attention to the output or impact of policies, stories that are more representative of the population, and stories that serve people. In the preface to the new edition, Gans contends that this approach has still not been adopted.

Brian T. Kaylor

See also News Coverage of Politics; Television in Politics

Further Readings

Gans, H. J. (2005). Deciding what's news: A study of CBS Evening News, NBC Nightly News, Newsweek, and Time. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press.

Defamation of Character

See Libel

de Gaulle, Charles (1890–1970)

Born November 22, 1890, Charles de Gaulle reached historical status on June 18, 1940, when he made a famous radio speech calling for the French to resist the German invaders, though the apparently legal government headed by Marshall Pétain had called for a truce. A professional soldier, de Gaulle had previously achieved the status of "temporary"general by leading one of the few successful counter attacks against the invading army. He was then called by politician Paul Reynaud to serve as assistant minister and subsequently left for London, where he delivered the famous radio speech.

From then on, Charles de Gaulle remained in politics: Leader of the Free French, he became the chief of the French Provisional Government. Dissenting from the traditional political parties, he soon withdrew, tried to establish a new party, and finally retired to his country manor. In 1958, however, he was recalled, again as a savior, to extricate France from the Algerian conflict, becoming at the same time the first president of the Fifth French Republic, under a new constitution he had tailored to fit a stronger executive power.

Tireless in all his enterprises, de Gaulle managed to master any communication means as soon as he thought he might put it to use. First, as a writer, he had already achieved an unusual reputation for an army colonel. Between World Wars I and II, he had written several widely publicized books, which warned about the danger of a new war and about the weaknesses of the French army. His genuine literary talents were again demonstrated in the 1950s, when he wrote three volumes of memoirs.

Radio became de Gaulle's main communication tool during World War II, and he regularly addressed occupied France through the BBC. His inimitable voice helped him reach many French people, in spite of the communication ban imposed by the occupying enemy forces.

Elected president in 1958, de Gaulle had to utilize a new medium, television. Initially he used it as he did radio, reading his texts with his (thick) glasses on. He was eventually advised by communication and advertising consultant Marcel Bleustein-Blanchet, founder of Publicis, to memorize his texts, remove his glasses, and look into the camera. De Gaulle continued to write elaborate discourses, which he delivered to his viewers with an apparent ease.

He organized his communication as president in a very thorough way, holding regular and extremely formal press conferences, attended by all the members of his cabinet. There, accredited journalists could ask only questions submitted to his cabinet beforehand. De Gaulle led these press conferences with great ease, using humor and showing an uncommon knowledge of the subtleties of French language.

Philippe J. Maarek

Further Readings

Berstein, S. (2001). Histoire du Gaullisme [History of Gaullism]. Paris: Rémi Perrin.

de Gaulle, C. (1954). Mémoires de guerre [Memories of the war] (Vols. 1–3). Paris: Librarie Plon.

de Gaulle, C. (1970). Mémoires d'espoir [Memories of hope] (Vols. 1–2). Paris: Librarie Plon, de Gaulle, P. (2003–2004). De Gaulle, mon père [My father, De Gaulle] (Vols. 1–2). Paris: Librarie Plon.

Lacouture, J. (1984–1986). De Gaulle [De Gaulle] (Vols. 1–3). Paris: Seuil.

Peyrefitte, A. (1994–2000). C'était de Gaulle [That was de Gaulle] (Vols. 1–3). Paris: De Fallois/Fayard.

Deliberation

In the context of political communication, deliberation refers to a process of reasoning and discussion about political matters. Deliberation takes place in parliamentary debate, expert panels, deliberative decision-making bodies, news media content, political talk shows, online discussion forums, civil society organizations, and everyday political talk among citizens.

Normative theories of deliberative democracy place particular emphasis on the democratic value of deliberation. Although by no means a uniform group, deliberative democratic theorists agree on the centrality of argumentative exchange in political communication in order to foster both the cognitive quality of political judgment (rationality) and mutual respect and cohesion among deliberators (social integration). Deliberation is usually considered to be an alternative to both bargaining and rhetoric. Although bargaining involves the pursuit of particularistic interests by means of offering incentives and applying threats, deliberation relies on the persuasive power of voluntarily accepted reasons. Whereas rhetoric can include polemics, humor, emotional appeals, and the like, deliberation is predicated on the literal use and understanding of arguments.

One problem of deliberative democratic theory is how to transpose the benefits of deliberation from small-scale deliberative settings into large-scale societal communication. Bruce Ackerman and James S. Fishkin have proposed a "deliberation day" to bridge the gap: establishing a national holiday one week before major national elections on which citizens would be paid for participating in deliberation groups as well as voting 1 week later. A more mundane possibility lies in measuring deliberative qualities of the mass news media and investigating the conditions under which such deliberative media content has normatively desirable effects on political decision makers and citizens. Vis-à-vis decision makers, mediated deliberation can be thought to foster active justification of political claims and decisions, thus enhancing the quality of decisions or at least avoiding egregious mistakes. In relation to the citizenry, deliberative media content may serve as a repository of arguments and justifications (thus reducing citizens' information costs drastically) and as a model for deliberative behavior in everyday political talk.

So far, there are only a few empirical studies directed at measuring the deliberative qualities of mass media content. In the print media, argumentative exchange is achieved for example in commentary, news analysis, or debate-style articles, with journalists apparently playing a particularly important role for enhancing deliberativeness. In political talk shows, the host can foster argumentation by eliciting justifications from discussants and confronting them with opposing claims. In citizen deliberation, argument repertoire has been shown to be a valid measure of deliberativeness; that is, the number of arguments a person can give for his or her own position and the number of arguments a person can imagine opponents will use to support the counter-position. Exposure to disagreement enhances argument repertoire and political tolerance but discourages political participation, suggesting that deliberative and participative behavior cannot be optimized at the same time. Critical accounts of political deliberation sometimes feature claims of decay over time, but longitudinal evidence to support such claims is scarce at best.

Hartmut Wessler

Further Readings

Fishkin, J. S., & Laslett, P. (Eds.). (2003). Debating deliberative democracy. Malden, MA: Blackwell.

Mutz, D. (2006). Hearing the other side. Deliberative versus participatory democracy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Wessler, H. (2007). Investigating deliberativeness comparatively. Political Communication, 24.

Deliberative Democracy

See Group Decision Making, Political; Public Communication in Politics

Demirel, Süleyman (1924–)

Süleyman Demirel has been a leading political figure in Turkey since he joined the center-right Justice Party, or JP, in 1962. He served as deputy prime minister (1965), prime minister (1965–1971; 1975; 1977–1978; 1979–1980; 1991–1993), and the ninth president of the republic (1993–2000). Leader of seven governments, deposed twice by the military (first in 1971 and again in 1980), and the nation's patriarch, often referred to simply as "Baba" or "Father," Demirel had a political life that spanned virtually the whole postwar period.

A self-made man, born in a village in the province of Isparta, a hydraulic engineer with a successful career of dam-building before 1960 and in an American firm after 1960, Demirel was elected the JP's chairman in November 1964. Under his leadership, the JP won a clear victory in the 1965 elections, gaining an absolute majority of the votes cast (52.9%) and of seats in the assembly. Demirel proved to be a first-rate vote-catcher with his rising popularity in the countryside. He was an orator who could speak the language of the mass of the people, stressing that he was one of them: a villager, a shepherd, a civil servant, and now a prime minister. Upon the ultimatum handed to him by the military in 1971, Demirel resigned his government. In office he had complained about large civil liberties and the autonomy of the state radio and television ensured by the 1961 Constitution. In 1972, a number of amendments were made in the Constitution, limiting civil liberties and ending the autonomy of radio and television, legalizing governmental control over the management and broadcasting policies of state radio and television. Demirel's most important contribution to political communication in Turkey was being the first to utilize advertisement techniques in the party's political campaign for the 1977 elections. Although this technique did not lead his JP to victory, it was an initial step for a larger use of advertising strategies in political campaigns after 1983.

Between 1975 and 1980, Demirel formed three "National Front" coalition governments gathering together the ultranationalist, Islamist, and center-right parties against Bülent Ecevit's center-left Republican People's Party. In 1980, the generals took over political power and banned all political leaders, including Demirel, from politics for 10 years. He was deposed by the military for a second time. However, 11 years after the 1980 coup, he returned to the prime minister's office to lead his seventh government. In 1993, after the death of Turgut Özal, Demirel was elected to the presidential office of the Turkish Republic, leaving his True Path Party in the hands of Turkey's first female prime minister, Tansu Çiller. In 1991, when he led the True Path to power, it was the largest party in parliament, with 27% of the national vote. Demirel stayed in the presidential office until May 16, 2000, when he left active politics, but his image as the nation's patriarch remains alive.

Nur Betül Çelik

See also Çiller, Tansu; Ecevit, Bülent; Özal, Turgut

Democracy Theories

Democracy is a concept that has its roots in ancient Greece. Since that time, political philosophers have derived a variety of understandings of democracy theories and their normative assessments. It is possible, however, to identify a democratic nucleus that is inherent to all democratic theories. Identifying a core concept of democracy allows us not only to clarify our understanding of democracy but also to locate political communication—its importance and functions—more precisely inside democratic thinking.

The family of democracy theories can be structured along three categories: (1) normative foundation, (2) institutional design, and (3) quality of functioning. The first category refers to certain ideal conceptions and finds its expression in versions such as liberal democracy or social democracy (often discussed as procedural versus substantial forms of democracy), strong (participative) democracy, feminist and gender democracy, or deliberative democracy. The second category allows us to differentiate democracies according to their institutional setting, such as parliamentarian and presidential democracies or majoritarian and consensus democracies. The third category distinguishes democracies with respect to their gradual democratic quality, which is assessed by certain standards (such as polyarchy, liberal democracy). Political regimes with lower democratic quality are regarded as defective democracies (e.g., illiberal, delegative, or electoral democracy).

Another common approach differentiates between normative and empirical democracy theories. This divide has its value in two main scientific traditions, which for a long time widely ignored each other. On the one hand political philosophers discussed what democracy should be, and on the other hand empirical researchers looked at existing political systems and analyzed what democracies are. This differentiation has lost most of its tension, because political philosophy is more closely linked to empirical research, and the latter has noticed that the building of democratic standards necessary for the assessment of democracy needs normative reflections, too. Nevertheless it is obvious that we are confronted with different ways of using, building, and testing democracy theories. Besides the different ways to conceptualize the term democracy, democratic theories are trying to answer the following questions:

1. What is the appropriate institutional form of democracy, or how is it possible to improve the quality of democracy? This question marks the search for an ideal concept of democracy and its inherent elements. It affects all three categories (normative foundation, institutional design, and standard of quality).

2. What are the necessary and/or sufficient conditions for the development and consolidation of democracy?

This question is mainly the focus of transformation research as well as of theories of modernization and political culture.

3. What are the consequences of democratic rule? What are its effects for the economic and social development, for the integration of societies, and for the generation and resolution of (international) conflicts? This question is treated in different fields of research which include policy research, analysis of societal development, and international relations (democratic peace).

All three questions underline the importance of democratic theories in contemporary social science research. It is impossible to discuss all the aspects mentioned above in just a few pages; therefore, the following discussion picks up the first question and concentrates on an explication of democracy and its relation to political communication.

Concept of Democracy

Procedural democracy, which assigns institutions of the political process as central in conceptualizing democracy, is the clearly dominating view of democracy theories and includes lean concepts such as polyarchy, as well as demanding models such as deliberative democracy, which underlines the quality of an appropriate democratic process in its reasoning dimension. In this procedural tradition, democracy can be defined in the following way: Democracy is a constitutional kind of rule, which allows the self-determination of all citizens (in the sense of sovereignty of the people) by guaranteeing their decisive participation in free and fair elections (of the main political representatives) and/or in political decisions (referendum). The concept includes the possibility of a continuing influence on the political process and the control of power. Democratic participation in the political power finds its expression in the dimensions of freedom, equality, and political and juridical control.

These three dimensions can be identified at the core of democratic thinking. They are inherent in each definition of democracy in an abstract sense. Although they build a common platform, their understanding and their significance differ notably. A systematic interpretation of these three dimensions along current debates enables us to explicate the basic ideas of the dimensions.

The dimension of freedom is rooted in the citizens' free self-determination in a political community. This dimension contains the transfer of individual preferences through the elections of political representatives in free and fair elections and/or the possibility to make one's own decisions by plebiscite or referendum. Additionally, this dimension allows for continuing political participation embedded in a public structure of competitive organizations and free media. The citizens' political participation is guaranteed by the existence of civil and political rights. Furthermore, sovereignty of the people implies that the elected representatives own the political power and use it (effective power to govern) while respecting individual rights, which are the foundation of democracy. Democratic rule is bounded by individual rights and does not mean unbounded rule. To participate freely means that all rights have to be codified, that the factual possibility to enjoy the rights exists (which demands a certain degree of institutional and administrative capacity), and that the use of these rights is not thwarted by formal or informal acts. Keeping these aspects in mind, it is obvious that democratic rule has to be considered within a system of rule of law (Rechtsstaat).

The dimension of equality expresses political equality, which on the one hand includes the fair formal treatment of all citizens by the state (legal equality). On the other hand, this dimension enables all citizens to participate in all formal institutions needed for the democratic process (input-egalitarianism). Whereas the dimension of liberty allows for free participation in the democratic process in an active sense, the dimension of equality underlines the equal chance of having access to these rights and asks whether all citizens have the same opportunity to use their rights. This concept of political equality does not strive for the same results of political participation, not even for equal chance of competition. Differences can be grounded in the changing formal status of the actors or can be given by the specific surrounding norm and value system. Political equality means fair and effective legal equality. Fair means the equal and effective use of civil and political rights. Therefore, equality is not only treated in a formal sense. We have to respect that rights can be realized. All citizens must be able to enjoy their rights. This implies a certain degree of social welfare and education. In a more fundamental sense, equality is rooted in the acceptance of others as equals on the basis of the concept of individual autonomy. Therefore, the existence of liberty rights is a necessity but not a sufficient condition for equality. The field of political and social decisions has to remain open for the decisions of the democratic sovereign (the citizens) with the previously formulated exception that the material fundamentals of all citizens should be considered.

Democracy always means a certain restriction of rule. Its main function is the control of political power (government and parliament) through political and judicial means. The dimension of control integrates both vertical and horizontal accountability. Besides the peculiarities of political control in the political process (mainly through political parties and civil society), the central actors of control are the formal institutions of the state. Democratic control is necessarily based on the opportunity of citizens, civil society, and parliament to participate in control mechanisms, to ensure their capacity to defend their rights, and to support the (sometimes limited) initiatives of the judicial system. The only standard of judicial control is established by the constitutional and legal behavior of the respective office-holders. Transparency of the political process functions as an important condition for both kinds of control (political and judicial), which are exercised permanently. Control is only effective if it aims at forcing the office-holders to render an account of their acts and behavior and if it provides for appropriate sanctions. This requires the functioning of an independent judicial system, supported by other authorities and by initiatives of civil society. As can be seen very clearly, rule of law is an inherent part of democracy regarding not only the dimensions of liberty and equality but also the dimension of control. Hereby the principles of rule of law (or the constitutional legality) serve as a benchmark of the procedures and assessment of control.

Five Central Institutions of Democracy

The dimensions have to be institutionalized if they are to work continuously. On the basis of the current discussion, five institutions are identified by their special functions, which are necessary for the realization of the three dimensions. Some functions are covered by characteristic institutions; however, the typical institutions can be substituted by institutional functional equivalents:

1. Procedures of decision: In democracies the participation of the citizens in binding decisions is mainly given by elections. With their vote, citizens select their representatives in government and parliament. This institution is characterized by the standards of free and fair elections. The institution's procedures of decision also include the possibility to participate directly in decisions by means of referenda or plebiscites.

2. Regulation of the intermediate sphere: Institutions of the intermediate sphere structure the organization of interests so that they are capable of articulating, selecting, and aggregating interests with regard to the democratic process. The institution is democratic if all preferences of the citizens have a fair chance to be organized and therefore translated into political decisions. To ground the policy decisions only on elections is insufficient. If political situations change, the ability to influence the decision-making process must still continue. Parties and organizations of civil society are the main types of intermediate mediation, whereby both types of representations formulate different goals—office-holding versus decision influence.

3. Public communication: The institution of public communication regulates the ways of communication that are necessary for other democratic institutions. Their specific democratic form is built on a set of liberty rights concerning public communication (such as freedom of speech, of expression, of information, of press). Even if they are individual rights, they need the public sphere to find their expression. Democratic communication structures are characterized by transparency and openness, which does not mean that all interests have the same impact but that they have a real chance of being articulated and communicated.

4. Guarantee of rights: The institution of guarantee of rights marks a specific form of political participation, which allows all citizens to protect their rights (basic to the other democratic institutions) directly. Through legal proceedings individual citizens or organizations of citizens can defend their rights or influence the political process and policy outputs. Similar to procedures of decision, this institution is qualified by its binding character with one important difference. Whereas voting expresses a citizen's decision, the judicial decision (judgment) is made by a judge (the court). In the latter, citizens can cause a decision about a special issue, but they cannot determine the content of the decision. The institution is used to correct former political decisions or to influence them in the future.

5. Rules settlements and implementations: The central character of this institution is linked with the idea of an effective government that implements the decisions of the democratic majority. This implies the control of the exclusive authority of the state in the whole country and excludes the existence of non-constitutional veto powers (or official veto powers, which use their formal resources in an unconstitutional way) or "brown areas," which are partly dominated by alternative norm systems (informal institutions). It also demands a rational and effective bureaucracy (Max Weber) and should be able to obtain all the information of the citizens that is necessary to fulfill their duty and not infringe on individual rights. An impartial and unbiased treatment of the citizens by government, parliament, and bureaucracy highlights the democratic character of an effective government.

The Matrix of Democracy

The combination of the three dimensions and five central democratic institutions enables the creation of a concept of democracy (Table 1) that allows a differentiated assessment and a separate analysis of the different aspects of democracy.

Political Communication and Democracy Theories

Political communication as public communication is inherent to each understanding of democracy and is necessary for the working of the other basic democratic institutions. The importance of public communication is already underlined in system theory by the input functions of interest articulation, selection, and aggregation as well as by the special function of political communication itself, which stresses the importance of government information. In democracies these functions obtain even more importance because they are the foundation of democratic legitimacy. The legitimacy of democratic rule is unthinkable without public communication. This exchange includes not only the complex processes of transferring individual and collective preferences to the political system and the public explanation and justification of governmental decision but also the central function of control expressed by public criticism through mass media or arenas of civil society.

Although this basic positive significance of political communication for democracy is widely accepted, one should not ignore its questionable aspects, which can undermine the democratic process and with it the legitimation of democracy. One main reason for ambivalent development lies in the transformation of political communication, which can be understood as a process of professionalization and change from party democracy to media democracy. This process means an increasing importance of the public arena accompanied by known attributes: growing importance of public agenda setting, (over)simplification of political arguments, persons gaining more significance than the party ideology or program, and electoral campaigns being more strongly influenced by marketing strategies (organized by spin doctors). One negative aspect lies in the unequal power structure of political communication, which can affect all dimensions of democracy, as prominently discussed in Italy under Berlusconi, who combined private and public media power. Furthermore, public communication inside civil society can be influenced by power structures as well. Another aspect for negative development is related to both of the previous arguments and underlines the problem that political communication follows more the logic of the market than the logic of reason. From this perspective it is difficult to establish a deliberative democracy.

Many of these aspects are also discussed under the phrase "colonization of politics by the media." This statement is called into question by an opposite argument, which stresses the instrumentalization of the media by politics (as partly visible in the conduct of government by former British Prime Minister Tony Blair and U.S. President George W. Bush). A more realistic position would avoid such extreme interpretations and emphasize the mutual dependence of media and politics as proposed in the symbiosis model by Ulrich Sarcinelli. Empirical analysis provides the basis for an appropriate interpretation. This approach is also true in the general assessment of the ambivalences of political communication for democracy. The functions and effects of public communication depend on its changing form and structure. Its impact on democracy has to be frequently analyzed. This analysis includes the growing importance of the Internet and with it, the changing opportunities of influencing public opinion and the establishing of e-democracy.

The relevance of political communication for democracy theories is also recognizable in other areas. One area concerns the mediation of conflicting interests and conflicts, which also affect the integration of society. Furthermore, public communication allows the steering of informal institutions, which can undermine democracy to a certain degree. Finally, public communication not bound to national borders helps disperse and promote democracy abroad. These

Table 1 Matrix of Democracy

Institutions \ Dimensions	Liberty	Equality	Control
Procedures of Decision	Free Elections and Referenda (no restrictions) 01 1/1	Equal Chances of Participation Equality of Votes 06 1/2	Control Exercised by Election Review Board 11 1/3
Regulation of the Intermediate Sphere	Freedom of Organization 02 2/1	Equal Rights of Organization 07 2/2	Control by Parties and Civil Society 12 2/3
Public Communication	Freedom of Communication 03 3/1	Equal Chances of Participation 08 3/2	Control by Media (Independent Journalism) 13 3/3
Guarantee of Rights	Free Access to Court 04 4/1	Equal Rights and Equal Treatment in Court 09 4/2	Effective Court Order/Supreme Court 14 4/3
Rules Settlement and Implementation	Effective Government (Rational Administration) 05 5/1	Equal Treatment by Parliament and Administration 10 5/2	Separation of Powers 15 5/3 considerations underline the importance of political communication in the analysis not only of democracy as a concept but also of the beneficial factors and effects of democracy.

Hans-Joachim Lauth

See also Agenda Setting; Democratization, Role of the Media in; E-Voting; Government Communication; Press Freedom; Public Sphere; Systems Theory

Further Readings

Baker, G. (2006). Democracy. Contemporary theories. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

Birch, A. H. (2001). Concepts and theories of modern democracy (2nd ed.). London: Routledge.

Corcoran, F., & Preston, P. (Eds.). (1995). Democracy and communication in the new Europe: Change and continuity in East and West. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press.

Cunningham, F. (2001). Theories of democracy. London: Routledge.

Dahl, R. A. (1989). Democracy and its critics. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Dryzek, J. S. (2002). Deliberative democracy and beyond. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Goodin, R. E. (2005). Reflective democracy. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Gunther, R., & Mughan, A. (2000). Democracy and the media. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Holtz-Bacha, C. (2002). The end of old certainties: Changes in the triangle of media, political system, and electorate and their consequences. Ethical Perspectives, 9, 222–229.

Lauth, H.-J. (2004). Demokratie und Demokratiemessung [Democracy and measurement of democracy]. Wiesbaden, Germany: VS-Verlag.

Phillips, A. (1991). Engendering democracy. Cambridge, UK: Polity Press.

Sarcinelli, U. (2005). Politische kommunikation in Deutschland. Zur politikvermittlung im demokratischen system [Political communication in Germany: Political policy in a democratic system]. Wiesbaden, Germany: VS Verlag für Sozialwissenschaften.

Sartori, G. (1990). The theory of democracy revisited. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House.

Schmidt, M. G. (2000). Demokratietheorien. Eine Einführung [Democracy theories. An introduction] (3rd ed.). Opladen, Germany: Leske & Budrich.

Terchek, R., & Conte, T. C. (Eds.). (2001). Theories of democracy. A reader. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Democratic Engagement

See Political Engagement

Democratic National Committee

The Democratic National Committee (DNC) refers to an organization affiliated with the U.S. Democratic Party. It was established at the 1848 Democratic National Convention. The DNC's main function is to nominate a Democratic presidential candidate, provide Democratic Party candidates with financial and other social supports, and promote Democratic values through elections. The committee also establishes all guidelines for party conventions, including convention sites, entertainment, and advertising. The DNC is responsible for upholding the Democratic Party's stated platform of equality, multiculturalism, health care, economic responsibility, fair taxes, freedom of speech, women's rights, and technological advancements, as well as educational, environmental, and welfare reforms.

The DNC cooperates with national, state, and local party organizations, including elected officials and candidates, to respond to public need. Moreover, the DNC promotes important party agendas and protects the Democratic Party's interests. Using new media technologies such as official Web sites and politically relevant Web logs, the DNC presents Democrats' views and interacts with the public. It is also responsible for organizing fundraising efforts and contributes financially to party operations. During the 2001–2002 election cycle, the DNC raised $162,062,084 and raised $61,131,832 during the 2005–2006 election cycle. It sometimes acts as a media source, releasing news articles on political candidates, elections, and other party-related issues. During campaign periods, the DNC also sponsors political advertising messages in support of Democratic candidates. The committee sponsors expert research on politically sensitive topics such as the environment, stem cell research, abortion, and gay marriage.

DNC leadership includes nine elected officers of the chair, five vice chairpersons, a treasurer, secretary, and national chairperson. The DNC chairperson often represents important Democratic political agendas in national elections and is dedicated to making the Democratic Party more competitive in every national and local election. There have been 47 chairpersons of the DNC since its inception in 1848.

As the representative body of the Democratic Party, the DNC often confronts controversy. After receiving $115,000 in foreign money for campaigns in 1996, the committee faced accusations of illegal fundraising. The DNC has also been criticized for its inconsistent political stances, especially regarding sensitive issues like gay marriage and stem cell research. Whereas the political function of the DNC is to endorse Democratic values through its activities and elections, it is often confronted with opposition from more conservative forces. Furthermore, its actions have spurned conflicts over control between Democratic parties at the national and state levels.

In 1952, the DNC created an official document called a "loyalty oath" that strategically defined the relationship between national and state Democratic parties. However, this process has produced more controversies regarding the varying degrees of control between national and local organizations. As a result, the DNC's programs and strategies have been modified and abandoned by different leaderships throughout its history.

Hyun Jung Yun

See also Democratic Party

Further Readings

The Democratic Party Web site: http://www.democrats.org/

Ogden, D. M. (1961). The Democratic National Committee in the campaign of 1960. The Western Political Quarterly, 14(3), 27–28.

Democratic Party

The Democratic Party in the United States emerged after the splintering of Jefferson's Democratic-Republican Party in the 1820s. Andrew Jackson is sometimes cited as the party's founder. Always more attuned to the needs of those with fewer privileges, the party initially espoused what one might term a conservative ideology. A succession of changes in party rules gradually altered its ideology to what it is today.

Between 1832 and 1860, the Democratic Party was dominant largely because rivals lacked a comparable level of formal organization. The party stood for strict interpretation of the Constitution, states' rights, and limited federal spending. The party was divided on the question of slavery.

The party was so divided that it ran two candidates for the presidency in 1860, a northern one and a southern one, thus assuring victory to the fledgling Republican Party and its candidate, Abraham Lincoln. During the Civil War, the Democrats' northern wing became factionalized, with "Copperheads" advocating conciliation toward the secessionist south. After the war, the party was weak, assuring a Republican ascendancy from 1860 to 1932.

The Depression brought African Americans, organized labor, and academics into a coalition with traditional Democrats in the South and in urban centers. The party's nomination of Franklin Roosevelt in 1932 and his subsequent actions as president pushed the party in a more liberal direction. The abolition of the party rule that required a two-thirds vote for its presidential nominee in 1936 stripped its more conservative members, concentrated in the South, of their power to veto more liberal party standard-bearers. The party, now with liberal leadership, came to advocate a loose interpretation of the Constitution, federal power, and government spending to address the nation's social and economic ills. This agenda was diametrically opposed to the party's philosophy during its earlier heyday.

Despite tensions within the Democratic Party (and widespread defections to the Republican Party in the South), it remained the majority party into the 1980s. Further modification of party rules opened up the national convention to more women and minorities, thus pushing the party in a liberal direction on many social issues. However, the emergence of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council pulled the party back toward the center. President Bill Clinton arguably represented a rapprochement between liberal and centrist groups, but the party lost power during his presidency to Republicans who were aggressively advocating a focused conservative agenda.

Political parties, almost by necessity, represent coalitions, and there will be tensions within any coalition large enough to command the allegiance of many American voters. The tension between centrists and liberals will undoubtedly continue to define the Democratic Party in the near future. In addition, the increasing number of Americans who define themselves as independents should pressure both Democrats and Republicans to stress ideologies less and solutions to public policy problems more.

In the United States, the Democratic Party actively pursues its political and legislative agenda through use of all means of political communication. During and outside formal campaign and election periods, the party produces and distributes campaign messages through multiple media, including the sponsorship of political advertising and the maintenance of Web sites.

Theodore F. Sheckels

See also Democratic National Committee

Further Readings

Fairlie, H. (1978). The parties: Republicans and Democrats in this century. New York: St. Martin's Press.

Holcombe, A. N. (1974). Political parties of today: A study in Republican and Democratic politics. New York: Harper & Row.

Lawrence, D. G. (1996). The collapse of the Democratic presidential majority: Realignment, dealignment, and electoral change from Franklin Roosevelt to Bill Clinton. Boulder, CO: Westview.

Reichley, A. J. (2000). The life of the parties: A history of American political parties. New York: Rowman & Littlefield.

DEMOCRATIZATION, ROLE OF THE MEDIA IN

In contrast to earlier waves of democratization, the media are playing a major role in recent transitions to democracy. Two factors can be regarded responsible for this development that reflect both the beneficial and detrimental potential of the media in democratic politics.

First, innovations in communication technologies have created a transnational, and even global, public sphere. As national opposition movements can link easily with a global network of supporters and journalists, it has become increasingly difficult for political leaders of autocratic regimes to control political opposition and change. However, it has to be kept in mind that dictatorships cannot be brought down by the media alone. They are just one factor that contributes to the erosion of autocratic rule and can only unfold their potential impact in conjunction with favorable political, social, and international constellations.

Second, institution-building and consolidation take place under the conditions of a saturated and commercialized media environment. For example, unlike political parties in established democracies, which developed before the advent of television and even before the introduction of general franchise, parties in new democracies have to incorporate media strategies as a matter of survival right from the start. As a consequence, new democracies seem to immediately develop into media-centered democracies that are vulnerable to populism, manipulation, and volatile public opinion.

At the turn of the millennium, democracy has become the predominant form of government with about two thirds of countries worldwide being classified as democratic. Over the 20th century, breakdowns of autocratic regimes with subsequent introduction of democratic institutions and procedures occurred in "waves," the first of which took place after the collapse of European monarchies in World War I, the second in the context of decolonization and the breakdown of fascism in World War II, and the third during the 1970s when the military dictatorships in southern Europe and Latin America came to an end. This last wave of democratization gained new momentum after the demise of the Soviet Union, allowing the countries of the former Soviet bloc in Eastern Europe to finally abolish communist rule. The end of the Cold War also allowed many countries in Asia and Africa, which had formerly been tied to the global interests of one of the antagonistic blocs, to hold open and competitive elections. As a consequence, the latest wave of democratization has developed an unprecedented global dynamic and involves more countries than any previous one.

However, many of the new democracies that have emerged over the past 2 decades or so remain fragile and prone to relapses into various forms of autocratic practices. Terms such as partial or defective democracies are used to characterize countries that fall short of the standards of a functioning democracy. One of the key problems in many new democracies is the persisting restriction on press freedom that prevents these countries from developing into fully fledged democracies. In particular broadcast media remain highly vulnerable to political interference and instrumentalization. Because the mass media are an indispensable part of a healthy democracy, the failure to transform both their institutional structures and journalistic performance poses a serious impediment to the viability of a newly established democracy as a whole. Without a free flow of information and the representation of a broad range of views in the public domain, elections remain rather meaningless, even if conducted according to procedural standards. Furthermore, the accountability and responsiveness of the elected government depend on the media's political autonomy and their ability to play a part in the system of checks and balances.

The media are also a driving force in the process of democratization, which derives from their dual nature as actors in their own right on the one hand, and communication technologies for the dissemination of messages on the other hand. As actors, the media may choose to take sides in the conflicts emerging during regime change, thus playing an active role in promoting, or inhibiting, democratization. Striving for a greater degree of autonomy by fighting a nondemocratic government might appear in the media's own interest. However, this frequently turns out to be a high-risk strategy, as it brings the media into open conflict with vested interests who have the power to cut off vital resources. In contrast, remaining close to the government or forming alliances with particular groups bears the risk of undermining the media's credibility on the side of their audience if the transition to democracy turns out to be successful. Hence, which option the media follow depends on the particular constellation in the political and economic environment and the expected risks and benefits arising from each of the choices.

The potential of communication technologies in processes of democratization arises from the media's ability to transmit messages to mass audiences instantly and across large distances. Although this generally applies to traditional media such as print and broadcasting, recent changes in communication technologies have fundamentally changed the interplay between the media and democratization. Satellites allow information to be broadcast worldwide irrespective of national borders. And the Internet has further revolutionized the production and dissemination of messages to an extent that makes it difficult for governments and political elites to control the flow of information. By allowing for one-to-one and many-to-many communications, the Internet has overcome the centralized structure of traditional media and provides an effective opportunity for citizens to circumvent censorship and to organize networks for democratic change.

Phases of Democratization and the Media

Transitions to democracy are long-term processes that usually take decades and remain open-ended throughout a considerable period of time. Students of democratization distinguish between three stages of transition to democracy: liberalization, democratization, and consolidation. The media's role differs significantly in each of these phases, reflecting both the particular constraints they are subjected to and the specific constellation in the political environment during the process.

Liberalization takes place under the old regime when the political elites realize they have to respond to the demands of the citizens in order to maintain the legitimacy of the regime. In many instances adopting a less suppressive approach has been caused by economic stagnation and the formation of a progressive faction within the ruling elite. One crucial aspect of liberalization involves the cautious softening of censorship. Deviant opinions are tolerated to a certain degree, and the media are gradually allowed more journalistic freedom. These new spaces of free expression are usually confined to areas the regime regards marginal to its power interests, and sensitive issues continue to be kept under strict control. An example of the dynamics of liberalization within autocratic regimes is the policy of glasnost, or openness, initiated in the mid-1980s by Mikhail Gorbachev, leader of the Communist Party and president of the Soviet Union at that time. He invited the media, alongside citizens and societal groups, to publicly discuss existing problems and to engage in a collective search for possible solutions to overcome the crisis. However, the policy of glasnost did not yield the intended consequences, as the crisis of the system spiraled out of control, and the Soviet Union finally collapsed in 1991. It is an open question whether the liberalization initiated by Gorbachev actually contributed to the eventual breakdown of the communist regime and whether it can be concluded that demands for freedom cannot be stopped once political leaders start to give in. The example of China illustrates that liberalization does not inevitably lead to the erosion of autocratic rule. Since the economic reforms were started in the 1970s, Chinese media underwent rapid commercialization, in the process of which they were given a high degree of managerial autonomy. However, as of now the state is still able to exert strict control over the content of media information, particularly political news.

The second phase, democratization, denotes the actual breakdown of the old regime and the implementation of core democratic institutions, usually laid down in a constitutional document. This is often a time of high drama bearing the risk of a fatal confrontation between the masses demonstrating for change and representatives of the old regime. Often the domestic media remain largely in the background and openly take sides only when it becomes clear which of the opponents is winning. In contrast, international media and, more recently, the Internet, with its instant global reach, play a key role in the course of events. Once the conflict has attracted the interest of international news agencies, global media attention serves like a protective shield for the protesters. As long as the whole world is watching, it is difficult for political leaders "to take out the tanks" without seriously damaging their international reputation. Transborder broadcasting and international media attention also affect the opposition movement itself by setting in motion a so-called demonstration effect. Even if domestic media refrain from covering the protest, information from foreign media makes people in the country aware of what is going on. As more people feel encouraged to take to the streets, international media devote even more coverage to the events, which leads to a rapid acceleration up to a point where it becomes impossible for the old elites to regain control and return to the previous state of affairs.

The third stage, consolidation, refers to the process of the new democracy taking roots in society, which in some circumstances can take decades to achieve. Consolidation involves both a structural and a cultural dimension which are closely interrelated and interdependent. Structural aspects of consolidation include institution building and the application of the rules of the democratic game. Cultural aspects denote the orientations, norms, values, and behavior of both citizens and elites. Accordingly, the structural consolidation of a democratic system of public communication involves media regulation and the reform of media organizations, especially those previously directly controlled by the state, whereas cultural transformation requires journalists to adopt orientations and practices that are in accord with the democratic role of the media. Following Blumler and Gurevitch's notion of political communication as a system of interaction between politicians and journalists, one should also include the practices of news management employed by political actors.

In most new democracies media regulation has become one of the most disputed areas in the consolidation process. In particular, redesigning the organizations of broadcasting is fiercely disputed not only between governments and the media but also between government and opposition parties, even in countries that have made fast progress in setting up democratic structures, such as Hungary and Poland. Throughout newly established democracies, interference in the management structure of broadcasting organizations, direct manipulation of news content, and even threats and blackmailing remain severe impediments to the development of an open and diverse public debate. Some observers have blamed persisting undemocratic traditions for the apparent inability of governments to respect the autonomy of the media. Another explanation lies in the particular constraints under which political power is won and maintained in post-autocratic politics. After years of suppressed pluralism most political parties lack both efficient party organizations and loyal constituencies that are the main resources for electoral success in established democracies. Hence, more than their Western counterparts do, political parties and candidates in new democracies depend on the media as a means of communicating to voters. Securing access to the media agenda at the expense of political competitors is therefore the main, if not the only, effective strategy in the political contest.

Journalists have made remarkable progress in providing a critical voice in the political debate. Indeed, some have taken extreme risks when standing up against misuse of power, corruption, and attempts to mislead public opinion. However, lack of resources often remains a severe impediment for in-depth analysis and independent research. Moreover, most political reporting, especially in the printed media, is characterized by a high degree of opinionatedness and partisanship. For many newspapers, aligning with specific groups or parties and supporting their cause in the day-to-day coverage of politics serve to secure income revenues that are independent from market constraints and circulation rates.

Pathways to Democracy and the Media

Even though the media in new democracies share certain problems, there are also significant differences across countries. The theory of path dependency of democratization provides a framework to explain why this is so. According to this school of thought, the specific features of the emerging democracy, its strengths and shortcomings, are shaped by the specific nature of the old regime. Democratization research distinguishes between transitions from communist regimes, military dictatorships, and one-party rule. Similarly, the role of the media after regime changes is, to a large extent, determined by the role they fulfilled before.

Countries in Eastern Europe represent, in an ideal typical way, the experience of post-communist democratization. The media under communist rule played a key role in mobilizing and re-educating the masses and providing legitimacy for the regime. In fact, according to Lenin's doctrine, the media were a pivotal part of the power structure as they served as the major propaganda channel and organizational instrument for the communist party. Entertainment in the media was frowned upon and only gradually admitted during the period of liberalization. In addition, like the rest of the economy the media were nationalized; that is, effectively owned by the state or state organizations. Democratic transformation of the media involves both political independence and privatization. The dual character of transition makes the post-communist pathway particularly complex and prone to failure. The outcome in many eastern European countries is a mixture of a public service broadcaster that still bears the features of state television and a highly monopolized print market.

In contrast, the situation of the media under military dictatorships, which dominated Latin America, was significantly different. These regimes built their power on the quiescence of the population rather than ideological mobilization. Therefore, apart from a few government-owned outlets, the media played only a marginal political role. Because the capitalist structure of both press and broadcasting remained untouched, media content carried the typical features of a highly commercialized industry with a predominance of cheap entertainment and a marginalization of politics. This has not changed after the demise of the old regimes resulting in the inability of the media to adopt a positive democratic role of informing citizens about political issues and promoting public debate. Moreover, the entertainment-oriented coverage of politics has made the media ideal allies for populist presidential leaders that are on the rise throughout the continent. The combination of popularized politics and presidentialism is believed to further exacerbate the existing weakness of political institutions in Latin America.

Finally, East Asian countries represent ideal typical cases for the third pathway of democratization, which has its roots in developmental one-party systems. Autocratic regimes, as they existed for example in South Korea and Taiwan, were based on a strong centralized state alongside an extensive bureaucracy that was regarded the primary agent for managing economic development. The media were both agents and beneficiaries of this system, as they were obliged to serve the government's developmental goals while being protected from global competition. Again, there is striking continuity between the old system and the emerging new democracy. Calling on so-called Asian values that emphasize deference to authority, primacy of collective interests, and social harmony, governments are still determined to keep the media at a short arm-length. As a consequence, investigative reporting and public controversies are rare, and oppositional voices find it extremely hard to get access to the media agenda. However, due to economic wealth, satellite television and the Internet are flourishing in these countries and play an increasingly important role in providing an alternative forum that takes on democratic functions traditional media are unable to fulfill.

Katrin Voltmer

Further Readings

Blumler, J. G., & Gurevitch, M. (1995). The crisis of public communication. London: Routledge.

Diamond, L., Plattner, M. F., Chu, Y., & Tien, H. (1997). Consolidating the third wave democracies. Regional challenges. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Ferdinand, P. (Ed.). (2000). The Internet, democracy and democratization. London: Frank Cass.

Freedom House Web site: http://www.freedomhouse.org

Hollifield, J. F., & Jillson, C. (Eds.). (2000). Pathways to democracy. The political economy of democratic transitions. London: Routledge.

Huntington, S. P. (1991). The third wave. Democratization in the late twentieth century. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

Mickiewicz, E. (1999). Changing channels. Television and the struggle for power in Russia (Rev. & exp. ed.). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

O'Donnell, G., & Schmitter, P. C. (1986). Transitions from authoritarian rule. Tentative conclusions about uncertain democracies. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Paletz, D. L., & Jakubowicz, K. (Eds.). (2003). Business as usual. Continuity and change in central and eastern European media. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press.

Potter, D., Goldblatt, D., Kiloh, M., & Lewis, P. (Eds.). (1997). Democratization. Milton Keynes, UK: Polity Press.

Splichal, S. (1994). Media beyond socialism. Theory and practice in east-central Europe. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Voltmer, K. (Ed.). (2006). Mass media and political communication in new democracies. London: Routledge.

Waisbord, S. R. (2000). Watchdog journalism in South America. New York: Columbia University Press.

Zhao, Y. (1998). Media, market, and democracy in China. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Demography

Demography is the study of variables such as age, ethnicity, gender, sexuality, religion, education, social class, and political preference in different population segments. Biological, economical, societal, and political characteristics determine an individual's demographic categories, which can be used as cues for understanding social interactions and furthering various types of research.

Cultural studies argue that whether an individual is younger or older, male or female, white or of color, well educated or uneducated, poor or wealthy determines how that individual thinks and behaves as well as the expectations others have of that individual in various contexts. Governments and survey research organizations, such as the Center for International Earth Science Information Network (CIESIN) and Census Scope, study population trends and lifestyles to predict demographic changes. Cultural differences among various demographic segments of populations can be compared both nationally and internationally. Besides factual and cultural observations, relationships or causations between demographic elements and possible consequences can also be studied.

In both the social and hard sciences, theories on causations have either centrally focused on demographic characteristics or have used demographics as control variables. The University of California at Berkley's Department of Demography, the University of Michigan, and the University of Pennsylvania have a long history of population studies focusing on demography. In addition, journals such as Demography cover population science across disciplines including geography, history, biology, statistics, business, epidemiology, and public health.

Demography is usually treated ontologically. In biology and epidemiology, for example, age, gender, ethnicity, and social class are important factors that determine chemical and medical reactions. In social science, political predispositions and societal characteristics are necessary determinants for behavioral consequences. Particularly in sociology, politics, and communication studies, all demographic characteristics are used as mediating factors.

In political communication, scholarship deals with demographic causational relations. Some examples of studies conducted include how age affects cynicism about politics, the relationship between religion and political affiliation, the relationship between education and political activism, attitudes toward opposing parties, and how men and women react differently to political candidates and political platforms like national defense, foreign relations, affirmative action, and education.

Studies have found, for example, that younger people are more likely to be cynical and less informed about politics and that females generally perceive or react to political issues differently than males and are often less opinionated about political candidates and issues. Furthermore, studies show that men see defense, foreign relations, and strong politics as important, whereas women think issues such as affirmative action and education supersede the current national agenda.

Furthermore, studies have found that religious people tend to be more active in political events than people who have weak or no religious beliefs and are more likely to be Republicans. More educated individuals are more likely to be politically active, get their information from various sources, and have a greater desire to learn. Individuals who are affiliated with a strong political party tend to not listen to information from incongruent opinion groups or other parties.

Hyun Jung Yun

Further Readings

Iyengar, S., & Simon, A. (2000). New perspectives and evidence on political communication and campaign effects. Annual Review of Psychology, 51, 149–169.

Kaid, L. L., McKinney, M. S., & Tedesco, J. C. (2000). Civic dialogue in the 1996 presidential campaign: Candidate, media, and public voices. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press.

Deng Xiaoping (1904–1997)

Deng Xiaoping was arguably the most influential Chinese leader of the second half of the 20th century, apart from Mao Zedong. Deng encountered Marxism in France and, after his return to China, joined the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), serving as an officer in the civil war against the Nationalist government and in the struggle against Japan during World War II. After the CCP formed the People's Republic of China in 1949, Deng quickly became an influential leader, serving as secretary general of the CCP from 1957 to 1966, when he lost his position and was sent to work on a labor farm during the Cultural Revolution. He was returned to high-level politics in 1974 but again was purged until after the death of Mao Zedong and the end of the Cultural Revolution. By 1980, he had emerged to become secretary general of the CCP again and began China's twin policies of economic reform and openness to the outside world.

Deng was largely responsible for the dismantling of the cult of Mao, the return of market forces to the economy, and the opening of Chinese society to foreign investment, tourism, and interaction. During the decades of the 1980s and 1990s, Deng oversaw the rapid transformation of Chinese society and legitimated policies that would previously have been unacceptable to orthodox Marxists. Deng's pragmatism was expressed in such famous sayings as "It doesn't matter whether a cat is black or white, as long as it catches mice," in effect saying that the actual form of economic structure is less important than its effectiveness in increasing overall wealth. In the early 1990s, Deng took a famous "southern tour," visiting the coastal areas, encouraging greater innovation and creativity in economic reform, and spurring the growth of cities such as Shanghai.

In spite of his legacy of reform and openness, Deng's reputation in the West was significantly diminished by his role in the 1989 "Tiananmen Incident," as the government refers to the Tiananmen democracy movement. As students and workers around the nation called for greater democracy, Deng ordered a military crackdown, which occurred June 3 to 4, 1989. At least several hundred were killed in the ensuing chaos, and estimates range into the thousands. Although Deng officially stepped down in 1992 as chair of the Central Military Commission, the era until his death was known as the "era of Deng Xiaoping."

Deng's role in changing Chinese politics, however, is undeniable. He was responsible for pushing a number of critical policies that laid the groundwork for the phenomenal growth of the Chinese economy in ensuing years, including the "four modernizations" (modernization of agriculture, industry, defense, and science and technology), "socialism with Chinese characteristics" (which legitimated the CCP's rejection of Soviet-style communism), and the "socialist market economy" (which enabled market- and profit-oriented economic policies to enter the economy).

Randolph Kluver

See also Chinese Cultural Revolution; Mao Zedong

Further Readings

Kluver, A. (1996). Legitimating the Chinese economic reforms: A rhetoric of myth and orthodoxy. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Denton, Robert E., Jr. (1953–)

Robert E. Denton, Jr. is a professor in the Department of Communication at Virginia Tech University in Blacksburg, Virginia. He also holds the W. Thomas Rice Chair at the Rice Center for Leader Development and serves as director of the Virginia Tech Corps of Cadets Center for Leadership Development. Denton received his doctorate from Purdue University. An expert in presidential communication, Denton also is well known as the editor of a series of political communication books, first for Praeger Publishers and later for Rowman & Littlefield. This series has been a major venue for political communication scholarship.

At Virginia Tech, Denton is a former chair of the Department of Communication. He has written or edited a number of books, including Ethical Dimensions of Political Communication; The Media and the Persian Gulf War; Images, Scandal, and Communication Strategies of the Clinton Presidency (with Rachel L. Holloway); Presidential Communication (with Dan F. Hahn); and Political Communication in America (with Gary C. Woodword). In addition, he edits a compendium on the communication in presidential elections, beginning in 1992 with The 1992 Presidential Campaign, with a separate volume on each subsequent presidential campaign, that serve as important sources for political communication students and scholars. He has also written extensively on the role of religion and morality in political communication.

Active in the Southern States Communication Association, Denton received that organization's Outreach Award in 1999 and the Michael M. Osborn Teacher-Scholar Award in 2003. Denton also regularly appears in the media as a commentator and expert on political communication.

Lynda Lee Kaid

Further Readings

Denton, R. E., Jr. (Ed.). (2005). Moral leadership and the American presidency. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
Denton, R. E., Jr. (Ed.). (2005). The 2004 presidential campaign: A communication perspective. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
Denton, R. E., & Hahn, D. (1986). Presidential communication: Description and analysis. New York: Praeger.

Dependency Theory, Media

Media dependency theory makes an attempt to explain effects of mass media. Sandra Ball-Rokeach and Melvin DeFleur first outlined the framework of the theory in 1976. They conceived audience and media as integral parts of societal systems and the effects of mass media as determined by the tripartite interactions among audience, media, and the societal system. They conceptualized dependency as the central issue leading to understanding of this tripartite audience-media-society relationship. Dependency is a relationship in which the fulfillment of one party's needs and goals is reliant on the resources of another party.

A central piece of the theory is the relationship between audience and media. In an industrialized and information-based society, individuals tend to develop a dependency on the media to satisfy a variety of needs in their life. These needs can range from obtaining information on a candidate's policy positions to help make a vote decision to watching an episode of TV drama series for relaxation and entertainment. Media play a multifaceted role of information-delivery services in society: collecting, processing, and disseminating information. And, in turn, media also depend on individual members of the society as a whole for their survival and further development.

In general, the extent of media effects is related to the degree of dependence of individuals and societal systems on media. Two of the basic propositions put forward by Ball-Rokeach and DeFleur are (1) the larger a medium's capacity is to serve as a center of the unique information-delivery services to the audience, the greater the audience dependency is on that medium; and (2) the higher the instability of a society is (e.g., in situations of social change and conflict), the stronger the dependency on the media that audience members tend to develop and, therefore, the greater the potential effects of the media on audience.

Specifically, the theory predicts that there are potentially three types of media effects due to the dependency of audience on media: cognitive, affective, and behavioral effects. In addition to the effects on audience's attitudes, beliefs, and values, one of the cognitive effects is linked to the media's role in "agenda setting." The affective effects include, for example, the development of feelings of "fear and anxiety" about living in certain neighborhoods as a result of overexposure to news reports that cover many violent stories. One example of the behavioral effects is "deactivation"—individual members of the audience don't take certain actions that they would take if they had not been exposed to certain messages from media. Not voting in political elections may be an effect of such. Any cognitive, affective, and behavioral effects on the audience can be channeled back to influence both the society and the media.

Since its inception, media dependency theory has generated many studies across disciplines. It can also serve well as a theoretical basis for research in the domain of political campaign communication, where the relationship between mass media and the electors and candidates remains a central focus.

Yang Lin

See also Uses and Gratifications Approach

Further Readings

Ball-Rokeach, S. J., & DeFleur, M. L. (1976). A dependency model of mass media effects. Communication Research, 3(1), 3–21.

DeFleur, M. L., & Ball-Rokeach, S. J. (1982). Theories of mass communication (4th ed.). New York: Longman.

Dewey, John

See Public Communication in Politics

Diffusion of Innovations

In January 2001, the impeachment trial against Philippine President Joseph Estrada was halted by senators who supported him. Within minutes, using cell phones, the opposition leaders broadcast a text message "Go 2EDSA. Wear blck" to people on their telephone lists. The recipients, in turn, forwarded the message to others. Within an hour, tens of thousands of people had gathered at EDSA, or the Epifanio de los Santos Avenue, to demonstrate against Estrada. The electronic ripples led the military to withdraw support, and the government fell without a shot being fired. The Philippines story illustrates how a technology-enabled rapid (almost instant) diffusion of a text message galvanized a country's citizenry to mobilize against a corrupt political regime, leading to its demise.

Diffusion is the process by which an innovation is filtered through certain channels over time among the members of a social system. An innovation is an idea, practice, or object perceived as new by an individual or other unit of adoption. This novelty necessarily means that an individual experiences a high degree of uncertainty in seeking information about, and deciding to adopt and implement, an innovation. Although most observers agree that the diffusion of innovations is fundamentally a communication process, communication scholars constitute only one of the many research traditions in diffusion along with geography, education, marketing, public health, rural sociology, agricultural economics, general economics, and political science.

History and Conceptual Overview of Diffusion

The study of the diffusion of innovations can be traced to the writings of Gabriel Tarde, a French sociologist and legal scholar. Tarde originated such key diffusion concepts as opinion leadership and the S-curve of adoption (although he did not use the same labels). Tarde's intellectual leads were followed up by anthropologists such as Wissler, who analyzed the diffusion of the horse among the Plains Indians. Wissler argued that adding horses to their culture led the Plains Indians, who had lived in peaceful coexistence, into a state of almost continual warfare with neighboring tribes.

The basic research paradigm for the diffusion of innovations emerged with Ryan and Gross's classic 1943 study of the diffusion of hybrid seed corn among Iowa farmers. This innovation was profoundly important, leading to increased corn yields of 20% per acre. The innovation had spread widely to Iowa farmers in previous years, but state administrators wondered why such an obviously advantageous agricultural technology required a dozen years to achieve widespread use. Ryan and Gross indicated that the average farmer needed 7 years to progress from initial awareness of the innovation to full-scale adoption (indicated by planting all of the corn acreage in hybrid seed), emphasizing how difficult it was for most individuals to adopt an innovation. Hybrid corn had to be purchased from a seed corn company, at a price per bushel not trivial to Iowa farmers in the Depression years. Further, adopting hybrid seed corn meant Iowa farmers had to discontinue their previous practice in which healthy ears of corn were used as seed for the following year.

During the 1950s many diffusion studies were conducted, particularly by rural sociologists, and they were directly influenced by the Ryan and Gross investigation. Meanwhile, the diffusion approach infected other social sciences, spreading to marketing, political science, and education. Everett M. Rogers in his classic 1962 book Diffusion of Innovations argued for a general model of diffusion, irrespective of discipline. Another key event leading to wider acceptance of the diffusion paradigm was Coleman, Katz, and Menzel's study of the diffusion among physicians of tetracycline, a new medical drug developed by Pfizer. Data were collected via personal interviews with virtually all of the medical doctors in four small communities in Illinois. Prescription data were also collected from pharmacies so the researchers knew the date when each doctor first prescribed the new drug. This represented an important methodological improvement—observed actual adoption—over the usual diffusion investigation, which depended upon respondent accuracy in recalling the date at which an innovation was adopted.

The rate of adoption of tetracycline followed an S-shaped curve (see Figure 1), as had the rate of adoption for hybrid corn, although only 17 months elapsed before most doctors had adopted tetracycline (compared to 12 years for the Iowa farmers adopting hybrid seed). The most innovative medical doctors (early adopters) were cosmopolites, making numerous out-of-town trips to medical specialty meetings. As with the Iowa farmers, mass media channels (such as articles in medical journals) were most important in creating awareness-knowledge, whereas interpersonal communication channels with peers were most important in persuading a doctor to try the medical innovation.

The intellectual contribution of the drug study was the evidence for diffusion as a social process. Doctors who were linked in more interpersonal networks adopted the innovation more rapidly than the isolated doctors. Even though tetracycline had been scientifically evaluated in numerous clinical trials, and even though Pfizer salespeople gave them free samples, they evaluated the innovation mainly through the personal experiences of their fellow doctors. An early adopting doctor might tell another doctor "Look, I prescribed tetracycline to several patients and it worked great. Want to try it?"

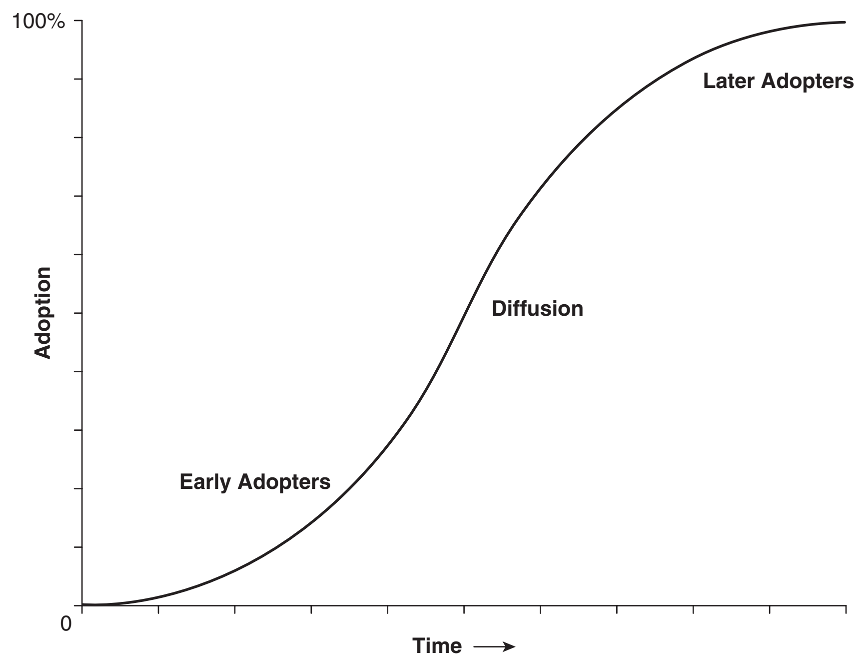

Figure 1 The Diffusion S-Curve

Diffusion of innovations has some distinctive aspects that set it off from other specialized fields of communication study. For instance, the diffusion approach emphasizes interpersonal communication networks more than any other type of communication research. The main function of mass mediated communication in the diffusion process is to create awareness knowledge about the innovation. Further, diffusion research considers time as a variable to a much greater degree than do other fields of communication study. Time is involved in diffusion in (a) the innovation-decision process, the mental process through which an individual passes from first knowledge of a new idea to adoption and confirmation of the innovation; (b) innovativeness, the degree to which an individual is relatively earlier in adopting new ideas than other members of a system; and (c) an innovation's rate of adoption, the relative speed with which an innovation is adopted by members of a system.

The number of diffusion studies has increased steeply in past decades. By 2003, Everett Rogers estimated some 5,200 diffusion publications, increasing at the rate of some 120 to 125 articles per year. By this count, in 2007, the number of diffusion publications should be nearing 6,000.

Political Contexts and Diffusion

Numerous studies of innovations generated through the political process have been published. These include innovative legislative practices in the areas of juvenile corrections, consumer advocacy, judicial administration, health and human services, responses to HIV/AIDS; and simple public health practices such as fortification of flour to combat stunting or iodization of salt to prevent goiter.

How do political contexts impact diffusion of innovations? Political contexts can inhibit or postpone the adoption of some innovations. For example, the fall of the Berlin Wall, followed by the collapse of the former Soviet Union, led to the development and spread of democratic movements in countries of the former Soviet Union. State policies, the nature of bureaucracies, and the existence (or lack) of political freedoms and legislations affect adoption of innovations. Patent laws, for instance, regulate what technological innovations can be adopted and by whom. Governmental restrictions on the broadcast of certain advertisements (e.g., condom ads) can affect the adoption of birth control and HIV prevention practices in a society.

Although we still have much to learn about how innovative ideas and practices gain prominence on policy agendas, social scientists have identified some factors as being salient. For instance, scholars have emphasized the role of policy entrepreneurs and "knowledge coaches"; some have emphasized the importance of research evidence to inform the drafting of policies and programs; some have highlighted the role of social networks; and others have emphasized the importance of media agenda-setting processes in the diffusion and adoption of new policies and practices.

Agenda Setting and Diffusion

Why did the tragedy involving cyanide-laced Tylenol in the United States, which claimed seven lives in 1982, get front-page, top-of-the-news coverage, while the issue of AIDS languished in the U.S. media? The New York Times ran four front-page articles on the Tylenol tragedy; however, it took 4 years and 20,000 AIDS deaths before The New York Times began to pay attention to the issue of AIDS. Communication scholars and political scientists have been studying this agenda-setting process.

The Media Agenda

The agenda-setting process begins with getting an issue on the media agenda, which consists of the hierarchy of news issues ranked by their degree of news coverage. What puts an issue on the media agenda? Seldom does an issue get media attention or stimulate public discourse (unleashing interpersonal channels) due to indicators of the severity of a social problem. In the early years of the epidemic, the weekly reports by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) on the number of HIV infections and AIDS deaths did not put the issue of AIDS on the U.S. media agenda. The media reported these data, but AIDS did not yet have a human face.

Research suggests that two factors can help put an issue on the national agenda: (1) when a news article about the issue appears on the front page of The New York Times and (2) when the U.S. president gives a talk about the issue. The New York Times is the most respected U.S. news medium. Other media follow its lead in judging the news value of various issues. In the case of AIDS in the 1980s, a news article about the epidemic did not appear on the front page of The New York Times until May 25, 1983, 2 years into the epidemic. The New York Times' lack of attention to the AIDS issue resulted in a relatively silent mainstream media and a barely audible public discourse. Further, the morally conservative U.S. President Ronald Reagan did not give a speech about AIDS until May 1987, 6 years into the epidemic, a time when 35,121 AIDS cases had been reported by the CDC. Starting in mid-1985, two important tragic figures, actor Rock Hudson and schoolboy Ryan White, helped give AIDS a human face. AIDS rapidly climbed on the media, public, and policy agenda.

The Public Agenda

After the media agenda is set, an issue like AIDS climbs the public agenda, defined as the priority of issues that the public perceives as important. The public's agenda of issues is usually indexed by questions asked in public opinion polls, such as "What is the most important problem facing the nation?" Not until late 1985, soon after AIDS climbed the media agenda, did sizeable numbers of the American public begin to identify AIDS as an important social problem. Eventually, in early 1986, the AIDS issue was rated in national polls as the most important health problem facing the nation. In essence, the AIDS issue was not just on the TV screen, but increasingly gained momentum on people's interpersonal radar.

The Policy Agenda

Finally, an issue like AIDS climbs the policy agenda, the set of issues that public officials consider as they allocate funding, pass laws, and make policies. Despite the resistance of the White House and The New York Times, once the media began giving heavy news coverage to the epidemic after mid-1980, the public began expressing concern about AIDS, and policymakers began to increase appropriations sharply for HIV/AIDS prevention, treatment, and research. This third step in the agenda-setting process is really the bottom line, when policies are implemented, budgets are determined, and programs are put into practice.

Why has diffusion of innovations research persevered for so many years? Few other areas of communication research have such a lengthy history and represent such a tremendous scholarly outpouring. The popularity of diffusion research is in large part due to its practical importance and its applied nature whether in the field of communication studies, marketing, or political science.

Imagine how different the path of the AIDS epidemic in the world might have been had the United States moved more quickly to stem the tide than it did. Perhaps the world could have mitigated the HIV/AIDS catastrophe, which by 2007 had claimed 30 million lives and had some 50 million living with the virus. In retrospect, the 4 years from 1981 to 1985, during which the agenda-setting process was held up by the inaction of the U.S. government and the inattention of The New York Times, proved costly.

Arvind Singhal and Margaret M. Quinlan

See also Agenda Setting; Interpersonal Communication; Rogers, Everett M.

Further Readings

Coleman, J. S., Katz, E., & Menzel, H. (1966). Medical innovation: Diffusion of medical drugs among doctors. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs-Merrill.

Dearing, J. W., & Meyer, G. (2006). Revisiting diffusion theory. In A. Singhal & J. W. Dearing (Eds.), Communication of innovations: A journey with Ev Rogers (pp. 29–60). New Delhi: Sage.

Dearing, J. W., & Rogers, E. W. (1996). Agenda setting. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Mintrom, M. (1997). Policy entrepreneurs and the diffusion of innovation. American Journal of Political Science, 4(3), 738–770.

Rogers, E. M. (2003). Diffusion of innovations (5th ed.). New York: Free Press.

Rogers, E. M., & Singhal, A. (1996). Diffusion of innovations. In M. Salwen & D. Stacks (Eds.), An integrated approach to communication theory and research. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Ryan, B., & Gross, N. C. (1943). The diffusion of hybrid seed corn in two Iowa communities. Rural Sociology, 8, 15–24.

Singhal. A., & Dearing, J. W. (Eds.). (2006). Communication of innovations: A journey with Ev Rogers. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Singhal, A., & Rogers, E. M. (2003). Combating AIDS: Communication strategies in action. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Tarde, G. (1903). The laws of imitation (E. C. Parsons, Trans.). New York: Holt.

Valente, T. W. (1993). Diffusion of innovations and policy decision-making. Journal of Communication, 43(1), 30–45.

Valente, T. W. (2006). Communication network analysis and the diffusion of innovations. In A. Singhal & J. W. Dearing (Eds.), Communication of innovations: A journey with Ev Rogers (pp. 61–82). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Digital Divide

The term digital divide describes the uneven distribution of information and communication technologies (ICT) in society. This encompasses differences both in access (first-level digital divide) and usage (second-level digital divide) of computers and the Internet between (a) industrialized and developing countries (global divide), (b) various socioeconomic groups in single nation-states (social divide), and (c) different kinds of users with regard to their political engagement on the Web (democratic divide). In general, these differences are believed to reinforce social inequalities and to cause a persisting information or knowledge gap amid those people having access to and using the new media ("haves") and those people living without ("have-nots").

The metaphor of the digital divide became popular by the mid-1990s when the National Telecommunications and Information Administration (NTIA) of the U.S. Department of Commerce (1995) first published its research report on Internet diffusion among American citizens. Under the title "Falling Through the Net: A Survey of the 'Have Nots' in Rural and Urban America," the results of this analysis revealed widespread inequalities in national ICT access. Especially migrant or ethnic minority groups and older, less affluent people living in rural areas with low educational attainments were excluded from Internet services. This pattern was confirmed by follow-up surveys of the NTIA which indicated also an initial gender gap in favor of men.

Although diffusion rates of the Internet were subsequently rising in all groups, additional studies apart from those first policy reports proved a perpetuating digital divide both in the United States and abroad. For the main part, these examinations were based on secondary analyses of cross-sectional data with few panel exceptions and some ethnographic projects in specific communities. Although varying methodologically with regard to their units of analysis (e.g., individuals versus households), their operationalizations of ICT access and usage (e.g., at home, at work, both, or in public places), and their measurement of respective group differences (e.g., users/non-users in absolute percentages versus odds ratios of adoption), the findings of these studies suggested some common characteristics of the digital divide.

A visitor looks at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology Media Lab initiative "One Laptop per Child" at the United Nations Development Programme stand of the World Summit on the Internet Society, November 18, 2005, at the Kram Palexo in Tunis. The initiative is a partner in ITU's Connect the World Programme, which has been developing a "one-hundred-dollar laptop," assisted by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology Media Lab, led by Professor Nicholas Negroponte. The computers are designed for use by schoolchildren in developing countries.

Source: AFP/Getty Images.

In single nation-states, access and usage of computer technology is stratified by age, education, ethnicity/race, family structure, gender, income, occupation, and place of residence. In this way, young Western men with high qualification profiles, working in well-paid managerial positions and living in small urban families with children are most of all advantaged to adopt the new media. This applies both to the formal possession of ICTs (material or physical access) and the motivation to deal with those devices (motivational access) as well as to the experience and skills provided to use the Internet (skills access) and the amount of self-administered time spent online for specific purposes (usage access). Here, usage among advanced groups includes, in particular, the proficient search for instrumental information on the Web to address professional or political interests. On the contrary, less-advantaged groups have been shown to lack those basic navigation skills and to prefer entertainment or diversion features on the Internet instead. Their political involvement has therefore not increased with the rise of new information technologies.

On the global level, additional factors like state economy (measured in per capita gross domestic product), international trade volume, degree of democratization, deregulation of the telecommunications market, density of the communication infrastructure, and investments in research and development have also been found to influence Internet diffusion. In this way, industrial societies are more prone to implement new technologies than less-developed countries. Consequently, the current intensity of national ICT access and usage decreases geographically starting from the United States and Canada, Northern Europe, Australia, and New Zealand to Western Europe, Central and Eastern Europe to Asia, Central and South America, and Africa.

In time comparison, this global digital divide remained relatively stable. Yet, in single nation-states certain gaps in ICT access and usage have slowly begun to fade: Especially among men and women and between rural and urban areas of Western residences those early differences subsided, possibly due to extended telecommunications networks, lowering entry barriers, and additional ICT experiences at work. Other initial inequalities caused by factors such as age, education, ethnicity/race, and income, however, continued to prevail.

These divergent developments and the various types of ICT access and usage encountered in single countries led some researchers to criticize the original description of a digital divide. In their opinion, this metaphor wrongly implies a binary construction of "haves" and "have-nots" based on the simple notion of absolute and insurmountable class differences in technology. Alternatively, they postulate "digital inequality" as a gradual concept and therefore advocate multidimensional measures of Internet connectedness which take into account the history and context of Internet use, its scope and intensity, and finally the centrality of ICTs in people's lives.

Similarly, policy initiatives conducted by supranational organizations (e.g., European Union, Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, and the United Nations), national governments, and private enterprises or foundations have been expanded to ameliorate the worldwide differences in ICT usage. Although concentrating in the beginning on the mere improvement of technical access to computers and the Internet in rural areas and public institutions (e.g., in libraries, schools, cultural centers, and government facilities), recent projects also include civic information campaigns and additional ICT courses for specific user groups to enhance media literacy in society.

Eva Johanna Schweitzer

See also Diffusion of Innovations; Information Society; Information Technology in Politics; Knowledge Gap; World Wide Web, Political Uses

Further Readings

DiMaggio, P., Hargittai, E., Celeste, C., & Shafer, S. (2004). Digital inequality: From unequal access to differentiated use. In K. M. Neckerman (Ed.), Social inequality (pp. 355–400). New York: Russell Sage Foundation.

Jung, J.-Y., Qiu, J. L., & Kim, Y.-C. (2001). Internet connectedness and inequality: Beyond the "divide." Communication Research, 28(4), 507–535.

National Telecommunications and Information Administration. (1995). Falling through the net: A survey of the "have nots" in rural and urban America. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Commerce.

Norris, P. (2001). Digital divide: Civic engagement, information poverty, and the Internet worldwide. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

van Dijk, J. A. G. M. (2005). The deepening divide: Inequality in the information society. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Direct Action Protest, Australia

Direct action has been used in Australia by groups involved in social movements such as the labor, indigenous, peace, and environmental movements. Such actions are usually undertaken by small, often autonomous groups wanting to make strong statements about social practices they regard as morally wrong. Sometimes, these actions are illegal and so constitute civil disobedience. The messages they are attempting to communicate are directed at ordinary people, urging them to join or, at least adopt, the same moral positions, rather than to governments or other representative institutions to change their policies.

Strikes, sabotage, and go-slows tended to characterize direct action in the Australian labor movement up to World War II. Radical labor organizations like the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW or "Wobblies") used such methods in the early 20th century, and their paper was named Direct Action. New social movements arising from the 1960s onwards resorted to creative direct action when they found it difficult to get their message heard any other way.

Both the indigenous rights and the anti–Vietnam War campaigns in Australia in the 1960s took inspiration from the U.S. civil rights and anti-war movements. In 1965, Charles Perkins, a leading Australian indigenous activist, led a group of Sydney University students on a bus tour of rural New South Wales towns to expose the extent of Australian racism. Similarly, Australian protesters undertook such actions as the burning of draft cards and throwing blood at the stock exchange. During the 1970s, a younger generation of environmental activists, frustrated by the conservatism of movement leaders, began to engage in more confrontational methods that included forestry blockades, occupations to prevent the destruction of historic urban buildings, and messages on public buildings. Perhaps the most famous of Australian direct actions was the Franklin River blockade in early 1983 during which the protesters used rubber rafts to blockade barges taking machinery to a proposed dam site. One of the most spectacular examples occurred during the nuclear disarmament campaigns of the 1980s when activist and surfer Ian Cohen maneuvered his surfboard in front of a visiting nuclear warship and rode it along the Brisbane River until it was forced to come to a halt midstream. He repeated the action on Sydney Harbor a week later gaining national and international media attention.

Mass social movements will often have within their complement of activities a direct action component and, as in the case of the Franklin campaign, the direct actionists can often play an important and creative role in achieving the movement's objectives. However, there is often a tension between the more politically moderate movement leaders, who play representative roles and who use political pressure to change government policy, and the direct actionists, who are often more interested in making moral points and doing things their way using consensus decision making.

Libby Connors and Drew Hutton

Further Readings

Burgmann, V. (1995). Revolutionary industrial unionism: The Industrial Workers of the World in Australia. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Cohen, I. (1997). Green fire. Pymble, Australia: Angus & Robertson.

Curthoys, A. (2002). Freedom ride: A freedom rider remembers. Crows Nest, Australia: Allen & Unwin.

Hutton, D., & Connors, L. (1999). A history of the Australian environment movement. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Langley, G. (1992). Decade of dissent: Vietnam and the conflict on the Australian homefront. North Sydney, Australia: Allen & Unwin.

Direct Democracy

Direct democracy refers to a system in which all citizens participate in political decision-making processes. This regime type was first conducted in ancient Athenian politics of Greece in 508 B.C. However, the right to direct participation was restricted to male citizens, who selected their representative officers annually. The success of Athenian democracy was due to the city-state's small population of 300,000 people. A similar political system run by citizens was exercised in the Roman Republic in 449 B.C. Citizens participated in the entire lawmaking process, and the political system lasted approximately 400 years.

Modern citizen lawmaking was established by Switzerland's "status referendum" in 1847. In the 20th century, the United Kingdom pursued the Direct Democracy Campaign, which encourages both citizens and elected representatives to launch public votes to establish new laws and public policies or to change or remove existing laws. Although the meaning of direct democracy has changed, contemporary democratic regimes uphold the principle of citizen participation in politics.

Larger populations and inefficiency render direct democracy an almost impossible ideal in contemporary politics. Defined by national boundaries, political entities are too large to hear and respond to all citizens. Full participation by all citizens in every political decision proves too expensive and slow for an efficient democratic system. More importantly, majority rule inevitably leads to the suppression of minority voices.

Representative democracy presents an alternative to direct democracy. Most democratic systems in the world have adopted this political system. For instance, the U.S. constitution adopts a combined form of direct and representative democracy to ensure that individuals are protected from majority rule. Under this alternative form of democracy, federal politics depend on voter election of representatives from a two-party system to act in the people's best interests. However, state statutes guarantee citizens direct participation in the lawmaking process, as well as the right to recall or veto laws. Despite this, because representative democracy does not directly represent public interests, it often leads to government corruption, disputes between political groups, and costly elections.

Avoiding the pitfalls of alternative political systems requires elected representatives to impartially pursue the collective welfare of the public. A pure direct democracy also calls for citizens who are well informed about political issues and a government that works via transparent networks. News media outlets are effective at ensuring a democratic system, as modern technologies like online voting allow citizens to directly participate in the decision-making process. Thus, the Internet, phones, and other media tools have rendered national politics more accessible to citizens.

Hyun Jung Yun

Further Readings

Cronin, T. E. (1989). Direct democracy: The politics of initiative, referendum, and recall. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Kaid, L. L. (Ed.). (2004). Handbook of political communication research. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Direct Mail

Direct mail is mail that targets specific audiences and constituents on a specific mailing list. Broadly used in direct marketing of products, services, and ideas, in the political arena direct mail is used by political candidates, political parties, political action committees, lobbying groups, and other organizations for four major reasons: to raise money, to amplify pressure on public officials, to recruit new members into groups, or, most commonly, to sell a product, program, candidate, or issue. The first successful national use of direct mail for political purposes was by Dwight Eisenhower in the 1952 presidential election. In 1964, Barry Goldwater's direct-mail campaign raised $4.7 million, mailed over 12 million letters, and most notably, created a list more than 200,000 strong. These lists have seen sizeable expansions today. What might have been possible in the early 1960s only at well-funded national organizations like the Republican National Party became possible at much smaller and more diverse organizations, particularly in the late 1970s and beyond, so that by the mid-1980s direct mail became a dominant means of political fund raising.

There are advantages to direct mail that are not available with other kinds of fundraising, research, and publishing. In fact, it is the only activity that simultaneously serves as fundraising, market research, and publishing. This triple advantage has translated into marketing gold for campaign managers. An organization can mail different letters to its recipient lists, letters that focus on different projects or agendas, and other letters that specifically target small demographic groups of people in scattered geographic locations. Direct mail offers advantages to politicians that are unmatched by many other means of political communication: repeat solicitations, market pretesting, personalization, concentration, and immediacy. Immediacy is a crucial factor for good direct mail. Urgent headlines like "THE BIBLE IS BEING THROWN OUT" tend to elicit fast and motivated reactions, donations, and overall mobilization.

It is common for the success of most direct-mail campaigns to make the group sponsoring the appeal seem powerful but not organizationally massive, savvy but not corporate, influential but still just a grassroots movement with intimate connections to its members. There are, therefore, abundant techniques for downplaying the mass-production of the letters themselves and emphasizing the person behind the personal appeal. Seemingly hand-underlined passages adorn most such letters. The short, telegraphic paragraphs make liberal use of bold-face, bright yellow highlighting, and machine-produced personal messages in the margins of the letters. The handwritten postscript, the faux post-it note with a personal appeal from the executive director, the bulk-rate sticker on the envelope as if it were a first-class postage stamp affixed with human saliva, the cursive type-font—all of these show the personal touches, the human-to-human bond simulated in the mass mailings.

The criticisms of direct mail are much more muted than its benefits. Some suggest that direct mail induces higher levels of voter apathy and cynicism by polarizing ideologies into extreme and adversarial groups. One concern is that mailers mostly consist of fear, guilt, and name-calling that can also push some to be less likely to even vote on an issue. Another concern is that those who cannot donate money will feel disaffected. They may be turned off by the money chase on both sides of a mailer campaign issue. Some argue that direct mail extends participation in government to people who otherwise would never have gotten involved. Direct mail, they say, enlivens government and extends democracy. Others argue that the extremist rhetoric of such letters and the splintering of the population into target groups encourages alienation, cultural fragmentation, paranoia, and violence. Although direct mail does use highly divisive and absurdly emotional claims, there is little evidence to support the contention that it pushes people away from all things political.

All in all, direct mail can be an effective tool for disseminating diverse messages and mobilizing targeted audiences, both of which are primary tactics in winning elections.

Brandon Jay Hersh

Further Readings

Gerbner, A. S., & Green, D. F. (2000). The effects of canvassing, telephone calls, and direct mail on voter turnout: A field experiment. The American Political Science Review, 94, 653–663.

Godwin, R. K. (1988). One billion dollars of influence: The direct marketing of politics. Chatham, NJ: Chatham Publishing House.

Dole, Elizabeth (1936–)

Elizabeth Hanford Dole epitomizes the strides women have made in politics in the United States but also illustrates limitations faced by female candidates. Dole worked under six different presidents, and her career includes many “firsts” for women. She was the first female secretary of transportation (during the Reagan administration); the first female executive of the American Red Cross since its founder, Clara Barton; the first serious female contender for the Republican presidential nomination; and the first female senator from North Carolina.

Dole was born Elizabeth Hanford in 1936 in Salisbury, North Carolina, the daughter of a wealthy merchant. She excelled academically and was elected class president during her first year in high school. Dole then earned a degree in political science from Duke University and a master’s degree and law degree from Harvard University. She moved to Washington, D.C., after college to work in national politics.

During her time as a political appointee in Washington, Dole was known for her work to raise the drinking age from 18 to 21 by withholding highway funds from states that failed to comply and implementing the requirement that new automobiles include a third brake light. Elizabeth Hanford married Senator Bob Dole of Kansas in 1975, and she has been an integral part of his various campaigns for public office since that time.

Dole is known for her talk-show style of political communication that catapulted her into national consciousness at the 1996 Republican National Convention. At this convention, Elizabeth Dole gave a speech on behalf of her husband who was running as the Republican presidential nominee. Her ability to connect with her audience—both television and live—established her national reputation and opened the door for her own presidential run in 2000.

Dole’s attempt to secure the Republican Party presidential nomination in 2000 uncovered major barriers for women seeking election to the highest political office in the United States. Dole received a different amount and type of media coverage than the male Republican presidential hopefuls in ways that hurt her candidacy. She received far less media coverage than expected for the second most popular Republican candidate and was less likely than other candidates to be mentioned first in news stories or be included in front-page articles. The press also paid more attention to Dole’s personality traits and appearance than to those of her male competitors. Some reporters discussed her physical features in disparaging, gendered ways. Additionally, journalists repeatedly talked about Dole as the "first woman" to be a serious presidential candidate, suggesting that she was a novelty in the race rather than a strong contender with a good chance of winning. Biased media coverage conveying the message that Dole was not a viable candidate no doubt contributed to a lack of campaign contributions that eventually forced Dole out of the race.

Dole went on to win a seat in the U.S. Senate from North Carolina in 2002. Elizabeth Dole exemplifies the success women have had in moving into politics in recent decades. Her accomplishments as a Washington political appointee, leader of a major nonprofit organization, presidential contender, and U.S. senator make her one of the most important female political figures of her generation. Gallup polls repeatedly name her as one of the top 10 most admired women in the world.

Caroline Heldman

See also Women Candidates, Advertising; Women Candidates, News Coverage

Further Readings

Anderson, K. V., & Sheeler, K. H. (2005). Governing codes: Gender, metaphor, and political identity. New York: Lexington Books.

Braden, M. (1996). Women politicians and the media. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press.

Devitt, J. (1999). Framing gender on the campaign trail: Women's executive leadership and the press. A Report for the Women's Leadership Fund.

Heldman, C., Carroll, S. J., & Olson, S. (2005). "She brought only a skirt": Print media coverage of Elizabeth Dole's bid for the Republican presidential nomination. Political Communications, 22(3), 315-335.

Kahn, K. (1996). The political consequences of being a woman. New York: Columbia University Press.

Dole, Robert (1923–)

Robert J. Dole served a lengthy political career, including years in the House of Representatives as well as the U.S. Senate and, most prominently, as a candidate for president in 1996. In addition to his prominent political service, Dole's military service was also distinguished. While serving during World War II, in the U.S. Army's 10th Mountain Division, Bob Dole was shot and seriously injured in Italy in 1945. His recovery from his injuries required 3 years, which left his right arm paralyzed. He received two Purple Hearts as well as a Bronze Star medal during his military career. When he was discharged in 1948, he returned home to Kansas and served in the state legislature from 1950 to 1953 and as Russell County Attorney from 1952 to 1960.

Dole represented Kansas in the U.S. House of Representatives from 1960 to 1968, then in the U.S. Senate from 1969 to 1996. He served as Senate majority leader, as well as Senate minority leader, from 1985 to 1996. On May 16, 1996, Dole resigned his seat in the Senate to focus his attention on running for president.

Robert Dole's first entry into presidential politics was as the Republican vice-presidential candidate in Gerald Ford's run for president against Jimmy Carter in 1976. His political career in elected office concluded with an unsuccessful bid for the presidency in 1996 as the Republican nominee. Dole had made earlier runs for president in 1980 and 1988 but received the nomination for president in 1996 to challenge Bill Clinton's bid for a second term in office. Dole was 73 years old at the time and would have become the oldest president to take office if he had been elected.

Dole's communication style was marked throughout his career by a dry wit and humor that sometimes was characterized as sarcastic and cutting. In the first national televised debate to feature vice-presidential candidates, Dole faced Walter Mondale, Carter's vice president, in the 1976 campaign. Dole's most memorable political commercials were from his 1996 campaign against Bill Clinton when commercials highlighting Dole's biography, including his military service and warm personal statements by his wife, Elizabeth, contrasted with strong attacks on Bill Clinton's moral and policy failures.

After his years in the House and Senate and running for president in 1996, Dole has remained active in politics. He has campaigned for Republican House, Senate, and gubernatorial candidates and promoted George W. Bush's presidency and reelection through campaign activities in 2000 and 2004. Bob Dole has also campaigned for his wife, Elizabeth Dole, in her own bid for the White House in 2000, as well as her election to the U.S. Senate in 2002 representing North Carolina. The Robert J. Dole Institute of Politics opened at the University of Kansas in June 2003 on Dole's 80th birthday. The nonpartisan institution holds Dole's personal and political papers, in addition to sponsoring politically oriented lectures and events.

Since retiring from elective politics, Bob Dole has continued to remain in the public eye. In 2003 Bob Dole and Bill Clinton briefly joined the CBS News program 60 Minutes for a point-counterpoint segment. Dole's humorous side has been featured in a number of television advertisements, including Target, Viagra, Dunkin' Donuts, and advertisements for Pepsi and Visa that ran during the Super Bowl, the most prominent advertising placement on television.

Dole also wrote his memoirs of his years of service in World War II and his lengthy recovery from his injuries in One Soldier's Story, published in 2005. He also authored Great Presidential Wit (. . . I Wish I Was in the Book) in 2001 and Great Political Wit in 1998.

Joan L. Conners

See also Dole, Elizabeth; Political Advertising

Further Readings

Dole, B. (2005). One soldier's story: A memoir. New York: HarperCollins.

Kaid, L. L., & Johnston, A. (2001). Videostyle in presidential campaigns. Westport, CT: Praeger/Greenwood.

Kalb, M. (1997). Honest skepticism versus bitter cynicism. Harvard International Journal of Press/Politics, 2(4), 4–9.

DONSBACH, WOLFGANG (1949–)

Wolfgang Donsbach studied communications, political science, and cultural anthropology at the University of Mainz, Germany, where he also received his PhD in 1981 and completed his postdoctoral dissertation (Habilitation) in 1989. He taught at the universities of Dortmund and Mainz and was a visiting professor at the Free University of Berlin and at Syracuse University, New York. In 1989–1990 he was a fellow at the Gannett Center for Media Studies, Columbia University, and in 1999 the Lombard Visiting Professor in Harvard University. Since 1993, he is professor of communication in the Department of Communication at the Technical University of Dresden.

Early in his career Donsbach started to concentrate on three fields that have remained his primary research interests and which he has often linked together: journalism, political communication, and public opinion. Many of his publications and research projects deal with the education and attitudes of journalists, their professional behavior, as well as objectivity and quality of reporting, the role of journalism and the media in democracy, and media effects. Regarding public opinion polls, he discusses the influence of poll data on public opinion and argues for the "freedom of pre-election polls."

Wolfgang Donsbach is also one of only a few German communication scholars who, almost from the beginning of his research activities, took up the international perspective and engaged in comparative research across countries. His extensive activities in international communication associations are proof not only of his global angle but also of his worldwide connections and the recognition in the international scientific community. From 1995 to 1996 he was president of the World Association for Public Opinion Research (WAPOR), from 1992 to 2002 chair of the AMCR section Psychology and Public Opinion, from 1996 to 1998 chair of the Political Communication Division of the International Communication Association (ICA) and from 2004 to 2005 president of the ICA. He is also a member of several editorial boards of communication journals and the managing editor of the International Journal of Public Opinion Research.

Christina Holtz-Bacha

See also World Association for Public Opinion Research

Further Readings

Donsbach, W. (1982). Legitimationsprobleme des Journalismus [The journalistic profession's problem of legitimacy]. Freiburg, Germany: Alber.

Donsbach, W. (1991). Medienwirkung trotz Selektion. Einflußfaktoren auf die Zuwendung zu Medieninhalten [Media effects despite selectivity. Factors influencing exposure to news media content]. Köln, Germany: Böhlau.

Donsbach, W., & Jandura, O. (Eds.). (2003). Chancen und Gefahren der Mediendemokratie [Chances and risks of media democracy]. Konstanz, Germany: UVK.

Donsbach, W., & Traugott, M. W. (Eds.). (2007). Handbook of public opinion research. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

DOWNS, ANTHONY

See MASS POLITICAL BEHAVIOR

Dramatistic Approaches to Political Communication

Dramatism is an approach to thinking about political behavior that employs the metaphor of "life as theater." Most dramatists, however, do not consider their mode of understanding to be a metaphor; they believe that the framework accurately describes the behavior of politics. A playwright uses language in dialogue to create a world within which his/her characters act. Like the playwright, politicians and citizens use language to organize the world they encounter and within which they act. With this language political actors characterize real events of the world, shape understanding of them, organize relationships of power around them, and guide response to them. Political conflict arises from the differences in these interpretations and responses.

Dramatism is part of an influential intellectual movement in the 20th century: contextualism. Contextualists believe that the power of language-based interaction to orient people to events and thus shape response is the essential mode of human activity. They study the strategies through which this interaction shapes response to events and establishes stable structures of human relationship. Although the great philosopher of contextualism was the late Wittgenstein, the most influential writer was the humanist Kenneth Burke. Burke developed a general theory of language's role in human activity. His books Permanence and Change, Attitudes Toward History, Grammar of Motives, and Rhetoric of Motives are his most influential on dramatistic approaches to political communication. His criticism "The Rhetoric of Hitler's Battle" stands as a powerful example of the explanatory and predictive power of dramatistic inquiry into political discourse. Other important theories of human activity, including Ernest Bormann's Fantasy Theme Analysis (later Symbolic Convergence Theory), Walter Fisher's Narrative Analysis, and Erving Goffman's Dramaturgy, are examples of contextualist and dramatistic theories, each owing varying degrees of debt to Burke. Key early adapters of dramatism to political communication were Murray Edelman, Bernard L. Brock, James E. Combs, Michael Calvin McGee, and Dan Nimmo.

Scholars who study political communication with the dramatistic approach frame their study in two activities. Theorists refine a common vocabulary and wield that vocabulary to provide an explanation of how political actors perform politics through their strategic choice of language (and other associated symbols) and how a society organizes its activities politically through the commonalities and adaptability of a shared symbolic system. Critics concentrate their scholarship on political performance, teasing out the significance of the constraints and choices of language on day-to-day political activity. Many scholars mix these activities, deepening understanding of the process of politics even as they contribute to the ongoing dialogue about contemporary political events.

Three examples illustrate how dramatists understand political communication. Murray Edelman laid the groundwork for a broad understanding of symbols and politics. He studied the ways in which leaders command key symbols and common ways of speaking to grow the legitimacy of their power. Like all good contextualists, however, he was not content with one viewpoint on politics. He also explored how language generated around policy issues shapes the carrying out of those policies in a policy-driven bureaucracy and transforms political actions into a satisfactory response to felt need. Ultimately he provided a vision of how political action is not merely an expression of belief but a powerful means through which society organizes each day to respond to the circumstances that it perceives as public problems.

Bernard Brock focused on the political speaker as a goal-oriented strategic deployer of symbols in pursuit of his/her goals. Brock viewed the political speech within the framework of the speaker's language choices from among the possibilities present in the speaking situation. Brock captured the drama of political conflict in the different ways in which those with different orientations pursue politics.

Robert Ivie focuses on the continuities of ways of talking about politics across time. His article "Presidential Motives for War" traces continuities across 2 centuries in the language of justification when American leaders make war. Ivie's critical work illustrates an important way that dramatists see political communication: Choices of language are not circumscribed by the moment, but call upon stable, yet evolving, forms. These forms are real in the language of politics, created in that language, reinforced and evolved within it, and called from the rhetorical context when political actors seek to justify action.

No two concepts better illustrate the difference between dramatistic and other approaches for understanding politics than ideology and motivation. Broken into its Greek roots, "ide-ology" is the study of ideas, and many who consider ideology do so by conceptualizing the way people think. Thus, when they see ideology in language, they see through the language to the ideas it expresses. Dramatists do not see language's relationship to ideas in this transparent way. They believe that ideas are, in fact, a property of language. Powerful ideas are a social product. They attain their power through their pronouncement in contexts in which they successfully guide the performance of the political system. Their refinement is far more than a mental process; it is a process of interaction, criticism, and modification born of the interrelated texture of words and actions.

To dramatists, the key to understanding motivations is the pattern of vocabulary and language use that drives society through response to its environment. Thus, motivation is not something in political actors and brought to behavior by triggers, verbal or otherwise. Rather, motivations are language artifacts that shape social behavior, built through their use in everyday activity, carried in the understandings of a society, and thus available to organize response to the ongoing events of life. Dramatists, such as Ivie, find these patterns of motivation real in their presence in the texts generated by a political culture and called upon at key moments by framers of political action.

Thus, dramatistic approaches elevate political communication to a primary role in the understanding of politics. The realm of human action we label "politics" organizes people to encounter the world day-today within a framework of power and leadership, with political interactions constructed through the deployment of choices by leaders and citizens from their shared cultural symbolic resources.

James F. Klumpp

See also Bormann, Ernest; Fantasy Theme Analysis; Symbolic Convergence Theory; Symbolic Uses of Politics, The

Further Readings

Brock, B. L. (1966). Political speaking: A Burkeian approach. In W. H. Rueckert (Ed.), Critical responses to Kenneth Burke (pp. 444–456). Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Edelman, M. (1964). The symbolic uses of politics. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Ivie, R. L. (1974). Presidential motives for war. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 60, 337–345.

Dukakis, Michael (1933–)

Michael S. Dukakis was governor of the state of Massachusetts and the Democratic nominee for president in the 1988 election. Much of his loss to George H. W. Bush in that election is thought to have derived from political miscalculations such as a photo op in an M1 Abrams tank in Michigan and the failure of his campaign to respond to Republican attacks ads that portrayed Dukakis as soft on crime.

Dukakis was born to Greek-immigrant parents in the Boston suburb of Brookline, Massachusetts. After serving 2 years in the U.S. Army overseas and graduating from Harvard Law School in 1960, Dukakis began his political career later that year when he was elected as a Town Meeting Member in Brookline as well as the chairman of the town's Democratic organization. In 1962, he was elected to a seat in the Massachusetts legislature. Following an unsuccessful run for lieutenant governor in 1970, Dukakis was elected governor in November 1974, defeating Republican incumbent, Frank Sargeant.

As governor, Dukakis was credited in leading the state of Massachusetts through one of its worst economic periods in history, inheriting record levels of unemployment and the largest budget deficit the state had ever seen. Despite these achievements, known as the "Massachusetts Miracle," Dukakis lost the governor's race in 1978 to Edward King, only to defeat him 4 years later. He was then reelected to an unprecedented third term in 1986.

After winning the Democratic Party's nomination for president in 1988 over a field that included Jesse Jackson, Dick Gephardt, Gary Hart, and Al Gore, Dukakis selected Texas Senator Lloyd Bentsen (1921–2006) as his running mate. Despite a strong showing in some states, the Dukakis-Bentsen ticket could not overcome the incessant "liberal" tag Republicans attached to him. This, coupled with the previously mentioned tank incident as well as attacks on Dukakis's prison furlough program that allowed convicted murderer Willie Horton to commit new atrocities, eroded much support from the Dukakis-Bentsen ticket in the eyes of the American public. Dukakis also suffered from media portrayals, particularly in the presidential debates, as a cold, unemotional technocrat. Shortly after his presidential loss, Dukakis announced that he would not run again for governor of Massachusetts and served the remainder of his term quietly as the state began to fall once again into economic crisis. Once out of office, Dukakis traveled with his wife Kitty to Australia and Hawaii and later joined Amtrak's board of directors as vice chairman.

Currently a professor of political science at Northeastern University in Boston, Dukakis has additionally been a visiting professor or guest at Harvard University, University of California at Los Angeles, the University of Hawaii, and Florida Atlantic University. He also coauthored a textbook on American government with fellow Democratic presidential candidate Paul Simon titled How to Get Into Politics—and Why: A Reader.

Fredrick H. Sowder

See also Willie Horton Ad

Further Readings

Dukakis, M., & Simon, P. (2006). How to get into politics—and why: A reader. Boston: Great Source Education Group.

E

Eagleton, Thomas

See McGovern, George

Ecevit, Bülent (1925–2006)

Bülent Ecevit was a Turkish journalist, a man of ideas, and a political leader and was also known as a poet. Ecevit had a 45-year political career during which he served as minister of labor (1961 to 1964), deputy prime minister (1997 to 1999), and prime minister (four times between 1973 and 2002). He was jailed three times and banned from politics for 10 years. He is best known for his decision as prime minister to send Turkish troops into Cyprus, for his idea of the "democratic left," for his stand against "anti-democratic political designs," and for his financial honesty.

An editor for Ulus, the official journal of the Republican People's Party, Ecevit was elected deputy in 1957. As minister of labor (1961 to 1964), he introduced labor rights so that he came to be identified with leftist-populist politics. Promising a new center-left identity for the Republican People's Party in 1972, Ecevit succeeded Ismet Inönü, the second president of the Republic and the leader of the party after Kemal Atatürk, as party chairman. Ecevit, with his wife and campaign strategist, Rahşan Ecevit, toured the party's branches to explain his new center-left program.

Upon his command as prime minister to mobilize Turkish troops into Cyprus to halt violence against the Turkish minority and to reestablish peace on the island in July 1974, Ecevit came to be publicly known as "Conqueror of Cyprus," a national hero. His political discourse comprised nationalistic/patriotic, pro-working class, and populist elements. It identified the just order with an order of the people. Ecevit, thus, built an image as a "man of the people." He always wore a cap, the headwear of peasants, and a blue shirt, the symbol of the working class. The color of his blue shirt was later named after him and became known as "Ecevit's blue." He addressed the public on a platform launched on the roof of a bus, a strategy to make him visible among others present; in a sense, to turn his physical disadvantage as a small-built man into an advantage. White doves were used as symbols of peace. Ecevit was nicknamed Karaoğlan, or "Dark Boy," a name derived from a Turkish comic hero that also referred to his black hair and mustache. He gradually became a symbol of hope for people, and his fans wrote his name over the mountains of the country. The outcome was his party's victory with 41% of the votes in the 1977 elections.

Seven years after the 1980 coup, he became the chairman of the Democratic Left Party. In the 1999 elections, the Democratic Left won 22.1% of general votes. The party owed its success to Ecevit's corruption-free image, his modest way of life, and his ability to communicate clear and consistent messages. However, with the loss of public support in 2002, Ecevit left politics. He was the honorary chairman of the party when he died on November 4, 2006. His funeral attracted hundreds of thousands of people from numerous provinces.

Nur Betül Çelik

Further Readings

Kınıklıoğlu, S. (2000). Bülent Ecevit: Transformation of a politician. Turkish Studies, 1(2), 1–20.

ECONOMIC THEORY OF DEMOCRACY, AN

See MASS POLITICAL BEHAVIOR

EDELMAN, MURRAY (1919–2001)

Murray J. Edelman studied the symbolic and subjective nature of politics to reveal the latent meanings of political performance. Born in Pennsylvania, Edelman received a bachelor's degree in social sciences from Bucknell University in 1941. He then earned a master's degree in history from the University of Chicago in 1942 and his Ph.D. in political science from the University of Illinois in 1948. Prior to his 40-year career in academia, Edelman investigated labor-management relations and public policy. He was on the faculty of the University of Illinois from 1948 to 1966. In 1966, Edelman joined the faculty of the University of Wisconsin, where he was the George Herbert Mead Professor Emeritus of Political Science and received numerous other distinctions including Fulbright Awards and fellowships from the National Endowment for the Humanities. Murray retired from the University of Wisconsin in 1990.

Edelman's innovative and classic book The Symbolic Uses of Politics, which was published in 1964, is the seminal work on symbolic politics, and it continues to exert a widespread influence on scholarly research. The Symbolic Uses of Politics explores the use of myths, rites, and other symbolic forms of communication in the formation of public opinion and policy. In the book, Edelman notes that, while the conventional study of politics concentrates on how people acquire what they want through government, his book "concentrates on the mechanisms through which politics influences what they want, what they fear, what they regard as possible, and even who they are." The theses of the book, which are centered on the notion that democracy is largely symbolic and expressive in function, have fostered vibrant scholarly debate. According to Edelman, political reality is accessible to the public through the generation of symbols by the politically elite.

Edelman wrote 10 other books exploring various angles of the issues of which The Symbolic Uses of Politics laid the foreground. These books include Politics as Symbolic Action: Mass Arousal and Quiescence (1971), which explored the generation of political perception and public opinion in democracies and mass political action, and Constructing the Political Spectacle (1988), in which Edelman argued prevailing political ideologies constrain even the politically savvy with a false consciousness wherein they reify the dominant ideology even while they are thinking otherwise. Edelman further explored the subjective nature of political process with a focus on art in From Art to Politics: How Artistic Creations Shape Political Conceptions, written in 1995. Edelman also wrote Securities Regulation in the 48 States in 1942, Political Language: Words That Succeed and Policies That Fail in 1977, and The Politics of Misinformation, which was finished shortly before his death by his daughter Lauren Edelman.

Elizabeth Johnson Avery

See also Symbolic Uses of Politics, The

Further Readings

Edelman, M. (1964). The symbolic uses of politics. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

EDITORIALS

Editorials are most frequently defined as officially expressed opinions on a matter by a publication's editorial board. These statements, often found on an editorial "page" of a newspaper or magazine, represent the consensus viewpoint of the editorial staff of the publication.

An editorial is sometimes referred to as an "op-ed." In its original usage, an op-ed was a newspaper page with featured commentary, "opposite" of the editorial page. Though considered improper by some, it is now common for people to refer to an editorial as an "op-ed," by substituting the word opinion for opposite. In addition to including the official stance of the publication, editorial pages may contain political cartoons, syndicated columns, and/or letters to the editor. These items are also sometimes referred to as editorials. Editorials of all kinds are much more common in print media, which are not constrained by any regulatory requirements to provide equal time or balanced coverage.

Editorials are typically constructed by a group of members of an editorial board, which may include the publisher and editor of the newspaper as well as other members of the staff. By not including a byline, these articles are meant to show solidarity of message and purpose among the staff. Organizations such as the American Society for Magazine Editors and the American Business Media Guide have designed sets of ethical guidelines for the creation and dissemination of editorials. For instance, both organizations emphasize the importance of clear divisions and distinctions between advertising or promotion materials and the actual editorial content.

Inspiration for editorials generally arises from current events. As opposed to the neutrality and objectivity that characterize articles written by journalists, editorials are subjective and may attempt to be persuasive. Some researchers have found that newspaper coverage of an issue will be reflective of editorial coverage, contrary to the notion of journalistic neutrality.

Numerous classification systems have been used to typify editorials. Editorials are frequently categorized as being either explanatory or persuasive. An explanatory editorial seeks to interpret the meaning of news stories and provide context to the reader. Alternatively, a persuasive editorial may argue a particular point of view, offer solutions, or call readers to action.

During political campaigns, newspapers may elect to endorse a particular candidate through use of an editorial. Research in communication, journalism, and political science has produced mixed results as to whether editorials are likely to influence the vote choice of readers.

Jason A. Moldoff

See also Broder, David; Cartoons, Political; Commentary, Political; Greeley, Horace; Journalism, Political; Letters to the Editor; Murrow, Edward R.; Newspapers, Role in Politics; Testimonials, Political; Will, George

Further Readings

Erikson, R. S. (1976). The influence of newspaper endorsements in presidential elections: The case of 1964. American Journal of Political Science, 20(2), 207–233.

Kahn, K. F., & Kenney, P. J. (2002). The slant of the news: How editorial endorsements influence campaign coverage and citizens' views of candidates. American Political Science Review, 96, 381–394.

Rystrom, K. (1983). The why, who and how of the editorial page. New York: Random House.

St. Dizier, B. (1985). The effect of newspaper endorsements and party identification on voting choice. Journalism Quarterly, 62(3), 589–594.

Effects of Mass Communication, The

In 1960, Joseph Klapper wrote The Effects of Mass Communication in which he outlined the "phenomenistic approach" to media studies. Klapper explains the approach by stating "it [the phenomenistic approach] is in essence a shift away from the tendency to regard mass communication as a necessary and sufficient cause of audience effects, toward a view of the media as influences, working amid other influences, in a total situation" (p. 5). Further developments in the phenomenistic approach eventually led to audience-centered media approaches, such as the uses-and-gratifications approach, a term which Klapper coined in 1963.

Klapper provides an extensive review of early political and persuasive communication literature, often citing classic works such as Lazarsfeld, Berelson, and Gaudet's The People's Choice (1948), Katz and Lazarsfeld's Personal Influence (1956), and Lang and Lang's The Mass Media and Voting (1959). Next, the author explains how individual exposure variables, such as selective exposure, selective attention, and selective retention, play a pivotal role in media persuasion. Klapper then outlines how psychological variables may aid the process of opinion conversion by noting experiments that indicated that war propaganda was effective only after soldiers were fully separated from their respective groups, eventually leading to an argument about the concept of "persuadability" as a predictor of personal influence. Klapper transitions from persuasion to media effects in order to further his development for the phenomenalistic approach, examining crime and violence in the media, escapist media content, and childhood viewing of adult media content.

Lastly, Klapper outlines the five interdependent generalizations of the phenomenisitic approach. First, mass communication does not "serve as a necessary and sufficient cause of audience effects, but rather functions among and through a nexus of mediating factors and influences." Second, these mediating factors and influences are a "contributory agent, but not the sole cause" in the reinforcement of media effects. Third, when mass communication does function as a change agent, it is because the mediating factors are absent and the media effect is direct, or it is because the mediating factors will be "impelling towards change." Fourth, there are "residual situations" when mass communication will produce direct effects or will fulfill certain "psycho-physical functions." Fifth, "the efficacy of mass communication, either as a contributory agent or as an agent of direct effect, is affected by various aspects of the media and communications themselves or of the communication situation."

Klapper provides an overview of just about all genres of media effects that originated before 1960, including emerging media effects research that received little empirical or theoretical treatment at the time. In sum, The Effects of Mass Communication provides insight into how media effects studies turned from media-centered in the 1930s, 1940s, and 1950s to the more modern motive and audience-driven approaches that have become vital to modern communication research. More importantly, this book served as the primary source of what became known as the "limited effects" or "minimal effects" model of mass communication.

John Spinda

See also Limited Effects Theory; Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory

Further Readings

Klapper, J. T. (1960). The effects of mass communication. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.

E-Government

In its broadest sense, electronic government, more popularly referred to as e-government, is the use of information and communications technologies by governments to operate more effectively and transparently; to provide more and better information and services to the public; and to facilitate the participation of individuals, businesses, and groups throughout society in their own governance. Another, more succinct, way of putting this may be that e-government is the use of electronic technology to facilitate better and more open government and governance. There is now a common understanding of e-government as encompassing most or all of the components noted above, even if there is still some level of controversy among academics and practitioners as to the proper scope and definition of e-government and its subcomponents in practice.

There are some who argue that e-government has in fact been in existence since the introduction of the first mainframe computers in government agencies in the 1950s. At some level, this may be factually correct, but the term itself was most surely not in existence at that time. The use of the term and the more dynamic and commonly understood concept of e-government as a transformational process in government, governance, politics, democracy, and public management are directly associated with the rise of the Internet, especially as the Internet entered the mainstream of society in the mid- to late 1990s.

Definition and Study of E-Government

E-government is an inherently multi- and interdisciplinary field. Concepts include government/public administration, political science, communications and media studies, law, public policy, engineering and computer sciences, and others. The study entails understanding of what e-government is and how it affects the structure and management of government institutions, the delivery of any and all public information and services, and the relationship between individuals and organizations in society as well as those who govern them. This field is still in its infancy.

The main axis of controversy in both defining and studying e-government is whether e-government is or should be thought of as a broad and inclusive concept or a narrow and exclusive concept. In terms of technologies, the narrow-broad distinction focuses on the "e" in e-government: Does it include only or primarily the Internet and Internet related technologies, or does it include any and all electronic/digital technologies from personal computers (PCs) and traditional computer based technologies, telecommunications technologies, as well as the Internet and the host of new mobile technologies and others that are only now in the testing stages?

In terms of public management and government institutions, the main point of dispute, especially among academics, is whether the term e-government refers narrowly to administration of government and delivery of public services or whether the term should be more broadly construed and include the impact of the Internet and new communications technologies on the democratic process, including elections, political communications, and the participation of individuals and groups in society.

There are many definitions of e-government, with both commonalities as well as distinctions between them. A key reoccurring theme, however, centers on the transformational aspect of government in using technology. A number of illustrative definitions that have been adopted by a range of large, credible organizations are included in the following.

The United Nations defines e-government fairly broadly as the use of information and communications technology, and its application, by the government for the provision of information and public services to the people. This definition subsumes the efficient administration and services delivery components of e-government but stops short of encompassing the political and social aspects of e-government, which in U.N. parlance are termed e-participation, or more broadly, e-inclusion.

The World Bank offers a broader, more complete explanation of e-government, worthy of including in full here:

> E-Government refers to the use by government agencies of information technologies (such as wide area networks, the Internet, and mobile computing) that have the ability to transform relations with citizens, businesses, and other arms of government. These technologies can serve a variety of different ends: better delivery of government services to citizens, improved interactions with business and industry, citizen empowerment through access to information, or more efficient government management. The resulting benefits can be less corruption, increased transparency, greater convenience, revenue growth, and/or cost reductions.

In the United States, the federal government loosely defines e-government as the "federal government's use of information technologies (such as wide area networks, the Internet, and mobile computing) to exchange information and services with citizens, businesses and other arms of governments." This brief definition leans heavily toward the administrative and services aspects of e-government.

The Gartner Group, a leading private technology research company, provides a more dynamic, process-oriented definition of e-government as "the continuous optimization of service delivery, constituency participation, and governance by transforming internal and external relationships through technology, the Internet and new media." Here, again, can be seen a broader, more inclusive definition of e-government.

E-Government in Practice

In the United States, e-government, by way of transforming access to government through technology, was a key component of the National Partnership for Reinventing Government during the Clinton administration. By the late 1990s the Reinventing Government initiative had resulted in the creation of dozens of new federal Web sites and online cross-agency service centers. This e-government Web site push included a complete overhaul of the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) Web site and culminated in 2000 with the launch of the groundbreaking (at the time) FirstGov.gov government Web portal. Under the Bush administration, a number of high profile projects were identified specifically as federal e-government initiatives in 2001 to 2002 (the 24 so-called Quicksilver Initiatives), and the first E-Government Act was passed in 2002. At the time, Rep. Tom Davis (R-VA), a key supporter of the bill, said the e-government act would revolutionize how Americans interact with government, since citizens now expect government to perform at the same level of electronic service as other Web delivery services. The hopes and expectations around e-government were indeed great at the time.

Other nations that were early adopters in the mid- to late 1990s include the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and Singapore. Canada and the United Kingdom, in particular, were credited with implementing forms of national e-government that facilitated and encouraged e-participation, thus possibly evidencing the broadest understanding of what e-government is and can be. In more recent years, nations as varied as South Korea and Estonia have established comprehensive systems of e-government. In Estonia's case, comprehensive e-services are matched by e-democracy and e-participation tools that allow citizens to have direct input on legislation and participate virtually in online cabinet meetings. The Korean government has developed and published perhaps the most sophisticated national e-government strategy to date, which includes goals of universal citizen access and participation in government and transparent government. To date, Korea has made great strides in implementing this e-government vision.

