The Petrograd workers, in particular, the most politicized cohort of the revolution, were highly conscious of the fact that the odds were against them if they could not obtain the support of revolutions in the West. They acted because they felt they had no choice, though of course they might have acquiesced to the counterrevolution. Understandably, they were not prepared to do that. A delegate to the factory committee conference in August 1917 responded to a Menshevik, who warned the workers that they would not be able to hold onto power: “The bourgeoisie understands its interests better than the petty-bourgeois [moderate socialist] parties. . . . They have expressed themselves very clearly in [banker] Ryabushinskii’s words that they will wait until hunger grabs us by the throat and destroys everything we have won. But while they reach for our throats, we will fight and we will not back away from the struggle.” The same essentially defensive outlook lay behind the struggle for workers’ control in the factories that eventually led to their nationalization. As one activist put it after the October Revolution, “Conditions were such that the factory committees became full masters of the enterprises. . . . The proletariat did not so much move toward this, as circumstances led it. It simply had to do what in the given situation it was impossible not to do. . . . Will this be another Paris Commune [drowned in blood by the bourgeoisie after three months] or will it lead to world socialism? In any case, we have absolutely no choice.”

Was the constituent assembly or an all-socialist coalition government based on a realistic alternative to soviet power, as the Mensheviks and SRs claimed? We have tried to show that this was not the case. If these slogans failed to attract the popular masses, it was not because of Bolshevik intransigence and repression. The propertied classes, as much as the Bolsheviks, did not want the constituent assembly to take power, although the liberals hypocritically used it as a rallying cry to organize the counterrevolution. As we noted, nowhere where the SRs held power during the civil war did they establish a liberal democratic regime.

A third issue is that of foreign intervention. Chamberlin, quoted earlier, concludes: “Had there been no intervention . . . the Russian civil war would almost certainly have ended much more quickly in a decisive victory of the Soviets. Then a triumphant revolution Russia would have faced a Europe that was fairly quivering with social unrest and upheaval.” The aim of the intervention was not to save democracy from Bolshevik dictatorship (which did not yet exist when intervention began). It was undertaken in support of Russia’s propertied classes and generals, who were intent on restoring the old order, or at least a right-wing dictatorship. The soviet regime made very accommodating proposals in an effort to prevent this intervention but they were rejected.

Two basic types of interests were behind the intervention: an imperialistic interest that is the acquisition or defense of spheres of interests in Russia and access to its natural resources, and related counterrevolutionary interests – defense of capitalism and the crushing of a bad example that was proving contagious. Surely, this foreign intervention must be considered when attributing responsibility for the civil war.

As for the Bolsheviks, they were indeed ruthless in defense of the revolution. But the historian must ask whether a less brutal means and a more conciliatory attitude to the enemies of the revolution would have shortened or prolonged the civil war. To lay all or most of the blame for the civil war and the national catastrophe on the October Revolution and Bolsheviks is implicitly biased toward the propertied classes and an unquestioning acceptance of the legitimacy of their goals, a choice that can be taken, but made transparent.

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; German Revolution, 1918–1923; Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Marxism; Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Russia, Revolutions: Sources and Contexts; Russian Revolutionary Labor Upsurge, 1912–1914; Soviet Union, Fall of; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940); War Communism and the Rise of the Soviet Union

References and Suggested Readings

- Carr, E. H. (2004) The Russian Revolution: From Lenin to Stalin (1917–1929). New York: Palgrave.
- Carrère d’Encausse, H. (1981) Lenin. New York: Longman.
- Chamberlin, W. H. (1935/1965) The Russian Revolution, 2 vols. New York: Grosset & Dunlap.
- Koenker, D. et al. (1989) Party, State and Society in the Russian Civil War. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Liebman, M. (1980) Leninism under Lenin. London: Merlin Press.
- Lih, L. (1990) Bread and Authority in Russia, 1914–21. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Mawdsley, E. (1998) The Russian Civil War. Boston: Allen & Unwin.
- Serge, V. (1984) Memoirs of a Revolutionary. London: Writers & Reader.
- Serge, V. (1985) The Conquered City. New York: Doubleday.
- Shukman, H. (Ed.) (1994) The Blackwell Encyclopedia of the Russian Revolution. Oxford: Blackwell.

Russian revolutionary labor upsurge, 1912–1914

David Mandel

Worker militancy after the defeat of Russia’s 1905–7 revolutionary upsurge, as measured in strike activity, reached a low point in 1910, with a mere 222 strikes involving 46,000 workers. However, an economic recovery began in 1911 that soon turned into an industrial boom, increasing the industrial workforce from 1.8 million in 1910 to 2.5 million on the eve of the world war. The relative scarcity of labor reduced the workers' fear of losing their jobs and helped rekindle their fighting spirit. In 1911, the number of strikes and strikers more than doubled as compared to 1910.

In the spring of 1912, the workers' movement exploded with a force unseen since 1905. Once again it was a government massacre that provided the spark. On April 4, troops opened fire on strikers in the Lena goldfields of Siberia, killing 172 and wounding another 372. Over 500,000 workers across Russia struck in response, more than during the preceding four years combined. That year, the total number of strikers was seven times greater than in 1911, and the political character of the strikes became increasingly pronounced, a trend that would continue to the very outbreak of war in July 1914. As before, St. Petersburg was the center of militancy, with three-quarters of all strikers between April 1912 and July 1914, a total of three million in the capital (the figure counts repeated participation in strikes), of which 88 percent were political in nature.

Despite the intervening years of reaction, St. Petersburg's workers seemed to have picked up directly just where they left off in 1905–7. Government officials were struck by the high level of organization and solidarity. All sectors and categories manifested a strong drive to organize into unions, which had been severely restricted after the defeat of the revolution. Even workers scattered in numerous small establishments, like bakers, tailors, jewelry makers, and porters, succeeded in organizing concerted strikes for economic demands. Strict boycotts of jobs in plants that were struck were observed by other workers, preventing the hiring of strikebreakers or the transfer of orders to other plants, as these would be struck in their turn if the orders were undertaken. Repression, including widespread use of police spies, arrest of leaders, activists, and even ordinary strikers, mass lockouts and fines, were powerless to halt this mighty upsurge. Nor did the government's limited concessions, like the creation of a sickness and accident insurance fund, have any appreciable impact.

Workers reacted with great sensitivity to political dates and events. May 1, 1912, for example, brought out 200,000 workers in the capital, 80 percent of the entire factory proletariat, despite the owners' policy of fining workers for participation in political strikes. Indeed, the imposition of fines by some of the employers for that strike provoked new and very stubborn strikes in a number of factories. On May 1, 1913, 420,000 workers struck across Russia (more than half of these in the capital), and on May 1, 1914, 500,000. Other key political dates, like the anniversaries of Bloody Sunday and the Lena massacre, also brought out hundreds of thousands. At the end of October 1912, 250,000 workers (two-fifths of them in St. Petersburg) downed tools to protest the sentencing of 142 Black Sea sailors for mutiny; 100,000 (two-thirds in the capital) struck a few months later over the threatened death penalty for 52 Baltic sailors. On November 6 and 7, 1913, 110,000 struck to protest the sentencing of workers of a St. Petersburg factory for an illegal strike; and even greater numbers struck in May 1914, when these workers were tried a second time. The mass poisoning in March 1914 of workers at a rubber goods factory brought out 156,000 in protest in the capital. Other political strikes protested the state's persecution of the labor press and government interference in the Duma elections. On the very eve of the war, 150,000 struck in St. Petersburg, and more in Lodz and Moscow, to protest the police firing on workers of one of the capital's factories.

There were, of course, also economic strikes with demands addressed to the employers. But even in these actions, the workers often added political demands to their list. This was one of the most striking traits of the movement: the interweaving of the economic and political struggles. One of the issues that straddled the divide between economic and political was that of dignity. In one of the most impressive strikes of the period, the workers of a St. Petersburg metalworking factory walked out for 102 days to protest the death of a fellow worker driven to suicide by a despotic foreman. This generation of young workers, more urbanized than their elders, showed no trace of the proverbial peasant meekness. Nothing expressed this more forcefully than their demand for "polite address," which figured frequently on lists of strikers' demands. This was a demand for management to stop speaking to workers in the second person singular (ty), a familiar form reserved for children, animals, and close friends. The workers demanded the polite, second person plural (vy), which implied respect and distance. It is telling that the officials of the ministry of the interior considered this to be a political demand. And they were right. Workers who respected themselves could not tolerate the despotism of the autocratic state or the Russian factory management.

Bourgeoisie and Liberals: Renewed Opposition Coupled with Hostility to the Workers

This interweaving, even fusion, of political and economic demands in the workers' movement had its counterpart on the employers' side in the close cooperation of factory owners and police in preventing and repressing both political and economic strikes of workers. There was no longer any trace of the sympathy that many employers had shown for the workers during their political strikes of 1905, when they opened their factories for meeting places. The owners were by now much better organized. The St. Petersburg industrialists adopted a new, binding convention in June 1912 that called for fining workers in the event of a political strike. The convention also rejected any permanent representation of workers in the factories, refusing workers the right collectively to negotiate wages and conditions. It also provided for the blacklisting of strikers. And lockouts became a favorite weapon of the employers. They were accompanied by mass dismissals, followed by the weeding out and blacklisting of "troublemakers" when hiring resumed. In 1914 alone, St. Petersburg's employers, in close collaboration with management of the state factories, conducted three mass lockouts, during which a total of 300,000 workers were dismissed.

Yet even while this happened, certain elements of the business class were distancing themselves from the government. Their shift to the opposition was provoked, as in 1905, by the regime's increasingly manifest inability to maintain social order, by the quasi-vacuum of power at the top of the pyramid of power, the endemic corruption of the public administration, and by the increasingly embarrassing decadence of the regime.

The latter was manifest most strikingly in the growing influence of Rasputin on the royal family and by the Beilis trial. Grigori Rasputin was a Dostoyevskian figure, an adventurer of dubious morals who enjoyed a reputation as a healer and "man of God." He won the confidence of the tsar's wife in 1909 and came to exert increasing influence on state policy through the royal family. Mendel Beilis, on the other hand, was a Russian Jew put on show trial in 1911 for the alleged ritual murder of a Christian child, an accusation that harkened back to the darkest Middle Ages. Although Beilis was eventually acquitted, the trial, part of the regime's policy of diverting internal discontent toward the Jews, attracted worldwide condemnation. All this proved too much even for the Octobrists, the party closest to the industrial bourgeoisie. A broad-based realignment took place within the third Duma (which the tsar was planning to dissolve), with some of the Octobrists joining the Kadets and other liberals in opposing the government. The left wing of this opposition, which included some prominent businessmen, even opened a dialogue with the social democrats and toyed with the idea of appealing to the masses. However, the vast majority of the business class and the intelligentsia were as frightened as ever of revolution and unsympathetic to the workers' movement.

This opposition was also opposed to the peasants' aspirations. The peasantry, however, remained relatively quiescent during this period, still smarting from the cruel repression that had followed the Revolution of 1905. Unlike the workers, the peasants were not prepared to act until they had some assurance that the state's repressive apparatus had been undermined. As noted earlier, while the liberals allowed for the forced alienation of noble estates, they wanted to make the peasants pay for it. One of the reasons for this position was that much of the land the nobility owned had been mortgaged to banks. Other estates had been bought by members of the bourgeoisie. Expropriation without compensation would, therefore, have hurt the banks and bourgeois landowners. The Kadets, as staunch supporters of capitalist property, could not accept that. Besides, although the noble estates were feudal in origin, any violation of property rights set a bad example.

The Working Class and the Bolsheviks: Class Independence

Given the antagonism between the bourgeoisie and the workers, it is not surprising that the Bolsheviks were able to greatly strengthen their support among the workers during this period. In the elections to the fourth Duma in the fall of 1912, six of the nine deputies elected by the workers were Bolsheviks. All the major industrial areas of Russia sent Bolsheviks to the Duma, whereas the Menshevik deputies came from the less industrialized periphery – the Caucasus, Ukraine, and the western provinces. The Bolsheviks also became the dominant force in most of the trade unions of St. Petersburg and Moscow. In August 1913, they won from the Mensheviks the leadership of the St. Petersburg Metalworkers' Union, the strongest union in the capital. And on the eve of the war they were elected to the leadership of the Printers' Union, whose members had traditionally leaned toward moderation (in part because their jobs linked them to the intelligentsia). The Bolsheviks also held dominant positions in the workers' sections of the sickness insurance boards.

Worker support for the Bolsheviks was based on their common rejection of the liberals, representatives of the bourgeoisie (or at least its progressive elements), as political allies in the struggle for democracy. The Bolsheviks, as noted, called for an alliance of the laboring classes, the workers and peasants, in overthrowing the autocracy. They argued that the bourgeoisie would oppose the revolution. On the other hand, the Menshevik strategy of cooperation with the liberals caused them to adopt a much more guarded attitude to the workers' proneness to engage in political strikes, which they sometimes criticized as "reckless," since that militancy could frighten the liberals away and into the arms of the autocracy, as happened in 1905. However, even workers who were not very politicized could see that the Bolsheviks' position corresponded best to their daily lived experience, one in which the employers were bitterly hostile to their aspirations. The Mensheviks' insistence on separating the economic from the political struggle was simply out of touch with reality.

The aspiration toward class independence – both organizational and political – from liberal society was one of the most striking characteristics of the labor movement of this period, though it had manifested itself already to some extent in 1906 and 1907. When they could vote, workers never cast ballots for liberals, only for one of the socialist parties. And they resisted any attempts by the employers to influence their organizations. A police report from St. Petersburg in 1915 observed that workers everywhere rebuffed offers of aid from the Society of Factory Owners to help them set up consumer cooperatives. In one factory, "the majority pointed out that the Society is totally dependent on the factory owners, and since cooperatives are one form of the workers' movement, it is necessary to think along lines of our own worker societies, independent of the owners." The report noted a similar attitude in relation to the sickness insurance boards, which were co-financed by employers and workers: "One observes of late in the worker population the tendency toward isolation of their activities from any sort of pressure from the authorities or entrepreneurs. Here, too, one feels the shift toward pure autonomy. . . . This tendency can be observed at all workers' meetings without exception."

The aspiration to class independence was reinforced by the relative absence during this period of intellectuals in the labor movement, people who, by their status in society, were often a kind of bridge between the laboring and propertied classes. The socialist intelligentsia that was active, a small minority of the intelligentsia overall, was attracted mostly to the Mensheviks and the SRs, the more moderate political currents. The rank-and-file and most of the leadership elements of the Bolshevik Party were now composed overwhelmingly of workers. Bolshevik cells existed in almost all large and medium factories, and as one group of activists was arrested, other workers came forward to take their place. But the shortage of educated people was severely felt and was a constant source of complaint. About this Lenin remarked in 1913: "The entire 'intelligentsia' is with the liquidators [pejorative term for the Mensheviks who favored legal forms of struggle]. The worker masses are with us (40,000 readers of Pravda contra 12,000 of Luch [the Menshevik paper]). But it is extremely difficult for the workers to develop their own intelligentsia. . . . It is hard and slow."

The Bolsheviks in this period were "flesh of the flesh" of the working class, both ideologically and physically. In the capital and in Moscow their main strength was among the metalworkers, especially those in the machine construction sector, who were on the whole a more skilled, better educated, better paid, and more urbanized part of the industrial proletariat.

On the Eve of World War I

The strike movement spread progressively from the capital to the rest of Russia, including the south, the Urals, and the textile mills of the central industrial region. On May 28, 1914, the oil workers of Baku on the Caspian Sea, long under Bolshevik influence, struck over the threat of plague that had erupted in nearby oilfields. They made use of the occasion also to demand the eight-hour day, the construction of decent settlements and housing, higher wages, and recognition of May 1 as a holiday. On June 2, the owners declared a lockout and demanded that the workers be evicted from company housing. Troops occupied the oilfields.

Meanwhile, the situation was also tense in St. Petersburg. In early June, the death sentence pronounced against a worker who had murdered his supervisor and the prison sentence of lawyers who had protested against the Beilis case provoked a wave of political strikes that drew 27,000 workers. That same month, the most inert, scattered sections of the working class, such as porters, bakers, and chimney sweeps, organized impressive, concerted economic strikes. All this time, the capital's workers were closely following events in Baku, collecting money for the strikers, despite the mayor's threat of a 500-rouble fine or three months in jail for doing that. At the start of July, the workers of the large plants observed a one-hour protest strike against the repression in Baku.

On July 3, yet another government massacre sparked events that had no parallel in the history of the capital. Mounted and foot police burst in on a mass meeting about the Baku strike that was being held in the yard of the Putilov factory. They began immediately horsewhipping the workers and ordered them to disperse. But the gates were locked. They then fired two salvos, killing two workers and wounding 50 others. All this time, the beatings continued. Sixty-five workers were arrested. When the Bolshevik Duma deputy A. Badaev reached the police station, he was horrified to see the police beating the arrested workers into unconsciousness. News of what happened provoked mass strikes in Lodz, Moscow, Kharkov, and elsewhere. In St. Petersburg demonstrations took place in all the working-class neighborhoods. The demonstrators moved toward the Putilov factory, which was cordoned off on all sides by police, who shot and wounded four demonstrators.

On July 4, 90,000 workers struck in the capital. In an effort to give the protest a more organized form, the Bolshevik Petersburg Committee called for a three-day general strike and for a peaceful demonstration on July 7, explaining that the time for armed uprising had not yet arrived. July 5 and 6 were relatively calm, the workers holding meetings. Then on July 7, 130,000 struck. Huge demonstrations took place in the working-class districts. The first barricades appeared. On July 8, the strike became general. Transport and commerce shut down, the latter on the demand of the workers. Everywhere workers clashed with the police and threw up barricades made of felled telegraph poles, overturned streetcars, and any other material at hand. To many observers this recalled the atmosphere of 1905.

Meanwhile, additional police and Cossacks poured into the city. Severe measures were announced. The Bolshevik newspaper Pravda was ransacked and all those present in its offices were arrested. The paper would not reappear until after the February Revolution. On July 9, the Bolshevik Committee called off the strike and urged the workers to avoid confrontations so as not to provide the police with a pretext for more killing. It explained that the time was not yet ripe for insurrection: the capital's workers still had to impart their revolutionary determination to workers of the distant provinces, to the peasantry, and to the troops.

But the Bolsheviks were not in control of the situation. The strike continued on July 10, even after the employers of the large metalworking plants announced a lockout and began firing workers en masse. The military was brought in. Even so, the police reported 133,000 workers on strike on July 11. Some Bolshevik workers defied their leaders and tried to convert the street fighting into an insurrection. It was not until July 17, two days before the start of the war, that the movement completely died down. That day, in view of the impending war, the owners reopened their factories.

St. Petersburg was the vanguard but not the only place where the movement displayed a revolutionary temper. Besides Baku in the south, there was Kostroma in central Russia, where 30,000 textile workers were striking. The governor wrote the following assessment: "The present strike is extremely serious, not only because of its dimensions. . . . Being on the surface economic, the movement is, in fact, in my opinion, entirely of a revolutionary nature. . . . When a strike in the course of a few days embraces an entire district, when identical demands are presented, when these demands are obviously unrealizable, then it is clear the movement is guided by some unseen hand. . . . This hand, having taken possession of the labor movement . . . will apparently lead the workers to social revolution.” The hand was “unseen” because the movement’s leaders were workers themselves, practically all Bolsheviks.

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Marxism; Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Russia, Revolutions: Sources and Contexts; Russian Civil War, 1918–1924; Soviet Union, Fall of; Trotsky,

Leon (1879–1940); War Communism and the Rise of the Soviet Union

References and Suggested Readings

- Elwood, R. C. (1972) Lenin and Pravda, 1912–1914. Slavic Review, June.
- Haimson, L. (1964, 1965) The Problem of Social Stability in Urban Russia, 1905–1917. Slavic Review, December, March.
- Haimson, L. (2005) Russia’s Revolutionary Experience, 1905–1917: Two Essays (New York: Columbia University Press).
- Kochan, L. (1978) Russia in Revolution, 1890–1918, London: Grenada.
- Le Blanc, P. (1993) Lenin and the Revolutionary Party. Amherst, N.Y.: Humanity Books.
- Shukman, H. Ed. (1994). The Blackwell Encyclopedia of the Russian Revolution. Oxford: Blackwell
- Shlyapnikov, A. (1982) On the Eve of 1917. London: Allison & Busby.

S

Sacco and Vanzetti case

Tom Collins

Nicola Sacco (1891–1927) and Bartolomeo Vanzetti (1888–1927) were Italian immigrant laborers and anarchists whose conviction in a murder case in the United States in 1921 aroused international controversy. The pair were accused of the armed robbery and murder of a company paymaster and his security guard outside a shoe factory in South Braintree, Massachusetts in 1920. Although their trial featured muddled eyewitness testimony and inconclusive ballistics evidence, the men were found unanimously guilty by a jury and sentenced to death by Massachusetts Superior Court Judge Webster Thayer. The verdict galvanized leftists, who denounced the trial as a miscarriage of justice tinged by anti-immigrant and anti-radical prejudice. Organizations such as the grassroots Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee and the Communist Party-backed International Labor Defense undertook mass publicity campaigns arguing for a new trial.

pages 2947-3190 are missing!

Sudan, Aba Island Rebellion, 1970

Andrew J. Waskey

Sudan received its independence from the British in 1956. The movement for independence had pitted a number of political groups against the British. One of these was an Islamic party called the Umma (Nation) Party. Begun in the 1930s by Sadiq al-Mahdi, the Umma Party sought complete independence. Sadiq was a grandson of Mohammad Ahmed al-Mahdi who had successfully driven the British and the Turco-Egyptian forces out of Sudan in the 1880s.

In Southern Sudan, which was either animist or Christian, the opposition to domination by the Arabic-speaking Islamic population broke into violent conflict even before Sudanese independence on January 1, 1956. Southern opposition contributed to the destabilization of Sudanese security to the extent that General El-Ferik Ibrahim Abboud, commander-in-chief of the armed forces, claimed justification to launch a coup d'état in 1958 against the civilian government of Abd Allah Khalil. General Abboud imposed authoritarian rule, replaced English in the schools with Arabic, expelled most of the English-speaking teachers, and sought to turn Sudan into an Arabic-Islamic state. He was expelled from power by the October Revolution of 1964, brought down by street disturbances led by the Ansar, who were members of the Umma Party. Authority was given to a civilian transitional government led by Sir Al-Khatim Khalifah. The 1965 election for president was won by Sadiq al-Mahdi, a great-grandson of the Mahdi. The general vote was split between the centrist Islamist Umma Party and the Democratic Union Party (DUP). However, the government was too weak to govern effectively because the Umma Party was factionalized among its several Al-Mahdi family leaders.

The weakness of the Umma Party government tempted the military to seize power. On May 25, 1969 Colonel Jaafar Muhammad Nimeiri, leader of the Free Officers movement, led a successful coup against the parliamentary government of President Isma'il Azhari. Establishing a Revolutionary Command Council (RCC) he declared Sudan a socialist state and renamed it the Democratic Republic of the Sudan. He presented himself publicly as a Free Officer in the Nasserite mold. A committed secularist, he used the help of the communists to gain and keep power until 1971, when they attempted a coup against him.

Early opposition to Nimeiri's coup came from the religious right. Nimeiri viewed the conservative Ansar as a threat to the Ruling Command Council. The Ansar were demanding a return to democracy and the expulsion of the communists from the government. Street demonstrations by the Ansar turned into Mahdist riots in Khartoum. Then many Ansar were killed at Wad Nubawi in Omdurman in March of 1970. Nimeiri tried to visit with the Imam Sayyid Al-Hadi al-Madhi, a grandson of Mohammad Ahmed al-Mahdi; however, hostile crowds kept him away and prevented the talks.

Fighting erupted between Nimeiri's government forces with as many as 30,000 Ansar. Nimeiri responded by seeking to destroy the power of the Mahdi family. His attention was focused on Al-Hadi because he was the leader of a faction of the Umma Party. Al-Hadi had retreated to Aba Island. Located in the middle of the White Nile, south of Khartoum, the island was the traditional Mahdi stronghold. The land on both sides of Aba Island is a featureless desert plain. Neither the island nor the riparian plains offered geographical features that could shelter the Ansar. Without effective weapons they were slaughtered. When the Nimeiri's ultimatum to surrender was ignored by the Ansar, the island was strafed and bombed. A major amphibious assault was launched against the island. At least 3,000 Ansar were killed. Al-Hadi fled on March 27, 1971, leaving Nimeiri to confiscate the vast Mahdi family estates and other assets. Al-Hadi fled toward Ethiopia, but was gunned down on March 31 before he could escape across the border to safety. His death did not end the opposition of the Umma Party to military regimes in the history of modern Sudan.

Unable to gain the cooperation of Sadiq Al-Mahdi, a nephew of al-Hadi had him arrested in June 1971. Sadiq was exiled to Egypt to be held under house arrest by Gamal Abdul Nasser. Opposition to Nimeiri continued from the Umma Party until he was driven from power. Today, the son of al-Hadi, Dr. al Sadiq al Hadi al Mahdi, is a leader of the General Leadership faction of the Umma and vice governor of the state of Khartoum.

SEE ALSO: Mahdist Revolt; Nasser, Gamal Abdel (1918–1970); Sudanese Protest under Anglo-Egyptian Rule; Sudanese Protest in Turko-Egyptian Era; Sudanese Women’s League

References and Suggested Readings

- Daly, M. W. (2007) Darfur’s Sorrow: A History of Destruction and Genocide. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Warburg, G. R. (1992) Historical Discord in the Nile Valley. Evanston: Northwestern University Press.

Sudanese protest under Anglo-Egyptian rule

Fadwa Taha

The Anglo-Egyptian invasion of Sudan in 1896–8 toppled the Mahdist revolution, which had occurred in 1885. The British and the Egyptians consolidated their power through the Condominium Agreement of 1899, which created a theoretical dualism. It named the territory south of the 22nd parallel the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, technically restoring Egypt’s control over the region. Even so, it left the British actually in control of the region until after 1924, at which point they took sole charge. Of course, the Sudanese resisted this dual imperialism.

The Sudanese nationalist movement was a peaceful struggle for freedom and independence, but it was characterized by factional conflict, which in the 1940s crystallized into a “dualism” that was to dominate Sudanese politics even in the post-independence era. Two opposing nationalist ideas developed. One advocated an independent Sudanese identity and demanded independence for the Sudan from both Egypt and Britain. Its motto was “The Sudan for the Sudanese.” The other nationalist idea advocated unity of the Nile Valley under the Egyptian crown, and a united struggle of both parts of the Nile Valley against the common colonial power, Britain. The Sudanese case, then, contradicted the general rule of the existence of one nationalist idea and the inclusiveness of the nationalist movement’s platform of self-government and independence. In the Sudanese case, there was an alternative to the demand for self-government and independence – unity of the Nile Valley.

Historians of the modern history of the Sudan tend to divide the Sudanese nationalist movement during the Condominium rule into chronological phases. The first phase (1900–19) was marked by religious and tribal risings refusing the new rule. Most of these movements were characterized by spontaneity, organizational weakness, and poor potential, which made it easy for the British administration in the Sudan to crush them.

The execution of Khalifa Sharif, the fourth Khalifa of the Mahdi and the Mahdi’s sons, and subsequently the defeat of the Khalifa Abdullahi meant that Mahdism was deprived of influential leaders in those early days. This situation continued until the emergence of Abd al-Rahman al-Mahdi, son of the great Mahdi. Abd al-Rahman established himself as the recognized political leader of Sudanese neo-Mahdism which dismissed armed struggle against the government.

However, violent Mahdist reaction reflected itself in the various Mahdist uprisings that were organized after 1900. Its source of inspiration and strength was the Muslim doctrine of Nabi Isa. Religious movements of this kind followed in 1900, 1902, 1904, 1906, 1908, 1909, 1910, 1912, and 1915. Despite the failure of these movements, they kept struggle alive. Their failure signaled the end of the role of religious movements on the political scene and raised the need for other alternatives that would lead and guide political struggle.

In 1908, however, an uprising occurred in the Blue Nile. Abd al Qadir Wad Habuba, who organized and led the revolt, and who was neither a faki nor an ordinary desperate Mahdist, declared himself Nabi Isa. His family enjoyed a position of political leadership in the Halawin tribe. He became one of the disciples of al-Mahdi. The Mahdist regime had confiscated the lands of those members of the Habuba family who had not accepted Mahdist rule, but the Condominium government restored the land. Abd al Qadir, who returned to his land after fighting with the Khalifa’s armies in the north, tried to reacquire his lost possessions. He began to dream of the day when he could revive and reestablish Mahdist rule in the Sudan. He mobilized the Mahdist elements in the Gezira and tried to associate them with Mahdist sentiments in other parts of the country. Abd al Qadir’s revolt was suppressed after reinforcements were dispatched from Khartoum.

Tribal movements concentrated during this period in the Nuba Mountains in southern Kordofan and the southern Sudan. Protest in these areas stemmed from tribal loyalty that refused the hegemony of the central state and its taxes. British policy at the beginning was to send patrols to solve conflicts and to collect taxes. The Nuba refused to pay taxes and clashes occurred between them and the government. By 1914, most Nuba, notably the weaker communities, were successfully subjugated and administrative control extended over them. The period after 1914 is marked by the gradual consolidation of British administration in the Nuba Mountains.

British administration in the south faced strong tribal resistance, especially during the first two decades and up to the early 1930s. Southern resistance to British rule concentrated around three tribes: Nuer, Zandi, and Dinka. Southerners in general disliked any foreign rule, whether Turkish or jallaba (itinerant traders). They treated British rule in the same way. Taxes and forced work were imposed on them without return from the government, who depended on firearms to impose its authority. Most early southern resistance to Condominium rule took the form of isolated incidents in the sense that there was no coordinated policy on any level beyond the particular sub-section of the tribe. Foreign intrusion was unacceptable in any form, and so was central authority.

However, this prolonged resistance by southern tribes had a permanent adverse effect on the participation of the southern Sudanese in the Sudanese nationalist movement: it limited the southern Sudanese role in the nationalist struggle for independence and retarded the region both economically and politically. This situation was augmented by the southern policy introduced after the 1924 revolution in northern Sudan, creating solid barriers between the north and the south. This policy sought to isolate the south administratively and culturally from the north in order to minimize the southward spread of Islam and of anti-colonial ideas like those that prevailed during the 1924 uprisings. The government's ability to suppress tribal resistance indicated the failure of the institution of the tribe to confront British rule. New social forces with a national attitude developed to lead the nationalist movement.

The beginning of the second phase (1918–24) was associated with general international conditions after World War I. It resulted in the growth of political and nationalist consciousness, in both Egypt and the Sudan, and in the emergence of nationalist ideas amongst the Sudanese intelligentsia. This period was marked by the formation of the School Graduates Club in 1918 as a forum for practicing cultural and social activities among school graduates.

The league of Sudanese Union, the first secret Sudanese party, was formed in 1920 by young graduates. It had secret cells and a pyramid organization. The first secret circular, which was distributed in November 1920, urged the Sudanese to unite with the Egyptians to achieve complete independence. This League was formed to counter the pro-Britain faction, led by traditional leaders and some of the older graduates.

The League's secret activities were no longer adequate to express the developing national consciousness, however, and conflict arose as some members, led by Obaid Haj al-Amin, sought the substitution of secret means by more effective ones. They called for direct confrontation with the colonizers. The White Flag League was formed on May 20, 1924 by these members and was led by Ali Abdullatif. Early in 1922, Ali Abdullatif wrote an unpublished article entitled "The Claims of the Sudanese Nation." He was arrested, put on trial, and imprisoned, and was released in early 1924.

The 1924 Sudanese uprisings consisted of urban demonstrations, the distribution of seditious circulars, and army mutinies. These events took place in the northern Sudan urban centers of Khartoum, Omdurman, Port Sudan, Shendi, and Atbara, as well as the military battalions as far south as Malakal and Wau. Although many participants voiced admiration for and solidarity with Egyptians, their grievances had roots in the economic hardships experienced by urban artisans and the working class and job dissatisfaction for Sudanese military and civilian personnel.

Sudanese writers usually call the uprisings of 1924 a revolution and regard them as an early manifestation of nationalism. However, the uprisings brought neither the change nor the mass appeal and ideological coherence of a nationalist program. The 1924 revolution had many weaknesses, one of which was that its events happened at different times with a lack of coordination between them.

The 1924 revolution was a turning point in British policy in the Sudan and in the future of the graduates' nationalist movement. First, the years following the revolt gave the graduates time to reevaluate the movement and make use of better tactics and techniques. Second, official policy toward them caused a sense of bitterness against the British. The harsher the treatment by the government, the closer they drew to Egypt.

With the defeat of the 1924 revolution, the Sudanese nationalist movement entered its third stage, which extended until the formation of the Graduates General Congress in 1938. The Sudan government, however, implemented an anti-graduates policy in the first decade after the revolt. For most of this period, British administration in the Sudan fought the intelligentsia and turned toward indirect rule by promoting native administration.

This period was marked by the development of literary societies, political struggle in the Graduates Club, and the development of magazines and newspapers. A large number of study groups and literary societies emerged inside and outside the capital. The most outstanding in that period were in Omdurman: the Abu Roaf and al-Fajr groups.

The Gordon College students' strike of 1931 was an important incident during this phase. It was instigated by a reduction in Gordon College graduates' starting salaries. The British administration in the Sudan employed the policy of "divide and rule" among the committee organizing the strike and a compromise was finally reached with the intervention of the two prominent religious leaders – Sayyid Ali, leader of the Khatmiyya sect, and Sayyid Abd al-Rahman, leader of the Ansar sect. However, the strike was a promoter for the Sudanese nationalist movement. It came seven years after the defeat of the 1924 revolution. It was a landmark in the change of the graduates' activities from literary to political. Differences started to develop among the graduates as they started to seek ways and means to get rid of the colonizers.

The fourth phase began with the formation of the Graduates' General Congress in 1938 and ended with the dominance of the pro-unity parties of Congress in 1945. The Graduates' General Congress was the first organized nationalist movement. The Sudan government tolerated the Graduates' General Congress to counterbalance the expected Egyptian influence after the conclusion of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of 1936, since the Congress emphasized a separate Sudanese identity.

For the period 1938–41, the Congress activities were confined to organizational, social, cultural, and educational matters. Congress committees were formed in big towns and the group's popularity increased through its educational programs. The year 1942 was marked by important international developments. In the same year, the Atlantic Charter was signed between the British and the American governments, promising the colonies self-determination immediately after the war. Reacting to this development, the Congress sent a memorandum in April 1942 to the Sudan government calling for Sudanese self-determination after the war. The memorandum created tension between the Sudan government and the graduates. Pursuing its policy of "divide and rule," it began personal communications with moderate elements in Congress and convinced them of the gradual process of self-government and self-determination.

The first institution formed by the Sudan government toward this gradualism was the Advisory Council for the Northern Sudan in 1943. This led to further dissensions in the Congress; the elections for the six sessions were fiercely contested and won by pro-unity elements led by the Ashiqqa (in Arabic, brothers of the same father and mother) Party formed in 1943 under the leadership of Ismail al-Azhari (first Sudanese prime minister in 1954).

It became evident by 1945 that one political party was dominating the Congress. The factions that lost domination of the Congress formed the Umma ("nation" in Arabic) Party in the same year, advocating the motto of "The Sudan for the Sudanese" and believing in a gradual process of self-government and self-determination with the aid of the Sudan government.

The period was also marked by the infiltration of sectarianism in the Graduates General Congress. The two major rival sects were the Khatmiyya and the Ansar. During the Condominium rule, these sects succeeded in infiltrating the graduates' ranks and directing the nationalist movement. Some Sudanese claim that just as the rivalry between the sects was exploited by the co-rulers, so also was the rivalry between the co-rulers exploited by the sects. This sped up the process of self-government and, ultimately, independence.

The last phase (1945–53) started with the clear emergence of Sudanese political parties patronized by the two major sects. The Umma Party came under the patronage of Sayyid Abd al-Rahman al-Mahdi as a political party favoring the complete independence of the Sudan. The Ashiqqa Party, favoring union with Egypt, came under the patronage of Sayyid Ali al-Mirghani and adopted the motto of unity of the Nile Valley. Tense relations developed during this phase between the Sudan government and the Sudanese political parties and groups, particularly the Ashiqqa Party, which had boycotted the constitutional institutions on the ground that they were furthering Britain's imperialist interests. The government wanted in particular to persuade the Ashiqqa Party to cooperate in the Assembly. This party declined to change its acknowledged hostile stand toward the government and its institutions. Instead, it actively participated in the demonstrations, which synchronized with the inauguration of the Assembly in December 1948, and criticized the government's policy in all respects. The Ashiqqa had, furthermore, worked through their majority in the Graduates Congress to build for themselves strong support among the public.

The period 1945–53 also witnessed the emergence of other groups and parties who had adamantly opposed the policies of the Sudan government. Since the inauguration of the Legislative Assembly in 1948, students and workers had organized violent demonstrations against it. They advocated revolutionary struggle against imperialism. Youth in particular had apparently seen in the slogan of unity of the Nile Valley a means for the struggle against colonization rather than an end in itself. The labor movement also developed during this period. The Sudan Workers' Trade Union Federation (SWTUF) was formed in November 1950. The Federation's constitution was amended to include political objectives such as immediate liquidation of all forms of colonization in the Sudan (economic, political, administrative, and military). The Federation advocated the cessation of all forms of cooperation with the colonial regime and the formation of a united revolutionary front. The United Front for Sudan Liberation was thus eventually formed. In a published statement, the Front proclaimed the weakness of imperialism and urged the people to intensify their revolutionary struggle against the government and its institutions.

During 1952, the Front was particularly active in organizing political rallies and demonstrations against the Self-Government Statute, which it dismissed as an imperialist plot and urged the public to boycott it. The recommendations of the Constitutional Amendment Commission were used to prepare the Self-Government Statute, which was submitted to the co-rulers in May 1952, and later on became the base of the 1952–3 Anglo-Egyptian negotiations.

The political atmosphere in the Sudan was very strained when a military coup took place in Egypt on July 23, 1952. It was presumably evident that nothing would calm this intensive political agitation in the Sudan other than a clear recognition of the right of the Sudanese people to self-government and self-determination. The new Egyptian government was realistic enough to acknowledge the strength of the Sudanese factor. It reversed the policy of previous Egyptian governments by recognizing these rights and facilitating the way for the conclusion of the February 12, 1953 Anglo-Egyptian Agreement. A transitional period followed and the complete independence of the Sudan was declared from within the Sudanese parliament on December 19, 1955. The Sudanese celebrated their independence on January 1, 1956.

SEE ALSO: Mahdist Revolt; Sudanese Protest in the Turko-Egyptian Era; Sudanese Women's League

References and Suggested Readings

- Abu Hasabu, A. A. (1985) Factional Conflict in the Sudanese Nationalist Movement 1918–1948. Khartoum: Graduate College Publications, University of Khartoum.
- Al-Gaddal, M. (2002) Tarikh Al-Sudan al-Hadith: The Modern History of the Sudan 1820–1955, 2nd ed. Omdurman: Abd al-Karim Mirghani's Cultural Center.
- Cudsi, A. S. (1969) Sudanese Resistance to British Rule 1900–1920. MSc thesis, University of Khartoum.
- Daly, M. (1991) Imperial Sudan: The Anglo-Egyptian Condominium 1934–1956. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Mawut, L. (1983) Dinka Resistance to Condominium Rule 1903–1932. Khartoum: Graduate College Publications, University of Khartoum.
- Sharkey, H. (2003) Living with Colonialism. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Taha, F. (2006) The Anglo-Egyptian Dispute over the Sudan 1937–1947. Khartoum: Khartoum University Press.
- Woodward, P. (1979) Condominium Rule and Sudanese Nationalism. London: Rex Collings.

Sudanese protest in the Turko-Egyptian era

Fadwa Taha

In the nineteenth century the Sudan was subjected to a Turko-Egyptian invasion. At the time of the invasion, the Funj and the Fur Kingdoms were the two strongest political organizations in Eastern and Central Bilad Al-Sudan. The Funj Kingdom, with its capital in Sinnar, had since the mid-nineteenth century witnessed political struggles that had weakened its influence, and it became evident that the kingdom's fall was imminent.

Mohammed Ali, ruler of Egypt since 1805, used force in invading the Sudan. He established an elaborate administrative system, with an emphasis on taxation and the export of agricultural and natural products. The Sudanese saw the Turkish administration and development efforts as instruments of oppression and injustice, and alien to most of their traditional religious, moral, and cultural concepts. The most important characteristic of Sudanese resistance was its persistence, in spite of its failure under the repressive policy of the regime.

Two sophisticated expeditions were prepared for the invasion. The Sudanese were forced to confront them with very limited means. Resistance to the first expedition, which was heading for the capital Sinnar and was led by Ismail, son of Mohammed Ali, occurred in the Shayqiyya area. The Shayqiyya is one of a number of large groups in Bilad Al-Sudan, and its leaders decided to resist, since they were denied the right to retain arms and horses. They entered into a confrontation in which modern arms were the decisive factor for the victory of the invading army. Thus, the army continued its advance without noticeable resistance.

The situation was worse for the Funj Kingdom, which had no organized army. There, preparations for resistance collapsed at the last minute due to internal conflicts. Conspirators supporting his cousin had killed the regent, Mohammed Wad Adlan, who had sent a defiant message to Ismail. With his death, resistance ended and Ismail entered Sinnar in June 1821. Although this resistance was eliminated, it had long-term effects because the courageous stand provided a psychological and moral boost to the Sudanese nationalist movement.

Another expedition, equipped with firearms and artillery, was prepared for the invasion of Kordofan and Darfur. Maqdom Mussallam, who was ruling Kordofan on behalf of the sultan of Darfur, refused to submit to Daftardar, leader of the expedition. The result of the confrontation was his utter defeat.

During the first stage of the invasion, the victories of the invading army were facilitated by its military superiority in arms, ammunition, and military planning. Sudanese resistance to the invading army was weak, and many areas submitted without a fight. Political disintegration then reached a stage where the Turks could easily deal with one group at a time. Resistance and protest in this early stage was confined to a few places. Some tribal chiefs were aware of the situation in Egypt and the development of a strong government there, and hoped that this rule would extend to the Sudan to give them some kind of stability. In many ways, then, the time was not ripe for the development of nationalism in the modern sense.

Despite the ease in conquering the country, the Turko-Egyptian rulers were confronted from 1822 to 1825 by Sudanese protest that manifested itself in uprisings. The restiveness of the Sudanese under the new Egyptian rule can be explained only by reference to the kind of rule that they had experienced before the Egyptians arrived. During the Funj rule there had been a light tax on crops, both irrigated and rain-grown. All taxes were payable in cash, in length of cloth, or in livestock. The Turko-Egyptian administrative and taxation policies affected and disturbed the lives of the ordinary people. Reaction was quick and spontaneous. It first exploded among tribes of the Gezira – the area between the Blue and the White Nile. Isolated Turkish garrisons were attacked, and soldiers were killed. Other tribal groups fled to the Ethiopian borders. Ismail hurried from Fazugoli, where he was searching for gold, to confront the explosive situation in the Gezira. He adopted a conciliatory policy, as he was not in a position to confront a large-scale protest.

In late October 1822, Ismail was murdered at Shendi. His death was a result of his failure to keep his temper. He had demanded an outrageous contribution – 30,000 dollars and 6,000 slaves within two days. Nimr, mak of the Ja'liyin tribe, protested that his people simply could not produce what was demanded in the specified time.

Ismail insulted him, and Nimr went away. That night his men piled forage around Ismail's quarters and at a given signal set it alight. Ismail and his staff were killed. The killing incited people in other places to protest. From al-Damar to Sinnar, the people rose and dislodged the Egyptian garrisons from al-Matamma, Karari, Halfayat al-Muluk, and al-Ailafun. Only Wad Madani was safe.

The news that Ismail was dead and the Nile Valley was in revolt reached the Daftardar in Kordofan. Ismail's death had made the Daftardar immediately responsible for the Egyptian forces in the Sudan. Without waiting for orders from Egypt, he led a strike force from Kordofan to the Nile. The revolt had cut the lifeline between Sinnar and the north.

In December, the Daftardar reached the Nile between Khartoum and al-Matamma, and then turned northward, burning and killing as he went. An Egyptian force defeated Nimr at Nasub near the wells of Abu Dilaiq, whence he fled with his surviving followers to the Abyssinian marshes and founded a buffer state with his seat at Sofi on the Atbara River. The Daftardar turned south, ravaging the villages as he passed. The people of al-Ailafun resisted him; some he killed, others he humiliated by branding them as slaves. Finally, the avenging army reached Wad Madani and relieved the garrison. For the time being, the Sudanese lay inert under his bloody hand. The revolt was a rising of despair, without leadership or aim. No chief among the Funj rose to unite the broken fragments of the old loyalties to the Funj Kingdom, which had gone for good. The Sudan had to wait 60 years for a leader to rouse the people in a single movement against the occupying power.

The uprising continued for three years, during which the country witnessed devastations not familiar to the people. The rebellious tribes confronted for the first time the brutality of the centralized state with its modern equipment. In the past, they had faced tribes whose strength was similar to their own. The supremacy of modern firearms became evident for the people and could not be resisted by traditional arms and tribal military formations.

The uprising demonstrated the fierce nature of the government and a bad image was created and consolidated in people's minds. Suppression became a phenomenon that accompanied the rule until it was ousted. The decentralization of the uprising weakened its power and made it easy for the Turks to suppress it. The tribal feeling prevented a unified center from being created to confront the regime. Despite the loss, however, the uprising became a legacy for the Sudanese, guiding them later in their moment of national awakening. The murder of Ismail in Shendi became a bequest in which people saw a national challenge for foreign invasion.

Other forms of protest and resistance developed between 1825 and 1881. Resistance was launched from different areas and developed between numerous social groups. Passive resistance was one type that demonstrated itself in people fleeing to forests and jungles inside the Sudan or border areas. It expressed rejection of injustice and the inability to resist foreign rule by direct confrontation. The protest of Sufi sheikhs took a passive form. They alienated themselves from the regime and sought exclusion in their Quranic schools among their students and followers. They stopped practicing their role as mediators between the ruled and ruler. The government then lost an important tool that could have helped it in linking the two.

Tribal resistance was a positive form of resistance. Some tribes expressed their rejection of the government's method by confronting it head on. Their motives were tribal and their resistance was a rejection of some of the regime's practices. None of these tribes was qualified to bring down the regime. However, this resistance deprived the regime of the satisfaction of enjoying absolute authority.

Resistance and protest extended to the army among the black troops (the Jihadiyya), with rebellions in 1844 and 1864, which the government was able to extinguish. The Jihadiyya were the slaves and sons of the slaves taken as captives by the Turks from the tribes of the Southern Sudan and the Nuba Mountains. A more serious mutiny of the Jihadiyya broke out in the 4th regiment at Kassala in 1865, where the governor, whose finances were in desperate straits aggravated by a crop failure, was forced to suspend salaries. The Kassala revolt, the most dangerous the Sudan government had suffered over 30 years, was crushed; however, it constituted a different type of rebellion, coming from the soldiers loyal to the government.

Some jallaba (itinerant traders) may well have welcomed the new order, since they anticipated better trading conditions with Egypt, but even the jallaba suffered from heavy taxes and the government's policy of monopolizing trade. They also suffered from uneven competition with Egyptian and foreign traders and from their secondary role in Egyptian markets. The spread of the jallaba across the different urban areas of the Sudan and their superior economic position led them to form elements of importance in the society. Through their position, they diffused their resentments to other groups.

Among all forms of resistance, protest, and revolts, the Mahdist revolution was the one that succeeded in overthrowing Turko-Egyptian rule. According to Holt (1958), the Mahdist revolution "was a movement of religious origin which was assisted in its development by political, social, and economic stresses in Sudanese society, and which accomplished a political revolution – the overthrow of the Egyptian rule and the establishment of an indigenous Islamic State." Holt believed that a revolutionary movement was most likely to be successful when there was general discontent that was not confined to one class or territorial group, and which arose from specific grievances, not merely from a vague malaise or resentment. Secondly, this had to coincide with a weakness in the existing government that prevented it from crushing the revolution. Thirdly, there had to be a revolutionary army. Fourthly, there had to be a revolutionary high command to disseminate propaganda and propose a renewed social and political order, and to organize the revolutionary activities evoked by this propaganda.

Shuqayr (2007) listed four principal causes of the Mahdiyya. Firstly, the violence that accompanied the original conquest and the Daftardar's devastation in the Shendi region created a desire for revenge, which he described as revenge of sons for their fathers. Secondly, the unaccustomed and inequitable taxation was levied by force. Thirdly, the attempts of the government to suppress the slave trade struck at an important source of wealth and the basis of the country's domestic and agrarian economy. Fourthly, the partiality shown by the government to some tribes and religious sects engendered jealousy.

The nature of the Mahdist revolution differed from early types of protest. The Mahdi was primarily a religious leader, who had arisen to purge the Muslim world of its faults and to break the power of the infidels. Successive victories of the Mahdi created military problems, both for the local administration and the government in Cairo. The last Egyptian attempt to hold the Sudan had ended in a defeat at Shaykan in Kordofan in November 1883. It forced both the Egyptian and British governments to confront the problem of the future of the Sudan. The British government, which had occupied Egypt since 1882, insisted that the Egyptians should evacuate their troops and officials. General Gordon, who was sent to accomplish this mission, was murdered at the hands of the followers of the Mahdi, and Khartoum, the capital, fell on January 26, 1885.

SEE ALSO: Mahdist Revolt; Sudanese Protest Under Anglo-Egyptian Rule

References and Suggested Readings

- Abu Saleem, M. (1970) al-Haraka al-Fikriyya fil Mahdiyya (The Ideology of the Mahdiyya). Khartoum: Khartoum University Press.
- Bjorkelo, A. (1989) Prelude to the Mahdiyya Peasants and Traders in the Shendi Region, 1821–1885. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hill, R. (1959) Egypt in the Sudan 1820–1881. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Holt, P. M. (1958) The Mahdist State in the Sudan. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Holt, P. M. & Daly, M. W. (1988) A History of the Sudan from the Coming of Islam to the Present Day. London and New York: Longman.
- Shuqayr, N. (2007) Goghrafyat ma Tarikh Al-Sudan (The History and Geography of the Sudan), 3rd ed. Khartoum: Dar Azza lil Nashr.

Sudanese Women's League

Christine Cynn

The Sudanese Women's League (Rabitat al-Nisa' al-Sudaniyyat) was founded in 1946 by women members of the Sudanese Communist Party (SCP) in Omdurman, a city on the western bank of the Nile River, across from Khartoum. Founded primarily by middle-class urban women under Dr. Khalda Zahir as president and Fatima Talib as secretary, the League sought to improve the economic and social status of women through focusing on education. The League organized literacy classes, taught sewing and home economics, and gave lectures on women's social problems and health. It also opened a nursery, which eventually became a primary school for girls.

The League restricted membership to the educated – a tiny minority of the population – and its activities were limited mostly to the urban north. The organization's development reflected ongoing political and class struggles on the national level, in particular around anti-colonial nationalism. In 1947, some of the League's members left to join the Jamiyat Taruiyat al-Mar'a (Society for the Promotion of Women), which sought to advance the interests of the land-owning elites from the Mahdi family. In 1952, three members of the League and members of the Sudanese Communist Party founded Itihad el-Nisai (the Sudanese Women's Union, or Women's Union) as part of a broad-based unionization movement among workers, teachers, and peasants. Although the Women's Union succeeded the League, it still restricted membership to the educated elite until its leadership recognized that such requirements were hindering its organization efforts.

Centered in Khartoum and since 1956 led by Fatima Ahmed Ibrahim, the Women's Union focused primarily on reform – women's political, social, economic, and civic rights, and equality between men and women in public and private spheres. The Women's Union Constitution of 1957 enumerated its goals as: female education, consciousness raising, and the defense of women's rights, especially through wage parity and social equality.

In 1955, the Women's Union began publishing Sawat el-Mara (The Woman's Voice Magazine) to debate issues such as Islam's stance on the status of women, the elimination of cliterodectomy, and facial scarification. The journal enjoyed wide circulation of about 17,000, and the Women's Union itself became the dominant women's organization in Africa with a membership estimated at about 15,000.

The Women's Union remained closely linked to the SCP. It was structured like the hierarchical SCP with a central committee overseeing local and regional cells, and the SCP determined the Women's Union leadership. After an unsuccessful leftist coup in 1971, the Women's Union was forced underground for 16 years, and Fatima Ahmed Ibrahim went into exile. The Women's Union was practically neutralized, with many of its secondary leaders joining the women's wing of the government organ, the Sudan Socialist Union, which co-opted the Women's Union's name. Throughout the late 1980s, controversy around the Women's Union agenda, strategies, and Ibrahim's leadership resulted in some feminist and women activists on the left distancing themselves from the Women's Union.

SEE ALSO: Women and National Liberation in Africa

References and Suggested Readings

- El-Bakri, Z. B. & Kameir, E. M. (1983) Aspects of Women's Political Participation in Sudan. International Social Science Journal 35 (4): 605–23.
- El-Bakri, Z. B., Zahir, F., Badri, B., Khalid, T. A., & al Sanusi, M. (1989) The History of the Sudanese Women's Movement. In S. Wieringa (Ed.), Women's Movements and Organizations in Historical Perspective. The Hague: Women and Development Programme, Institute of Social Studies.
- Fluehr-Lobban (1974) Women and Social Liberation: The Sudan Experience. Three Studies on National Integration in the Arab World. Association of Arab-American University Graduates, Information Papers 12 (March): 28–34.
- Hale, S. (1996) Gender Politics in Sudan: Islamism, Socialism, and the State. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Ibrahim, F. A. (1996) Sudanese Women's Union: Strategies for Emancipation and the Counter Movement. ufahamu: Journal of the African Activist Association 24: 2–20.
- Kashif-Badri, H. (1980) el-Haraka el-nisaiyya fi-el-Sudan (The Women's Movement in Sudan). Khartoum: University Publishing House, University of Khartoum.

Sukarno (1901–1970)

Andrew J. Waskey

Sukarno (Soekarno) is the only name of the first president of Indonesia. He was an active member of the struggle for independence from Dutch colonial rule.

Sukarno was born in the city of Surabaya in East Java, the Dutch East Indies. His father was a schoolteacher and his mother was from the Buleleng regency. In 1916 he went to Surabaya to attend secondary school, and studied engineering and architecture five years later at the Technische Hogeschool in Bandung.

In 1927 Sukarno and others formed the Partai Nasional Indonesia (Indonesian Nationalist Party, PNI). The party operated on a pro-independence platform. It was also anti-capitalist as well as anti-imperialist. His involvement in politics led to his arrest in 1929 by the Dutch colonial government, and he was sentenced to two years in prison. When released he found that he had become a folk hero to the Indonesians, although the PNI fell apart during his incarceration.

During the 1930s Sukarno was arrested several times by the Dutch. When the Japanese invaded Indonesia in 1942, they freed him from jail and used him to organize resistance against the Dutch. From Sukarno's point of view, however, he was using the Japanese to free Indonesia from the Dutch. He was able to encourage non-cooperation with the Dutch and limited cooperation with the Japanese. When the Japanese needed aviation fuel, labor conscripts, and other supplies, Sukarno was able to obtain them; he did radio propaganda for them as well.

In November of 1943, Sukarno went to Japan where he was decorated by the emperor and became the head of a ruling committee organized by the Japanese. The committee was the nucleus of the future independence organization. By September of 1944 the Dutch were promising independence at a future date, the announcement of which vindicated Sukarno's policy of cooperating with the Japanese in order to defeat the Dutch.

With Sukarno's help, the Japanese recruited two million Indonesians as a native contingent to fight the Allies; these units were ready to fight against any Allied forces sent to retake Java. The Japanese surrender in August of 1945 was followed by the Indonesian declaration of independence on August 17, 1945. The next day a provisional convention elected him president. Sukarno announced five principles for the new government. These were nationalism, equality among nations, representative democracy, social justice (Marxist in vision), and theism. However, his constitutional vision was to flounder from the beginning because of the numerous factions in Indonesia.

Between 1945 and 1950 Sukarno and other Indonesian nationalists attempted (unsuccessfully) to prevent the Dutch from returning. In October 1945 the Indonesian army was formed but was too disorganized to defeat the Dutch, and in December 1948 Sukarno was captured and taken to Jakarta. After independence, recognized by the Netherlands on December 27, 1949 (later, in August 2005, it declared that it recognized de facto Indonesian independence on August 17, 1945), Sukarno continued as president until March 1967, when he was expelled from the presidency by the generals of the army. He died on June 21, 1970.

SEE ALSO: Indonesian Pro-Democracy Protests; Indonesian Protests against Suharto Dictatorship; Indonesian Revolution and Counterrevolution; Japan, Pacifist Movement, 1945–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Legge, J. D. (1985) Sukarno. New York: Routledge.
Penders, C. L. M. (1979) The Life and Times of Sukarno. New York: Pan Macmillian.

Sun Yat-Sen (1866–1925)

Amit Bhattacharyya

Dr. Sun Yat-Sen, the “frustrated patriot” and “Father of Modern China,” was a political and revolutionary leader in the early twentieth century who is still highly regarded in China and Taiwan as a unifying figure, in spite of his long history of political failures. Although he did not live to see Manchu despotism overthrown or a political consolidation in post-revolutionary China, he initiated and nurtured a movement that would succeed many years later.

Sun Yat-Sen was born into a peasant family in the village of Choyhung in Kwangtung province. He was educated in missionary schools, mostly outside China: in Hawaii and the British colony of Hong Kong. This missionary background and western exposure may have led to his aversion for traditional Chinese religion and embrace of Christianity in 1884. Sun Yat-Sen returned to China to attend Queens College and then medical school in Hong Kong, where he qualified as a physician in 1892. From the 1890s, reformist ideologies had been gaining ground among the western-educated professional and commercial class in China. Sun Yat-Sen initially aligned himself with such bourgeois-liberal reformists in an attempt to push through proposals for reform in agriculture, railways, administration, education, and business. All of his attempts ended in failure, however, and he was impelled to think in terms of a revolutionary overthrow of the Manchu rulers and the creation of a republic.