E-government can be thought of as constituting the intersection between three related "e" spheres: e-administration, e-services, and e-participation. The relationship is illustrated in Figure 1 below. E-administration deals primarily with the backend processes and internal structure of government. It therefore has an internal focus. E-services connects the backend processes that generate information and services with the end users, such as citizens (government to citizen, or G to C), businesses (government to business, or G to B), and other governments (government to government, or G to G). E-services, then, maintain both an internal and an external focus. E-participation focuses primarily on the external relationships of the government with civil society, and encompasses citizen input on decision making and policy development, direct access to government officials, electronic voting, citizen and social networking as it relates to governance, and other tools of citizen empowerment. E-participation has a primarily external focus.

E-Administration

E-administration refers broadly to the internal mechanisms, processes, and structures of government. While the most immediate goal of most e-administration initiatives is to increase efficiency of administrative processes, a longer term and potentially more important goal is that of government transparency, one of the key hallmarks of democratic societies. By digitizing government records and making them available in electronic formats, and by streamlining and automating bureaucratic processes that previously involved large amounts of paper and human discretion, the inputs, process, and results can all be more readily accessed and monitored, thereby putting in place a more transparent process.

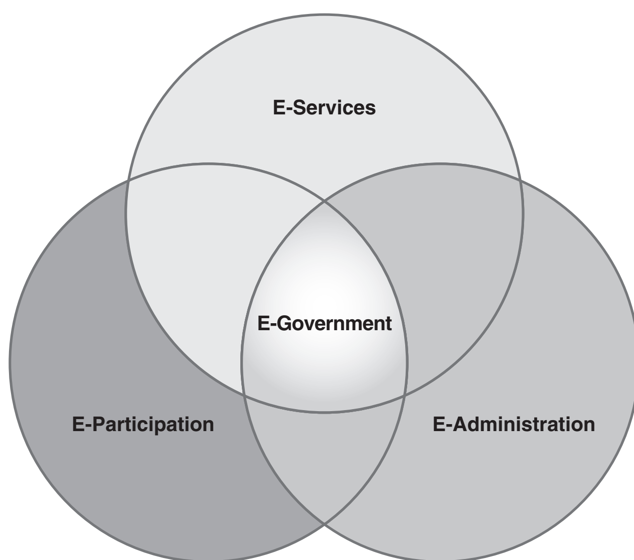

Figure 1 Relationship of E-Government Spheres

E-Services

Government-to-Citizen E-Services

Government-to-citizen, or G-to-C, e-services are generally the main focus of e-services initiatives. The delivery of public information and direct services to citizens via electronic channels has revolutionized the way many governments deliver and think about public services. Citizen e-service initiatives often take the citizen as a true consumer of public services, and the best practices among citizen e-services incorporate notions of marketing and customer service from the private sectors. From the online renewal and issuance of important documents such as drivers' licenses, to registration and payment for government amenities such as recreational services, to the qualification of citizens for and even delivery of key social services such as education and public health benefits, the G-to-C area of e-government promises the most immediate and tangible benefits to individuals and governments.

Government-to-Business E-Services

Government-to-business, or G-to-B, e-services can bring significant efficiencies to both governments and businesses. Large-scale e-procurement projects, for example, whereby governments move their purchasing and contracting processes online, have been initiated at all levels of government and even between national governments. These projects can span a range of implementations, from posting and/or distributing government procurement documents and contracts online, and allowing or even requiring that bidders' responses are similarly submitted online either via e-mail or through more sophisticated electronic systems implemented specifically for that purpose, to managing formal online reverse auctions. Other basic forms of G-to-B services include one-stop service centers for business licensing and registrations. While G-to-B services are generally implemented with the goal of increasing the efficiency of government procurement and realizing cost savings, a related goal is to increase the fairness and transparency of government contracting, thereby reducing corruption and favoritism.

Government-to-Government E-Services

Government-to-government, or G-to-G, e-services can not only increase the obvious backend internal processes between governments, but also seamlessly expedite external services for citizens through the integration of services offered. For example, in the United States, multiple government entities came together to form the GovBenefits.gov portal, which matches citizen beneficiaries with a government agency that provides some form of assistance. This centralized G-to-G portal approach allows backend integration, coordination, and cost savings in targeting individuals between multiple government agencies while improving citizen access to information and services, thus helping them get the assistance needed. On another G-to-G front, the use of information technologies by different governmental entities (e.g., federal and state, among different states, state and local) to share and/or centralize information, or to automate and streamline intergovernmental business processes such as regulatory compliance, has produced numerous instances of time and cost savings and service enhancements.

Government-to-Employees E-Services

The government-to-employees, or G-to-E, programs initialized often result in significant service improvements. Employee e-services can range from online form initiatives for internal purposes to integration of third-party services, such as allowing employees access to manage their benefits online, to partaking in tailored information related to the agency mission. Even simple internal communications and morale building initiatives done online can show great results.

E-Participation

E-participation encompasses the range of engagement between citizens, as individuals and as members of groups, and their governments. This participation includes formal interaction, including e-voting, formal participation tools such as electronic input on policies, regulations and legislation, as well as informal participation mechanisms such as online citizen forums, direct access to government officials and policymakers, and newer and still emerging technologies, including Web logs, vlogs, wikis, and RSS feeds.

The exact definition of e-participation varies across countries and is sometimes also referred to or partnered with e-rulemaking, e-democracy, e-regulations, or e-inclusion. Generally speaking, all of the definitions and scopes seek to promote the social empowerment of citizens generally, and more specifically to allow citizens to engage in the decision-making or participatory processes. As such, the United Nations, for example, defines e-participation as follows: "The goal of e-participation initiatives should be to improve the citizen's access to information and public services; and promote participation in public decision-making which impacts the well being of society, in general, and the individual, in particular."

Conclusion

While there are differences in opinion regarding the historical underpinnings of e-government, and some minor discrepancies in its nomenclature as well as the extent of its impact, it is safe to say that it most certainly is transforming the structures and processes of government, and more important, governance in society. Some see the change as incremental, whereas others view it as revolutionary. Either way, as e-government systems and applications become more efficient, inclusive, and widespread, the rate of transformation is likely to increase, not only in the United States but globally as well. As such, the study of e-government, as well as its current and future impact, will only increase in importance.

Gregory G. Curtin

See also Information Society

Further Readings

Accenture Web site: http://www.accenture.com

Brown University policy reports Web site: http://www.insidepolitics.org/policyreports.html

Capgemini. (2005, March 4). Online availability of public services: How is Europe progressing? Retrieved from http://www.capgemini.com/news/2005/Online_availibility_of_public_services_5th_measurement.pdf

Curtin, G. G., Sommer, M. H., & Vis-Sommer, V. (Eds.). (2003). The world of E-government. New York: Haworth Press.

Economist Intelligence Unit. (2005). The 2005 e-readiness rankings. Retrieved from http://graphics.eiu.com/files/ad_pdfs/2005Ereadiness_Ranking_WP.pdf

Eggers, W. (2005). Government 2.0: Using technology to improve education, cut red tape, reduce gridlock, and enhance democracy. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Graafland-Essers, I., & Ettedgui, E. (2003). Benchmarking e-government in Europe and the US. Retrieved from http://www.rand.org/publications/MR/MR1733/

Heeks, R. (2005). Implementing and managing egovernment: An international text. London: Sage.

International Journal of Electronic Government Research Web site: http://www.idea-group.com/journals/details.asp?id=4298

Journal of E-Government Web site: http://www.egovjournal.com

Pacific Council on International Policy. (2002, April). Roadmap for e-government in the developing world. Retrieved from http://www.pacificcouncil.org/pdfs/e-gov.paper.f.pdf

Reece, B. (2006). E-government literature review. Journal of E-Government, 3(1), 69–110.

United Nations E-Government Readiness Knowledge Base Web site: http://www.unpan.org/egovkb/

United Nations E-Government Readiness Knowledge Base, Global Reports Web site: http://www.unpan.org/egovkb/global_reports/index.htm

West, D. W. (2005). Digital government: Technology and public sector performance. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Wilhelm, A. G. (2004). Digital nation: Towards an inclusive information society. Cambridge: MIT Press.

EISENHOWER, DWIGHT D. (1890–1969)

Dwight David Eisenhower—West Point graduate, supreme commander of the allied forces in Europe, president of Columbia University, and supreme commander of NATO forces—was the 33rd president of the United States from 1953 to 1961. The Eisenhower presidential campaign of 1952 was the first in which television played a major strategic role. Eisenhower's campaign and presidency established historic and enduring precedents in televised political communication. Two key moments of his presidency are the election campaign and his farewell address.

Unique to the 1952 campaign was the confluence of television set ownership (19 million compared to fewer than 500,000 in 1948) and the burgeoning broadcast area, which was able to reach 40% of the population. For the first time, television was perceived as an important strategic campaign tool. The Eisenhower Republicans and the Adlai Stevenson Democrats spent an estimated $4 million to $12 million on television. While both candidates bought 20- to 30-minute time slots (sometimes longer) for political campaign speeches, "Eisenhower Answers America"—the first presidential spot ad campaign—is an enduring legacy of the Eisenhower campaign.

Rosser Reeves of the Ted Bates Agency conceived, developed, and produced the twenty-eight 20-second spot ads and the three 1-minute ads. Based on information acquired from George Gallup, Reeves limited the ads to three topics: high prices and taxes, corruption, and the Korean War. "Eisenhower Answers America" was the first time a presidential candidate appeared in a television ad campaign. In 1952, many believed that a candidate's appearance in television ads would denigrate the office being sought. Both candidates resisted the idea of appearing in their own ads, and while Eisenhower was convinced to appear in ads in 1952, Stevenson was not convinced until the 1956 campaign. A Democratic spot in 1952, for example, was a 40-second "Vote Stevenson" song performed by Judy Garland.

"Eisenhower Answers America" was conceived in direct response to President Harry Truman's slogan "You Never Had It So Good!" Uncertain of victory, Republican Party bosses contacted Reeves hoping he could create an effective counter slogan. Instead, he proposed a spot ad campaign that featured Eisenhower answering staged questions from ordinary citizens. Reeves commissioned a study (The Levin Report) which calculated that a saturation spot ad campaign (at least 12 ads per evening) on television in 62 counties in 12 states—designed to influence 844,320 voters—would, given the voting demographics of 1952, secure the 249 electoral votes needed for victory. The election was a landslide for Eisenhower (55% popular vote, 442 electoral votes), and post-election studies of the effectiveness of the ads were eschewed by the Republican National Committee, which preferred other explanations for their success.

The structure of the "Eisenhower Answers America" ads was simple both in copy and visual appearance. A sample of one of the 20-second ads is typical (Figure 1).

Eisenhower filmed his answers several days before the 26 individuals, couples, or families were photographed asking scripted questions. "Citizens" were

Narrator: Eisenhower Answers America

Citizen: You know what things cost today, high prices are just driving me crazy.

Eisenhower: Yes, my Mamie gets after me about the high cost of living. It's another reason why I say, it's time for a change. Time to get back to an honest dollar and an honest dollar's worth.

Figure 1 Sample "Eisenhower Answers America" 20-Second Ad

selected from visitors to Radio City Music Hall, and they never interacted with Eisenhower. The three 60-second ads consisted of an existing 20-second ad with stock footage and graphics added to the beginning and ending. Also, "Eisenhower Answers America" ads aired on radio using the same format, sometimes the same material, in 15-second spots.

While the spot ad campaign was a presidential campaign first, it was not the only political ad innovation utilized in that campaign. Roy Disney is credited with producing a 1-minute musical animated ad for Eisenhower, often referred to as the "I Like Ike" ad. It has the signature Disney look: upbeat and clever. Further, it seems to be the only presidential political ad produced in the history of Disney. Eisenhower did not appear in the ad except in caricature. The ad features Uncle Sam (with his Ike button prominently displayed) leading a parade of citizens marching with Ike placards to the catchy tune "I Like Ike." The parade's pachyderm beats a drum with his tail and carries an Ike banner hanging from his trunk and a caricature of Eisenhower draped over his back.

"I Like Ike" included specific criticisms of the Democrats. One shot in the ad pictures three donkeys that stand passively as the Republican parade passes them by. In another shot-at-the-Democrats, Stevenson is silhouetted behind the "I Like Ike" parade riding a donkey in the opposite direction just as the song reminds voters that "Adlai goes the other way." The ad ends in Washington, D.C., as the sun rises over the Capitol with Ike's name in the middle of the sun.

The effectiveness of "I Like Ike" was never determined, but along with "Eisenhower Answers America," spot ads (including a few spot ads from the Democrats) from 1952 set an enduring precedent in televised politics. Future presidential ad campaigns increasingly moved away from on-air speeches to saturation-level spot ads focused on limited issues that often featured the candidate. Contemporary political ads continue to use theme songs and animation as part of the persuasive production process.

The ad campaign for Ike in 1952 was unique, precedent-setting, and part of a nationwide sweep into office; his exit from office in 1961 left scholars and the public with his most enduring speech, his farewell address. While Truman's farewell address may have been the first such speech televised, Eisenhower's is among the best remembered of any presidential farewell address because of his warnings about the military-industrial complex. Eisenhower's farewell address is a key rhetorical moment in his tenure in office. On January 17, 1961, Eisenhower addressed the nation for the last time as president of the United States. He warned against the problems associated with the vast military-industrial complex and the "unwarranted influence" and "misplaced power" that could follow. In a touch of irony, the most compelling and pivotal political communication moments in Eisenhower's presidency stand as bookends: before he assumes office (the spot ad campaign) and as he prepares to leave office (his farewell address).

Stephen C. Wood

See also Political Advertising

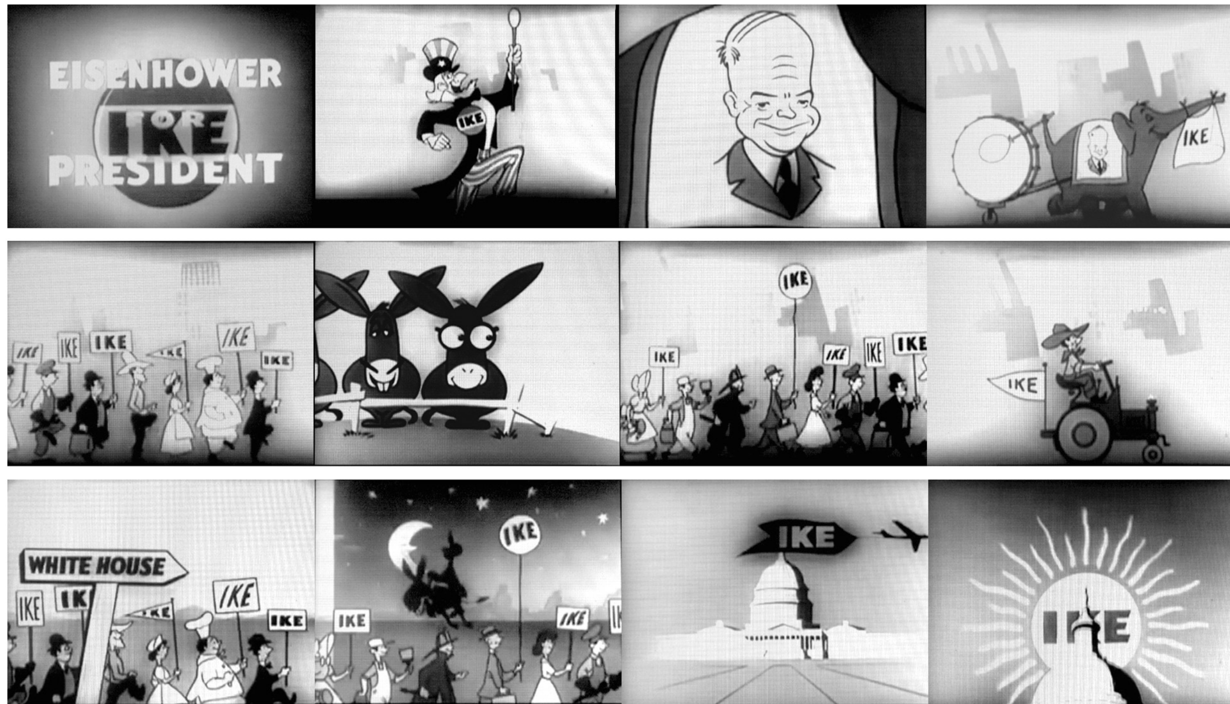

Figure 2 Abbreviated Story Board for 60-Second "I Like Ike" Ad

Further Readings

Diamond, E., & Bates, S. (1984). The spot: The rise of political advertising on television. Cambridge: MIT Press.

Jamison, K. H. (1984). Packaging the presidency. New York: Oxford University Press.

Kaid, L. L. (2001). Videostyle in presidential campaigns: Style and content of televised political advertising. Westport, CT: Praeger/Greenwood.

Kaid, L. L. (2004). Political advertising. In L. L. Kaid (Ed.), Handbook of political communication research (pp. 155–202). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Wood, S. C. (1990). Television's first political spot ad campaign: Eisenhower Answers America. Presidential Studies Quarterly, 10, 265–283.

Electoral Systems

Electoral systems can be conceptualized in both a broad and a narrow sense. Although there is a tendency to understand the term for descriptive purposes as encompassing everything relating to the electoral process, including suffrage, electoral administration, and, recently, also electoral behavior, for analytical reasons, a narrow concept is preferable. Correspondingly, electoral systems are the mode by which voters express their political preferences through votes and according to which votes are transformed into parliamentary seats or executive offices. This narrow concept is usually applied when electoral systems are regarded as instruments for shaping party systems.

Institutionalists, among them the most reputed experts on electoral systems, ascribe great significance to the latter as the most fundamental element of representative democracy, especially important for the functioning of the political system. Sociologists, however, argue that political systems and party systems are, to a far greater degree, dependent on societal factors, such as the structure and deepness of social cleavages, the level of development, political culture, and historical paths. In contrast to conceptualizing the issue in sharp alternatives, it seems more reasonable to consider both approaches and to look at electoral systems as an independent and a dependent variable in relation to party systems and contextual factors. Furthermore, the choice or design of electoral systems is made by political parties along with their preferences, and the effects of electoral systems are influenced by the structure of the party system itself.

Certainly electoral systems exert, as Maurice Duverger stated, mechanical effects on the political representation as well as psychological effects, as a voter's choice is influenced by earlier decisions. But the formation and changes of party systems are far too complex to be understood by a traditional linear-causal treatment of their dependence on electoral systems. Their effects largely depend on contextual factors, which play an important role in the understanding of why the same electoral system in different countries goes along with different party systems. While the causal relationship between electoral systems and party systems is maintained, contextual factors, which differ from country to country, can be said to be co-determinant. It is worthwhile to add that the proper party system is likely to constitute a very significant factor determining not only the choice but also the effects of an electoral system.

Structure of Electoral Systems

For more than a century the debate on electoral systems has focused on plurality and proportional representation (P.R.). Indeed, there are only two principles of representation. But majority and proportionality serve as well as decision rules, and electoral systems can combine one principle of representation (for example, P.R.) with the opposite decision rule (majority). At the level of types of electoral systems, the number of possible options is far higher than two because of such combinations. To meet increased requirements of electoral engineering, a more comprehensive approach gives first attention to the range of possible options at a technical level. These technical elements can be subdivided into four spheres: districting—the determination of electoral constituencies; forms of candidacy; kinds of voting; and the formulae of translating votes into seats. Each of these technical elements per se has political effects. The political effects of the electoral system in its entirety, however, are only determined by the combined interaction of the individual elements which can diversely be combined with one another, almost arbitrarily.

Districting refers to the process of determining the constituencies' number and magnitude; that is, the quantity of seats available for allocation in a constituency. The basic differentiation that applies here is between single-member constituencies (SMC) and multi-member constituencies (MMC). The latter, for their part, can be small (2 to 5 seats), medium (6 to 9 seats) or large (10 or more seats). Constituency magnitude is most important for the effects of electoral systems, first for the relation of votes to seats and, thereafter, for the political parties' electoral chances. If one regards only constituency magnitude on its own, using a proportional formula, the following rule applies: The smaller the constituency, the less the proportional effect of the electoral system, and the slighter, usually, chances of small parties getting into office. Through the size of constituencies, political representation, party system structure, and power structure can be controlled. Therefore, districting is frequently enormously controversial. One only needs to think of so-called gerrymandering; that is, attempting to steer candidates' election chances by means of drawing up constituencies according to political criteria. Moreover, constituency magnitude also influences the kind of communication between the voter and the representative. In an SMC, it can be assumed that a relationship between the voter and the candidate or representative, based on direct communication, familiarity, confidence, and responsibility, materializes more easily than in an MMC.

As regards forms of candidacy, the basic differentiation is between individual candidacy and party lists. Three different forms of these can be distinguished: (1) The closed and blocked list only permits the voter to cast his or her vote for the party list en bloc. (2) The closed and nonblocked list or preferential voting within one list, often called open list, enables the voter to alter the sequence of candidates on the party list and hence leaves it up to him or her to decide who is to represent the party. Such a decision is merely prestructured by the party organs. (3) The freedom of choice list, often called free list, gives the voter the possibility to overrule party boundaries, to vote for candidates placed on different party lists, and to compile his or her own list. Here, the party lists are only significant as recommendations.

The kind of voting is closely linked with the form of candidacy. Accordingly, the basic distinction is between the vote for an individual candidate and the vote for a party list. As regards the closed and blocked list, the voter usually has only one vote. With other list forms, the voter can have several votes (multiple vote system), through which he or she can express preference for a candidate, for example by two votes, one for a candidate and one for the party list. Voters can have as many votes as there are candidates running for election (single transferable vote, where voters cast second, third, or fourth preferences), or limited multiple vote, less votes than there are representatives up for election. In the case of a free list, and by cumulative vote, voters can cast several votes for one and the same candidate, and by panachage, he or she can choose candidates from different party lists.

Electoral formulae are to be distinguished first with regard to decision rules, whether majority rule or proportional rule is applied. In the case of the majority rule, allocation of seats is further dependent on whether a candidate needs a relative or absolute majority of the votes. It can be counted as an advantage of the majority formula in general that the voter is confronted with a clear decision-making situation and can retrace directly what is going on with his or her vote. The votes cast for the victorious candidate are successful; the votes for the losers, however, get lost. Consequently, the success value of the votes is quite different, and the plurality system is marked by exclusionary tendencies. With regard to the plurality formula, however, this can have the political consequence of discouraging the political minority in a given constituency from running or campaigning seriously where one party dominates completely. If an absolute majority is required, electoral alliances to contest the run-off elections may lead to an intense political bargaining among parties, where smaller parties can obtain some seats in exchange for assisting a larger party's candidates in other constituencies. In the case of the proportional formula, seats are allocated according to the share of votes the various candidates or parties obtain. Unlike the majority formula, the votes have, at least roughly, equal success value, and proportional systems are marked by tendencies of inclusion at the cost of fragmentation of votes and parties. Correspondingly, along with the use of closed and blocked party lists, representatives of minority cultures or groups as well as women will be more frequently elected under a proportional formula. Furthermore, a significantly greater share of the voters regards its participation in the polls as being crowned with success insofar as their votes have contributed to a party winning a seat. It is therefore worthwhile for the candidates and supporters of the political parties to fight for each vote, which can be conducive to stimulating party competition and voter turnout. Finally, some concentration effects may be exerted by strategic voting, enhanced by voters' will to cast an effective vote; that is, a vote given for a victorious candidate, which requires a good deal of information about parties, coalitions, and the mechanism of the electoral system. The so-called thresholds of representation deserve special attention. As opposed to factual "natural" hurdles originating from the size of constituencies, thresholds are legal "artificial" hurdles; for example, 5% of the total vote as a minimum that parties must obtain to be allocated seats. Thresholds can be distinguished according to the area of application (national, regional, or district level), to the stage of voting account, where they are applied, to their magnitude (actually varying from 1% to 12.5%), and, finally, to their different magnitude according to party alliances and the number of parties they include.

Types of Electoral Systems

When classifying electoral systems, it is necessary to distinguish first between classical and combined (or mixed) systems. Classical electoral systems are those in which the principle of representation and the decision rule correspond to each other. The most prominent are the plurality system in SMCs, applied in Great Britain, the United States, Canada, and most Commonwealth countries; the two ballot system in SMCs, used in France; and the pure P.R., applied, for example, in Israel. Combined systems are those in which the principle of representation and the decision rule cross each other. Although many scholars identify combined electoral systems with the German system, different combinations of decision rule and principle of representation lead to three distinct subtypes of combined electoral systems:

1. Personalized proportional systems (or mixed-member-proportional systems): All seats are allocated according to the proportional principle at a national level. The decisions that voters make on the individual candidates in the constituencies, who make up half of the deputies, do not affect the national proportional distribution of seats among parties, except in the case of extra ("overhang") seats. Personalized proportional systems are in use in Germany and New Zealand.

2. Compensatory systems: Under these electoral systems, a part of the seats is allocated in SMCs according to a plurality or majority formula, then, in a second step, a second part of seats is allocated by proportional representation in order to compensate, at least roughly, for the disproportionality resulting from the election in SMCs. A compensatory system was used in Italy (1994 to 2005) and is still used in Hungary.

3. Segmented systems (also called parallel or "truly mixed" systems): Under these electoral systems, one part of the seats is allocated in SMCs and, separately, another through party lists according to a proportional formula. Segmented systems are in use, for example, in Mexico and Japan and were used in Russia in three elections during the 1990s.

Criteria of Evaluation

When we proceed to ask what functional demands are commonly ascribed to an electoral system in electoral system debates around the world, and if we disregard unrealistic expectations and purely power and party-related considerations, five functional demands essentially result:

1. Representation, in the sense of fair representation; that is, as close as possible a mirror of social interests and political opinions in the government. The parameter of reasonable representation is the degree of proportionality of votes to seats.
2. Concentration or effectiveness, in the sense of aggregation of social interests and political opinions for the purpose of attaining political decisions and rendering the polity capable to act. Elections are understood not as a mirror but as an act of forming the political will of the electorate. Parameters of a reasonable concentration of an electoral system are, on the one hand, the number or reduction of the number, respectively, of parties that receive seats, and on the other hand, the formation of stable party or coalition majorities in the government.
3. Participation, in the narrower sense of more or fewer opportunities the voter has of expressing his or her political preferences. The alternative between personal vote versus closed party list is crucial. The parameter for reasonable participation of this kind is whether, and if so, to what extent the electoral system facilitates personal voting.
4. Simplicity, in the sense that the voter can understand the way electoral systems work and what is happening with his or her vote. This is especially important because electoral systems that attempt to fulfill more than one function tend to be more complicated.
5. Legitimacy, in the sense of an overall criterion insofar as it relates to the acceptance of the election results and of the rules of the game and, thereby, of the political system.

Comparing Types of Electoral Systems and Worldwide Trends

If we compare the existing electoral systems applying the first three criteria, we notice that the classical ones are likely to fulfill only one (P.R.) or two criteria. That is why these systems tend to be substituted with combined systems, which can be designed to correspond to the various requirements placed on electoral systems. They are more suitable for fulfilling, simultaneously and in a well-balanced way, the different functions of electoral systems: providing fair representation, government stability, voter participation through personal choices, and government accountability to voters. Effectively, looking at the changes in the worldwide map of electoral systems, combined electoral systems have gained ground on classical ones in recent decades. At least in Eastern Europe, almost no classical electoral systems were introduced. In a great number of countries, electoral commissions, charged to design new electoral systems to overcome the shortcomings of the current systems, proposed combined electoral systems. Furthermore these systems are more amenable to political compromise and also to a more complete designing approach. Considering that there is no best system, but only that which adapts best, experience, contextual knowledge, and good judgment are, in practice, the most important devices for electoral engineering.

Normally, politicians and political scientists pay their closest attention to the effects which, from a systems' point of view, different elements and their combination in a given electoral system exert on political representation, measured in terms of party representation, concentration or fragmentation, government formation, and political stability. Another perspective, from the voter's point of view, is how electoral systems improve voters' freedom of choice, how they open up the inclusion of social, cultural, and political diversity, and how they enhance a process of political communication and rational voting, in which the constant need for integration and the postmodern tendencies of greater particularization can be balanced.

Dieter Nohlen

Further Readings

Duverger, M. (1963). Political parties. New York: Wiley.
Lijphart, A. (1994). Electoral systems and party systems. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
Nohlen, D. (1995). Elections and electoral systems. New Delhi: Macmillan India.
Nohlen, D. (2004). Sistemas electorales y partidos políticos [Election systems and political parties] (3rd ed.). México: Fondo de Cultura Económica.
Nohlen, D. (2007). Wahlrecht und Parteiensystem. [Electoral law and party system] (5th ed.). Opladen, Germany: Barbara Budrich.
Rae, D. W. (1968). The political consequences of electoral laws. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
Rose, R. (2000). The international encyclopaedia of elections. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly.
Sartori, G. (1976). Parties and party systems. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
Sartori, G. (1994). Comparative constitutional engineering. Houndmills, UK: Macmillan.
Taagepera, R., & Shugart, M. S. (1989). Votes and seats. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

E-Mail, Political Uses

Political use of e-mail is one of the most revolutionary communication tools for politicians and civic-minded citizens alike. In 1994, fewer than 50 members of Congress even had e-mail addresses, but by 2000 e-mail had become the primary mode of communication between elected officials and constituents. E-mail has been found to have both positive and negative attributes for presidential candidates, congressional members, and political activists alike.

For presidential candidates, the 2000 election year was the first one in which e-mail was utilized on a large scale in multiple capacities. E-mail lists were valuable tools for the Bush and Gore campaigns; by the general election, both candidates had e-mail lists with over 400,000 addresses. These lists aided candidates in getting messages about the campaign to supporters quickly. While some messages were designed to reinforce support for their candidates, other e-mail messages were used to spin or reframe events such as Bush's "Set the record straight" e-mails. E-mails were also sent out by campaigns to supporters to recruit and motivate volunteers. Both candidates also sent e-mails about campaign events and policies to news sources to influence reporting. "Get out the vote" e-mails were common near Election Day to mobilize citizens to vote. Near Election Day the Bush campaign was sending upwards of 600,000 e-mails a day to mobilize supporters to vote in the 2000 election.

E-mail has also been shown to have positive benefits and curses of its own for members of Congress. Because of the ease of sending e-mails, many members of Congress are more likely to take messages from e-mails less seriously than from citizens that write letters or come to visit members of Congress in their offices. E-mail has become a primary form of communication for members of Congress to get information to their constituents. However, one issue that congressmen and congresswomen have struggled with is the handling of e-mails from constituents and nonconstituents alike. Issues began to develop in 1996 as e-mail was becoming more widespread. Citizens can respond very quickly to members of Congress on political issues, but most of their staffs are not equipped to handle the onslaught of communications. Other problems for members of Congress responding to e-mails include the issues of an inability to respond to e-mails with regular mail when e-mail writers do not include a return address, receiving e-mails from nonconstituents as a result of citizens that send out mass e-mails to many members of Congress, and even citizens that attempt to spoof officials by falsely claiming to be members of Congress themselves.

E-mail also has several uses for political activists as well. Its quick delivery to many recipients makes it one of the best tools to mobilize supporters for a cause quickly. Moreover, e-mail campaigns can be staged more cheaply than through other traditional mediums. However, since congressional staff members are not equipped to handle mass quantity e-mails quickly and e-mails can be easily ignored, few e-mail campaigns have led to results for political activists.

David M. Rhea

See also New Media Technologies

Further Readings

Bimber, B., & Davis, R. (2003). Campaigning online: The Internet in U.S. elections. New York: Oxford University Press.
Browning, G. (2002). Electronic democracy: Using the Internet to transform American politics (2nd ed.). Medford, NJ: Cyberage Books.
Owen, D., Davis, R., & Stricker, W. (1999). Congress and the Internet. Harvard International Journal of Press/Politics, 4, 10–29.

Embedded Journalists

Embedded journalists are reporters who work within and under the control of one side's army in a military conflict. They are attached to a specific military unit and permitted to accompany troops into combat zones. Embedded journalism allows reporters, sometimes referred to as "embeds," a firsthand view of military action taking place in or around battlefields previously unattainable by pool reporters. While the term could be applied to other historical interactions between journalists and military personnel (e.g., during the Vietnam War), it first came to be used in the U.S. Iraq invasion in 2003. Embedded journalism was introduced by the Pentagon as a strategic response to news media who have criticized the low level of access granted during the 1991 Gulf War and in the 2001 invasion of Afghanistan.

Though professional journalists have covered wars by accompanying military units since the modern press evolved in the 19th century, embedded journalism added a new dimension to war coverage. It resulted in some intense coverage of real-time combat, including astonishing pictures taken by "lipstick" or tank cameras which have never been seen before in the history of warfare. As part of the U.S. Department of Defense's strategy to provide "the factual story—good or bad—before others seed the media with disinformation and distortions," the Pentagon offered journalists the opportunity to join U.S. troops after undergoing boot camp–style training and accepting ground rules put together in the Public Affairs Guidance on Embedding Media. During the invasion of Iraq approximately 600 embedded journalists were permitted to join American forces. They represented primarily news organizations based in the United States and in countries that united in the so-called coalition of the willing.

The scholarly debate on the effects of covering combat operations by embedded journalists started while U.S. troops were still on their way to Baghdad. On the one hand it was argued that a new standard of openness and immediacy had been created for war coverage. Reporters directly involved in military action were believed to provide a more incisive account of events by shedding the inevitable speculation that might surface by keeping the media at a distance. Others though, viewed embedding more negatively, particularly raising concerns about bias in reporting. Even media organizations, who participated in the embed program, have described it as an attempt to present the U.S. side of the war in a sympathetic light by absorbing reporters into the culture of the military and tainting the objectivity that journalists are bound to uphold. Those holding this critical view have created the alternate term inbedded journalist to reflect this bias.

Recently, scholars started analyzing the relationships of embedded journalists and military units developed through interpersonal communication. Present key objectives of research include questions such as whether embedded reporters become part of the military culture, whether the outcome of interpersonal relationships help foster a more affirmative representation of the military, and whether embeds produce a more positive news coverage than unilateral correspondents.

Martin Löffelholz

See also War Coverage

Further Readings

Pfau, M., Haigh, M., Gettle, M., Donelly, M., Scott, G., Warr, D., et al. (2004). Embedding journalists in military combat units: Impact on newspaper story frames and tone. Journalism and Mass Communication Quarterly, 81(1), 74–88.

Tumber, H., & Palmer, J. (2004). Media at war: The Iraq crisis. London: Sage.

U.S. Secretary of Defense. (2003, February 3). Public affairs guidance (PAG) on embedding media during possible future operations/deployments in the U.S. central commands (CENTCOM) area of responsibility (AOR). Washington, DC: Author.

Endorsements, Political

See Testimonials, Political

Entman, Robert (1949–)

Robert Entman is a well-known interdisciplinary political communication scholar. He received his bachelor's degree in political science from Duke, a Ph.D. in political science from Yale, and an M.P.P. in policy analysis from Berkeley. He taught public policy analysis at Duke and joined the faculty at Northwestern University's interdisciplinary program in communication studies, journalism, and political science. Entman also served as professor of communications at North Carolina State University and as adjunct professor of public policy at the University of North Carolina. He has worked as co-director at the Center for Information Society Studies, and since January 2006 has served as a J.B. and Maurice C. Shapiro professor at the George Washington University School of Media and Public Affairs.

Entman's academic approach deals with the media's normative functions, social responsibility, and inclusive democratic processes. His research focuses on political communication and communication policy, with primary studies measuring the media's framing effects on public policies and opinions. Entman's further analyses criticize media coverage styles that negatively influence policy development processes. Theoretically, Entman believes the media shapes elite and public perceptions. His books Media Power Politics (1981) and Democracy Without Citizens: Media and the Decay of American Politics (1989) developed the idea of media bias and its effect on politics. He argues that one-sided media framing, in particular, manipulates public opinions of civic issues. Furthermore, his cascading activation model theoretically illustrates the mechanism of framing spreading through the hierarchical levels of administration, elites, media, news frames, and the public. Entman argues that interpretive incongruence between two different levels of information flow interrupts an intended political framing.

Another primary focus of Entman's studies is media coverage of race and race relations. In The Black Image in the White Mind: Media and Race in America (2000), he noted that African Americans receive less media coverage and are more likely to be presented negatively in television news. Entman asserts that African American politicians are often portrayed as black community leaders and troublesome individuals, while ordinary African Americans are described as poor, uneducated, and socially hostile. Entman argues that the media's unbalanced racial coverage fuels and deepens prejudice toward African Americans. The Black Image in the White Mind was awarded Harvard's Goldsmith Book Prize, the Lane Award from the American Political Science Association, and several other awards.

Entman extended his framing studies to media influence in international contexts, suggesting that news coverage of similar events that are framed differently yield differing public perceptions of identical events. In his book, Projections of Power: Framing News, Public Opinion, and U.S. Foreign Policy, he argues that if the U.S. government wants to lead international politics and obtain greater public support, it must utilize skillful one-sided news coverage that favors its political agendas. Entman has also authored several reports on communication policy for the Aspen Institute, the Commission on Radio and Television policy, and the U.S. House of Representatives Subcommittee on Telecommunication, as well as articles and book chapters in the political communication, public opinion, race relations, and public policy fields.

Hyun Jung Yun

Further Readings

Entman, R. M. (2004). Projections of power: Framing news, public opinion, and U.S. foreign policy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Entman, R. M., & Paletz, D. (1981). Media power politics. New York: Free Press.

Entman, R. M., & Rojecki, A. (2001). The black image in the white mind: Media and race in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Equal Time Provision

Section 315 of the Communications Act of 1934 (and its amendments) sets forth "equal opportunity" (as opposed to "equal time") rules of access to broadcast radio and television stations for U.S. political candidates. The origins of the equal opportunity provision appear in Section 18 of the Radio Act of 1927:

> If any licensee shall permit any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, he [sic] shall afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station . . . : Provided, That such licensee shall have no power of censorship over the material broadcast under the provisions of this paragraph. No obligation is hereby imposed upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate. (Sec. 18)

That language was virtually unchanged when Congress passed the Communications Act of 1934.

Congress amended Section 315 on September 14, 1959, creating exemptions from equal opportunity requirements for bona fide newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events. It was in the 1959 amendment that Congress introduced the phrase "equal time" as opposed to "equal opportunity," leading to some confusion regarding what the provision required. No broadcaster has ever been required to provide unconditional "equal time" to any political candidate; they must only provide equal opportunity to all legally qualified major-party candidates for any given political office. For example, if a television station sells a legally qualified candidate $10,000 of air time for political commercials, all other legally qualified candidates may purchase the same. But the broadcaster is not obligated to give free time to any candidate. While the original wording in the law said that equal time must be provided to all legally qualified candidates for federal office, the Federal Communications Commission has generally extended the guarantee to other electoral levels.

The 1959 amendment also stipulates that political candidates must be afforded the lowest unit charge for commercial air time posted during the 45 days preceding a primary or primary runoff election and during the 60 days preceding a general or special election.

Robert Gobetz

Further Readings

Communications Act of 1934, Pub. L. No. 86-274, 73 Stat. 557 (1959). Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.

Radio Act of 1927, Pub. L. No. 632 (February 23, 1927). Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.

Erdoğan, Recep Tayyip (1954–)

Recep Tayyip Erdoğan is a leading political figure in Turkey. He is the chairman of the Justice and Development Party that won 34% of the general votes in the 2002 elections and came to power.

Turkish political life witnessed the rise of Islamist parties in the late 1960s at a time when Erdoğan's political career also began. He took active positions in the National Salvation Party and its successors, the Welfare Party and the Virtue Party, all of which were later shut down by the Constitutional Court on the grounds of threatening the secular nature of the state.

Erdoğan was elected as mayor of Istanbul in 1994 by the Welfare Party. Reading a famous poem with religious imagery in a public speech, Erdoğan was imprisoned for 4½ months and was banned from active politics in 1998.

Following his release, Erdoğan adopted a political discourse with a more secularized accent. He formed the Justice and Development Party in 2001. Despite its founders' lifelong political career in Islamist parties, the Justice and Development Party immediately began to set a distinctive tone: It was "new" and untested, having never competed in Turkish national elections. The party is identified with its leader and represented as a potential agent of change. Erdoğan chose to describe his "new" political identity as "conservative democrat" by assigning the party a mission of bridging a gap between traditional and modern Turkey. This mission is visible in Erdoğan's private and political life: On the one hand, he is still a practicing Muslim valuing a traditional way of life. On the other hand, in his political discourses he accentuates his commitment to Turkey's admission to the European Union as well as his attachment to the principles of the secular Republic.

As a leader, Erdoğan's personality is often described as "decisive," "frank," "charismatic," and "trustful." The fact that he was not corrupt was a major theme of the electoral campaign in 2002. A shining lightbulb was chosen as the party emblem instead of the variations of the crescent moon logo that was common to former Islamist parties. The slogan "continual light" was chosen, and an abbreviation for the party's name connoting "purity" in its religious sense and "cleanness" of the party figures in being untainted by the corruption of the past was preferred.

Because he is from Kasımpaşa, a lower middle class district, Erdoğan has the feeling of belonging to the Turkish cultural periphery. He often describes himself as "your brother Tayyip." During his election campaign, he also benefited from the legal ban on his taking part in a new government and had success with his appeal as an underdog. Erdoğan's personality, together with the grassroots organizational capacity of the party (the party organization was modeled after the organizational successes of the Welfare Party with a focus on neighborhoods), allowed the party to receive substantial support at the grassroots level.

Erdoğan and his party's electoral success are mostly interpreted by the mainstream media as related to the electorate's reaction to the former parties and leaders. After the elections, Erdoğan had generally uneasy relations with the liberal press. He moved to sue and filed for damages in compensation from cartoonists and humor magazines for depicting him as an entangled cat and for publishing drawings showing his head attached to various animals. He also blamed journalists and the media patrons that published news and comments criticizing his government and his personality, of not supporting Turkey's supreme interests and of violating media ethics. He has been the prime minister filing the greatest number of lawsuits against journalists in Turkey. Intolerant with critics he doesn't hesitate to use vulgar, even slangy, insulting language against opposition parties, the president of the Republic, the president of the Higher Education Council, as well as a farmer protesting his government's policies.

Ülkü Doğanay

Further Readings

Heper, M., & Toktaş, Ş. (2003). Islam, modernity, and democracy in contemporary Turkey. The case of Recep Tayyip Erdoğan. Muslim World, 93, 157–185.

Mecham, R. Q. (2004). From the ashes of virtue, a promise of light: The transformation of political Islam in Turkey. Third World Quarterly, 25(2), 339–358.

Eurobarometer

Eurobarometer is a series of surveys initiated by the European Commission to measure public opinion in countries that are members of the European Union. Eurobarometer was created in 1973, when the European Parliament released a report requesting the establishment of a permanent research institute that would study European public opinion.

Eurobarometer is conducted every 6 months, and the results are released free of charge to the public. About 1,000 citizens from each European Union (EU) country are polled through face-to-face interviews, with the exception of countries with small populations such as Malta or Cyprus, where the sample for Eurobarometer averages 500 persons.

The first study was designed by the first director of Eurobarometer, Jacques-René Rabier, in collaboration with U.S. political scientist Ronald Inglehart, and was conducted in the nine EU Member States at the time (France, Germany, the United Kingdom, Italy, the Netherlands, Belgium, Denmark, Ireland, and Luxembourg). The results of this first survey were released in 1974. Over time, Eurobarometer grew from surveying the nine original EU countries to include new EU members. Greece was added in fall 1980, Portugal and Spain in fall 1985, the former German Democratic Republic in fall 1990, Finland in spring 1993, and Sweden and Austria in fall 1994. The 13 Central and Eastern European candidate countries that became full members of the EU in 2004 and 2007 were first surveyed in fall 2001.

The Eurobarometer questions measure attitudes toward EU institutions, attitudes toward major topics concerning European affairs, and public awareness of the EU. Another set of questions measures people's satisfaction and expectations regarding the quality of life in the EU. A third set of questions measures how citizens of European countries perceive the other EU countries. Most questions are repeated on each survey in order to measure trends and opinion change over time. Eurobarometer allows monitoring the evolution of public opinion in the Member States, which helps the European Commission with the preparation of texts, decision making, and the evaluation of its work. Eurobarometer data are also often cited by mass media and are used by research scholars in communication, public opinion, and political science.

In the 1990s, Eurobarometer initiated an additional series of surveys, conducted by telephone on smaller samples, called Flash Eurobarometer. Flash surveys differ from the main Eurobarometer studies as their purpose is to find out what the public opinion is on a specific topic, such as the introduction of the Euro currency in the new EU Member States.

Monica Postelnicu

Further Readings

Eurobarometer Archive Web site: http://ec.europa.eu/public_opinion/archives/eb_arch_en.htm

European Commission, Public Opinion Analysis sector Web site: http://ec.europa.eu/public_opinion/index_en.htm

European Association of Political Consultants

The European Association of Political Consultants (EAPC), founded in 1996 in Vienna under the initiative of Michel Bongrand (France) and Sepp Hartinger (Austria), is a nonpartisan association of individuals who are actively involved in tasks of communication concerning the political as well as the public arena in Europe.

Founded as a branch of the International Association of Political Consultants (IAPC), the EAPC has developed its own strong identity but still keeps working side by side with the IAPC and maintains a close contact with its brother associations: the Latin American Association of Political Consultants (ALACOP), the American Association of Political Consultants (AAPC), and the Asia-Pacific Association of Political Consultants (APAPC).

Besides the exchange of experience and the improvement of contacts with the other associations, the EAPC has set the following targets:

- Development, support, and maintenance of democratic processes
- Mutual exchange of information and experience
- Support of cooperation and understanding beyond all borders

The EAPC organizes annual European conferences each time in a different European city. During the conferences, recent political campaigns, mostly in Europe but also outside Europe, are analyzed. Obviously, the country hosting the conference is one of the main themes of each conference, and its political situation is deeply analyzed. Technique plays a big role in modern political campaigning, and new ones are usually presented also. Lecture presentations by political professionals are highlights of the conference. Every meeting is accompanied by an interesting social program, which offers perfect settings to meet new people, exchange opinions, and improve contacts for continuing the discussions.

Since 2004 in Istanbul, the EAPC has been organizing a seminar on political campaigning prior to the annual conference. The Master Class, as this special event is called, is a seminar day during which the most distinguished professors impart their more than 250 years of combined experience in political campaigning to students and junior consultants.

Another important contribution of the EAPC to its goals mentioned before has been the regular publication of Election Time, the European yearbook of political campaigning that analyzes approximately 20 political campaigns in Europe in each year's edition. The yearbook, originally in English, has already been translated into German, Turkish, and Russian.

The board of the association is nominated and elected by the General Assembly every 2 years with a simple majority for a 2-year term of office. Organization presidents are elected for a 2-year term of office and cannot be reelected. The rest of the board (one to three vice presidents, a treasurer, an executive secretary, and a maximum of eight additional board members) may be reelected in consecutive years.

Association membership consists of political consultants, media consultants, pollsters, campaign managers, public affairs officers, professors, fundraisers, lobbyists, and congressional staffers and is open to everyone associated with politics from the local to national level in their respective countries. Because political consultants do not work exclusively for parties and candidates, a growing number of corporations, public interest groups, labor, and other entities interested in public policy are hiring political consultants as members of their public relations, public affairs, or advocacy teams. Such professionals are welcome at the association also.

José Manuel Talero-Garcia

See also American Association of Political Consultants; Consultants, Political; Media Consultants; Professionalization

Further Readings

European Association of Political Consultants Web site: http://www.eapc.com

European Association of Political Consultants. (2006). Election time: The European yearbook of political campaigning 2005. Leibnitz, Austria: Hartinger Consulting.

European Commission

The European Commission is one of the four principal institutions of the European Union (EU) and its constituent entities, the European Community (EC) and the European Atomic Energy Community (EURATOM), the others being the European Parliament, the European Court of Justice, and the Council of the European Union. The commission is essentially the executive arm of the European Union, although it also has some legislative and judicial functions as well. The primary tasks of the commission include (a) the administration and implementation of EU and community policies and legislation, including formulation and spending of the budget; (b) the initiation and drafting of community legislation; (c) the enforcement of EU and community law; and (d) representation of the EU and the communities at the international level, including negotiation of international treaties.

The commission as a body is composed of members called commissioners, who are citizens of and are nominated by the respective governments of each Member State. However, the commission is charged with representing the EU or community interest, not the interests of the Member States, and the commissioners are to act independently in that interest. Commissioners are expressly forbidden to take instructions from their Member State. Because of its responsibility to represent the European interest and enforce the treaties and legislation that provide the legal foundation for the EU and communities, the commission is known as the guardian of the treaties.

The commission is at present composed of one member from each of the 27 Member States: France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, the United Kingdom, Ireland, Denmark, Greece, Spain, Portugal, Austria, Sweden, Finland, Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic, the Slovak Republic, Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, Slovenia, Malta, Cyprus, Romania, and Bulgaria. In the future, the number of commissioners will be less than the number of Member States, so the Member States will nominate commissioners on a rotating basis.

A new commission is appointed every 5 years, within 6 months of the elections to the European Parliament, which occur in June. The procedure is that Member State governments jointly select a commission president, who is then approved by parliament. The commission president-designate, in discussion with the Member State governments, chooses the other members of the commission. The new parliament then interviews each member and gives its opinion on the new commission as a body. After approval, the commission officially begins its work. The present commission's term of office runs until October 31, 2009.

The commission is politically accountable to parliament, which has the power to dismiss the whole commission by adopting a motion of censure. Individual members of the commission must resign if asked to do so by the president, provided the other commissioners approve. The commission attends all the sessions of the European Parliament, and it must reply to written and oral questions posed by members of the parliament.

The commission is responsible for formulating regulations governing political parties at the European Parliament level and providing for public funding for the party campaigns for European Parliament.

Clifford A. Jones

See also Eurobarometer; European Court of Justice; European Parliament; European Union

Further Readings

Craig, P., & De Burca, G. (2007). EU law: Text, cases, materials (4th ed.). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Dinan, D. (2005). Ever closer union: An introduction to European integration (3rd ed.) Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan.

European Commission Web site: http://www.ec.europa.eu

Weatherill, S. (2005). Cases and materials on EU law (7th ed.). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

European Convention on Human Rights

The European Convention on Human Rights (or the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms) was adopted by the Council of Europe in 1950 to protect human rights. The Council of Europe, originally established in 1949 to promote human rights, democracy, and the rule of law, consists today of 46 member countries across Europe. The convention establishes a European Court of Human Rights to monitor observance of the rights and freedoms secured in the convention (article 19).

The convention protects 13 specific rights ranging from the right to life (article 2) and a prohibition against torture (article 3) to a prohibition against slavery (article 4) and the right to liberty and security (article 5) and the right to a fair trial (article 6). The convention also specifically protects rights of freedom of thought, conscience, and religion (article 9) and assembly and association (article 11).

At article 10 the Convention provides for the right to freedom of expression, which expressly includes the right to "hold opinions and to receive and impart information." In Leander v. Sweden, Gaskin v. United Kingdom, and Guerra v. Italy, the European Court has held that this article does not impose an obligation on government authorities and officials to release information to the public. The European Court has held the right to freedom of speech is an essential pillar of democratic society which should be guaranteed not only for ideas that are "favorable," "inoffensive or indifferent" but also for offensive opinions that disturb the state or sectors of the population. This is required to allow tolerance and openness, necessary in plural, democratic society, the court held in the case of Scharsach and News Verlagsgessellschaft v. Austria.

The right to freedom of expression is bounded by "restrictions and penalties" that are "prescribed by law" and are "necessary in a democratic society." The European Court has held that "necessary" is not a synonym for "indispensable" but implies the "existence of an important social need." It is not enough to show that the need is "useful," "reasonable," or "opportune," the court declared in the case of Barthold v. Germany.

Under the Convention the right to freedom of expression can be proscribed "for the protection of the reputation or rights of others." The European Court has held there is greater room for criticism in the case of the politician than in the case of private individuals. It is inevitable that a public person would be subject to rigorous scrutiny, the court said, not only by the judiciary and legislature but also by the press and public opinion. Thus, although the right to reputation protects all people including politicians in their private roles, this should be balanced with an interest in open debate on political matters.

Roxanne Watson

Further Readings

Barthold v. Germany, (ser. A) No. 90 ¶ 58 (Mar. 25, 1985).

Council of Europe Web site: http://www.coe.int/

Council of Europe. (2003, September). Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Retrieved from http://www.echr.coe.int/NR/rdonlyres/D5CC24A7-DC13-4318-B457-5C9014916D7A/0/English Anglais.pdf

Gaskin v. United Kingdom, 12 Eur. H.R. Rep36 (1989).

Guerra v. Italy, (Case 116/1996/735/932) 4 BHRC 63 (1996).

Leander v. Sweden, 9 Eur. H.R. Rep. 433 (1987).

Lingens v. Austria, (ser. A) no. 103, ¶ 42 (Jul. 8, 1986).

Scharsach and News Verlagsgessellschaft v. Austria, ¶ 29 147 Eur. Ct. H.R. (Feb. 13, 2004).

European Court of Justice

The European Court of Justice is the highest court of that entity known as the European Union (EU) or the European Community (EC). The EU includes the EC and the European Atomic Energy Community (EURATOM), and formerly included the now-expired (1952 to 2002) European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC). Each of these entities was created by an international treaty, and the European Court of Justice is one of the institutions common to the EU, the EC, and EURATOM.

The European Court of Justice is a supranational court distinct from a court of one of the EU Member States. Its purpose is to ensure that in the interpretation and application of the various component treaties and legislation, the law is observed. The European Court of Justice gives judgments on issues of EC or EU law, not on questions of national law of individual countries, except to the extent it may refer to national law in order to decide the question of community law. The Court of Justice often is asked to determine whether provisions of a national law are compatible with EC or EU law.

The court system of the European Union includes in descending order, the European Court of Justice, the Court of First Instance, and the Civil Service Tribunal. Unlike in some other international courts, the judgments of the European Court of Justice and the Court of First Instance are binding in each Member State and have primacy or supremacy over the laws of the Member States in those fields of law to which its rulings apply.

From January 1, 2007, the Member States of the EU include, in order of accession, France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, the United Kingdom, Ireland, Denmark, Greece, Spain, Portugal, Austria, Sweden, Finland, Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic, the Slovak Republic, Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, Slovenia, Malta, Cyprus, Romania, and Bulgaria.

The European Court of Justice hears appeals from the Court of First Instance and direct actions by a Member State against another Member State, or another EC or EU institution such as the European Commission, the Council of the European Union, or the European Parliament. Decisions of the European Commission are appealed first to the Court of First Instance and may then be further appealed to the Court of Justice. A very important aspect of its jurisdiction is that it hears proceedings called preliminary references made from the national courts of the Member States on questions of EC or EU law.

Preliminary references take the form of questions put to the court by judges of national courts when they consider that the application of EU or EC law is necessary for their decision on a matter before them. Such preliminary references are submitted by national court judges to the Court of Justice, which gives an answer to the question of EC or EU law sufficiently so that the national court is then able to decide the case before it.

The European Court of Justice considers cases involving regulation of political parties or elections in connection with elections to the European Parliament.

Clifford A. Jones

See also European Commission; European Parliament; European Union

Further Readings

Craig, P., & De Burca, G. (2007). EU law: Text, cases, materials (4th ed.). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Dinan, D. (2005). Ever closer union: An introduction to European integration (3rd ed.). Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan.

European Court of Justice Web site: http://www.curia.europa.eu

Weatherill, S. (2005). Cases and materials on EU law (7th ed.). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

European Parliament

The European Parliament (EP) is one of three bodies of the European Union (EU) involved in its legislative process. The members of the EP were determined by the national parliaments until direct elections were introduced in 1979. Since then, EP members are elected by the people in the Member States in the European elections that are held every 5 years. Since the last European elections and after 10 new Member States joined the EU in 2004, the European Parliament was composed of 732 members. With the most recent enlargement and two more countries accessioned on January 1, 2007, the number of members of the EP rose to 785. Following a graded system, the Member States are assigned different numbers of seats in the EP according to the size of their population. While the minimum number of seats is five (Malta) and six (Cyprus, Estonia, Luxembourg) for the smallest countries, Germany can fill 99 seats and the other big countries (France, Italy, United Kingdom) 78 seats each.

Due to the nature of the European elections, with candidates running on national party lists, often running more nationally oriented than European campaigns and being elected by the national electorates, the EP is not a real European body, although it is the only one with a direct democratic legitimacy. Once elected, the Members of the EP unite in supranational party fractions which determine their stance on issues and thus their voting behavior in the EP instead of their national origin. Currently, seven fractions exist in the EP (e.g., the Group of the European People's Party [Christian Democrats] and European Democrats, the Socialist Group, the Group of the Greens). The EP is headed by a president who is elected by the Members of the European Parliament for a term of 2½ years. The EP has its seat in Strasbourg (France), but some of its sessions are held in Brussels (Belgium).

Always having been the weakest of the three bodies, the EP has gained in power over the years whenever the treaty was amended. Today, the parliament takes part in the legislative process, particularly through the co-decision process that it shares with the European Council. In addition, the EP shares budgetary power with the council, examining and adopting the budget. The European Commission is accountable to the EP. The EP is also involved in the selection of the president of the Commission and the Commission as a whole needs the consent of the EP. The EP also has the right to force the Commission to resign through a vote of no-confidence.

Again and again, the EP and its committees have provided the impetus for new legislative initiatives, calling upon the Commission to deal with certain issues and take the steps of the legislative process. For instance, it was mainly the EP which made the Commission become active in the field of media policy in the early 1980s and has put its stamp on it by taking up a more cultural than economic perspective on broadcasting.

Christina Holtz-Bacha

See also European Parliamentary Elections; European Union; European Union, Media Policy; Second-Order Election

Further Readings

Corbett, R. (2002). The European Parliament's role in closer EU integration. Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan.

Corbett, R., Jacobs, F., & Shackleton, M. (2005). The European Parliament (6th ed.). London: John Harper.

Judge, D., & Earnshaw, D. (2003). The European Parliament (The European Union). Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan.

European Parliamentary Elections

European elections were held for the first time in 1979. They determine the members of the European Parliament (EP), which is one of the most important institutions of the European Union (EU). Until 1979, the members of the EP were delegates of the national parliaments. The decision to introduce direct elections was driven by the idea of further integration and involving citizens in the European integration process.

European elections are held every 5 years. They take place at the same time in all EU Member States within 4 days. Voters in the Member States cast their votes according to national election laws, meaning there is no supranational European law harmonizing the electoral process. Accordingly, voters cast their votes for national parties and candidates. Thus, the members of the EP are not European politicians but represent their individual countries. Therefore, campaigning for the European elections also takes place at the national level. Analyses of the campaigns have shown that primarily national issues dominate the agendas of the parties and the media. Depending on the date of the European elections in relation to the national election cycle, European elections often become a test election for the incumbent national government. Voters have used their vote in the European election for protesting against current national politics and the established parties, or even to strengthen those parties that do not support their countries' involvement in the European Union. As a consequence, smaller parties that only play a minor role on the national level have made their way into the EP or gained importance through their engagement in European politics before they were accepted by the electorate at the national level. Because of the comparatively weak position of the EP in the European political process and the assumed small impact on their individual lives, European elections have been regarded as second-order elections from the beginning. Average (all European) voter turnout in the first direct election in 1979 was 63% (in then nine Member States, driven up by countries with compulsory voting) and fell to 45.6% in 2004 (25 Member States).

Although the unique event lends itself to internationally comparative research on the role of the media in election campaigns, the European elections have not drawn as much attention of researchers as do national elections. Only on the occasion of the first direct election was a cross-comparative and multimethod study on the role of television in the then-nine Member States conducted (see Blumler, 1983), an exemplary case of international cooperation that could not be repeated.

Christina Holtz-Bacha

See also European Parliament; European Union; Second-Order Election

Further Readings

Blumler, J. G. (Ed.). (1983). Communicating to voters. Television in the first European parliamentary elections. London: Sage.

European Union

The European Union (EU) is a multinational democratic entity that consists of 27 Member States. There have been six periods of enlargement in the growth of the EU, and the largest occurred on May 1, 2004, when 10 states joined the existing 15. The most recent expansion was on January 1, 2007, when Bulgaria and Romania were accessioned. The current Member States of the EU are Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, and the United Kingdom.

With such growth, there have been numerous issues of concern as well as the promise of an integrated Europe. One major area is that of language barriers and the need for the EU to spend much time and resources on translation in order to facilitate communication among its diverse membership. Presently, the EU has 23 official and working languages. These languages are Bulgarian, Czech, Danish, Dutch, English, Estonian, Finnish, French, German, Greek, Hungarian, Italian, Irish, Latvian, Lithuanian, Maltese, Polish, Portuguese, Romanian, Slovak, Slovene, Spanish, and Swedish. German is the most widely spoken mother tongue, followed by English, French, and Italian. English is widely acknowledged as the de facto official common language of the EU.

Historically, the European Economic Community, or the Common Market, was established by the Treaty of Rome in 1957 and was implemented January 1, 1958. It then evolved into the European Community. The EU was officially formed when the Maastricht Treaty was signed on February 7, 1992. It was created as a supranational entity with the goal of creating a common market among its Member States. Therefore, the EU was responsible for the administration of the customs union, the Common Agricultural Policy, and the Common Fisheries Policy. Also, the EU has extended its original tasks to include a broader range of common policies, such as road safety, culture, transportation, and the environment.

The continuation of a developing EU has created what is called the Eurozone, and this major democratic entity is continuing to evolve and expand. Currently recognized member candidates are Croatia, the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, and Turkey. Potential member candidates are Albania, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Montenegro, and Serbia. According to the EU Treaty, each Member State, and the EU Parliament, must agree to any enlargement.

For a nation-state to join the EU, it must fulfill economic and political conditions generally known as the Copenhagen criteria. These standards are set forth to maintain democratic government, standard rule of law, and corresponding freedoms. Despite these criteria, some critics are concerned about Europe losing not only its identity but also its common standards. For example, much concern arose over the accessioning of Cyprus in 2004, which divided Greek and Turkish parts of this nation. The Cyprus issue illustrated a ferment in EU growth that will undoubtably continue to prove problematic with the plans for the accession of Turkey. While the EU is a secular body, it is largely one whose members' religion is Christianity. The accessioning of Turkey is argued to be problematic due to religious differences—and because only a small part of Turkish territory is considered to be European territory.

While the EU Parliament does not have a great deal of direct power, it serves as a democratic watchdog over other EU institutions. The EU Member States are guided by a series of mandates for foreign policy and security. However, individual Member States are allowed to develop and follow their own foreign policies. EU guidelines require its Member States to follow the United Nations Charter and to uphold human rights.

In May 2004, the EU became what is now widely acknowledged as the largest democratic body in the world when it accessioned 10 new countries. This expansion of the 15 existing members to 25 brought into the EU many countries that only 15 years earlier were under the communist domination of the former Soviet Union. For the accessioning countries, as well as the 15 existing members of the EU, the 2004 elections marked the first opportunity for the selection of representatives to the new and enlarged European Parliament. These elections were held from June 10 to June 13, 2004.

With this growth, the EU has faced what some consider an identity crisis of sorts, and it is unclear to many citizens whether the EU is a military, political, symbolic, or economic entity. It appears that the clearest function of the EU is an economic one, and its main purpose is to create a unified European market. One widely recognized product of the EU is the development of the cross-national Euro currency. While it is used in 13 Member States, others have rejected its use for various reasons including the desire to maintain a national identity and not just a European one.

This division is evidenced by actions on October 29, 2004, when EU Member State heads of government signed a treaty to establish a general constitution for all members of the EU. The constitution was later ratified by 17 EU Member States, but largely the ratification was due to parliamentary action, instead of popular vote. The path to a EU Constitution faced major obstacles on May 29, 2005, when French voters rejected the constitution. This defeat was followed shortly thereafter by failure in the Netherlands. The ability to pass, and enforce, the EU constitution across all Member States remains uncertain.

In addition to the problem of EU skepticism and some resistance to an integrated and an ever-expanding Europe is the issue of voter participation. Beginning with the first election for a European-wide parliamentary body in 1979, these elections have been considered "second-order elections" in which citizens have little at stake. The organization in which the winners of the election will participate is remote from the citizens and perceived to be of little daily relevance. Consequently, voter apathy and low turnout have characterized the EU parliamentary elections and set the stage for party campaigns that attract limited media attention and focus more often on domestic concerns in each country, rather than on European-wide policies. Fighting voter apathy and raising the stakes for citizens in Member States has been a long-term struggle in European-level elections.

Nonetheless, the EU has become a powerful entity that influences trade negotiations, aid agreements, and border control. It also has the ability to impose sanction and arms embargos. As the EU continues to develop its policies and improve its internal and external communication, it will have the opportunity to flex the muscles of the superpower it is capable of becoming.

Andrew Paul Williams

See also Eurobarometer; European Convention on Human Rights; European Court of Justice; European Parliament; European Union, Media Policy

Further Readings

Blumler, J. G. (1983). Communication and turnout. In J. G. Blumler (Ed.), Communicating to voters: Television in the first European Parliamentary elections (pp. 181–209). London: Sage.

de Vreese, C. H. (2001). Election coverage—new directions for public broadcasting. European Journal of Communication, 16(2), 155–180.

de Vreese, C. H. (2004). Framing Europe. Television news and European integration. Amsterdam, Netherlands: Aksant Academic.

de Vreese, C. H., Peter, J., & Semetko, H. A. (2001). Framing politics at the launch of the Euro: A cross-national comparative study of frames in the news. Political Communication, 18(2), 107–122.

Norris, P., & Reif, L. (1997). Second-order elections. European Journal of Political Research, 31(1), 109–124.

Schlesinger, P, (1999). Changing spaces of political communication: The case of the European Union. Political Communication, 16(3), 263–279.

Semetko, H, A., & Valkenburg, P. M. (2000). Framing European politics: A content analysis of press and television news. Journal of Communication, 50(2), 93–109.

Williams, A. P., & Kaid, L. L. (2006). Media framing of the European Parliamentary elections: A view from the United States. In M. Maier & J. Tenscher (Eds.), Campaigning in Europe—Campaigning for Europe: Political parties, campaigns, mass media and the European Parliament elections 2004 (pp. 295–304). London: LIT.

European Union, Media Policy

The European Union (EU), or the European Community (EC), has long been active in the field of the media. Whether these activities can be called media policy in the sense of a systematic regulation is at least open for discussion. However, the many-fold actions have a major impact on media regulation in the EU Member States and by now even seem to have forced them onto the defensive in this regard. The increasing relevance of the media in European politics is also reflected by the fact that, since 2004, the Commission has had its own Commissioner for Information Society and Media (Viviane Reding from Luxembourg).

Media-related activities started around 1980 and were at first mainly initiated by the European Parliament (EP). The first EP election (1979) had shown that the idea of a unified Europe not only remained abstract for the people in the Member States, but also that the image of the European institutions was vague if not negative. While at the same time new technologies were introduced that allowed for television to cross borders, the EP prepared several reports and passed resolutions that criticized the current EC information policy and called for using television to promote the European idea. This also referred to examining the possibility of establishing a European television channel. In 1982, five members of the European Broadcasting Union (EBU) started Eurikon, a TV channel that was to test the feasibility of a joint venture in European television. However, the 6 months of its operation clearly demonstrated the problems of such an undertaking among which the financing and the language turned out to be the most difficult. When a similar project (Europa TV) was started in 1985, the experiences were not much different, and it was closed down in 1986.

While the EP hoped for the integrating power of television, the European Commission became convinced that cross-border television provoked the need for a common European regulation. At that time, the Member States had heterogeneous laws regulating their broadcasting markets (e.g., advertising regulations), and programs broadcast from one country to another either had to respect different standards or violate them. In order to allow for the free movement of goods, services, capital, and the freedom of establishment on the EC Internal Market, the European Commission started to discuss the homogenization of regulations for broadcasting. From the beginning, it was much disputed whether the community had the competence to deal with broadcasting, which was often regarded as a cultural product in the Member States and not so much as a commercial commodity. The Member States reserve the legal competence for the field of culture mostly to themselves. The European Commission instead relied on a decision of the European Court of Justice in 1974 (Sacchi case), which had declared broadcasting should be considered as a service and broadcasting corporations as companies.

The most decisive step in European media policy was undertaken with the adoption of the Television Without Frontiers (TWF) Directive in 1989. This was prepared by an Interim Report in 1983 and the TWF Green Book in 1984. Unlike the original plan, the directive only pertained to television and did not include radio. The regulation is based on the general rule that all Member States must ensure the freedom of reception and will not restrict the retransmission on their territories of television broadcasts from other Member States. Individual broadcasters fall under the jurisdiction of that country where the decisions about their programming are taken and where its management is situated. Each Member State makes sure that the broadcasters comply with the TWF regulation.

The directive brought common rules for television advertising, protection of minors, and the right of reply and introduced a quota for European works. The rules of the directive had to be implemented in the Member States within 2 years. Other than the general doubts concerning the right of the community to become active in the field of television, the quota was the most controversial item of the directive. With the aim to support and foster the European audiovisual industry, the directive rules that more than 50% of the programs (except news, sports programs, and game shows) have to be works of European origin and 10% of the program or 10% of the program budget has to be allocated for independent productions. Although this caused international disputes over protectionism (particularly on the part of the United States) to be put on the agenda of the GATT/GATS talks (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade/General Agreement on Trade in Services) and later the World Trade Organization, some Member States interpreted the quota as an unacceptable intervention into the program autonomy of the broadcasting stations. The regular reports of the European Commission on compliance with the quota, however, show that the stations adhere to the quota satisfactorily.

As a supplementary instrument for fostering the European audiovisual industry, the European Community in 1991 started its MEDIA program with diverse measures to support the distribution and promotion of European films and training initiatives. In addition to strengthening European film production, the quota and the MEDIA program are thought to further the integration of the EU Member States through the exchange of films from one country to the other. The latest (and fourth) MEDIA program, which will run until 2013, was launched in 2007 (MEDIA 2007).

The TWF Directive was amended in 1997, mostly in order to react to new developments in television advertising, sponsoring, and teleshopping and to clarify their regulation. The most important innovation of the 1997 amendment was a provision to ensure free access of the public to major events. Under the new regulation, Member States attained the right to draw up lists with events "of major importance for society" that are to be broadcast on free TV channels. Several countries have used this option and listed mainly sports events. The result was that these events are not allowed to be shown on pay-TV exclusively.

In December 2005, the European Commission presented a proposal for another amendment of the directive which is supposed to be adopted at the end of 2007. Because of the technical convergence and the fact that by now the same content is delivered through different technical channels, the new Audiovisual Media Services (AMS) Directive will cover all media services. It distinguishes linear and nonlinear services. Linear services are those where the provider decides about the time of the transmission of a specific program as well as the program schedule (traditional television). Nonlinear services are provided on-demand (e.g., video-on-demand). Because of the control an individual user can exercise over nonlinear services and because of their lesser impact on society, the new AMS Directive will apply only basic rules for nonlinear services (as, e.g., provision of certain information of the origin of the service, protection of minors, basic regulation for commercial communications). Linear services, instead, will underlie additional rules similar to those contained in the old TWF Directive. The restrictions for advertising will be relaxed. As before, product placement will be forbidden, but Member States have the possibility to allow this form of advertising under certain conditions. Another innovation will be a provision ensuring linear services the right to short news reporting about events of major interest to society.

While the TWF Directive is based on the Internal Market articles of the EC Treaty, the European Commission refers to the (general) antitrust articles (81, 82) of the EC Treaty for other activities in the field of the media. These prohibit agreements and decisions of undertakings or concerted practices that may restrict or distort competition within the common market as well as abuse of a dominant market position. Concentration is controlled according to the EC Merger Regulation which, however, is a general law on mergers and therefore does not consider the specificities of the media market (pluralism; small and midsize companies). Although the EP has again and again called for measures to deal with media concentration at the European level, the European Commission has never come to grips with a Concentration Directive. The argument for the reluctance to this point is the heterogeneity of national concentration regulation and, although not officially stated, the resistance of the Member States.

Another article of the rules on competition of the Treaty has recently played a prominent role among the media-related activities of the European Commission. Article 87 of the EC Treaty prohibits all aids granted by Member States that may distort competition. Since the early 1990s, several commercial broadcasters had filed complaints and the European Commission had to examine whether the financing of public service broadcasting by fees was to be regarded as state aid and, if so, whether these aids threatened competition between public and commercial broadcasters. The European Commission at first dealt with these complaints reluctantly but was pushed by the European Court of Justice to become active. While the Commission was convinced that the broadcasting fees constitute state aids, their legitimateness became strongly disputed. Thus under pressure, the public service broadcasters hinted at exemptions for "undertakings entrusted with the operation of services of general economic interest" (as laid down in Article 86(2) of the treaty).

As the debate about the role of public service broadcasting in the Member States continued, the European Council, at its meeting in Amsterdam in 1997, decided to add a protocol on public service broadcasting to the treaty (Amsterdam Protocol). It stressed the significance that Member States assign to their public service broadcasters and affirmed their competence concerning remit and funding. This was again underlined by a Council resolution on public broadcasting released in early 1999.

Accordingly, in 2001, the European Commission released its "Communication on the Application of State Aid Rules to Public Service Broadcasting" which was to provide for a common scheme to be employed for assessing the existence of state aid on a case-by-case basis and to determine whether the aids are compatible with the common market. The communication emphasized the role of services of general economic interest in attaining the fundamental objectives of the EU but put up several conditions for Article 86(2) to be applicable: an official definition of the public service mandate, which has to be entrusted to one or more broadcasters by an official act. While the European Commission acknowledged that the decision about the financing of public broadcasters lies in the powers of the Member States, it also reserved the right to verify that the aid does not adversely affect competition. The communication also emphasized the obligation of public undertakings to clearly separate their public service and non–public service activities and the respective accounting, as also laid down in the EU Transparency Directive. On these grounds, the Commission examined the activities of public broadcasters in several Member States and in some cases concluded that financing exceeded what was necessary for the fulfillment of the public service task and imposed redemptions.

The general problem with media-related activities in the EU is its confinement to the economic perspective. Because the community does not have much competence in the field of culture every step has to be grounded in and legitimated by the provisions of the Treaty which still shows the origin of the EU as an economic community. Until recently, the EU did not have a fundamental rights catalogue and, because the European Court of Justice often had to deal with cases pertaining to the media, they therefore relied on Article 10 of the European Human Rights Convention of the Council of Europe. At its meeting in Nizza in 2000, the European Council proclaimed the Charter of Fundamental Rights, which was to become part of the treaty establishing a constitution for Europe but that currently is on hold. Nevertheless, the European Court of Justice already refers to the fundamental rights laid down in the charter and to Article 11 that contains freedom of the media. In the long run, this may change the perspective that the EU institutions have on the media and make the cultural side of the media an equal part of their thinking.

Christina Holtz-Bacha

See also European Commission; European Court of Justice; European Parliament; European Union

Further Readings

European Commission. (n.d.). The "Television Without Frontiers" directive. Retrieved from http://ec.europa.eu/comm/avpolicy/reg/tvwf/index_en.htm

Harcourt, A. (2005). The European Union and the regulation of media markets. Manchester, UK: Manchester University Press.

Holtz-Bacha, C. (2006). Medienpolitik für Europa [Media politics for Europe]. Wiesbaden, Germany: VS Verlag für Sozialwissenschaften.

E-Voting

E-voting stands for electronic voting. It refers to the process of casting an electronic ballot and generally encompasses a wide range of electronic technology, including telephones, cable, and computers. Internet voting, or I-voting, refers more specifically to the process of casting an electronic ballot that is transmitted to election officials via the Internet.

Interest in electronic voting increased following the dramatic events of Election Day 2000 when concerns over the integrity of the U.S. electoral system arose from the uncertainty over whom had won the presidential election. Over a month passed before Democratic presidential candidate Al Gore conceded the election to Republican George W. Bush. During that month, the Florida recount of the presidential vote brought to the fore the untidy reality of punch card voting involving hanging, dimpled, and pregnant chads that made it difficult to determine with certainty for whom a ballot had been cast. In 2002, the Help America Vote Act was passed by Congress to provide funds to replace vintage voting systems (i.e., punch card systems). The law authorized Congress to make more than $3 billion available to state and federal agencies to improve election systems.

Many states rushed to reform their voting systems by adopting various forms of electronic voting machines as a replacement to traditional punch card systems. During the 2006 general election when many of these new voting systems were implemented, criticisms of these systems arose. Possible problems with e-voting systems include software programming errors, machines freezing, new forms of human errors, and attacks made by hackers. To date, it is unclear whether these systems merit suspicion or whether many of the problems associated with e-voting stem from poll workers insufficiently trained with the new equipment and voter unfamiliarity with machines. For example, in Florida's 13th Congressional District in the November 2006 election, 18,000 votes supposedly went missing. It is unclear whether people did not vote or whether the touch-screen systems did not record the votes. The missing votes could have been consequential, as the Republican candidate won the election with only 368 more votes than his Democratic opponent.

Elderly voters cast their ballots on the new touch-screen electronic voting machines in the Century Village retirement community in Palm Beach County, November 2, 2004. Palm Beach County was one of the centers of controversy in Florida during the 2000 election.

Source: Getty Images.

The four major companies providing electronic voting systems are Diebold, Election Systems & Software, Hart InterCivic, and Sequoia Voting Systems. Voting software is considered proprietary and therefore citizens cannot check to see if the machines are working correctly, placing trust in the companies that have designed the systems.

Voting practices are determined by state and local jurisdictions, although some people are calling for uniform federal standards. Some states do not require paper records to verify vote counts made from electronic machines (voter-verified paper audit trails, or VVPAT). A little less than half, or 22, states use systems with VVPAT. Even with paper audit trails in place, it is possible that difficulties will emerge due to problems such as paper jams from printers, which could lead to undercounts of electronic votes.

Kate Kenski

Further Readings

Kenski, K. (2005). To I-vote or not to I-vote? Opinions about Internet voting from Arizona voters. Social Science Computer Review, 23(3), 293–303.

Qadah, G. Z., & Taha, R. (2007). Electronic voting systems: Requirements, design, and implementation. Computer Standards & Interfaces, 29, 376–386.

EXPERIMENTAL STUDIES

See METHODOLOGY

F

Face-to-Face Communication

See Interpersonal Communication

Fahrenheit 9/11

See Film and Politics

Fairness Doctrine

One of the Federal Communications Commission's (FCC) most controversial policies, the Fairness Doctrine obligated U.S. broadcast licensees to seek out and present contrasting viewpoints on controversial issues of interest to the community in which the license was held. The commission reasoned if such programs were aired in sufficient amounts by a licensee, then the public interest, convenience, and necessity (PICN) would be better served, thus improving the likelihood for license renewal. The goal of the Fairness Doctrine was to foster discussion of important community issues, but it was ultimately set aside by the FCC because it was said to contravene that goal.

Set forth as FCC policy in 1949, the commission declared:

> Radio [must] be maintained as a medium of free speech for the general public as a whole rather than as an outlet for the purely personal or private interests of the licensee. This requires that licensees devote a reasonable percentage of their broadcasting time to the discussion of public issues of interest in the community served by their stations and that such programs be designed so that the public has a reasonable opportunity to hear different opposing positions.

The Fairness Doctrine appeared to gain statutory status in 1959 when Congress amended Section 315 of the Act (which exempted legally qualified political candidates appearing in bona fide news programs from equal time requirements):

> Nothing in [this amendment to the Communications Act of 1934] shall be construed as relieving broadcasters . . . from the obligation imposed upon them . . . to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance.

The U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the constitutionality of the Fairness Doctrine in its Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC decision, June 9, 1969: "The Fairness Doctrine . . . and political editorializing regulations are a legitimate exercise of congressionally delegated authority."

In the years after Red Lion, broadcasters claimed the policy had an inverse effect; rather than fostering debate, it "chilled" discussion of controversial issues such that broadcasters avoided controversy, fearful that they would be required to air opposing viewpoints, thus losing available commercial airtime. In 1984, Fairness Doctrine critics and a sympathetic FCC began gathering information to support a change, and the FCC soon announced that, although it would not repeal the Fairness Doctrine, it no longer served the public interest, and in 1987 the FCC announced it would no longer enforce the policy. Congress attempted unsuccessfully to enact the Fairness Doctrine into law in 1988, and the D.C. Court of Appeals ordered the FCC to repeal the final corollaries to the Fairness Doctrine in October 2000.

Robert Gobetz

See also Communications Act of 1934

Further Readings

Communications Act of 1934, Pub. L. No. 86-274, 73 Stat. 557 (1959). Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.

Fairness Doctrine Report. (1985). (102 FCC 2d 145).

Federal Communications Commission. (1946). Public service responsibility of broadcast licensees. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office.

Kahn, F. J. (1984). Documents of American broadcasting (4th ed.). Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.

Red Lion Broadcasting Co., Inc. et al. v. Federal Communications Commission et al., 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

Sterling, C. H., & Kittross, J. M. (2002). Stay tuned: A concise history of American broadcasting (3rd ed.). Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.

Falklands-Malvinas War

The Falklands-Malvinas War took place from April until June 1982 between Argentina and the United Kingdom. From Argentina's side, it was a struggle for recovering a long-demanded sovereignty of these South Atlantic islands. For the United Kingdom, it was a response to Argentina's invasion of British territory. The war culminated in British victory. The conflict embodied a significant event for war communication because despite the development and availability of technologically sophisticated global media, the geographical hindrances allowed each country control over the information given to its citizens.

At the time of the war, Argentina was ruled by a military dictatorship that had begun to lose momentum. The dictatorship's decline resulted from national objections to economic mismanagement as well as internal and external disapproval of human rights violations. In Great Britain, Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher was losing support. After the war, the military government in Argentina resigned, and constitutional elections were called. Meanwhile, opinions of Thatcher improved and facilitated her reelection in 1983.

The Falklands-Malvinas War is considered a communication conflict particularly because the distant location made for difficult live transmissions. Except for the few inhabitants of the islands, the events became real for the world, including the belligerent countries' populations, exclusively through media coverage and government statements. Consequently, the possibilities for manipulation and censorship were high, and both sides provided their constituencies with incomplete or false information.

There were shortcomings in the diplomacy and crisis management not only caused by the involved parties but also by the international community. Mediation attempts presented by the United Nations, the U.S. secretary of state, the Organization of American States, and the president of Peru failed. Although the European Community and the United States announced economic sanctions against Argentina, the majority of Latin American nations approved the country's claim.

The military government in Argentina used the advantages of the location and their control over national media. The first pictures and commentaries on the war seen by the world came from Argentina. The sinking of the ship Belgrano outside the war operations zone briefly brought the international public opinion to Argentina's side. Also, the sinking of the British destroyer Sheffield was presented successfully as a consequence of the Argentine possession of more powerful weapons. When the situation turned more favorable for Britain, the propaganda machine of the Argentine government manipulated the facts into suitable interpretations that preserved the optimistic national public opinion until the end. From the British side, no centralized propaganda campaign existed. The British media were theoretically free to publish their points of view. However, the U.K. government did not facilitate access to information for foreign journalists, and the national media complained after the conflict about the news distribution from governmental departments.

Malvina Rodriguez

See also War Coverage

Further Readings

Escudero Chauvel, L. (1996). Malvinas: el gran relato. Fuentes y rumores en la información de guerra. [Malvinas: The big story. Sources and rumors in war information]. Barcelona: Gedisa.

Freedman, L., & Gamba-Stonehouse, V. (1991). Signals of war. The Falklands conflict of 1982. London: Faber & Faber.

Fantasy Theme Analysis

Developed primarily by Ernest G. Bormann, fantasy theme analysis is a method of rhetorical investigation, designed to detect and describe the presence of group consciousness, or what Bormann called symbolic convergence. First introduced in a 1972 publication, symbolic convergence theory attempts to account for the development of a group mind through "dramatizing" or the dramatic sharing of narratives among group members. Bormann called these communal narratives "fantasies" and argued that such cooperative story-telling would enhance group cohesion and encourage the cultivation of a convergent point of view. Thus, a fantasy provides group members with symbolic common ground and, by extension, a shared social identity.

Emanating from both the social scientific and humanistic traditions of communication scholarship, fantasy theme analysis is often characterized as a bridge between these sometimes discordant lines of research. The social scientific component of fantasy theme analysis derives from the research conducted by Robert F. Bales and his Harvard associates on small group dynamics in the 1960s. A coding system was developed to enable them to apply content analysis techniques to group communication. They observed the process of dramatizing a narrative and the chain reaction that followed as group members interacted with excitement. Drawing upon Freudian thought, they described the phenomenon as group fantasizing and noted that it heightened group cohesion. Bales published these findings in a 1970 book titled Personality and Interpersonal Behavior.

The humanistic component of fantasy theme analysis emerged from the small group research of Bormann and his associates at the University of Minnesota, also in the 1960s. They too used content analysis, as well as journaling, interviewing, and recordings, to analyze small group interactions. In addition to these social scientific methods, however, the Bormann group also used rhetorical criticism to study the persuasive tactics of task-oriented groups. When the Bales research was published, the Bormann group recognized that the Bales approach to analyzing group fantasies was a form of rhetorical criticism. The Bormann group then set out to reproduce the findings of Bales's research and further investigate the occurrence of group fantasizing. Symbolic convergence theory evolved subsequently from fantasy research as a means to describe the emergence of group consciousness.

In order for a fantasy to emerge, a group member will "dramatize" or share a story that excites a response in the other members of the group. This excitement ignites a chain reaction in which group members begin to expand the original narrative, collaboratively refining and constructing the story in response to one another. Thus, the initial dramatization "chains out" among group members, generating a fantasy. Bormann used fantasy as a technical term within the confines of symbolic convergence theory, not as the word is used in everyday conversation—that is, it does not refer simply to the imaginary. Notably, a fantasy is always set in some other place and some other time, never the "here and now." The specific content of this communal narrative, including its characters and plot, is called a fantasy theme. A fantasy theme then is the most basic manifestation of symbolic convergence; it provides evidence that group members have created a common understanding of some aspect of their experience.

Bormann noted that a fantasy theme is a group's interpretation of ideas or events, a collective attempt to assign meaning to the world around them. As such, fantasy themes enable participants to account for their ideas and experiences in a way that is palatable to the group mind and serves the needs of its members. In constructing their shared reality, group members often fabricate details, interweaving the fanciful with the factual to produce an account that is satisfactory to all.

With the emergence of a group mind via a fantasy theme comes the increased potential for the chaining out of additional fantasies. Each subsequent fantasy theme will often follow a similar plotline as its predecessors, and these recurrent scenarios can then be sorted into fantasy types. These categories serve as a shortcut for the creation of new fantasies, because the previous stories provide group members with a selection of scripts to emulate. Thus, the group is able to continually integrate new experiences into the shared consciousness they have already established through prior collaborative fantasizing.

As a group generates multiple fantasy themes, its members will usually invent symbolic cues, or shorthand references to a previously shared fantasy or fantasy type. Comparable to evoking an inside joke, these cues are unintelligible to outsiders but are designed to induce insiders to respond as they did when the fantasy was first shared. A symbolic cue can be a code word or phrase or even a gesture, any brief allusion that reminds group members of a particular fantasy or type. The emergence of both fantasy types and symbolic cues offers confirmation that symbolic convergence has developed. Bormann noted that the implementation of an experiment is not essential to fantasy theme analysis, because historical documents and resources can often provide evidence for the existence of fantasy types and symbolic cues.

When a large number of people share a multitude of fantasy themes, they often compile the various narratives over time, creating a broader worldview, or rhetorical vision. This vision is a collaborative construction of reality, a means for participants to understand and evaluate the circumstances around them in keeping with the group mind. Those who subscribe to the vision comprise a "rhetorical community" and are united, not necessarily by physical proximity but by a common point of view. The vision they share will usually be consolidated under a "master analogue" or guiding purpose, which can fall into one of three categories: pragmatic, emphasizing practicality; social, highlighting the relational; and righteous, evoking a higher cause. Bormann cites the cold war, black power, and the silent majority as examples of rhetorical visions in recent U.S. history.

Bormann noted that an individual can subscribe to multiple rhetorical visions and consequently belong to more than one rhetorical community. Accordingly, membership in a rhetorical community can be official or unofficial, short-lived or long-term. A long-standing community like an organization will usually be united by a saga, a specific type of rhetorical vision that illuminates the group's origins and founders, customs and heroes, fundamental values and ultimate purpose for existence. The saga is perpetuated with the creation of icons, rituals and regular celebrations, all designed to help communities' members "keep the faith."

Although it originated in small group research, fantasy theme analysis has been broadened since its formulation in the 1960s and 1970s and, over the last 3 decades, has been applied to communication at any level, from interpersonal to public to mass. Bormann explained that a fantasy can chain out among a larger public in much the same way that it would in a small group. In addition, a form of public address and/or the mass media could easily propagate a rhetorical vision, therefore uniting substantial portions of the population into rhetorical communities. In light of this, Bormann characterized symbolic convergence as a general theory of communication and fantasy theme analysis as a method of research for interpersonal, group, organizational, public, and mass communication.

Bormann offered an example of fantasy theme analysis in his seminal 1972 publication, analyzing the rhetorical vision advanced by 17th-century Puritan ministers of the Massachusetts Bay colony. He likened the vision that sustained them through the deprivation and hardship of existence in the new world to the exodus of the Jews from Egypt to the promised land. By infusing their struggles with religious significance, preachers like John Cotton gave their congregations hope and purpose in an otherwise bleak situation.

In 1973, Bormann presented a fantasy theme analysis of the 1972 presidential campaign's notorious Eagleton Affair, in which presidential hopeful George McGovern selected Senator Thomas Eagleton as running mate. Eagleton subsequently withdrew from the race when rumors of his past psychiatric hospitalizations surfaced in the press, raising questions about McGovern's judgment. Bormann analyzed how multiple fantasies, spurred on by extensive media coverage, chained out among the American electorate as this story unfolded.

In 1985, Bormann published The Force of Fantasy, a book-length case study of the American dream as a recurrent and ever-evolving rhetorical vision in pre-civil war America. He identified four periods of development—namely, the pre-revolutionary Puritan revivals, the great awakening, the frontier era, and advent of the Free Soil and Republican parties—corresponding to four rhetorical communities who each propagated a vision of restoring the American dream. Here, public address played a vital role in the chaining out of a rhetorical vision.

Bormann joined John F. Cragan and Donald C. Shields in 1994 to examine the cold war paradigm as a rhetorical vision. Of particular interest were the various stages in the life cycle of this vision (and, by extension, any rhetorical vision). The cold war, they argued, offered a unique opportunity to explore the inception, expansion, propagation, decline, and demise of an especially prominent rhetorical vision. They identified three stages common to all rhetorical visions: "consciousness-creating" (the creation and ongoing revision of a group mind, which continues throughout the life of the vision), "consciousness-raising" (intended specifically to attract new members), and "consciousness-sustaining" (the renewal of the group mind, intended to maintain the commitment of members).

Also in 1994, Bormann, Cragan, and Shields published a defense of symbolic convergence theory and fantasy theme analysis, refuting the most persistent criticisms of the theory and its methodological premises. The term fantasy has particularly frustrated critics who claim that the word causes confusion because it is intended to describe both the rational and the fanciful elements of a shared narrative. In addition, critics have charged that symbolic convergence merely re-labels concepts borrowed from other theories, needlessly complicating research. In response, Bormann et al. argue that all communicative phenomena need not be condensed under one set of universal terminology and that findings drawn from symbolic convergence and fantasy theme research could not be replicated under any other theoretical framework. Critics have also claimed that a theory based on Freudian thought cannot be applied in studies outside the realm of small group communication, an indictment that Bormann et al. dismissed by citing the abundance and variety of research that the sharing of fantasies has inspired.

Over the past 30 years, fantasy theme analysis has stimulated dozens of studies on a wide array of subjects and encompassing a range of mediums within the domain of communication. In recent years, symbolic convergence theory has continued to inspire researchers to undertake fantasy theme analysis. Csapo-Sweet and Shields used fantasy theme analysis to explore the use of sagas on Serbia's Radio B92. Palenchar and Heath demonstrated the versatility of fantasy theme analysis by applying it to their examination of competing rhetorical visions in risk communication. Stone investigated the rhetorical visions adopted by newly admitted graduate students during the selection of a program of study. Duffy explored the persuasive potential of rhetorical visions presented by hate groups on their Web sites. Aleman used fantasy theme analysis to analyze romantic narratives found on the discussion boards of SeniorNet. From Alcoholics Anonymous to Mister Rogers, from political cartoons to romance novels and public relations to politics, fantasy theme analysis has continually demonstrated that it is both highly effective and virtually indispensable to communication research.

Arin Rose Dickerson

See also Bormann, Ernest; Symbolic Convergence Theory

Further Readings

Bales, R. F. (1970). Personality and interpersonal behavior. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston.

Bormann, E. G. (1972). Fantasy and rhetorical vision: The rhetorical criticism of social reality. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 58, 396–407.

Bormann, E. G. (1973). The Eagleton affair: A fantasy theme analysis. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 59, 143–159.

Bormann, E. G. (1982). Fantasy and rhetorical vision: Ten years later. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 68, 288–305.

Bormann, E. G. (1982). A fantasy theme analysis of the television coverage of the hostage release and the Reagan inaugural. Quarterly Journal of Speech, 68, 133–145.

Bormann, E. G. (1985). The force of fantasy: Restoring the American dream. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press.

Bormann, E. G., Kroll, B. S., Watters, K., & McFarland, D. (1984). Rhetorical visions of committed voters in the 1980 presidential campaign: Fantasy theme analysis of a large sample survey. Critical Studies in Mass Communication, 1, 287–310.

Fear Appeals, Use in Politics

The logical fallacy of argumentum ad metam or argumentum in terrorem, more commonly known as the fear appeal, has been studied scientifically since World War II. This type of emotional appeal in the political arena consists of threatening or arousing dread or anxiety in order to gain support for one's cause or candidate. Fear appeals have been described by political communication scholars Lynda Lee Kaid and Ann Johnston as appeals that suggest a negative consequence will result if the opponent is elected or, alternatively, if the sponsoring candidate is not elected. Their research has found that 32% of all negative ads use fear appeals—significantly higher than the percentage found in positive spots. In fact, in the 1988 presidential race, a full 75% of the ads sponsored by the Bush and Dukakis campaigns contained fear appeals.

Perhaps the most infamous example of a fear appeal in a modern-day campaign is what has come to be known as the "Daisy Girl" ad. Brainchild of Madison Avenue's Tony Schwartz and sponsored by the Democrats in the 1964 presidential campaign, the black-and-white ad opens on a girl, perhaps 6 years old, pulling off and counting a daisy's petals. When she reaches ten, a faceless announcer counts down, "Ten, nine, eight . . ." At zero, an extreme close-up zooms directly into the child's eye as a mushroom cloud erupts within it. Johnson's voice echoes, "We must love each other, or we must die," appealing to cold war viewers' fears of nuclear attack and inferring that his opponent, Barry Goldwater, if elected, would lead the nation to realizing those fears. The shocking yet powerful ad was pulled after just one viewing. However, it has remained an historical icon of political fear appeals.

Scientific scholarship regarding fear's effects began during World War II, when the U.S. military first turned to mass media technology to keep U.S. soldiers from falling prey to enemy propaganda or their own vices and to indoctrinate them into military life. Yale scholar Carl Hovland and several other psychologists were hired by the War Department to assess the effects of the new mass-mediated military efforts, including films like the Why We Fight series, directed by Frank Capra of It's a Wonderful Life fame.

Two of the Yale scholars, Janis and Feshbach, published findings which showed that fear appeals are nonmonotonic (i.e., their effectiveness does not increase as the level of fear garnered from the audience via the appeal increases). Conversely, their study found that the level of anxiety produced by a fear appeal is actually indirectly proportional to its success in persuading the audience. In other words, a fear appeal which attempts to incite high levels of arousal through overly aggressive claims or imagery is actually less effective than one with mild or moderate fear appeals. Moreover, an overly strong appeal was found to actually bolster the audience member's defenses against the desired new attitude or behavior. A minimal to moderate fear appeal proved to yield the strongest persuasive force. Findings of the Janis and Feshbach study proved to be not only robust but enduring. One year after the initial treatments, differences remained in the attitude change reported in each of the treatment groups.

In addition to concerns that highly aggressive appeals may have negligible or even reverse effects, a second caveat for persuaders planning to utilize fear appeals is thus: Fear appeals are often short-lived. One study, in fact, found that participants' levels of fear decreased significantly within just 10 minutes of exposure to mildly or even moderately frightening message stimuli.

Further research has continued to address the question of strong versus mild fear appeals, and modern scholarship considers the initial findings somewhat naive, citing a need to investigate whether individual message and receiver variables impact the level of fear incited by a given appeal and the effects of that fear. For instance, studies show that fear appeals are less effective if the receiver feels helpless to act on limiting the harm threatened by the appeal, and they are more effective if they are attached to a message regarding specific steps the receiver might take to avoid or stop the harm from occurring.

A very small percentage of ads combine fear appeals with humorous ones (6%). One such ad warns of a Tyler, Texas, state senator who has "belly-landed" his private plane "not once, but twice." The ad claims, "If he can't get his wheels on the ground in Tyler, how's he gonna (sic) get his feet on the ground in Austin?" In light of findings regarding humor's power to aid recall and reduce negative reactions to strong attacks, the limitations of fear appeals might be circumvented via use of such mixed appeals.

Karla Hunter

See also Daisy Girl Ad; Negative Advertising

Further Readings

Hovland, C., Lumsdaine, A. A., & Sheffield, F. D. (1965). Experiments on mass communication. New York: John Wiley and Sons.

Hunter, K. (2000). (Not so) Divine comedy: A content analysis of humorous political ads. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, University of Oklahoma, Norman, OK.

Johnston, D. (1994). The art and science of persuasion. Madison, WI: Brown & Benchmark.

Kaid, L. L. (2004). Political advertising. In. L. L. Kaid (Ed.), Handbook of political communication research. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Kaid, L. L., & Johnston, A. (1991). Negative versus positive television advertising in U.S. presidential campaigns, 1960–1988. Journal of Communication, 41(3), 53–64.

Kern, M. (1989). 30-second politics: Political advertising in the eighties. New York: Praeger.
Severin, W., House, J., & Tankard, J. W., Jr. (1979). Communication theories: Origins, methods, uses. New York: Hastings.

Federal Communications Commission

See Communications Act of 1934

Federal Election Campaign Act

The Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (FECA) was the first serious attempt to regulate the raising and spending of money in U.S. federal elections. The ways in which it does so have important effects on political campaigns and their methods of communication with voters. Political speech is rarely directly regulated by FECA but, for the most part, is indirectly regulated by a combination of limits on the amounts of monetary or other contributions that lawfully can be made to federal candidates and parties, requirements that contributions and expenditures in campaigns for federal office be disclosed, and outright bans on certain corporate and union contributions, speech, and expenditures.

The FECA has been amended several times: in 1974 following the Watergate scandal involving the Nixon administration, in 1976 after several provisions were declared unconstitutional, and most recently in March, 2002, by the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (BCRA). The BCRA amendments went into effect immediately following the 2002 elections and have governed all federal elections since 2004. FECA's key elements include the following:

1. Disclosure of contributions and expenditures. FECA requires disclosure of amounts and sources of contributions to candidates and political committees and disclosure of independent expenditures by those making them. Reports of these contributions and their sources are filed with the Federal Election Commission, and they are publicly available over the Internet at www.fec.gov. The BCRA (2002) added new disclosure requirements concerning "electioneering communications."

2. Contribution limits for individuals. Specific limits on contributions were originally set in the 1974 amendments. Contribution limits were $1,000 per election (primary and general elections counted separately) to federal candidates by individuals, $20,000 per year on contributions to national political parties, and $5,000 per year to state and local parties. Effective with the BCRA amendments in 2002, the limits on contributions to candidates rose to $2,000 per election, and the limits are now indexed to inflation so they automatically will increase (e.g., to $2,300 in 2007–2008). Under the BCRA amendments, the limits on contributions increase to $25,000 per calendar year ($28,500 in 2007–2008) in the case of national parties and to $10,000 per year in the case of state, district, or local parties (this limit is not indexed to inflation). Aggregate contribution limits rose under BCRA from $25,000 per year to $95,000 per 2-year election cycle ($108,200 in 2007–2008), of which only $37,500 may be contributed to candidates (distinct from parties or political action committees) over the 2 years ($42,700 in 2007–2008).

3. Limits on contributions by political action committees (PACs). PACs (if multicandidate) are limited to contributions of $5,000 per election to candidates, and there are annual limits on contributions by PACs of $5,000 per year to other outside PACs and state and local parties (combined) and $15,000 annually to national parties. There is no annual aggregate limitation on PAC contributions. These limits are not indexed to inflation.

4. Expenditure limits for candidates. (Note: These were declared invalid by the U.S. Supreme Court and are not in effect.) FECA originally set limits on total candidate spending and on spending of candidate's personal funds. These rules were declared unconstitutional in Buckley (1976). Except in the case of candidates for president who accept public financing, candidates may spend unlimited amounts of money in their campaigns.

Candidates may spend unlimited amounts of personal funds. However, in BCRA (2002), it is provided (Sections 304 and 318) that Senate and House candidates running against candidates proposing to spend substantial amounts of personal funds will be allowed to receive contributions in excess of the contribution limits up to six times the normal limits and have limits on party "coordinated" expenditures removed. This permits candidates facing opponents who spend large amounts of personal funds to raise contributions in larger amounts than would normally be permitted. This so-called millionaires provision was challenged as unconstitutional in McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (2003), but the court did not decide the issue in that case.

5. Limits on expenditures for radio and television advertising by candidates. (Note: Not in effect.) These specific spending limits for media advertising were contained in the original 1971 law but were eliminated in the 1974 amendments before ever going into effect. The general expenditure limits which replaced them in the 1974 law were in effect until declared unconstitutional in Buckley (1976). They are no longer in force.

6. Limits on "independent" expenditures advocating or opposing election of a candidate. (Note: Not in force.) These were limited by FECA to $1,000. These were then declared unconstitutional in Buckley (1976) and are no longer in force. However, independent expenditures over $1,000 must be disclosed by filing reports with the Federal Election Commission.

7. Allowance of corporate and labor union PAC contributions. Other federal statues have banned direct contributions to political campaigns by corporations since 1907 and by labor unions since 1943. FECA allowed PACs to make such contributions in limited amounts. PACs are generally organized by employers (often but not always corporations or labor unions), or they may be "nonconnected" PACs. A corporate or union PAC may solicit contributions from its employees or members, which are then pooled and contributed to political candidates. These funds are not considered corporate or union funds (i.e., general treasury funds derived from profits or union dues) and do not violate the statutes prohibiting such contributions. Contributions to PACs by employees or union members are voluntary. FECA 1971 created the framework that allowed PACs to exist. Prior to FECA, there were in place (and still are) statutory bans on direct contributions to candidates for federal office by corporations and labor unions. Corporations and labor unions are also banned from making expenditures from corporate or union treasuries intended to influence federal elections: Both contributions and expenditures are banned. The 2002 BCRA amendments put in place rules governing "electioneering communications" to more precisely define when corporate or labor union communications not made through PACs are considered to influence federal elections and are thus prohibited. The rules on electioneering communications were upheld on their face in McConnell v. Federal Election Commission but found unconstitutional as applied to particular ads in Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc.

8. Federal Election Commission (FEC). The FEC was created by the FECA. It is the federal agency with responsibility for administering FECA, and the reports required by the FECA are filed with the FEC, which audits the reports and enforces the FECA.

9. Public financing of presidential election campaigns. FECA established a system of partial public funding of presidential campaigns and party conventions funded by a voluntary "tax check-off" system in which taxpayers may designate on their federal income tax returns that $3.00 (originally $1.00) of their tax liability should go to the presidential election campaign fund. Candidates who accept public funding in this system agree not to accept private contributions in the general election campaign and agree to limit their expenditures in the primary and general election campaigns to the amounts provided in FECA, as adjusted for inflation. In recent presidential campaigns, several major candidates have chosen not to accept public financing in the primary campaign because of the spending limits. These spending limits exceptionally were considered lawful by the U.S. Supreme Court because candidates voluntarily could choose whether or not to accept public funds and the limits on spending that go with them.

Clifford A. Jones

See also Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act; Buckley v. Valeo; Campaign Finance; McConnell v. Federal Election Commission

Further Readings

Bauer, R. B. (2003). More soft money, hard law (2nd ed.). Washington, DC: Perkins Coie LLP.

Corrado, A., Mann, T. E., Ortiz, D., & Potter, T. (2005). The new campaign finance sourcebook. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

Smith, B. A. (2003). Unfree speech: The folly of campaign finance reform. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Federal Election Commission

See Campaign Finance; Federal Election Campaign Act

Federal Trade Commission

The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) is an independent agency of the U.S. government charged by Congress with protecting Americans from unfair or deceptive business practices. The FTC is headed by five commissioners who serve 7-year terms. Although the president nominates commission members, they must be confirmed by the Senate. By law, no more than three commissioners may be from the same political party. The FTC is divided into three main bureaus: Consumer Protection, Competition, and Economics.

Through its Bureau of Consumer Protection, the FTC regulates product claims made in advertisements in newspapers, magazines, television, radio, direct mail, and Internet media. The FTC is particularly vigorous in its regulation of health claims. However, it has no responsibility for political advertising messages—those are regulated by the Federal Election Commission and the Federal Communications Commission.

The FTC also manages the National Do Not Call Registry, which protects U.S. consumers from unwanted telemarketing calls under the provisions of the Telemarketing Sales Rule (TSR). The TSR specifically omits calls from political organizations from its definition of telemarketing, however. Therefore, political organizations and pollsters may call even those homes on the Do Not Call Registry. A few bills in the House have sought to include "politically oriented recorded messages" among those calls prohibited by the TSR. However, those bills have not yet resulted in changes to the regulations.

Increasingly, there are also issues involving the FTC that relate to the mingling of commercial and political speech. When organizations engage in activities that involve the promotion of ideas or viewpoints that have political implications, even though advocated in a commercial context, the organization may find its communications subjected to a different type of scrutiny. This problem may be particularly acute for companies that develop integrated marketing communication strategies.

Colleen Connolly-Ahern

See also Campaign Finance; Communications Act of 1934; Federal Election Campaign Act

Further Readings

Fitzpatrick, K. R. (2005). The legal challenge of integrated marketing communication (IMC): Integrating commercial and political speech. Journal of Advertising, 34(4), 93–102.

Feminine Style in Communication

Scholars of political discourse argue that women have, because of a centuries-long relegation to the private sphere, developed a rhetorical style that tends to (a) be more personal in tone, (b) rely on personal experience, (c) be structured inductively, (d) invite audience participation, (e) address the audience as peers, and (f) identify with the audience's experience.

Male speech strategy, conversely, tends to (a) use deductive logic, (b) affirm expertise, (c) refer to expert authority, and (d) use impersonal examples that are not connected to audience experience.

A person's goal when using a "feminine" style of communication is to empower the listener to become effective or an agent of change. Further, the strategy is not exclusive to women and can be used by men. In addition, a more "masculine" style of speech may be used by women. In the past, female political speakers have often been observed utilizing the same approach as men. However, as more women move into higher office, a new appreciation of feminine rhetorical style has evolved. Obviously not all women and men communicate in the same way. However, due to cultural history, stylistic differences between women and men may have developed that are based on the differences between private and public communication.

It has been posited that women often face a "double bind" when running for office—if they portray the masculine qualities needed to convey strength and decisiveness, they appear "unfeminine"; yet if they do not display such qualities, they are thought to be too weak and unsuited for the tough job of politics. However, over the past 3 decades women have become a much larger component of the political landscape. Many researchers have concluded that the stereotypical gaps inherent in the electorate that are given to male and female candidates have decreased, except perhaps at the presidential level. The number of women being elected to local, state, and federal posts has steadily increased over these decades. Further, political communication scholars have noted that both female and male political speakers have controlled electorate gender expectations by using male and female rhetorical strategies during political discourse. Successful candidates of either gender utilize a balance of male and female communication strategies. Campaigning has evolved in a way that merges feminine and masculine styles, and both are apparent in many candidates as they deliver political speech. In recent elections, men and women often take issues and incorporate a more narrative style in order to explain those issues. The ability, for example, of either sex to use the more feminine style of story illustration and draw people in tends to serve candidates well.

Terry Robertson

See also Gender and Politics; Women Candidates, Advertising; Women Candidates, News Coverage

Further Readings

Bystrom, D., Banwart, M. C., Kaid, L. L., & Robertson, T. (2004). Gender and candidate communication: Videostyle, webstyle, newstyle. New York: Routledge.

Campbell, K. K. (1989). Man cannot speak for her: A critical study of early feminist rhetoric. New York: Greenwood Press.

Feminist Movement

The feminist movement refers to historically specific and culturally contextual political movements that seek justice for women. A concerted effort to address women's social and legal inequalities in 19th- and early 20th-century Europe and America is recognized as the "first wave" of the feminist movement. British women joined together to begin publishing the English Woman's Journal in 1858; the First International Women's Conference in Paris in 1892 established the word feminism as the belief in and advocacy of equal rights for women based on the idea of the equality of the sexes; and in the United States, feminism that emerged out of the abolitionist movement culminated in the suffrage movement that won a decades-long struggle for women's right to vote in 1920. This first wave of the feminist movement is characterized as "liberal" feminism, an activist movement dedicated to social and political equality.

After winning the right to vote, the U.S. feminist movement remained dormant with no significant political activism around women's subordination until the 1960s. A "second wave" of the feminist movement then rose out of the civil rights and anti-war movements, in which women, disillusioned with their second-class status even in an activist environment, began to organize to contend against discrimination. In this second wave, feminists pushed beyond the early quest for political rights to fight for greater equality across the board, for example, in education, the workplace, and at home. The National Organization of Women (NOW), the National Women's Political Caucus, and the Women's Equity Action League all were formed at that time. NOW's first president Betty Friedan wrote the groundbreaking book The Feminine Mystique in 1963, defining the "mystique" as the worthlessness women feel in roles that require them to be financially, intellectually, and emotionally dependent upon their husbands. The movement was not a unified one, with multiple "feminisms" emerging to join liberal feminism, including black feminism that recognizes the duality of racial and sexual oppression, radical feminism that rejects all feminine and all masculine gender roles, and Marxist/socialist feminism that is concerned with economic oppression. In Britain, the movement also had multiple focuses but was based more strongly in working-class socialism.

The "third wave" of the feminist movement refers to feminist sensibilities that evolved from the 1990s up to the present day. It has critiqued second-wave feminism for its lack of attention to the differences among women due to their age, gender, ethnicity, class, sexual orientation, religion, and level of education. The third-wave feminist movement reflects postmodern sensibilities; it rejects dogma and academia, celebrates diversity, welcomes ambiguities, negotiates contradictions, sees gender as performance rather than a fixed binary, has a broader political focus, and engages in social activism that often takes the form of music, art, or theater performance, new media Web logs, and e-zines.

Janis Teruggi Page

Further Readings

Living the Legacy: The Women's Rights Movement 1848–1998 Web site: http://www .legacy98.org/

Tong, R. (1998). Feminist thought: A more comprehensive introduction (2nd ed.). Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Feminist Theory

See Feminist Movement

Ferraro, Geraldine (1935–)

Geraldine Anne Ferraro is a Democratic politician who served as a member of the U.S. House of Representatives and was the first woman to be the vice-presidential nominee of a major political party. Ferraro received her undergraduate degree from Marymount Manhattan College and then her law degree from Fordham University School of Law in 1960. After raising three children, she worked at the Queens County district attorney's office where she started the Special Victims Bureau.

She was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1978 where she represented the 9th Congressional District of New York in Queens. She served for 6 years during which her voting record was generally considered liberal. She served as the secretary of the House Democratic Caucus and was chairwoman of the Platform Committee for the 1984 Democratic National Convention.

On July 12, 1984, Democratic presidential nominee Walter Mondale announced that Ferraro would serve as his running mate. Ferraro was selected for the position over Colorado Senator Gary Hart, San Antonio Mayor Henry Cisneros, and San Francisco Mayor Dianne Feinstein, to name a few. Mondale's selection of Ferraro was questioned by critics and supporters alike. It was unclear if the addition of Ferraro to the ticket would gain or lose votes for Mondale.

Mondale was well behind Reagan in the polls, and the addition of Ferraro did not improve his position in the campaign. As the only female to be on a major party presidential ticket, Ferraro is the only woman to participate in a presidential-level debate. She is widely considered to have performed well in the vice-presidential debate against George H. W. Bush in 1984. However, her campaign appearances and presentations were often subjected to female stereotyping by the media. Throughout the campaign, Ferraro's handling of campaign finances was under fire, and after the election, the House Ethics Committee officially criticized her mishandling of campaign finances. The Reagan/Bush ticket handily defeated the Mondale/Ferraro ticket.

After her unsuccessful bid for the vice presidency, Ferraro undertook other endeavors in her life. In 1985, she published her autobiography, Ferraro: My Story. In 1992, she ran for Democratic nomination for a New York Senate seat but did not win her party's nomination. President Bill Clinton appointed her to be an ambassador for the United States at the United Nations. From 1996 to 1998 she was the co-host of the CNN show Crossfire. In 1998, Ferraro ran again for the Senate. She took second place in the Democratic primary to eventual general election winner Charles Schumer.

Ferraro was diagnosed in 1998 with a form of blood cancer and has since become an active supporter of the Multiple Myeloma Research Foundation. She is a senior managing director of the Global Consulting Group, a corporate public relations firm. She is married to John Zaccaro, a real estate agent and Queens County native.

Abby Gail LeGrange

Further Readings

Braden, M. (1996). Women politicians and the media. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press.

Ferraro, G. A., & Franke, L. B. (1985). Ferraro: My story. New York: Bantam Books.

Shields, S. A., & MacDowell, K. A. (1987). "Appropriate" emotion in politics: Judgments of a televised debate. Journal of Communication, 37, 78–89.

Film and Politics

Since the invention of the motion picture at the turn of the 20th century, film has remained a popular and powerful medium that does much more than entertain collective, or individual, viewers. From early efforts, to modern-day productions, movies have had the ability to communicate many diverse, global political issues. Through genres such as comedy, science fiction, drama, melodrama, documentary, mock-umentary, and American actor James Stewart (1908–1997) clutches a wad of letters as British actor Claude Rains looks on, while standing on the floor of the U.S. Senate in a still from director Frank Capra's film Mr. Smith Goes to Washington.

Source: Getty Images.

blatant propaganda, film has communicated and influenced audiences about political issues, events, individuals, and entities. Popular film continues to inform and educate viewers about politics. From fictional retellings of real events, to the pure imagination of fictional scenarios, to documentaries, film proves to be an important channel through which audiences can explore past, present, and future political areas.

Arguably almost any feature-length film can be viewed, or interpreted, politically for multiple factors. However, certain films clearly engage with overt political content. Political cinema therefore can be narrowed somewhat to films that intentionally direct attention to manifest political content.

The 1900s

It is evident that during the advent of cinema for mass audiences in the 1900s, political content emerged as a popular subject matter. One early example is that of Georges Méliès's The Coronation of Edward VII (1902), which employed actors to impersonate and recreate the coronation in accurate detail in order to allow the average citizen the opportunity to feel as if they were witnessing the actual proceedings of the event.

The Early Years of Political Film

It was in the 1910s that feature-length films began to make their mark on the cultural landscape, and a focus on political issues became manifest. In what is considered to be the first major political film, D. W. Griffith's The Birth of a Nation (1915) offered a historical epic of the American civil war. This groundbreaking film was about 3 hours in length, and it proved to be a spectacle. However, the film has long been criticized for being racist and promoting white supremacy. In his other epic film, Intolerance (1916), Griffith continued to tackle sensitive political subject matter by presenting four stories about victims of prejudice. Griffith's work established him as a pioneer of the cinema.

Also notable is Charles Chaplin's The Immigrant (1917). Chaplin's work introduced the tramp character, and through the use of humor, Chaplin brought attention to the hardships of poverty and experiences of those who dealt with the obstacles of everyday existence.

The 1920s advanced the popularity of motion pictures in the United States and in Europe. Charles Chaplin's The Kid (1921) is considered by many film historians to be one of this director's finest accomplishments. The Kid again used the tramp character to portray the effects of poverty when a boy is abandoned by his mother. The mother changes her mind, rescues her child from Chaplin's tramp character, and the portrayal of these events offers a blend of drama and comedy that allow the auteur to poignantly comment on issues of class and power in society.

Dziga Vertov's Istoriya grazhdanskoy voyny [History of the Civil War] (1922) and Shagay, Sovet! [Forward, Soviet!] (1926) provide excellent examples of Russian propaganda from film's early years. In Sergei M. Eisenstein's landmark film, Battleship Potemkin (1925), events that provoked the Bolshevik Revolution were portrayed. This powerful film offered shocking images of a crew eating maggot-infested rations and other inhumanities that led the crew of the battleship Prince Potemkin to revolt. The subsequent footage was, and remains, shocking as it depicts an uprising by the citizens of Odessa, resulting in czarist troops' infamous, systematic slaughter of insurgents and bystanders that included the death of infants.

German director Fritz Lang's Metropolis (1927) is a fantastic visual journal of the contemporary, imaginary world of that time and of the future. This silent film is in keeping with portrayals of a class divide where some privileged individuals lived surreal, exotic lives above ground, while other unfortunate souls were forced to work in horrid conditions beneath the surface.

1930s

The 1930s provided a shift in political content in feature films. Themes of war, social injustice, corruption, and the emergence of Nazi propaganda became salient to the public of this time, and such issues were received well by consumers of film during this decade. For example, Lewis Milstone's classic war film All Quiet on the Western Front (1930) offered a depiction of young German soldiers who move from a state of idealism to despair in this biting adaptation of Erich Maria Remarque's anti-war novel.

Charles Chaplin's City Lights (1931) resurrected his tramp character in this film which depicts his trying to help a poor, blind flower girl get an eye operation. Mervyn LeRoy's I Am a Fugitive From a Chain Gang (1932) offers a glimpse into the horrid life of an unjustly imprisoned war veteran who escapes and is then betrayed by a corrupt woman.

Norman Taurog's The Phantom President (1932) provided audiences with a glimpse into political conspiracy and an ethical dilemma faced by a candidate who finds himself compromised by his political party. Unfortunately for the presidential hopes of banker T. K. Blair, his party feels he has too little flair for savoir faire.

Hans Steinhoff's Hitlerjunge Quex: Ein Film vom Opfergeist der deutschen Jugend [The German Youth Quex: A Film About the Victim Spirit of German Youth] (1933) offered a blatant Nazi propaganda film based on the life and death of Hitler Youth member Herbert Norkus who was killed while distributing flyers in a Communist neighborhood.

David Butler's The Littlest Rebel (1935) provided a view of the U.S. civil war era in an absurd story featuring a Confederate man's daughter, played by Shirley Temple, and the black loyal servant, played by Bill "Bojangles" Robinson. In this sentimental yet racist film, viewers are presented with a young girl and her black servant, who are able to plead a case of injustice directly to President Lincoln.

Leni Riefensthal's Triumph of the Will (1935) is one of the most infamous propaganda films of its time. This film documents the Third Reich's 1934 Nuremberg party rally and uses a mass cast, including Adolf Hitler, Heinrich Himmler, Joseph Goebbels, Rudolf Hess, Hermann Goering, and other top officials of the Reich. Through the use of actual footage of cheering crowds, marching military bands, banners lining Nuremberg's streets, and Hitler's actual speech, the film serves to demonstrate how it was possible for Germany to be swayed by Hitler's vision.

David O. Selznick's epic Gone With the Wind (1939) glorified the last days of the old South against the backdrop of the civil war. Through the use of the heroine, Scarlett O'Hara, her beloved Mammy, and other memorable characters such as Rhett Butler, Selznick presented a portrait of a glamorized plantation life that falls away due to the unstoppable Yankees.

Frank Capra's Mr. Smith Goes to Washington (1939) exemplifies the battle between idealism and corruption through the tale of dedicated new senator Jefferson Smith, played by James Stewart, who arrives in Washington to find he must fight for the people and the very essence of democracy.

1940s

The motion pictures of the 1940s took a distinct shift in focus, as the filmmakers of the time faced the unthinkable realities of the Holocaust and the significant changes brought about by World War II. Films of this decade also dealt with American domestic socioeconomic challenges and with corruption.

During this time, the U.S. Office of War Information sought the help of esteemed director Frank Capra to create a series of films to motivate the U.S. military and clarify why the United States had to be involved in World War II. This series was titled Why We Fight and was an exercise of great U.S. engagement in production of propaganda. These seven films served to engage viewers in a disturbing topic that ultimately proved to be effective with citizens, military members, and critics. These award-winning films by Capra were Prelude to War (1942); Divide and Conquer (1943); The Battle of Britain (1943); The Nazis Strike (1943); The Battle of Russia (1943); The Battle of China (1944); and War Comes to America (1945). Additionally, Capra's Know Your Enemy–Japan (1945) was one of the last films made for the U.S. government, and its goal was to educate the military about how to deal with the fighting strategy of the Japanese.

Of course, Hitler's propaganda machine also produced propaganda films in order to generate support for the Reich in Germany. Viet Harlan's Jud Süß [Sweet Jew] (1940) portrayed a Jewish businessman as a corrupt schemer who rises to political power, creates civil chaos, and rapes a Christian girl. Also noteworthy is the Nazi propaganda film The Resistance (1944), which portrayed the concentration camp as a type of utopian environment.

Numerous films of this decade focused on the atrocities of war in general, and many directly confronted the issue of Nazi Germany and Adolf Hitler. Examples of films that dealt with Hitler and the Third Reich as central topics include Frank Borzage's The Mortal Storm (1940); John Cromwell's So Ends Our Night (1941); Henry King's A Yank in the RAF (1941); Jean Renoir's This Land is Mine (1941); Fritz Lang's Hangmen Also Die (1941); and Alfred Hitchcock's Lifeboat (1944).

Many other U.S. and international productions of the 1940s dealt with World War II but were broader in scope. These classic war films include Alfred Hitchcock's Foreign Correspondent (1940); Lowell Mellett's documentary The World at War (1942); William Wyler's Best Years of Our Lives (1946); and Vittorio De Sica's Sciuscià [Shoeshine] (1946).

A number of motion pictures addressed the U.S. military action against Japan following the attack on Pearl Harbor. Examples of these films include David Miller's Flying Tigers! (1942); John Ford's documentary about the bombing of Pearl Harbor, December 7 (1943); Edward Ludwig's The Fighting Seabees (1944); Edward Dmytryk's Back to Bataan (1945); John Ford's They Were Expendable (1945); and Allan Dwan's Sands of Iwo Jima (1949).

John Ford's Grapes of Wrath (1940) dealt with the saga of American domestic troubles. In his adaptation of Steinbeck's novel, Ford portrayed the struggle of the Joad family as they leave Oklahoma in their futile search for a better life in California. Similarly, John Ford tackled the issue of how an American family attempts to deal with unionization and survival in the coal industry in How Green Was My Valley (1941).

Frank Capra's Meet John Doe (1941) addressed the issue of corruption and lies in the media with the creation of a fake story about a gullible man, played by Gary Cooper, threatening suicide by a jump from city hall. The effects of the bogus story spin out of control as the newspaper attempts to use public support to propel him to the highest level of political power. Elia Kazan's Gentleman's Agreement (1947) used the story of a reporter seeking to expose anti-Semitism as an opportunity to reinforce the message of the price of prejudice. Frank Capra's State of the Union (1948) addresses the issue of both corrupt journalism and politics in this film about moral compromise and the quest for power.

One of the earliest films to portray the use of political power was Orson Welles's Citizen Kane (1941). The famous film is based on the character of media mogul William Randolph Hearst and conveys strong and powerful emotions in the struggle for political power and personal gratifications. In 1998, the film was named by the American Film Institute as the greatest film of all time.

1950s

The films of the 1950s generally follow similar themes as those of the previous decade. The world was still attempting to process World War II. These included Lewis Milestone's Halls of Montezuma (1950); Anthony Mann's Strategic Air Command (1955); Robert Aldrich's Attack (1956); Dick Powell's The Enemy Below (1957); and Stanley Kubrick's Paths of Glory (1957).

Two noteworthy films by French Director Alain Resnais stand out among the rest in their treatment of the horrors of the Holocaust and the bombing of Hiroshima. Resnais's Nuit et Brouillard [Night and Fog] (1955) was a landmark documentary, a beautiful but horrific film about the Holocaust that uses 1955 footage of a stark, silent, and vacant Auschwitz and footage of this death camp during its containment of prisoners from 1944. The juxtaposition of the peaceful, quiet scenes compared with chaotic, graphic ones is haunting. Also, Hiroshima Mon Amour (1959), in which Alain Resnais presents a retelling of the effects of the bombing of Hiroshima primarily through the dialogue between a French woman and her male Japanese lover. Both are traumatized and their stories, along with the use of restrained but startling visuals, are horrific.

Political Unrest: The 1960s and 1970s

The films of the 1960s reflect major turning points in society that are partly depicted in the cinema. Themes of racism come to the forefront of such films, as do those of people grappling with multiple sociopolitical issues.

Daniel Petrie's A Raisin in the Sun (1961) depicts the plight of a black family who implode due to their inability to take part in the American dream because of racial intolerance. Likewise, Robert Mulligan's To Kill a Mockingbird (1962) addresses the issue of racism when an innocent black man is accused of raping a white woman. Despite the hopefulness this movie attempts to offer by providing a protagonist who seeks to prove the black man innocent in the form of a white attorney, played by Gregory Peck, the film shows a southern town torn apart because of excessive hate, prejudice, fear, and lies.

John Frankenheimer's The Manchurian Candidate (1962) captures the best and worst of communist paranoia in the story of a Korean War hero who has been brainwashed into an assassin.

One of the most notable films of this decade is Stanley Kubrick's Dr. Strangelove or: How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb (1964). This dark comedy about the shift into the nuclear phase of the strain between the United States and Russia is an exercise in paranoia. The story sets the stage for nuclear extension at the hands of a deranged American military leader.

Gillo Pontecorvo's La Battaglia di Algeri [The Battle of Algiers] (1965) is considered by many to be one of the most significant films in the history of political cinema. This film is shot in documentary style, and the graphic depiction of the events of the 1957 battle remains startling.

Stanley Kramer*'s Guess Who's Coming to Dinner* (1967) presents the fictional story of a family who think they are liberal until their daughter brings home a black fiancé. This groundbreaking film about interracial relationships was a landmark for its time and a strong look at prejudice in American society.

Mike Nichols's Catch 22 (1970) provides a dark comedy in which, in trying to escape from the reality of war, a military captain sets actions into motion that cause his friends to die. Robert Altman's *M*A*S*H* (1970) is a thinly veiled Vietnam War satire about doctors fighting military insanity and healing wounded soldiers during the Korean War.

The Candidate (1972) depicts Robert Redford as a young lawyer whose ideals are compromised as he becomes more and more caught up in a campaign to become a U.S. senator. This film provided a realistic and sometimes cynical look at the professionalization of the modern media campaign.

Alan J. Pakula's The Parallax View (1974) offers paranoia at is best with the story of the assassination of a leading U.S. senator and the discovery that all reporters who were present are now dying. This is the height of 1970s conspiracy-theory films.

Pakula's All the President's Men (1976) offers a version of how Washington Post reporters Woodward and Bernstein facilitated President Nixon's downfall by proving his connection to the Watergate scandal. Despite the clear outcome of this historically based film, it is a tense experience for the viewer.

1980s

The political films of the 1980s range from the absurd to the horrific. They reflect an uncertain time during the cold war when the world was changing, there was much excess, and nothing seemed clear.

Warren Beatty's Reds (1981) is an epic that depicts the experiences of a couple that gets caught up in the spirit, euphoria, and aftermath of Russia's 1917 Bolshevik Revolution.

Sidney Lumet's Power (1986) is the story of a powerful and successful nationwide U.S. political consultant who winds up in a mysterious situation that is beyond his control.

Many films of this decade focused their message on the effects of the Vietnam War. Oliver Stone's Platoon (1986) is based on the director's own experiences in Vietnam and emphasizes the loss of innocence that was the price of the war. John Irvin's Hamburger Hill (1987) is considered to be one of the most realistic, gruesome, and graphic anti-Vietnam War movies that shows the soldiers being reduced to just meat. Stanley Kubrick's Full Metal Jacket (1987) is arguably one of the most disturbing portrayals of war in film history. Set in Vietnam, the film challenges viewers to face horrific visuals and difficult questions about the cost of war. Oliver Stone's Born on the 4th of July (1989) offers the second in the director's Vietnam trilogy and examines what happens when a wounded, quadriplegic Marine returns from war and changes from fighter to protester.

1990s

The 1990s proved to be a sober time, and the films of this decade reflect this mood. Global issues such as the AIDS epidemic were front-and-center in movie messages, and other political concerns emerged rapidly as the Berlin wall fell and many changes in political leadership occurred worldwide.

Norman Rene's Longtime Companion (1990) is an ensemble film revolving around the lives of a group of gay men in 1980s New York City. It was the first film to deal with AIDS as its central issue. Similarly, Jonathan Demme's Philadelphia (1993) was a breakthrough film that examined the rights of a homosexual man with AIDS, played by Tom Hanks, when he sues his former law firm for wrongful termination. This was the first major-studio picture to tackle the topic of AIDS.

Oliver Stone's Heaven & Earth (1993) is the third film in his Vietnam trilogy that focuses on the ill-fated lives of a Vietnamese woman and the American soldier with whom she moves to the United States.

Tim Robbins's Dead Man Walking (1995) is a film that forces viewers to judge a convicted rapist and murderer and decide if he really deserves to die. This heavy-handed film appears blatantly anti-death penalty and features strong performances from Sean Penn and Susan Sarandon.

Alexander Payne's Citizen Ruth (1996) is a scathing satire about the abortion issue in the United States. The film does not take a side, and takes swipes at both the pro-lifers and pro-choicers, who attempt to manipulate the film's protagonist, played by Laura Dern, in order to advance their own political agendas.

Barry Levinson's Wag the Dog (1997) is an important film that explores the power of the mass media to shape public opinion—and the political players that are willing to wage a pseudo-war to cover a sex scandal. This film, viewed with the realities of President Clinton's sexual misconduct (and impeachment) is eerie in retrospect and may cause viewers to question what those in power are capable of in order to stay in power.

Michael Mann's The Insider (1999) delved into the corruption and cover-ups of the tobacco industry. It is the story of one man's fight to tell the truth while fighting the powerful industry that had the power to destroy him and silence the issue.

The Direction of Political Film in the 21st Century

The films of the early 2000s have run the gamut from those that look back to wars and political issues of the past to those that speculate about what the future has in store for the world based on the political mistakes and tragedies of the past and present. In a time of terrorist attacks and war, the cinema is changing as rapidly as society. The movies of the decade reflect a more diverse offering and are less focused on central themes in comparison with decades past. However, several trends are clear. One major shift is an increase in mainstream documentaries, a focus on corporate greed, an emphasis on cynicism and political corruption, and films that depict the fragility of the world—either due to environmental, medical, or manmade catastrophes.

Roger Donaldson's Thirteen Days (2000) is a tense fictional account of what occurred during the Kennedy administration at the height of the Cuban missile crisis. Steven Soderberg's Traffic (2000) challenges viewers to consider the plausibility of America winning its war on drugs. Rod Lurie's The Contender (2000) offers a fictional account of what happens when a female senator is nominated to be America's first female vice president. The film shows her under attack by the right wing and accused of sexual impropriety.

A major trend of the early 2000s was the significant number of documentaries. These documentaries dealt with a range of issues and are exemplified by films such as Bill Siegel and Sam Green's The Weather Underground (2002), which provides a look at an extremist group of freedom fighters in the 1960s who used violence to fight what they viewed as oppression. Jehane Noujaim's Control Room (2004) is a documentary that examines the operations of the Al Jazeera news network. Megan Mylan and Jon Shenk's The Lost Boys of Sudan (2003) follows two Sudanese orphan refugees throughout their intense journey from their native Africa to the United States. Robert Greenwald's Uncovered: The Whole Truth About the Iraq War (2003) is a controversial documentary that purportedly exposes the viewer to information from CIA, Pentagon, and Foreign Service experts that explain the real reasons for the U.S. government's launching the war on Iraq in 2003. Danny Schecther's WMD: Weapons of Mass Deception (2004) offers an evaluation of how mass media coverage shaped people's views of the Iraq War through their intense coverage from the war's inception through February 2004. Michael Moore's Fahrenheit 9/11 (2004) is a documentary that examines September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, details the reasons the United States has become a target for hatred and terrorism, and offers up a scathing criticism of President George W. Bush's response to the attacks—as well as making allegations that there are nefarious connections between the Bush family and the bin Ladens. Joseph Mealey and Michael Shoob's Bush's Brain (2004) assesses the power of Karl Rove and argues that this advisor has almost single-handedly shaped President George W. Bush's policies in the United States. Rachel Boynton's Our Brand Is Crisis (2005) follows a team of political consultants to Bolivia. The film examines the impact of such political campaign tactics during a short election period. Eugene Jarecki's Why We Fight (2005) is an even-handed documentary that was filmed during the Iraq War and attempts to thoroughly examine the American military and answer the question of why the United States goes to war. Davis Guggenheim's An Inconvenient Truth (2006) follows former Vice President Al Gore's fight for the environment. This PowerPoint presentation, interspersed with anecdotes about Gore's personal and professional life, is a troubling film that seeks to have viewers evaluate the devastating effects of global warming and what can be done to prevent imminent doom. Likewise, Chris Paine's environmentally focused documentary Who Killed the Electric Car? (2006) seeks to answer the question of why General Motors eliminated the GM EVI electric car—even shredding remaining ones and taking them from customers. Barbara Kopple's Shut Up and Sing (2006) is a documentary about free speech that examines a time when the band The Dixie Chicks were denigrated for criticizing President Bush at a London concert in 2003. Robert Greenwald's Iraq for Sale (2006) is a disturbing examination of how private contractors are gaining financially during the U.S. war with Iraq and evaluates who is paying the price for these corporations' benefit.

Jason Reitman's comedy Thank You for Smoking (2005) is an equal-opportunity offender, but its purpose is larger than just shock value. Some consider it a scathing commentary about lobbying, and others find it to be an interesting look inside the beltway and into the issue of the importance of free speech in a democratic society.

George Clooney's political drama Good Night and Good Luck (2005) tells the story of how CBS news anchor Edward R. Murrow battled the crusade against the threat of communism and its primary leader Senator Joseph McCarthy.

Film now has the power to reach many through insular markets via cable, satellite TV, DVD, Video on Demand, Pay Per View, televised broadcasts, and Internet technology. Film will continue to spread through new venues and new production techniques. Undoubtedly film will continue to evolve with technological advances and the increase in distribution to multiple global outlets.

Andrew Paul Williams

See also All the President's Men; Candidate, The; Citizen Kane

Further Readings

Cook, D. A. (1996). A history of narrative film. New York: W. W. Norton.

Keyishian, H. (2003). Screening politics: The politician in American movies, 1931–2001. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press.

Neve, B. (1992). Film and politics in America: A social tradition. New York: Routledge.

Nimmo, D., & Combs, J. (1990). Mediated political realities. New York: Longman.

Rosenbaum, J. (1997). Movies as politics. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Sachleben, M., & Yenerall, K. (2004). Seeing the big picture: Understanding politics through film and television. New York: Peter Lang.

Fireside Chats

Fireside chats were radio addresses (aired from 1933 to 1945) made famous by President Franklin D. Roosevelt. Although the chats were initially meant to garner Americans' support for Roosevelt's New Deal policies, they eventually became a source of hope and security for all Americans. The chats were influential in reformulating the American social imaginary from one of despair to one of hope during a time of multiple crises, including the Great Depression and World War II. Fireside chats reinforced the importance of broadcast media and the use of common, everyday language when addressing the American people.

Unlike U.S. presidents before him, Roosevelt understood the importance of radio as a medium and first used it to pressure the New York state legislature during his governorship from 1928 to 1932. Roosevelt understood the difference between speaking and radio and thus set up the "informal chats" to convey the success of his policies via radio to the American people. Fireside chats were constructed by a committee of Roosevelt's speech writers and advisors, but Roosevelt was an integral part of the process; he often wrote the conclusions and even changed some of the text while speaking on air. The chats were scheduled sparingly so as to maintain their importance among his other frequent radio and public addresses. They were delivered by Roosevelt from the White House, with him sitting behind a desk with multiple microphones from various radio networks. The actual number of fireside chats is disputed, with scholars counting between 27 and 31 of his radio addresses as this form of communication. The term fireside chat was not coined by the Roosevelt administration but, rather, by Harry Butcher of CBS, who used the words in a network press release before the second fireside chat on May 7, 1933.

Roosevelt used the chats initially to advocate for his New Deal policies to Americans. He had to address both the economic and spiritual crises that accompanied the Great Depression, and his chats were meant to bolster Americans' confidence in both the economic and political systems. Roosevelt's first fireside address came to the American people on March 12, 1933, as the president tried to explain the banking crisis and the government's response. One important characteristic of this form of communication was the simple language. Although Roosevelt's New Deal policies were often quite complex, his chats used common language to construct the radio address as an informal conversation between himself and the American public. The content of the chats moved from bolstering Roosevelt's New Deal policies to discussing various aspects of America's involvement in World War II. During a time filled with major crises, Roosevelt directly met Americans' call for leadership through his fireside chats, strengthening the nation's confidence.

Rebecca A. Kuehl

See also Radio Addresses; Roosevelt, Franklin D.

Further Readings

Buhite, R. D., & Levy, D. W. (Eds.). (1992). FDR's Fireside Chats. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

Ryfe, D. M. (1999). Franklin Roosevelt and the Fireside Chats. Journal of Communication, 49(4), 80–103.

First Amendment

The text of the First Amendment to the U.S. constitution on freedom of expression states: "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." Given that the First Amendment only outlines the broad contours of legal protection, American free speech jurisprudence derives more from the gloss provided by the U.S. Supreme Court than from the constitutional text. The judicial interpretations of the First Amendment center on whether the government violates freedom of expression as an individual right. Hence, private infringements on free speech do not raise constitutional issues.

The intrinsic and utilitarian values of freedom of speech and the press inform the Supreme Court in formulating various First Amendment doctrines and tests. The most famous theory of freedom of expression is the "marketplace of ideas" concept. It posits the notion that ideas should be allowed to compete against one another in an open process of human interaction in search of truth. Meanwhile, self-governance theory is based on a premise that freedom of speech is essential to a democracy. It has been influential to the judicial interpretation of the First Amendment on Americans' right to talk politics. The individual autonomy theory holds that the right to freedom of expression that people each—in the development of their own personalities—have the right to form their own beliefs and opinions and to express these beliefs and opinions.

American courts have developed several substantive standards for freedom of expression. The two-level approach—free versus unfree speech—is a good example. The categorical approach to free speech law has identified unprotected speech such as libel, obscenity, and "fighting words." The content-based classification of speech balances certain social interests with their competing individual interest in free expression.

The speech versus action dichotomy has been another way the Supreme Court demarcates on First Amendment rights. It protects pure speech but allows restriction of expressive conduct, also known as symbolic speech or "speech-plus," such as burning draft cards.

The hierarchy of freedom of protected speech has been established. For example, political speech is more highly valued than any other expression, and it requires a compelling interest to justify a government regulation. Less protected are commercial speech and sexual expression which is not necessarily obscene. Their First Amendment standards are met by a substantial or significant governmental interest.

Notwithstanding the judicial line-drawing on free and unfree speech, the First Amendment is generally averse to content discrimination. There is the strongest of presumptions against viewpoint-based restrictions, and they almost never survive a constitutional scrutiny. By contrast, content-neutral restrictions are more easily accepted.

The judicial distinction between prior restraint and subsequent punishment is derived from the differing impacts of the two on freedom of expression. Prior restraint creates a "freezing effect" on free speech, while subsequent punishment brings about a "chilling effect." The Supreme Court has erected so high a hurdle against prior restraints that the government rarely succeeds in using them as an effective weapon. However, the protection of press freedom against prior restraint is not absolute. Prior restraints can be imposed against national security–related information, obscene publications, or incitement to violence and the forcible overthrow of the government.

These days, gag orders against the news media in reporting court proceedings exemplify a more common type of prior restraint. Still they are presumed to be invalid unless they are narrowly tailored to prevent the administration of justice from being jeopardized or if less drastic alternatives are available.

In balancing freedom of speech with its conflicting societal interests, the Supreme Court established the "clear and present danger" test in 1919. The clear and present danger test was refined in a liberal way in *Brandenburg v. Ohi*o (1969). The incitement test of Brandenburg allows advocacy of the use of force or criminal violation unless it "is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action."

Historically, free speech jurisprudence in America arose from persecution of political dissidence, but such subversive expression is no longer at the center of First Amendment law. Rarely does the U.S. government seek to punish dissident criticism. The "preferred position" of political speech is illustrated in the Supreme Court's explicit repudiation of seditious libel in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964). The political speech doctrine applies to, among other types of expression, hate speech, group libel, and blasphemy.

The "actual malice" rule of American libel law is the keystone of the First Amendment commitment to protection of political speech. The unique constitutional rule, as formulated by the Sullivan court, bars public officials from recovering damages for false defamation relating to their official conduct if they cannot prove the defamatory statements were made with knowledge of their falsity or with reckless disregard for the truth. The actual malice rule now covers nonofficial public figures.

One of the more vociferous, high-profile First Amendment conflicts concerns whether freedom of the press, separate from freedom of speech, allows reporters a right to protect their confidential sources. The U.S. Supreme Court has rejected the journalist's source privilege. The press clause of the First Amendment makes no special exception for the news media as an institution; it is for everyone, whether they are journalists or not.

Currently, commercial speech—i.e., advertising—is more protected than ever. Since the mid-1970s, it has been viewed in the context of the public's right to access truthful information about legal products and services. Yet the First Amendment status of commercial speech is not the same as that of noncommercial speech about matters of public interest.

Obscenity remains wholly unprotected under the First Amendment, although its restrictive boundaries have been narrowed since the Supreme Court first ruled on obscenity law in 1957. The current obscenity test, which evolved from Miller v. California (1973), mandates proof that to prohibit a sexual material as obscenity, the work appeals to the "prurient" interest; that the word is sexually explicit in a patently offensive way; and that the work lacks "serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value."

Electronic media enjoy less First Amendment freedom than print media. Over-the-air broadcasting in particular is subject to a range of government regulations such as licensing, political candidate speech, and indecency. The physical scarcity of airwaves justifies the government's direct interference with broadcasting. The scarcity rationale for broadcasting law does not apply to cablecasting and Internet communication.

The First Amendment undoubtedly makes Americans' freedom of expression the object of envy in the rest of the world. This is especially the case with political expression, including hate speech. The uninhibited criticism of the government is a constitutional right in the United States. Ergo a free press is reality under the First Amendment. Nonetheless, the First Amendment does not guarantee an open press in the sense of access to the news media for the public as an affirmative right.

Kyu Ho Youm

See also Libel; Press Freedom

Further Readings

Cook, T. E. (Ed.). (2005). Freeing the presses: The First Amendment in action. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

Emerson, T. I. (1966). Toward a general theory of the First Amendment. New York: Random House.
Fiss, O. M. (1996). Liberalism divided: Freedom of speech and the many uses of state press. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
Lewis, A. L. (1991). Make no law: The Sullivan case and the First Amendment. New York: Random House.
Smolla, R. A. (1992). Free speech in an open society. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.
Smolla, R. A. (2006). Smolla and Nimmer on freedom of speech (2nd ed.). St. Paul, MN: West.
Sunstein, C. A. (1993). Democracy and the problem of free speech. New York: Free Press.

First Ladies, Political Communication of

The term first lady is given to the spouse of the president of the United States. The position, although unelected and unpaid, is considered to be a highly influential role with many expectations attached. An important part of any presidency, there are no "official assignments" for this position, though the first lady plays a prominent role in many areas. The position is so important to the presidency that there have been times in history when other women have served as social "stand-ins" when presidents were either divorced or widowed. For many Americans the first lady serves in a royal capacity, not unlike the queen in a monarchy.

The official use of the term first lady emerged in the early part of the 20th century. Some presidential spouses, such as Jackie Kennedy, tried to object to this name, with little success. Other terms such as first mate or first spouse were explored, but none had the same staying power as the term first lady. By the end of the 20th century, the role of the presidential spouse had evolved into a fully supported "Office of the First Lady" complete with a full staff and a suite of offices to help manage the daily demands of the position.

From the standpoint of political communication, scholarship about first ladies as a collective group is quite eclectic. Numerous biographies and autobiographies of various women who served in this position exist throughout American history, many based largely on anecdotal evidence, interviews, and press coverage. In recent years, more work has been done on the rhetorical or symbolic actions of first ladies and the influence they have on their husband's presidency. For example, much has been written about specific first ladies such as Eleanor Roosevelt and Hillary Clinton due to their public, activist roles. Hillary Clinton's unprecedented election as a senator from New York and her presidential bid are of significant interest to many political communication scholars.

Compilations written about first ladies have looked specifically at the rhetorical strategies used to enhance the symbolic nature and expectations of this role. Seen as the worst and best job in America, many first ladies have grappled with this role, especially given the tensions between supporting family and serving as the symbolic focus of the nation. First and foremost, presidential spouses claim their primary role is to take care of and support their husbands. Nancy Reagan's devotion to Ronald Reagan during his presidency, and in his declining days with Alzheimer's, is a common example of the strong support a first lady shows her husband. Several first ladies worked hard to guard access to their husbands so that people would not learn about illness or other troubles. Francis Cleveland, Edith Wilson, and Eleanor Roosevelt each made significant attempts to redirect the press from their husbands' ailments. Following the assassination attempt on her husband, Reagan went to great measures (even consulting an astrologist) to shield her husband from potential dangers. Many first ladies are also very protective of their children, keeping them from the public eye so they can grow up with little public scrutiny. Frances Cleveland, Edith Roosevelt, Jackie Kennedy, and Hillary Clinton all made significant efforts to shield their children from the press and the general public, attempting to help them live relatively normal lives.

A significant part of the first lady's role is to manage the social aspects of the presidency. White House restoration projects, special press and public tours, and overseeing presidential receptions are just a few of the social aspects of the position. First ladies are expected to be visible, to entertain dignitaries, and to be the public "face" of the White House. Great attention is paid to the clothes they wear, their hair styles, and their words. They are invited to present public speeches and are often seen at important ceremonies when their husbands cannot be present. Once their spouse is no longer in office, they continue to enact the symbolic role of their position with special appearances, political speeches, and written memoirs.

From the beginning of the U.S. presidency, women have been involved in helping their husbands run the nation. First ladies such as Martha Washington, Eleanor Roosevelt, and Rosalynn Carter would travel on behalf of their husbands, representing them on policy matters. White House personnel decisions have been attributed to the influence of presidential spouses. Gerald Ford admitted discussing the pardon of Richard Nixon with his wife, Betty. Jimmy Carter relied greatly on Rosalynn Carter's advice. Nancy Reagan was seen to have considerable interest in matters concerning the Soviet Union and who should work with her husband. Hillary Clinton's stand on affordable health care and her public support of her husband in difficult times are more examples of a strong influential spouse. These examples contribute to the perception some writers have of the first lady as "associate" or "co-president."

Presidential wives have focused on personal causes since the early part of the 20th century when Edith Wilson concentrated on improving housing in Washington, D.C.'s poorer neighborhoods. Reagan's anti-drug campaign, Barbara Bush's focus on the problem of illiteracy, and Laura Bush's reading campaign are all examples of adopted causes. In each situation, the clout of the first lady's position played an important role in gaining public attention about the issue.

As the presidential election evolves and a woman is one day elected, the role of the first spouse will also evolve to reflect shifting expectations. Successful, dual-career couples will have to carefully negotiate the demands of this position; those with families will have to reevaluate more traditional roles and create new opportunities. Regardless of who sits in this position, the important influence of this role will undoubtedly remain the same.

Janette Kenner Muir

See also Bush, Laura; Ford, Betty; Onassis, Jacqueline Kennedy; Reagan, Nancy; Roosevelt, Eleanor

Further Readings

Anthony, C. S. (2003). America's most influential first ladies. Minneapolis, MN: Oliver.

Caroli, B. B. (1995). First ladies (Extended ed.). New York: Oxford University Press.

Gould, L. (1996). American first ladies. New York: Garland.

Gutin, M. G. (1989). The president's partner: The first lady in the twentieth century. New York: Greenwood.

Wertheimer, M. M. (2004). Inventing a voice: The rhetoric of American first ladies of the twentieth century. New York: Rowman & Littlefield.

Fitzwater, Marlin

See Press Secretary, White House

Fleischer, Ari (1960–)

Lawrence Ari Fleischer was born in Pound Ridge, New York. Fleischer was the White House press secretary for George W. Bush from 2001 to 2003. A graduate of Middlebury College in Vermont in 1982 with a degree in political science, Fleischer's career as a press secretary began shortly thereafter for an unsuccessful Republican congressional candidate, Jon Fossil, in New York. Fleischer also worked as press secretary for New York Congressman Norman Lent.

After serving as the field director for the National Republican Congressional Committee from 1985 to 1988, he worked a short time for New York Congressman Joseph DioGuardi as press secretary. Fleischer worked as press secretary for New Mexico Senator Pete Domenici from 1989 to 1994. During U.S. President George H. W. Bush's 1992 reelection campaign, Fleischer served as deputy communications director.

After his stints as press secretary for various Republican candidates and representatives, Fleischer then served as spokesman for the House of Representatives Ways and Means Committee until 1999. In 1999, Fleischer worked on the presidential campaign of Elizabeth Dole until she dropped out. He then joined George W. Bush's presidential campaign as the primary spokesman and communications advisor. He became the press secretary after Bush won the election. The role of White House press secretary mainly entails delivering daily White House briefings and serving as the primary spokesperson for the president. He served during the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the 2001 anthrax attacks, the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and the 2003 space shuttle Columbia disaster. Fleischer announced his resignation in May 2003 and was replaced by Scott McClellan in July 2003.

Fleischer is a member of the board of directors for the Republican Jewish Coalition. He formed

Ari Fleischer Communications, his own consulting firm, after leaving the White House in 2003. He has also worked as a speaker since serving as White House press secretary and has written a book about his experiences, Taking Heat: The President, the Press, and My Years in the White House (2005).

Kristen D. Landreville

See also Press Secretary, White House

Further Readings

Fleischer, A. (2005). Taking heat: The president, the press, and my years in the White House. New York: HarperCollins.

Focus Groups

A focus group is a small number of individuals who share common interests in specific issues or events and who are asked to take part in an interactive discussion. Focus group study began in the late 1930s and became more popular in the 1950s with marketing studies. Aside from using interactive discussion groups, researchers also use telephone focus groups, Internet focus groups, and media focus groups depending on the particular purpose of the study or for the sake of convenience.

The purpose of a focus group is to understand how people with common interests feel and think about an issue, product, service, or idea and gather their comments within a comfortable and permissive environment facilitated by a skilled moderator. The intent of the focus group is to comprehend and determine the range of individuals' thoughts and preferences rather than to infer or generalize how respondents might answer. Focus groups are used for decision making, product and program development, primary and secondary research tools, client-satisfaction studies, policy making and testing, and understanding individual concerns.

Qualitative data from at least three different focus groups composed of homogenous participants can represent the subjective motivations and preferences of certain types of individuals. Focus groups are often identified as a nondirective method of study because they rely on asking open-ended questions and enforce no limit on respondents' answers. Good questions for a focus group study are controversial or provocative yet clear, short, one-dimensional, easy, and open-ended. An efficient strategy is to begin with easy, general questions, ask positive questions before negative questions, and conclude the testing with more specific questions.

The purpose and nature of the study determine the sample type and size of a focus group. Researchers often use purposeful sampling to better understand specific target audiences. The use of a homogenous group of individuals with sufficient variation is recommended. 10 to 12 people is an appropriate size for a commercial topic group, but 6 to 8 people are ideal for general social research.

Moderators should exhibit efficiency of time usage, encourage respondents to reply, and remain cautious when supplying participants with information about the topic or agenda. They are required to have an adequate background, listen to and be comfortable with others, avoid distraction, and know which questions are key to the proceedings.

Acquiring focus group data can be difficult because of both the spontaneity of respondents and the environment. Therefore, transcripts, recordings, notes, and memory-based tools are recommended to obtain significant information during group discussion. There are several strategies to analyzing such qualitative information, such as the popular long-table approach where researchers compare answers in terms of frequency, specificity, emotion, and extensiveness. Recently, researchers have used computers to catch key words and manage data.

Focus groups are a useful means of reflecting individuals' true emotions and behaviors toward subjective issues through a process of observing, listening, documenting, and reporting how respondents interpret what they think or like. However, due to the difficulty in obtaining subjective information from a small number of homogenous participants, focus groups exhibit lower external validity than other research methods. Thus, it is less certain that the opinions expressed in a focus group can be generalized to a larger population.

Hyun Jung Yun

Further Readings

Krueger, R. A. (2000). Focus groups: A practical guide for applied research. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Ford, Betty (1918–)

Betty Ford was the first lady of the United States from 1974 to 1976. As wife of the first unelected president, following the Watergate scandal and Richard Nixon's departure from the White House, Ford attempted to develop an open relationship with the press and the American public. Ford was known as a candid first lady who would engage in frank discussions about both political and personal issues. Ford's political activism challenged the American public's expectations for a first lady, and Ford is credited with helping expand the role of first lady to include political activities. During her short tenure as first lady, Ford actively advocated for breast cancer awareness, caused a public furor with an interview on 60 Minutes, and campaigned for the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA). After leaving the White House, Ford stayed in the public eye by founding the Betty Ford Clinic for treatment of substance abuse.

Ford's candidness with the American public extended to issues of personal health, including her need for (and later addiction to) painkillers and the radical mastectomy she received in 1974. Ford's diagnosis of breast cancer in 1974 served as a wake-up call for American women. Using the "white glove pulpit" available to first ladies, Ford made numerous speeches encouraging women to receive yearly mammograms and perform breast self-exams. In 1975, Ford was appointed an honorary chair of the American Cancer Society and was one of the 11 women named Time magazine's Man of the Year.

Ford's willingness to be candid with the American public reappeared during a controversial appearance on 60 Minutes in which Ford applauded the Roe v. Wade decision and took moderate stances on premarital sex and marijuana use. The appearance prompted thousands of Americans to write angry letters to the White House. Ford's public appearances for the ERA also caused controversy. By 1975, the ERA had been ratified by 34 states and needed only 4 more for passage. Although President Ford did not explicitly support the ERA, Betty Ford was a passionate advocate, arguing that at stake in the passage of the ERA was human freedom.

Ford's political activism as first lady garnered mixed reactions from the public. Although her popularity ratings were strong by 1976 and some of the campaign materials for President Ford's reelection campaign read "Betty Ford's husband for President in '76," some commentators suggest that Betty Ford's outspokenness—particularly on issues like the ERA—alienated President Ford's conservative constituents and cost Gerald Ford the presidential election.

Tasha N. Dubriwny

See also First Ladies, Political Communication of

Further Readings

Anthony, C. S. (1991). First ladies: Volume II. New York: William Morrow.

Ford, B., & Chase, C. (1978). The times of my life. New York: Harper & Row.

Wertheimer, M. M. (Ed.). (2004). Inventing a voice: The rhetoric of American first ladies of the twentieth century. New York: Rowman & Littlefield.

Ford, Gerald (1913–2006)

The 38th president of the United States, Gerald R. Ford was the only president to serve without having ever been elected president or vice president. Considered a man of ordinary talents, Ford nevertheless steered the country through two of the nation's most tumultuous crises during his two-and-a-half-year presidency—the end of the Vietnam War and the Watergate scandal. Ford's elevation to the presidency occurred as the result of another scandal involving President Richard M. Nixon's first vice president, Spiro T. Agnew, who resigned from office in 1973. Ford was picked by Nixon, whose presidency was already clouded by the ongoing Watergate investigation, to serve as vice president under the terms of the 25th Amendment.

A 1935 graduate of the University of Michigan, where he played center on the football team and was named most valuable player, Ford attended Yale Law School despite offers to play football professionally. He served with distinction during World War II and returned to Michigan after the war, winning election to the House of Representatives in 1948. In 1965, a group of insurgent House Republicans succeeded in deposing minority leader Charles A. Halleck and replacing him with Ford. Ford's reputation as a party stalwart, his congressional experience, and longtime friendship with Nixon led to the selection of Ford, who was easily confirmed by Congress for the vice presidential slot. Nixon's subsequent resignation in August 1974 found Ford in the oval office, declaring most famously on taking office that "Our long national nightmare is over." Ironically, Ford initially resisted using the phrase, considering it too harsh.

The Ford presidency struggled from the start. The country's initial enthusiasm diminished when, a month after taking office, Ford pardoned Nixon, sparing him, and the country, a protracted criminal investigation and trial. Ford never wavered in his belief that the pardon was justified but felt that it cost him the 1976 election, which he lost to Jimmy Carter. In addition, Ford had to grapple with the end of the Vietnam War, the seizure of the American merchant ship Mayaguez, instability in the Middle East, tensions with the Soviet Union, and domestic problems including high inflation, energy shortages, and public disillusionment with government.

Though an able politician, Ford lacked the communication skills generally regarded as necessary to presidential governance. Occasional verbal gaffes and displays of apparent physical clumsiness by the president, such as hitting his head on the doorway to Air Force One, stumbling down the plane's steps, and hitting spectators with an errant golf shot, led comedian Chevy Chase to lampoon Ford on the popular comedy program Saturday Night Live. In what soon became a national joke, Ford's physical clumsiness came to be seen by Americans as symptomatic of a politically clumsy, even inept, presidency, a verdict enforced when his policy initiatives foundered in the emboldened Democratic-controlled Congress, leaving him to rely on an unpopular defensive veto strategy. Ford used the veto 66 times in just over 2 years.

In his campaign against challenger Jimmy Carter, Ford engaged in a series of televised debates, the first presidential debates since the initial Kennedy-Nixon encounters in 1960. Ford was not particularly comfortable in the formal debate format. In the second debate on foreign policy matters, a Ford statement about Soviet dominance of Eastern Europe (or lack thereof) was ridiculed and strongly criticized by media and political observers.

Robert J. Spitzer

See also Ford, Betty; Nixon, Richard M.; Saturday Night Live; Watergate

Further Readings

Cannon, J. (1998). Time and chance. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan.

Greene, J. R. (1995). The presidency of Gerald R. Ford. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas.

FOUR THEORIES OF THE PRESS

Four Theories of the Press provided the primary theoretical framework for understanding variation in national media systems for a half century after its publication in 1956. Fred S. Siebert, Theodore Peterson, and Wilbur Schramm argued that a communication system reflects the structure of the society in which it operates, and that this relationship is determined by philosophical assumptions about human nature, state and society, knowledge and truth. They elaborated on four "concepts of what the press should be and do": the authoritarian, libertarian, social responsibility, and Soviet Communist theories.

The authoritarian theory, they argued, grew out of the absolutist states that prevailed in most of Europe when the printing press was first introduced. It was based on the premise that the maintenance of social order depended on centralized state authority and required state control or guidance of communications media. Historically, they argued, this has been the most common model of communication system. The libertarian theory developed in the United States and Britain based on the liberal philosophy expressed by writers such as John Milton and J. S. Mill. It was based on the premise that truth should be determined in the "marketplace of ideas," and that the state should stand aside to allow individuals freely to exchange ideas. The social responsibility theory was a modification of the libertarian theory, articulated in the United States and Britain in the years just before the publication of Four Theories. It was based on critiques of the libertarian theory which stressed inequality of access to media in the age of large-scale media industries and the possibility that propaganda could overwhelm the rationality on which enlightenment philosophy was based. The social responsibility theory advocated correcting the deficiencies of libertarianism through professionalism, self-regulation, and limited state intervention. The Soviet Communist theory was understood as a variation of the authoritarian theory, in which the state used the media as a tool of social transformation, rather than merely restricting it to prevent disruption of social order.

Since its publication, Four Theories has been widely used to classify the world's media systems, and many scholars have developed variants of its category system. It has played an important role in diffusing the liberal framework in media studies worldwide; the book was written at the height of the cold war and was intended to contribute to the victory of Western liberal conceptions of the press against Soviet Communist ones.

Four Theories has come under considerable criticism in recent years. It offered a highly ethnocentric view of world media systems, based almost entirely on the history of the British and U.S. press and the competition between these and the Soviet system. Its emphasis on the philosophical roots of "press theory" meant that it gave little attention to the actual structure and practice of media institutions and equally little to the structure of society in its political and economic dimensions. Although it pointed in the direction of comparative analysis of media systems, it was not actually based on such an analysis.

Daniel C. Hallin and Paolo Mancini

Further Readings

Nerone, J. C. (Ed.). (1995). Last rights: Revisiting four theories of the press. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Siebert, F. S., Peterson, T., & Schramm, W. (1956). Four theories of the press. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Fourth Estate, Media as

The "fourth estate" refers to the press as an additional power in society. In the enlightenment, French society was seen as three estates: the king and the clergy; the aristocrats; and the middle class and poor. In the American political system, the three primary estates correspond to the branches of government: executive, legislative, and judicial. In the U.S. version of the fourth estate, the press is as an additional branch, one that has a role to play in power-wielding. The function of the press is to provide information about the activities of government and other powerful entities.

In a remark about parliament, political philosopher Edmund Burke allegedly made reference to a fourth estate. In Burke's construction, the press was the most important element in society, presumably because it watched over the other three and provided an avenue of expression for ordinary citizens. This explanation refers to the watchdog role of the press. It means that the press guards the central values of democracy and checks abuses of power by the other estates. In this view, the press helps determine and frame the issues that are important to the public and thereby protects the public interest.

Historically, the rise of the fourth estate coincided with the expansion in the number of newspapers and the demise of licensing. It had its philosophical underpinnings in the enlightenment, which emphasized the quest of knowledge as a way to equality and economic security.

Thomas Carlyle, the 19th-century English author and man who made Burke's coinage legendary, said that being able to express one's self publicly was democracy in action. "Invent writing," he said, "and democracy is inevitable . . . Whoever can speak, speaking now to the whole nation, becomes a power, a branch of government, with inalienable weight in law-making, in all acts of authority." Thus, in Carlyle's estimation, journalists deliberated on public matters and had an impact on government as it contemplated, enacted, and enforced laws.

In the U.S. system, journalists have a vital interest in public affairs. Their vantage point, though, is generally taken to be over and against government. The press reveals to the public government activity, including those actions that might show lawmakers and enforcers in less than favorable light. This oppositional relationship often puts journalists and government officials at odds, and over time the latter tend to build structural barriers that make it more difficult for the former to perform their professional duties. The "nattering nabobs of negativism," as Vice President Spiro Agnew dubbed journalists, see their oppositional position as necessary in a democracy.

In the modern world, according to Walter Lippmann, most citizens do not have time to attend to every government activity. Therefore, the journalist is looked to as a proxy who attends board and committee meetings and then reports back to the public about what happens. In this sense, the fourth estate refers to journalists shining light on state authority and other powerful entities in society and defending the rights of individuals.

The concept of the fourth estate as watchdog, though, is not explicitly guaranteed by the Constitution, but rather by practice and subsequent law. The watchdog role of the press evolved over time and tends to be tolerated by government more than it is encouraged. It is a claim that the press has made for itself, coming out of the American revolution and developing with the abolitionist press and later the muckrakers. It is supported by principles like freedom of information and confidentiality—neither of which appears explicitly in the Constitution. The idea of the watchful eye that provides a check on the powerful in society dovetails with Joseph Pulitzer's class-based charge to the press that it ought to comfort the afflicted and afflict the comfortable. In this view, the press, in functioning as a spotlight on the powerful, serves ordinary citizens, not elites. Indeed, the crusading, progressive press of Pulitzer's era developed the investigative function of the press that led to pro-consumer legislation in the first decade of the 20th century. So strong has been the press claim for being a fourth entity in society that by 1975 Supreme Court Justice Potter Stuart observed that the First Amendment guaranteed the "institutional autonomy of the press." Stuart said the federal press clause provided for a "structural provision" that allowed for a "fourth institution outside the government to check the potential excesses of the other three branches."

In the United States, press freedom and independence have come from its commercial orientation. The watchdog function depends on the press maintaining its operation because of its financial health, not because of its dependency on party or governmental printing contracts. In the first century of the nation's existence, the party press was firmly in place, and the newspapers of the majority party were not critical of government. However, newspapers representing the minority party lambasted the government, and consumers were free to purchase the paper of either side. In the 19th century, newspapers, although essentially partisan in orientation, began to break away from the dependency model, relying for financial solvency more on advertising and less on subscriptions. Many of these papers made claims of independence, though those were hard to maintain during the antebellum and civil war period because the nation was in extreme political turmoil.

The movement toward a more independent press accelerated after the war, as publishers and editors realized that independence would not leave them in the vulnerable position that minority party journalists found themselves in the civil war. Hundreds of Democratic editors faced suppression in the war. Afterward, they realized that the path to independence was paved with commercial success. Thus, in the 20th century, the U.S. model became tied to independence and objectivity and a shrinking degree of partisan ties.

Many in journalism have championed free markets as a way to guarantee noninterference from the government. However, the problem with journalists yoking themselves to the free-market wagon is that news does not sell as well as entertainment, and thus contemporary newsgathering and presentation have less of a role in media operations. This dilutes the quality of information and raises questions about how well the public is informed—which, of course, is the basic function of the press in the watchdog theory. Some scholars have argued that the news media tend to replicate the positions of the government and other social elites because they are so dependent on sourcing within the upper echelons of society. Noam Chomsky, among others, says the news media act as manufacturers of consent to government positions. Chomsky sees journalists as de facto propagandists.

The term fourth estate is pervasive in American culture, and a journal titled Fourth Estate, put out by Ernest F. Birmingham and Frank L. Lancaster, covered the newspaper industry from 1894 to 1927.

David W. Bulla

See also Lippmann, Walter

Further Readings

Powe, L. A. (1992). The fourth estate and the constitution: Freedom of the press in America. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Ward, H. W. (1997). Mainstreams of American media history: A narrative and intellectual history. Needham Heights, MA: Allyn & Bacon.

Fox, Vicente (1942–)

Vicente Fox, born July 2, 1942, was the first Mexican president from an opposition party elected in 71 years. The candidate from the right-of-center National Action Party (PAN), he was elected president of Mexico on July 2, 2000, defeating Francisco Labastida of the Revolutionary Institutional Party (PRI), a party in power since 1929.

Fox studied business administration and management at Mexico City's Jesuit-run Ibero-American University and at Harvard, joining Coca-Cola in 1964 as a route supervisor. Over the next 15 years he climbed the corporate ladder to become Coca-Cola's president for Mexico and Central America.

He entered politics in the 1980s and was elected to Congress in 1988, ran for the post of governor of Guanajuato in 1991, and won by a landslide victory on his second attempt in 1995. He took leave of absence as governor in 1999 to run in the presidential elections.

In the electoral campaign of 2000, voters, for the first time in the modern history of the country, experienced an aggressive dispute between candidates through radio, television, and the press. Candidates criticized their opponents openly and received extensive coverage by newspapers and news programs on a daily basis, and access to all parties seemed for the first time completely balanced and fair. After 71 years of officialism and self-censorship in the vast majority of mass media, opposition candidates not only received coverage on radio and television stations, but they were able to criticize openly and harshly the current president of Mexico and the candidate of the ruling party. Vicente Fox participated in comedy shows and sketches, tolerating the irreverence of the anchors and actors and the frivolity of the content in order to reach important segments of the public not reached by the news media. During the Fox campaign, fierce criticism against the official contender, populist acts, photo opportunities, and sound bytes were the rule.

Out of a total of six presidential candidates, Fox was the one using more aggressive and innovative political ads, including a significant number of negative ones. Taking into account the historical context where private and public television stations had never transmitted ads from the opposition either praising candidates or criticizing the ruling party or current administrations, numerous ads attacking the PRI's candidate as belonging to a corrupt party monopolizing power for 71 years, or ads praising the personal qualities of Fox, surprised and impacted potential voters.

His administration started on December 1, 2000, and lasted until November 30, 2006. Despite his clear victory over his rivals, his party did not get the majority in Congress, and he had to rule the country with the opposition of both the lower and upper houses. During the whole time of his administration Fox continued using marketing tactics like surveys, focus groups, and thousands of spots promoting his image and his administration's achievements.

José Carlos Lozano

Further Readings

Fox, V. (1999). Vicente Fox a Los Pinos [Vicente Fox goes to Los Pinos]. Mexico, D.F.: Océano.

Lozano, J. C. (2005). Political advertising in Mexico. In L. L. Kaid & C. Holtz-Bacha (Eds.), The SAGE Handbook of political advertising (pp. 259–267). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Fox News

The Fox News network is a cable news channel. Located in the United States (New York), Fox News is owned by Rupert Murdoch's News Corporation media conglomerate. Fox News began airing news programming in 1996. The network is headed by Roger Ailes, a former political media consultant.

With up to 15 hours of live programming per day, Fox News has climbed steadily in the ratings and is now the top-rated cable news channel, ahead of its older competitor, CNN. Among the most popular programs on Fox news are The O'Reilly Factor (featuring Bill O'Reilly) and Hannity & Colmes, which are the two highest rated cable shows. The channel's overall viewship has had some ups and downs over the past few years, but Fox continues to draw more viewers than any other network news program, including CNN, ABC, CBS, NBC, and MSNBC.

Fox prides itself on its motto "fair and balanced" and other proclamations of its objectvity and intent such as "we report, you decide" and "we put the world in context." One innovation attributed to Fox was the creation of the "Fox News Alert," which is designed to interrupt other programming to highlight specific current news events.

Almost from its beginning Fox has faced accusations of conservative bias. Although the network and its owner Rupert Murdoch continually deny any suggestion of bias, other journalists and reporters perceive Fox as favoring a Republican viewpoint. One attempt to document the charges comes in a documentary by Robert Greenwald called Outfoxed: Rupert Murdoch's War on Journalism. The documentary is critical of Murdoch's media empire and suggests it has been used to convey his personal views at the expense of neutrality and objectivity. The documentary maintains that employees are required to espouse the conservative viewpoint or lose their jobs.

Fox, like other news outlets, also maintains a Web site. On the site at www.foxnews.com, the network provides videos, Web logs, and special programs by Fox personalities like O'Reilly, Hannity and Colmes, Brit Hume, Greta Van Susteren, and John Gibson.

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Ailes, Roger; CNN (Cable News Network); O'Reilly, Bill

Further Readings

Collier, S. (2004). Crazy like a fox: The inside story of how Fox News beat CNN. New York: Portfolio.

Hickey, N. (1998, March/April). Is Fox News fair? Columbia Journalism Review, pp. 30–35.

Morris, J. S. (2005). The Fox News factor. The Harvard International Journal of Press/Politics, 10(3), 56–79.

Outfoxed: Rupert Murdoch's war on journalism Web site: http://www.outfoxed.org

Framing

Most scholars of political communication probably agree on one thing: There is not a widely accepted definition of framing in the field of political communication. Since the 1980s, researchers have offered a variety of perspectives on framing that all differ with respect to their underlying assumptions including the way they conceptually define and empirically observe frames and the framing process. This entry provides the conceptual definitions relevant to the framing model, the theoretical assumptions underlying the idea of framing, and the important implications for framing research in the field of political communication.

Conceptual Definitions and Assumptions of Framing

Scheufele has classified framing research by grouping studies, based on their level of analysis and the specific process of framing they examined, making important differentiation between media frames and audience frames.

Media Frames

Frames at the media level act as "central organizing ideas or story lines" which give meaning and perspective to events or happenings. Embedded within news coverage, such ideas provide ways of interpreting and structuring meaning. Journalists employ frames as important translation devices that serve to make their jobs easier. In other words, frames allow reporters to reduce relatively complex issues, such as the war in Iraq or global climate change, into a format that conforms to the constraints of their medium but that also allows audiences to easily integrate the news story into their existing cognitive schema.

Media frames both shape and reflect the policy process. Rarely is a political decision reached without consideration of how it will be defined in the press. Recognizing the importance of the news media, political actors engage in the "frame-building" process, investing heavily in supplying packaged news items and story information to journalists. By framing an emerging issue early and strategically in the news, political operatives can impact the "scope of participation," determining the policy venue where an issue is decided, by whom, and with what outcomes. Early definitional victories can have lasting and powerful feedback effects, insulating future news coverage from rival framing interpretations that might challenge the status quo.

Audience Frames

Media frames work as organizing themes or ideas because they play to individual-level interpretive schema among audiences. These schemas are tools for information processing that allow any individual—whether an average citizen, journalist, or policymaker—to categorize new information quickly and efficiently, based on how that information is defined or described by the media. Framing research has often used the metaphorical term audience frame to describe these schemas, seeing them as mental classifications for individual information processing.

Two types of frames of reference can be used to interpret and process information: global and long-term "worldviews" on the one hand and short-term issue-related frames of reference on the other hand. Erving Goffman's idea of frames of reference refers to more long-term, socialized schemas that are often shared in societies or at least within certain groups in societies. In the U.S. context, examples might include Evangelical

Christian identity, or alternatively, secular liberal orientations. But in addition to these more long-term and socially shared schemas, there are also short-term, issue-related frames of reference that are learned from mass media and that can have a significant impact on organizing incoming information and on drawing inferences from that information. Examples might include the strongly held view that people fail in life because they are lazy, or alternatively, that unfortunate personal circumstance is not the result of individual flaws but the product of a system that stacks the deck against success for a particular group.

The Interplay of Media and Audience Frames

The applicability model of framing offered by Price and Tewksbury provides a theoretical explanation of how media frames and audience frames interact to influence individual perceptions and attitudes. They argue that frames work only if they are applicable to a specific interpretive schema. These interpretive schemas can be pre-existing ones or worldviews that are acquired through socialization processes or other types of social learning. But they can also be part of the message itself. For example, a news message may suggest a connection between tax policy and unemployment rates. The news message may suggest that the best way to think about whether higher or lower taxes are desirable is through a consideration of whether one wants higher or lower unemployment. Thus, the message has said that considerations about unemployment are applicable to questions about taxes.

The applicability model, therefore, implies that when audience members do not have an interpretive schema available to them in memory, and the schema is not provided in a news story, a frame that applies the construct in a message will not be effective. Framing effects therefore vary in strength as a partial function of the fit between the schemas a frame suggests should be applied to an issue and either the presence of those frames in an audience member's mind or the content of the message itself.

Theoretical Explanations of Framing

The applicability model is consistent with the two larger disciplinary contexts within which researchers commonly examine framing: sociological approaches and psychological approaches.

Psychological Approaches

Work in this area of framing research is often traced back to Daniel Kahneman and Amos Tversky's notions of bounded rationality, more broadly, and prospect theory, in particular. In 2002, Kahneman was awarded the Nobel Prize for his contributions to this collaborative effort, and in a summary of his acceptance speech he nicely summed up the basic premise of prospect theory as "perception is reference-dependent." The idea of reference dependency assumes that a given piece of information will be interpreted differently, depending on which interpretive schema an individual applies. More importantly, however, different interpretive schemas can be invoked by framing the same message differently. This makes it clear that context can determine meaning and interpretation. Although his experimental work focuses mostly on the impact of framing on economic and risk-related choices, the implications for communication are obvious.

The debate in the United States over embryonic stem cell research presents a useful example. Over the past 5 years, patient advocates, politicians, and scientists have delivered a focused message in news coverage and political advertising, employing "social progress" and "economic competitiveness" frames to argue that the research "offers hope for millions of Americans," whereas limits on federal or state dollars would catalyze a "brain drain" of top scientific talent. This successful frame-building campaign has helped to drive overall public support for funding from the high 40% range in 2001 to the high 50% range as of late 2006. However, opponents of increased government funding continue to frame the debate around the moral implications of research, and, as of 2006, a strong majority of social conservatives remain opposed to research. The lesson from this example is that powerful "perceptual screens," in this case the schema of social conservatism, can help filter out even dominant and positive media frames about stem cell research. On this scientifically complex and morally uncertain issue, public perception is heavily reference dependent.

Sociological Approaches

Work in this area is often traced to Erving Goffman's work on frames of reference, which served as the foundation for William Gamson and his colleagues' "social constructivist" approach to framing research. According to this social constructivist view, in order to make sense of political issues, citizens use as resources the frames available in media coverage but integrate these packages with the frames forged by way of personal experience or conversations with others. Media frames might help set the terms of the debate among citizens, but rarely, if ever, do they exclusively determine public opinion. Instead, as part of a "frame contest," one interpretative package might gain influence because it resonates with popular culture or a series of events, fits with media routines or practices, and/or is heavily sponsored by elites.

According to this approach, because frames of reference are socially negotiated by citizens, framing cannot be studied within an experimental lab as an individual-level cognitive "effect" compared across contrived conditions. Rather the process of framing should be observed in the "real world" by tracking the careers of certain frames in media coverage and by examining via focus groups how these interpretative packages are used and made sense of in conversations.

To test the assumptions of the sociological approach, in a recent study Vincent Price and his colleagues introduced an innovative "constructionist" methodology, recruiting a representative sample of the U.S. population to participate in 50 discussion groups that interacted online. Categorized by self-reported ideology into homogenously conservative, homogenously liberal, and ideologically diverse groups, participants were asked to debate within Internet forums the topic of gay marriage. Across groups the issue was framed for discussion as either "homosexual marriage/granting special rights," or as "gay civil unions/granting equal rights." Although the two framing manipulations shaped the content and tone of discussion across groups, neither framing condition led to significant opinion change. Based on their results, Price and his colleagues conclude that psychological approaches using laboratory experimental designs may overstate media effects on public attitudes.

Current Issues in Framing Research

Across the framing literature, several core questions and issues remain unresolved.

Levels of Analysis Matter

The term framing has been used almost interchangeably to describe individual-level media effects, macro-level influences on news content, and other related processes. At least four separate processes involving framing at different levels of analysis have been identified.

The first of these processes is frame building. Similar to agenda building, frame building refers to the intrinsic and extrinsic influences on the frames used in news coverage. These factors include the personal predispositions of journalists, organizational routines and pressures, the efforts by outside groups to promote certain frames, the impact of other parallel issues or events, and the type of policy arena where decision making or conflict might take place.

Frame setting, the second process, refers to the process of frame transfer from media outlets to audiences. Some communication researchers have suggested that this frame setting effect is conceptually similar to the transfer of salience hypothesized in the agenda-setting model. Recent research, however, has shown that the two processes rely on distinctly different theoretical premises and cognitive processes.

Most framing research in political communication has focused on a third process: individual-level outcomes of framing. These individual-level outcomes include attributions of responsibility, support for various policy proposals, and citizen competence. Unfortunately, despite making important contributions in describing effects of media framing on behavioral, attitudinal, or cognitive outcomes, most of these studies have not provided systematic explanations as to why and how these two variables are linked to one another. The notion of applicability effects outlined earlier provides a first step in this direction.

The last process related to framing that political communication scholars have explored is the idea of journalists themselves as audiences for frames. Without directly referring to the idea of framing, it has been suggested that, similar to "regular" audiences, journalists are indeed susceptible to frames set by news media. For example, one study demonstrated how news coverage of isolated crimes in a community was framed as a "crime wave against the elderly" by initially a small number of local media and how that frame was soon picked up by other journalists and spread across other news outlets and communities. Fishman labels this phenomenon a "news wave." In more recent work, Entman has explored this "journalists-as-audience" process in coverage of foreign policy conflicts.

New Issue, Same Frames

A second problem the field of political communication is beginning to struggle with relates to consistency and validity in framing research. With each new study or each new topic examined, researchers have a tendency to "reinvent the wheel" in identifying and labeling the frames that exist. Yet based on previous studies, within specific policy domains, a deductively derived set of frames might apply. For example, previous studies describe a set of frames that reoccur across science-related policy debates. Originally identified in Gamson and Modigliani's classic study of nuclear energy, a similar typology of frames has been further developed in studies of biotechnology in Europe and the United States. Specifically, in the early years of development, a new discovery or emerging technology is likely to be heavily promoted by way of "social progress" and "economic development" interpretations. Only later does the issue grow controversial as new frames focus on dimensions of "ethics and morality," "public accountability," or a "Pandora's box" of unknown risks and potential catastrophe. As these interpretations ebb and flow in prominence within the policy and media system, they activate differential perceptions across publics, depending on the schema held by those audiences.

Dietram A. Scheufele and Matthew C. Nisbet

See also Agenda Setting; Presentation of Self in Everyday Life, The

Further Readings

Druckman, J. N. (2001). The implications of framing effects for citizen competence. Political Behavior, 23(3), 225–256.

Entman, R. M. (1993). Framing: Towards clarification of a fractured paradigm. Journal of Communication, 43, 51–58.

Entman, R. M. (2004). Projections of power. Framing news, public opinion, and U.S. foreign policy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Fishman, M. (1980). Manufacturing the news. Austin: University of Texas Press.

Gamson, W. A. (1992) Talking politics. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Gamson, W. A., & Modigliani, A. (1989). Media discourse and public opinion on nuclear power: A constructionist approach. American Journal of Sociology, 95, 1–37.

Goffman, E. (1974). Frame analysis: An essay on the organization of experience. New York: Harper & Row.

Iyengar, S. (1991). Is anyone responsible? How television frames political issues. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Kahneman, D. (2003). Maps of bounded rationality: A perspective on intuitive judgment and choice. In T. Frängsmyr (Ed.), Les Prix Nobel: The Nobel Prizes 2002 (pp. 449–489). Stockholm, Sweden: Nobel Foundation.

Kahneman, D., & Tversky, A. (1979). Prospect theory—Analysis of decision under risk. Econometrica, 47(2), 263–291.

Nisbet, M. C. (2005). The competition for worldviews: Values, information, and public support for stem cell research. International Journal of Public Opinion Research, 17(1), 90–112.

Pan, Z., & Kosicki, G. M. (1993). Framing analysis: An approach to news discourse. Political Communication, 10, 55–75.

Price, V., & Tewksbury, D. (1997). News values and public opinion: A theoretical account of media priming and framing. In G. A. Barett & F. J. Boster (Eds.), Progress in communication sciences: Advances in persuasion (Vol. 13, pp. 173–212). Greenwich, CT: Ablex.

Scheufele, D. A. (1999). Framing as a theory of media effects. Journal of Communication, 49(1), 103–122.

Scheufele, D. A. (2000). Agenda-setting, priming, and framing revisited: Another look at cognitive effects of political communication. Mass Communication & Society, 3(2&3), 297–316.

Scheufele, D. A., & Tewksbury, D. (2007). Framing, agenda-setting, and priming: The evolution of three media effects models. Journal of Communication, 57(1), 9–20.

Franken, Al (1951–)

Al Franken is a political commentator, writer, performer, and radio host who is well known for his support of liberal ideologies. Born Alan Stuart Franken in New York City, Franken was raised in St. Louis Park, Minnesota, and graduated cum laude from Harvard in 1973 with a Bachelor of Arts in government. While engaging political and social issues as one of the original writers of the sketch comedy program Saturday Night Live (in which he also performed) and the short-lived NBC comedy series Lateline, some of his most discussed political works include his comedy-laced writings and public statements.

Franken has written five bestselling books, with three of them hitting number one on The New York Times bestseller list. Fox News sued Franken over the title of his 2004 volume, Lies and the Lying Liars Who Tell Them: A Fair and Balanced Look at the Right, claiming that his title infringed upon their trademark. A federal judge threw the case out of court, citing Political satirist Al Franken speaks during a news conference at Air America Radio studios August 25, 2004, in New York City. Franken urged New Yorkers and Americans across the country who are opposed to the Bush presidency to open their windows and shout the moment the president takes the stage in New York to deliver his address to the National Republican Convention. Dubbed the "Great American Shout-Out," Franken urged New Yorkers to yell "Fuggedaboutit," a play on the phrase "Forget about it." Al Franken announced his candidacy for the U.S. Senate in 2007.

Source: Getty Images.

Fox's charges as "wholly without merit." Franken's books generally attack conservative political figures and issues and have generated responses from a variety of conservative pundits.

Franken also employs radio and Internet outlets to air his political views. In 2004 he agreed to host a radio show on the new Air America Radio, a radio network dedicated to liberal issues. Initially his program was called The O'Franken Factor (a parody of Fox News commentator Bill O'Reilly's program) but later changed to The Al Franken Show. In 2005 he began maintaining a Web log as part of the progressive Huffington Post Web site.

In addition to a prolific writing, performing, and radio career, Franken was selected to serve as a fellow with Harvard's Kennedy School of Government at the Joan Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics, and Public Policy. Franken brought controversy to this position when in 2003 he used the Shorenstein Center letterhead to write a satirical letter to Attorney General John Ashcroft requesting information of a sexual nature. After Ashcroft publicly criticized the letter, Franken wrote a letter of apology to Ashcroft and extended the apology to other conservative political figures mentioned in the letter and to the Shorenstein Center.

Franken has actively been part of many political rallies, most notably a presidential election rally in 2004 where a man loudly heckled speaker Howard Dean and, in the process, somehow became involved in a physical altercation with Franken. Although many claim Franken acted in self-defense, the move solicited criticism from Republican pundits who shamed Franken for physically attacking someone who was exercising his free speech. The public seemed to quickly forget the issue. In February 2007 Franken announced his candidacy for the U.S. Senate as a Democrat from his home state of Minnesota.

Jimmie Manning

See also Fox News; Humor in Politics; Saturday Night Live

Further Readings

Franken, A. (2005). The truth (with jokes). New York: Plume.

Thompson, S. (2005). Al Franken. The Progressive, 69(9), 37–40.

Free Airtime

The concept of free airtime generally refers to a plan or process of making commercial airtime available to political candidates at no charge. Application ideas have varied from public forums and debates to political commercials, with proponents citing the public interest standard for broadcasters as the impetus for the free airtime.

Free airtime is usually linked to campaign finance reform. Advocates argue that commercial broadcast time is one of the largest expenditures in an election campaign; free airtime would decrease campaign expenditures by requiring local broadcasters—through either Federal Communications Commission rulings or congressional law—to provide free advertising time for federal candidates for office. The free time is usually proposed in conjunction with having candidates meet spending limits or other criteria. Proponents maintain that because television is the biggest campaigning expense, spending limits can only be met if television is provided. The cost to the stations is justified through the "public interest" clause in the Communications Act of 1934. This clause requires stations to operate in the "public interest" in order to maintain their licenses. Public interest as a concept, however, is not defined. Opponents to free TV claim serious First Amendment and Fifth Amendment concerns and express doubt that the bills offered to date would bring any serious reform.

The National Association of Broadcasters (NAB) has been an outspoken opponent of the free airtime concept, citing an undue economic burden on broadcast stations. NAB argues that broadcasters provide many on-air opportunities for candidates in the form of debates and public forums—and that candidates are often reluctant to use that free airtime. Instead, candidates want commercial time that they can control; NAB argues that commercials are not in the public's best interest.

On the other hand, grassroots organizations such as Common Cause have been long-time advocates of the free airtime concept. Groups such as Common Cause argue that the spectrum used for free by broadcasters really belongs to the public and should be used to help create a more transparent election process. They advocate the use of free airtime as a way to cut down on campaign expenditures.

The Federal Communications Commission has, to date, declined to address the free airtime concept. Outspoken commissioners have stated that free airtime is an issue for Congress; because free airtime would be the equivalent of a tax on broadcasters, a bill would have to be written and passed before the Federal Communications Commission would enforce the concept.

The History of the Free Airtime Concept

President John Kennedy has often been credited with originating the idea of free airtime in 1962. Elaborate plans were devised over the next few years, mostly based on party size and previous vote acquisition, but none was ever implemented.

In 1996 the Free TV for Straight Talk Coalition (headed by journalists Paul Taylor and Walter Cronkite) advocated free airtime for presidential candidates. Networks reluctantly agreed during the fall campaign to provide varying lengths of free time slots for candidates Clinton and Dole. These spots, which varied from 1 minute to 2½ minutes, were aired on CBS, NBC, FOX, CNN, PBS, and NPR (radio slots). This experimental effort was not deemed particularly successful, and many voters were unaware of the free time spots.

President Bill Clinton brought the concept back to the forefront in 1997 as part of his national debate on campaign reform. Since that time, numerous free airtime bills have been introduced in Congress, including the Presidential Election Issues Access Act (1997), the Free Political Broadcasting Act of 1985, the Campaign Broadcast Discount Act of 1988, and the original version of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 1997 (also known as McCain-Feingold).

The original Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 1997 would have eliminated "soft money" (monies given to the party or to a political action committee but not to be used for a specific candidate), established spending limits, and for those who follow the bill's guidelines, provided free television advertising time. Candidates would have had to choose whether or not to comply with the bill, but the free television time was the incentive for compliance. This bill contained the most comprehensive plan for free airtime. Had it passed intact, it would have provided each senatorial candidate in the general election a total of 30 minutes of free airtime which could be used Monday through Friday during prime time. No more than 15 minutes could be used on a single broadcast station. Although 30 minutes is the total allotment, the bill does not specify any other time frame for the free air. Because the candidate must be qualified for the general election, it is assumed that the 30 minutes must be used between the primary and the general election. The candidate may select the time increments they desire as long as the time is not less than 30 seconds and not more than 5 minutes. A related bill in the House would have provided similar benefits for House campaigns. By the time the Bipartisan Campaign Finance Reform Act passed Congress in 2002, however, all free airtime provisions had been removed from the bill.

What McCain-Feingold—and other similar plans—failed to take into account is the lack of congruence between the Nielsen Designated Market Areas for 0television (DMAs) and the congressional districts. Stations in a given market would be providing airtime for more than one congressional race. Stations might also be required to provide free airtime for congressional and senatorial candidates in other states. For example, the New York City market (which is the largest DMA) would have to provide free airtime for 64 candidates in any presidential election year. At 30 minutes per candidate during prime time, these stations would stand to lose more than 7 weeks of prime-time revenue.

Although the U.S. system has not adopted the free time concept, many other countries have institutionalized such systems and routinely provide free time on television and radio for political candidates. Sometimes these systems provide the time for free and candidates cannot buy other time (for example, Britain), or in other countries a dual system of free time on public channels and purchased time on private channels exists (for instance, Germany).

Glenda C. Williams

See also Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act

Further Readings

Holtz-Bacha, C. (1999). The American presidential election in international perspective: Europeanization of the U.S. electoral advertising through free-time segments. In L. L. Kaid & D. G. Bystrom (Eds.), The electronic election: Perspectives on the 1996 campaign communication. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Freedom Forum Media Studies Center

The Freedom Forum Media Studies Center was once one of the nation's leading independent media think tanks, devoted to improving understanding between the media and the public. Established in New York City in 1985, the center moved in 1996 from Columbia University to Madison Avenue in Manhattan, just blocks from many of the U.S. major print and broadcast companies. The Freedom Forum, a nonpartisan foundation dedicated to free press and free speech founded by Allen H. Neuharth in Arlington, Virginia, closed the Media Studies Center in early 2000 due to investment reversals and heavy spending on other projects, such as Newseum. The forum now funds the operations of Newseum, an interactive museum of news under construction in Washington, D.C., as well as the First Amendment Center and the Diversity Institute, both at Vanderbilt University in Nashville, Tennessee. Freedom Forum started phasing the center out several years before 2000, and it did not mention it at all in its 1999 and 2000 reports. The New York office, which continued to be a satellite of the First Amendment Center in early 2000, was shut altogether in November.

Among other things, the Media Studies Center relied on its location at the intersection of the media world to draw powerful and controversial practitioners alike to the table for discussion and supported 1-year fellowships that resulted in more than 100 books and hundreds of articles and monographs. Fellows spent an academic year or part of a year in residence at the center in Manhattan working on projects aimed at enriching the knowledge of media practitioners and increasing public understanding of how the media work.

The Media Studies Center also published, three times a year, the Media Studies Journal, which has been discontinued since fall 2000. Scholars, practitioners, and people interested in media discussed issues of importance to the mass media and the public. Some back issues are available on the forum's Web site or can be ordered at no charge. Other products developed at Columbia were an electronic newspaper, public records software for journalists, and several innovative television programs and prototypes.

The center organized public forums around the world to discuss media issues such as credibility and fairness, coverage of science and technology, coverage of women and minorities, public perceptions of news coverage, Internet censorship in Asia, and other more specific topics such as the Clinton-Lewinsky story or the Y2K problem.

Raluca Cozma

Freedom of Information

President Lyndon B. Johnson signed into law the Freedom of Information Act on July 4, 1966, after a 10-year concerted effort by Congress. The law was commonly referred to as FOIA, and it required that government-held information be available to the public unless it is considered to be designated among nine categories of exclusions. These exemptions include information that is restricted for national security, law enforcement investigation records, government employee personnel records, medical records, banking records, trade secrets required by government registration, internal government agency memoranda, geological and geophysical data on oil and gas wells, and any material explicitly exempt by an act of Congress.

The two-page bill not only included the nine exemptions to available information, but also said that agencies must provide notice of what was available in the Federal Register. It also required agency opinions and orders be published, as well as agency records, proceedings, and the limitations on exemptions. The codification of the amendment to the Administrative Procedure Act, known as the Freedom of Information Act, or FOIA, went into effect July 4, 1967.

The Senate report that accompanied the bill said that the Act was intended to "establish a general philosophy of full agency disclosure." In a signing statement President Johnson wrote, "This legislation springs from one of our most essential principles: a democracy works best when the people have all the information that the security of the nation permits."

About 20 states already had laws directing that government-held information be available to the public before the U.S. Congress was successful in its effort. Soon after the federal law was enacted, all 50 states had similarly intentioned laws.

Historical Context of Freedom of Information

The first session of the first Congress of the United States worried about the public's need to know what government was doing. During that session there was some debate about how to best provide the necessary reports, but there was little delay in congressional action. On September 15, 1789, Congress required the secretary of state to publish in at least three of the public newspapers printed within the United States every bill, order, resolution, vote of the houses of Congress, as well as presidential objection to these actions.

Though this early resolve in American history might suggest a continuing and empowering atmosphere of government disclosure, it was not the case. In times of open conflict there was little discussion about the need for secrecy, and the courts denied any attempts to force an easing of secrecy. Often, however, during times of relative calm the president and his cabinet were forthcoming about their activities, with Congress pressing the case and the courts responding with some support. Because peace was rare, Congress often found it necessary to push hard where the path was not already well-trod for any disclosure about executive branch decision making and follow-through.

Twentieth-Century Activities Before the Enactment of FOIA

Congress passed the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 to force federal agencies to provide information about their activities on a regular basis. Unfortunately the language of the law allowed the agencies to decide which information would be made available if the agency thought it in the best interest of the public to withhold some of it. Frustration with the shortcomings of the Administrative Procedure Act led to more congressional hearings and further efforts to force the executive branch to open up. President Harry Truman's expansion of the military's information classification system to include documents from all executive branch agencies did not make things easier with the legislature. Nor did his expansion of executive privilege endear him to Congress. The struggle for more public review of executive agencies during the 1950s and the cold war was a continuing priority among some legislative members. Continued evidence that the executive branch was not only refusing requests from the public, but increasingly rejecting requests from Congress forced members to launch an investigation and publish an unflattering report titled "Withholding Information From the Public and the Press, A Survey of Federal Departments and Agencies" published by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights in 1959.

Outside Congress

The American Society of Newspaper Editors established a committee to compile a report on freedom of information problems. That report, "The People's Right to Know: Legal Access to Public Records and Proceedings," was published in 1953, and its author, Dr. Harold L. Cross, served as a resource to congressional subcommittees that later wrote the FOI legislation.

The American Bar Association recommended that the entire Administrative Procedure Act be revised, as did the U.S. Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, Legal Services and Procedures, also known as the Hoover Commission, in the mid-1950s.

1974 Revision of FOIA

Soon after the 1966 law went into effect hearings were held frequently during the early 1970s. These activities resulted in the House and the Senate each passing amendment bills that went to a conference committee late in 1974. Both House and Senate agreed to the conference report, which was then sent to the president on October 1, 1974. Among the significant changes to the original law that the separate bills addressed were more frequent reporting of FOIA, shortening the agency response time when an administrative appeal was requested, broadening of the definition of agency to include all executive departments like the executive office of the president, military and government controlling of corporations and independent agencies, and relaxing the definition of identifiable records in a request to that of more simply, reasonably described.

President Gerald Ford received the bill, with many political concerns. Though Watergate investigations 2 years earlier and the resignation of the President Richard Nixon formally accepted on August 7, 1974, had eroded public esteem of the White House, Ford was said to have concerns about the long-term effects of too much disclosure by the executive branch. President Ford had supported the original FOIA legislation when he was a member of Congress, but his shift to the executive branch also shifted his view of the problems detailed in the amendments. President Ford issued some specific suggestions to amend the language of the bill, but Congress set about to override his veto. On November 20, the House voted 371 to 31, with 32 abstentions, in favor of the override and the Senate followed on November 21 with 65 in favor and 27 against. The FOIA amendments, then, became effective on February 19, 1975.

1986 Freedom of Information Reform Act and the 1996 Electronic FOIA

Nearly every session there were some amendments to FOIA offered in Congress. Reform provisions were introduced about the fee structure and waiver provisions based on the purpose and kind of request. With much haste and a minimum of explanation, the House and Senate agreed on a single version of the FOIA amendments and passed the reforms attached to a more popular bill, the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986. President Reagan signed the bill on October 27 and the law went into effect immediately. Then in 1996 President Bill Clinton signed into law the Electronic Freedom of Information Act, which instructed agencies to put as much of their public information on the World Wide Web as possible.

Shannon E. Martin

Further Readings

Cross, H. L. (1953). The people's right to know. New York: Columbia University Press.

Wiggins, J. R. (1956). Freedom or secrecy. New York: Oxford University Press.

Freedom of Information Act

See Freedom of Information

Freedom of the Press

See Press Freedom

Fundraising

See Campaign Finance

G

GALLUP POLLS

See POLLS

GANDHI, INDIRA (1917–1984)

Indira Gandhi was the only child of Kamala and Jawaharlal Nehru. She started her involvement in politics early, at age 12, serving as the leader of the children's political group, the Monkey Brigade. Their task was to help the Indian Congress gain control back from Britain. After Indira completed college in 1936, Kamala Nehru passed away, leaving Indira to care for her father. In 1942, Indira married Feroze Gandhi. Soon after marrying, in September 1942, Indira and Feroze were imprisoned by the British for charges of subversion. They were released in May 1943. In 1944, they welcomed their first son, Rajiv, and in 1943 their second son, Sanjay. Soon after Indira's father was elected India's first prime minister, she set out on the road with him as his assistant and caretaker. For Indira, 1959 brought a political career of her own. She was elected president of the Indian National Congress. In 1960, Feroze died of a heart attack. Indira, now a single mother, continued to push forward. In 1964, she was elected to Parliament, and in the same year her father was assassinated. After the death of her father's successor, Lal Bahadur Shastri in 1966, Indira was appointed prime minister. She was considered a compromise candidate and was called a "dumb doll," but she proved ambitious and strong. In 1971, India defeated Pakistan and was considered "an invincible goddess." In 1975, Indira was convicted of violating election laws in her 1971 reelection campaign. The courts demanded her resignation, but instead she declared a state of emergency and arrested her opponents. This act caused an overturn in her conviction, and she remained in office until she lost the election in 1977. In 1980, she was reelected; in that same year her youngest son, Sanjay, was killed in a plane crash. Then in 1984, after a successful attack on Sikh rebels in the Golden Temple, Indira was assassinated by two of her own Sikh guards at her home in New Delhi.

Indira Gandhi was an extraordinary woman and politician. She is remembered for her battle against poverty and her commitment to the honor and unity of India. She is also acknowledged for her foreign policies, the win over Pakistan, and a 20-year treaty of friendship with the USSR. During her tenure, India's economic status rose tremendously. India became the third largest country in scientific and technical manpower, fifth in military power, sixth member of the nuclear club, seventh to space, and 10th industrial power. Unfortunately, what Indira is most remembered and criticized for is her declaration of the state of emergency. This incident is known as "Indira's Cardinal Sin." The act created a devastating blow to India's democracy and allowed an influx of political pollution to occur that still remains today. As history shows, Indira Gandhi did overcome the hurdle in her 1980 reelection, but the stigma of her poor choice haunts her legacy to this day.

Alecea Davis Jones

Further Readings

Bhatia, K. (1974). Indira: A biography of Prime Minister Gandhi. New York: Praeger.

Indira Gandhi. (n.d.). Retrieved from http://www.answers.com/topic/indira-gandhi

Manas: History and Politics. (n.d.). Indira Gandhi. Retrieved June 26, 2007, from http://www.sscnet.ucla.edu/southasia/History/Independent/Indira.html

Gatekeeping

See News Selection Process

Gender and Politics

Issues of gender and politics have played a fundamental role in American history since the country's founding fathers penned, "All men are created equal." Since those words were written, women have struggled for fair and equal representation in government, media, and society as a whole.

After the 2006 midterm election, women occupied only 16.3% of the seats in the House of Representatives, 16% of the seats in the Senate, 18% of state gubernatorial positions, and 14.4% of the mayoral positions in the largest cities in America. While these numbers are not representational of the percentage of females living within the United States, they can at least be regarded as a modest improvement for a country that did not allow women to vote until 1920, when the 19th Amendment was ratified.

While there have been several prominent female governors, congressional members, vice presidential, and presidential candidates, when running for elective offices female politicians continue to face an uphill battle, a battle that is exacerbated as the candidate moves up the political ladder. In all political campaigns, the ability to raise adequate funds is essential to a candidate's success. Although since the 1990s women have shown the ability to raise money for their campaigns and their parties, the few who have run for the presidency have always fallen short of raising the massive amount of money necessary to compete in even the earliest presidential primaries and caucuses. Beginning in the 1970s, organizations have been established to provide money for the campaigns of local, state, and national women candidates and women's issues. These organizations include the National Women's Political Caucus, EMILY'S (Early Money Is Like Yeast) List, and Women In the Senate and House (WISH).

Studies of the press coverage of candidates in early elections of the 21st century indicate that male and female candidates receive relatively equal press coverage, although differences in the type of coverage remain. For example, more time is devoted to describing a female candidate's physical appearance than would ever be allotted to describing the appearance of a male candidate. Stories of personal issues such as marriage, divorce, and the birth and care of children have the ability to damage a woman's political career more severely than that of a male politician. These contrasts in how male and female candidates are portrayed in the media are rooted in traditional sex role stereotypes. Because leadership is often conceptualized as a masculine quality, female politicians must try to balance their image to appear both feminine and masculine. Until the 1980s, female candidates were cautioned about the use of negative political advertisements because it was feared that aggressiveness would violate the public's perception about how a woman should act. However, in the 21st century, political advertising studies have found that female candidates who are perceived to be strong and aggressive are more likely to be successful in their campaigns than are candidates who demonstrate more feminine qualities.

Essential to the topic of gender and politics is the role that female voters play and are perceived to play by political parties and political pollsters. Since ratification of the 19th Amendment, some feared that women would vote in blocs and thus be in a power position when it came to social and welfare issues. Although a female voting bloc never truly materialized, beginning in the 1970s evidence began to suggest that there were statistically significant differences between how men and women voted. In fact, the results of a 1983 Harris poll indicated that women were 17% more likely to vote for a Democratic Party candidate than for the incumbent, Republican President Ronald Reagan. Since the 1980s, women voters have continued to favor Democratic rather than Republican candidates. In the first few election cycles of the 21st century, the targeting of the female vote has become more fragmented as both parties have sought to appeal to particular demographics that were thought to be especially important in tipping the scales of an election. Such a strategy was evident in the Democratic and Republican parties' attempt to appeal to the "soccer mom" during the 2000 election and the "security mom" during the 2004 election.

In trying to appeal to female voters, some politicians may choose to take stances on so-called women's issues, including education, health and welfare, environmental policies, and family care. The most debated women's issue to come to the forefront in the political arena is abortion. Following the 1973 Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision, which declared that the prior governmental stance against abortion was unconstitutional, there have been few political issues as divisive. Since the ruling, many candidates have used either a pro-choice stance or a pro-life stance in attempts to appeal to particular segments of the female vote.

Regardless of issues used by political parties and candidates to appeal to women, three truths about women's voting emerge. First, women do not, as a whole, vote along women's rights issues. Second, there is no evidence that women prefer female candidates to male candidates. And third, prior to the midterm election of 2006, the Democratic Party appears to have benefited from the women's vote more than did the Republican Party.

In summary, gender has played a significant role in American politics, from the Suffragists' struggle to see the 19th Amendment ratified, to the debate concerning abortion, to the struggle that women continue to face when seeking equal representation in county, state, and federally elected offices.

Judith S. Trent and David M. Luftig

See also Women Candidates, Advertising; Women Candidates, News Coverage

Further Readings

Bystrom, D., Banwart, M., Kaid, L. L., & Robertson, T. (2004). The gendering of candidate communication: VideoStyle, WebStyle, and NewsStyle. New York: Routledge.

McKinney, M. S., Kaid, L. L., Bystrom, D. G., & Carlin, D. B. (Eds.). (2005). Communicating politics: Engaging in democratic life. New York: Peter Lang.

Trent, J. S., & Friedenberg, R. V. (2004). Political campaign communication: Principles and practices (5th ed., pp. 147–175). Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Witt, L., Paget, K. M., & Matthews, G. (1995). Running as a woman: Gender and power in America. New York: Free Press.

Gender Gap

See Gender and Politics

Gerbner, George (1919–2005)

George Gerbner was born in Hungary, emigrated to the United States in 1939, and became a U.S. citizen. He earned a BA degree in journalism from the University of California at Berkeley in 1942 and worked as a journalist at the San Francisco Chronicle until enlisting in the Army during World War II.

After the war, he earned an MA in 1951 and his PhD in 1955 from the University of Southern California. In 1955, his dissertation, "Toward a General Theory of Communication," was named "Best Dissertation." He joined the faculty at the Institute for Communication Research at the University of Illinois in 1956.

Dr. Gerbner became professor of communication and dean of the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Pennsylvania in 1964. He was awarded the only study funded as part of the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence to analyze the content of television programs. This research was the beginning of the Cultural Indicators Project, which continued to receive funding from the Surgeon General's Scientific Advisory Committee on Television and Social Behavior, the National Institute of Mental Health, and other agencies. It became the longest continuously running research project focused on television. Professor Gerbner served as dean of the Annenberg School until 1989, when he was named Bell Atlantic Professor of Telecommunications in the Department of Broadcasting, Telecommunications, and Mass Media at Temple University in Philadelphia. In 1990 he founded the Cultural Environment Movement, a global coalition of organizations and activists devoted to changing media practices and policies. He served as the executive editor of the Journal of Communication for many years.

Professor Gerbner formulated a paradigm for understanding mass communication made up of three prongs: institutional process analysis, message system (content) analysis, and cultivation analysis. Cultivation analysis, an important theoretical perspective in communication, is based on the idea that the views and behaviors of those who spend more time with the media, particularly television, reflect what they've seen on television. Cultivation theory is a process focusing upon the commonality in what people think about or know and assesses television's contributions to viewers' conceptions of social reality.

Dr. Gerbner is best known for his studies of television violence. For more than 30 years, the Violence Profiles, created as part of the Cultural Indicators Project, provided a continuous and consistent monitoring of violence in primetime network broadcast programming. Violence was studied as a demonstration of power, examining the demographic profiles of who gets hurt and who does the hurting and focusing upon its long-term consequences for both thinking and action. Professor Gerbner often testified before Congress using the Violence Profiles to provide evidence that the amount of violence in primetime network programs changed very little from one television season to the next and had a decided effect upon the public's conceptions of violence in their lives and in society.

Professor Gerbner was a prolific writer. Two of his most important and seminal writings include his 1969 article in AV Communication Review, "Toward 'Cultural Indicators': The Analysis of Mass Mediated Message Systems," and the 1976 Journal of Communication article (written with Larry Gross), "Living With Television: The Violence Profile."

Nancy Signorielli

See also Cultivation Theory

Further Readings

Gerbner, G. (1969). Toward "cultural indicators": The analysis of mass mediated message systems. AV Communication Review, 17(2), 137–148.

Gerbner, G. (1994, Spring). Reclaiming our cultural mythology. Ecology of Justice, 40.

Gerbner, G., & Gross, L. (1976). Living with television: The violence profile. Journal of Communication, 26(2), 173–199.

Greunke, L. (2000). The cultivation theory. Retrieved June 26, 2007, from http://www.colostate.edu/Depts/Speech/rccs/theory06.htm

German Unification, Role of the Media

The process of German reunification—in fact, the entire period between the peaceful demonstrations in autumn 1989, the first free elections in the German Democratic Republic (GDR) in March 1990, and the unification day in October 1990—could not be predicted by the social sciences. Both the speed of this process and the peculiarities of social science research in the GDR resulted in a fairly incomplete scientific analysis of this huge historical event, in particular with regard to the role of the media. Contemporary historians dealing with the "peaceful revolution" focused on the economic, political, and ideological failure of "real socialism" in the GDR, on the developments in the other countries of Eastern Europe (e.g., Poland and Hungary), and on the changed political orientation of the Soviet Union (Gorbachev's perestroika and glasnost—translated, "restructuring" and "openness"). The relevance of these considerations is unquestionable. Nonetheless, a critical review of empirical studies and theoretical approaches on the impact of the media can reveal interesting results on their role in the unification process. Such a consideration requires the analysis of two interlinked aspects: analysis of the general media situation in the GDR and of their specific constellation in the unification process.

A major peculiarity of the media situation in the GDR can be seen in the competition between two media systems. Beside East German media (e.g., two television channels, five radio programs, six national and many regional newspapers in the 1980s), the majority of the population also had access to West German media (TV and radio). This usability was both complementary as well as substituting. Almost everywhere across the country, Western radio stations could be received. Approximately 85% of the territory could watch West German TV programs. In the 1970s, West German media represented a normal part of everyday life, which at last was also tolerated by the communist state. Although the import of press products from Western countries was forbidden, newspapers and magazines circulated to a considerable extent. The long-term impact of Western media use—above all, of TV channels as the "window to the Western world"—can be interpreted along the lines of cultivation theory: the mental existence and attractiveness of alternative cultural models (communication, leisure time, consumption, and so on), of alternative interpretations for political processes (at home and abroad), as well as the sensibility for a common language and culture. The media of the GDR could hardly be competitive. Until 1989, the GDR media were subject to ruling party and government administration, with the press governed by parties and radio stations, TV, film, and music productions controlled by the state. The media were defined as "instruments of political power" and "mouthpieces" of the Socialist Unity Party (SED) and the state. Consequently they were headed, controlled as, and censored by the Agitation and Propaganda Department of the SED's Central Committee. This predominantly affected journalism, the character of which can be described as announcements, court circulars, or career journalism as well as all those branches of popular (media) art that touched political values and ideology. A critical exploration of reality based on people's experience remained relegated to the sidelines, where, however, it sometimes (re-)vitalized influentials and "subcultures" in the spheres of literature and visual art or in communicative spheres of film, music, and journalism.

In the sphere of media entertainment, however, the dependence of the GDR on imports, an increasing international cooperation, and consideration of manifest needs led to a strong internationalization (understood as orientation along Western lines) in the respective sections of the GDR media. In the sphere of political journalism, TV to a large extent lost touch with reality and with the audience. TV programs tried to illustrate how the reality should be, not how it actually was. In this way, it produced an "obstinate audience" that pushed its claims of coping with reality in opposition to the GDR media. This occurred in many ways: in extensive rumor and joke communication, in turning to forms of communication with political substitute and compensation functions (as, for example, in arts, in the church, and in Western media), and in selective refusal or subversive interpretation of the existing media situation ("reading between the lines").

In this respect, the causes of the peaceful revolution need to be discussed in the context of everyday experience of economic and political problems, the inability of GDR media to stabilize the state's authority, and the diverse impact of Western media.

Initiation and power of the people's civil movement in autumn 1989 cannot be judged without considering the mass exodus of East Germans to the West via Hungary and the Czech Republic. The intensive media coverage of these developments in the West (and the helpless response of the GDR media) served to increase the stream of refugees and boost the protest movement. From the very start of the protests against the existent regime (in order to transform or to overcome it), this issue turned into a topic of media coverage—at first in the Western media, then also in the media of the GDR. Thus, the revolution and the way to unification was a mediated social process. It was also a "media revolution," since, on the one hand, the GDR media turned into open media without party and state control, and on the other side, the GDR's media market became open for the Western media. The main effect of media coverage in this period was multiplication, for example, of agendas of demonstrations, demands, erosion of state authority through discussions about (unsolved) problems, and involving people in the processes of political discussion about the future. For the protest movement and the newly founded political parties, the media served as organizing and legitimating bodies, presenting their efforts and making the (opposition) protagonists clearly visible.

Hans-Joerg Stiehler

See also Cultivation Theory; Revolution, Political

Further Readings

Etzkorn, K. P., & Stiehler, H.-J. (1998). The "Valley of the Clueless": Results from a historical experiment. Communications: The European Journal of Communication Research, 23, 271–298.

Sandford, J. (1995). The German media. In D. Lewis & J. P. R. McKenzie (Eds.), The new Germany (pp. 199–219). Exeter, UK: University of Exeter Press.

Gingrich, Newt (1943–)

Newt Gingrich, Speaker of the House of Representatives (1995–1999), is known for his leadership of GOPAC (a Republican Party training organization), the development of the "Contract with America," and the 1994 "Republican Revolution."

In seeking to erode confidence in the Democrats while concurrently developing a set of Republican ideas and programs, Gingrich's congressional leadership began with the Conservative Opportunity Society (COS) House caucus. Notably, the COS took advantage of C-SPAN's congressional floor coverage so as to preach a blisteringly conservative message to more than 17 million American viewers. Though Democratic leaders were furious and forced cameras to pan across the empty floor, COS had made its mark, and leading conservatives encouraged Gingrich to keep pushing.

Gingrich was handed control of GOPAC in 1986, transforming it into a national organization designed to recruit and train a new generation of Republican legislators using seminars such as "Language: A Key Mechanism of Control." What began as a program for schooling junior politicians in the ways of campaign techniques through a network of videos and speeches soon turned into a powerhouse of political communication. Referring to GOPAC as the "Bell Labs of GOP politics," Gingrich's efforts resulted in the creation of the Contract with America. Adamant about the message and its presentation, the content of the contract was refined with extensive polling and the advice of sympathetic public policy groups. Further, the contract went public with a calculated, made-for-television political rally on the Capitol steps.

Following a wave of support for the contract, Gingrich found success at the ballot box: on November 8, 1994, Republicans gained 52 seats and assumed a majority in the House for the first time since the Eisenhower administration. A milestone in congressional history, the success of the Republican Revolution was founded on Gingrich's ability to mold public opinion in an effort to gain electoral advantage through political communication techniques.

In his role as Speaker of the House, Gingrich worked to enact the contract within the first 100 days of the 104th Congress, at one point issuing his own nationally televised address in February 1995. President Clinton and the Democrats fought back, resulting in two federal government shutdowns that blighted the contract and Gingrich's appeal to the American public. Finally, after allegations of unethical behavior and his failure to produce Republican gains in the wake of the Monica Lewinsky scandal, Gingrich relinquished his speakership and resigned altogether from Congress. Though much of the contract's specific legislation was either blunted or failed to pass altogether, Newt Gingrich and his work with GOPAC is much credited for establishing the contemporary political arena.

H. E. Schmeisser

Further Readings

Bruck, C. (1995, October 9). The politics of perception. The New Yorker, pp. 50–76.

Edwards, L. (1999). The conservative revolution. New York: Free Press.

Goidel, R., Gross, D., & Shields, T. (1999). Money matters. New York: Littlefield.

Kernell, S. (1997). Going public (3rd ed.). Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Plano, J. C., & Greenberg, M. (1997). The American political dictionary (10th ed.). New York: Harcourt-Brace.

Wilcox, C. (1995). The latest American revolution. New York: St. Martin's.

Giscard d'Estaing, Valéry (1926–)

Born on February 2, 1926, Valéry Giscard d'Estaing became one of the youngest French (assistant) ministers in 1959 and then full finance minister in 1962. When dismissed from the government in 1965, he founded a Center Right party, the Fédération Nationale des Républicains Indépendants, and slowly achieved a national stature by dissociating more and more from ruling President General de Gaulle. This was done very effectively, with short and easy-to-remember formulas, which showed Giscard d'Estaing's wits in political communication. In 1965, his critical support to de Gaulle was, for instance, expressed by a short "Oui, . . . mais" ("Yes . . . , but") to the president, thus vividly articulating his reservations while supporting de Gaulle's reelection. His direct opposition to de Gaulle for the 1969 referendum was then not surprising, and his clever positioning on the center of the political field had the next president, Georges Pompidou, place him again at the helm of the finance ministry.

A strong candidate in the 1974 French presidential election, Giscard d'Estaing demonstrated a superb mastery of campaigning skills. Introduced to American political marketing methods, he was the first significant French politician to introduce his personal life into his campaign. He frequently featured his family, appearing on huge posters alongside his daughters, in order to alleviate his image of "grand bourgeois." He also reached the deeper roots of France, by publicly playing the ever-popular accordion during the campaign (18 years before Bill Clinton's saxophone!). A tough debater, he easily won the first French televised presidential debate, against François Mitterrand. He had prepared well-built sound bites that he inserted with ease, the best remembered being, "Vous n'avez pas le monopole du coeur" ("You don't have a monopoly on having a heart"), spoken when Mitterrand, as expected, accused him of representing only the richest classes of society.

When elected, Valéry Giscard d'Estaing undertook to professionalize the communication of the president's office. He was the first to set up a permanent surveys cell, an example that was followed by all his successors. He also tried to mellow his still rather distant image by organizing events that took him to the poorest classes of society: cameras showed him inviting the Elysée Palace service staff for breakfast, and even the local garbage removers. On several occasions, he invited himself to dinner with "representatives" of middle-class families in view of television cameras.

In 1981, then, defeat came for the first time when Valéry Giscard d'Estaing tried to keep his office. Opposed again to François Mitterrand, he had made several unexpected campaigning mistakes:

- He approved an ambiguous slogan for his posters, "Il faut un Président à la France" ("France needs a president").
- He kept the same kind of arguments, even the same sound bites, as for the 1974 debate, becoming an easy target for rebuttal.
- He underestimated the strong preparation of François Mitterrand, who had taken in the lessons of his 1974 loss and had gone through intensive media training.

After his 1981 defeat, Valéry Giscard d'Estaing was never able again to compete for presidential office, though his 1984 book, Deux Français sur trois, tried to establish that he had the support of more of the French people than the election result had shown. He remained quite influential among the liberal right-wing politicians and held several public offices, serving at the helm of the European group that prepared the so-called European Constitution.

Philippe J. Maarek

Further Readings

Bothorel, J. (1979). La République mondaine, essai sur le giscardisme [The fashionable Republic: A test of Giscardism]. Paris: Grasset.

Bothorel, J. (1983). Le Pharaon, Histoire du septennat Giscardien [The Pharaoh: History of the rule of Giscard]. Paris: Grasset.

Giscard d'Estaing, V. (1988, 1991, 2006). Le pouvoir et la vie [Capacity and life]. 3 vols. Paris: Compagne 12.

Giuliani, Rudy (1944–)

In the aftermath of the attacks of September 11, 2001, Rudolph Giuliani was labeled "America's Mayor." His courage and compassion during the extreme circumstances of the tragedy reconfigured his public image.

Giuliani received a law degree from the New York University School of Law and spent much of his early career as a prosecutor. He is credited with a number of successful prosecutions of organized crime on the East Coast. He also served as associate attorney general under Ronald Reagan.

As mayor of New York, Giuliani served two terms, from 1994 to 2001. His terms as mayor were praised for his successful reduction of crime in New York City. He also spearheaded a visible Times Square renovation/revitalization that improved the city's appearance and safety. During his time as major, Giuliani honed his media skills by initiating a call-in radio program and appearing regularly on late night talk and comedy shows, including Saturday Night Live.

Giuliani has been widely credited with helping to hold the city together in the immediate aftermath of the 9/11 collapse of the World Trade Center. His leadership has been called courageous and inspirational, and it was the major reason for his designation as Time magazine's Person of the Year in 2001.

Before his term as major of New York was scheduled to end in 2001, Giuliani considered entering the race for the U.S. Senate in New York, upon the retirement of Senator Patrick Moynihan. However, due to prostate cancer and other personal considerations, Giuliani withdrew from that race before the Republican primary in 2000.