Anti-Manchu Protest

In 1894 Sun Yat-Sen formed the Hsing Chung Hui (Revive China Society) in Honolulu as the first Chinese bourgeois revolutionary organization. Hsing Chung Hui attempted to weave together the multiplicity of anti-Manchu popular outbreaks that erupted when China was forced to sign the humiliating Treaty of Shimonoseki in 1895 – a result of the Manchu defeat at the hands of Japan. Sun Yat-Sen became a fugitive in China when his first plan for a revolutionary uprising in Canton was exposed. He secretly left China for Europe, and while in London became acquainted with the writings of western philosophers and political economists such as Karl Marx, J. S. Mill, and Adam Smith. By early 1901 Sun Yat-Sen was in Japan mobilizing almost 10,000 Chinese expatriates for an uprising in Huichow, China; however, this attempt was also suppressed.

After signing the Protocol of 1901, the Qing government facilitated imperial penetration, and all of China cried out for the overthrow of the Manchu regime. Sun Yat-Sen thus set about forming a revolutionary party to unify the diverse radical and anti-Manchu forces to lead the bourgeois-democratic revolution on a nationwide scale. His strategy was to bring together sporadic revolts, while at the same time gaining foreign respect for the revolution. The culmination of his efforts was the formation of the revolutionary organization Tung Meng Hui (Revolutionary Brotherhood) in 1905.

Three Principles of the People

The essence of Sun Yat-Sen's ideology was manifested in the slogan "Drive out the Manchus, restore Chinese rule, establish a republic, and equalize land rights." From this slogan the Three Principles of the People were developed: People's Nationalism, People's Democracy, and People's Livelihood, which Sun Yat-Sen proclaimed in 1905. People's Nationalism was aimed at the overthrow of Manchu rule and the establishment of a republic in China. It targeted the Qing ruling aristocracy, but made no mention of the role played by foreign imperialism. The goal of People's Democracy was to establish a democratic constitutional government patterned after the western capitalist countries. The Principle of People's Livelihood reflected the social aspect of the program and referred to equal rights to land, and implied nationalization of land. People's Livelihood sought to free the peasantry from the feudal yoke; however, it did not take into account the role of the working class.

Tung Meng Hui's formation coincided with numerous anti-tax riots and revolutionary outbreaks that took place in different parts of China from 1905 to 1911. Though these were not successful, they nourished the protest movements that would intensify and compel the Qing to promulgate a Nine-Year Program of Constitutional Reform in 1908. Later that year, both Empress Tzu Hsi and the imprisoned Emperor Kuang-hsu died, and Pu Yi, an infant surrounded by non-entities, was on the throne. The crisis of the Manchu became more serious than ever, while at the same time Sun Yat-Sen was secretly preparing for the final showdown with the imperial army. In September 1911 a rising in Sichuan stimulated the revolutionary mood of the people. Within a month, 13 provinces had been lost from the empire. After the revolution of 1911 the defeated Manchu rulers tried to save their position by appointing a Manchu army general and former minister, Yuan Shikai, as the premier. Sun Yat-Sen became the president of the republic on January 1, 1912. China was essentially divided between the republicans in the South, with Nanking as their capital, and Yuan Shikai and his forces in the North, with Peking as the capital. The revolution remained incomplete; it abolished the feudal dynastic rule of the Manchus, but not feudalism, foreign imperialism, or Yuan Shikai's dictatorship. Anxious to bring about the unity of the North and the South, Sun Yat-Sen yielded the presidency to Yuan Shikai in 1912. Yuan Shikai went on to establish a military dictatorship in China.

Kuomintang and the Three Major Policies

In August 1912 Sun Yat-Sen formed the Kuomintang (KMT) political party, which replaced Tung Meng Hui. In 1913, when the full depth of Yuan's betrayal became clear, Sun Yat-Sen mobilized the army of south China and launched the Second Revolution, directed against the dictator. This uprising was suppressed after months of fighting, however, because agrarian demands were again ignored and the peasants therefore remained aloof. After gaining victory, Yuan Shikai banned the KMT.

With the outbreak of World War I, China stood face to face with a new set of problems. Japan joined the Allies in the war and presented the president, Yuan Shikai, with the infamous Twenty-one Demands, the acceptance of which would mean the colonization of vast parts of China by Japan. The Chinese government succumbed to this pressure and accepted all of the demands. This, in addition to Article 156 of the Treaty of Versailles, which handed over German concessions in China to Japan, led to the May 4th movement of 1919.

With the influence of the October Revolution in Russia, Sun Yat-Sen's ideology began to evolve. With the formation of the Communist Party of China (CPC) in 1921, he drastically revised his own views and program. He then propounded the Three Major Policies for the KMT: Alliance with Soviet Russia; Alliance with the CPC; and Support for the Workers' and Peasants' Movement. This provided the ideological basis of the First United Front (1923–7) between the KMT and the CPC. A new revolutionary government was set up in Canton. It established the Whampoa Military Academy, with the KMT officer Chiang Kai-Shek as the dean, and the CPC leader Zhou Enlai as political director, to train officers to fight against the Northern warlords. Canton thus became the center of the revived hopes and activity of everything that was progressive in China. Sun Yat-Sen, however, did not live long after that. In the end, nothing grew from Sun Yat-Sen's elaborate plans for China's economic transformation, and no imperialist government recognized any regime he headed, impelling historian C. Martin Wilbur (1976) to describe Sun Yat-Sen's life as "a somber story of shattered dreams."

SEE ALSO: Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949; China, May 4th Movement; Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911; Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864; Zhou Enlai (1898–1976)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bergere, M. C. (1989) The Golden Age of the Chinese Bourgeoisie 1911–1937. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Epstein, I. (1956) From Opium War to Liberation. Beijing: New World Press.
- Schiffirin, H. Z. (1968) Sun Yat-Sen and the Origins of the Chinese Revolution. Berkeley: University of California Press.

- Sharman L. (1934) Sun Yat-Sen: His life and its Meaning: A Critical Biography. New York: John Day.
- Sheng, H. & Liu, D. et al. (1983) The 1911 Revolution: A Retrospective After 70 Years. Beijing: New World Press.
- Wilbur, C. M. (1976) Sun Yat-Sen: The Frustrated Patriot. New York: Columbia University Press.

SWAPO (South West African People's Organization)

Tilman Dederling

The South West African People's Organization (SWAPO) was formed in the 1950s in contemporary Namibia among a group of about 200 Ovambo workers who had maneuvered their way through the bureaucratic maze of the migrant labor system to reach Cape Town where they faced the constant danger of falling foul of the repressive South African pass laws. Under the leadership of Andimba Toivo ya Toivo, this group established connections with white and black members of left and liberal South African opposition groups, such as the African National Congress, the Communist Party, the Liberal Party, the Congress of Democrats, and the South African Coloured People's Organization. In 1957 the South African government removed Toivo to Ovamboland, where he continued campaigning for political independence and petitioning the United Nations. The Ovambo People's Organization (OPO) emerged from this set of connections between Namibian and South African activists and against the background of the increasing internationalization of anti-colonial resistance in the 1950s and 1960s. In 1960 it was transformed into SWAPO. Unlike other emerging leaders of the independence movement, such as Sam Nujoma, Toivo did not go into exile. In 1966 the apartheid government sentenced Toivo to 20 years in prison. He was released in 1984 and joined SWAPO in exile, which in the meantime had been recognized as the sole representative of the Namibian people under the organization's energetic president, Nujoma.

From the 1950s, a number of Namibian political organizations, such as the South West Africa Progressive Association (SWAPA) and the Herero-dominated Chiefs' Council, emerged to test the limits of independent African political action under the South African occupation. The South West Africa National Union (SWANU) was originally conceptualized as an umbrella organization for the different independence movements. From its inception, however, it was disrupted by debates on representation and by organizational difficulties. These conflicts among the different sections of the independence movement showed that there were not only incompatible views on strategy. The older representatives of traditional leadership often seemed to be tainted by their integration into the structures of the colonial state as salaried headmen or as organizers of migrant labor. Some scholars suggest that the new conflicts reflected the aspirations of a new generation of leaders, who had been exposed to external ideological and political influences and perceived themselves to be more modern and less "tribal" than the old leadership. Representatives of this new generation of activists wanted to mobilize followers more vigorously across ethnic barriers and, stimulated by the rising wave of decolonization on the continent, they envisaged more resolute action beyond petitioning the authorities.

The violent response of the colonial state to African protest against the forced removal of Windhoek's black population to nearby Katutura township in 1959, which left 11 people dead and 44 injured, has been described as a major turning point in the history of Namibian nationalism. Subsequently, the South African authorities intensified the repression of black political movements, which mirrored the harsh methods employed against the ANC and other organizations in South Africa from the early 1960s. In the wake of the Katutura killings the disputes between the Herero in the Chiefs' Council and the SWANU leadership escalated and led to an open split between the two organizations, which eventually damaged the chances of both associations to consolidate their respective positions.

Although SWAPO was never banned in Namibia, many of the important leaders were driven into exile where they could establish connections with international organizations and with newly independent countries in the Third World. Before he left the country to organize the armed struggle against South African rule, Nujoma played a major role in Namibia in building organizational ties among various important sections of the African population. His diplomatic activities in exile contributed to alerting the world public to the situation in Namibia. In 1960 Nujoma appeared together with other Namibians and with Oliver Tambo of the ANC before the UN General Assembly to speak up against South Africa's repressive policies.

In 1961 SWAPO opened an office in Dar es Salaam in Tanzania, and the organization began to send cadres for military training to Algeria, Egypt, North Korea, and the Soviet Union. SWAPO continued to cooperate with the Chiefs' Council for several years after the Katutura killings. Although he represented a new type of vigorous national leadership, Nujoma had kept his distance to the better-educated SWANU leadership and initially relied more on the solid ethnic base of the Herero leaders in the Chiefs' Council. The fallout between the latter and SWANU made the cooperation with SWANU less significant. Moreover, the Cold War and its ramifications, such as the Sino-Soviet split, impacted on the disputes between SWANU and SWAPO in the 1960s. SWAPO pursued a strategy which aimed at keeping the doors to the UN and to western countries open, despite increasing support from the Soviets. In contrast, SWANU propagated a closer alignment with China, which stance contributed to its gradual slide into irrelevance.

Although the independence movement in Namibia was unable to create a unified centralized structure for the struggle against South Africa, SWAPO succeeded in establishing the political credibility which proved to be crucial to its ascent to international recognition. A major reason was that SWAPO started a guerrilla war in Namibia in 1966. The military activities of the People's Liberation Army of Namibia (PLAN) did not produce significant results on the ground, but their importance consisted in affirming SWAPO's status as one of the legitimate liberation movements in Africa. By the late 1970s SWAPO was recognized both by the OAU and the UN as the sole representative of the Namibian people.

During the "heroic period of the internal struggle" from 1971 to 1975, SWAPO also made its presence felt inside Namibia, holding public meetings and successfully boycotting elections for an Ovambo "homeland." The general strike of 1971-2 erupted among contract workers in the South African enclave Walvis Bay and spread to the mining industry and other sectors, immobilizing an estimated 43,000 contract workers. Because of the participation of contract workers from Angola and from Ovamboland, the repercussions of the strike extended to the rural population on both sides of the northern border, where Africans began to rebel violently against the Portuguese and South African regimes. The strike became a key moment in the history of the independence movement because it generated genuine mass support for SWAPO in Ovamboland. Traditional leaders were increasingly discredited because they collaborated with the South African administration and exposed their men to the brutal realities of labor migration. By the mid-1970s SWAPO also found strong support among the Nama in the south of the country. In subsequent years, facing increasing bouts of state repression, SWAPO tried to adjust its tactics to the situation on the ground by inspiring and supporting a number of organizations, ranging from students' and women's associations to trade unions. These activities were often observed with some suspicion by the leadership in exile. Since Ovamboland was increasingly turned into a war zone from where the South African military launched cross-border raids into Angola, SWAPO activism could only be pursued more openly in the south of Namibia. The southerners were considered better educated and politically more sophisticated than the traditional leadership based in Ovamboland. This heightened tensions within the independence movement, which was under constant attack from the apartheid regime. In the long run, the external leadership established its hegemony of the internal resistance, arguing somewhat convincingly that, ultimately, any prospect of liberation depended on SWAPO's military activities and international connections.

These tensions between the internal and external branches of SWAPO were also reflected in the resurrection of trade union activities in the 1980s following a period of heavy state repression which practically immobilized the workers' movement. In the 1980s the SWAPO-affiliated National Union of Namibian Workers began to organize workers in the mining sector and in the meat-processing and chemical industries. Labor actions, such as a strike in the Tsumeb copper mine in 1987, were influenced by the contemporaneous upsurge of union activities in South Africa and by the release of a number of SWAPO labor activists from South African prisons. These activities generated concern among the external leadership; Sam Nujoma is reported to have summoned trade union leaders to Europe and reprimanded them for creating independent centers of political militancy in Namibia.

Until the collapse of Portuguese rule in Angola in the early 1970s the South Africans were able to suppress SWAPO's military activities in Ovamboland. This forced PLAN fighters to focus on the Caprivi Strip in the northeast of the country, which was accessible from Zambia. These strikes on representatives of the state included attacks on collaborators among the indigenous elite, such as the killing of Chief Philomenon Elifas who participated in the South Africa-inspired Turnhalle (sports hall) assembly which attempted to achieve an alternative solution to a SWAPO-led government.

SWAPO successfully negotiated and survived the shifting strategic and political circumstances which added to the complexities of the situation in southern Africa during the period of the proxy war which devastated Angola in the 1970s and 1980s. The South African military involvement in Angola from September 1975 to March 1976 provided a major impetus to the SWAPO war effort, because in the wake of the South African withdrawal SWAPO could move its bases closer to the northern Namibian border. Groups of 60–100 PLAN fighters conducted cross-border raids into northern Namibia and planted landmines. The armed struggle received a setback, however, when South African troops returned to Angola from 1978 to become involved in heavy fighting with government troops and their Cuban auxiliaries.

On May 4, 1978 South African troops attacked the Cassinga camp, 250 kilometers north of the southern Angola border, which left about 600 people dead, many of them non-combatants. The South African military celebrated the raid as a great success in fighting terrorism, but it backfired politically because the mass killing infuriated the world public and gave SWAPO a clear victory in the propaganda war. The early 1980s saw the intensified presence of the South African military in southern Angola. In a series of military operations the South Africans put enormous pressure not only on the Angolans and their Cuban allies but also on SWAPO's positions.

By 1988 the situation had escalated to the point that the main patrons of the belligerents – the Soviet Union, Cuba, and the United States – pushed the warring parties into negotiations.

American diplomacy had succeeded in creating “linkage” between the presence of Cuban troops in Angola and the occupation of Namibia by the South Africans. South Africa’s involvement in the war in Namibia and Angola had put great pressure on the finances of the white minority regime. The apartheid government faced increasingly bitter resistance in South Africa, which convinced many whites that the war in Namibia and Angola had become a costly obstacle to seeking a peaceful solution at home. In 1988 Angola, Cuba, and South Africa agreed to an end of the war. South Africa accepted UN Resolution 435, which paved the way for free elections in Namibia under the supervision of UN peace-keeping troops and for the final withdrawal of South Africa from Namibia. On March 21, 1990 Sam Nujoma was sworn in by UN Secretary General Javier Pérez de Cuéllar as the first president of the independent Republic of Namibia. Subsequently, SWAPO became the dominant party in the independent battle-scarred country.

SEE ALSO: Nujoma, Sam (b. 1929); Toivo ya Toivo, Andimba (b. 1924); Witbooi, Hendrik (ca. 1825–1905)

References and Suggested Readings

- Brown, S. (1995) Diplomacy by Other Means: SWAPO’s Liberation War. In C. Leys & J. S. Saul (Eds.), Namibia’s Liberation Struggle: The Two-Edged Sword. Athens: Ohio University Press.
- Dierks, K. (2002) Chronology of Namibian History: From Pre-Historical Times to Independent Namibia. Windhoek: Namibia Scientific Society.
- Emmet, T. (1999) Popular Resistance and the Roots of Nationalism in Namibia, 1915–1966. Namibia Studies Series 4. Basel: P. Schlettwein.
- Katjavivi, P. H. (1988) A History of Resistance in Namibia. Paris: Unesco.
- Leys, C. & Saul, J. S. (Eds.) (1995) Namibia’s Liberation Struggle: The Two-Edged Sword. Athens: Ohio University Press.

Swaziland, nationalist and economic protests

Nhlanhla Dlamini

Early Period

Protest and resistance have been manifested in Swaziland since at least the sixteenth century, when the Dlamini rulers started to assert their hegemony over the resilient peoples of the area. In this context, contestations centered on the alliances and rivalries that were set up either in support of, or in competition with, Dlamini domination. During the time of Mswati II’s reign in the nineteenth century, major forms of protest emanated from competing rivalries contending the throne. This was the case, for example, when rebellions were staged by the king’s brothers, Malambule, Fokoti, and Somcuba. Ultimately, Dlamini hegemony had been firmly established by the time of Mswati II’s demise in 1865.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century there was pressure from the Boer republics and the British empire: this was met by diplomatic but vigorous protest from Swaziland’s indigenous rulers, although they ultimately agreed to the territory becoming a British protectorate in 1902. The traditional rulers continued advancing Swazi grievances after the establishment of colonial rule, and well before the emergence of modern political parties.

While British sovereignty was accepted, its terms were contested throughout the period of colonial rule. Traditional leaders sought to defend their prerogatives at the same time as they were being incorporated into the system of “indirect rule.” Between 1895 and 1921, the Queen Regent Labotsibeni Gwamile Mdluli fiercely resisted the imposition of colonial authority, and openly and boldly challenged the claims of the colonial power. As early as 1904 the Swazi protested heavy taxation by the colonial state as they were dissatisfied with the manner in which taxation was introduced. Rumors caught the attention of the colonial administration that the Swazi felt that they were oppressed and harshly treated and were contemplating revolution.

The Sir George Grey Commission which completed the demarcation of land in 1909 inspired protest among the Swazi who felt that they had been cheated when land was divided among themselves, the British crown, and private European landowners. In meetings with colonial officials the Queen Regent Labotsibeni and Prince Malunge vigorously expressed these sentiments. A series of articles in the newspaper Abantu Batho (The People), which was identified with the South African Native National Congress (SANNC, later the African National Congress, ANC) in 1913 saw anonymous writers, supposedly Swazi, articulate grievances about the manner in which the Swazi had lost land, and argued that it was identical to the South African case where the ownership of land had been largely removed from Africans (Swaziland National Archives, RCS 124/1913).

Soon after his installation as Paramount Chief in 1921 Sobhuza II protested, among other issues, the manner in which British rule interfered with the powers of the traditional rulers, and the transfer of land ownership to whites and the state. This was pursued through a series of delegations to London, including a legal case in 1926 through which Sobhuza sought to regain lost land. Though Sobhuza lost the case, a combination of change in wartime colonial policy and a petition presented to the British in 1941 resulted in some considerable amount of crown land being allocated for use by the Swazi between 1930 and 1950.

Nationalists and Modernizers

Swazi protests from the 1920s were also inspired by the emergence of modern associations, and by the example of the ANC in South Africa. The nascent group of educated Swazi, under the auspices of the Swaziland Progressive Association (SPA) formed in 1929, had begun to protest racial discrimination in Swaziland. Though the SPA made its representations directly to the colonial government, it frequently experienced opposition from the Swazi traditional leadership, the “royalists,” who considered themselves as the authentic voice of the Swazi people.

For much of its existence, the SPA confined itself to the submission of petitions to the colonial government. Occasionally the SPA’s struggle had contradictory overtones, and oscillated between themes that addressed discrimination and those that celebrated positive relations between blacks and whites. It also appears that the SPA lacked coordination strategies, as it tended to speak for groups that were not apparently aware of its activities. This may be attributed to its elitist approach, with the SPA perceiving itself as the educated “mouthpiece” of the masses. It lacked a strategy to translate its concerns into a national campaign, and ultimately failed in protesting racial discrimination in Swaziland.

The start of the 1960s saw parties like the Swaziland Progressive Party (SPP) emerge and compete; there was growing protest and increasingly vocal calls for a return of Swazi self-determination. These developments coincided with the labor protests of 1962–3 when rising worker consciousness was manifested in a series of strikes in industrial and urban centers. This long overdue labor unrest was an outlet for deep-seated grievances concerning poor working and living conditions, which were inextricably linked to the prevalent discriminatory workplace policies. From the point of view of the workers and political activists who rose to articulate these grievances, and to mobilize labor, these conditions were the result of colonial domination; hence the underlying anti-colonial gestures and sentiments during the strikes.

The period also saw constitutional negotiations with the colonial power, which served as bargaining forums for a new political order. While the newly formed political parties favored change along the principles of liberal democracy, the royalists advocated a political dispensation in which power was transferred to the Swazi monarchy. One key area of contention was land, which the royalists regarded as the property of the monarchy, administered on behalf of the people by the chiefs. When it became apparent that the British would not hand over power to the monarchy without the evidence of support from the Swazi people, the monarchy formed the Imbokodvo National Movement (INM) to contest the elections.

Ultimately, conditions swung in favor of the Swazi monarchy, as witnessed in its major victories in the Legislative Council elections in 1964 and the pre-independence elections in 1967. The monarchy and its supporters also secured the support of most conservative whites in Swaziland. It was able to present the radical nationalism of groups like Ngwane National Liberatory Congress (NNLC) – a 1964 split off the SPP, headed by Zwane – as a foreign ideology, contrary to Swazi traditions. The INM formed the first government of independent Swaziland in 1968, with Samuel Thornton Msindazwe Sukati as Speaker.

Soon after the first post-independence elections in 1972, Sobhuza II abrogated the constitution and decreed the banning of political parties in the country, subsequently instituting a system of limited “non-partisan” elections based on Tinkhundla, or local constituencies. The parties had begun showing signs of being a credible threat to the royalist bloc. The NNLC, backed by figures like Kwame Nkrumah and Julius Nyerere, for instance, had won four seats, mainly in the working-class constituencies of the Mpumalanga sugar plantations. From the banning of political parties, opposition parties operated from underground, key figures like Zwane were repeatedly arrested or driven into exile, and trade unions provided a major vehicle for public protest. A new constitution was promulgated in 1978, but not formally presented.

Under the Tinkhundla Regime

Supported by students, teachers staged a general strike in 1977 to protest low wages. The action resulted in serious disturbances in many parts of the country. The period following Sobhuza II's demise in 1982, just prior to the coronation of Mswati III in 1986, was characterized by a political vacuum and serious infighting in the ruling elite, a section of which seems to have favored a republican state. University students took to the streets in 1983 to protest the dethronement of Dzeliwe Shongwe as Queen Regent.

The underground People's United Democratic Movement (PUDEMO), now the main opposition grouping, was formed at the University of Swaziland the same year. In 1990 university students at the main university campus, Kwaluseni, engaged in class boycotts to protest, among other issues, the shortage of lecturers and to demand the release from jail of a student detained in connection with political activity. The protest was forcefully terminated through army and police intervention. Throughout the 1990s students' grievances at the university received the sympathy of the labor movement and political activists. The Swaziland Youth Congress (SWAYOCO) was formed in 1991.

Squatter evictions from farms in the different parts of the country since the 1980s inspired protests well into the early 2000s. In an unrelated case, dissident chiefs Mliba Fakudze and Mtfuso Dlamini were evicted from the Kamkhweli and Macetjeni chiefdoms in 2000 in favor of Prince Maguga. This was condemned by some union leaders, as well as by women from these chiefdoms, who showed their naked buttocks in public as a "gift" to the now deceased prince.

Parallel to student protests were various strikes, which at times brought the economy of the country to a halt. A small underground Swaziland Communist Party was formed in 1994. In the mid-1990s, Swazi unions were amongst the most rapidly growing in the world. They forged close ties with formations like the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU), which, along with the South African Communist Party (SACP), provides support to Swazi political exiles and had organized several blockades of Swazi border posts. In 1994, the Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions (SFTU) held a two-day general strike for political and economic reforms. The strength of the labor movement was again dramatically demonstrated when the SFTU staged a countrywide strike in March 1996 that brought the country to a standstill for 28 days, despite the arrest of union leaders. Through this strike the SFTU was applying pressure for the improvement of working conditions as well as demanding certain political reforms and a new constitutional dispensation. Several more general strikes took place in 1997.

Such struggles forced some concessions: most of the political reforms since the start of the 1990s can be traced to protests by pro-democracy groups and labor. An ongoing review of the constitution saw Mswati III announce in 2001 that the existing system would be retained, and even extended. By July 2006, protests had led to a new constitution being put in place (not long after the arrest of a number of PUDEMO and SWAYOCO activists for high treason after a spate of firebomb attacks). The new constitution has, however, generally been heavily criticized by civil society for its disappointing provisions and its strong continuities with the political status quo.

Discontent with the constitution, the repression of political parties, and worker-unfriendly policies led to unions and prominent political formations jointly organizing successful protest marches on July 24 and 25, 2007 in Manzini and Mbabane respectively. At the same time, there have been major protests at the University of Swaziland against curriculum restructuring: political groups saw this as a favorable climate for their activities ahead of the 2008 elections. The protests have involved, inter alia, the burning down of university buildings, leading to the closure of the university in 2007. In 2008, the university administration resolved to postpone examinations indefinitely. Students appealed to the courts, and a final verdict interdicting the university from implementing its new curriculum was issued April 10, 2008. With ongoing student militancy and labor organizing, it seems certain Swaziland will remain a turbulent area for years to come.

SEE ALSO: COSATU (Congress of South African Trade Unions); Lesotho, Popular Protest and Resistance; Nkrumah, Kwame (1909–1972); Nyerere, Julius (1922–1999); South Africa, African Nationalism and the ANC; Zwane, Ambrose Pheseyha (1922–1998)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bonner, P. (1983) Kings, Commoners, Concessionaires: The Evolution and Dissolution of the Nineteenth-Century Swazi State. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Booth, A. R. (1983) Swaziland: Tradition and Change in a Southern African Kingdom. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Crush, J. S. (1985) Colonial Coercion and the Swazi Tax Revolt of 1903–1907. Political Geography Quarterly 11: 179–90.
- Dlamini, N. (2007) The Legal Abolition of Racial Discrimination and its Aftermath: The Case of Swaziland, 1945–1973. PhD thesis, University of the Witwatersrand.
- Fransman, M. (1978) The State and Development in Swaziland, 1960–1977. PhD thesis, University of Sussex.
- Genge, M. (2001) Power and Gender in Southern African History: Power Relations in the Era of Queen Labotsibeni Gwamile Mdluli of Swaziland, ca. 1875–1921. PhD thesis, Michigan State University.
- Jones, H. W. (1993) A Biographical Register of Swaziland up to 1902. Pietermaritzburg: Natal University Press.
- Kanduzza, A. (2001) Evolving Significance of Sobhuza's 1941 Petition. TransAfrican Journal of History 25: 110–22.
- Levin, R. (1997) When the Sleeping Grass Amakens: Land and Power in Swaziland. Johannesburg: Witwatersrand University Press.
- Macmillan, H. (1985) Swaziland: Decolonization and the Triumph of "Tradition." Journal of Modern African Studies 23: 643–66.
- Matsebula, J. S. M. (1988) A History of Swaziland, 3rd ed. Cape Town: Longman.
- Nyeko, B. H. L. (1977) The Swazi Leadership's Response to Colonial Rule, 1902–1930. DPhil, Makerere University.
- Potholm, C. (1972) Swaziland: The Dynamics of Political Modernization. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.
- Simelane, H. S. (2000) Colonialism and Economic Change in Swaziland, 1940–1960. Manzini: JaNyeko.

Swedish Revolution of 1809

Marcelline Block

King Gustavus III of Sweden (r. 1771–92) was a so-called enlightened despot who not only ushered in an age of culture and prosperity in Sweden, but also imposed absolutism during a coup d'état in 1772. Previously, Sweden had been ruled by a parliamentary system under the Riksdag of the Swedish Estates. In 1792 Gustavus III was assassinated at a masquerade ball by a conspiracy of nobles angered by his absolutist stance.

Gustavus III's son, Gustav IV Adolf (1778–1837; also known as Gustavus IV) ascended to the throne at age 14 in 1792 under the regency of his uncle Charles, duke of Södermanland. At age 18 he became the sole ruler of Sweden. Gustavus IV was a devout Christian; in 1796 he refused to marry the granddaughter of the Russian Empress Catherine the Great, Alexandra Pavlovna, because she intended to continue worshipping in the Russian Orthodox Church. Gustavus IV was initially well liked, perceived as a down-to-earth, pious man, unlike his father. Yet he too became an intransigent, absolute monarch who claimed he would never again call a meeting of the Riksdag of the Swedish Estates after they opposed him in March and April 1800. Gustavus IV's ferocious hatred of France – because of the Jacobins and Napoleon, whom he considered to be the antichrist – coupled with his refusal to cooperate with the Riksdag and his failure to resolve Sweden's fiscal and agricultural crises led to his downfall. Gustavus IV's rule was marked by internal strife as well as major diplomatic gaffes, military mistakes, and substantial losses of Swedish territories during the Russo-Swedish Wars and the Napoleonic Wars of the early nineteenth century.

In 1805 Gustavus IV joined the Third Coalition of Great Britain, Russia, and Austria against Napoleonic France. After France's strategic and devastating victory over Prussia in the Battle of Jena (1806), Napoleon made numerous diplomatic proposals to Sweden, which Gustavus IV rejected, even though he had previously lost several battles in his attempts to aid the British and Russian armies against France. As a result, Sweden lost its territorial holdings in Pomerania and the Swedish army was nearly massacred.

When Tsar Alexander I of Russia (Sweden's former ally) and Napoleon signed the Treaty of Tilsit in 1807, Gustavus IV rejected all of Alexander's proposals and also did not properly protect Finland, at that time a Swedish territory, and it was soon attacked by Russia. A small Swedish contingent attempted to stave off the Russian assault while the under-equipped Finnish army was essentially left to fend for itself. Swedish troops were preoccupied with Denmark, whose declaration of war against Sweden in 1808 was at the behest of Napoleon and, oddly enough, was to be led by Marshal Jean-Baptiste Bernadotte – ironically, the future king of Sweden. This Danish assault never materialized, yet the defeat of Sweden by Russia during the Finnish War of February 1808–September 1809 caused the loss of Sweden's eastern territory, which then became the autonomous Grand Duchy of Finland under the rule of imperial Russia. In the Treaty of Fredrikshamn/Hamina (September 17, 1809), Sweden formally surrendered all of its holdings in Finland, as well as parts of Lapland, to Russia. Sweden's loss of Finland led to the deposition of Gustavus IV by several military conspirators on March 13, 1809. This is one of the main events of the Swedish Revolution of 1809, which established a new constitution and a new royal dynasty.

Gustavus IV was deposed when seven army officers, all part of a larger conspiracy, broke into his royal palace, seizing him and his family, and imprisoning them in Gripsholm Castle. Gustavus IV's elderly uncle and former regent, Charles, was instated as King Charles XIII. On March 29 Gustavus IV abdicated the throne because he thought that by doing so he could preserve the crown for his son. But this was not to be. On May 19 the Riksdag of the Swedish Estates proclaimed that not only Gustavus IV but also his entire family had lost their right to the crown. In December 1809 Gustavus IV and his family were exiled to Germany; he ultimately died in poverty in Switzerland, where he was known as Colonel Gustavsson, among other aliases that included Count Gottorp and the Duke of Holstein-Eutin.

Since King Charles XIII had no heir, the Swedish Estates named Jean-Baptiste Bernadotte (1733–1844) – he who had previously served as one of Napoleon's marshals – crown prince in 1810 and elected him heir to the Swedish throne. In 1818 Bernadotte became King Charles XIV John. Although the Bernadotte family remains the royal family in Sweden, the current king of Sweden, King Carl XVI Gustaf (b. 1946; ruled since September 15, 1973), is coincidentally a descendant of both Gustavus IV and Bernadotte, since the Bernadotte King Gustav V of Sweden married Gustavus IV's great-granddaughter Victoria of Baden. Gustav V is the father of King Gustav VI Adolf (r. 1950–73) and the grandfather of King Carl XVI Gustaf. Through this marriage, the line of Gustavus IV who had been deposed and had abdicated the throne in 1809 has been reinstated. Both lines – Gustavus and Bernadotte – have produced the current royal family of Sweden.

Along with the new Bernadotte dynasty, another major result of the Swedish Revolution of 1809 was the ratification by the Riksdag of the Swedish Estates of an important constitutional reform, the Regeringsformen (Instrument of Government) on June 6, 1809. The Regeringsformen lasted until 1974. In 1975 a new constitution established Sweden as a parliamentary monarchy.

SEE ALSO: Bonaparte, Napoleon (1769–1821); Denmark, Insurrection and Revolt; French Revolution, 1789–1794; Gustav Rebellions; Nordic Revolts and Popular Protests, 1500–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Bain, R. N. (1905) Scandinavia: A Political History of Denmark, Norway and Sweden from 1513 to 1900. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Barton, H. A. (1986) Scandinavia in the Revolutionary Era, 1760–1815. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Carlsson, S. C. O. (1946) Gustav IV Adolf: En biografi. Stockholm: Wahlström & Widstrand.
- Elkan, S. S. (1913) An Exiled King: Gustaf Adolf IV of Sweden. London: Hutchinson.
- Elstob, E. C. (1979) Sweden: A Political and Cultural History. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Griffiths, T. (2004) Scandinavia: At War with Trolls: A History from the Napoleonic Era to the Third Millennium. Kent Town, S. Australia: Wakefield Press.
- Heckscher, G. (1959) The Swedish Constitution, 1809–1959: Tradition and Practice in Constitutional Development. Stockholm: Swedish Institute.
- Jorgensen, C. (2004) The Anglo-Swedish Alliance Against Napoleonic France. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Koblik, S. (Ed.) (1975) Sweden's Development from Poverty to Affluence, 1750–1970. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Miller, D. (1975) The Political History of Finland, 1809–1966. London: Heinemann.

- Nordstrom, B. J. (2002) The History of Sweden. Greenwood Histories of the Modern Nations. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Sather, L. (2004) Border War and Border Peace: The Norwegian-Swedish War of 1808 and the Swedish Revolution of 1809. In Scandinavians in Old and New Lands: Essays in Honor of H. Arnold Barton. Chicago: Swedish-American Historical Society.
- Scott, F. D. (1977) Sweden: The Nation's History. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Swift, Jonathan (1667–1745)

Karen Sonnelitter

In the history of protest literature, few authors have been as successful as Jonathan Swift in making their dissident voices heard. Although he sometimes wielded his satirical pen on behalf of narrow partisan political interests, the universal themes of his best writing assure its immortality. His best-known work, Gulliver's Travels, takes pomposity and the absurdity of the human condition as its subjects, and his Battle of the Books lampoons the self-importance of scholarly discourse, but some of his most powerful satires take aim at wrongs done to his native Ireland. In A Modest Proposal for Preventing the Children of Poor People in Ireland Being a Burden to Their Parents or Country, and for Making Them Beneficial to the Public, Swift argued with deadpan seriousness that impoverished Irish families should breed children to be sold as culinary delicacies for the rich.

Swift was born in Dublin on November 30, 1667. Little is known about his early life, but it seems that when he was a child his widowed mother returned to England, her birthplace, and left him in Ireland to be raised by an uncle. He entered Trinity College in 1682 and completed his BA degree in 1686. In 1688 political troubles in Ireland stemming from England's "Glorious Revolution" prompted Swift to emigrate to England, where he became secretary to Sir William Temple. While living at Temple's home, Swift met Esther Johnson, then 8 years old, whom he preferred to call "Stella." The two would maintain a close relationship for the rest of her life, and she would figure prominently in his writing.

Swift completed his MA in 1692 at Hertford College, Oxford, and in 1694 he temporarily left Temple's service to be ordained in the Church of Ireland. Unhappy with the remote parish to which he was appointed, he returned to work for Temple until the latter's death in 1699. In 1702 Swift received his Doctor of Divinity from Trinity College, Dublin. Shortly after, he began to gain a reputation as a writer through the publication of A Tale of a Tub and The Battle of the Books.

Swift also became increasingly politically active, traveling to London to argue for the claims of the Irish clergy to "Queen Anne's Bounty" – substantial financial benefits enjoyed by the English clergy. Finding little support from the Whig government, Swift allied himself with powerful Tories and published several political pamphlets on their behalf. He was recruited to become editor of the Examiner, the weekly Tory newspaper, in 1710. During the years the Tories were in office (1710–15), Swift was an active member of inner government circles. He hoped his friends would be able to find him a church appointment in England, but Queen Anne personally disliked him and the best they could do for him was the deanery of St. Patrick's Cathedral in Dublin, which he accepted in 1713. Swift's thoughts and experiences during this time were recorded in a long series of letters he wrote to Esther Johnson and later compiled into The Journal of Stella.

Though dejected at having to return to Ireland, Swift soon began to channel his skills as a political pamphleteer into support for Irish causes. His status as an Irish patriot was earned through the publication of Proposal for the Universal Use of Irish Manufacture (1720), The Drapier's Letters (1724), and the above-mentioned Modest Proposal (1729). He also began to write his masterpiece Gulliver's Travels, which was published pseudonymously in 1726.

In 1728 he was devastated by the death of his beloved Stella. In 1731 he would write his own obituary, Verses on the Death of Dr. Swift, though he would live on until 1745. He left his fortune to the establishment of a hospital for the mentally ill and was buried alongside Stella, as he had desired.

SEE ALSO: Glorious Revolution, Britain, 1688

References and Suggested Readings

- Forster, J. (1876) The Life of Jonathan Swift. New York: Harper & Brothers.
- Nokes, D. (1985) Jonathan Swift, a Hypocrite Reversed: A Critical Biography. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Quintana, R. (1955) Swift: An Introduction. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Swing Riots

Carl J. Griffin

Starting with the concurrent destruction of threshing machines in the Elham Valley area of east Kent and a wave of incendiary fires in the vicinity of Sevenoaks in the late summer of 1830, the so-called "Swing Riots" went on to engulf most of rural southern, central, and eastern England. Whilst the destruction of labor-sapping threshing machines became, retrospectively, the hallmark of the movement, Swing took many forms including incendiarism, "mobbings," political demonstrations, attacks on migrant laborers, food riots (in Cornwall), and enclosure riots (at Otmoor, Oxfordshire). Notwithstanding the deployment of such seemingly disparate weapons of rural resistance, Swing protests universally sought to improve the living standards of the rural worker, whether through eliminating unemployment (attacking threshing machines) or increasing wages and poor relief payments.

The first recorded attack on a threshing machine occurred at Wingmore, near Canterbury, on August 24. However, it was not until September 27 that any arrests were made, by which time at least 15 machines had been destroyed. Immediately thereafter the intensity of protest declined.

The trial, though, acted to reinvigorate protest. That six of the seven men were sentenced to four days' imprisonment against a maximum sentence of seven years' transportation provoked a sensation. Following what Home Secretary Sir Robert Peel called the "unparalleled lenity shown to the Destroyers of Thrashing Machines," overt collective protests spread beyond Elham overnight.

Initially, the new loci were Ash-next-Sandwich in east Kent, where machine breaking dominated, and the area between Sittingbourne and Maidstone in mid-Kent, where wage demonstrations dominated. From the latter center, protests literally spread into west Kent, and by November 3, Swing had diffused into the Kentish Weald and the Sussex border by the activities of highly mobile temporary "gangs." Concurrently with this latter diffusion, an independent wave of open protests had started in the east Sussex protest centers of Battle and Brede on November 1 and 5 respectively. In the Weald and the rest of east Sussex, wages and poor relief "riots" dominated, a reflection of both the lower uptake of threshing machines in the largely pastoral and hop economy and chronic levels of unemployment and pauperization.

Between November 8 and 14, virtually every Wealden and southwest Kent parish rose. From here, though, there is little evidence to suggest that Swing physically diffused into the combined arable-pastoral of central Sussex. Instead, on November 13, laborers' assemblages occurred independently in the northwest Sussex parishes of Kirdford and Wisborough Green. What then appears to have unfolded over the following three days is that other geographically non-contiguous incidents – though potentially connected by the diffusion of news and the actions of radical agents provocateurs – occurred throughout west Sussex, even spreading eastwards to the areas around Ringmer and Uckfield.

At this point, the movement lost its geographical coherence. Instead of diffusing in an essentially linear way, Swing now had several concurrent foci. A wave of threshing-machine breaking in the vicinity of Chichester physically diffused into neighboring Hampshire on November 18, the day after a series of wages assemblages had started in the vicinity of Whitchurch in north Hampshire. In Berkshire, Swing was first manifest in its overt form at Thatcham on November 15 in an incident inspired by Kentish and Sussex precedents, but otherwise unconnected. The first manifestations of Swing in its overt form in Wiltshire occurred through a combination of physical spread and indigenous inspiration on Saturday, November 19. In all three south-central counties, Swing spread quickly and, with the arguable exception of the Dever Valley in central Hampshire, burned brightly – and quickly.

As Hobsbawm and Rudé in their seminal Captain Swing, the only comprehensive national account of the movement, suggest, it was in these counties that the movement reached its peak (1969: 170). This intensity, though, stiffened governmental resolve and ultimately changed the pattern and depth of subsequent protests, if not checking protest altogether. Indeed, elsewhere in the south, Swing was only manifest in an intensive form in isolated pockets, most notably upon Cranborn Chase and in the Blackmore Vale in Dorset and in the vicinity of High Wycombe, Buckinghamshire, where highly mechanized paper mills were targeted.

Intensive protests in East Anglia in December in many ways represented a separate movement informed as much by the cultural memory of the 1816 Bread of Blood riots and the 1822 wave of protests as they were by southern Swing. Threshing machines – long a focus of popular opprobrium in East Anglia – were a particular target. Rural workers also made common cause with the farmers in attempting to force tithes reductions from the clergy, a feature of protests in the Weald but ubiquitous wherever Swing was manifest in East Anglia.

Notwithstanding East Anglia, few further overt protests occurred beyond December 1, though there was a clear resort to incendiarism in response to the military-led repression in south-central England. Whilst it is currently unknown how many individuals were arrested, in the six counties where the government sponsored Special Commissions of Assize, 992 criminal cases were heard. Here, the sentence of death was passed on 227 individuals, of whom five were actually hanged, 359 were transported to New South Wales or Van Diemen's Land, 254 were jailed, and two were fined. According to Hobsbawm and Rudé, the “draconian punishments distributed . . . [and] the deportation of hapless men and boys to antipodean semi-slavery” helped to thoroughly demoralize rural workers (1969: 281). In those counties where the government did not sponsor trials, including Kent and Sussex, Hobsbawm and Rudé suggest that Swing “died a natural death” (1969: 233). In some areas though, not least in the vicinity of Dover and Sittingbourne in Kent and in the Dever Valley in Hampshire, Swing lived on into 1831, whilst Swing-inspired protests occurred well into the summer of 1833.

SEE ALSO: East Anglian Wheat County Riots, 1816; Enclosure Movement, Protests against; Luddism and Machine Breaking; Luddite Riots in Nottingham; Peterloo Massacre, 1819; Poor Law, Britain, 1834

References and Suggested Readings

- Charlesworth, A. (1979) Social Protest in a Rural Society. Norwich: Geobooks.
- Griffin, C. (2004) Policy on the Hoof: Sir Robert Peel, Sir Edward Knatchbull and the Trial of the Elham Machine Breakers, 1830. Rural History 15 (2): 1–22.

Hobsbawm, E. & Rudé, G. (1969) Captain Swing. Harmondsworth: Penguin.

Wells, R. (1990) Social Protest, Class, Conflict and Consciousness in the English Countryside. In M. Reed and R. Wells (Eds.), Class, Conflict and Protest in the English Countryside, 1700–1880. London: Frank Cass.

Swiss Peasants' War of 1653

Lynette M. Deem

During the Thirty Years' War, Swiss peasants had, generally, profited from the wartime economy, exporting goods at higher prices than ever before. After peace was secured in 1648 the quick recovery of the southern German economy led to a sharp decline in Swiss exports. Swiss peasants, therefore, began to face sudden financial problems.

The decrease in exports, coupled with the devaluation of Swiss currency, led to the Swiss Peasants' War of 1653. This revolt continued a series of tax revolts that had occurred throughout the confederacy. In addition to the poor fiscal situation, there was discontent regarding the concentration of political power in the hands of a few urban families, who subjugated the rural population with decrees which restricted their rights and social and cultural freedoms.

The revolt began in the Entlebuch Valley, near Lucerne, and spread to the Emmental Valley, near Bern, eventually encompassing the cantons of Solothurn, Basel, and Aargau. The peasant armies were led by Niklaus Leuenberger, Hans Emmenegger, and Christian Schybi. Emmenegger and Schybi organized a delegation to address the concerns of the peasants; however, the city council of Lucerne refused to listen to its demands. The peasants, therefore, organized a general assembly. Freedom of assembly, however, was not granted by the laws of the times, so these actions were deemed illegal by the local authorities.

Regardless of its legality, this assembly met on February 10, 1653 and decided to suspend all tax payments until the authorities reduced or abolished taxes, including the taxes on the salt, cattle, and horse trades. During the ensuing negotiations a resolution was proposed that satisfied most of the peasants' fiscal desires, but the talks stalled, and as authorities considered how best to subdue the revolts, the peasants worked to gather support in the rural areas.

In April 1653 the peasants concluded an alliance at Huttwil to aid each other in achieving their goals and elected Niklaus Leuenberger as their leader. This alliance, which became known as the Huttwil League, accomplished two major feats. First, it united Catholics throughout Switzerland with their Protestant counterparts, thus demonstrating the primacy of class difficulties over religious differences. Second, it successfully established the League as a separate political entity from the cities, both equal to and independent of city authorities.

With the signing of a written contract, the tax revolt of 1653 surpassed previous revolts and became an independence movement. The peasants had, furthermore, managed to gain political and military control over the territory they occupied and refused to succumb to city authorities. Due to its overwhelming popularity in rural areas, the Huttwil League further declared its intent to continue expanding until it encompassed the entire Swiss Confederacy.

One of the most significant problems for civil authorities manifested itself as both sides prepared for military conflict: the city militias were supposed to be composed of the rural population. It was this population, however, that had turned against the government. The city establishment, therefore, conscripted troops from the two cantons not involved in the uprising, Vaud and the Bernese Oberland. In its request for assistance, the authorities in Zürich used the term "revolution" for the first time. Incidentally, this note appears to be the first use of the word in the sense of a political revolution without any connotation of a circular movement.

On May 22 one of the armies of the Huttwil League arrived in Berne and another marched to Lucerne. The government of Berne immediately began negotiations. A peace treaty was signed on May 28 by Leuenberger and Niklaus Dachselhofer, the mayor of Berne. This peace agreement required the disbanding of the Huttwil League, in return for which the peasants' fiscal demands would be met; therefore, the troops retreated and lifted the siege on Berne. The peasants, however, refused to break up the League.

The army assembled in Zürich, unaware of the aforementioned treaty, marched toward the peasant army and demanded its unconditional surrender. The peasant army of 24,000 far outnumbered the 8,000 men of the authorities; nevertheless, the government's army decisively defeated the peasants at the Battle of Wohlenschwil, resulting in the peace of Mellingen, which annulled the Huttwil League and declared amnesty for the peasants, excluding their leaders. Despite this defeat, peasants in the Entlebuch Valley continued to resist. The peasant troops were led by Schybi, whereas the army of the city of Lucerne was led by Sebastian Peregrin Zwyer. Zwyer's army gained control over the Lucerne on June 20, 1653. Schybi was captured and incarcerated at Sursee.

Although the peace treaties that followed the revolt granted the peasants amnesty, city authorities ignored this portion of the agreement and opted to punish severely those involved in the rebellion. In addition to the disarmament of the rural population, many cantons forced the peasants to pay all military expenses involved in suppressing the insurgency.

The Swiss peasant revolt of 1653 demonstrated that the cities depended heavily on their rural subjects. The authorities became increasingly aware of this reliance and sought to prevent future insurrections, especially considering the difficulties they faced in quelling this rebellion. The government politically incapacitated its rural subjects; however, authorities also began to grant the peasants' original fiscal demands.

SEE ALSO: German Peasant Rebellion, 1525

References and Suggested Readings

- Holenstein, A. (2004) Der Bauernkrieg von 1653: Ursachen, Verlauf und Folgen einer geschichterten Revolution. In J. Römer (Ed.), Bauern, Unterfanen und "Rebellen." Zürich: Orell Füssli.
- Stüssi-Lauterburg, J. (2003) Verachtet Herrenpossen! Verschüchert fremde Gäst! Lenzburg: Merker im Effingerhott.
- Suter, A. (1997) Der Schweizerische Bauernkrieg von 1653: Politischen Sozialgeschichte Sozialgeschichte eines politischen Ereignisses. Tübingen: Bibliotheca Academica.
- Suter, A. (2002) Bauernkrieg (1653). Historisches Lexikon der Schweiz. Available at www.hls-dhs-dss.ch/index.php.
- Suter, A. (2004) Kollektive Erinnerungen an historische Ereignis – Chancen und Gefahren. Der Bauernkrieg als Beispiel. In J. Römer (Ed.), Bauern, Unterfanen und "Rebellen." Zürich: Orell Füssli.

Sylvis, William H. (1829–1869) and the National Labor Union

Gregory R. Smulewicz-Zucker

William H. Sylvis was one of the earliest and most radical American labor leaders. He first served as president of the Iron Molders' International Union and was later elected president of the short-lived National Labor Union. While his memory and significance are largely overshadowed by the eventual decline of the National Labor Union and by the better-known and more successful labor leaders that followed him, during his short life Sylvis led ambitious campaigns for working people's rights, attempted prescient reforms of the labor movement, and exerted significant political influence. He was a pioneer in the effort to forge national cooperation among American working people, regardless of race or gender. Had he lived longer, he intended to strengthen the United States' ties to the international labor movement.

The son of Nicholas Sylvis, a poor wagon shop owner who struggled to support a large family, William chose to leave his father's profession and found work as an apprentice iron molder. Following his apprenticeship, Sylvis attempted to establish his own foundry, but the business endeavor failed. He spent the early 1850s moving with his wife and son looking for work across Pennsylvania. In 1853, the family settled in Philadelphia. There, Sylvis found work at the Cresson foundry. An accident that Sylvis suffered at the foundry, in 1854, led to a lowering of his wages and made it more difficult for his family to get by. This event, according to the biography by Sylvis's brother, led Sylvis to begin thinking more radically about the plight of working people. In 1857, he joined the Philadelphia Stove and Hollowware Molders' Union and was soon made the union's secretary. Around this time, molders were beginning to mobilize toward the creation of a national union. Sylvis was among those most active in promoting the idea of a national union of iron molders. At a Philadelphia meeting in 1858, he introduced a resolution calling for a national convention. The first national convention on July 5, 1859 led to the establishment of the National Union of Iron Molders.

In the years that followed, Sylvis remained active in the building of a national union for iron molders. However, by 1861, the national organization that Sylvis had worked to establish had been weakened by the outbreak of the Civil War and was virtually nonexistent. Sylvis took it upon himself to reinvigorate the movement. He called for a convention in Pittsburgh in January 1863. There, amidst little enthusiasm, the Iron Molders' International Union (international because it hoped to include Canadian workers) was founded and William Sylvis was elected its president. Throughout 1863, Sylvis tirelessly toured the northern states, organizing, visiting locals, and recruiting members. His tours of 1863–4 greatly increased the size of the Iron Molders' International Union and earned Sylvis a reputation as one of the most successful union organizers. The union continued to grow and was strengthened by a number of strike victories. By 1866, the Iron Molders' International Union was regarded as one of the strongest in the country.

Throughout his life, Sylvis's radicalism was motivated by his belief in the common interests and cooperation of working people. However, his vision was not limited to creating solidarity among iron molders. With the success of the Iron Molders' International Union, Sylvis turned his efforts toward the creation of a national organization of labor. In collaboration with several other powerful labor leaders, Sylvis began working toward the creation of a federation of American labor. After months of preparation, a call for a congress was sent out and on August 20, 1866, the National Labor Union (NLU) was launched at the National Labor Congress in Baltimore. The first resolution passed called upon every worker to join a union and for every union to seek national and international cooperation. Delegates also agreed to make the fight for an eight-hour workday and the improvement of living conditions and education its primary goals.

Over the next two years, the NLU suffered for lack of organization and ambition in its leadership. At the 1867 National Labor Convention, a constitution was adopted to remedy the organization's weaknesses. The reforms primarily empowered the NLU's president and changed the ways that funds would be collected. Despite these attempts at strengthening the organization, it still lacked the necessary inspiration and ambition to galvanize the labor movement.

The NLU was only truly transformed at the 1868 Convention when William Sylvis was elected its president. One of his first acts as president was to appoint a veteran labor organizer, Kate Mullany, his vice-president, making her the first woman to hold such an office.

After Sylvis's election, the NLU grew rapidly. Sylvis tirelessly toured across the country, as he had as president of the Iron Molders' International Union, organizing offices of the NLU. Membership soared. He also attempted to transform the NLU into a political force by appointing a committee of five lobbyists to bring the NLU's cause to Washington. Sylvis saw the NLU's primary objectives as: the eight-hour workday; the organization of women workers; the organization of African American workers; forging international bonds with union leaders abroad; the formation of workers' cooperatives to compete with the capitalist companies for the employment of workers; currency reform; and lobbying the government. Such a program was by far one of the most radical in the world – particularly with respect to Sylvis's vision for organizing women and African American workers. Word of Sylvis's work spread to Europe. He counted among his many great admirers Karl Marx. There was even talk of admitting the NLU to the International Workingmen's Association.

It is impossible to predict how much success William Sylvis might have had in fulfilling his program, but all hopes were dashed when his life came to an abrupt end. His nearly endless travel and campaigning had taken its toll on his health, and on July 26, 1869, William Sylvis died. During his short tenure as president of the NLU, few of his visionary objectives made real progress. Although Congress passed an eight-hour workday, it was rarely enforced. In 1869, at the height of the NLU's power, Sylvis was able to pressure President Grant to issue an executive order upholding the eight-hour workday. However, once Sylvis was gone, employers continued to violate the order. Internal opposition within the union hindered any serious effort to recruit women and African Americans. Before his death, Sylvis was never able to overcome the racism and sexism of the union's members. Similarly, without Sylvis's guidance, the NLU never joined the International Workingmen's Association or built solidarity with workers abroad.

Although Sylvis's plan for forming cooperatives was somewhat of a success when ironworkers in Troy, New York, created their own foundry, it failed miserably in subsequent attempts. The cooperatives failed due to lack of organization, demands for high-interest rates from investors, and companies' underselling of their goods to ruin the cooperatives. The program for monetary reform was in a sense inspired by the failure of the cooperatives. Its ultimate aim was to secure government loans, which could be used to revive the cooperatives. Yet, in the end, the movement only exhausted the energy of the NLU and distracted its leaders from campaigning for labor reforms.

After Sylvis's death, the NLU took a reactionary turn, and by 1872 it was dissolved. Due to its short existence, it has largely faded from memory and Sylvis along with it. However, the history of the NLU under Sylvis's leadership offers insight into the early history of the fight for American workers' rights and ambitions of American unions. Despite the apparent failings of the movement he attempted to build, Sylvis might yet reemerge as a model for the current labor movement, in crisis and in search of purpose. The unity that Sylvis sought to forge still eludes America's labor movement. Reflecting on the obstacles he faced might inform modern labor leaders with similar hopes.

SEE ALSO: Marx, Karl (1818–1888); US Labor Rebellions and the Rise of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO)

References and Suggested Readings

- Foner, P. S. (1982) History of the Labor Movement in the United States, Vol. 1: From Colonial Times to the Founding of the American Federation of Labor. New York: International Publishers.
- Grossman, J. P. (1945) William Sylvis: Pioneer of American Labor. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Marx, K. (1869) Address to the National Labor Union of the United States. Available at www.Marxists.org/history/international/iwma/documents/1869/us-labor.htm.
- Sylvis, J. C. (1968) The Life, Speeches, Labors and Essays of William H. Sylvis. New York: Augustus M. Kelley Publishers.

Syndicalism, France

Stephen Leberstein

The two decades before World War I were the “heroic” period for French syndicalism, one that saw it emerge as a major workers' movement pledged to revolution. Syndicalists were highly conscious of their class identity. Seeing in class consciousness an essential element of a revolutionary movement, they rejected parliamentary politics as a means to the new socialist society that would be organized by a working class they regarded as sufficient in its own right for this task.

Their emphasis on working-class autonomy and self-sufficiency made syndicalists particularly interested in culture in the totality of workers' experience. Culture and education in particular assumed a political burden. While syndicalists generally claimed they were anti-political, they tended to politicize every aspect of their lives in the effort to define a specifically working-class agenda. The educational activities of French syndicates were, in this sense, always elements of political struggle. For the left wing of the French labor movement in the two decades leading up to World War I, then, every kind of labor organization would become a "school of revolt," a way to educate workers. In the political ferment of the period, anarchists, syndicalists, and revolutionary socialists all agreed on the need to educate workers, on the importance of training them in "la science de son malheur," as the secretary of the Bourses du Travail, Fernand Pelloutier, put it. Projects to promote that consciousness of their poverty were seen as vitally important by many militants and often served as a means for organizing workers. The educational work of labor organizations often went beyond the expected short courses and study circles to take on a greater purpose than teaching new skills needed on the job or for union work. Writing in La Vie Ouvrière just before the war, Albert Thierry, the syndicalist educator, looked to the syndicates to cultivate "the treasure" of the working class, that is "this profound understanding workers get by means of their labor . . . [that of a] society capable of justice." As Thierry's generation of militants sought to create a cadre of dedicated militants who would lead the working class to overthrow capitalist society, they saw the educational task of labor organizations as an important organizing device, both in the present and for the long run. From the youth groups, the model schools, the work of the Bourses du Travail, and the struggles of the organized public school teachers, syndicalists were doing far more than demonstrating ideas on adult education or school reform.

The syndicalist educational project was shaped by the changing circumstances of working-class life in the period before the war. The two decades leading up to World War I mark a period of great economic change in France as small, self-sufficient enterprises gave way to much larger ones and as the working class became increasingly proletarianized. Workers responded to these changes with growing militancy expressed in labor organization, revolutionary rhetoric, and strike movements. Of the approximately 15 million wage workers in the first decade of the twentieth century, about half worked in industry.

In the same period (1902–10), the number of syndicates doubled from 1,403 to 3,012, and the number of workers who belonged to syndicates in the Confédération Générale du Travail (CGT) grew from 100,000 in 1902 to about 400,000 in 1908. Strikes attest to growing worker militancy. As compared with the last decade of the nineteenth century, the period 1900 to 1910 saw the number of strikes and strikers more than double (from 4,210 to 9,042 and from 924,000 to 2,021,200, respectively). Similarly, the number of strike days also shot up from 15,021,840 in the last decade of the nineteenth century to 37,702,650 in the first decade of the twentieth. While syndicates did not include a majority of French workers, the CGT still exerted a great influence, especially at times of strikes, according to Lefranc and others; syndicalists were the "minorités agissantes" able to galvanize masses of workers despite their small numbers and the lack of a trade union apparatus. The "heroic age" of revolutionary syndicalism in France was more than rhetorical; it was one of growing militancy. It was against this background of mounting class conflict and industrial strife that the syndicalist movement in France took on its revolutionary character.

If any labor organization of the time embodied the syndicalist educational project it was the Bourses du Travail, or labor exchanges. The first Bourse was authorized by the Paris Municipal Council in 1886 and was established there in 1888 and in other cities thereafter. Bourses were sponsored by unions, or associations, of local syndicates as a means of providing job placement services and mutual aid. For the local governments, the Bourses were intended to help promote social peace by aiding struggling syndicates and by giving workers a chance to improve themselves.

By the end of the 1890s, 57 Bourses were functioning throughout France, representing the association of 1,065 syndicates, nearly half the total number in the country. In this regard, the Bourses had joined local unions together in common efforts across trade or jurisdictional lines. Another aspect of the Bourses was that they were by definition local; by providing a common center of activities and a physical facility, they represented the working-class community in the cities and towns where they existed. These were qualities that made them responsive to the needs and concerns of workers that may have been beyond the ken of union action over wages and the like. These included temporary lodging and assistance for those in search of work, cultural activities for workers, and guided activities and even schooling for children and youth. They also offered services such as free job placement and raised funds to distribute to the unemployed and to aid itinerant workers. The Bourses du Travail also offered an instructional service, which usually included a library, an information office, vocational training, and general education courses for adults. In the main the Bourses devoted their energies to offering trade courses to workers.

Attention to the needs of working-class children and youth also remained an important concern of the syndicalist movement in general. The syndicalist press was full of articles and letters on educational issues. While much of this interest can be attributed to the nearly universal worries of working parents, part of it stemmed from the continuing conflict between church and state in France and elsewhere. One response to the perceived failure of state schools for working-class children was the creation of model schools, often anarchist-inspired. The anarchist weekly Les Temps Nouveaux set out a project for a model school in 1897 as a needed alternative to public schools, described with poorly concealed hyperbole as “the perfect training for servitude.” Critics were especially incensed that coeducation was actually prohibited by school law. Impatient to show what could be done, some of the critics organized a summer camp for August 1898 near Paris, with 19 children. The unfortunate experiment foundered when one of the organizers lost his patience and slapped a camper.

By 1901 Francisco Ferrer organized La Escuela Moderna in Barcelona, a model school that attracted widespread attention and support and which inspired similar projects all over Europe, and even in New York. The most important French model school was La Ruche which Sébastien Faure directed at Rambouillet near Paris from 1904 until 1917. Over a ten-year period from 1904 to 1914 about 4,000 children applied to La Ruche, mostly the children of single parents, abused women, and those determined to keep their children out of charitable religious institutions when they were hard up.

In 1913 the idea emerged of federating all the children's groups that had become a part of the labor movement. Léon Clément and Maurice Bouchor argued in La Vie Ouvrière that workers' cooperatives, syndicates, and socialists together should coordinate and support the Pupils' Groups. Such an arrangement had apparently already been worked out in Bouchor's own neighborhood, the 14th arrondissement of Paris, and the proposal garnered a warm response from readers of La Vie Ouvrière. Within a year a Coordinating Committee for the Pupils of Cooperatives of the Parisian Region had been created, affiliating the activities of 26 separate groups under the control of labor organizations. The groups were not meant only to extend the school day, explained a member of the Coordinating Committee, but rather “to give our children a social education which is given them nowhere else.”

The most interesting aspect of the syndicalist project, though, was the Jeunesses Syndicalistes that emerged alongside the children's groups. Embracing adolescent apprentices and workers, the first such youth groups appeared for a very brief time around 1904–5, just as the student-worker study circles began to fade away. But it seemed that they too faded away, mainly due to the indifference or active hostility of older militants. By 1911 La Vie Ouvrière regarded the ascendant syndicalist youth groups as crucial to the future of syndicalism. To understand better how the syndicates could attract and hold onto youth, the journal developed a questionnaire to survey all the youth groups it could identify. The results of the poll were encouraging. Within a few months, the journal's inquiry found the Jeunesses Syndicalistes to be generally flourishing. In the first summary of reports to the Vie Ouvrière questionnaire, 22 different groups sent in answers to the survey. Most of those that responded were well established or growing, although it is hard to estimate the exact numbers of young workers involved due to their loose organization. Although the Jeunesses Syndicalistes probably included fewer than 1,000 steady members throughout the country at the end of 1911, these groups, like the syndicalist movement itself, certainly exerted an influence on their comrades out of all proportion to their numbers, especially during anti-militarist campaigns and in times of crisis.

Some trends are apparent from the responses. In Paris the youth groups formed within certain trades, whereas in the suburbs and provincial towns the small number of workers in any given trade meant that groups formed instead within the local labor exchange or cooperative, drawing their members from among all the syndicalist workers in the area. A majority of the groups admitted and encouraged non-organized workers to join their activities as a way to recruit new members to the labor movement. For this organizing tactic to work, the groups had to do more than study together; they had to embrace the kind of things youth in general would be interested in, like physical education and sports. Many of the Jeunesses Syndicalistes groups thought of themselves as representing "advanced" ideas, an attitude that often brought them into conflict with their elders.

The first youth group to form that was identified in the survey, in July 1909, was the Jeunesse de la Voiture in the automobile industry. These youths tried to strike a balance by sponsoring cultural activities in addition to family outings and what they called "rational" or non-competitive sports. They also participated as a group in street demonstrations, and although they wanted to include "revolutionary" in the group name, they held back in order to attract more recruits. Even though their number remained small, the auto-workers practiced solidarity by going out of their way to help organize other youth groups. So the Jeunesse Syndicaliste des Ferblantiers, the tin-workers, reported that they got the idea to organize from their comrades among the auto-workers. So too did the Jeunesse Syndicaliste d'Asnières help their comrades at Saint Ouen in setting up a group, and together they organized the Coordinating Committee of Revolutionary Syndicalist Youth Groups of the Suburbs. The youth saw the need to combine their efforts the better to oppose the government's militarism, as they saw it, since young workers would be "the principal victims of such ignoble carryings-on."

Sometimes youthful enthusiasm put the youth in conflict with their elders, as when the activities of the youth of the Le Mans group threatened the local Bourse du Travail with the loss of its municipal funding. In such cases the youth might have found themselves on the street instead of inside the labor exchange. Still, the Fédération des Bourses du Travail had endorsed the creation of youth groups at its 1910 congress in Toulouse and so was consistent in calling on all local syndicates to join the effort.

The organization of youth groups was not limited to the Parisian region. A congress of allied youth groups in the West met in February 1912 and agreed to coordinate its activities to make its members more effective in their anti-militarist campaigns. Now agreed on their tasks, reported a spokesman, the youth groups of the West "will be able to give this region, undergoing rapid industrialization, and to all its bodies a generation of militants."

Among the most militant syndicalist workers were public school teachers, who began to organize trade associations, or Amicales, around 1900. With wages hovering near the subsistence level and jobs scarce, the teachers' main concern was survival. Allied with the CGT, the teachers' syndicates saw themselves as a vanguard. By joining in the labor movement, the syndicalist teachers also believed that they would "gain an understanding of the intellectual and moral needs of the people." These teachers identified their interests with those of the communities they served. Such attitudes brought the syndicalist school teachers into conflict with the government. Under Clemenceau, the government in 1907 banned the teachers' syndicates from joining in the Bourses du Travail on the grounds that such membership would conflict with their official public role. In response, the national federation of teachers' syndicates formed a defense committee, which issued an "Open Letter to M. Clemenceau," accusing the government of being the "Defender of Capital and of privileges," and of blocking the teachers' membership in the Bourses du Travail to prevent them from discussing the conditions of social organization with other workers. With that the syndicalist teachers vowed to fight "the insatiable Moloch." In response, the government fired some of the signers.

Not all syndicalists welcomed the school teachers, some, like C. A. Laisant, believing that they would dilute the militant fervor of the labor movement. Anatole France, on the other hand, saw their actions as an example of labor solidarity in which “functionaries and state employees, along with those who hold the pen and those who wield the pick,” worked together as fellow proletarians. Eventually, Victor Griffuelhes wrote in L’Humanité welcoming the teachers as comrades in the battle against “the forces of oppression and exploitation.” In the years that followed, syndicalist teachers came to talk more and more about the need for “Adaptation of teaching to the needs of the working class.” And over the years, they worked actively to define how they might adapt public schools to those needs.

In an example of labor solidarity in August 1912, the congress of the Fédération nationale des syndicats d’instituteurs at Chambéry voted to support a CGT anti-militarist project, the “Sou du Soldat,” designed to strengthen the bond between young conscripts and their syndicate. That resolution gave the government the excuse it needed to dissolve the teachers’ syndicates.

At the beginning of the 1913–14 school year, the editors of Ecole Émancipée, the journal of the teachers’ syndicate, expressed the opinion that crises in the labor movement, the attempted dissolution of their syndicates, and the countless reprisals against militant teachers, had only served to strengthen teachers’ syndicalism.

All in all, while the continual agitation and organizing of syndicalist workers may have been a necessary condition for transforming an unjust society, it was an insufficient one. The syndicalist education project could not succeed in holding the forces of war at bay in 1914, and so it failed almost at the peak of its power to create the new world it had promised. But it demonstrated strategies that could, and did, work to build class-conscious, community-oriented, rank-and-file organizations that could effectively mobilize workers to fight both for their own interests and for a larger agenda.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Anarchism and Culture, 1840–1939; Anarchism and Education; Anarchism, France; Anarchosyndicalism; Bourses du Travail; Confédération Générale du Travail and Syndicaliste Révolutionnaire; Pelloutier, Fernand (1867–1901) and the Bourses du Travail

References and Suggested Readings

Ansell, C. K. (2001) Schism and Solidarity in Social Movements: The Politics of Labor in the French Third Republic. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

- Bérenger, H. et al. (1897) Les Prolétaires intellectuels en France. Paris: Editions de la revue.
- Bou’t, L. et al. (1924) Le Syndicalisme dans l’enseignement: Histoire de la Fédération de l’enseignement et du syndicalisme universitaire. Avignon: Editions de l’Ecole Émancipée.
- Friedman, G. C. (1997) Revolutionary Unions and French Labor: The Rebels Behind the Cause; or, Why Did Revolutionary Syndicalism Fail? French Historical Studies (Spring) 20, 2: 155–81.
- Gambone, L. (1995) Revolution and Reformism: The Split between “Moderates” and “Revolutionaries” in French Anarcho-Syndicalism. Montréal: Red Lion Press.
- Jennings, J. (1990) Syndicalism in France: A Study of Ideas. New York: St. Martin’s Press.
- Jouenne, A. (1914) L’Education dans les Cooperatives; nos Groupes de Pupilles. L’Ecole Émancipée 4, 30 (April 18).
- Julliard, J. (1971) Fernand Pelloutier et les origines du syndicalisme d’action directe. Paris: Seuil.
- Lefranc, G. (1967) Le Mouvement syndical sous la troisième république. Paris: Payot.
- Maitron, J. (1951) Histoire du mouvement anarchiste en France. Paris: SUDEL.
- Maitron, J. (1964) Le Groupe des Etudiants Socialistes Révolutionnaires Internationalistes. Le Mouvement Social 46.
- Mitchell, B. (1987) The Practical Revolutionaries: A New Interpretation of the French Anarchosyndicalists. New York: Greenwood Press.
- Pelloutier, F. (2005) [1895] Anarchism and the Workers’ Union. In D. Guérin (Ed.), No Gods No Masters: An Anthology of Anarchism. Edinburgh: AK Press.
- Pouget, E. (2003) [1920] Direct Action. London: Kate Sharpley Library.
- Stearns, P. N. (1971) Revolutionary Syndicalism and French Labor: A Cause without Rebels. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press.
- Tucker, K. H. (1996) French Revolutionary Syndicalism and the Public Sphere. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Syndicalism, Greece

Georgos Koukoules

The Greek labor movement reflects the particularities of socioeconomic development in the Greek state from the 1870s to the early twentieth century. The early development of labor syndicalism emerged during the depression in Western Europe after 1873 which forced capital to seek new national markets in Greece. The Greek economy also expanded in the late nineteenth century as expatriate capital began flowing into the country. The conditions for elementary industrial development were also facilitated from 1875 to 1895 by measures introduced by the government of Prime Minister Charilaos Trikoupis to insulate domestic production from foreign imports. Greek industrial activity also expanded through the construction of a national transportation network in 1884 and the development of government infrastructure. Despite modest industrialization in the early twentieth century, 50.5 percent of Greece's population remained active in the dominant agrarian economy.

The first trade unions as understood today were established in the country around the end of the nineteenth century. In the early twentieth century a type of horizontal, cross-sector union appeared, the Local Labor Centers (Ergatika Kentra; Εργατικά Κέντρα), equivalent to the British Trades Councils. Federalized unions organized on a vertical basis appeared following the establishment of the General Confederation of Workers of Greece (GSEE; ΓΣΕΕ) in 1918. The mainly Jewish Workers' Solidarity Federation under its leader Avraam Benaroya was instrumental in the establishment of the GSEE. In the same year (1918), the Socialist Labor Party of Greece (SEKE; ΣΕΚΕ) was established, subsequently renamed the Communist Party of Greece.

The evolution of the Greek syndicalist movement was influenced by the country's turbulent political reality as well as by broader international developments and conditions. The following briefly presents these developments using as its main theme the activities of the GSEE, which organized workers in the private sector. Employees working under public law contracts such as civil servants joined primary-level trade unions belonging to the Supreme Administration of Civil Servants' Trade Unions (ADEDY; ΑΔΕΔΥ).

The first period (also known as the fractions period) lasted from 1918 to 1936 and includes the period of the military dictatorship of General Pangalos (1925–6). Two splits took place within the GSEE and the organizations that subsequently formed it: the first in 1919, and the second in 1928, leading to the formation of the so-called Unitary GSEE (Ενωτική ΓΣΕΕ), which was under communist control.

The second period lasted from 1936 to 1944. During this time the dictatorship of General

Metaxas (1936–41) converted syndicalist organizations into part of the state's mechanism. During the country's Triple Occupation (1941–4), the Greek syndicalist movement operated through the ranks of the National Workers' Liberation Front (EEAM), while the vast majority of the dictatorial syndicalists of the GSEE collaborated with the occupying forces.

The third period (1944–74) comprises one of the darkest periods of contemporary Greek history: a civil war (1946–9), un concealed interventions by the US in the country's internal affairs, and the military dictatorship (1967–74). During these years the syndicalist movement was – for obvious reasons – under the conservatives' control. However, a number of initiatives took place that opposed official syndicalist representation, promoted unitary demands, and resulted in some reduction in the otherwise unrelenting exploitation of workers.

The period following the fall of the dictatorship (1974–2008) saw some attempts to democratize the syndicalist movement and the corresponding labor legislation, but with limited results. After 1981 under the government of the Panhellenic Socialist Movement (PASOK; ΠΑΣΟΚ, attempts at democratization were more solidly promoted. In 1985 the PASOK government's economic policy caused a split among members of the government-affiliated majority side of the GSEE leadership.

The capacity of Greek labor unions to unify has been hindered by unaffiliated grassroots unions, a plethora of Local Labor Centers and Federations, disputed financial independence, the existence and activity of party-affiliated groups at all levels of the syndicalist organization (groups acting as their party fractions, not tendencies), and a low union density rate in the population of 25 percent of the total workforce in the private sector. Yet for all its disadvantages, the movement has engaged in exemplary syndicalist struggles throughout the period of its existence and operation. For example, during the Triple Occupation, the EEAM refused to collaborate with the conquerors and acted at various levels, establishing communal soup kitchens and consumption cooperatives during the great famine (1941–2), which cost thousands of lives, and even organizing strikes – some of the first in occupied Europe. Moreover, it organized other activities that reached their apogee with the cancellation of civil conscription in February–March 1943. Another example is the appearance of an industrial workers' movement after the end of the 1967–74 dictatorship, which grew in size and in some cases managed to impose principles of workers' control. However, this movement experienced a number of setbacks and began to fall apart from 1976 onwards. Finally, recent mobilizations against the privatization and reform of the country's social insurance and pensions system are also notable. The movement's success in April 2001 in causing the withdrawal of the reform bill was partially overshadowed by its subsequent failure in March 2007.

Today, in the face of neoliberal policies, job losses, business restructuring, and privatization, the syndicalist movement struggles to protect basic workers' rights at the national as well as international level.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Greece; Anarchosyndicalism; Britain, Trade Union Movement; Greece, Anti-Dictatorship Protests; Greece, Partisan Resistance; Greece, Socialism, Communism, and the Left, 1974–2008; Syndicalism, France

References and Suggested Readings

- Ioannou, C. (1995) The National Labour Relations System in Post-War Greece (1995–1967). In Greek Society During the First Postwar Period (1945–1967), Vol. 11. Athens: Sakis Karagiorgas Foundation, pp. 73–105 (in Greek).
- Katsanevas, T. (1984) Trade Unionism in Greece. Athens: National Center for Social Research.
- Kordatos, Y. Y. (1972) The History of the Greek Labour Movement. Athens: Boukoumanis (in Greek).
- Koukoules, G. (1995) The Greek Trade Union Movement and Foreign Interventions, 1944–1948. Athens: Odysseas (in Greek).
- Koukoules, G. (2000) The Workers' Movement and the Myth of Sisyphus, 1964–1966. Athens: Odysseas (in Greek).
- Kouzis, Y. (2007) The Main Features of the Greek Trade Union Movement. Athens: Gutenberg (in Greek).

Syria and Iraq, Baathists

Steven Isaac

Three main currents of socialist thought flowed through the Arab world during and after World War II: the Baath Party's version, shared by Nasser, and the options promulgated by the region's various communist parties. None could be considered independent from the others. The history of Arab communists is often a story of rivalry and occasional cohabitation with other movements. The Baathists were active beyond just Syria and Iraq, which saw their most signal successes, and concomitant disappointments.

Michel Aflaq, a Sorbonne-educated Syrian Christian, is one of the two primary founders of the Baath movement. Exposed to Marx during his studies in France, Aflaq associated for some time with communists in Syria after returning in 1932. While he declared his fascination with communism ended by 1936, others cite him as a confirmed party member until 1943. His co-founder, Salah al-Din al-Bitar, likewise went to France for university education and returned to Syria as a teacher. Frustrated by France's interwar policies, the nationalism of both men significantly influenced their attitudes toward the West, such that even western socialism was viewed as another form of imperialism. From 1940 onward, Aflaq and Bitar considered forming a political party based on their nationalism, but the failure of the Rashid Ali revolt in Iraq in 1941 and the Lebanon crisis of 1943 finally galvanized them into action. By 1945 they had formally created the Baathist Party, which held its first convention in 1947. Bitar was more successful at occasionally winning election to office, while Aflaq was recognized as ideologue of the party and, through the office of secretary general, de facto controller.

The Baath holds a number of positions contradicting traditional western socialism. From the start it was intended to herald a "Renaissance" or "Resurrection" (both translations of Baath) of the entire Arab world, not just the Syrian region. Thus, it was a fiercely nationalistic movement. These positions followed from the insistence of the Baathists, like many other Arab socialists, that an ideology appropriate to Arab needs was required. In Aflaq's words, socialism was "a means to resurrect our nationalism and our people and is the door through which our Arab nation enters history anew." He saw socialism as the means to achieving a "structural transformation . . . in the spirit and thinking of the Arab people which would revolutionize their society."

Aflaq's writings clarify that besides internal social justice, Baath socialism sought empowerment of the state precisely so the Arab state could enjoy just treatment on the world stage.

Baath ideology rejects the economic determinism of western models, viewing socialism as a solution arising from the conviction of a majority of society, not a single class. These stances explain Baathist opposition to communism as exclusively secular and, during the Cold War, overly dependent upon the Soviet Union. Aflaq's vision for the Baath Party has been described, perhaps not inappropriately, as romantic nationalism. Like previous nationalisms, its "spiritual" message appealed to its target audience, explaining some of the early Baath success. Concurrently, emotional and intellectual approaches often left the Baath without the "political realism" that might have secured its victories and implement policies.

The 1947 constitution of the party included numerous policy statements outlining the Baath vision of socialism fitted for an Arab nation. The program did not seek an end of private property, but limited ownership by measuring it against its exploitative factor. Workers were supposed to share wages with management; usury was outlawed, and foreign companies banned. The state would control utilities and all the largest undertakings while guaranteeing employment to citizens. In politics, non-alignment was preferred out of recognition that neither the US nor the Soviet Union had Arab interests at heart. On social issues, the Baath was dedicated to universal and free public health care and education. From its earliest days, the Baath called for gender equality, and by 1947, the right to vote for women was supported by its National Convention. The Baath also espoused parliamentary democracy in its calls for action, which was ultimately an early victim of political maneuvering once the party gained power.

The practicalities of achieving and holding power in Syria and Iraq have seen the Baath go through numerous incarnations. Initial membership was primarily among intellectuals and students. Observers often noted how the Baath exercised influence well beyond its actual numbers. The party gained enormous prestige as a result of the Palestinian debacle. Party leaders and members volunteered to fight in Palestine while the party collected money and weapons for the war. In political opposition, the Baath distanced itself from the defeats. Over time, the Baathists appealed to sectarian minorities of Syria, especially the Alawites and Druze. In conjunction with this appeal, the Baath began programmatically to seek inroads in the Syrian military, proving fertile ground since both Baath ideology and the military profession held promises of social mobility for segments of Syrian society.

The role of the military became evident within a few years of Syrian independence. The first of several coup d'états occurred in March 1949 when Husni al-Zaim, apparently supported by Baathists, overthrew the government dominated by landed elites and rich merchants. The Baath soon moved to opposition, however, after al-Zaim began pushing a constitution forbidding civil servants from joining political parties; a Baath pamphlet denounced the regime's measures. Subsequently, al-Zaim responded by banning all political parties and jailing the Baath leaders. After the coup d'état led by Colonel al-Hinnawi, several Baathists joined the new coalition government. In December 1949, Adib al-Shishakli launched a third coup and assumed power, tolerating the Baath until January 1952, when he closed the offices of al-Baath, the party's newspaper. On December 29, 1952, Shishakli had Aflaq and Bitar arrested, as well as Arab Socialist Party leader Akram Hourani. Five days later, the men escaped to Lebanon and moved to Europe. When Shishakli announced new elections for October 1953, Aflaq, Bitar, and Hourani returned to Damascus. Disaffection with the government's management of the elections led to a Baath boycott of the election along with the People's Party and the National Party. Charges of corruption against Shishakli's Arab Liberation movement resulted in widespread demonstrations by all other parties after the election. A leaflet campaign led to new arrests in January 1954 of the three men.

One month later, the fortunes of the Baath changed dramatically. Proselytization amid the army paid off as disaffected troops mutinied in Aleppo in February. The revolt spread to Damascus, and Shishakli fled. A few days later the jailed leaders were released, and on March 5, 1954 announced the merger of the Baath and Arab Socialist Party, henceforth known as the Arab Baath Socialist Party. The constitution of the new party was adopted virtually unchanged from Aflaq's and Bitar's party. While the party remained comparatively small, the merger expanded Baath membership beyond the pockets of intellectuals scattered around the country into the influential Syrian military officer corps. In the elections of late 1954 the party won 22 seats in the Syrian parliament, up from three seats in 1949. Working with other leftist parties, including the communists, the Baathists could garner 25 percent of parliamentary votes. With a weak and fractious Syrian parliament, the Baath benefited from a clearly organized and delineated agenda. As the Cold War came to the Middle East in the 1950s, Baath resistance to western schemes further expanded its influence in Syria and in several other Arab states. By the mid-1950s party branches were active in Jordan, Lebanon, and Iraq. As each party gained viability, these were termed as “regions” of the party organization, overseen by the National Command, a credible adjective given the party’s pan-Arabism.

The Baathists’ success led to an effort by opponents to counter their gains. In Syria, most prominently, on the political right, the Syrian Social Nationalist Party (SSNP) emerged prominently in opposition, and Islamist groups like the Muslim Brotherhood campaigned against Baathist secularism. The Baath was ideologically opposed to the Communist Party’s economic determinism and ties to the Soviet Union, but a rapprochement was negotiated for practical gains. The party leadership often defended the alliance by saying, “We may meet in the same trenches, but we can’t join up with them.” When a member of the SSNP assassinated Adnan al-Maliki, the Syrian army’s deputy chief of staff and a Baathist, in April 1955, sympathy for the Baath ran high, and the party capitalized on this popularity to abolish the conservative SSNP. Many SSNP leaders fled to Lebanon while 130 members were arrested and put through show trials for treason, intimidating opposition to leftist parties.

The fallout from the Maliki assassination led to further Baath–communist cooperation and growing popularity, particularly as Syria turned to the Soviet bloc for economic and military assistance. An anti-imperialist party advocating socialism as the path to a better society naturally led further to the left. The 1956 Suez Crisis confirmed the imperialist threat of the West among many Syrians, and the pace of the country’s drift to the political left accelerated. By 1957, Baath members controlled vital foreign affairs and economic posts in government, Hourani became speaker of the Syrian parliament, and the chief of army intelligence was an ally. The overall conclusion among scholars is that Baath fear of dramatically growing communist popularity impelled its next initiative: the union of Syria with Egypt under Gamal Nasser’s control.

Beyond a fear of growing communist support, the Baath advocacy of union with Egypt appealed to the movement’s ideology of Arab nationalism. In addition, Nasser’s popularity across the Arab world after the Suez Crisis of 1956 was unmatched by any regional leader. He may have thus appeared to Aflaq as the person who could achieve the conditions of inqilab, restructuring crucial to Aflaq’s vision of Arab recovery. The question of Baath motives, however, remains a sharp one since the Syrian Baathists, in moving toward union, also knowingly moved toward their own dissolution. Nasser made conditions for union perfectly clear – total union, not a federal one; a single executive under his control instead of a plurality; the end of all political parties in Syria and their replacement by a single-party system mirroring the National Union in Egypt.

Given the speed with which the union was achieved, the Baath scarcely appeared to blink at the prospect of its demise, and in fact, worked to achieve it. When the original set of talks stalled, Baath leadership encouraged the Syrian army to negotiate independently with the Egyptian military. Those talks resulted in an agreement to merge the two nations’ armed forces, a fait accompli forcing Damascus’s hand. Al-Bitar was sent to confer with the Syrian officers, but met instead directly with Nasser to cement the agreement. The Syrian premier, Quwatli, had little choice left but to bend before the political winds. On February 1, 1958, Quwatli and Nasser jointly announced the creation of the United Arab Republic (UAR), confirmed by referenda in both nations three weeks later, and Nasser was elected as president in a 99 percent landslide.

Perhaps Aflaq and al-Bitar thought that the incipient formal end of the party was a technical detail. There was some expectation that both would shape the ideology of the National Union in Syria, and perhaps, they thought, impart a Baathist tilt to the one party. “Since it was we who began preaching Socialist ideas at least fifteen years before Nasser assumed power,” Aflaq reasoned like many other Syrians, surely Nasser would want to listen to them.

At the outset, Nasser understood the significant role of the Baath in crafting the union, and rewarded them with several cabinet posts in the new UAR government. They were lesser posts, however, since Nasser had set in motion the dynamics that would also bring this hasty marriage to an end; from the start Egypt's tradition of centralized control ran against Syria's more often fractured, localized structures. Nasser sent Egyptian officers and agents north to bring Syria's armed forces and bureaucracy in line with Egyptian patterns. Although formally disbanded as a party, the Baathists still had a presence as individuals and through their National Command, which relocated to Lebanon. The Baathists professed their allegiance to the union and to Nasser, but grew into serious disarray. In September of 1958, Nasser began implementing an Egyptian-style land reform which alienated the many landowners of Syria. Simultaneously, he began sifting the Syrian armed forces for potential opponents and relocating them to safer positions, often in Egypt. The mood in Syria soon soured and former Baathists caught the brunt of disaffection in the July 1959 elections to the National Union. Of the 9,445 seats allotted to Syria in this body, known Baathists won only 250. Still, the party's leaders claimed a victory, saying that the popular vote in the union had nonetheless elected a 90 percent socialist majority.

All of these dynamics had to account for another factor after July 1958, following the overthrow of the Hashemite monarchy in Iraq, bringing Abdul Qasim to the fore as another leading personality in the Middle East. The fact that his regime included members of Iraq's branch of the Baath Party added new impetus to the direction that Arab socialism might take. Talk of union between Iraq and the UAR began immediately, but it was clear that Qasim intended to follow his own trajectory. Fuad al-Rikabi, the Baath secretary general in Iraq, was so convinced that Nasser was the key to fulfilling Baathist goals that he left his cabinet post in the new government and participated in a 1959 plot to assassinate Qasim. The government reaction was predictably harsh and the Baath were driven underground. Having been persecuted under the monarchy as well, the Iraqi Baathists were accustomed to operating as a cell-type organization, and actually managed to grow by influencing several key trade unions and the Iraqi Students' Organization. Four clandestine newspapers managed regular issues during the period 1958–63.

By 1959, the cracks in the Baath Party were unmistakably clear. At the Fourth National Congress, held in Beirut in August, Aflaq could barely retain control over the party. A movement to condemn formally the previous year's dissolution of the Syrian "Region" was narrowly thwarted. Ideologically committed to the UAR, Syrian Baathists began to form a passive resistance to Nasser. A third group, led by the Iraqi al-Rikabi, which saw so little difference between Nasserism and Baath ideology, and supported an end to the party, was expelled. His wholehearted Nasserist pan-Arabism had already earned him several rebukes from the National Command of the party, but he remained intransigent. The final straw apparently was open advocacy of violence and assassination: methods, according to the party ideologues, betraying a lack of trust in the people's ability to understand and achieve socialism's benefits.

In 1959, a new fissure emerged, unbeknownst to the civilian Baathists. Numerous military officers with Baathist sympathies, stationed deliberately by Nasser in Egypt to be supervised more closely, mostly drawn from the minority Alawi and Druze communities of Syria, formed a "Military Committee." Its history remains difficult to penetrate, but the members' later actions testify to a desire to reconstitute the Baath Party and an opposition to civilian leadership. The Baathists had long decried the intrusion of the military into politics, although they were not above using the military themselves. This military turn would eventually see an inversion of the original Baath stance. Although the Baath in Syria would reconstitute the party, the older generation of leaders found their younger counterparts pressing the party in new directions.

Nasser's brand of socialism continued to alienate the Syrians. Despite protestations of support from the party's leaders, individual Baathists in Nasser's administration continued resigning across 1959, including Hourani himself. In December, all the remaining Baathists resigned en masse. In 1961, Nasser's measures to nationalize banks and insurance companies left the significant bourgeois elements of Syria worried about the future of private enterprise. For their own reasons, the Baathists were also upset by the maneuver, construing it not as a step toward socialism but as thinly disguised state capitalism. The political left in Syria, however, had been weakened by Nasser's policies, and so it was a conservative backlash that brought on the September 28, 1961 coup. Landowners and bourgeois elements supported conservative military units who moved into Damascus that day and declared the end of the union with Egypt.

The Baathists faced a dilemma. Committed to the principle of Arab unification, they knew that a continuation of Nasser's policies would end Baathist socialism. Hourani and al-Bitar were originally signatories to the declaration of separation, but al-Bitar soon "removed" his name. Hourani, though, had had his fill of Nasserism and split from the main Baath body that could not publicly condemn Nasser or forego the possibility of recreating the union. The next two years were turbulent. At the time of the coup, the National Command directed the Syrian "Region" to reorganize itself and to work for union again, but this time on a "democratic, socialist, and popular" basis. Splits continued in the Syrian and Lebanese branches of the party on the acceptability of union with Nasser. Aflaq, still the ideological weathervane of the party, continued to push for union despite mistrust of Nasser. At the 1962 Congress, Aflaq packed the meeting with his supporters and pursued a federal union, an idea anathema to Nasser. Simultaneously, the Baath came in for criticism all around the Arab world from Nasser's supporters, who charged the Syrian socialists with spearheading the 1961 secession.

Once again, though, events in Iraq exerted a heavy influence on Syria, Egypt, and whether Arab socialism might have a Nasserite or Baathist face. Iraq's Baathists could not claim many members in 1962, but concentrated on developing grassroots sympathy to bring people out in demonstrations, intended both to counter the apparent popularity of Iraq's communists among the people and to win outright control of key areas if necessary. Concomitantly, the Baath made overtures in the military to nationalist officers. In 1962, it formed the Military Bureau of the Baath, composed of the party's leader Ali Saleh al-Sa'di and prominent generals like 'Abd al-Salam Arif and Ahmad Hasan al-Bakr. Then a December 1962 incident at Baghdad's al-Sharqiyyah (Eastern) High School led to a student strike. The Baath in Iraq, ensconced in the Iraqi Students' Union, succeeded in extending the strike across all schools in the country. At the same time, the political arm of the Kurdish resistance approached Iraq's Baath searching for an ally against Qasim's regime. The pressure paid off in February 1963, when Qasim arrested several Baathist officers, spurring others into quick action. The Iraqi Communist Party moved its partisans into the streets of Baghdad, hoping to forestall the coup, and begged Qasim for weaponry to defend his regime. He was reluctant to give weapons out to the public and the Baath street forces kept an upper hand. Within a day the coup's military allies forced their way into the ministry of defense and captured Qasim. He was tried immediately and executed, with pictures of his bullet-riddled body broadcast to prove the charismatic leader was indeed dead.

Even as Qasim was besieged, the Baath and their allies formed the National Council of the Revolutionary Command to oversee the new administration, beginning with 12 Baath civilian and military members and four Arab nationalist officers. For the government itself, 'Arif assumed the presidency, a result of his popularity with the armed forces, while the Baathists al-Bakr and al-Sa'di became vice-president/prime minister and deputy prime minister/minister of the interior respectively. A Baathist National Guard was established, growing quickly to 30,000 members as savage reprisals against the communists were carried out. By all appearances, the Baath had achieved control of Iraq, but the coalition with the nationalists proved tenuous. The regime could not continue its cooperation with the Kurds and an expensive struggle ensued. Within the Baath Party ideological differences became apparent, with al-Sa'di leading the most left-leaning elements, and the ruling coalition split apart, each fraction seeking to secure an independent agenda. Events in Syria soon widened these fissures into real conflict.

On March 8, 1963, one month after the Baath gained control of Iraq, the Military Committee formed in Egypt became quite visible by toppling the government in Damascus, giving the Baath control of Syria as part of a "National Front" government. Scholars of the movement began to introduce a new term, the neo-Baath, denoting the new party orientation. Aflaq remained as a Founding Father and guide, but the new emphasis by the military leaders began to emphasize Syria's interests over a pan-Arab vision. The party also shifted its efforts to mobilizing the rural population.

In the meantime, the unexpected confluence of Baath regimes in both Damascus and Baghdad immediately spurred talk of Syrian-Iraqi union. The Baathists approached Egypt again, pushing more strongly for a collective executive and a federal arrangement giving greater regional autonomy. Nasser was unenthusiastic by this prospect, but the movement for union seemed to have all the initiative. By April 17, a Tripartite Union was agreed upon, to be implemented over the next two years. The pace of the talks and schedule of integrating the three nations virtually ensured self-destruction of the process: a result most observers view as Nasser's actual objective. Recrimination and propaganda campaigns ensued as each side shifted blame for the failed unification. The Baath was accused of being "anti-religious," a charge denied vigorously, in no small part because of Aflaq's Christianity and the growing Alawi presence in the party. In Syria, the military Baathists continued to purge Nasserist officers from all authority positions.

In October 1963, the Baath held its Sixth National Convention, calling for federal union between Syria and Iraq, with economies operated according to socialist principles. Particular attention was given to collective farming, workers' "control of the means of production," and austerity programs, in part to avoid foreign economic assistance. All called on the Baath governments to support the ongoing revolutions in Yemen and Algeria. The party appeared to move to the left. One conclusion attributes this movement to the new concentration of rural members in the party, especially in light of the push for land redistribution.

Among the more Marxist-inclined members of the Baath, al-Sa'di might have looked upon the October meeting as a confirmation of his views, but it was seen differently in Iraq, where "rightist" members of the Baath reacted against the leftward tilt and managed to take over the November Regional Congress. Al-Sa'di and his clique were exiled from the country, leading to a violent reaction by the National Guard on his behalf and an air force mutiny. In this disarray, Aflaq and other members of the National Command went to Baghdad, but their "help" was mostly resented. Finally, President 'Arif acted, dispatching trustworthy military units against the National Guard. Fighting broke out in Baghdad, but full civil war was avoided when the National Guard surrendered to the army. Baath National Command members were arrested and later expelled from Iraq.

The story of the Baath in Syria after this point is a complex political narrative of coup and counter-coup within the framework of the party itself. Another military coup struck in February 1966 and adopted the more radical propositions of the 1963 National Congress. The infighting eventually saw both Aflaq and al-Bitar expelled from the party they founded. The nationalist faction of the Military Committee slowly continued to build its base, most particularly under the direction of Hafez al-Assad, who profited from his quiet resistance to the more socialistic programs of the Baath. In 1970 al-Assad ousted the "progressive" wing of the party in a final coup, establishing control over the party and state. The fact that some analysts refer to the Baath as al-Assad's fief is testimony to how far the party had moved from its founding principles.

In Iraq, although out of power, the Baathist Party continued on, but no longer as an affiliate of the Syrian "mother" party. While it plotted (including a September 1964 coup among the military which the regime forestalled in advance), 'Arif implemented Nasser-style socialist reforms, in July 1964 decreeing the nationalization of banks, insurance industry, and the largest manufacturers. The Iraqi Petroleum Company remained almost wholly under control of foreign investors, limiting government revenues. By 1965, the country was losing capital, joblessness was rising, and the prospect of land redistribution stymied investment. When 'Arif died in a 1966 plane crash, his brother 'Abd al-Rahman 'Arif assumed the presidency, but his association with the military and the tribal shayks was not as strong as his brother's. In addition, the Communist Party was reviving in Iraq's south, prompting concern among religious conservatives that Islam might be in danger.

When street demonstrations began in 1967 to "save the country from unbelief," the Baath aligned with the anti-secular movement. Ahmad Hasan al-Bakr, former vice-president in 1963, reorganized the Baathist Party, turning to relatives to fill positions, including Saddam Hussein as secretary of the Regional Command. Both men went to jail after the 1964 aborted coup, but new cells of the party developed, including in the military.

When Hussein was released from jail in 1966, he expanded recruitment among the military and disaffected, gaining the ability to reconstitute a Baath militia. Having activists available in crisis moments was pivotal to creating the impression of Baathists' control of the streets.

The pressure grew as 'Arif's weaknesses became apparent to the Baathist Military Bureau; at that point the Regional Command established links with a trio of key officers in the army and Republican Guard. These Baathist officers struck on July 17, 1968, seizing key ministries and expelling 'Arif from the country. Al-Bakr became the president, and Hussein was given control of domestic security and the police forces. Using this portfolio, plus his position with the Baath regional command, Hussein began consolidating his hold on the party and regime. He would not take the reins from al-Bakr until 1979, a changeover only ratifying a situation long in the making.

The 1970s saw the Baath of Iraq lose ideological moorings, as was happening in Syria, but the process was more easily camouflaged by progress in several socialist initiatives. In 1972, the long-sought nationalization of the oil industry was finally achieved. The regime also concentrated on creating the goods and services it needed for the dominant industry within Iraq. It also sought diversification, tapping into the country's rich sulfur and phosphate reserves. Policies were implemented whereby the state took the lead over communal groups in providing health care, handling labor problems, addressing family needs, and making education accessible.

The oil riches meant that Iraq was one of the few developing nations of the world with surplus capital, allowing it to increase spending on the medical infrastructure by 40 percent from 1968 to 1974. Meanwhile, Hussein was extending control through a growing network of secret police and informers, many recruited from the same pool of desperation that Hussein had come from earlier. In the face of torture, illegal imprisonments, wholesale killings, and suppression of all political activity beyond Hussein's countenance, the party's longtime slogan of "Unity, Freedom, and Socialism" doubtless rang hollow alongside the socialist advances.

With the initiation of the Iran–Iraq War, Hussein lost his oil-driven economic advantage, and within two years Iraq became a debtor nation. Socialist programs had to be abandoned due to costs and to conditions "suggested" by lender nations. The regime continued, even increased, its repression, although it was little remarked on the world stage since many of Iraq's erstwhile supporters at this time were more focused on containing the Islamic revolution of Iran. As with Syria, measures to maintain authority undercut Baathists' implementation of socialist ideals.

SEE ALSO: Arab Left and Socialist Movements, 1861–1930; Egypt and Arab Socialism; Iraq, Revolution of 1958; Nasser, Gamal Abdel (1918–1970)

References and Suggested Readings

- Abu Jaber, K. S. (1966) The Arab Ba'th Socialist Party: History, Ideology, and Organization. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.
- Avraham, B. (1968) The Neo-Ba'th Party of Syria. Journal of Contemporary History 3, 3 (July): 161–81.
- Hanna, S. (1967) Al-Afghani: A Pioneer of Islamic Socialism. Muslim World 57: 24–32.
- Hanna, S. & Gardner, G. (1969) Arab Socialism: A Documentary Survey. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press.
- Ismael, T. (2001) Middle East Politics Today: Government and Civil Society. Gainesville: University Press of Florida.
- Kerr, M. (1968) Notes on the Background of Arab Socialist Thought. Journal of Contemporary History 3, 3 (July): 145–59.
- Olson, R. (1982) The Ba'th and Syria, 1947 to 1982: The Evolution of Ideology, Party, and State. Princeton: Kingston Press.
- Reid, D. M. (1974) The Syrian Christians and Early Socialism in the Arab World. International Journal of Middle East Studies 5, 2 (April): 177–93.
- Tibi, B. (1986) Islam and Modern European Ideologies. International Journal of Middle East Studies 18, 1 (February): 15–29.
- Tripp, C. (2000) A History of Iraq. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Wahba, M. M. (1990) The Meaning of Ishirakiyah: Arab Perceptions of Socialism in the Nineteenth Century. Alif: Journal of Contemporary Poetics 10: 42–55.

Szabó, Ervin (1877–1918)

János M. Bak

Ervin Szabó, a Hungarian sociologist and anarchosyndicalist, was born in Slanica (now a lost village in Slovakia). After studies in Budapest and Vienna he became a librarian, and from 1911 director of the Budapest Municipal Library (now bearing his name), which he made into a modern public library. A member of the Social Democratic Party from 1900, he was co-founder, with Oscar Jászi, of the journal Huszadik Század (Twentieth Century), the organ of modern social science in Hungary, and a regular contributor to Neue Zeit (New Times) as well as, later on, to Mouvement Socialiste (Socialist Movement). After failing to organize a successful opposition to the doctrinaire-reformist Social Democratic Party in 1905, he came to be ever closer to anarchists at home and abroad.

While editing the first Hungarian translation of the selected works of Marx and Engels (1905–9) and keeping close contact with orthodox Marxists such as Karl Kautsky, Karl Mehring, and Georgi Plekhanov, Szabó became critical of their determinist views and the “Prussian discipline” of social democracy. He was convinced that “all social progress is the work of critically thinking intellectuals,” and turned against those “enemies of workers’ socialism who use a falsified Marx as a weapon in the fight for state socialism.” Szabó’s contacts with radical Russian émigrés in Vienna (in whose underground activities he participated) and then with George Sorel and Hubert Lagardelle, as well as with Count Ervin Batthyány, brought him close to anarchosyndicalism. When attempts at a syndicalist organization around 1909–10 failed, Szabó saw himself as “the flag bearer of the morrow and the day after tomorrow,” and retreated into librarianship.

During World War I Szabó was a mentor to young anti-militarist activists, many of whom became communists; however, later on, the Bolshevized Communist Party rejected Szabó’s libertarian views. Only in the 1980s, and then after the fall of Soviet communism, was his position in the progressive traditions of his country restored.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Hungary; Anarchosyndicalism; Kautsky, Karl (1854–1938); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Marxism; Plekhanov, Georgi (1856–1918)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bak, J. M., Bozóki, A., & Sükösd, M. (Eds.) (1991) Liberty and Socialism: Writings of Libertarian Socialists in Hungary, 1884–1919. Savage: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Bozóki, A. & Sükösd, M. (2006) Anarchism in Hungary: Theory, History, Legacies. Boulder: Social Science Monographs.
- Goldberger, S. (1985) Ervin Szabo, Anarcho-Syndicalism and the Democratic Revolution in Turn-of-the-Century Hungary. PhD dissertation, Columbia University.
- Szabó, E. (1982) Socialism and Social Science: Selected Writings of Ervin Szabó, 1877–1918. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.

T

Tagore, Saumyendranath (1901–1974)

Shatarupa Sen Gupta

Saumyendranath Tagore began his political career as a Gandhian but joined the Workers' and Peasants' Party (WPP) in April 1926. Thereafter, he began mobilizing the jute mill-workers of Bengal to form the Bengal Jute Workers' Association. Both his success as a trade union activist and his attempts to win over revolutionary terrorists to the WPP made him a marked man. In order to avoid arrest, Tagore left for Europe in May 1927 with a mandate from the WPP. By June 1927 he was in Moscow where he presented a report on the political condition of India. He attended the Sixth Congress of the Comintern in 1928 as an Indian delegate, and expressed some limited unease with the Colonial Thesis, though he did hold that since the Indian bourgeoisie had much to gain from the British, any upsurge in the national revolution would make them oppose it.

In early 1929 Tagore was preparing to return to India when he was implicated in the Meerut Conspiracy Case. He thus decided to remain in Europe to carry on with his politico-literary activities, which included the translation of the Communist Manifesto into Bengali. During this time he was arrested and later released by the Gestapo on charges of planning the assassination of Hitler. He returned to India in 1934, by which time the WPP was defunct and the communist movement was in disarray. By this time he had also become critical of Stalin and the Comintern. Consequently, he started a communist organization known as the Communist League of India, which advocated the formation of soviets of workers and peasants for the success of the Indian revolution. This party became the Revolutionary Communist Party of India in 1938, which took a revolutionary internationalist stance during World War II.

In 1940 Saumyendranath published a pamphlet in which he equated British and French imperialism with fascism, and urged for the utilization of the British crisis of World War II to press for Indian freedom. As a result he was imprisoned for a year. He was jailed again in 1942 for opposing the Cripps mission to India. He condemned the assassination of Trotsky, and characterized the USSR as a bureaucratic-collectivist regime, carrying on anti-Stalinist as well as anti-imperialist propaganda from jail.

After his release in 1945, Tagore participated in the mass movement against the trial of the Indian National Army officers and provided leadership to the hugely successful general strike in Calcutta on July 29, 1946. He also initiated the formation of trade unions in mercantile concerns.

In 1948 the RCPI split into two, whereby Tagore's group was reduced to a minority. He spent the remainder of his political career as a civil rights activist. He also defended the records of early Indian communists such as Abani Mukherjee, who was murdered in Stalinist Russia, and those vilified as agents of imperialism by Stalinists, such as Muzaffar Ahmed. Some of his important works are Biplabi Russia (Revolutionary Russia), Russiar Kabita (Poems of Russia), Troyee (The Three), Communism and Fascism, Hitlerism and the Aryan Rule in Germany, and Sadharan Swattabadia Ishtahar (Communist Manifesto). He died on September 22, 1974.

SEE ALSO: Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)

References and Suggested Readings

Chandra, A. (1993) Communist League: Trisher Dasaker ekti Samantaral Communist Sangathan. In A. W. Mahmud (Ed.), Itihas Anusandhan. Calcutta: K. P. Bagchi.

Chattopadhyay, G. (1970) Communism and Bengal's Freedom Movement. New Delhi: Peoples' Publishing House.

Chattopadhyay, S. (Ed.) (1975, 1984) Against the Stream: An Anthology of Writings of Saumyendranath Tagore, Vols. 1–2. Calcutta: Saumyendranath Memorial Committee.

Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864

Amit Bhattacharyya

One of the greatest Chinese peasant rebellions, the Taiping (Great Peace) Rebellion was directed primarily against the feudal rule of the Manchu dynasty and secondarily against foreign capitalism, which had been making steady inroads into the economy, society, and politics of China ever since the country's defeat in the first Opium War and the signing of the Treaty of Nanking.

Crises of the Manchu Rule (1644–1911)

Manchu rule was the rule of a conquering dynasty named the Ch'ing or Qing that had overthrown the indigenous Ming dynasty. They were a Tungusic people, considered foreigners by the mainland Chinese. Manchu rule was torn by crises, mismanagement, and corruption in the late eighteenth century, at both the central and provincial levels. Government encouragement of the sale of official positions created a vicious cycle of corruption. Taxes were arbitrarily enhanced by local officials and landlords, who also acted as tax collectors. Political decline led to economic failure. The great majority of the peasants had no protection against exploitation by officials and various feudal elements. As in all feudal societies, land was concentrated in the hands of a handful of gentry officials and the peasants were subjected to all forms of oppression and exploitation. Factors such as these caused peasant rebellions in the earlier periods of the history of China. However, in the mid-nineteenth century, social crisis assumed a new dimension by the unexpected population explosion. In fact, China's population increased from 180 million in 1751 to 430 million in 1851 without any corresponding expansion of the area of arable land. In the absence of any industry to absorb the surplus population and territory to which they could migrate, land was further fragmented. This not only disrupted the balance of the rural economic sector but also crippled the peasantry by lowering their standard of living.

Advent of Western Imperialism

The scenario was aggravated by the entry of western capitalism. From the beginning of the nineteenth century, the import of goods from abroad, especially opium, had risen steeply compared to exports. Thus the balance of trade went against China. The import hike was met by the export of large quantities of silver from China to other countries. Before the beginning of the nineteenth century, tael (1 ounce of silver) was equal to 1,000 copper coins; in 1835, the rate of exchange was 1 ounce to 2,000 coins. The great majority of the population usually used copper coins to pay for goods including agricultural products. But the problem was that peasants had to pay their taxes not in copper but in silver. Therefore, for the peasants, taxes were doubled simply by the alteration in the rate of exchange. Moreover, a series of natural disasters from 1826 to 1850 drove the peasants below subsistence level and they were no longer in a position to pay taxes.

The political and social crises were accelerated by the First Opium War (1840–2) and the Treaty of Nanking (1842), the first in a series unequal treaties that, along with subsequent developments, transformed China from a feudal country into a semi-feudal and semi-colonial one. The Manchu state became totally discredited, politically weak and subservient to foreign powers. Before the Opium War, foreign trade was limited to the port city of Canton. A great number of porters were regularly employed in transporting goods between Canton and the Yangzi provinces. After the war, the British intruders demanded that other ports such as Amoy, Shanghai, Ningpo, and Foochow also be opened to trade. Decline in the importance of the Cantonese monopoly threw hundreds of thousands of boatmen and porters in central and southern China out of work. These unemployed masses swelled the ranks of the Taiping and furnished many of their leaders. The influx of cheap foreign textiles ruined millions of weavers and other handicraftsmen through direct competition in the market. This was known as deindustrialization, a phenomenon noticeable also in contemporary colonial India. Indigenous merchants and moneylenders, who used to finance artisans, now invested in foreign goods.

Proto-nationalist feelings gave these long-standing and diverse socioeconomic grievances a common vocabulary of protest. Followers of the Ming dynasty, overthrown by the Manchus, had prepared a literary battle against the foreign rulers at the end of the seventeenth century that profoundly inspired the leaders of the Taiping Rebellion and other risings. Supporters of the Ming dynasty formed a secret society called the Heaven and Earth Society, whose slogan was "Overthrow the Ch'ing and restore the Ming."

Hong Xiuquan

The beginning of the Taiping Rebellion almost coincided with the revolutionary outbreaks that shook Europe in 1848. Starting off in Tzu-chin shan in the province of Kwangsi, near the Vietnam border, it cut across China like a sword, approaching Peking in the north, Shanghai in the east, and the Tibetan mountains in the west. The rebels made Nanking their capital and set up the revolutionary state of the oppressed people known as the Taiping Tien-kuo or the Heavenly Kingdom of the Great Peace.

Hong Xiuquan, the supreme leader of the rebellion, was a poverty-stricken schoolteacher who had been ill treated by the corrupt Confucian scholar gentry that served the Manchus. He was born in the province of Kwangtung (capital Canton), which gave birth to many a Chinese revolutionary including Sun Yat-sen. Witnessing the persecution of his own people by the landlords, Hong was deeply influenced by the heroic battles of the Cantonese peasant detachments against the British invaders during the Opium War. At the same time, he came into contact with the Christianity preached, but rarely practiced, by the missionaries.

This rebellion brought within its fold a number of people from different walks of life. In fact, Hong's earliest colleagues such as Yang (charcoal-burner), Feng (village schoolteacher), Hsiao (poor peasant and woodcutter), Wei (trader), and Shih (rich peasant) reflected the class basis of the movement. There were also representatives of small sections of relatively well-to-do scholar gentry who were opposed to the Manchus for national, not social, reasons. Their followers consisted of the Hakka, Yao, and Miao tribes, several hundred charcoal-burners, a large number of miners, and former pirates who had been driven from the seashores by foreign warships. Moreover, there were a few traders and well-to-do peasants as well as deserters from the government troops and porters from Canton. The peasantry constituted the main fighting force of the movement.

Dynamics and Defeat

As the revolutionary situation was conducive to their growth, the Taiping rebels quickly grew in strength. In the summer of 1852, they left their original base in Kwangsi and marched northwards toward Hunan, where they were joined by a huge body of rebels from other movements. From Hunan they proceeded through Hupei and then occupied Nanking, the southern capital of the Ming dynasty in the spring of 1853. Nanking became the seat of rebel power and Hong Xiuquan set up his court there. An army was dispatched northwards with the aim of capturing Peking. However, because of inadequate military preparations and the inability of the southern soldiers to adjust to the northern food habits and cold winter climate, the thrust to the north came to nothing.

The rebels could not keep their revolutionary fervor intact for long for a number of reasons. In 1856, the rebels fell out among themselves in the city of Nanking itself, and the treachery of a commander named Wei Chang-hui resulted in a confrontation in which some of the most important leaders lost their lives. This brought the revolutionary offensive to an end and its continuance in the following years turned out to be purely defensive. Along with this, other internal contradictions developed within the rebel order. The Taipings began by conducting mobile warfare, all the way from the mountains of Kwangsi to the rebel capital of Nanking. Undoubtedly this was a spontaneous people's war against the feudal order. However, as Chesneau (1973) points out, after establishing a government and a state in Nanking, the leaders soon became a privileged class. In order to make the governmental machinery work, they had to make increasing demands on the peasantry. This marked the transition point for the peasantry, who were transformed from active agents participating in the decision to create a new political formation to passive subjects of a government. They had to pay taxes, suffer requisitions, and supply unpaid labor: the system they had sought to change. This was why the peasantry became increasingly disaffected in the last years of the Heavenly Kingdom. The rebel state was thus in the process of being weakened by these internal contradictions.

The defeat of the Taipings can be attributed not only to internal factors, but also to external ones. The foreign powers played a major role in this. At the beginning, the rebellion received much praise in the western press and even in government circles. The fact that the rebels were Christian and stood against Manchu corruption and backwardness was much acclaimed. That is why the western powers maintained neutrality in the initial years of the revolt. They wanted to utilize the revolt to further their own gains by exploiting the internal contradictions within China. Some foreign leaders sought to transform the rebel leaders into their stooges, who would help them capture political power and gain control over China. Others wanted to see China exhausted by internal turmoil and cease to exist. However, the Taipings were never prepared to allow foreigners to use them as they wished. Through their revolutionary activities and their program of action, they made it clear that the civil war in China was the internal affair of the Chinese people and that any offer from foreigners to mediate between the rebels and the Manchu state was unacceptable to them. At the same time, by imposing a ban on the opium trade in areas controlled by the Taiping rebels, they made their anti-western position perfectly clear.

Foreign Intervention

The Opium War and the treaties signed thereafter paved the way for the control of China's internal affairs by the foreign powers. Britain's declaration of war on China was followed by that of France, culminating in the Second Opium War in 1857–8 which also ended in China's defeat and the signing of another unequal and humiliating treaty, known as the Treaty of Tientsin (1858). By this treaty, the Manchus had to concede a tremendous war indemnity, the legalization of both opium and missionary activities, and the perpetuation of foreign control of customs and tariffs. The toiling people of China were transferred to different colonies to serve in Malay, US, and New Caledonian plantations and mines as nothing better than slaves. This marked the beginning of the infamous "coolie trade" whereby Chinese workers were forced to work in abysmal, unhygienic conditions. Britain and France were to provide military help to the Manchu government to fight the Taiping rebels. Opium was legalized by the treaty and the Taipings, who had banned opium, were regarded as "international law-breakers" in their own motherland.

The attitude of the foreign governments and the press toward the rebels soon changed. They were no longer regarded as religious brethren but as "anarchists" and "blasphemers." The Manchu government, regarded previously as reactionary, was now hailed as the guardian of trade and legality and a force for stability. In fact, by 1861–2, British and French troops started participating in the armed conflicts on the side of the Manchus in Shanghai.

Many progressive people in the western world raised their voices against unwarranted western interference in the internal affairs of China. Marx and Engels denounced such aggression in a series of articles. A number of foreigners fought directly for the Taipings. Augustus Lindlay, a British citizen, not only took up arms on the side of the Taipings but also wrote a moving eyewitness account of the rising. Moreover, several former officials of the French army and at least one Italian named Major Moreno played an active part in it.