After his term as mayor ended in 2001, with a 76% public approval rating, Giuliani continued his commitment to restoration of the World Trade Center site and worked on task forces and organizations to combat future terrorism attacks and facilitate greater preparedness. He was a keynote speaker at the 2004 Republican National Convention and an active supporter of President George W. Bush's reelection.

In 2007, Rudy Giuliani declared his intention to run for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. His exploratory campaign efforts seem promising, and many polls place him at the top of Republican choices.

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Terrorism and Media

Further Readings

Barrett, W., & Collins, D. (2006). Grand illusion: The untold story of Rudy Giuliani and 9/11. New York: Harper Collins.

Giuliani, R. W., & Kurson, K. (2002). Leadership. New York: Miramax.

Pooley, E. (2001–2002, December 31–January 7). Person of the year 2001: Mayor of the world. Time, 52, 28–46.

Glasgow Media Group

The Glasgow Media Group (GMG) was formed in 1974, as six media researchers within the sociology department of Glasgow University got together to produce the book Bad News. John Eldridge, Jean Hart, Alison McNaughton, Greg Philo, Paul Walton, and Brian Winston measured bias and ideology in television news coverage through content analysis, complemented by some interviewing and covert participant observation. The book argued that both the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) and News Independent Television News (ITN), important news providers in the United Kingdom, editorialized and fell short of their legal obligation to present political and industrial news in a balanced and neutral fashion. The group argued that television news did not reflect the full range of views, was undemocratic in its choice of sources, and that broadcasters defied notions of accuracy and impartiality. All these led to a legitimization of the dominant ideology and to false consciousness among the masses. Journalists, even if well intended, often held unconscious political assumptions that affected news selection and distorted reality.

While many acclaimed the GMG research, some academics challenged the way it defined and measured ideology and the way the data was gathered, while others argued that unconscious political assumptions and media effects cannot be measured with content analysis. The book also met hostility from BBC and ITN, which complained to the university officials and tried to limit the freedom of the researchers.

Follow-up books, More Bad News in 1980 and Really Bad News in 1982, completed a trilogy based on the same content analysis of news programs. The GMG came to mean all those people who wrote with the initial team to produce the series of books on media bias. It included journalists working on the production side of news media who conducted their own content and audience studies. At the same time they also set up the Glasgow University Media (GUM) Unit, which applied for research grants and won many research awards. War and Peace News, with funds from UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization), highlighted in 1985 the wholesale abandonment of impartiality in both print and broadcast media. With their work on subjects such as the miners' strike, the group gained a reputation for not shying away from difficult social and political issues.

Getting the Message in 1993 investigated media treatments of areas such as food panics, health scares, AIDS in the media, and mental health.

In 1998, Cultural Compliance underlined the political failure of media and cultural studies as they were taught in Britain's universities. The "cultural compliance" concept refers to postmodern writers who have lost the ability to engage critically with the society in which they exist and thus have drifted into irrelevance. The postmodern focus on the text and the negotiation of meaning has reduced the ability to study the real and often brutal relations of power that form our culture. Message Received (1999) focused on race, migration and media, disaster and crisis reporting, mental illness and suicide.

A more recent GMG work, Bad News From Israel, analyzes the coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian war and its impact on public opinion.

Raluca Cozma

See also Media Bias

Further Readings

Eldridge, J. (2000). The contribution of the Glasgow Media Group to the study of television and print journalism. Journalism Studies, 1(1), 113–127.

Glasgow Media Group. (1976). Bad news. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.

Glasnost

See Russia, Democratization and Media

Globalization

Globalization was one of the most important catchwords in communication studies in the past decade. "Global village," "global public sphere," "global civil society"—phrases like these have characterized the debate on the new phenomena of mass-mediated transnationalization in all fields of politics, society, and culture.

Cross-border communication is defined very unsystematically in the globalization literature, sometimes as inter- and trans*national* and sometimes as inter- and trans*cultural* communication. Cross-border thus describes those processes of information exchange in the course of which system borders, of the nation-state or culture, are transversed. Nearly all contemporary attempts to grapple theoretically with globalization that tackle issues of communication emphasize the nation-state or culture. Theoretical thought on globalization and media can be divided into three fields: (1) system connectivity, (2) system change, and (3) system interdependence.

Globalization and Media Connectivity

Connectivity describes the extent, speed, and intensity of the international or intercultural exchange of information. Connectivity may be generated between entities, however defined, through various means of communication. Alongside mediated interpersonal communication (telephone, e-mail, letter, fax, and so on), communication that depends on mass media can also be understood as direct access to the range of communicative services produced by another country or culture (Internet; direct broadcasts by satellite); international broadcasting (special TV and radio services in foreign languages broadcast to other countries); imports or export of media); and access to information and contexts in another country or cultural area conveyed by journalism (international reporting on television, radio, the press; corresponding media services on the Internet).

One of the key factors shaping the globalization debate over the past decade was the fact that the means of transmission and the exchange of information beyond borders has increased dramatically. The "new media" have set the overall tone of the debate since the 1990s. However, it is far from certain that the new media, regardless of their many new forms, characterize the processes of globalization more than national journalism and international reporting.

The concrete form of connectivity via the new media depends on a range of technological, socioeconomic, and cultural parameters:

Technological reach and socioeconomic implications of media technology. Nation-states and cultural areas are characterized by very different technological capacities for transmission and reception in the field of satellite broadcasting, depending on the prevailing political and financial parameters. The same goes for the Internet. Regardless of the strong increase in the number of connections, a "digital divide" exists, above all between industrialized and developing countries, that restricts connectivity substantially.

User reach. The debate on the globalization of the media often fails to distinguish between technological reach and user reach. The number of those who use a technology per se lies below the technologically possible use—and cross-border use is only one variant of the use to which the new media may be put.

Linguistic and cultural competence. To communicate with people in other states and cultural areas or to use their media generally requires linguistic competence, which only minorities in any population enjoy. To avoid dismissing cross-border connectivity as marginal from the outset, it is vital to distinguish between various user groups: globalization elites and peripheries. Connectivity is without doubt partly dependent on the nature of the message communicated, including music, images, and text. Music enjoys the largest global spread, and images occupy a middle position (for example, press photographs or the images of CNN [Cable News Network], also accessible to users who understand no English), while most texts create only meagre international resonance because of language barriers.

Connectivity may ultimately occur within global communication not only between producers and consumers in various nation-states and cultural areas—that is, *inter*nationally and *inter*culturally—but also via a *trans*national (or cultural) media system. Here, media and media businesses would no longer have a clear-cut national base but would emerge as "global players." The idea of a world linked through communication is anchored in the assumption that globalization is more than the sum of the links among its components.

Contemporary notions of what such a transnational media system consists of are, however, still very nebulous. Apart from a few global agreements brought into being by the major transnational trade organizations such as the World Trade Organization (WTO) (in the copyright protection field, for instance), there are only a few transnationally active corporations that can be called "global players." Regardless of the existence of such businesses, transnational media—that is, programs and formats—are extremely rare. CNN, frequently mentioned as the perfect example of a leading global medium that encourages exchange of political opinion worldwide by concentrating on transnational programs, seems to come closest to fitting this vision. Yet even this case is problematic, for CNN is no uniform program but consists of numerous continental "windows." There are many "CNNs," but no complete global program.

Due to the current state of global connectivity, a number of counter-tendencies characteristic of global communication are having such disastrous effects that the necessity for cross-border communication is more apparent than ever, particularly after the events of September 11, 2001. The worldwide coverage of the attacks of 9/11 and the Iraq War of 2003 have revealed the paucity of evidence of a communicative integration that could help alleviate conflicts and liberate the media from the traditionally strong influence of belligerent governments and patriotic cultural influences. Through one-sided coverage in wartime and limitations on public access to information, it may still be possible to seal peoples and regions off from one another and mobilize them for war. We have little reason to assume that a global media network has significantly reduced the susceptibility of societies, even democratic ones, to war propaganda.

Moreover, permanent cross-border media use—for example, through satellite TV by large numbers of people—is largely limited to specific linguistic regions. In multilingual Europe, for example, it hardly occurs. Foreign-language media use remains the privilege of small knowledge elites or special groups such as immigrants who sometimes create their specific "virtual communities." Alongside the still dominant production and use of media within national media areas, contemporary developments in the media are marked by a regionalism of a geolinguistic hue. At present, it is impossible to state with confidence whether this is open to globalization or not. Major language areas such as Spanish, Chinese, Indian, and Arab are currently experiencing a boom in native-language media.

The Internet has introduced a new subtlety to the global array of information, but cross-border linkage is obviously growing more slowly than local and national interactions in many areas. Since the introduction of non-Latin symbols for domain names at the turn of the millennium, the Internet is also increasingly developing a linguistic diversity that is creating new Babel-esque dividing lines. The potential of some political campaigns to mobilize people on a global scale—in principal an interesting feature for political communication—may be impressive, but this occurs only when very specific conditions and alliances are in place. The large "digital divide" between industrialised and developing countries, where technical connectivity might range as high as 80% of all households (as in Scandinavia) or below 3% (as in most of Africa), raises doubts about whether the comparative political advantages of a "global civil society" are making themselves felt to any real extent and are managing to change policies when faced with the power of governments.

Globalization and Political/ Cultural Change

For both the major realms of connectivity—direct communication through new media and mediated communication by means of journalism—it is also important to understand whether receiving cultures are changed by transmitting cultures in the process of cross-border communication through the Internet, satellite broadcasting, international broadcasting, or through media imports and exports and whether the media content of foreign coverage passed on by national journalism systems to their domestic populations is capable of changing the worldviews and attitudes of the receiving cultures.

Three forms of cultural change are mentioned again and again in the globalization debate:

1. The adoption of the "other" culture (above all in the form of "Westernized" globalization)
2. The emergence of "glocalized" hybrid cultures that are influenced both by global and local elements
3. The revitalization of traditional and other local cultures as a reaction to globalization

Mass media have the potential to change systems, and here the individual media differ, sometimes significantly. The areas in which the Internet can work to change systems are diverse, because its form is untypical of the mass media. The Internet can generate alternative publics. It can unite political actors and oppositional landscapes worldwide to form a "global civil society." The CIA report Global Trends 2015 predicted new challenges for national and international politics. The report assumes that while the nation-state will remain the most important political actor, its efficiency will be measured on the basis of how it masters globalization and how it comes to terms with an increasingly articulate and well-organized civil society worldwide. The Internet, it could be argued, is becoming all the more significant as a platform capable of articulating and shaping the will of the citizenry, creating civil networks, and even mobilizing people politically.

In view of the structures underlying television and radio worldwide, which tend to be commercial, government run, or public, direct broadcasting by satellite is a downright elite medium in comparison to the Internet. It features formidable barriers to access—making it difficult to use to articulate one's views—and highly developed journalistic selection mechanisms. Nonetheless, the comparative advantage of satellite broadcasting is that large publics can form rapidly, including cross-border ones. The Internet is fragmenting into countless subpublics; in everyday life, these can be fused only by political organizations and networks.

Is the media forming a "global public sphere" as this popular and central concept in the globalization debate suggests? The catchphrase "media diplomacy" captures the capacity of media to act almost as representatives of the public and the peoples of the Earth and to intervene in the traditional diplomacy between states, which is often stuck in a rut and conflictual in nature. Broadcasters that are clearly nationally based may perform such a function. Ideally, however, it should be taken over by formats of a transnational character. Media diplomacy has thus often been referred to as the "CNN effect," joined in recent years by other models such as the "Al Jazeera effect." In all cases, the suggestion is that the media have global resonance and centrality; that is, within their specific spheres—Western or Arab—they enjoy a privileged position and thus have excellent prospects of changing the politics of international conflicts.

However, in light of the sobering appraisal of connectivity, we clearly have to assess the influence of cross-border mass communication on system change with much care. Today, every political and social change, from the fall of the Berlin Wall through the political upheavals in Ukraine, Lebanon, and Kyrgyzstan to Pope John Paul II's funeral, is thought to be molded by the global media. Yet we are clearly getting ahead of ourselves. Mass gatherings following the death of a pope have been common throughout history, long before the modern mass media, and political revolutions and uprisings are nothing new either. During the era of the information revolution, all appearances to the contrary, the number of free social and media systems has by no means increased. It has, in fact, decreased or at least stagnated. The information revolution has been left untouched by the "Third Wave of Democratization," which finished with the upheavals in Eastern Europe before the new media of the Internet and direct broadcasting by satellite had become established.

Ultimately, as far as cultural change is concerned, the globalization debate has produced an internally inconsistent dual myth. This is the notion that culturally imperialist "Americanization" or "Westernization" may be accompanied by the "glocalization" or "hybridization" of cultures. The European film market as well as much of the pop music listened to worldwide are surely examples of Americanization. These individual pieces of evidence, alluded to again and again, do not, however, allow us to generalize. They permit no overall conclusions about cultural globalization. In many countries and in most world regions, American film imports are in the minority, not to mention TV films, which are produced in the vast majority of countries by national or regional industries.

The second variant of the myth of globalization asserts not only that American and Western cultural hegemony is expanding but takes possible counterarguments into account by conceding that non-European cultures are capable of making local adaptations in response to globalization. Indian rap, for example, is claimed to be a typical hybrid culture. Many of these cultural fusions could not, however, be reexported to Western markets. This points to the way the globalization debate confuses globalization and modernization. External stimuli may serve to spark off cultural change. It is music and images that characterize entertainment culture as the core area of globalization—and it is text, news, and interpretations of the world that are proving to be the basis of local resistance and independence.

Globalization and Political/ Economic Interdependence

The notion of a world linked by communication extends and changes the traditional model of national media systems. It becomes increasingly difficult to demarcate the societal system within which the media operate. Publics can act transnationally, as can politics and the media itself. Alongside each national media system there thus arises a second global system. To the extent that it becomes a component of the flow of information, it has great and growing influence.

Do these changes, however, allow us to speak of a "communicative world system"? More important than the mere existence of other entities beyond national media systems is a deeper understanding of their fundamental relations. Are foreign political systems really as influential as domestic ones? Do journalists feel as keen a sense of duty toward their foreign public as they do to their domestic one, and does this lead to changes in the journalistic product? Are global, market, and capital interconnections as strong as national and regional ones? Cultural and societal change in a global system is not produced by connectivity alone, but is based on interdependence. In an interdependent global system, autonomous national systems change into partly autonomous subsystems of a global macrosystem.

In striving to understand why cross-border processes of communication have palpably failed to generate connectivity and system change, it is essential to look at the fundamental relations between the transmitters and receivers of mass communication. Despite the extensive exchange of information and news, media systems are firmly in the grip of nation-states. National owners, investors, and publics dominate; transnational media (such as the German-French TV network Arte) are hardly used; the transnationalization of media capital mostly ends at subregional borders.

Global media policy remains largely restricted to areas in which commercial interests demand regulation (such as copyright protection), leaving little prospect of a new approach. It is no accident that many commentators have evoked civil society as a third force alongside companies and governments. Perceptual distortions and informational uncertainties typify global exchanges via the Internet as much as they do classical journalism. There is a dearth of binding and stable processes of informational feedback. Moreover, Net-based political alliances, typically casual in nature and characterized by arbitrary selection and random events, lag far behind "offline politics."

Kai Hafez

See also Al Jazeera Television; CNN (Cable News Network)

Further Readings

Compaine, B. (2002). Think again—Global media. Foreign Policy, 133, 20–28.

Hafez, K. (2007). The myth of media globalization. Cambridge, UK: Polity.

Halavais, A. (2000). National borders on the World Wide Web. New Media and Society, 2, 7–28.

Herman, E. S., & McChesney, R. W. (1997). The global media: The new missionaries of corporate capitalism. London: Continuum.

Robertson, R. (1994). Globalization or glocalization? Journal of International Communication, 1, 33–52.

Sikkink, K., & Keck, M. E. (1998). Activists beyond borders: Advocacy networks in international politics. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Sinclair, J., Jacka, E., & Cunningham, S. (1996). Peripheral vision. New patterns in global television: Peripheral vision (pp. 1–32). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Sparks, C. (2000). The global, the local and the public sphere. In G. Wang, J. Servaes, & A. Goonasekera (Eds.), The new communications landscape: Demystifying media globalization (pp. 74–95). London: Routledge.

Straubhaar, J. (2001). Brazil: The role of the state in world television. In N. Morris & S. Waisbord (Eds.), Media and globalization: Why the state matters (pp. 133–153). Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Volkmer, I. (1999). News in the global sphere: A study of CNN and its impact on global communication. Luton, UK: University of Luton Press.

Goebbels, Joseph (1897–1945)

Paul Joseph Goebbels is credited by contemporary historians with being the single most influential person in propaganda history and the most important leader of the Third Reich next to Adolf Hitler and Hermann Göring. For more than 12 years he served as Hitler's minister for Propaganda and Popular Enlightenment and controlled virtually every aspect of Germany's cultural life.

Goebbels was born on October 29, 1897, in Rheydt, a small town in the Rhineland. Due to an infection he caught when he was 7 years old, he was left with a club foot that prevented him from military service in World War I. In 1921, Goebbels graduated from the University of Heidelberg with a PhD in literature and philosophy and worked in various temporary jobs.

In 1924, he joined the NSDAP (National Socialist Party of Germany). In the first years, he belonged to the left wing of the party, which was advocating a merger of socialistic and nationalistic ideology. After his first meeting with Adolf Hitler in 1926, he changed sides and became a member of the anti-Semitic and strictly anticommunist faction of the NSDAP.

In 1926, Goebbels was appointed Gauleiter (district leader) of the NSDAP for Berlin; after 1930 he served as Reichspropagandaleiter (chief of propaganda) of the Nazi Party as well. On March 13, 1933, he was appointed minister of the newly created Ministry of Propaganda and Popular Enlightenment. In 1944 he became Reichsbevollmächtigter für den totalen Kriegseinsatz (Commissioner for the Total War) and mobilized in a huge propaganda effort all the energies of German society for a war that was already lost.

Goebbels was an extremely skilled writer and a talented speaker, whose intelligence was clearly above the standards of the ruling National Socialists. Due to his short stature and his handicap, his craving for admiration was almost limitless. As the ruling propagandist of the Nazi Party he invented many propaganda techniques and strategies that raised the Nazi propaganda at its time (beside the inherent terror and threat, which always went along with it) to a new and until then unseen type of political communication. Goebbels invented the Hitler myth that infected many Germans and created a specific aesthetic style of the Nazi movement.

As minister, Goebbels was in charge of German film production as well as of the playlists of the theaters and concert halls. He turned the radio, then still very new, into a powerful propaganda weapon in the hand of the National Socialist state. Popular entertainment was to him one of the most efficient ways of carrying well-hidden propaganda messages to every German family, but he did not hesitate to use cruel atrocity propaganda when he believed it to be necessary. This was especially the case with the war against the Soviet Union in 1941–1945 and with the anti-Jewish propaganda of the Nazi regime. In 1938 he tried to counteract a decline in his prestige within the ruling Nazi group by organizing the Reichsprogromnacht against the German Jews, which for the first time clearly indicated that the Nazis would use direct violence in their fight against the Jews. Foreign countries were shocked at the Progromnacht, but Goebbels noted in his diaries that the Führer was "impressed" by this pseudo-spontaneous outbreak of violence—and what Hitler thought about him was the only thing that ever worried Goebbels. To him, it was the peak of his career: although he succeeded Adolf Hitler as chancellor of Germany on April 30, 1945, he remained in office only for one day, because the following day he committed suicide in the Führer Bunker in Berlin after he and his wife Magda had killed their six children.

Thymian Bussemer

See also Film and Politics; Mass Political Behavior; Persuasion, Political; Propaganda; Public Relations, Political; Strategic Communication

Further Readings

Balfour, M. (1979). Propaganda in war 1939–1945: Organisations, policies and publics in Britain and Germany. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.

Reuth, R. G. (1993). Goebbels. New York: Harcourt Brace.

GOFFMAN, ERVING

See PRESENTATION OF SELF IN EVERYDAY LIFE, THE

GOLDWATER, BARRY (1909–1998)

Barry Goldwater was a Republican senator from Arizona for five terms between 1953–1965 and 1969–1987. In 1964, Goldwater, a fervent anticommunist, won the Republican nomination for president but was defeated by Lyndon Johnson in a general election landslide, thanks largely to negative advertising in which Goldwater was painted as dangerous and extreme. Deemed a disaster in 1964, Goldwater's White House bid was later seen as a watershed event in the rise of modern American conservatism.

During the 1950s, Goldwater emerged as one of the nation's leading conservatives. In 1960, he published his book, Conscience of a Conservative, in which he outlined many of the central tenets that later defined modern conservatism. In 1964, Goldwater won a bitterly contested presidential nomination fight that exposed the growing factionalism between establishment Republican elites, predominantly from the Northeast, and grassroots populist conservatives increasingly identified with the growing American Sunbelt. At the 1964 Republican National Convention, Goldwater famously told a widely divided convention and national television audience, “Extremism in the defense of liberty is no vice.”

Goldwater’s abrasive personality and gruff comments did not endear him to the American electorate or to the media, and they opened the door for charges of extremism to cripple his campaign. Goldwater, who once quipped that “sometimes I think this country would be better off if we could just saw off the Eastern Seaboard and let it float out to sea,” was himself the target of one of the most famous presidential campaign commercials in history—the famed “Daisy Girl” ad, which highlighted the potential nuclear ramifications of a Goldwater presidency. The ad, which ran only once, was pulled by the Johnson campaign for being too controversial, but it continued to receive attention and airplay on news programs and talk shows throughout the fall.

Goldwater carried only six states in 1964 (Alabama, Arizona, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina), and won only 38.4% of the popular vote. His success in the deep South was credited largely to his opposition to the Civil Rights Act of 1964. By most accounts, the lone highlight of Goldwater’s presidential campaign was a nationally televised speech given on his behalf by Ronald Reagan on October 27, 1964. The speech launched Reagan’s political career in California, where he was elected governor in 1966.

Though future Republican presidential candidates typically avoided associations with Goldwater the man, the Arizona senator’s ideas about smaller government, lower taxes, property rights, anticommunism, and liberalism were largely adopted by the Republican Party in the coming decade, thereby greatly influencing the nature of modern American conservatism.

Reelected to the Senate in 1968, Goldwater remained politically active long after his failed presidential bid. In the late 1970s, he spearheaded opposition to the Panama Canal Treaty. He retired from the Senate in 1987 and died on May 29, 1998.

Sean P. Cunningham

See also Conservative, Conservatism; Daisy Girl Ad; Reagan, Ronald; Republican Party

Further Readings

Perlstein, R. (2001). Before the storm: Barry Goldwater and the unmaking of the American consensus. New York: Hill & Wang.

White, T. (1965). The making of the president, 1964. New York: Atheneum.

González Márquez, Felipe (1942–)

Felipe González Márquez (born in Seville, Andalucía, on March 5, 1942) graduated in 1966 with a law degree. Afterward, he specialized in representing workers and he also taught law at Seville University. At the beginning of his studies, he was a member of two Catholic organizations. He joined the illegal Partido Socialista Obrero Español (PSOE) in 1962, and as a party activist he used the nom de guerre Isidoro. From 1965 to 1969, he was a part of the PSOE Seville Provincial Committee; from 1969 he served on the PSOE National Committee; and in 1970 he became a member of the party’s Executive Commission.

He was arrested in 1971 for attending protests against General Francisco Franco. In 1974, he was elected PSOE general secretary, which represented a victory for the young renovating wing of the party over the traditionalist veterans.

After the end of the dictatorship of Franco, González became one of the leaders of the legal democratic opposition. In February 1977, the PSOE was legalized; participating in the first democratic elections, it became the leading parliamentary party of the opposition. González wanted to rid the PSOE of its Marxist character in order to convert it into a social-democratic party. In 1978, he was named vice president of the Socialist International. In the 1979 general elections, the PSOE could increase its percentage of votes, maintaining, however, its position as the leading opposition party. The change of government was successful in 1982, and González became prime minister. During his government, several reforms were carried out, including, for example, not only all levels of school education but also the promotion of university studies. Further, the reorganization of social security was initiated and a partial legalization of abortion was achieved, despite the opposition of the Roman Catholic Church. González pushed for liberal reforms and a restructuring of the economy, and in 1985 numerous state-owned companies were privatized partially or fully. The job layoffs resulting from this restructuring often provoked protests by workers and trade unions. The PSOE, however, won the general elections in 1986 and 1989 and kept its absolute majority until 1993; afterward, in his last legislative period, González was forced to form a pact with small regional political parties. In 1996, because of the poor economic situation, high unemployment rate, and numerous corruption scandals, as well as infringements during the prosecution of Euskadi Ta Askatasuna (ETA) terrorism, the PSOE lost the general elections to the People's Party. Thus, the term of office of Felipe González as Spanish prime minister, which had lasted for 14 years, came to an end. One year later, he resigned as leader of the party, but he stayed a member of the Spanish Parliament until 2000.

Felipe González was a very charismatic leader who was skilfully able to handle the mass media. Already, in the late phase of the franquismo (the Franco regime) and in the first year of the transition, when his party still was illegal, the young politician was flattered by the press. Then, and for a long time afterward, the press wrote about "Felipe"; it was an expression of his popularity that he was known only by his first name. Everywhere, the rhetorically brilliant politician was attested to "seduce" his interlocutors. In public performances and in TV interviews he self-consciously cultivated his Andalusian accent, which gave his statements a folksy touch. He used the (state-controlled) television for the promotion of his ideas, for example, in 1986 during the vote campaign for continuance in NATO. When in the second term of his government he was fiercely criticized by the conservative press—mainly by El Mundo—because of corruption in his party, his relationship to this part of the public, which he attacked vehemently, got worse. Yet, particularly in the foreign press, he was considered, for a long time after his presidency, to be Spain's most popular politician.

Walther L. Bernecker

Further Readings

Aguilar, M. A., & Chamorro, E. (1977). Felipe González, perfil humano y político [Felipe González, human and political profile]. Madrid: Cambio.

Cernuda, P. (1994). El Presidente [The president]. Madrid: Temas de hoy.

Guerra, A. (1992). La Filípicas. Diez años de gobierno socialista, 1982–1992 [The Filípicas: Ten years of socialist government, 1982–1992]. Barcelona: Planeta.

Gutiérrez, J. L., & de Miguel, A. (1993). La ambición del César. Un retrato político y humano de Felipe González [The ambition of Caesar: A political and human picture of Felipe González]. Madrid: Temas de hoy.

Prego, V. (2000). Presidentes [Presidents]. Barcelona: Plaza y Janes.

Gorbachev, Mikhail (1931–)

Mikhail Gorbachev was the leader of the Soviet Union from 1985 until 1991. His reform efforts contributed to ending the Cold War, ended the political supremacy of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, and ultimately dissolved the Soviet Union. He was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1990.

Gorbachev is known for trying to revive the Soviet economy, which had reached stagnation in 1985. He initiated acceleration reforms, later known as perestroika ("reconstruction") and glasnost ("liberalization" or "opening"). In 1988, glasnost brought about greater freedom of speech, a radical change for a system in which control of speech and suppression of government criticism had previously been strictly enforced. The press became less controlled, and thousands of political prisoners and many dissidents were Presidents George Bush and Mikhail Gorbachev hold a press conference at the Helsinki Summit, Finland (September 1990). Hailed in the West for his "New Thinking" in foreign affairs, Gorbachev was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1990.

Source: Ronald Reagan Library.

released. Time magazine named Gorbachev Man of the Year in 1985.

Gorbachev's economic reforms, which permitted the private ownership of businesses in the services, manufacturing, and foreign trade sectors, did not produce the expected results, bringing about food shortages and provoking internal dissatisfaction and hostility from Soviet extremists. They contended that Gorbachev weakened the Communist Party and the country's military capabilities.

Gorbachev also launched radical reforms meant to reduce party control of the government institutions. He proposed a new executive in the form of a presidential system, as well as a new legislative element, to be called the Congress of People's Deputies.

In 1988, Gorbachev abandoned the Brezhnev Doctrine and allowed the Eastern bloc nations to determine their own internal affairs. Gorbachev's relaxation of Soviet censorship and control led to liberation revolutions in the Eastern Bloc in the late 1980s and to the collapse of the Soviet Union. The loosening of Soviet hegemony over Eastern Europe effectively ended the Cold War, and for this Gorbachev was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize on October 15, 1990. Also, on March 15 of the same year, Gorbachev was elected as the first executive president of the Soviet Union.

Gorbachev was largely appreciated in the West for his "New Thinking" in foreign affairs. He sought to improve relations and trade with the West by reducing Cold War tensions. He established close relationships with several Western leaders, including U.S. President Ronald Reagan. In Germany he is acclaimed for allowing German reunification to proceed.

In 1986 and 1987, Gorbachev made proposals for the elimination of intermediate-range nuclear weapons in Europe and agreed to eliminate all nuclear weapons by the end of the century. In February 1988, Gorbachev also announced the full withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan.

Gorbachev resigned as general secretary of the Communist Party and advised the Central Committee to dissolve itself after the August 1991 unsuccessful coup led by hard-line communists. He lost the presidency to his opponent Boris Yeltsin, after the collapse of the Union in December 1991.

Raluca Cozma

See also Reagan, Ronald

Further Readings

Matlock, J. F. (2004). Reagan and Gorbachev: How the Cold War ended. New York: Random House.

Gore, Albert (1948–)

Albert Arnold Gore is a Democrat who served as the 45th vice president of the United States (1993–2001) under President Bill Clinton. Before becoming vice president, Gore was a U.S. congressman for 16 years, serving in the House of Representatives (1977–1985) and in the Senate (1985–1993) as a representative of Tennessee. In 2000, Gore was the Democratic candidate for the U.S. presidency, running against Republican George W. Bush. Although Gore won the popular vote, he lost the Electoral College vote after a controversial ballot count in Florida and a legal ruling by the U.S. Supreme Court that awarded the presidency to his opponent.

As vice president, Gore is credited for supporting legislation that led to the development of the Internet in the United States. His efforts resulted in the High Performance Computing and Communication Act of 1991, a bill that allocated $600 million to the development of an "information superhighway." Gore's vision was to create an "infrastructure for the Global Village" through cooperation among the government, academia, and the industry. Gore pushed for open access to this technology for all Americans and also for legislation on digital privacy.

As a presidential candidate, Gore was often criticized as being stiff and having a boring communication style that lacked charisma. The political advertising in his presidential campaign, although primarily policy and issue oriented, were noted for their negativity toward his opponent, George W. Bush. His performance in televised debates was generally uninspiring.

However, Gore's achievements as an advocate for environmental protection are more impressive. Gore's interest in the environment dates back to the 1970s and the 1980s, when he was among the first politicians to initiate environmental-friendly actions, such as hearings on greenhouse emissions and global warming, in Congress. The culmination of his environment advocacy is the 2006 Academy Award–winning documentary An Inconvenient Truth, which raises awareness about the damaging effects of global warming. Since its release, the film has become, up to present time, the third most viewed documentary in the United States, which prompted Gore to release a companion book that also became a best-seller. In February 2007, Gore associated with Richard Branson (the owner of the Virgin brand) to initiate the Virgin Earth Competition. The prize is $25 million and will be offered to the first person who designs a commercially viable method to remove one billion metric tons of carbon gases a year from the atmosphere for 10 years.

Gore is the author of several books, including The Assault on Reason (2007) and Earth in Balance: Ecology and the Human Spirit (1992). He is also known as a businessman and the founder of independent media company and television channel Current TV. In October 2007, Gore, along with the United Nation's Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

Monica Postelnicu

Further Readings

Gore, A. (1991, September). Infrastructure for the global village. Scientific American, 265(3) [Special Issue], 150–153.

Gore, A. (2006). An inconvenient truth: The planetary emergency of global warming and what we can do about it. Emmaus, PA: Rodale.

Kaid, L. L. (2002). Videostyle and political advertising effects in the 2000 presidential campaign. In R. E. Denton, Jr. (Ed.), The 2000 presidential campaign: A communication perspective (pp. 183–197). Westport, CT: Praeger.

Turque, B. (2000). Inventing Al Gore. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

Government Communication

Government communication refers to public information institutions and strategies whereby governments manage the flow of political messages. Government communication aims at informing the citizens about the executive's positions and policies, but also at legitimatizing political actions, thereby creating popular consent and achieving an advantageous position in the electoral competition. Since mass media are the most important means of political information of the citizens, they are the means and targets of messages, while the strategies are determined by the political objectives of the government. In all Western democracies, we find similar institutions and professional and political roles of government communication that refer to media relations and message dissemination, political marketing and political strategizing with regard to media agenda setting.

During the past 30 years, the public information strategies of governments have changed from traditional press release policies—based on interpersonal exchanges between government spokespeople and journalists—to a professionalized and specialized process of strategic communication controlling the flow of news in the media. Government communication in Western democracies has become ever more sophisticated and complex as new information and communication technologies have advanced and penetrated all forms of political communications. In terms of the action repertoire, governments apply a series of news management activities and rhetoric and symbolic actions to produce political messages, such as the personalization of politics or image management; the creation of pseudo-events and strategies of defining political issues by framing and spin-controlling political messages. Efforts of spin-control refer to the depiction of the issue in the interaction of news managers and journalists. Most likely it includes the simple pattern of stressing the importance of features that are most attractive to target publics or target media and avoiding the features that are deemed to be undesirable from the point of view of the government. Efforts of spinning can be regularly observed after major political developments, when journalists are often desperate to speak to authoritative sources capable of giving them an instant interpretation of what has happened. If it is not possible to control the message, another technique that belongs to the action repertoire of government communication is dethematization, which—as diversionary tactic—intends to divert from substantial issues.

Governments compete with other political actors for favorable media attention. There are various reasons why the messages of the executive have better chances to pass the media filter. In most Western democracies, the government is the most powerful decision-making body that is legitimatized by the popular vote. It is active in setting national priorities and proposing policy innovations, taking collectively binding decisions, and implementing them in its programs. As to politics, governments constantly work on legislative and political coalition building. Finally, the leadership function is expressed in the executive's role of crisis management, in maintaining international commitments and entertaining foreign relations, if not proclaiming war. Another reason for the governments' favorable position in public communication is the availability of human and financial resources and institutions for public information.

As every government is obliged to inform its citizens, modern executives are in command of institutions and roles to prepare and disseminate official information. In most countries, we find a division of labor regarding the regular day-to-day relation of government spokespeople and the media and the more strategic and political aspects. The most prominent role of official government communication is formally occupied by the press secretary. The formal and informal roles of strategic communication are held by a circle of advisors who decide on the strategy of news management and the reactions to the issues and opinions raised in the media. Those positions are usually located at the heart of the executive office. In addition to these decision-making roles, most countries entertain government information agencies that employ civil servants and public information specialists working in intelligence, media communications, issue campaigns, and policy consulting. Although these offices are obliged to act nonpartisan and pursue their information task in a politically neutral way, they are the most precious resource of proactive news management.

While the general objectives of government communication and its technological means might converge across governments and countries, the environment of government communication varies according to the makeup of the political system and the role of the executive within it. Hence, government communication in a presidential system with low party cohesion in the legislature, like in the United States, is focused on the chief executive. Since the president is elected independently from the legislature and stays in office for a fixed term, his government information policy, strictly speaking, does not look back on the parliamentary groups in Congress, but on public opinion. According to Samuel Kernell, the strategy of "going public" tends to replace the negotiations between the executive and Congress. Geared toward mobilizing the general public's support, this approach is related to a proactive strategy of reaching out to the electorate by determining the media agenda. As a consequence of seeking the general public's support, the personalization of politics and the creation of pseudo-events around the issues of legislation and national security are the most likely outcomes.

In contrast to the presidential system in the United States, the institutional arrangements in parliamentary systems tend to support government communication strategies that aim at orchestrating the debate between the parties inside and outside of Parliament. In countries where two or more parties form a coalition government that depends on the support of the parliamentary fractions, the efforts of the chief executive to set the media agenda clearly aim at positioning his administration as political leader within the coalition government and vis-à-vis the opposition parties. This general constellation becomes even more complex if the government is confronted with oppositional voices from within its own party. In this case, the communication strategy of the executive is not only designed to control the media agenda but must respond to the political rivalries within and across the coalition parties. The constellation of strong parties under high competition provokes public information approaches that focus on political issue management, so the major activities refer to the thematization and de-thematization and the framing of politics.

Barbara Pfetsch

See also Agenda Setting

Further Readings

Han, L. C. (2001). Governing from center stage: White House communication strategies during the television age of politics. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press.

Han, L. C. (2005). The Rose Garden strategy revisited: How presidents use public activities. In L. C. Han & D. J. Heith (Eds.), In the public domain: Presidents and the challenges of public leadership (pp. 163–177). Albany: State University of New York Press.

Jacobs, L. R. (2005). Communicating from the White House: Presidential narrowcasting and the national interest. In J. D. Aberbach & M. A. Peterson (Eds.), The executive branch (pp. 174–217). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Kernell, S. (1986). Going public: New strategies of presidential leadership. Washington: Congressional Quarterly Press.

Kingdon, J. (1984). Agendas, alternatives and public policies. Boston, Toronto: Little, Brown.

Kumar, M. J. (2003). Source material: The White House and the press: News organizations as a presidential resource and as a source of pressure. Presidential Studies Quarterly, 33, 669–683.

Linsky, M. (1986). Impact: How the press affects federal policymaking. New York, London: Norton.
Ornstein, N. J., & Mann, T. E. (Eds.). (2000). The permanent campaign and its future. Washington, DC: American Enterprise Institute and Brookings Institution.
Seymour-Ure, C. (2000). Prime ministers' and presidents' news operations: What effects on the job? In H. Tumber (Ed.), Media power, professionals and policy (pp. 151–166). London: Routledge.

Graber, Doris A. (1923–)

Award-winning scholar, teacher, and mentor, Doris Appel Graber's professional career and personal life are shaped by her inquisitive and adventurous nature, her loyalty to family and friends, and her rigorous, pioneering, and trend-setting scholarship. Her love of experiential travel is a reflection of her insatiable curiosity and interest in understanding the world in all its complexity.

With more than 100 chapters and journal articles, Graber's publications span a number of fields in political science. Among her 15 books to date, several stand out as defining the field of political communication. Processing Politics: Learning From Television in the Internet Age (2001) received the Goldsmith Book Prize for Best Academic Political Communication book of 2003. In it she argues that findings from neurobiology research show how the brain is "wired" to assimilate information more effectively through audiovisuals, thus challenging those who assert that print media are more important than television as a source of political information. She finds that when citizens talk about issues they consider important, they draw upon accurate and substantive information. Television can provide that information, though the full potential of the medium has yet to be realized. Her seminal study, Processing the News: How People Tame the Information Tide (1984), set a new standard for research on information processing. And the link between political opinion and news about crime was established by Graber more than 25 years ago in Crime News and the Public.

Founding editor of the journal Political Communication in 1992, a journal cosponsored by the American Political Science Association (APSA) and the International Communication Association (ICA), Graber also received APSA's Edelman Career Award that year. Her impact on the field also has been recognized by APSA's book award—the Doris A. Graber Outstanding Book Award for the best book published in political communication in the past decade. Among other offices held, she was vice president of APSA and president of the International Society for Political Psychology, Midwest Public Opinion Association, Midwest Political Science Association, and the political communication divisions of the ICA and APSA.

Graber was a feature writer and reporter for newspapers in St. Louis, Missouri, after completing her BA at Washington University. She took a PhD in international relations and political science at Columbia University in New York. She is currently professor of political science at the University of Illinois at Chicago and has held academic appointments at Northwestern University, the University of Chicago, and Harvard University.

Holli A. Semetko

See also Processing the News

Further Readings

Graber, D. A. (1984). Processing the news: How people tame the information tide. New York: Longman.
Graber, D. A. (2001). Processing politics: Learning from television in the Internet age. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
Graber, D. A. (2006). Mass media and American politics (7th ed.). Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press.

Graduate School of Political Management

The Graduate School of Political Management (GSPM) was established in 1986 under the direction of Neil Fabricant, a New York lawyer. Fabricant believed that politics was becoming professionalized and that an institution needed to ensure that the profession matured in a way that fostered ethics and the democratic process. The GSPM was intended to prepare students to enter the field of professional politics, and the first class of 24 students began classes in September 1987 on the Manhattan campus of Baruch College. After opening a degree program in Washington, D.C., in 1991, the GSPM became part of the George Washington University in July 1995. In January 2006, GSPM became the largest program in the university's College of Professional Studies. The mission statement of the GSPM is to make politics better by educating its students and professionals in the tools, principles, and values of participatory democracy, preparing them for careers as ethical and effective advocates and leaders at the international, national, and local levels.

The GSPM faculty is drawn from the ranks of top-performing practitioners in the Washington, D.C., area. The GSPM offers master's degrees in political management, legislative affairs, and, beginning in September 2007, strategic public relations. The school also offers a graduate certificate in political action committee (PAC) and political management (the only graduate education offered anywhere in PAC management), and it manages Semester in Washington (SIW), an undergraduate program (including an innovative leadership development program for Native Americans) for students desiring to study politics in Washington. As of 2006, the GSPM has 270 graduate students (200 in political management, 50 in legislative affairs, and 20 PACs students) and 50 SIW students. More than 1,300 alumni work in politics, public policy, advocacy, and public relations around the world.

Students study the full range of practical political skills needed for success in the field. All students follow a core curriculum that provides them with the foundations of political practice, communications, ethics, and research methods. Students may follow concentrations in lobbying, campaign management, issues management, fundraising, corporate/trade association public affairs, polling, public policy, and leadership.

The GSPM advances the growing field of professional politics through its research program, the Institute for Politics, Democracy and the Internet (IPDI). Originally organized in 1998, IPDI is the leading research activity dedicated to understanding advanced technology's emerging role in politics. IPDI hosts the annual Politics Online Conference, the major gathering of students, researchers, and practitioners working at the cutting edge of digital politics.

The GSPM is also dedicated to spreading democratic politics worldwide. Working with the Corporación Andina de Fomento (Andean Development Corporation), the GSPM's Governability Program has trained more than 3,000 local officials, party operatives, and community organizers across Latin America in the skills of communications, good government, and accountability. In addition, GSPM conducts frequent campaign and political communications conferences throughout Latin America.

Charles Cushman

Further Readings

The Graduate School of Political Management Web site: http://www.gwu.edu/~gspm/

Graham, Katherine

See Watergate

Grassroots Campaigning

Grassroots campaigning refers to efforts to mobilize individuals to take some action to influence a political outcome. In practice, grassroots campaigns come in two types: (1) efforts to mobilize individuals either to turn out to vote or to vote a certain way in an upcoming election and (2) efforts to mobilize individuals to contact a policymaker to take a particular action (also called "outside lobbying"). The distinguishing features of grassroots campaigns are that they (1) mobilize masses to participate in politics, such as contacting their legislator or turn out to vote; and (2) they are conducted through narrow communications such as mail, e-mail, phone calls, or face-to-face visits rather than broadcast media such as television or radio.

Incidence of Grassroots Campaigning

How often is grassroots campaigning used as a tactic? There are two methods of measuring the number of grassroots get-out-the-vote drives: survey data and group self-reports. Survey data suggests that in 2004, slightly more than half of the adult population reported some form of contact from a campaign, up from 40% in 2000. The raw numbers of group contacts in 2004 were 8 million door-to-door contacts by the Kerry-Edwards campaign, and more than 9 million by the Bush-Cheney campaign. Each of the respective campaigns was aided by groups that shared the candidates' respective ideologies. For example, the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) knocked on 6 million doors and made more than 100 million volunteer phone calls, while the U.S. Chamber of Commerce claims to have made more than 2.1 million phone calls to its members in eight targeted states.

Political scientists have attempted to count the number of groups that use grassroots lobbying by sampling groups and surveying group leaders. Some have estimated that 56% of groups surveyed regularly mobilize members, plus 38% of groups occasionally mobilize members. This is similar to earlier counts that found that 84% of groups surveyed ran letter-writing campaigns, while 80% used grassroots lobbying efforts.

Grassroots "Get Out the Vote" Campaigns

Early research on grassroots campaigning used surveys to determine the effectiveness of Get Out the Vote (GOTV). There are two problems with this approach. The first is that the method uses self-reports to determine voting behavior, which can be unreliable. The second problem is that endogenous variables can bias the results. That is, individuals who claim to have been contacted by a campaign may be more likely to turn out to vote for reasons not related to the campaign contact itself. Field experimental research has resolved these methodological problems by using public records to measure voter turnout behavior and by randomly assigning individuals to be contacted by a campaign.

Recent research has shown that more personal contacts are more successful than less personal attempts to get out the vote. The difference is so great that it is more cost effective to conduct door-to-door campaigns than direct mailings. For instance, Gerber and Green (2000) estimate that a door-to-door campaign costs $8 per additional vote, while a direct mail campaign costs about $40 per vote.

The research has consistently found that impersonal methods of contact are ineffective. Telephone calls made by commercial phone banks are ineffective at turning out voters, as are Robo or automated calls, or calls placed to households with a recorded message. Phone calls can be effective, but only if they are conducted by volunteers rather than a commercial phone bank. This last result seems to be because volunteers read the script for calls in a more conversational way than professional callers.

Recent research has branched into attempting to determine the influence of GOTV campaigns on specific subpopulations. For example, young people are influenced by appeals to turn out at the same rate as older adults. However, young people are harder to reach, dampening the overall effect of youth vote drives. Many field experimental studies have also examined specific ethnic subpopulations. The literature has suggested a number of special considerations for different groups, including language barriers and difficulty of locating specific subpopulations. When targeting specific subpopulations, it appears that campaigns can be improved with strategies specific to the target population. For example, canvassing was more effective in getting Latinos to vote when the canvassers were also Latino.

Grassroots Lobbying

As with grassroots GOTV campaigns, groups have many methods of carrying out grassroots lobbying campaigns. Groups can have volunteers or commercial phone banks call members to ask them to contact a legislator. A more sophisticated method allows groups to call activists and patch them through to an official's phone number. E-mail, because of its low cost in terms of money and time, has grown in popularity for conducting grassroots lobbying campaigns. Groups maintain lists of interested activists and e-mail them when an important action (e.g., legislative vote, governor's veto) is about to occur. Many groups have software that allows members to click on a link to automatically send an e-mail to their legislator while allowing the group to keep track of which members responded.

Is grassroots lobbying an effective strategy? Bergan, Gerber, Green, and Panagopoulos (2006) conducts a randomized field experiment to evaluate the effectiveness of a grassroots lobbying campaign attempting to influence the state legislature in New Hampshire. A number of antismoking groups e-mailed their members, asking them to e-mail their legislators to support a bill banning smoking in restaurants and bars. Legislators were randomly assigned to be contacted by a grassroots e-mail lobbying campaign. The results show that grassroots lobbying by e-mail affects legislative voting behavior.

As there have been fewer field experimental studies on grassroots lobbying, we must rely on other evidence to gauge the relative effectiveness of different grassroots lobbying methods. Surveys of legislators suggest that, as with GOTV drives, the more personal the contact, the more effective on legislative behavior. Likewise, anecdotal evidence suggests that context matters. Lobbyists and state legislators suggest that it takes 10 or fewer calls or contacts to legislators to have an effect, while at the national level, legislators suggest that it takes many more. This suggests that the effectiveness of grassroots lobbying differs substantially across legislatures.

Daniel E. Bergan

Further Readings

Bergan, D. E., Gerber, A. S., Green, D. P., & Panagopoulos, C. (2006). Grassroots mobilization and voter turnout in 2004. Public Opinion Quarterly, 69(5), 760–777.

Cornfield, M. (1999–2000, December/January). The online campaigner. Campaigns & Elections, p. 45.

Gerber, A., & Green, D. P. (2000). The effects of canvassing, telephone calls, and direct mail on turnout: A field experiment. American Political Science Review, 94, 653–663.

Kollman, K. (1998). Outside lobbying: Public opinion and interest group strategies. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Michelson, M. R. (2005). Meeting the challenge of Latino voter mobilization. Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 601(1), 85–101.

Nickerson, D. W. (in press). Hunting the elusive young voter. Journal of Political Marketing.

Nickerson, D. W. (in press). Volunteer phone calls can mobilize voters: Evidence from eight field experiments. American Politics Research.

Rosenstone, S. J., & Hansen, J. M. (1993). Mobilization, participation, and democracy in America. New York: Macmillan.

Rosenthal, A. (2001). The third house: Lobbyists and lobbying in the States (2nd ed.). Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Schlozman, K. L., & Tierney, J. T. (1983). More of the same: Washington pressure group activity in a decade of change. Journal of Politics, 45(2), 351–377.

Wolfinger, R., & Rosenstone, S. J. (1980). Who votes? New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Great Debates, The

The term Great Debates was commonly used for the Lincoln-Douglas Debates during the 1858 Senate race in Illinois. Since then, the term has been extended to apply to several presidential debates, especially during the television era. Most famously, the presidential debates of 1960 were the first televised debates and included John Kennedy and Richard Nixon.

It is often contended that these debates were harmful to Nixon's campaign because several problems related to the medium were unkind to Nixon and made Kennedy look more credible. Nixon appeared to be tired and unwell during the debates due to excessive lighting that caused heat and makeup problems. Kennedy appeared well rested, energized, and healthy. Some speculate that Nixon "won" the voters who listened to the debates broadcast on radio while Kennedy "won" the voters who viewed the debates on television. However, the analysis of this data, as well as the data itself, was questionable, and the accuracy of this conclusion is still questionable.

The 1960 debates offered a chance for every voter with television access to watch both presidential candidates. This was the first time in history that voters were afforded this opportunity without having to attend a convention or debate in person. The candidates were pitted against each other in a setting where questions focused on domestic and foreign issues; they were given time to respond to each other as well as to questions posed by media representatives. These debates differed from current presidential debates in format, length, and topics, but they were the first introduction of debates as a campaign forum.

Over the course of the past 40 years, presidential debates have been used strategically during campaigns. Sydney Kraus (1962, 1977), along with others, reviews the debates and provides suggestions for how campaigns might strategize further with this campaign forum. In a series aptly titled The Great Debates, Kraus and contributors have dissected and analyzed not only candidates participating in debates, but how debates function.

As a book and the subsequent series*, The Great Debates* offers a solid report, a close analysis, and careful critique of the presidential debates since 1960. First published in 1962, the original book is now out of print, but Kraus's critique of televised presidential debates continues. In addition, online resources provide samples from the debates and commentaries from those who participated in them. The greatest contribution of the reflections in The Great Debates series is not only that it serves as a reminder of the importance of media in campaigns, but that it chronicles change over four decades of presidential debates.

Elizabeth Dudash

See also Debates; Kraus, Sidney

Further Readings

The great debate and beyond: The history of televised presidential debates. (n.d.). Retrieved January 15, 2007, from http://www.museum.tv/debateweb/html/index.htm

Kraus, S. (Ed.). (1962). The great debates: Background, perspectives, effects. Bloomington: University of Indiana Press.

Kraus, S. (Ed.). (1977). The great debates: Kennedy vs. Nixon, 1960. Bloomington: University of Indiana Press.

Greeley, Horace (1811–1872)

Horace Greeley was an American newspaper editor, a publisher of diverse opinions and literary content, and a champion of 19th-century social and political movements. He used the New York Tribune, the crowning achievement of his career, to call for protective tariffs and improvements in national infrastructure, the abolition of slavery, and to influence the policies of both the Whig and Republican parties. In 1872, Greeley ran unsuccessfully for president as a candidate for both the Democratic and Liberal Republican tickets, the only time in American history when a candidate received the backing of two major political parties.

In 1834, Greeley founded the New-Yorker, his first successful editorial project, as a weekly literary and news journal that featured his interest in politics, social issues, and the arts and sciences. In 1837, Greeley first met Thurlow Weed, editor of the Albany Evening Journal and one of New York's most powerful Whig operatives. Weed asked Greeley to edit a new journal, the Jeffersonian, to promote the gubernatorial campaign of his friend William H. Seward, which was successful in part because of Greeley's editorial talents. Greeley's connection with Weed helped him in turn launch the Log Cabin, a campaign weekly he first issued May 2, 1840, to promote William Henry Harrison's successful presidential bid. At its peak, the Log Cabin reached an astonishing circulation of 80,000 copies a week.

After Harrison's election, Seward and Weed encouraged Greeley to issue a daily paper that would reach Manhattan's working-class audience with a range of content, from local and national news to the advocacy of political ideas that would help advance Whig social programs. On April 10, 1841, Greeley first issued the New York Tribune and edited the newspaper for more than 30 years. He opened the Tribune's pages to contributions from a range of writers who often identified themselves with a Transcendentalist movement promoting social harmony, popularizing the communitarian ideas of French socialist Charles Fourier (1772–1837). The Tribune also advocated homestead legislation and the principle of distributing free public lands to settlers, attacked the exploitation of wage labor, denounced monopolies, supported women's rights and temperance, opposed capital punishment, and editorialized vehemently against slavery. By the 1860s, the Tribune and its various editions had a total circulation of more than a quarter of a million.

Historians credit Greeley with naming the Republicans, as well as helping form many of the political objectives outlined in their 1856 and 1860 platforms. With Greeley's support, the Republicans nominated Abraham Lincoln, and during the Civil War, Greeley pressured Lincoln constantly to emancipate the rebel slaves. His most famous editorial on the subject, "The Prayer of Twenty Millions," was published August 20, 1862, urging the president to use the Second Confiscation Act to allow Union commanders to free the slaves of rebel masters.

In May 1872, the newly formed Liberal Republican Party nominated Greeley for president. His campaign took an unexpected turn when the Democratic Party, desperate to unseat President Ulysses S. Grant, also nominated him as its candidate. Greeley resigned his Tribune editorship and delivered speeches across the country to stress the need for national reconciliation, but both campaigns quickly degenerated into a mudslinging melee. The persistent assaults on Greeley's character took a mental and physical toll on him. Exhausted, disheartened, and ill, Greeley died on November 29, 1872.

Gregory A. Borchard

See also Journalism, Political

Further Readings

Borchard, G. (2006). From pink lemonade to salt river: Horace Greeley's utopia and the death of the Whig party. Journalism History, 31(1), 22–33.

Greeley, H. (1868). Recollections of a busy life. New York: Arno.

Parton, J. (1855). Life of Horace Greeley. New York: Mason Brothers.

Van Deusen, G. G. (1953). Horace Greeley: Nineteenth-century crusader. New York: Hill & Wang.

Williams, R. C. (2006). Horace Greeley: Champion of American freedom. New York: New York University Press.

Green Party

A political party that belongs to the family of the so-called New Politics parties is commonly named a Green party (sometimes also alternative party or ecological party). Such parties were founded in the late 1970s and in the early 1980s in most of the Western industrialized countries. Shortly after their emergence, Poguntke (1987) developed a first theoretical description and definition of the New Politics party family that has found widespread acceptance in the literature. According to this definition, New Politics parties differ from traditional political parties with respect to their programmatic orientation, their party organization, their political style, and the profile of their members and voters.

Poguntke deduced all the specific characteristics of this party family from the central characteristics of the New Politics. The term New Politics is used to refer to the changes in the political attitudes and dispositions of the citizens that result from the process of postmaterialist value change in advanced industrialized societies. The most important change resulting from this so-called silent revolution is the increasing emphasis on quality of life, citizen participation, and self-actualization, while material affluence and economic growth are losing their dominance. As a consequence, there is a change in the dominant lines of political polarization in modern societies.

In their party platforms, Green parties take a stand in favor of New Politics issues like nuclear disarmament, solidarity with the so-called Third World, grassroots democracy, and gender equality. In the early years of the New Politics parties, their most distinctive programmatic claim was giving first priority to ecological imperatives. This is the reason that they often named themselves Green parties. Since adherents of New Politics show a strong emphasis on direct political participation, the organizational structure of Green parties originally differed fundamentally from the internal structure of traditional political parties. A series of measures were taken in order to avoid processes of internal oligarchization and hierarchization: ordinary party members had the right to participate in party meetings at all organizational levels and were directly involved in important political decisions. Elected officeholders were strongly controlled by the rank and files, and their terms of office were limited. The intention was to realize the goal of direct participation of the party members under the requirements of the respective national party law as far as possible. However, despite all these efforts, there was a contradiction between operating as a political party within the parliamentary system and the fundamental preference for a grassroots democracy. Initially, Green parties tried to dissolve this contradiction by becoming active in and outside the parliamentary arena simultaneously. Members and officeholders of Green parties engaged strongly in unconventional political actions like demonstrations, boycotts, squattings, and walkouts. The Parliament was seen as an arena that was only to be used in order to give the political concerns of the Green Movement a greater public visibility. According to this strategy, Green parties initially did not strive for coming into power. During its early days, the German Green Party described this strategy with a nice metaphor: while the extraparliamentary New Social Movements should form the "supporting leg" of the party, the parliamentary work should not be more than the "free leg." Taking all this together, the political style of New Politics parties can be described as unconventional. The last aspect of Poguntke's definition of New Politics parties refers to the specific profile of their membership and their electorate. He saw the main potential for Green parties among persons with postmaterial value orientations. According to the available empirical evidence, those persons were predominantly young, highly educated, urban, and members of the new middle classes.

Poguntke's description of the New Politics party family was perfectly correct for the 1980s. Starting in the early 1990s, Green parties underwent a fundamental metamorphosis, which was first described using the prototypical example of the German Green Party as the "Greying of the Greens." The first aspect of this metamorphosis was a programmatic change from fundamental opposition to the political system toward a pragmatic politics of reform within the Parliament. This implies the willingness to become part of a ruling coalition. The second aspect was a gradual shift of the internal party structures toward the classical élite-directed model of the traditional parties. The third aspect was a change in the political style in the direction of conventional politics, for example, the adoption of personalization strategies in Green election campaigns. Finally, the "Greying of the Greens" describes changes in the electoral support of New Politics parties. In the course of time, their voters became older in the average. At the same time, the electoral support in the youngest age groups was gradually declining. This pattern does not fit the model of intergenerational value change proposed by Inglehart (1977). It seems, that at least in Germany the Green Party is in fact a single-generation party, which is predominantly supported by persons who experienced their formative years in the politically turbulent 1970s and 1980s.

Markus Klein

Further Readings

Barnes, S. H., Kaase, M., et al. (1979). Political action. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Bürklin, W., & Dalton, R. J. (1994). Das Ergrauen der Grünen [The greying of the Greens]. In H.-D. Klingemann & M. Kaase (Eds.), Wahlen und Wähler: Analysen aus Anlass der Bundestagswahl 1990 [Elections and voters: Analyses of causes in the 1990 national election] (pp. 264–302). Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag.

Inglehart, R. (1977). The silent revolution: Changing values and political styles among Western publics. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Klein, M., & Arzheimer, K. (1997). Grau in Grau. Die GRÜNEN und ihre Wähler nach eineinhalb Jahrzehnten [Grey in grey: The Greens and their voters after a decade and a half]. Kölner Zeitschrift für Soziologie und Sozialpsychologie, 49, 650–673.

Klein, M., & Falter, J. W. (2003). Der lange Weg der Grünen: Eine Partei zwischen Protest und Regierung [The long road of the Greens: A party between protest and government]. München: C. H. Beck.

Müller-Rommel, F. (Ed.). (1989). New politics in Western Europe: The rise and the success of Green parties and alternative lists. Boulder, CO: Westview.

Müller-Rommel, F. (1993). Grüne Parteien in Westeuropa [Green parties in Western Europe]. Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag.

Poguntke, T. (1987). New politics and party systems: The emergence of a new type of party? West European Politics, 10, 76–88.

Poguntke, T. (1993). Alternative politics. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

Group Decision Making, Political

Many of the decisions made in democracies result from group processes, both small and large. The emergence of deliberative democratic theory over the past two decades has spurred research on political group decision making by stressing the role citizens can play in larger political processes. Researchers informed by deliberative democratic theory examine and evaluate existing organizations and institutions designed to promote citizen participation and deliberation, from government-sponsored citizen forums to voluntary groups involved in democratic social movements. Research has also looked at trial juries, which provide citizens with a formal opportunity to render a consequential public decision (verdict or civil judgment). In addition, scholars interested in political group decision making have investigated the process, content, and quality of group deliberation by governmental officials in institutions, such as Congress and the executive branch.

Citizen Deliberation

The modern ideal of citizen deliberation traces back to the Athenian assembly, in which male citizens acted as legislators on important public questions. In this vision of democracy, citizen decision making was essential to establishing the legitimacy of the state's decisions. This foundational idea deeply influenced democratic theorists from Jean-Jacques Rousseau to Jürgen Habermas. In general, deliberative political theory argues that democratic systems fail to the extent that they do not promote robust, widespread deliberation. A deliberative public sphere in which citizens participate is necessary to help individual citizens develop broad and public-spirited perspectives and reasoned judgments on public policy. In addition, to maintain legitimacy, formal institutions of government in representative democracy such as legislatures, courts, and chief executives should engage in deliberation in their decision-making processes to facilitate representative and well-informed outcomes.

A central claim in the contemporary study of citizen deliberation is that citizens' policy views and civic attitudes can transform through public-oriented discussion, and a wide range of political reforms have demonstrated the potency of such deliberation. In the 1970s, citizen juries in the United States and planning cells (Planungszelle) in Germany experimented with varied techniques for convening small representative samples of citizens to study complex public policy issues. Government agencies, private foundations, and others have used these and related processes to gain a sense of what the general public thinks about issues after having the opportunity to deliberate. More recently, the deliberative poll has also become a popular means of assessing how public opinion changes as a result of one-to-three days of discussion.

Some reformers have suggested institutionalizing deliberative practices to give citizen discussion a formally recognized role in government. One widely cited example is Brazil's Participatory Budgeting and Management Council processes, which have created mechanisms for local civil society organizations to influence fiscal and regulatory decisions. British Columbia's Citizens Assembly process provides another precedent, by bringing together a random sample of the province's population to deliberate over several months and draft an electoral reform proposal that was subsequently put on the ballot for ratification by the full electorate.

Groups in Democratic Social Movements

A handful of studies have found that deliberation can have transformational effects on citizens who take part in democratic social movements. Opportunities for democratic decision making exist within many movement organizations, such as civil rights groups in the 1960s, women's collectives in the 1970s, and fair trade groups in the past 2 decades. Though these civil society organizations rarely wield formal political authority, they do have significant cultural and political influence.

Taking part in the internal governance of these organizations, whether planning public events, developing strategy, or undertaking any number of decision-tasks, constitute intrinsically valuable decision making in a pluralistic society. In addition, these tasks can provide citizens with habits, attitudes, and skills conducive to effective participation in other public activities, fueling the development of participatory democracy, aside from whatever substantive benefits are provided by their advocacy on specific issues.

Juries

Though much attention has been given to relatively new forums for citizen deliberation, other researchers have attempted to understand the deliberative qualities of the jury system, one of the oldest venues for groups of citizens to formally participate in political decision making. Originally devised in England as a means of administering justice, the use of juries slowly evolved over centuries, with independence of juries from the will of the magistrate established in 1671. Several countries have adopted the jury system, but its use is most widespread in the United States. The right to a trial by a jury of one's peers is an established component of the American justice system, and as the ideals of equality and civil rights have flourished, the peer group constituted by a formal jury has become more diverse in ethnicity, gender, and socioeconomic status.

Research on juries has generally demonstrated that citizen-jurors take their decision-making task seriously, more often than not reaching the same verdicts at which experienced judges would themselves arrive. Juries are also less predictable than conventional wisdom would suggest, with juror demographics being very weak predictors of trial outcomes. Even in the contentious area of civil lawsuits, where "Robin Hood juries" are reputed to levy oversized judgments, research has found that juries generally render fair and proportionate judgments. Thus, the balance of evidence is that juries do, in fact, deliberate carefully on the cases that come before them.

In his observations about American political culture, Alexis de Tocqueville imagined that the American jury system would serve a civic educational purpose. Recent investigations of jury deliberation have demonstrated that the experience of deliberation can, indeed, spark heightened levels of future political and civic engagement. Results from large-scale studies of multiple juries show that there is some positive transformational effect as a result of serving on a jury, providing support for the broader claim made by deliberative theorists that active citizen engagement in public decision making can transform private individuals into more active, public-minded citizens. In addition, researchers have found that jury participation bolsters jurors' perceptions of the legitimacy of the justice system.

Congressional Committees

Research on political decision making has also considered the deliberative competence of traditional governmental bodies comprised of elected officials. Legislatures, in particular, are charged with engaging in sustained discussion on public issues, often resulting in policy decisions. For example, in the U.S.

Congress, standing committees are presumed to deliberate when their members "mark up" a piece of legislation. During this step of the legislative process, the substantive details of a bill are revised with the goal of passing it on to the general membership of the body (either the House or Senate) for consideration.

After the reform period (1965–1980) and the Republican takeover of the U.S. House of Representatives in 1995, political parties have become stronger vis-à-vis committees, taking away some of the independent power to deliberate on policy that committees enjoyed in the mid-20th-century "Textbook Congress." Under current practices, committee deliberation overall has been weakened in favor of closed-door discussion within party caucuses. On bills that have partisan implications, majority party members of committees frequently reject suggestions regarding content or amendments proposed by minority party members, using their advantage in numbers to push through their party's favored policy outcome.

Not all legislation lends itself to clear-cut partisan differences, however, and on bills in which party members have an interest but do not divide members of a committee in a clear-cut ideological way, a considerable amount of discussion regarding content occurs. This discussion reflects the original deliberative purpose of committees: to specialize in area of public policy so that members could gain expertise during their tenure and to encourage these members to share information with each other and the general membership in a way that promotes the best (i.e., most thoroughly considered and representative) policy outcome.

Groupthink in the Executive Branch

One additional line of research has sought to connect social-psychological research on small group decision making to the difficult political choices often facing executive decision makers. A distinguishing feature of the executive branch of government is the unilateral decision-making authority given to the mayor, county commissioner, governor, or president. Nonetheless, deliberation is widespread within executive bodies because decision makers often seek information from colleagues and confidants in an effort to inform their ultimate decisions. This is precisely what a president has the opportunity to do when calling together a cabinet, a committee, or an advisory council. The judgments of such groups can help the executive understand and consider a range of views and information; at other times, however, those informal bodies can create a kind of "groupthink."

Irving Janis (1982) cemented the popular understanding of that term when he found that groups of well-intentioned and highly capable experts, policy advisors, and executives have made historically catastrophic decisions that can be traced back to poor group decision-making practices. The most serious symptoms of such "groupthink" include an illusion of invulnerability, wherein a group comes to doubt that it can fail. Another warning sign is careful self-censorship of deviations from the emerging group consensus, along with the application of direct pressure on dissenters and the emergence of self-appointed "mindguards" who keep unpleasant information and dissenters out of the executive's reach.

Janis found these symptoms to be present in the historical record for many important meetings of the executive branch. In particular, groupthink appears to have been partly to blame for such fiascoes as the Bay of Pigs invasion in Cuba and policy-making errors in World War II, the Korean War, and the Vietnam War. Groupthink, however, remains the exception rather than the rule. Janis famously demonstrated this by showing how the Kennedy administration managed to navigate the Cuban Missile Crisis expertly by learning procedural lessons from its previous decision-making lapses. In the end, the research on groupthink and related deliberative breakdowns is more cautionary than pessimistic about the prospects for political group decision making.

John Gastil and Stephanie Burkhalter

See also Deliberation

Further Readings

Barber, B. R. (1984). Strong democracy: Participatory politics for a new age. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Bessette, J. M. (1994). The mild voice of reason: Deliberative democracy and American national government. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Bohman, J. F., & Rehg, W. (Eds.). (1997). Deliberative democracy: Essays on reason and politics. Cambridge: MIT Press.

Chambers, S. (2003). Deliberative democratic theory. Annual Review of Political Science, 6, 307–326.

Deering, C. J., & Smith, S. S. (1997). Committees in Congress (3rd ed.). Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Delli Carpini, M. X., Cook, F. L., & Jacobs, L. R. (2004). Public deliberation, discursive participation, and citizen engagement: A review of the empirical literature. Annual Review of Political Science, 7, 315–344.

Dwyer, W. L. (2002). In the hands of the people. New York: St. Martin's.
Fishkin, J. S. (1995). The voice of the people. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
Gastil, J. (1993). Democracy in small groups: Participation, decision-making, and communication. Philadelphia: New Society Publishers.
Gastil, J., & Levine, P. (Eds.). (2006). The deliberative democracy handbook. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.
Habermas, J. (1989). The structural transformation of the public sphere. Cambridge: MIT Press.
Hans, V. P. (2000). Business on trial: The civil jury and corporate responsibility. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
Janis, I. L. (1982). Groupthink: Psychological studies of policy decision and fiascoes (2nd ed.). Boston: Houghton Mifflin.
Verba, S. (1961). Small groups and political behavior. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Groupthink in Politics

See Group Decision Making, Political

Guggenheim, Charles (1924–2002)

Charles Guggenheim was an American film director and producer. Using the documentary style of filming, Guggenheim was one of the first to create advertisements for American political campaigns. Guggenheim developed television commercials using filmmaking techniques such as the script, visuals, and editing to showcase the candidates' character and campaign themes. In the course of his career, Guggenheim made more than 100 documentaries, for which he was nominated for 12 Academy Awards and won 4. Guggenheim also received three Emmys and the George Foster Peabody Award.

In 1965, Guggenheim began his work as a media adviser to many Democratic political figures. Guggenheim worked on four presidential campaigns and hundreds of Senate and gubernatorial campaigns. Political commercials have become an indispensable component of American political campaigns. Unlike the current negative trends in political advertising, Guggenheim sought to expose the character of his candidates in an affirmative way, letting the issues speak for themselves.

Guggenheim's efforts shaped the campaigns of many prominent politicians in the 1960s and 1970s, including Adlai Stevenson, Jr., the Kennedys, and George McGovern. However, his most famous contribution to political campaigns was his work on Robert Kennedy's presidential nomination campaign. After Kennedy's assassination, Guggenheim was commissioned by the Kennedys to create a documentary remembering the senator. In less than two months, Guggenheim created the film biography, Robert Kennedy Remembered, which aired for the first time at the 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago and went on to win an Oscar the following year. Guggenheim's success in this arena led to the filming of biographies of former presidents Harry S. Truman, John F. Kennedy, and Lyndon B. Johnson. He was the major filmmaker for George McGovern's 1972 presidential campaign, and his work on that campaign illustrates his use of cinema verité documentary film style for political commercials. In many of these commercials Guggenheim presented McGovern interacting with and encountering real voters in real situations.

Guggenheim's work centered on his passion for human fortitude. His ability to bring a humanistic component to the forefront of his pictures has left a lasting impression on more than presidential campaigns. All of Guggenheim's work had a political foundation and message to be shared with its viewers. The 1964 film, Nine From Little Rock, focused on the violent 1957 school degradation crisis in Arkansas, and A Time for Justice (1994) centered on America's civil rights movement. Guggenheim also made documentaries on the Ku Klux Klan, immigrants entering the United States though Ellis Island, and the D-Day landings. Guggenheim's final and most personal project, Berga: Soldiers of Another War, was filmed from the lens of soldiers who survived the Berga war camp. This documentary focused on POWs who were separated from other soldiers and sent to slave labor camps in eastern Germany. Guggenheim finished his last film weeks before dying from pancreatic cancer.

Leslie A. Rill

See also Political Advertising

Further Readings

Diamond, E., & Bates, S. (1992). The spot: The rise of political advertising on television. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.

Jamieson, K. H. (1996). Packaging the presidency: A history and criticism of presidential campaign advertising. New York: Oxford University Press.

Gulf War, Media Coverage of

The Vietnam War was a turning point in the media's coverage of military conflict and was the first modern war in which television brought visual images of combat into homes. Despite the impact these still images and footage had on the public, they were not close-up, live reports, as viewers were able to see during the 1991 Gulf War and later the Iraq War. In 1991, coverage of the Gulf War allowed viewers to watch war in their living rooms in real time.

In August 1990, Iraq invaded neighboring Kuwait as the result of a dispute over oil drilling. The United Nations immediately initiated economic sanctions against Iraq, but Iraq continued to occupy disputed territory. Consequently, in January 1991 the United States led a coalition of some 30 countries, with United Nations approval, to liberate Kuwait from Iraqi occupation. The live and expanded coverage of the Gulf War was largely due to the groundbreaking coverage of the Cable News Network (CNN), which provided continuous coverage of the 45-day war, sometimes called the Persian Gulf War.

Researchers who analyzed CNN's coverage of the Gulf War conflict concluded that CNN provided generally an American view of the war that highlighted the military and technological aspects of the war. In fact, much scholarly research about the media's coverage of the 1991 Gulf War indicates a general consensus that the reporting was biased in favor of an American point of view. However, the international press was not as supportive and influenced by the high tech. Many studies also noted the tendency of the news media to rely on their own sources and to insert their own involvement into the coverage at unprecedented levels, thus becoming participants in the military conflict that they themselves were reporting on.

Andrew Paul Williams and Lynda Lee Kaid

President and Mrs. Bush walking along the desert in Saudi Arabia with General Schwarzkopf and entourage (November 1990). Throughout most of the period in the buildup to the war (from August 1990 to January 1991), news coverage was both lengthy and intense.

Source: George Bush Presidential Library.

See also CNN (Cable News Network); Iraq War, Media Coverage of; War Coverage

Further Readings

Greenberg, B. S., & Gantz, W. (Eds.). (1993). Desert Storm and the mass media. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press.

Jensen, R. (1992). Fighting objectivity: The illusion of journalistic neutrality in coverage of the Persian Gulf War. Journal of Communication, 16(1), 20–32.

McCain, T., & Shyles, L. (Eds.). (1994). The 1,000 hour war: Communication in the Gulf. Westport, CT: Greenwood.

Gurevitch, Michael

See Uses and Gratifications Approach

H

Habermas, Jürgen

See Public Sphere

Hagerty, James C.

See Press Secretary, White House

Haider, Jörg (1950–)

Jörg Haider is the current governor of the Austrian state of Carinthia, the former head of the so-called Austrian Freedom Party (Freiheitliche Partei Österreichs/FPÖ), and founding member of the BZÖ (Bündnis Zukunft Österreich/Alliance for the Future of Austria). After taking over the Freedom Party chair in September 1986, Haider began a swift ascendancy in the FPÖ that found its climax in the 1999 elections (the party gained 27% of the votes and the second place behind the Social Democrats). After forming a coalition with the Christian-conservative Peoples Party (Österreichische Volkspartei/ÖVP) and resigning as head of the FPÖ (facing massive pressure because of former statements made about the Third Reich and foreigners), he continued his position as governor of Carinthia. Continual losses in regional elections and internal party conflicts led to the end of the coalition in 2002; in the following federal elections the FPÖ lost more than the half of their votes. However, the ÖVP resumed the coalition with Haider's Freedom Party. Further election defeats increased criticism about the party line and of Haider. In 2005, the governing part of the Freedom Party and Haider split from the FPÖ and founded a new party, the BZÖ.

Jörg Haider portrayed himself as a new type of politician. He relied on populist attacks against the great coalition between the Social Democratic Party (Sozialdemokratische Partei Österreichs/SPÖ) and the ÖVP. This government, amassing more than two-thirds of the parliamentary vote in 1999 and in office for 13 years, was a target of attacks and was noted for several scandals. By fraternizing with the voters against the politicians, Haider presented himself to be more a fighter for justice (and later for social issues) than a real politician.

Haider was often criticized for showing a biased view of Austria's Nazi history (playing down historical facts concerning Nazism) as well as for his party's hostile and xenophobic attitude against foreigners and asylum seekers.

Haider introduced several new techniques into campaigning in Austria; he was, for instance, the first politician to use a Taferl (board with short messages) in political debates on TV, and began an ongoing tradition. All campaign work was totally focused on the person of Haider; his face eventually showed up on regional election posters in place of the regional candidate's. In discussions and speeches he often made insulting jokes about his opponents, and relied on (sometimes anti-Semitic) stereotypes and prejudices in his arguments.

Frequently discussed with the ascendancy of Haider during the 1990s is the role of the media, as it offered him much space and time. His face is found on countless covers, mainly because of his highly criticized statements. Politically, a debate took place about whether a politics of exclusion as done by Chancellor Franz Vranitzky (SPÖ) was the right tactic. Some argue that if Haider had been given responsibility (for instance, as part of a government), his winning streak would suddenly have come to an end—of course, at the price of making (extreme) right-wing populism part of the government.

Peter Filzmaier, Flooh Perlot, and Maria Beyrl

See also Populism; Schüssel, Wolfgang; Vranitzky, Franz

Further Readings

Ottomayer, K. (2000). Die Haider-Show. Zur Psycho-Politik der FPÖ [The Haider-Show: On psycho-politics of the FPÖ]. Klagenfurt, Austria: Drava.

Pelinka, A., & Wodak, R. (Eds.). (2002). The Haider phenomenon in Austria. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction.

Hallin, Daniel C. (1953–)

Daniel C. Hallin is a professor in the Department of Communication, University of California at San Diego. He is one of the major U.S. specialists in the relationship between mass media and politics, a subject he has studied both in national and comparative dimensions. Indeed, he has written extensively on the U.S. media system and on its comparison with other countries' systems.

His most important book is Comparing Media Systems, which he coauthored with Paolo Mancini; it represents a sort of "summa" of his theoretical thoughts and empirical analysis. In this book Hallin was able to place media analysis within an elaborated, theoretical framework that combines suggestions coming from a critical approach, essentially from Habermas's critical view of the mass media, with observations proposed by some functionalist scholars such as Jeffrey Alexander and Niklas Luhmann. Pierre Bourdieu's works on journalism have also been useful to Hallin in developing an approach to a comparative analysis of media systems that is highly original and that represents an important step in the direction of a more comprehensive understanding of how mass media and the political world interact in different social contexts.

Hallin rejects the sort of normative view of journalism that has been so diffused and common in media studies and in the vocational attitudes of journalists, and, instead, proposes to view journalistic practices and structures in a way that is more directly connected with the society in which they develop. In this way, all "imperialistic" and commonsense observation are rejected, while his empirical approach starts from real, social contingencies.

In his previous books, We Keep America on Top of the World: Television Journalism and Public Sphere (1994) and The Uncensored War: The Media and Vietnam, Daniel Hallin had already used a critical approach to the U.S. media environment that enabled him to look beyond the most common interpretations and to discover, as in the case of the coverage of the Vietnam War, interesting journalistic attitudes that could more fully explain what role the mass media played in producing that perception of the war that so deeply affected its outcome and therefore the entire American society.

Two other research fields characterize Hallin's work: Latin America and clientelism. Hallin is an expert in the media of Latin America, especially in Mexico, and this interest goes together with his involvement in several associations that aim at facilitating the exchange of knowledge between North and South America.

His most recent interest focuses on clientelism and the media. This relationship is observed as an ideal means to place the mass media within the most general cultural and political features of the society in which they function.

Paolo Mancini

See also Comparing Media Systems

Further Readings

Hallin, D. C. (1986). The uncensored war: The media and Vietnam. New York: Oxford University Press.

Hallin, D. C. (1992). Sound bite news: Television coverage of elections, 1968–1988. Journal of Communication, 42(2), 5–24.

Hallin, D. C. (1994). We keep America on top of the world: Television journalism and the public sphere. New York: Routledge.

Hallin, D. C., & Mancini, P. (2004). Comparing media systems: Three models of media and politics. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Handbook of Political Communication, The

The Handbook of Political Communication was edited in 1981 by Dan Nimmo and Keith R. Sanders. As the first compendium in the discipline of political communication, the book was designed to lay out the parameters of the field and to provide overviews of the extant scholarly literature in the various subfields that were developing. In the introduction, Nimmo and Sanders describe the growth and development of the field of political communication, noting that the components that comprise a discipline are present for political communication: a group of scholars who identify with the field, specialized divisions in national associations, journals that specialize in the content of the field, and university programs that offer degree specializations.

The individual chapters in the handbook are divided into sections. The first section, which concentrates on theoretical perspectives, includes notable chapters on agenda setting by Max McCombs, uses and gratifications theory by Jack McLeod and Lee Becker, and constructivism by David Swanson. In the second section, on means and modes of political communication, are chapters on debates (Sidney Kraus and Dennis Davis), political advertising (Lynda Lee Kaid), political language (Doris Graber), and political rhetoric (Lloyd Bitzer). A third section is focused on political communication settings, encompassing political socialization (Charles Atkin), public opinion (Cliff Zukin), press roles (Jay Blumler and Michael Gurevitch), and social movements (Herbert Simons and Elizabeth W. Meckling). In the fourth section, chapters are included on various methodological approaches to studying political communication, including content analysis, experimental studies, survey research, and critical-cultural studies.

Appendices to the book include a short section on political communication scholarship in Europe and a guide to the literature in the new and growing discipline.

The publication of this handbook was a major landmark for the field of political communication, and the volume served as a textbook in the area for many years. Some chapters are still required reading for political communication students.

Although no second edition of the handbook was ever published, some later books updated the literature in the subfields covered in the original handbook and expanded consideration to include new developments in the field. For instance, Swanson and Nimmo edited a sourcebook of political communication in 1990 that expanded the coverage of the field, and Newman's Handbook of Political Marketing (1999) focused broadly and internationally on aspects of the field that relate directly to marketing politics.

The most recent volume to build on the original handbook is The Handbook of Political Communication Research, edited in 2004 by Lynda Lee Kaid. This volume contains new and updated chapters on political advertising, political debates, political news, rhetoric, spiral of silence, agenda setting, the press, and methodological approaches. This volume also includes chapters on Europe and Asia in recognition of the great expansion and contributions to the political communication field by international scholars.

Lynda Lee Kaid

Further Readings

Kaid, L. L. (Ed.). (2004). The handbook of political communication research. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Newman, B. J. (Ed.). (1999). Handbook of political marketing. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Nimmo, D., & Sanders, K. R. (Eds.). (1981). The handbook of political communication. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Swanson, D. L., & Nimmo, D. (Eds.). (1990). New directions in political communication: A source book. Newbury Park, CA: Sage.

Hanson, Pauline (1954–)

Pauline Hanson, founder of the One Nation party and Australia's most well-known neopopulist political leader, provided a clear challenge for Australia's media. In her notorious maiden speech as an independent member of Federal Parliament in 1996, she attacked Asian immigration and indigenous welfare, sparking racial divisions while striking a chord with many rural, regional, and working-class voters who felt alienated by multiculturalism and disaffected by rural economic downturn.

At first, Hanson was ignored or ridiculed by the media for her apparent naïveté, nasal Australian accent, and frequent verbal blunders. However, as she gained more support, the popular media (talk radio and tabloid newspapers) and later the more serious print and broadcast media began to examine the causes of her success, often highlighting disaffection brought about by economic and social change.

Unusually, Hanson did not seek to cultivate the media, as more experienced mainstream politicians or other successful populist leaders do. Instead her relationship with the media ranged from indifference to active hostility. She frequently frustrated her media advisors by ignoring or subverting their advice, and she lashed out at the media when they criticized or ridiculed her. Late in 1996 she publicized a videotape to be played after her death, asserting that if people were hearing the tape it was because she had "been murdered."

Hanson was not averse to drawing media attention to herself, but she flaunted her personal appearance and dramatic appeal more than her political ideas. She was photographed draped in an Australian flag and courted women's magazines and dress designers to ensure startling reportage out of the usual political contexts. During one election campaign she appeared on a television ballroom dancing program.

Media attention intensified during the 1998 Queensland State election, when One Nation—the party she established with only three voting members—won 11 seats, comprising 22.7% of first preference votes. Hanson's personal support waned, and she failed to be reelected to her federal seat in late 1998 or to be elected to the Senate in 2001 and 2004. Some media commentators believed she had lost touch with the disgruntled voters who rallied to her in the first couple of years. Others claim Liberal Prime Minister John Howard has gradually subsumed her constituency by incorporating their fears into his populist policies, an explanation Hanson herself endorses.

In August 2003 Hanson was jailed for 3 years for electoral fraud, a conviction she successfully appealed against, serving only 11 weeks of the sentence.

No longer a member of the party she founded, Hanson will run as an independent in the 2007 federal elections. But she commands only fleeting media attention to her renewed racist comments about "diseased" African and Muslim immigrants.

Julianne Stewart

See also Populism

Further Readings

Horsfield, B., & Stewart, J. (2003). One Nation and the Australian media. In G. Mazzoleni, J. Stewart, & B. Horsfield (Eds.), The media and neo-populism (pp. 122–147). Westport, CT: Praeger.

Kingston, M. (1999). Off the rails: The Pauline Hanson trip. St. Leonards, NSW, Australia: Allen & Unwin.

Pasquarelli, J. (1998). The Pauline Hanson story . . . by the man who knows. French's Forest, NSW, Australia: New Holland.

Hard Money

See Federal Election Campaign Act

Hard News

Hard news is often described as "traditional news." A story has hard news value if it contains new information that is timely and relevant. Hard news is something the reader or viewer needs to know about right away. Stories about catastrophic events or neighborhood house fires are hard news. Crime and political stories are considered hard news. Hard news might be personally relevant to a viewer or listener; an example of this would be a story about a proposed sales tax increase. However, hard news stories, such as stories about war, terrorist acts, or natural disasters, can also be relevant to a viewer or reader even if he or she is not directly involved.

Content is one way to distinguish between hard and soft news. Hard news is usually of a more serious or negative nature. Generally, if something bad has happened, a report on the event is considered hard news. Stories involving government also fall into the hard news category, since government operations affect the general population in serious ways. Conversely, stories about arts, culture, entertainment, and lifestyle are usually considered soft news.

Presentation is another way to distinguish between hard and soft news. Hard news is more often presented in a straightforward manner with a fast pace, with quick cuts between shots. Soft news is more often presented in a feature format. Features may be longer than hard news stories and contain more production elements, such as graphics and soft transitions between shots.

Gender differences have been found in the content and presentation of hard news. The Global Media Monitoring Project (GMMP) has repeatedly found that women are less likely to be featured in hard news stories. Stories about economics and politics are dominated by men, but women are twice as likely as men to be portrayed as victims in hard news stories. As newsmakers, professional women are underrepresented in categories such as law, business, and politics. Women are also underrepresented as reporters, and there is a gender division in which kinds of stories they cover. Women are much less likely to be assigned hard news stories, instead being asked to cover arts and culture events.

Beyond concerns of gender differences, there is a concern about what appears to be a decrease in the overall coverage of hard news. In 2005 former U.S. Vice President Al Gore accused large media conglomerates of ignoring serious political coverage and other hard news stories and instead covering scandal and entertainment. Gore warned that access to healthy political debate has faded in the current media environment.

However, recent studies suggest that media outlets are simply giving readers and viewers what they want. Many newspaper readers say they skip over hard news because they find it sad and depressing. Young readers in particular say they skip hard news to get to stories about entertainment.

Hard news is supposed to give citizens information they need to make informed decisions about their government. But, increasingly, hard news is being ignored or underreported in an era of declining interest in public life and a continuing disengagement of citizens from their government.

Lisa Mills-Brown

See also Soft News

Further Readings

Cornog, E. (2005, January/February). Let's blame the readers: Is it possible to do great journalism if the public does not care? Columbia Journalism Review, 43(5), 43–49.

Shields, M. (2005, October 10). Former VP Gore decries lack of hard news on TV. Media Week, 15(36), 6–8.

Turley, A. (2006, April). Who makes the news? Promoting gender equality in and through news media. Pacific Journalism Review, 12(1), 10–14.

Harris, Fred (1930–)

Fred Harris, the "New Populist" U.S. senator, served from 1964 to 1972. He was born in the western Oklahoma small town of Walters on November 13, 1930. From a young age Harris worked in the wheat and cotton harvests. Those experiences taught him the value of hard work and the plight of share croppers.

Hard working and ambitious, Harris was a Future Farmers of America state champion in high school. He graduated college Phi Beta Kappa and finished first in his University of Oklahoma law school class of 1954. At age 25, Harris was elected to the Oklahoma State Senate, where he served for 8 years. Even as he was winning his first local campaign, Harris expressed ambition for the U.S. Senate.

Harris established a reputation as the hardest working member of the Oklahoma legislature. He worked to establish the Oklahoma Human Rights Commission. He also encouraged the development of the Oklahoma Wheat Commission. His record was not entirely populist; he also supported tax breaks for western Oklahoma's rapidly developing oil industry.

In 1964, Harris was elected to complete the term of the late U.S. Senator Robert S. Kerr. The wealthy Kerr family's support helped Harris overcome two former governors and the legendary Sooner football coach, Bud Wilkinson.

In the U.S. Senate, the hardworking Harris became known as "Mr. Science." As a freshman senator he persuaded the chairman of the Government Operations Committee to create a subcommittee on government research and became one of the few freshmen ever to chair a subcommittee. In 1966, Oklahomans elected him to a full 6-year term.

President Lyndon Johnson was persuaded by Harris and others in 1967 to form the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, also known as the Kerner Commission, named after its Ohio chairman. Harris described his work on the commission as a "Damascus Road experience." Although he had long been active in the civil rights movement, he suddenly saw the problems of poverty and race in a new light.

Harris entered the Senate calling himself an "independent Democrat." Soon he made friends with a variety of liberal senators like Hubert Humphrey, Walter Mondale, and Robert Kennedy. Much to the frustration of his southern conservative Democratic constituency, Harris became recognized as an "establishment liberal." In 1968, he served as cochair of Humphrey's presidential campaign. Following that election, Harris became chairman of the Democratic National Committee while retaining his seat in the Senate.

By 1972 Oklahoma had become a conservative state. Harris, true to his populist roots, had moved left. Rather than seek reelection in Oklahoma, in 1972 Harris chose to run for president. Harris found a platform in New York Times reporter Jack Newfield's 1971 article titled "New Populist Manifesto." Harris began to decry many of the Great Society programs that he had helped to put in place. He felt these programs placed too much emphasis on inner-city racism and did not do enough to address the broader problem of poverty in America. Harris's campaign was short lived, but it completed his transformation from "independent Democrat" to "establishment liberal" to "new populist." Harris tried again in 1976, whistlestopping across the country in a Winnebago.

Harris's populist philosophy was congruent with his man-of-the-people communication style. He traveled Oklahoma on a 77-county "Thank You Tour" in 1964. He traveled from ghetto to ghetto as part of his Kerner Commission work. In protest of the Vietnam War, he traveled from campus to campus. Seeking the presidency, he traveled the country in an RV. When he wanted to make major policy pronouncements, he spoke on the floor of the Senate.

Local media found little to criticize early in his Senate career. However, as his antipoverty and antiwar activities took shape, local news outlets began to suggest that he was out of step with average Oklahomans. Nationally, Harris never became a household name.

Rick Farmer

See also Populism

Further Readings

Lowitt, R. (2002). Fred Harris: His journey from liberalism to populism. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Scott, A. L. (2005). National liberal, hometown radical, and new populist politician: The life of Fred Harris. Chronicles of Oklahoma, 83, 4–33.

Hart, Gary (1936–)

Gary W. Hart is a former two-term senator from Colorado and was a candidate for the Democratic nomination for president in 1984 and 1988. Although he was the frontrunner going into the 1988 Democratic primaries, he may be best remembered for an act of hubris. Responding to rumors that he was having an extramarital affair, he dared the press to follow him around. Reporters for the Miami Herald took up his challenge and caught his mistress, Donna Rice, leaving Hart's residence one evening. Hart initially fought back. But a photo eventually surfaced showing Rice sitting on Hart's lap on a yacht aptly named Monkey Business. The photo story broke in early May 1987, causing Hart to drop out of the race. He briefly returned to the race toward the end of the year, but he received little support and lost to the eventual Democratic nominee, Michael Dukakis.

The drama of Hart's personal fall overshadows his many significant accomplishments and his expertise in international affairs. A graduate of Yale Law School in 1964, Hart went on to earn a Doctor of Philosophy degree in politics at Oxford University in 2001. Before becoming a senator, Hart served as a lawyer for the Department of Justice in 1964 and 1965, an assistant for the solicitor of the Interior Department from 1965 to 1967, and he was the national campaign manager for George McGovern's run for the presidency in 1972. Hart served on multiple international policy boards, including the Defense Policy Board and the Council on Foreign Relations. Many of Hart's recommendations as a presidential candidate in the 1980s for reform of national defenses have been taken up by President George W. Bush's administration. Hart served on a bipartisan National Commission on Terrorism, appointed in 1998 by President Bill Clinton to examine domestic security against foreign attacks. The commission's recommendations, based largely on fears of globalization's sweeping changes to world economies that were bringing people with conflicting values into greater contact with each other, went largely ignored until reinforced by the commission investigating American security failures during the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001. Hart and fellow commission member Warren B. Rudman warned that the end of the Cold War brought the need for a change in approach to American security, shifting from bipolar calculation to multipolar acknowledgment of emerging superpowers as well as rogue states that would eventually be getting their hands on rapidly spreading technologies of mass murder. Hart's predictions about terror attacks on the United States prior to September 11, 2001, have brought him greater prominence than at any time since his 1987 debacle.

Hart now sees himself as a "Paul Revere," decrying the nation's continued lack of preparedness for another attack. Hart's name has come up as a possible cabinet member should the Democratic Party retake the presidency.

Nicholas A. Thomas

See also McGovern, George

Further Readings

Gary Hart official Web site: http://www.garyhartnews.com/hart/

Hart, G. W. (1998). The Minutemen: Restoring an army of the people. New York: Free Press.

Hart, G. W. (2004). The fourth power: An essay concerning a grand strategy for the United States. New York: Oxford University Press.

Hart, G. W. (2006). The courage of our convictions: A manifesto for Democrats. New York: Times Books.

Hart-Rudman Commission Report. (2001). Executive summary, the U.S. commission on national security in the 21st century. Retrieved June 28, 2007, from http://www.milnet.com/hart-rudman/

Hart, Roderick P. (1945–)

Roderick P. Hart (born February 17, 1945) is an important scholar in the areas of political language, media and politics, presidential studies and rhetorical analysis. He has authored 12 books, received numerous teaching awards, created a theoretically grounded computer program designed to analyze language patterns (DICTION), founded the Annette Strauss Institute for Civic Participation, and serves as dean of the College of Communication at the University of Texas at Austin.

Hart received a BA in English from the University of Massachusetts and an MA and PhD in speech communication from the Pennsylvania State University. While at Penn State, Hart studied under rhetorician Carroll Arnold and was named a Woodrow Wilson Fellow. After graduating from Penn State, Hart joined the faculty at Purdue University, where he served as an assistant professor (1970–1974) and associate professor (1974–1979) of communication. In 1979, he was appointed a full professor at the University of Texas at Austin, where he has been to the present.

Hart's reputation in rhetorical analyses—often of political texts—began through a series of research honors, including three Golden Monograph Awards (National Communication Association, 1972, 1974, 1981). These accolades were followed by the Charles H. Woolbert Research Award (NCA, 1984), the Winans-Wicheln Book Award (NCA, 1988), Diamond Anniversary Book Award (NCA, 1995), and the Douglas W. Ehninger Distinguished Rhetorical Scholar Award (NCA, 2003). Additionally, Hart has received the highest honors bestowed by the National Communication Association (Distinguished Scholar Award, 1993), the International Communication Association (Research Fellow, 1993), and the American Political Science Association Political, Communication Division (Edelman Distinguished Career Award, 2000).

While he has authored more than 50 articles and chapters, it is perhaps his books that have had the largest influence in political communication. The Sound of Leadership (1987) and Campaign Talk: Why Elections Are Good for Us (2000) are unique in that they carefully blend two approaches (a sensitivity to individual texts and the rigor of large-scale human and computerized content analyses) to ask and answer fundamental questions about politics, language, and culture. The former book analyzes nearly 10,000 public speaking events over the course of eight presidencies, focusing not only on what politicians say, but also on why they said what they said, and when and where they said it. This approach allows Hart to conclude that presidents are speaking more and saying less, largely as speechmaking has become a tool of barter and the speech act has become a political favor and a moment for aggrandizement.

The latter text employs Hart's own computerized-content analytic DICTION program to analyze three political voices (presidential candidates, journalists, and citizens) as they appear in six forms of campaign discourse (speeches, debates, television advertisements, television and print coverage, and letters to the editor of local newspapers) over 13 presidential elections (1948–1996). This method allows him to spot macrolevel patterns that have gone heretofore unexamined, most notably how candidate discourse is hopeful, media discourse is focused, and the campaign settings force elites to be far more transparent than they are during noncampaign periods. These offerings are supported by the careful use of quantitative patterns and illustrative textual examples from candidates, news coverage, and citizen voices.

In Seducing America: How Television Charms the Modern Voter (1998), Hart asks what television has done to citizenship in the United States. In attempting to reconstruct how Americans listen to and feel about televised politics, he contends that television miseducates the citizenry and makes that miseducation attractive. Specifically, television inspires sentiments that are harmful to political life, and in his mind, any solution to political malaise must address how people feel about democracy (more so than what they know about it).

In addition to his scholarship, Hart founded the Annette Strauss Institute for Civic Participation at the University of Texas at Austin. With the goal of creating more voters and better citizens, the Strauss Institute conducts research on voting and engages in practical interventions to engage citizens in the political process.

Sharon Jarvis

Further Readings

Hart, R. P. (1987). The sound of leadership: Presidential communication in the modern age. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Hart, R. P. (1998). Seducing America: How television charms the modern voter. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Hart, R. P. (2000). Campaign talk: Why elections are good for us. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Hassan II, King (1929–1999)

King Hassan II, born in 1929, was the king of Morocco from 1961 to 1999.

King Hassan II's information policy was conservative and reflected the authoritarian nature of the political regime. The Ministry of Information had been held by loyal and staunch royalists such as Ahmed Guidera (1960), Ahmed Alaoui (1962), and Abdelhadi Boutaleb (1963). Throughout the years when King Hassan II was at the top of Moroccan political life, all areas of broadcasting fell under the control of the Ministry of Information, which was in turn subsumed under the powerful and influential Ministry of Interior.

King Hassan II firmly believed that the national broadcasting system was a fundamental piece in the architecture of his political power. He explained on many occasions that he regarded it as a "very important element in the process of nation building." Morocco's national radio was designed to create common ground for the political regime by filtering information to Moroccan society. The king had a conservative understanding of the flow of information. For him, "the public could not know what I know. My government knows more than the public. But it knows less than what I myself know."

Moroccan TV was launched on Throne Day in March 1962. It has become the privileged domain of the political regime because of its convenience as a means to disseminate news and information and to propagate a sense of national identity around the person of the king.

King Hassan II used the national broadcasting system to create a personality cult that promoted the charismatic features of the king. Moroccan TV has been designed thematically and symbolically to meet the demands of stabilizing the political system. The predominance and the centrality of the figure of the king were obviously manifested in the news bulletins. The news bulletins were an occasion to document with a degree of certainty daily activities of the king, which occupied the bulk of primetime radio and TV news bulletins, followed by the activities of the ministers of his majesty. They covered his domestic and international visits. Official pronouncements take up hours of airtime. News was royal realism on video.

King Hassan II effectively used Moroccan mass media to mobilize Moroccans to take part in the Green March in 1975, the biggest mass mobilization in Morocco's modern history. In 1984, he encouraged and allowed Moroccan political parties to use the national broadcasting system to conduct their election campaigns, a rarity and exception in Arab countries at that time. In 1987, King Hassan II started to subsidize the Moroccan printing press.

King Hassan II's information policy did not favor the exposition of Morocco's "dirty laundry to the world" in the Moroccan media. According to King Hassan II's media philosophy, mass media should not publish true facts if such publication might cause harm to the country by tarnishing its image.

King Hassan II cared for international audiences. He was an eloquent public speaker, fluent in three languages, and was famous for his communication skills, especially during his interviews with international media. No wonder that MBC TV, the first Arabic language satellite channel based in London, interviewed him on its first day on air in 1991.

Mohammed Ibahrine

Further Readings

Ibahrine, M. (2002). Democratization and the press: The case of Morocco. Nord-Süd Aktuell, 4, 632–640.

Ibahrine, M. (2004). Die Medien in Marokko [The media in Morocco]. In Hans-Bredow-Institut (Ed.), Internationales Handbuch für Medien 2004/5 [International media handbook 2004/5] (pp. 729–741). Baden-Baden: Nomos.

Ibahrine, M. (in press). New media and Neo-Islamism (online published PhD thesis).

Hate Speech

Research from authors have defined hate speech as the use of words as weapons that terrorize, humiliate, degrade, abuse, threaten, and discriminate based on race, ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation, national origin, or gender. After the efforts and rhetoric of the Nazi regime in World War II, nations like Germany and France began the push for hate speech regulations. Other Western democracies, such as the United Kingdom and Canada, followed suit. The United States, on the other hand, has continued to hold to the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution and Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which both guarantee freedom of expression. Thus, nearly all efforts to restrict hate speech in the United States, including speech codes on public university campuses, have been disallowed by the U.S. Supreme Court (Doe v. University of Michigan, 1989; UWM Post v. Board of Regents of University of Wisconsin, 1991).

There are strong arguments on both sides of the issue of regulating hate speech. Supporters of freedom of expression have argued that true freedom of expression is lost if it is regulated, even for issues such as hate speech. Moreover, they argue that free expression is a necessary condition for individuals to feel free to discuss hate speech against minorities. Supporters of free expression claim that restrictions on free speech will be used against the oppressed groups and minorities they are designed to protect. On the other hand, supporters of hate speech regulation argue that hate speech regulation is essential to preserve the dignity of oppressed groups. The debate on hate speech regulation helps exemplify the long-standing tensions that exist between those upholding individual rights and protecting for the collective good of society.

There are many past examples of the expression of hate in the United States, but one of the most well known is the 1977 and 1978 attempts of the National Socialist Party of America to march on public streets in Skokie, Illinois, a community with many survivors of the Holocaust. The ability for the group to have their event was upheld by the state and federal courts on the judgment of the First Amendment.

One of the current controversies surrounding free expression of political activists and demonstrators against the president and elected officials is the use of free speech zones. First used by the Clinton administration and used insistently throughout the George W. Bush administration, the use of these free speech zones—sometimes a mile or two from the sites where the speeches are given by the elected officials—is considered by some to be unconstitutional on First Amendment grounds.

David M. Rhea

See also First Amendment

Further Readings

Hatfield, K. L., Schafer, K., & Stroup, K. A. (2005). A dialogic approach to combating hate speech on college campuses. Atlantic Journal of Communication, 13, 41–55.

Owen, U. (1998). The speech that kills. Index on Censorship, 1, 32–39.

Havel, Václav (1936–)

Václav Havel, born in 1936, was president of former Czechoslovakia and the Czech Republic, from 1989 to 2003. He is a playwright; his work is rooted in the aesthetics of absurd drama of 1960s. One of the most visible representatives of the Czech dissident movement, he became a leading figure of political changes in Eastern Europe in the fall of 1989. Both in his works and his political activities, Havel has focused upon the role of communication and language in thinking and negotiating, exploring the emptiness of Orwellian communist aparatschik language. He manifested this approach to political communication during negotiations with representatives of communist power as well as in his speeches on international forums during and after 1989. In his works, he frequently criticized the bureaucratization of political decisions and elaborated on “nonpolitical politics,” a concept of debureaucratized, non-party politics based upon negotiations within a informal framework of civil society. As explained especially in his concept of "power of the powerless," he believes that civil society is a cornerstone of democracy.

His work examines the influence of modern bureaucratic apparatuses of power on human relations and communication. His first play, The Garden Party (1963), was a satire on modern bureaucratic routines and their lack of humanism. In the 1970s, Havel wrote a series of plays—Audience (1978), Private View (1978), and Protest (1978), among others—in which he examined the troubles an individual was having with the authorities. In the 1980s, he focused upon problems of identity and moral issues (Temptation, 1986; Largo desolatio, 1985).

From the 1960s Havel was involved in various political movements, criticizing the nonhumanistic practices of the pro-Soviet regime in the former Czechoslovakia. He tried to communicate with the pro-Soviet government by writing a letter to the president of Czechoslovakia in early 1970s. Havel was a cofounder of the human rights organization Charter 77. His works were banned, but manuscripts circulated and were printed abroad. He was imprisoned in 1979. He was released due to health difficulties in 1983. Havel was a member of the editorial board of the samizdat (unauthorized, clandestine) newspaper Lidové Noviny, and a regular contributor from 1987 to 1989. In November 1989, he formed a Civic Forum, an attempt to organize people politically on a non-party basis, and was elected the president of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic in December 1989. As a president, Havel witnessed the breakup of Czechoslovakia in 1992. He resigned but was elected president of the new Czech Republic in February 1993 and stayed in the office until 2003. He promoted reconciliation with Germany and supported the Czech Republic's entry into NATO and the European Union.

In his political career, Havel became a symbol of informal, deliberative approach to political negotiations, favoring a more personal and individualized political communication than a formalized one.

Jan Jirak

See also Helsinki Process

Further Readings

Keane, J. (Ed.). (1985). The power of the powerless: Citizen against the state in Central-Eastern Europe. London: Hutchinson & Company.

Keane, J. (1999). Václav Havel: A political tragedy in six acts. London: Bloomsbury.

Hearst, William Randolph (1863–1951)

William Randolph Hearst was a well-known 20th-century publisher whose influence extended to art, architecture, publishing, politics, and Hollywood. Born in San Francisco, California, he inherited more than just money from his father, a self-made multimillionaire miner and rancher. Most important, he became proprietor of the San Francisco Examiner, which had been given to his father as payment for a gambling debt. After studying at St. Paul's Preparatory School, Hearst continued his education at Harvard College, where he showed both interest and talent in journalism, which he demonstrated as business manager of the Harvard Lampoon. In 1887 he took over the San Francisco Examiner and began his lucrative career as journalist.

An advertisement for Hearst papers, 1922. Believed by many to have initiated the Spanish-American War of 1898 to encourage sales of his newspaper, William Randolph Hearst also advocated political assassination in an editorial just months before the assassination of President McKinley.

Source: Wikipedia.

Hearst is well known for his development of the phrase "yellow journalism." While his inspiration derived from Joseph Pulitzer, his style for reformist investigative reporting and garish sensationalism soon became his trademark and allowed him to employ the best journalists of his day. Hearst pioneered banner headlines and elaborate illustrations to catch the eye and sell more papers. He purchased the New York Morning Journal and from there built a journalism empire that included 28 major newspapers and 18 magazines, along with several radio stations and movie companies.

In addition to journalism, Hearst took a brief interest in politics. He was a Democratic member of the U.S. House of Representatives from 1903 to 1907. His ambition led him to run for both governor of New York and mayor of New York City. Though he was defeated in both, he was an active supporter of Franklin D. Roosevelt and his New Deal plan. However, in 1935, when the president vetoed the Patman Bonus Bill, Hearst criticized him in all his papers and broke ties with the party. From that point on, Hearst let politics take a back seat to his other aspirations, such as the development of his art collection, which included classical paintings, tapestries, textiles, sculptures, and furniture. Hearst's private life, particularly his open affair with actress Marion Davies, was the subject of great controversy and speculation.

Hearst unsympathetic view of minorities resulted in his use of his chain of newspapers to aggravate racial tensions, particularly by encouraging the Spanish-American war. His opposition was strong and vocal to the famous Orson Welles movie, Citizen Kane, which was undoubtedly based on Hearst's life, but he was not able to suppress the film. Though the life of William Randolph Hearst was littered with scandal, rumor, and unethical transactions, his contributions to journalism, communications, and politics were substantial.

Hilary Noriega and Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Citizen Kane

Further Readings

Nasaw, D. (2000). The chief: The life of William Randolph Hearst. New York: Houghton Mifflin.

Pizzitola, L. (2002). Hearst over Hollywood: Power, passion, and propaganda in the movies. New York: Columbia University Press.

Helsinki Process

In political communication, the Helsinki Process relates to freedom of expression; more exactly to freedom of information, free access to cultural works, and the rights of journalists to freely work and access information. The expression refers to the series of events that followed the Conference for Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE) from the early 1970s on.

The conference was initiated by Soviet leaders in the era of the détente (relaxation of tensions between East and West). The initiative was initially met by skepticism in the West and by democratic opposition in socialist states in Central and Eastern Europe ("dissidents"), as it was expected to formalize the division of Europe as part of the Cold War. However, providing earlier powerless and subdued oppositional voices within the communist bloc with a politically and morally—though not legally—binding international instrument, the process proved to stimulate rapid development in the opposite direction.

Finnish President Urho Kekkonen actively advanced the idea of the conference. Finland offered to host the preparatory talks, which started in 1972. This led to a set of recommendations, the so-called Blue Book, proposing that the process should be carried on in three "Baskets": questions relating to (a) the security of Europe; (b) cooperation in the fields of economy, science, technology, and environment; and (c) cooperation in the humanitarian and other fields. Finland's position as a border country between East and West and the activity of Finnish foreign policy eventually led the initial phase of the work to be hosted by Finland.

A conference of foreign ministers in Helsinki, Finland, in July 1973 adopted the Blue Book, thereby launching the Helsinki Process. After a working phase in Geneva, heads of state from 35 countries signed the Helsinki Final Act in a conference in the Finlandia Hall in Helsinki (the "Helsinki Accords") on August 1, 1975. The signatories represented all the European states (except for Albania), the United States, and Canada.

The Helsinki Accords introduced a unique international instrument that linked security and human rights. Respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, and equal rights and self-determination of peoples, were included in the First Basket on European security. The Third Basket included issues of cooperation in the humanitarian field, freedom of information, the working conditions for journalists, and cultural contacts and cooperation. Having been played down in the initial phase of the process, these aspects soon gained prominence by inspiring democratic opposition in the communist bloc. The Moscow Helsinki Group was formed in 1976. Democratic opposition—for example, Charta 77 in Czechoslovakia, or political movements in Poland that preceded the Solidarity Movement, such as KOR (the Workers' Defence Committee, founded in 1976) or ROPCiO (the Movement for the Protection of Human and Civil Rights, functioning between 1977 and 1981)—was inspired by the Helsinki Accords. A growing body of Helsinki Watch groups led to the formation of the International Helsinki Federation for Human Rights (IHF) in 1982.

With disintegration of the communist bloc, new states formed. Today 56 states are part of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), which carries the process. The work has been guided by several follow-up conferences. In November 1990, the Charter of Paris for a New Europe was signed, formally putting an end to the Cold War.

In 1997, a position of OSCE Representative of the Freedom of the Media was established, with the task to provide early warning on violation of freedom of expression in the OSCE area and promote freedom of expression and free media.

In 2002, a "second Helsinki Process" was launched by the Finnish and Tanzanian governments to instigate a multistakeholder process for global governance.