The last phase of the battle was the bloodiest of all. The combined attacks of the Manchu and foreign troops finally put an end to this greatest peasant revolt in the history of modern China. In the summer of 1864, the capital Nanking fell to the Manchus.

Revolutionary Measures

The military successes of the Taiping were based on the overwhelming support of the people. It was truly a people's war that unleashed the initiative and creativity of the masses. The social and political program they adopted reflected the aspirations of the masses. In fact, many of the principles of the Taiping Rebellion served as an inspiration and model for Sun Yat-sen and the Kuomintang (National People's Party) he founded, as well as for the May 4th movement of 1919 and the communists. Franke writes that the Taiping took the idea of equality from Christianity. This idea combined with many ancient ideas and did much to strengthen their revolutionary social program.

- Common property: Under the Taipings, unlike in previous regimes, there were no private possessions. They established a common treasury and granary from which provision was made for individual weddings, births, funerals, and so on.
- Land reform program: The makers of the new order proclaimed an egalitarian Agrarian Law according to which all the land under Heaven was to be collectively cultivated by all the people under Heaven. All land was divided into nine categories according to its quality and was allocated for the use of the population. The peasants retained for themselves only that part of the produce that was needed for their subsistence. Taxes were reduced to a level that was lower than that demanded by the Manchu state. In a manifesto of November 2, 1860, Hong Xiuquan announced a reduction of taxes in the southern counties of Kiangsu. It read: “Now, seeing the suffering of the people, and fulfilling the will of the Most High, I and my youthful heir to the throne intend to govern humanely and to lower taxes in order to lighten the life of the people and bring them relief. . . . As I have learned from the report of Brother Li Hsiucheng, in the past the population of Kiangsu paid onerous taxes and extortionate duties to the Manchu devils, who sucked your blood and rebelled against Heaven” (Anon 1959). The Soviet historian Tikhvinsky (1983) has drawn attention to the limitations of the measures of the Taiping. It is true that the revolutionaries were thoroughly anti-feudal and anti-Manchu and regarded all property, including landed property, as the “property of the Satan.” At the same time, as peasant rebels they tended to reproduce structures similar to what had existed before, relying on gentry and bureaucrats for administration. As a result, in many cases landlord-bureaucrats failed to carry out demands for the reduction of sharecroppers’ rent and were able to impose practically the whole burden of taxation on the shoulders of the peasantry.
- Position of women: In traditional Chinese society, the position of women was subordinate in every respect to that of men. Women did not have any right over property; they were subjected to political, religious, clan-based, and patriarchal exploitation. The Taipings marked a qualitative departure from the past as they sought to create a new society based on gender equality. Their unhesitant declaration to this effect was itself a revolutionary political statement. In a feudal society where women had no rights whatsoever, they forbade prostitution and the purchase and sale of women in marriage. In the rebel order, women could sit for state examinations and occupy the same civil or military positions as men. One unique fact is the presence of women soldiers in special women’s contingents in the Taiping army. Monogamy was made obligatory. Rape was punishable by death.

- Temperance: Like tobacco and alcohol, opium was also strictly prohibited and this was enforced in practice.
- Attack on images: The Taipings were monotheistic and their activities showed signs of their intolerance toward other religious sects. They were influenced by Christianity and destroyed the images, statues, and temples of Buddhism, Taoism, and particularly Confucianism, which served as the ideological basis of the feudal system in China. By directing their attacks against images, the Taipings gave their critics and opponents a powerful weapon to use against them.
- Treatment of foreigners: The Taiping Rebellion took place in the context of western capitalist penetration when foreign trade and the opium business had already extended their tentacles. The Taipings recognized none of the privileges the foreign powers extracted from the Manchus through unequal treaties. On the other hand, they were prepared to establish commercial relations with them on the basis of equality. As a result of the Christian influence, they regarded all nations as having equal rights; they did not deride foreigners as “barbarians,” nor did they regard the Chinese as people chosen by the Lord on High. They were hostile to Catholics, but fairly friendly to Protestants.
- Calendar reform: The traditional lunar Chinese calendar was replaced by a completely new lunisolar calendar with a seven-day week.
- Literary reform: The Taipings also introduced important changes in the written language of the people. The Chinese language does not have an alphabet: it is ideographic. Moreover, there was a wide variety in the dialects used by people living in each province. Despite such differences, the written language was the same everywhere and it was this unity that could hold the Chinese nation together, regardless of disunity in other fields. The problem was that the overwhelming majority of the Chinese did not know the written language and so were not in a position to write. The Taipings relaxed the heavily conventional written style, which was quite different from the spoken language, by approximating it more closely to colloquial speech. In this they were the forerunners of the great literary revolution that took place later on.

- Other reforms: Besides these reforms, the Taipings envisaged other modern infrastructural reforms, such as the construction of a network of railways, a postal service, hospitals, and banks. They accepted the Ten Commandments and the divinity of Christ. In their opinion, Hong Xiuquan was the second brother of Christ. They believed in baptism, and the Old and New Testaments were integral parts of their religious canons. It can therefore be argued that the Taipings created a complete politico-religious system which combined spiritual salvation and obedience to the will of God with the political and military defense of the rebel state.

Nature and Significance

Although the Taipings did attempt to establish an egalitarian utopian society, their reforms were actually such as to pave the way to capitalism. But peasant rebellions without the creation of new productive forces through the participation of an urban bourgeoisie could not achieve capitalist development. In effect, the peasantry was used by the landlords and the nobility as a lever to bring about dynastic changes.

The Taiping Rebellion took place at a time when Chinese society had been undergoing a process of transition from a feudal society to a semi-feudal and semi-colonial one. The process of transition started roughly from the time of the Opium Wars when Britain and other foreign powers had already begun making active encroachments on Chinese soil. Epstein (1956) holds that this rebellion was simultaneously the last of China's old-style peasant wars and the first great democratic fight of its people in the modern period. Chesneau (1973) says that elements of proto-nationalism in the Taiping movement linked it with the peasant revolts of earlier days. The rebels accused the Manchu dynasty of wanting to drain the country of its wealth. It is important to refer in this connection to an interesting feature: they allowed their hair to grow on the front part of the head – a longstanding practice that was prohibited by the Manchu rulers. It was this nationalistic element that explains the participation of a large number of educated and rich people whose anti-Manchu patriotism gave them some sympathy for the rebel cause.

A number of scholars, both Chinese and western, have written on the nature and significance of the Taiping Rebellion. Mao Zedong (1939) pointed out that peasant risings and wars constituted a unique feature of Chinese history. According to him, class struggles between peasants and feudal forces constituted the dynamic element in the progress of China amidst the changing fortunes of ruling dynasties. He argued that in the absence of “correct leadership” by the proletariat and the Communist Party, peasant wars of the past were unable to liberate the peasantry from the feudal yoke. While speaking of the Taiping Rebellion, Mao said that it was one of the eight major events that occurred in the formative period of China's bourgeois-democratic revolution.

Mao's observations inspired the historians of modern China to engage in 11 years of debate from 1950 to 1961. In 1952, the Chinese Historical Society published eight volumes of source materials on Taiping from Shanghai. During that period, Chinese journals published 400 research articles. However, as Tan Chung (1985) argues, this important intellectual achievement has hardly been noticed outside China. J. P. Harrison, who followed this debate with interest, was critical of the communist historians' attempts to put the peasant movements of the past on a new pedestal.

Tan Chung argued that in earlier times the gentry had suppressed information about the importance of peasant rebellions in Chinese history, an importance that was recovered only after the aforementioned debates. These debates helped Chinese scholars view their past as a continuous process of social evolution with peasant movements acting as locomotives, having an anti-feudal dynamic. A different view was that the peasants attacked the regime, not feudalism as a class system. Hou Wailu described the Taiping revolt as the highest form of peasant war and a very good beginning for modern revolution. Another writer, Wu Shimo, asserted that Taiping stood for political equality, economic equality, sexual equality, and equality among nations.

Karl Marx and The Times (August 30, 1853) hailed the event in identical language. Marx called it a formidable revolution and The Times described it as the greatest revolution the world had ever seen. On the other hand, Barrington Moore (1993) and Kung-chuan Hsiao (1979) maintain that it was a rebellion, not a revolution, as it did not alter the basic structure of society. Vincent Shih holds that the Taipings had genuine revolutionary possibilities in borrowing Christian and western ideas. But these possibilities were nullified because the Taipings were only able to perceive Christian ideas through the glass of traditional concepts. It is ridiculous to argue that all revolutionary possibilities should be identified solely with western ideas. While opposing Vincent Shih, Tan Chung argues that the Taiping ideology drew heavily on native cultural aspirations such as folklore, but the trace of continuity does not necessarily dilute its revolutionary character. D. S. Zagoria has made an ecological analysis and argues for the inevitability of the movement. He maintains that a peasant rebellion of the Taiping type was the inevitable outcome of "Monsoon Asia." China, one of the wettest countries in the world, is well known as a "rice economy," highlighted by intensive utilization of farmland, a dense population, hunger for land, elimination of smallholdings, and proletarianization of the peasants, thereby creating the conditions for rural unrest, revolts, and anti-feudal wars. Although old democratic revolutions consisting of the Taiping, Boxer, and the 1911 nationalist revolution failed to free China from the tentacles of feudal and imperialist forces, its successor, the new democratic revolution, from the May 4 movement onwards – when the working class entered the political stage – could bring about the liberation of the country within a short span of 30 years. The Taiping Rebellion was an agrarian revolution, which formed part of the democratic revolution.

SEE ALSO: China, Peasant Revolts in the Empire; Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911; Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Sun Yat-Sen (1866–1925); Yi Ho Tuan (Boxer) Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Anonymous (1959) Records of the Taiping Era. Peking: Foreign Languages Press.
- Chesneaux, J. (1972) Secret Societies in China in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Chesneaux, J. (1973) Peasant Revolts in China 1840–1949. London: Thames & Hudson.
- Epstein, I. (1956) From Opium War to Liberation. Beijing: New World Press.
- Franke, W. (1970) A Century of the Chinese Revolution 1851–1949. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Kung-chuan Hsiao (1979) A History of Chinese Political Thought. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Mao Zedong (1939) The Chinese Revolution and the Chinese Communist Party. Available at www.marxists.org/reference/archive/mao/selected-works/volume-2/mswv2_23.htm (downloaded May 5, 2008).
- Moore, B., Jr. (1993) Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy: Lord and Peasant in the Making of the Modern World. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Shih, V. Y. C. (1972) The Taiping Ideology: Its Sources, Interpretations, and Influences. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- Spence, J. D. (1996) God's Chinese Son: The Taiping Heavenly Kingdom of Hong Xiuquan. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Tan Chung (1985) Triton and Dragon: Studies on Nineteenth-Century China and Imperialism. Delhi: Gian.
- Tikhvinsky, S. L. (Ed.) (1983) Modern History of China. Moscow: Progress Publishers.
- Zagoria, D. S. (1974) Asian Tenancy Systems and Communist Mobilization of the Peasantry. In J. Lewis (Ed.), Peasant Rebellion and Communist Revolution in Asia. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

Taiwan, anti-imperialism and nationalism

J. Megan Greene

Nationalism in Taiwan has in many ways been generated and refined through a series of protests of foreign imperialism. Taiwan has had a long history of imperialist conquest, which began with the Dutch in the seventeenth century and ended, according to many Taiwan nationalists, with the Guomindang (GMD) takeover of the island in 1945. Over this 300-year period, Taiwan was governed by Dutch, Chinese, and Japanese rulers, and although protests were infrequent, from the late nineteenth century on they took on an increasingly nationalistic character. In recent years, Taiwanese nationalists have drawn upon the island's colonial history to encourage its modern residents to resist efforts by the People's Republic of China (PRC) to take it over and turn it into a Chinese province.

The residents of Taiwan at the time of the Dutch conquest in 1624 were composed of numerous Austronesian aboriginal tribes that can be broadly divided into two groups. Mountain aborigines had had little or no contact with Chinese traders and other groups that had periodically landed on Taiwan's shores, and were regarded by Taiwan's Dutch rulers, and later by Chinese and Japanese rulers alike, as impossible to assimilate and best left on their own, although the territory that they controlled diminished substantially over time and under Japanese rule many of their traditional practices were outlawed. Plains aborigines, who inhabited the western plain of Taiwan, assimilated rapidly, and during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries many intermarried with Chinese settlers. Between the seventeenth and late nineteenth centuries Taiwan's plains aborigines periodically protested against the unfair taxation practices of the Dutch and Qing Chinese rulers and mountain aborigines occasionally conducted violent wars against the Dutch and Chinese.

The earliest notable protest that can clearly be understood as anti-imperialist came in 1895 in response to the news that Taiwan was about to be given to the Japanese as part of the war reparations the Qing dynasty was forced to pay following its defeat in the Sino-Japanese War (1894–5). A group of local leaders decided to secede from the Qing and establish a Taiwan Republic, thereby preempting the planned colonization of Taiwan by Japan. This maneuver was not intended so much as a rejection of the Qing, since its authors were themselves pro-Qing, as an attempt to evade the fate of becoming Japanese.

Although the move failed, the leaders of the Republic backed up their political efforts with an army, and fought the Japanese invasion for five months before finally acknowledging defeat. These actions were followed by further efforts at resistance, but within the first ten years of Japanese rule the resistance had been pacified and the Japanese had only to contend with occasional rebellions from mountain aboriginal groups, whereas the plains aborigines and Chinese residents of the western plain yielded to Japanese authority. By the 1930s and 1940s, a group of Taiwanese elites had begun to call for self-government and autonomy, but their approach was to work within the system rather than to attempt to overthrow it.

As Taiwan was handed from Japan to GMD-controlled China at the end of World War II, with no regard for the wishes of the Taiwanese people, these same elites continued to call for self-government, but they now did so from within a new provincial assembly that the GMD permitted to exist. Their efforts to work within the system, however, ended in early March 1947 after riots had erupted in protest of the GMD's taxation policies and its perceived authoritarianism. The February 28 Incident, as these events have come to be known, started with a smallish riot in protest against brutal treatment by police of a woman selling contraband cigarettes. Over the next several days, increasing numbers of people took to the streets to protest the new GMD government.

In this environment, Taiwan's elites met to formulate a series of demands, including the dissolution of the Taiwan Garrison Command, all of which aimed at the ultimate goal of self-rule. These demands met with violent opposition on the part of the GMD, however, when Governor Chen Yi called in troop reinforcements who killed or imprisoned many of the elites who had been involved as well as other protesters. Following the February 28 Incident, martial law was declared in Taiwan and was not lifted until 1987.

Although martial law severely restricted the political activities of the people of Taiwan, there were nonetheless some notable protest movements during the martial law era, most of which were associated with publications. In 1960, for example, Lei Zhen (Lei Chen), a writer and intellectual, called upon the Republic of China (ROC) to democratize. He published his essays in a journal by the name of Ziyou zhongguo (Free China), which had been established by a number of well-known advocates of liberal democracy, including Hu Shi, who had served the GMD government in various capacities since the 1930s. Although Lei Zhen and the other Ziyou zhongguo writers were supporters of the ROC and, to a certain extent, of the GMD itself, the GMD state could still not tolerate such open criticism; it shut down the journal and arrested Lei as well as a number of other figures who had associations with the journal.

In 1979, the publishers of Meilidao (Formosa) magazine undertook to organize a major protest in Kaohsiung that was violently suppressed by the authorities. Meilidao magazine was perhaps the most radical of a number of new journals that had sprung up in the year or so prior to the Kaohsiung Incident. Its aim was to promote democratization and its editors included some important political figures, one of whom, Xu Xinliang (Hsu Hsin-liang) had earlier been expelled from the GMD for keeping his name on a ballot even after having lost a primary. The magazine increasingly functioned more or less as a political party, opening branch offices in various cities in Taiwan and promoting activism, anti-GMD protest, and a pro-Taiwan independence agenda. These activities ultimately proved more than the GMD was willing to tolerate, and as a result it responded harshly to the planned protest in Kaohsiung in 1979.

In spite of the fact that Meilidao was shut down and its editors were jailed, some for very long sentences, the incident helped to catalyze a democracy movement in Taiwan that ultimately contributed to the ending of martial law in 1987. Although political parties other than the GMD were illegal under martial law, Xu and others could run in local elections as so-called "outside the party" (dangwai) candidates. Beginning in the late 1970s these candidates began to coalesce, and dangwai took on an identity that was akin to an opposition party. It was out of this group that Taiwan's first opposition party, the illegal Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), emerged in 1986, and it was in part owing to President Jiang Jinguo's (Chiang Ching-kuo) decision not to suppress that party that he subsequently also decided to end martial law.

The protests of the 1940s, 1970s, and 1980s all sought to democratize Taiwan, but like those of the 1890s and 1930s they were also anti-imperialist in nature. The question of Taiwan's autonomy was at the center of each of these movements, and the activists not only called for an end to GMD authoritarianism, they also hoped for an end to GMD rule altogether. The GMD had, like the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) in the PRC, insisted since 1949 on maintaining the fiction that there was a single China and that both Taiwan and the mainland were a part of it. Many Taiwanese, however, never accepted this view, and for them calls for democratization were closely linked to their desire to establish an independent Taiwan. Perhaps the most important plank in the platform of the DPP other than its opposition to the GMD was its support for Taiwan independence. In other words, the early DPP regarded the GMD as a Chinese colonial force, and sought to oust both the party and the government. It never chose to attempt using methods any more violent than mass protest, however, and always tried to work within the very system that it sought to end. With the DPP candidate Chen Shuibian's election to the presidency in 2000, however, the party had to take a more pragmatic stance with respect to antagonizing the PRC, and backed away, at least partially, from the Taiwan independence platform.

Following its ascension to power in 2000, however, the DPP used every cultural institution it controlled to help teach Taiwanese to think of the GMD as a colonial power, just like the Japanese, the Qing, and the Dutch. New museums were constructed that commemorated bygone colonial experiences, and spaces in existing museums were dedicated to exhibits on the Dutch seventeenth century, English treaty-port culture of the nineteenth century, and the Japanese colonial era. Likewise, high school curricula were revised to include more material on Taiwan's colonial experiences than they had included under GMD rule. Taiwan's students and general public were encouraged to start thinking about the GMD as just another conqueror from outside. Although the public ultimately voted to return the GMD to power in 2008, the results of this mass education campaign are still unclear.

SEE ALSO: China, Maoism and Popular Power, 1949–1969; Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949; Meilidao Protests, 1978; Taiwan, Land Reform; Taiwan, 2-28 Protests, 1947

References and Suggested Readings

- Phillips, S. (2003) Between Assimilation and Independence: The Taiwanese Encounter Nationalist China, 1945–1950. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Shepherd, J. R. (1993) Statecraft and Political Economy on the Taiwan Frontier, 1600–1800. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

Taiwan, land reform

J. Megan Greene

Sometimes small revolutions occur as the consequence of state policy. An example of this phenomenon was the land reform of 1949 to 1953 in Taiwan. During this period, the Guomindang (GMD) government, which had taken control of Taiwan at the end of World War II, undertook a thorough land reform in an effort to disempower local elites, solve problems of economic inequity in the countryside, and carry through an economic strategy that had been espoused by the GMD founder, Sun Yatsen. Land reform resulted in a radical redistribution of wealth in the Taiwanese countryside which had a lasting effect on economics and politics through the twentieth century. It thus amounted to an essentially non-violent, rural, economic "revolution from above" that was guided by a coercive state.

When the GMD relocated to Taiwan following its defeat by the Chinese Communist Party in 1949, it undertook to carry out, in a much more systematic and meaningful way than it had during its period of rule in China, the economic policies of Sun Yatsen. China's early twentieth-century revolutionary leader, motivated by a desire to see China take control of its own economy, and inspired by western socialist and liberal thinkers, mapped out a strategy for a Chinese economic revolution that would involve nationalization of industry, development of state-owned enterprises, and land reform. Sun himself never had the opportunity to implement any of these policies, and his successor Jiang Jieshi (Chiang Kai-shek) did not acquire sufficiently stable or penetrating control of China to carry them out with any sustained success prior to 1949. Following the GMD's retreat to Taiwan, however, the party was able to undertake all three of these major policies, the first of which, nationalization of industry, they initiated in Taiwan as soon as they took control of the island from the Japanese in 1945.

Land reform was a critical element of this economic reform process, and was of particular importance to the GMD because of the fear of party leaders that communism would take hold in Taiwan as it had in China. As in China, the majority of Taiwan's population were peasants, and the GMD leadership was concerned that communist activists would succeed in fomenting peasant discontent in Taiwan as they had in China by utilizing the land question. A high priority for the GMD in the early 1950s, therefore, was the elimination of this threat by addressing the land question itself, and it was encouraged in this undertaking by its US advisors, who offered aid and advice through the Joint Commission on Rural Reconstruction (JCRR). Unlike land reform in the People's Republic of China, which involved violent class struggle and created a permanent division between China's old landlords and the new ruling party, however, the GMD carried out the land reform in Taiwan in a way that bound the interests of the party and the old landed elite together. Land reform enabled the GMD to win support from both the rural poor and segments of the agrarian elite, neither of whom had owed any allegiance to the GMD prior to the implementation of the policy.

The GMD's land reform was undertaken in three stages. First, in 1949, farm rents were reduced. Second, between 1948 and 1953, public farm land that the GMD had confiscated from the Japanese or private owners was sold or leased to tenant farmers. Third, in 1953, a "Land to the Tiller Act" was implemented which set an upper limit on the amount of land that an individual could own and determined a formula for compensation to landowners for the land that they would lose. Compensation was given in two forms: 70 percent of it was given in land bonds in kind, so that landowners received rice for paddy land and sweet potatoes for dry land, and 30 percent was given in stock in four major state-owned enterprises.

Land reform affected about one-quarter of Taiwan's arable land and resulted in a large rise in the quantity of owner-cultivated land, from 50.5 percent in 1949 to 75.4 percent in 1953. The number of tenant farmers fell from 36 percent to 15 percent, and the amount of land farmed by tenant farmers was reduced from 41.8 percent to 16.3 percent over the same period. As a consequence of land reform large landowners were replaced by small landowning families as the main force in rural Taiwan, and this pattern continues to the present day. The GMD followed up on the land reform by establishing, with the assistance of the JCRR, peasant associations that offered economic and technical assistance and helped farmers to diversify the agricultural economy and make Taiwan more agriculturally self-sufficient.

Although the benefits of land reform were immediately apparent to Taiwan's peasant population, who were able to acquire land at substantially reduced prices, they were not at first obvious to landlords, many of whom were particularly skeptical of the trade of land for stock. The GMD, which in the spring of 1947 had effectively established its willingness to use force to draw Taiwan's population to order, however, was able to rely on the coercive authority that it already had, along with the absence of organized opposition among landlords, to force landowners to comply with the policy. Those landlords who held onto their stock in Taiwan Industry and Mining, Taiwan Paper and Pulp, Taiwan Agriculture and Forestry, and Taiwan Cement, however, found over the course of the following decade and more that their economic interests had become closely aligned with those of the state. These bedrock enterprises blossomed in the 1950s and 1960s and the value of the early stock issues skyrocketed. It behooved the stockholders, therefore, to throw their political and economic support behind the GMD state.

Scholars have varied in their assessment of the causes of Taiwan's so-called miraculous economic development of the late twentieth century. Most agree, however, that the 1950s land reform laid the foundation for a pattern of equitable growth that enabled the emergence of a large middle class and helped to tie the interests of Taiwan's population to the GMD state. This state-guided economic revolution overturned old economic patterns and established new ones that endured at least into the 1990s if not to the present day.

SEE ALSO: Taiwan, Anti-Imperialism and Nationalism; Taiwan, 2-28 Protests, 1947

References and Suggested Readings

- Gold, T. B. (1986) State and Society in the Taiwan Miracle. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.
- Yager, J. A. (1988) Transforming Agriculture in Taiwan: The Experience of the Joint Commission on Rural Reconstruction. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Taiwan, 2-28 protests, 1947

J. Megan Greene

In 1895 Taiwan was ceded by China's Qing court to the Japanese, who had defeated China in the Sino-Japanese War (1894-5). With this act, Taiwan became Japan's first imperial colony, and it remained so for the next 50 years. After such a long colonial experience not all Taiwanese were pleased when, in 1945, Taiwan was returned to China in accordance with the terms of the Cairo Declaration of December 1, 1943 that was agreed upon by Jiang Jieshi (Chiang Kai-shek), Winston Churchill, and Franklin Roosevelt. This displeasure increased as representatives of Jiang's Guomindang (GMD) government took over Taiwan and began to implement a new set of political, economic, and social policies that in many ways discriminated against the Japanese Taiwanese and sought to extract as many resources as possible from Taiwan to assist the GMD in their quest to solidify their control over mainland China. Rising tension between Taiwanese people and representatives of the GMD government culminated in a protest riot that began on February 28, 1947 and that led to a lengthy repression of the Taiwanese people.

By early 1947 the new provincial government of Taiwan had started to nationalize Japanese-owned industries and enterprises, established a considerable police presence, and implemented a number of new taxes. The GMD thus presented itself to the people of Taiwan as a coercive and taxing authority that had little interest in the will of the Taiwanese themselves. Many elite Taiwanese resented the GMD's failure to listen to their calls for Taiwan's autonomy in the wake of World War II, and they looked down upon the Chinese migrants, many of whom were not themselves elites, and who seemed to these Japanese-educated Taiwanese to be backward and ill-educated. They also felt that the mainlanders were keeping them out of government jobs and pushing them out of the former Japanese-owned industries that the GMD was in the process of nationalizing.

Chinese who went to Taiwan with the GMD, on the other hand, generally regarded Taiwanese with considerable suspicion. China had just won a protracted war against Japan, and these Japanese-speaking Taiwanese, many of whom wore Japanese-style clothing, lived in Japanese-style homes, and had adopted Japanese cultural habits, all seemed to be extensions of China's former enemy. In this environment of mutual suspicion, and in which the GMD was eagerly seeking to both control and extract resources from Taiwan, it is hardly surprising that tensions would erupt into violence.

On February 27, 1947 two agents from the GMD-controlled Monopoly Bureau beat a woman who had been selling cigarettes at a small stand on a Taipei street. They also seized her wares and cash on the grounds that only the GMD government was permitted to sell goods such as cigarettes and liquor. A crowd of onlookers interested in defending the woman grew, and in the scuffle that ensued, a bystander was shot. The following day a group of about 2,000 protestors demonstrated in front of the Monopoly Bureau headquarters and the office of the governor-general. Guards at the governor-general's office fired upon the crowd and two protestors were killed. At roughly the same time, a mob in a different part of Taipei beat two other agents of the Monopoly Bureau to death, and many other demonstrators were taking to the streets to protest the actions of the Monopoly Bureau. As word spread about the protests, more and more demonstrations occurred throughout the cities of Taiwan, and in some cases young Taiwanese who had served in the Japanese imperial army even began to wear their old Japanese military uniforms and sing Japanese military songs in the streets. Over the next days around 1,000 mainlanders were killed by the mob.

The Taipei Branch of the Guomindang (GMD) Bureau of Monopoly, located in Taipingding (now Yanping North Road), was occupied by a crowd during the protests known as the 2-28 Incident. After GMD forces opened fire on a demonstration, killing two civilians, a major Taiwanese uprising ensued, leading to the deaths of 1,000 Chinese nationalists from the mainland. Following the institution of martial law in 1949, an estimated 20,000–30,000 Taiwanese were killed by the GMD government.

The military force at the disposal of the GMD governor of Taiwan, Chen Yi, was too small to control the riots, and as a consequence he had no choice but to negotiate with local elites who demanded punishment of guilty authorities. On March 7 Taiwanese elites were emboldened to make a series of demands for the implementation of self-rule that included the dismantling of the Taiwan Garrison Command, which was one of the core institutions of the GMD government in Taiwan. Chen Yi viewed these demands as tantamount to rebellion, however, and called upon Jiang Jieshi to send more troops, following which he implemented martial law, which remained in effect until 1987.

Over the course of the next several days, thousands of troops landed in Taiwan and were immediately put to work reestablishing GMD authority and quelling the insurrection. Over the course of March many of the leaders of the protest were hunted down and either killed or imprisoned. Between this repression and a later purge of Taiwanese political elites that took place in 1949–50, it has been estimated that as many as 20,000 to 30,000 Taiwanese were killed. Under martial law, which lasted for 40 years, Taiwanese were forbidden to establish political parties, there was heavy censorship of all media and other published material, military police were widely visible, and the political sphere was carefully controlled by the governing GMD.

This series of events that took place in the spring of 1947 has come to be known as the 2-28 Incident, and although during the martial law era it was rarely mentioned in public, Taiwanese nationalists and anti-GMD activists drew upon the event for inspiration and sought retribution for it. When the GMD finally lifted martial law in 1987, one of the first major topics of public discussion was the 2-28 Incident. Critics of the GMD sought acknowledgment of and an apology for the events, and they sought access to documents that would bring to light all that had actually happened. In the early 1990s Taiwan was awash with public meetings and discussion of 2-28 and the subsequent white terror, and by the latter part of that decade new monuments and parks were being erected to commemorate the event and those who died as a consequence of it.

SEE ALSO: Taiwan, Anti-Imperialism and Nationalism

References and Suggested Readings

- Phillips, S. (2003) Between Assimilation and Independence: The Taiwanese Encounter Nationalist China, 1945–1950. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Roy, D. (2003) Taiwan: A Political History. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Tse-han, L., Meyers, R., & Wu, W. (1991) A Tragic Beginning: The Taiwan Uprising of February 28, 1947. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

Tajikistan, protests and revolts

Nandini Bhattacharya

Constructing Tajik Identity

Tajikistan is a modern Central Asian state first created by the Bolshevik Soviet regime as part of its revolutionary experiment during the 1920s. However, the Tajiks first emerged as a distinct Persian-speaking ethno-linguistic group in the eighth century during the Arab conquest and Islamization of Central Asia. Between 1860 and 1900 Tajikistan underwent a divided existence, with the north under tsarist Russian rule and the south under the Emirate of Bukhara.

In the early twentieth century a number of reformist trends developed in this traditional society, especially in Bukhara. Ahmed Donish (1826–97) was the first Tajik who sought to reform and regenerate the stagnating Bukhara through education. Arguing largely from the Quran and Hadith, Donish's writings also reflected western influences after three visits to Russia from 1857 and 1874 as the Bukhara Emir's delegate. He upheld secularization of madrasa (seminary) education offering history, natural sciences, and traditional Islamic law, theology, or logic. Supporting reform from above, Donish saw the Emir as the entitled servant of the people as long as he responded to popular aspirations. But the Bukhara Emir simply rejected his concept of reforms.

By 1900 a novel educational approach began to be transformed into a sociocultural movement known as Jadid (a "new method" of teaching in schools) in different parts of Central Asia. Receiving support from Tajiks, Tatars, and Uzbeks, the Jadidists were modernizers and nationalists, viewing Central Asia in holistic terms. Although not necessarily anti-Russian, tsarist officials in Turkestan found Jadid education even more threatening than traditional teaching in maktabs (Islamic primary education centers) that did not impart basic literacy training. The Jadid emphasis on teaching alphabets phonetically ensured functional literacy, a new method intended for a new generation coinciding with the coming of the printing press to Central Asia, providing the tools to challenge the monopoly of the handful of traditional educated religious elites. Aware of the general backwardness of Central Asia, the Jadids identified themselves as taraqqi-parvarlar (progressives), a terminology combining Persian and Turkic coined to imply linguistic agility and broad cultural knowledge.

Though Jadidism failed to develop any institutional framework to articulate its political objectives and faced substantial opposition from conservatives, by World War I several cities in present-day Uzbekistan and Tajikistan had developed underground Jadidist organizations. This movement had a strange history of collaboration and conflict with the rising tide of Bolshevism, arriving in the same broad ethno-cultural space. Though both were critical of traditional sociocultural and political systems, Jadidism was an indigenous movement for change and Bolshevism an outside effort to restructure Central Asian society fundamentally toward revolutionary socialism. Bolsheviks published the secret treaties showing tsarist plans to dismember the Turkish state, and the party's support for peace in Central Asia was a source for recruitment in 1916. As many lives were lost in the war, a section of Jadidists turned to the Bolsheviks.

The Muslim Commissariat in Moscow oversaw Russia's policy towards Islam; Muslims with few communist credentials were granted leading positions in the organization. Mahmudkhoja Behbudi, Abdurrauf Fitrat, and Sadriddin Aini were a few of the eminent leaders of Jadid movements. Among them, Sadriddin Aini, inspired by the Russian Revolution, joined hands with the Bolshevik revolutionaries to overthrow the Emirate of Bukhara in the 1920s and propagated revolutionary ideas in Uzbekistan and Tajikistan. Aini was a leading Tajik scholar among predominantly Uzbek (Turkic-speaking) colleagues and instrumental in creating a modern Tajik literature during the early Soviet era.

It was the Jadid movement that created the Tajik-language press. Bukhara-i-Sharif (1912–13) or the Noble Bukhara was an important Tajik newspaper published by the Jadids which supported the Russian Revolution. Welcoming the new regime, Aini took a careful stand regarding the national question and openly supported an autonomous existence within the Soviet regime. However, the close collaboration between the Jadidists, who sought Enlightenment ideals for modernizing Islamic societies, and the Bolsheviks began to decline with the rise of Stalin and the transformation of the Russian Revolution. Most of the leaders of the Jadid movement were liquidated either for their Islamic overtones or nationalist aspirations during the Stalin era. Aini, by adhering to Tajik cultural production, produced an acceptable line of creating the nation, creating a Tajik national consciousness that survived through the Soviet experience and after.

Russian Revolution and Attempts at Reform

Tajikistan underwent the great revolution at the very moment of the state's creation. Even prior to that, Bolshevik, Menshevik, and Socialist Revolutionary (SR) propaganda mobilized local people in Russian Turkestan and Bukharan Emirate for eradicating oppression and poverty. But a majority of clandestine parties were overwhelmingly Russian cadres. In fact, discontent and sporadic protests were growing in certain places against the discriminatory taxation and extortion by the tsarist government. In July 1916 the first violent and spontaneous reaction against conscription in Khojent, an important region of the subsequent Tajik Republic, was suppressed, preparing the groundwork for resistance to tsarism and acceptance of the Bolshevik regime. The slogan of land, bread, and shelter found many takers.

The Bolshevik Revolution in Turkestan formed even before October 1917, but did not consolidate power until two months later. Meanwhile, the interim government headed by Nalivkin, created to rule over Russian Turkestan, attempted futilely to break the revolutionary upsurges in Turkestan. After the seizure of power in October 1917, Turkistan Soviets convened and passed a motion to rally along the Bolshevik victory, and Soviet power was proclaimed at Tashkent. But the new Soviets did not include a single local Muslim in the coalition committee, despite the promise of national self-determination. Aware of this anomaly, Lenin argued for the need to include large numbers of Muslims, and the Bolsheviks sought compromises with Islamic traditions (introduction of Shariat courts following Quranic laws, while declaring illegal certain sharia punishments such as cutting off hands or stoning to death).

The Jadids and "Young Bukhara" formed by them, emboldened by Bolshevik assurances, organized a demonstration in the streets of Bukhara demanding immediate reforms and independence in the Emirate of Bukhara. The demonstration was brutally suppressed. After repeated appeals from Young Bukhara the president of the Turkestan Soviet government, Kolesov, agreed to intervene in the Bukharan Emirate through an insurrection. Though Kolesov favored abolishing the Emirate, he agreed to the Young Bukhara preference for a constitutional monarchy as the precondition for a revolutionary committee to take power. But this attempt to seize power in early 1918 failed, as the Emir launched a strong counterattack supported by mullah (Islamic theologian) forces. Railway communication with Turkestan was cut to prevent the small Bolshevik detachment from contacting headquarters.

The peace of Kizil Tepe on March 25, 1918 was signed, whereby Soviet power was forced to recognize the independence of the Emirate. The victory of counterrevolution showed that Kolesov underestimated the strength of the Emir and his support base and the Jadids visibly overestimated their popularity and acceptance among the masses of Bukhara. There was also a push-factor by a religious undercurrent acting as the rallying force against foreign domination.

In fact, this event drew the attention of Lenin, who admitted the practical limitation of the Bolsheviks to mobilize the Uzbeks, Tajiks, Turkmen, and Kirgiz to adhere to the goal of revolutionary transformation. The Fifth Congress of Soviets of Central Asia (April 1918) proclaimed the federation of the Autonomous Republic of Turkestan and elected a central executive committee for Turkestan with ten Muslim representatives, mainly chosen from the Jadids, providing space for the indigenous population to participate in the running of the new order. The Jadidists had a clearly modernist outlook. Even before the Russian Revolution, they had attempted to widen women's rights, including educational rights. During 1917 Jaddists contested the ulama (experts in Islamic jurisprudence) on women's equal rights and the right to vote, finding the Bolsheviks as allies, and continued as they struggled against the landlord-dominated Emirate.

Barely two years after the failure of the Kolesov operation, in 1920 Bukhara had collapsed in the face of the combined forces of the Bolsheviks and the Jadids. Not before the end of the civil war in 1919 could Bolsheviks again concentrate on Central Asian territories. In the 1920s the Red Army and Central Asian allies gradually occupied all of Central Asia, defeating the conservative forces. After establishing communist rule in Central Asia by 1924, the Soviet government redrew internal political borders based on the Marxist concept of nation and taking into account local aspirations.

Tajikistan was initially created as an autonomous zone within Uzbekistan, one of the new states created during this time. Instead of having Bukhara as capital, Dushanbe, an obscure village, was made capital by the Soviet authorities. In 1929 Tajikistan was given independence from Uzbek SSR, designated Tajik Soviet Socialist Republic under the USSR. Despite integration of Gorno-Badakhshan (in the Pamirs on the eastern part of Tajikistan) as an autonomous region, Tajikistan was the smallest of Central Asian states with the highest population density and lowest economic output throughout the Soviet era.

The Basmachi Movement

The consolidation of Soviet power in Central Asia was vigorously opposed by an indigenous Islamic group in Tajikistan, the Basmachis (“violators”). Identified as rural bandits, the Basmachi instigated indigenous uprisings after the establishment of Soviet power. The Basmachis claimed to be the “free men” denouncing the establishment of the Soviet authorities. This movement, though sporadic and decentralized, received a severe jolt with the passing of its leader, Envar Pasha (1922), who organized a unified resistance against Soviet rule. However, resistance continued for about a decade (1920–31) under the warlord Ibrahim Bek, providing a geopolitical dimension to his movement by involving Afghanistan as his strategic powerbase. Appealing for the defense of Islam in the face of Russian oppression of Tajikistan, this leader of the Lokai tribe mobilized 200 Kurbashi (the local leaders who recruited the Basmachi fighters) and 5,000 ordinary soldiers in his troop. In 1923 the Basmachi defeat in Lokai demoralized the local people. Subsequent relocation of his base across the Afghan border enabled Ibrahim to restructure his army and mobilize funds and centralize power. But his harsh taxation system made him unpopular and turned many of his followers into renegades, who assisted the Red Army in 1925, during the second Soviet onslaught (March–September). The movement weakened thoroughly and failed to resist Soviet forces in central and southern Tajikistan.

To prevent any further large-scale Basmachi operations within Tajikistan, Soviet authorities banned the popular pilgrimage to the grave of Envar Pasha and arrested the mullahs who agitated against them. The Soviet government concentrated attacks against Basmachi strongholds, abandoning large-scale military operations. The Soviets formed a special 60-man cavalry unit comprising Lokai tribesmen to hunt down and kill Ibrahim Bek, who again took refuge in Afghanistan, awaiting another chance to strike back. By October 1925 the Soviets officially announced the termination of Basmachestvo (Basmachi revolt) in Tajikistan.

Despite the Soviet-Afghan agreement of neutrality and non-aggression in 1921, the Afghans provided tacit support and indulgence to the Basmachi movements. The Red Army’s capture of the Basmachi military base in the Urta-Tugai Island in the north Afghanistan, and the disarming of a garrison forced Afghanistan to restrain cross-border operations of Basmachis, formalized by a treaty in 1926. But the rise to power in Afghanistan of Bacha-i Sakkao in 1928 led to a resurgence of the Basmachis. The Emir of Bukhara received official recognition of Basmachi organization through Bacha-i Sakkao, who permitted them to use northern Afghanistan as a base and to recruit Afghan Tajiks and Uzbeks into their ranks. Acting upon the decree of the ousted Emir of Bukhara, Ibrahim Bek created a large band of Basmachis to overthrow Soviet rule from Tajikistan. The guerilla warfare through the mountains of Tajikistan was ruthlessly suppressed. But Ibrahim Bek could not be caught. In June 1929 he re-crossed the Soviet-Afghan frontier and began another phase of preparation along with the exiled Basmachis.

The Afghan government of Nadir Khan that came to power was more interested in reviving peace with the USSR and actively liquidating Basmachi strongholds within Afghanistan. But the new government failed to pin down Ibrahim Bek, who in 1931 initiated a mass terror by killing all pro-Soviet elements, destroyed Kolkhozy (collectivized farms) and demolished railway lines as part of his jihad (holy war) against Tajikistan and Bolshevism. The countryside of eastern and southern Tajikistan was swept by revolts. Despite promises of a new regime, replacing the alien Soviet rule, Ibrahim returned to the old feudal and tribal practices of the Emirate regime, causing disillusionment among the peasantry.

The loss of mass confidence ultimately destroyed the backbone of Basmachi revolt. While escaping into Afghanistan, Ibrahim was caught, tried, and executed by Soviet authorities. Ibrahim Bek's movement was seen as an assertion of national and Islamic identity, though it was unsympathetic to workers and peasants.

Soviet Power: Repression and Protest

The Soviet turn towards collectivization of agriculture in Tajikistan between 1927 and 1934 involved violence against peasants and forcible resettlement of mountain Tajiks and Uzbeks in the cotton cultivation area. While the expansion of irrigation networks and implementation of modern technology turned Tajikistan into the third largest cotton-producing state in the USSR, the overall economic development of the state suffered. Apart from peasant opposition to forced collectivization and Stalin's path to socialism, many Tajik communists were purged and executed en masse by the Communist Party of Tajikistan between 1933 and 1935.

The 1930s also marked an era of repression of religious expression. The adjustment with Islam was replaced by heavy-handed atheistic propaganda in educational and other collective institutions of society. In the late 1930s Muslim intellectuals were purged or forced into exile, and most mosques and madrasas were closed. During the same phase the Jadids, too, were purged and many were executed by Stalin's forces. Prominent leaders close to the Soviet establishment, such as A. Fitrat, A. Muhiddinov, and F. Khojayev, were killed in the ruthless process of creating a uniform "Socialist" identity and stamping out "bourgeois nationalist deviation."

During World War II the Soviets compromised their strong stand against religious practice due to the strategic importance of Central Asia. In the early 1940s they partially reversed their religious policy and in 1947, after 15 years of closure, the famous Sheykh Moslehedin Friday Mosque in Khojand was reopened and official permission granted for the practice of Islam. A Spiritual Board of Central Asian Muslims was created in Tashkent and the Tajik representative of this organ was called Qazi. This liberal attitude towards Islam was projected by the Soviet authorities to Muslims beyond the USSR to create a benevolent image and gain sympathy and moral support during the Cold War rivalry with the US from the 1950s to the 1980s.

The postwar phase also saw a substantial amount of de-Stalinization in various politico-economic issues, but the processes of rapid economic productivity and substantial urbanization were not evenly distributed in Tajikistan. However, during the Brezhnev regime, an era of stability and progress broadened the scope of participation of a limited number of political elites in the function of the state and party, which continued until Gorbachev's experiment with Perestroika and Glasnost.

Rise of Political Islam: Prelude to the Civil War

From 1970 to 1990 different strands of political Islam emerged. In northern Tajikistan economic standards advanced in Khojent-Quliab, an urban and industrial region, and living standards increased, especially for supporters of Soviet rule in Central Asia. Communist influence brought secularism to the politics of the North. But the relative prosperity among secular populations of the North created alienation among less-prosperous Tajik counterparts. Once the Soviet system was broken, this alienation surfaced in a bitter civil war. For a generation, the Tajik communist leadership emerged from the Khojent-Quliab-Hissar-Leninabad territories of the northern zone.

The most stubborn opponents of the northerners were the tribal people of the Gorno-Badakhshan region, which was significantly less economically advanced, despite the Soviet system, and where Islam was more popular. In the late-Soviet era five Islamic movements arose against the government. Beginning in the 1970s, clandestine Islamic organizations operated in several areas of Southern Tajikistan and operated openly following the end of Soviet rule. Moreover, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the consequent influence of the Mujahidins (anti-USSR Afghan Islamic militants), and partial relaxation towards religious practices pushed the neglected and underdeveloped region towards diverse shades of extremist Islamic ideology. One such revivalist trend was influenced by Hojji Muhammadjan Hindustani (1895–1989), who had survived the Stalinist era and returned in the 1950s. Hindustani received a full religious education, including training in the Deobandi Madrasa in India. Many Islamic political leaders in Tajikistan were Hindustani's disciples, including Said Abdullo Nouri, leader of the Islamic Renaissance Party (IRP), among other traditional leaders. Similar revivalism appeared among Sufi brotherhoods (such as the Naqshbandi branch) in the southern part of Tajikistan.

Mass Protest Since 1991

With the introduction of Perestroika and Glasnost in 1986 the entire Soviet system entered the final phase of socialist experiment. As part of Perestroika, the nationalities question intensified within all Soviet states and Tajikistan sought to assert a national independence in governance. Russian was replaced as the official language by Tajik in 1989, and Tajikistan's second largest city, Leninabad was renamed Khojent. Initially, no Central Asian political party emerging in the new atmosphere of Glasnost sought secession from the Soviet Union until the collapse of the system. Rather, impending independence brought tremendous power struggles and interethnic riots in the Central Asian states. Tajikistan experienced intense internal strife among the completing Garm (Islamic nationalist force) and the Quliab (communist) factions.

The Dushanbe Riots (known as Hot February) broke out in February 1990 when the Garmis and the Pamiris demonstrated against what they saw as the corrupt and self-righteous communist regime through the use of religious and regional loyalties. In the March 1991 referendum on the continuation of a socialist USSR, nearly 90 percent of Central Asians supported maintaining the system along with a renewed federation of strong republics. This political consensus was ruptured by the arbitrary decision of the three Slav republics of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus to join a new union called the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS). The December 8, 1991 decision led to the demise of the USSR and independence for all 15 republics.

Each Central Asian republic suffered from this unforeseen freedom, which brought enormous economic calamity, as subsidies from the center were suddenly cut. Tajikistan went through the most complicated and prolonged crisis in the region. While the northern Khojent-Quliabi faction, protégées of the ex-communist regime, preferred continuance under the same power structure, the long-deprived South, swayed by Islamic currents (represented by the IRP), attempted to replace the northern hegemony. Pro-market liberals like the Democratic Party of Tajikistan (DPT) or Lal-i Badakhshan (representing primarily the northern Pamiris, who advocated greater autonomy for the mountainous Badakhshan region) vacillated between the two extremes.

In 1991 tensions mounted after the failed August coup d'état against Gorbachev. The ban on the Communist Party in Russia by President Boris Yeltsin intensified polarities in Central Asia, followed by a similar ban by the southern faction led by Aslanov, a Garmi leader, rendering futile efforts at reconciliation of the northern leader Khakhar Makhkamov (president of the Tajik Supreme Soviet), who brought Aslanov to chair the Supreme Soviet. Rakhmon Nabiyev, a hardliner, replaced the more conciliatory Makhkamov. The 1992 presidential election reinstated former Communist Party officials in their previous positions, who unleashed a vengeful policy against opposition leaders. Thus, the trials of Rastokhez (Rebirth – another nationalist organization) leader Mirbobo Mirrakhimov and DPT leader Shodmon Yusupov were fixed in spring 1992 and Qazi-kalon Turajonzoda, official head of the Tajik Muslims, was dismissed as untrustworthy. The opposition took up the challenge to fight back with stronger determination, backed by popular support from Garm and Badakhshan.

A protracted civil war lasted from May 1992 to June 1997, with government forces opposed by various sociopolitical and ideological groups (drawing support from a particular region) forming a coalition. The IRP was the largest faction, with a stronghold in the southwest Qurghonteppa zone, and aligned itself with the DPT, the Rastokhez (composed mainly of Dushanbe-bound intellectual nationalists), and Lal-i-Badakhshan to form a United Tajik Opposition (UTO) to further the cause of a national front to oust the former communists. President Nabiyev and speaker of the Supreme Soviet Safarali Kenjayev organized armed government militias, while the opposition turned to Afghan rebels for military aid, adding the dimension of cross-border Islamic terrorism to the civil war.

Nabiyev mobilized Moscow's aid and deployed "peacekeeping troops" of the CIS to guard the Tajik-Afghan border. Nabiyev was captured by the opposition in September 1992 and resigned at gunpoint. Chaos reigned until Nabiyev's government was replaced by another Quliabi government in Dushanbe in December 1992, under Rahmonov.

Despite IRP military interventions in 1992–3 the Quliabis held power with external support. Human Rights Watch accused the government of ruthless ethnic cleansing against Pamiris and Garmis. Tens of thousands of popular opponents were killed or fled to Afghanistan, where the resistance reorganized and rearmed with the aid of the Ahmed Shah Masoud's Jamati-Islami. The umbrella opposition group UTO continued with its mission. An opinion poll in 1991–2 suggested that though most people in the republic wanted greater space for Islam in society, only 5–7 percent sought the establishment of an Islamic state.

Despite the origins of the government from the remnants of the CPSU, portrayals of the civil war as between atheistic communists and dogmatic Islamists neglect the underlying regional and factional conflicts that are rooted in the instability of Tajik national identity. Iran, the center of Shiite Islam, did not support the Islamic party since Tajiks, though Persian-speakers, are overwhelmingly Sunni Islam. Unlike the Balkans or Caucuses, secessionist sentiment was not a factor in the war. Some 20,000 to 60,000 people were killed in 1992 and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) estimated that some 600,000 were internally displaced, with 80,000 refugees forced into Afghanistan.

Fear felt by both sides toward the possibility of Taliban aggression into Tajikistan, and the pragmatic awareness that continued warfare could threaten the future independence of the country they aspired to control, was conducive for the peace process. A power-sharing compromise to govern a unified state was preferred by both parties. In June 1997 the UN ultimately was able to bring the divergent interests together to a General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord, a political and military settlement centered on a power-sharing formula. Even after this peace accord there were periodic skirmishes and assassination attempts by government forces and militant opponents, but the danger of civil war was in all probability over.

SEE ALSO: Afghanistan, 1978 Revolution and Islamic Civil War; Afghanistan, Resistance to 19th-Century British Invasion; Bacha-i Sakkao's Movement; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Soviet Union, Fall of; Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and "Revolution from Above"; Tulip Revolution, Kyrgyzstan; Turkmenistan, Protest and Revolt; Uzbekistan, National Movement and Protests

References and Suggested Readings

- Akiner, S. & Barnes, C. (n.d.) The Tajik Civil War: Causes and Dynamics. Available at www.c-r.org/our-work/accord/tajikistan/causes-dynamics.php. Accessed December 24, 2006.
- d' Encausse, H. C. (1988) Islam and the Russian Empire: Reform and Revolutions in Central Asia. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Dixit, A. (1993) Tajikistan: Engulfed by Flames of Afghan Civil War. Strategic Analysis 15, 9: 873–81.
- Hetmanek, A. (1993) Islamic Revolution and Jihad Came to the Former Soviet Central Asia: The Case of Tajikistan. Central Asian Survey 12, 3: 367–74.
- Khalid, A. (1998) The Politics of Muslim Cultural Reform: Jadidism in Central Asia. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Patnaik, A. (2003) Nations, Minorities and States in Central Asia. Kolkata: Anamika.
- Ritter, W. S. (1985) The Final Phase in the Liquidation of Anti-Soviet Resistance in Tadzhikistan: Ibrahim Bek and the Basmachi, 1924–31. Soviet Studies 37 (October): 484–93.
- Rubin, B. R. (1993–4) The Fragmentation of Tajikistan. Survival 35 (Winter): 71–91.
- Tishkov, V. (1997) Ethnicity, Nationalism and Conflict In and After the Soviet Union: The Mind Aflame. London: Sage.

Taliban, 1996–2007

Yury V. Bosin

The Taliban emerged in Pakistan in the spring of 1994 as a movement built on radical Islam and Pashtun nationalism. Essentially, the Taliban accumulated the protests and dissatisfaction raging against the anarchy and violence that plagued Afghanistan under the rule of competing Mujahedeen (holy warrior) factions who had come to power with US assistance against the Soviet Union. With implicit Pakistani sponsorship, the Taliban forces grew rapidly and by fall 1994 had reached 1,500 followers, recruited mostly from among Afghan religious students. Headed by Mullah Muhammad Omar, a Mujahedeen veteran, the Taliban army captured Qandahar, and by fall 1995 reached Herat. In September 1996 the Taliban seized Kabul and established the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan. During the next two years, Taliban rule expanded over 90 percent of the Afghan territory, with small pockets of regional resistance.

Many Afghans welcomed the Taliban as the movement responded to their longstanding hopes for peace and political stability in a country divided on the basis of region, ethnicity, and clan. Others, however, were opposed to the Taliban's strict policy of imposing fundamental Islamic values and its goal to transform Afghanistan into a theocratic state. The most important factor for the Afghani people was not religious fundamentalism, as was demonstrated following the Taliban's fall, but establishing order and honest representative government. The destruction of the country's pre-Islamic cultural heritage contributed to the Taliban's image as fanatics and barbarians, even though for many observers the Taliban's religious fundamentalism was a means to power rather than an essential component of its rule. As a force of resistance, countering the US-imposed government installed in 2002, the Taliban moderated its religious fundamentalism, promising the core goal of establishing order and stability. Nonetheless, while the Taliban were in power, the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan was ostracized by the international community, with only Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates recognizing the Taliban government. Diplomatic pressure on the Taliban to improve human rights, combat the opium trade, and end support for the Mujahedeen terrorist groups had little effect. International economic assistance to Afghanistan evaporated, leaving it one of the poorest countries in the world.

As the Taliban was welcomed by civilians throughout the country as a force of order, resistance to the new government was concentrated primarily in the north of Afghanistan among the Northern Alliance encompassing Uzbek and Tajik units from the former Mujahedeen forces. Stationed in the mountains, they engaged in intermittent clashes with the Taliban army but were not strong enough to defeat it. In the meantime, Afghanistan became a hub of international jihadist organizations which received a welcome reception from the Taliban government. The most notorious was al-Qaeda, headed by Osama Bin Laden, the likely architect of the 1998 US embassies bombings and the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks in New York City and Washington, DC. Afghanistan became a prime target of the US-led war on terror and in October 2001 an international coalition of forces started military operations against the Taliban. The Taliban regime had fallen by December 2001, although resistance continues unabated as the government of Hamid Karzai, installed by the US, has failed to deliver order, stability, or any measure of prosperity to Afghanistan.

Afghan Resistance to US Invasion (2001–2007)

The displacement of the Taliban posed a problem regarding the composition of a new Afghan government. The US did not want it to be monopolized by the Northern Alliance, which was responsible for the four-year chaos before the coming of the Taliban. Besides, a Pushtun leader would better fit the country's political tradition. As a result, Hamid Karzai, a moderate figure with strong anti-Taliban views, was appointed president of the Afghan Transitional Administration and in 2004 was elected president of Afghanistan. International peacekeeping forces were deployed in Kabul and in some provincial centers. Foreign governments and donor organizations pledged billion of dollars for the Afghan reconstruction.

The peace in Afghanistan has been fragile, and at times appears nonexistent. The resistance to Hamid Karzai's regime has several sources. The first source is Taliban extremists who are dispersed throughout the country and pursue anti-government activity. The second source is international terrorist groups still remaining on Afghan territory. The third threat to Hamid Karzai comes from regional warlords who have lost their influence and revenues. Finally, the most serious resistance force is generated at the grassroots level. It is driven by popular worries that the foreign presence has not led to any improvement in economic conditions, jeopardizes Islamic traditions by bringing in thousands of foreign nationals, and represents a new foreign occupation that thwarts independence.

The prospects for Hamid Karzai's government are difficult to predict: much depends on his ability to achieve a viable compromise with opposition groups rather than quell them by force, although rampant patronage and corruption appear to hamper these prospects. American backing adds another pitfall as Hamid Karzai cannot afford to ignore deep-seated xenophobic sentiments in the Afghan society. If, however, Hamid Karzai fails to tame the resistance by peaceful means, a new round of insurgency and violence is likely to engulf the country. In this case the rise of radical or reformist elements, whether Taliban or another faction, is a highly plausible scenario for the future.

SEE ALSO: Afghanistan, 1978 Revolution and Islamic Civil War; Afghanistan, Resistance to 19th-Century British Invasion; Bacha-i Sakkao's Movement; Bin Laden, Osama (b. 1957) and al-Qaeda; Durrani Empire, Popular Protests, 1747–1823; Islamic Political Currents

References and Suggested Readings

- Ali, T. (2008) Afghanistan: Mirage of the Good War. New Left Review 50 (March–April): 5–22.
- Briant, P. (2002) From Cyrus to Alexander: A History of the Persian Empire. Trans. P. T. Daniels. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns.
- Dupree, L. (1979) Red Flag over Hindu Kush: Hanover, NH: American Universities Field Staff.
- Gregorian, V. (1969) The Emergence of Modern Afghanistan: Politics of Reform and Modernization, 1880–1946. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Marsden, P. (2002) The Taliban: War and Religion in Afghanistan. New York: Palgrave.
- Masson, V. & Romodon, V. (1964) A History of Afghanistan, Vols. 1–2. Moscow: Nauka (in Russian).
- Montgomery, J. D. & Rondinelli, D. A. (Eds.) (2004) Beyond Reconstruction in Afghanistan: Lessons from Development Experience. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Poullada, L. (1973) Reform and Rebellion in Afghanistan, 1919–1929: King Amanullah's Failure to Modernize a Tribal Society. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Rubin, B. (2002) The Fragmentation of Afghanistan: State Formation and Collapse in the International System. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Sykes, P. (1940) A History of Afghanistan. London: Macmillan.

Tambo, Oliver (1917–1993)

Luli Callinicos

Oliver Reginald Kaizana Tambo, political and professional partner of Nelson Mandela, was the leader of the African National Congress (ANC) during its 30-year period in exile, from 1960 to 1990. Tambo became renowned for maintaining the unity of a broad liberation movement, consisting of many tendencies, during a long Cold War period of vicissitudes, changing circumstances, and shifting strategies. He nurtured its far-flung members and military cadres as the movement steered its way between international diplomacy and armed struggle while also maintaining its mystique inside South Africa. When the ANC was reestablished in South Africa, Tambo delivered an organization “bigger, stronger, intact” – more skilled and sophisticated, acknowledged and acclaimed throughout the world and at home.

Tambo was born in 1917 in the remote village of Mpondoland, on the east coast of South Africa. Half a century later, Tambo recalled the seminal influence of his rural childhood. The traditional homestead, his three mothers, and his polygamous father's ability to create harmonious relationships in the large, extended family fostered an ability to commit himself to collective values; the little boy had to share his mother with many others. Embedded in this way of life were values imparted by the homestead economy. Even young children were economically active: Tambo was scarcely 3 years old when he began to learn from older children how to herd and how to span oxen “in such a way as the whole team pulls together.” Social relations, courtesy, and consensus were highly valued parts of an ubuntu (humanist) outlook that taught that “a person was a person through other people.” The priority of the collective good over individual needs guided Tambo in the years to come.

From the age of 11 Tambo was educated in Anglican missionary schools. The youngster, whose own mother was a Christian, became deeply influenced by the spiritual and moral message of the missionaries. The intellectual challenges that they offered excited him, and he excelled academically. He graduated to St. Peter's College, situated in the melting pot of Johannesburg. For the first time he encountered blatant racism and acquisitiveness in a city that treated blacks instrumentally, that is, they were tolerated only for their low-paid labor. Tambo became aware of the contradictions and the bigotry embedded in the colonial interpretation of Christianity, and while he never forsook the church, he came to perceive the social construction of culture and religion.

After obtaining top marks in the Transvaal matriculation examination, Tambo was awarded a scholarship to the black Fort Hare University. Unlike most black students, Tambo enrolled for a science degree. In 1942, he took up a post as mathematics master at his old school of St. Peter's. In Johannesburg, Tambo met Walter Sisulu and Mandela. These three men became key ANC leaders. In 1944 they helped to found the ANC-aligned Youth League (YL), an Africanist body that criticized "exotic" ideologies like Marxism, and stressed African culture, history, and identity.

In 1948 the white electorate voted into power the National Party on a platform of apartheid. It immediately introduced a barrage of white supremacy laws. The Youth League presented their Programme of Action to the ANC in 1949 to mobilize mass resistance, and Tambo was elected into the executive council of the ANC. The Youth League and its activists played a key role in reviving a fairly moribund ANC, and figures like Tambo were centrally involved in the turbulent anti-apartheid campaigns of the 1950s. Tambo was always a close associate of Mandela, and the two men – who managed despite enormous obstacles to become attorneys – also set up a law firm in Johannesburg to defend their people.

From the late 1940s onwards, the ANC had worked alongside opposition groups of different races, including members of the multiracial South African Communist Party (SACP). Tambo was closely involved in the mass campaigns against apartheid in the 1950s. He was also on the working committee that crafted the ANC's Freedom Charter and its non-racial message: "South Africa belongs to all who live in it, black and white." The ANC adopted the Charter in 1955, together with the Congress Alliance, which linked unions and organizations representing different racial groups. Tambo's concept of nation widened to include not only Africans regardless of ethnicity, but all South Africans.

In 1956, Tambo was arrested for high treason along with 155 others, including Mandela and Joe Slovo. In 1959, following the banning of ANC President Chief Luthuli, Tambo was elected to the position of deputy president. In March 1960, following the police massacre of 69 men and women at a protest meeting in Sharpeville Township, the ANC instructed Tambo to leave the country to garner international support for the ANC.

Articulate and a careful listener, Tambo was a successful diplomat in exile, obtaining the trust of many influential friends. However, in 1962, the ANC announced that it had turned to armed struggle, believing peaceful attempts to resist apartheid had been met with contempt and violence. Tambo did not succeed in garnering support from most western countries, and the ANC found provision for military support for the armed wing Umkhonto we Sizwe (the "Spear of the Nation," or MK) from the Soviet bloc with the aid of the SACP. Tambo was, however, able to raise funding for the ANC's administrative and educational activities from the Scandinavian countries and anti-apartheid groups in the West. Where state support was lacking, Tambo developed a "people-to-people diplomacy" that fostered links with grassroots groups.

Tambo received much of the flak for the unsuccessful military efforts of the 1960s. He responded by calling a consultative conference at Morogoro in Tanzania, where the ANC executive resigned en bloc, though Tambo was reelected. The conference foregrounded political rather than military imperatives. It also strengthened ties with the SACP and opened ANC membership to non-Africans. The ANC was fairly weak within South Africa in the 1970s, but it became the major beneficiary of the wave of young refugees fleeing the country after the violent suppression of the 1976 uprising. Frustrations in MK ranks, émigré tensions, and infiltration by South African agents helped create a tense and paranoid climate in the ANC's camps, resulting in a series of mutinies, as well as repression and abuses. Tambo, along with Chris Hani, sought to resolve these conflicts without alienating senior military officers. He finally took the problem to the ANC conference in Kabwe, Zambia in 1985, which condemned the abuses, redeployed commanders, and forbade executions.

Kabwe helped reposition the ANC at a time of rising mass struggles in South Africa and rapidly rising ANC support. As resistance inside South Africa escalated, the United Democratic Front (UDF) was launched in 1983 – comprising unions, neighborhood groups, women's and youth movements, and extraparliamentary opposition groups – and generally looked to the ANC for inspiration.

While Tambo had a "diamond-edged" intellect and shrewd strategic sense (Mandela 1994: 55), he also possessed a remarkable emotional intelligence. As an educator he was a nurturing mentor, finding time to visit the camps and explain the challenges facing the liberation movement. During the camp abuses, he remained personally popular with the youth. ANC strategy now centered on “four pillars of struggle”: armed struggle, the South African underground, mass mobilization, and international support. These were not seen as mutually exclusive.

From exile each year, Tambo’s January speech on Radio Freedom gauged the struggle and announced a focus for the coming year. In 1985, he called on South Africans to conduct a “people’s war,” aimed at arming the masses. The police and army had moved into the townships and unequal battles occurred in the streets. Hundreds were killed while the labor movement and civics embarked on a series of “rolling mass action,” blocking the city streets. While MK did not seriously threaten the armed forces of apartheid, its attacks on “hard targets” served as powerful “armed propaganda” and inspiration.

At the same time Tambo, secretly in touch with Mandela, was quietly exploring the option of negotiations with the apartheid government. Remarkably, Tambo was able to bring the ANC’s diverse constituencies along this difficult route through his inclusive, participatory, and consensus approach. Furthermore, through patient consultation with African heads of state, Tambo and his team oversaw the Harare Declaration (1989), which set down the key demands of the ANC and launched the process of talks that was ultimately to lead to South Africa’s “negotiated revolution” and democracy. Tambo’s prestige in South Africa was by this time second to that of Mandela. However, he suffered a debilitating stroke the day the draft of the Declaration was finalized and did not contribute his experience to the negotiations.

Quiet and thoughtful, in meetings Tambo was always the last to speak; it was easy for the unperceptive to underestimate the strength of his character and integrity. But he left the ANC a legacy that aspired above all to unity; an ability to view the terrain holistically without losing sight of the detail; a scientist’s rigor in revisiting strategies and tactics as situations changed; and the intelligence to manage contradictions. To the generation that followed, the challenge was to acknowledge and conserve those values most relevant to a democracy needing to respond to the twenty-first century’s global age of insecurity.

Oliver Tambo died in April 1993, a year before South Africa’s first democratic elections. At his funeral, attended by many international figures in high office who considered Tambo to be their friend and by many of the ordinary people who made the end of apartheid possible, an elegy likened Tambo to Moses: he led his people out of exile during the long, difficult journey to the Promised Land, but did not live to reach it himself.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Apartheid Movement, South Africa; Hani, Chris (1942–1993); Mandela, Nelson (b. 1918); Slovo, Joe (1926–1995); South Africa, African Nationalism and the ANC

References and Suggested Readings

- African National Congress, www.ANC.org.za.
 Baai, S. (2006) O. R. Tambo: Teacher, Lawyer, Freedom Fighter. Isando: PSD Promotions.
 Callinicos, L. (2004) Oliver Tambo: Beyond the Engeli Mountains. Cape Town: David Philip.
 Jordan, P. & Mabuza, L. (Eds.) (2007) Oliver Tambo Remembered. New York: Macmillan.
 Mandela, N. (1994) Long Walk to Freedom. London: Abacus.

Tamil nationalist struggle for Eelam

Charan Rainford

The struggle for Eelam (homeland) revolves around the notion of the Tamil nation and its traditional homeland, historically and geographically equivalent to the Northern and Eastern Provinces of Sri Lanka, and the inalienable right to self-determination. Following independence in 1948, the post-colonial Sri Lankan polity passed legislation on citizenship, language, and education favoring the majority Sinhalese at the expense of the minorities, particularly the Tamils comprising approximately 15 percent of the population. This led invariably to an escalation of Tamil demands, from federalism to armed struggle for a separate homeland. In the former avatar the Tamil political leadership coalesced around S. J. V. Chelvanayakam and the Federal Party (FP), which equated the rights of the Tamils to that of a separate nation. It demanded a federal state with language rights through non-violent struggle. In 1976, after the failure of successive Sri Lankan governments to adhere to promises made concerning decentralization, the Tamil United Liberation Front (TULF) was formed on a united political platform for Eelam.

Outbreak of Armed Insurrection 1976–1987

The shift to a call for independent statehood left the TULF vulnerable to an impatient generation of youths frustrated at the failure to gain any settlement from the government of Sri Lanka (GOSL). The origins of armed struggle can be traced to the founding in 1970 of the Tamil Students Federation, later renamed the Tamil New Tigers and then in 1976 the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE). The symbolic beginning of armed struggle was the assassination of the government organizer in Jaffna and former Mayor Alfred Duraipappah in 1975 by a group of Tamil youth led by Velupillai Prabhakaran, the future leader of the LTTE.

The LTTE has subsequently been at the forefront of the Tamil armed struggle, usurping the democratic path taken by the TULF and swamping its armed rivals. In addition to the LTTE there were 37 armed groups with diverse ideology and caste-composition (Gunaratna 1994), of which the most important were the People's Liberation Organization of Tamil Eelam (PLOTE), the Tamil Eelam Liberation Organization (TELO), the Eelam People's Revolutionary Liberation Front (EPRLF), and the Eelam Revolutionary Organization of Students (EROS). Despite emphasizing socialism in its literature, the LTTE's approach was effectively pragmatic and lacked revolutionary ideology. The Marxist EPRLF was firmly committed to revolutionary struggle, PLOTE and EROS were ostensibly Marxist organizations, and TELO was of high-caste composition.

Two momentous events in the early 1980s transformed the struggle from one of isolated incidents of assassination and robbery to a fully-fledged guerrilla war. In the wake of decentralization proposals there was extensive violence in the Northern Jaffna Peninsula, the symbolic center of Eelam, culminating in the destruction of the culturally vital Jaffna Library. The second event, known as Black July 1983, was a country-wide pogrom primarily centered in Colombo. This state-sponsored violence (backed up by myriad Sinhala Buddhist extremist groups) resulted in the deaths of thousands of Tamils and caused more than 100,000 to flee the country. This forced migration of Tamils helped to create a significant diaspora, large sections of which have supported the nationalist struggle.

During this time, almost all the aforementioned armed groups were given training and allegedly arms by the Research and Analysis Wing (RAW) of India. Under Prime Minister Indira Gandhi and after her assassination, Rajiv Gandhi, India was increasingly drawn in as a mediator, particularly in 1985, when the TULF and the five dominant Tamil military organizations were involved in direct negotiations with the GOSL in the Bhutanese capital, Thimpu. On July 13, 1985 the Tamil parties united to put forward the Thimpu principles as the benchmark of Tamil nationalism: a recognition of the Tamil people as a distinct nationality with the right to self-determination; a guarantee of the territorial integrity of an independent Tamil homeland; the safeguarding of the fundamental rights of the Tamil people outside the independent Tamil homeland.

GOSL's Operation Liberation in May 1987 (headed by President J. R. Jayewardene) aimed at defeating the LTTE in a key sector of the Jaffna Peninsula, and was followed by an uninvited and angrily derided Indian humanitarian intervention. By mid-July the government, forced to take a diplomatic route, agreed upon a set of proposals leading to the creation of provincial councils. Critically, the issue of the merger of the Northern and Eastern Provinces was to be temporary, its permanence dependent on a referendum in the Eastern Province. Agreement was secured with the Tamil parties on the crux of the issues, but the LTTE broke ranks, opposing the referendum and the stipulation that it must relinquish its weapons.

LTTE-India Confrontation, and War for Eelam, 1987–2002

As part of the agreement the Indian government dispatched the Indian Peace Keeping Force (IPKF). From the outset there was a lack of communication between the Indians and the LTTE. Matters reached a nadir when eight LTTE commanders bit their cyanide capsules and committed suicide rather than be transported to Colombo. The Indian officers were unable to prevent this incident. This, along with the public fast-unto-death by senior commander Thileepan, and the issue of disarmament, ultimately exploded into a bitterly contested war. The IPKF could not garner the support of the local population, hamstrung by the symbolism of a foreign occupying force and by their own aggressive approach, since an overambitious India was seeking to establish its hegemony in Sri Lanka. Vociferous protests grew in the Indian province of Tamil Nadu, supporting Sri Lankan Tamils. Therefore, despite successfully eradicating several population centers, including Jaffna, of the LTTE, the IPKF were not able to defeat it. The EPRLF was the victor in the provincial elections held under Indian auspices, and associated openly with the IPKF, a situation that neither gained it the support of the local population nor a fallback mechanism if, and when, the IPKF withdrew. Simultaneously, RAW was assisting and supporting TELO and PLOTE, a situation that ultimately led to the LTTE decimating both organizations.

In the South, in 1987, the second armed insurgency of the Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna (People's Liberation Front) (JVP) broke out, as they bitterly opposed Indian intervention. Ranasinghe Premadasa succeeded Jayewardene on a twin pledge to defeat the JVP and remove the IPKF. In a bizarre twist of fate, Premadasa covertly acceded to a request by the LTTE for arms to fight the IPKF. In effect, the LTTE fought the IPKF with arms provided by India and subsequently fought the Sri Lankan army with arms provided by the GOSL.

With no support from the GOSL, Rajiv Gandhi's defeat at the polls, and under increasing pressure from its own citizens, the IPKF withdrew in March 1990. The provincial EPRLF leadership collapsed and fled to India in an attempt to escape LTTE retaliation. Even before the withdrawal, in May 1989, the Premadasa administration had begun peace talks with the LTTE, which used the opportunity to re-arm and recuperate as well as install a network of sleeper agents. It also decimated its remaining militant rivals and removed perceived pro-India elements. The assassination of the charismatic TULF leader A. Amirthalingam by the LTTE during negotiations effectively marked the end of the TULF's limited influence on the destiny of the struggle. The LTTE became the self-styled sole representative of the Tamils, a status adhered to by large numbers of Tamils, to whom Prabhakaran had become the supreme leader. The remaining moderates among the Tamil community acquiesced, fled, or were assassinated.

The 1990s witnessed escalating conflict between the LTTE and the GOSL, separated by a period of negotiations conducted with President Chandrika Kumaratunga's administration in 1994–5. The LTTE celebrates July 5, the day of the first suicide attack, as Black Tiger day, in memory of the Black Tigers (suicide bombers dying in the cause). Its use of suicide bombings markedly increased and several high profile officials, including President Premadasa (assassinated at a rally on May Day in 1993), in Colombo and elsewhere were targeted with significant loss of life. The resort to suicide attacks and child recruitment, among other things, has led to the LTTE being banned in several countries. Most significantly, the LTTE's assassination of Rajiv Gandhi by suicide bombers brought it global notoriety, including in previously sympathetic Tamil Nadu. The repercussions of the Gandhi assassination are still felt today, including international warrants for the extradition of Prabhakaran and his intelligence chief Pottu Amman.

Furthermore, the LTTE's transformation from a guerrilla organization to a conventional army with a quasi-state apparatus took place in this period. An international network of agents facilitated fundraising and procured armaments, but the separate state apparatus played a role in gaining legitimacy in the quest for Eelam. The GOSL conducted a "War for Peace" strategy, aimed at militarily defeating the LTTE while pursuing a constitutional reform package to satisfy Tamil aspirations. Kumaratunga's constitutional package – even after an attempt on her life in 1999 – was rejected in parliament. Militarily, large-scale battles were prevalent with significant loss of life. The zenith of the government push was the capture of Jaffna in November 1995, but the LTTE hit back strongly from 1998 to 2000, culminating in the overrunning of the critical Elephant Pass military base. Their push towards Jaffna was, however, halted by overstretch and a Sri Lankan military resuscitated by emergency support from foreign allies. It was in this climate of strategic parity, along with the devastating economic impact of a successful strike on the only international airport in June 2001, that renewed negotiations provided an ephemeral hope for tangible peace.

Failed Negotiations

The parliamentary elections of December 2001 installed a government elected on a platform of peace, leading to the signing of a ceasefire agreement with the LTTE in February 2002, its deproscription in September, and six rounds of negotiations between September 2002 and April 2003, the highlight of which was an agreement to explore a federal solution in acceptance of the Tamil right to internal self-determination. In a climate imbued with hope, the GOSL and the LTTE jointly participated in sub-committees related to humanitarian needs, demobilization, and gender. However, the LTTE withdrew from negotiations dissatisfied with the government's actions on fundraising and economic development, and a government hamstrung by its lack of a clear majority was dismissed by a hostile President Kumaratunga in November 2003, on the grounds that national security was being impaired.

New elections brought in a government more critical to the peace process, though Kumaratunga attempted to make progress on an interim administration and on a structure for post-tsunami cooperation. The impact of the tsunami on the LTTE was significant and the slide towards conflict was further strengthened by a major split in the LTTE led by its eastern commander Colonel Karuna. The next president, Mahinda Rajapakse, had strong inclinations towards a military strategy. The government initially concentrated its energies on the Eastern Province, where Colonel Karuna's faction lent it support, and succeeded in clearing it of large-scale LTTE resistance for the first time in decades.

The present theater of conflict has shifted to the North, with a mushrooming of human rights violations including abductions, disappearances, and killings. The LTTE has stepped up its attacks on civilian and military targets with the added innovation of a limited but psychologically effective air force. Nonetheless, in the face of a revitalized and modernized Sri Lankan military, the LTTE's armed struggle faces severe obstacles, evidenced by the death of the leader of its political wing S. P. Thamichelvan in an air strike. Therefore, the armed struggle for Eelam continues apace amid diminishing prospects for a diplomatic breakthrough.

SEE ALSO: Marxism; Non-Violent Movements; Struggles for Rights, Justice, and Identities; People's Liberation Front of Sri Lanka (JVP); Prabhakaran, Velupillai (b. 1954)

References and Suggested Readings

- Gunaratna, R. (1994) Indian Intervention in Sri Lanka: The Role of India's Intelligence Agencies. Colombo: South Asian Network on Conflict Research.
- Loganathan, K. (1996) Sri Lanka: Lost Opportunities, Past Attempts at Resolving Ethnic Conflict. Colombo: University of Colombo Press.
- Narayan Swamy, M. R. (1994) Tigers of Lanka: From Boys to Guerrillas. New Delhi: Konark.
- Rupesinghe, K. (Ed.) (2006) Negotiating Peace in Sri Lanka: Efforts, Failures and Lessons, Vol. 2. Colombo: Foundation for Coexistence.
- Wilson, A. J. (1994) S. J. V. Chelvanayakam and the Crisis of Sri Lankan Tamil Nationalism 1947-1977. London: Hurst.
- Wilson, A. J. (2000) Sri Lankan Tamil Nationalism: Its Origins and Development in the 19th and 20th Centuries. London: Hurst.

Tanzania, protest and independence

Ayokunle Olumuyiwa Omobowale

The Maji-Maji Revolt and its Aftermath

The Maji-Maji revolt stands out as one of the major phenomenal occurrences in the political development of colonial and postcolonial Tanzania. It started on July 31, 1905 and lasted until 1907, when the last remnants of the revolt were crushed. It was indeed a classic example of a peasants' revolt against their colonial masters' unfavorable economic policies, constructed and carried out, however, within the boundaries of the prevalent belief system. Its suppression nevertheless brought dire consequences for both the natives and the German colonial regime. One lasting consequence of the revolt was the decimation of a hitherto thickly populated environment, which has since served as a game reserve.

As with other European colonists, German colonial rule in Tanzania was directed along economic lines in order to provide much-needed raw materials for German industries and also extract adequate tax for colonial administration. The situation reached its peak when the new governor, Gotzen, decided to increase cotton growing by creating communal cotton plantations (shambas), where each native was expected to work over a specified period of time per month under the supervision of African headmen and colonial officials. As the plantations expanded and production increased, the demand for more labor meant peasants were taken away from subsistence production to work for the European colonists' interests.

The resultant impoverished socioeconomic conditions of the natives engendered resentments, which were soothed by the anti-European apocalyptic predictions of a religious native chief, Kinjikitile. He demanded an end to the payment of taxes and predicted that all white men would be swept away by flood, swallowed up by the earth, and/or killed by seven lions, while their guns would become ineffective, shooting out merely water. In addition, the prophet gave out Maji water as a protection against the white man's bullet. His message, leadership, and messianic claims for Maji water acted as a unifying force for the ethnically diverse and oppressed people of German East Africa. In each community, the message was spread by religious assistants (hongo), who also issued Maji water to the faithful. Thus, the hitherto ethnically divided natives were symbolically united in the fight against white domination, believing the Maji water medicine to act as an antidote against the white man's firearm. Starting with the first insurrection at Rufiji in July 1905, the rebellion quickly spread to other parts of the territory as natives attacked European settlers, missionaries, and their associates, killing about 12 Europeans in the process. As the revolt became widespread in German East Africa, the colonial authority decided to take drastic action to suppress it.

Reprisals by the colonial regime were brutal and aimed at wiping out every bit of resistance. German forces subjected insurgents and their accomplices to corporal and capital punishment, in the process destroying the local subsistence system of agricultural production and causing widespread famine. By the time the revolt was suppressed, an estimated 75,000 Africans had died through starvation and disease. As a consequence of the elimination of the food system, the densely populated region of southeastern Tanzania was depopulated and eventually returned to the wild, later to become the Selous Game Reserve, 50,000 square kilometers of savannah grasslands designated a protected site by UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization).

Nevertheless, while repression effectively ended the revolt, it also provided a rationale for condemnation of German colonial administration in East Africa. The campaign against German rule was conducted largely by British officials, who denounced the German colonial administration as brutal and having little consideration for its African subjects. Britain gained a strategic advantage in the region when Germany was divested of its African colonial territory after World War I. The former German territory was placed under British colonial rule in 1919.

The Maji-Maji also served as an inspirational model for Julius Nyerere, the anti-colonial leader in the Tanganyika African National Union's nationalist struggles in the 1950s who later became the first president of the independent nation. While the 1905 revolt was violent, Nyerere emphasized the non-violent nature of his own nationalist struggle and stressed the historical precedent of the Maji-Maji as a source of unification of Tanganyikans (Tanzanians), irrespective of region, ethnicity, or clan. Furthermore, Nyerere used the Maji-Maji struggle in the implementation of the postcolonial Ujamaa initiative, designed as a self-reliance development policy that he viewed as a means to restore African socialism.

Julius Nyerere: Nationalism, Anti-Colonialism, and the Making of the One-Party State

Julius Nyerere emerged as the president of the Tanganyika African National Union (TANU) at its inauguration in 1954. Under his leadership, TANU vastly increased its membership around the country while Nyerere took the campaign for Tanganyika's independence to the international scene. Despite the suppression of TANU's activities by the British colonial government, which sponsored a rival political party, the United Tanganyika Party (UTP), TANU earned a landslide victory in the 1959 legislative election and eventually formed the government when independence was granted in December 1961.

Nyerere thought the multi-party political system would contribute to internecine dissent and erode the country's capacity to advance economically and independently. This potential for internal hostility could be remedied by evolving a single national party, which would accommodate all politicians in the country. In 1962, therefore, Nyerere relinquished his position as prime minister in order to reorganize TANU. For the next 11 months he worked assiduously as TANU's president to reposition it as a national party. By 1965, TANU was able to reform the constitution inherited from Britain and subsequently became the country's single political party. The aim was supposedly to prevent strife and ethnic rivalry, which Nyerere believed were endemic to multi-party politics. A one-party structure would, he believed, bring about political hygiene. The one-party constitution was designed to allow citizens to choose candidates to represent them under the same party banner. After the first election under the new constitution, party officials who held powerful positions, including ministers, lost to seemingly less popular candidates. It turned out to be a free and fair election under a one-party arrangement.

The next stage in Nyerere's reform was to merge the party with the state and bureaucracy. Thenceforth, civil servants were posted to the party to work as officials. They were to be well informed and absorb the ideology and programs of the party, which they would carefully implement as government policies. Ultimately, all this was intended to bring about an equal society, which Nyerere believed was based on a socialism reminiscent of precolonial African societies.

SEE ALSO: Charismatic Leadership and Revolution; International Socialism: Mass Politics; Mau Mau Rebellion, 1952–1959; Nyerere, Julius (1922–1999); Uganda, Protests against British Colonialism and Occupation; Ujamaa Villages; Zanzibar Revolution

References and Suggested Readings

- Hallet, R. (1974) Africa Since 1875. London: Heinemann.
- Iliffe, J. (1967) The Organization of the Maji Maji Rebellion. Journal of African History 8 (3): 495–512.
- Sunseri, T. (1997) Famine and Wild Pigs: Gender Struggles and the Outbreak of Maji Maji War in Uzaramo (Tanzania). Journal of African History 38 (2): 235–59.
- Sunseri, T. (1999) Majimaji and the Millennium: Abrahamic Sources and the Creation of a Tanzanian Resistance Tradition. History in Africa 26: 365–78.
- Sunseri, T. (2000) Statist Narratives and Maji Maji Ellipses. International Journal of African Historical Studies 33 (3): 567–84.

Tecún Umán (d. 1524)

Dima Zito

Tecún Umán led the resistance of the Mayan Quiché people against the Spanish invasion in the highlands now called Guatemala and was killed in a battle by the conquistador Pedro de Alvarado.

In 1524 Spanish conquerors under the command of Pedro de Alvarado attacked the region populated by the Maya. The Quiché and other Maya groups fought the arriving Spanish troops with intelligent guerilla tactics, but the invaders benefited from the fact that the different peoples were divided among themselves. Tecún Umán, a member of the Quiché royal family, formed an alliance with some of the neighboring peoples and gathered thousands of warriors to resist the Spanish invasion. The army of about 450 Spaniards was strengthened by numerous allied indigenous fighters and equipped with superior weapons – guns and steel arms as well as horses, which were still not known by the Maya. In an open battle near Quetzaltenango, Alvarado and Tecún Umán met face to face. A legend claims that Tecún Umán killed Alvarado's horse, thinking that man and animal were one, and was then killed by the conqueror. A Quiché legend says that Tecún Umán was accompanied by a quetzal, Guatemala's national bird, which was his nahual (spiritual guide). When Tecún Umán was killed, the quetzal landed on him and was stained with his blood. Since then quetzal birds are said to have red feathers on their breast and no longer sing.

At this decisive battle, in which more than 10,000 warriors were killed, the Quiché were defeated. Tecún Umán is still celebrated as a symbol of indigenous resistance to this day. In 1960 he was declared Guatemala's official national hero and is commemorated on the anniversary of his death, February 20.

SEE ALSO: Cuauhtémoc (1502–1525); Guatemala, Popular Rebellion and Civil War; Mapuche Indian Resistance

References and Suggested Readings

- Galeano, E. (1971/1997) Open Veins of Latin America: Five Centuries of the Pillage of a Continent. New York: Monthly Review Press.

Informationsstelle Guatemala (Ed.) (1982) Guatemala: Der lange Weg zur Freiheit. Wuppertal: Peter Hammer Verlag.

Recinos, A. (1957) Titulos de la casa Ixquin Nehaib. Available at www.literaturaguatemala.org/ixquinnehaib.htm.

Westphal, W. (1977) Die Maya: Volk im Schatten seiner Väter. Munich: Bertelsmann.

Tennis Court Oath, France, 1789

Eric F. Johnson

The Tennis Court Oath was a pledge taken on June 20, 1789 by members of the Third Estate of France, along with several sympathetic members of the clergy and nobility, not to disband until they had produced a constitution for France. It represents an important turning point in the French Revolution when the monarchy effectively lost influence over the direction of events, and when political power came to be perceived as residing in the people and their representatives rather than the king. Louis XVI's hostile response to the oath further weakened the monarchy and alienated him from much of French society.

In 1788 a mounting financial crisis forced Louis XVI reluctantly to summon the Estates General, an advisory body consisting of deputies from the three traditional orders of French society (the clergy, the nobility, and the commoners). When the Estates convened in Versailles in May 1789, one of the first issues of contention was whether it should vote by order (which would have preserved the traditional influence of the clergy and nobility) or by head (which would have given the more numerous Third Estate the advantage). While Louis allowed the Third Estate more seats, he refused to allow a vote by head.

The failure to reach a compromise led to a stalemate that lasted into mid-June. On June 17, 1789 the Third Estate created a National Assembly, which most of the clergy's delegates and a number of sympathetic nobles agreed to join. On June 20 the king locked the new Assembly out of their meeting hall, which led them to convene at a nearby tennis court where they took their famous oath. Their action represented a dramatic challenge to the traditional order of French society by asserting that the people and their representatives are the source of political legitimacy, and that the king's authority was not absolute but was limited by a "social contract" with his subjects.

Originally, the king appeared to accept the National Assembly and the idea of a constitution, although relations between the deputies and the monarchy remained tense. The public remained distrustful of the king and was further agitated by speeches and pamphlets made by radical journalists and activists. These anxieties seemed to be confirmed in early July when Louis ordered several thousand troops to march to Paris. Fearing that the king was planning to restore royal authority by force, a crowd of Parisians stormed the Bastille, a fortified royal prison, on July 14, 1789. The fall of the Bastille became symbolic of ordinary citizens becoming politically assertive and spelled the beginning of the end for the old regime in France.

SEE ALSO: Estates General, France; French Revolution, 1789–1794; Mirabeau, Comte de (1749–1791); Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712–1778); Sieyès, Abbé (1748–1836)

References and Suggested Readings

Fitzsimmons, M. (1994) The Remaking of France: The National Assembly and the Constitution of 1791. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Hunt, L. (1984) Politics, Culture, and Class in the French Revolution. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Rudé, G. (1972) The Crowd in the French Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press.

Sewell, W. H., Jr. (1994) The Rhetoric of Bourgeois Revolution: The Abbé Sieyès and "What Is the Third Estate?" Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Thai Communist Party

Pierre Rousset

The communist movement was first established in Siam (renamed Thailand in 1939) mostly in the Chinese ethnic migrant communities, then proliferated in the seemingly disparate surrounding regions in the North, Northeast, and South of the country. Following a long, difficult period of transition, the Thai Communist Party (CPT), once an urban party, retreated to the jungle and engaged in armed struggle. Its national expansion, during the 1970s, occurred while the kingdom was transformed into a US base for military intervention in the Vietnam War. The party eventually saw its decline during the Sino-Indochinese conflict of 1978–9 and disappeared from sight in the mid-1980s.

In Siam the formation of the CPT was dependent upon its strategic geopolitical position, a social formation characterized by a three-way segmentation of the population (town-province, center-outskirts, migrant-Thai), and also by the gap between a Chinese political orientation and the realities of life in Thailand. Thailand also benefited from its geographical position and avoided the colonization suffered by its neighbors. By creating ties with Germany, who helped form its army, and navigating a balance between the French and British imperial influences in the region, Thailand became a buffer zone between the possessions of the French in the East and Great Britain in the South and West.

The communist movement in Thailand, therefore, could not arise from a powerful popular tradition of anti-colonial resistance. Instead, the movement had to confront the dominant class and authorities whose power had never been checked by colonialism or loss of independence. These realities had significant consequences on the trajectory of sociopolitical struggles in Thailand, and made the CPT unique within the greater political sphere in Southeast Asia.

The Thai peasantry was particularly difficult to organize for a number of reasons. For one thing, ethnic divisions made the expansion and unification of sharp class conflicts in rural Siam difficult. At the same time, in urban areas, workers' strikes were initially acts of Chinese immigrant workers who sometimes fought to defend their jobs against the hiring by employers of Thais. The Chinese labor movement was often linked to the Guomindang or to family clans. Thus, the communist movement was confronted with the difficult task of organizing such a divided population.

Revolution of 1932

In 1932 the political struggle took a new turn with the overthrow of the absolute monarchy and transition to a constitutional monarchy. The People's Party was a direct player in the coup. Though its membership was small, the party was supported by regiments in Bangkok as well as a large faction of urban dwellers, if not provincial populations or rural peoples. The civilian left wing was led by Pridi Banomyong (1900–83), an intellectual influenced by European non-Marxist liberal and socialist ideas. A field officer and a commoner, Phraya Phahon Phonphayuhasena (1887–1947), led the military group.

Through his support for individual freedom, social progress, and a state-implemented economic plan, Pridi gained support from businessmen, the Chinese trade unions, and the politicians of the provinces. Soon, however, the politically progressive civilian wing of the People's Party was usurped by the military wing. In 1935 the new army chief and defense minister, Plaek Phibun Songkram (1897–1964), known as Field Marshal Phibun, became Prime Minister and established a dictatorship. From 1933 to 1937 the number of military men doubled and the military budget increased dramatically. The army became a vector of industrialization. In the name of nationalism it invested in agriculture and transport and took control of Chinese enterprises. A new law on nationality in 1939 forced minorities to "become" Thais by learning the language, changing their family names, and sending their children to Thai schools. The regime of Phibun imposed a martial law more severe than Siam had ever known in order to assimilate non-ethnic Thais into this nationalistic vision. A new alliance was established between sectors of the traditional bourgeoisie (including Sino-Thais), the administration, and the military. But, under Phibun, some campaigned for the "superiority" of the "Thai race" and racist campaigns were directed against minorities.

First Communist Parties

The Chinese community established in Thailand had been precociously politicized by the impact of the 1911 and 1927 revolutions in China. Thus, the communist movement first established itself among Chinese traders and workers, with the primary exception to this trend in the poor and densely populated region of the Northeast, where Vietnamese communists played a significant role from the late 1920s.

The onset of communism in Thailand was not widespread. A first small staff of half a dozen people was sent to the kingdom by the Chinese Communist Party in 1923. In 1926 the Committee of the Southern Seas, or Nanyang Party, was established in Southeast Asia. In 1927 hundreds of young Chinese founded the Communist Youth of Siam (CYS), linked to the Communist Party of Siam (CPS), a precursor of the CPT. A second organization, the Thai branch of the Chinese Communist Party or the Chinese Communist Party of Thailand (CCPT), may have existed, though the relationship between the CPS, CPT, and the CCPT is not clear. At the same time, there was a constant movement of militants from China and Vietnam who, alongside Chinese communities throughout Southeast Asia, promoted the establishment of the Thai communist movement. Ho Chi Minh (alias Nguyen Ai Quoc) went several times to the field as an envoy of the Komintern to help with the establishment of the CPS.

Organizing the movement in Thailand was risky. Chinese militants were arrested from 1921 to 1931 in Bangkok and in the North, and anti-communist laws became more stringent. In 1933 the propagation of communist doctrine became a crime against the state. Repression was widespread and the CPS declined until it fragmented altogether around 1936. In the Northeast, Vietnamese militants were either detained or deported, and remaining Vietnamese militants returned to their country to reinforce their own anti-colonial battles. The influence of the Indochinese Communist Party on Thai communists declined significantly.

Communist Party of Thailand and the Beginnings of Social Battle, 1940–1972

At the onset of World War II Thailand, under the authority of General Phibun, allied itself with Japan, embracing much of Japan's fascistic ideology. In 1941 Japanese troops invaded the country under the pretense of fighting British and French armies on the Thai borders. The Thai government declared war on the Allied powers while joining the Axis, but Japanese forces quickly took on the role of conquerors, alienating the Thai population. Two resistance movements organized against the Japanese occupation: the Volunteer Organization for Armed Opposition to Japan created by the newly reestablished CPT, and the underground Seri Thai (Free Thai) network, represented in exile by Pridi Banomyong and Seni Pramroj (1905–97), a former ambassador to the US. Both movements were limited in their capacity to act against the occupation, and there was effectively no cooperation between them. Still, Thailand's occupation by Japan was an impetus for communists in Thailand legitimately to declare its first battle for national liberation.

The CPT's movement-building during the war was more influential than its military activities, which were limited essentially to gathering intelligence and some operations of armed propaganda. Though initially the political situation was not amenable to popular resistance, the atmosphere eventually changed and the communist struggle flourished with the creation of welfare associations, an underground labor union, and the Anti-Japanese Federation.

The party was not able to contend with the Seri Thai movement in the aftermath of the war, but the immediate postwar period nonetheless constituted a very important political opportunity for the communists' struggle. Members of the Seri Thai network returned from exile to negotiate peace with the Allied movement. Seni Pramroj, Oxford-educated and a member of the royal family, became prime minister in 1945. The following year a constitution proposed by Pridi was adopted and the parliamentary regime was restored. In order to avoid a Russian veto on the entry of Thailand into the United Nations, the Thai government abrogated the anti-communist law and authorized the CPT to act legally.

As armed struggle was no longer on the agenda, the CPT dissolved its military forces. Then, instead of organizing peasants in the countryside, the CPT called back its members to Bangkok, which shows how much it remained an urban party. Leaders and militants of the party returned from China, including Udom Srisuwan, who became a well-known editorialist of the CPT and its primary theorist. During the years following the war the influence of revolutionary ideas began to find its place among students such as Jit Phumisak (1930–66), whose essays and poems impressed many generations of militants, and who was eventually killed by police. The underground, episodic CPT newspaper, Mahachon (the Masses), became a weekly publication. The party reestablished itself in the capital and started the Bangkok Labor Federation as well as unions, associations for women and youth, and associations of school and university students. The CPT became politically involved at the parliamentary level when parliament member Prasert Sapsunthon publicly declared his affiliation.

In order to offer a common framework to the union organizations in which it was active, the CPT created the Association of United Workers of Thailand. Moreover, the prestige of the party increased with the defeat of the Kuomintang in China and the party's influence developed within the Central Labor Union (CLU), which joined the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) in 1949. Even so, during these years, the Thai left was diverse. Pridi Banomyong created the Southeast Asia League to affirm solidarity with the national liberation movements in the region. The writings of European socialists were translated into Thai. A progressive Buddhist current was developed and represented by the thinker Buddhadasa; the possible relationship between Marxism and Buddhism was discussed.

The development of a legal, pluralist left was ultimately hindered by the chronic instability of the postwar parliamentary regime. In 1947 Phibun instigated a coup d'état and took power. He took a series of measures against the communist movement, unions, and Sino Thai schools, ending the CPT's period of legality after less than two years. Phibun established the Thai Labor Union (renamed the Thai National Trade Union Confederation (TNTUC) in 1951), reserved only for Thai nationals and serving as a mass base for the regime. In 1952, in the name of the Anti-Communist Act, the Central Labor Union was dissolved and its leaders were arrested.

From 1950 Bangkok aligned itself with the United States and became the first country in Asia to offer troops and material to the United Nations in Korea. In return, Washington offered massive military assistance to the Thai regime. Thus, the geopolitical situation of Thailand changed dramatically. In the past, Siam, as a buffer between French and British colonies, remained at the margins of regional conflicts and avoided colonial conquest. This time, the kingdom was on the front lines, in the direct service of imperialist military strategy. The anti-communist and anti-Chinese repression worsened and arrests increased. The democratic movements and the left were muzzled. Pridi Banomyong returned to exile, this time permanently.

The influence of the Chinese Communist Party and the role of the Sino-Thai cadres in the CPT did not insure the "spontaneous" adoption of a Maoist orientation for the CPT. During the 1920s when Chinese influence on Thai communists was taking hold, the Chinese party itself was not yet Maoist. The relationship between the two parties was tenuous after the counterrevolution of 1927 and "pro-Chinese" during this period did not necessarily mean "pro-Mao." The CPT's Maoist orientation shaped only after the victory of the revolution of 1949, and was not formalized until the Sino-Soviet conflict in the 1960s.

The movement toward rural armed struggle was difficult for the Thai party to make, as it necessitated a radical reorganization of party forces that were culturally and sociologically removed from the peasantry. The prestige and influence of Chinese Maoism helped move the CPT toward rural struggle, but the evolution of Thailand's political scenery itself played a significant role. From the mid-1940s to the end of the 1970s, the country had only three democratic interludes of three years each punctuating three decades of military rule. There were 18 coups d'état under one reign of King Bhumibol, Rama IX, who ascended the throne in 1946.

The CPT held its second congress in early 1952 and was officially named the Communist Party of Thailand. It was only during this period, the early 1950s, that the Chinese Communist Party of Thailand (CCPT) was formally dissolved. According to some estimates, this organization had about 4,000 members and the CPT only 200. Some militants went back to China and others joined the Thai party. This integration reinforced the "Chinese" influence on the direction of the organization. The congress also endorsed the "rural turn" of the CPT, without giving up the development of its urban activities. In particular, it mobilized forces to participate in the worldwide peace movement, an issue important to Thailand.

Meanwhile, Thailand experienced a new relatively democratic interlude. Numerous jailed Chinese leaders were freed. Thailand's trade relationship with China improved. Prominent figures on the left went to Peking, such as Thep Jotinuchit, leader of the socialist opposition, and Klaew Norapati, general secretary of the Economist Party. The Chinese government linked itself with Thai opposition parties. Peking targeted the role of the United States in Thailand, and the party focused on anti-imperialism and nationalism more than revolution.

In 1954 Thailand and the Philippines joined the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO), whose purpose was to fend off communism in the region through alliances with the West and pro-western nations. In 1957 a new coup d'état brought General Sarit Thanarat to power, and the following year his regime consolidated authoritarian rule. A wave of arrests hit militants and prominent figures on the left. In 1959 imports from China were prohibited and in 1960 Thai troops were sent to fight secretly in Laos on the side of US forces.

The third congress of the CPT in 1961 effectively marked the inception of armed struggle, though much preparation was necessary to ready the forces before battle began. Cadres had to be sent in the countryside to establish bases. Militants had to be trained (outside Thailand) in military as well as political fields. The CPT had to get the support of the Chinese, Indochinese, and other small neighboring parties. Political repression contributed much to the turn toward armed struggle. Soon after the third congress, one of the leaders of the CPT, Ruam Wongphan, was captured by security forces and later executed. Other members of the central committee, based underground in Bangkok, found refuge along the border or in China. For the first time, the national leadership of the party, by and large, left the capital and never returned.

Throughout the 1960s Thailand was a western stronghold of the counterrevolutionary security belt in Eastern Asia. The United States turned Thailand into an important operational base for Indochina. For four years, the CPT avoided confrontations with the government, knowing that the conditions were not yet ideal for engaging in military operations. However, counterrevolutionary actions on the part of the Thai state accelerated the CPT's decision to engage in an armed struggle even if conditions were not yet ideal. The mass base was fragile, comprised of no more than a few thousand sympathizers and only a small number of villages, primarily in the Northeast, where battles broke out in 1965. Under pressure from the government army, the party was forced to begin fighting while it was still badly prepared in most regions of the country.

The CPT targeted remote provinces of strategic importance. In the mountainous North it recruited members of Hmong tribes who had been bombarded with napalm by the Thai army in 1968, and who were still alienated from the rest of Thailand. Alliances with the hill tribes were made by offering services such as health, education, and assistance to the poor, and by attacking outside enemies such as the Thai army, the forestry companies, and various gangs. In the Northeast Isan region the battle for socialism was led by the Samakee-kun (Solidarity) movement, which was influenced by Khrong Chandawong, a member of the Socialist Front and the Peace Committee of Thailand. Khrong was arrested during the waves of state-led repression in 1958 and sentenced to death in 1961. The repression contributed to the radicalization of northeastern resistance, though it also caused a great deal of problems for the party.

The mountains of the South were dense with forests and served as an important refuge for the CPT and its active guerilla forces. Armed struggle took place in 1966, alongside the Communist Party of Malaya (CPM), which depended on bases in the Thailand side at the border after defeat by the British. In this region the communist movement did not benefit from proximity with China or Indochina, and developed more autonomously than in the other provinces. Muslim resistance in the South was reorganized underground along the border and by the 1960s the regional resistance was at once Islamic and socialist in character.

From Success to Crisis: 1973–1982

The CPT developed itself along the fault lines of Thai society. The militants were devoted to serving the people; the CPT participated in social protection more than fomenting revolution. It protected the tribal communities or villages from outside threats such as armed forces, a corrupt administration, and usurers. It also offered services that the state did not, such as healthcare and education, and consequently benefited from a moral debt of recognition. The party acted in favor of social justice but without necessarily radicalizing the social sphere itself.

The CPT's strategy is summarized in the maxim: "The countryside encircles the town, the jungles lead the village." The first part of this saying is common to all Maoist parties, although its application differs in different regions (in China and Vietnam, armed forces were established following revolutionary struggle and mass uprising, which was not the case for Thailand). The second term of the maxim reflected a characteristic particular to the CPT: in order to escape repression, the political and military cadres did not stay in the village, but the surrounding forest.

Cadres and party members left their homes, entered the jungle, and secretly returned to work in the villages. They worked in the jungle during the day and in the village at night. This system of organization would have significant consequences for the future of the CPT.

The whole CPT organization, then, was reoriented in order to support the rural armed struggle up to the point that in the beginning of the 1970s there was no leadership structure in Bangkok responsible for activities in the capital as a whole. There were networks, each of which linked to a different region, charged with helping the development of the guerilla forces by assuring communication, information, or collection of funds, clothing, and medicines. Comparatively, renouncing centralized leadership of the urban network was an uncommon move for a Maoist party.

Operating along the Indochinese borders and near China, the CPT benefited from important logistical, financial, military, and food support from its neighbors. It had diplomatic representation in Peking and the backcountry of Yunnan. It opened bases in Laos where there were hospitals, schools, and training camps. With the exception of Thailand's southern region, militants based in the jungle were armed, fed, and cared for thanks to this foreign assistance. The cadres of the party were often sent to train in China; thus, ideological dependence on Peking was coupled with a dangerous physical dependence.

A Crucial Decade

The political climate in the 1970s shifted in such a way that the CPT was able to coordinate its struggle at the national level. A national crisis – simultaneously political, social, and moral – broke out in Thailand with the overthrow of the military dictatorship in 1973 and the proliferation of radicalized student and peasant movements. For the first time, revolutionary victory seemed possible. Communist guerillas were active in Thailand, Burma, and Malaysia, hoping for support from Peking and Hanoi. American officials expected to see the loss of continental Southeast Asia.

During this period large numbers of people and a plurality of organizations were engaged in a struggle against dictatorship and for democracy. Students participated actively in the organization of labor unions. They also launched a campaign promoting and publicizing the rights of peasants and contributed to the development of peasant associations, especially in the North where the new Federation of Peasants of Thailand became prominent. Workers' strikes and peasant delegations increased in the capital.

The arrest of democratic militants who demanded the promulgation of the constitution stoked the fire in October 1973. The student movements and then the common urban people of the capital took to the streets. Faced with repression, the huge demonstrations turned violent. The king had no choice but to demand the exile of the dictators. For the first time in the history of Thailand, a military dictatorship was defeated under pressure from the street. Individually, militants of both the CPT and the Socialist Party participated in the October 1973 struggle. They built underground networks and had an increasing influence on above-ground organizations. The CPT enjoyed a substantial amount of prestige among the students, who admired its tenacity and its devotion to the people, but who knew very little about the party itself. In fact, as such, the CPT was not at the initiative of the 1973 upsurge and had little to offer in terms of orientation to the continuing mass struggles. Some student groups, such as the Federation of Independent Students (FIST), which were animating the movements, looked to the CPT but usually were not members.

The false unanimity present after the October 1973 uprising died down as a result of the dual impact of social struggle within the kingdom and the victory of communist forces in Indochina. The royal family worried about the radicalization of struggles and was concerned with the abolition of the monarchy in Laos, a neighboring country. Political repression increased in severity and popular struggle became more risky. After several assassinations and attempted assassinations, many student and labor leaders from Bangkok fled to the jungle to join the underground partisans of the CPT. Notable among these was Seksan Prasertkul, a prominent union and student leader.

On October 6, 1976 police, military, and anti-left wing paramilitary forces assembled at the gates of Thammasat University and opened fire on protesters in what would come to be known as a massacre. There were hundreds of deaths and thousands of arrests; the televised images of the massacre shook the entire country. Just three years after the removal of the dictator in 1973, the military took power again in October 1976, shortly after the massacre. For many, it destroyed hope for Thailand's democratic evolution.

Still, this was not the end of the left. By the thousands, in order to avoid arrest or death, to pursue their struggle, and obsessed by the desire to avenge friends massacred at Thammasat, students joined the guerilla forces, along with workers and peasants. The People's Liberation Army of Thailand (PLAT) increased its forces dramatically. In the beginning of 1979, at its peak, it had 12,000 to 14,000 soldiers according to government estimates; according to other estimations, there were 20,000. Guerilla zones existed in more than forty provinces and the CPT had influence in thousands of villages with a total population of more than 3 million.

It was not only numbers that gave the CPT and PLAT strength. The credibility of party leadership was reinforced by the coup. Though the party had not necessarily drawn large numbers of members from protest movements in the past, guerilla zones became the only refuge for the urban and student activists who were now hunted by government forces. Members of the mainstream left were also forced to go underground and join the movement, including the United Socialist Front (USF) and particularly the Socialist Party of Thailand (SPT).

The mass arrival of young urban folks in the guerilla camps caused many logistical problems. The integration of students educated into the urban democratic fight within more traditional village communities was difficult. A few months after the coup d'état of October 6, 1976, the first conflict broke out within the camps in the southern province of Surat Thani; however, such conflicts remained localized. Still, the rallying to the CPT, to the PLAT, and to the new United Front of prominent worker, peasant, and student activists, and the growing propensity of the student movement for revolution, allowed for a considerable enlargement of the social base of the Thai communist movement.

Sino-Indochinese War

Between 1979 and 1980 the CPT lost a great deal of support from the outside. Militants left the guerillas and returned to towns in large numbers, discreetly at first, then publicly, in response to a government offer of general amnesty. In 1981 through 1982 the crisis of the Thai left became increasingly profound. The contradictions that undermined the heart of the CPT became apparent with its Fourth Congress. At that time, approximately half the guerillas had already left the jungle. Extensive political debates within the Thai left called its legitimacy into question.

One cause of this decline, and perhaps the most obvious, was the Sino-Indochinese crisis. Political and then military disputes between the Vietnamese, Cambodian, and Chinese regimes had serious repercussions for Thailand. A flow of refugees from the three Indochinese countries caused confrontations within the movement and raised several ideological and political issues. Tensions were particularly obvious between the CPT and the Vietnamese Communist Party (VCP). The VCP had proposed, since 1975, a considerable increase of military assistance to the CPT, in order to take advantage of the American collapse in Indochina and to give a push to the revolutionary struggle in Thailand. Such offers were reiterated until 1978, but the CPT refused, believing that the Vietnamese party wanted to exert its own influence on the revolutionary movement in Thailand. For Hanoi, the CPT's refusal reflected the will of Peking to avoid an extension of revolutionary struggle in the region and demonstrated the political dependence of the CPT on China.

In this period, the CPT was obliged to choose between its past allies. It maintained its alliance with Peking and the Khmer Rouge and denounced Vietnam as an agent of social imperialism in Southeast Asia. Pham Van Dong, Vietnamese prime minister, declared in 1978 that all assistance to the CPT was suspended. In 1979 the CPT and CCPDF camps in Laos were closed and the Thai militants expelled.

Crises of Allegiance

The Third Indochinese War, in which China briefly invaded Vietnam in response to Vietnam's aggressions against Cambodia, accelerated the crisis of the party, which politically and logistically depended on the support of its neighbors. The war also instigated a series of debates within the CPT, as the militants began to question the capacity of the party's leadership. The brutal decline of the CPT and its guerilla forces after a period of such rapid growth was a result of the way in which the leadership of the party reacted to the regional conflicts between the Chinese, Vietnamese, and Cambodian regimes.

The party came into crisis even before the government and the army inflicted heavy blows on the resistance. It was not defeated by superior forces, but was weakened both by the loss of its Indochinese allies and by the evolution of Chinese diplomacy as it opened up to the West. The CPT was also undermined by the advent of deep internal divergences.

Because the party was unable to avoid a rupture with Vietnamese and Lao forces, some questioned whether the CPT's leadership was more responsive to the Thai people or to Chinese policymakers. These questions arose when Chinese leadership supported ASEAN and efforts were made for the constitution of an anti-Vietnamese front. Suspicions were also raised by increasing diplomacy between China and the US and the improvement of relations between the Thai and Chinese governments. The Voice of the Thai People, the radio station of the CPT that had been established in China, permanently ceased broadcasting a few days after the declaration announcing China's rupture with Hanoi and denouncing Vietnam as a threat to Thailand. The disappearance of the radio station was a blow to the Thai movement, as it had been the principal means of political communication between militants in Thailand. The discontinuation of the station was perceived by the government as a pledge of good will from Peking toward Bangkok. Moreover, leadership began to solicit the militants to prepare for resistance against what seemed an inevitable Vietnamese invasion of Thailand.

The Vietnamese invasion never occurred. Slowly, the militant Thai left started to get the measure of the tragedy faced by the Cambodian people under the Khmer Rouge. In the Northeast, many PLAT units experienced the bloody "radicalism" of their Cambodian comrades. Moreover, some CPT members implemented a "Polpotian" policy by forcefully shifting many Thai villages to the Cambodian side of the border. After the Vietnamese intervention in Cambodia, the Thai government army allied with the Khmer Rouge and turned Chinese arms against PLAT.

Many newer members of the party and of PLAT finally decided to leave the jungle, often citing reasons concerning lack of democratic decision-making practices. The politburo of the CPT was often non-communicative and few political documents circulated within the party. Rare "directives," often obscurely signed "center," were written in terms so general that they were nearly impossible to discuss. The recruitment of new members to the party was rigidly controlled. The vertical orientation, partially a result of being underground, prohibited horizontal contacts and exchanges. Critical documents and communications only reached the leaders, who often did not reply.

Isolated in the jungle, with little contact with the population, the students, who by thousands joined the armed struggle in 1976, were powerless. They left, discouraged, one by one, group by group. Some left very early, others left much later, such as Seksan Prasertkul, who reached Bangkok only in 1981. The absence of democracy within the CPT, PLAT, and the Thai revolutionary movement in general was an essential factor in the crisis of the left. The militants were faced with the alternative of keeping quiet or voting with their feet by returning to the towns or villages.

A first disagreement, concerning strategy within Thailand, broke out regarding the attention paid to urban work versus rural work. The coup d'état of October 1976 and resultant move to the jungle temporarily staved off this debate. Later, the evolution of government policy opened a new space for democratic intervention in the towns. The union movement began new activities. Bangkok became again a political center of concern.

A second disagreement emerged over the party's Maoist orientation. Many felt that the Thai revolutionary movement did not have a clear line of action. These debates confirmed the end of the Chinese model. China had become the single point of reference for the Thai militants. The ideological formation of the militants was based on chosen Maoist works. Faith in the Chinese "big brother" was shaken by the violent struggles between factions which tore apart the PCC in the following years. The Chinese leadership eventually attacked the heritage of Mao himself. The experience was traumatizing for the Thai militants.

Fourth Congress of CPT

The crisis of the Communist Party of Thailand was already obvious when the Fourth Congress convened more than twenty years after the third. Due to the precariousness of the military situation, the leadership of the party decided to convene three regional assemblies. At this particular moment, the CPT was losing the majority of its active forces and its prestige was declining. A small majority opted for a reform of the orientation and the functioning of the party: the Northeast, the new zones of the North, and the organization in Bangkok voted together against the North, the South, and the Central leadership.

On ideological issues the term "semi-feudal" gave way to "semi-capitalist." The traditional orientation was replaced by formulas balancing the strategic importance of the town and the countryside, of the armed struggle and the political struggle. Such formulas were closer to those of the Vietnamese than the Chinese. The word "revisionist" was withdrawn from the party vocabulary. Analysis of the USSR became vague, and the congress declared that it was ready to seek alliances with all "neutral" groups who were not too allied to Moscow or Peking. The party's Maoist orientation was further questioned.

The reformers gained ground at the last congress. However, the votes did not express homogeneous lines but blocs of factions. The aftermath of the congress was bitter for the reformers. The new leadership remained de facto under the control of former dominant factions, and key zones of the reformers did not have representation in the central committee. The official communiqués of the CPT played down the debates and changes. The documents of the Fourth Congress were only officially published in 1986.

The 1982 congress did not resolve the crisis. A new series of eye-catching defections occurred, including among the party leadership. Groups of guerilla forces negotiated en masse their surrender, especially in the Northeast. In certain regions of the South the military forces of the CPT resisted the crisis, but on the national level the guerillas disintegrated. In 1986 the CPT leadership announced that it had reorganized and reinforced its relationship with international solidarity; however, the party did not reappear on the political scene.

Difficult Departure from the Jungle

The 1980s marked the end of an era of party oriented revolutionary struggle. Another era commenced which, on the contrary, was characterized by the disappearance of political parties with leftist roots. Unlike in places such as the Philippines, the crisis of the CPT did not give way to a pluralist left, but to the disappearance of the political left. This contrast could be understood in part by the new policy of counterinsurrection implemented in Thailand under the government of General Prem Tinsulanonda. The government offered individual amnesty to CPT members and negotiated the grouped return of guerilla units into newly established villages. This policy was a success because it came at the time when the CPT leadership could not offer any credible solution to its crisis. Still, it does not completely explain the reasons for the collapse or the disintegration of the political left as a whole.