Tom Moring

See also Havel, Václav; Kekkonen, Urho

Further Readings

Evers, F., Kahl, M., & Zellner, W. (2005). The culture of dialogue: The OSCE Acquis 30 years after Helsinki. Hamburg: University of Hamburg, Centre for OSCE Research (CORE), and the Institute for Peace Research and Security Policy (IFSH).

Helsinki Process on Globalisation and Democracy Web site: http://www.helsinkiprocess.fi/

The Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe Web site: http://www.osce.org/

Heuristics in Political Decision Making

In the early 1970s, heuristics were first noted by Amos Tversky and 2002 Nobel Prize laureate Daniel Kahneman. They defined a heuristic as a knowledge-based way to a judgment that does not follow rational principles but instead the dictum of efficiency.

As does other research on human information processing, research on heuristics, too, focuses on the individual's need to cope with complexity by simplifying it. Heuristics—often labeled "shortcuts" or "rules of thumb"—normally lead the individual quickly to adequate judgments, although no extensive algorithmic processing is applied. But since the main characteristic of heuristics is to extrapolate from knowledge stored in human memory, such rules of thumb can also be responsible for erroneous inferences.

In their first articles, Tversky and Kahneman described a few judgmental heuristics, two of which have had an enormous impact on social sciences: representativeness and availability. Although there are some other heuristics discussed in literature, those two were most influential and model the implications associated with rules of thumb. The representativeness heuristic describes how individuals assess the likelihood of a certain object or person belonging to a certain class of objects or persons. The question, for example, whether politician X is a member of the group of neoconservatives is not evaluated by computing probabilities but rather by using the representativeness heuristic. Thus, a specific case (politician X) is classified as belonging to a class of cases (neoconservatives) if the attributes of the case (e.g., promoted war on Iraq) are typical or representative to the attributes of the class.

Samuel Popkin applied representativeness as so-called low-information rationality to the political decision-making process of the voter. Representativeness acts as a goodness-of-fit assessment, which voters use to evaluate a presidential candidate. Therefore people judge the likelihood of a candidate being a good president by how well their knowledge about the candidate (e.g., drawn from television appearances or from how he or she manages the campaign) fits the essential features of their stereotype of a good president. Voters do not try to analyze the background of a candidate in detail and do not compute thoroughly the probability of him being a good president. They rather extrapolate predominantly from media-based knowledge how likely it is that a candidate will perform well as a president. Therefore, the representativeness heuristic results in appropriate judgments about a possible president, in case the candidate's characteristics are presented equitably by the mass media. But inferences about him can be inadequate if the information provided only spotlights a few attributes.

Works on the availability heuristic focus on the influence of the easiness with which information comes to mind. Thus, different from what the name availability heuristic suggests, the crucial criterion of this rule of thumb is not just the availability of relevant information in the individual's long-term memory but also its accessibility. According to this, people analyze the risk of an accident in a nuclear power plant by trying to recall prior disasters. If there have been recent nuclear accidents that are available in memory and come to mind easily, the assumed likelihood of an upcoming disaster will be rated high, although the actual risk is unchanged. Therefore, deductions based on the availability heuristic are vulnerable to information that is somehow more accessible than other relevant information. This phenomenon is called "accessibility bias."

The accessibility of certain information in the individual's long-term memory depends on the frequency of its processing and can therefore have many sources. As one of the critical determinants of what is more or less accessible in human memory, scholars discuss the intensity of media news coverage. It is assumed that a frequent reporting of, for example, terrorist activity makes people think about the issue more often and therefore facilitates the accessibility of information concerning terrorism (the attacks on September 11, 2001, bombing attacks in Madrid, many dead in London's subway, etc.). In the light of the availability heuristic, the increased accessibility of such memory contents influences inferences on terrorism: when judging the risk of future attacks, individuals try to recall relevant information. If there are considerable attack pictures and other terror-related contents that come to mind easily, the individuals' judgments will be biased with the tendency to overestimate the danger. In the reverse case, the absence of relevant information in memory can lead the individual to underestimate the risk of future attacks.

On this account, media-induced accessibility and biased judgments based on the availability heuristic arouse scholars' skepticism of their ability to influence political decision making, because the people's candidate preferences depend on evaluations about the candidate's attitude toward certain issues. If the mass media stresses the terrorism issue, the repeated reporting on that issue will increase the accessibility of information associated with terrorism in memory. The heightened accessibility of such information influences assessments on the risk of future terrorist attacks, and people tend to overestimate the danger of terrorism. If this is the case, biased judgments based on the availability heuristic should serve the political candidate who does not promote tolerance and liberal principles but a strict law-and-order policy. As this example shows, availability heuristics and accessibility bias are intimately connected with the framing concept and priming theory.

Nevertheless, experience-based rules of thumb in general lead people to judgments that are in their quality comparable to judgments that follow rational approaches while also being less costly. Usually assessments on certain likelihoods based on heuristics are proved by reality to be true. And since heuristic judgment is based on extrapolation, even uninformed people are allowed to decide adequately by using mental shortcuts. But low-information rationality is temperamental: the described positive effects of heuristics as an aid to political decision making will disappear if the extrapolated information used for judgments originates from data that does not meet normative requirements. Then, heuristics lead people to construe pictures in their heads that do not fit the world outside. Scholars consider mass media coverage that focuses on certain attributes of objects and persons while disregarding others a possible source for biased judgments and decisions.

Steven Schuh

See also Framing; Political Information Processing; Priming

Further Readings

Fiske, S. T., & Taylor, S. E. (1991). Social cognition. Singapore: McGraw-Hill.

Gilovich, T., & Griffin, D. (2002). Introduction—heuristics and biases: Then and now. In T. Gilovich, D. Griffin, &

D. Kahneman (Eds.), Heuristics and biases: The psychology of intuitive judgment (pp. 1–18). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Iyengar, S. (1990). Shortcuts to political knowledge: The role of selective attention and accessibility. In J. A. Ferejohn & J. H. Kuklinski (Eds.), Information and democratic processes (pp. 160–185). Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Iyengar, S., & Kinder, D. R. (1987). News that matters: Television and American opinion. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Nisbett, R. E., & Ross, L. (1980). Human inference. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.

Popkin, S. L. (1994). The reasoning voter: Communication and persuasion in presidential campaigns. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Tversky, A., & Kahneman, D. (1974). Judgment under uncertainty: Heuristics and biases. Science, 185, 1124–1131.

HILL, ANITA

See HILL–THOMAS HEARINGS

HILL–THOMAS HEARINGS

The Hill–Thomas hearings, which took place in the U.S. Senate in October 1991, were held in connection with President George H. W. Bush's nomination of Clarence Thomas to the U.S. Supreme Court. The primary witness to testify against his nomination was University of Oklahoma Law Professor Anita F. Hill. The hearings and events preceding them quickly captured the attention of the American media and public.

On June 27, 1991, Thurgood Marshall, the only African American on the U.S. Supreme Court, announced his resignation. The U.S. Constitution provides that the president "by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint . . . Judges of the Supreme Court." Four days later, the president nominated Marshall's successor, Clarence Thomas, an African American judge who had been sitting on the District of Columbia Court of Appeals for the previous 15 months. The nomination was immediately controversial. The president asserted that Thomas was the best person for the job, but some viewed him as too conservative and lacking in experience. Thomas's supporters, however, focused on his character and personal story as a self-made man who pulled himself up through hard work, rising from abject poverty in Pin Point, Georgia, to nomination to the nation's highest court. On September 28, the Senate Judiciary Committee deadlocked 7–7 on Thomas's nomination, then voted to send the nomination without recommendation to the Senate floor for hearings. The committee vote signaled trouble for the nomination.

Senate hearings began on October 3 and continued the next day, with little attention from the general public. On the morning of October 6, just 2 days before the Senate was scheduled to vote on the nomination, a story broke on National Public Radio and in Newsday that University of Oklahoma Law Professor Anita Hill, herself an African American, claimed she had been sexually harassed by Clarence Thomas when she worked for him at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and the U.S. Education Department in the early 1980s. Although she did not allege physical contact, she stated that he had asked her out numerous times, made obscene remarks to her, and described to her details from pornographic movies he had seen. The allegations created a firestorm of media attention. By that night, reporters had rushed to Norman, Oklahoma, to interview Professor Hill and her friends, colleagues, and students.

Reporters filled the law school building as classes began on October 7. Later that day, Hill held a televised press conference in one of the classrooms. On October 8, the Senate Judiciary Committee received a letter calling for an investigation that was signed by 120 women teaching in law schools from New York to California. That same day seven women serving in the House of Representatives marched up the steps of the Senate, demanding that the vote on Thomas be delayed. Thousands of voters contacted their senators, urging further investigation. By now, Thomas's supporters agreed, believing it necessary that he be given an opportunity to defend himself against the charges. That evening the Senate voted unanimously to delay the vote one week and to hold additional hearings on Hill's allegations.

This second round of hearings began October 11. In the hearing room all three major networks were joined by PBS, CNN, C-SPAN, Court TV, and so many print media reporters that there was standing room only. Clarence Thomas gave an impassioned defense, calling the hearings Kafkaesque and, in a clear reference to the media coverage, characterizing the attack against him a high-tech lynching. Anita Hill testified next, describing in graphic detail the things that Clarence Thomas had said to her while she worked for him. The spectacle of a black woman testifying against a black man in sexually explicit detail contributed to the public's keen interest in the hearings.

For three days thereafter, while other witnesses were called to testify for or against Thomas and Hill, the nation was riveted. Gavel-to-gavel coverage provided them with a glimpse into usually staid Senate hearings that now more resembled a circus. Senators could not agree on the protocol for such proceedings, nor could they agree on the role they were to play. Eventually the political process took over, and those who supported the nomination argued for proceedings favoring their candidate, while those who opposed the candidacy argued the opposite. Witnesses included friends in whom Hill had confided years before about Thomas's behavior. It also included witnesses who worked with Thomas and claimed he had never harassed them. Thomas's allies called several people who attacked Hill's credibility, accusing her of fantasizing about male attention and outright lying. One senator accused her of committing perjury. Throughout the hearings, Thomas angrily denied the charges.

The hearings especially galvanized women who watched them. Many of them identified with Hill, having experienced similar behavior at their workplaces. Indeed, women across the nation, including female law professors, rushed to Hill's defense and organized opposition to Thomas's nomination once Hill's charges were made public. The hearings split the African American community. Many African Americans, male and female, had mixed feelings about Thomas's nomination. On the one hand, they wanted to support the nomination of a black man; on the other hand, they did not favor attacking a black woman. Some believed Hill should not have spoken out against Thomas, particularly while so much of the nation was watching. Others, especially black women, supported Hill because she reflected some of their own experience. For the black community, the hearings were confusing and divisive.

What is clear, however, is that these hearings received more media attention than any other judicial nomination in this nation's history. More than 50 million people watched, far more than had ever watched judicial nomination hearings before or since. The hearings offered race, sex, and politics; a "he said/she said" theatrical drama; and a story of inappropriate sexual behavior that resonated with many viewers.

The number of polls taken after the hearings was unprecedented. Respondents were asked whom they believed and whether Thomas should be confirmed. Public opinion initially favored Thomas, though a year later it was evenly divided.

The hearings concluded on October 13. On October 15, the U.S. Senate voted to confirm Clarence Thomas's nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court by a vote of 52–48, the closest vote for a successful Supreme Court nominee in the 20th century. Thomas was sworn in just three days later. Anita Hill returned to her position as a law professor at the University of Oklahoma.

In the aftermath of the hearings, Congress quickly voted to approve amendments to Title VII, the federal employment discrimination law, increasing the amount of damages and permitting punitive damages against employers who engaged in discriminatory behavior. Formal complaints of sex discrimination to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission rose 50% in the first half of 1992. And in 1992, tagged the "Year of the Woman," a record number of women won congressional seats, raising the number to six in the Senate, 48 of 435 in the House.

Shirley A. Wiegand

Further Readings

Davis, R. (1994). Supreme Court nominations and the news media. Albany Law Review, 57, 1061.

Gender, race, and the politics of Supreme Court appointments: The import of the Anita Hill/Clarence Thomas hearings. (1992). Special Issue, Southern California Law Review, 65, 1279–1582.

Hill, A. (1997). Speaking truth to power. New York: Doubleday.

Morrison, T. (Ed.). (1992). Race-ing justice, En-gendering power: Essays on Anita Hill, Clarence Thomas, and the construction of social reality. New York: Pantheon.

Totenberg, N., & Miller, A. (Eds.). (1994). The complete transcripts of the Clarence Thomas–Anita Hill hearings: October 11, 12, 13, 1991. Chicago: Academy Chicago.

Hitler, Adolf (1889–1945)

Adolf Hitler was chancellor of Germany from January 30, 1933, to April 30, 1945, and the Führer (leader) of the NSDAP (German National Socialist Party) and the German people. Hitler was not only one of the most notorious dictators of the 20th century, on whose command millions of people were killed, but he saw himself as a propaganda genius. And in fact, the rise to power of the Nazi Party cannot be understood without taking into account the propaganda successes of the Nazi propaganda conception, which rested largely on Hitler's person and charisma.

Hitler was born to a petit-bourgeois family on April 20, 1889, in Braunau am Inn, Austria, and moved as a young man to Vienna, where he lived from 1909 in a shelter for the homeless. Twice the Academy of Fine Arts Vienna rejected him due to "unfitness for painting."

In World War I, Hitler served as a common soldier and was decorated for bravery. During the war, he discovered his interest in politics and the power of propaganda. In 1919 he joined the DAP, the German Worker's Party, and became one of its prominent propaganda speakers.

After the Beer Hall Putsch in 1923, Hitler was imprisoned for one year and used the time to write his book Mein Kampf (My Struggle), in which he dedicated two chapters (chapters 6 and 11) to his theory of political propaganda. According to Hitler, "The function of propaganda does not lie in the scientific training of the individual, but in calling the masses' attention to certain facts. . . . The whole art consists in doing this so skilfully that everyone will be convinced that the fact is real. . . . All propaganda must be popular and its intellectual level must be adjusted to the most limited intelligence among those it is addressed to" (Mein Kampf, 1980, p. 164). This propaganda conception was relying heavily on the works of popular crowd theorists of the time such as Gustave Le Bon and Ortega y Gasset. Hitler saw the people as a dumb mass that had to be manipulated and seduced according to the wants and needs of the propagandist. This was the effect Hitler sought in the numerous speeches he made while the Nazi Party was striving for power and in the early years of the Third Reich. Even though Hitler was not a very good speaker in the sense of his rhetoric ability, he developed in the interaction with his audience a charisma that produced a kind of mass hysteria. Later, after the National Socialist rule had been secured, Hitler left the propaganda business to Goebbels, who executed it in line with Hitler's ideas. After World War II had begun, Hitler disappeared almost entirely from the public sphere, which led, together with the way the war developed, to a decline in his popularity. Goebbels was aware of this and searched desperately for new ways of reestablishing the intense relation between Hitler and the people. But he failed. When Hitler committed suicide on April 30, 1945, he was convinced that the German people deserved to be eradicated by their enemies. His image as the rescuer of the German nation turned out to be one carefully constructed by propaganda.

Thymian Bussemer

See also Authoritarianism; Censorship, Political; Film and Politics; Ideology; Mass Political Behavior; Persuasion, Political; Propaganda

Further Readings

Fest, J. C. (1974). Hitler. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich.

Hitler, A. (1980). Mein Kampf [My struggle]. London: Hutchinson.

Kershaw, I. (1999, 2001). Hitler 1889–1936 (vol. 1) & 1937–1945 (vol. 2). New York: Norton.

Holtz-Bacha, Christina (1953–)

Christina Holtz-Bacha holds the chair for communication research at Friedrich-Alexander-University of Erlangen-Nürnberg in Germany. Her academic career started with the study of communication, political science, and sociology at the universities of Münster and Bonn. In Münster she obtained her PhD in 1978. From 1979 until 1981 she worked as a press manager for the Institut für Demoskopie Allensbach. Between 1981 and 1991, Holtz-Bacha worked as an assistant professor in communication at the University of Munich. She received her postdoctoral dissertation (Habilitation) in 1989 and held her first professorship from 1991 at the University of Bochum. She continued to the University of Mainz in 1995, and in 2004 she took up the post at the university of Erlangen-Nürnberg, succeeding Winfried Schulz.

Holtz-Bacha is primarily known as a scholar and lecturer in the areas of political communication (especially concerning elections, information campaigning, and political advertising), media politics, and gender-related issues. Her broad perspective is indicated by her work as an editor of both a bibliography and an anthology of key publications in the field of communication research. Her postdoctoral dissertation investigated the videomalaise hypothesis, an insight that can be found in textbooks. Her five anthologies with empirical studies on German national elections have become classic literature in political communication.

Holtz-Bacha is also renowned for her broad international perspective. She was a fellow at the Joan Shorenstein Center/John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University in 1999 and a visiting professor at the University of Minnesota in Minneapolis in 1986. She has participated in many international projects, including the "Changing Media Changing Europe" Program by the European Science Foundation. Since 1989 she has been the coeditor of the German communication journal Publizistik. She also sits on the editorial boards of the Journal of Communication, the Journal of Political Marketing, the European Journal of Communication, and the International Advisory Board of Comunicazione Politica. She has served as chair of the Political Communication Division of the International Communication Association and as program chair of the Political Communication Section of the American Political Science Association.

Lutz M. Hagen

Further Readings

Fröhlich, R., & Holtz-Bacha, C. (Eds.). (2003). Journalism education in Europe and North America: An international comparison. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton.

Holtz-Bacha, C. (1985). Publizistik-Bibliographie. Eine internationale Bibliographie von Nachschlagewerken zur Kommunikationswissenschaft [Communication-Bibliography: A bibliography of bibliographies in communication research]. Konstanz: Universitätsverlag.

Holtz-Bacha, C. (1990). Ablenkung oder Abkehr von der Politik? Mediennutzung im Geflecht politischer Orientierungen [Distraction or estrangement from politics?]. Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag.

Holtz-Bacha, C. (2004). Political communication research abroad: Europe. In L. L. Kaid (Ed.), Handbook of political communication research (pp. 463–477). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Holtz-Bacha, C. (2006). Die Massenmedien im Wahlkampf: Die Bundestagswahl 2005 [Mass media in election campaigns: The national election of 2005]. Wiesbaden: VS Verlag für Sozialwissenschaften.

Holtz-Bacha, C. (2006). Medienpolitik für Europa [Media policy for Europe]. Wiesbaden: VS Verlag für Sozialwissenschaften.

Holtz-Bacha, C., & Brosius, H.-B. (Eds.). (1999). German communication yearbook. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton.

Holtz-Bacha, C., & Kaid, L. L. (Eds.). (2006). The Sage handbook of political advertising. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Holtz-Bacha, C., & Kutsch, A. (Eds.). (2002). Schlüsselwerke für die Kommunikationswissenschaft [Key publications in communication science]. Wiesbaden: Westdeutscher Verlag.

Kaid, L. L., & Holtz-Bacha, C. (Eds.). (1995). Political advertising in Western democracies: Parties and candidates on television. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

HONG KONG HANDOVER

Hong Kong Handover refers to the return of the former British colony, Hong Kong, to the People's Republic of China on July 1, 1997. China regained its sovereignty, and Hong Kong became a special administrative region under the policy of "one country, two systems." Hong Kong's Basic Law guarantees the continuity of its capitalist system for 50 years. Chinese President Jiang Zemin and Premier Li Peng, as well as British Prime Minister Tony Blair and the Prince of Wales attended the special ceremony among foreign dignitaries. Tung Chee-hwa replaced the last British Governor Chris Patten and became Hong Kong's first chief executive.

Hong Kong, with an area of 422 square miles and a population of 6.3 million by 1997, consists of three regions. The island of Hong Kong was ceded to Great Britain under the 1842 Treaty of Nanking after the first Opium War. Kowloon was acquired by Britain under the 1860 Convention of Peking after the second Opium War. The New Territories, which constituted the last British territorial extension in Hong Kong, include an extensive northern area of the Kowloon Peninsula and surrounding islands and were leased to Britain for 99 years on July 1, 1898. Hong Kong remained under the British control except during Japanese occupation in World War II.

As China implemented new policies of economic reform and opening to the outside world, China and Britain began to discuss the lease expiry in 1997 and the future of Hong Kong. British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher visited Beijing and began to negotiate with Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping in 1982. Both countries signed the Sino-British Joint Declaration in 1984. China agreed to grant Hong Kong a separate administrative status and a high degree of autonomy. The Basic Law of Hong Kong was passed by the National People's Congress in 1990 and served as the constitution starting in July 1997.

The handover took place among fireworks, speeches, and live media coverage. Literature on news reports of the ceremony demonstrated domestication of global news as different nations used their own national prisms for framing and agenda setting. The Chinese media celebrated the return of Hong Kong, presenting it as the end of Western imperialism and the beginning of a brighter future for both Hong Kong and China. Hong Kong media cast the event in the global context, searching for a new identity among mixed feelings of hope, excitement, ambivalence, and uncertainty. Western media expressed concerns for Hong Kong's political prospects despite their confidence in its economic prosperity.

Mei Zhang

See also China, Media and Politics in; Chinese Cultural Revolution; Deng, Xiaoping

Further Readings

Lee, C. C., Chan, J. M., Pan, Z., & So, C. Y. K. (2002). Global media spectacle: News war over Hong Kong. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Pepper, S. (2000). China and Hong Kong: The political economy of reunification. In C. Hudson (Ed.), The China handbook: Prospects onto the 21st century (pp. 41–58). Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn Publishers.

HORSERACE COVERAGE

Horserace coverage is a term used to describe mass media coverage of political campaigns that focuses on the overall political spectacle, the who's ahead/who's behind mentality of a race, instead of providing essential political information. The international trend of mass media coverage relying on horserace elements during an election is prevalent in print, television, and Internet channels. Such coverage predominately focuses on the political campaign as a contest instead of a legitimate, substantive political process. Horserace coverage is considered to be a troubling media practice and a breakdown of the gatekeeping function of journalists, as such coverage takes up valuable space in the limited news hole by focusing on image and game elements instead of the political candidates and their issues.

As such, horserace coverage is exemplified by media stories that explicitly address the projected race results through the presentation of opinion polls, stories that are about various types of strategies being used by the candidates and parties in their campaigns, and discussions of political parties' and candidates' campaign media tactics and advertising. Other examples of horserace coverage include media content that contain a focus on who's winning or who's losing, that discuss in detail where the candidates are campaigning, what voter groups the candidates are targeting, how candidates are raising money, and which candidates are getting endorsed by powerful individuals or groups.

This type of media coverage typically does little to inform and educate voters about domestic or foreign issues or policy issues that might directly affect the voters. Instead, such horserace coverage tends to focus on the candidates and members of political parties as if they were celebrities, sports figures, or game show participants who are in a race or contest instead of a political campaign to hold public office and serve a constituency. Research has consistently shown that horserace or strategy coverage dominates campaign coverage at all levels of elections in the United States. Many other countries have noted the same trend in their political coverage.

Research also indicates horserace coverage is not just limited to mass media. Findings from recent elections suggest that political candidates and parties rely on content that focuses on the game, or horserace, elements of a campaign in their own controlled media, such as Web sites, e-mails, advertising, and direct mail. In addition to this tabloidization of news, the media also direct more attention to argumentative discussions between candidates, such as debates.

Also, metacommunication is considered to be specific type of horserace coverage in which the media tend to inject themselves into news. This trend is particularly alarming in democracies, where the public rely on the mass media to provide substantive and objective information on political and policy issues. Researchers have noted this practice and even measured the amount of time the media spend talking to and about themselves versus actual coverage during presidential campaigns, finding significant decreases in the amounts of substantive coverage of issues, as well as the time given to coverage of statements by political leaders and newsmakers.

Overall, horserace coverage is game- and/or poll-driven reporting. This type of content appears to favor the short sound bite and is often followed by an instant analysis from a media personality. The metacommunication trend is illustrated by the media's tendency to focus the emphasis of campaign coverage on itself, as media commentators report and comment on sensationalistic stories instead of ones that focus on policy. Ultimately, it is of concern that extended exposure to political horserace coverage of elections may increase voter apathy and cynicism.

Andrew Paul Williams

See also News Coverage, Politics; News Selection Process; Tabloids

Further Readings

D'Angelo, P., & Esser, F. (2003). Metacoverage of the press and publicity in campaign 2000 network news. In L. Kaid, J. C. Tedesco, D. Bystrom, & M. S. McKinney (Eds.), The millennium election: Communication and the 2000 campaign (pp. 89–103). Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Delli Carpini, M. X., & Williams, B. A. (2001). Let us infotain you: Politics in the new media environment. In W. L. Bennett & R. M. Entman (Eds.), Mediated politics: Communication in the future of democracy (pp. 160–181). New York: Cambridge University Press.

deVreese, C. H., & Semetko, H. A. (2002). Cynical and engaged: Strategic campaign coverage, public opinion, and mobilization in a referendum. Communication Research, 29(6), 615–643.

Esser, F. (2000). Tabloidization of news: A comparative analysis of Anglo-American and German press journalism. European Journal of Communication, 14(3), 291–324.

Esser, F., & D'Angelo, P. (2002). Framing the press and the publicity process: A content analysis of meta-coverage in campaign 2000 network news. American Behavioral Scientist, 46(5), 617–641.

Kerbel, M. R. (1997). The media: Viewing the campaign through a strategic haze. In M. Nelson (Ed.), The election of 1996 (pp. 81–105). Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Lichter, R. S., & Noyes, R. E. (1995). Good intentions make bad news: Why Americans hate campaign journalism. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Lichter, R. S., Noyes, R. E., & Kaid, L. L. (2000). No news or negative news: How the networks nixed the '96 campaign. In L. L. Kaid & D. Bystrom (Eds.), The electronic election (pp. 3–13). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Patterson, T. E. (1993). Out of order. New York: Alfred Knopf.

Williams, A. P., & Trammell, K. D. (2005). Candidate campaign E-mail messages in the presidential election 2004. American Behavioral Scientist, 49(4), 560–574.

Horton, Willie

See Willie Horton Ad

Hostile Media Effect

For journalists reporting on controversial political issues, it is all too common to get critical feedback from readers or viewers who accuse them of bias. They find some comfort, however, when audience members from both sides of a political fence charge that news coverage is slanted in favor of the other side. This scenario is a classic illustration of the hostile media effect—the tendency for opposing partisans to see presumably neutral news coverage as unfairly biased against their own point of view.

Psychologists regard such biased perceptions as a contrast effect, in which partisans perceive information to be further away from their own position on an issue. In this sense the hostile media effect illustrates the subjective character of information processing. The fact that different people can perceive or interpret the same political information in different ways nicely illustrates the "active audience" paradigm and argues against the view of the media audience as a passive, vulnerable, and homogenous mass.

An important point is that, for any political issue, not everyone exhibits the hostile media perception. This perceptual bias is often dramatically evident for partisans, those individuals who are highly involved in or have strong opinions on an issue, but it is just as dramatically lacking for people who are neutral or uninterested. Thus it begs another important question in the political communication arena: Just who is a partisan? Research has successfully demonstrated the hostile media effect for people who identify strongly with an interest group or who hold intense or extreme attitudes on an issue. But many questions remain about the nature of issue involvement and how it might generate perceptions of unfavorable media bias.

Although this phenomenon has long been familiar to news reporters and editors, researchers turned serious empirical attention to the idea only in 1985, when Vallone, Ross, and Lepper published the first carefully observed evidence. The authors showed that groups of Arab and Israeli students each considered broadcast news coverage of conflict in the Middle East to be biased against their own position. As this example illustrates, the hostile media effect is most typically studied by recruiting groups of partisans with opposing views toward a political controversy and exposing them to samples of media coverage of the issue, coverage often selected or sometimes even manipulated to be as neutral or "balanced" as possible. The resulting perceptions of bias have been demonstrated across a range of issues, including debates about genetically modified foods, the 1997 United Parcel Service strike, physician-assisted suicide, sports rivalries, the use of primates in laboratory research, legalized gambling, and, of course, political elections. Some field survey studies have also shown a negative relationship between respondents' political attitudes and their perceptions of the slant of mass media coverage.

However, research has also only begun to carefully investigate some intriguing theoretical questions, including whether this bias is unique to information in a mass media context. Several studies have addressed this question by presenting partisans with content randomly presented as either a mass media report or a college student's essay for a composition class. Results show that partisans view media contents as unfairly biased, but see the identical information as neutral or even supportive when it appears in the student essay context. These findings suggest that the same content can produce a contrast effect when it appears in the mass media, but an assimilation effect (in which partisans see information as more similar to, rather than different from, their own position) in nonmedia formats, perhaps because the mass media arouses a defensive processing response.

The nature of information processing underlying the hostile media effect has also been examined in several studies. Three potential mechanisms have been identified. One, termed "selective recall," proposes that for highly involved individuals, disagreeable content is more salient and is seen as more prominent or more dominant than it actually is. A second mechanism, "selective categorization," occurs when partisans agree on the content but disagree in their evaluations of that content, each side interpreting more of the same content as unfavorably slanted. The third mechanism, quite different from the other two, is very similar to latitude-of-rejection ideas in social judgment theory. In this process, termed "different standards," partisans on different sides would each find some of the ideas or arguments in an array of content—particularly those ideas unfavorable to their own point of view—to be invalid or irrelevant. The presence of such "unacceptable" content thus makes the overall presentation appear unfair. Evidence for these mechanisms is mixed. In general, support has been found for selective categorization but not selective recall. Different standards appears to be robust, but equally so in both contrast and assimilation circumstances, suggesting that it may not explain the hostile media effect.

It is important to note that, while the hostile media perception indicates the presence of an audience bias, it does not necessarily strengthen the defensive position of the media. The presence of an audience bias does not lessen the likelihood of source or channel biases as well.

Finally, some research has discussed or investigated consequences, largely dysfunctional consequence, of hostile media perceptions. These include the possibility that partisans may be increasingly polarized or alienated by their sense that the mass media are hostile to their side of the political fence. This perception is also seen as an obstacle to the effective functioning of the marketplace of ideas in democratic theory, since partisans seem prone to reject what may in fact be evenhanded presentation of competing notions. Of particular concern are data showing that embattled partisans who perceive unfavorable media bias, and see that biased content as likely to influence others, report a greater likelihood to resort to violence in defense of their cause.

Albert Gunther

See also Media Bias; Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory

Further Readings

Gunther, A. C., & Schmitt, K. M. (2004). Mapping boundaries of the hostile media effect. Journal of Communication, 54, 55–70.

Schmitt, K. M., Gunther, A. C., & Liebhart, J. L. (2004). Why partisans see mass media as biased. Communication Research, 31(6), 623–641.

Tsfati, Y., & Cohen, J. (2005). Democratic consequences of hostile media perceptions: The case of Gaza settlers. Harvard International Journal of Press/Politics, 10(4), 28–51.

Vallone, R. P., Ross, L., & Lepper, M. R. (1985). The hostile media phenomenon: Biased perception and perceptions of media bias in coverage of the Beirut massacre. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 49(3), 577–585.

Humor in Politics

Political humor is communication intended to evoke amusement about the governance of society. Humor need not be primarily geared to deliver a political message in order to be classified as political.

Political humor may take a variety of forms. The simplest form is the political joke, pun, or riddle, which typically employs a question-answer format but can use any number of devices to deliver the punch line, including surprise endings, double meanings, or even simple letter inversions. An example would be:

Q: A child, an honest politician, and Santa Claus all spot a $20 bill on the ground. Who picks it up?

A: The child. The other two are figments of his imagination.

Perhaps the most common type of political jokes target prominent politicians, although in repressive states (Hitler's Germany, Stalin's Soviet Union), jokes about the system itself were not uncommon. Politicians will sometimes use self-deprecating humor to deflate criticism. In one of the 1984 presidential debates, Walter Mondale attempted to make Ronald Reagan's advanced age an issue. Reagan intentionally misinterpreted the issue, retorting, "I will not make age an issue of this campaign. I am not going to exploit, for political purposes, my opponent's youth and inexperience."

Classically, political humor took the form of, or was found in, poetry, song, or literature. Much can be considered political satire, a literary technique that exposes and ridicules the absurdities of its subject in order to affect (or prevent) change. It is typically subtle, relying on irony and deadpan delivery. One of the oldest known examples of political satire is from the Greek comic playwright, Aristophanes, whose Lysistrata is still amusing audiences today. The Roman Empire boasted several noted satirists, including Lucilius, Horace, and Juvenal. Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels was in part an attack on England, the dominant Whig Party, and England's war with France. In the 20th century satire was employed by authors like Aldus Huxley and George Orwell to comment on the dangers of social changes taking place in Europe.

In the United States, Mark Twain offered biting and humorous political commentary, including his quip that "it could probably be shown by facts and figures that there is no distinctly native criminal class, except Congress." Twain is also famously credited with claiming that "first God created idiots, that was for practice. Then he made school boards." Another American, the entertainer Will Rogers, was also well known for his political quips, including his claim that "it's easy being a humorist when you've got the whole government working for you." In Great Britain, the Anglo-Irish playwright George Bernard Shaw had a long career as a political humorist, once noting that "a government that robs Peter to pay Paul can always depend on the support of Paul."

During the era of yellow journalism in the United States, political humor routinely included the political cartoon, a form mastered by Thomas Nast. His critical cartoons helped bring down Boss Tweed of Tammany Hall. Garry Trudeau continues to take on controversial issues in his Doonesbury comic strip. The past half-century has seen the emergence of standup comics such as Dick Gregory, George Carlin, Lenny Bruce, and Mort Sahl, all of whom gained prominence with their edgy sociopolitical humor. During this period, political humor has also been increasingly found in electronic media (radio, television, and of late, the Internet) as well as in film. For example, filmmakers Trey Parker and Matt Stone poked fun at a wide range of political issues in their marionette-based farce, Team America: World Police.

Televised political satire includes situation comedies such as All in the Family and The Simpsons. Sketch comedy on Saturday Night Live has poked fun at political targets for roughly 3 decades. It is also found in the monologues of such late night comics as David Letterman, Jay Leno, and Conan O'Brian, as well as on The Daily Show with Jon Stewart. The latter, patterned after Saturday Night Live's "Weekend Update," is a "fake news" broadcast. This makes it a parody, a type of satire that imitates in order to ridicule. In the past few years hundreds of Web sites have sprung up that offer political humor, including the now-classic "This Land" animated video clip from JibJab.com, a parody of George W. Bush and John Kerry during the 2004 presidential campaign.

The content of most modern political humor in the Unites States is heavily centered around the presidency. From Chevy Chase's portrayal of Gerald Ford as a clumsy incompetent on Saturday Night Live to jokes on late night talk shows about Bill Clinton's sexual foibles, presidents (and presidential candidates) provide endless fodder for political humor. Political humor on television is typically nonpartisan, since commercial television must appeal to a wide audience. This is not the case with other media (for example, the Internet).

There is a small body of work in the tradition of the humanities that examines political humor, primarily from a descriptive standpoint. Some examine political humor during specific eras (e.g., the Roman Republic, the American Revolution, the Soviet Union); a few focus on political satire from a comparative perspective; and several serve as compilations or collections of American political humor. Political cartoons and presidential humor remain popular subjects.

Starting in the 1990s, a body of research began to emerge that examines political humor from a more scientific perspective. Communications and political science scholars have begun to focus on television-based political humor. This includes research into various late night talk shows like The Late Show with David Letterman or The Daily Show with Jon Stewart, programming like The Simpsons or South Park, and more conventional comedy shows like Saturday Night Live. Many studies focus on content, for example, ideology, or cataloging types and targets of jokes during a presidential campaign. More recent research has begun to examine the learning and attitudinal effects of televised political humor. The study of political humor, while a smaller academic niche, holds great promise.

Jody Baumgartner

See also Daily Show, The; Saturday Night Live

Further Readings

Baumgartner, J. C., & Morris, J. S. (Eds.). (2007). Laughing matters: Humor and American politics in the media age. New York: Routledge.

Nilsen, D. L. F. (1993). Humor scholarship: A research bibliography. Westport, CT: Greenwood.

Humphrey, Hubert H. (1911–1978)

Hubert Horatio Humphrey, Jr., was the 38th vice president of the United States under Lyndon B. Johnson and is best known as one of the first advocates of civil rights. During his career, Humphrey served as mayor of Minneapolis, U.S. senator from Minnesota, and the 1968 Democratic presidential nominee. Humphrey is seen by some scholars as one of the last representatives of American progressivism, following in the footsteps of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Humphrey's Midwestern progressivism can be traced to his childhood. In his autobiography, Humphrey notes that two major influences in his life were the land in South Dakota and his father, who supported the Democratic Party. During his doctoral study at the University of Minnesota, Humphrey decided to enter the Minneapolis mayoral race in 1943, losing that election but winning the mayorship just 2 years later. In 1944, Humphrey played an integral role in the merger of the Democratic and Farmer-Labor parties, creating the DFL party that is still significant in Minnesota today.

The Minneapolis mayor gained national prominence through his Democratic National Convention speech of 1948, in which Humphrey persuaded the party to adopt a pro–civil rights stance. His famous line from that speech noted, "The time has arrived for the Democratic Party to get out of the shadow of states' rights and walk forthrightly into the bright sunshine of human rights." Although the pro–civil rights plank inevitably divided southern Democrats from the rest of the party, Harry Truman won the presidential election in which civil rights defined the Democratic Party.

After his national debut, Humphrey was elected U.S. senator from Minnesota in 1949, where he continued his quest for civil rights, including a role in the passing of the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. Humphrey writes in his autobiography that the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was the major legislative achievement of his Senate career. He served as majority whip of the Senate from 1961 to 1964, thereafter serving as vice president of the United States until 1968. Humphrey was heavily criticized throughout his vice presidency for being too loyal to President Lyndon Johnson, especially regarding Johnson's stance on the Vietnam War.

Although Humphrey ran for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1952, and again in 1960 against John F. Kennedy, he did not receive the Democratic presidential nomination until 1968. Humphrey did not end his political career following his loss in 1968 to Richard Nixon; he returned to the U.S. Senate in 1971, ran again and lost the presidential nomination in 1972, was reelected to the Senate in 1976, and remained in office until his death. As a representative of Midwestern prairie progressivism, Humphrey was an advocate of social progress, social justice, and social reform.

Rebecca A. Kuehl

See also Civil Rights Movement; Johnson, Lyndon B.

Further Readings

Devlin, L. P. (1968). Hubert H. Humphrey's 1948 civil rights speech. Today's Speech, 16(3), 43–47.

Humphrey, H. H. (1976). The education of a public man. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

Hungary, Communication and Politics

Hungarian political traditions are determined by a thousand years of Hungarian statehood. Before the political transition, the Hungarian political evolution had been characterized by a weak democratic but strong parliamentary system. In the Hungarian political system, the most prominent state and representative organ is its 386-member Parliament, the Hungarian National Assembly. Its legal status and functions are regulated by the Constitution. Members of the Parliament are elected every 4 years in the course of a regular election campaign, and the winning party or coalition then has the legal right to nominate the prime minister, who formulates the program of the government. The head of the state is the president of the republic, who is elected by the members of the Parliament for 5 years.

Democracy was institutionalized in the Republic of Hungary between 1987 and 1989, resulting in a multitier system and a new legal frame of operation: the parliamentary democracy. The first democratically elected government began abolishing the centrally planned economy to develop a new market-based economy. The four political parties that determined the formation of the Hungarian political system are

1. The Federation of Young Democrats—Hungarian Civic Party (Fidesz-MPP), which was founded on March 30, 1988, and was chaired by a 13-member National Committee until 1993, when the committee was replaced by a single-member chairmanship. Viktor Orban has been the chairman of the party since 1993.
2. Hungarian Socialist Party (MSZP) was founded on October 7, 1989, on the basis of the former MSZMP (Hungarian Socialist People's Party).
3. Alliance of Free Democrats (SZDSZ) was founded on November 13, 1988
4. Hungarian Democratic Forum (MDF) was founded on September 27, 1988.

Christian Democratic People's Party (KDNP), a historical party originally established in 1944, became a parliamentary party in coalition with the Federation of Young Democrats in 2006. All are organized and financed similarly. The financial base for their functioning comes from three sources: membership fees, donations, and state subsidy. They each possess a huge decision-making organization that usually comes together annually or at special occasions (e.g., forming a coalition, leaving a coalition, election of officials). Its main task is to elect the party leaders or to decide on the merits of a political case.

The Media System

Before the democratic regime change, in the so-called Kádár era, the Hungarian print and electronic media functioned under the supervision of the centralized, hierarchic, and bureaucratic political system. The beginning of the new era, or, in other words, the end of the dictatorial media policy took shape slowly, beginning in 1986, when the first commercial radio station, Danubius Radio, started broadcasting entertainment programs without ideological content. That was the year that the first local cable television channels came into being. Law No. 2, regulating print media, was put into force.

On January 14, 1988, professional journalists openly criticized the media policy of the totalitarian state. In the fall of 1988 an "alternative" paper—Hitel (Credit)—was legally published. The next year, in March 1989, control of Hungarian Television was taken from the government, and a special committee was formed to deal with the question of the reform of publicity. On August 24, the committee issued the document titled the "Basic Concepts of Unbiased Information," which urged the political independence and neutrality of Hungarian mass media. Consequently, the government eliminated the requirement for permission to found a paper; it also meant the end of the state monopoly of the ownership of print media. In 1989, 1,118 new papers were registered, signaling the privatization of print media and the inflow of foreign capital into the media sector. On August 19, Nap-TV (the Hungarian word nap means "sun" and also "day"), the first private television studio, was established. When the modified constitution came into force on October 23, it officially declared the freedom of press. In the spring of 1990, the National Assembly and the parties took further steps to protect the public media and the Hungarian Telegraph Agency (MTI) from political battles. They also agreed that the presidents and the vice presidents of Hungarian Radio and Hungarian Television would be appointed by the president of the republic upon proposal of the prime minister.

Thus, during the years of the democratic regime change, state control over the press and electronic media came to an end. The majority of the print media were privatized. A pluralistic media system came into being, characterized by many participants and a tense competition among them. Currently more than 5,000 (almost 6,000) different press organs, radio and television channels, and Internet forums are available to satisfy the information needs of the citizens. The most important question, however, concerns the ownership of information media. In other words, who controls and influences the agenda setting and the opinion formation in Hungary?

In the Hungarian media, market consolidation took place first in the press media segment; the first monopolies were formed in the newspaper business. Different foreign media companies took possession of the most profitable papers, and they started dominating the advertising business as well in the competition for advertisers. The most popular quality political newspaper is still the Népszabadság, but during the past years the copies sold of this newspaper dropped by more than 30%. While the issues sold of the quality national newspapers decreases, there is a reverse tendency for the tabloids, and their expansion on the press market has been spectacular. The most popular daily is Blikk, a typical tabloid.

Television has a distinguished time-setting and agenda-setting role in Hungarian society. An average viewer spends more than four and a half hours per day watching TV programs. The Hungarian audiovisual media have the format of a dual system: public and commercial. The representatives of the public television broadcast are MTV (Hungarian Television) and Danube Television (Duna TV). MTV has two channels: m1, functioning on terrestrial frequency, and m2, operated by satellite transmission. Duna TV has two satellite channels. In the fall of 2006, more than 900,000 adult people (above the age of 18, who are eligible to vote) chose the Evening News of MTV. The most popular public political televised programs are The ESTE (The Evening), which is broadcast every weekday evening and is watched by more than 8% of all the adult TV viewers (approximately 650,000 people); the Kedd 21 (Tuesday 21), watched by more than 10% of all the adult TV viewers (approximately 800,000 people); and A szólás szabadsága (The Freedom of Speech), which is transmitted on Sunday night and is watched by more than 9% of all the adult TV viewers (approximately 740,000 people).

The two most important commercial representatives of the Hungarian electronic media are the Luxemburg-based SBS Broadcasting S.A., with about 80% ownership of TV2 channel and Bertelsmann AG., the owner of RTL Klub channel. The National Radio and Television Commission (ORTT) decided to provide two of the three terrestrial television frequencies for these commercial television giants in 1997, at the beginning of the deregulation of the Hungarian electronic media market. ORTT gave permission for a 10-year exclusive franchise of the biggest segment of the electronic media market, which has been prolonged for another 5 years until 2012, thus determining the development of the national media market and the financing of the public information service.

The Hungarian television market is highly concentrated. This concentration can be illustrated by the fact that the money spent by the investors (owners) of RTL Klub and TV2 makes up more than 30% of the revenues of the total Hungarian advertising industry and 90% of the total revenues from television advertisements. The conglomeration of the commercial television market also means the concentration over the control of the program structure and content. TV2 and RTL Klub reach the most valuable (from a marketing point of view) age group of the audience: they have a significant influence on 60% of the viewers between 18 and 49 years old. This situation has led to the monopoly of the television market and to the trivialization (tabloidization) of program content, not to the growth of competition and freedom of speech.

Most of the program topics offered by TV2 and RTL Klub are shallow. However, despite their superficial coverage of important concerns, the News of RTL Club and the Tények (Facts) of TV2 are the most widely watched evening news programs nationally, and the Evening News of m1 public channel occupies the third position. One of the first drastic consequences of the "dual media system" in Hungary became the radical decrease of the audience ratings and the advertising income of the public television channel, m1.

Political Communication in Hungary

In the Republic of Hungary, TV, among all the media institutions, has gained crucial importance as one of the most powerful means for political influence and shaping the political process. In 1993, the situation became quite dramatic, as TV had become the target of the parties' political struggle. There was no media law officially accepted by the Parliament that could regulate the functioning of Hungarian television until 1996. Law No. 1, concerning radio and television broadcasting, defines the meaning of political advertisement: It is a program that attempts to influence; calls for support by participation in the elections of a party or political movement, its successful actions, its candidate, its initiative for plebiscite; and popularizes a party or movement's name, activity, aims, slogan, emblem, and the image. In the paragraph about restrictions and bans on advertising, the law decrees:

> In election periods, political advertisements can be broadcast according to the laws about the election of members of Parliament, the local and regional candidates, and the mayors. In any other period, political advertisements can only be communicated in connection with a decreed plebiscite. It is prohibited to announce political advertisements in any programs broadcast to foreign countries. Although another person or institution is sponsoring the political advertisement, this does not decrease either the responsibility or the freedom of the broadcaster, and neither the sponsor nor the broadcaster may change the content or placement of the program because of the ad, just the timing. The broadcaster is not responsible for the content of the political advertisement. A political advertisement must be visually and acoustically separated from other pieces of the program, with special announcement about its character before and after the broadcast.

Parliamentary elections between 1990 and 2006 were based on Act No. 34 of 1989 on the Election of Members of Parliament (1994), enacted by Parliament on October 20, 1989, and also on Act C of 1997 on Electoral Procedure. Act No. 34 contains the regulations concerning suffrage, the electoral system (members of Parliament, nomination, determination of election results), and electoral procedures (electoral campaign, polling, electoral bodies, polling wards, registration of voters, publicity of electoral procedures, legal remedies, final provisions). Article 11 in chapter 4 ("Electoral Campaign") of the act briefly defines the media presentation of the campaign:

> 1. Until the day preceding election at the latest, the Hungarian Telegraph Agency, Hungarian Radio and Hungarian Television shall carry on an equal footing the electoral presentations of parties putting forward candidates. Each party with a candidate shall be given at least one electoral program free of charge. This same duty shall devolve upon the local studios in their respective area of broadcast with regard to the electoral programs of candidates. Other advertisements that go toward making a party or any of its candidates more popular can only be broadcast with a clear message declaring such publicity as "Paid Electoral Advertising."
> 2. During the 30 days preceding the election, Hungarian Radio and Hungarian Television shall cover the parties presenting national lists on an equal footing in their news of electoral events and, in their electoral reports, in proportion to the candidates nominated.
> 3. On the last day of the electoral campaigns, Hungarian Radio and Hungarian Television shall broadcast the electoral summary reports prepared by parties presenting national lists, under equal program conditions for parties, for equal lengths of time and without comments. (Act No. 34, 1994, p. 25)

The key concepts in the act are equality and proportionality in media presentation of the parties and the candidates. These principles guide the application of the regulatory system to campaigning.

Act C of 1997 on Electoral Procedure declares that according to the Constitution of the Republic of Hungary, suffrage is equal, voting is direct and secret, the process of elections is democratic. This act is applied to the election of the members of Parliament, the election of the members of the European Parliament, the election of the representatives and mayors of local governments, the election of minority municipalities.

Act C of 1997 in chapter 6 contains the regulations of the campaign period. The campaign period lasts from the call for the election to midnight of the day before voting. From midnight the campaign silence period is announced. During this period all election campaign activity is prohibited (including, for example, organizing transportation to the polling station for the voters by the candidate or the nominating organization; supplying food and drink; distributing parties' or candidates' symbols, posters). No opinion polls can be published 8 days prior to the elections, until the termination of elections.

Nominating organizations and candidates can produce posters without permission, and they may place them without limitation on certain areas in the public domain, but they should not cover the posters of other candidates or parties. Posters should be removed in 30 days from the polling day. Radio and television program providers may broadcast political advertisements under equal conditions for candidates and parties without attaching explanation or opinion.

In the Republic of Hungary the marketing approach to parliamentary election campaigns has been applied since 1998. The switch to the marketing approach meant that politics became business, where success mainly depends on professional communication skills and unique public relations strategies. The final goal is to project the most positive image of the political candidate and the party and to sell them with the biggest possible profit. The profit is the voters' support and the winning of the elections. What are the most widely used tools and channels for gaining the citizens' attention in political campaigns? Major components of the candidates' campaign are the televised advertisements and the broadcast of the candidates' debate. The parties' use of televised ads, which is regulated by the media law, is not widely discussed by the news media.

Among the new technological advances, the Internet has significant potential to influence political elections. In Hungary, Internet multimedia became part of the political skirmish in 1998, which was made possible by the latest advances in telecommunication technology: prerecorded messages through cable and SMS (Short Message Service) messages, or text messages, transmitted through mobile phones in 2002 and 2006. The Internet plays a growing role in spreading the election information, in collecting donations, and also in activating the voters. However, the homepages of the parliamentary parties do not reveal the strategy they intend to use to activate the potential "Internet" voters. For example, in the 2006 parliamentary election campaign, the parties did not consider it important to let the citizens know about their plans and party programs well before the voting day. (In that respect the Hungarian Democratic Forum was an exception.) The most informative and well-designed homepage was prepared by the Alliance of Free Democrats. It included podcasting, interactive interviews, RSS, blog, and it introduced the party's candidates for member of parliament. Blogging as an election campaign tool was also used by the prime minister, but not on the Socialist Party homepage—it was accessible on the homepage of a left-wing game called Amoeba. Interactive communication possibilities were characteristic only of the homepages of the governing parties and only for registered users. Both the Hungarian Socialist Party and the Federation of Young Democrats used their homepages for recruiting volunteers, and they also had separate homepages for negative campaigning. The main political parties were able to create effective interactive communication with the citizens through the Internet. Online communication became a new qualitative feature of political participation (though online and offline communication of the separate parties did not differ much strategically, they represented the general conventions, manners, and rules of the given party), but it has not been proved yet to what extent online communication contributes to the success of a party.

Jolán Róka

Further Readings

Act C of 1997 on Electoral Procedure. Retrieved January 1, 2007, from http://www.election.hu/parval2006/en/02/2_0.html

Act No. 34 of 1989 on the Election of Members of Parliament. (1994, January). Magyar Közlöny, 7. Retrieved January 1, 2007, from http://www.election.hu/parval2006/en/02/2_0.html

Bajomi-Lázár, P. (Ed.). (2005). Magyar médiatörténet a késő Kádár-kortól az ezredfordulóig [History of Hungarian media from the late-Kádár era until the turn of millennium]. Budapest, Hungary: Akadémiai Kiadó.

Ez történt a tévében. MTV: hírműsorok nézettsége az új struktúrában. 2006. Október 12. [This happened in television. MTV: The viewing figures in the new structure. October 12, 2006]. http://www.hirado.hu/nyomtatas.php?id=154780

Félúton. Választási kampány online [Half-way. Election campaign online]. (2006, March 1). Retrieved from http://www.hullamvadasz.hu/index.php3?tanulmany=879&fotip=6

Gallai, S., & Török, G. (2003). Politika és politikatudomány [Politics and political science]. Budapest, Hungary: Aula Kiadó.

Jany, J., Ilosvai, G., & Bölcskei, J. (2000). Médiajogi kézikönyv [Handbook of media law]. Budapest, Hungary: Osiris Kiadó.

Körösényi, A., Tóth, Cs., & Török, G. (2003). A magyar politikai rendszer [Hungarian political system]. Budapest, Hungary: Osiris Kiadó.

Róka, J. (2006). Political advertising in Hungarian electoral communications. In L. L. Kaid & C. Holtz-Bacha (Eds.), The SAGE handbook of political advertising (pp. 343–358). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Hussein I, King (1935–1999)

King Hussein bin Talal was one of few contemporary Arab leaders to effectively harness media communication to promote Jordan's moderate political views on local and international fronts. During its 46-year period, King Hussein's reign was marked by numerous abortive coups, assassination attempts, and military conflicts in Jordan as well as in neighboring countries. King Hussein was instrumental in establishing a solid Jordanian media system, adopting a centrist discourse on national, regional, and international issues. When he acceded to the throne in 1953 as a monarch of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, which then comprised what historically was known as Trans-Jordan and the West Bank, there was only one newspaper and one radio station, both based in Palestinian territories. By the late 1980s, Jordan had four daily newspapers, three radio stations, and two television channels. King Hussein was a strong believer in the power of mass media to bring about social and political changes. His speeches over Jordan Radio and Jordan Television reflected a rational and moderate discourse drawing on both traditional and modern themes. His exceptional mastery of classical Arabic language delivery was well appreciated by a traditionally oral Arabian culture, especially when his words were carried live on broadcast media.

From 1970 (on the aftermath of an armed conflict involving Palestinian militias and Jordan Army units) to 1989 (when democratic elections were launched), Jordan had experienced some forms of political repression that adversely affected the media's role in politics. Arabic-language papers had been suspended at various times throughout the 1970s and 1980s for publishing articles that the government considered objectionable. Yet, since the early 1990s, the Jordanian media scene, under King Hussein's reign, had remained far more diverse and open compared with neighboring Arab countries. The press remained largely part of the private sector with certain state shares, as in Al Rai' daily. Following the traditional media ownership model dominant in many Arab countries in the postcolonial era, Jordan kept broadcast media under state control. When democratic changes were introduced to Jordan in the early 1990s, the media were among the first to benefit from that transformation. In 1992, a more democratic political parties law was passed, followed in 1993 by a new more liberal press law, giving civil courts the power to handle press issues. The proliferation of new political parties in the 1990s in Jordan led to the rise of more politically diverse print media outlets, thus reflecting King Hussein's ambition for bringing about a more participatory political system in which the media were important players.

Muhammad Ayish

See also Abdullah II

Further Readings

Boyd, D. (1999). Broadcasting in the Arab world: A survey of electronic media in the Middle East and North Africa. Ames: Iowa State University Press.

Lynch, M. (1999). State interests and public spheres: The international politics of Jordan's identity. New York: Columbia University Press.

Rugh, W. (1987). The Arab press: News media and political process in the Arab world. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.

I

Ideology

A political ideology is an action-oriented model of people and society. The phrase "action-oriented" refers to the prescriptions contained in an ideology regarding how political, economic, and social issues should be resolved. A political ideology also contains generalizations called "models." A model is a simplification intended to make complex phenomena understandable. Political ideologies share the characteristic of systematic simplification with science and engineering.

The term ideology is frequently used negatively. People who believe in an ideology are often characterized as rigid, fanatical, and unthinking, and ideologies are said by some to produce bad public policy because ideologies fit true believers' preconceptions instead of reality. Definitions of ideology are often biased to discredit the concept or its use. Some authors on all parts of the political spectrum come close to defining ideologies as the belief systems of fanatics.

Others believe ideology to be insignificant. In one version of this view, ideology is not an independent cause of political behavior; ideology is merely an intermediate factor of little importance in explaining political behavior.

Not everyone considers ideologies destructive or unimportant elements of politics. Some regard ideologies as allowing their adherents to understand the relationships among events, to facilitate the making of consistent judgments over time, and to process information more efficiently than an ad hoc approach would allow.

Politics in the United States and in most Western democracies is dominated by two closely related ideologies: liberalism and conservatism. Liberals and conservatives advocate specific policies, but when the democratic process yields a contrary result, they accept it until the next election. Liberalism and conservatism can be contrasted with comprehensive ideologies such as communism and militant Islam, which produce undemocratic, totalitarian regimes.

One difference between liberals and conservatives concerns how they structure three ideological building blocks: equality, freedom, and order. Liberals tend to value equality over freedom and freedom over order. Conservatives reverse this ranking by valuing order over freedom and freedom over equality. Liberals and conservatives value all three, but their relative preferences differ. There are also differences between liberals and conservatives regarding the market economy, with conservatives more inclined to allow the market free rein and liberals more likely to constrain it using government.

The question of whether ideology at least sometimes has an independent impact on public policy has been the subject of many quantitative studies using congressional roll call vote analysis. Often the form such studies take is to explain votes in an area of public policy, such as coal mining, using measures of the ideological positions of U.S. senators and indicators of self-interest, such as a state's reliance on coal. Such analyses often show that the inclusion of ideology provides a more complete explanation of voting behavior than does self-interest alone.

Carl Grafton

See also Conservative, Conservatism; Party Identification; Political Parties; Political Socialization

Further Readings

Grafton, C., & Permaloff, A. (Eds.). (2005). The behavioral study of political ideology and public policy formulation. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.
Rawls, J. (1971). A theory of justice. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

IMAGE, POLITICAL

Walter Lippmann (1922) made it clear that people do not directly experience most political affairs but rather respond to the representations of politics produced by journalists. Long before Lippmann, Niccolò Machiavelli (1513) argued that, to most people, politics is more about appearances than substance. Appearances are created with symbolic gestures. Decades of behavioral research indicate that people behave more in relation to their representations of realities than directly to the material realities.

In the study of political behavior, many scholars believe that actions are shaped in relation to perception and that messages have effects on behaviors indirectly by affecting perceptions. Political images are conceptually related to processes of political message perception and information processing. The social science construct "political image" is used to refer to cognitive representations of political subjects, such as candidates for office (candidate images), presidents (presidential images), nations (national images), and political parties (party images). As with the construct "political attitude," political images are individual-level phenomena but can be aggregated for various samples and populations, as with the concept of public opinion (the aggregate of individual opinions).

Research concerning political images is done mainly in communication studies and political science, where scholars who study political communication examine the cognitive effects of campaign messages. Of major concern to these scholars are studies that show how images are changed in relation to particular message strategies. It is generally assumed that political images are drawn upon in various political decision-making processes such as choosing among presidential candidates. Some studies examine mass media effects on images such as news and advertising impacts, while others examine changes in images related to nonmediated contexts such as interpersonal discussions about politics.

The origins of this type of research are generally traced back to the work of Kenneth Boulding, who wrote the seminal book The Image (1973). Boulding argued quite clearly that the meaning of a message is the change that it produces in the images held by receivers of the message. The most focused early work on political images was reported by Dan Nimmo and Robert Savage in their book Candidates and Their Images. Consistent with Boulding's view of images in general, Nimmo and Savage argued that political images are subjective mental constructs that are formed in relation to political messages.

Political persuasion scholar Richard Perloff (1998) notes that voters consider many factors in choosing their preferred candidate in an election. These factors include issues positions, character, party, and other impressions about the candidates. As voters process information about candidates, they relate that information to their values and ideological dispositions. This affects the formation of political images, including images of the campaign. Despite low levels of detailed issue knowledge, voters are able to choose political candidates who are closest to their issue preferences. Additionally, the more voters know about issues and candidate issue positions, the more likely issues affect their voting choices.

Political message environments like campaigns or conflict situations (terrorism, war, etc.) provide individuals with an overload of messages. People thus select certain aspects from the message environment to employ in representing the political objects to themselves and to others. These representations are what we call "political images." The leaders or candidates who are the objects of this representational process attempt to use persuasion strategies to steer message receivers toward the desired public (most commonly shared) political image.

Despite the uncertainties regarding the actual variables (and relationships among them) involved in voting, scholars know that in making their voting decisions, voters are intentionally selecting the candidate they believe will be the best leader. In whatever proportions, voters think about issues, personalities, communication styles, political parties, and other factors in the election contexts and somehow arrive at a decision about who to select as their preferred candidate.

Interesting research indicates that voters process a great deal of information but can recall very little of it by the time they vote. Political images can be seen as cognitive representations of political subjects, like candidates, wherein the images are not inclusive of all stored knowledge but rather are constituted by what the political perceiver believes is most important about the subject at hand. This means that images are always susceptible to change in relation to the messages the image holder encounters and accepts. In other words, political images can be initiated, cultivated, and modified over time.

Candidates (along with their advisors) can cultivate their images for voters by how they act in public communication situations such as presidential debates. Some candidates, for example, portray themselves as activists by listing their accomplishments in previously held offices.

Candidate images can also include perceptions of issue positions along with impressions of candidate character. Election campaigns always involve voter evaluations of both candidate character and candidate issue positions. Candidates use issues to build perceptions of their character. While some researchers contrast political images with issues, others see images as incorporating impressions related to issues. Emotional responses to political topics are thus included in images.

There are three basic conceptual approaches to political images. The first views the image as projected by the political source. The second sees the image as a mental construct in the perceiver of the political source. The third view is that the image results from an interaction of projected traits and mental reactions of the perceiver. These three views can arguably apply to all types of political images. The projection model stresses what is created and disseminated by specific communication campaigns. The utility in this model is a detailed examination of what persuasion strategies are used by political senders to generate particular framing. The receiver model stresses interpretation of political communication above all else. This model is useful for providing explanations of political message receivers' cognitive structuring of messages. The interactional view emphasizes both projection and interpretations and is useful for describing how political message senders' intentions are met with the realities of message receiver interpretations.

While there is no consensus on a precise operationalization of the construct, most scholars who measure political images use methods that elicit voter or citizen impressions about political subjects such as presidential candidates. Methods of measurement include source credibility scales, surveys of citizen or voter impressions, attitude measures, combined issues and character items, experiments testing message effects on images, open-ended questions for content analysis, and cognitive response testing, While researchers have no consensus on the precise content dimensions of political image, there are common assertions that what is most important about images is what receivers represent to themselves about various political stimuli (candidates, leader, nations, parties, etc.).

Images for election candidates (candidate images) can vary in content by candidates and by elections. In 2004, voters were more concerned about national security (36% rated it as most important) than moral issues (27% rated this as most important), despite common claims about moral issues driving the campaign. When asked open-ended questions about the importance of these issues, moral issues dropped to 13%.

The mix of elements in political images is also variable (e.g., the same person running for office in two different elections may be evaluated differing criteria). Many scholars who study voting behavior classify candidate images as short-term factors affecting voting preference. The argument goes that partisanship is the strongest determinant of vote but that short-term factors like images can diminish the effects of parties. Likes and dislikes about a candidate can include both personal traits and feelings about candidate issues. Another type of short-term factor and another type of political image is party image. Party images concern impressions of political parties, such as how they perform on various concerns, for example, maintaining a good economy. However, little is known about how candidate images and party images affect each other. A common image of party image influence on vote choice is what is called "retrospective voting," whereby the voter evaluates the past performance of a party in thinking about candidates. Partisanship (a long-term voting determinant) is not the same thing as party image (short-term determinant), and voters can have negative images of their own parties. When candidate images become most salient, the effect of partisanship on voting declines.

There are political images related to leaders who are already elected, such as presidents, and also for nations. These tend to receive less research attention than candidate images but are equally important. As images of candidates result from campaign communication and affect behavior related to candidates, images of nations result from international communication and affect how nations respond to each other with policies and various actions.

World leaders make decisions about political events among nations on the basis of information they process and the images they hold of the nations involved. Nations, like election candidates, also attempt to project the kinds of political images that give them the ability to increase their influence on political events.

Impressions that add to the content of candidate images are more than issue positions and character traits and are likely to include physical appearance, style of communication, and nonverbal behaviors. It is know that partisanship and attitudes toward competing candidates are good predictors of actual voting behavior. However, political image research tends to look for the origins of those attitudes and the influence of partisanship in relation to party images. This implies that rating of political objects (attitudes) such as candidate or nations are related to how those objects are cognitively represented (images). Statistically, this should be born out by very high and significant correlations between political attitudes and political images.

The utility of the political images constructs lies in their provision of observable cognitive and psychological models that connects individual political perception to various forms of political communication. The study of political images also allows scholars to examine how voters, citizens, candidates, and leaders reason about politics and how they define and frame various political subjects and events.

Political image formation is most likely a process that is closely related to the process described as "framing." Framing involves highlighting certain aspects of a political situation over other aspects. Just as framing is not a concept reserved for contexts implying imagery, the concept of images should not be confused with the visual communication of imagery. Imagery can certainly be part of the image formation process, and visual communication can affect framing and political images, but imagery and political images are conceptually distinct. Framing can be done by a political message source, but it can also be done by a political message receiver who frames or reframes a particular political object or event in their thoughts and messages to others.

There are many psychological, cognitive, emotional, and communicative aspects of political communication that can be partially described and explained by the examinations of political images. More work is needed on how images are related to other elements of cognitive systems, however. For example, we still need to distinguish attitudes, images, schemata, and general cognitive representations. More empirical and theoretical work on political images should elucidate their specific roles in both political cognition and political communication.

Work in political psychology has shed light on some of these intersections. Voters do not store vast amounts of knowledge about candidates or campaigns but rather those items that are most concern or interest to them. What is known as the "online model" of voter candidate evaluation indicates that voters are affected by information that they process but then forget. Despite a low quantity of candidate and campaign knowledge, the voter is able to summon enough of an affective evaluation model of the candidate to make decisions about how to judge the candidate. The evaluation models appear to be what scholars study when they refer to candidate images. Summary assessment of candidates involves the integration of various types of knowledge or impressions regarding the candidates.

Much more focus is needed today regarding the dynamics of political image emergence, formation, and change. Voting research, for example, demonstrates that voter decision-making variables vary by voters, by candidates, and by elections. In other words, the relative importance of issues, candidate images, and party images is not fixed for each candidate and each election. Studies also show that voters differ in how they weigh various voting determinants like ideology and party membership. Image-related messages come from mass communication and interpersonal communication sources, but it is not known how the various sources precisely affect image formation processes or stages.

While there are many loose claims about the differences among frames, images, schemata, and attitudes, there is still no satisfactory (either theoretical or empirical) explanation of the differences among these elements of the cognitive systems. This should not affect research in any of these areas, however, because a focus on any one of the constructs yields differing, if somewhat similar, insights about political communication. Single-construct descriptions of political communication do not offer only partial explanations of complex and interrelated structures and processes.

Communication researchers have long known that mass media message can be altered by interpersonal influence. As discussed earlier, the formation of political images appears to involve a summative process whereby the image serves as a summary model or summary evaluation of a political subject.

Kenneth Hacker

See also Candidates and Their Images; Framing; Image, The; Lippmann, Walter

Further Readings

Abramson, P., Aldrich, J., & Rohde, D. (2002). Change and continuity in the 2000 elections. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press.

Boulding, K. (1973). The image. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Entman, R. (2004). Projections of power. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Flanigan, W., & Zingale, N. (2002). Political behavior of the American electorate. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press.

Hacker, K. (Ed.). (1995). Candidate images in presidential elections. New York: Praeger.

Hacker, K. (Ed.). (2004). Presidential candidate images. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Hacker, K., Zakahi, W., Giles, M., & McQuitty, S. (2000). Components of candidate images: Statistical analysis of the issue-personal dichotomy in the presidential campaign of 1996. Communication Monographs, 67, 227–238.

Lippmann, W. (1922). Public opinion. New York: Macmillan.

Machiavelli, N. (1513). The prince. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1964.

Nimmo, D., & Savage, R. L. (1976). Candidates and their images: Concepts, methods, and findings. Pacific Palisades, CA: Goodyear.

Perloff, R. (1998). Political communication: Politics, press, and public in America. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

IMAGE, THE

The Image or What Happened to the American Dream was published by Daniel J. Boorstin in 1962. The book diagnosed the formation and development of illusions held by contemporary Americans. What was central to the making of illusions was the notion of "pseudo-events." A pseudo-event possessed four characteristics. First, it was a nonspontaneous happening planned, planted, or incited by someone. Second, it was planted primarily for the immediate purpose of being reported or reproduced by the media. Third, its relation to the underlying reality of the situation was ambiguous. Finally, it was intended to be a self-fulfilling prophecy. Pseudo-events often overshadowed spontaneous events because they were more dramatic, were easier to disseminate and to make vivid, were more intelligible and more assuring, were more sociable, more conversable, and more convenient to witness; could be repeated at will and their impression reinforced, could be advertised in advance as events worth watching, worth believing, and worth investing; and could spawn other pseudo-events in geometric progression.

Boorstin argued that pseudo-events were prevalent in communication and marketing initiatives. Celebrities, for example, were human pseudo-events and were fabricated by the media to satisfy the illusions of human greatness. The package tour was another example of prefabricated experience full of pseudo-events. Travel agencies devised efficient ways of insulating the tourist from the natives in foreign cultures to ensure the experience was convenient, comfortable, risk-free, and trouble-free. The rise of the Reader's Digest and the motion picture version of novels were typical examples of how pseudo-events overshadowed spontaneous events, the shadow outsold the substance, and second-handedness won over originality. Stars in motion pictures were the celebrities in the entertainment world and best-sellers were the stars in the book world, and both of them were known primarily for being well known more than for any other quality.

Advertising, Boorstin argued, combined both a pseudo-event and a pseudo-ideal. While the pseudo-event was in the world of fact, the image was in the world of value, and it was the pseudo-ideal. Similarly, the image was planned and created to disseminate, to reinforce, to serve a purpose, and to make a certain kind of impression, was believable, concrete, and appealing to the senses, was simpler than the object it represented, and was ambiguous enough to float itself between the imagination and the senses and between expectation and reality. Boorstin traced the passion for pseudo-events and image to contemporary Americans' attempts to shape the environment that shaped them, which converted the American Dream to American illusions.

For decades after its publication, Boorstin's description and anticipation of journalism, advertising, celebrity, and the American Dream have been used to interpret the American culture. Pseudo-events and the creation of image, illusions, and other key concepts of Boorstin's work are frequently used to describe and interpret political events and the behavior of political figures.

Feng Shen

See also Image, Political; Pseudo-Event

Further Readings

Boorstin, D. J. (1962). The image or what happened to the American Dream. New York: Atheneum.

Whitfield, S. J. (1991). The Image: The lost world of Daniel Boorstin. Reviews in American History, 19(2), 302–312.

Impression Management

Impression management is the strategic action of controlling information about a person, entity, or idea. Impression management is not an inherently deceptive practice; rather, impression management is an attempt to portray and claim a desired image in social interactions. When the images claimed are personally relevant, impression management is known as self-presentation.

Impression management is an important theoretical framework for the study of social psychology. It derives from the work of Erving Goffman, whose 1959 work The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life crystallized the dramaturgical view of sociology, which holds that social interaction between individuals is best understood through the metaphor of actors performing for audiences. Individuals, like actors, want audiences to interpret their actions in particular ways. However, audiences often interpret a performance differently than the actor intended. Impression management expands upon the life-as-theater analogy, studying how individuals seek to influence the reactions of both real and imagined audiences regarding all aspects of their lives. Impression management counts the "self" as a most important audience for every actor's performances; people come to learn who they are as they observe their own actions.

Impression management offers an important theoretical framework for the study of political roles and political campaigns. Barry Schlenker, author of one of the seminal works in the field, Impression Management (1980), suggests that public impression management is central to the successful claim of political roles. He discusses Richard Nixon's Man in the Arena programs to illustrate the way in which television allows politicians to claim desirable images for themselves, whether authentic or not.

Political advertising represents a very direct form of impression management for political candidates. In contrast to news coverage, advertising allows politicians to completely control their "performance" for key audiences. Through advertising, politicians and their organizations seek to claim specific images. Lynda Lee Kaid and Anne Johnston's book, Videostyle in Presidential Campaigns: Style and Content of Televised Political Advertising (2001), offers a detailed account of the mechanics of impression management in political advertisements, detailing both the rhetorical strategies and "props" that are have been used by presidential candidates to claim their desired image: president of the United States.

In his book Self-Presentation (1996), psychologist Mark Leary discussed the significance of role playing to successful impression management in politics. As "actors," each individual has a very specific role to play. Job titles like police officer, professor, and politician all evoke specific "prototypes" from audiences. The more an individual's behavior corresponds with the prototypes associated with a particular role, the more the audience finds the person credible in that role. Behaviors that do not correspond with prototypes lead to audience skepticism in the actor's ability to adequately perform a desired role.

Because of the nature of their roles, politicians must perform in very public fora. In fact, politicians rely on mass media to deliver their performances to important constituencies. However, mass media can both help and hinder politicians' efforts to claim desired images. Deviations from accepted prototypes, such as Howard Dean's much publicized "Dean Scream" following the 2004 Iowa caucuses, can have devastating effects on the public's belief in an individual's fitness for a particular role. The media replays of Dean's decidedly unpresidential yowl resulted in wide-scale withdrawal of audience support for his desired political role, and his presidential bid came to an end.

Impression management extends beyond the self; organizations also engage in impression management through their communications and actions. In this sense, the platforms of political parties may be viewed as important "props" for political organizations, allowing parties to provide a kind of impression management manifesto: detailed accounts of what their organizations stand for. Similarly, the use of floor votes to make policy statements by members of a political party may be viewed in terms of the impression management dimensions of the images claimed by parties with those votes.

The self is not always the beneficiary of impression management. Beneficial impression management is the strategic controlling of information to aid others. The role of public affairs in government may be understood as a manifestation of beneficial impression management. Statements made by spokespeople for various departments of government are not meant to present images for the individuals making the statements—although they are certainly engaging in impression management in their attempts to credibly deliver information—but rather on the individuals or institutions that the public affairs officers represent.

Impression management has long provided a useful framework for the study of political communication, in particular political advertising. However, there are many other areas of study that might be informed by the impression management framework. For example, research in the area of impression management has now begun to focus on cultural differences in political roles, examining the impression management techniques employed by politicians internationally.

Colleen Connolly-Ahern

See also Political Advertising; Presentation of Self in Everyday Life, The; Strategic Communication; Videostyle

Further Readings

Goffman, E. (1959). The presentation of self in everyday life. Garden City, NY: Doubleday Anchor.

Kaid, L. L., & Johnston, A. (2001).Videostyle in presidential campaigns: Style and content of televised political advertising. Westport, CT: Praeger/Greenwood.

Leary, M. R. (1996). Self-presentation. Boulder, CO: Westview.

Schlenker, B. R. (1980). Impression management: The self-concept, social identity, and interpersonal relations. Monterey, CA: Brooks/Cole.

Inaugural Addresses, Presidential

As the United States' chief executive, the president's public speeches both influence and reflect cultural norms. Thus, political scholars have assessed that the presidency is largely rhetorical and that a variety of rhetorical genres have come to typify the institution of the presidency. One such genre is the inaugural address. Each new term of a president of the United States begins with a constitutionally mandated oath or affirmation before they may enter the office of the presidency. The swearing in of the president is known as the "inaugural address" and has been given by each of the presidential elects who were elected to a full term.

Many scholars have used various theoretical approaches to examine the institution of the presidency and some have focused on the inaugural address specifically. Karlyn Kohrs Campbell and Kathleen Hall Jamieson (1990) argue that there are five defining features of inaugural addresses. First, they argue that the inaugural unifies the audience by reconstituting its members as the people who can witness and ratify the ceremony. In this sense, the audience is transformed from mere spectators to a testimonial body—giving life to the president's ascent to power and affirming the oath of office, itself. Second, the speech invokes communal values drawn from the past. In taking the oath, the president presents his or her qualifications for the office and demonstrates that the traditions of the institution will remain unbroken in their term. The third defining feature of the inaugural address is that it sets forth the political principles that will govern the new administration. The president must go beyond traditional values and state a guiding philosophy of governance. Fourth, the words of the speech demonstrate that the president appreciates the requirements and limitations of executive functions. The speech must simultaneously demonstrate the president can function as a leader and respect the boundaries established for the office by the Constitution. Last, the proceeding four elements must be adapted to fit the character of epideictic rhetoric, thus, becoming timeless in nature. Great

U.S. President George W. Bush presents his inaugural address before a crowd of thousands in Washington, D.C., January 20, 2005. More than 5,000 men and women in uniform participated in the inaugural events. Military support of the presidential inauguration is a tradition that reaches back to 1789 when U.S. President George Washington was escorted by members of the U.S. Army to his swearing-in ceremony at Federal Hall in New York City.

Source: Photo by PH2 Corey Lewis, USN.

inaugurals transcend the situation and can speak to Americans across time. Scholars mark the ability of George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and John F. Kennedy to express the material problems of their day but articulate ideologies that ring true generations later. In short, the inaugural address incorporates the past and future within a contemplative text that describes the present.

Political scholars have discussed at length the connection between religious and political rhetoric in presidential discourse. Most scholars agree that there is an institutionalized set of beliefs that Americans believe to be true and just. An American president, therefore, becomes the priest, prophet, and guardian of the national civic religion. Inaugurals bear a close resemblance to ordination. Roderick P. Hart argues that when presidents are inaugurated, they are also ordained into American civil piety. The inaugural address provides a unique opportunity to introduce religion into policy. Inaugural addresses must contain a moral dimension, as the president should be seen as possessing a personal ethos to justify the ordination. Thus, the inaugural address must emphasize the enactment of the duties of the office as well as the symbolic role of the president as moral barometer. Harry S. Truman's and John F. Kennedy's inaugural addresses receive a lot of attention in political studies as speeches that evidenced sincere and deeply held religious convictions.

In a mediated age, the spoken word is the primary means of communication from a president to the constituencies. These words constitute and reconstitute the presidency. The inaugural address maintains presidential stability insofar as it affirms traditional principles, heightens what is known and believed about the institution, focuses on the nation's present, reconstitutes "the people" who witness the ritual and vouch for the national faith, and refocuses the president as the central figure in American civil religion.

Kristen McCauliff

See also Presidential Communication; Rhetoric, Political

Further Readings

Beasley, V. B. (2004). You, the people: American national identity in presidential rhetoric. College Station: Texas A&M University Press.

Bellah, R. N. (1967). Civil religion in America. Daedelus: Journal of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 96, 1–21.

Campbell, K. K., & Jamieson, K. H. (1990). Deeds done in words: Presidential rhetoric and the genre of governance. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Hart, R. P. (1977). The political pulpit. West Lafayette, IN: Purdue University Press.

Hart, R. P. (1987). The sound of leadership: Presidential communication in the modern age. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Hart, R. P., & Pauley, J. L. (2005). The political pulpit revisited. West Lafayette, IN: Purdue University Press.

Medhurst, M. J. (1977). American cosmology and the rhetoric of inaugural prayer. Central States Speech Journal, 28, 272–282.

Ritter, K., & Medhurst, M. J. (Eds.). (2003). Presidential speechwriting: From the New Deal to the Reagan revolution and beyond. College Station: Texas A&M University Press.

Incumbent, Incumbency

An incumbent politician, or one achieving the status of incumbency, is an individual who currently holds political office. Often compared to the status of a challenger candidate or candidates involved in incumbent/challenger races (open races), the incumbent candidate has been described as having distinct communicative campaign styles. Despite the findings of any particular sample of scholarship or the outcome of a specific campaign, Judith Trent and Robert Friedenberg (2004) contend that "styles (incumbency, challenger, and incumbent/challenger) are a product of whatever candidates and their staffs believe is needed at a particular time within the context of their particular campaign." Consequently, various campaign strategies may be used by any candidate throughout the campaign regardless of any official classification. These communicative strategies may be found in the various campaign practices used, including public address, political advertisements, the Internet, and so on.

One of the prominent advantages of incumbency becomes evident when facing a challenger who has limited public exposure and inadequate financial support. Officeholders benefit from the symbols of incumbency, which routinely illustrate candidates' qualifications, serving as reminders for constituents that a candidate is in office. Trent and Friedenberg identify four prominent symbolic strategies of incumbents at the presidential level (this categorization is useful at other levels of office as well): symbolic trappings of office, legitimacy of the office, competency and the office, and charisma and the office. Ever present in the physical offices or structures from which they conduct business, the incumbent politician is shown among the symbolic trappings that suggest leadership and importance. With respect to legitimacy of the office, incumbents are seen holding official meetings, signing legislation, or simply helping their constituencies, all from the perspective that they were elected to serve in office and, thus, are legitimate candidates for reelection. Whereas symbolic trappings and legitimacy of office enhance the public image of a candidate, competency and charisma of the office promote the office held. Once in office the elected official is directed by the competency associated with the office. As the president of the United States is often referred to as the "leader of the free world," the person elected can readily assume that characteristic. Furthermore, charisma and the office recognizes the fundamental influence the office has in relation to the public. Political campaigns and incumbent politicians attract public attention. Campaign stops during fairs, parades, or political rallies capture the awe of the public—the ability to see, hear, or participate in these events through the media, if not in person, captures the charisma of the office and, thus, may benefit the incumbent candidate.

Jerry Miller

Further Readings

Trent, J. S., & Friedenberg, R. V. (2004). Political campaign communication: Principles and practices (5th ed.). Westport, CT: Praeger.

Indexing Theory

The indexing hypothesis, as proposed by W. Lance Bennett (1990), states that the range of debate on public affairs appearing in the news is indexed to the range of debate present in mainstream government discourse. With this hypothesis, Bennett pointed out that a variety of theories about the relationship between media and government, particularly political economy theories of media and theories of the sociology of news production, made similar predictions about what the news would look like. Since its initial publication in 1990, more than 100 journal articles have referred to Bennett's essay.

The concept of indexing has appeared most consistently in three areas of political communication research. First, indexing has implications for theories of media autonomy. Well-functioning democracies require an independent press, but much research indicates that press autonomy is limited at best. Indexing captures an aspect of that limited autonomy, for the hypothesis claims that when political officials do not differ on an issue, journalists will accept that consensus, fail to seek alternative perspectives, and present one-sided news. References to the indexing hypothesis also appear in the literature on media framing. Indexing offers an explanation of the origins of news frames as well as an explanation of why news sometimes contains multiple, competing frames and sometimes contains only one. Finally, the literature on "new institutionalism" makes use of the indexing concept. Indexing in this context is an example of an institutional practice that links organizational rules and interorganizational relationships to specific day-to-day organizational activities and outputs.

Although the indexing concept synthesizes important theoretical predictions and is intuitively appealing for many scholars of media and politics, empirical support for the hypothesis itself has been mixed. While some studies seem to reveal indexed news, others do not. In its initial formulation, the hypothesis is difficult to falsify. It is not entirely clear what constitutes "mainstream government debate." For example, if the news includes the views of foreign government officials who disagree with American officials' consensus view on foreign policy, is it indexed or not? Moreover, the original formulation of the indexing hypothesis may refer to the range of official debate or to the distribution of official perspectives. Is news that confines itself to the perspectives offered by public officials but misrepresents the distribution of official support and opposition to various views indexed or not? Bennett himself initially expected that indexing would apply to some kinds of news events more than others and has more recently suggested that indexing offers only a partial explanation of how news is covered. These limitations suggest the need for further empirical study and revision of the indexing concept.

Jill A. Edy

Further Readings

Althaus, S. L., Edy, J. A., Entman, R. M., & Phalen, P. (1996). Revising the indexing hypothesis: Officials, media, and the Libya crisis. Political Communication, 13, 407–421.

Bennett, W. L. (1990). Toward a theory of press-state relations in the United States. Journal of Communication, 40(2), 103–125.

Niven, D. (2005). An economic theory of political journalism. Journalism and Mass Communication Quarterly, 82, 247–263.

Information, Political

See Infotainment; Political Knowledge

Information Flow, Global

Beginning in the 1960s, as the supply of information increased at a high rate—both internationally and domestically—information and equal access to it were seen as vehicles for reducing dependency in economic, political, and cultural relations. In a broad sense, the study of the international flow of information is an approach to the study of international relations. It is also an aspect of globalization.

Initially, the study of the international flow of information examined the international political aspects of flow as well as the news dimension. Later it broadened to include technological, cultural, and economic factors, expanding the concept of the international flow of information beyond the narrow scope of the mass media and the growing number of technological channels.

The global information flow has two complementary and adaptive dimensions. On the human orientation side, it includes educational, artistic, and cultural exchanges, including conferences and sporting events; diplomatic and political channels, including military and related conferences and organizations; and tourism, travel, and migration, including religious and other personal contacts. On the technological orientation side, the flow includes print media; new(online) media; broadcast media and satellites; film, recordings, and video; marketing, advertising, and public opinion polls; and mail, telephone, telegraph, and related telecommunication channels.

A number of information flow studies dealt with theories of imperialism, integration, conflict and cooperation, and hypotheses about image and perception among and between nations. Other studies examined a nation's internal and external communication systems as well as its political, economic, social, and cultural development in a national, regional, and international context. This category also includes studies on the balance or imbalance of information flow and the direction of flow, which at times are related to such factors as ideology, ethnocentricity, commercialism, or geographical proximity. Other flow studies examined international actors and the impact of political and persuasive messages on the behavior of individuals and nations. This perspective includes propaganda and policy studies, as well as research on stereotyping or image manipulation and control. Other inquiries analyzed the political economy of information and factors influencing the process of global flow, including gatekeepers, as well as the technological, institutional, and human dimensions of both production and distribution aspects of the information flow. Some researchers looked at the technical and legal aspects of information flow, such as technology and techniques of international information gathering and processing, national and international regulations and standards of information industries and flow, and the technical aspects of transferring information across national boundaries. Studies from this perspective increased recently as a result of the rapid development of the Internet and computers, the growing power and importance of transnational organizations, and the priority regional and international organizations gave to the complex problems of technology, information, and services.

Raluca Cozma

See also Globalization

Further Readings

Kamalipour, Y. R. (Ed.). (2006). Global communication. Belmont, CA: Thomson Wadsworth.
Politics and Information Flow panel. (2005, April). Presented at the Yale Global Flow of Information Conference: http://islandia.law.yale.edu/isp/GlobalFlow/panels.html#panel4

Information Society

Information society refers to a society driven economically and politically by nonmaterial products like information and knowledge. To be considered an information society, a society must evolve beyond the trade of material goods and generate at least half of its GNP (gross national product) through information and knowledge. Information society is also referred to as knowledge society, network society, postmodern society, postindustrial society, and so on. All these terms describe a socioeconomic reality in which information is a commodity, an essential resource used to create new products and services and to generate wealth to those who have it.

Economist Fritz Machlup (1962) is credited for first developing the concepts of information society and knowledge economy. Machlup immigrated from Austria to the United States in 1933; his research on patents led him to calculate the cost of knowledge and information to economic enterprises. He estimated that about a third of the 1959 GNP in the United States was generated by the five knowledge industries, which he identified as education, research and development, mass media, information machines (signaling machines, instruments, office equipment, and computers), and information services (or the activity of generating and distributing knowledge). Machlup also classified the types of knowledge into practical knowledge (cultural, political, etc.), intellectual knowledge, pastime knowledge, spiritual knowledge, and unwanted knowledge outside a person's interest and acquired by accident. Based on content analysis of 130 daily newspapers in 1954, Machlup claimed that more than half of print media content falls under the pastime knowledge category, which represents knowledge for entertainment purposes. Only about a third of print media content contains intellectual knowledge, and less than a tenth conveys practical knowledge. Advertising, which made up for about 70% of newspaper content, was classified mostly as unwanted knowledge.

Machlup's views on information and knowledge as the main commodity of a modern society were developed by other scholars. Economist Peter Drucker (2002) studied the transition between societies driven by material goods to societies driven by information. Economist Marc Porat classified the various economic sectors into primary and secondary and calculated their share to the GNP based on their information generating capacity. Economist Daniel Bell explained that transitioning from material goods to trading information will result in a postindustrial society based on services rather than tangible items. Philosopher Jean-François Lyotard argued that the reliance of information and its diffusion to all levels of society will end centralized perceptions of the world, called "metanarratives," because information about the outside world makes people aware of the differences rather than the similarities between them.

Monica Postelnicu

Further Readings

Drucker, P. F. (2002). Managing the next society. New York: St. Martin's.

Machlup, F. (1962). The production and distribution of knowledge in the United States. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Information Technology in Politics

Information technology is also called "information communication technology." It refers to any kind of technology that can be utilized to acquire, produce, process, store, and disseminate information. Mass media (such as newspaper, motion picture, radio, and television), computers, the Internet, satellites, cellular phones, fax machines, and CD-ROMs and DVDs are a few examples of information technology.

In contemporary society, politics and information technology are inextricably linked. This entry focuses on a few information technologies that are considered central to changes in the conduct of contemporary politics: print media, electronic media, and emerging media. Specifically, it examines the role of these technologies in American politics with an emphasis on campaigns and elections. These information technologies, arguably, have had and continue to have a profound impact on American politics, in both positive and negative ways. Communicative activity is central to all politics. Without information technology, contemporary political communication is impossible.

Print Media

Newspapers and news magazines are the two most influential print media in politics. Moving away from serving as mouthpieces of political parties, newspapers in the United States began to develop a reputation of objectivity at the turn of the 20th century. The establishment of wire service for newsgathering helped the growth of objectivity in the newspapers. Since the 1960s, however, the practice of strict objectivity in newspaper news reporting has been modified to encourage news reporting with journalists' subjective analysis and interpretations.

Today, both the nationwide newspapers, such as The New York Times, The Washington Post, USA Today, and the Los Angeles Times, and some regional newspapers, such as the Chicago Tribune, the Boston Globe, and the Atlanta Constitution, provide extensive and substantive information of political campaigns and elections, government administrations, public policies, and public opinions/polls. The wire services such as the Associated Press also supply a large amount of information to these newspapers and other media. The information of local politics, which is largely missed in the national and regional newspapers and other media, is mainly presented in a variety of local newspapers. News stories, editorial pages, and commentary and opinion columns are common places for readers to seek political information. During elections, editorial endorsements by newspapers for candidates can be influential. Magazines, especially such weekly news magazines as Newsweek, Time, and U.S. News & World Report, provide relatively detailed analysis of events in politics. These news magazines often help set a news agenda. When a story or a topic gets into these magazines or a photo of a person is featured on their front covers, they suggest the importance of the topic or the person to other media. With its great flexibility of content, size, and timing, political advertisement in newspapers is an effective means for candidates in local elections and their respective parties to disseminate their messages directly to their constituents. Political interest groups often put issues ads in the large national or regional newspapers and magazines to influence policymakers or elected officials on their policy or legislative positions.

Electronic Media

The advances of electronic information technology have had a great influence on American society. The introduction of the telegraph, telephone, and motion picture in the late 19th century and radio, television, fax machine, videocassette recorder, satellite transmission, and computer in the 20th century has changed the landscape of American politics.

Traditionally, radio and television are considered the two most prominent electronic media in politics. Political messages have been included in radio broadcasting since its inception in the 1920s, when the results of the U.S. presidential election were reported. With the development of national networks of radio broadcasting in the 1920s and 1930s, presidential candidates were able to use radio to reach a large number of the national audience. President Franklin D. Roosevelt used a special radio program (an early version of today's talk radio) to talk directly with average Americans about important national issues such as the New Deal and the Great Depression. Surveys conducted during the 1940 presidential campaign showed that a majority of voters regarded radio as a more important source for political news than newspapers. As television started to become a dominant medium in American politics, in the late 1950s, the significance of radio on national politics was decreased in spite of its essential role in the local politics.

However, in the late 1980s, as a result of the development of satellite technology and the deregulation of the telecommunication industry that stopped enforcing the "fairness doctrine" in radio programming, political talk radio again found its popularity across the nation. The rebirth of talk radio programs has had a widespread influence on American politics. The new wave of conservative talk radio programs has been credited with the Republicans' win of the U.S. House and Senate in the 1994 elections.

Television appeared on the stage of American politics in the late 1950s. With the capacity of transmitting both audio and visual information simultaneously, television changed the way that American voters learn about political information and the conduct of American politics. Three political events in the 1950s and the early 1960s helped television establish its role in the political life of American people: the McCarthy hearings on the alleged influence of communists in the U.S. Army in 1954, and the 1956 and 1960 presidential election campaigns. The American public, through the live coverage of these events by television, were able to observe the political processes that used to be distant from their lives. In the 1960 presidential election, American people watched the first televised presidential debate between Richard M. Nixon and John F. Kennedy. The results of public opinion polls taken after the debate showed an interesting difference between radio audience and TV viewers: the former considered Nixon the winner, and the latter thought Kennedy the winner. In the 1960s and 1970s, television allowed American people to witness many political and social events in their living rooms. Civil rights movements, the Vietnam War, the Senate Watergate hearings, and political parties' conventions are just a few examples. Similar to the news reporting of newspaper and radio, those of national television networks and local stations supply American people with a large quantity of political information. Television news magazine shows (such as CBS's 60 Minutes and ABC's 20/20) became a new format of news reporting in the 1970s. These popular shows offered a greater in-depth analysis of political issues than the traditional evening or morning news broadcasts. Since the 1960s, television has been considered the most important source for the majority of American people to obtain information about national and international politics.

The coming of Cable News Network (CNN) in the 1980s brought cable television to the main stage of American politics. CNN's coverage of the first Persian Gulf War in 1991, for example, was the only source of information by which U.S. leaders, U.S. government officials, and American people could get a glimpse of what was going on inside Baghdad. The arrival of C-SPAN (Cable-Satellite Public Affairs Network) in the early 1980s added a new venue for American people to see Congress (both House and Senate) in action. In the 1990s, cable news networks, such as CNN, MSNBC, and Fox News Channel, provided the American public with 'round-the-clock coverage of political news, commentaries, and discussions. In the 2000 and 2004 presidential elections, more people named these cable news networks as their main sources of the campaign news than those who named the big three national TV networks (ABC, CBS, and NBC). In addition, the interview shows (such as Meet the Press and Larry King Live), the morning talk shows (such as Today and Good Morning America), the late night talk shows (such as The Tonight Show with Jay Leno and Late Show with David Letterman), and comedy talk shows (such as The Daily Show) have been identified by many individuals as their primary information sources about candidates and campaigns. It is clear that the amount of political information accessible by the American public through various formats of television programs has increased significantly since the 1950s.

The use of TV commercials has transformed political campaigning. TV ads were first used by the Republican presidential candidate, Dwight Eisenhower, in 1952. Television political advertising has become one of the most important parts of campaign communication strategies. Television political spots are the most common vehicle for statewide and national candidates, their respective parties, and a variety of political advocacy and interest groups to convey their messages directly (that is, without any media's interpretation) to average Americans. The first negative attack-style political spot appeared in the 1964 presidential election—the "Daisy Girl" ad produced for President Lyndon B. Johnson's campaign. Today candidates are willing to use negative attack-style ads for the purpose of either attacking opponents or rebutting an attack by the opponents. In most of the campaigns, the largest amount of money has been spent on producing television ads and purchasing airtime for the ads.

By watching television, American people receive a wide range of political information on almost every aspect of American politics: information on candidates, issue policies, political institutions and organizations, and public opinions. American people learn more about politics from television than they do from any other media. To date, among all the information technologies, it is television that has had the most profound impact on American politics.

Emerging Media

As narrowly defined, emerging media include mainly the Internet and its major components: the World Wide Web, listservs, e-mail, chat rooms, and Web logs (blogs). In the late 1980s and the early 1990s, with the development of computer technology and an increase in the number of personal computer users, a form of computer network that connects together a vast number of computer networks globally, known today as the Internet or the World Wide Web, emerged and entered into regular American homes. By the end of the 1990s, the Internet had become a new mass medium. Today, any kind of text, audio, and visual messages can be transmitted via the Internet in a variety of communication formats and styles, and the rapid growth of the Internet has had profound implications for newspaper, radio, and television. However, the Internet is not simply a replacement for those traditional mass media. Based on computer technology, the Internet is a new medium, with its own characteristics, that brings traditional mass media together and creates new dynamics of society. Those traditional mass media adapt this new medium by creating a wide range of Internet versions of newspapers and radio and television programs.

Political information available on the Internet covers every major aspect and every major activity of American politics. The information comes from a variety of sources: individual citizens, candidates running for political offices, political parties, political advocacy and interest groups, government at all levels, other mass media (television, radio, newspaper, and magazine), business, to name just a few. The information is shared in various ways, for instance, sending e-mails, using Web sites, joining chat rooms, and writing blogs. As a result, the sheer volume of the information and the speed at which the sources generate the information and people can access it have reached a level that it is unprecedented in human history.

The Internet has exerted a widespread impact on elections. Particularly, the Internet provides a new means for candidates to conduct their campaigns. In 1996, President Clinton and the Republican presidential candidate Robert Dole were among the first to use the Web for campaigning at the national level. Jesse Ventura's Web site in his 1998 campaign for the governorship of Minnesota played an important role in helping him organize his supporters, disseminate the information of his campaign agenda and policy positions directly to the voters, and eventually win the election. Senator John McCain used his Web site to raise a large amount of money within a few days after his winning of the 2000 Republican presidential primary election in New Hampshire. In late 2003 and the early 2004, the former governor of Vermont, Howard Dean, depended primarily on the Internet to engage in a large scale of grassroots campaigning to recruit his supporters and to raise funds for his campaign. His effort allowed him to become a formidable frontrunner in the Democratic Party caucuses and primary elections.

In the United States, a candidate's campaign Web site typically includes the candidate's background information, policy positions, sample speeches, news releases, campaign photos and videos, campaign ads, campaign schedule, and campaign donation links. Similar to a campaign advertisement, the information on a candidate's Web site is totally under the control of the candidate and his or her campaign. A candidate is able to use the Internet to bring unfiltered or unmediated messages directly to voters. Campaign Web sites can be presented in Spanish, Chinese, or other major languages. This capacity of campaign Web sites helps candidates reach voters who may not speak English.

In addition to candidates' Web sites, another means by which a candidate may communicate directly with voters via the Internet is the use of e-mail. E-mail is a low-cost and very quick way to reach a large group of targeted individuals. Campaign Web sites and e-mails promote frequent communications between candidates and voters.

As the Internet has become easily accessible for the majority of American people, new approaches for them to engage in politics have been developed. For example, campaign activities can be organized via personal e-mail, discussion of issues and candidates can be conducted in chat rooms, and opinions about issues and candidates can be shared in individuals' blogs. The Internet, combining the features of interpersonal and mass communication, makes exchange of information among citizens a task that can be performed in an easy and timely manner. Average citizens can act like journalists to report and comment on any political story. They are now both consumers of and producers of political information. This kind of exchange enables individual citizens to rely less on the analysis and interpretation of political information provided by the mainstream media and to increase their ability to develop their own understanding of the information that can be meaningful to their decision making. The information generated by "citizen journalists" can sometimes present a serious challenge to that of the elite media in terms of accuracy and speed.

The Internet continues to grow and expand. Its further development comes with numerous implications for politics. Assessments of the magnitudes and the meanings of these implications are still in progress, and the effects of the Internet on politics can be revolutionary.

The role of information technology in politics as outlined here illustrates that changes in information technologies can, in a profound way, affect the conduct of politics. The world in the 21st century has experienced and continues to experience a fast pace and a large scale of development and application of information technologies. It is true that, before the effects of existing information technologies on politics can be fully understood, new technologies appear on the horizon.

Yang Lin

See also Media Events; Newspapers, Role in Politics; Radio, Politics and; Television in Politics

Further Readings

Davis, R., & Owen, D. (1998). New media and American politics. New York: Oxford University Press.

Graber, D. A. (2006). Mass media and American politics (7th ed.). Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Hollihan, T. A. (2001). Uncivil wars: Political campaigns in a media age. Boston: Bedford/St. Martin's.

Paletz, D. L. (2002). The media in American politics: Contents and consequences (2nd ed.). New York: Longman.

Rosenau, J. N., & Singh, J. P. (Eds.). (2002). Information technologies and global politics: The changing scope of power and governance. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Sterling, C. H., & Kittross, J. M. (1990). Stay tuned: A concise history of American broadcasting (2nd ed.). Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.

INFOTAINMENT

This relatively new concept has multiple meanings. It has been used to refer to such diverse content phenomena as soft news, personalization and human interest in traditionally hard news TV formats; program genres like talk shows that mix seriousness with fun, factual opinions with private feelings; the popular, lighthearted, or emphatic style of journalists; and to the introduction of music, dramatization, and fictional elements in informational TV genres. It is mainly used in relation to television, but sometimes the content of the tabloid press is similarly characterized. As such, infotainment is an ambiguous label for the concept. It blurs the distinction between information (linked to knowledge and citizenship) and entertainment (linked to fun, distraction, and passive consumption) and points at politicians going popular by appearing (more) in entertainment-style programs. It is mostly discussed in relation to journalism and usually does not (but could well) cover the informational aspect in knowledge-testing quiz shows and in fictional drama like West Wing or Yes, Prime Minister.

Infotainment is used both as a normative concept—a term of abuse, even—assuming and worrying about a negative effect, and as an empirical concept to measure and make sense of what is supposed to be a trend. The claim of negative effects appears in various guises: from the "dumbing down" of the public, affecting our sense of reality and promoting a cynical understanding of politics, to disengagement and, in the end, to the decline of our civic culture. The trend is blamed on increasing commercialization and intermedia competition, having prompted more market-driven styles of journalism and more audience-pleasing genres of TV programming. Moreover, to reach the same audience in a multichannel reality as before and to show empathy, image, and authenticity in a more performance-oriented politics, politicians have to use as many platforms as they can find and try to bypass traditional informational genres, where critical journalists are more interested in their failures than what constitutes their personal charm. As such, infotainment is supposed to be the result of changes in both media and politics. Whether it increases and has a bad effect is, however, contested.

As to the trend, infotainment is not a present-day phenomenon. The popular style of the U.K.'s "penny dreadfuls" in the 19th century and the mixing of fact in fiction in some of the U.S. muckraking in the first half of the 20th century (e.g., the works of Truman Capote) and the new journalism (e.g., Tom Wolfe's essays) in the second half, have all met with the same critique. With more channels and increasing competition for audiences, genres that popularly package serious information have become successful, as have more emphatic journalistic styles. Comparative longitudinal research, however, that could substantiate whether there is a cross-cultural trend that substantive information is being "sauced over" by a gravy of personal feelings and dramatic encounters and that politicians are to be found more where the fun is in TV is far and few between. In fact, the little research there is gives at best a mixed picture: politicians appear in talk shows, but they generally prefer and still do appear mostly in serious programming, and though the style and format of TV news has been popularized, the informational level of TV news, current affairs programs, documentaries, and talk shows has not necessarily declined.

That people do not learn from infotainment, or learn the wrong things with a negative effect, has been even more strongly contested. By focusing on and framing politics in terms of the scandalous, the petty intrigue, and the personal might lead audiences to sideline the hard stuff of policy and decision making while perceiving politicians as predominantly self-interested, as yet there is no unequivocal evidence of a direct causal link between infotainment and political cynicism or disengagement. Instead, research seems to indicate that especially the less politically interested and lower educated learn from it, recall that information better and use it in electoral choices.

Kees Brants

Further Readings

Baum, M. (2002). Sex, lies and war: How soft news brings foreign policy to the inattentive public. American Political Science Review, 1, 91–109.

Blumler, J., & Kavanagh, D. (1999). The third age of political communication: Influences and features. Political Communication, 16, 209–230.

Brants, K. (1998). Who's afraid of infotainment? European Journal of Communication, 13(3), 315–335.

Brants, K. (2004). Politische Kommunikation im Zeitalter von Big Brother [Political communication in the age of Big Brother]. In J. Nieland & K. Kamps (Eds.), Politikdarstellung und Unterhaltungskultur. Zum Wandel der politischen Kommunikation [Political representation and entertainment culture: Changes in political communication] (pp. 93–116). Köln: von Halem Verlag.

Delli Carpini, M., & Williams, B. (2001). Let us infotain you: Politics in the new media environment. In W. Lance Bennett & R. Entman (Eds.), Mediated politics: Communication in the future of democracy (pp. 160–182). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Franklin, B. (2004). Packaging politics: Political communications in Britain's media democracy. London: Arnold.

Schudson, M. (1999). Social origins of press cynicism in portraying politics. American Behavioral Scientist, 42(6), 998–1008.

Inoculation, Political

Inoculation theory was devised by William McGuire in the early 1960s as a strategy to protect attitudes from change: to confer resistance to counter-attitudinal influences, whether such influences take the form of direct attack or sustained pressures.

Inoculation consists of two elements: threat, which raises the prospect of persuasive challenges to existing attitudes and is designed to get a person to acknowledge the vulnerability of his attitudes so that he will be motivated to strengthen them; and refutational preemption, which raises and refutes specific arguments contrary to attitudes and is designed both to provide specific content a person can use to defend her attitudes and to provide her with a model or script for defending attitudes.

Studies by McGuire in the 1960s proved, convincingly, that inoculation works. More recent research by Pfau and colleagues indicates that inoculation works, in part, through the dual mechanisms of threat and refutational preemption, as McGuire posited, but also by eliciting anger, enhancing attitude accessibility, altering associative networks about an attitude object, and enhancing attitude strength or certainty.

Applications to Political Communication

Inoculation is an interesting theory and a very useful one, since research during the past 20 years has revealed numerous real-world applications, including those relevant to political communication. Studies by Pfau and colleagues found that inoculation is a viable strategy to insulate supporters of candidates in election campaigns against the influence of opponents' attacks. Three studies examined inoculation and political attack advertising. Pfau and Burgoon (1988) examined uses of inoculation in a tightly contested U.S. Senate campaign in South Dakota (the 1986 Abdnor versus Dashle contest). They found that inoculation worked on behalf of Democratic and Republican candidates with weak, moderate, and strong party identifiers, and against both character and issue attacks.

Two subsequent studies also compared the strategies of preemptive inoculation and post hoc refutation (responding to an attack immediately after it occurs). Pfau, Kenski, Nitz, and Sorenson (1990) delivered inoculation treatments via direct mail in the 1988 presidential campaign. Once again, inoculation was effective for both Democratic and Republican candidates and with issue and character attacks. Both the inoculation and post hoc refutation messages partially blunted the effects of opposing attack messages. However, inoculation proved superior to post hoc refutation in reducing effectiveness of opposing attacks for strong party identifiers and for nonidentifiers. Inoculation also was superior to post hoc refutation with weak identifiers, but only with character attacks. An and Pfau (2003, 2004) also compared inoculation and post hoc refutation in the 2002 U.S. Senate and gubernatorial campaigns in Oklahoma. Inoculation proved to be more effective than post hoc refutation in all conditions. Inoculation worked best when the source of the treatment was perceived as high in credibility. Research has also found that inoculation protected viewers of televised debates from the influence of opponents' attacks launched during debates.

Apart from its potential as a strategy for political candidates, inoculation also can be used to impact process. For example, inoculation can serve as an antidote to the corrosive influence of soft money-sponsored political attack ads. Research indicates that, when used generically to forewarn of such ads, inoculation messages were able to preempt the negative influence of soft money-sponsored ads on people's political interest and participation. Finally, research indicates that inoculation is a useful strategy to nurture democratic values in fledgling democracies. A study in Taiwan revealed that inoculation can protect citizens against the spiral of silence, which can thwart minority expression on controversial issues.

Michael Pfau

See also Negative Advertising; Political Advertising; Spiral of Silence

Further Readings

An, C., & Pfau, M. (2003). Efficacy of inoculation strategies in promoting resistance to political attack messages: A source credibility perspective. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, University of Oklahoma.

An, C., & Pfau, M. (2004). The efficacy of inoculation in televised political debates. Journal of Communication, 54, 421–436.

Lin, W-K., & Pfau, M. (in press). Inoculation and the spiral of silence: A study of public opinion in democracy. International Journal of Public Opinion Research.

McGuire, W. J. (1961). The effectiveness of supportive and refutational defenses in immunizing and restoring beliefs against persuasion. Sociometry, 24, 184–197.

McGuire, W. J. (1961). Resistance to persuasion conferred by active and passive prior refutation of same and alternative counterarguments. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 63, 326–332.

McGuire, W. J. (1962). Persistence of the resistance to persuasion induced by various types of prior belief defenses. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 64, 241–248.

Pfau, M., & Burgoon, M. (1988). Inoculation in political campaign communication. Human Communication Research, 15, 91–111.

Pfau, M., Kenski, H. C., Nitz, M., & Sorenson, J. (1990). Efficacy of inoculation strategies in promoting resistance to political attack messages: Application to direct mail. Communication Monographs, 57, 25–43.

Pfau, M., Park, D., Holbert, R. L., & Cho, J. (2001). The effects of party and PAC-sponsored issue advertising and the potential of inoculation to combat its impact on the democratic process. American Behavioral Scientist, 44, 2379–2397.

Pfau, M., Szabo, E. A., Anderson, J., Morrill, J. Zubric, J., & Wan H.-H. (2001). The role and impact of affect in the process of resistance to persuasion. Human Communication Research, 27, 216–252.

Pfau, M., Tusing, K. J., Koerner, A. F., Lee, W., Godbold, L. C., Penaloza, L. J., et al. (1997). Enriching the inoculation construct: The role of critical components in the process of resistance. Human Communication Research, 24, 187–215.

Intercultural Communication, Dimensions

The term culture has been primarily employed as a label for the collective life experience shared by people who live or have lived within the same social environment, such as a nation or a world region. Over the years, the concept of culture has been broadened to include smaller, more specified subcultures from domestic, ethnic, or racial groups as well as from other sociological categories, such as gender or sexual orientation. Consequently, intercultural communication has addressed the two main perspectives: cultural (intracultural) communication and cross-cultural communication. Scholars have labeled the former perspective as "emic" and the latter as "etic." The etic perspective of intercultural communication is mainly addressed in this section.

Cross-cultural study in mass communication involves comparing similar phenomena occurring in different sociocultural systems. In this respect, intercultural political communication research is usually based on the assumption that different parameters of political systems will promote or constrain political communication roles and behavior in disparate manners dependent on their respective systems.