The militant struggle in the jungle collapsed for a number of reasons. First, ideological confusion, disciplinary constraints, and isolation of camps from one another made collective departure difficult. More importantly, members of the party and the revolutionary army living in the jungle had depended on the central leadership for everything (money, rice, ammunition, and arms), and splitting meant being without material means for survival. Each member had to search for work or for his or her family for financial resources. Priority was placed on professional and social reintegration. Many resumed the education interrupted by the 1976 coup. Under such conditions, it proved very difficult for the "returnees from the jungle" to maintain their newly formed organizations.

There were also generational and linguistic issues. The generation gap was particularly profound. The leadership was largely composed of cadres advanced in age, of Chinese origin, and for whom Thai was a second language. The assimilation of Sino-Thai children accelerated with the suspension of immigration in 1949. They went to Thai schools and fewer spoke the dialects of their parents or grandparents. Living in China or in surrounding camps, the historical cadres of the CPT remained unaware of these developments. Language created a political barrier for other reasons as well. English was not used frequently, even by the students, as Thailand had not been colonized, and there were very few Marxist works translated into Thai. Very few people could read Marx or understand how Marxism was plural, encompassing various trends.

Continuing the Struggle

Some students who returned from the underground movement took up activities in the parties of the traditional “political establishment” linked to industrial and banking sectors, and defended sociopolitical reform. Others turned to the Socialist Democratic Party, established legally after the SPT went underground. The National Labor Party recruited some student and labor cadres returning from the jungle and hoped to be a permanent voice for the workers for the first time in the Thai political arena, which was historically reserved for the elite classes. However, the majority of leftist militants felt that this new party would primarily serve to intervene in the union movement on behalf of various military factions.

Others returning from the jungle concentrated their energy on the publication of above-ground political magazines, with both information on current events and in-depth discussions related to the militant experience. Study groups were formed with students who were often anxious to reflect on these experiences. The crisis of the CPT paved the way to a vast ideological debate within the Thai left and provoked an effort at political reflection never witnessed before in Thailand.

Social work and the defense of democracy took on greater importance for militants desirous to engage in work for social change. New associations of volunteer work were established and oriented towards slums, children’s welfare, and the rural population. Various cooperatives appeared in the villages. These associations began to coordinate their actions more systematically. Still, in spite of a very precarious political situation in the kingdom, the era of revolutionary struggle ended, at least temporarily.

SEE ALSO: Cambodia, Communist Protests and Revolution; Mao Zedong (1893–1976)

References and Suggested Readings

- Baker, C. & Pasuk P. (2005) A History of Thailand. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Bello, W., Cunningham, S., & Li, K. P. (1998) A Siamese Tragedy: Development and Disintegration in Modern Thailand. Oakland, CA: Food First; Bangkok: White Lotus; New York: Zed Books.
- Elliott, D. (1978) Thailand: Origins of Military Rule. London: Zed Books.
- Gawin, C. (1990) The Rise and Fall of the Communist Party of Thailand (1973–1987). Detroit: Cellar Book Shop.

- MacCargo, D. (Ed.) (2002) Reforming Thai Politics. Copenhagen: Nordic Institute of Asian Studies.
- Marks, T. (1994) Making Revolution: The Insurgency of the Communist Party of Thailand in Structural Perspective. Bangkok: White Lotus.
- Ross, P. & Sinsawasadi, N. (1974) Thailand: Student Activism and Political Change. Bangkok: DK Book House.
- Ungpakorn, G. (Ed.) (2003) Radicalizing Thailand: New Political Perspectives. Bangkok: Institute of Asian Studies, Chulalongkorn University.
- Wedel, Y. & Wedel, P. (1987) Radical Thought, Thai Mind: The Development of Revolutionary Ideas in Thailand. Bangkok: Assumption Business Administration College.

Thailand, Patani Malay nationalism

Herbert Docena

Muslim Malay or Patani Malay nationalism refers to the ideology or sentiment of those movements among Muslim Malays in southern Thailand which seek greater autonomy or independence from Thailand. Patani or Muslim Malays currently comprise about 2 percent of the total population of predominantly Buddhist Thailand, but they constitute approximately 80 percent of the population in the three southern provinces bordering Malaysia. These provinces were once part of the former kingdom of Patani, a then-independent state that for centuries maintained fluctuating degrees of autonomy in a tributary relationship with Siam. Patani was gradually and forcibly incorporated into Siam (renamed Thailand in 1939) beginning in the early nineteenth century against the will of its leaders and without the consent of its people. Since then, frequent and recurring attempts on the part of Malays to challenge Thai rule have posed a persistent threat to Thailand’s claim to its current territory.

Annexation

In the sixteenth century the kingdom of Siam expanded southward into Patani, deploying its navy and army to control the peninsula’s resources. Though at this time the kingdom of Patani was one of the largest and most important in the peninsula, it was relatively weaker than its expanding neighbor and ultimately, along with other Malay states, Patani entered into a tributary relationship in which it became a vassal and Siam the suzerain.

Unlike in a direct colonial relationship, the tributary system was essentially an unequal power-sharing arrangement between states in which the vassal's ruling class submitted to the suzerain in exchange for direct rule over their subjects. Siam selected or confirmed its vassals' rulers, exacted tributes or a portion of the vassals' revenues, and demanded conscripts to fight on its side in times of war, but otherwise allowed the vassals' rulers free rein in domestic affairs. Depending on the relative balance of power between it and Siam, Patani accommodated and allied with but at other times defied and resisted Siam.

Beginning in the eighteenth century, Siam gradually replaced its suzerainty over Patani with more direct rule. In the late eighteenth century Siam's military forces conquered Patani, and Patani's autonomy began to erode. In the early years of the nineteenth century, with French and British forces consolidating their rule and expanding their colonies in that region, Siam deepened its rule over Patani and Patani began to be considered a province of Siam. By 1902 Siam had removed the remaining powers of the Patani royalty and replaced them with Thai bureaucrats who directly governed the province. In 1909 Siam and Britain agreed, without Malay consent, to partition the Malay states between themselves. The former Patani kingdom was annexed by Siam while other Malay states were incorporated into British Malaya. The move was contentious. Even Thai King Chulalongkorn acknowledged that the Malay provinces were treated as though they belonged to Thailand, though that was not true (Thanet 2007). Still, a powerful alliance ensured that Patani would remain a Thai province. Seeking to maintain a buffer between British Malay and French colonies, Great Britain consistently rejected the Patani Malays' repeated appeals for intervention. The United States also played a decisive role by pressuring Britain not to support Patani independence or incorporation into Malaya.

Assimilation

After annexing Patani, Thai rulers sought to integrate and assimilate the Muslim Malays into their conception of a Thai nation. The intensity and severity by which Thai governments attempted to achieve this varied only according to their capacity to exact submission, the ideological inclination of their leaders, and the degree of resistance posed by the Malays.

The Thai monarchy has historically engaged in nation-building by coopting and manipulating the Buddhist religious hierarchy to buttress its legitimacy. Though the power of the king was curbed in 1932 with the transition from an absolute to a constitutional monarchy, the Thai nationalism founded on the king – with its myths and Buddhist rituals and symbols – did not dissolve. Instead, it morphed into a more popular version mobilized by successive regimes and eventually became more strongly identified with Thai Buddhism. Thus, with Buddhism unofficially serving as Thailand's national religion, successive Thai governments attempted to homogenize Muslim Malays, along with Chinese immigrants, hill tribes, and the Lao people in the northeast, into "proper" Thai citizens through a raft of "Thai-fication" policies that sought to change the ethnic minorities' identities and behaviors by controlling and subordinating their cultural practices and institutions.

For Malays and Thai Muslims in general, Islamic laws were replaced with Thai laws and administered by Thai judges. Malay children were forced to attend Thai primary schools, often with Buddhist Thai monks as teachers, to learn the Thai language, Buddhist morals, and Buddhist-oriented texts on history and civics. During some ultra-nationalist regimes the wearing of Malay traditional dress was forbidden. Men were required to wear trousers and tops. Women were forced to wear hats and western dress. Even the Malay practice of carrying loads on the head was proscribed; only the supposedly Thai way of carrying loads on the shoulder was allowed. Malay Muslim children were required to bow down before statues of Buddha placed in public schools. Malays could not take on Malayo-Arabic names, only Thai ones. Creating a sense of Thai-ness among the Patani has long been an enduring goal of the Thai government.

While many of these policies were eventually relaxed, the determination to assimilate the Malays into the "Thai race" persisted. When widespread Malay opposition to these policies threatened to escalate into more serious threats to the Thai state, certain policies were abandoned, only to be renewed when the opposition defused. In 1948 snowballing protests by Malays prompted the Thai government to abandon temporarily some ultranationalist policies. By the 1960s and 1970s, however, the Thai government again required that Muslim schools use Thai as the medium of instruction, and follow the Thai-imposed curriculum which consciously stressed the supposed homogeneity of Thai culture and identity. The emphasis on Thai education was so great that at the height of the separatist rebellion from 1972 to 1976, government spending on primary education in the three southern provinces increased annually by an average of 40 percent. After having successfully pacified the rebellion by the 1980s and 1990s, Thailand's assimilation efforts continued. While Malay students could study English, French, German, and Arabic as a second language after Thai, the study of Malay remained forbidden. Malays were again encouraged to take Thai names and Malay street names were changed to Thai.

Subordination

While various Thai governments have proven willing to ease assimilationist policies and grant concessions to Malays in the cultural sphere (such as recognizing the Muslim weekend or building more mosques), they have consistently refused to concede political or administrative autonomy to Malays. When, at the height of the Malay Muslim uprising in the late 1940s, Muslim leaders issued seven demands – that 80 percent of all the government posts within the provinces be filled by local-born Malays, that all tax revenues raised in the provinces be spent in the provinces, and that Malay be considered an official language in the provinces, among others – the most that the Thai government could grant was the assurance of religious freedom for Muslims; none of the demands were met.

The Thai government consistently appointed Buddhist Thai-speaking officials, many of whom see Buddhism as a defining and essential marker of Thai-ness, to govern the Malays. The civil servants sent by the various ministries in Bangkok were almost all Thais, and many were seen as corrupt and incompetent bureaucrats dumped in the south as a sort of punishment. Locals intensely feared or resented their presence. For a long time, Malays could assume only lower-ranking posts in local government, and only 5–15 percent of these posts were held by Muslim Malays as late as 1978. With few exceptions, virtually all of the provincial governors and their immediate subordinates, as well as other high-ranking bureaucrats, were Thais. Malays that did manage to get into the bureaucracy often lost their posts or were denied promotion. Inside government offices where ceremonies and rituals were entirely Buddhist, Malays became the subject of deliberate efforts for them to acquire “Thai hearts and manners.”

Dispossession

By annexing Patani, Thailand gained access to its resources. The area's lands, fishing grounds, forests, mineral deposits, and other resources became subject to the control of the Thai state. Most of the rubber plantations, tin-mining operations, large fishing operations, and other commercial interests are now overwhelmingly run by Buddhist Thais, ethnic Chinese Thais, or foreigners. Most of the Muslim Malays are small-scale fishers, shopkeepers, rice farmers, or rubber tappers working on small landholdings. Thus, wealth in the Malay-majority provinces is concentrated in the hands of non-Malays and the ethnic divisions coincide with the class cleavages.

Economic opportunities for Malays continue to dwindle. Since the 1960s more and more large commercial trawlers from outside the region have been fishing in the south, leaving Malay fishermen with far less catch. In 1961 the average catch was 298 kilograms of fish per hour, but by 1999 it was just 3 kilograms. Malays who have survived on communal lands and forests have been threatened by the worsening deforestation in the region as well as by state development projects that effectively fence off those lands. Gas pipelines, sewage plants, power lines, and other government projects expelled or threatened to expel families cultivating crops in what were once communal lands.

The Thai government exacerbated some of these problems by instituting resettlement programs. In the 1950s Thai Buddhists living in Kelantan, Malaysia were encouraged to settle in the southern provinces and were granted Thai citizenship as an enticement. In the 1960s it encouraged landless northeasterners to migrate to the southern provinces, often with financial assistance. On one hand, this migration of over 100,000 people was intended to quell the perceived communist threat in the impoverished and

In an attack upon a symbol of Thai repression, separatists set fire to a school in Patani province on September 10, 2007. Between 2004 and 2007, daily violence in the ongoing conflict between Patani Malay nationalists and Thai state control cost more than 2,500 lives in the Muslim-dominated south. (AFP/Getty Images) densely populated northeastern region; on the other, the government encouraged the relocation to the south in order to “increase loyal Thai blood” in that region. Though in both cases the government intended to reduce the proportion of Muslims, the ethnic balance remained more or less constant. The resettlement programs, however, were perceived by Malays as a form of territorial invasion.

While Thailand as a whole has enjoyed sustained economic growth through the last few decades, economic well-being in the three southernmost provinces has worsened. As Thai policies have prioritized Bangkok as the focus of economic development, Thailand’s economic growth has been accompanied by an increased income gap between the rich and the poor, between the cities and the countryside. This growing inequality disparately affects Muslim Malays. If, in the past, the southernmost provinces fared better than most of rural Thailand, they are now considerably worse off by some measures. From the mid-1970s to the mid-1980s, as Thailand’s economy surged and total poverty incidence dropped, income in the south, along with the northeast and central regions, actually declined. In 1990 the poverty line in the three provinces was more or less the same as in the northeast, conventionally considered Thailand’s poorest region; by 2000 the southern provinces had overtaken the northeast. In 1962 the south’s gross domestic product was one-fourth larger than the national average; by 1999 it was a third smaller. In 1962 household income in the southern region was one-fifth higher than the national average; in 2000 it was about one-tenth lower. In addition, compared to Buddhist Thais, Malay Muslims have lower educational attainment and higher unemployment rates.

Repression

Thailand’s efforts to integrate the Muslim Malays and to access Patani’s resources were enforced at gunpoint. Throughout their volatile tributary relationship, Siam occasionally deployed its troops to Patani to quell its defiance. During this long period, recollections of carnage, looting, and rape perpetrated by Siamese armies were imprinted in Malay folk memory. In 1902, when Siam unilaterally abrogated Patani’s vassal status and dislodged its royalty, Siam arrested and exiled those who resisted. In the late 1940s Thailand faced the real and growing possibility of losing Patani, when siding with Japan during World War II resulted in a growing large-scale Patani popular uprising. Thailand responded with massive force, including aerial bombardment. Hundreds were killed, thousands fled, and many were arrested. The region was placed under a state of emergency. Thai forces were accused of abuses and cruelty. Haji Sulong, the movement’s leading figure, was imprisoned and subsequently disappeared; many believed he was executed by the police.

From the 1950s through the 1970s armed, openly separatist and communist movements emerged. With the help of over $3 billion in military and non-military assistance from the United States, Thailand responded with large-scale police and military operations. Even after Thailand wrote off the threat posed by separatists in the 1980s, it retained its military presence in southern provinces with a vast network of informers that enabled security forces to keep a lid on the violence.

When violence surged again in the early 2000s, Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra placed the region under martial law. Emboldened by the worldwide wave of repression and curtailment of civil liberties legitimized by the US-led “war on terror,” the Thai government strengthened the hand of its security forces, allowed warrantless arrests and indefinite detentions, and tolerated torture and summary executions. Impunity reigned. In one incident in a mosque in April 2004, around 30 lightly armed and otherwise defenseless Malays, most of them young, were killed by the military. In another incident in Tak Bai in October 2004, up to 76 Malays died after Thai security forces rounded up hundreds of protesters and piled them six layers deep on top of each other in trucks. Since 2001, scores have been abducted, tortured, and disappeared. Though the Thai government has held few officials responsible and the emergency law was not revoked, new Thai Prime Minister Surayud has acknowledged the responsibility of Thai security forces in at least the Tak Bai incident, saying, "What happened in the past was mostly the fault of the state."

Response

Since Patani's incorporation into Thailand, Muslim Malays have challenged their relationship with the Thai state. At first, the Malay aristocracy and religious elites spearheaded opposition to Thai rule from 1902 through the late 1940s in what amounted to an inter-elite conflict between the Siamese and the Malay royalties for power over the Malay people. Despite their subordinate status under the Thai suzerains, the Malay ruling families had grown wealthy off the labor of Malay peasants, with only a small portion of wealth transferred to the Siamese. This ended when Siam displaced the Malay rulers and replaced them with Thai bureaucrats. After 1902, 87.5 percent of revenues went to Bangkok while the Malay rulers received 12.5 percent. Stripped of their power, the Malay rulers rebelled.

The resistance collapsed quickly. Some rulers quickly made deals with Siam in order to preserve their remaining power and those who refused to surrender were arrested and exiled. In this period, opposition to Thai rule was not founded on Malay nationalism or Islamic mobilization but on the displaced elites' desire to regain power. The Malay rulers could not appeal to an imagined Malay solidarity: in the past, the different Malay states were frequently at war with each other; at times, it was Siam's support that allowed Patani to fight her Malay neighbors. Neither did the Malay rulers appeal to anti-colonialism. In fact, the deposed rulers wished to become a British colony.

Outside the nobility, Muslim Malays resisted Thailand's successive moves to sideline Islamic law, subordinate the Malays' religious institutions, and compel the Malays to attend Thailand's Buddhist-oriented school system, which threatened the power and interests of the Malays' religious establishment. Increasingly, religious leaders took an active role in opposition to Thai rule. In the 1940s Haji Sulong, a charismatic religious leader, organized a mass movement and soon became the symbol of Malay struggle. Sulong successfully appealed to Islam to mobilize popular support. The traditional Malay elites joined hands with the religious leaders in the hope of ruling again.

Though they succeeded in mobilizing the Muslim masses, the religious and traditional elites' demands conflicted with the interests of the mostly peasant Malays.

Armed Struggle

In time, the resistance evolved. In the 1950s and 1960s active opposition to Thai rule broadened beyond the traditional and religious elites. Tactics expanded from passive resistance and non-violent political actions to organized armed revolt. Its aims moved beyond autonomy to outright separation from Thailand.

During this period, various organizations and ideologies emerged. Gabungan Melayu Patani Raya (GAMPAR) was formed by exiled religious leaders and aristocrats, but was allied with the leftist Malay Nationalist Party in Malaya and called for Patani's incorporation into Malaya. The Barisan Revolusi Nasional (BRN) or the National Revolutionary Front (NRF) advocated pan-Malay nationalism, becoming the first organization that did not call for the restoration of the Patani royalty, but sought to distance itself from the traditional elites and establish a state that would bring together Malays from existing Southeast Asian states. Invoking anti-colonialism and anti-capitalism, it called for a socialist revolution to bring about "Islamic socialism," a vaguely defined concept which one spokesman claimed to be similar to Egypt under Nasser. Unlike other organizations, the BRN forged intimate relations with the Communist Party of Malaya and fought alongside guerrillas of the Communist Party of Thailand, which promised autonomy to Malays in the event that it seized state power.

Repelled by BRN's leftist positions, descendants of the former royalty and religious leaders formed the Barisan Nasional Pembebasan Patani (BNPP) or the National Liberation Front of Patani (NLFP). The most conservative of all the groups, the BNPP shifted from espousing Malay nationalism to a more orthodox Islamic orientation. Though it called for full independence, some BRN leaders still supported the restoration of Patani royalty. Seeking to distinguish itself from the BNPP's conservatism and the BRN's socialism and expand its base, the Patani United Liberation Organization (PULO) instead advocated secular nationalism even as it claimed to be fighting for an Islamic republic. Deriving support from Libya and Syria and maintaining a base in Saudi Arabia, it was allegedly the most aggressive and best organized of the organizations. Many smaller groups were formed as well – by 1970, there were an estimated 20 different groups, with about 1,000 fighters.

Turn to Islam

To different degrees and in various ways many Malay groups articulated their struggle through a narrative of religious persecution. Marginalized politically, and having relatively weak ties to an explicit and unifying Malay identity, many sought refuge in religion, in the schools and mosques. Simultaneously, the Thai state, although increasingly tolerant of religious difference, maintained its efforts to dilute the Malay ethnicity and undermine it as a source of nationalism. Hence, Malays can be Thai Muslims but they cannot be Malays. In seeking to blunt their ethnicity, Thailand sharpened their religious identity.

Although some Malay organizations have spoken about establishing an Islamic republic, their struggle remained rooted in ethnicity and nationalism. The goals include a more autonomous political entity or an independent state for Malays in which they will have power over their affairs, religion being one of them. Religious leader Haji Sulong called for Malays, not any Muslims, to rule over Malays. Their fight against the Thai state has not been one between Muslims and Buddhists; other non-Malay Muslims in Thailand have not rallied to their cause. Their aspirations do not concern non-Malay Muslims and these Malay groups are not known to have links with organizations promoting regional or global pan-Islamic agendas.

Role of Peasants

The armed rebellion by Patani Malay organizations reached its height during the late 1960s and 1970s. With fragmented leadership, poor organization, and lack of mass support, the rebellion posed little threat to Thai rule and was effectively suppressed by the 1980s. Since then, the organizations have split along tactical and ideological lines. Some have disbanded. Others shifted from armed struggle to political organizing, or went underground or operated from exile. Armed separatism went into a long period of decline. Beginning in 2004, after the Thai government dissolved bureaucratic structures that had pacified the region, supported the US wars on Afghanistan and Iraq, and mounted a war on drugs in which many Muslims in the south were executed, a new wave of violence ensued. The government response to the violence included the abduction, torture, and killing of many Muslims. Consequently, the violence escalated.

Who perpetrated the violence remains in question. At one point, a Thai deputy prime minister claimed that as many as half of the violent incidents were instigated by state authorities, with only a quarter attributed to separatists. The targeting of state symbols, institutions, and structures, of Buddhist monks, teachers, and civilians, as well as of Muslims supposedly collaborating with the Thai government, seemed to point to the separatists' involvement. No group, however, has come forward officially and consistently to claim responsibility for the violence or to advance a set of political demands. The perpetrators were either unwilling or unable to articulate their goals. It is possible that various groups, possibly from a new generation with loose or no ties to the organizations of the past, are involved.

While in the past primarily nobility and the religious elites mobilized against Thai rule, the sustained insurrection since the 1960s could not have happened without the increasing participation of ordinary Malays, an overwhelming majority of whom are peasants. While peasants were involved in earlier actions, they often followed the initiatives of Malay elites. In this new period the traditional and religious elites have largely abandoned the initiative. The separatists' goals threatened their interests, many lost their following, and some found a niche within Thailand's political system. Previously, Malay peasants responded to government injustice and discrimination by avoiding or minimizing contacts and relations with the Thai state. After World War II and more so since Thailand's economic boom of the late 1980s and early 1990s, however, state projects and capitalist enterprises have severely impacted peasants' livelihood. Malay traditions and social relations have suffered. To cope, many leave the countryside to seek employment, but in the towns and cities they experience difficulties finding work due to lack of education or the structural discrimination in the Thai Buddhist-dominated civil service. Others have fled to find work in Malaysia, leaving their families behind, but this has become more difficult as border restrictions become more stringent.

Increasingly, many Malays have found themselves in direct confrontation with the Thai state. In the 1970s some fisher folk were driven to arm themselves and shoot at trawlers illegally fishing close to the shore, only to find that the Thai police were on board the trawlers themselves, protecting their owners. They organized themselves into a coalition, demonstrated in large numbers in front of government offices, and submitted petitions, but were ignored. Many of those sitting on the government board administering fishery policy owned the very trawlers that the fisher folk wanted out of their fishing grounds. Villagers driven to live in the forests have also clashed with Thai bureaucrats and timber companies. Demonstrations against state projects have either been brutally broken up or ignored.

It is still not clear to what extent and in what ways peasants have been directly involved in violence aimed at achieving separatists' goal of breaking free from Thailand. Measuring the degree of active mass support for avowedly separatist organizations has been difficult. Though they swim in a sea of antagonism to Thai rule, it is believed that the organizations' core membership remains small. At least one survey confirmed that a sizable number of people sympathize with the separatist movements (Srisompob 2007). But whether or not they have actually joined the armed movements, it is evident that ordinary Malays have indirectly cooperated with them, or else passively refused to assist the Thai state against them. In some instances they may even have acted on their own without being directed by the organized separatists. The fisher folk, who are among those most affected by the enclosure, for example, are known to have previously received weapons from separatists in their fight against commercial fishers, share their resentment or hostility towards the state, or else find little motivation to object to their actions.

Of those Malay peasants actually involved in the violence, it is not clear to what extent their actions are motivated by disparate resource use or nationalism, or to what degree they actually share the separatists' specific aims. Of the new wave that began in the 2000s, it has been suggested that, rather than a separatist movement, the actions of the Malays – with their appeal to folk Islam, their putative lack of organization, and their seeming aimlessness – may be more accurately characterized as a millenarian movement. While the Muslim Malays may be seeking an end to the intrusion of the Thai state and capitalists into their lives, their alternative political project remains to be articulated and heard. Like others who consider the prospects of separatism elsewhere, they face a familiar dilemma: nationalism promises deliverance from subordination but does not necessarily guarantee emancipation.

SEE ALSO: Thai Communist Party; Thailand, Popular Movements, 1980s–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Baker, C. & Phongpaichit, P. (2005) A History of Thailand. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Brown, D. (1994) The State and Ethnic Politics in Southeast Asia. London: Routledge.
- Che Man, W. K. (1990) Muslim Separatism: The Moros of Southern Philippines and the Malays of Southern Thailand. Quezon City: Ateneo de Manila University Press.
- Kobkua Suwannathat-Pian (1988) Thai Malay Relations: Traditional Intra-Regional Relations from the Seventeenth to the Early Twentieth Centuries. Singapore: Oxford University Press.
- Lim Joo-Jock & Vani, S. (Eds.) (1984) Armed Separatism in Southeast Asia. Singapore: Institute of Southeast Asian Studies.
- Melvin, N. J. (2007) Conflict in Southern Thailand: Islamism, Violence, and the State in the Patani Insurgency. SIPRI Policy Paper (September) 20.
- National Reconciliation Commission, Thailand (2006) Overcoming Violence through the Power of Reconciliation. Bangkok: National Reconciliation Commission.
- Srisompob, J. with Sobhonvasu, P. (2007) Unpacking Thailand's Southern Conflict: The Poverty of Structural Explanations. In D. McCargo (Ed.), Rethinking Thailand's Southern Violence. Singapore: NUS Press.
- Thanet, A. (2007) Rebellion in Southern Thailand: Contending Histories. Washington, DC: East-West Center.

Thailand, popular movements, 1980s–present

Pierre Rousset

During the 1980s various social movements appeared in Thailand for democracy and against capitalist globalization, including village organizations to preserve forests, peasant struggles against construction of dams, and workers' mobilizations for higher wages. Nevertheless, in the early 1990s these popular movements lacked national coordination, due to the demise of a left political party (revolutionary or reformist) with a significant national influence. The decline of the Thai communist insurrection paved the way to new conflicts within the dominant class, opening a new political cycle of resistance, which crystallized over the question of the constitution.

New Political Cycle

In the late 1970s, after five decades in power, the army maintained considerable influence. With a thousand generals, the army's presence was felt throughout society. A growing segment of the "civilian" bourgeoisie sought to diminish this influence and was also worried about the increasing economic strength of the royal family. This wing of the civilian bourgeoisie wanted its political clout to correspond to its economic power, and sought to eliminate the burdens imposed by administrative bureaucracy, red tape, commissions, and subcommissions. Seeking to open the country to foreign investments, it criticized the inefficiency of some 70 state enterprises. In unison with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, it demanded a "rationalization" of the public sector, including a number of privatizations, and an increase in the prices of public services.

The conflict within the civilian and military elite revolved around the budget and government institutions. Business pushed for the establishment of a properly parliamentary regime: the role of the Senate should be limited, military officers should no longer have the right to be elected and to take government functions. The army itself was the scene of some dissidence. The political game remained largely modeled by the military factions.

In April 1981 the "Young Turks" attempted a coup d'état. These middle-rank officers claimed to defend traditional values, being at the same time anti-communist and anti-capitalist. They dissolved their group after a final coup attempt in 1985. With the "Democratic Soldiers," for the first time in Thailand a "reformist military" current emerged. They had been, like Chavalit Yongchaiyudh, involved in the political side of counterinsurrection and concluded that communism was just a reaction to the wrongdoings of capitalism.

General Athit Kamlang-ek – strong man of the military command, right-wing populist demagogue, and close to the queen – wanted a democracy maintained under the tutelage of the military. For him, the army was the only guarantee of the general interest, while the political parties only represented particular interests. Another officer, General Chatichai Choonhavan, who became prime minister in 1988, broke off with the traditional military concept of "guided democracy" and opted for a parliamentary (but elitist) regime, closer to the will of the civil business class. He gave priority to profits above security policy. After a long political-military career (he led a coup d'état as early as 1947), he became a powerful businessman in the textile and banking industries.

Crisis of 1991–1992

"Democracy" through constitutional reforms against the military or "democracy" through military-led reforms against the political parties – the use of the word "democracy" showed the lasting impact of the 1973–6 people's mobilizations: it had become a useful catch-word to gain popular legitimacy. The 1991–2 crisis confirmed that the country was not ready to accept another dictatorship.

The army took power in February 1991 and chose a civilian as prime minister, Anand Panyarachun. The military denounced the "money politics" of the influential provincial businessmen, but compromised itself into private enrichment by negotiating juicy contracts in armaments and communications. The 1991 coup d'état revived democratic mobilizations, spearheaded by the Campaign for Popular Democracy (CPD). But the king intervened to calm down the situation, ending street demonstrations. In March 1992 the pro-military party Samakkhitham won the elections and a military junta took power. Democratic mobilizations started again and built in intensity. On May 17, 200,000 demonstrators – members of the middle class, rural migrants, workers and students, among others – marched in Bangkok, as well as in the provinces. The military junta sent in troops who opened fire: 40–60 people died during three nights of violence. On May 20 the king intervened again, this time for General Suchinda Kraprayoon, the chief of the junta, to resign and for new elections to be called in September 1992.

The 1991 coup and the bloody repression that followed dealt a severe blow to the status of the army. The general staff had to accept the principle of the “depoliticalization” of its role. The decline of the military, very sensitive during the 1990s, paved the way to neoliberal economic reforms and to the integration of the country into capitalist globalization.

Acceleration of Socioeconomic Transformations

The country changed at an accelerated rhythm. The demographic growth rate declined. The economic center of gravity swung to the towns. Bangkok became a tentacle town with more than 10 million inhabitants. The best-paid urban wage-earners and professionals began to play a stronger public role; their tastes westernized with the development of a consumer society. Women from relatively prosperous families entered massively into higher education and occupied quite a significant number of qualified jobs and responsibilities in banks, finance, and administration – but did not join the ranks of senior executives in industry and the bureaucracy. Political power remained patriarchal: in 1995 only 2 percent of village heads were women.

Asian capital came to Thailand, from Japan, Taiwan, and Hong Kong, in the form of assembling industries (automobiles, home appliances) and manufacturing of toys, textiles and garments, and information technology. Production turned more and more towards the world market. The tourist sector was in full boom. Labor became one of the main products of exportation, in particular to Middle East building sites. In 1985–95 the industrial labor force nearly doubled, reaching 5 million. This industrial boom attracted new migrants from neighboring countries. Most came from Burma and others from Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia, and China. In 1997 the population of migrant laborers in Thailand ranged from an estimated 1–3 million. Migrants were employed in the fishing industry, fruit plantations, and sweat shops, and as domestic workers, without civic rights or social protection. By the mid-1990s women comprised half of Thai wage earners.

In the early 1980s agriculture still represented nearly half of exports, but a decade later dropped to only 10 percent. The economic importance of the peasantry quickly declined, though they remained an important demographic segment of society, composing the majority of the population until the beginning of the 2000s. The rural world lost its significance in the kingdom’s cultural imagination, while in the 1970s the countryside inspired many writers, poets, and popular singers. Urban migration became massive, especially in the Northeast where a million people a year moved to towns. With the sex tourism boom, Thailand became a center of AIDS epidemics, provoking the first deaths at the end of 1980. HIV cases were probably 600,000 in 2000.

1997 Financial Crisis

Thailand had the sad privilege of being the starting point of the 1997–8 international financial crisis. The social shock was very brutal: a ruined urban middle class, 2 million wage earners laid off right away, bankruptcies, etc. A part of the urban labor force returned to the villages. Others tried to survive in the informal sector. What was a disaster for many was a good chance for a few. Foreign investors bought bankrupted enterprises at extremely low prices. During the three years that followed the crisis, more capital entered Thailand than during the previous eleven years of booming economy. It came with the benediction of the International Monetary Fund (IMF).

This was the first structural crisis of neoliberal capitalist globalization, the new mode of class domination and organization of the world market. Its political consequences included the fall of the Suharto regime in Indonesia, loss of legitimacy of neoliberal ideology, and loss of authority of its international institutions such as the IMF and World Bank in Thailand. Beyond financial speculation, this crisis revealed the significant influence of capitalist globalization to spreading social insecurity, economic precariousness, and the tyranny of the market in all spheres of life. It also contributed to the development of new international links between social movements within the Global Justice Movement and the World Social Forum. One of the most active organizations in this process, Focus on the Global South, is based in Bangkok. People's Thailand has been an integral part of the renewal of internationalism. However, linguistic barriers – few people speak foreign languages – have meant that the integration of local popular movements into international activities is slower than in other countries.

Diversity and Convergence of Struggle

The expansion of the capitalist market and implementation of neoliberal policies in every sector of society fostered the development of a diverse array of social resistance in Thailand. While the centralization of struggles could not operate as in the 1970s (because of the defeat of the Communist Party of Thailand), new ways of converging had to be found.

The situation remained particularly difficult in unionism. At the end of the 1970s, legal unions remained essentially subservient to patronage and all “political” activities were prohibited. The noose loosened the following decade and at the end of the 1980s a few (temporary) victories were gained on issues such as social security, the minimum wage, and the privatization of public enterprises. But after the coup d'état of 1991 these favorable laws were put into question, unions were banned in public enterprises, and repression considerably hardened.

The development of free trade zones (where employers are not under the usual legal constraints) and of work at home (evaluated, at the end of the 1980s, at about 800,000 people in textile production) made the organization of workers especially difficult. The arson attack in May 1983 at the Kader Toy Factory gave a lift to protests, so big was the emotion resulting from the death of 188 employees and 500 others injured because there were no protection measures whatsoever. Struggles developed to reinforce legislation protecting the health and security of workers.

In the 1980s demographic pressure in the countryside was lessened because of migration to the cities. Nevertheless, inequalities increased between regions that had access to the urban market and could commercialize their products (rice fields giving way to fruit and shrimp) and others hit by poverty, debt, and falling prices. This fall was particularly brutal with the devaluation of the baht following the financial crisis of 1997. Peasants then developed new forms of struggle, blocking roads to pressure the government to sustain prices and cancel debts. Faced with an unstable market, some peasants turned again to forms of cooperation and mutual aid, aiming at self-sufficiency or attempting to combine production for home-consumption, local exchanges, and the market.

The rural world also faced many other kinds of aggression in addition to the dictatorship of the market. The extension of urban and industrial zones reversed a historical trend. In the past, cultivated areas did not stop growing; now they declined. Ecologically destructive plantations like eucalyptus spread (particularly in the Northeast). Customary rights on forest use by villages were denied by big, often illegal, logging exploitation (especially at the Burmese border). Huge infrastructure projects, like dams, did not benefit local populations; on the contrary, they often deprived them of traditional resources. The “American” era of development led to an over-exploitation of natural resources. Thailand, so richly endowed with natural resources, became a country where conflicts over their use multiplied, placing into conflict the state, enterprises, and peasants over access to forest, rivers, lakes, the sea, and beyond. The villagers responded to commercial logging and overfishing through petitions to local authorities, and quasi-military operations to destroy company equipment.

New Movements

The establishment of the first non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in Thailand dated back to the end of the 1960s, but at that time they were not militant. They began to radicalize and to widen their activities (on rural conditions, human rights, etc.) after the October 14, 1973 upheaval, but the repression that followed the 1976 coup d'état put a brake on their activities and forced some of their founders into exile – together with well-known personalities like Dr. Puey Ungpakorn, former governor of the Bank of Thailand and former rector of Thammasat University. The following decade, elements defending a “this-worldly” Buddhism or actions based on local communities (the “community culture movement”) systematized criticisms of the authoritarian policies of modernization “from top to bottom” dear to the international financial institutions. This contributed to the building of a new activist culture and influenced the subsequent evolution of NGOs.

The activities of NGOs expanded again during the 1980s: they started to intervene on questions of the environment and were more involved in social rights and working conditions in industrial zones. They were considerably reinforced in 1985–7 when they occupied the space left vacant by the CPT crisis, and played a significant role in the democratic mobilization of 1992.

The NGO movement had a strong identity, but it was not politically homogeneous. There were significant differences of orientation between associations, especially on the question of relationships with the state. In the words of researcher Dulcey Simpkins, some NGOs were more “collaborationist” (without giving to this term the very pejorative meaning it can have) and others were more “autonomist” – they could look for the “patronage” necessary to their legal registration or on the contrary renounce it. Some NGOs actively supported social struggles, others were para-governmental bodies, and others limited themselves to charitable activities.

In the 1990s the left debated NGOs’ role. Could they claim to represent the population and become a force in themselves, or should they support more socially representative and rooted social movements? Should they try to build a new consensus on development with the administration and private companies, or should they facilitate the expression of social radicalism? Did they gain an unjustified power over people’s organizations because of their international and media links, and because of their control of important financial flows?

Various types of people’s organizations and social movements also formed in the 1990s. Independently from submissive unions, some informal “labor clubs” appeared in the popular suburban areas of Bangkok. Centers of initiatives like the Thai Labor Campaign, with links to international solidarity networks, helped to revive campaigns against privatization and for the reinforcement of social legislation and to popularize struggles engaged in factories (e.g., Thai Durable Factory, Almond Workers).

Several peasant movements were reconstituted in the beginning of the 1990s, like the Small Scale Farmers of the Northeast or the Northern Farmers Network.

In this framework, feminist movements seemed strangely discreet. To be sure, there were programs of feminist studies in the universities and quite a number of feminist associations. Many struggles, especially in factories, were initiated by female workers. Women activists often played a key role in information, local radio, and coordination of militant unions, social movements, NGOs, and community organizations. Feminist movements prepared for the Fourth World Conference on Women organized in Beijing by the United Nations in September 1995, but the mobilization ended with the conference. After the 1997–8 financial crisis a new network was created to favor multi-level and multi-sector coordination of organizations: the People Alliance for the Advancement of Women. This alliance aimed at the implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), adopted in 1979 by the UN General Assembly, and at the utilization of the clause of the 1997 Thai constitution allowing the petitioning of parliament by collecting 50,000 signatures.

However, the visibility of the feminist struggle did not correspond to the actual participation of women in mobilizations. Due to the absence of a feminist movement, as such, there was great difficulty in linking women’s specific demands on violence, equal wages, and legislation on the family to global issues and economic policies. Those who spoke in the media were mostly individual personalities from relatively well-to-do backgrounds whose vision of feminism was quite different from the popular classes of women. After the September 2006 coup d’état, a new network came to light but with an English name (“We Move”), a choice with a strong middle-class connotation.

The legacy of the 1970s was not totally lost. Militants who had lived through the struggle of this radical decade – or even who had been members of the CPT – often played an active role in the emergence of new movements. They had an experience of political work both in villages and popular suburbs. In the 1980s it helped the organization of local resistance and, most importantly, to connect urban and rural networks. Opposition to the building of dams, in particular, has been an occasion to bring together into a common struggle a great variety of solidarity networks. This process began as early as 1982, against the construction of the Nam Choan Dam. This resistance movement included residents of the villages directly affected, progressive militants and sympathizers from the neighboring towns, Thai NGOs and international ecological groups, monks and singers, journalists and academics. Thus, a growing number of links were made between social sectors.

In the 1990s the struggle against the Pak Mun Dam took on national dimensions with a march to Bangkok and a protest camp in front of government house. This hydroelectric dam was built in 1994. It blocked the migration of fish, provoking a drastic reduction of stock for the local community living upstream (more than 20,000 people). They had opposed the construction of the dam since 1990 and later sought to shut it down, pursuing the struggle for years. On March 23, 1999, 5,000 villagers began a permanent occupation of the site. In June 2001 the government decided temporarily to reopen the sluice gates. It was an important victory, but in spite of an impact study which proved the critics of the dam right, the sluices were closed again in November 2002.

The establishment of the Assembly of the Poor on December 10, 1995 (International Human Day) gave a permanent framework to these dynamics of convergence. It built a loose network linking locally rooted activist groups without central leaders and coordinated by a minimal secretariat. The social movement was initiated by this Assembly much more than by NGOs. The Assembly of the Poor primarily included rural movements from the North and the Northeast, but also welcomed fishing communities from the South and a few labor organizations. It did not represent all peasant organizations, far from that, for its establishment was an outcome of the division within these movements. Those who represented a peasantry with relatively stable living conditions aimed at defending their income by developing, in particular, political lobbying. On the other hand, those who participated in the Assembly represented sectors living in precariousness: they fought for the securitization of access to land and forests, against the construction of dams, etc. The flexible way in which the Assembly's network functioned represented a break from both the "centralist" tradition of the CPT and the "lobbyist" traditions of organizations operating through clientelist linkages.

The Pak Mun Declaration was issued on December 14, 1995, four days after the creation of the Assembly, in the village of Dan Kao (province of Ubon Rachathani in the Northeast). The poor spoke to the leaders of the country and to public opinion: "The people must set up the country's development direction. The people must be the real beneficiaries of development. And the poor must participate in decision-making involving development projects that will affect them." The Assembly published a 125-point action program. It helped to link local demands to global stakes. It also reflected new relationships (socioeconomic and cultural) between the countryside and cities, provoked by the commercialization of agriculture and village-town migrations. Often, the rural cadres of the movement had temporarily worked in workers' suburbs or as migrants in the Middle East, or had been teachers.

The Assembly also gave new life to forms of struggle successfully tested in the early 1990s – marches, "invasions," and occupations that received important media coverage for the struggles. In 1996 the Assembly organized a spectacular demonstration in Bangkok. The following year it did it again, gathering more than 20,000 people and occupying the surroundings of the seat of government for 99 days. The encirclement ended after the Chavalit government acceded to some demands.

The victory was only temporary. The state reneged on its pledge after a change of government and the accession of Chuan Leekpai to the premiership. The repression was severe and the movement responded by recentering its action on local struggles more than central mobilizations. The Assembly of the Poor's model of organizing has been questioned by activists, and it was not a panacea. But the Assembly considerably renewed the militant experience of the social movements.

Crisis of Democracy

At the turn of the century it looked as if the army no longer wished to play an open political role in the kingdom. The coup d'état of September 19, 2006 proved that this was not so. It revealed how deeply Thai democracy was in crisis after the Thaksin years.

Thaksin Shinawatra was linked both with provincial businessmen and heavyweights from Bangkok's bourgeoisie. His election as prime minister in 2001 heralded a new step toward a wheeler-dealer style of parliamentary regime. It seemed that the civilian bourgeoisie wished to free itself from the traditional compromises with the Palace and the army and exercise directly political power, but the coup d'état of 2006 was a severe reminder that neither the royal clan nor the military was ready to lose its privileges.

Thaksin knew well the importance of the army. He placed trusted people in key positions. He leant on it to pursue a policy of repression against irredentist Muslim movements in the South. Before becoming a politician, he was a businessman who had built a fortune and an empire in telecommunication with licenses and concessions obtained from the military and the government. After the 1997 financial crisis, he judged that it was time to reform the system. He was not hit by this crisis because the service sector in which he had invested was protected from international competition by state licenses. He created his own party, the Thai Rak Thai (Thais Love the Thais), and strengthened links between business and politics.

Thaksin did not content himself with offering political levers to businessmen. He developed a nationalist and populist profile, relying on the unpopularity of the IMF-imposed economic reforms. With the help of his clientelist networks in the North and the Northeast, he consolidated a rural mass base, implementing efficient social programs in the countryside. In the name of the fight against drugs, he allowed the police to summarily shoot down alleged traffickers: 1,200 people were assassinated in such a way in 2003 alone.

Thaksin's populist policy insured him a lasting electoral success. In 2005 his party won an unprecedented 377 of the 500 seats in parliament. But he implemented a neoliberal program of integration into capitalist globalization. He initiated a bilateral free trade agreement with China and attempted to do the same with the United States. The inner contradictions of his policy became obvious. His authority crumbled around three issues. First, resistance to neoliberal policies strengthened when Thaksin accelerated talks with the United States on the free trade agreement: on April 9, 2006, in Chiangmai, around 10,000 demonstrators tried to penetrate into the building where negotiations were being held between Thai and American representatives.

Second, from the end of the 1990s various armed Islamic resistance movements reconstituted in the provinces near Malaysia. They sometimes had the same name as in the 1970s – like the Patani United Liberation Organization (PULO) – but the cadres and the ideology had changed: there were no more socialist references, which were often replaced by fundamentalist influences.

Third, the repressive policy of the Thaksin government in the three provinces of the far South, where the majority of the population is Muslim, led to a bloody dead end. Murders and massacres became frequent. The behavior of the governmental armed forces raised a public outcry, as when, in the region of Tak Bai, the army transported 1,300 persons under such terrible conditions (piled on top of one another) that at least 79 of them died of suffocation. Rebellion intensified and Thaksin recommended summary executions, declared a state of emergency, and gave full powers to the military. His policy became more and more unpopular and the Palace imposed the nomination of General Sonthi Boonyaratkalin, a Muslim, at the head of the army. The general staff distanced itself from the prime minister.

Thaksin took advantage of two terms in office to enrich himself and his friends in a shameless way. In 2006 he decided to sell his industrial empire Shin Corp. to the telecommunications holding company Temasek, controlled by the Singaporean state. Through a secret company in a tax haven and by means of a transfer of ownership to his children, he evaded Thai regulations and did not pay a single baht in tax on the sale. This became another enormous scandal.

From January 2006 mobilizations multiplied in Bangkok to demand the resignation of the prime minister. By tens of thousands, intellectuals, the urban middle class, and members of the Democrat Party demonstrated in Bangkok. Nevertheless, Thaksin won again in the April elections: his party received 16 million votes against 10 million abstentions. However, as opposition seats were not issued (due to a boycott), parliament could not be convened. The king intervened on television to declare with an unusual straightforwardness that the elections were not democratic. The Constitutional Court invalidated the ballot. New elections were planned, which Thaksin would have probably won again. He could also hope to reinforce his control of the military hierarchy on the occasion of the October 1 promotions. Just before this date, a putsch put an end to his ambitions.

The coup d'état of September 2006 took place without a single shot being fired. It enjoyed the support of Thailand's urban public opinion and provoked only very mild criticisms internationally. The coup was nonetheless a grave event: it meant the political comeback of the army and it sanctioned a structural crisis of democracy. By dint of wheeler-dealing and nepotism, politicians had discredited the parliamentary regime, and Thailand became one of a growing number of countries to reconstitute themselves under regimes of more or less military power, endangering the fundamental democratic freedoms gained during the 1990s.

Thai progressives split over the question of the coup d'état. Many militants regarded the military as the lesser of two evils. Others immediately denounced the return to power of the military. Thai popular movements have not been able to define their own political answer to the crisis, independently from the moves of the Palace and the general command. Beyond tactical issues, what was at stake was the capacity of progressive forces to act politically. This issue was largely eluded after the trauma of the 1970s. In reaction to the authoritarianism of the CPT, many of the best NGOs and associations became autonomist and localist, having in that sense an anarchist vision. The dominant radical currents were "movementists," whether consciously or not. Very few militants raised the issue of rebuilding one (or several) radical parties, or reflected on what could be the relationships between such parties and the social movements, to avoid the authoritarian model of the CPT. The 1980–90 generation did not have a historical "founding experience" of the scope experienced in the 1970s, and thus lacked a common framework of collective politicization.

The coup d'état of 2006 could have plunged Thai progressive movements into crisis. It did not happen. In spite of everything, the first Thailand Social Forum was held as planned in November 2006. And it was a success.

SEE ALSO: Charusathira, Prapas (1912–1997); Thai Communist Party; Thailand, Patani Malay Nationalism

References and Suggested Readings

- Baker, C. (2000) Thailand's Assembly of the Poor: Background, Drama, Reaction. South East Asia Research 8, 1. London: SOAS, University of London.
- Baker, C. & Phongpaichit, P. (2004) Thaksin: The Business of Politics in Thailand. Chiang Mai: Silkworm Books.
- Baker, C. & Phongpaichit, P. (2005) A History of Thailand. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Bello, W., Cunningham, S., & Li, K. P. (1998) A Siamese Tragedy: Development and Disintegration in Modern Thailand. Oakland, CA: Food First; Bangkok: White Lotus; London: Zed Books.
- Boonyarattanasoontorn, J. & Chutima, G. (Eds.) (1995) Thai NGOs: The Continuing Struggle for Democracy. Bangkok: Thai NGO Support Project.
- Brown, A. (2004) Labour Politics and the State in Industrializing Thailand. London: Routledge Curzon.
- Connors, M. (2003) Democracy and National Identity in Thailand. London: Routledge Curzon.
- Handley, P. (2006) The King Never Smiles: A Biography of Thailand's Bhumibol Adulyadej. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- MacCargo, D. (Ed.) (2002) Reforming Thai Politics. Copenhagen: Nordic Institute of Asian Studies.
- Mills, M. B. (1999) Thai Women in the Global Labor Force. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press.
- Missingham, B. (2003) The Assembly of the Poor: From Local Struggles to National Protest Movement. Chiang Mai: Silkworm Books.
- Phongpaichit, P. (1999) Civilizing the State: State, Civil Society and Politics in Thailand. Amsterdam: Wertheim Memorial Lecture.
- Ungpakorn, G. (Ed.) (2003) Radicalizing Thailand: New Political Perspectives. Bangkok: Institute of Asian Studies, Chulalongkorn University.
- World Commission on Dams (2000) Pak Mun Dam, Mekong River Basin, Thailand. Cape Town: WCD.

Than Tun, Thakin (1911–1968)

Justin Corfield

The leader of the Communist Party of Burma from 1945 until his death in 1968, Thakin Than Tun was a longstanding Burmese leftist politician and activist. He studied at the Teachers' Training School in Rangoon and then worked as a school teacher. Influenced by Marxism from an early age, in 1936 he joined the Dobama Asiayone (We Burmans Association), which was allied to Ba Maw's Sinyetha (Poor Man's Party).

As a Burmese nationalist, Than Tun gained the honorific title Thakin (Master), a reflection on the term by which the British liked to be called.

A colleague of U Nu, he circulated Burmese-language translations of some Marxist books and associated with the retired left-wing British intellectual J. S. Furnivall. Than Tun sought to diminish the influence of Indian businessmen in the country, and in his early teachings urged the Burmese to regain control over economic life in Burma, not just from the British but also from other foreign interests.

In 1940 Than Tun joined Aung San, the leading Burmese nationalist, on a visit to India where they established contacts with important Indian politicians. On their return, Than Tun was held in jail by the British along with U Nu, U Soe, Ba Maw, and others – some of whom had been arrested when Than Tun was still in India.

While in Insein prison, in July 1941 Than Tun and Thakin Soe wrote what became known as the “Insein Manifesto.” They felt that world fascism was the biggest threat to the world, arguing for an alliance with the Soviet Union. However, in spite of this, Than Tun served as minister of land and agriculture in the pro-Japanese government of Ba Maw. In this position he made a fortune, and this brought him into contact with a wealthy timber merchant. Soon afterwards he married the merchant’s daughter, Khin Gyi. Her sister, Khin Kyi, soon afterwards married the Burmese nationalist leader Aung San.

The influential Than Tun used his position in the government to supply information to U Soe and cooperated with the British who returned to Burma through the Anti-Fascist People’s Freedom League. In 1945 the Communist Party of Burma was established, and, although not present at the first meeting, Than Tun became the leader of the party, which cooperated with Aung San, although a breakaway group under U Soe formed the Red Flag Communist Party.

After independence on January 4, 1948, U Nu became the first prime minister of the Union of Burma – Aung San and some senior cabinet ministers having been assassinated in July of the previous year. Than Tun organized a civil disobedience campaign and orders were given for his arrest on March 28. He fled the capital, Rangoon (Yangon), and launched a guerilla war with the communists from the jungle for many years. They tried to negotiate with U Nu but failed; and after the establishment of the military government in 1962, they also tried to reach an accommodation with Ne Win, but also failed. On September 24, 1968, Than Tun was assassinated by a subordinate who had hoped to win Ne Win’s favor. His widow then moved to Rangoon and lived with her sister until her death in 2001. During that time she lived in a house in the compound where Aung San Suu Kyi was regularly held under house arrest from the 1990s.

SEE ALSO: Aung San (1915–1947); Burma, Democracy Movement; Burma, National Movement against British Colonial Rule; Nu, U (1907–1995); Soe, Thakin (1906–1989)

References and Suggested Readings

- Butwell, R. (1963) U Nu of Burma. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Lintner, B. (1990) The Rise and Fall of the Communist Party of Burma. New York: Cornell University, Southeast Asia Program.
- Wintle, J. (2007) Perfect Hostage: A Life of Aung San Suu Kyi. London: Hutchinson.

Thelwall, John (1764–1834)

Steve Poole

John Thelwall rose to prominence in England during the politically volatile 1790s as a highly influential orator for the proto-democratic London Corresponding Society (LCS). He had already produced literary work critical of empire and the slave trade, as well as an excursion into history, travel, and philosophy in The Peripatetic (1793). By 1794, Thelwall was drafting universal suffragist policy resolutions and public addresses for the LCS, and in April appeared as principal speaker at an outdoor meeting of 2,000 plebeian reformers at Chalk Farm.

Within a month, together with 11 other prominent LCS organizers, he was arrested, imprisoned in the Tower, and charged with high treason by a ministry that had convinced itself that LCS plans to call a national convention of delegates might spark a revolutionary confrontation, overturn the constitution, and depose the monarchy. Neither Thelwall nor any of his co-defendants was convicted, earning themselves the disdainful soubriquet “acquitted felons” from Secretary of State for War William Wyndham.

Thelwall was the only defendant to throw himself forcefully back into the reform struggle after his release, his republicanism undented. He resumed political lectures to packed houses in London and published them in his own weekly journal, The Tribune. He published the lengthy and uncompromising trial defense his counsel had forbidden him to deliver in court as The Natural and Constitutional Rights of Britons (1795). He took a leading oratorical role in a series of outdoor public meetings called by the LCS in the autumn of 1795 and which, following a crowd attack on George III's coach, prompted the immediate passage of two "Gagging Acts" (1796), aimed specifically at silencing Thelwall.

Despite repeated interference from government spies, agents provocateurs, and loyalist mobs, Thelwall traveled the country in 1796–7, lecturing for provincial reform societies and protecting himself from prosecution by disguising political rhetoric with historical allegory. Like Thomas Paine, Thelwall rejected constitutional foundation myths and was careful not to locate abstract natural rights in accidents of precedent. Thelwall's most significant theoretical work was The Rights of Nature Against the Usurpations of Establishments (1796), a treatise which advanced a sustained critique of commercial monopoly and the damaging effects upon liberty of the social inequalities produced by political economy. Between 1818 and 1821, he edited a pro-reform weekly, The Champion, and remained a professional lecturer on political and historical subjects for the Lyceum movement until his death in 1834.

SEE ALSO: London Corresponding Society; Paine, Thomas (1737–1809)

References and Suggested Readings

- Claeys, G. (Ed.) (1995) The Politics of English Jacobinism: Writings of John Thelwall. Pennsylvania: Penn State Press.
- Poole, S. (Ed.) (2009) John Thelwall: Radical Romantic and Acquitted Felon. London: Pickering & Chatto.
- Scrivener, M. (2001) Seditious Allegories: John Thelwall and Jacobin Writing. University Park: Penn State Press.
- Thompson, E. P. (1994) Hunting the Jacobin Fox. Past and Present 142: 94–140.

Thistlewood, Arthur (1774–1820) and the Cato Street Conspiracy

Christopher Frank

Arthur Thistlewood was a British radical best known for leading the Cato Street Conspiracy, a botched plot to assassinate members of the Cabinet in 1820. Thistlewood was born in 1774 near Topholme, in Lincolnshire, England. His father was a prosperous farmer who paid to have Thistlewood educated as a land surveyor. This work was not to his liking, so he joined the army and served in the West Indies. He later traveled to the United States and France, where he was greatly influenced by revolutionary ideas and became committed to the overthrow of the British government and the creation of a more just and equitable society. In 1808 Thistlewood married Susan Wilkinson, a woman who shared his revolutionary ideas. Three years later they moved to London, and it was not long after that Thistlewood joined the Society of Spencean Philanthropists, a group of radical men who met regularly to discuss politics and revolution.

This organization was inspired by Thomas Spence, a bookseller and teacher, who between 1792 and his death in 1814 produced radical books, pamphlets, and the journal Pigs Meat. He was imprisoned in 1794 and 1801 under the suspension of habeas corpus, and was regularly harassed by police. Spence advocated remaking society based on equality by ending private property and redistributing land. After his death, his followers formed the Society of Spencean Philanthropists. Almost from the beginning, government spies heavily infiltrated the group. These informants gave regular reports to the Home Office about Thistlewood and fellow Spencean James Watson.

Police spy John Castle reported to the government that on December 2, 1816, at the second of three mass meetings planned at Spa Fields, the Spenceans were planning to overthrow the government by encouraging rioting, looting gunsmiths' shops, and attacking the Tower of London and the Bank of England. Magistrates dispersed the meeting with 80 police officers and rounded up four Spencean leaders, including Thistlewood, who was arrested while attempting to board a ship for America with his family. Thistlewood, James Watson, Thomas Preston, and John Hopper were charged with high treason. At the trial, however, Watson's defense counsel was able to discredit the evidence against Castle with the jury, which acquitted Watson, forcing the government to drop the charges against the others.

This close brush with the hangman's noose did not temper Thistlewood's commitment to revolutionary change. He wrote angry letters to the government, demanding that he be reimbursed for the tickets to America he and his family had been prevented from using by his arrest. When he received no reply, Thistlewood challenged Home Secretary Lord Sidmouth to a duel, which led to him being arrested for breach of the peace and landed him in prison. This experience, as well as the Peterloo Massacre and the passage of the Six Acts, which deemed any meeting calling for radical reform an act of treason and conspiracy, heightened his anger against the government.