Cultural Dimensions

Scholars in various disciplines have developed schemas shown to be relatively effectual in comparing culture (i.e., Hofstede's (1980) dimensions of cultural variability; Kluckhohn and Strodtbeck's (1961) value orientations; Parsons and Shils's (1951) pattern variables). These schemas can be referred to as dimensions of sociocultural variability that affect the specific values and norms predominant in different cultures. Although there are many dimensions along which cultures differ, Hofstede's dimensions of cultural variability and Hall's high-low context communication have proven most useful:

Hofstede empirically derived five dimensions of sociocultural variability:

1. Individualism versus collectivism regarding the relationship between the individual and the group
2. Power distance addressing social inequality
3. Uncertainty avoidance related to the expression of emotions
4. Femininity versus masculinity
5. Long-term (future) versus short-term (associated with the past and present) orientation

Individualism/collectivism is the major dimension of cultural variability used to explain similarities and differences in cross-cultural behaviors. Individual goals are emphasized in individualistic cultures, while group goals take precedence over individual goals in collectivistic cultures. Individualistic societies focus on individual initiative and achievement, while emphasis is placed on belonging to groups in collectivistic societies. In collectivistic cultures, social control over individual behavior is stringently reinforced through the maintenance of rigid hierarchical structures. In individualistic cultures, however, people tend to believe that an individual has control of, and is responsible for, his or her own life. In this cultural pattern, competition is encouraged and frontal attack is considered as a matter of course. The United States is identified as the most individualistic country, followed by Australia and Great Britain, while Guatemala is the most collectivistic, followed by Ecuador, Panama, and Venezuela.

Nations can also be distinguished by the manner in which they tend to deal with inequalities. As one of the dimensions of national cultures, power distance is the degree to which the less powerful people within a country tolerate inequality of power distribution. In a large-power-distance society, a hierarchical social structure is strong, and power is centralized at the top. Individuals are very conscious of their rank, and superiors and subordinates perceive themselves as being separate from one another. Malaysia and Slovakia are examples of the largest power-distance countries. However, in a small-power-distance society, members of an organization feel relatively close to one another and possess a shared sense of equality as human beings. Austria has been determined to be the world's smallest power-distance country.

Another dimension of sociocultural variability that distinguishes Western from Eastern culture is uncertainty avoidance. Uncertainty avoidance explains the cultural pattern of seeking stability, predictability, and low-stress situations rather than change and new experiences. In other words, uncertainty avoidance involves a lack of tolerance for ambiguity and uncertainty in a specific sociocultural system, which thereby exhibits less tolerance for people or groups that display deviant ideas or behaviors and demonstrates a greater need for formal rules and absolute truth. Consequently, people in high uncertainty avoidance cultures try to avoid ambiguity. Countries such as Greece, Portugal, and Guatemala are placed high on the uncertainty avoidance scale, while Singapore, Jamaica, and Denmark rank low in uncertainty avoidance.

The masculinity/femininity dimension reflects the extent to which a society is dominated by masculine characteristics (e.g., assertiveness, performance, ostentation, and self-concern) or feminine characteristics (e.g., modesty, interdependence among people, and affection or caring for others). This dimension is thus related to the traditional divisions of emotional gender roles between men and women. The most feminine-scoring countries are Sweden, Norway, the Netherlands, and Denmark, while Slovakia, Japan, and Hungary display the highest levels of masculine characteristics.

Hofstede later added time orientation to the first four dimensions, addressing the long-term versus short-term orientation involved in individuals' choices to focus on the past, present, or future. Long-term orientation signifies future rewards (i.e., perseverance, thrift), while short-term orientation is related to the past and present (i.e., quick results, personal stability). Generally, people from East Asian countries, such as China, Japan, and Korea, tend to demonstrate long-term orientation, while the populations of European countries occupy a middle range in terms of time orientation, and Americans, Canadians, and Africans tend to possess short-term time orientations.

While individualism/collectivism defines broad differences between cultures, Hall's high/low context notion focuses on cultural differences on the basis of communication processes. Although some scholars have argued that all the cultures labeled by Hall as low context are individualistic, and all high-context cultures are collectivistic according to Hofstede's scheme, this notion has been one of the most well-known and employed dimensions to identify and describe cultural differences. Hall focuses on communication patterns within cultures along the four dimensions of context, space, time, and information flow. High-context communication is characterized by a dominant dependence on the implicit, rather than explicit, expression of messages, and meaning in a high-context culture is primarily derived from the physical context or is internalized within individuals in the culture. In contrast, communication in low-context cultures relies primarily on verbal codes. Hall describes the United States and some other Western countries as being low-context cultures, while Korea, Japan, and Taiwan represent typical high-context cultures.

Hyoungkoo Khang

Further Readings

Foschi, M., & Hales, W. (1979). The theoretical role of cross-cultural comparisons in experimental social psychology. In L. Eckensberger, W. Lonner, & Y. Poortinga (Eds.), Cross-cultural contributions to psychology (pp. 244–254). Amsterdam, Netherlands: Swets & Zeitlinger.

Gudykunst, W. (1987). Cross-cultural comparisons. In C. Berger & S. Chaffee (Eds.), Handbook of communication science (pp. 847–889). Newbury Park, CA: Sage.

Gudykunst, W., & Kim, Y. Y. (1992). Communication with strangers: An approach to intercultural communication (2nd ed.). New York: McGraw-Hill.

Gudykunst, W., Matsumoto, Y., Ting-Toomey, S., Nishida, T., Kim, K., & Heyman, S. (1996). Influence of cultural individualism-collectivism, self-construals, and individual values on communication styles across cultures. Human Communication Research, 22, 510–540.

Hall, E. T. (1976). Beyond culture. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

Hofstede, G. (2001). Culture's consequences: Comparing values, behaviors, institutions, and organizations across nations (2nd ed.). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Hofstede, G., & Hofstede, G. J. (2005). Cultures and organizations: Software of the mind. New York: McGraw-Hill.

Kluckhon, C., & Strodbeck, F. L. (1961). Variations in value orientations. Westport, CT: Greenwood.

Parsons, A. T., & Shils, E. (Eds.). (1951). Toward a general theory of action. New York: Harper & Row.

Triandis, H. C. (1995). Individualism and collectivism. Boulder, CO: Westview.

Interest Groups in Politics

Interest groups are private organizations that attempt to influence decisions made by public officials. These organizations typically represent a group of individuals with a common interest, or corporations with shared concerns. Interest groups use political communications to appeal to their membership, the general public, and political officials. The influence of interest groups in U.S. politics has grown in recent years with the advent of mass communication and the increasing cost of elections.

There are two basic types of interest groups in America: private and public. Private interest groups represent a small segment of the community and are formed in an effort to protect and improve members' material interests. Examples of private interest groups are AARP, which advocates for the interests of senior citizens, and the National Rifle Association (NRA), which represents gun owners. Public interest groups are established to promote a cause that benefits the whole community, such as animal rights organizations or interest groups promoting environmental protection.

Political scientists disagree about which interest groups have the most political power. Some scholars think that citizen interest groups have the most influence in policymaking, while others propose that corporate interests are more dominant. The number of corporate lobbyists in Washington, D.C., far exceeds the number of citizen lobbyists, and corporate interest groups contribute a much great amount of money to campaigns than do citizen interest groups. Whether these gaps translate into disparities in policy influence is debatable; however, most scholars agree that corporate interest groups have greater access to members of Congress and the White House than do citizen interest groups.

Interest groups engage in different tactics to influence public policy outcomes. The "inside game" refers to direct lobbying of public officials. The "outside game" refers to more public tactics seeking to influence public policy, such as endorsing certain candidates or policies, contributing money to campaigns through political action committees (PACs), or running political advertisements. Interest groups have taken advantage of new communication technologies—namely, television and the Internet—to influence public policy.

Interest groups have played a more prominent role in influencing public opinion, public policy, and elections with the advent of mass communication and the high price of contemporary elections. Candidates are able to appeal to voters directly through communication technology instead of going through the political parties, and, as a result, national elections now cost about 20 times more than they did in the 1950s. Candidates now rely more than ever on the resources of interest groups to support them and to criticize their opponents. Some prominent examples include the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth campaign against Senator John Kerry in the 2004 presidential election and the MoveOn.org Voter Fund that works to elect Democratic candidates.

Interest groups have amassed great influence in politics in recent decades, partially as a result of their savvy use of political communications. Most notably, these organizations have been able to capitalize on the new importance of television in persuading the public to support certain policies and candidates. Interest groups will remain a prominent force in American politics through lobbying efforts and effective use of political communications.

Caroline Heldman

See also Political Action Committees

Further Readings

Dahl, R. (1956). A preface to democratic theory. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Herrnson, P. S., Shaiko, R. G., & Wilcox, C. (2004). The interest group connection: Electioneering, lobbying, and policymaking in Washington. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press.

Kollman, K. (1998). Outside lobbying: Public opinion and interest group strategies. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Lindblom, C. (1977). Politics and markets. New York: Basic Books.

Olson, M. (1965). The logic of collective action: Public goods and the theory of groups. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Schattschneider, E. E. (1975). Semisovereign people: A realist's view of democracy in America. New York: Harcourt Brace.

Internet in Politics

See World Wide Web, Political Uses

Interpersonal Communication

Interpersonal political communication refers to episodes of political conversation and discussion that take place between the non-elite members of a political community. Often conceived as a basic form of political participation, it includes activities like conveying and receiving information on political matters, exchanging arguments about how they are to be evaluated, or attempting to convince others of certain points of view. In contrast to mass communication, interpersonal communication is not one-sided but bidirectional. At least in principle it provides all participants with similar chances to control its course. Instant feedback and constant readjustments of the flow of communication are always possible. The structure of its messages is complex and multidimensional, as it involves not only exchanges of verbal statements but also nonverbal metacommunication that may influence how explicit messages are processed. It has a large capacity to convey socioemotional content. Thus, on the whole interpersonal communication appears a richer form of conveying and receiving political messages than mass communication.

On the other hand, the range of coverage of any interpersonally conveyed message is far smaller. Interpersonal communication is decentralized and fragmented, and any particular content can be received by only a small number of addressees. In its capacity to expose large numbers of people at the same time to identical messages it is by far surpassed by the mass media. While modern mass media, especially the audiovisual media, address a politically indistinct audience that is large and socially heterogeneous, interpersonal communication tends to follow lines of social and political cleavage, operating mostly within rather than across structural segments of society. If mass communication functions as the great equalizer of modern society, interpersonal communication rather mirrors its pluralism and diversity. However, to the degree that mass communication provides interpersonal communication with its thematic agenda and frames for dealing with it, some standardization takes place there as well.

The Study of Interpersonal Political Communication

While mass communication is a relatively young phenomenon, dating back just a few centuries, interpersonal communication is as old as mankind itself. Using a shared language to send and receive meaningful symbols in order to orient themselves with regard to one another, as well as to co-orient themselves with regard to their physical and social environments, can be seen as an essential component of humans' nature from its beginning. While the advent and expansion of mass communication is one of the key features of the processes of socioeconomic modernization, it has supplemented but not replaced interpersonal communication as a crucial instrument of exchanging information, including information on politics.

Nonetheless, as far as political communication is concerned, by far the largest share of scientific attention so far has concentrated on mass communication. Only a relatively small body of research has been accumulated with regard to interpersonal political communication, and even smaller is the stock of studies that analyze both interpersonal communication and mass communication simultaneously. With few exceptions, a clear division of labor characterizes the relationship between scholarly interest in these two forms of political communication, and it is complemented by a theoretical divide. Mostly, research into interpersonal political communication works with different concepts and theories than inquiries into the mass media's political roles and attributes.

In an age in which new information and communication technologies tend to increase individuals' capacity to convey messages to larger numbers of other people, while narrowcasting and demand-driven provision of content replace broadcasting and its supply-driven logic in the realm of media, drawing the boundary between interpersonal communication and mass communication appears not so easy. Yet, the paradigmatic form of interpersonal communication remains communication occurring in direct interactions among a small number of individuals. Although often restricted to word-of-mouth communication in face-to-face interaction, in present times it seems more appropriate to include also personal exchanges that are technically mediated, for instance by telephone or e-mail, in the notion of interpersonal communication.

Such communication can be public or private. It can take place in the course of encounters between strangers, when no control can be exerted over the range of participants that share in the dialogue. Or it can occur between persons who are well acquainted if not intimately related to one another, in secluded spaces that are protected physically or at least through norms of civility against anyone entering who is not explicitly invited.

Public Interpersonal Communication

Advocates of more populist rather than strictly elitist conceptions of democracy often emphasize the crucial importance of open political debate in public situations that involves persons who are personally unrelated to one another. Examples are town hall meetings or other kinds of political gatherings as well as, in more recent times, Internet forums and chat rooms where concerned citizens assemble, personally or virtually, to exchange their views on matters of common interest. However, such activities are very demanding in terms of civic skills and tend to be rather unpleasant experiences for many of those taking part. Almost by necessity, communication under such circumstances is emphasizing conflict rather than consensus, and thus may create a fair amount of discomfort if not outright stress among its participants. It needs courage and a certain confidence in one's ability to prevail in verbal disputes to take a position in plain view of the public. Accordingly, fear of isolation as well as uncertainty about one's argumentative competence have been identified as factors that impede people's willingness to take part in such activities.

Expressing political standpoints is sometimes likened to religious practices—something that due to cultural norms is considered an activity that belongs to the private rather than to the public realm. On the other hand, extended experiences with political discussion in the private realm, especially if it implies exchanges with many associates who hold diverse political views, may spill over into the public sphere, nourishing people's readiness to speak out in public. On the whole, public interpersonal communication appears as a fairly demanding form of political participation. Accordingly, it is rather a phenomenon of a small minority of political activists. In most societies, under ordinary circumstances only few citizens find their way to such events, and even smaller proportions actively engage in their proceedings.

It is difficult to analyse such occurrences in natural settings, and accordingly few attempts have been made so far. An important exception is studies related to recent democratic experiments of plebiscitary institutional reform like "consensus conferences," "citizen juries" or "planning cells." The most extensive and far-reaching, but at the same time also most intensely scientifically monitored of these measures are the so-called deliberative polls, invented by James Fishkin (1997). They start like any ordinary survey of a random sample of individuals from some population, for instance, the electorate of a country, on some political issue. But then a huge investment is made to assemble the respondents of this survey at a central location, to expose them to a huge dose of carefully prepared information on the issue in question, and to let them debate the issue extensively in moderated group discussions. Eventually, they are surveyed again to see how their opinions have changed during this intense process of political information and deliberation.

Within this elaborate procedure, the purpose of interpersonal communication between strangers—in this particular case a random sample from a large population—is to contribute to more substantial, better-considered opinions on complex political issues. This is seen as a practical antidote against the notorious shallowness of public opinion as it finds expression and visibility through media polls, which are usually just registering superficial top-of-the-head statements. The resulting opinions of higher quality among the members of a random sample are assumed to qualify as a proxy for the opinions of an ideal, well-informed, and intensely deliberating electorate that in reality does not exist. As such, they may, according to Fishkin, legitimately play a prescriptive role in elites' political decision making.

These and other studies on organized public deliberation suggest that such events—even when proceeding online and not face to face—can create a sense of community identity and social trust, and change their participants' attitudes, increase their internal efficacy, raise their interest in and knowledge about political issues, make them on the whole better capable to discuss political issues, and eventually also more likely to participate in other forms of political activity. They thus seem to attest to the political potential of ordinary citizens and justify a stronger appreciation of their voice in the political process of a less elitist, and more plebiscitarian version of democracy.

Private Interpersonal Communication

Most research on interpersonal political communication has concentrated on private settings, concerning persons that together form more or less stable webs of social interaction. Such communication takes place within citizens' immediate life-world, in various contexts by which people get into touch with each other. People's homes are the locus where such communication takes place most often, and it tends to be spontaneous, unstructured, and intermingling with exchanges about other topics of a more mundane character.

Measuring everyday political discussion between ordinary citizens is notoriously difficult. Few studies have so far attempted to gain insights into the functioning of interpersonal communication by directly observing political talks. A notable exception is William Gamson's (1992) study of political discussions among working-class Americans, aimed to demonstrate how common people are able to make sense of complicated issues through political conversation, drawing on media frames, personal experiences, and folk wisdom.

Most of what we know about interpersonal political communication comes from survey research and is derived from respondents' reports on their communication habits and either respondents' perceptions or direct measurements of their political talkmates' attributes. Early research, in particular the seminal studies of Paul Lazarsfeld and his colleagues at Columbia University's Bureau of Applied Social Research, conceived of interpersonal political communication as a matter of functionally diffuse primary groups, tightly integrated by lasting emotional ties of mutual attraction, sympathy, esteem, and trust, and characterized by strong norms, advocating conformity to group standards and prevailing opinions. More recently, the view of political conversations as an exclusive matter of cohesive social groups, densely interwoven by strong ties, has been replaced by a more open perspective, centered around the notion of social networks. It recognizes that such communication may also extend to weak ties, connecting individuals to mere acquaintances and not necessarily involving intimate relationships and positive emotions. Theoretically, such secondary relationships can be seen as an intermediate form of interpersonal communication that bridges the strictly private and the strictly public realms.

Doubtless, processes of socioeconomic modernization and the ensuing trends toward social differentiation and individualization as well as rising social and geographic mobility have increased the odds for citizens' personal environments to include more such functionally specific linkages. Nonetheless, even today primary relationships are more important than secondary relationships. Data from different advanced industrial societies clearly show that most interpersonal political communication still takes place between spouses, relatives, and friends. Hence, political talkmates are mostly tied to one another by intimate relationships. However, some political discussion also occurs between neighbors, at the workplace, or in voluntary associations. Such secondary relationships' share is larger in more extended networks. But discussion networks that consist exclusively of mere acquaintances are extremely rare. It seems that political talks within primary relationships are a necessary precondition for discussion activities that extend beyond the realm of intimate relationships.

Background and Intensity of Private Political Communication

Compared with other forms of political participation, political talk appears as a distinct mode of involvement. Dimensional analyses reveal how it is set apart from "vertical" activities that are aimed at influencing government by its "horizontal" logic that concerns citizens' interactions with one another rather than with elites.

Cross-National Differences

In cross-national perspective, the intensity with which people discuss political matters varies widely (see Table 1). Many European and North American countries' citizens are very active, with 40% or more claiming to engage in political conversations with high regularity, and large majorities doing so at least occasionally. At the same time, there are also countries where large shares of the population—up to one out of five citizens in some cases—never talk about politics at all. A North/South divide exists in Western Europe, with citizens of the Mediterranean countries being least talkative with regard to politics. Latin Americans also tend to display somewhat lower rates of political discussion, at least as far as conversations with friends—the only kind of political discussion for which comparable data are available on a global scale. In several Asian countries, rates appear also rather low. In North Africa and the Mideast, as well as sub-Saharan Africa, talking politics appears as a minority phenomenon, at least among friends.

Longitudinal studies reveal that such patterns of cross-national differences are very stable. A crucial institutional prerequisite of interpersonal political

Table 1 Political Discussions Worldwide

		Discuss Politics		Discuss Politics With Friends
		Several days a week or daily	Never	Frequently	Never
Western Europe	Belgium	28.6	19.4	14.7	35.6
	Finland	41.1	4.3	6.6	27.5
	France	37.1	11.8	11.4	35.4
	Germany	47.0	3.9	24.0	15.3
	Greece	19.1	15.0	21.3	21.4
	Italy	30.7	20.9	12.9	32.4
	Netherlands	38.4	10.5	15.9	19.8
	Norway	40.4	3.8
	Portugal	31.9	14.1	14.4	45.3
	Spain	28.3	22.6	12.1	43.4
	Switzerland	47.3	4.4
	U.K.	28.8	21.2	9.1	53.9
Eastern Europe	Belarus			18.1	20.1
	Bulgaria			17.4	24.6
	Czech Republic	35.8	9.5	21.7	12.5
	Hungary	36.5	12.2	11.3	43.2
	Poland	35.0	12.1	21.5	25.2
	Romania			10.8	37.7
	Russia			20.2	25.4
	Ukraine			19.4	21.9
North America	Canada			11.0	39.3
	United States			16.3	26.0
Latin America	Argentina			18.5	48.8
	Chile			13.1	43.4
	Mexico			15.2	42.1
	Venezuela			15.6	43.9
North Africa/Middle East	Algeria			8.8	26.3
	Egypt			7.5	42.6
	Iran			16.8	30.6
	Israel	44.2	9.4	37.1	14.0
	Saudi Arabia			21.2	28.1
	Turkey			12.1	46.2
Sub-Saharan Africa	Nigeria			17.1	25.7
	South Africa			10.2	46.3
	Uganda			19.1	20.2
	Zimbabwe			9.7	52.2

		Discuss Politics		Discuss Politics With Friends
		Several days a week or daily	Never	Frequently	Never
Asia	China			24.4	30.0
	India			16.5	42.2
	Indonesia			10.5	31.5
	Japan			7.4	35.5
	Pakistan			9.3	43.1
	Philippines			6.6	23.4
	Singapore			4.3	43.5

Sources: European Social Survey 2002; World Values Survey 1999/2000.

communication is the freedom of expression. This basic right is nowadays guaranteed by nearly all constitutions worldwide. According to a recent comprehensive content analysis, it is explicitly included in 87.5% of 160 surveyed constitutions from all over the world—far more than make mention of the freedom of the press. Nonetheless, it is clear that in many states this right exists on paper but not in practice. Feeling free to express one's thoughts, however, is an important facilitator of political conversation. Even when this basic right is guaranteed, heritages of authoritarian rule, deeply ingrained in citizens' collective memories, may curb their readiness to engage in open political exchange. Other differences between democracies also impinge on their citizens' engagement in political talks. For instance, political diversity seems to breed discussion, as it appears more intense among citizens of countries that are ideologically more heterogeneous.

Certain situational factors also stimulate or depress citizens' readiness to take part in interpersonal communication about politics. During dramatic periods of system change, such as processes of democratization, citizens develop a high need for orientation, which may increase their motivation to engage in political talks. But the ordinary ebb and flow of democratic politics also makes itself felt. For instance, election campaigns have been found to stimulate political conversations among voters.

Inter-Individual Differences

While differences between political systems certainly go a long way to explaining their citizens' general habits of political conversation, individual attributes make for important variations within countries. Citizens' likelihood to be active discussants has been found to depend on a number of personal characteristics, most notably their ability, motivation, and opportunity, as well as civic integration and political identification.

While evidence is mixed with regard to the importance of socioeconomic resources such as income, there is no doubt that people's cognitive resources are a crucial prerequisite of interpersonal communication. Their general intelligence and levels of education, but also more specifically their political knowledge, understanding, and awareness, increase their odds for engaging in political conversion. Persons who are generally more involved with public affairs, through intense interest in politics, partisanship, or strong ideological commitments, are also more likely to discuss political matters. Even when controlling for other factors, gender often appears as an important predictor as well, with males discussing politics more intensely than females, perhaps reflecting tradition role conceptions.

In addition, citizens' participation in extended social networks of interaction seems to stimulate the exchange of political content, as does their involvement in voluntary associations and their general trust in others. Politically, intense discussants tend to deviate from the political mainstream. Cross-national research found that supporters of minority parties as well as persons who are ideologically more extreme engage more readily in political discussion than adherents of the governing majority and ideological moderates.

Homogeneity and Heterogeneity in Private Political Communication

Citizens are usually well oriented about their associates' political positions, although cross-national differences cannot be overlooked. Where discussion activities are on the whole less intense, citizens typically are also more uncertain about where their talkmates stand politically. In all countries, spouses are particularly well informed about each other's political leanings. Contexts that nurture secondary relationships, like neighborhoods, workplaces, or voluntary organizations, are less conducive to learning about other people's political views.

Awareness of other persons' political preferences must not necessarily reflect reception of explicit statements about voting intentions or similarly clear-cut messages. Rather, inference processes certainly play an important role, with individuals drawing conclusions on their discussants' political identities from casual statements on specific topics. To some degree, impressions of others' political standpoints are also vulnerable to projection. People tend to attribute their own preferences on their communication partners. Such attributions are sometimes erroneous. Hence, relying on people's perceptions of each other implies a risk of overestimating the actual extent of political homophily within discussant networks. In addition, people's assessments of their associates' political leanings are also responsive to the general political climates of the wider sociospacial contexts within which their interactions take place.

Notwithstanding, political conversations are typically characterized by a considerable degree of homogeneity. Socioeconomic modernization has so far gradually, but not yet fundamentally, altered the basic rule that "like talks to like." Hence, interpersonal political communication more often than not occurs between like-minded souls and consists of exchanges of mutually agreeable political messages. To some degree, concordance between individuals who engage in political communication with each other is the consequence of deliberate choice and selective attention. Interpersonal communication is a means to reassure one's own identity by exposing oneself to affirming information. Hence, individuals tend to construct personal networks of like-minded associates. When successful, they will thus create for themselves a tight cocoon of mutual political confirmation in which the likelihood of being exposed to dissenting voices is negligible.

However, for several reasons it is unlikely that many citizens indeed find themselves in such circumstances. First of all, not all kinds of relationships are similarly controllable by individuals. One cannot choose one's relatives, and few people will find politics important enough to move to another neighbourhood or change their workplace because it exposes them to discordant political communication. According to several studies, among coworkers the odds are particularly high that conversations entail experiences of dissent and challenge. In contrast, chosen relationships like those between spouses and friends are on average very homogeneous.

In addition, most people are not political animals to such an extent that they let political motives entirely dominate their choices of interaction partners. Selecting associates according to other criteria may thwart citizens' control over the kind of messages they receive when discussing political matters with these people. Often they may not even bother to check where others stand politically before engaging in regular interactions.

Last, even when undertaking a determined attempt to construct a network of politically like-minded souls, people may find it difficult if not impossible to attain this goal. Choices of interaction partners are constrained by availability and the supply of potential discussants with specific political preferences is a function of the distribution of such positions within one's sociospatial context. In regions that are dominated by one party, adherents of other parties have a hard time getting in touch with congenial talkmates, and they find it close to impossible to engage exclusively in political exchanges with politically similar associates. Hence, sooner or later they find their own opinions challenged during political talks. In multiparty systems, at least if they are not segregated regionally, this mechanism implies a structural disadvantage for smaller parties.

For many years, research on interpersonal political communication has emphasized its homogeneity, to the point that it has been identified as a major force of the status quo in politics, contributing to the conservation of existing structures of political cleavage. More recently, an increasing theoretical interest in the notion of deliberative democracy has spurred concern for phenomena of network heterogeneity and its sustenance. This research accords a special role to open networks of lower density. Within such rather loose structures, weak ties fulfil an important function as bridges to other networks, serving as channels through which opinion diversity may find its way into political conversation, creating, and sustaining experiences of political disagreement.

Effects of Interpersonal Communication

That talkmates more often than not are politically congenial to some degree reflects processes of selection. However, political conversations are also powerful sources of political persuasion, even if they take place in secondary relationships. Hence, similarity between discussants is often also the result of one person having converted another to her own point of view or even voting preference. In recent years, the scope of research into the political consequences of private interpersonal communication has been expanded beyond this narrowly election-related perspective to include also more fundamental aspects of citizenship, such as citizens' engagement with politics and their ability to cope with political diversity—a crucially important theme, as the capacity for peaceful accommodation of political differences is essential for any democratic system of government.

Effects on Electoral Behavior

The seminal Columbia studies saw interpersonal influence as a mighty force that was responsible for the tendency of election results to reflect societal lines of cleavage. According to Lazarsfeld and his colleagues, political discussion intensifies during campaign periods. As it mainly takes place within the confines of socially and politically homogeneous groups, it reminds people of who they are politically and what they accordingly ought to do on Election Day. Thus, being exposed to one's associates' political views during political conversations activates citizens' latent predispositions that then guide their electoral behavior.

Numerous studies provide ample evidence that both voters' political attitudes and their political choices vary in accordance to the frequency with which they engage in political conversations and whom they talk to. While political activation through intense talks to associates with concordant views indeed appears as the more frequent outcome of interpersonal political communication in election times, conversion is also possible, although far less easily attained. While voters seem to be eager to follow their latent inclinations if they get exposed to justifications for doing so when discussing politics, messages that challenge their predispositions encounter resistance. However, if such contestations become strong enough, voters' sturdiness can be softened and eventually broken. On the whole, however, as concordant information is encountered more often and digested more readily, while exposure to discordant messages occurs more rarely, and leads less quickly to these messages' acceptance, the aggregate outcome of interpersonal communication at elections indeed tends to reflect and sustain the political status quo.

However, if predispositions are weak, conversion through political talks is facilitated. This implies that the total impact of interpersonal communication as a mover of public opinion tends to grow in the long run, as processes of dealignment erode voters' perceptional screens for exposure to and processing of messages from interpersonal (and other) communication. Conversions during political discussions appear also more likely in cases of voters who are not political experts and are little interested in politics. In addition, being trusted makes discussants more influential. At the same time, it is clear that interpersonal influence is stronger in primary relationships, although by no means restricted to them.

Effects on Democratic Citizenship

Interpersonal political communication provides not only guidance for citizens' voting decisions at elections. Irrespective of its content, it also creates a more knowledgeable citizenry with regard to public affairs. Furthermore, political conversations contribute to the quality of citizens' opinions. People who talk to each other are not only more like to have opinions on political issues, but these opinions also tend to be well considered.

By providing information, and by conveying norms and expectations about proper political behavior, interpersonal communication functions as a powerful mobilizer for political participation. Political discussion stimulates turnout and other forms of party- or campaign-related participation, especially if it takes place in large networks between highly partisan talkmates. Even stronger is its role with regard to so-called unconventional forms of participation. While certain attitudinal predispositions are often sufficient to drive people to the polls even in the absence of political exchanges with any associates, taking part in protest activities of social movements typically requires interpersonal mobilization. Social movements can be seen as politically mobilized everyday networks, and attending protest events, especially if they are of a more disruptive kind, is almost always the consequence of processes of recruitment that work through political conversations. In a way, political activity is contagious, and it spreads through interpersonal channels of political communication.

Yet, the mobilizing role of interpersonal communication depends on a certain degree of unanimity and is often thwarted if political conversations confront citizens with “cross-pressures.” Individuals who are exposed to ambivalent messages from their talkmates, at the same time promoting contradictory courses of action, tend to postpone political decisions and to abstain from more demanding forms of political activity, although this does not seem to extend to voting itself.

While disagreement among citizens’ political talkmates thus seems to entail some problematic consequences, in other ways it has recently come to be seen as an important prerequisite for several important facets of democratic political culture. Again, the main impulse for this research came from the recent deliberative turn in democratic theory. From this view, democracy is not primarily seen as an arena where preexisting preferences are expressed and aggregated, but rather as a communicative process of opinion formation that is to yield preferences of higher quality through an extended and inclusive debate in which problems are carefully analyzed, possible solutions identified, evaluation criteria developed, and solutions achieved that are fair to most if not everyone. One essential prerequisite for such a process to work is that interpersonal communication is not uniform but pits diverse opinions against each other. Only exchanging and confirming concordant points of views cannot be deliberative. Hence, it is essential that some degree of disagreement is sustained in interpersonal political communication.

To be sure, disagreement in private interpersonal communication can be only a minimum requirement for true deliberation. Nonetheless, it has been shown to entail healthy consequences that partly correspond to those demonstrated for much more demanding public deliberations. For instance, it increases people’s awareness and understanding for each others’ standpoints by conveying rationales for political views other than their own, and it fosters tolerance for opposing opinions as well as respect for those expressing them. Experimental evidence suggests that conversations including conflicting perspectives may even neutralize elites’ power to frame the way people think about issues.

Interpersonal Communication and Mass Communication

The most influential assumption about the relationship between mass communication and interpersonal communication is the notion of the “two-step flow of communication” proposed by the Columbia researchers half a century ago. It implies the assumption that far fewer people attend to messages from mass media than to word-of-mouth communication from personal associates, and that those who attend to the media serve—as so-called opinion leaders—as relays that filter media messages and convey only those into their groups that conform to these groups’ prevailing norms. If this hypothesis was ever valid, the expansion of television since World War II has changed its premises profoundly. While reading newspapers is still not a common activity in many countries, television nowadays brings political news to virtually everyone’s attention everywhere. Yet, as demonstrated by Table 1, in many countries considerable portions of societies never get exposed to political information while interacting with other people. Hence, there are sizable pockets of non-discussants who nonetheless take part in political communications by watching television. It is probably safe to say that nowadays the reach of the mass media surpasses the reach of interpersonal political communication everywhere.

Accepting this, some studies argued that the two forms of political communication nonetheless play different roles for those exposed to them. While political conversations have been found to possess a considerable capacity to influence attitudes and behaviors of those taking part in them, mass communication’s influence has been assumed to be constricted to cognitive effects, in particular agenda setting. However, after a long period of neglect, caused by the predominance of the “limited effects model” and the cognitive paradigm in effects research, recent years have seen a revived interest in the question of whether the media can not only inform but also persuade their audiences. Opinions, attitudes, and even behavior are no longer believed to be totally immune from media influences. Hence, the question can be legitimately raised as to which of the two forms of political communication—mass communication or interpersonal communication—is more important with regard to the formation and change of citizens' political orientations. On the whole, beginning with Katz and Lazarsfeld's classic study Personal Influence (1955), existing research suggests that mass communication is by no means irrelevant with regard to political persuasion, but that on the whole the impact of political discussion is indeed more powerful than that of media usage. Remarkably, this seems to extend even to cognitive effects like agenda setting.

Various attributes of interpersonal communication contribute to its higher effectiveness as a political influence. Typically, it is more one-sided than mass communication, so that there is a lower chance for oppositional messages to neutralize each other. Furthermore, it is more flexible. Participants in political talks can at all times adapt their messages to the flow of conversation and tailor their messages in such a way that their impact is optimized. To do so, they can make use of a large variety of verbal and nonverbal tactics, including emotional cues. Furthermore, depending on the nature of the relationship they may be able to impose sanctions on their associates in cases of noncompliance. Last, the casual character of many interpersonal communication events may soften individuals' tendency of selectivity when attending to and accepting inconvenient political messages. Only under very specific circumstances—for instance, when few people engage in political discussion while the media cover politics in a very one-sided way—may mass communication exert a more powerful impact on citizens' political orientations than interpersonal communication.

While interpersonal communication as a source of political information for individuals is sometimes seen as an alternative to mass communication, empirical research does not provide evidence for such a division of labor. Rather, the intensity of interpersonal communication appears positively linked to the attention paid to the political reporting of mass media, particularly the press. Exposure to sources of political information follows a cumulative "the more, the more" logic rather than a logic of alternatives. Probably, the relationship between media use and political talking is best understood as being transactional. Receiving mediated political information can stimulate secondary communication to make sense of media content by talking it through. At the same time, political discussion can incite increased attention to media's public affairs coverage, to learn more about some topics one heard about from others, or to prepare for anticipated upcoming conversations.

Often, political talks focus on themes and frames that originate from the media, so that at least to some degree it appears inappropriate to conceive of them as an independent form of political communication. As French sociologist Gabriel Tarde observed more than a century ago, "Every morning the papers give their publics the conversations of the day." Informal communication is an important tool for processing the information received from the media, assisting people in making sense of the political world beyond the realm of their personal experience. Discussing media content with one's associates thus serves as metacommunication that helps assess the viability of media messages by means of a "social reality test." According to recent studies, individuals embedded in politically homogeneous discussant networks tend to perceive stronger biases in the media's political reporting than others. More important, depending on their political composition, discussant networks may even serve as facilitators or inhibitors of media effects on political preferences. Furthermore, mass and interpersonal communication also seem to interact with regard to political mobilization. Media consumption stimulates political participation especially among people who intensely discuss politics, less so among those who rarely or never engage in political talk.

Rüdiger Schmitt-Beck

Further Readings

Delli Carpini, M. X., Cook, F. L., & Jacobs, L. R. (2004). Public deliberation, discursive participation, and citizen engagement: A review of the empirical literature. Annual Review of Political Science, 7, 315–344.

Fishkin, J. S. (1997). The voice of the people: Public opinion and democracy (2nd ed.). New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Gamson, W. A. (1992). Talking politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Hawkins, R. P., Wiemann, J. M., & Pingree, S. (Eds.). (1988). Advancing communication science: Merging mass and interpersonal processes. Newbury Park, CA: Sage.

Huckfeldt, R., & Sprague, J. (1995). Citizens, politics, and social communication: Information and influence in an election campaign. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Katz, E., & Lazarsfeld, P. F. (1955). Personal influence: The part played by people in the flow of mass communication. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.

Lazarsfeld, P., Berelson, B., & Gaudet, H. (1968). The people's choice: How the voter makes up his mind in a presidential campaign (3rd ed.). New York: Columbia University Press.
Mutz, D. C. (2006). Hearing the other side: Deliberative versus participatory democracy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
Schmitt-Beck, R. (2000). Politische Kommunikation und Wählerverhalten [Political communication and voter behavior]. Wiesbaden, Germany: Westdeutscher Verlag.
Zuckerman, A. (Ed.). (2005). The social logic of politics: Personal networks as contexts for political behavior. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

Iowa Caucuses

For more than 3 decades, the Iowa Precinct Caucuses' Presidential Straw Polls, known as the Iowa caucuses, have dominated the kickoff of the U.S. presidential nomination process. Traditionally placed first among the nomination contests, Iowa's grassroots-heavy precinct-level party meetings grow in importance far beyond the local delegates they select. Since 1976, when former Governor Jimmy Carter (D-GA) won Iowa's straw polls, propelling himself to national prominence, capturing the Democratic nod, and sweeping to the White House over then-President Gerald Ford, candidates, media, and voters alike have seen Iowa winnow the presidential field for the New Hampshire primary that follows.

A caucus is a party meeting. At caucuses, partisans gather to make decisions on whom to back and what to do. In the U.S. presidential nomination system, specifically, caucuses are local party gatherings at which delegates are selected to go on to conventions at the county, district, and/or state level that ultimately determine the delegates the state's party sends to the national convention and thus, indirectly, which presidential candidates the state supports. The local nature of the process and its exacting requirements tend to reinforce the importance of political organization relative to broad advertising.

Most state parties today hold primaries rather than caucuses. In primaries, any party regular (and sometimes even those outside the party) can show up at voting stations just as in a general election. Reforms in the Democratic Party from the early 1970s, generally followed by Republicans in later years, placed strict limits on presidential caucuses, steering more and more states toward the primary method of selecting national convention delegates and away from the caucus-to-convention system.

History of the Iowa Caucuses

The Hawkeye State cleaves to its caucus tradition, as well as its first-in-the-nation status. Since its entry into the union in 1846, the state has always used the caucus-to-convention system for its presidential nomination decisions, with the exception of 1916, when Iowa held one ill-fated presidential primary. (The state uses primaries to select all other levels of candidates, with the exception of judgeships.)

In 1972, the state Democratic Party moved its precinct caucuses up to January 24, ahead of the New Hampshire primary, motivated by clean campaign timelines adopted by state Democrats rather than by national prominence. Yet national prominence was thrust upon the state, with neighboring Senator George McGovern (D-MN) leveraging his geographic proximity into political support and frontrunner Senator Edmund Muskie (D-MA) capturing the endorsement of a key Iowa political figure just before the contest was held—and the victory.

Carter saw the value an early win might provide in the next election cycle. He organized his campaign around doing well in Iowa, and the strategy paid off. With a rising post-Watergate tide of support for crystal-clean politicians, the new face buoyed by the media after the win was carried to the nomination and the White House. On the GOP side, former CIA director George H. W. Bush, in turn, duplicated Carter's Iowa-centered approach in the following presidential cycle. Toppling the prohibitive favorite for the nomination, former Governor Ronald Reagan (R-CA), in the state, Bush rode what he termed the "Big Mo," or momentum, for the 5 weeks until the next contest, and ultimately to a showing that prompted Reagan to grant the moderate Bush the vice presidential slot on his 1980 ticket.

Again in 1984, the caucuses played a political role disproportionate to the delegates they allocated. Former Vice President Walter Mondale beat the field decisively in the state. The media judged that Senator John Glenn (D-OH) had been badly wounded by his rout there—and that the second-place showing of young Senator Gary Hart (D-CO) catapulted him into the challenger position and gained him a national following.

In 1988, frontrunner Vice President George H. W. Bush was stunned in the caucuses, finishing third behind both Senator Bob Dole (R-KS) and religious broadcaster Pat Robertson. But Bush corrected his stumble by defeating Dole in New Hampshire soon thereafter and went on to the nomination and the presidency.

The 1992 presidential race in Iowa was rendered all but irrelevant, with incumbent President Bush seeking reelection on the Republican side and the candidacy of favorite son Senator Tom Harkin (D-IA) on the Democratic side. But in 1996 the caucuses were back in the limelight, with Dole once again besting a tough field of Republican opponents and setting his feet to the path to the nomination.

The 2000 caucuses featured Governor George W. Bush's ascendance, though he triumphed over a field that did not include his main rival, Senator John McCain (R-AZ). McCain explicitly bypassed Iowa, choosing to fight first in New Hampshire, where the primary vote was open to the Independents (and Democrats) to whom McCain's views appealed most.

In 2004, Iowa once again crowned a nominee. Former Governor Howard Dean (D-VT) had built an electrifying fundraising lead by tapping in to a high-tension line of Internet-based opposition to the incumbent president. Yet as Dean's tide began to recede, that of Senator John Kerry (D-MA) came in, and with the air of a war hero's electability, the latter washed over Dean in the caucuses and rode the current all the way to the Democratic nomination.

The leading authority on the Iowa caucuses, Hugh Winebrenner of Drake University, describes Iowa as a "mediality," a press-created event whose coverage far outstrips its actual importance. Because of their position at the outset of the presidential nomination contest, the caucuses give the media—and through them, future voters—a tangible measure of candidates' relative strength. That measure tends to winnow the field of weaker candidates, who are declared uncompetitive after succumbing to Iowa's retail-politics rigors.

Accordingly, no candidate in the past 3 decades has become president of the United States without finishing at least third in the Iowa caucuses.

Christopher C. Hull

See also Grassroots Campaigning; Presidential Communication; Primaries

Further Readings

Squire, P. (Ed.). (1989). The Iowa caucuses and the presidential nominating process. Boulder, CO: Westview.

Winebrenner, H. (1998). The Iowa precinct caucuses: The making of a media event (2nd ed.). Ames: Iowa State University Press.

Iraq War, Media Coverage of American news media coverage of the Iraq War largely followed the same trends found by scholars who were examining coverage of prior conflicts involving the United States since at least the Vietnam War. Consistent with prior research, before and early in the war, antiwar protesters were more likely to be framed negatively than were pro-war demonstrators. Furthermore, during the war's initial phase, from March 19, 2003, when the United States bombing began, to the fall of the statue of Saddam Hussein in Baghdad's Firdos Square on April 9, press coverage tended to be episodic, casualty free, and pro-American, especially on Fox News Channel (FNC). For example, studies have shown that American broadcast news channels aired more than five times as many shots of firefights and battles as images of casualties (and less than 4% showed dead soldiers or civilians), as did newspaper photographs from the first week of the war. This period of uncritical, sanitized, and rallying press coverage reached its apex with the toppling of the statue of Saddam Hussein, an image repeated an average of once every 4.4 minutes on FNC during that afternoon and once every 7.5 minutes on Cable News Network (CNN). This coverage fed a premature "victory" frame that not only correlated with Bush administration goals but had the effect of dramatically reducing the war's prominence on the news agenda.

Yet, as became increasingly apparent in the summer and, especially, fall of 2003, the war was far from over. As the insurgency phase took off, media coverage slowly became more negative, more driven by events than administration frames, and less episodic. Still, some important story lines still adopted uncritical frames, notably coverage of the first insurgency-period invasion of Fallujah by American forces in the fall of 2003, which greatly underplayed civilian casualties, and coverage of the Abu Ghraib scandal, which avoided the use of the word torture in favor of less challenging labels such as abuse. These studies also point to the ways in which coverage of the war supported theories of news indexing and cascade activation by showing how the Bush administration dominated the framing of the war for some time and at key moments.

As the war dragged on, however, events on the ground made it more difficult for the administration's frame to go uncontested. From the beginning of the war, Bush administration officials and pro-war commentators often criticized the press for overreporting negative stories from Iraq. These charges increased in tenor as the insurgency grew and U.S. soldiers and Iraqi civilians died in increasing numbers. Studies analyzing reporting from Iraq in 2005 and 2006, however, came to a different conclusion. While it is true that press coverage focused quite a bit on "bad news" such as casualties, sectarian violence, and general political and social instability, when compared with real-world data on, for example, casualties and insurgent/terrorist attacks, the press actually underplayed these stories.

Another important feature of the reporting from Iraq involved the controversial "embed" program. Since the U.S. invasion of Grenada in 1983, the Pentagon had employed a media management strategy of "precensorship" in which the military kept the press from the front lines and/or utilized a pool system in which a few journalists were allowed to cover selected actions on behalf of the press corps. For a variety of reasons, not the least of which being the desire to wage a more effective information war against an enemy whom they knew would charge coalition forces with atrocities, the military decided to change this policy and offer to "embed" reporters from around the globe (including Al Jazeera) with front-line units. Before the war, skeptics assumed these embedded reporters would develop some variant of the Stockholm Syndrome and churn out flattering and decontextualized coverage. Studies comparing embedded reporting to that of nonembedded, or "unilateral," reporters showed mixed confirmation of these fears. They did, however, find that unilateral reporters were far more likely to show casualties. Embedded reporting was more favorable to military personnel and employed more episodic frames.. After the Saddam statue fell and coalition forces entered Baghdad in force, large numbers of reporters disembedded themselves, with the number of embeds dropping from 700 to 23, and despite fluctuations during major offensives (e.g., Fallujah in the fall of 2003), that number remained in the mid-20s in 2005. Ultimately, then, the story of the embed program is a mixed one that evolved over the course of the war from episodic and uncritical to more thematic and negative. This, of course, mirrors the broader story of Iraq War coverage from invasion to civil war.

Sean Aday

Further Readings

Aday, S. (2005). The real war won't be shown on television: An analysis of casualty imagery in American television coverage of the Iraq War. In P. Seib (Ed.), Media and conflict in the 21st century (pp. 141–156). Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave.

Aday, S., Cluverius, J., & Livingston, S. (2005). As goes the statue, so goes the war: The emergence of the victory frame in television coverage of the Iraq war. Journal of Broadcasting & Electronic Media, 49(3), 314–331.

Aday, S., Livingston, S., & Hebert, M. (2004). Embedding the truth: A cross-cultural analysis of objectivity and television coverage of the Iraq war. Harvard International Journal of Press/Politics, 10(1), 3–21.

Bennett, W. L., Lawrence, R. G., & Livingston, S. (2006). None dare call it torture: Indexing and the limits of press independence in the Abu Ghraib scandal. Journal of Communication, 56(3), 467–485.

Bennett, W. L., Lawrence, R. G., & Livingston, S. (2006). Punctuating the homogeneity of institutionalized news: Abusing prisoners at Abu Ghraib versus killing civilians at Fallujah. Political Communication, 23, 215–224.

Fox, J. R., & Park, B. (2006). The "I" of embedded reporting: An analysis of CNN coverage of the "shock and awe" campaign. Journal of Broadcasting & Electronic Media, 50(1), 36–51.

King, C., & Lester, P. M. (2005). Photographic coverage during the Persian Gulf and Iraqi wars in three U.S. newspapers. Journalism and Mass Communication Quarterly, 82(3), 623–637.

Luther, C. A., & Miller, M. M. (2005). Framing of the 2003 U.S.–Iraq War demonstrations: An analysis of news and partisan texts. Journalism and Mass Communication Quarterly, 82(1), 78–96.

McCormick Tribune Foundation. (2006). The military-media relationship 2005: How the armed forces, journalists and the public view coverage of military conflict. Wheaton, IL: McCormick Tribune Conference Series.

O'Hanlon, M., & Kamp, N. (2006). Is the media being fair in Iraq? Washington Quarterly, 29(4), 7–18.

Pfau, M., Haigh, M. M., Logsdon, L., Perrine, C., Baldwin, J. P., Breitenfeldt, R. E., et al. (2005). Embedded reporting during the invasion and occupation of Iraq: How the embedding of journalists affects television news reports. Journal of Broadcasting & Electronic Media, 49(4), 468–487.

Isocrates

See Rhetoric, Political

Issue Management

Issues management is the term used to describe strategic moves by organizations to influence public policy around an issue that is disputed by society. Issues management helps organizations take a more proactive rather than reactive stance on important political issues, such as concerns over the environment or rising energy costs. Although scholars Richard Crable and Stephen Vibbert pointed out that the government possesses the actual authority to determine public policy or legislation that could become regulation, organizations use issue management to advocate for particular resolutions. By targeting those who have the authority to make legal, economic, and political changes, organizations need not wait passively for policy to be determined. Issues management anticipates developing issues and helps determine whether organizations should comply with social norms or attempt to modify them. Organizations can employ issues management to resolve an area of concern in their favor by responding to public interest, changing organizational policy, and/or shaping legislation. Should an organization not exercise public sensitivity on issues of concern, however, they can face federal or state regulation that forces them to adopt more socially responsible practices.

W. Howard Chase coined the term issue management in 1976 to answer the question of how management should respond to the criticism being heaped on corporate America by activists during the 1960s and ’70s. In 1977, Chase designed issue management as a “new science.” Along with coauthors Barry Jones and Teresa Yancey Crane, he stressed the proactive position on issues that companies should adopt in order to participate meaningfully in the creation of public policy. Early on, issue management took the form of issue advocacy advertising, where organizations would use advertising to head off controversial issues through skillfully designed messages. Mobil Oil Corporation, for example, famously argued for openness in the heated 1970s energy debate in its aggressive op-ed campaign. While early issue management discussions did not recognize that organizations might need to adapt their internal cultures to successfully manage an issue and forestall regulation, today organizations recognize they may need to change to foster mutual interests in the public policy arena. Issues management may present an organization’s case to the public, but its efforts can unite groups instead of pitting them against each other. Organizations and their publics can be helped to share the same perspective about a given topic through issues management.

Although originally designed to help corporations respond to their critics, issues management is practiced as a management function that helps a variety of organizations integrate public relations, government and legal affairs, and strategic planning. Issue management is responsible for guiding managerial decisions affecting corporations, activist groups, issue-identified nonprofits, and government agencies. Its focus on an organization’s long-term goals and developing policy on issues of concern extends issues management’s decision-making function beyond technician-based public relations activities and public affairs. Shannon Bowen points out that a range of experts, including scientists, legal counsel, financial managers, and product managers, in addition to public relations experts, help identify developing issues and their implications for an organization’s business plan.

Robert Heath identified four common functions of issues management. Issue managers (1) anticipate and analyze potentially troublesome issues by scanning the environment, monitoring public opinion and values, and predicting how they might affect an organization. They also (2) develop organizational stances on areas of concern, engaging in public policy planning that is responsive to societal trends. Issue managers then (3) identify key constituencies whose support is important on an issue and (4) choose the behaviors they wish them to adopt. These publics are reached through issue management campaigns frequently employing advocacy advertising, public speeches, media relations, and working with lobbying groups and PACs.

Several issue management models detail this process. In 1979, Jones and Chase devised the first issues management model. After describing the issue identification, monitoring, and analysis phases issue managers follow, they identified the issue change strategy options managers can select. Organizations can adopt one of three potential issue stances: reactive, adaptive, and dynamic. A reactive stance implies that an organization “stonewalls” an issue, an adaptive stance indicates an openness to change and a willingness to participate in the public policy process, while a dynamic stance has organizations attempt to direct and shape the direction of public policy through strategic activities. Jones and Chase also described how organizations derive goals and objectives that support their chosen issue change strategy option, create an issue action program, and evaluate results. Crable and Vibbert later noted that all issues are not ready for decision, as Jones and Chase had claimed. They identified the distinction between influence and authority, recognizing that organizations possess the former, not the latter, in influencing public policy decisions. As a result, they offered another issue change strategy option, the catalytic stance, which tries to enter into the public policy decision process even earlier. Here, organizations determine what public policy outcome they are trying to achieve and nurture their position through the issues management life cycle.

Other scholars have since focused on predicting how issues become worthy of issues management efforts and classifying the common organizing principles, situational requirements, and substantive and stylistic characteristics of typical issues management discourse. In essence, these scholars detail the process whereby an organization has the opportunity to be perceived as socially responsible and therefore allowed to continue to operate in society. Issues management helps join together corporate or organizational goals with public expectations and harmonizes the relationships between them. Because it serves a vital balancing function, scholars argue that issues management has failed to attract the widespread attention it deserves. Greater attention to issues management in the future should help yield a better integration of stakeholder or activist desires, political representation, and organizational/corporate response.

Ashli Quesinberry Stokes

See also Public Affairs, Communication in

Further Readings

Bowen, S. A. (2004). Expansion of ethics as the tenth generic principle of public relations excellence: A Kantian theory and model for managing ethical issues. Journal of Public Relations Research, 16, 65–92.

Cowden, K., & Sellnow, T. L. (2002). Issues advertising as crisis communication: Northwest Airlines' use of image restoration strategies during the 1998 pilot's strike. Journal of Business Communication, 39, 193–219.

Crable, R. E., & Vibbert, S. L. (1985). Managing issues and influencing public policy. Public Relations Review, 11, 3–16.

Crane, T. Y. (2005). Issue Management Council. In R .L. Heath (Ed.), Encyclopedia of public relations (Vol. 1, pp. 457–459). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Heath, R. L. (1997). Strategic issues management: Organizations and public policy challenges. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Heath, R. L., & Nelson, R. A. (1986). Issues management: Corporate public policymaking in an information society. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Jones, B. L., & Chase, W. H. (1979). Managing public policy issues. Public Relations Review, 5, 3–23.

Kuhn, T. (1997). The discourse of issues management: A genre of organizational communication. Communication Quarterly, 45, 188–210.

Renfro, W. L. (1993). Issues management in strategic planning. Westport, CT: Quorum.

Issue Ownership

Issue ownership happens when a plurality of voters believes one political party is better suited to handle a particular issue than another party. In the United States, the Republican Party generally "owns" national defense and crime, while the Democratic Party is thought to better handle, and thus "own," education and the environment.

Issue ownership is tied to commonly held images of political parties that tend to be relatively stable over time. But if a ruling party handles an issue poorly over a period of time, it may lose the public's confidence on that issue. For some issues, such as the economy, neither party claims enduring ownership. These are called "performance issues" because public opinion is tied mainly to a party's performance rather than its image. A change in a country's political structure also can alter perceptions of issue ownership. In Canada, competition on the right from the newly formed Reform Party helped end the Conservative Party's ownership of the deficit issue in the early 1990s.

Issue ownership affects party strategies. Candidates tend to address most of their campaign communications to issues their party owns. Some evidence suggests candidates benefit when they focus on owned issues. This may be because people are biased toward information that confirms their prior beliefs, so they prefer messages consistent with existing party images. Another explanation is that candidates are more credible when they discuss an issue their party owns. There is some dispute as to whether the benefit of stressing owned issues applies in primary elections or among partisans. Partisans tend to believe their own party is best suited to handle every issue, but the margins are larger for ones their party owns.

To the extent that candidates confine their communication to issues they own, they fail to engage each other on the issues; as the issues they discuss diverge, they talk past one another. However, there is evidence to suggest considerable "issue convergence," or discussing the same issues, at least in partisan statements reported in the news. While not the norm, some convergence also occurs in political advertising, a format in which campaigns choose the topic rather than reporters. Candidates tend to converge on the same issues more in races that are more competitive, where issue-based voting is more common, so that the opposing candidate cannot determine the way an issue is discussed. For example, George W. Bush in 2000 ran as a "compassionate conservative" on education and Social Security (but stressing individual or local control instead of more centralized approaches).

It has been suggested that the concept be broadened from issue ownership to issue and trait ownership. In the United States, Republicans tend to be perceived as stronger leaders and more moral, while Democrats own the trait of compassion and empathy.

Patrick C. Meirick

See also Priming

Further Readings

Damore, D. A. (2005). Issue convergence in political campaigns. Political Behavior, 27, 71–97.

Petrocik, J. R., Benoit, W., & Hansen, G. (2003/2004). Issue ownership and presidential campaigning, 1952–2000. Political Science Quarterly, 118, 599–626.

Issues, Policy

See Mass Political Behavior

Issues in Campaigns

See Mass Political Behavior

J

Jackson, Jesse (1941–)

Jesse L. Jackson was an early activist in the civil rights movement. A follower of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Jackson was with King in Memphis when King was assassinated in 1968. After King's death, Jackson continued his work in the Southern Christian Leadership Conference but left that organization as a result of conflicts with other organization leaders. Continuing his civil rights work, Jackson founded Operation PUSH (People United to Save Humanity) and later the Rainbow Coalition, which merged with Operation PUSH in 1996.

As an African American leader, Jackson has been an agitator for civil rights internationally as well as in the United States. He has injected himself into situations and advocated, sometimes successfully, for the release of prisoners or captives in Syria, Cuba, and Yugoslavia. However, his controversial meetings with Venezuela's Hugo Chavez earned Jackson criticism from some religious leaders.

Jackson has made two bids for the U.S. presidency, seeking the Democratic Party nomination. In 1984, Jackson had some initial success, winning five state primaries, but ultimately lost the nomination to Walter Mondale. In 1988, Jackson again had some early success but was eventually denied the Democratic nomination, which went to Michael Dukakis. Jackson's political views, as expressed in these presidential bids, were considered decidedly liberal and included payment of restoration to descendants of American Black slaves, rescinding tax cuts put in place by the Reagan administration, establishing more public works projects and reinstituting New Deal–type programs.

Jackson has given important national addresses at the Democratic national conventions. His keynote address at the 1984 Democratic Convention and his speech at the 1988 convention are considered among his best and are often studied and held up as examples of great speeches.

Although Jackson did not succeed in his own campaigns for elective office, his son Jesse Jackson, Jr., is a U.S congressman from Illinois.

There have been some difficult times in Jackson's career. Controversies over extramarital relationships and accusations of financial misdeeds have sometimes plagued his operations. Nonetheless, his communication style, his rousing rhetorical skills, and his commitment to the African American cause have earned him an important place in American political history.

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Race in Politics

Further Readings

Clemente, F., & Watkins, F. (1989). Keep hope alive: Jesse Jackson's 1968 presidential campaign. Boston: South End Press.

Frady, M. (2006). Jesse: The life and pilgrimage of Jesse Jackson. New York: Random House.

Timberman, K. R. (2000). Shakedown: Exposing the real Jesse Jackson. London: Regency Press.

Wilson, P. (1996). The rhythm of rhetoric: Jesse Jackson at the 1989 Democratic National Convention. Southern Communication Journal, 61, 253–264.

JAMIESON, KATHLEEN HALL (1946–)

Kathleen Hall Jamieson is a communication scholar and one of the nation's leading experts on political advertising and presidential campaigns. Her academic career started with a focus on papal rhetoric but shifted over the years; she has made many research contributions to the areas of presidential discourse, political argumentation, media framing, gender and sexism, and adolescent mental health. She is author and coauthor of 15 books and more than 90 articles. From 1989 to 1993, Jamieson served as dean of the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Pennsylvania, where she is currently the Elizabeth Ware Packard Professor of Communication and the Walter and Leonore Annenberg Director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center. She is also the director of the Annenberg Foundation Trust at Sunnylands.

Jamieson is perhaps best known for her book Packaging the Presidency: A History and Criticism of Presidential Advertising, first published in 1984 (with revised editions published in 1992 and 1996). In that work, she analyzed the various political advertising techniques used by presidential campaigns since 1952. In another book, Dirty Politics, published in 1992, Jamieson identified the ways in which political advertisements could twist facts to mislead the public, highlighting distortions from the 1988 presidential campaign.

While much of her work has focused on political campaign discourse, her research has also examined the influences of news media framing on the public. Much research in the field of political communication has observed that the news media tend to focus on style over substance when reporting about political campaigns. Her book The Spiral of Cynicism: The Press and the Public Good, published in 1997 with Joseph N. Cappella, establishes empirically the deleterious effects of "horserace" framing by the news media on voter perceptions of the political system. Their research suggests that by focusing on horserace coverage over issues, the news media contribute to growing voter apathy.

In recent years, Jamieson has improved the empirical study of presidential campaigns by creating and implementing the National Annenberg Election Survey (NAES), the largest set of academic public opinion studies of the American electorate ever conducted. The NAES was conducted in 2000 and 2004, providing political communication scholars with datasets collected over the courses of these elections, containing more than 100,000 interviews per election. This contribution is important to political communication researchers because the NAES is predicated on the assumption that campaigns matter. The NAES's research design and questionnaires contain a strong political communication focus.

Kate Kenski

Further Readings

Jamieson, K. H. (1984). Packaging the presidency: A history and criticism of presidential advertising. New York: Oxford University Press.

Jamieson, K. H. (1992). Dirty politics: Deception, distraction and democracy. New York: Oxford University Press.

Jamieson, K. H. (1995). Beyond the double bind: Women and leadership. New York: Oxford University Press.

JOHNSON, LYNDON B. (1908–1973)

Lyndon Baines Johnson (LBJ) served as the 36th president of the United States and led the nation during a time of major changes in social, cultural, and political values. Assuming national power in the early 1950s, for nearly 2 decades Lyndon Johnson was a major force in shaping domestic legislation. Foreign policy, dominated by deepening American involvement in the Vietnam War during his presidency, cast a shadow on his domestic agenda and forced Johnson to retire from public life and not seek a second term as president.

Born and raised in rural Texas, Johnson trained to be a teacher but found politics too inviting. He worked on Capitol Hill in the early 1930s as a legislative aide and was elected to the House of Representatives as a New Deal Democrat in 1937. He served briefly in World War II and was elected to the Senate in 1946. He was elected to a full Senate term in 1948, although corruption charges in the campaign followed him for years. He became the Senate Majority Leader in 1954 and sought the Democratic presidential nomination in 1960. Losing to John Kennedy, he surprised many when he accepted Kennedy's invitation to be the vice presidential candidate. Kennedy's assassination in 1963 elevated Johnson to the presidency, and in 1964 he was elected in a landslide.

Although Johnson debated in high school and later coached debate, he was not noted for his public speaking prowess. Instead, he was a powerful communicator in interpersonal and small group interactions, often using what some aides called "the treatment" to gain support for his political agenda. Considered one of the greatest leaders in Senate history, LBJ pushed 1,300 bills through during his tenure. He was a tireless political campaigner in Texas and utilized the latest technology available, including political polling, targeted radio advertising, and travel by helicopter and airplane when other candidates dismissed such actions as fads.

As president, Johnson sought to continue Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal with his own Great Society. Legislation designed to eliminate poverty, help the elderly, end racism, promote education, and improve the quality of life for all Americans was a central part of the Great Society agenda. Although successful in gaining victory for many major pieces of domestic legislation, Johnson became mired in managing the Vietnam War. Escalation of the American role in the war in 1965 and 1966 came to define his presidency, and by 1968 he was challenged by fellow Democrats Robert F. Kennedy and Eugene McCarthy for the party's presidential nomination. Johnson declined to run for a second full term and retired from political life, where he remained out of the public eye until his death.

C. Brant Short

See also Daisy Girl Ad

Further Readings

Caro, R. A. (1982–2002). The years of Lyndon Johnson (3 vols. as of 2006): The path to power (1982); Means of ascent (1990); Master of the Senate (2002). New York: Knopf.

Pauley, G. E. (1998). Rhetoric and timeliness: An analysis of Lyndon B. Johnson's voting rights address. Western Journal of Communication, 62(1), 26–53.

Zagacki, K. S. (1995). Lyndon Baines Johnson. In H. Ryan (Ed.), U.S. presidents as orators: A bio-critical sourcebook (pp. 228–248). Westport, CT: Greenwood.

Jordan, Barbara (1936–1996)

Born in Houston, Texas, on February 21, 1936, Barbara Jordan became one of the most notable women in politics of the 20th century. Raised during segregation and Jim Crow laws, Jordan overcame race and gender as societal barriers to become one the most admired public speakers and the first African American and woman to serve in the Texas Senate.

Growing up, Jordan lived with her parents, two older sisters, Bennie and Rose Marie, and grandfathers, John Ed Patten and Charles Jordan, in an African American working-class neighborhood. Jordan's grandfather made a huge contribution to Jordan's outlook on life and education. With the determination instilled in her, she was an exemplary student at Phillis Wheatley High School in Houston. Soon, she became well known for her rhetorical skills and received many awards for her talent as an orator.

Right after high school, Jordan was admitted to Texas Southern University, where she received her bachelors of science in government in 1956. Jordan was admitted to Boston University Law School and received a law degree in 1959. One of the two women in her graduating class, Jordan passed the bar examinations in both Massachusetts and Texas and set up a law practice out of her home.

A strong advocate for education and justice, Jordan officially entered the political area in the 1960s. She was the first woman to run for the Texas House of Representatives in 1962. She ran again in 1964, losing on both occasions. In 1966, Jordan was elected to the Texas State Senate and became the state's first African American senator since 1883. In 1972, Jordan was elected to U.S. House of Representatives. In that same year, Jordan served briefly as acting governor of Texas on June 10, 1972, the first African American woman to head any American state government.

One of her remarkable speeches was the televised address in favor of President Richard Nixon's impeachment during the House Judiciary Committee's investigation in 1974. In 1979, Jordan retired from the political arena, joining the faculty at the University of Texas in Austin. In 1991, Ann Richards, the new governor of Texas, appointed Jordan as her special counsel on ethics.

Jordan received many distinguished recognitions. In 1977, Harvard and Princeton universities conferred upon Jordan honorary doctoral degrees. In 1984, she was voted the "Best Living Orator" by the International Platform Association. In 1990, she was inducted to the National Women's Hall of Fame. In 1992, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) honored Jordan with the Spingarn Medal prestigious award. Jordan died on January 17, 1996, in Austin, Texas.

Juliana Maria da Silva

Further Readings

Blue, R., & Naden, C. (1992). Barbara Jordan: Politician. Philadelphia: Chelsea House.
Editors of Salem Press. (2000). Notable women in world government. Pasadena, CA: Salem Press.
Holmes, B. A. (2000). A private woman in public spaces: Barbara Jordan's speeches on ethics, public religion, and law. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.
Morin, I. V. (1994). Women of the U.S. Congress. Minneapolis, MN: Oliver Press.
Rogers, M. B. (1998). Barbara Jordan: American hero. New York: Bantam Books.

JOURNALISM, POLITICAL

Political journalism is a term used to describe the specialized practice of reporting on political campaigns, elections, and government functions. This practice may take place on the local, district, state, regional, national, or international level and on any channel of the mass media. A political journalist may not report on politics and government exclusively; nor is his or her work limited to any particular approach, style, treatment, or format. Stories covered by political journalists may be ongoing, but often the term is associated with news coverage of a political campaign. This would include but is not limited to advertisements, debates, public appearances, and formal speeches. When covering the executive branch of a state or the nation, a political journalist may travel with the candidates or officeholders. The producer, who decides whom to bring on a political talk show and then arranges those appearances, might also be called a political journalist, even though his or her work takes place out of the public eye.

Political journalism at its best more often focuses on a candidate's statements and records rather than his or her image or on government functions. For instance, voting records can indicate where a candidate stands on important issues. Finance records reveal which individuals or interest groups made the largest contributions to a candidate. An elected official's leadership abilities, character, and responsiveness to constituents are also valid subjects for political journalism when reported through the use of multiple credible sources. America's founding fathers wanted reporters to be able to cover these kinds of stories without interference from the government. They put the First Amendment into the Constitution to guarantee the right of free speech in order that it might generate an informed electorate. This Madisonian Ideal held the hope that the electorate would choose the best person for an office and would hold that person accountable if he or she did not perform their duties satisfactorily.

History of Political Journalism in the United States

As American history shows, however, the relationships among the press, the public, and politicians in this democracy has always been tenuous, following cyclical patterns set by public opinion and cultural norms. A free press was key to revolutionary activities that brought the birth of America. Revolutionary political journalists were printing press operators like Benjamin Franklin, who published pamphlets and treatises that sparked citizens to take arms against British occupiers. A party press emerged in the late 18th century, in which newspaper editors were literally "political" journalists who operated their publications at the center of partisan activity. As Americans moved west, frontier political journalists were less interested in divisive party politics and more involved in issues of community unity. During the Civil War, powerful editorials from newspaper publishers like Horace Greeley challenged President Abraham Lincoln and his cabinet for their moderate slavery policies with bitter and sarcastic attacks. As the 20th century unfolded, journalists became more independent and less partisan, taking on a "watchdog" role as part of the progressive social movement. Muckraking and sensational journalism increased circulation, so newspapers were less dependent on political parties. New media arose, and political journalists began to use the "mass media" to modernize coverage of foreign affairs as part of America's social-political culture. With the advent of radio, movie newsreels, and television, entertainment values were considered in the reporting of politics and commercial influence took shape.

Walter Lippmann was among the first "media critics" to examine the role of the press in the political life of the nation, as political journalism sometimes took the form of patriotic propaganda. Political documentaries such as Why We Fight, which supported war efforts in the 1940s, were on the opposite end of the spectrum from television broadcasts that followed 25 years later during the Vietnam War. Coverage of the civil rights era and Watergate scandal brought hope that political journalism could serve an informed democracy and bring positive social change. But media deregulation in the 1980s emphasized journalism as a money-making strategy for corporations. Public affairs programming dropped off the airwaves as cable competition and the 24-hour news cycle put new economic constraints on electronic journalism. Talk shows on television and radio drew audiences that were hungry for scandal and political punditry that did more to reinforce their beliefs than provide new information and context. Media credibility fell and is still falling. More citizens are turning to the Internet for political journalism, but navigating through a maze of Web sites, Web logs, and podcasts, they more often find biased diatribes. In the Information Age, anyone can be a "political journalist" with the help of a computer, some software, and a space on the Web.

Professional journalists generally abide by certain ethical standards gathered over time and tradition and put forward by professional organizations such as the Society of Professional Journalists and the Radio-Television News Directors Association. At the center of these tenets is the obligation of journalists to report the truth fairly and independently, and to do no harm. The definition of a political journalist evolves beneath the broader concept of political communication. Indeed, the first political communication studies conducted in the 1940s centered on political journalism and its effect on the electorate. The underlying questions behind such ongoing studies are,

> Do journalists play their role well in an informed democracy?
>
> Do they help citizens learn enough about candidates, issues, and the political process in order to make good decisions at the polls?

The following summary may tell us some of what political communication scholars have discovered about political journalism in trying to answer these questions.

Construction of the Political News Story

All news stories are constructions in an ever-changing environment of economics, technology, public opinion, and politics. The traditional role of a journalist is to provide content that fills a given space or time with carefully selected facts, descriptions, visuals, quotes, or sound bites. Political news stories may contain many actors in the political process, from candidates and activists to institutions and experts. To a certain extent, each of these actors wants to control the message of the story. Some actors are more powerful than others. Some provide more human interest, while others have more entertainment value. A political journalist must determine what motivates each actor to say what he or she does while providing context for the statements. There is increasing economic pressure on all journalists to create stories that will attract readers and audiences. Thus, a political journalist performs a difficult balancing act, mediating the controlling desires of the actors, the gratification needs of the audience, and, ultimately, the truth.

The stakes are often high in the outcome of a political news story. The choice of words and pictures can promote or provide an advantage to one candidate or one side of an issue. The struggle to maintain balance among all actors can be intense. Underlying this struggle are the structural forces that shape how a political journalist writes or tells a story. These forces have traditionally been studied under the heading of "gatekeeping." Lance Bennett (2004) outlined four broad areas of gatekeeping that interact in the selection and construction of news stories:

1. An individual reporter's news judgment
2. Standards and policies of a particular news organization in which a reporter works
3. Economic pressures from management stemming from audience research, consultant interference, or ratings
4. New technologies that allow new ways of gathering and organizing news stories

Some researchers say their findings indicate the collapse of the journalistic gatekeeping function. They suggest that tremendous economic and structural changes in the news business take story construction beyond the control of individual journalists. Others argue this is a pessimistic overgeneralization. They find evidence that the traditional organizational model still exists, while gatekeeping standards vary from news organization to news organization. Bennett developed his "multigated" model of news construction to illuminate variable news patterns created by a host of social, political, technological, and economic factors.

The bottom line of political communication research that examines political journalism is whether it is biased and whether it imparts the kinds of information citizens need. Such scholarship has revealed several trends and challenges over the years. Some were expected, while others were more surprising and, in some cases, troubling.

Structural Bias

Political information may be proliferating on talk shows, late night comedy, and the Web, but the amount and the size of political stories is shrinking in newspapers and on traditional television newscasts. Over the past 2 decades, network TV newscasts covered more entertainment, disasters, accidents, and crime while reducing coverage of political campaigns, issues, government, and international affairs. There are also indications that the quality of political news is lower. The journalistic tone is more cynical and negative. Journalists introduce their own voices and interview each other without providing quotes or sound bites from truly independent experts or even the political figures they are covering. Researchers found journalists spoke 6 minutes for every 1 minute allocated to candidates in the 2000 U.S. elections.

When political stories are reported they are less likely to be focused on the thoughts or ideas of political candidates or officeholders. The so-called press pack is instead quick to seize on the "scandal" or "gaffe" of the moment. Such a feeding frenzy adds drama and negativity to political coverage. Emotionally charged content may satisfy the audience hunger for entertaining gossip and scandal, but it disconnects readers and viewers from political reality or public policy. The competition to break stories leads to the reporting of unconfirmed information at best or, at its worst, reporting nothing more than rumors.

Ironically, the hungry 24-hour news cycle does little to promote more serious political reporting. When a reporter is live in front of a camera or on the set he or she cannot be examining voting records, reading proposed legislation, or documenting public policy. Instead, the never-ending demand for news content is met by speculation, superficial analysis, and commentary.

While evidence mounts for this passive sort of bias, the good news is there is little evidence of premeditated or active partisan bias by individual journalists. Repeated analysis of news coverage over decades of presidential elections found little partisan reporting among daily general news journalists. However, that does not mean coverage is neutral. Some candidates receive more coverage, while others receive very little. This particular kind of structural bias has its own line of research known as "horserace coverage" or "the game frame."

Horserace Coverage of Elections

It is not surprising that political journalists would cover a political contest like a game or sporting event. Games and sport have a high entertainment value in modern culture. It is simpler, quicker, easier, and cheaper to whittle a political contest down to a race between a winner and loser than it is to provide deep background and contextual information about complex campaign issues and candidate positions. Some outcome of a contest is inevitable, and the strategies leading to victory meet traditional norms of journalism that dictate the choice of stories that are timely, relevant, and interesting. These norms often lead to the choice of some topics over others and emphasis of some candidates over others. There is a structural bias against covering candidates who have no chance of winning a campaign, not necessarily because of the positions they take, but because of what reporters deem as "news." Some researchers have found losing candidates receive more negative coverage. Others have found the frontrunner is more likely to receive negative coverage, while the "dark horse" benefits from more positive stories. Most researchers agree third-party and lesser-known candidates are rarely quoted or heard over the air.

The emphasis on who's winning a campaign is even more pronounced in American primary elections. A larger field of candidates and time pressures allow political journalists to construct stories that are simpler, boiling down to a candidate's prospects for winning. Some political journalists are vying for affirmation as successful predictors of who will win. But often, the voter loses, because as journalists increasingly take center stage, sounds bites with candidates and other political figures are shrinking. The messages delivered to voters are increasingly mediated. Debates provide a forum in which voters can hear candidates discuss topics of interest, but few are presented without speculative analysis afterward that announces who the winner and loser were.

Political Advertising Analysis

Political ads and Web sites remain the only unmediated messages from candidate to voter. Increasingly, television ads have been placed in commercial breaks appearing during newscasts, adding to their legitimacy. In 1988, political columnist David Broder called on journalists to analyze political spots for accuracy. The first attempts to do so backfired. Researchers discovered that when all or part of a political spot was played during a newscast, the message of the ad was enhanced. This discovery brought calls for specific ways in which political journalists could report on ads, emphasizing analysis rather than the original ad messages. Production techniques such as truth boxes have brought some success at diffusing any kind of ad boomerang effect. However, ad watch reports that appear in newspapers rarely address technical distortions placed in negative advertising. Recently, candidates, parties, and independent advocacy groups have employed their own ad watching of opponents' spots, adding to the confusion.

Most scholars and media critics agree some kind of political ad analysis is needed as ads proliferate and increasingly appear inside newscasts and on the Web. However, research indicates as the amount of substantial political journalism produced goes down, so does the amount of ad watching.

Political Punditry

Ad watch reporting is only part of a growing culture of interpretive analysis among political journalists. Political pundits abound on network television, cable, and talk radio. Their interpretive style of reporting is supported by a daily supply of political ads, polling data, sound bites, blogs, e-mails, and telephone calls. For the audience, watching or listening to pundits is a way to get a broader perspective or context that often reinforces beliefs rather than providing new or substantive information. This calls into question the fairness of punditry. Long-term research by Page and Shapiro (1992) found that pundits, along with former presidents, were the most important forces influencing changes in public opinion. Talk shows are cheap to produce, which makes them economically viable to 24-hour networks trying to fill air time. Advertisers know that placing spots inside news or quasi-news-format programming legitimizes their image or message. Political talk programming is also popular among desirable key demographic groups. One of the most striking developments in this area is the popularity of late night comedy talk shows that attract young viewers. Recent research indicates shows like The Daily Show with Jon Stewart are the number one source of political information for viewers in their late teens and twenties.

Pundits like Tim Russert carry a certain amount of credibility due to their relationship with established news organizations. But can Bill O'Reilly, Rush Limbaugh, and Jon Stewart be considered political journalists? Such full-time commentators impart political information and context, but they also demonstrate ideological bias. The line between journalism and entertainment is increasingly blurred in pundit venues.

The Internet: New Voices, New Concerns

The Internet is another venue in which political journalism is changing shape. Here, the line between journalist and citizen is blurred as political activists take the reigns of Web sites, Web logs, and viral e-mail communication. There is no doubt the Internet offers exciting opportunities for unmediated political communication and activity. As the so-called digital divide narrows, more people can get information about candidates, interact with their campaigns, and support their choices for office. As the World Wide Web emerges as a significant player in the political process, it is still unclear what role political journalists will play or who they will be. Early research in this area has revealed some trends.

First, mainstream media journalists who practice in traditional media are using the Web to enhance and distribute their political reports. Databases containing important campaign and candidate information are now available online, and reporters are using them to add content to their stories. The stories that air on television and radio may now be accessed on media Web sites. Critics argue, convincingly, such media Web sites too often act as promotional or marketing tools for stations. However, there is no doubt that political reports from traditional media are more accessible now than they were before the advent of the Web.

Second, citizen journalists outside the mainstream are contributing to political communication, for better or for worse. Matt Drudge broke the Clinton–Lewinsky scandal. A conservative Web log first called into question the authenticity of a memo contained in a CBS news story about President George W. Bush's National Guard Service. There is no question such communication added information to important national stories.

They also added to the growing negativity and scandal coverage in the traditional political press.

Finally, and perhaps most disturbingly, political operatives can easily disguise themselves as political journalists on the Web. Hidden behind the electronic screen, facing little or no government regulation, and carrying no professional standards, political advocacy groups create convincing political messages packaged as journalism or "truth." Such a group emerged during the 2004 presidential campaign as the "Swift Boat Veterans for Truth." It promised to "provide what the mainstream media wasn't reporting" about John Kerry's service in Vietnam. The group's political motivation and financial support was eventually revealed, but their actions had a devastating effect on the Kerry campaign. Some analysts believe they were ultimately responsible for his defeat.

Although the Internet has the potential to be a powerful tool for political journalism, it also contains troublesome pitfalls. It is a medium that requires both caution and sophistication. Credibility and bias are an even larger concern here than in traditional political media.

Effects of Political Journalism

What are the effects of the struggle among journalists, parties, and candidates for control of a political message? How does structural bias change the way voters perceive such messages? The answers to these questions lie in research based on social science theory. Researchers have used agenda setting and framing theories to explore such effects.

Agenda-setting studies found that issue salience in political reporting was remarkably linked to issue salience among political news viewers and readers. The topics that political journalists report on gain importance in the minds of citizens. As Bernard Cohen suggested, "The news may not be able to tell people what to think, but it is startlingly successful at telling them what to think about." But while citizens may list as important the same issues reported upon by political journalists, there is no evidence citizens are learning much about them. Americans consistently demonstrate low levels of political knowledge, perhaps because they find most political journalism distasteful.

The negative frames used by journalists to report on political scandal may be to blame for increasing levels of political cynicism and disengagement. Many scholars believe it's no coincidence that voter turnout and other political activity have declined alongside the rise of electronic media and the fall of media credibility. Drama and sleaze are not bringing viewers back to the polls or to news programming. The news audience in the United States declined dramatically between 1990 and 2000. T. E. Patterson found that of those who said they now pay less attention to news than they did before, 93% characterized the news as negative, compared to 77% of the general population.

If the relationship between political journalists and citizens is strained, so is the press-government relationship. A higher level of mistrust is bringing higher levels of spin. This makes it increasingly difficult for political journalists to cut through political management to the truth.

Future of Political Journalism

Today's political journalism may be at a technological turning point similar to the one brought about with the rise of radio and television. Some scholars believe the mass media will give way to a more individualized medium in which citizens select their own news sources and stories as personal gatekeepers. Responsible interest groups and civic organizations are bypassing both mainstream media and ideologues in hopes of providing new and credible sources of political information on a global level.

If seeing is believing, visual information will increasingly become important. This is already happening in the form of short political and documentary videos appearing on the Web.

Clearly, the key to political journalism is quality governed by high standards and accessibility to both individuals and the collective. The credible political journalist of the future is likely to be a member of a specialized team conducting research and clearly organizing data relevant to voter choices.

Lisa Mills-Brown

See also Ad Watch, Horserace Coverage; Lippmann, Walter; Media Bias; News Selection Process; Pack Journalism; Public Journalism; Pundits, Punditry

Further Readings

Baldasty, G. C. (1984). The press and politics in the age of Jackson. Journalism & Communication Monographs, 89.

Bennett, L. W. (2004). Gatekeeping and press-government relations: A multigated model of news construction. In L. L. Kaid (Ed.), Handbook of political communication research (pp. 283–313). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

Cloud, B. L. (1980). A party press? Not just yet! Political publishing on the frontier. Journalism History, 7(2), 54–73.

Graber, D. (1976). Press and TV as opinion resources in presidential campaigns. Public Opinion Quarterly, 40, 285–303.

Graber, D. A. (1989). Mass media and American politics (3rd ed.). Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press.

Gulati, G. J., Just, M. R., & Crigler, A. N. (2004). News coverage of political campaigns. In L. L. Kaid (Ed.), Handbook of political communication research (pp. 237–256). Mahwah, NJ: Erlbaum.

Hofstadter, R. (1960). The age of reform. New York: Vintage.

Hofstetter, C. R., & Gianos, C. L. (1997). Political talk radio: Actions speak louder than words. Journal of Broadcasting & Electronic Media, 41, 501–515.

Page, B., & Shapiro, R. Y. (1992). The rational public: Fifty years of trends in Americans' policy preferences. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Patterson, T. E. (2000). Doing well and doing good: How soft news and critical journalism are shrinking the news audience and weakening democracy—and what news outlets can do about it. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, John F. Kennedy School of Government, Joan Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics and Public Policy.

Sloan, W. D. (1987). The party press and freedom of the press, 1798–1808. American Journalism, 4, 82–96.

Startt, J. D. (1993). The media in America: A history. Scottsdale, AZ: Horizons.

Steirer, W. F. (1976). A study in prudence: Philadelphia's "revolutionary" journalists. Journalism History, 3, 16–19.

Yepsen, D. (2005, Winter). Political journalism: It's not the good old days. Nieman Reports, 59(4), 110.

K

Kaid, Lynda Lee (1948–)

Lynda Lee Kaid is professor of telecommunication at the University of Florida. She received her PhD from Southern Illinois University, where she studied communication under one of the founders of the political communication discipline, Keith Sanders. She is perhaps best known for her contributions in political communication for advancing global empirical scholarship of political advertising. In 1981, she published a chapter on political advertising in the original Handbook of Political Communication (1981).

From 1974 to 2001 Kaid was on the faculty of the University of Oklahoma, where she founded and served as the director of the Political Communication Center and director of the Political Commercial Archive. Her work with the Political Commercial Archive was recognized in 1999 when it was named as an American "Treasure" by Save America's Treasures, sponsored by the White House Millennium Council and the National Historic Preservation Trust. In 2001, she joined the faculty of the College of Journalism and Communications at the University of Florida, where she has served as senior associate dean of Graduate Studies and Research.

She was recognized as one of the most productive scholars in communication in 2004 in Communication Quarterly. Kaid has published 27 books and more than 150 journal articles and book chapters. One of her greatest contributions to political communication social science research is the development of Videostyle (2001), a method for analyzing the verbal, nonverbal, and production content of political advertisements. Kaid's research on Videostyle has been adapted to the Internet in the development of Webstyle. An international scholar, Kaid has conducted cross-cultural research and has been particularly active investigating the role political advertising plays in emerging democracies. In 2004, she edited The Handbook of Political Communication Research, and she coedited with Christina Holtz-Bacha Political Advertising in Western Democracies and The SAGE Handbook of Political Advertising (2006). Kaid has been executive producer of several videos, such as Sights and Sounds of Oklahoma Politics, Ethics in Political Advertising: Uses and Abuses of Technology, and TechnoDistortions in Political Advertising, an interactive DVD.

Kaid is a three-time Fulbright Scholar. She has received more than $1.8 million in competitive grants and other funding to support her research and projects from sources including the National Science Foundation, the National Endowment for the Humanities, the Federal Election Assistance Commission, the Oklahoma Historical Society, the Council for European Studies at Columbia University, and the U.S. Federal Election Assistance Commission. In addition to active involvement in numerous organizations, she served as chair of the Political Communication Divisions of the International Communication Association and the National Communication Association.

Andrew Paul Williams

Further Readings

Kaid, L. L. (1981). Political advertising. In D. Nimmo & K. R. Sanders (Eds.), The handbook of political communication (pp. 249–271). Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Kaid, L. L. (Ed.). (2004). The handbook of political communication research. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.
Kaid, L. L., & Davidson, D. K. (1986). Elements of videostyle: A preliminary examination of candidate presentation through televised advertising. In L. L. Kaid, D. D. Nimmo, & K. R. Sanders (Eds.), New perspectives on political advertising (pp. 184–209). Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press.
Kaid, L. L., & Holtz-Bacha, C. (Eds.). (2006). The SAGE handbook of political advertising. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
Kaid, L. L., & Johnston, A. (2001). Videostyle in presidential campaigns: Style and content of televised political advertising. Westport, CT: Praeger/Greenwood.

KAPITAL, DAS

See MARX, KARL

KATZ, ELIHU (1926–)

Elihu Katz has significantly contributed to research examining the intersection of mass and interpersonal communication, uses and gratifications research, and media effects research. He received his PhD in 1956 from Columbia University, where he worked alongside his mentor, Paul Lazarsfeld, to write Personal Influence: The Part Played by People in the Flow of Mass Communications in 1955. This book has been widely cited as an influential work in the two-step flow model of communication, which suggests that information first flows from mass media channels to "opinion leaders," who then wield their interpersonal influence on less active members of the population. Additionally, this work was unanimously selected by the American Association for Public Opinion Research as one of the Fifty Books That Significantly Shaped Public Opinion Research, 1946–1995.

Katz next turned his attention to helping the government of Israel introduce broadcast television to the populace in the 1960s, authoring numerous reports about the newly introduced media and its effects on everyday Israeli life. In the 1970s, he worked with Manchester University in England to help introduce broadcast television to third world nations. In 1974, Katz and Blumler played a major role in the development of uses and gratifications research by publishing The Uses of Mass Communication: Current Perspectives on Gratifications Research. Within this compilation of works, Katz, Blumler, and Gurevitch present an oft-cited definition of uses and gratifications that underscores the importance of social and psychological needs and individual differences, which in turn determine media consumption and exposure. This influential work helped provide a new level of depth to uses and gratifications research, leading the way for numerous studies across a variety of communication media.

Stirred by Anwar al-Sadat's peace initiative in the late 1970s, Katz began to record and subsequently research the historic broadcasts involved in the development of the 1978 Camp David Accord and the 1979 peace treaty between Israel and Egypt. Katz has also extensively studied television and its impact on culture, namely public opinion and morale during the Six-day War as well as the cross-cultural meaning of the primetime drama series Dallas. Many of his works have also dealt with the work of theorists such as Gabriel Tarde and Marshall McLuhan.

In his career, Katz has served as Trustee Professor at the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Pennsylvania, emeritus professor of sociology and communication at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, distinguished visiting scholar at the University of Southern California, associate professor at the University of Chicago, visiting professor at Columbia University, and scientific director of the Guttman Institute of Applied Social Research. Moreover, he has been awarded honorary degrees from the Universities of Ghent, Montreal, Paris, and Haifa. Katz has also received many prestigious international awards, such as the UNESCO-Canada McLuhan Prize and the Burda Prize in Media.

John Spinda

See also Personal Influence; Two-Step Flow Model of Communication; Uses and Gratifications Approach

Further Readings

Elihu Katz faculty biography Web page: http://www.asc.upenn.edu/ascfaculty/facultyBioDetails.asp?txtUserID=ekatz
Katz, E., & Lazarsfeld, P. F. (1955). Personal influence: The part played by the people in the flow of mass communications. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.

Katz, E., & Lazarsfeld, P. F. (Eds.). (1974). The uses of mass communication. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Kekkonen, Urho (1900–1986)

Urho Kaleva Kekkonen was a Finnish statesman, prime minister, and long-term Finnish president (1956–1982). Together with his predecessor Juho Kusti Paasikivi, architect of the Finnish foreign policy during the Cold War, Kekkonen maintained a strong stance of neutrality for Finland which facilitated its trade and economic relations with other countries. In political communication, Kekkonen's name is combined with the concepts of détente (relaxation of tensions between East and West), Finlandization (in German Finnlandisierung, in Finnish suomettuminen), and self-censorship.

Kekkonen in his early years was a nationalist with an aim to unify the country. Having been left outside the government in the continuation war against Russia (1941–1944), Kekkonen repositioned himself into the Peace Opposition, craving disengagement from the war fought at the side of Germany. He gradually reformulated his political views toward a radical political realism that could be described as a "Small State Realpolitik." This was based on the insight that Finland as a small nation would have to cope with the Soviet Union, a superpower, as its immediate neighbor. The leading principle of the new policy was "Finnish neutrality," to remain outside conflicts of the great powers and develop economical relations with and secure the trust of the Soviet Union toward Finnish politics.

Kekkonen participated in the negotiations of the Treaty of Friendship, Co-operation and Mutual Assistance, formed with the Soviet Union in 1948. The treaty obligated Finland to resist armed attacks by Germany or any state allied with Germany, if necessary with the assistance of the Soviet Union. This led skeptics in the West as well as the Soviet leadership—from time to time—to question Finnish neutrality. The skepticism rose in the West after interference by the Soviet Union in Finnish government politics during the so-called Night Frost Government (1958–1959) and after the Note Crisis in 1961. The latter followed Soviet demands for negotiations on the basis of the Soviet-Finnish treaty at the time of the Berlin Crisis in 1961. These demands coincided with upcoming Finnish presidential elections. Kekkonen solved both crises to the satisfaction of the Soviet Union, the first by urging his own party to withdraw from the government, which fell as a consequence of the withdrawal; the second by convincing the Soviet leadership to abandon its request. As a consequence of these incidents, the power of Kekkonen in Finnish politics rose to almost monolithic proportions.

The dependence of Finnish security on peaceful development in the region brought Kekkonen to stress an active rather than passive form of neutrality. Under his rule, Finland was actively promoting a Nordic nuclear-free zone and hosted the European Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE). Both initiatives were part of a process to relax tensions between East and West (détente).

The Finnish heightened consideration of its eastern neighbor gave birth to the term Finlandization (Finnlandisierung). The term was coined by political scientists in Germany in the early 1960s as part of the debate on consequences of a reduced American military involvement in Europe. It gained attention in international politics when the influential Conservative politician in Germany, Franz Josef Strauss (leader of CSU—the Bavarian branch of the Christian Democrats—and minister in several federal governments), applied it as a critique of the Ostpolitik of Egon Bahr and Willy Brandt.

The term was also used internally in Finland, where it was linked to a debate by politicians on compliance with the Soviet Union and self-censorship in Finnish journalism. As part of the new realism in postwar Finnish politics, media were urged to play down critique that was considered to interfere with Soviet interests.

While media in general, and also the political system, by and large operated freely and according to Western standards, a certain lack of critical distance was rooted not only in relation to the Soviet Union but also with regard to President Kekkonen himself. Kekkonen had succeeded in making former opponents passive by balancing alleged pressure from the East against his own personal influence, which became to be perceived of as a precondition for the continuation of good relations between the two states. There remains, however, a general respect for the decisiveness and skill with which the Finnish political leadership guided the country out of the war without giving up its independent status as a sovereign and democratic nation.

Tom Moring

See also Helsinki Process

Further Readings

Kähönen, A. (2006). The Soviet Union, Finland and the Cold War: The Finnish card in the Soviet Foreign policy, 1956–1959. Helsinki: Suomalaisen Kirjallisuuden Seura.
Salminen, E. (1999). The silenced media: The propaganda war between Russia and the West in Northern Europe. Basingstoke, UK: Macmillan.

Kennedy, Edward (Ted) (1932–)

Edward (Ted) Kennedy has served in the U.S. Senate since 1962. He is the younger brother of John and Robert Kennedy and the foremost living member of the Kennedy family. Ted Kennedy, due to his steadfast advocacy of liberal politics, is considered a stalwart within the Democratic Party. Kennedy began public service by running in and winning a Senate seat from Massachusetts, even though he had never held public office prior to 1962.

Kennedy's tenure in the Senate has been tumultuous. On a personal level, he witnessed the assassinations of both brothers, John (1963) and Robert (1968). Further, he was involved in a plane crash in 1964 and was yanked from the debris by fellow Senator Birch Bayh (D-Ind.). On July 18, 1969, Kennedy attended a party held on Chappaquiddick Island in Massachusetts. After the party Kennedy drove away with Mary Jo Kopechne as a passenger in his car. During the trip away from the island, Kennedy made a wrong turn at Dyke Bridge and drove over its side. The car plunged into a channel called Poucha Pond and landed inverted, submerged in water. Kennedy was able to escape. Kopechne, unfortunately, drowned. The incident led to scandal, with claims that Kennedy had been drinking, left the scene of the accident, and failed to summon help immediately. Kennedy later pled guilty to leaving the scene of an accident and was sentenced to 2 months in prison, which was suspended.

The political firestorm that took place following the accident was intense. On July 25, 1969, Kennedy attempted to defuse the situation by addressing his constituents and describing the events that took place. The national broadcasting networks provided prime-time coverage of the event, and the speech was heard nationwide. The speech was intended to minimize Senator Kennedy's responsibility in the death of Ms. Kopechne as well as place Senator Kennedy's future in the hands of Massachusetts's voters. The speech probably assisted Kennedy in his quest to hold his Senate seat; however, the impact of the speech on the national stage was negligible and may have been detrimental. For example, Kennedy's attempt to gain the Democratic presidential nomination over Jimmy Carter was hindered by questions concerning Chappaquiddick, and the senator dropped out after winning 10 primaries. Carter, conversely, won 24 and was the Democratic nominee.

Since the failed presidential attempt, Kennedy has secured an influential role in congressional politics. He is the senior Democratic Party member on the Senate Judiciary Committee; the Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions Committee; the Immigration Subcommittee; and the Armed Services Committee. In April 2006 he was selected by Time as one of America's Ten Best Senators. His substantial legislative record impacts nearly every American.

Terry Robertson

Further Readings

Clymer, A. (1999). Edward M. Kennedy: A biography. New York: Morrow.
Ling, D. A. (1970). A pentadic analysis of Senator Edward Kennedy's address to the people of Massachusetts July 25, 1969. Central States Speech Journal, 21, 81–86.

Kennedy, Jacqueline

See Onassis, Jacqueline Kennedy

Kennedy, John F. (1917–1963)

John F. Kennedy was the first U.S. president born in the 20th century. He was also the first Catholic and the youngest man elected to that office. He assumed the presidency in 1961 and served until his assassination in Dallas, Texas, on November 22, 1963.

Kennedy viewed his speeches as an important element of his political style, and he was very involved in crafting the public address that would be part of his legacy. He would often edit a major address right up until delivery, and it was not uncommon for him to abandon a prepared text entirely and speak extemporaneously. The importance he placed on his speeches was based, in part, on his belief that an active president needed to provide the leadership necessary to overcome the natural inertia of a democracy and arouse the public to action.

John Kennedy was elected to Congress as a Democrat in 1946 and as the senator from Massachusetts in 1952. He assembled a talented staff that would serve throughout his career. Included among these was Theodore Sorensen, who joined in 1953. Sorensen would eventually become a special counsel to the president, but his primary responsibility was to craft Kennedy's speeches. Although he was not the only writer, he is the person most associated with Kennedy's public address. Sorensen wrote speeches for a listening audience, employing short clauses and short words. It was Sorenson who often provided the historical analogies, literary references, and quotations that became part of the Kennedy persona.

That persona first came to national attention when he delivered a speech for Adlai Stevenson at the 1956 Democratic Convention in Chicago. He so impressed the delegates that he was nominated to be Stevenson's running mate. He lost a close vote to Estes Kefauver and conceded graciously, but he resolved to make his own presidential run.

After securing the Democratic nomination in 1960, Kennedy faced Richard M. Nixon in the general election. This election marked the first time that the candidates of both major parties met in a series of televised debates. What was said in these debates was probably less important that the image of Kennedy debating the standing vice president. The debates helped Kennedy become a nationally recognized figure and to overcome the perception that he was too inexperienced to be president.

On September 12, 1960, Kennedy addressed the Greater Houston Ministerial Association about the "Catholic issue"—whether a Catholic could faithfully fulfill the office of the presidency. Kennedy had faced concerns about his religion during the primary campaign, but many on his staff viewed this issue as the major obstacle to his winning in November. This speech defused religious concerns by successfully reframing the issue away from religion and toward matters of tolerance. Kennedy campaigned on the "New Frontier" theme of getting the country moving again and won by only 113,000 votes out of a total of 64 million.

One of Kennedy's best-known speeches is his inaugural address. After many drafts, the final version was delivered on a bitterly cold January 20, 1961. The speech employed one-syllable words where possible and is probably best known for its memorable sentence, "Ask not what your country can do for you—ask what you can do for your country." The speech lasted 14 minutes.

Civil rights commanded a lot of public attention during Kennedy's term. As a candidate, he had pledged moral and political leadership on the issue. But during the first 2 years of his administration his rhetoric seemed to offer neither. He provided federal protection when lives were threatened in Montgomery, Alabama, during the Freedom Rides of 1961, and when a riot erupted during the 1962 attempt to desegregate the University of Mississippi. But his public statements stressed the necessity of following the law and lamented that these events caused international embarrassment.

But in 1963, after viewing the brutality visited against peaceful demonstrators in Birmingham, Alabama, and confronting continuing southern intransigence—such as Governor George Wallace's promise to personally block integration at the University of Alabama—Kennedy was finally moved to address the morality of civil rights. On June 11, 1963, the president delivered a partially extemporaneous speech that spoke of a moral crisis in America and promised to introduce comprehensive civil rights legislation. Months before his death, Kennedy finally delivered the moral and political leadership he had promised as a candidate.

Foreign policy was the primary focus of President Kennedy. His worldview and his rhetoric in this area were set against the backdrop of the Cold War. Kennedy was aware of the dangers in a nuclear age, and he tried to move beyond the Manichean perspectives that dominated the Eisenhower administration. But much of his foreign policy rhetoric during his first 2 years in office—especially concerning Berlin and Cuba—was marked by direct confrontation with the Soviet Union.

On July 25, 1961, Kennedy stated clearly that the United States would defend its access to West Berlin, located 110 miles inside communist East Germany. On October 22, 1962, Kennedy warned Americans about the threat posed by missiles the Soviet Union was secretly installing in Cuba. In both speeches, Kennedy clearly committed the country to the potential use of its military, and in each he called for Americans to support him in this struggle of freedom against tyranny.

The first crisis ended with the construction of the Berlin Wall, and the second with Soviet agreement to dismantle their missiles in Cuba. But coming so close to war made Kennedy realize that constant confrontation between nuclear powers could not continue. On June 10, 1963, he delivered the commencement address at American University and called for a reexamination of American attitudes toward the Soviet Union and a national commitment toward a practical and attainable peace.

Kennedy's public address during his brief time in office focused on what came to be seen as watersheds in the American experience, and it often demanded much of his audience.

George N. Dionisopoulos

See also Debates; Kennedy, Edward (Ted); Kennedy, Robert F.; Kennedy Assassination; Onassis, Jacqueline Kennedy

Further Readings

Berry, J. P. (1987). John F. Kennedy and the media: The first television president. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.

Goldzwig, S. R., & Dionisopoulos, G. N. (1995). "In a perilous hour": The public address of John F. Kennedy. Westport, CT: Greenwood.

Sorensen, T. E. (1965). Kennedy. New York: Harper & Row.

Kennedy, Robert F. (1925–1968)

Robert Francis Kennedy, son of Ambassador Joseph P. Kennedy and brother of President John Fitzgerald Kennedy and Senator Edward Moore Kennedy, graduated from Harvard in 1948 and earned a law degree from the University of Virginia in 1951. He began his legal career by serving as an attorney in the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice 1951–1952, leaving to manage John Kennedy's successful campaign for the Senate in 1952. He returned to public service as assistant counsel, Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations in 1953. He achieved public notice as chief counsel of the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor Management Field (1957–1960), investigating the Teamster Union and its president Jimmy Hoffa. He managed John Kennedy's presidential campaign in 1960 and was named by his brother to be attorney general. He coordinated the integration of the University of Alabama and played a major role in the Cuban missile crisis. After the assassination of his brother, he ran successfully for the Senate from New York in 1964.

In the Senate he served on the Labor and Public Welfare committee, where he championed the poor. He worked to establish the Bedford Stuyvesant Restoration Corporation to serve as a model for public-private cooperation to help the needy. He traveled to the Mississippi Delta to publicize the problem of hunger. He traveled to Eastern Europe and South Africa to speak for human rights.

The Vietnam War was a troublesome issue for Kennedy. President John Kennedy had supported it, and many of his advisors were still in positions of leadership in the conduct of the war. His opposition to the war developed slowly. In 1966 he urged that all parties in Vietnam, including the National Front for Liberation, participate in a political settlement. On March 2, 1967, he called for an end to the bombing of North Vietnam as a means to bring about a negotiated peace. His reluctance to challenge President Johnson in the New Hampshire presidential primary in 1968 left an opening for Eugene McCarthy to emerge as the champion of the antiwar forces in the Democratic Party. Amid much criticism, Kennedy announced that he would be a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination on March 16, 1968, setting off a furious campaign for delegates. While campaigning in Indiana on April 4, 1968, he learned of Martin Luther King's assassination. He went to a scheduled campaign rally that night in a predominately black neighborhood in downtown Indianapolis, where he spoke publicly for the first time of his brother's death as he asked the crowd to avoid violence and to return to their homes. After winning the Indiana primary and losing the Oregon primary, the race for the nomination came down to the California primary. Kennedy won California on June 5, 1968. In his moment of triumph, he was gunned down by Sirhan Sirhan.

Lloyd Rohler

Further Readings

Palermo, J. A. (2001). In his own right: The political odyssey of Senator Robert F. Kennedy. New York: Columbia University Press.

Kennedy Assassination

President John F. Kennedy (1917–1963) was shot and killed on November 22, 1963, in Dallas, Texas. Texas Governor John B. Connally, who was riding in the limousine with Kennedy, was also seriously wounded but survived. Kennedy had traveled to Dallas to resolve political infighting among the Democratic leadership in Texas and to raise funds and support for the 1964 election. Within hours of the assassination, Lee Harvey Oswald was arrested as a suspect in the murder of a Dallas police officer and the assassination of Kennedy, and Lyndon B. Johnson, Kennedy's vice president, was sworn in as president. Oswald was shot to death by Dallas nightclub owner Jack Ruby 2 days after the assassination. Television reporters who had traveled to Dallas to report on Kennedy's trip covered the assassination as breaking news. The assassination was the subject of two controversial federal investigations.

Events of the Assassination

On the morning of November 22, 1963, Kennedy spoke at a breakfast gathering in Ft. Worth and then boarded Air Force One with the rest of his party to fly to Dallas. Air Force One arrived at Love Field in Dallas at 11:40 a.m. CST, and 10 minutes later Kennedy's motorcade left on the way to the Dallas Business and Trade Mart, where Kennedy was to attend a luncheon.

As Kennedy's motorcade traveled through large crowds gathered on the streets of Dallas, it turned left in front of the Texas School Book Depository building to make its way to Dealey Plaza. At 12:30 p.m. CST, shortly after the motorcade made the turn, shots were fired. Kennedy was hit by two shots, Connally was hit by one shot, and a bystander was nicked on the right cheek by debris from a shot.

As the motorcade raced away from Dealey Plaza to Parkland Hospital, Marrion L. Baker, a Dallas patrolman ran to the School Book Depository because he believed the shots had come from the building. After gaining access to the building, Baker and Roy Truly, the building superintendent, began a floor-by-floor search. They found Oswald in the second-floor lunchroom at 12:35 p.m. CST. Truly identified Oswald as an employee, and the two moved on.

At 1:00 p.m. CST, Kennedy was officially declared dead at Parkland Hospital, and Connally was taken into surgery to treat his wounds. Out of concern for his security, Johnson left the hospital and traveled to Air Force One. Dallas police officer J. D. Tippet was shot shortly after 1:15 p.m. CST by a man witnesses identified as Oswald. Oswald was seen entering the Texas Theater at 1:40 p.m. CST, police were called, and Oswald was confronted and arrested at about 2:00 p.m. CST after drawing a pistol on officers. Oswald was taken to the Dallas jail and charged first with Tippit's murder and later with Kennedy's murder.

About the same time Oswald was being arrested, Kennedy's body was taken to Air Force One. Johnson was sworn in as president by Federal District Court Judge Sarah T. Hughes on board Air Force One before it left Dallas for Washington, D.C. Air Force One

November 25, 1963: The John F. Kennedy funeral procession to St. Matthew's Cathedral, including caisson and casket, standard-bearers, riderless horse ("Black Jack"), and mourners.

Source: Photograph by Abbie Rowe, National Park Service, in the John F. Kennedy Presidential Library and Museum, Boston.

arrived at Andrews Air Force Base about 6:00 p.m. EST. Kennedy's body was taken to Bethesda Naval Hospital for an autopsy.

On November 24, 1963, at 11:21 a.m. CST, as Oswald was being moved from the Dallas jail, he was shot and killed by Jack Ruby. Ruby was immediately arrested and charged with Oswald's murder.

Media Coverage

Hundreds of print, radio, and television journalists were in Dallas to cover what they thought would be a routine presidential trip. As the tragic events of the day began to unfold, radio and television reporters took the lead in reporting events as they occurred. ABC, NBC, and CBS interrupted their regular television programming with reports that shots had been fired at the president's motorcade within minutes after the event. About 2:38 p.m. EST, Walter Cronkite, CBS news anchor, read live on the air the Associated Press (AP) wire flash announcing that Kennedy had died.

The three television networks canceled their regular schedules and provided continuous coverage of the events for three days. This coverage included the live broadcast of Oswald's murder and Kennedy's funeral. Even with the significant amount of media coverage devoted to the assassination, several studies of how information about the assassination was diffused through the public demonstrated that most people first learned about the assassination from interpersonal communication and not radio or television.

Investigations

On November 29, 1963, President Johnson established a commission to investigate Kennedy's assassination. The commission is commonly referred to as the "Warren Commission," after its chair, Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, Earl Warren. The commission issued its final report on September 24, 1964, after hearing testimony from hundreds of witnesses, receiving reports of several federal agencies, and reviewing various photographs and films. One film reviewed by the commission, made by Abraham Zapruder and know as the "Zapruder Film," shows Kennedy grasping his throat in reacting to the first shot and the fatal head shot. The commission found that Oswald had acted alone in the assassination, firing three shots from the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository. According to the report, one shot struck Kennedy in the upper back, exited his throat, and then struck Connally. This became known as the "single-bullet theory." Another shot struck Kennedy in the head, and a third shot missed the motorcade. The commission also found that Ruby had acted alone in killing Oswald. The report was also critical of the security arrangements for Kennedy's trip and provided several recommendations for changes in Secret Service operations. The findings of the commission were met with widespread public skepticism, especially the finding that one bullet had struck both Kennedy and Connally.

In 1976 the U.S. House of Representatives established the Select Committee on Assassinations to investigate the assassinations of Kennedy and Martin Luther King, Jr. After reviewing the evidence used by the Warren Commission and additional information, the committee issued its final report in 1979. In relation to the Kennedy assassination, the committee found that Oswald had fired three shots at Kennedy. The second and third shots struck the president, and the third shot was fatal. The committee also determined that scientific acoustical evidence established a high probability that shots were fired at Kennedy by two gunmen and that a fourth shot was fired by a gunman on the grassy knoll in front of Kennedy. The committee also stated that it believed Kennedy's assassination was probably the result of a conspiracy, but the committee was unable to discover the other gunmen or the scope of the conspiracy. Like the Warren Commission, the House Select Committee was critical of the level of protection provided Kennedy and gave recommendations for changes in the process for protecting the president. The findings of the committee were more widely accepted than the Warren Commission because the committee acknowledged that the Kennedy assassination was probably the result of a conspiracy, a view long held by many researchers, private citizens, and members of the media.

Larry Jene King

See also Connally, John; Johnson, Lyndon B.; Kennedy, John F.; Media Events

Further Readings

Dayan, D., & Katz, E. (1992). Media events: The live broadcasting of history. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Greenberg, B. (1964). Diffusion of news about the Kennedy assassination. Public Opinion Quarterly, 28, 225–232.
Greenberg, B. (1964). Person to person communication in the diffusion of news events. Journalism Quarterly, 41, 489–494.
Greenberg, B. (1965). Diffusion of news about the Kennedy assassination. In B. Greenberg & E. Parker (Eds.), The Kennedy assassination and the American public: Social communication in crisis (pp. 89–98). Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
Hill, R., & Bonjean, C. (1964). News diffusion: A test of the regularity hypothesis. Journalism Quarterly, 41, 336–342.
Spitzer, B., & Spitzer, N. (1965). Diffusion of news of Kennedy and Oswald deaths. In B. Greenberg & E. Parker (Eds.), The Kennedy assassination and the American public: Social communication in crisis (pp. 99–111). Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
Zelizer, B. (1992). Covering the body: The Kennedy assassination, the media, and the shaping of collective memory. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Kenyatta, Jomo (1890–1978)

Jomo Kenyatta was the first president of the independent Republic of Kenya. He is considered to be among the great African freedom fighters and nationalists. Kenyatta was a Pan Africanist, a founding member—together with Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana, Dr. Namdi Azikiwe, Ho Davice QC of Nigeria, and Peter Abrahams of South Africa—of the Pan African movement.

He was born to a herdsman family at Ichaweri village in Kiambu District in Central Province near Nairobi in the 1890s. The exact date of his birth is unknown. Kenyatta had a shaky childhood, as his father died when he was still was young. However, he was salvaged by a church minister, one Musa Gitau at the Thogoto Church of Scotland Mission station, who persuaded him to go to school. After his elementary education, to avoid conscription into the Kings African rifles, he went to Narok, where he worked as a clerk in a ranch. It was in Narok that he acquired the nickname Kenyatta, after Kinyatta, the beaded Masai belt that he was fond of. He left Narok for Nairobi, where he took up a job as a court interpreter, later joining the Nairobi Municipal Council as a water meter reader.

Kenyatta left his employment to help found the Kikuyu Independent School Association, a counter to the Church of Scotland's refusal to admit circumcised girls into its schools. Kenyatta started his political activities first as a sympathizer of the East African Association in 1928 where he was made general secretary. He traveled to Moscow to attend Moscow University between 1932 and 1934. From Moscow he went to England, where he studied anthropology at London University from 1935 to 1938 and wrote his famous book Facing Mount Kenya.

On his return from England in 1964, Kenyatta took over the presidency of the Kenya African Union (KAU). He was arrested along with others on the accusation that he was supporting the Land liberation movement Mau Mau in October 1952, when a state of emergency was declared and tried at Kapenguria, finally sentenced to 7 years' imprisonment. He was released in 1961 and became the president of Kenya African National Union (KANU), a party that was to propel him to power first as prime minister on June 1, 1963, and subsequently as the first president of postcolonial Kenya on December 12, 1964.

Kenyatta was a very skilful orator, whose speeches captured the imagination of his listeners. Like most postcolonial African leaders, he created a sense of fear in the media practitioners without overtly confronting them. He eventually ruled the country for 15 years that were marked by political assassination, detention without trial, corruption and tribalism. To his credit, however, Kenyatta maintained a steady economic growth comparable to the growth rates in most Western industrialized countries. Unfortunately benefits were not equitably distributed. This saw the emergence of a wealthy black middle class and unfavorable ethnic imbalance in the wealth distribution. Kenyatta died peacefully in his sleep on August 22, 1978, in the coastal town of Mombasa.

Christopher Odhiambo

Further Readings

Moi, D. (1997). Which way Africa. Nairobi: Government Press.
Cuthbert, V. (1980). Jomo Kenyatta: Burning Spear. Essex: Longman.
Kariuki, J. (1996). Paranoia: Anatomy of dictatorship in Kenya. Journal of Contemporary African Studies, 14(1), 58–86.
Kenyatta, J. (1968). Suffering without bitterness: The founding of the Kenya nation. Nairobi: East African Publishing House.
Mbugua, N. (2006). Kibaki: The economist for Kenya. Nairobi: Sasa.

Morton, A. (1998). Moi: The making of an African statesman. London: Michael O'Mara.
Ndegwa, D. (2006). Walking in the struggle of Kenyatta. Nairobi: KLI.
Odinga, O. (1967). Not yet Uhuru. Nairobi: East African Educational Publishers.

KEPPLINGER, HANS MATHIAS (1943–)

Hans Mathias Kepplinger teaches political communication, journalism, and media effects at the University of Mainz. This author of 30 books and 250 articles is one of the most published communication scholars in Germany. His firm international orientation has taken him as a visiting scholar to University of California-Berkeley, University of Tunis, Southern Illinois University, Università della Svizzera Italiana, and Harvard University. He is coeditor of the International Encyclopedia of Communication and sits on the editorial boards of the Journal of Communication and the International Journal of Public Opinion Research.

Kepplinger gained his PhD in political science in 1970 and his postdoctoral lecturing qualification in communications in 1977. He was a Heisenberg scholarship holder of the German Science Foundation (1978–1982) and, after his appointment to the University of Mainz in 1982, served as director of the Institut fuer Publizistik and dean of the Faculty of Social Science. Besides his strong managerial and leadership capabilities, Kepplinger is a gifted teacher, demanding adviser, and a highly active scholar with a sense for innovative methodological approaches to a broad range of socially relevant research questions. He was the first in Germany to study systematically the influence of television presentational techniques and how the resulting impressions of nonverbal signals thus influenced the politician's public image. His early case studies on conscientious objection and the oil crisis were among the first quantitative analyses to conceptualize political communication as a complex process in which several protagonists act on various institutional levels and—because their actions are not isolated but interrelated—lead to dynamics that need to be studied with longitudinal designs.

Kepplinger's more recent studies in political communication focused on the question of whether long-term trends of negativism and symbolic politics that are characteristic of U.S. news coverage can also be observed in the German press. One follow-up study titled Farewell to the Rational Voter (2005) looked at the effects of TV upon the images of politicians and their impact upon voting behavior over a 5-year period and combines survey panel data with news content data. Another follow-up study identified prototypical mechanisms that steer the construction of mediated scandals in the political and environmental domain.

Among Kepplinger's most important contributions to journalism research have been his involvement in the first cross-national, strictly comparative survey of news journalists using equivalent samples from Germany and England and the conclusions he and Koecher (1990) drew for the concept of media professionalism. His arguably most influential contribution to the study of journalism is his theory of instrumental actualization. With this theory, Kepplinger investigated empirically how journalists' predispositions affect their judgment on the newsworthiness of a controversial story. In this quasi-experimental study, news items supporting the journalist's own opinion on the issue at hand were attributed a higher news value than those that ran counter to these opinions.

Frank Esser

Further Readings

Kepplinger, H. M. (1982). Visual biases in television campaign coverage. Communication Research, 9, 432–446.
Kepplinger, H. M. (1987). Media and conscientious objection in the Federal Republic of Germany. In D. Paletz (Ed.), Political communication research: Approaches, studies, assessments (pp. 109–128). Norwood, NJ: Ablex.
Kepplinger, H. M. (2002). Mediatization of politics. Journal of Communication, 52(4), 972–986.
Kepplinger, H. M. (2005). Die Mechanismen der Skandalisierung [Mechanisms of scandal]. München, Germany: Olzog.
Kepplinger, H. M., Brosius, H. B., & Staab, J. F. (1991). Instrumental actualization. European Journal of Communication, 6, 263–290.
Kepplinger, H. M., & Koecher, R. (1990). Professionalism in the media world? European Journal of Communication, 5, 285–311.
Kepplinger, H. M., & Maurer, M. (2005). Abschied vom rationalen Wähler [Farewell to the rational voter]. Freiburg, Germany: Alber.

Kepplinger, H. M., & Roth, H. (1979). Creating a crisis: German mass media and oil supply in 1973/74. Public Opinion Quarterly, 43, 285–296.

KERRY, JOHN (1943–)

John Forbes Kerry was born in Fitzsimmons Army Hospital in Colorado. The son of a foreign service officer, Kerry was raised Catholic and spent his childhood primarily on international soil. After graduating from Yale University, Kerry joined the U.S. Navy and did two tours of duty in Vietnam from 1966 to 1970. He received the Silver Star, Bronze Star, and three purple hearts. Upon his return from Vietnam, Kerry became actively involved in "Vietnam Veterans Against the War," and in 1971, he was the first Vietnam veteran to testify before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee about the atrocities of the war. In a 2-hour-long hearing, Kerry expressed resentment and consternation about war crimes he had witnessed that were perpetrated by U.S. servicemen sent to "die for the biggest nothing in history." Kerry posed the compelling question, "How do you ask a man to be the last man to die for a mistake?" The 27-year-old Kerry contended that the reason for the prolonged fighting in Vietnam and President Richard M. Nixon's recalcitrance in considering its end was strictly political. "Someone has to die so that Nixon won't be, and these are his words, 'the first President to lose a war.'" Not long after the hearing, in a dramatic demonstration, Kerry, along with 800 other veterans, publicly cast their metals and ribbons over a barrier to the front steps of the U.S. Capitol building.

These antiwar protests, in conjunction with the publication of his first book, The New Solider (1971), propelled Kerry's political career. Following his graduation from Boston College Law School, Kerry worked for the district attorney's office in Massachusetts, and in 1982 won the office of lieutenant governor of Massachusetts. Three years later, he was elected to the U.S. Senate, succeeding Paul Tsongas. Characterized as a left-of-center legislator, Kerry was reelected to the Senate in 1990, 1996, and 2002. In 2004, Kerry accepted the Democratic nomination for president.

Kerry focused his presidential campaign on a critique of the Bush administration's foreign policy, especially in relation to the war in Iraq, and this largely negative strategy seemed a reasonable basis for running against an apparently vulnerable incumbent. The campaign failed, however, and, as several commentators have observed, it offered a case study of what not to do in contemporary politics. Kerry proved unable to tell an appealing and coherent story about himself and his ideas, and he could not prevent the Republicans from seizing control of the campaign by defining the Democratic candidate as an irresolute "flip-flopper."

The foibles of Kerry's campaign surface most obviously in terms of general strategic issues such as timing, emphasis, and the use of media. But a careful reading of Kerry's speech texts reveals a less obtrusive but fundamental problem. Stanley Fish, writing during the course of the campaign, noted that Kerry's speeches violated basic rhetorical principles of composition and coherence and characterized his prose as confused, difficult to understand, and (in the words of one of Fish's students) "kind of skippy."

As an example of Kerry's rhetorical meandering, consider this excerpt from his most important speech on the war in Iraq (October 20, 2004):

> Global terrorism is increasing, not receding. Since 9/11, the number of significant attacks has jumped to the highest level in 20 years. The President took his eye off the terrorists. I will stop at nothing to kill the terrorists before they kill us and prevent others from taking their place. This requires America to be strong. It also requires America to be smart. My plan for winning the war on terrorism calls on the totality of America's strength—our military, intelligence, economic, and political power.

Parts of the book, like the passage above, proceed with little sense of logical or narrative coherence; the paragraphs are so random in their arrangement that they could be expressed in almost any order without making much difference in the meaning of the passage. Kerry is here addressing the central issue of his campaign and trying to establish the foundation of his attack against Bush. Yet, while he offers assertions and bits of evidence that provide the raw material for a cogent argument, he utterly fails to put them together into a coherent form.

Students of political communication might wonder whether these observations about the rhetorical microstructure of texts have relevance for the larger concerns that inform the study of campaigns. Fish indicates that there is a connection, and his comments deserve attention. "Words," he writes, > are not just the cosmetic clothing of some underlying integrity; they are the operational vehicles of that integrity, the visible manifestation of the character to which others respond. And if the words you use fall apart, ring hollow, trail off and sound as if they came from nowhere or anywhere . . . the suspicion will grow that what they lack is what you lack, and no one will follow you.

This judgment, derived through close inspection of Kerry's texts, suggest views about the man and his campaign that are strikingly similar to those of Mark Halperin, John Harris, and other students of the more general features of the 2004 presidential campaign. Perhaps, then, rhetorical disorders at the microlevel have some connection to strategic blunders at the macrolevel. And if this conjecture seems plausible, analysis of Kerry's campaign rhetoric might open renewed interest in the interaction between traditional rhetoric, grounded in textual analysis, and more recently developed modes of scholarship designed to encompass the complexity of extended, mass-mediated campaigns.

Michael Leff and Christopher J. Oldenburg

See also Rhetoric, Political

Further Readings

Fish, S. (2004, September 24). The candidate, seen from the classroom. New York Times, op-ed. Retrieved from http://www.physics.ohio-state.edu/~wilkins/writing/Assign/so/24fish.html

Halperin, M., & Harris, J. (2006). The way to win: Taking the White House in 2004. New York: Random House.

John Kerry official Web site: http://www.johnkerry.com.

Kerry, J. (2003). Call to service: My vision for a better America. New York: Viking Penguin.

Kerry, J., & Vietnam Veterans Against the War. (1971). The new soldier. New York: Macmillan.

Kranish, M., Mooney, B. C., & Easton, N. J. (2004). John F. Kerry: The complete biography by the Boston Globe reporters who know him best. New York: Public Affairs Reports.

Khrushchev, Nikita (1894–1971)

Nikita Khrushchev emerged as the primary leader of the Soviet Union from 1953 to 1964. Khrushchev's accomplishments and failures during his 11 years in power helped shape and define many of the major trends during the Cold War period (1946–1991).

Khrushchev was an important transitional leader. Today his policies are viewed as an important precursor to the large-scale reforms later attempted by Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev and Russian President Boris Yeltsin. He was instrumental in leading the Soviet Union away from the brutal repression of the Stalin era toward a more moderate form of communism. He was a leading proponent of peaceful coexistence with the West, and he attempted to grant a higher level of intellectual and artistic freedom to Soviet citizens. Khrushchev also tried to limit the arms race. He made large unilateral cuts in Soviet defense expenditures and took the first tentative step toward nuclear arms control by joining the nuclear test-ban treaty that stopped atmospheric testing of nuclear weapons. In contrast, his stationing of nuclear missiles in Cuba during the summer of 1962 led to the most severe crisis during the Cold War.

In early 1956, Khrushchev delivered his famous "secret speech" to the Twentieth Party Congress. In graphic detail, Khrushchev described Stalin's abuses of power and his massive disregard for human rights. This semipublic acknowledgment of Stalin's crimes undermined Soviet Cold War propaganda both in the world communist movement and among the Soviet elites. Khrushchev's "de-Stalinization" campaign contributed to the worsening of relations with communist China and revolts against the communist governments of Poland and Hungary.

Khrushchev's "style" as a leader stood in sharp contrast from most Soviet leaders. He was an impulsive extrovert. At dinners with foreign leaders Khrushchev was noted for his heavy drinking and gossiping about inner party politics. He was also known for his fits of rage before foreign audiences. On one occasion he pounded his shoe on a desk at the United Nations to express his displeasure. Conversely, he could also exude an earthy charm. During his visit to the United States in 1959, his populist, outgoing approach created a favorable impression. He spoke to the media with a sense of humor, without the use of notes or prepared texts.

Domestically, Khrushchev undertook a number of bold initiatives. In order to increase agricultural productivity, he inaugurated the "virgin lands" project in Central Asia, which was eventually curtailed due to large-scale soil erosion . He also encouraged the development of "state farms" (very large farms owned by the state, managed by paid officials, and worked by salaried workers) that proved infeasible. Khrushchev also initiated several administrative and bureaucratic reforms. However, these changes were strongly opposed by the party bureaucrats. Ultimately Khrushchev's style of rule and his mixed record resulted in his colleagues voting him out of office in 1964.

David K. Scott

See also Russia, Democratization and Media

Further Readings

Scott, D. K. (2003). The Eisenhower/Khrushchev rhetorical compact: Toward a model of cooperative public discourse. Southern Communication Journal, 68, 287–307.

Zubok, V., & Pleshakov, C. (1996). Inside the Kremlin's Cold War: From Stalin to Khrushchev. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Kibaki, Mwai (1931–)

The third president of postcolonial Kenya was born on November 15, 1931, in Gatuyani village, Othaya division, Nyeri, in Central Province. He was the last-born son in his family.

After completing his primary schooling, Kibaki proceeded to Mangu High School, where he was a student from 1947 to 1950. After high school, Kibaki proceeded to Makerere University in Uganda, where he majored in economics, history, and political science. While at the university he became the chairman of the Kenya Students Association and also vice chairman of the Makerere Students Guild. He graduated in 1955 with a first-class honors degree (BA) in economics and took up employment with Shell Company East Africa, Uganda Division, as assistant sales manager.

He left his employment to accept a scholarship to undertake studies at the London School of Economics. After graduation in 1958, he returned to Makerere, where he took a teaching position as an assistant lecturer in the Department of Economics.

His political journey began in 1960, when he quit his teaching position to take up a job back home in Kenya as an executive director with the Kenya African National Union (KANU). He was one of the founding members of the KANU Party, which eventually led Kenya into independence.

He made his first attempt in elective politics in 1963, contesting the Donholm constituency (which changed to Bahati and the Makadara) and won on a KANU ticket. He was appointed the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance from 1963 to 1965. He was made a minister of commerce and industry from 1965 to 1969. He was reelected member of Parliament (MP) for the same constituency on KANU ticket in 1969. He later became the Minister for Finance and Economic planning, serving from 1970 to 1978. He shifted his political base to his home village in Othaya after he nearly lost his Nairobi seat to Jael Mbogo in the 1974 elections. He has since been continuously reelected the MP for this constituency in subsequent elections.

When Arap Moi became president in 1978, he appointed Kibaki his first vice president, a position he held until 1983, when he was demoted to head the Ministry of Health.

As a politician, Kibaki always took a neutral position, resulting in the media christening him a "fence sitter." However, when Kenya became a multiparty state in 1991, Kibaki resigned from the government and the ruling party KANU and formed his own party—the Democratic Party (DP) of Kenya—which he used to run for presidency in 1992. He lost to Moi, coming in third after Kenneth Matiba. He contested the presidency again on DP ticket in 1997 and lost, coming second to Moi. In January 1998, his party DP became the official opposition party, and consequently Kibaki became the official opposition leader.

Realizing that he might never become a president through his own party, Kibaki formed an alliance with two other party chiefs: Christopher Kijana Wamalwa of Forum for Restoration of Democracy People (FORD People) and Charity Ngilu of the National Party of Kenya (NPK). They came up with a coalition party known as National Alliance of Kenya (NAK), which finally combined with a rebel group from KANU LDP to form the NARC (National Rainbow Coalition). This is the party that finally propelled Kibaki to country presidency in elections that were held on November 27, 2002. Kibaki was sworn in as the third president of Kenya on December 30, 2002, while using a wheel chair and wearing a neck brace, the result of a road accident during the electioneering period. Indeed Kibaki's campaign was quite interesting, as he was disposed most of the time, and one of Kenya's most indefatigable politicians, Raila Odinga, who had earlier endorsed him for presidency, campaigned for him nearly single-handedly.

Kibaki's presidency was heralded with much enthusiasm and optimism, but much of that has since waned off. Kibaki' s presidency is now marked with failed promises, increased corruption, tribalism, and general apathy. The only promise kept by Kibaki's government is the universal free primary education. Though the economy has shown signs of recovery, the benefits have not trickled down to the populace. Kibaki's leadership is accused of being elitist, taking care only of Kibaki's cronies from his alma mater, Makerere University, and his golf-playing friends.

Before the car accident and the rumors of a stroke that followed it, Kibaki was considered one of the most eloquent and articulate politicians in Kenya. However all this is now history. Kiabki has become incoherent in speech and more often than not lacks clarity of thought in his enunciations.

Christopher Odhiambo

Kids Voting USA

Many adolescents in the United States reside in apolitical cocoons in which friends and parents rarely talk about public affairs. Everyday life is structured by exposure to music, online chat, and television, but news media are shunned. Thus, the problem of youth civic disengagement represents in part the quandary of how to circulate political communication within families and peer networks.

Prior studies on adults have described "obstinate audiences" and "chronic know nothings," while less attention has been devoted to overcoming barriers in the diffusion of political stimulation among young citizens. However, the Kids Voting USA (KVUSA) curriculum has provided researchers with opportunities for exploring the interactions of schools, media, and families in the generation of political discussion.

KVUSA began as a pilot program in 1988 after three businessmen traveled to Costa Rica on a fishing trip and learned that voter turnout hovers around 90%. Voting is a family tradition in Costa Rica, as parents bring children to the polls. Curious as to whether family voting might lift turnout rates in the United States, the three men launched a pilot program in Tempe, Arizona. Kids Voting has since expanded to 29 states. In 2004, 1.5 million KVUSA students voted for president with ballots similar to those used by adults.

The nonprofit, nonpartisan organization comprises a national network of schools that enlist the help of election officials. K–12 teachers typically use lesson plans during the final weeks leading up to Election Day, with the goal of providing authentic activities that involve children in participatory citizenship. Along with voting, students develop media literacy from exercises such as decoding campaign advertisements. Students monitor the flow of news as they anticipate classroom debates, and they ensnare parents in a family voting guide.

The architecture of KVUSA is remarkable—from the perspective of political socialization theory—because it integrates so many agents of civic development: schools, peer groups, families, media, and elections. Such synergy generates counterintuitive outcomes, such as "trickle-up influence" in which children initiate political conversations with parents. This dynamic is most consequential in low-income families, where parents were often never socialized themselves to politics as youth. Spurred on by KVUSA, children provide parents with a second chance at citizenship.

Many parents respond defensively to their newly politicized children. Nonetheless, empirical studies have shown that the provocations of opinionated offspring motivate adults to take civic parenting more seriously. A boomerang effect occurs as parents encourage children to pay more attention to news, to acquire political knowledge, and to express opinions during classroom discussions.

The innovations of KVUSA are significant beyond theory. Since the 1960s, evaluations of civic curricula in the United States have generally concluded that schools are inconsequential in political socialization. Kids Voting illustrates that schools and families are potentially bridged through student-initiated discussion, with outcomes that benefit both children and parents.

Michael McDevitt

See also Political Engagement; Political Socialization; Rock the Vote; Youth Voting

Further Readings

Center for Information & Research on Civic Learning & Engagement. (2003). The civic mission of schools. New York: CIRCLE and Carnegie Corporation.

McDevitt, M. (2006). The partisan child: Developmental provocation as a model of political socialization. International Journal of Public Opinion Research, 18, 67–88.

McLeod, J. (2000). Media and civic socialization of youth. Journal of Adolescent Health, 27, 45–51.
Niemi, R. G., & Junn, J. (1998). Civics education: What makes students learn. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968)

Although controversial to this day, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., has become the quintessential icon of the American civil rights movement. King was born in Atlanta, Georgia, to Michael King, Sr. (who later changed his name and his son's to Martin Luther King) and Alberta Williams King. His father and maternal grandfather (Rev. A. D. Williams) both pastored the Ebenezer Baptist Church and held leadership roles in the local National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) chapter. At 15, King enrolled in Atlanta's Morehouse College, where he was described as "an ordinary student" but displayed the extraordinary oratorical talent that would be a hallmark of his career. King went on to graduate work at Pennsylvania's Crozer Theological Seminary, and earned a PhD in systematic theology from Boston University in 1955. His graduate work exposed him to the ideas of luminaries such as Gandhi, Thoreau, Tillich, and Niebuhr, all of whom played important roles in his subsequent career.

Shortly after his marriage to Coretta Scott, King became pastor of the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama, in 1954. The following year he became an influential leader of the Montgomery bus boycott initiated by Rosa Parks's famous refusal to give up her seat on a public bus to a white passenger. After hearing King speak at the first meeting of the Montgomery Improvement Association (formed to coordinate the boycott), Parks opined that "we had found our Moses. . . ." The Montgomery boycott was a major turning point in the civil rights movement, leading to the Supreme Court's 1956 desegregation ruling. King continued his tireless work for civil rights throughout the 1950s and 1960s. As the first president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, he helped organize the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom in August 1963, at which he displayed his considerable rhetorical acumen by presenting his "I Have a Dream" speech. Citing the Declaration of Independence, King argued that the nation had "defaulted" on its declaration of universal equality "insofar as her citizens of color are concerned." These powerful words were made more so by the stirring preacher-like musical rhythms of his deep baritone voice, particularly in repeated poetic refrains such as "Let freedom ring . . ." and "I have a dream. . . ."

Aside from themes of civil disobedience and nonviolence (which often put him at odds with more militant civil rights leaders), King's rhetoric was also heavily infused with biblical rhetorical motifs, such as the Exodus narrative. This influence is seen most clearly in his "I've Been to the Mountaintop" oration delivered on the eve of his assassination in Memphis on April 4, 1968. In this address, King promised that the tedious and dangerous work of the movement would not be in vain because "we, as a people, will get to the Promised Land." The prophetic declarations contained throughout King's speeches and writings not only encouraged his followers, but forced the extant political establishment to confront the inevitability of African American equality—a goal toward which our society continues to strive.

David C. Bailey

See also Civil Rights Movement

Further Readings

Carson, C., & Shepard, K. (Eds.). (2001). A call to conscience: The landmark speeches of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. New York: Warner Books.
Rosteck, T. (1992). Narrative in Martin Luther King's "I've been to the mountaintop." Southern Communication Journal, 58, 22–32.

King Assassination

See King, Martin Luther, Jr.

Klapper, Joseph (1917–1984)

Joseph T. Klapper is widely known for his influential work in media effects as well as his long career in private broadcasting with CBS. After returning from World War II, Klapper was a doctoral candidate in English at Columbia University when he met and interacted with Paul Lazarsfeld. Lazarsfeld convinced him to switch his major. He is best known for his prominent work in "minimal" or "limited" media effects or "functional analyses," emphasized by his 1960 book The Effects of Mass Communication, in which he outlined his "phenomenistic approach" as "a shift away from the tendency to regard mass communication as a necessary and sufficient cause of audience effects, toward a view of the media as influences, working amid other influences, in a total situation." Overall, this book provides insight how media effects studies turned from media centered in the 1930s, 1940s, and 1950s to the more modern motive- and audience-driven approaches that have become vital to modern communication research. This work was unanimously selected by the American Association for Public Opinion Research as one of the Fifty Books That Significantly Shaped Public Opinion Research, 1946–1995.

After receiving his PhD in sociology at Columbia University, Klapper served as a professor at the University of Washington and at Stanford University. Next, he moved onto the U.S. Information Agency (USIA), where he conducted research on the Voice of America broadcast channel. Afterward, he spent four years as a research director for General Electric (GE). In 1962, Klapper began his tenure as the director of Social Research for the Columbia Broadcasting System (CBS); a position he held until his passing.

In addition to his position at CBS, Klapper remained active in government research, serving on President Lyndon B. Johnson's Commission on Obscenity and Pornography. Additionally, he assisted the U.S. Surgeon General's Scientific Advisory Committee on Television and Society and was on the board of advisors for the Federal Role of Funding Children's Television Programming. Also, he served as president of the American Association of Public Opinion Research (AAPOR) from 1962 to 1963.

During his presidential address at the 1963 AAPOR conference, Klapper coined the title "uses and gratifications" in an attempt to separate traditional "functional analysis" from the uses and gratifications approach by stating "the list of uses to which people put mass communication, and the gratifications they derive from it, do not of course constitute themselves as full 'functional analyses.' . . . They are rather first steps in such analyses." This assertion helped to inspire future scholars to discover additional variables (i.e., psychological variables, audience motives) in media effects research, eventually forming the modern uses and gratifications approach, which examines the "total situation" that exists in mass communication.

John Spinda

See also Effects of Mass Communication, The; Limited Effects Theory; Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory; Uses and Gratifications Approach

Further Readings

Klapper, J. T. (1960). The effects of mass communication. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.

Klapper, J. T. (1963). Mass communications research: An old road resurveyed. Public Opinion Quarterly, 27, 515–527.

Maisel, R., & Cisin, I. H. (1984). In memoriam: Joseph T. Klapper, 1917–1984. Public Opinion Quarterly, 48, 658–659.

Knowledge Gap

The knowledge gap perspective was and still is a fruitful extension of the classic diffusion of information paradigm insofar as it poses the question of (un)equal distribution of communication and knowledge in democratic societies as a prerequisite of decision making by analyzing the complex (dys)functions of classic and modern media, like the Internet, in this process.

Evidence of learning processes and knowledge gain from news media use is found repeatedly in a vast number of survey studies. As a consequence, modern media effects research no longer considers the most important media function the influence on opinions and attitudes but, instead, the transfer of information and knowledge acquisition by media users. But empirical studies of public affairs media coverage, political debates, or elections demonstrate regularly that citizens remain remarkably uninformed. Nevertheless, many voters feel sufficiently informed to make voting decisions. This low level of knowledge seems to have remained stable despite the general increase in education that took place in the past decades in the United States as well as in most European countries, together with an explosion of mediated political communication and promising new media like the Internet. This pronounced discrepancy between intensive media use and relatively low or even no knowledge gain can be observed especially in the case of television.

Basic Hypothesis and Explanations

This unsatisfying situation concerning the widely assumed positive information functions of media, on the one hand, and generally only modest levels of knowledge acquisition, on the other hand, resulted in the formulation of the "knowledge gap hypothesis" in 1970. Phillip Tichenor, George Donohue, and Clarice Olien proposed in their initial journal article, "Mass Media Flow and Differential Growth in Knowledge," that dysfunctional media effects, insofar as the better-educated and higher-status segments of society tend to acquire public affairs information and science matters through the mass media at a faster rate than the lesser-educated and lower-status segments, are a consequence of the initial gap in knowledge between different social segments. The gap tends to increase rather than decrease if media coverage of a topic is intensifying.

The authors explain this phenomenon by referring to five underlying processes but not by formulating a systematic theory:

1. Communication skills: Formal education fosters reading and understanding abilities in a general way as a basis for efficient learning processes.
2. Prior knowledge encourages attention for and facilitates acquisition of new information.
3. Persons with higher education have more relevant social contacts as sources for interpersonal communication.
4. Education correlates with active information exposure, acceptance, and remembering of new information.
5. Media system: Information about public affairs or scientific progress are transmitted mostly by print media that are directed to the interests of and used more by the better-educated segments of the population.

Each of these factors, namely disparities in media access, unequal information exposure, or differences in perceived information utility, on the one hand, and amount and complexity or relevance of information or involved conflict, on the other, can contribute to increasing and narrowing knowledge gaps.

In the past 35 years, the knowledge gap perspective became one of the most cited and used approaches of the new cognitive media effects tradition since the 1970, beside other prominent theories like uses and gratifications, agenda setting, cultivation or framing research. This is certainly because knowledge gap perspective treats long-term media effects, links them to the macro level of society, and points to normative political implications like equal opportunities. Several hundred empirical studies have been realized so far, a number of theoretical refinements and differentiations on the micro as well on the macro level have been formulated

Theoretical Criticism and Further Developments

Initially, the knowledge gap hypothesis was formulated as a deficit perspective, deriving from lack of knowledge and motivation. Others have suggested that it is not education or motivation that underlies knowledge gaps, but the problem is to better understand how motivation and education jointly affect knowledge acquisition; this later led to the formulation of a so-called contingency model. A further development in regard to the communication process is the differentiation between gaps in access, use and reception. So, knowledge gaps can be the result of nonexposure to presidential debates and/or unequal learning processes. Besides these differentiations on the micro level, more sociologically oriented researchers formulated specifications on the macro level: amount of conflict, size, or pluralism of social systems are analyzed as mediating factors in the process of developing knowledge gaps.

Empirical Research

Knowledge gap phenomena were empirically studied in various fields, such as public affairs events or science reporting, presidential debates, elections, public information campaigns, developmental communication, or the diffusion of new media like the Internet. The latter issue was controversially debated in the public sphere under the catchword digital divide It is still not clear whether unequal access to the Internet because of education, income, or gender will diminish in the future as consequence of a so-called trickle-down effect or if disparities at least in use and effects will persist.

The research evidence based on one-point-in-time surveys consistently demonstrates gaps in knowledge between different educational segments; but the results of the longitudinal research, based on panel studies or several surveys in time, is more mixed. Contrary to the original hypothesis of increasing knowledge gaps, there are diminishing or even closing gaps as well, especially under conditions of heavy social conflict or in situations of well-conceptualized and targeted public communication campaigns with information relevant to motivated although underprivileged citizens. Here, one especially studied phenomenon is that of the so-called ceiling effects. Information distributed by health campaigns can be tailored to the low-informed, disadvantaged segments, so that the already informed privileged people can't further increase their knowledge lead since the campaign messages are redundant for them. There are also ceiling effects when knowledge cannot be increased, as in the case of agenda knowledge. In such a situation, that is, of knowing that there will be an election or a referendum, knowledge gaps will close as a result of catching up by the not yet aware or sensitive segments of the population, such as in the case of AIDS after the heavy media coverage of the Magic Johnson case.

Heinz Bonfadelli

Further Readings

Bonfadelli, H. (1994). Die Wissenskluft-Perspektive: Massenmedien und gesellschaftliche Information [The knowledge-gap perspective: Mass media and societal information processing]. In W. Hömberg, H. Pürer, & U. Saxer (Eds.), Forschungsfeld Kommunikation [Communication as a research field] (Vol. 5, pp. 85–98). Konstanz: Ölschläger.

Gaziano, C. (1983). The knowledge gap: An analytical review of media effects. Communication Research, 10(4), 447–486.

Gaziano, C. (1997). Forecast 2000: Widening knowledge gaps. Journalism and Mass Communication Quarterly, 74(2), 237–264.

Kwak, N. (1999). Revisiting the knowledge gap hypothesis: Education, motivation, and media use. Communication Research, 26, 385–413.

Tichenor, P., Donohue, G., & Olien, C. (1970). Mass media flow and differential growth in knowledge. Public Opinion Quarterly, 34(2), 159–170.

Viswanath, K. (1993). Motivation and the knowledge gap: Effects of a campaign to reduce diet-related cancer risk. Communication Research, 20(4), 546–563.

Kohl, Helmut (1930–)

Helmut Kohl, born in 1930, was German chancellor from 1982 to 1998. In the course of his political career, he has also held the post of prime minister of the state of Rhineland-Palatinate from 1969 to 1976 and was chairman of the Christian Democratic Party from 1973 to 1998. Kohl is especially known as the chancellor of German reunification.

At the beginning of his career at the Federal State level, Kohl had positive media responses most of the time, especially in the regional media, and he was regarded as the upcoming man of the Christian Democratic Union. His relationship to the media changed for the worse, however, when he became a chairman of his party's program commission in 1970; it deteriorated even further when he took over the role of opposition leader in the national parliament in 1976. Since these days, Kohl has often been the subject of satire and caricature. Journalists named him "The Pear" because they found his figure was somewhat pear shaped. Moreover, the media took to calling his wife "The Barbie of Palatinate," thereby alluding to her blond hair and immaculate outward appearance. Furthermore, content analyses of his TV appearances during national election campaigns showed that he was frequently filmed from unfavorable camera angles, and TV stations presented negative crowd reactions in combination with his person more often than was the case with his competitors. These are only a few examples to illustrate that Kohl had to counter his negative media image much more than any other chancellor. This might be a reason why only a handful of journalists belonged to his inner circle, not a few of them foreign journalists. Kohl systematically ignored some parts of the German media for years, especially the weekly magazine Spiegel.

Considering that his relationship to the media had already been difficult for years, it became even worse when Kohl was suspected of having received donations for his party without identifying them in the party's statement of accounts in 1999. Although he admitted to having received money in a TV interview, he was not willing to give away the names of he donators. Some facts gave rise to the suspicion that the donations had been bribe money. Kohl reacted to these reproaches by accusing the media of having started a campaign against him that was meant to destroy his reputation and lifetime achievements. He even went so far as to call the reporting on his case a violation against the national broadcasting treaty that regulates public service broadcasting in Germany. In addition, he publicly speculated about secret connections between the office of the district attorney on one side and the daily newspaper Süddeutsche Zeitung and the news magazine Spiegel on the other side.

Mona Krewel

Further Readings

Wiedemeyer, W. (1990). Kohl und die Medien [Kohl and the media]. In R. Appel (Ed.), Helmut Kohl im Spiegel seiner Macht [Helmut Kohl in the mirror of his power] (pp. 271–283). Bonn: Bouvier Verlag.

Kraus, Sidney (1927–)

Sidney Kraus was among the first observers of political communication to perceive and bring attention to the important function served in election campaigns by televised political debates. He was also among the first to begin challenging the limited effects model of media effects, particularly with regard to television, which had long dominated the field. He began his education at the School of the Art Institute of Chicago where he received his BFA (1953) and MFA (1954). In 1959 he earned his PhD from the University of Iowa (Radio and Television). During his academic career, he has taught at Indiana University, the University of Massachusetts, and Cleveland State University, where he served as chair of the department of communication and is now a professor emeritus. In addition to teaching, he has also served as a consultant in communications and campaign advisor to various political candidates and as a political analyst for television news.

In The Great Debates (1962), Kraus brings together for the first time a remarkable collection of interdisciplinary studies that includes a variety of historical, descriptive, critical, and experimental research about a single communication event. This volume opened the door for similar investigations of significant critical events. In 1993, two of his books, The Great Debates: Background, Perspective, Effects (1962) and Televised Presidential Debates and Public Policy (2nd ed., 2000), were selected by the Freedom Forum Media Studies Center at Columbia University as among the 25 most important books on media and politics. Kraus is best known for the work he has done on televised presidential debates, beginning with those in 1960 between John F. Kennedy and Richard M. Nixon. In 1964, The Great Debates was chosen for inclusion in the White House Library, one of only four books selected in the area of broadcasting. During the presidential campaigns of 1976, 1980, 1984, 1988, and 1996, he was invited to attend the presidential and vice presidential debates, giving him the unique opportunity to study the debates as a participant observer.

In Televised Presidential Debates and Public Policy, Kraus reviews what has been learned about televised presidential debates, their impact on the course of the election, and utilizes that knowledge to address the question of whether or not presidential debates should be mandated by legislation. He concludes that, based on the evidence, voters want presidential debates in national elections and gain significant information from the debates. Therefore, to receive federal funding, candidates should be compelled to participate in televised presidential debates. He further suggests that Congress establish a commission regarding eligibility of candidate participation and establish fair criteria for participation.

Cynthia Roper

See also Debates; Great Debates, The

Further Readings

Kraus, S. (Ed.). (1962). The great debates: Background, perspectives, effects. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
Kraus, S. (Ed.). (1962). The great debates: Kennedy vs. Nixon, 1960. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
Kraus, S. (2000). Televised presidential debates and public policy (2nd ed.). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.
Kraus, S., & Davis, D. (1976). The effects of mass communication on political behavior. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.

Kreisky, Bruno (1970–1983)

Bruno Kreisky, Austrian chancellor, Social Democratic Party (Sozialdemokratische Partei Österreichs, SPÖ) was elected chairman of the SPÖE in 1967. In the 1970 elections the Socialists defeated the Peoples Party (Österreichische Volkspartei/ÖVP; the party had ruled with an absolute majority since 1966) but missed the absolute majority of seats. After failing to achieve an agreement with the ÖVP, Kreisky became chancellor of a minority cabinet, which was tolerated by the Freedom Party (Freiheitliche Partei Österreichs/FPÖ). In return Kreisky decided (among other things) a change in electoral law to benefit small parties. In October 1971 he called elections by open ballot with the FPÖ, and the Social Democrats won an absolute majority. In the 1975 and 1979 elections he managed to secure his absolute power in the Austrian Parliament. In 1983 the Socialists lost their absolute majority and were forced into a coalition once again. Kreisky resigned, nominating Fred Sinowatz as his successor.

With the defeat of Bruno Kreisky, an era in the SPÖ came to its end. Many of his supporters see the last socialist of the old school in Kreisky and look back nostalgically at an era of policy of full employment, while the welfare state was in full swing. Political rivals, however, criticize Kreisky's policy of deficit spending and hold him responsible for Austria's subsequent economic difficulties. Nowadays the Kreisky era is often described retrospectively as an era of welfare, prosperity, and progress.

Kreisky played a prominent role in international affairs, promoting the North-South dialogue as well as supporting the European integration. He presented neutral Austria as a bridge between East and West. He tried to use his position as a European Jewish Socialist to act as a mediator between Israel and the Arabs (even meeting with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat). Kreisky had a deep conflict with prominent Austrian Jew Simon Wiesenthal, especially in terms of the handling of the Austrian Nazi past.

Kreisky was a skilled orator and media performer. He earned the nickname "Media Chancellor" for his alleged understanding of and new way to use the mass media, especially television. Legendary are his appearances in pre-election debates on TV, matching and beating his opponent Taus (ÖVP). Highly intellectual as well as quick at repartee, he had a unique comprehension for this new medium to communicate his politics.

He is also known for his well-placed quotes about the media, like "Lernens a bissl Geschichte, Herr Reporter" ("Go and learn some history, Mister") or the statement "ein paar Milliarden Schulden mehr bereiten mir weniger schlaflose Naechte als ein paar hundert Arbeitslose" ("I prefer a few billion more debts over a few hundred unemployed people").

After leaving office, Kreisky had serious health problems and died in Vienna in July 1990.

Peter Filzmaier, Flooh Perlot, and Maria Beyrl

Further Readings

Fischer, H. (1994). Die Kreisky Jahre 1967–1983 [The Kreisky years 1967–1983]. Wien: Loecker.

Kriechbaumer, R. (2004). Die Ära Kreisky. Österreich 1970–1983 in der historischen Analyse, im Urteil der politischen Kontrahenten und in Karikaturen von Ironimus [The Kreisky era: Austria 1970–1983 in historical analysis, judgment of the political contractors and the caricatures of Ironimus]. Wien: Boehlau.

Kwaśniewski, Aleksander (1954–)

Aleksander Kwaśniewski served as the president of Poland from 1995 to 2005. During the communist era, he was active in the communist Socialist Union of Polish Students. He was a former leader of the left-wing Social Democracy of the Republic of Poland, successor to the former ruling Polish United Workers Party, and later of the Democratic Left Alliance.

When communism finally declined in Poland, Kwaśniewski participated in the Roundtable negotiations, where he cochaired the task group for trade union pluralism. Running for the Sejm from the Warsaw constituency in 1991, Kwaśniewski won the largest number of votes and headed the parliamentary caucus of the Democratic Left Alliance in his first and second terms. He was a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee and chairman of the Constitutional Committee of the National Assembly.

In 1995, Kwaśniewski won the presidential elections, collecting 51.7% of the votes in the runoff, compared to 48.3% for the incumbent, Lech Wałęsa, the former Solidarity leader. Kwaśniewski's campaign slogans were "Let's choose the future" and "A Poland for all." In 2000 he was reelected in the first round of voting; his election campaign slogan was "A home for all—Poland."

Following the September 11, 2001, attacks on the United States, Kwaśniewski organized an international conference in Warsaw, with participation of leaders from Central, Eastern, and Southeastern Europe to strengthen regional activities in fighting international terrorism. Under Kwaśniewski's leadership, Poland became a strong ally of the United States in the war on terror and contributed troops to the Iraq war, a move that was highly controversial in Poland and Europe.

Kwaśniewski took an active part in the efforts to secure Polish membership in NATO and was engaged in promoting further enlargement of NATO and the European Union.

Polish membership of the European Union became a reality on May 1, 2004, during Kwaśniewski's second term. He strongly supported putting Christian roots into the European Constitution and became one of the strongest advocates of Lithuanian and Ukrainian membership in NATO and the European Union. He also played a major role in peaceful solution of political conflict in Ukraine—the Orange Revolution.

Despite the deep polarization brought about by his election, and opposition fears that a Kwaśniewski presidency would signal a return to communism, these fears proved groundless, and he proved a surprisingly popular leader. His political course resembled that of Wałęsa's in several key respects, such as the pursuit of closer ties to the Western European political and military organizations and the transition to a market economy. He was able to avoid the conflicts with the Sejm and wanted to be seen as "the president of all Poles," including his political opponents.

Andrzej Falkowski

See also Poland, Democratization; Wałęsa, Lech

Further Readings

Kwaśniewski, A. (1999). Poland—significant factor in regional stability. NATO's Nations and Partners for Peace [journal].

Kwaśniewski, A. (2001). Our home—Poland. Warszawa: Perspektywy Press.

Labour Party, Britain

In terms of its use of communication, the Labour Party's evolution can be traced through three stages of propaganda, media, and marketing campaigning. The initial phase involved experimentation with advertising, public relations, and market research techniques. Strategist Sidney Webb's devising of "stratified electioneering" in 1922 was an early attempt to segment and target voters, and this and other methods helped Labour bypass a hostile print media and limited radio service. This experimentation culminated with London party leader Herbert Morrison's successful reelection in a 1937 local campaign devised by marketing experts and focused on persuading less committed supporters. Those involved were influenced by Graham Wallas's contention that mass democracy meant politics would be increasingly about imagery and symbolism. This conflicted with party traditionalists' belief in "making" (rather than "selling") socialism through interpersonal, didactic methods. Their "educationalist" approach dominated Labour's approach to communication until the 1960s, when Harold Wilson became party leader and the first prime minister to really exploit the growing medium of television.

Whereas previously the aim had been to maximize exposure, Labour's embrace of mediated political communication led to greater refinement of its message. During the run-up to the 1964 general election, strategists called for a "permanent campaign" to appeal to an increasingly affluent, "aspirational" electorate. An image-conscious Wilson perfected the sound bite, evoked a "New Britain," was compared to John F. Kennedy, and supervised the integration of opinion research, advertising, and public relations techniques and expertise into a campaign that ended with the Labour Party regaining office after 13 years in opposition. Marketing experts played a role in every subsequent election, although they became increasingly marginal prior to the arrival of Neil Kinnock as leader of the Labour Party in 1983 following Labour's traumatic defeat that year. Kinnock oversaw the most thorough reorganization of the party's communications in its history and underlined his commitment to professional methods by streamlining headquarters, recruiting the Shadow Communications Agency of marketing experts, and countenancing the employment of American campaign consultants. Although the subsequent 1987 campaign ended in further defeat to Margaret Thatcher, the new leader and his communications director Peter Mandelson (who was, incidentally, early campaign pioneer Herbert Morrison's grandson) were credited with having rejuvenated Labour's fortunes. The party subsequently embarked on a comprehensive Policy Review driven by opinion polling and focus group evidence provided by advisors, including the influential chief strategist Philip Gould. The review saw Labour embrace a marketing-driven electoral approach, in that opinion research now began to inform policies as well as their presentation. The consequences of this have been widespread and have included the abandonment of several long-standing commitments, together with the party's federal system of internal democracy, resulting in the centralization of power in the leader and his unelected advisers. This marketing-driven settlement did not prevent Labour losing again in 1992, but its ultimate legacy was to help create the circumstances that enabled the charismatic Tony Blair to win the party leadership.

Dominic Wring

See also Blair, Tony

Further Readings

Wring, D. (2005). The politics of marketing the Labour Party. Hampshire, UK: Palgrave Macmillan.

LaDuke, Winona

See Nader, Ralph

Lamb, Brian

See C-SPAN Network

Lang, Gladys Engel (1919–)

Gladys Engel Lang is a sociologist trained at the University of Chicago. A researcher for the Offices of War Information (OWI) and Strategic Services (OSS), her contributions to political communication revolve around media effects on public perceptions and collective behavior. Lang's research in this area of scholarship began with her doctoral dissertation on television coverage of the 1952 Democratic and Republican conventions. Her study, parts of which were published in Public Opinion Quarterly (1955) and as a chapter in Politics & Television (a book cowritten with husband Kurt Lang, 1968), illustrated how televised commentary can define ambiguous events and create and emphasize action where none would exist otherwise.

Lang's focus on media effects, particularly those of television, is reflected in studies of presidential debates, Watergate, candidates' television images, and how polls influence public opinion and political behavior. In Voting and Nonvoting (1968), the Langs demonstrated how vote turnout and vote choice can be shaped by networks declaring a winner. Specifically, they showed how election returns can shift votes from the opponent to the frontrunner (the bandwagon effect), generate sympathy and extra votes for the person behind (the underdog effect), and suppress turnout (slack).

Lang's sociological orientation can be seen in her research on collective dynamics. With her husband, she has studied disaster news, riots, and school desegregation. Their book Etched in Memory (1990) seeks to understand how the reputations of some artists survive while others do not. The answer of who survives within the collective memory resides in a combination of demographic and social circumstances. The Langs' attempt to better understand the survival of artistic reputation, like their other studies, draws on multiple research strategies. In this case, they analyzed documents (e.g., memoirs, wills, exhibition announcements) and interviewed the friends and families of etchers. Their other studies have combined the use of survey data, content analyses, interviews, and observations.

A more important commonality in the Langs' research, however, deals with the impact of their work. Across decades of research, Gladys and Kurt Lang have identified immediate, long-term, and ancillary effects of media coverage of events and issues. They have concerned themselves with effects not only on individual consumers of media content but also on news practices and policy outcomes.

Professor emerita of communication, sociology, and political science at the University of Washington, Lang and her husband received the 1994 Murray Edelman Distinguished Career Award of the Political Communication Section of the American Political Science Association.

Patricia Moy

See also Edelman, Murray; Lang, Kurt

Further Readings

Lang, G. E., & Lang, K. (1955). The inferential structure of political communications: A study in unwitting bias. Public Opinion Quarterly, 19, 168–183.

Lang, G. E., & Lang, K. (1990). Etched in memory: The building and survival of artistic reputation. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Lang, K., & Lang, G. E. (1968). Politics and television. Chicago: Quadrangle Books.

Lang, K., & Lang, G. E. (1968). Voting and nonvoting: Implications of broadcasting returns before polls are closed. Waltham, MA: Blaisdell.

Lang, Kurt (1924–)

Kurt Lang is a scholar whose research in political communication focuses on media effects, particularly how the media shape public opinion. Born in Germany, Lang earned his master's degree and doctorate at the University of Chicago in sociology, and spent several years working for the U.S. military. He has written extensively in the areas of the sociology of war, military institutions, and collective behavior.

In the realm of political communication, however, Lang and his wife Gladys Engel Lang are known best for their study "MacArthur Day in Chicago," which provided the basis for the former's doctoral dissertation. The chapter was published in their 1968 book Politics & Television and was hailed as a canonic text in media research by Elihu Katz and his colleagues in 2002.

The study of MacArthur Day compared on-scene observers' reports of the homecoming of General Douglas MacArthur with televised coverage of the same events (his arrival in Chicago, a motorcade and parade, and an evening rally). Observers expected great excitement on the part of bystanders and parade spectators, but instead found thin crowds, passive interest, and disappointment. Onsite observations were in stark contrast to televised coverage, which showed numerous crowds and enthusiastic admirers, and included exaggerated reports of attendance—reports that Lang and Lang showed to be unsubstantiated by other data. The MacArthur Day study emphasized how television portrayals of public mood or opinion, despite their inaccuracies, could be perceived as reality. In essence, television coverage could shape opinion and public policy that relied on public opinion.

The Langs' work on media effects also included a notable study of public opinion and media coverage related to Watergate. In their 1983 book, The Battle for Public Opinion, the Langs showed that the news media had very subtle effects on public perceptions of actors and events in this scandal. Specifically, how the news media decided to emphasize some events over others, to use particular language, and to rely on specific individuals as sources influenced how citizens' understanding of Watergate and attitudes toward President Richard Nixon. In 1995, The Battle for Public Opinion was cited by the American Association for Public Opinion Research (AAPOR) as one of 50 books that have significantly shaped public opinion research. In 1989, AAPOR awarded the Langs its highest honor, the AAPOR Award for Exceptional Achievement in Public Opinion Research.

Lang is professor emeritus of communication and sociology at the University of Washington.

Patricia Moy

See also Framing; Lang, Gladys Engel

Further Readings

Katz, E., Peters, J. D., Liebes, T., & Orloff, A. (2002). Canonic texts in media research: Are there any? Should there be any? How about these? Cambridge, UK: Polity Press.

Lang, G. E., & Lang, K. (1983). The battle for public opinion: The president, the press, and the polls during Watergate. New York: Columbia University Press.

Lang, K., & Lang, G. E. (1968). Politics and television. Chicago: Quadrangle Books.

Language and Politics

There are many different ways to approach the connections between language and politics, all of them to some extent involving different contexts and all of them in some ways connected. One way is to look at political language as a form of rhetoric, to see how politicians seek to persuade their audiences. Another way is to apply aspects of discourse analysis to political data; this involves looking at typical structures within political language and seeing how politicians show ideological stances through their language choices, whether these choices are conscious or unconscious.

This short account of the language of politics gives examples from each of these methods, to provide some of the flavor of a broad and important topic. It will begin, though, by looking at some issues around key words, including the word politics itself.

Politics/Politician/Political/Politicize

Few words in English carry such negative connotations as the word politician. "Connotation" refers to the level of meaning based on associations we attach to words, whereas "denotation" is the referential meaning, the barest core of a word's meaning. A denotative definition of the word politician might be something like "a person who is practically engaged in running a country, district, or town," but the connotations surrounding the word politician are nearly always negative, often strongly so.

The suggestion that politicians are somehow sinister, devious figures goes back a long way. Hotspur in Shakespeare's Henry IV, Part 1, says of his opponent Bolingbroke:

> I am whipt and scourg'd with rods
>
> Nettled, and stung with pismires (ants), when I hear
>
> Of this vile politician.

And King Lear says to the blinded Gloucester:

> Get thee glass eyes
>
> And like a scurvy politician, seem
>
> To see the things thou dost not.

Because the word politician carries such negative connotations, another word is required for those few politicians who achieve and sustain almost universal popularity. If the word politician carries such a stigma, then what can we call figures such as Mahatma Gandhi, Martin Luther King, or Nelson Mandela, whose reputations are largely untainted with the usual connotations of deviousness? One word often used to describe them is statesman, a word that carries connotations of wisdom, vision, dignity.

The noun politician belongs to a family of words: politic, politics, political, politicize are some others. The root form politic comes originally from classical Greek, meaning "city, citizen, civic," but even Greek philosophers like Plato described politics as "nothing but corruption."

The idea that politics refers broadly to people and the lives they lead in organized communities rather than more narrowly to the battleground of conventional party politics became used again in the 1960s. Feminists, for instance, talked of sexual politics; in using this term they were arguing that culture and ways of behavior, including how we use language, have to be examined and changed. In this sense, then, to politicize an issue is a positive move—it is to subject it to rigorous and careful analysis and to act upon the subsequent findings. To describe an issue as "political," in this usage of the word, is to demand a serious analysis and recognize the need for change; those who seek such analysis and change will often urge those close to the issue to become "politicized." To talk of the politics of food production, for example, suggests that there is something wrong with the way food is currently produced, something wrong with the systems that support that production, and that changes must be made.

Eventually the distinctions among the use of the words politics/political/ politicize described here and the narrower sense of politics as the process of government can become blurred—if pressure groups seeking to politicize an issue are successful in raising awareness, then their leaders often become elected politicians, while other professional politicians are quick to add the issue to their own lists of concerns.

Labels

What you are called, what you call yourself, what you call your policies, what you call your enemies are a vital part of the political process. In Britain, for example, the Conservative Party happily refers to itself as the "Tory Party," even though when originally used the word Tory referred to Irish robbers. Many political labels carry either positive or negative connotations, and usually these labels undergo semantic drift as their meanings subtly change.

For example, all of the following terms for systems of government carry subtle connotations, often dependent on the context in which they are used: democracy, dictatorship, one-man rule, regime, junta. Western leaders, for example, frequently extol the virtues of democracy as though its absolute value as a term must be taken for granted.

All of the following terms, which describe opponents to those in power, carry subtly different connotations: a revolutionary, a fundamentalist, a dissident, a zealot, a critic, a partisan, a militant, a separatist, a paramilitary, a protester, a liberator. Although often used by politicians as though they are neutral in value, such terms are in fact laden with implications.

Another type of political label is that which is attached to a specific political figure. These can begin life as satirical jibes but then shift in connotation and be seen as complimentary. When Margaret Thatcher was first referred to as "The Iron Lady," she was being depicted as narrow and inflexible, but the term became approving when it was seen to represent qualities of toughness and resolve. Sometimes, too, a particular policy or policies is given a label, named after the politician deemed to be most responsible for its development; examples include Reaganomics, Thatcherite, Blairite.

Rhetoric

Although public speaking is often described as an art (and so presumably a good thing), political public speaking is often labeled as "rhetoric," a term with sometimes negative connotations. The idea that rhetoric is dangerous goes as far back as the concept itself. In classical Greece the Sophists were a group of paid teachers who journeyed around Greece teaching young men how to get on, in politics especially, by using rational arguments rather than intrinsic "truths." The sophist Protagoras argued that the relativity of truth meant that students needed to be able to see both sides of a question, so he taught students to praise and blame the same thing—with the idea being that the best course of action would be sorted out through this debate. It is easy to see, however, how this doctrine could be seen as encouraging the specious, of deceiving both self and others rather than seeking the truth. In early classical civilization, therefore, we can already see the dichotomy about political rhetoric that still exists today. Can content be separated from delivery? Do truth, substance, and sincerity matter more than style? What is truth? Is it possible to distinguish between the substance and the surface? Do politicians actually believe anything at all? Is the whole political thing just a cynical exercise?

The Problem of Truth

Politicians and other public figures often complain about bias in the media, about media "witch hunts"; instead of reporting the truth, they claim, the media present a distorted picture that serves their own interests. Sometimes the complaints revolve around the fact that a story has been broken at all, at other times they concern the presentation of the story, including the language used. Meanwhile the media ridicule politicians for never telling the truth. Truth is relative, though; there is no such thing as absolute truth. What we call a truth is in fact an assertion that we ourselves believe in. By this definition, truth is both relative and subjective. The whole idea of "truth" is very problematic at the best of times, but when it relates to how a political story is reported then it is especially so.

When a television news team reports a story, they make a number of decisions that will affect how the story is received by the audience. Where they position the camera, the sequence in which they show events, the language they use all determine the overall picture we get. In making these decisions they are reflecting an ideological view; there is no such thing as an unbiased report, no such thing as "neutral" language.

This does not mean, though, that language is merely the tool of cynical manipulation, that because you can report the same story in different ways there are no such things as ethical or moral behavior, that one political policy is no more fair and just than another. Language is a means of communication, a means of presenting and shaping argument, and political argument is ideological in that it comes from a series of beliefs. Language is not something separate from the ideas it contains, but the way language is used says a great deal about how the ideas have been shaped.

When analyzing examples of rhetoric it is important to put the data into context. One key question involves the extent to which the example being analyzed is preplanned. Another question involves whether or not the data is spoken, or written, or written to be spoken—and many political speeches also appear in an officially released format that does not necessarily coincide exactly with what was said. These generic issues around planning and delivery are compounded by the fact that the written data we tend to use for analysis does not fully incorporate the three elements that Aristotle identified as being central to rhetoric. Although we are in a reasonable position to examine the logos (or arguments) of the data, we can only guess at aspects of the ethos (or character of the speaker) and the pathos (literally, the means of raising passion in an audience).

The Significance of Pronouns

Pronouns are very common in talk, giving agency to actions (saying who is doing something) and helping to provide cohesion to the overall speech. Politicians and their speechwriters, then, have some difficult decisions to make when it comes to using the pronouns that will keep appearing in their speeches: How much responsibility are they prepared to take on themselves; how much responsibility for success are they willing to share with other colleagues; how confident are they that whole groups of people share their views; how much responsibility for failure are they prepared to accept as their own?

When politicians make speeches, they have two sets of first-person pronouns available to them.

They can talk in the first person singular, using I/me/myself/mine or they can talk in the first-person plural using we/us/ourselves/ours. With the latter, though, there are several potential meanings. The first-person plural forms can have the following range of reference:

- They can refer to I plus one other; that is, we = minister + prime minister.
- They can refer to I plus a group; that is, we = minister + government and/or political party.
- They can refer to I plus the whole country; that is, we = minister + people of the nation.
- They can even refer to I plus the rest of humanity; that is, we = minister + people everywhere.

The advantage of the singular forms (I/me/myself/mine) is that they show a clear sense of personal involvement on the part of the speaker, which is especially useful when good news is delivered. The disadvantage can be that they show all too clearly where blame lies if something goes wrong. They can also be seen as too self-important, with the individual speakers placing themselves above or outside the collective responsibility of their colleagues. The advantage of the plural pronoun forms (we/us/ourselves/ours) is that they help share the responsibility, especially when the decisions are tricky, when the news is uncertain. In their broadest reference they can show the politician in touch with all of the country, even all of the world. The disadvantage is that the individual does not gain so much credit when things go well.

The following transcript of part of a televised speech by George W. Bush in 2004 shows the importance of pronouns in public rhetoric and the various ways in which they are used:

> If America shows uncertainty or weakness in this decade, the world will drift toward tragedy. That's not going to happen, so long as I'm your president.
>
> The next four years we will continue to strengthen our homeland defenses. We will strengthen our intelligence-gathering services. We will reform our military. The military will be an all-volunteer army.
>
> We will continue to stay on the offense. We will fight the terrorists around the world so we do not have to face them here at home.
>
> We'll continue to build our alliances. I'll never turn over America's national security needs to leaders of other countries, as we continue to build those alliances.
>
> And we'll continue to spread freedom. I believe in the transformational power of liberty. I believe that the free Iraq is in this nation's interests. I believe a free Afghanistan is in this nation's interest.
>
> And I believe both a free Afghanistan and a free Iraq will serve as a powerful example for millions who plead in silence for liberty in the broader Middle East.

Metaphor and Metonymy

Both metaphor and metonymy are frequently used in the language of politics. They are only one aspect of political discourse, but they are useful starting points for looking at some of the ways in which political language has ideological implications.

Metaphor refers to a word or a phrase used to establish a comparison between one idea and another. When a politician is said to "take flak" from an opponent, politics is being compared to warfare, with the politician metaphorically being shot at. On the other hand, it may be the politician who is "on the offensive, targeting" his opponents by "launching an attack" on their policies.

Metonymy involves replacing the name of something with something that is connected to it, without being the whole thing. For example, the president of the United States, his government and advisors, are sometimes replaced by the much simpler term "the White House," which is the presidential residence and administrative center. Similarly, when an announcement is made by the British government, it might begin, "Number 10 Downing Street today announced. . . ." This metonymic use allows economy of language and gives the audience a sort of mnemonic. But it can also be used ideologically: "bad" news is much more likely to be incorporated into metonymically distancing references than good, whereas good news is much more likely to emanate from the named individual.

Adrian Beard

Further Readings

Atkinson, M. (1984). Our masters' voices. London: Methuen.

Beard, A. (2000). The language of politics. London: Routledge.

Fairclough, N. (2000). New Labour, new language? London: Routledge.

McNair, B. (2003). An introduction to political communication. London: Routledge.

Orwell, G. (1946). Politics and the English language. [Reprinted in Inside the whale and other essays (1962, pp. 143–157)]. London: Penguin.
Wilson, J. (1990). Politically speaking. Oxford: Blackwell.

Lasswell, Harold (1902–1978)

Harold Dwight Lasswell was an influential American social scientist who did pioneering work in political science and communication. His main achievements are the study of propaganda and the development of content analysis as a research method in communication.

Lasswell earned a bachelor's degree in economics and a doctoral degree in political science from the University on Chicago. During his career, he served as a faculty member for major U.S. universities, such as the University of Chicago, Yale University, City University of New York, Temple University, and Columbia University. He was part of the intellectual group of scholars known as the "Chicago School." During the 1930s, Lasswell became one of the leaders of the Rockefeller Foundation Seminar on Mass Communication, where he made two important contributions to the field of communication. First, he defined communication as "Who says what to whom through which channel with what effect?" a model that became the main paradigm in the filed and stirred research on media effects. Second, Lasswell theorized about the functions of communication in society, identifying surveillance of the environment, correlation of individuals' responses to societal stimuli, and transmission of cultural heritage as the three main functions of the process. Together with entertainment, which was added to the list later by Charles Wright, these functions became known as the classic functions of communication and the basis for the uses and gratifications theory. A third significant contribution to the study of communication was the development of qualitative and quantitative research methods. He developed content analysis while studying propaganda disseminated by various countries engaged in World War I and II. Lasswell served as the chief of the Experimental Division for the Study of Wartime Communications at the U.S. Library of Congress. This division analyzed print and broadcast communications disseminated by the Axis powers to identify propaganda strategies used by to divide and demoralize the enemy. In doing so, Lasswell and his associates developed sampling techniques, measurement systems, reliability and validity guidelines for content analysis. The first courses on propaganda and public opinion formation taught in American universities came directly from Lasswell's research.

His most popular works include Propaganda and Communication in World History (in three volumes; 1979), Propaganda Techniques in the World War (1927), Psychopathology and Politics (1930), and Politics: Who Gets What, When, How (1936). His interests were diverse and ranged beyond the field of political science and communication. He published across the board in social sciences (anthropology, international and economic relations, law, and psychiatry) and was among the first scholars who attempted to bridge psychoanalysis and behaviorism. Lasswell worked with psychoanalysts in Boston, Vienna, and Berlin on psychoanalytic theory and set up his own experimental lab where he conducted experiments with volunteers, an initiative that scandalized the academic world at the time. He founded the field of political psychology by using psychoanalysis and psychology to describe causal relationships between the personality of politicians and their political behavior. Such theories are explained in his books Psychopathology and Politics and World Politics and Personal Insecurity (1965).

Monica Postelnicu

Further Readings

Ascher, W., & Hirshfelder-Ascher, B. (2004). Revitalizing political psychology: The legacy of Harold D. Lasswell. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.
Lasswell, H. D. (1927). Propaganda techniques in the World War. New York: Knopf.
Lasswell, H. D. (1930). Psychopathology and politics. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
Lasswell, H. D. (1936). Politics: Who gets what, when, how. New York: McGraw Hill.
Lasswell, H. D. (1965). World politics and personal insecurity. New York: Free Press.
Lasswell, H. D., Lerner, D., & Speier, H. (1979). Propaganda and communication in world history. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.
Rogers, E. (1994). A history of communication study: A biographical approach. New York: Free Press.
Smith, B. L. (1969). The mystifying intellectual history of Harold D. Lasswell. In A. A. Rognow (Ed.), Politics, personality and social science in the twentieth century (pp. 41–106). Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Late Night Talk Shows

See Talk Shows, Television

Latinos and Politics, Media

A common analogy about Latinos in the realm of politics as well as marketing is that of "a sleeping giant," which implies a great potential that has yet to be mobilized. Regarding politics and media, however, the Latino giant—that is, the 45 million and rapidly growing population that at 15% of the nation's total is already the country's largest ethnic minority group—is not a single homogeneous body. Instead, it incorporates a number of diverse groups concentrated in a number of regions of the country, with language preferences that vary, and not all of whom are U.S. citizens and able to vote. They are served by and use a vast and growing Latino-oriented media, which offer political news and information that is generally relevant but limited in its use as an incentive for political action. For political news, Latinos are also use general market (mainstream) media, which tend to stereotype or ignore Latinos in terms of political matters.

Political communication research pertaining to Latinos has focused on content analysis of the media and on the communication strategies used by the Democratic and the Republican parties to gain Latino votes. Very little has been studied about Latinos' use of the media and on media effects on their voting opinions, attitudes, or behaviors. Nevertheless, Latinos, just like other Americans, are not immune to political messages disseminated via the media or by the growing number of Internet sites dedicated to all types of political information and propaganda. Still pending, however, are systematic analyses of the role and impact of media (including the Internet) on Latino political life, as well as experimental studies of political messages and of communication rhetoric aimed at Latinos.

Latinos in the United States

Approximately 67% of the Latino population residing across the 50 states is of Mexican heritage, 9% is Puerto Rican, and 4% is of Cuban heritage; 20% is from other Spanish heritage regions and countries. Mexican Americans are concentrated in the southwestern states; the major concentrations are in California and Texas, but the metropolitan cities of every state in the region are home to a few thousand and up to 8 million Latinos (Los Angeles). Puerto Ricans are concentrated in New York and other northeastern states, but also in Illinois and increasingly in central Florida. Cubans tend to reside in the southern Florida region but also in select cities in the Northeast. Central and South American Latinos, as well as others from the Caribbean, have their respective concentrations in select cities, but, as is the case for all other Latinos, they are also scattered across the whole country.

Felipe de Jesus Calderón was elected in the contested 2006 presidential elections. The results were controversial and contested by opponent Andrés Manuel López Obrador, but they were validated by the electoral courts in September 2006. At age 43, Calderon is one of the youngest persons to be elected president of Mexico.

Source: Noticias e Información de la Presidencia.

More than 28 million Latinos (62%) speak primarily Spanish in the home; 13.8 million (31%) do not speak English very well. The level of language proficiency varies by educational attainment, years of residency in the United States, and parental heritage (i.e., more Spanish fluency if both parents speak primarily Spanish; more English if at least one parent speaks primarily English). In some cities (e.g., New York, San Antonio), the majority of Latinos are bilingual; in others (e.g., Houston, Los Angeles, Miami), Spanish is the preferred language. English as the dominant language of most Latinos is rare.

As a legacy of the U.S. Jones Act, which was unilaterally imposed on Puerto Rico by the U.S. Congress in 1917, all Puerto Ricans (the 2.65 million living in the 50 states of the union as well as the 3.9 million living on the island Commonwealth-type nation) are U.S. citizens. However, only Puerto Ricans residing in a state are allowed to vote in federal elections (i.e., candidates for president, vice president, or Congress). For all other Latinos, eligibility to vote is contingent on acquiring U.S. citizenship by birth on the mainland (or a U.S. territory) or by naturalization.

In 2006, 17.2 million Latinos (38%) were eligible to vote (i.e., were U.S. citizens age 18 and above). Approximately 7 million (less than half of those eligible) voted in the 2004 presidential elections; for the 2008 elections, the projection is 10.5 million. While among all eligible Latino voters the actual voter turnout is low, among Latinos who were foreign nationals and subsequently became U.S. citizens the voting participation rate exceeds that of U.S.-born citizens of any background.

The Media Landscape

Latinos who seek to learn about and participate in American (i.e., U.S.) politics read and tune in to the same general market media that are used by all other politically inclined people who wish to do the same. This means that Latinos, as do non-Latinos, watch the local, network, and cable television channels, read mainstream newspapers and magazines, listen to radio news and commentary, and nowadays increasingly search the Internet for political news and information.

In addition, Latinos have available to them a vast, growing, and diverse Latino-oriented media, many of which also offer news and information about American politics. There are two main Spanish-language broadcast networks (Univisión and Telemundo), the corresponding complementary networks of each of these (Telefutura and Mun2), regional emerging networks (e.g., Galavisión, TV Azteca, LA-TV, SíTV), plus numerous cable channels (e.g., CNN en Español, Discovery en Español, Fox Sports en Español, HBO Latino, MTV Tr3s), which are Latino and/or Latin American operations of the parent market cable companies. News about U.S. politics in general and Latino-related politics in particular are regularly aired in the first of these networks, which have been conduits for political spots for the political parties and candidates during electoral campaigns. The local stations affiliated or owned by the two largest networks also offer a regular stream of news and have likewise broadcast political commercials for local and national elections. However, except for CNN en Español, news programs are practically absent in the other outlets because of the focus of those channels or by omission of the programming/news directors.

In the United States, approximately 20 daily newspapers are published in Spanish for this country's Latinos who can read in that language. Without a doubt, these newspapers cover their respective communities and, in varying degrees, the political news—especially when the editors consider the happenings important for their readers. Political advertising is also found in these newspapers, especially during local elections.

Across the country, more than 350 Latino-oriented weekly newspapers are also published; most are printed in Spanish, a few in English or in both languages. Some are news oriented and cover quite well the local and some nonlocal events (political or otherwise); others print mostly advertisements and offer little or no political news of any type. The extent to which political candidates advertise in these papers varies by locality and type of press.

National and regional magazines oriented to U.S. Latinos are scarce, but the monthly Hispanic, Latina Style, Latina, Hispanic Business, and Vista (a newspaper insert akin to Parade), all of which are published in English, offer occasional political content relevant to Latinos. Advertisements for presidential candidates have occasionally been printed in these media. The vast majority of the U.S.-based Spanish-language magazines are for the most part about fashion, lifestyle, entertainment, celebrities, or sports. Thus, these do not regularly carry political news or advertising.

Latino-oriented AM and FM radio stations—most of them in Spanish but also a few bilingual ones—are easily found all across the country. In cities such as Los Angeles, San Francisco, New York, Chicago, Houston, Dallas, Miami, and Orlando, which have large concentrations of Latinos, various radio stations are aimed at this audience. And in border cities all across the South, especially in San Diego, El Paso, and Laredo, in addition to the local Spanish-language stations, other stations from Mexico are also easily heard. Because of these stations' popularity, many political candidates, especially local ones, have purchased and aired campaign spots on them. However, news is currently a very scarce offering on most radio stations, especially those in Spanish. As an outcome of the deregulation of the broadcast industry, which led to the increased concentration of ownership and the decline of locally owned operations, radio news programs have been phased out across the country. For example, in central Texas (Austin to San Antonio), in late 2006 none of the 17 Spanish-language stations offered any locally produced news; even canned radio network news was extremely scarce. Popular as these media outlets may be for entertainment and airing of occasional political advertisements, their offerings of political news and information are scarce. Their role as political socialization agents for Latinos is thus understandably quite limited except in some cities (e.g., Miami, New York, Los Angeles), where at least one station in each place does offer regular local news programs, talk show programs, and even political commentary.

For Latinos seeking political news and information, the Internet may be an emergent valuable source. This is particularly the case for the designated sections of the Democratic and the Republican parties' Web sites, and the corresponding sections of the political candidates from both parties who have made it their purpose to create Latino-oriented sections in English and/or Spanish.

The Latino-oriented media described, as well as the general market (mainstream) media, constitute important sources that inform and socialize Latinos' political orientations and behaviors. All types of media are particularly crucial for the political parties, candidates, and their respective outreach operatives, who constantly funnel news, information, and propaganda via those outlets. Undoubtedly, the media—interacting with the communication flowing from family, friends, coworkers, and religious and/or social groups—constitute crucial factors in influencing the political lives of Latinos.

Evidence From Research

Empirical research about the political content provided by Latino-oriented media, or about what the general market media offer in terms of Latino-focused political news, is currently at a developing stage. Also embryonic is the research on the communication strategies employed by the political parties and their candidates to woo Latino voters. Less prominent is survey research attesting to the actual political influence that the media might have on Latinos. Experimental studies of the impact of particular messages or analysis about Latino-oriented political rhetoric are even scarcer.

Like their English-language counterparts, Spanish-language (SL) newspapers have historically printed political news and opinion content. The traditional, commercial-based SL papers have offered such content as an integral part of their coverage of world, national, and local events. A few community-centered or political SL papers focus on advocacy and civil rights issues.

Systematic studies of the latter papers have not been conducted, but it is known that such papers played major roles in the organization, mobilization, and struggles of U.S. Latino and of immigrant activists seeking to overcome discrimination, prejudice, or oppression at home and abroad. Studies of the SL daily newspapers reveal that they all offer political campaign news, but primarily focus—just like their English-language counterparts—on the horse race elements of the campaign. The SL daily papers, however, have been observed to be more partisan than their English-language counterparts. In studies of the coverage of campaigns of the 1980s, La Opinión (Los Angeles) and El Diario-La Prensa (New York) clearly favored Democratic candidates, while Diario Las Américas and El Nuevo Herald (Miami) and the now defunct Noticias del Mundo (New York) favored Republicans. In these daily newspapers, political/electoral editorials, editorial cartoons, and opinion columns have not been frequent, except in the conservative Diario Las Américas. There are no recent in-depth studies of these or the newer dailies that have emerged since the mid-1990s.

The English-language (EL) press coverage of Latino politics (and Latinos in general) has been much more dismal. The main focus of Latino-related political news in these publications has been on the (re)discovery of the potential Latino vote (e.g., whether or not it is still a sleeping giant and if it speaks more Spanish than English or vice versa), the liberalism/conservatism of Latinos (i.e., if they are more prone to vote Democrat or Republican), which candidate is preferred by Latinos (i.e., the horserace among potential Latino voters), and the Latino-oriented campaign activities of select political candidates and/or their parties. The issues and concerns (whatever those may be; for example, education, immigration, affirmative action) that are of central interest to Latinos in general or to particular subgroups of Latinos have not received much coverage. The EL papers also do not give much attention to Latino candidates, and very infrequently publish editorials or op-ed pieces that focus on Latino electorates or issues.

Studies of the English-language network news reveal strikingly similar patterns in their coverage of Latino political stories. What distinguishes these, however, is the tendency to highlight Latino music and dancers (e.g., Mariachis and ladies with wide, colorful dresses) at the campaign stops that presidential contenders occasional make in predominantly Hispanic neighborhoods.

Research about how the Spanish-language network news cover Latinos reveals that these media have followed some of those same patterns. With each passing electoral campaign, however, Spanish-language networks have made major strides to mobilize Latinos to register and vote. The news departments at the national and sometimes local levels also do not pass up any opportunity to cover and even feature Latino candidates as well as Spanish-speaking representatives or spokespersons for non-English-speaking candidates. Still, the specific issues or concerns of Latino communities or particular Latino subgroups are not covered extensively. Most notably missing in these media, as well as in the press, are news and information that is both uniquely relevant and serve as incentives to mobilize Latinos not just to register, but also to get involved in the campaigns and subsequently vote.

Turning to radio, no empirical research has been published about the political content (be it news, commentary, or advertising) directed to Latinos. However, it does not take much research to recognize the mobilization potential of this medium. This was made quite evident during spring 2006, when a handful of disc jockeys in radio stations in Los Angeles and other metropolitan cities used their airtime to promote what turned out to be massive marches against the most restrictive immigration reforms that were being proposed by the conservative elements of the Republican Party.

The political communication topic that has received most academic attention pertains to the communication strategies that the Democratic Party and the Republican Party have used to woo Latino voters during presidential elections. The cumulative evidence from that research shows that dating back to the 1950s, Latinos have been particularly targeted via a variety of communication efforts ranging from simple propaganda paraphernalia (e.g., posters, campaign buttons in Spanish) to sophisticated, multifaceted, and multimedia campaigns via general market and Latino-oriented media in both Spanish and English.

The Latino-oriented political communication efforts have been inconsistent over the years. They have been most intense in tight races during which the Latino vote was considered essential for victory, and least forceful when a party considers that its candidate is assured victory. The Republican Party, more than the Democratic Party, has designated the greatest amount of funding, centralized long-term planning, and multimedia (English and Spanish, print and broadcast) strategies (including survey and focus group research) to target Latinos. The GOP has also formulated advertising and propaganda that seeks to persuade via messages that appeal to emotional chords. In contrast, the Democratic Party has designated significantly less money to its Latino outreach efforts, which have been inconsistent and retooled from one campaign to the next, limited in their research foundations, directed predominantly in Spanish, and focused on specific issues via messages that have not been very emotionally appealing. A common trend since the late 1990s is that both parties—and their respective candidates for the presidency—have set up Latino-oriented Internet Web sites (in English and/or Spanish). These sites have started to receive some academic research attention that shows the different characteristics of each party's efforts to inform and woo Latino voters.

Analysis of the effects that the media and the political parties' communication outreach efforts have had on the political attitudes, opinions, and behaviors of Latinos have not received much systematic research attention. Limited as that research may be, what is clear is that exposure to newspapers and television news does contribute to Latinos' political knowledge, but to a lesser extent to their political participation.

Nonetheless, millions of Latinos do participate in U.S. electoral politics. That participation, which varies by Latino subgroups, location, and campaign period, cannot all be attributed to just word-of-mouth persuasion. Directly or indirectly, the media do play many roles in that process. The shortcomings of the current survey studies to date—mostly secondary analyses of data not designed to specifically assess media effects—and the absence of more sophisticated research leave open new grounds for studies in this arena.

Undoubtedly, Latinos who are U.S. citizens and eligible to vote, as well as Latinos who cannot or wish not to vote, are exposed to and use the media in English and in Spanish. Thus, all Latinos are potentially influenced by the political news and information that stream from those media and can also be affected in distinct ways by the absence of relevant content in those media. Likewise, Latinos of all types may also be influenced by the communication outreach efforts that political parties and candidates direct to them.

The arena for studying the intersections among Latinos, media, and politics—not only related to presidential campaigns, as has been the norm to date, but also local elections—is ripe for new explorations. Opportunities for innovative research are also open for experimental studies, and many other inquiries related to political communication and Latinos. Given the recent surge in the number of Latinos voting and/or flexing their advocacy muscles in massive marches, the sleeping giant analogy maybe less applicable to this population, but more so to this arena of the field of political communication, which still waits to be awakened.

Federico Subervi

See also Minorities, Role in Politics

Further Readings

Connaughton, S. L. (2005). Inviting Latino voters: Party messages and Latino party identification. New York: Routledge.

Pew Hispanic Center. (2006). Hispanics and the 2006 election. Washington, DC: Author.

Soruco, G. (1996). The Cuban exiles of southern Florida and the mass media: The struggle of culture. Gainesville: University of Florida Press.

Subervi-Vélez, F. A. (Ed.). (2007). The mass media and Latino. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.

U.S. Census Bureau. (2003). The Hispanic population in the United States: March 2002. Washington, DC: Author. Retrieved from http://www.census.gov/prod/2003pubs/p20-545.pdf

LAZARSFELD, PAUL F. (1901–1976)

Paul F. Lazarsfeld was one of the most influential social scientists of the 20th century. He is credited with the founding of market research and communication research into media effects and the creation of the two-step flow model of mass communication. He significantly advanced qualitative and quantitative methodology for social sciences and invented the first instrument to measure audience reactions to media content in real time.

Shortly after earning a PhD degree in applied mathematics from the University of Vienna in 1925, Lazarsfeld founded the Research Center for Economic Psychology under the patronage of the university. This was the first research institute in the world to be affiliated with a university, and it became well known after conducting the first study of unemployment impact on community life (the Marienthal Study, 1931–1932) and one of the very first studies in the world about the effects of radio broadcasts on listeners.

In 1935, Lazarsfeld left his native Vienna to immigrate to the United States after his family was persecuted by the police for its connection to the Socialist Party in Austria. In the United States, Lazarsfeld founded and directed the Research Center at the University of Newark. In 1937, he moved to Princeton University to become associate director for the Office of Radio Research, which moved to Columbia University in 1944 under the name of the Bureau for Applied Social Research. His work at these institutions laid the foundation for communication research into media effects.

First in a series of seminal studies was the Erie Country (Ohio) Study, an investigation into how mass media influenced people's voting behavior during the 1940 U.S. presidential campaign. Lazarsfeld discovered that mass media influenced only a small number of people (opinion leaders), who in turn persuaded others through interpersonal communication, a process known as "the two-step flow of communication." These findings were described in Lazarsfeld's 1944 book titled The People's Choice, which launched the paradigm of limited effects of mass media and also created the foundation for research into people's voting behavior. The relationship among mass media, opinion leaders, and interpersonal communication was explored again in 1945, when Lazarsfeld conducted the Decatur Study of personal influence, explained in the book Personal Influence (1955), coauthored with Elihu Katz.

Lazarsfeld's background in mathematics helped him pioneer new quantitative methods of data analysis such as cross-tabulation and deviant case analysis. A firm believer in triangulation, he also developed qualitative methods of research and pioneered focus group interviewing. In collaboration with Frank Stanton of CBS, Lazarsfeld developed the first media effects measurement machine, called the "Lazarsfeld-Stanton program analyzer." The machine, nicknamed "Little Annie," was a two-button device that could record audience's likes and dislikes regarding media content in real time. It was quickly adopted in other fields of research, such as advertising and media content pretesting.

Monica Postelnicu

See also People's Choice, The; Personal Influence; Political Socialization; Two-Step Flow Model of Communication

Further Readings

Katz, E., & Lazarsfeld, P. F. (1955). Personal influence: The part played by the people in the flow of mass communications. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.

Lazarsfeld, P. F. (1944/1988). The people's choice (3rd rev. ed.). New York: Columbia University Press.

Rogers, E. (1994). A history of communication study: A biographical approach. New York: Free Press.

Lehrer, Jim (1934–)

James Charles Lehrer was born May 19, 1934, in Wichita, Kansas. A news anchor for The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer on PBS, he is an author of nonfiction and fiction novels, films, and plays. At Thomas Jefferson High School in San Antonio, Texas, he was one of the three sports editors at the Jefferson Declaration. Lehrer graduated from Victoria College and the University of Missouri. After serving 3 years in the U.S. Marine Corps, his journalism career began at the Dallas Morning News and then the Dallas Times-Herald. Lehrer covered the Kennedy assassination in 1963. He was also a political columnist at the Dallas Times-Herald and became the paper's city editor in 1968.

Lehrer's newspaper career led him to Dallas KERA-TV to work as executive director of public affairs, anchor, and editor of a nightly news program. His work with the Public Broadcasting System (PBS) began in 1972 when he moved to Washington, D.C., to serve as the public affairs coordinator. Lehrer was also a fellow at the Corporation for Public Broadcasting and a member of PBS's Journalism Advisory Board. His work as a correspondent for the National Public Affairs Center for Television (NPACT) led to his relationship with Robert MacNeil. In 1973, Lehrer and MacNeil provided continuous live coverage of the Senate Watergate hearings on PBS, which won them an Emmy. He also covered the House Judiciary Committee's impeachment inquiry of Richard Nixon as a solo anchor on PBS.

In 1975, Lehrer became the Washington correspondent for the half-hour Robert MacNeil Report, which was renamed The MacNeil/Lehrer Report. The news program won more than 30 awards for journalistic excellence. The collaboration became The MacNeil/Lehrer NewsHour in 1983 and continued until 1996, when MacNeil departed from the news program. Lehrer began hosting The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer in 1996.

Lehrer's awards include the 1999 National Humanities Medal, presented by President Bill Clinton and First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, two Emmys, the Fred Friendly First Amendment Award, the George Foster Peabody Broadcast Award, the William Allen White Foundation Award for Journalistic Merit, and the University of Missouri School of Journalism's Medal of Honor. He was inducted into the Television Hall of Frame with MacNeil and inducted into the Silver Circle of the Washington, D.C., chapter of the National Academy of Television Arts and Sciences. He was also elected a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

Lehrer has served as a moderator for 10 of the nationally televised debates in the past four presidential elections.

Kristen D. Landreville

See also PBS (Public Broadcasting Service)

Lenin, Vladímir I. (1870–1924)

Vladímir Iljítsch Uljánov was the leader of Russian Revolution (1917) und founder of the Soviet Union (1922). His works include contributions to political theory and philosophy (Imperialism: The Highest Stage of Capitalism; State and Revolution, both published in 1917). Lenin was the author of several theoretical works in philosophy such as Materialism and Empiriocriticism (published in 1909), which became fundamental in Marxist-Leninist philosophy, especially in their epistemology. In the text Lenin argued, among other issues, that human perceptions correctly and accurately can reflect the objective external world and that there is no independent, nonsubjective way to verify the existence of the external world.

In an earlier pamphlet titled What Is to Be Done? (published in 1902), Lenin argued that only a disciplined party of professional revolutionaries could bring socialism to Russia. In the book Lenin developed his Theory of (Party) Press. He saw the press as an instrument both (1) of party building and (2) of communication between party and people. Relating to the development of party, he judged a party press as necessary for internal communication (organization, self-notification, etc.). As to communication to the masses, Lenin followed Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels (Manifesto of the Communist Party, 1848) and understood the Communist Party as avant-garde. According to Lenin, the communists have "over the great masses of the proletariat the advantage of clearly understanding the line of march, the conditions, and the ultimate general results of the proletarian movement." Thus Lenin defined the party's main task "to connect spontaneous evolution with conscious revolutionary action," that is, the transformation of everyday experiences into socialist consciousness in sense of the Marxist theory. To sum up both functions, he postulated, "The role of a newspaper, however is not limited solely to the dissemination of ideas, to political education, and to the enlistment of political allies. A newspaper is not only a collective propagandist and a collective agitator, it is also a collective organizer." Lenin understood the public sphere not as place of exchange of ideas and/or opinions, but in an educational and unidirectional way of communication form the party to the people.

Until 1989, Lenin's Theory of Press was a very influential doctrine in theory and practice of political communication in the former Soviet bloc.

Hans-Joerg Stiehler

See also Communism; Marx, Karl

Further Readings

Service, R. (2000). Lenin: A biography. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Le Pen, Jean-Marie (1928–)

Born on June 20, 1928, Jean-Marie Le Pen has brought the French far right back to the political scene from where it was excluded because of its extensive collaboration with the Nazis during the Second World War.

His early interest in politics led him to become one of the youngest members of the French Parliament when he was elected on the populist politician Pierre Poujade list in 1956, after having led several rightist movements when he was a student. Though he was drawn back to a relative obscurity in the 1970s, he was brought back to light by two events. First, he was made rich thanks to the death of the owner of the Lambert Concrete Manufactories, Hubert Lambert, who had made him his sole heir. This relieved him of any financial concerns and even enabled him to finance his own party, the newly renovated "Front National." Second, in the mid-1980s, he was helped, paradoxically, when Socialist President François Mitterrand introduced proportional voting to the Parliament in order to diminish his opponents' chances of victory, by giving seats to the small parties—Front National included. This took Jean-Marie Le Pen again to the French Parliament.

From then on, systematically betting on the fears of his fellowmen, notably fear of unemployment due to the foreign-born immigrants, Le Pen regularly increased his electoral scores. For the 2002 presidential election, taking advantage of a low voter turnout and of some campaigning mistakes made by Lionel Jospin, the Socialist candidate, he achieved the unexpected result of making it to the second round of voting against incumbent President Jacques Chirac (who was then easily reelected, with most of the French politicians calling to vote for him against Le Pen).

Jean-Marie Le Pen's campaigning skills have helped him considerably all along. A formidable debater, he is feared by many French politicians. The analyses of his speeches reveal very elaborate discourse strategies. For instance, in order to prove himself as a legitimate candidate, he is one of the very few French politicians to employ some relatively outdated forms of the French language (subjunctive, or nearly forgotten words) in order to subconsciously convey that he his part of old-roots France. One of his less understood but main victories is the fact that he was one of the first to put several issues on the French political agenda: the consequences of the globalization of the economy, and personal safety worries, issues that are now, willingly or not, taken on by most parties and politicians.

Jean-Marie Le Pen also knows how to regularly get media attention when needed, by uttering sentences or words that are on the fringe of what may be tolerated, but do not break the law. His most famous voluntary slip happened during a radio broadcast, on September 13, 1987: he said that the Nazi gas chambers in the extermination camps were a mere "detail" of the Second World War. Though he insisted later that he was meaning that other methods were used by the Nazis to kill Jews, this caused an immediate scandal, exactly what he was looking for.

His campaigns are organized according to the best of political marketing methods. The Front National militants are systematically trained in a country castle in Normandy; its meetings are carefully planned, often with paying admission in order to eliminate curious people and troublemakers. Similarly, he always starts campaigning early, in order to put into the minds of voters that he will be a candidate, relaying these early starts with elaborate campaigns of direct marketing by mail to increase donations.

Philippe J. Maarek

Further Readings

Le Pen, J.-M. (1984). Les Français d'abord [The French first]. Paris: Carrère Lafon.

Perrineau, P. (1997). Le Symptôme—Le Pen [The symptom—Le Pen]. Paris: Fayard.

Souchard, M., Whanich, S., Cuminal, I., & Wathier, V. (1997). Le Pen, les mots. Analyse d'un discours d'extrême droite [Le Pen, words: Analysis of the discourse of the extreme right]. Paris: Le Monde Editions.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letters to the editor (LTE), a long-standing tradition in American journalism, are letters sent to publications by readers to express opinions about a wide range of issues. While LTEs traditionally have been sent to newspapers, they are now also submitted to electronic broadcast media, including local and national television and radio news programs. In these latter cases, the letters are sometimes read on the air. LTEs are deemed important because they (a) provide a public forum for deliberation and debate on critical issues in a democracy, (b) can influence public policy via their use by both citizens and politicians, and (c) underscore the role of journalism in society and its responsibility to offer a space for public debate. Academic research on this topic has examined the nature of that public forum.

One the one hand, it has been noted that caution should be taken in surmising that letters to the editor are a true reflection of public opinion on a topic. For example, LTEs may be biased in that they simply reflect the opinions of the editorial staff who act as gatekeepers in their selection and publication. Or letters may be chosen for inclusion because of their sensational or dramatic appeal to readers rather than because they are a representative sample of the letters received. Writers of LTEs are also often not demographically and politically representative of the public and are considered unusual because they feel so strongly about an issue that they are willing to make public statements. They have been characterized as a fringe element in society who use the opportunity to blow off steam about an issue.

However, some investigations have shown that LTEs do reflect public opinion on particular and often controversial issues, such as the decision by Arizonans to reject a Martin Luther King Day ballot initiative, or levels of support or opposition to the Equal Rights Amendment. While caution should be exercised in generalizing these findings, letters, on issues that generate strong interest and emotion, written to a broad-based number of publication outlets, can reflect the public's positions on that issue. Thus, under certain conditions, LTEs can provide an accurate gauge of public opinion on controversial issues and thus become a forum for deliberation.

The Internet poses new challenges for editors, as electronic mailing of letters can increase the volume of letters significantly, thus making selection even more time consuming for the editorial staff. Additionally, easy access to "model letters" at organizational Web sites set up a situation in which letters can now easily be submitted by scores of active citizens.

Letters to the editor are a salient piece of the American media. The responsibility for their contribution to public deliberation remains with both the editors and the public. The National Conference of Editorial Writers is committed to presenting a diversity of views on the editorial page. In the same manner, citizens have a responsibility to engage in public debate, including the use of LTEs. The media and citizens working together can create a place for vigorous democratic deliberation.

Barbara J. Walkosz

See also Public Opinion

Further Readings

Hill, D. (1981). Letter opinion on ERA: A test of the newspaper bias hypothesis. Public Opinion Quarterly, 45, 384–392.

Sigelman, L., & Walkosz, B. (1992). Letters to the editor as a public opinion thermometer: The Martin Luther King holiday vote in Arizona. Social Science Quarterly, 73(4), 938–946.

Thornton, B. (1998). The disappearing media ethics debate in letters to the editor. Journal of Mass Media Ethics, 13(1), 40–55.

Wahl-Jorgensen, K. (2001). Letters to the editor as a forum for public deliberation: Modes of publicity and democratic debate. Critical Studies in Media Communication, 18(3), 303–320.

Lewinsky, Monica (1973–)

Monica Samille Lewinsky was born July 23, 1973, in San Francisco, California. The older of two children born to Marcia and Bernie Lewinsky, Monica grew up in Beverly Hills, California.

She graduated with a Bachelor of Science degree in psychology from Lewis and Clark College of Portland, Oregon, in May 1995. In July of that year, with her mother's encouragement and through family ties, Monica became an intern—an unpaid but highly prestigious position—in the White House, advanced to temporary employment, and, then, a salaried position in the correspondence section of the Office of Legal Affairs. On November 15, 1995, Monica Lewinsky and President Bill Clinton began a sexual relationship that would last until March 29, 1996, the date of their last acknowledged intimate contact. This relationship made Monica a public figure and contributed to impeachment proceedings against President Clinton.

The story of the relationship between Monica Lewinsky and President Clinton was reported to the press on January 21, 1998. President Clinton first denied the allegations but publicly acknowledged an improper relationship on August 17, 1998. The Starr Report, which details the findings of independent counsel, Kenneth Starr, includes sexually explicit descriptions of the affair.

Jerry Miller

See also Clinton, William Jefferson

Further Readings

Dershowitz, A. M. (1998). Sexual McCarthyism: Clinton, Starr, and the emerging constitutional crisis. New York: Basic Books.

Morton, A. (1999). Monica's story. New York: St. Martin's Press.

The Starr Report: The findings of independent counsel Kenneth W. Starr on President Clinton and the Lewinsky affair. (1998). With analysis by the staff of the Washington Post. New York: Public Affairs.

Libel

Freedom of speech and the press cannot be absolute, regardless of whether they are constitutional rights or not. They must be balanced against reputation and other competing individual and societal interests. The libel law of a society indicates to a large extent how the society views reputational interests in comparison with freedom of expression.

Harm to reputation is a criminal offense or a civil wrong—or both—in nearly every society. Nonetheless, reputation as a sociocultural and legal value varies from society to society. American libel law is a case in point. In the United States, freedom of the press is protected as a constitutional right, but reputation is not. In many ways, the U.S. approach to press freedom versus reputation emanates from Americans' deliberate judgments as to the special role of the news media as an institution in an open democracy.

Defamation, as a legal concept, refers to publication of material that tends to hold a person up to hatred, ridicule, contempt, or spite. In Anglo-American law, it is subdivided into libel (written defamation) and slander (oral defamation). The libel-slander dichotomy remains a factor in assessing the harmful impact of defamatory statements, but it has become all but obsolete with the recent convergence of communication technologies. Hence, the form of communication medium is rarely a decisive element in classifying a defamatory statement as libel (more harmful) or slander (less harmful).

The main purpose of libel law is to protect the reputational interests of individuals in connection with their existing and future relationships with others. Libel law also serves societal interests because it provides a civilized, nonviolent forum in which a legal dispute over reputational injury is settled in such a way as to compensate for economic and emotional injury. More important but less acknowledged is the social value of libel law in providing a check on media power. Libel lawsuits expose the otherwise jealously guarded news-gathering and decision-making process of the news media to public scrutiny and accountability.

As already noted, reputation is not explicitly recognized as a constitutional value in the United States, which stands in marked contrast with many other countries. Nonetheless, protection of a good name is accepted by American courts as a basic concept underlying any decent system of ordered liberty. The U.S. Supreme Court has held, "Society has a pervasive and strong interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation." Thus, reputational injury is treated as a tort, although it has yet to be repudiated as a crime.

Before libel law was constitutionalized in the United States in the mid-1960s, common law required a plaintiff to show that the defendant published a statement about the plaintiff that had a tendency to harm the plaintiff's reputation. More specifically, the plaintiff had to prove three requisite elements: identification of the plaintiff in the allegedly defamatory material, publication of the material by the defendant, and the defamatory nature of the material. But the proof requirements in a modern libel action in American law are more complicated. Especially in media libel actions, a plaintiff must establish that (1) the defamatory statement of fact concerning the plaintiff was false, (2) its publication resulted from the defendant's fault, and (3) the plaintiff suffered actual injury.

So, under the common law, statements upon which a libel action were based were presumed to be false. As a matter of constitutional law, however, that presumption of falsity is rejected in the United States. The fault requirement in American law is making libel litigation far more complex than in any other legal system. It hinges on the status of the libel plaintiff. To win libel actions, public figures and public officials must prove "actual malice"—knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth. Private persons, on the other hand, must prove only negligence in most states, unless they claim punitive damages or presumed damages.

U.S. libel law allows the press a number of defenses against libel litigation. Its policy justifications illustrate a balancing process. The personal rights of individuals to protect their reputations are weighed against the constitutional rights of the public to keep informed on issues important to self-government. Freedom of speech and the press are assumed to contribute significantly to public knowledge and information.

The news media can defeat the complainant or plaintiff's case by refuting any of the plaintiff's proof elements. If the elements of the plaintiff's case are not refutable, they then assert constitutional and common law defenses. The constitutional "actual malice" standard, as the U.S. Supreme Court enunciated in New York Times v. Sullivan (1964), states that unless a defamatory statement about a public plaintiff was made with knowledge of its falsity or with reckless disregard for its truth, the defendant cannot be liable. Besides the "actual malice" defense, the affirmative common law defenses are available if the defendant proves the defamatory statement is true, or if the statement is privileged as a result of government proceedings, or if it is a fair comment and criticism about matters of public interest.

In recent years, libel law has emerged as an increasingly global issue largely because of borderless cyber-communication. In 2002, the High Court of Australia held that when a defamatory statement is accessible to Internet Service Provider (ISP) subscribers in an Australian state, regardless of where it was originally uploaded, a court of that state can hear an action for defamation relating to the statement. More recently, a Canadian trial court rejected The Washington Post's argument that a former U.N. official's libel lawsuit against the American newspaper in Ontario be dismissed because it had nothing to do with Canada. The court reasoned, "Those who publish via the Internet are aware of the global reach of their publications, and must consider the legal consequences in the jurisdiction of the subjects of their articles." To the relief of the American newspaper, the trial court's ruling was overturned in 2005. Yet, the transnational libel cases in Australia and Canada showcase a new challenge for defamation law in the Internet era. That is, choice of law and jurisdiction in transnational communication cannot be blithely dismissed any longer.

Kyu Ho Youm

See also First Amendment; Press Freedom

Further Readings

Barendt, E. (2005). Freedom of speech (2nd ed.). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Carter-Ruck, P. F., & Starte, H. (1997). Carter-Ruck on libel and slander (4th ed.). London: Butterworths.

Collins, M. (2005). The law of defamation and the Internet. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
Hopkins, W. H. (2007). Communication and the law. Northport, AL: Vision Press.
Lewis, A. L. (1991). Make no law: The Sullivan case and the First Amendment. New York: Random House.
Sack, R. D. (2006). Sack on defamation: Libel, slander, and related problems. New York: Practising Law Institute.
Sanford, B. W. (2006). Libel and privacy (2nd ed.). New York: Aspen.
Smolla, R. A. (2006). Law of defamation (2nd ed.). St. Paul, MN: West.

Libertarian Party

The Libertarian Party is a political party in the United States that rigidly supports limited governmental activity. It is estimated that the Libertarian Party is the third-largest political party in America. The party is active in all 50 states and claims to have more than 200,000 registered voters, which would be more than the membership of all other third parties combined.

The political philosophy of the Libertarian Party transcends the conventional categories of "liberal" and "conservative" thought. In general terms, the party's platform combines liberal views on civil liberties with conservative laissez-faire economic beliefs. It also advocates a noninterventionist foreign policy and favors global free trade. In its most basic form, Libertarianism believes in total economic and personal freedom, as long as one does not impinge on the rights of others. Some of the specific stances of the Libertarian Party include a completely unregulated economy, the legalization of drugs and prostitution, repealing the income tax, and ending foreign aid as a matter of government policy and turning it into a program run on voluntary private donations.

The writings of Ayn Rand (1905–1982) provide much of the intellectual foundation of Libertarian philosophy. Rand provided a moral defense for the laissez-faire capitalism by linking it to personal liberty and rationality. The Libertarian Party itself was formally established in Colorado Springs in December 1971. The impetus for the party's creation was President Richard Nixon's 1971 imposition of wage and price controls, which was viewed as a dangerous expansion of governmental power. John Hospers, head of the Philosophy Department at the University of Southern California, was named as the party's first presidential candidate. Hospers appeared on the ballot in two states and received approximately 2,500 votes. Since that time the party has steadily grown. As recently as 2003, more than 600 Libertarians were serving in elected positions nationwide. However, these successes have been limited to lower-level city and county elections. To date, no Libertarian candidate has won a statewide or national election. In the 2004 presidential election, the Libertarian Party candidate appeared on the ballot in 48 states and received 397,265 votes or 0.3% of the total turnout.

Some political scientists have argued that the Libertarian Party is best seen as part of a larger intellectual movement. Arguably, the ideas of the Libertarian Party have influenced the two major political parties. For instance, the major political parties are associated with Libertarian-advocated policies like school vouchers and privatization of governmental services. In addition, there has been a growth of libertarian "think tanks." For example, the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank in Washington, D.C. (not directly affiliated with the Libertarian Party) is an influential voice in economic discourse. Several notable Libertarian-oriented public policy institutions exist, such as the Institute for Humane Studies, the Reason Foundation, Citizens for a Sound Economy, the Political Economy Research Center, the National Center for Policy Analysis, the Heartland Institute, and the Pacific Institute for Public Policy Research.

David K. Scott

See also Political Parties

Further Readings

Hazlett, J. M. (1992). The Libertarian Party and other minor political parties in the United States. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.

Limbaugh, Rush (1951–)

Rush Limbaugh is a conservative radio talk show host often ascribed with regenerating interest in AM radio when his program, The Rush Limbaugh Show, became nationally syndicated in 1988. By the mid-1990s, his program was attracting more than 11 million weekly listeners and still holds steady today, with roughly 14 million listeners each week. For most of the past 2 decades, the show has been ranked by the media research group Arbitron as the most popular radio talk show in the United States. Limbaugh is compensated handsomely for his success; in 2001, he agreed to an 8-year contract in the amount of $285 million, a salary unprecedented in American radio.

For regularly reaching and captivating such a large portion of the electorate, Limbaugh is credited by many pundits with playing an instrumental role in the 1994 Republican takeover of Congress, as well as George W. Bush's defeat of Senator John McCain in the 2000 Republican presidential primary and the subsequent defeat of Vice President Al Gore in the general election. For reasons such as these, Time magazine described Limbaugh as "one of the most influential entertainers in the history of the country," in its 2004 survey of the most important people in the United States.

During the presidential election year of 1992 and throughout the years of the Clinton administration, Limbaugh's popularity hit record highs among discontented conservatives. In addition to his radio juggernaut, he published a book titled The Way Things Ought to Be that instantly became a national bestseller, and he also starred in a televised talk show, Rush Limbaugh: Talent on Loan From God, which for a time entered more than 2 million homes five days a week.

For nearly 20 years Limbaugh's conservative irreverence has delighted sympathizers on the right and infuriated opponents on the left. Not one for soft tones, he has in years past referred to feminists as "Feminazis" and to animal rights advocates as "eco-wackos," and branded prominent American liberals with the epithet "Commie-Libs."

Limbaugh began his career in broadcast journalism as a teenager in the 1960s in his home state of Missouri. After dropping out of college in the early '70s, he moved to Pittsburgh, where he worked as a disc jockey for a top-40 radio station. In 1984, Limbaugh received an important break and was hired and given his own platform by KFBK in Sacramento. In 1987 the Federal Communications Commission under President Ronald Reagan repealed the fairness doctrine—a law dictating that AM radio stations give equal time to more than one side of an issue as well as response time to persons individually attacked on the air—a reversal that led to Limbaugh's national syndication the following year.

Justin D. Martin

See also Conservative, Conservatism; Radio, Politics and

Further Readings

Hammer, J. (1992, September 28). Welcome to Rush's world. Newsweek, p. 50.

Rush Limbaugh: Talk radio's big mouth. (2001, November). Columbia Journalism Review [40th Anniversary Issue], p. 116.

Starr, P. (2004, March). Reclaiming the air. American Prospect, p. 57.

Talk-radio meets rock-TV. (1992, September 5). Economist, p. 60.

Limited Effects Theory

Limited effects theory is an approach to mass media effects that claims the media have limited effects on their audiences and/or on society. This theoretical approach emerged in the late 1940s and early 1950s in large part because of a team of researchers at Columbia University (Paul Lazarsfeld, Bernard Berelson, and Hazel Gaudet) who conducted a series of studies in Erie County, Ohio, to learn how and why people decided to vote as they did. The Erie County Study employed a longitudinal research design interviewing the same 600 participants seven times during the 1940 presidential campaign.

The results of the study indicated limited effects with regard to the influence of media exposure leading to a change in vote intention from one candidate to the other. Rather, they concluded that media exposure led to a reinforcement of voting choice as "correct" among participants instead of a change in vote intention. The media messages over the course of the campaign, instead of serving to move voters toward a decision, were mostly valuable to support a voter's decision regarding for whom to vote. Additionally, the study conclusions indicated that people tend to seek out communication messages that are in line with their personal opinions and perspective, while those messages that are in contrast with one's opinion are discarded or avoided. This notion of selective exposure was further explained by Joseph T. Klapper, an influential author in support of the limited effects theory.

Klapper's book, The Effects of Mass Communication (1960), brought together the various writings and studies conducted on the effects of the mass media and argued that they supported the limited effects perspective. In his book, Klapper claims that persuasive messages in the mass media tend to function more frequently as an agent of reinforcement rather than an agent of change. Among the effects of the mass media noted, Klapper also discusses the "self-protective" measures taken by people in their exposure to the mass media. He notes that people will have selective exposure to mass communication that supports their opinions and interests, selective perception in how they process the messages from mass media, and selective retention in choosing to remember those messages that support their opinions. This notion of selective exposure to communication is one of the most important ideas to emerge from the limited effects perspective.

While Lazarsfeld and his colleagues conducted their study in 1940, during the presidential election between the Republican Wendell Willkie and the Democratic incumbent Franklin D. Roosevelt, it would take several years for them to publish their results due to the large amount of data they had to synthesize by hand. During this time, several other studies took place that supported and expounded upon the limited effects theory.

The limited effects approach contrasted with the then-dominant theoretical approaches of the "magic bullet" model or the "hypodermic needle" model of mass communication. These approaches claimed that when a message reached its audience, it would exert powerful and uniform effects on each person who processed the message. The "strong effects" approach had generally been advocated by researchers in their approach to studying the mass media, and many researchers continued with this approach throughout the 1950s, as the limited effects approach was gaining popularity among researchers.

As this theory was in its infancy, a major development in mass communication took place with television's arrival in mainstream society. The advent of the television and its subsequent placement in American households forced mass media research to examine the influence of this new medium.

Other studies in this perspective have found that the effect of media vary according to the perceived prestige of the communication source. The propaganda in Nazi Germany demonstrated that the more control an entity has over the mass media, the more likely it is that public opinion can be changed in the desired direction. Additionally, the salience of the issues or subject matter to the audience can affect the likelihood of the influence of persuasive messages. Using the limited effects approach to mass communication, several researchers have examined political communication to determine the influence of political communication on the electorate. For instance, research tends to indicate that modern political campaigns reach the politically interested and converted, which supports the selective exposure theory.

The pure limited effects theory and approach to mass communication was relatively short-lived. In the late 1960s and throughout the 1970s, many researchers returned to a theory advancing stronger, more powerful effects of the mass media. However, researchers tend to agree that the media do not have all powerful effects on audiences, but rather the effects are mediated by a number of different things. Current research on media effects tends to operate through a multilevel effects paradigm and an understanding of various types of media effects. For instance, contemporary research is concerned with such things as macro- and microlevel effects; content-specific or diffuse-general effects; and attitudinal, behavioral, or cognitive effects.

Jenifer L. Lewis

See also Selective Processes, Exposure, Perception, Memory

Further Readings

Klapper, J. T. (1960). The effects of mass communication. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.

Lazarsfeld, P. F., Berelson, B., & Gaudet, H. (1948). The people's choice. New York: Columbia University Press.

Sparks, G. G. (2006). Media effects research: A basic overview (2nd ed.). Belmont, CA: Thompson Wadsworth.

Lippmann, Walter (1889–1974)

Walter Lippmann was one of the first political observers to identify and analyze the role of the media in shaping the opinions of the public. During his long career, he worked as a journalist, served in the national government, helped found the New Republic magazine, and wrote a syndicated national column. He is best known for his book, Public Opinion, published in 1922. When Lippmann contended in this famous book that news media provide the "pictures in our heads" that are more important than the reality of the "world outside," he primarily applied his discussions to the print media. Many scholars and political professionals have found Lippmann's observations to be just as relevant to television and electronic media.

In Public Opinion, Lippmann built his case for the power of the media to influence public opinion on several major concepts. An underlying principle of Lippmann's perspective on the role of the media and public opinion was based on his view that the public was an ill-informed mass whose opinions on policy matters could not be trusted. Lippmann's view of the public, which is further elaborated in The Phantom Public in 1925, resulted in an ongoing feud with educator John Dewey, who thought Lippmann's elitist views were unduly pessimistic about democracy.