In February 1820 government agent provocateur George Edwards alerted Thistlewood to an article in the New Times stating that the entire Cabinet would be dining at the home of the Earl of Harrowby, Lord President of the Council on February 23, 1820. Thistlewood, with the support of some London shoemakers and silk weavers, planned to assassinate the entire Cabinet as they sat down to dine, and then parade through the streets with ministerial heads upon pikes in order to incite the city. They planned to proclaim a provisional republic with Thistlewood as president. Edwards reported the plot in its entirety to the government, which had placed the advertisement in the New Times.

On February 23, when the conspirators met in a hayloft on Cato Street to prepare for the assassination, a dozen police officers descended upon them. Thistlewood killed an officer with his sword and escaped along with three others out a back window, but was soon arrested. Eleven men, including Thistlewood, were charged with high treason, but two had their charges dropped in return for testifying against the others. On April 28, 1820 Arthur Thistlewood was found guilty of high treason and sentenced to death. On May 1, 1820 he was executed at Newgate Prison, declaring, "I desire all here to remember that I die in the cause of liberty."

Thistlewood and the Cato Street conspirators have been described by different historians as "mad-cap" or "pathetic," but it is noteworthy that the British government did not view them that way. Not long after the arrest of the conspirators there was an attempted rising in Glasgow, and another two in Yorkshire. Thistlewood's revolutionary activities occurred against the backdrop of the March of the Blanketeers, the Luddite disturbances, the revelations of "Oliver the Spy," the Peterloo Massacre, and the passage of the Six Acts and repeated suspension of habeas corpus.

Between 1816 and 1820 the British government paid significant numbers of spies and informants and resorted to increasingly drastic measures to deal with radicals.

SEE ALSO: Hunt, Henry "Orator" (1773–1835); Luddite Riots in Nottingham; Peterloo Massacre, 1819; Spence, Thomas (1750–1814)

References and Suggested Readings

- Johnson, D. (1974) Regency Revolution: The Case of Arthur Thistlewood. London: Compton Russell.
- Milsome, J. (1970) Arthur Thistlewood and the Cato Street Conspiracy. Contemporary Review 217: 151–4.
- Stanhope, J. (1962) The Cato Street Conspiracy. London: Jonathan Cape.
- Thompson, E. P. (1963) The Making of the English Working Class. London: Penguin.
- Turner, M. (1999) British Politics in an Age of Reform. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Wilkinson, G. T. (1972) An Authentic History of the Cato Street Conspiracy: With the trials at Large of the Conspirators for High Treason and Murder. New York: Arno Press.

Thompson, Edward Palmer (E. P.) (1924–1993)

Bryan D. Palmer

Edward Palmer (E. P.) Thompson was a historian, dissident communist, and peace activist. One of the English-speaking world's finest social historians and a lifelong campaigner for human rights and critic of powerful elites, he fits easily in few preconceived understandings of radicalism. Reared in a household steeped in the proselytizing zeal of Methodist missionaries, Thompson himself was a dissident atheist. With an American mother and an English father, his origins were unmistakably internationalist, yet he would often mistakenly be associated with a narrow parochialism.

Overshadowed in youth by his brother Frank, who had precocious talents as a poet and an early mastery of languages, Edward grew up feeling very much the intellectual inferior. The two brothers nevertheless grew especially close in the mid- to late 1930s, both gravitating to the radicalism of the period, drawn to the causes of the Spanish Civil War and anti-fascism. They joined the Communist Party of Great Britain (CPGB) in 1939 and 1942, and both fought in World War II – Edward as a tank troop commander in Italy and Frank in a variety of roles. Frank was parachuted behind enemy lines, and it is possible that elements of the British military with few sympathies for the radical and revolutionary impulse of popular resistance to fascism abandoned him. The Nazis captured and executed Frank. His last act was a clenched-fist salute in the name of the Partisan Fatherland Front. Some of E. P. Thompson's earliest writings, as well as his last published book, would commemorate his martyred brother.

With World War II over, Thompson lived for a time in Yugoslavia, where he was part of a youth brigade building a railway line. One of his co-workers was a Young Communist League member, Dorothy Towers. The two met at Cambridge, and by the end of 1945 they were living together, marrying in 1948. For almost 50 years, Edward and Dorothy Thompson were partners in an amazing array of movements and political causes. They combined to influence decisively the field of social history through their personalities, temperaments, and complementing styles.

Settling in Halifax, Yorkshire, the couple worked as communists, raised a family of three children (Ben, Kate, and Mark), and lived on Edward's meager annual salary of £425 as an adult education tutor in extra-mural studies at the University of Leeds, as well as Dorothy's part-time employment as a sociological researcher. It was in this period that Thompson began to research the life of William Morris. Published in 1955, the first edition of Thompson's 800-page William Morris: Romantic to Revolutionary betrayed no hint of his growing disillusionment with orthodox Communist Party political practice – what he went on to call Stalinism.

At the death of Stalin in 1953, as Khrushchev's revelations of the "Great Leader's" crimes and growing opposition movements in Soviet Eastern and Central European countries unfolded, the CPGB was tense with a questioning dissidence. At its head were Thompson and a historian colleague, John Saville. In defiance of the party, they published a mimeographed journal, the Reasoner, in 1956. This act ultimately led to their expulsion from the CPGB. Ten volumes of a co-edited journal, the New Reasoner, followed. Thompson elaborated his discontents with Stalinism in writings on socialist humanism that resonated with the late 1950s and early 1960s birth of a transatlantic new left. Thompson edited one of the first collections of writings from this political mobilization, Out of Apathy (1960), a book heralded by the American sociologist C. Wright Mills.

For Thompson, whose clarity of thought always sharpened in polemical rejoinder, the new left would promise much but fracture early. Thompson invested much in mass mobilizations, such as the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (CND), and in researching the origins of the English labor movement. Yet a younger generation of new leftists, of which Perry Anderson was arguably the most prominent, was increasingly turning away from the resources of a national culture to champion an abstract and less politically engaged Marxism. It leaned less on organization and more on theory; it looked far more in the direction of Parisian Left Bank discourses than to the values, moral resiliency, and historical example of homegrown class struggles. In part, the two perspectives were a cause of the British new left's split that saw Anderson found the New Left Review, essentially an amalgam of two publications: the New Reasoner and the Universities and Left Review. The new direction Thompson, Saville, and others chose not so much to oppose as to counter and supplement, with the founding of the Socialist Register in 1964.

Ironically, the result of this rupture would be, in Eric Hobsbawm's words, a volcano of a book. In 1963, Thompson published The Making of the English Working Class, gaining decades of international acclaim and galvanizing new approaches to class struggle in North America in the 1960s and 1970s. Remaining central to debates over historical method into the age of postmodernism in the late 1980s and 1990s, Making took on increasing salience in historical writing in Asia and Latin America well into the twentieth century. Thompson showed with argumentative passion and detailed empirical recovery that workers drew on their own resources and human agency to make themselves, as they were also forged in the determining crucible of change associated with industrial capitalism.

One of the most important books of historical reconceptualization published in the last half of the twentieth century, Thompson's Making did nothing to lessen the divide in the new left. Collaboration with Raymond Williams and others in the May Day Manifesto, 1968 offered a statement of continued engagement, but Thompson was undeniably on the margins of a second new left mobilization that accented youth and new fashions of Marxist thought.

For a time Thompson moved more decisively into historical research. He helped to found, and taught successfully at, Warwick University's Centre for the Study of Social History in the late 1960s. Stimulating graduate students no doubt offered him much, but Thompson yearned to write more and teach less. In the aftermath of a student campus revolt, Thompson resigned to take up full-time writing in the 1970s.

That decade saw his immersion in historical projects initiated in his Warwick years and associated with research on eighteenth-century plebeian culture, in which time and work discipline, the moral economy of the crowd, and crime and punishment figured prominently. Fighting his way back into politics with his pen, Thompson also wrote relentlessly on the inadequacies of certain tendencies in Marxist theory and published wide-ranging political commentary in British journals such as New Society and New Statesman. Convinced that the horizon of dissident political possibility was shrinking, Thompson opposed the power of a menacing statism that undermined democratic rights and practices.

Two books were nearing completion as the 1970s ended: a pioneering Thompson reinterpretation of eighteenth-century plebeian culture; and a radical revision of the meaning of William Blake, Morris's predecessor as the romantic critic of early capitalism. Both studies were shelved as Thompson became convinced in the late 1970s and early 1980s that a renewed and technologically out-of-control global arms race threatened nuclear annihilation in an age overshadowed by the menace of "Star Wars."

Thompson was soon Britain's, and some argue the world's, leading campaigner for nuclear disarmament. A 1980 pamphlet, Protest & Survive, sold 50,000 copies in a single year. As one of the growing nonaligned peace movement's leaders, Thompson transformed himself into a fastidious disarmament researcher, a prolific arms race writer, and the European Nuclear Disarmament (or END) campaign's most ardent platform speaker. From Berkeley to Budapest, Thompson mounted podiums and met in small enclaves, encouraging peace advocates in Britain and America, while also working with independent peace protesters in Hungary's Peace Group for Dialogue, Czechoslovakia's Charter 77, and Poland's Solidarity.

All of this registered. By 1986, the threat of nuclear war lessened. Nevertheless, the physical toll on Thompson had been great. His immune system weakened, he succumbed to a plethora of physical afflictions. The writing he wanted to finish was more and more difficult to see through to its proper conclusion. Hospitalized for much of 1987, he managed to get back to his studies of Blake and the eighteenth century with difficulty, while, with the help of Dorothy, he was determined to organize his manuscripts. Customs in Common (1991) and Witness Against the Beast: William Blake and the Moral Law (1993) were completed before Thompson died in his garden at his Wick Episcopi, Worcester, home on August 28, 1993. Beyond the Frontier: The Politics of a Failed Mission, Bulgaria, 1944 (1997), Thompson's study of his brother's death, was published posthumously, with Dorothy playing a decisive role in transforming an incomplete draft and research notes into a published text. A collection of Thompson's poetry also appeared after his death, in 1999.

E. P. Thompson was the perennial objector, opposing capitalism and its rapaciousness; Stalinism and its deforming intellects and initiatives; the mendacious state; the nuclear threat to humanity. Thompson spent his life opposing the entire corpus of thought that blinds us from seeing men and women as whole human beings, capable of making the collective lot of all so much better than the select few seem to want to allow. Thompson wrote with passion, with polemical zest, and with a politics of unrivaled feeling for what men and women could become. In the history of world revolution and protest, E. P. Thompson's voice was one that mattered and was never silenced.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Nuclear Campaign, Britain; Anti-Nuclear Protest Movements; Blake, William (1757–1827); Charter 77; Morris, William (1834–1896); Solidarność (Solidarity); Williams, Raymond Henry (1921–1988)

References and Suggested Readings

Anderson, P. (1980) Arguments within English Marxism. London: Verso.

- Hobsbawm, E. (1996) Edward Palmer Thompson, 1924–1993. Proceedings of the British Academy 90: 521–39.
- Kaye, H. J. & McClelland, K. (Eds.) (1990) E. P. Thompson: Critical Perspectives. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Palmer, B. D. (1994) E. P. Thompson: Objections and Oppositions. London: Verso.
- Thompson, E. P. (1963) The Making of the English Working Class. London: Penguin.

Tiananmen Square protests, 1989

Michael J. Thompson

The Tiananmen Square protests and the violent government crackdown on June 4, 1989 – known in China as the “June 4” movement – represent one of the most important political episodes in modern Chinese history. Indeed, although the epicenter of the protests and the crackdown itself occurred at Tiananmen Square in Beijing, major protests occurred in many large cities in China. The protests should therefore genuinely be seen as a movement and not as a series of isolated protests. Although there was universal condemnation of the crackdown in the West, the origins and aims of the protests themselves have remained ambiguous to many western observers.

The movement was a real attempt at changing the political and cultural dimensions of Chinese society. In this sense, it was a legitimate extension of the protest movements that began to spring up in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The most important among these movements was the “May 4th” movement of 1919. This was a movement of students, writers, and intellectuals who sought to modernize China by adopting the powers of modern science, but also through an adoption of democracy and a republican form of government. Chinese culture had always given primacy to intellectuals as critics of state power. Confucian ethics taught that an essential part of the vocation of the intellectual in society consisted of the duty to point out the moral wrongs of political leaders, to point the way toward a more humane, enlightened form of ruling for the happiness of the people. This tradition continued through the twentieth century, from the May 4th movement through Tiananmen

Square, which was also motivated first by the actions and ideas of intellectuals and then taken to a higher stage of political activity by student groups and other organizations. How this happened is a complex story, but it can be best understood as a reaction of ideas against the entrenched institutions of the Chinese Communist Party and its attempts to suppress the democratic interests and tendencies of an emerging civil society, itself a product of the economic reforms of the late 1970s and early 1980s.

Social Reform and the Intellectual Elite

The roots of the 1989 protests reach back to the ideological struggles and debates that emerged in the years accompanying the rise to power of Deng Xiaoping in 1978. China had just emerged from perhaps the most disruptive and chaotic period in its history. The Cultural Revolution (1966–76) had left Chinese society and its institutions in virtual shambles, and after Mao’s death in 1976, it became clear that China had to follow new paths if the aim of developing and modernizing the country was to be realized. Since 1949, China’s political system has been a Leninist system, characterized by the centrality of party power over all aspects of political and social life. For its part, China’s Communist Party has always had as its primary focus the modernization of the country: economic development, the development of modern technology, its emergence as a world player economically and militarily, and so on. But under Mao’s control, this power was severely abused, and China’s development goals had been taken far off course. Upon Deng’s assumption of power, it became a paramount concern among many intellectuals and party members to try to put some limits on party power and control. But a discontinuity between party officials and the democratic ideas of the new intellectual elite oriented toward democratic reforms quickly began to form.

Two groups began to emerge and cross-pollinate beginning in the late 1970s and through the 1980s: first, a group of reform-minded government officials and technocrats who were eager to push forward with economic development, but, more importantly, a second group of intellectuals who were associated with the general secretary of the Communist Party and a protégé of Deng Xiaoping, Hu Yaobang. This latter group was eager to introduce reforms which would both curb the all-encompassing political power of the party and attempt to humanize the kind of Marxist ideology China possessed in order to provide a new intellectual groundwork for a post-Cultural Revolution era. This democratic intellectual elite was not a well-defined group; at best it was made up of a loose association of intellectuals, think tanks, editors, and journalists. They differed with respect to their ideologies, but they were essentially unified around the goal of undermining the control of the party by forming institutions which would protect the rights of individuals: an independent judiciary, a free press, freedom of association, and so on. They were encouraged by Hu to continue their ideas, and Hu protected them and their discourse from conservative factions from within the party. These intellectuals were democratic in their outlook, and their basic position was that only through initiating democratic reforms could there be any sense of true modernization in China.

“Tank Man” is the anonymous figure who became internationally famous after being photographed standing in front of a Chinese tank on June 5, 1989. This iconic image has come to represent the Tiananmen Square protests that began in April of that year and were met by fierce government repression: the Chinese Red Cross estimates that 2,000–3,000 protesters died. “Tank Man” has not been seen since, and is rumored to have been executed by the Chinese government or to be still in hiding. (Stuart Franklin/ Magnum Photos)

But another social reality was beginning to emerge and shape the context for the protests. One of the key elements of Deng’s reform program was economic growth through liberalization of the economy. Farmers in the countryside were allowed to decollectivize farms and sell their produce on the open market for the first time; new economic zones were launched in major coastal cities to encourage economic growth; and a new openness to the outside world for investment and technology began to take place, among other major reforms. The intent of these reforms was to mobilize economic growth, but their unintended consequence was a gradual loosening of the party’s control over society. The reforms began creating new pressures on the outmoded political system, and in 1987, Peng Zhen – a participant in the Long March and a conservative member of the Central Advisory Commission – began phasing in direct elections in the villages. Although these elections were confined to rural areas, urban areas began to be deeply affected as well.

These forces began to awaken new sensibilities among everyday people. First, the problem of official corruption – an issue of central importance for the entirety of modern Chinese history – became a central grievance. The intensity of this sentiment was tied to economic growth: those with connections to party officials or those officials themselves benefited disproportionately from the rest of the populace, and students as well as everyday people began to feel resentment. The economic reforms created a swift transformation of society: a “market fever” (shichang re), as it was called, was giving rise to a “cultural fever” (wenhua re) where people began to question the nature of Chinese society. The New Chinese Cinema was beginning to make films critical of China’s past and present; new forms of literature were emerging, the “obscure poetry” (menglong shi) of poets such as Bei Dao was challenging the older literary forms of socialist realism; the novels of writers such as Gu Hua were revealing new aspects of Chinese society and its collective self-consciousness; and philosophers such as Li Zehou were fashioning a new philosophical language for the times. A new cultural consciousness was emerging, signaling major shifts in society as a whole.

But as social and economic reforms progressed, it became clear to students and intellectuals that their interests were not being met. Intellectuals remained underpaid, but even more: the belief was that reforms had not penetrated deep enough into the entirety of society. Political reforms bent toward democracy were needed. This became evident as early as 1979 during what was known as the “Democracy Wall” movement. The most prominent of this group was Wei Jingsheng, a former Red Guard and worker at the Beijing Zoo, who argued that democracy was in fact an essential reform that had to take place if other reforms were to have any meaning. Calls for democracy were therefore building slowly but certainly throughout the 1980s, and intellectuals and students over that period were becoming increasingly involved in that discourse.

Outside of the intellectual class, the reforms also began to unleash terrible effects on working people. Whereas prior to the reforms workers had some guaranteed benefits and wages – known as the “iron rice bowl” – reforms toward a market economy were rapidly dismantling these benefits. In addition, conditions for workers were worsening, and there were no viable avenues for workers to communicate their grievances. Inflation was rising; in some places the rate was as high as between 20 and 40 percent. Corruption, always present, was now becoming more visible with government officials and factory owners – themselves linked to the party – accruing benefits while workers saw their own fortunes declining. The reforms therefore created a powerful potential alliance between many sectors of society, most importantly workers, students, and intellectuals, which would form the basic alliance of forces of the protests and account for their extraordinary resiliency.

Origins of the Tiananmen Protest Movement

The social and political context had therefore been set for the beginnings of the movement by bringing to a head both economic pressures and a new set of political ideas oriented toward democratic reform. The event that sparked the protests was the death of Hu Yaobang early in the spring of 1989. Hu had been forced to resign as party secretary general in 1987 by conservative elders in the party who had opposed his reforms and his tolerance of democratic ideas and intellectuals from the beginning. Although Hu then receded from public view, he remained a major symbol of reform in the minds of many intellectuals and students. In addition, Hu’s image was associated with pro-democracy sentiments among students and intellectuals. He was seen as someone who not only stood for political reforms, but was also untouched by the problems of corruption and the moral lassitude associated with the party.

Hu was about to launch a return to power in April 1989 when he was struck down by a heart attack, dying a week later on April 15. Students at Beijing University already had plans for a demonstration to celebrate the 70th anniversary of the 1919 May 4th movement, but Hu’s death offered a political opportunity. In a traditional festival in remembrance of the dead, students marched from the campus of Beijing University to Tiananmen Square with a black wreath and portrait of Hu in tribute. In addition to this act of remembrance – which in and of itself was apolitical – were the accompanying demands that Hu’s purge be reinterpreted politically and that his status be rehabilitated within the party. Students and intellectuals knew that Hu had been purged by conservative forces in the party, and this was an opportunity for them to show opposition to their continuing efforts to halt political reforms.

Things intensified on April 22, the day of Hu’s funeral. Although it was only seven days since Hu’s death and the wreath-bearing march at Beijing University, an estimated 70,000 students and approximately 30,000 workers turned out in Tiananmen Square near the Great Hall of the People where Hu’s state funeral was being held. The protesters were also prepared for a direct encounter with the party elite. They carried with them a large petition demanding democratic reforms such as a free press, an increase in aid for education, a raise in salaries for intellectuals, and a fair account of the protest demonstration in the media, among other demands. In a provocative, media-savvy move, three organizers of the demonstration held the petition over their heads on the steps in front of the Great Hall demanding that Premier Li Peng come out and take the petition himself. The students waited on their knees for 40 minutes, but no one from inside came to accept it.

The demonstrations continued and intensified. Students from other universities in Beijing began to join the demonstrations. The media’s response was also crucial in swelling support and participation in the protests. Hu’s successor and one-time protégé, Zhao Ziyang, was engaged in his own struggles with the party elders. He allowed and encouraged openness in the media in its coverage of the events. Many of the editors of China’s newspapers, such as the China Morning Post, New Observer, Beijing Youth, Science and Technology Daily, and others, were part of the democratic intellectual elite allied around Hu when he was in power. They began reporting objectively and openly on the events in addition to publishing editorials in support of the demonstrations. As a result, the message was being sent to the public that a crackdown was not imminent and that the students had broader support. Even more people began to support and participate in the demonstrations as a result.

But on April 26, the People's Daily, the major national daily paper of China, published a front page editorial by Deng Xiaoping that would enrage the students and other members of the protests. The editorial branded the protests as sowing "dissension among the people" and having the aim of plunging "the whole country into chaos." By labeling the protests and the students as disrupters of society, Deng related the student protests to the chaos of the Cultural Revolution. In reality, the hardliners saw the demonstrations as the possible beginnings of what was at the time bringing down communism in Eastern Europe. But the editorial had the opposite effect: instead of making people fear the demonstrations as a slide into social chaos, they were angered by what they rightly saw as an attempt to further quash social reforms. The students now made a reversal of the April 26 editorial a part of their demands.

As a result, the demonstrations, marches, and protests continued to grow. Other cities such as Guangzhou and Xian also began to stage demonstrations and marches, and in Shanghai the demonstrations were accompanied by a general strike. The situation was becoming national in scope, but the real epicenter remained in Beijing, and the core of the organizers and demonstrators remained inside the Square. The government had refrained from using force to put down the protests only because Zhao urged dialogue with the students. By doing this, Zhao was forced into a difficult position: by using the popularity of the protests to protect himself as a reformer against the elder conservatives in the party, he had to promise that a policy of dialogue would produce effective results. The hardliners in the party had advocated a crackdown from the beginning, but it was Zhao who was able to stave them off. Dialogue sessions began to sprout between members of the student groups and middle-range officials, but they were either incompetently handled by the officials or, at other times, disrupted by students themselves.

Some of the student groups began to introduce democratic procedures within their associations. They held elections and discussions at campuses, and they also saw that this was something that needed to be introduced into the movement as a whole. Two prominent student leaders, Wang Dan and Wu'er Kaixi, founded an autonomous student union, and almost 100 intellectuals organized to form the Beijing Intellectuals' Autonomous Federation. But the movement quickly moved into other sectors of society. Reforms in China up to this point had allowed a significant development of civil society in urban areas and, as a result, other groups began to organize as well. Hang Dongfang, a 27-year-old railway worker, organized approximately 20,000 workers to form the Beijing Workers' Autonomous Federation, and shopowners and small-scale business people also began to aid the protesters by donating food, communications and office equipment, and other needed supplies to facilitate organization. All these groups were, in their own way, disaffected by the government's unwillingness to extend, deepen, and genuinely pursue modernizing reforms such as property rights, wages, worker protection, and guarantees for free speech and assembly.

On May 4, about 100,000 students and workers marched in Beijing and began occupying Tiananmen Square, refusing to leave. Students from other parts of the country were now swarming into Beijing and the number of people participating in the demonstrations reached into the hundreds of thousands. But frustration at the lack of real dialogue and response from the government was growing. The students had demanded that dialogue take place between elected student leaders and members of the government, but the government would only recognize the leaders of state-sanctioned student organizations, ignoring the demands of students. In addition, splits within the movement as a whole began to emerge. Many of the students therefore decided to go on a hunger strike on May 13, continuing for several weeks – but there was no response from the government. They garnered sympathetic support from Chinese in Hong Kong and Taiwan as well and mustered even more sympathy from society at large within China, especially the residents of Beijing, who were witnessing the unfolding of events first hand. The hunger strike finally provoked an emergency meeting between conservative premier Li Peng and student leaders. But both sides essentially talked past one another, leading to further deadlock.

As the protest movement increased in size and strength, factional splits within the party elite were deepening. But the use of force was made even more problematic. Two major international events were also occurring during this period: first was a meeting of the Asian Development Bank in Beijing early in May, and the second was a historic visit by Mikhail Gorbachev from May 15 to 18. At the meeting of the Asian Development Bank, Zhao gave a joint press conference with other Asian leaders and representatives where he referred to the student demonstrations as “patriotic.” Students were emboldened and saw this as a signal to push forward with the protests. But then, at a meeting with Gorbachev on May 16, Zhao implied that Deng bore responsibility for handling the student movement. As a result, he lost Deng’s support and the hardliners were able to organize internally against him. On May 19, the government decided to impose martial law and to use force in order to end the demonstrations; even though Zhao objected, he was left with no allies to support him and he resigned his post that day. Later that evening, Zhao gave a tearful speech amid students at the Square apologizing for not having done enough. “We have come too late, we are sorry,” saying finally, “we deserve your criticism.” He then receded from public view, effectively kept under house arrest until his death in 2005. The students and other protesters were now left with no one to restrain the hardliners in the government. The message had already been sent. Miles outside the city of Beijing, the People’s Liberation Army was being mobilized for a full-scale military invasion of the city.

The Crackdown and its Aftermath

Finding troops actually to carry out the order, however, proved harder than expected. The local army units stationed in and around Beijing were sympathetic to the students and the protests and refused to use force. As a result, the decision was made to send in troops from the 27th and 28th armies from the outer provinces. There was fear that a split within the military could become a problem, but the hardliners saw few options: their unwillingness to dialogue and their interests in eradicating dissent compelled them to bring the movement to a close at all costs. Troops entered Beijing on June 3. Residents of the city had set up barricades, mainly burning buses, to try to stop the troop advance. Soldiers shot indiscriminately at residents, students, and sometimes at each other. The wounded were taken to local hospitals by rickshaws and bicycles, and they soon became swamped with the wounded and dying. Late that night, the troops reached the Square where students were beaten and some killed. By 6 a.m. June 4, the Square had been completely cleared of demonstrators. The military remained in the city where smaller clashes and skirmishes continued between soldiers and citizens through June 6.

The actual number killed and wounded is difficult to estimate. The numbers fluctuate wildly from 300 to 6,000, but there are no hard statistics. The weeks and months that followed were filled with arrests, jail sentences, executions, and the persecution of students and workers who were involved with the protests. The government reasserted itself with vigor in the following months and years. First among their concerns was the vilification of the demonstrations and those involved with or who had sympathy for them. Liberalization of political and cultural organs of society was curtailed, and Marxism-Leninism once again became required ideological study at universities. The subject of the protests and the crackdown became taboo and there was no room for toleration for those who engaged in dissenting acts or discussions, however minor, against the government. Today, the Tiananmen Square protests and the bloody crackdown are forgotten or even totally unknown among the younger generation. They are not taught in schools and there is strict censoring of the event in the Chinese media. Although they were the largest and most robust demonstrations in the history of the People’s Republic, it can generally be said that the crackdown was successful in suppressing the major currents of democratic dissent in contemporary China.

SEE ALSO: China, May 4th Movement; China, Student Protests, 20th Century; Democracy Wall Movement, 1979; Deng Xiaoping (1904–1997); Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Wei Jingsheng (b. 1950)

References and Suggested Readings

- Gilley, B. (2004) China’s Democratic Future. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Goldman, M. (1994) Sowing the Seeds of Democracy in China: Political Reform in the Deng Xiaoping Era. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Schwarcz, V. (1986) The Chinese Enlightenment: Intellectuals and the Legacy of the May Fourth

- Movement of 1919*. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Spence, J. (1999) The Search for Modern China. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Thompson, M. J. (2006) The Price of Heavenly Peace: Tiananmen Square 15 Years Later. In S. E. Bronner & M. J. Thompson (Eds.), The Logos Reader: Rational Radicalism and the Future of Politics. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, pp. 141–8.
- Wang Chaohua, Wang Dan, and Li Minqi (1999) A Dialogue on the Future of China. New Left Review 235 (May/June).
- Wei Jingsheng (1997) The Courage to Stand Alone: Letters from Prison and Other Writings. New York: Viking.
- Zhang Liang (Comp.), Nathan, A., & Link, P. (Eds.) (2002) The Tiananmen Papers. New York: Public Affairs Press.
- Zhang Xudong (1997) Chinese Modernism in the Era of Reforms. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Tianjin Massacre, 1870

J. Megan Greene

In 1870 tensions between Chinese residents of the northeastern port city of Tianjin (Tientsin) and western missionaries came to a head in a spontaneous eruption of anti-western protest dubbed the Tianjin Massacre. Sixteen French men and women and three Russians, including the consul and ten nuns, were killed in a single day as a crowd of Chinese responded violently to the western presence. The event represented the largest single anti-western protest in China prior to the Boxer Uprising of 1900, although smaller-scale anti-Christian protests were not infrequent.

As a consequence of the unequal treaties that China was compelled to sign between 1842 and 1858, the western presence in coastal China, particularly in the environs of the so-called treaty ports such as Tianjin, grew rapidly. The treaties gave westerners unprecedented rights to travel freely in China, engage in commerce with comparatively little restraint, and be governed not by Chinese laws but by the laws of their home countries. Numerous Catholic and Protestant missionaries took advantage of the new access to China that they were granted by the treaties, building churches, recruiting converts, and setting up schools, hospitals, and orphanages both in the treaty ports and farther inland. In Tianjin the western presence was perhaps even more visible and more hated than elsewhere because the city had been the site of humiliating treaty negotiations in 1858 and had housed British and French troops at the time of the Anglo-French sacking of Beijing in the early 1860s.

The missionary presence in China met with considerable resistance as it both threatened the Confucian social order that elites were trying so hard to hold on to and created anxieties among non-elites, who did not always fully comprehend the aims of the missionaries. Elites found that missionary efforts to introduce new schools, in particular, were threatening to a social order that was built upon Confucian texts and precepts. At the same time, missionaries sought to play philanthropic roles in areas that had traditionally been the realm of local elites, and thus threatened their position as local agents of social welfare. It was not uncommon, therefore, for elites to fan the fires of anti-foreign sentiments that developed among non-elites by producing anti-foreign publications and posters depicting the worship of Christianity as the worship of a pig (the Chinese character for pig and one of the characters in the word for Christianity are homonyms).

Because some of the activities of missionaries were rather mysterious to casual observers, non-elites also often perceived missionaries in a negative light as well. The activities of orphanages, in particular, led to numerous misunderstandings and rumors. Missionaries frequently took in very ill children and infants in order to baptize them before they died, one consequence of which was that orphanages were observed to have very high death rates. Missionaries sometimes also offered to pay for children. As a result, rumors abounded that missionaries were killing Chinese children and using their body parts to make medicine or conduct other sorts of medical experiments.

The Tianjin Massacre, as the event was later called by westerners, was by no means the only anti-foreign protest in late nineteenth-century China, but it was one of the most brutal and well publicized. It resulted from precisely these sorts of misunderstandings and from a mob desire to protect China from the undesirable foreign presence. To begin with, the French illegally erected a new cathedral on the site of an old imperial temple, an act that enraged many Chinese observers. Anti-western sentiments were further fueled by exceptionally high death rates among children in the Catholic orphanage during the summer of 1870. In addition, throughout the early summer Tianjin had been in the grips of a kidnapping epidemic, and evidence suggested that at least some of the children that had been kidnapped had later been purchased by Chinese working for the Catholic Church.

In combination, these issues led to the wide circulation of numerous anti-foreign rumors, a rising level of anti-Catholic sentiment, and investigations into the activities of Catholic Chinese by local officials. Acting on these suspicions, various Tianjin authorities on June 19 and 20 approached the French consul, Henri Fontanier, to solicit his assistance in the investigations into the kidnappings. On June 21, however, Fontanier stormed into the office of one public official and shot at him. After departing, he shot at yet another official, killing his servant, following which a mob of witnesses fell upon him and killed both Fontanier and his assistant. The mob subsequently burned down the newly erected Catholic church of Tianjin and broke into the convent of the Catholic Sisters of Mercy, brutally killing ten nuns and several other westerners, as well as some Chinese Catholics.

The impact of this protest was primarily to exacerbate ill will between Europe, particularly France and the Vatican, and China. The European powers responded to the event by demanding that the perpetrators of the violence be punished, and by sending warships to Tianjin to back up their demands. The Qing court bowed to pressure by executing a number of Chinese, paying reparations to the French, and sending an official envoy to France to apologize. The event also hampered efforts that the Qing had earlier been making to renegotiate the unequal treaties. Popular protest against foreign presence in China thus served to highlight the Qing court's weakness vis-à-vis the foreign powers, and foreign presence became ever more visible in China in subsequent decades.

SEE ALSO: China, Protest and Revolution, 1800–1911; Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911

References and Suggested Readings

Cohen, P. A. (1963) China and Christianity: The Missionary Movement and the Growth of Chinese Antiforeignism, 1860–1870. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Tibet Uprising and resistance

James Steinberg

In 1959 a major rebellion erupted in Lhasa, the capital of Tibet, as thousands of Tibetans gathered to protect their threatened religious leader, the fourteenth Dalai Lama. The uprising culminated after ten years of intrusive Chinese military and political coercion that turned more violent by early 1952. The new Chinese communist regime began in 1949, led by Mao Zedong (1893–1976), who began a subtle and intentional strategy to spread the communist revolution to Tibet and lay claim to the region as an integral part of China. As the Chinese began to move into the region in the 1950s, tensions increased between the Chinese communists and the Tibetans (who are by and large devout Yellow Hat Buddhists, a local sect founded in the fifteenth century).

In 1950, the Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA) defeated the Tibetan army at Chamdo (in outer Tibet); however, they ceased their offensive and sent an ultimatum to the Dalai Lama. The Chinese strategy was to force the Tibetans into negotiating a settlement and allow the Chinese to move into the region, building roads and electrical stations. Using agreements and committees, they sought to reassure the Tibetans that changes would not be immediate, and Lhasa (in central Tibet) would be left alone for six years. The communists' aim was the "peaceful liberation" of Tibet, and their strategy was to show a united front to reduce resistance by the Tibetan people and convince Tibet to accept the changes.

In 1952, Chinese officials began imposing a socialist transformation on Tibetans living in outlying areas of the capital. The Chinese engaged in dismantling religion as monks were imprisoned and chased from monasteries. The hostilities by the Chinese led to rebellions in these areas as Tibetan Khampa and Ambowas were outraged by the abuse and murder of their own people. As tribal Tibetans continued to rebel and the casualties mounted, the Chinese, however, did not engage in hostilities in Lhasa, the residence of their god-king, the Dalai Lama. The Chinese created intolerable conditions of coerced "social change" that would gradually cause the disparate Tibetan tribal groups to unify and fight against their communist oppressors.

Mao's Strategy

Mao's approach to handling Tibet was to attempt to persuade the government of Tibet to accept a political agreement; he wanted to obtain the consent of the Dalai Lama to recognize China's sovereignty, which would reduce the risks of rebellion. For Mao, military intervention carried a moderate risk, although he did not anticipate any international intervention even if he had to resort to massive military force. On October 7, 1950, however, Mao ordered his troops to engage the poorly organized Tibetan army in Chamdo. The Tibetan army of 10,000 was soundly defeated in only two weeks and Tibet was essentially defenseless. This attack killed 4,000 Tibetan troops and intimidated the Dalai Lama into participating in negotiations with China. Meanwhile, Lhasa issued an appeal to the United Nations to settle the dispute (that Tibet is a state), but it was not considered. Tibetan officials traveled to Beijing and, following some inducements, signed the Seventeen-Point Agreement for the Peaceful Liberation of Tibet on May 23, 1951. The agreement nearly closed the "Tibet question": is Tibet an independent state or part of China? The answer for the Chinese was that Tibet had accepted political control by China. Essentially this agreement was consistent with Mao's gradualist policy to postpone major reforms in central Tibet until the populace became more willing to accept Chinese socialist changes.

The Prelude to the Rebellion

In the 1950s the People's Republic of China's new government initiated the first five-year plan and started the socialist transformation. Parts of eastern Tibet (Kham and Amdo) were subject to communist changes by 1952 and 1953. The Chinese considered Kham and Amdo as parts of provinces (Tsinghai, Szechwan, and Yunnan) established earlier and were not considered to be the central Tibetan region. The Chinese did not consider outlying areas as a part of the Seventeen-Point Agreement, even though Tibetans had inhabited the region for over five centuries. Moreover, religiously speaking, both the Khampas and Amdowas (who later were key actors in the revolt) maintained devout patronage to the Dalai Lama as the sacred incarnation of Avalokitesvara (a compassionate Buddha).

In early 1953 certain areas in Kham were subjected to Chinese oppression. Thousands of monasteries were obliterated, lamas were sentenced to death, and monks sent to prison. These early Chinese initiatives reflect the socialist changes in the forced collectivization of agriculture, curtailing nomadic herding, atheist indoctrination, and the disarmament of the Tibetans. The reforms spread and soon afterward about 80,000 fiercely independent Khampas rose up in a rebellion against the Chinese. Again, in August 1954, 40,000 Tibetans rebelled in Kham, but the most serious rebellion was the Kanting rebellion of 1955–6, when Khampas engaged in violence against communist government bureaucrats and the Han Chinese. This was followed by yet another regional outbreak, the Szechwan-Chando rebellion in 1956. Both groups were dispersed by mobilized Chinese armies and air force attacks that killed thousands of Khampas and Amdowas. By late 1956 the PLA dispersed Khampas, and Amdowas began trekking to Lhasa to seek refuge from PLA crackdowns and persecutions, as well as to protect their godking, the Dalai Lama. In total, 15,000 rebels from eastern Tibet had settled in Lhasa. News of the Chinese aggression had become well known and posed a threat of impending violence in the capital.

The Rebellion in Lhasa, 1959

The Chinese presence in Lhasa and news of the brutal violence against rebels generated deep resentments. By 1954 a grassroots resistance group had begun operations in Lhasa. Called the Mimang Tsongdu (People's Meetings), the group engaged in demonstrations and publicly hung posters criticizing the Chinese for their treatment of the Dalai Lama and their restrictions on Tibetan social observances and religious ceremonies. In 1957 the Chinese cracked down on the movement and imprisoned a number of its leaders. By then outer Tibet had been forcefully reorganized into 47 communes.

In 1958 fighting broke out in Lhoka, about 50 miles from Lhasa, as Khampas were pursued by the PLA, engaging the rebels on over a dozen occasions. As more rebels filtered into Lhasa, the Chinese infuriated the tribal leaders by attempting to expel them from the city. News of PLA interrogations of nomads across Tibet revealed thousands of civilians were abusively treated by the PLA. With the Chinese continuing the pressure, a Kham-born merchant, Gompo Tashi Andrugstang, began organizing 23 tribal groups to unite and fight against the Chinese. Five thousand Khampas volunteered to join the newly formed military organization they called the Chushi Gandruk (Four Rivers and Six Ranges). The resistance movement formed its base of operations at Trighthang, 50 miles south of Lhasa. From August 1958 to April 1959 it reported 14 violent engagements against numerous PLA forces in the region, ranging in distances from 5 to 100 miles from Lhasa. This protracted and dispersed rebellion left no doubt that China had no intention of permitting the Tibetans political and religious freedom.

Although the Dalai Lama pleaded with the Khampas to cease their operations and settle their differences peacefully, the Chushi Gandruk continued fighting. The resistance fighters reported that the Chinese military used coordinated troop movements to set up ambush points. On April 14, 1959, the Khampa base was discovered and overrun, dispersing the Khampas, some of whom returned to Lhasa. The crowds in the city had increased; combined with the NDVA (National Volunteer Defense Army), they composed about 30,000 Khampas, Amdowas, and other tribal Tibetans. Lhasa was crowded and tense.

In February of 1959 a rumor began circulating that the Dalai Lama had been invited to a theater presentation by the PLA military leaders. The Tibetans, however, felt it was a Chinese ruse to kidnap the Dalai Lama. By March 10, the rumor had become magnified and created a veritable panic among the Tibetan faithful. It has been reported that over 20,000 Tibetans assembled around the palace and Chinese army headquarters. The crowd assembly whipped up further hatred for the Chinese, and a mob killed a Tibetan politician and injured a member of the Dalai Lama's cabinet. This incident further ignited the crowds for action. From mid-March to June, the Dalai Lama's palace was besieged with thousands of Tibetans who by now believed that their god-king was in mortal danger. By mid-June the situation in Lhasa was very tense and the PLA reinforced its defenses, waiting on the outskirts of the city. Artillery was brought in and set up around the perimeter. For the Dalai Lama, the rebellion was on his doorstep and his advisors began planning for his escape from possible arrest or worse by the Chinese authorities.

On June 14, recognizing that he could no longer influence the crowds, the Dalai Lama was disguised in military garb and escaped to India where he was immediately given political asylum. In his article "The Tibetan Rebellion of 1959 and China's Changing Relations with India and the Soviet Union" (2006), Jian shows that Mao was still coolly playing his game of strategy: he really did not care if the Dalai Lama escaped since it just changed the strategy. As the unfriendly crowds harassed PLA troops there, some groups became more violent; still their orders were to hold out but not engage the "rebels." However, by March 20 the PLA began attacking the Tibetans in Lhasa, opening fire with small arms, mortars, and artillery at rebel positions. The PLA also organized maneuvers around Lhasa and repeatedly engaged a fierce resistance until March 23. The PLA eventually crushed the rebellion, killing a total of 80,000 Tibetans between 1958 and 1959.

Following the rebellion, the CIA (US Central Intelligence Agency) funded air drops to Tibetan guerillas to ascertain the possibility of maintaining the resistance. During the escape of the Dalai Lama in 1959, CIA operatives assisted in making advanced requests for his political asylum. While a number of incursions have been reported, there was no appreciable effect of their clandestine activity.

The Dalai Lama set up his government-in-exile in Dharamsala, India, condemning the Seventeen-Point Agreement and pleading for Tibetan independence. Soon after the Dalai Lama arrived, thousands of faithful pilgrims also crossed the border to join him.

Causes of the Rebellion

While the communist plan was an initial success, failure was ultimately linked to the Chinese assumption that outer Tibet was part of China. This region was subject to more immediate communist transformation that involved disregard for the symbols of religion signified by Tibetan monks and monasteries. In his 1979 article "The 1959 Tibetan Rebellion: An Interpretation," Dawa Norbu argues that the Tibetans had become painfully aware of what the socialist transformation meant, and when surrounding tribal groups filled Lhasa, the atmosphere was volatile.

A related factor in the rebellion was the outrage felt by Tibetans in Lhasa at the early abuse of Khampas and Amdowas in which brutality was displayed (during the democratic reforms in eastern Tibet). The casualties inflicted between 1953 and 1958 were in the thousands: the Chinese air force devastated rebels, nomad civilians, homes, livestock, and monasteries, but there was a lag in the realization of the devastation given the expanse and isolation of the region. It also offended the Buddhists, for instance, when the Chinese treated nuns, monks, and lamas with disdain and meted out draconian punishments – an affront to their religious faith. As the PLA smashed the Khampa rebels, the cause also became one of protecting their way of life and their religious leader.

In addition, there are causal wildcards that appear plausible: rumors in Lhasa may also have played a role in generating mass anxiety and anger in the crowds, as did the artillery explosions near the Norbulinka (Jian considered them accidental) that energized their gathering and precipitated murder in rebellious defiance for a week before the PLA crackdown on June 20. In the end, Goldstein and Norbu agree that Mao failed in his gradualist approach by oppressing eastern Tibetans, whom he did not comprehend. Moreover, after he reached India, the Dalai Lama once again raised the issue of declaring Tibet's independence from China.

SEE ALSO: China, Peasant Revolts in the Empire; China, Student Protests, 20th Century; Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949; Nepal, People's War and Maoists

References and Suggested Readings

- Goldstein, M. (1997) The Snow Lion and the Dragon: China, Tibet, and the Dalai Lama. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Jian, C. (2006) The Tibetan Rebellion of 1959 and China's Changing Relations with India and the Soviet Union. Journal of Cold War Studies 8, 3 (Summer).
- McGranahan, C. (2006) The CIA and the Chushi Gandrug Resistance, 1956–1974. Journal of Cold War Studies 8, 3 (Summer).
- Norbu, D. (1979) The 1959 Tibetan Rebellion: An Interpretation. China Quarterly (March).
- Patterson, G. (1960) China and Tibet: Background to the Revolt. China Quarterly (January–March).

Tiso, Josef (1887–1947)

Stanislav J. Kirschbaum

Josef Tiso, a Roman Catholic priest and politician, assumed leadership of the Slovak People's Party after the death of Andrej Hlinka (1864–1938) and served as prime minister and president of the First Slovakia Republic. His leadership of Slovakia during its first appearance as a nation-state (1939–45) places Tiso among the most controversial figures in modern Slovak history. To some he was an outstanding statesman who preserved Slovakia from usurpation by Hungary, forestalled German occupation, and sought to contain the extremist tendencies within the Hlinka Slovak People's Party. Others hold him responsible for the break-up of Czechoslovakia and Slovakia's collaboration with Nazi Germany in the deportation and death of Slovak Jews.

Tiso's administration of the first modern Slovak state affirmed the nation's capacity for self-government, laying to rest the perception that Slovaks were incapable of running their own affairs. His pragmatic negotiation of international pressure preserved Slovakia from dominance by Germany during World War II and allowed him to retain influence over the governance of Slovakia to undermine the extension of German policies. While an alliance with Germany was unavoidable given the military threat posed by the Nazi regime, recent research indicates that German advisors sent to Slovakia found anything but willing puppets (Tönsmeier 2003). Tiso often opposed Adolf Hitler while appearing to cooperate with him. He often received German officials, praised them in public, and promised to follow their advice while in fact doing the exact opposite.

The political system of the Slovak Republic is characterized as a one-party state because the Hlinka Slovak People's Party (HSPP) was the sole contender in the December 1938 elections to the Slovak Assembly (which later became the parliament of the Slovak Republic). The HSPP was not ideologically homogeneous; rather, it was a convenient alliance of most of the political parties in Slovakia (excluding the communists) in pursuit of independence from Czechoslovakia. As the leader of the moderate faction within the party, Tiso worked to minimize German interference and contain attempts by the radicals, led by Vojtech Tuka, to introduce National Socialism to Slovakia. In July 1940, Tiso was summoned to Salzburg by Hitler and told to dismiss Slovak politicians – among them Foreign Minister Ferdinand Ďurčanský and HSPP Secretary General Jozef Kirschbaum – whom Berlin considered anti-German. He acquiesced to the German demands but also used his presidential powers to restrain the policies of Tuka, who was prime minister. As head of state, he refused to sign the Jewish Codex, laws the Slovak parliament passed to define the restrictions imposed on Slovakia's Jews, but he could not stop the Tuka government from deporting Slovak Jews to Germany from March to October 1942. However, he used his legislative authority to extend exemptions to individual Jews and their families, thus saving some 30,000 before the outbreak of the 1944 uprising.

The 1944 uprising, which provoked the German invasion of Slovakia, all but eliminated Tiso's authority. Despite his political ineffectiveness he tried to mitigate the effects of the German occupation by personally intervening to save lives, but he was unable to prevent further deportations of Slovak Jews. When Soviet troops entered Slovakia in 1945, Tiso and other government officials moved to Austria where they surrendered to the United States Army. He was handed over to Czechoslovak authorities and charged in a Slovak court with treason against the Czechoslovak Republic and collaboration in the 1944 uprising. He was found guilty, sentenced to death, and executed on April 18, 1947, after Czechoslovak President Edvard Beneš refused to grant clemency.

SEE ALSO: Hlinka, Andrej (1864–1938) and the Slovak People's Party; Slovakia, 1944 Uprising

References and Suggested Readings

- Durica, M. S. (1989) The Slovak Involvement in the Tragedy of the European Jews. Abano Terme: Piovani Editore.
- Durica, M. S. (2003) Dejiny Slovenska a Slovákov v časovej naslednosti faktorov dvoch tisícročí (The History of Slovakia and the Slovaks in the Chronological Order of Facts over Two Centuries). Bratislava: Luč.
- Kirschbaum, J. M. (1960) Slovakia: Nation at the Crossroads of Central Europe. New York: Robert S. Speller & Sons.
- Kirschbaum, S. J. (2005) A History of Slovakia: The Struggle for Survival, 2nd ed. New York: Palgrave.
- Spiesz, A. (1992) Dejiny Slovenska: Na ceste k sebauvedomeniu (History of Slovakia: On the Road to Self-Determination). Bratislava: Vydavateľstvo Respekt.

- Sutherland, A. X. (1978) Dr. Jozef Tiso and Modern Slovakia. Cleveland: First Catholic Slovak Union.
- Tönsmeier, T. (2003) Das Dritte Reich und die Slowakei, 1939–1945. Politischer Alltag zwischen Kooperation, Paderborn: Ferdinand Schöningh.

Tisquesuza (d. 1537)

Olga Burkert

Tisquesuza was the fourth king of the indigenous tribe of the Muisca, the so-called Zipa of Bucatá. He was killed by the Spaniards while fighting their conquest of the territory of modern-day Colombia. The Muisca were part of the linguistic family of the Chibchas and Zipa was their title of nobility given to their rulers in the southern part of their territory, what is today known as the Sabana de Bogotá of Colombia. In the northern region, the so-called Zaque ruled, and the two kingdoms together were el reino de los Chibchas.

The Zipa's throne was inherited, but not directly from a patriarchal line, instead, power was given to the son of the ruler's elder sister. Tisquesuza was known as a great warrior, and apart from being the nephew of the third Zipa Nemequene, he was his commander-in-chief. After his succession to the throne, Tisquesuza continued fighting Nemequene's war against the traditional tribal rival, the Zaque Quemuenchatocha. In a war against another tribe, Tisquesuza was surprised by the arrival of the Spaniards under Gonzalo Jiménez de Quesada. In April 1536 Quesada established military headquarters in Santa Marta with 800 men and 100 horses to conquer the inland. His forces traveled down the Magdalena River to Muisca territory. Zipa ordered a close watch on the invaders to determine their intentions. On hearing of Tisquesuza's spectacular gold treasures, Quesada sought to capture and defeat his people.

Tisquesuza engaged in a broad resistance against Quesada's forces, but in face of the overwhelming technical superiority of European arms he fled to the mountains. In 1537 Zipa was assassinated by one of Quesada's soldiers, but the Spaniards had to retreat, unaware that they had killed Zipa and having failed to discover the location of the treasure. The Spanish conquistadores never were able to find Tisquesuza's gold. Two years after defeating Tisquesuza, Quesada founded Colombia's modern capital of Santa Fé de Bogotá.

Tisquesuza remains a leading popular figure in the national historical struggle of Colombia's indigenous peoples. Politicians frequently name Tisquesuza and his fierce resistance against the conquerors as an example of the bravery of the indigenous ancestors of many Colombian people.

SEE ALSO: Lempira (d. 1537); Panama, Cemaco's Anti-Colonial Resistance, 1510–1512; Túpac Amaru (ca. 1540–1572); Urracá, Cacique of Veraguas (d. 1516)

References and Suggested Readings

- Castillo, G. (2003) Caminando en el tiempo: El encuentro de tres conquistadores en la Sabana de Bogotá. Bogotá: Intermedio Editores.
- Francis, J. M. (2007) Invading Colombia: Spanish Accounts of the Gonzalo Jiménez de Quesada Expedition of Conquest. Pennsylvania: Pennsylvania State University Press.
- Friede, J. (1966) Invasión del País de los Chibchas. Bogotá: Ediciones Tercer Mundo.
- Kintto, L. (1992) Rebeliones indígenas y negras en América Latina. Quito: Editorial Abya Yal.

Tito, Josip Broz (1892–1980)

Boris Kanzleiter

Josip Broz Tito was leader of the communist anti-fascist movement in Yugoslavia during World War II that, like Albanian and Greek partisans, liberated the Balkans from Nazi occupation without assistance from foreign powers. Subsequently, Tito developed a form of socialism independent of Moscow through the establishment of "Workers' Self-management." As founder of the Non-Alignment Movement, Tito achieved widespread international respect as a statesman in the global South in the 1950s and 1960s.

Tito was born to a Slovenian mother and Croatian father on May 7, 1892 in Kumrovec, a village in Croatia, then part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. The seventh of 15 children, Tito grew up poor and began work as a waiter at 16. He then was a locksmith apprentice in the Croatian city of Sisak, where he was educated by a fellow worker in socialist ideals. In 1910 Tito became a machinist in Zagreb, joining the Metal Workers Union and Social Democratic Party. In 1911 and 1912 Tito migrated to Slovenia, Czechoslovakia, and Germany for employment, joining a successful strike in Bohemia and strengthening his socialist and labor sympathies.

Drafted into the Austro-Hungarian army in 1913, World War I was decisive to Tito's political future. He was sent to Vojvodina to fight Serb forces and then transferred to the Eastern Front against the Russians. In March 1915 Tito was wounded, captured by the Russian army, and sent to a work camp in the Ural Mountains. In 1917 Tito participated in the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, including July 1917 demonstrations in Petrograd. He enlisted with the international Red Guards, consisting mainly of former war prisoners and in 1920 returned to Croatia after the Austro-Hungarian Empire was dissolved. Croatia formed part of the new Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, renamed in 1929 the Kingdom of Yugoslavia.

In the early 1920s Tito was a communist revolutionary and joined the newly formed Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY), which attracted considerable mass support before being banned in late 1920. By the late 1920s Tito was a labor union leader and strike organizer and in June 1927 became secretary of the Metal Workers Union. In January 1928 he joined the leadership of the banned Communist Party in Zagreb. After his arrest in November 1928 Tito spent five years in several prisons, associating with fellow communists and helping organize political discussions and Marxist education.

With his release from prison in March 1934, Josip Broz was gradually recognized as an influential leader of the CPY. His party pseudonym, "Tito," was a common nickname in his region of origin. In 1935 he worked for the Balkan Comintern (Communist International) in Moscow, witnessing the Stalinist purges. At the end of 1936 he was appointed "organizational secretary" of the CPY and dispatched to Yugoslavia to reorganize the divided and weakened party.

In the autumn of 1938 Tito returned to Moscow, where he was interrogated but survived purges while other CPY leaders were arrested and shot. He was appointed the CPY's new general secretary and in early 1939 returned to Yugoslavia when the Yugoslav royal regime was in disarray due to national conflicts and economic crisis. Tito and the CPY leadership built a disciplined party organization and expanded membership and political influence. Although Tito's opinions differed with the Comintern, fundamentally he remained loyal to Moscow, defending the purges and the Hitler–Stalin pact.

On April 6, 1941, after German, Italian, Hungarian, and Bulgarian forces attacked Yugoslavia, Tito's prominence expanded dramatically. The CPY initiated armed resistance after Germany attacked the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941. Over four years of struggle Tito formed an army of more than 500,000, liberating Yugoslavia from the foreign occupiers and defeating local anti-communist collaborators, like the fascist Croatian nationalist Ustasha and monarchist Serbian Chetnics. Tito gained worldwide recognition as the leader of the Yugoslav war against fascism and was named marshal by the Anti-Fascist Council of National Liberation of Yugoslavia, and then president of a provisional government. He was identified by the majority of partisans as undisputed leader of the Yugoslav anti-fascist "People's Liberation War."

After Tito's break with Stalin in 1948, socialist Yugoslavia gained significant political and economic support from the West. Tito was invited to Washington in 1963, 1971, and 1978. With the formation of the Non-Alignment Movement in the late 1950s he was a celebrated figure also in many countries of the Third World. After his death on May 4, 1980, three days before his 88th birthday, his funeral was attended by statesmen from 128 nations.

Tito's legacy is contentious. The struggle of the communist partisans during World War II under Tito against the German Wehrmacht was an inspiring example for anti-fascists around the world and the source of Yugoslavia's international prestige in the postwar era. Under Tito's rule, standards of living improved rapidly for most as the country rebuilt infrastructure and housing after the war. In the 1960s and 1970s Yugoslavia was by many standards the most prosperous country in Eastern Europe, and citizens enjoyed the broadest political and cultural liberties of all citizens in the socialist world, and arguably greater democracy than many countries in the West.

Tito's reputation dissolved after the breakup of Yugoslavia in 1991, and he was often demonized by new nationalist movements and intellectuals dominating the political landscape. Tito's concept of "brotherhood and unity" of the South Slav (Yugoslav) people is ridiculed and some historians even condemn partisan war crimes during World War II. The Tito cult, his luxurious lifestyle, and many affairs with women are condemned, while conspiracy theories abound that the "real" Tito was a Jew, Freemason, Russian agent, or American spy. In the early 2000s a more balanced evaluation of Tito's legacy emerged that emphasizes his leadership in the partisan anti-Nazi resistance, commitment to democratic workplace governance, and independence from imperial powers.

SEE ALSO: Yugoslavia, Anti-Fascist "People's Liberation War" and Revolution, 1941–1945; Yugoslavia, Formation of the Non-Aligned Movement; Yugoslavia, Marxist Humanism, Praxis Group, and Korčula Summer School, 1964–1974; Yugoslavia, Resistance to Cominform, 1948

References and Suggested Readings

- Dedijer, V. (1980) Novi prilozii za biografiju Josipa Broza Tita, Vols. 1–2. Zagreb: Mladost.
- Djilas, M. (1980) Tito: The Story From Inside. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich.
- Pavlowitch, S. K. (1992) Tito – Yugoslavia's Great Dictator: A Reassessment. Columbus: Ohio State University Press.

Tlatelolco 1968 and the Mexican student movement

Vittorio Sergi

The movement of 1968 in Mexico was part of a worldwide social movement that year. It was characterized by the definition of a common enemy concentrated in the authoritarian state party, the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), the government, and the president of the republic, Gustavo Díaz Ordaz (1964–70). It was led by university students, who occupied the universities and organized militant mass demonstrations. The escalation of radical protests and open repression led to high levels of institutional violence. On October 2, 1968, ten days before the beginning of the Olympic Games in Mexico City, army and security forces opened fire on the student crowd on Tlatelolco Square.

From 1966 there had been an increasing tendency to autonomy by the official student organizations, supported by both the Mexican Communist Party and the more radical groups inspired by the Cuban Revolution. The spark for the movement was the heavy-handed intervention of riot police in a vocational school of the National Polytechnic Institute (IPN) in Mexico City, with the pretext of stopping a fight between different groups of students on July 23. The protest against repression soon escalated into a national claim against authoritarian government and culture. It represented a rupture in the legitimacy of the Mexican state system.