Lippmann is also credited with a useful discussion of how the media facilitate the development of stereotypes that often then serve to guide the public's interpretations and reactions to individuals and events. However, Lippmann's most enduring contribution to the study of public opinion and political communication was his conceptualization of the media's ability to shape how the public thinks and feels. Lippmann was a strong critic of the media's power to select some events over others for communication to the public. His descriptions of this selectivity process and its influence on the public were a clear precursor to later agenda-setting theories.

It is also clear that Lippmann should be credited with laying the groundwork for the modern discussions of media framing in political communication. Lippmann argued in Public Opinion that the way the media choose to present events and ideas to the public has a strong influence on how the public comes to feel about these events and ideas. The title of the first chapter in Public Opinion is "The World Outside and the Pictures in Our Heads." Since the book's publication in 1922, this phrase has been used to describe the idea that most members of the public have little direct experience of most of what happens in the world and consequently must rely on the media's representations in order to understand and perceive the world around them—to form the pictures that represent reality.

Lynda Lee Kaid

See also Framing; Journalism, Political; Public Communication in Politics; Public Opinion

Further Readings

Kaid, L. L. (2004). An analysis of the impact of Lippmann's Public Opinion. Journalism Studies, 5(3), 409–411.

Lippmann, W. (1922). Public opinion. New York: Macmillan.

Lobbying, Lobbyist

A lobbyist is a professional expert or an ordinary citizen who advocates the social, economic, and political interests of public and private groups to legislators. Lobbyists target senators, House representatives, and judges and often involve themselves in legislative and executive processes. Professional lobbyists have skillful methods of connecting with government officials. About half of politicians who leave formal political positions become lobbyists.

Lobbying is the process of influencing politics. During campaign periods and legislative terms, organizations, political unions, companies, and individuals spend millions and even billions of dollars lobbying their interests to government officials and decision makers. There are thousands of interest groups appealing to each single issue regarding the budget, health care, transportation, energy, and defense.

Types of Lobbying

There are two types of lobbying. Inside or professional lobbying takes place within government through direct contact with politicians. This form of lobbying includes meeting with legislative and executive politicians, directly negotiating with policymakers, and providing professional information to political decision makers. Outside or citizen lobbying occurs outside the center of politics via indirect political contacts. This type of lobbying includes media reportage, establishing political coalitions and local political contacts, organizing rallies, and letter writing campaigns. Outside lobbying is often used to coordinate inside lobbying, since citizen lobbying initiates political relationships.

There are two federal lobbying regulations: one is 31 USC, Section 1352 (the Byrd Amendment), which prohibits the use of federal funds to engage in lobbing activities; the other is 2 USC, Section 1605, which specifies the registration and semiannual reporting of lobbyist activities. According to the Lobby Disclosure Act of 1995, publics are allowed to view filings received by the Office of Public Records. After several lobbying scandals, including the Jack Abramoff controversy, in which Abramoff pled guilty to five criminal felonies of corruption and bribery, the Legislative Transparency and Accountability Act of 2006 was initiated. The bill restricts lobbyists from bribing politicians and requires the disclosure of more details on lobbyist activities. However, the bill does not prevent firms or organizations from giving politicians gifts and funded trips.

Through transparent political processes, such as open meetings, disclosure of financial statements, freedom of information legislation, and budgetary audits, the public and government sectors can check illegal political activities. Media transparency can also reduce illegal lobbying practices by providing the public with multiple information sources as well as publicizing funding and other political transitions.

Hyun Jung Yun

See also Interest Groups in Politics; Issue Management

Further Readings

Ainsworth, S. (1993). Regulating lobbyists and interest group influence. Journal of Politics, 55(1), 41–56.

Center for Responsive Politics. (n.d.). Lobbying Database. Available at http://www.opensecrets.org/lobbyists/

Hunter, K. G., Wilson, L. A., & Brunk, G. G. (1991). Societal complexity and interest group lobbying in the American states. Journal of Politics, 53(2), 488–503.

Loukanov, Andrey (1938–1996)

Andrey Loukanov was a member of the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP), which after 1990 was renamed the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP). Born a Soviet citizen, he was the grandson of Todor Loukanov (1874–1946), who was killed during Stalin's repressions, and son of Karlo Loukanov (1897–1982), a fighter in the International Brigades in Spain (1939), foreign minister (1956–1962), and, briefly, deputy prime minister of Bulgaria (1956–1957).

Andrey Loukanov graduated with a university degree in international affairs in Moscow in 1963. He was a member of Parliament (1976–1996), member of the Central Committee (CC) of the BCP (1977–1989), representative of Bulgaria at the United Nations and Council of Ministers of Foreign Affairs (CMEA). He also served as deputy prime minister (1976–1986) and first deputy prime minister (1986–1987), as well as minister of foreign economic affairs of Bulgaria (1987–1989).

In 1944 the BCP became the leading power in the political and public life of the country and was orientated toward the building of socialism, following the experience of the USSR. That was a period of success in the socioeconomic and cultural development of the country. Along with that, the BCP established a monopoly over the executive power, ideology, and information. It was a time of many deformations that led the country to a grave economic, political, moral, and psychological crisis. Andrey Loukanov was one of the main engineers of the deposition of Todor Zhivkov, secretary general of the CC of the BCP, on November 10, 1989. He was also a major driving force of the subsequent political changes by organizing a round table with the toddling opposition.

After Zhivkov was removed from his posts, the country commenced its transition to a democratic social system and market economy. Since 1990, BSP has been invariably represented at the National Assembly and has formed four governments—two with Andrey Loukanov as prime minister (1990), one under Zhan Videnov (1995–1997), and one under Sergey Stanishev (since 2005)—and a president, Georgi Purvanov (since 2001), was elected from its ranks for two consecutive terms of office.

The first government under Andrey Loukanov lasted for 7 months. After the elections for a Grand National Assembly in June 1990, Andrey Loukanov formed a second government, but 3 months later had to resign, owing to the public discontent with the grave economic crisis in the country. That period resulted in the expression "Loukanov's winter."

It has been assumed that Loukanov was connected with some influential circles in Russia, as well as with the process of draining out the government funds into some BCP-related companies that started in the mid-1980s. Gradually, Loukanov withdrew from the limelight of political life, though the press ascribed to him a major role in some economic gains on an international scale. Since 1994 he was partner and president of the Russian-Bulgarian Topenergy Joint Venture. In October 1996, he was assassinated in front of his house in Sofia, which further intensified the rumors about his connections with organized crime. The assassins and the commissioners of his assassination remained undisclosed.

Lilia Raycheva

Further Readings

Detchev, T. (2003). Evolution of the model of industrial relations in Bulgaria 1989–2000. South East Europe Review, 6, 45–68.

Vazrzonovcev, D. (1990–1991). "Autobiography" of the Bulgarian transition. Retrieved July 5, 2007, from http://formulata.hit.bg/kniga.html

Encyclopedia of POLITICAL COMMUNICATION

Volume 2

Lynda Lee Kaid
University of Florida

Christina Holtz-Bacha
University of Erlangen-Nürnberg

A SAGE Reference Publication

M

Machiavelli, Niccolò (1469–1527)

Niccolò Machiavelli, quite possibly the single most influential political writer of all time, was born in Florence, Italy. In 1518, he published his literary masterpiece, The Prince, and has been associated with authoritarianism and government's cynical manipulation of its citizens ever since. This was, and is, unfair to Machiavelli, since his later writings (Discourses on Livy) pointed to a much more democratic and fair-minded individual. Regardless of his true feelings, his influence created two new words for the international lexicon: Machiavellian and Machiavellianism.

Machiavelli started his career in the Florentine government as a secretary, though his innate ability soon allowed him the opportunity to become involved with diplomacy. Although he met many important personages, none influenced him more than Cesare Borgia, a prince of the papal states and the model used for The Prince. From all accounts, Borgia was a cruel and heartless tyrant though wily and clever. Machiavelli did not agree with Borgia's methods or philosophy; he felt that Borgia could unite Italy—a situation Machiavelli longed for. However, when the republic was overthrown, Lorenzo de' Medici became the ruler. Lorenzo did not trust Machiavelli because of his support for the Republic and in 1513 had him thrown into prison and tortured. Afterward, he was banished to his estate at San Casciano.

The Prince was written as an effort to gain favor with Italy's new rulers, and Machiavelli dedicated the book to the Medicis. Unfortunately, Lorenzo disliked the book, and the Italian public detested it. They could not understand how anyone could think such cruel and unjust thoughts. In essence, The Prince was politics estranged from ethics; that is, one does whatever it takes to gain power and then maintains that power in any way possible. Everything else is secondary, whether it is morality, Christianity, or relationship. The only morality a leader needs is having the skills and the wherewithal to remain in power by any means necessary. Today, as in the 16th century, most people assume that Machiavelli was a proponent of totalitarian dictatorships, not realizing that when The Prince was written, Italy was in danger from foreign invaders. In Machiavelli's opinion, what was needed to save his country from destruction was a man with an iron will. Contrary to public opinion, Machiavelli was considered by individuals who knew him well to be both religious and moral.

The examples given by Machiavelli in The Prince are considered failures. In fact, the book continually points out that if a ruler makes mistakes, or miscalculates the populace in any way, all of the power and authority he has gained up to that point will be lost. Leaders are successful if they have the moral strength to rule the populace coldly and efficiently. Moreover, since the world is inherently volatile and governmental power is often a chimera, the wise leader is one who takes whatever he can and feels no pangs of conscience if someone is hurt.

Cary Stacy Smith and Li-Ching Hung

Further Readings

Machiavelli, N., Viroli, M., & Bondanella, P. (2005). The prince. New York: Oxford World's Classics.

Villari, P. (2004). The life and times of Niccolò Machiavelli. Honolulu, HI: University Press of the Pacific.
Viroli, M., & Shugaar, A. (2002). Niccolò's smile: A biography of Machiavelli. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux.

MALCOLM X

See MINORITIES, ROLE IN POLITICS

MANCINI, PAOLO (1948–)

Paolo Mancini is a specialist in political communication whose work focuses on comparative analysis of the relation between mass media and political systems. He has written numerous works on media and politics in Italy, studies comparing American and Italian television news and, with Daniel Hallin, a comparative study of media and politics in Western Europe and North America, Comparing Media Systems: Three Models of Media and Politics (2004). He edited with David Swanson an anthology on the transformation of election campaigns around the world, and he has contributed to a number of international studies of journalists and news media.

Much of Mancini's work has been concerned with questions of how to theorize the distinctive character of the Italian media. From the point of view of the dominant theories of media and politics, he has argued, Italian media appear as a case of retarded development. From the point of view of structural-functional theories of modernization, for example, Italian mass media appear as less modern in the sense that they are less differentiated from other social structures. Italian media have always been closely linked to the political system. Journalists often have political ties and move back and forth between journalism and more explicitly political roles. Media owners, similarly, are deeply involved in politics and frequently see media more as a political instrument than purely as a business. Media outlets have clear points of view, and reporting and commentary are often combined. Public broadcasting has been part of the lottizzazione through which power is shared among political parties.

But it is not enough, Mancini argues, to understand the Italian media by contrasting them with normative models derived from the American case, which stress political neutrality and separation between market-based media and political actors. Instead, it is necessary to understand the distinctive functions media play within the Italian system, with its rich plurality of intermediating institutions like political parties, social movements, trade unions, and interest groups. The media are crucial to the process by which these groups bargain and compete, mobilize their constituencies, compromise and share power. Their political function is more one of horizontal communication among these actors than of vertical communication, mediating between individualized citizens and the state.

Mancini is professor in the Dipartamento Istituzionie Società in the Faculty of Political Science of the University of Perugia, director of the Interuniversity Center of Political Communication, and academic director of the School of Broadcast Journalism run by the Italian public broadcaster, RAI. He has also served on a panel that monitors compliance with rules on political pluralism in Italian broadcasting.

Daniel C. Hallin

Further Readings

Hallin, D. C., & Mancini, P. (2004). Comparing media systems: Three models of media and politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
Swanson, D. L., & Mancini, P. (Eds.). (1996). Politics, media, and modern democracy: An international study of innovations in electoral campaigning and their consequences. Westport, CT: Praeger.
Negrine, R., Mancini, P., Holtz-Bacha, C., & Papathanassopoulos, S. (Eds.). (2007). The professionalisation of political communication. Bristol, UK: Intellect Books.

MANDELA, NELSON (1918–)

The man who would eventually become the first president of a truly democratic South Africa was born in rural Transkei in 1918. Close to Xhosa royalty, he received a privileged education at a mission school and then at the South African Native College at Fort Hare. Although modest in size and facilities, Fort Hare had become an academic center for the nation's African population. It attracted the academic elite as well as many with radical political ideas.

In 1941, Nelson Mandela left Fort Hare for Johannesburg. He worked as a clerk in a progressive white law firm while pursing his legal education at the University of Witwatersrand. He gradually was drawn into increasing political activism within the contexts of the South African Communist Party and the African National Congress (ANC). Mandela, at this point and later, pursed principles, not a party line. As a result, he did not adhere to any single group's agenda, and he sought allies in his emerging crusade on behalf of black South Africans wherever he might find them, including in white liberal circles.

A government crackdown on the activities of the ANC led to Mandela's arrest and trial for treason. The trial was lengthy. During its years, Mandela continued his radical activism under the pseudonym "The Black Pimpernel" and tried to broker the disagreement over tactics that would split what was now the anti-apartheid movement into the ANC and the more violent Pan African Congress. The Sharpeville demonstrations in 1960 hardened government attitudes, and Mandela, although acquitted in the lengthy treason trial, was arrested and convicted of inciting a riot in 1962 and was again arrested and convicted of sabotage and attempting to overthrow the state in 1963. In June 1964, Mandela began serving his life sentence on Robben Island.

"Free Mandela" became a rallying cry of anti-apartheid activists globally as his imprisonment became a symbol of South Africa's oppression of its nonwhite population. In 1980, the United Nations Security Council called for his release. With external pressure against South Africa mounting, discussions began between Mandela and Presidents P. W. Botha and F. W. de Klerk. In early 1990, Mandela was released. He then assumed ANC party office and embarked on a speaking tour of 14 foreign nations. Upon his return, tense discussions began between the ruling National Party and the ANC, culminating in the National Peace Accord of 1991. For their work brokering this accord, Mandela and de Klerk were awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1993.

In April 1994, Mandela was elected president of South Africa. He served for 5 years, during which he traveled widely in South Africa and abroad and spoke to a wide variety of audiences.

Theodore F. Sheckels

Further Readings

Lodge, T. (2003). Politics in South Africa: From Mandela to Mbeki. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Sampson, A. (1999). Mandela: The authorized biography. New York: Knopf.

Sheckels, T. F. (2001). The rhetoric of Nelson Mandela: A qualified success. Howard Journal of Communications, 12, 85–99.

Mandelson, Peter (1953–)

Although a controversial figure, few would deny that Peter Mandelson had a key role in the creation of New Labour, and that he greatly contributed to the transformation of British political communication, driving the changes in the relationship between policy and presentation and in media management. The "Prince of Darkness," as he became known, grew to be one of Prime Minister Tony Blair's most trusted political, media, and campaign advisers.

Mandelson was the grandchild of Labour Minister Herbert Morrison. He was active in politics from his youth and was elected to the London Council of Lambeth in 1979. Disappointed with the power of the extreme left, in 1982 he went to work for London Weekend Television (LWT), which gave him both inside knowledge of the media and important contacts.

In 1985 he became Labour's director of communications. He formed the Shadow Communication Agency, from which professional advertisers and pollsters advised the party; he also led the redesign of Labour's corporate identity, including the replacement of the red flag with a red rose. In 1987 Mandelson was a driving force in what, until then, was considered the most professionalized Labour campaign. Although an electoral failure, it was regarded by many as a remarkable communication success and it gave Mandelson an almost mythical reputation. However, his utter loyalty to the leader, even if it meant briefing against party colleagues, disdain for the party structure, and his litigious relationship with journalists, who were often bullied both directly and through persistent complaints to their bosses, gained him enemies in the party and the media. This would become a trademark of his career.

He resigned in 1990 to fight for a parliamentary seat. He was elected as a member of Parliament (MP) in 1992 but played only a minimal role in the national campaign, which Labour lost. However, he had now become a close ally and media advisor to Blair and MP Gordon Brown. After John Smith's death, Mandelson took a pivotal but covert role in Blair's leadership campaign and then, more openly, in the party's "modernization," culminating in the 1997 New Labour landside.

In 1997 Blair named Mandelson as minister without portfolio, giving him direct access to the prime minister and considerable influence on Blair's policy decisions; he also continued to be central to policy presentation and media management, with a belligerence that provoked more resentment now that Labour was in office. In 1998 he became trade and industry secretary and in late 1999 secretary for Northern Ireland. In both cases, although later cleared of wrongdoing, he had to resign due to scandal. However, he continued routinely to advise the prime minister from the backbenches. In 2004 Mandelson was appointed EU (European Union) trade commissioner, which confirmed Blair's enduring trust in his skills. However, despite Blair's belief that Labour would only be truly modernized when it had learned to love Mandelson, he still has more enemies than allies.

Ana Inés Langer

See also Blair, Tony; Labour Party, Britain

Further Readings

Gould, P. (2001). The unfinished revolution. London: Abacus.
Macintyre, D. (2000). Mandelson and the making of New Labour. London: HarperCollins.

Mao Zedong (1893–1976)

Mao Zedong was the first-generation leader of the Chinese Communist Party. He helped found the party and later the People's Republic of China. In China, he is renowned as a party and national leader, military strategist, poet, and political writer. All these roles granted him opportunities for political communication. As a party leader, he successfully engaged the party in seizing political power through military struggles with their enemies and then establishing the People's Republic of China in 1949. As a national leader, he launched a series of political movements that culminated in the Cultural Revolution, for various reasons ranging from removing his political opponents to reforming Chinese culture. His poems vented his political dreams. In his political writings, he elaborated the party's positions, policies, missions, and political theories, which constitute Mao Zedong Thought, the political ideology of the party in Mao's era. His most important writings are included in the five volumes of Selected Works of Mao Tse-tung (1967), which were compiled by the Chinese government.

In his writings Mao elaborated the principle of democratic centralism, which is essential to political communication in China. Although it was borrowed from the Soviets, because of Mao's elaborations, the term has unique meaning in the Chinese context. Four themes can be discerned in Mao's writings on democratic centralism. First, democracy is practiced and constrained within a hierarchy. As a hierarchy, a political system has many levels of representation. Democracy at a lower level is supervised by a central authority, which exists at a higher level. For most people, democratic participation is restrained to just one level. Second, democracy is practiced in order to enhance the hierarchy. Democracy is practiced within the party, or its organizations such as the army, only to strengthen its power base. Third, democracy is embedded in class struggle. In this regard, democracy is of an in-group nature. Only in-group members can have the right of democracy. Thus, inner-party democracy is a privilege in China's political agenda. Fourth, democracy is rhetorical in that it helps to sell the party and helps it to gain power. Because of its everlasting appeal to the populace, democracy is often used strategically for political campaigns that aim at some political gains, including but not limited to removing political opponents. Democracy as manifested in these four themes guides the party's operations in cases of leadership selection, decision making, policy making, and relationship building. In most cases, when the two ends are not aligned with each other, usually the democracy end concedes to the centralism end.

In addition to his theoretical contribution to the principle of democratic centralism, Mao showed great expertise in political mobilization. This is manifest in the political campaigns recorded in the party's history. His major role was to set up a tone for these campaigns through which his political messages effectively got across to the masses. Besides media, meetings were a favorite means of political mobilization. These techniques of political communication were effectively employed during the Cultural Revolution, a campaign that the Chinese government now deems as being more destructive than constructive.

Canchu Lin

See also China, Media and Politics in; Chinese Cultural Revolution

Further Readings

Mao, T. (1967). Selected works of Mao Tse-tung. Beijing: Foreign Languages Press.

Marx, Karl (1818–1883)

Karl Marx was born in Trier, Germany, and originated from a Jewish family. His parents were very much attached to the values of humanism, the European Enlightenment, and French socialism. Following his father's advice, Marx started studying jurisprudence, but soon he discovered that he was more attracted to philosophy. Between 1836 and 1841 he studied philosophy in Berlin in an intellectual atmosphere that was still dominated by Hegelian philosophy. His doctoral thesis was on the difference between Democritus's and Epicurus's natural philosophy. After his studies he worked as the chief editor of the Rheinische Zeitung, but because of its left-wing radical views the paper was soon banned. He went to Paris, where he met his friend Friedrich Engels (1820–1895) in 1844. From this point on, nearly everything they produced was more or less a common work.

The aim of Marx was to develop a total critique of capitalism by analyzing its inner logic (immanent critique). It is sometimes suggested that there is a shift or even a break between his early and later works, but his entire work may well be seen as a continuation and development of his original aim. He pursued the same question: What is the foundation of a total critique of capitalism? The essence of Marx's whole work is expressed best in his famous 11th thesis on Feuerbach. He asserts that the philosophers have only interpreted the world in various ways; the point, however, is to change it. This statement of Marx's is often interpreted in a pure actionist sense, as if Marx were discarding philosophy. However, Marx never gave up philosophy. Rather, he wanted to rescue philosophy from its abstract form and get it involved in practical issues. His program to change the world has two interwoven aims: to revolutionize philosophy and all the rest of theoretical fields and to change the world with the revolutionized scientific-philosophical method. The term critique therefore assumes a central role in his work. He starts with the critique jurisprudence, continues with the critique of philosophy, and over the critique of politics he arrives at the critique of political economy. The critique of political economy is, then, the basis from which he wants to develop his total critique of capitalist social formation, including the state, moral, legal system. Some scholars therefore aptly suggest studying Marx's work from the Capital and viewing his earlier works from this more mature work.

Two concepts are essential to understand Marx's system: dialectical and historical materialism. Dialectic is an ancient Greek concept but may also be found in the philosophy of other civilizations. It is a theory of logic that wants to reflect the structure and the development of the world. The most comprehensive system of dialectic was developed by Hegel in its idealist form. It is a theory of the motion of the terms. Marx arrives at his theory of logic by reversing the Hegelian system. It is therefore called dialectical materialism. It wants to explain genesis of the motion in the world from within. It implies that there are laws of motion that govern nature, society, and thought. These fundamental laws concern the nature of natural and social phenomena. Dialectical materialism suggests, first, that every natural and social phenomenon may be seen as a unity of opposing qualities. The contradiction or struggle between these opposing qualities is then the cause of motion. It supposes that, second, this motion proceeds from gradual quantitative changes to a revolutionary change of quality. It assumes that, third, in this process of revolutionary change there is a permanent process of negation, which brings about new qualities.

Historical materialism is the application of dialectic to society and social history. It implies that the production of the means of subsistence is prerequisite for human history and assumes a complex set of factors that are responsible for the changes in the history of humankind. The change in the history of society derives, on the one hand, from the appropriation or humanization of nature by means of labor, and, on the other hand, from social class struggles in a given society. It explains the genesis of the state, religion, metaphysics, morality, and system of law (superstructure) by referring to the material relationships (structure) prevailing in a given society. According to Marx (and Engels), every social formation has its specific form of the production of the means of subsistence, which also establishes its adequate ideological superstructure.

The most well-known explanation of Marx's economic theories is embodied in his treatise, Das Kapital. The first volume, which provides an attack on capitalism and the exploitation of the laboring classes, was published in 1867.

Doğan Göçmen

Further Readings

Engels, F. (1954). Anti-Duhring: Herr Eugen Duhring's revolution of science. London: Lawrence & Wishart.

Jackson, T. A. (1936). Dialectics: The logic of Marxism and its critics—An essay in exploration. London: Lawrence & Wishart.

Marx, K. (1938). The German ideology. London: Lawrence & Wishart.

Marx, K., & Engels, F. (1977). The communist manifesto. In D. McLellan (Ed.), K. Marx, selected writings (pp. 221–247). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Mass Nonviolent Protest, Australia

Citizens invoke mass nonviolent protest when they are blocked from successfully communicating their messages to government, either because of a government's hostility to the message or because governments feel that such ideas are not supported by a sufficiently large section of the population. Mass protest serves either to pressure the government to change policy or to heighten awareness of the issue among the general population in order to effect policy changes.

This has been a regular characteristic of new social movement activity in Australia during the past 40 years. These movements include those against the Vietnam War in the late 1960s and early '70s (especially the Vietnam Moratorium movement in 1970 when 100,000 people marched in Melbourne alone), the campaign against the Franklin Dam in the early '80s, the anti-uranium and nuclear disarmament campaigns of the '70s and '80s, the Reconciliation movement culminating in the Sorry Day marches by one million Australians in the year 2000, and large protests of a similar scale against the Iraq War in 2003. Despite the spectacular successes of campaigns like the Franklin, the fact that some protest movements are able to mobilize very large numbers does not, however, guarantee their success. Both the Sorry Day and anti–Iraq War campaigns failed to move the conservative Howard government away from existing policies.

Many Australian nonviolent protest actions are influenced by the teachings and practice of Gandhi. The campaign against the damming of the Franklin River, for example, specifically adopted such Gandhian techniques as training activists in nonviolent theory and practice despite its scale of more than 1,000 participants.

Mass protest actions are seldom controlled by one organization, however, and are usually coalitions of many different groups that tend to find common ground around several key demands. When mass protest actions incorporate nonviolent direct action and civil disobedience, these are usually carried out by autonomous or semiautonomous groups within the overall framework of the movement. There is sometimes a degree of tension between the movement leadership seeking legitimacy and the direct action groups, not all of whom embrace nonviolence, such as in the antiglobalization protests at the World Economic Forum in Melbourne in 2000.

Mass protest activity has become an important component of democratic practice in Australia and many other countries. Despite its long historical antecedents in the Western tradition, the right to protest had to be reasserted in Australia following the Cold War; nonviolence was essential to public and governmental acceptance of this expression of dissent. Mass protests are a dynamic part of civil society and mobilize the energies of many thousands of people. If their activities are accompanied by appropriate media coverage, lobbying of decision makers and the dispassionate analysis of the merits of the protesters' demands by government, then they can consolidate and deepen citizens' identification with democratic values and democratic governance.

Libby Connors and Drew Hutton

Further Readings

Burgmann, V. (2003). Power, profit and protest: Australian social movements and globalization. Crows Nest, NSW, Australia: Allen & Unwin.

Gordon, M. (2001). Reconciliation: A journey. Sydney: University of New South Wales Press.

Hutton, D., & Connors, L. (1999). A history of the Australian environment movement. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Mass Political Behavior

In democracies, the study of mass political behavior focuses attention on voting decisions, voter turnout, and unconventional political behavior. Each is reviewed in turn in this entry. Generally speaking, there are three approaches to understanding voting: the sociological model, the social-psychological model, and the rational voter model.

The Sociological Model

Early voting studies, conducted in the 1940s and 1950s, were carried out at Columbia University and were characterized by their sociological approach, which placed an emphasis on group characteristics in determining the vote. In these early studies, Lazarsfeld and colleagues examined voters in Erie County, Ohio, and Elmira, New York. They developed an index of political predispositions that were related to voting decisions. Such demographic characteristics as education, income, class, religion, and rural or urban residence explained the vote.

Another important notion that the Columbia school put forth is that voters often rely on opinion leaders, or other citizens who are highly motivated to follow politics, for information. Opinion leaders were the second step in what the Columbia school called the "two-step flow of communication," in which voters receive information from the media but also from informed citizens who have digested the media's information and then related it to others.

The Social-Psychological Model

With the publication of The American Voter in 1960, scholars took a social-psychological approach to voting. The social-psychological model, also known as the "Michigan model," considers three important factors in an individual's vote choice: party identification, candidate evaluations, and issue preferences. Of these elements, party identification was the most important. Party identification was conceptualized as an affective attachment to a particular political party. The affinity for a party is often developed early through the socialization process. Parents transmit partisanship to their children much the same way they instill values. Michigan researchers argued that one's partisan affiliation was stable and lasted over a lifetime. Later research called these assumptions into question. Rather than being an unchanging attachment, partisanship was seen as responding to the political environment. Morris Fiorina famously called this a "running tally," in which partisanship can be influenced to a certain extent by the issues of the day and the past performance of the parties.

The social-psychological model downplays the importance of issue preference. Decades of research has demonstrated that voters are uninformed or even misinformed about politics, so some scholars came to doubt whether voters could actually vote on the basis of issue positions. This led many to speculate that democracy was in trouble because the voters were "fools."

The Rational Voter Model

The reputation of voters was rescued to some extent by the rational choice approach. Unlike the proponents of Michigan studies, political scientist V. O. Key argued that the voter is a "rational god of vengeance and of reward." That is, voters evaluate the incumbent's performance over the past term and vote accordingly. Anthony Downs argued in his seminal work, An Economic Theory of Democracy, that voters take into account past performance, but Downs's model differs from Key's because he contends that voters are making calculations about the future performance of a party based on the past. The foundation of Downs's model is the notion, imported from economics, that voters act in a rational manner. By rational, Downs means that voters are able to make a decision when confronted with a range of alternatives. Further, the alternatives can be ranked so that each is either a preferred choice, indifferent choice, or an inferior alternative to the other, and the preference ranking is transitive. Finally, the candidate chosen was ranked highest in the ordering, and the voter would make the same decision again if confronted with the identical circumstances.

Based upon his understanding of a rational actor, Downs also laid out his expectations of "rational voting." Voters compare both parties and determine which would be most likely to pursue policies that would be favorable for the voter. To understand a voter's decision, we must consider the size of the current party differential. This is the difference between what the voter believes he actually received and what he would have received if the other party had been in power. A positive result means a vote for the incumbent; a negative value reflects a vote for the challenger. If the expected party differential is zero, then the voter would abstain because it would not matter who won the election—either party would be expected to pursue the same agenda. To vote with the expectation that the outcome of the election does not matter would not be rational because, as noted above, the act of voting itself is costly.

But on what information does the voter base his or her decision? Downs argues that the acquisition of knowledge is costly. Citizens will continue to acquire information until the costs of doing so outweigh the benefits, namely the importance of making a right rather than a wrong decision. To reduce the costs of obtaining information, Downs says that voters can (a) reduce their intake of information, but risk making a wrong decision because of it; (b) reduce the cost of obtaining the same information by using free sources such as government publications, party publications, interest group information, and television; or (c) rely on expert opinions. This last point can be traced back to the Columbia studies and their discovery of the importance of opinion leaders. Because each voter has such little influence, the returns on information are quite low, and it is completely rational to rely on free information. By using the advice of experts they respect, voters can reduce the costs of gaining information and make rational decisions that are the same as if they had been fully informed. In this way, voters might not know the issues, as demonstrated by the Michigan studies, but they can still make meaningful contributions to the democratic process by casting rational votes.

It has long been believed that the "state of the economy" is the most important variable in determining how voters vote in presidential elections. Voters who believe that the economy is moving in the right direction are likely to reward the incumbent president or party with their vote. Scholarly attention has focused on the best indicators to use for models of economic voting. Some models rely on indicators of the health of the national economy and look at macroeconomic variables as predictors of how the electorate will behave. Other "pocketbook" considerations look at the voter's assessment of his or her own economic situation.

Campaigns and Voting

In order to make their evaluations of the candidates and their eventual choices, voters gain information during campaigns. Campaigns actually help reduce the amount of time and energy needed to learn about elections by making information readily available. Campaigns expose voters to information about the differences between the candidates and increase the accuracy with which voters perceive the candidates. How then do campaigns influence voters? In addition to providing information, campaigns play an important agenda-setting role, because they focus attention on certain issues. Though campaigns may not always change the way people view issues, they can make some issues more prominent on the public agenda.

What about elections in which there is less information? Information is plentiful—even hard to avoid—during a presidential election, but elections for Congress and other offices are known as low-information elections. The costs, or time and effort required to become informed, are much higher. Voters can still reasonably operate in a low-information environment. They can take into account partisanship and information gleaned from their past experiences, daily life, the media, and political campaigns.

Voter Turnout

Americans vote at a low rate. In 1960, 63% of eligible voters actually voted. In recent years, a turnout rate hovering around 50% is common. Among democratic nations, the United States is near the bottom in voter turnout. The explanation for who votes and who stays home depends on a variety of factors: individual traits, societal factors, and institutional factors.

The Individual

Education is the best predictor of whether an individual votes. Those with a college education are far more likely to vote than those with a high school diploma are. Education leads to more interest in politics, a greater sense of civic responsibility as well as a sense of efficacy—the belief that an individual can make a difference. Education also increases the skills needed to become informed about politics. It is also more likely to make an individual familiar with how to go about registering to vote. Rising education levels in the United States have not led to higher turnout, however.

Instead, education has only slowed the decline. Turnout can be influenced by a person's occupation and income. Professionals and wealthier Americans are more likely to go to the polls than are the poor and unemployed. Older Americans are more likely to vote than younger Americans. Marriage also has an impact on the likelihood of voting, with married people casting ballots at higher rates than singles. Americans who strongly identify with a political party are more likely to go to the polls. Also, being contacted by one's party or a political campaign can make an individual more likely to vote. The increasing negativity of campaigns has led some scholars to conclude that the tone of campaigns can depress turnout. However, several studies have challenged this finding and offered an alternative view. Rather than causing voters to stay home, negative advertising may actually stimulate turnout.

Societal Factors

Voter turnout varies considerably among different generations in America. Those who became eligible to vote from 1932 to 1964 are known as the "New Deal" cohort. They are named after Roosevelt's campaign slogan. Members of this generation have always turned out in high numbers.

Baby boomers, who came of age in the era of the Vietnam War and Watergate, are less likely to vote than previous generations. Some scholars have concluded that this is due to a distaste for politics brought on by coming of age in such a tumultuous time, whereas others have implicated television and declining community involvement. The downward trend continued with the so-called GenXers, or those born between 1965 and 1980, who became eligible to vote between 1983 and 1998.

Institutional Factors

Strict voter registration laws have an impact on turnout levels. Voter registration laws vary from state to state. Due to their past history of discrimination, southern states have some of the strictest rules. Some states allow voters to register the same day they vote. Research indicates that most voters do not pay serious attention to campaigns until an election draws near. A potential voter could become motivated by events late in a campaign, when intensity peaks. Without the ability to register and vote on the same day, it is possible for citizens to miss the deadline to register when it is scheduled weeks before the election. This leaves out potential voters who have not planned in advance. Some states have experimented with extensive use of mail-in voting. As one might expect, the opportunity to vote by mail appears to have increased turnout by making voting more convenient. Voting by mail is also an antidote to the problem of voting on Tuesday, the day when U.S. elections are held. Many other democracies vote on a weekend or national holiday.

As previously noted, the United States has lower turnout than most other industrialized democracies. By contrast, many European nations have turnout rates around 75%. Since 1993, voters in the United States have been able to register to vote when they get a driver's license. Although motor-voter legislation has added millions of voters to the rolls, it has not resulted in a substantial increase in turnout. Many organizations, citizen groups, and media outlets have sought to increase turnout by launching voter registration drives, but even these efforts have been unable to reverse the general decline in participation.

Although voting is the most prevalent form of participation, unconventional forms of participation have a long history in the United States. From Boston Harbor to the Edmund Pettus Bridge, protests have been an important part of the political landscape. Protests and direct action were central to the successes of the civil rights movement. However, protests can backfire on participants as well, as Todd Gitlin has observed of the protests at the 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago. Instead of making the public more sympathetic to their cause, protests—especially violent ones—can turn the public against the protestors. A variety of factors have been identified that make an individual more likely to engage in protests. Among them are youth and being childless. Individuals are also more likely to take part in a protest if they are asked to do so.

Ann Gordon and Doug Spence

See also American Voter, The; Framing; Ideology; Negative Advertising; Party Identification; Two-Step Flow Model of Communication; Voter Behavior

Further Readings

Abramson, P. R., Aldrich, J. H., & Rohde, D. W. (2006). Change and continuity in the 2004 elections. Washington, DC: CQ Press.

Crotty, W. (1991). Political participation and American democracy, Westport, CT: Greenwood.

Downs, A. (1957). An economic theory of democracy. New York: Harper & Row.

Lazarsfeld, P., Berelson, B., & Gaudet, H. (1944). The people's choice: How the voter makes up his mind in a presidential campaign (3rd ed.). New York: Columbia University Press.

Miller, W. E., & Shanks, J. M. (1996). The new American voter. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
Popkin, S. (1994). The reasoning voter: Communication and persuasion in presidential campaigns. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
Teixeira, R. A. (1992). The disappearing American voter. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

MATALIN, MARY (1953–)

Mary Matalin is a well-known American Republican political consultant. Famous for her feisty personality and her marriage to Democratic consultant James Carville, Matalin has served as an advisor to numerous high-level Republicans, written several books, hosted her own television and radio political shows as well as routinely making the rounds on the Sunday morning news programs, and is currently running Threshold, a new conservative publishing imprint for Simon & Schuster.

After receiving a BA in political science from Western Illinois University in 1978, Matalin worked on local and state level campaigns until the Reagan Revolution took her to Washington, D.C., to work for the Republican National Committee (RNC). After a brief stint at Hofstra Law School, Matalin returned to Washington and held several senior positions on George H. W. Bush's presidential campaign in 1988. After he was elected, she returned to the RNC and was appointed chief of staff. Matalin served as deputy campaign manager during Bush's 1992 reelection campaign, where she had oversight of operations and organization in all 50 states. Her visibility increased dramatically during this time because of both her vocal support for President Bush and his policies and the appearance that she and then-beau Carville made in the documentary The War Room.

In George W. Bush's administration, Matalin served as both assistant to the president as well as counselor to Vice President Cheney until resigning her position in late 2003. She was the first to hold both titles simultaneously. Matalin has recently ventured into political campaigns again as the treasurer for Virginia Republican Senator George Allen's 2006 reelection campaign.

Always media savvy, Matalin was the host of CNN's Crossfire in 1993 as well as Equal Time on CNBC. Prior to that, she hosted her own weekly radio show on CBS. Matalin has authored two books: first, All's Fair: Love, War and Running for President (1994), coauthored with Carville, and most recently Letters to My Daughters (2004), which has appeared on both The New York Times and Washington Post bestsellers lists. Matalin and Carville both appeared on the short-lived K-Street (2003), an HBO series revolving around the world of political consultants. They have two daughters, Matalin "Matty" Carville and Emerson "Emma" Carville, and they reside in Virginia.

Michelle Honald

See also Carville, James

Further Readings

Matalin, M. (2004). Letters to my daughters. New York: Simon & Schuster.
Matalin, M., & Carville, J. (1994). All's fair: Love, war and running for president. New York: Touchstone.

MATCHING FUNDS

See CAMPAIGN FINANCE

MAZZOLENI, GIANPIETRO (1946–)

Gianpietro Mazzoleni is a professor at Università Statale di Milano. He was one of the first Italian scholars to discover the importance of the field of political communication. With his international activity and connections, Mazzoleni has put the Italian school at the heart of this newborn scientific area. Together with other colleagues, with the founding of Comunicazione Politica, the leading journal in the country for political communication studies, Mazzoleni has facilitated the creation of an autonomous scientific field, separating it from other older fields such as sociology, political science, and semiotics. Mazzoleni's presence at conferences and debates, as well as his involvement in teaching activities, has been of great importance in establishing a field that had previously lacked proper legitimation.

Mazzoleni's interest in political communication studies derives from his education in the United States. When back in Italy, he started to empirically analyze processes and phenomena that were, up to then, of no scientific interest. In the 1980s, Mazzoleni was able to understand the dramatic consequences that the birth and development of commercial television would have on politics and democracy. He empirically analyzed these changes, focusing first on media content and structure and later on the reception models while linking empirical data with deeper theoretical frameworks. His interests have been concerned with all the new forms of communication: political ads, the use of polls, and so on.

In 1998, Mazzoleni published the first edition of La comunicazione politica, the first Italian textbook devoted entirely to political communication. This publication has meant the official recognition of the importance of the field by one of the major Italian publishers, Il Mulino. With this book, university classes finally have appropriate material to develop an approach that is no longer based on improvisation and contaminated by other disciplines.

Recently, Mazzoleni has focused his interests on the consequences of media commercialization. He has written several journal articles on the personalization and dramatization of politics. The career of Italian media mogul and Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi provided Mazzoleni with interesting experiences and data that he put into a more general framework that he then compared with other countries, identifying similarities and differences.

Then, from media personalization, Mazzoleni easily moved to modern populism and the role that the media system has played in creating new figures of populist leaders and populist proposals. Here, too, Mazzoleni was prompted by the Berlusconi experience; he used Berlusconi as an example of a televised populist leader and then compared him with other foreign figures. The book he edited with other colleagues, The Media and Neo-Populism, published in 2003, gives the reader an almost complete overview of the consequences the mass media may have on transforming political life and debate.

Paolo Mancini

Further Readings

Mazzoleni, G., Stewart, J., & Horsfield, B. (Eds.). (2003). The media and neo-populism: A contemporary comparative analysis. Westport, CT: Praeger.

McCain, John (1936–)

The public ethos of Senator John S. McCain III (R-AZ) as a straight shooter has been shaped most principally by two events: his time as a prisoner of war and the savings and loan scandal of the 1980s. McCain entered the Navy and flew fighters during the Vietnam War. On October 26, 1967, he was shot down over Hanoi, breaking a knee and both arms but landing in a small lake. McCain spent more than 5 years in prison, 2 of those in solitary confinement, and he was repeatedly interrogated under torture. He refused the preferential treatment or early release offered by his captors, who were trying to propagandize on McCain's lineage as the son and grandson of Navy admirals. Finally released with his comrades on March 14, 1973, McCain returned to the United States as a decorated hero. After retiring from the Navy with the rank of captain, McCain first ran for elected office in 1982, representing Phoenix in the House of Representatives. After winning reelection to the House in 1984, McCain was elected to the Senate in 1986, taking the seat being vacated by Barry Goldwater.

During McCain's political rise, he had been supported by and become good friends with Charles Keating, a rich and successful investment banker who had cashed in on the federal deregulation of savings and loan banks. The two were close enough to take family vacations together, but that all came to an end when Keating tried to convince McCain and four other senators to support his company exemption from a federal examination of investment practices. Keating was eventually charged with fraud, having made too many risky investments from his company's savings and loan funds. When Keating's company went bankrupt, the federal government was forced to pay out more than $3 billion to defrauded customers. The "Keating Five" became the focus of a Senate ethics investigation, and McCain, the only Republican among the five, was largely found innocent of any intentional wrongdoing save "poor judgment." But McCain's pride was damaged in the scandal; he could not bear having besmirched his otherwise outstanding reputation.

McCain bounced back by cosponsoring campaign finance reform, which he said he hoped would dilute the power of money in politics. Admitting that he too was tainted, McCain portrayed himself as the honest politician inevitably soiled by a corrupt system. McCain also had the epithet "maverick" applied to him for his willingness to break with his own party on many major issues, like campaign finance reform and torture of political prisoners.

When McCain ran for president in 2000, his character looked outstanding, but McCain's "Straight Talk Express" could reveal his ugly side, too. McCain referred to his Vietcong captors as "gooks," backpedaling only to insist that the slur did not refer generally to the Vietnamese people. After some big primary wins against George W. Bush, McCain lost a crucial South Carolina primary that was saturated with allegations of dirty politicking. McCain reacted by giving a major address in Virginia lashing out at leaders of the religious right like Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell. Alienating an already dubious right wing, McCain went down to defeat.

Nonetheless, his maverick status and willingness to engage in straight talk have made him remain popular with Americans generally. Conventional wisdom holds that McCain will be a contender for the presidency in 2008 if he is able to persuade the Republican base to support him through the primaries.

Nicholas A. Thomas

See also Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act; McConnell v. Federal Election Commission

Further Readings

Alexander, P. (2003). Man of the people: The life of John McCain. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley.

McCain, J. S., III, & Salter, M. (1999). Faith of my fathers. New York: Random House.

McCain, J. S., III, & Salter, M. (2002). Worth fighting for: A memoir. New York: Random House.

McCain, J. S., III, & Salter, M. (2004). Why courage matters: The way to a braver life. New York: Random House.

McCarthy, Joseph

See McCarthy Hearings

McCarthy Hearings

What have become known as the "McCarthy hearings" refer to 36 days of televised investigative hearings led by Senator Joseph McCarthy in 1954. After first calling hearings to investigate possible espionage at the Army Signal Corps Engineering Laboratories in Fort Monmouth, New Jersey, the junior senator turned his communist-chasing committee's attention to an altogether different matter, the question of whether the Army had promoted a dentist who had refused to answer questions for the Loyalty and Security Board. The hearings reached their climax when McCarthy suggested that the Army's lawyer, Joseph Welch, had employed a man who at one time had belonged to a communist front group. Welch's rebuke to the senator—"Have you no sense of decency, sir? At long last, have you left no sense of decency?"—has been called one of the most devastating lines in American history. McCarthy was censured for his conduct by the Senate a few months later, and in 1957, he died. Though he has become something of a pariah in the annals of history, the enduring value of studying and understanding the hearings that bore his name is undeniable.

Prior to the hearings on television in 1954, McCarthy's search for communists in the Central Intelligence Agency, the motion picture industry, the State Department, and elsewhere made him a widely despised man. His reach was unmatched among those with institutional power, and his influence was only bolstered after 1952 with the arrival of Republican majorities in the House and Senate, and with the election of an Eisenhower administration reluctant to denounce him for fear of appearing soft on communism. Moreover, he had commanded the attention of television. McCarthy was eventually undermined significantly by the incisive and skillful criticism of a journalist, Edward R. Murrow. Murrow's devastating TV editorial about McCarthy, carried out on a series of episodes of his show, See It Now, cemented him as the premier journalist of the time, and it also raised concerns about the ideological powers of journalists and of television generally.

Television, via Murrow, had seemingly stepped in to stop what a partisan Republican majority around Senator McCarthy could not seem to. In the process, Edward R. Murrow became a symbol of television and its influence. As a result of the hearings, journalists and intellectuals alike talked at length about television's power as a communication medium, just as they had at the dawn of radio. Indeed, the McCarthy hearings are underappreciated for their coincidence with the early stages of the development of TV as a technological medium for politics. In this context—after years of blacklisting in Hollywood, and the demonizing of some of its most famous writers—TV was a cultural obsession. As pessimists dismissed it as culturally disruptive, overly commercialized, and a promoter of laziness and sloth, optimists argued that TV would deliver America from war into a technologically enhanced democratic utopia. The hearings were a test of TV's democratic promise, but they were a commercial failure and the networks dropped all-day coverage after just 2 weeks. While it is fair to say that they suffered by comparison to entertainment programming, this was only a beginning. The hearings were a test of television for the future, and as such, had important consequences for how we think about the power of television, about the ideology and the media, and about press responsibility today.

Paul J. Achter

See also Murrow, Edward R.; Television in Politics

Further Readings

Herman, R. (2000). Joseph McCarthy: Reexamining the life and legacy of America's most hated senator. New York: Free Press.

Royere, R. H. (1959). Senator Joe McCarthy. New York: Harcourt, Brace, Jovanovich.

Wiebe, G. D. (1958–1959). The Army-McCarthy Hearings and the public confidence. Public Opinion Quarterly, 22(4), 490–502.

McClellan, Scott

See Press Secretary, White House

McCombs, Maxwell (1938–)

Maxwell E. McCombs, born in 1938 in Birmingham, Alabama, is one of the two founding fathers of empirical research on the agenda-setting function of the press. McCombs and his longtime research partner, Donald L. Shaw, first tested the hypothesis that the news media have a major influence on which issues the public considers important in the 1968 U.S. presidential election while they worked together as young professors of journalism at the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill. The article that resulted from that study, "The Agenda-Setting Function of Mass Media," which appeared in the summer 1972 issue of Public Opinion Quarterly, has become a classic and perhaps the most cited article in the field of mass communication research in the past 35 years. Since then, there have been hundreds of studies of agenda setting, many of which are described in McCombs' latest book, Setting the Agenda: The Mass Media and Public Opinion (2004).

After earning his bachelor's degree from Tulane University in 1960, McCombs enrolled in Stanford University's master's program, which he completed in 1961, and then returned to New Orleans, where he worked as a reporter for the New Orleans Times-Picayune until 1963. He then enrolled in Stanford's doctoral program in communication, which he finished in 1966. He took a position as an assistant professor at the University of California at Los Angeles (UCLA), where he had been lecturing since 1965, and stayed until 1967. He moved to the University of North Carolina, where he and Donald Shaw began their 40-year research collaboration. He left North Carolina for the John Ben Snow Professorship at Syracuse University in 1973, and in 1985 he accepted his current position as the Jesse H. Jones Centennial Chair in Communication at the University of Texas at Austin.

Highlights of McCombs' career include serving as director of the American Newspaper Publishers Association (ANPA) News Research Center from 1975 to 1984, chairing the Department of Journalism at the University of Texas from 1985 to 1991, spending a decade as a visiting professor at the University of Navarra in Spain from 1994 to 2004, and serving as the president of the World Association for Public Opinion Research (WAPOR) from 1997 to 1998. His honors include the Sidney S. Goldish Award for a significant, continuing contribution to newspaper research from the International Newspaper Promotion Association in 1978, a fellowship in the Institute for Advanced Study at Indiana University in 1990, a fellowship in the International Communication Association in 1995, the Murray Edelman Career Award for distinguished scholarship in political communication (with Donald Shaw) from the American Political Science Association in 1996, and the Paul J. Deutschmann Award for excellence in research from the Association for Education in Journalism and Mass Communication in 1998.

Throughout his unusually focused and productive research career, McCombs has expanded and elaborated the original agenda-setting hypothesis into a rich and complex theory not only of media influence on the public but also of its influences on the media agenda. This theory is one of few that have been developed solely within the communication field.

David H. Weaver

See also Agenda Setting; Public Opinion

Further Readings

McCombs, M. (2004). Setting the agenda: The mass media and public opinion. Cambridge, UK: Polity Press.

McCombs, M. E., & Shaw, D. L. (1972). The agenda-setting function of mass media. Public Opinion Quarterly, 36, 176–187.

McConnell, Mitchell

See McConnell v. Federal Election Commission

McConnell v. Federal Election Commission

On December 10, 2003, the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (FEC) upheld by a 5–4 decision most of the provisions of the 2002 Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (BCRA) against constitutional challenges. In so doing, it purported to apply the constitutional framework of analysis that had been handed down in its 1976 decision in Buckley v. Valeo, but in fact reached results arguably quite different from those in Buckley.

The progression of the court's constitutional analysis from Buckley to McConnell, and more recently in Randall v. Sorrell in 2006 and Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. (WRTL) in 2007, reflects a sort of doctrinal incoherence whose development is not yet complete. Future decisions of the court may clarify the extent to which the Constitution permits the regulation of political speech in the name of controlling the uses of money in politics.

The constitutional framework established in Buckley allowed campaign contributions to be limited, but expenditures by candidates, parties, or independent persons (including political advertising) were not limited because to do so would result in direct limits on the quantity of political expression protected by the First Amendment. The sole justification recognized by the Buckley court for allowing contribution limitations, which appeared to impair the constitutional right of free association, was the strong governmental interest in preventing corruption or the appearance of corruption. Politicians and political parties over the years developed ways around contribution limits by using unlimited "soft money," raised outside the scope of the Federal Election Campaign Act, to fund unlimited political ads that avoided express advocacy of election or defeat of candidates. When Congress passed the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (2002), containing provisions that among others sought to limit soft money and control electioneering communications that did not amount to express advocacy, some 20 provisions of the BCRA were challenged by Senator Mitch McConnell and others.

The McConnell decision upheld almost all provisions of the BCRA. The soft money ban in BCRA was that, with limited exceptions, federal candidates, parties, officeholders, and their agents were prohibited from soliciting, receiving, or directing soft money to another person or organization, including state or local parties, on the reasoning that state or local parties might serve as conduits for potential corruption; for example, donors could buy access to federal politicians by donating funds to state or local parties that then used the contributions to support party activities, since federal politicians might potentially benefit from such contributions.

The soft money provisions of BCRA were all upheld in McConnell. More specifically, it was permissible to prohibit national party committees and their agents from soliciting, receiving, or spending any soft money and to prevent donors from contributing nonfederal funds to state and local party committees to fund federal election activity.

The court upheld the prohibition on national, state, and local party committees and their agents or subsidiaries from soliciting any funds for, or making or directing any donations to, certain tax-exempt organizations that make expenditures in connection with elections for federal office. Congress could also prohibit federal candidates and officeholders from soliciting, receiving, directing, transferring, or spending soft money in connection with federal elections and limit the ability of federal candidates and officeholders to solicit, receive, direct, transfer, or spend soft money in connection with state and local elections. Finally, it was permissible to prohibit state or local officeholders and candidates from spending soft money to fund communications that refer to a clearly identified candidate for federal office and that promoted, supported, attacked, or opposed a candidate for that office.

Despite a lack of evidence of any actual corruption, the court ruled that the potential for circumvention of campaign contribution limits justified the broad rule of prohibition and use of contributions. The difficulty with the McConnell court's equating of potential circumvention to Buckley's corruption is the lack of a logical stopping point. As the dissent argued, the same rationale could arguably justify restrictions on the press or political commentators or talk shows because the candidates might be grateful for the potential benefit of positive political speech.

The court also upheld the BCRA restrictions on electioneering communications—those ads aired within 60 days of a general election or 30 days of a primary election that mentioned the name of any federal candidate and were targeted to the candidate's electorate—regardless of whether the message expressly advocated support or defeat for the candidate. The BCRA had extended the existing requirement—that corporations and labor unions use separate (nontreasury funds such as political action committees) funds for express advocacy—to these electioneering communications.

The constitutional attack on the electioneering communications provision was that it was overbroad; that even though it properly banned some ads with an electoral purpose, that it caught genuine issue ads deserving of constitutional protection in its sweep. The court, relying on some questionable empirical studies and perfunctory analysis, concluded that vast majority of such ads had an electoral purpose and could therefore be banned as to corporations and unions and required to be disclosed as to others because they were the functional equivalent of express advocacy. Evidence before the lower court had concluded that from 17% to more than 50% of such ads were genuine issue ads, but the court characterized this evidence as indicating the vast majority of such ads were properly regulated. The impact of upholding this limit is that corporations and labor unions are prohibited from expressing their views on important public issues at a critical time—within 30 days of a primary election or 60 days of a general election—even when they have a genuine purpose to comment on issues rather than promote candidates. For example, within 60 days of any election in which Senator John McCain of Arizona or Senator Russ Feingold of Wisconsin is a candidate for any federal office, no company or labor union may run ads urging the repeal of the McCain-Feingold bill—BCRA—because such would be an electioneering communication. A better indication of congressional purpose may be found in the Congressional Record, which is replete with comments suggesting the need for this provision in order to reduce the number of ads criticizing members of Congress.

In BCRA, Congress also sought to force political parties to choose between making potentially unlimited advertising expenditures independent of its candidates or making coordinated expenditures that could be treated as contributions and limited in amount. However, the Supreme Court in McConnell v. FEC struck down these provisions, thus leaving party committees free to make both limited coordinated expenditures and unlimited independent expenditures, although the ban on solicitation or expenditure of soft money was upheld. This was one of the few provisions of BCRA that were found unconstitutional.

Another provision of BCRA found unconstitutional was one prohibiting minors from making political contributions at all, apparently assuming that minors who did so were merely serving as a subterfuge for excessive contributions by adults. In McConnell v. FEC, the Supreme Court ruled that this provision unconstitutionally impaired the First Amendment rights of minors to associate with candidates of their choice where the minors had their own funds. The court said that Congress cannot impose a blanket prohibition on contributions by minors without regard to the source of the funds. In this particular ruling, the court actually adhered to the ruling in Buckley, while others of its rulings merely claimed adherence to Buckley.

Following McConnell, the Supreme Court seemed poised to give a green light to any kind of election reform that could plausibly be claimed to prevent circumvention of contribution limits, even if First Amendment rights seemed to be given little respect. However, there have been changes to the composition of the court, and there are some indications that the new configuration of the court (at least until the composition changes again) may be less willing to defer to legislative rules on campaign finance that suppress political voices. In 2006, in Randall v. Sorrell, Vermont's state campaign finance law was declared unconstitutional in both its contribution limitations and its expenditure limitations. The court did not purport to overrule McConnell, but instead seemed to signal more of a true adherence to the Buckley framework. This has led to suggestions that the court may now be willing to reconsider the extreme deference shown to Congress in McConnell.

Vermont's Act 64 imposed inflation-adjusted 2-year election cycle expenditure limits for candidates for state office of approximately $300,000 for governor, $100,000 for lieutenant governor, $45,000 for other statewide offices, $4,000 for state senator (plus an additional $2,500 for each additional seat in the district), $3,000 for state representative in a two-member district, and $2,000 for state representative in a single-member district. Expenditures were broadly defined and expenditures by others that were coordinated with the candidates were counted against the limits. Contribution limits, which were not adjusted for inflation, were $400 for governor, lieutenant governor, and other statewide offices, $300 for state senator, and $200 for state representative.

The court in Randall ruled by a vote of 6–3 that both Vermont's expenditure limits and the contribution limits were unconstitutional in violation of the First Amendment. In striking down the expenditure limits, the court reaffirmed Buckley's ruling to the same effect and specifically declined Vermont's invitation to overrule Buckley. In striking down the contribution limits, the court said that normally it would defer to the legislature in setting such limits, but that merely because some contributions might be so large as to implicate the integrity of the electoral process did not mean lower was always better. Contribution limits that are too low could harm the electoral process by preventing challengers from mounting effective campaigns against incumbent officeholders, thereby reducing democratic accountability.

The court found that the Vermont limits involved were so low as to give danger signs in that they were lower than any previously approved limits and lower than limits in other states. The court therefore carefully analyzed the Vermont limits, finding that the limits were likely to be so low as to restrict the amount of funding available for challengers to mount effective campaigns. The court found that the fact that limits on contributions by political parties were the same as the limits on individual contributions indicated an impairment of the right to associate through political parties. The court found that the fact that the travel expenses of volunteers were counted as contributions coupled with how low the contribution limits were placed a serious burden on volunteer political activity and rights of association. The court found that the failure to adjust contribution limits for inflation meant that the limits, if not already too low, would inevitably become too low. Finally, the court found an absence of a special justification for the extremely low contribution limit. The court concluded that, taken together, Act 64 "disproportionately burdens numerous First Amendment interests, and consequently, in our view, violates the First Amendment."

For more than 30 years, the Buckley court's dichotomous treatment of contribution limits and expenditure limits has sparked controversy. Proponents of campaign reform have argued that Buckley's protection of the First Amendment goes too far and should be overruled and Congress allowed to pass limits on campaign expenditures to reduce the need for large amounts of money in politics. Others have argued that Buckley did not go far enough, and that its allowance of contribution limits are what should be overruled. The court's opinion in McConnell v. FEC upheld BCRA and allowed Congress to punish what Senator McConnell once called "the crime of incitement to political action." After the Supreme Court decision, Senator McConnell lamented that we now live in a world in which greater protections are afforded to virtual child pornography and dissemination of illegally intercepted communications than to criticisms of elected officials. Others, including some of the dissenters in McConnell, said that political speech now clearly has less constitutional protection than virtual child pornography, tobacco advertising, sexually explicit cable programs, dissemination of illegally received communications, nude dancing, defamation, cross burning, and flag burning.

The Supreme Court's shifting campaign finance doctrine was further evidenced in its 2007 decision in Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. In WRTL, the court considered another constitutional challenge to the BCRA's ban on electioneering communications by corporations and labor unions. The court found the provision unconstitutional as applied to two ads WRTL sought to air in 2004 within 60 days of the general election. The ads urged listeners to contact their (Wisconsin) senators to oppose a threatened filibuster of judicial nominees submitted by President George W. Bush. Although the ads contained no express advocacy, they ran afoul of the ban because they mentioned, ironically, Senator Russ Feingold by name (the challenged law was part of the so-called McCain-Feingold bill), and he was then a candidate for reelection. The Court in WRTL sharply narrowed its holding in McConnell v. FEC by saying that an ad is the functional equivalent of express advocacy only if the ad is susceptible of no reasonable interpretation other than as an appeal to vote for or against a specific candidate. The court's opinion relied heavily on the Buckley court's original discussion of the difficulty of separating public issues from candidates for public office and the need for a test that gave the benefit of the doubt to political speech. It appears that the Supreme Court may have gone far toward restoring the express advocacy doctrine first announced in Buckley and may be willing to consider reversing its decision in McConnell upholding the BCRA electioneering communication provision entirely. Some observers have suggested that McConnell has already been overruled in part by WRTL, even though the court did not formally do so.

After Randall and WRTL, it may be that the Supreme court will not give blanket deference to congressional rules governing election campaigns, but will recognize that when incumbent legislators specify the rules under which their future opponents will campaign to take their places, and those rules are likely to impair the ability of challengers to compete, a healthy skepticism by the courts is not only warranted but necessary.

Clifford A. Jones

See also Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act; Buckley v. Valeo; Campaign Finance; Federal Election Campaign Act

Further Readings

Bauer, R. B. (2003). More soft money, hard law (2nd ed.). Washington, DC: Perkins Coie.

BeVier, L. R. (2004). McConnell v. FEC: Not Senator Buckley's First Amendment. Election Law Journal, 3(2), 127–145.

Buckley v. Valeo. (1976). 424 U.S. 1.

Corrado, A., Mann, T. E., Ortiz, D., & Potter, T. (2005). The new campaign finance sourcebook. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. (2007). 2007 U.S. LEXIS 8515.

Hasen, R. L. (2004). Buckley is dead, long live Buckley: The new campaign finance incoherence of McConnell v. Federal Election Commission. University of Pennsylvania Law Review, 153, 31–72.

McConnell v. Federal Election Commission. (2003). 540 U.S. 93.

Randall v. Sorrell. (2006). 126 S.Ct. 2479.

Schotland, R. A. (2004). Act I: BCRA wins in Congress. Act II: BCRA wins big at the court. Act III: BCRA loses to reality. Election Law Journal, 3(2), 335–343.

Smith, B. A. (2004). McConnell v. Federal Election Commission: Ideology trumps reality, pragmatism. Election Law Journal, 3(2), 345–353.

Smith, B. A. (2003). Unfree speech: The folly of campaign finance reform. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

McCurry, Michael

See Press Secretary, White House

McGovern, George (1922–)

George Stanley McGovern served as a U.S. representative (1957–1961) and senator from South Dakota (1963–1981) and was the Democratic nominee for president in 1972 against Richard M. Nixon. McGovern secured 38% of the popular vote to Nixon's 61%, winning only 17 electoral votes to Nixon's 520. Although the famous Watergate break-in scandal occurred during this campaign, the investigations leading to Nixon's implication in the scheme and his eventual resignation did not occur until after the campaign was over. McGovern never reaped the benefits of Nixon's wrongdoing. He also conducted unsuccessful campaigns for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1968 and 1984.

McGovern's 1972 campaign was characterized by an emphasis on the primary system, controversy over his choice for vice president, and antiwar themes. The campaign was managed by Gary Hart, future U.S. senator and unsuccessful presidential candidate. Hart published a chronicle of the events of the campaign, Right From the Start (1973), which outlined the campaign's strategy of concentrating on winning popular support through primaries and caucuses rather than gaining the support of party elites.

Such a strategy was made possible by reforms instituted in 1969 by the Democratic Party based on recommendations of the party's Commission on Party Structure and Delegate Selection, which had been chaired by McGovern.

At the 1972 Democratic Convention, the choice of a vice-presidential candidate led to 39 nominations from the floor, but McGovern was eventually able to secure Missouri Senator Thomas Eagleton as his running mate. McGovern's choice of Eagleton turned disastrous when journalist Clark Hoyt published a story concerning Eagleton's earlier hospitalization for nervous exhaustion and treatment with electroshock therapy. These revelations led to calls in the media for McGovern to replace Eagleton. Initially McGovern expressed support for Eagleton, but on July 31, 1972, Eagleton withdrew his name from the ticket. McGovern replaced Eagleton with R. Sargent Shriver, but intense media coverage questioning McGovern's choice of and initial support for Eagleton continued.

In his 1972 campaign, McGovern expressed strong opposition to the Vietnam War, calling for the end of bombing and the withdrawal of American troops. He also called for cutting waste in military spending. One of McGovern's television ads highlighted his antiwar stance by showing an image of a Vietnamese woman cradling her injured child in her arms with the sound of jets and the voice of a child saying, "Does a president know that planes bomb children?" Although most of McGovern's campaign ads in 1972 were produced by Emmy award-winning documentary filmmaker Charles Guggenheim, this ad was produced by Tony Schwartz, maker of the controversial "Daisy Girl Ad" for Lyndon Johnson in 1964.

Throughout the campaign, McGovern was never able to defend successfully his liberal viewpoints. The Republican campaign against him succeeded in branding him a liberal whose judgment on policy issues as well as his vice-presidential choice could not be trusted.

McGovern also served as special assistant to the president and director of the Food for Peace Program (1961–1962), as a delegate to the United Nations General Assembly (1976 and 1978), president of the Middle East Policy Council (1991–1998), ambassador to the United Nations Agencies for Food and Agriculture (1998–2001), and the first United Nations Global Ambassador on World Hunger (2001). He was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross as a bomber pilot during World War II and earned MA and PhD degrees from Northwestern University. He was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 2000.

Larry Jene King

See also Guggenheim, Charles; Hart, Gary; McGovern Library and Center for Public Service and Leadership

Further Readings

Ambrose, S. E. (2001). The wild blue: The men and boys who flew the B-24s over Germany. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Anson, R. S. (1972). McGovern: A biography. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston.

Dougherty, R. (1973). Goodbye, Mr. Christian: A personal account of McGovern's rise and fall. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

Hart, G. (1973). Right from the start: A chronicle of the McGovern campaign. New York: Quadrangle Books.

McGovern, G. S. (1977). Grassroots: The autobiography of George McGovern. New York: Random House.

McGovern, G. S., & MacLaine, S. (1972). McGovern: The man and his beliefs. New York: Norton.

Pressler, L. (1982). U.S. senators from the prairie. Vermillion, SD: Dakota Press.

McGovern Library and Center for Public Service and Leadership

October 2006 marked the dedication of the George and Eleanor McGovern Library and Center for Public Service and Leadership, housed at Dakota Wesleyan University, in Mitchell, South Dakota. The center bears the name of 1972 Democratic presidential hopeful and United Nations Food and Agricultural Organization Ambassador Senator George McGovern and his wife and fellow humanitarian activist, Eleanor.

The center's unique utility for the study of political communication is twofold: (1) the center's curricular focus on careers in public service and leadership and (2) the creation of the McGovern Legacy museum.

McGovern Center Director, Dakota Wesleyan University Professor Don Simmons, states that "what makes the Center unique is the emphasis on the study of the practical side of public service, not just the theoretical elements. Students are better prepared for the practical reality of politics and public service when they graduate."

Simmons contrasts the center's curriculum with that of what he considers "the more traditional political science program," asserting that the Public Service and Leadership (PSL) major or minor at Dakota Wesleyan University streamlines political education for those interested in a future in the political arena. University President Robert Duffett adds that the PSL minor also serves the demographic of those students who wish to maximize their public service and leadership abilities within any chosen field. "Nurses, teachers, and ministers are just a few of the fields whose careers the PSL minor's leadership education can infuse with a service ethic."

The center honors the McGoverns not only through its academic programs, but also in the "McGovern Legacy" space it houses. The space is a museum-like exhibit area chronicling the lives and accomplishments of George and Eleanor McGovern. Displays feature highlights and memorabilia from every period of their lives, emphasizing their decades-long quest for humanitarian issues such as ending world hunger as a route to world peace. "McGovern for President" campaign commercials and speeches are accessible, as well as footage from the Vietnam War and more recent events, such as the Medal of Freedom Ceremony at the White House.

President William Jefferson Clinton, keynote speaker at the dedication of the McGovern Center, stated that Senator George McGovern and his wife Eleanor are internationally renowned as dedicated public servants and examples of servant leadership. Clinton, along with the university, dedicated the center in their honor in recognition of their dedication to making a difference in the lives of citizens of the world.

Senator McGovern states that he is thrilled at the choice of a library to honor him and his wife. "Books are the keystone of learning, and knowledge is the foundation of political service," he says. "What better way to honor us than with a library dedicated to honoring our work?"

Karla Hunter

See also McGovern, George

Further Readings

The McGovern Center for Leadership and Public Service Web site: http://www.mcgovernlibrary.com/center.htm

McLuhan, Marshall (1911–1980)

Born Herbert Marshall McLuhan on July 21, 1911, McLuhan was raised in Canada. There, he studied at the University of Manitoba and earned a BA and a MA in English. He then went on to study at the University of Cambridge, where he earned a BA, an MA, and a PhD. McLuhan credited the faculty at Cambridge for his "training of perception" and for providing him with his theoretical foundation. Although he once said he would never be an academic, he went on to teach at the University of Wisconsin, St. Louis University, Assumption University, and the University of Toronto, where he served as director of the Center for Culture and Technology. Additionally, he earned nine honorary degrees and numerous awards for his scholarly works.

McLuhan loved word play and is likely best known for his phrase, "The medium is the message." This concept was first laid out in Understanding Media (1964). Here McLuhan explained that it was the medium and not the content itself that should be the focus of mass communication studies. McLuhan also developed "medium theory" in this book. Medium theory is based on the hypothesis that the degree of participation an individual must exert to experience media content varies by medium. He explained that some media, such as movies, are "hot." Hot media demand a great deal of attention from the participant. They are well filled with data and offer a "high-definition" experience. Other media are "cold." For example, a comic book requires more conscious participation on the part of the participant. Thus, the user must fill in the missing information. McLuhan considered this a "low-definition" experience. Understanding Media provided a new way to look at media effects and culture. Not only did this publication provide the foundation for many modern mass communication studies, but it also brought interest in communication studies to the general public. In fact, this publication received a great deal of publicity in news magazines, including Newsweek, in a Playboy article, and in a 1967 NBC episode, "This Is Marshall McLuhan," from the network's experiments in TV series. To date, Understanding Media has been published in more than 20 languages.

McLuhan elaborated on these ideas in The Medium Is the Massage (1967). According to the Marshall McLuhan Web site run by his estate, the title was actually a mistake. It was supposed to have read "message" as often quoted, but it instead read “massage.” When McLuhan noticed the typo, he said, “Leave it alone! It’s great, and right on target!” Now there are four possible readings for the title: “Message,” “Mess Age,” “Massage,” and “Mass Age.” All may be accurate, considering that McLuhan saw media as an extension of our human senses, bodies, and minds. Each medium, independent of its content, has its own effects, which are its unique message.

Although these works are what made him famous or infamous, depending on how you look at it, his earlier works provided the foundation for these concepts and others. In fact, McLuhan’s dissertation resulted in the book The Mechanical Bride (1951). Here, he provided a survey of visual arts history. Using contemporary examples of persuasion, McLuhan stressed the importance of rhetoric and language over the formal study of logic. Today, this work is considered a pioneering study for the field now known as “popular culture.”

In The Gutenberg Galaxy (1962), McLuhan also presented many of the concepts that shape our communication today. He discussed how communication technology (alphabetic writing, printing press, electronic media) affect our cognition and, in turn, our social organization. He explained that new technologies would move us from an individualistic to a collective society or “global village” with “electronic interdependence.” Although it would be 30 years before the Internet would be invented, he coined the term surfing to represent rapid, irregular, multidirectional movements through a heterogeneous body of documents or knowledge.

Today, Marshall McLuhan is both an intellectual and pop icon. In fact, Wired magazine named him their “patron saint.” McLuhan and his concepts have been magnified through audio recordings, mention of him in the song The Broadway Melody of 1947 by Genesis, a Marshall McLuhan festival, in film roles (cameo appearances and spoofs), and with a Canadian postage stamp in 2000. Additionally, there have been countless biographies, academic articles, and symposia in his honor.

Marshall McLuhan said that the artist picks up on messages before others. So he was always thought to be way ahead of his time. Today, most people would argue that McLuhan himself was ahead of his time. Indeed, his works have changed and continue to change the way that both the general public and scholars view mediated communication. Without doubt, McLuhan will continue to play a major role in the future of mass communication studies and in the future of each medium we use to experience our world. As McLuhan is often quoted, “We look at the present through a rear-view mirror. We march backwards into the future.”

Lori Melton McKinnon

See also Medium Theory

Further Readings

McLuhan, M. (1951). The mechanical bride: Folklore of industrial man. New York: Vanguard Press. (Reprinted by Gingko Press, 2002)

McLuhan, M. (1962). The Gutenberg galaxy: The making of typographic man. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.

McLuhan, M. (1964). Understanding media: The extensions of man. New York: McGraw-Hill. (Reprinted by Gingko Press, 2003)

McLuhan, M. (1967). The medium is the massage. New York: Random House. (Reprinted by Gingko Press, 2000)

McQuail, Denis (1935–)

Denis McQuail studied history and administration at the University of Oxford in the U.K. He received his PhD at Leeds University. While working for the newly founded Granada Television Research Unit at Leeds University, he participated in the early British election studies (1959, 1964) and was a coauthor of the classical books that emerged from these projects, Television and the Political Image (1961, with Joseph Trenaman) and Television in Politics (1968, with Jay G. Blumler). In 1965, he started teaching sociology at the University of Southampton. From 1977 until his retirement in 1997, McQuail held the chair of mass communication at the University of Amsterdam/Netherlands. Over the years, he was visiting professor or fellow at universities all over the world, including the Annenberg School of Communication at the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia; the Gannett Center for Media Studies at Columbia University, New York; and Seijo University, Tokyo.

Together with Jay Blumler, Denis McQuail was one of the early proponents of the uses and gratifications approach, a perspective that they first applied in their 1964 election study. The authors thus initiated the reorientation of European media effects research and contributed to a significant change in paradigms. Likewise, in his early career McQuail brought his sociological background into the study of mass communication, from which followed his book Towards a Sociology of Mass Communications (1969). This and his book Communication in 1975 laid the ground for his well-known Mass Communication Theory, which was first published in 1983. This book became a true best-seller and was finally so much associated with his name that the title was changed to McQuail's Mass Communication Theory. It is presently on the market in its fifth edition and has been translated into several other languages. Linking theory with empirical research on media content and the media audience, McQuail discusses the contribution of the mass media to the public interest in his work on Media Performance.

Since its establishment in 1982, McQuail was a pillar and a driving force of the Euromedia Research Group, a network of European scientists who continuously analyzed the development of the media and of media policy, first only in the West European countries and later in the whole of Europe. This engagement resulted in several publications, the latest being The Media in Europe: The Euromedia Handbook, of which McQuail was one of the editors. When the European Journal of Communication was founded in 1986, Denis McQuail was one of the three founding editors and the only one who is still an active editor of the journal today.

Christina Holtz-Bacha

See also Television in Politics; Uses and Gratifications Approach

Further Readings

Brants, K., Hermes, J., & van Zoonen, L. (1998). The media in question: Popular cultures and public interests. London: Sage.

Kelly, M., Mazzoleni, G., & McQuail, D. (2004). The media in Europe: The Euromedia handbook. London: Sage.

McQuail, D. (1997). Audience analysis. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

McQuail, D. (2003). Media accountability and freedom of publication. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

McQuail, D., & Windahl, S. (1981). Communication models for the study of mass communications. London: Longman.

Media Bias

By definition, the word bias refers to showing an unjustified favoritism toward something or someone. Thus, on a very simplistic level, media bias refers to the media exhibiting an unjustifiable favoritism as they cover the news. When the media transmit biased news reports, those reports present viewers with an inaccurate, unbalanced, and/or unfair view of the world around them.

Political communication scholars have identified and examined two main types of bias in media reporting. The first type, commonly referred to as "partisan bias," involves media reports that are slanted in favor of a particular political party. The second type of media bias is known as "structural bias." This type of bias stems from certain "structures" (customs, reporting routines, commercial pressures, etc.) that operate within the news industry. As a result of the highly commercial and purportedly nonpartisan nature of the mainstream U.S. media, the issue of media bias surfaces in a unique way in American democracy.

Partisan Bias

News that exhibits a partisan bias favors one political party at the expense of other political parties. In the U.S. political system, partisan bias generally alludes to reporting that unfairly favors one of the major political parties, either Democrats or Republicans. In general, when individuals accuse the media of "biased" coverage, they are usually referring to a partisan bias in political reporting.

Through much of American history, accusations of a partisan bias in the media would have made little sense, because American democracy originally rested upon an explicitly partisan press. In early American journalistic history, papers such as the Gazette of the United States openly promoted the political positions of the Federalist Party. Competitor papers, such as the National Gazette, advanced the views of the Republican Party.

However, from the 1830s to the 1870s the media began adopting nonpartisan, objective news standards. Economic reasons brought on this shift from a partisan to a nonpartisan (objective, nonbiased) style of reporting. Prior to the 1830s, most American newspapers catered to a small, elite audience. Individuals falling below the level of high society could simply not afford these expensive publications; these elite daily newspapers commonly cost 6 cents per issue. In the decade of the 1830s, the penny press arrived in the media marketplace. Penny press papers, such as the New York Herald or the Philadelphia Public Ledger, were inexpensive (a penny per issue) news dailies designed to attract a mass audience. If a newspaper's goal was to attract the largest possible audience, then that paper could not afford to engage in biased, partisan reporting. Such partisan news coverage would ultimately turn away certain readers. Just as a paper favoring the Democratic Party would repel Republican readers, a paper showing undue favoritism toward Republicans would discourage Democratic readers. A nonpartisan newspaper, on the other hand, could attract a larger audience comprised of citizens belonging to both political parties. The highly profitable penny presses soon discovered that less partisanship in a paper's reporting resulted in more revenues for that paper.

While the press initially pursued objectivity for economic reasons, it eventually came to view objectivity as a core journalistic value. As the news media progressed through the 20th century, objective reporting became equated with good reporting. When journalism schools today train future reporters, they place great emphasis on news reports that are objective and free of any partisan bias.

While today's journalism profession stresses the importance of objectivity, the very concept of "objectivity" is very elusive and difficult to define. In defining this elusive concept, journalists have come to equate "objective" reporting with "balanced" reporting. For example, a reporter preparing a news story on a Republican administration's budget proposal would probably turn to key administration officials (e.g., the director of the Office of Management and Budget) for comments supporting this Republican budget. In all likelihood, that reporter would then turn to key Democratic lawmakers to obtain arguments against this budget plan. This media format, which juxtaposes the views of Republican politicians with those of Democratic politicians, has grown extremely prevalent in political reporting. This format's popularity has much to do with the fact that it allows reporters to fulfill their professional obligation to objectivity. This format is "objective" because it is "balanced." Democratic views are balanced against Republican views.

While the mainstream news media in the United States have come to place great value on objective, nonpartisan reporting, that value is not universally shared throughout advanced democracies. In fact, many advanced democracies disseminate news through an explicitly partisan press. In such media systems, news sources are commonly connected to particular political parties. For example, in the British press some newspapers, such as the Daily Mirror, promote the political agenda of the Labour Party. Other papers, such as the Daily Mail, attempt to advance the causes of the Conservative Party. When a nation's political communication revolves around a partisan press, much like the early days of American journalistic history, charges of partisan bias in the media make little sense. Such charges amount to little more than stating the obvious.

The Liberal Press Corps

The best evidence supporting the existence of a partisan bias in the U.S. media can be found in data on the individuals who make their living as journalists. Surveys have consistently shown that journalists tend to be more liberal and more favorably disposed to the Democratic Party than is the general public. For example, after the 1992 election, one survey revealed that nearly 90% of the Washington press corps voted for the Democratic candidate, Bill Clinton. A mere 7% voted for the incumbent Republican candidate in the race, George H. W. Bush. These voting percentages from Washington journalists stand in sharp contrast to the overall electorate. In the 1992 presidential race, 43% of the overall electorate cast ballots for Bill Clinton and 37% voted for George Bush (the remaining votes went to the Independent candidate, Ross Perot). Paralleling the results in the 1992 presidential race, surveys have repeatedly shown that the vast majority of journalists cast their votes for Democratic candidates.

Not only do reporters consistently vote for Democratic politicians, but they also tend to possess liberal viewpoints on most political issues, falling on the liberal side of the value divide that separates liberals and conservatives. Demonstrating reporters' liberal values, surveys have shown that a substantial majority of journalists fall into the pro-choice camp on the issue of abortion. Most journalists report that they do not attend any type of religious service on a regular basis. Regular attendance at religious services is one of the best indicators of a culturally conservative viewpoint.

However, the mere fact that most members of the press possess liberal or Democratic political views does not clearly establish a partisan bias in media reporting. A reporter's personal political biases need not necessarily appear in his or her news stories. Most reporters work in a profession that stresses objectivity and nonpartisanship in political reporting. Media sociologists have pointed out that news reporters who desire career advancement must establish their journalistic credibility. Such credibility comes through objective (nonbiased/nonpartisan) reporting. Hence, reporters face strong incentives to keep their political views in check and out of their reporting.

News Content and Partisan Bias

Discovering whether the personal political biases of reporters shape news reports requires examining the content of news stories. For several decades, political communication scholars have been doing just that; they have been systematically scrutinizing news stories in an effort to uncover partisan bias. In these systematic examinations, researchers have primarily relied upon a research method known as "content analysis." This method involves coding and counting segments of text, such as paragraphs in newspaper articles or news segments on broadcast news programs.

In their attempts to code and classify news content as biased or unbiased, researchers have struggled to find a workable definition for media bias (i.e., a definition that is clear enough to use in coding content). What appears as biased reporting to one individual may very well appear to be a factual, objective news report to someone else. For example, consider a campaign involving two candidates (Candidate A and Candidate B). In this political race, Candidate A is prone to making misstatements. Unlike Candidate A, Candidate B's political speeches are generally free of such verbal mistakes. Given Candidate A's propensity for verbal errors, Candidate A is likely to receive less favorable treatment in campaign news coverage than will Candidate B. In this case, does Candidate A's higher level of negative news coverage reflect a partisan media bias (the fact that reporters dislike Candidate A's political party), or does it merely reflect the objective reality of the campaign (the fact that Candidate A makes far more misstatements)? Political communication scholars have struggled with such questions in their ongoing effort to analyze the content news stories and uncover partisan bias.

In light of the difficulty in coming up with a clear definition of partisan bias, researchers have employed a host of definitions in their content analysis studies. For example, some research has attempted to uncover partisan bias by comparing the number of campaign news stories on Democrat-owned issues against the number of stories on Republican-owned issues. (When a political party has developed a better reputation for handling certain political issues, that party is said to "own" those issues.) Others have made an effort to find partisan media bias by contrasting media references to liberal think tanks against the number of references to conservative think tanks. While content analysis studies have incorporated many different definitions of partisan media bias, most have adopted the "50–50 rule" when coding news content for partisanship. This rule suggests that on any given political issue or in any political campaign the media should give roughly equal (50%) voice to the views of both major political parties. This 50–50 rule accords with journalists' value and view of objectivity. As discussed previously, journalists value objectivity in news reporting, and in the eyes of the press an "objective" story is a "balanced" story.

In addition to counting and coding the sheer amount of press coverage received by each party, many of these content analysis studies have also examined the tone (either positive or negative) of this coverage. In a typical content analysis study, researchers count how many paragraphs in major newspapers are devoted to the Republican candidate or to the Democratic candidate in a particular presidential race (such as the race between Republican candidate George Bush and Democratic candidate John Kerry in the 2004 presidential campaign). A typical content analysis study would also involve coding the tone (as either positive or negative) of each paragraph. This coding process would reveal the total amount of positive and negative news coverage received by each candidate. If the Republican candidate (George Bush) received more positive news coverage than his Democratic opponent, the content analysis would reveal a conservative bias in the media. On the other hand, if a study showed that the Democratic candidate (John Kerry) received more positive news coverage than his Republican opponent, the research could claim to have uncovered a liberal media bias. In fact, content analysis studies conducted by both the Project for Excellence in Journalism and by the Center for Media and Public Affairs found that Kerry received far more favorable press treatment than George Bush over the course of the 2004 presidential race.

Such content analysis studies have been commonplace in the field of political communication since the 1970s. Most of this research has failed to find any partisan bias in political news stories. Certainly, some studies have uncovered partisan bias on particular issues or in particular campaigns. However, these cases of partisan bias do not appear to consistently favor one party over another. While news reports may favor Republicans on a particular political issue at a specific point in time (e.g., press coverage in the early stages of the Iraq War was favorable to the Republican Bush administration), news reports will favor Democrats on other issues or at other points in time (e.g., over time press coverage on the Iraq War became unfavorable to the Bush administration). Moreover, just as media coverage may favor a Democratic candidate in a particular political race (e.g., in the 1992 presidential campaign, the Democratic candidate Bill Clinton received more positive press coverage than the Republican candidate, George Bush), other studies looking at other campaigns have found media coverage slanted in favor of Republican candidates (e.g., the Republican candidate, Ronald Reagan, received more positive news treatment than his Democratic rival, Walter Mondale, during the 1984 presidential race). Thus, while many conservative commentators charge that press reports are hopelessly biased in favor of Democratic politicians and liberal causes, decades of research examining actual news content have been unable to find any systemic partisan bias in the U.S. media.

Public Perceptions of Partisan Bias

While media content studies have failed to find any consistent partisan bias in the news, some members of the public consistently see such bias. A 2005 public opinion poll conducted by the Pew Research Center found that 60% of respondents believed that news organizations are politically biased. Political communication research would caution against drawing any conclusions about partisan bias in the media by relying upon public perceptions of such bias. This caution is warranted because studies have often found a disconnect between perceptions of partisan bias in the news and the actual content of news stories. Bias appears to have more to do with the perception of the person reading a news story than with anything said in the story itself.

The disconnect between perceptions of media bias and actual media content is perhaps best illustrated in work on the "hostile media effect" (sometimes also referred to as the "hostile media phenomenon"). Research into the hostile media effect has found that when individuals see bias in the news, they see a bias that runs against their political views rather than a bias that favors their political positions. When people perceive a biased media, they see a media that is hostile to their political causes or to their preferred candidates.

Research into the hostile media effect has clearly demonstrated that people's perceptions of a hostile (biased) media have little to do with the actual content of news stories. Many of the hostile media effect studies have exposed audiences with different political perspectives to the exact same news story. For example, some of the research in this area has examined audience reactions to media messages on animal experimentation. When audiences with divergent political views on this issue (such as animal rights activists and scientists who use animals in their research) read a seemingly neutral (objective/nonbiased) news report on this subject, both audiences perceive a biased news story. However, they see that bias running in opposite directions. When animal rights activists read the news story, they see a biased report that unfairly favors animal experimentation. On the other hand, when the scientific researchers read this exact same news story, they perceive a report that unfairly opposes animal experimentation. After reading the same article, both audiences perceive a media bias that is hostile to their perspective on this issue. Since both audiences form very different perceptions of media bias based on the same news content, their perceptions appear to have little to do with the actual content conveyed in the story.

This hostile media effect does not emerge in all news consumers. Most individuals reading through the aforementioned article on animal experimentation would see a story that is fair, unbiased, and nonpartisan. Most news consumers simply do not succumb to the hostile media effect. This effect, however, does influence a number of individuals, and these individuals share certain traits. For instance, individuals who have strong political views on a subject are particularly susceptible to the hostile media effect. With regard to a news story on animal experimentation, anyone with strong views on this topic (such as animal rights activists or scientists who conduct animal research) is likely to perceive a hostile bias in this news story. In addition, individuals with strong partisan attachments are prone to the hostile media effect. When highly partisan Democrats or Republicans read or watch the news, they tend to perceive media hostility toward their political party. While partisans from both major parties are predisposed to the hostile media effect, this effect appears to be stronger with Republicans than with Democrats.

Structural Bias

As scholars have engaged in an ongoing search through media content for bias, they have observed several trends in news reports that have no apparent connection to partisanship; these patterns do not favor either political party. However, these trends do constitute a form of bias because they provide the media audience with an inaccurate and distorted view of the world around them. This form of media bias is commonly known as "structural bias," because it stems from certain "structural" features of the news industry. Such structures include everything from reporting routines to newsroom practices to industry incentives. Within any given industry, individuals face certain pressures and incentives. As individuals within the news industry act on these pressures and incentives, they develop a particular way of doing things, such as a way of writing political news stories. When reporters put a certain slant on their stories to adhere to industry pressures and incentives, these stories reflect the industry's structural bias.

In terms of industry pressures, the structural bias in the U.S. media has primarily been associated with the strong profit motive that drives commercial media organizations. In the United States, the news primarily comes from profit-driven media corporations. In contrast to other advanced democracies, the United States has a far more competitive and far more commercial media marketplace. Hence, the structural bias that emerges in the U.S. media market is unique in comparison to other modern democratic nations.

Since the late 1970s, the profit motive has become increasingly important in newsrooms throughout the U.S. media marketplace. Over the past several decades, this marketplace has experienced an increasing number of news sources fighting over an ever-decreasing news audience. These market trends have resulted in fierce competition in the news industry, and in this intensely competitive environment news organizations have had to focus more and more on producing profits. As media corporations place greater emphasis on profits, the media's structural bias, which emerges from the industry's profit motive, has played an increasingly important role in shaping news coverage.

Political communication scholars have identified a myriad of elements that make up the media's structural bias. The sections following discuss some of the more significant aspects of this structural bias. The elements have been divided into the two central components (revenues and costs) involved in turning a profit.

Lowering Costs and Structural Bias

As commercial enterprises, media companies can increase profits by lowering the costs involved in news production. Such cost-cutting decisions generate certain similarities across news stories.

For example, reporters can lower costs (the time and effort involved in news gathering) by developing relationships with and by relying upon individuals in positions of authority. This helps to explain why government officials serve as the primary sources in most political news stories. For instance, when reporters cover a story on U.S. defense policy, they are likely to contact Defense Department officials or members of Congress serving on defense-related committees. Over time, political reporters build and maintain relationships with politicians and government administrators. Contacting such individuals then becomes an efficient and inexpensive way to obtain content for a news story. As news reporters rely heavily on official government sources, their news stories create a biased (i.e., skewed) picture of the political environment. By depending so heavily on official government sources, news stories become slanted in the direction of the dominant political parties. Most government officials are either Democrats or Republicans. News stories built on commentary from such sources favor the views of the dominant political parties at the expense of less prominent political organizations, such as the Green Party or the Libertarian Party.

Reporters can also lower the cost of news gathering by relying on "news subsidies" (also referred to as "news handouts"). A news subsidy refers to materials that essentially subsidize or economically assist a reporter's effort in putting together a news story. Such subsidies often come from government authorities or public relations practitioners who send out press releases, hold press conferences, or often simply make phone calls in order to provide reporters with story ideas and content. As the news industry has become increasingly focused on profits, its newsrooms have grown increasingly reliant on news subsidies. Recent research suggests that such subsidies account for more than half of all of the content contained in both print and electronic news stories. With their heavy reliance on news subsidies, the media provide news consumers with a biased depiction of the world around them. Many media critics have argued that the press favors the voices of the powerful over the powerless. News subsidies play an important role in this pattern of favoritism because such subsidies are likely to come from individuals and organizations in positions of power. An affluent corporation with highly paid public relations professionals is better able to provide news subsidies than organizations without such financial resources.

Increasing Audience Size and Structural Bias

Another way for news organizations to increase profits is by raising the revenues that flow from advertisers. Advertisers are willing to pay more for a larger audience. Thus, news organizations face strong structural pressures to increase the size of their reading/viewing/listening audience. As newsrooms produce stories designed to attract a larger audience, the stories they air and print come to exhibit several tendencies.

In one such tendency, news stories often emphasize negative news. Psychologists have long recognized that human attention favors negative information over positive information. Taking advantage of this pattern in human attention, the press gravitates toward negative news and away from positive news. A news story about a failed government program is likely to receive more media attention than a news piece on a government program that has achieved great success. The media also devote excessive attention to negative events such as disasters and crimes. This trend in negative news reporting has been steadily on the rise. Content analysis studies of news stories (generally from the 1980s through to the present day) have found that press coverage of the president, Congress, and even government agencies has taken on an increasingly negative tone. By favoring negative news over positive news, the media present the news audience with a distorted image of political reality. For instance, as a result of all of the media attention given to negative crime stories, individuals tend to overestimate the level of crime in their communities; they perceive that crime is more prevalent than it actually is.

The media's structural bias not only favors negative news, it also favors conflict. Just as human attention is naturally drawn toward negative information, it also naturally turns toward conflict. Consequently, the media are partial to stories that portray individuals in a state of conflict. Illustrating the media's fondness for featuring conflict, political news stories often follow a "Democrat said/Republican said" pattern. In this pattern, the news story presents an argument from a member of one major political party followed by a counterargument offered by a member of the opposing party. The media's bias toward highlighting conflict is also evident in coverage of political campaigns. On the campaign trail, candidates spend far more time promoting their political views than on attacking the views of their opponents. However, candidate attacks disproportionately find their way into campaign coverage. By favoring areas of conflict over areas of agreement, the press again provides its audience with a biased (distorted) representation of politics. In this representation, politics becomes an arena for battle rather than a domain for moderation and compromise.

The media's structural bias also favors known political personalities. Humans tend to pay more interest to information about known personalities than to information about unknown individuals. Capitalizing on this pattern of human interest, political news coverage is skewed toward known political personalities. In U.S. politics, the public is more familiar with the president than with any other politician. In part, the president has attained such familiarity because the president receives far more news coverage than any other politician. When the news media turn their attention to members of Congress, they tend to focus on a handful of prominent leaders or personalities, such as the Senate majority leader or the speaker of the House. By focusing in on these well-known politicians, the media produce a self-reinforcing cycle of political prominence; as prominent politicians receive an undue amount of press coverage, they become even more prominent. By highlighting the voices of well-known politicians, the press provides its audience with a partial picture of politics. In this partial view of the political environment, the audience is exposed to the views of the few (prominent politicians) but does not see the views of the many (the multitude of less prominent political actors).

In terms of its structural bias, the media are also partial to new and novel topics. Since new information attracts more attention than old information, today's newsrooms tend to operate on the belief that only new news counts as news at all. As a result of their continual search for novel news subjects, media coverage typically ebbs and flows in waves. Like an ocean wave, media coverage on any given subject rapidly forms, builds, reaches a peak, and then quickly dissipates. Usually, media coverage begins and builds on a particular subject (such as the subject of Social Security reform) based on some key event (such as a president proposing a major change to the Social Security program). This media coverage rapidly builds to a peak. At this peak point, story after story on Social Security reform appear in newspapers and on news programs throughout the nation. When coverage on the topic of Social Security reform reaches this peak saturation point, news directors and assignment editors start to fear that any additional airtime or print space devoted to this subject will bore the news audience. Consequently, news stories on the subject of Social Security reform rapidly disappear. When acting on this bias favoring new and novel topics, the media once again create a skewed image of politics. This skewed image tends to underrepresent long-running political issues and debates. Many media scholars have argued that this aspect of the media's structural bias (a preference for new and novel subjects) makes it difficult for American democracy to grapple with long-lasting political problems.

As a final element in its structural bias, the media gravitate toward stories with dramatic elements. A dramatic narrative features interesting characters engaged in intriguing actions (usually actions that center on struggle or conflict) that rise to a climax point. A news story on the ramifications of a proposed modification to tax policy does not have the components to build a dramatic narrative. On the other hand, a story about a president having a secretive, ongoing affair with a much younger White House intern, such as the scandal involving President Bill Clinton and White House intern Monica Lewinsky, has all of the elements of good drama. This helps to explain why the Clinton-Lewinsky scandal received more news coverage than any other story in 1998. By highlighting such dramatic stories, the media once again construct a skewed image of political reality. Social psychologists have recognized that individuals often assign too much weight to vivid narratives. That is, when individuals view a compelling dramatic story, they often assume that this unrepresentative story accurately represents the world around them.

The Effects of the Media's Structural Bias

The various elements that make up the media's structural bias, ranging from the media's fondness for negative news to their preference for good drama, push media coverage in an increasingly sensationalized direction. This shift in press coverage to more sensational news content has often been described as the shift from "hard news" (stories about key political events and issues) to "soft news" (dramatic human interest stories that generally lack any public policy component). Political communication studies over the past few decades have consistently charted the growth of soft news and the coinciding decline of hard news. For example, a report issued by the Project for Excellence in Journalism found that the number of news stories about foreign affairs dropped by 25% between 1977 and 1997. During that same time period, the number of entertainment or celebrity stories nearly tripled. Such findings show that hard news topics, such as foreign affairs stories, are being driven out by soft news subjects, such as stories about Hollywood movie stars.

This growth in soft news has fueled an active debate among political communication scholars over how this softening of news coverage impacts American democracy. On one side of this debate, most scholars view this growth of soft news as a damaging media trend. Such scholars have connected this growth in soft news to everything from an uninformed electorate to a cynical citizenry to a politically apathetic public. On the other side of this debate, some political communication authorities view the rise of soft news as a helpful media trend. Such authorities argue that citizens today have more hard news options than ever before. Through the virtual explosion of news content on cable television and on the Internet, citizens who want hard news can get hard news. As the reasoning on this side of the debate continues, the growth of soft news helps to satisfy the needs of news consumers who prefer softer news products. In short, soft news helps to diversify the media marketplace by providing a broader range of news products to satisfy the needs of various news consumers.

David G. Levasseur

See also Hard News; Hostile Media Effect; Party Press; Soft News

Further Readings

Alterman, E. (2003). What liberal media? The truth about bias and the news. New York: Basic Books.

D'Alession, D., & Allen, M. (2000). Media bias in presidential elections: A meta-analysis. Journal of Communication, 50, 133–156.

Friedman, J. (2005). The bias issue. Critical Review, 17, 221–236.

Gans, H. J. (1979). Deciding what's news: A study of CBS Evening News, NBC Nightly News, Newsweek, and Time. New York: Pantheon.

Hofstetter, C. R. (1976). Bias in the news: Network television coverage of the 1972 election. Columbus: Ohio State University Press.

Schiffer, A. J. (2006). Assessing partisan bias in political news: The case(s) of local Senate election coverage. Political Communication, 23, 23–39.

Starkey, G. (2006). Balance and bias in journalism: Representation, regulation, and democracy. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Media Buying in Politics

Media buying in politics refers to the purchasing of advertising in print or electronic media by the candidate or his or her campaign. A media plan is developed early in a campaign and includes exactly which stations and newspapers the candidate wants to advertise in. Typically, especially for a challenger candidate, the media plan starts at Election Day and works backward. This way, the media is heaviest right before undecided voters make their final decision. In contrast, many incumbents will start a media campaign earlier, essentially because they are more confident in their ability to raise funds should they run low. Incumbents will also use heavier media in the week before the election, however.

For radio and television, local and state candidates must first find out which stations have agreed to carry their political advertising. Under the Equal Time Provision all stations are required to offer advertising space to federal candidates for office; however, each campaign season stations are allowed to determine which other state and local offices they will sell time for. Once this declaration is filed with the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), stations cannot change their policies.

Within accepted local races, stations are required by the FCC to make the time available to all candidates in the race and cannot play favorites with individuals or parties. The time provided must be of similar value and similar audiences (equal access). However, the station is not required to notify candidates that their opponent has purchased time.

For federal candidates, the media buying plan usually must be stretched over several broadcast markets. For presidential candidates, the media plan will focus on states and areas where the candidate has the best chance of winning and on states where the race will be very close. Presidential candidates will rarely buy big in states they know they cannot win.

All candidates, federal and local, are to be given prices that reflect the lowest unit rate the station has offered to another client in the current quarter. However, in recent years the FCC has allowed stations to adopt a tier-structured pricing. The lowest price is considered preemptible without notice; that is, the station can replace their commercial with a more lucrative client and move the political spot to a less desirable place without notifying the candidate first; up one level is preemptible with notice; the top pricing level is nonpreemptible. The pricing within each tier is still required to be the lowest unit rate available at that level. This structure allows stations to maximize their inventory, but generally favors candidates with the most money.

In recent years, the FCC has determined that the political rulings for broadcast will apply to cable and satellite service providers as well.

Glenda C. Williams

See also Communications Act of 1934; Equal Time Provision

Media Consultants

Media consultants in political campaigns are a specialized group of political consultants who specialize in the production of and advice about the media aspects of a campaign. As an amateur vocation, “political adviser” probably dates to the formation of groups in hominid populations, or at least to their acquisition of language. With the rise of urban civilization and vast empires, the role of counselor to the powerful became formalized in the courts and senates of the ancient world. For example, in the Roman Republic—the wellspring of many of our political traditions and nomenclature—political advisers were commonplace. Cicero’s brother Quintus wrote his Commentariolum Petitionis (Little Handbook on Electioneering) during the late Republican period, giving advice such as “One has great need of a flattering manner, which, wrong and discreditable though it may be in other walks of life, is indispensable in seeking office.” Surely some astute pol told Julius Caesar, running for the political/religious office of aedile, to erect a billboard on the Appian Way proclaiming to passersby, “Make Caesar an aedile and he’ll make an aedile of you!”

The political consultant as an American institution has a varied origin. Historians debate whether or not the professional consultant is a product of the 20th century, but there is no doubt that early in our history people operated as political consultants in all but name.

Political consulting also increased as a vocation with the vast expansion of franchisement that occurred in the 19th century, most notably associated with the beginnings of the rise of mass democracy in the 1828 election of war hero Andrew Jackson. Although our sources are incomplete and shadowy, we know that there were large-scale information campaigns, distributions of all sorts of materials, and a good deal of proto-strategizing. The symbolism so prevalent in politics today also was well established. Attendees at Jackson rallies, for example, were given hickory brooms and other hickory-made items to remind them of Jackson's Spartan nickname of "Old Hickory."

The expansion of the country and the increase in the population also changed the role of politicians. Presidents began to campaign, taking donations and raising large war chests. In major cities, political power groups like Tammany Hall in New York created a veritable industrial revolution in voter persuasion, organization, and deployment. Political bosses and advisers, like Mark Hanna of Ohio, became infamous to the point of regular public satire—in the cartoons of Thomas Nast, for example.

But the establishment of the formal profession of political consulting properly belongs to the 20th century. By one account, the first political consultants were Clem Whittaker and Leone Baxter, who in 1933 founded "Campaigns Incorporated," running many California Republican campaigns. As political scholar Dan Nimmo noted, these were the first political advisers not working directly as operatives of a party or at the court of a candidate but as independent businesspeople seeking to "make a business of political campaigning." Such developments were not in isolation from the rise of the mass media industries: newspapers, magazines, radio, movies, and later television. In the early and middle part of the century, "scientists of public relations" like Ivy Lee and mass propagandists such as the impresarios of Britain's war propaganda during World War I were pioneering systematic approaches to mass persuasion. In addition, the "father of public relations," Freud's nephew Edward Bernays, was developing strategies for the "engineering of consent."

The professionalization of political and media consulting accelerated in the 1950s. Dwight Eisenhower, running for the presidency in 1952, hired the Madison Avenue firm BBD&O and others to design his television commercials, a foretaste of a giant industry and what would eventually become the single greatest expense for larger campaigns and elections. Simultaneously, George Gallup and other pioneers of polling were developing another important aspect of political consulting, in-depth surveys of the electorate, seeking to understand their concerns and their voting predilections and preferences. In 1959, Joe Napolitan, a Democrat, became the first person to put the words political consultant on his business card as his sole profession. The industry expanded with the rise of many great names of the early founding fathers, like Stuart Spencer, Joseph Cerrell, Doug Bailey, and Raymond Strother, who pioneered the field and helped crystallize many of the time-honored strategies.

Political consulting in the late 20th and early 21st centuries was also marked by specialization. Whereas a political adviser or political consultant might have previously been responsible for all aspects of a campaign, now an individual political consultant might specialize, for example, in GOTV (get out the vote), direct mail, or even subspecializations like "styling" a candidate for a debate. New media technology, from the Internet itself to blogs and Facebook, also offer even more narrow breeds of working consultants.

Two major developments marked the rise of political consultants in the 1990s and the new century. First, there was the phenomenon of consultant as star. Joe Napolitan famously advised that "a good consultant is invisible to the public." In other words, it did not behoove the politician's image as a leader to give voters the idea that he or she was being "handled," "styled," or "managed." Yet, with Lee Atwater, James Carville, and Dick Morris, political consultants rose to the forefront of talk shows, book tours, and popular culture parody to the point even of eclipsing their blander candidates.

Second, consultants grew in power through the rise of the "seamless" or "permanent" campaign. Once upon a time, consultants worked only during campaign and elections and then took vacations until the next cycle. Now, political consulting, as Strother and Joe Klein have documented, is part of governing, with polls, pulses, and strategizing behind every issue and every speech.

In modern campaigns, media consultants play a crucial role in the production of political advertising messages for candidates. A media consultant generally develops a strategy, sometimes using the tools of other consultants such as polling, to enhance and communicate the candidate's image via the media. These decisions include writing political spots, filming or videotaping the messages, editing and postproduction of spots, and decisions about airing and buying time for the spots.

David D. Perlmutter

See also American Association of Political Consultants; Consultants, Political; Napolitan, Joseph

Further Readings

Dulio, D. A. (2004). For better or worse? How political consultants are changing elections in the United States. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Friedenberg, R. V. (1997). Communication consultants in political campaigns: Ballotbox warriors. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Goebel, T. (2002). A government by the people: Direct democracy in America, 1840–1940. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Johnson, D. W. (2001). No place for amateurs: How political consultants are reshaping American democracy. New York: Routledge.

Medvic, S. K. (2001). Political consultants in U.S. congressional elections. Columbus: Ohio State University Press.

Sabato, L. J. (1981). The rise of political consultants: New ways of winning elections. New York: Basic Books.

Strother, R. D. (2003). Falling up: How a redneck helped invent political consulting. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press/Reilly Center.

Thurber, J. A., & Nelson, C. J. (Eds.). (2000). Campaign warriors: The role of political consultants in elections. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

Media Events

Media events are incidents or processes with high news value and strong public resonance that have been turned into spectacles by the media and have a sustained effect on public communications. The first manned moon landing in 1969, the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989, the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, the death of Pope John Paul II in 2006, and the Olympic Games in any year are examples of media events that are offered to the public as outstanding incidents of general interest. On the basis of this conceptual understanding, originally developed largely by Daniel Dayan and Elihu Katz, media events may be characterized in the object, time, and social dimensions as follows:

In the object dimension, the media event is presented as a kind of exceptional media situation. Existing program routines are interrupted. Live or special reports underline the character of the event as standing outside everyday affairs. Whereas the program flow consisting of daily news, daily talks, and daily soap operas represents the media's normal fare, it is complemented by media events that focus on special issues and distinguish themselves sharply from routine reporting.

In the time dimension, media events are staged as follow-up stories with spectacular highlights presented in dramatic detail. As far as possible, the media try to present these highlights before, during, and for a long time after the event in a manner that impacts public interest. Thus the dying of Pope John Paul II was already accompanied by the public, and his death was highlighted as a media spectacle that generated great public interest with as much symbolic and aesthetic resonance as the subsequent election of a new pontiff.

In the social dimension, media events are characterized by intensive follow-up communications in the media system as in society as a whole. A large part of the representative media at both national and international levels is involved in the reporting. Other spheres of activity such as politics, economics, and science then take up the resonance and turn their attention to the topic, if they were not already involved in initiating the event in the first place. And finally, viewer ratings and circulation figures rise steeply, that is, the public shows an above average degree of receptiveness.

Other approaches, especially in Europe, do not center their definition so much on the aspect of "outside the daily routine." Media events are not simply reduced to "major events," but are defined in a general way as units of "media meaning" whose thematic core refers to specific events, processes, or abstract problem complexes in the form of narrative figures continuously processed by the media. Questions of impact, that is, of the intensity of resonance and reception, are examined only in secondary fashion—they do not yet form the decisive criterion in advance that identifies media events as such. The same approaches also suggest that the expression "media event" be replaced by the more general term of "communications event." This is due to an understanding of the public sphere or public communications that cannot simply be reduced to the "media." Instead, the public sphere is described, with reference to Jürgen Habermas, as a network that links various communication spheres such as politics, the economy, science, and the media. High-impact communications events are then characterized by the fact that they form an important part of the agenda not only of the media but also in other communication spheres and that the discourses about the communications event are mutually influenced and intensified in the various communications spheres.

Media events, understood on the basis of the mentioned use of the term as communications events broadcast by the media, play a series of fundamental roles in modern societies. The first of these is their integrating function. Such events have the power to bind millions of people worldwide to common topics, needs, and experiences. They allow recipients to participate in a phenomenon in which they can share in a way defined purely by the media presentation. In this way, they then gain an awareness of a socially shared presence from out of their respective situation. Thus the public dying, death, and funeral of Pope John Paul II—all packaged in one and the same media event—ensured that in addition to the 300,000 mourners in St. Peter's Square and the approximately 2 million pilgrims present in the streets of Rome, an estimated 2.5 billion viewers could also participate live in front of their TV screens in an unparalleled "death spectacle" that must be regarded as having a globally integrating force. Media events unfold their integrative function especially through the fact that they trigger massive follow-up communications in society, whether in schools or universities, in pubs, on the train, or at the workplace. They form a thematic resource for discussion material and thus make up a significant part of daily communications. Not least thanks to this integrating function, political events such as party conferences are today deliberately staged as media events with the aim of mobilizing additional votes via political scenarios broadcast by the media.

Another major function of media events is to speed up or even trigger social change. All historically significant transitions in the development of the modern age were accompanied by momentous media events. Individual events and the reporting about them, such as the stock market crash of 1929, the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989, or the terrorist attacks of 2001 have marked entire epochs and triggered fundamental processes of change in society. Thus the global triumph of neoliberal political programs in the 1990s cannot be explained without the intensive communications activity around the fall of the Berlin Wall as a symbol of the collapse of global socialism. Likewise, the previously unparalleled communications intensity around the terrorist attacks of 9/11 led to the replacement of previous threat and hostile scenarios by new ones and raised the field of national security to the rank of the primary political arena. Such key communications events are characterized by the fact that they fundamentally change our approach to the world.

On the whole, media events (or media-broadcast communications events) may be considered as elementary components of modern media societies. They may be used to examine society in all its facets. This is because political, religious, cultural, or other events do not draw their significance simply from themselves but depend on the significance assigned to them by the media. It can then be observed that the media are becoming increasingly independent event producers, quite apart from the current of nonmedia events, and thus have an increasingly autonomous impact on social change.