Due to the strength of the students' militant organizations against the police and the rapid growth of the protests, Prime Minister Luis Echeverría asked the army to restore public order. The army, led by General Marcelino García Barragán, was directed to use open force to strike what it considered as a communist conspiracy against the state. On July 30 the army attacked various schools and university facilities within the center of Mexico City. On August 5 in Mexico City the first student demonstration received the support of many dissident intellectuals, as well as the rector of the IPN, Wilfrido Massieu Helguera.

With an agreement between the main student groups of IPN, the National Autonomous University of Mexico (UNAM), the Autonomous University of Chapingo, and the National Teachers' Schools, the National Strike Council (CNH) was created. The CNH spread to 210 committees all over the country and 250,000 students went out on strike. It had a strong militant organization and diffusion in the metropolitan area of the Federal District and in some provinces. The CNH issued a document of public demands to the government calling for an end to the repression and respect for the student organizations, and, on August 8, declared a national strike of universities and secondary schools. Five days later the group held a large peaceful demonstration in the center of Mexico City, gaining wide popular support. It proposed a public dialogue with the government and asked for a public discussion to be broadcast on television to avoid the risk of corruption and co-optation of the students' leadership.

On August 27, a large demonstration of 400,000 ended in the Zócalo (central plaza) of Mexico City and remained there to maintain permanent pressure on the government. In the early hours of the morning, the Mexican army and police used tanks and violence to evict the crowd. In a speech on September 1, President Díaz Ordaz announced that protests would no longer be tolerated, particularly since Mexico was to host the Olympic Games beginning on October 12. On September 18, 10,000 soldiers under General José Hernández Toledo occupied UNAM, arresting 1,500 people.

On September 23, the army tried to evict the main campus of IPN, the Casco de Santo Tomás, but encountered armed resistance from the students who confronted several hundreds of riot police and soldiers. After heavy combat the security forces took over. Four students were killed and hundreds were wounded and arrested. On October 2 the CNH called for a demonstration and a speech in Tlatelolco Square, in front of the foreign ministry.

The government, led by Prime Minister Echeverría, began a planned repression with the use of covert agents and the army. The Battalion Olimpia, a covert military unit, was in charge of opening fire to provoke the reaction of several army units encircling the square. After the army opened fire on the crowd, the Battalion Olimpia started to chase down the CNH leaders, arresting many and killing others in the chaotic fights that followed the intense gunfire. A number of people were arrested, others were sentenced to detention, and others disappeared. After the massacre, the army removed the corpses to disguise the number of casualties. On October 5, the CNH claimed that 150 civilians and 40 soldiers had been killed, but it was not able to document this statement. John Rodda, a sports reporter for the Guardian newspaper in 1968, reported the number of dead as 325. The government recognized only 34 dead. In 2005 an independent investigation by an American non-governmental organization, National Security Archive, officially documented 44 dead, ten of whom were unidentified. The number of dead and disappeared has never been definitely recognized and remains an open question. The movement lasted until December with the occupation of several faculties and schools, and was then disbanded. The massacre of Tlatelolco gave impetus to the resurgence of a new wave of guerillas arising from the urban students' and workers' movement.

SEE ALSO: Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959; May 1968 French Uprisings; Student Movements

References and Suggested Readings

García Pineda, C. (2002) Testimonio de la Verdad (Tlatelolco 68). Mexico City: Editorial Claz.

- Jardón, R. (2003) El Espionaje Contra el Movimiento Estudiantil. Mexico City: Editorial Itaca.
- National Security Archive (2007) The Dead of Tlatelolco. Available at www.gwu.edu/~nsarchiv/NSAEBB/NSAEBB201/index.htm (downloaded May 15, 2008).
- Poniatowska, E. (1980) Fuerte es el Silencio. Mexico City: Editorial Era.
- Zermeño, S. (1978) México: Una Democracia Utópica. El Movimiento Estudiantil del 68. Mexico City: Siglo XXI.

Togliatti, Palmiro (1893–1964)

Mauro Stampacchia

Palmiro Togliatti was both a prominent leader of the Communist International and the secretary of the Italian Communist Party (PCI) between 1927 and his death in 1964. After the fall of Fascism he returned to Italy and contributed to shape the PCI as a new mass party, with a large electoral support and roots in the Italian working classes and society.

Togliatti was born in Genoa on March 26, 1893 and as a law student in Turin was active in the Socialist Party before World War I. During the war he was an interventionist, but he later joined the Ordine Nuovo group, and in 1921 the Communist Party. The year after, at the Congress in Rome, he was elected to the Central Committee. He then worked with Antonio Gramsci at the Congress in Lyon in 1926 to draft the Lyon Thesis, which became the political statement of the new Gramsci leadership. Togliatti attended the 5th Congress of the International in Moscow in 1924 and was elected to its Executive Committee.

The final takeover of Fascism and the disrupting of the Communist Party in 1926 found Togliatti in the USSR, where he was to become one of the foremost leaders of the International, one of the few not from the Russian Communist Party. However, his full support for Joseph Stalin and Nikolai Bukharin against Leon Trotsky brought him into conflict with Gramsci. Togliatti then succeeded Ruggiero Grieco as secretary of the PCI in 1927, a position he was to hold for the rest of his life.

Togliatti, with the battle name of Ercoli, played fundamental roles in all the internal conflicts of the Communist International. He kept close to Stalin, not only in supporting the building of socialism in one country, but also in backing up after 1928 the new sectarian course known as the “socialfascism” period, though he does not seem to have shared this position completely.

When the 7th Congress in 1935 initiated the new “popular front” course, Togliatti was one of the foremost supporters of the new anti-Fascist alliance. In 1935 he published Lezioni sul fascismo, a series of lectures on Fascism in which he formulated the idea that Fascism was a “mass reactionary regime” that could draw consent from the middle classes and in Italian society as a whole. After July 1937 he was in Spain as a Comintern agent to enforce Stalin’s directives, which included the persecution of left-wing anarchists and Trotskyists. In 1938 he approved the execution of the whole Polish communist leadership, as well as the Grand Terror trials in the USSR. After the fall of republican Spain he was sent to France, where he was arrested in September 1939. Once released, he returned to the USSR, where he encountered a period of disgrace. He was accused by Gramsci’s widow of being an obstacle to the attempts to liberate Gramsci from prison, and he disagreed on the divulgation of Gramsci’s prison writings.

The anti-Fascist policies that the USSR embraced after being attacked by Germany in June 1941, and the fall of Fascism in Italy, gave him a new chance to affirm his political leadership. In March 1944 he returned to liberated Italy and used his influence and political stature, somewhat legendary among the communists, to negotiate a common stance in the Resistance between moderate monarchists and the more radical parties, communists included. The king would yield to his son Umberto as Lieutenant as soon as Rome was liberated, and it was agreed that the political and constitutional questions of monarchy vs. republic would be handled only after the end of the war, through a Constituent Assembly. In the meantime, anti-Fascist parties of the Comitato di Liberazione Nazionale would be part of the executive, in the context of a politics of national unity.

During the Resistance and the postwar Constituent Assembly period, Italian communists were led by Togliatti (who held the post of minister of justice and subsequently of vice premier) into playing a national role. Only the Cold War disrupted this policy, and in May 1947 socialists and communists were left out of the executive and were defeated in the general elections of April 18, 1948. Then, in a July 14, 1948 assassination attempt, Togliatti was severely wounded, and a general protest strike extended spontaneously to most of Italy, but the party leadership he had molded stood firm in not letting it get out of hand. Togliatti had devoted much of his political influence to avoid the Greek model of a communist insurrection.

During the Cold War Togliatti strongly backed the socialist camp theory of the USSR, but at the same time tried to limit its influence. He also sought to keep in check the radicalism and militancy inside the CPI, much under the influence of Pietro Secchia. He chose to transform the CPI into a mass party, with roots in factories and among peasants. “A party seat in every village” had been the organizational formula. The electoral turnout of the PCI under Togliatti’s leadership kept growing steadily.

In 1951 Togliatti refused Stalin’s proposal to go back to Moscow to lead the Cominform. The strong link with Soviet communism was a constant in Togliatti’s policy, but he also worked to gain full access and respectability in Italian politics. He pursued this goal at the cost of being considered by some a “double faced” political personality, shaped in ambiguity. Despite this characterization, Togliatti was a fine, if not shrewd, politician and a man of great culture. One of his contributions to the cultural policy of postwar Italy was the publication of a first (abridged) edition of Gramsci’s Quaderni.

In 1956 Togliatti had to face two main problems. In March Nikita Khrushchev, at the PCUS 20th Congress, denounced Stalin’s crimes, and Togliatti advanced the idea of policentrism in the international communist movement. But when the Hungarian revolt took place in November, he denounced it as a counterrevolution and gave his support to the Soviet invasion, encountering dissent from inside his party, as well as from union leaders and intellectuals who had expressed their sympathy to the PCI. For Togliatti, the national road to socialism did not imply major conflicts with Soviet leadership or a strong criticism of ideas that had been so far shared with Soviet leaders. The Sino-Soviet dispute saw Togliatti active on an international basis. Although an ally of Soviet Russia and a supporter of “peaceful coexistence,” he refuted the Soviet condemnation of communist China, as it defied his “polycentrism.”

Togliatti died in August 21, 1964 in Yalta, before a meeting in which he and other Soviet leaders were scheduled to tackle such hot matters. He had prepared a text, known as Memoriale di Yalta, to serve the purpose of political confrontation on international and Italian issues. This document, which suggested a different approach, could be considered his political testament. He called for actions based not on ideology but on current political issues, especially in response to Chinese (and Albanian) dissent, and he disagreed with an international conference to condemn dissent and advocated one that would gather communist parties in capitalist countries and liberation movements in former colonies. He stood for international actions of unions, and for communists to become “champions of freedom in intellectual life, of free artistic creation and scientific progress,” even advocating dialogue with Italian Catholics (Togliatti 1988).

After his death, the city of Stavropol in Samara province was renamed Togliattigrad in his memory. His funeral in Rome drew an extraordinary crowd, revealing his popularity, even if he is now controversial in both historiography and political studies.

SEE ALSO: Bordiga, Amadeo (1889–1970) and the Italian Communist Party; Dimitrov, Georgi (1882–1949); Gramsci, Antonio (1891–1937); Italian Communist Party; Italian Socialist Party; Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and “Revolution from Above”; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)

References and Suggested Readings

- Agosti, A. (2008) Palmiro Togliatti: A Biography. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Agosti, G. (1999) Togliatti. Turin: Utet.
- Aga Rossi, E. & Zaslavski, V. (1997) Togliatti e Stalin. Il PCI e la politica estera staliniana negli archivi di Mosca. Bologna: Il Mulino.
- Di Loreto, P. (1991) Togliatti e la “doppiezza”: il Pci tra democrazia e insurrezione (1944–49). Bologna: Il Mulino.
- Ragionieri, E. (1976) Palmiro Togliatti. Per una biografia politica ed intellettuale. Rome: Editori Riuniti.
- Togliatti, P. (1967–73) Opere. Rome: Editori Riuniti.
- Togliatti, P. (1970) Lezioni sul fascismo. Rome: Editori Riuniti.
- Togliatti, P. (1988) Il memoriale di Yalta. Palermo: Sellerio.
- Urban, J. B. (1986) Moscow and the Italian Communist Party: From Togliatti to Berlinguer. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Toivo Ya Toivo, Andimba (b. 1924)

Tilman Dederling

Hermann Andimba Toivo Ya Toivo was born on August 22, 1924 at Omangundu in Oshana Region of Namibia, near the Angolan border. After obtaining primary and secondary education in northern Namibia, Ya Toivo fought for the British in World War II from 1942 to 1943. After the war he initially worked as a teacher in Namibia and then moved to Cape Town employed as a railway police officer from 1952 to 1953. While in Cape Town, Ya Toivo joined with a network of other black Namibian expatriates and with black and anti-apartheid activists from all races and political persuasions. In 1957 he joined the South African National Congress (ANC) and Ya Toivo helped found the Ovamboland People's Congress (OPC), the precursor of the Ovamboland People's Organization (OPO), and forerunner to the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO).

In cooperation with Mburumba Kerina and Michael Scott, Ya Toivo petitioned the United Nations in 1958 protesting South Africa's occupation of Namibia. The apartheid government reacted by deporting Ya Toivo from Cape Town to Namibia, where he was placed under house arrest in Ovamboland. While under surveillance, Ya Toivo remained active in the community of political dissidents in Namibia, in 1965 meeting with the first combatants from SWAPO's armed wing that filtered into Namibia to agitate among the indigenous population. In 1966, when SWAPO formally launched an armed struggle against the occupying forces, Ya Toivo was arrested and taken to South Africa with other compatriots. In solitary confinement for more than a year, Ya Toivo and his co-accused were sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment by the Pretoria Supreme Court in 1968. His speech in the dock, condemning South Africa's occupation of Namibia, made international headlines.

Ya Toivo survived the hardships of imprisonment on notorious Robben Island and was eventually released on March 1, 1984, serving 16 of his 20-year sentence. After a brief stay in Namibia he went into exile in Zambia. In Lusaka, Zambia, Ya Toivo met Sam Nujoma, the president of SWAPO, for the first time and became a member of the SWAPO Central Committee and Politburo and appointed secretary-general. During Namibia's transformation to independence Ya Toivo was a member of the Constituent Assembly. After independence, Ya Toivo was appointed to ministerial portfolios in the Namibian government, including Mines and Energy, Labor, and finally Prisons and Correctional Services. After retiring in 2005 Ya Toivo became a senior advisor at an international oil and gas company. In 2007 Ya Toivo lost reelection to SWAPO's Central Committee and Politburo, according to critical observers, due to his siding with a small splinter group that seceded from the organization.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Apartheid Movement, South Africa

References and Suggested Readings

- Dierks, K. (2002) Chronology of Namibian History: From Pre-Historical Times to Independent Namibia, 2nd ed. Windhoek: Namibia Scientific Society.
- Emmet, T. (1999) Popular Resistance and the Roots of Nationalism in Namibia, 1915–1966. Namibia Studies Series, 4. Basel: P Schlettwein Publishing.
- Hopwood, G. (2006) Guide to Namibian Politics, 2nd ed. Windhoek: Namibia Institute for Democracy.
- Nujoma, S. (2001) Where Others Wavered. My Life in SWAPO and My Participation in the Liberation Struggle of Namibia. The Autobiography of Sam Nujoma. London: Panaf.

Tolpuddle Martyrs, Britain, 1834

Paul A. Pickering

Successive wage reductions in Dorset, England in the early 1830s prompted a small group of agricultural laborers in the village of Tolpuddle to establish a trade union. Known as the Friendly Society of Agricultural Labourers, the aim and resolution of the members was simple: not to work for less than 10 shillings a week. Although restrictions on "combinations," the blanket term covering associations of workers, had been eased, trade unions were still regarded with fear and suspicion by the British elite. The Tolpuddle laborers had followed a longstanding ritual and sworn an oath to underscore their determination, leading local landowners to complain until the laborers were arrested for contravening the 1797 Mutiny Act that had made it illegal for individuals to swear oaths of loyalty to each other.

The laborers were united by ties of flesh and blood as well as trade and neighborhood. Led by George Loveless, a Methodist preacher, the society met in the house of his brother in law, Thomas Standfield. Both these men were arrested, along with James Brine, James Hammett, George's brother, James Loveless, and Thomas's son, John Standfield. Despite no evidence of any seditious purpose on the part of the hapless laborers, at their trial they were treated very harshly and given the maximum sentence of transportation for 7 years to Australia. The laborers remained defiant in the face of persecution, and this contributed to their celebrity.

Petitions calling for their release were collected all over the country, culminating in a massive procession through the streets of London in 1834. In Parliament their cause was taken up by popular radicals, including Feargus O'Connor, a rising star in the radical movement who would go on to lead the Chartists. Like others, O'Connor focused on the hypocrisy of the incumbent Whig government that had come to power on a wave of popular support in the early 1830s. The Dorchester Unionists had "erred without a knowledge of the law," but members of the Cabinet were the ones who "had been the prime movers and actors in all the transactions which had for their object the promotion of political change by means of unions of the working classes."

The public outcry wore down the resolve of the government. All, except James Hammett, were released in 1836. Four of the six returned to England to a rousing welcome before moving to Ontario, Canada, where they are commemorated for their contribution to the labor movement. Hammett was released in 1837 and returned to Tolpuddle where he remained. He died in the Dorchester workhouse in 1891.

SEE ALSO: Chartists; O'Connor, Feargus (1796–1855)

References and Suggested Readings

- Loveless, G. (1837/1946) The Victims of Whiggery: A Statement of the Persecutions Experienced by the Dorchester labourers with a Report of their Trial. Hobart: privately published.
- Marlow, J. (1971) The Tolpuddle Martyrs. London: History Book.

Tolstoy, Leo N. (1828–1910)

*Alexandre J. M. E.
Christoyannopoulos*

Leo N. Tolstoy is one of the world's most esteemed authors of literature for his War and Peace (1869) and Anna Karenina (1887), but he is also the most famous proponent of Christian anarchist ideas. Although this more controversial part of his legacy was a target for suppression and misinformation during the Soviet era, his writings did influence figures like Mohandas Gandhi and Ammon Hennacy, as well as ordinary people in the wider pacifist movement.

After a long and increasingly acute existential crisis which he later narrated in A Confession (1879), Tolstoy converted to a deeply rationalistic, deistic version of Christianity toward the end of the 1870s. For him, the essence of Christianity was to be found in the Sermon on the Mount, where Jesus teaches not to resist evil with evil but to turn the other cheek instead. Tolstoy pondered this teaching and eventually concluded it to be the most rational idea ever pronounced, the only remedy for humanity to overcome the cycle of violence that has plagued human relations from time immemorial.

He accused the church of burying this revolutionary teaching in exchange for political power, and he blamed the state for perpetuating violence and slavery to the advantage of the well-to-do classes. For the last 30 years of his life, in numerous letters, essays, and books such as What I Believe (1884), The Kingdom of God is Within You (1893), and The Slavery of Our Times (1900), he used his talent to write intensive criticisms of both church and state, but also of any revolutionary group opting for the use of violence against these institutions. He wanted humanity to wake up from what he saw as its hypnotic submission to the lies, myths, and rituals maintained by the ruling classes, but he insisted that this also required a strict rejection of violence as a revolutionary method.

Despite being censored in tsarist Russia, Tolstoy's writings were widely circulated both in Russia and abroad. He also wrote letters directly to the clergy and to public officials pleading with them to repent, the only substantial result of which was his excommunication in 1901. His followers were arrested and persecuted, and while Tolstoy longed to share this burden with them, the authorities did not want to make him a martyr. In the meantime, he forewent most of the luxurious habits he had grown into (he was born an aristocrat), became a vegetarian, worked the land, and generally strove to emulate as much as he could the simple life of Russian peasants which he admired. He also welcomed many distinguished visitors to Yasnaya Polyana (his home), and diligently answered the many letters from around the world that inquired about his ideas.

His political writings no longer circulate as widely as they once did, but they have inspired many conscientious objectors, Christians, and pacifists for over a century.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Russia; Day, Dorothy (1897–1980); Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (1869–1948); Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907

References and Suggested Readings

- Christoyannopoulos, A. J. M. E. (2008) Leo Tolstoy on the State: A Detailed Picture of Tolstoy's Denunciation of State Violence and Deception. Anarchist Studies 16 (1): forthcoming.
- Hopton, T. (2000) Tolstoy, God and Anarchism. Anarchist Studies 8: 27–52.
- Marshall, P. (1993) Leo Tolstoy: The Count of Peace. In Demanding the Impossible: A History of Anarchism. London: Fontana.
- Maude, A. (1930) The Life of Tolstoy, 2 vols. London: Oxford University Press.
- Tolstoy, L. (1990) Government is Violence: Essays on Anarchism and Pacifism. Ed. D. Stephens. London: Phoenix.

Tone, Theobald Wolfe (1763–1798)

Karen Sonnelitter

Theobald Wolfe Tone was an Irish nationalist and political writer. He was born in Dublin on June 20, 1763 into a wealthy middle-class family, but its fortunes declined with a downturn in his father's coach-building business in the late 1770s. Theobald entered Trinity College in 1781, was suspended briefly for dueling, and graduated in 1786 before going on to train as a barrister. In 1785 he married Matilda Witherington, cloping with her to the disapproval of her family. His career as a barrister commenced in 1789, and in 1790 he began writing pro-Whig political pamphlets.

At about that same time, Tone became friends with Thomas Russell, who asked him to compile resolutions for a political club that radical Dissenters (Presbyterians) planned to establish in Belfast on July 14, 1791, the second anniversary of the fall of the Bastille. Tone's resolutions were initially rejected because they included the demand for Catholic emancipation. In response he wrote An Argument on Behalf of the Catholics of Ireland, a persuasive tract that led the Dissenters to drop their objections and invite Tone to Belfast for the founding of the Society of United Irishmen. Tone thereafter gained a reputation as a political writer for both the United Irishmen and the Catholic Committee.

In 1794 Tone's radicalization deepened through political collaboration with William Jackson, an agent of revolutionary France. Jackson was betrayed to the authorities and arrested, prompting Tone to flee to the United States in 1795. The following year he went to Paris with the aim of negotiating French military assistance for the Irish independence struggle. He was commissioned as an officer in the French military with the expectation of commanding an invasion of Ireland to challenge British rule. When the Rebellion broke out in Ireland in 1798, Tone was authorized to lead a small French force in a raid on the coast. His ship was captured by an English squadron, however, and he was taken prisoner. He was tried and convicted by a military court and sentenced to be publicly hanged. Tone considered hanging an unbearable humiliation, so he cut his own throat the night before his scheduled execution and died a week later, on November 18, 1798. Tone's wife and children remained in France, and his journals were published posthumously by his son in 1826.

Wolfe Tone's martyrdom, and the courageous and eloquent defense of Irish independence he expressed at his trial, won him the admiration of later generations of Irish revolutionaries who have immortalized him as "the father of Irish republicanism."

SEE ALSO: Fitzgerald, Lord Edward (1763–1798); Ireland, Age of Revolutions, 1775–1803; Ireland, Great

Rebellion, 1798; Napper Tandy, James (1737?–1803); O'Connor, Arthur (1763–1852); United Irishmen

References and Suggested Readings

- Curtin, N. J. (1998) The United Irishmen: Popular Politics in Ulster and Dublin, 1791–1798. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Elliott, M. (1989) Wolfe Tone: Prophet of Irish Independence. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Knox, O. (1997) Rebels and Informers: Stirrings of Irish Independence. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Tone, T. W. (1826/1998) Life of Theobald Wolfe Tone. Ed. T. Bartlett. Dublin: Lilliput.

Torres Restrepo, Camilo (1929–1966)

Edward T. Brett

Camilo Torres Restrepo was born into an upper-class family from Bogotá, Colombia on February 3, 1929. After studying law at the Universidad Nacional in Bogotá, he entered the seminary to study for the Catholic priesthood. Following his ordination in 1954, he was sent to the Pontifical Roman Catholic University of Louvain in Belgium to do graduate work in political science and sociology. After earning a licentiate, he returned to Colombia where he co-founded the sociology faculty with Orlando Fals Borda at the Universidad Nacional in Bogotá and served as national chaplain of the university student movement. During this time he also worked with various popular organizations devoted to social justice, especially agrarian reform.

Influenced by Fidel Castro's Marxist revolution and some of the more radical theological intellectual movements in the Catholic Church, he began to cooperate with Marxist activists in his pursuit of social justice. In January 1965 he formed the Frente Unido (United Front), a leftist coalition dedicated to radical social reform, but through non-violent, lawful means. This brought the wrath of the Colombian Catholic hierarchy upon him and when the conservative prelate of Bogotá, Cardinal Luis Concha, forbade him to lecture, speak, or write on social problems and ordered him to resign from his professorship, he asked the cardinal to release him from active priesthood. On June 18, 1965 Concha granted him his request, but noted that he was being laicized because he rejected the doctrines and ordinances of the Catholic church.

The Frente Unido quickly grew in numbers, prompting authorities to accuse Torres of being a Marxist-Leninist. In his "Message to the Communists" he denied this, stating that as a Christian and a priest he could never become a communist. Nonetheless, he added that he was willing to collaborate with everyone, regardless of their affiliation, who attempts to improve the world. When security forces arrested several members of the Frente Unido, Torres concluded that the elite-based Colombian power structure would never allow peaceful change and that violent revolution was therefore necessary. In early 1965 he began to meet secretly with representatives of the Ejército de Liberación Nacional (Army of National Liberation) (ELN), a Marxist guerrilla group organized after the Cuban model. On October 18, 1965 he publicly announced that he had joined the ELN as a low-ranking combatant. Claiming that Marxism and Christianity were compatible, he attempted to provide spiritual direction to his fellow combatants. Since the ELN guerrillas were poorly armed, they planned an ambush of an army patrol in the department of Santander. Torres, who had not yet experienced combat, convinced his superiors to let him take part. On February 15, 1966 he died in his first battle.

Seeing the propaganda value of Torres' death, the ELN declared him a revolutionary martyr. Consequently, throughout the 1960 and 1970s, he served as an inspiration for some leftist Christians, such as Néstor Paz in Bolivia, Maryknoll Father Thomas Melville in Guatemala, and Sacred Heart Father Gaspar García Laviana in Nicaragua, motivating them to join guerrilla movements as "Christian revolutionaries."

SEE ALSO: Bogotazo and La Violencia; Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959; Ejército de Liberación Nacional, Colombia; Gaitán, Jorge Eliécer (1898–1948), UNIR, and Revolutionary Populism in Colombia; Lame, Manuel Quintín (1880–1967), Indian/Peasant Organization, and the Struggle for Land in Colombia, 1920s–1930s

References and Suggested Readings

- Guzman, G. (1969) Camilo Torres. Trans. J. D. Ring. New York: Sheed & Ward.
- Torres, C. (1972) Father Camilo Torres: Revolutionary Writings. New York: Harper & Row.

Torrijos, General Omar (1929–1981)

Inga Töller

General Omar Torrijos Herrera was a military dictator of the Panamanian Republic between 1968 and 1981. He took power by a coup d'état in 1968. His politics were formed by progressive and nationalist policies with a focus on the rural areas, social security, health, and education. He also wanted to regain the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone from the United States and thus recover national sovereignty.

Torrijos was born to rural teachers on February 13, 1929 in Santiago, in the province of Veraguas, Panama. He earned a scholarship to the Military Academy in El Salvador and there he achieved the rank of 2nd lieutenant of infantry. In 1952 he started working with the Panamanian National Guard (the national army), where he became lieutenant colonel in 1966.

After his third reelection on October 1, 1968, the former oligarchic and fascist president, Dr. Arnulfo Arias, who was deposed three times by military coups backed by the National Guard, decided to restructure the National Guard and the overseas delegation and demote several of the high commanders. This was what spurred Torrijos, who was then secretary of the Commander's Office of the National Guard, and Major Boris Martínez, to carry out the coup d'état on October 10, 1968. After the takeover, Martínez first held the highest position in the Panamanian state, but he was sent overseas by Torrijos in 1969, after an unapproved speech Martínez gave on public television. Torrijos then began to act as head of state.

Torrijos' national politics were marked by several reforms in favor of the poor, which helped him gain great support from the Panamanian poor, working class, and parts of the middle classes in urban as well as rural areas. His reforms included the division of the ministry on work and welfare, social provision and public health, opening of communitarian health centers, implementation of public vaccinations, a rise in the numbers of employees in the public health sector, and enforcement of communitarian allotments for food production, so that by 1972 the health and social system had improved considerably. Housing was also increased. The educational sector experienced major changes in institutions; for example, the foundation of the Institute for the Formation and Utilization of the Human Resources and the National Institute of Culture. Moreover, the numbers of matriculations in primary and secondary schools increased 90 percent, and in universities 180 percent. More schools were built and more personnel were employed. Minor changes occurred in the agrarian sector where the government bought land and built settlements for the poor. Agrarian Councils were formed. A major change was the new constitution and the new legislation in 1972, which implied a new governmental structure and gave Torrijos the provisional title of chief of the government (1972–8) and nearly absolute power.

The student and popular social movement held a divided position concerning Torrijos. The group that allied with Torrijos saw him as a progressive, anti-imperialistic and anti-oligarchic force, and saw in his military government a new armed force supporting major social change. His opponents argued for an anti-militarist government with no links to the political oligarchy. Other leftist groups such as Marxist MLN-29 and Marxist-Leninist MUR, which saw themselves in the tradition of the Cuban Revolution, were opposed to Torrijos' military leadership and suffered the repressive violence of Torrijos' military forces.

Torrijos' major aim was to recover the sovereignty of Panama and to end the colonial enclave within the Panamanian Republic by regaining the Panama Canal and its Canal Zone. In order to browbeat the United States to end the unequal treaty of 1903, Torrijos sought international support. Supporters of this cause were Tito in Yugoslavia, Velasco Alvarado in Peru, Bánzer in Bolivia, Perón in Argentina, and Portillo in Mexico. Finally, the Torrijos-Carter Treaty was signed on September 7, 1977 in Washington, which promised to return the Panama Canal and its Zone to Panama on December 31, 1999.

Torrijos also formed relationships with the Latin American socialist countries. He supported the Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) in Nicaragua against the Somoza dictatorship and the Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front (FMLN) for national freedom in El Salvador. He assisted the Summit of the Non-Aligned Countries in Cuba in 1979. His international politics were marked by dialogue, not by confrontation. This is why he met with different parties of conflicting groups and invited them to Panama for discussions, a strategy which was criticized by the occidental powers.

On July 31, 1981 Torrijos died in an airplane crash. There is debate about whether this was an accident or whether it was an assassination. Public opinion on Omar Torrijos was and is today strongly polarized in Panama. On the one hand, he is praised for his social governance and for his international politics and his work as a mediator and negotiator between conflicts. On the other hand, he is accused of using repressive methods against his political opponents, and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights in 1978 accused him of violating human rights, citing “disappearances” of his enemies. His oldest son Martín Torrijos won the elections for the presidency in 2004, but in public dissociates himself from his father’s politics.

SEE ALSO: Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front (FMLN); Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN); Tito, Josip Broz (1892–1980)

References and Suggested Readings

- De León Jiménez, E. M. (1996) Torrijos: Un camino por correr. Panama: Fundación Omar Torrijos.
- Escobar Bethancourt, R. (1981) Torrijos: ¡Colonia Americana, No! Bogotá: Carlos Valencia Editores.
- Greene, G. (1984) Getting to Know the General: The Story of an Involvement. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Vargas, D. (2004) Omar Torrijos Herrera y la Patria Internacional. Panama: Fundación Omar Torrijos.

Tory rebellion, Ireland

G. K. Peatling

“Tory rebellion” is most commonly used in Irish history to refer to elite and popular Protestant resistance to concessions to Catholic nationalist interests. “Tory,” however, arose in mid-seventeenth-century Ireland as a term applied to outlaws, often assumed to have been dispossessed Catholics, although they may have had little political motivation. Later in the century it was imported into British politics as a term of derision applied to supporters of conservative Anglo-Catholicism and Jacobitism. Applications of the term shifted as the Jacobite threat receded, and late eighteenth-century “Tories” resumed a close relationship to the British monarchy and the Protestant establishment.

By the nineteenth century, therefore, by association, supporters of the British establishment in Ireland – a predominantly Anglican group – were being labeled “Tories.” While the British political “Tory” party became more commonly referred to as the “Conservative” party in the nineteenth century, “Tory” continued to be used thereafter as a term of affirmation and derision. Most definitively, opposition to home rule by Protestant “Tories” backed by English “Tories,” especially in Ulster in the period 1911–14, is conceived of as Tory rebellion. This “rebellion” frustrated demands for home rule, and ultimately helped to avert the establishment of an all-Ireland jurisdiction. An echo of “Tory rebellion” thus appeared in protests intended to preserve a position of strength for Protestants in late twentieth-century Northern Ireland.

“Tory rebellion” has thus been a persistent if changing phenomenon in modern Irish history. A cognate historiographical debate pertains to how far it was a manifestation of rooted differences between Britain and even unionist Ireland (Jackson 1989; Loughlin 1995: 33–7). For Stewart (1977), “Tory rebellion” was a historically embedded democratic movement, dependent on the united support of Protestant communities often acting in the teeth of British government policy. Fanning (2004), however, suggests that in the crucial context of 1911–14, Tory rebellion was dependent on collusion within elements of the British ruling class and establishment itself, suggesting it was an example of counterrevolution. But “Tory rebellion” has not always been effective in Irish history, as the ultimate failure of resistance to Catholic emancipation and disestablishment in the nineteenth century shows.

SEE ALSO: Ireland, the Troubles; Irish Nationalism, Irish Revolts, 1400–1790; Jacobite Risings, Britain, 1715 and 1745

References and Suggested Readings

- Boyce, D. G. & O’Day, A. (Eds.) (2006) The Ulster Crisis. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Fanning, R. (2004) The Home Rule Crisis of 1912–14 and the Failure of British Democracy in Ireland. In M. J. Bric & J. Coakley (Eds.), From Political Violence to Negotiated Settlement: The Winding Path to Peace in Twentieth-Century Ireland. Dublin: University College Dublin Press.

- Jackson, A. (1989) The Ulster Party: Irish Unionists in the House of Commons, 1884–1911. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Loughlin, J. L. (1995) Ulster Unionism and British National Identity since 1885. London: Pinner.
- Prest, W. R. (1998) Albion Ascendant: English History, 1660–1815. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Stewart, A. T. Q. (1977) The Narrow Ground: Aspects of Ulster, 1609–1969. London: Faber & Faber.

Toussaint Louverture and the Haitian Revolution, 1796–1799

Alexander King

Political developments in revolutionary France naturally ran up against a solid front of rejection from neighboring European monarchies. This rejection became all the more uncompromising with the increasing radicalization of the revolutionary process leading up to the proclaiming of the Republic. During the trial of the deposed King Louis XVI before the National Convention, which led to his execution in January 1793, the hostilities in Europe intensified until the outbreak of the French Revolutionary Wars beginning in 1792. On February 1, 1793 France declared war on Britain, which had taken the leadership position among the monarchist opponents of the Revolution. Then on March 7, 1793 France declared war on Spain. France was now engaged in war on several fronts: internally against the counterrevolution, at its borders against the hostile European powers, and in the Caribbean for its colonies. In 1793 both Spain and Britain took advantage of the turmoil that had befallen the colony of Saint-Domingue and attempted to take this potentially lucrative colony away from France.

The economic prosperity of the French half of the island had all along aroused the envy and greed of the Spanish colonial masters of Santo Domingo. For this reason, since the beginning of the slave revolt in Saint-Domingue in 1791, sporadically there had been small, rather informal acts of assistance by Spanish soldiers to the insurgents. Principally, though, Spain at first remained neutral. However, under the impact of the increasing antagonism between France and Spain in the wake of the revolutionary process in France – and prior to the French-Spanish War – neutrality was abandoned in the Caribbean

Toussaint Louverture (1743–1803) was the influential leader of the Haitian Revolution who abolished slavery and led the French colony of Saint-Domingue to independence. After his conquests in Haiti, Louverture invaded Santo Domingo where he also freed the enslaved. He is credited with defeating imperial armies from France, Spain, and Great Britain. (Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images) as well. In February 1793 the governor of Santo Domingo, Joaquín García y Moreno, began a systematic recruitment of black insurgents from Saint-Domingue for his armed forces. He offered the insurgents freedom in exchange for putting themselves under the Spanish flag. But it was the aim of the Spaniards to take advantage of the moment to bring the entire island under their rule in order to preserve the old colonial order – including slavery.

Jean-François and Biassou, who had headed the insurgency since the outbreak of the revolts in the summer of 1791, put themselves under Spanish command in May 1793; Toussaint Louverture did the same in June. What at first glance appears to be a joining together of insurmountably opposed interests – the slaves' drive for emancipation versus the aim of the Spanish crown to preserve the old colonial order – had its basis not only in an agreement regarding military strategy, but also in an agreement in the realm of ideas. In accordance with their beliefs and the traditions of the societies from which they came, the black insurgents of the northern plains were not in the least republican; on the contrary, they were fervently royalist. The rebel leader, Macaya, who in 1793 would drive out the royalist Galbaud from Cap Français on behalf of the Jacobin Sonthonax, had as late as the early 1790s compared the three kings of France, Spain, and the Congo to the three kings of the nativity account in the Bible. The insurgents also believed that the French king, Louis XVI, was on their side. In the summer of 1791 a rumor had spread throughout the colony that the king had, in line with the demands of the insurgents, ordered the abolishment of the whip and an increase in the slaves' leisure time; but, according to the rumor, the king's order was being boycotted by the white planters of Saint-Domingue, and the king himself was being held hostage by scoundrels in France. The insurgents therefore adorned themselves with the insignia of the monarchy to express their solidarity with the king, whom they saw as their benefactor, and they repeatedly declared that they were fighting for the king.

In the summer the Plaine du Nord and the adjacent parts of the mountain range directly to the south, Massif du Nord, were fully outside the control of the French government. The insurgents had established a kind of liberated zone on the ascent to the Massif du Nord, which is the natural border between the Plaine du Nord in the North, the central Haitian plateau in the South (under Spanish sovereignty at that time), and the Vallée de l'Arbimonite in the Southwest. This liberated zone extended from Ouanaminthe in the East and Vallière in the Southeast to the Grande-Rivière-du-Nord and Dondon in the West. Within this area slavery was at least at times abolished. Above all, this territory included the French colony's former northern border with the neighboring Spanish colony. The insurgents therefore had an "open line of communication with Spanish Santo Domingo," as Bell (2007: 38) puts it. Biassou and Jean-François had established themselves along the Spanish border in the mountains of the Massif du Nord; the scarcely populated Spanish central plateau to the South served as a convenient retreat and source of supplies. Toussaint Louverture had already spent the autumn of 1791 there in safety together with his wife and children.

After the execution of Louis XVI the black insurgents fought against the Republic with all the more determination and finally went over to the side of the Spanish monarchy; there their leaders quickly took leading positions in the battle against the French troops. Both Biassou and Jean-François rose to high military rank and were honored with awards. Their defection to the Spanish flag turned the liberated zone into Spanish-occupied territory, which Biassou and Jean-François divided between themselves: the latter took command over the eastern part, from Ouanaminthe to the Grande-Rivière-du-Nord; Biassou took command over the mountainous region south and west of Grande-Rivière-du-Nord and the adjacent region to the west between Dondon and Limbé. Toussaint Louverture, who had joined with Biassou in November 1791, followed him and Jean-François to the Spanish side and, like them, made a career for himself in the Spanish army. Within half a year he had reached the rank of lieutenant general in the royal army.

There were 14,000 black recruits in the ranks of the Spanish governor's troops. With their help the Spaniards were able to conquer large parts of the northern part of Saint-Domingue (Massif du Nord, Artibonite). The conflicts of interest between the black insurgents and their Spanish allies soon became clear, however, especially after the French commissioners Sonthonax and Polverel abolished slavery in Saint-Domingue. The contradictions on the Spanish side became all the more clearly accentuated in 1794, when hundreds of former French plantation owners poured into the Spanish-occupied parts of Saint-Domingue in the hope that the new rulers would give them their plantations and slaves again. Jean-François answered these hopes with a massacre: in July 1794 he had several hundred French planters killed in Fort-Dauphin under the eyes of the Spanish troops. But he, like Biassou, stayed with the Spanish when Toussaint Louverture switched sides and joined the French army in May 1794. Following the Spanish defeat and the 1795 Peace Treaty of Basel, Biassou and Jean-François left the island. Biassou settled in Florida, while Jean-François settled in Spain.

When Toussaint Louverture and his 4,000 troops joined forces with the French army, the fortunes of the war changed. In October 1794 Toussaint Louverture conquered the border towns of the Saint Raphaël and Saint Michel for the French. The Spaniards were beaten. Also, in Europe, the war ended with France victorious and thus able to gain recognition as a European power on an equal footing with other nations. Per the Treaty of Basel, Spain was forced to cede its colony of Santo Domingo to France in July 1795.

British Intervention and Alliance with White Planters

Fearing loss of ownership of their plantations and slaves – and in the hope of preserving the old colonial order from which they had profited – French planters had, after the outbreak of the revolutions in France and in Saint-Domingue, repeatedly made secret attempts to form an alliance with France’s arch-enemy, Great Britain; they even offered to place themselves under the sovereignty of the British crown.

As in the case of the confrontation between Spain and France, the British military intervention in Saint-Domingue came in the wake of the war in Europe. In September 1793, 600 British soldiers came from Jamaica and landed in Môle Saint Nicolas on the northwestern coast of Saint-Domingue. Like Spain, Britain had the dual goal of seizing a potentially rich colony and simultaneously containing the spread of revolutionary ideas in the Caribbean. The resident white planters welcomed the British invaders with joyous acclaim. The subsequent landings of British troops on other parts of the western coast of Saint-Domingue (Léogane, Arcahaie, Saint-Marc) were also met with rejoicing by the white population, which supported the British invasion in the hope that it would provide security for the preservation of the slave economy.

During the first years of the war the British were able to push forward to Mirebalais and Lascahobas in the East and to Grande-Rivière-du-Nord in the North and to bring a third of Saint-Domingue under their control – supported by the militias of the white planters. Despite some effort, they were not able to establish an alliance with the Spaniards, even though the Spaniards were their allies in the war in Europe. The desire to take possession of the rich colony of Saint-Domingue was simply too strong. Therefore, the powers fought in different regions of the colony: Britain in the West and in the South and Spain in the North and in the East, and without getting in each other’s way.

Disease and the tropical heat took their toll on the British troops, just as on the Spanish troops, and brought their advance to a halt. The hope of conquering the colony for Britain gave way to a defensive war with the sole aim of holding established positions and not losing them to the adversary. All in all, 20,000 British soldiers were deployed in Saint-Domingue, assisted by several thousand colonists and German merchants. The governor of Jamaica was their military commander and was at the same time governor of the British zone of Saint-Domingue. He sought close cooperation with the white planters. Outside the cities, British authority was frequently enforced by the French planters’ militias, in which black mercenaries also fought.

The economic results of the British invasion were mixed. In some communities, where the supremacy of the French planters and their British protector had been secured (for example, in Jérémie), agricultural production continued with the utilization of slaves just as before the Revolution. However, in many communities it was not possible to resume operation of the plantation economy that had been shattered by the civil war. The occupation proved to be very costly. This, and the persistent and increasing military threat of the republican troops under the leadership of Toussaint Louverture in the West and the North and of André Rigaud, who headed up the mulattos, in the South – along with the consequent rising costs of the occupation – induced the British government finally to withdraw troops from Saint-Domingue in September 1798.

Rise of Toussaint Louverture in the Spanish-French War

The rise of Toussaint Louverture as the leading military and political figure in Saint-Domingue is closely linked with the Spanish-British-French war on the island. Toussaint, who in the course of his military and political ascent adopted the surname Louverture (“the opening”), was born as François Dominique Toussaint Bréda on May 20, 1743, on the possession of Bréda in Haut-du-Cap, a few kilometers away from Cap Français. He was the son of black slaves of the Aradas tribe. His grandfather Gaou Guinou had been the king of this tribe on the southern coast of West Africa (near present-day Ghana). Gaou Guinou’s son of the same name, Toussaint’s father, had been captured during a war with an enemy tribe, sold to European slave traders, and then transported to Saint-Domingue. For some historians, Toussaint Louverture's royal ancestry is an explanation of his early attachment first to the French king and then to the Spanish king.

Toussaint was a Créole, a black born in Saint-Domingue, in contrast to the majority of those Bossales who had been born in Africa and transported to Saint-Domingue. And something else set Toussaint apart from those whose advocate he would later become. Although he was himself a black and always relied in his military and political struggle on the nouveaux libres, the black majority that had been liberated by the decree of February 4, 1794, he himself belonged to the group in the anciens libres or Affranchis dominated by mulattos, who had already been free prior to the Revolution. In 1776 his owner had freed him from slavery. At the onset of the Revolution of 1789 he was himself a property owner (some say he was a tenant) of a successful coffee plantation with 13 slaves in Grande-Rivière-du-Nord.

Toussaint was not one of the leaders at the beginning of the insurrection; in November 1791 he joined the group allied to Biassou. In December 1791 he belonged to the delegation that, under the leadership of Biassou and Jean-François, carried out negotiations with the First Civil Commission regarding a possible end of the slave uprising. Following the failure of these negotiations and a period of stagnation and dispersion, the struggle of the blacks and the rise of Toussaint Louverture as a central figure in this struggle gained new impetus when the leaders decided, in the spring and summer of 1793, to join the army of the Spanish king.

In August 1793 Toussaint Louverture drew attention to himself with a statement that he made from Camp Turel, an insurgent post in the border mountains between Saint-Domingue and Santo Domingo, addressed to the insurgent slaves. For the first time he formulated his own claim to leadership: "Brothers and Friends, I am Toussaint Louverture, perhaps my name has made itself known to you. I have undertaken vengeance. I want Liberty and Equality to reign in Saint Domingue. I am working to make that happen. Unite yourselves to us, brothers, and fight with us for the same cause" (cited in Bell 2007: 18).

Toussaint had already joined the Spanish army and was operating along the Cordon de l'Ouest, the border between the Spanish central plateau and the northern part of Saint-Domingue. He had by this time already come a long way: as a plantation and slave owner, he had been among those who had profited from the colonial order. He had a close friendship with the caretaker of the plantation on which he had worked as a slave when he was younger, a friendship that lasted even during the exile of his friend, who fled with Galbaud and other white royalists from Cap Français to the United States in June 1793. At the beginning of the insurgency Toussaint had not aspired, any more than the other leaders did, to the complete overthrow of the old regime. Years of insurgency in Saint-Domingue both radicalized Toussaint and made him into a committed defender of the freedom of all former slaves. This conviction did not end with his alliance with Spain. In this Toussaint differed from Biassou and Jean-François, who after joining the Spanish side engaged in the slave trade, were primarily concerned with obtaining financial security for themselves, and showed little enthusiasm for further military ventures. Although Toussaint had at first only been a field marshal subordinate to the generals Biassou and Jean-François, he quickly took a dominant role during the battle for military position along the Cordon de l'Ouest. His military successes, and his consequent control of the Cordon, isolated the Plaine du Nord and Cap Français from the rest of the French colony. At the same time he single-mindedly made use of his integration into the Spanish military apparatus to enlarge his own military power. He built up an army of 4,000 that was subordinate to him alone, and he was thus able to emancipate himself from Biassou. By the spring of 1794 Toussaint Louverture had attained such military power that it became of critical importance in Saint-Domingue which way he would lean. The British invasion was no longer progressing and British troops were loath to fight in the inaccessible mountain regions. The Spanish advance also stagnated. Spanish conquests were more conquests by Toussaint himself and became regions that he ruled. French territory was intersected and divided up by military front lines. In this stalemate, all parties sought to get Toussaint Louverture on their side. He decided to put himself at the service of France.

He may have had many different reasons for this decision. First, by this time the rivalry with Biassou and Jean-François, both of whom had observed his ascent in the Spanish army with growing distrust, had taken on dangerous proportions. Both had already threatened him militarily; they had had his brother Pierre killed and the families of his followers kidnapped and sold as slaves. A second reason might have been the proclamation of the universal prohibition of slavery by the French National Convention on February 4, 1794. Opinions differ as to whether Toussaint had already been informed of the decision of the Convention by the time he went over to the side of the Republic. The official proclamation of the decision was publicly noticed in Saint-Domingue at a later time, but it is quite possible that the report had previously reached Toussaint, who was generally well informed and up to date regarding European affairs. When Toussaint joined the French armed forces they gained the upper hand against Spain and were also able to recapture territory from the British. From Trou-du-Nord to Marmelade, Plaisance, and Ennery and then to Gonaïves, the French troops took back control of the Cordon de l'Ouest.

In July 1794 Toussaint became the commander of the Cordon de l'Ouest; in October 1795 he became brigadier general; and in August 1796 he became division general. In September 1797 he was made general of the army, the supreme commander of the French troops in Saint-Domingue. Along with his military ascent began also his rise to political power. In all regions that he conquered for the Republic he immediately took over military and administrative control.

Third Civil Commission

Meanwhile, during the years 1794 and 1795, the political situation in France had again changed. With the execution of Robespierre on July 28, 1794, the reign of the Jacobins and the radicalization phase had come to an end; these had commenced in the spring of 1793 with the establishment of the Welfare Committee and the Revolutionary Tribunal, followed by the forced removal of the Girondists from the National Convention in June 1793, and had finally led to a reign of terror.

Among the revolutionists, the forces of the grand bourgeoisie prevailed. The new Constitution of August 22, 1795 secured their privileges. As the government an Executive Directory, made up of five conservative republicans, was established. At the same time, France succeeded in delivering a decisive blow against external threats. After France negotiated a peace agreement with Prussia in early April 1795, it was able, after a successful military advance into northern Spain, to end the war with Spain. Thereby two important enemies from within the monarchist coalition were eliminated, and France once again became a recognized major power in Europe.

In the Peace Treaty of Basel of July 22, 1795 France received from Spain the Spanish colony of Santo Domingo. For the first time, the entire island of Saint-Domingue was formally under French rule, even though France initially had neither the military nor the administrative capacity to establish De Facto sovereignty over the eastern part of the island. The new Constitution of 1795 defined the French colonies as integral parts of the Republic. Furthermore, the Constitution envisioned the possibility of sending agents to the colonies that would have the same authority as the Executive Directory in the metropolis and to whose instructions they would be bound. There seemed to be a strong need for assignment of such an agent to the colony of Saint-Domingue.

The British occupation of parts of the colony (in the West and in the South) continued and was further consolidated. In the territories that were not occupied, the French administration increasingly lost control to competing local warlords: the mulatto generals Villatte in Cap Français (until his failed coup of March 1796) and André Rigaud in the South – both enjoyed the support of the local mulattos, the anciens libres – and Toussaint Louverture as the leader of the blacks, the nouveaux libres, along the Cordon de l'Ouest. Against this background the agents sent by the Executive Directory as the Third Civil Commission to go to Saint-Domingue had a threefold assignment: they were to drive the British occupiers from the island, reconcile the various factions in Saint-Domingue, and reestablish the colonial order.

The Third Civil Commission was led by Léger-Félicité Sonthonax, who had been deported from Saint-Domingue to France as a prisoner upon the termination of the Second Civil Commission but who had been able to rehabilitate himself in France after the fall of Robespierre and had since then become celebrated as a hero. Among the five agents of the Third Civil Commission was Philippe-Rose Roume, previously a member of the First Civil Commission and thus another agent with many years of experience in Saint-Domingue. Sonthonax and Roume were accompanied by the mulatto Julien Raymond, who since the 1780s had lobbied in Paris on behalf of the rights of the free blacks and mulattos. There were also two other agents and 900 soldiers.

Roume came to the island in April 1796; he was the only one of the five agents to move into quarters in Santo Domingo, which now belonged to France. The other agents, including Sonthonax, arrived a month later in Saint-Domingue. Following the failed coup of the mulatto General Villatte, the agents saw a danger to the unity of the colony in the regional dominance of the mulattos, especially in the South. Sonthonax especially mistrusted the mulattos. The commission therefore sent a delegation to the Southern Province to reorganize relations there as they saw fit. The delegation met with considerable local resistance and rioting and was finally forced to flee. The subpoena of the commission upon the leaders of the mulattos in the South, including André Rigaud and his brother Augustin, which required them to appear in France before the parliament, was defied; the subpoena was tied to the tail of a donkey that was then driven through the streets of Cayes.

The stay of the Third Civil Commission in Saint-Domingue was only of short duration and characterized by internal squabbles. Its end was initiated in an unforeseen way by the surprising election of its president, Sonthonax, and of the current governor, Etienne Laveaux, as two of the first six new representatives from Saint-Domingue to the French parliament. It is difficult to understand the choice of these two, considering their responsibility for key tasks and the important positions they held in Saint-Domingue; some historians describe this choice as the result of manipulation by Toussaint Louverture, who in this way wanted to get rid of two competitors.

Sonthonax and Toussaint, who had for years been in agreement with each other, had in the end parted company over the issue of how to handle the large landowners who had emigrated. Sonthonax, the radical Jacobin, took a harsh attitude towards emigrants, but Toussaint counted on them for the reconstruction of the devastated economy of Saint-Domingue. In August 1797 Toussaint Louverture finally resorted to military threats to force Sonthonax, who for a year had steadfastly refused to depart, to take up his mandate in France and therefore to leave the colony.

End of British Occupation and French Control

Sonthonax's successor, General Joseph d'Hédouville, who arrived in Santo Domingo in March 1798, had received orders from the Executive Directory to limit the increasing power of Toussaint Louverture in the colony. Hédouville tried to bring the colonial administration under his control by replacing followers of Toussaint Louverture with administrative personnel he had brought with him to Saint-Domingue. Hédouville pursued the goals of bringing the administration under civilian control, rolling back the influence of black military personnel in the administration, and reducing the size of the army. Toussaint Louverture was actively opposed to these ideas. Despite the resistance of the agents, he furthermore persisted in his cooperative efforts to rebuild the colonial economy with the assistance of the large landowners who had emigrated, a policy that had already brought him into antagonism with Hédouville's predecessor, Sonthonax.

To weaken Toussaint's position, Hédouville drove a wedge between him and the mulatto leader André Rigaud, who ruled the rebellious Southern Province, by granting Rigaud the rank of army general for the Southern Province and thus putting him on the same level as Toussaint. But with the departure of the British from Saint-Domingue, Toussaint Louverture was able to buttress his own claim to power: after Toussaint's troops had taken from the British the strategically important Mirebalais in the south of the Artibonite valley, they succeeded in March 1798 in breaking through the circle of defense surrounding the coastal city of Archahaie; they were thus able to threaten the most important positions held by the British, Saint Marc and Port-au-Prince. In this strong position, Toussaint negotiated with the British occupiers regarding their complete withdrawal from the Western Province, and he did not include Hédouville, the representative of the French central power, in these negotiations. A key part of the agreement that Toussaint negotiated with the British was the granting of impunity to the French planters who had collaborated with the British. Many planters nevertheless left western Saint-Domingue in May 1798 together with the British; Toussaint promised to respect the property rights of those who remained. That it was Toussaint who negotiated with the British regarding their withdrawal signified a defeat for Rigaud. Furthermore, this was a political setback for Hédouville, who was not included in the negotiations and who would not have approved the agreements concerning the treatment of the white planters. His authority was shaken.

In the fall of 1798, when rioting in the military camp of Fort Liberté spilled over into the Plaine-du-Nord and grew into a general uprising against Hédouville, Toussaint not only refused to give the agents his help, but he put himself at the head of the rebellion and tried to have Hédouville arrested. Hédouville took refuge on a ship in Cap Français and left the island on October 22, 1798. As his successor, Hédouville named André Rigaud.

After the withdrawal of the British, who in September 1798 held only two positions – Jérémie in the extreme southwestern part of the island and Môle Saint Nicolas in the extreme northwestern part – and after the nearly simultaneous escape of Hédouville, Toussaint could turn his attention to the internal tensions in Saint-Domingue in order finally to consolidate his power.

SEE ALSO: Dessalines, Jean-Jacques (1758–1806); French Revolution, 1789–1794; Haiti, Revolutionary Revolts, 1790s; Haiti, Revolutionary Struggles; Haiti, Saint-Domingue Revolution, 1789–1804, Aftermath; Haiti, Saint-Domingue and Revolutionary France; Haitian Revolution and Independence, 1801–1804; Ogé's Revolt, 1790

References and Suggested Readings

- Bell, M. S. (2007) Toussaint Louverture: A Biography. New York: Pantheon.
 Moise, C. (2003) Dictionnaire historique de la révolution Haïtienne (1789–1804). Montréal: Images et al.

Treatment Action Campaign (TAC)

Benjamin Shepard

Organized by HIV-positive South African activist Zachie Achmont in 1998, the Treatment Action Campaign (TAC) helped the international movement for access to medication and therapy for people living with HIV/AIDS in South Africa and around the world. Building on the lessons of the US activist group AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP), TAC took the stigma of HIV/AIDS head on, shifting debate about the disease from deviance to one of human rights and access to treatment.

In public demonstrations in the early 2000s, both HIV-positive and HIV-negative members of the organization wore t-shirts with the words "HIV POSITIVE" to increase visibility for people with HIV/AIDS and reduce social isolation among those with the disease in South Africa. Anti-apartheid icon and international human rights hero Nelson Mandela, leader of the South African anti-apartheid movement and former president, wore an "HIV POSITIVE" t-shirt as a symbol of the need to expand public access to HIV treatment. Mandela's advocacy for the group also helped solidify the links between the anti-apartheid struggle and the campaign for treatment access as human rights movements. Since access to treatment for people with HIV/AIDS was only narrowly available to South Africans, Achmont drew international headlines for refusing the medication until available to everyone. In doing so, Achmont put his own health at risk to make a larger point about what he called medical apartheid in South Africa. "Making health care more accessible to South Africa's poor is now a constitutional duty facing the government," a TAC press release stated in 2001. He claimed that the South African constitution stipulated that: "Everyone has the right to have access to health care services. The state has a constitutional duty to progressively improve health care access for everyone." Yet the government was not TAC's only target.

When the South African government finally responded to activist pressure and focused on treatment for the masses, the policy shift was at odds with multinational pharmaceutical companies. When the South African government sought to import generic AIDS drugs from abroad, the administration attracted the ire of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association (PMA) of the US and pharmaceutical companies worldwide, who threatened to sue for patent infringement. TAC activists publicly dissented and joined with the global justice movement, engaging in solidarity protests throughout the world. In different demonstrations, protesters chanted such slogans as: “AIDS Crimes Against Humanity, from Botswana to the Bronx,” “DEMAND affordable AIDS Drugs for Africa,” and “Drug Company Greed Kills.” The PMA dropped the suit in April 2001, after world protest the previous month. By 2003, TAC successfully pushed the South African government to back a plan to distribute and expand access to anti-retroviral medications for people with HIV/AIDS. By 2005, TAC was already considered among the most innovative and effective social movement groups in the first decade of the twenty-first century.

SEE ALSO: ACT UP; Anti-Apartheid Movement, South Africa; Lesbian, Gay, Transsexual, Bisexual Movements; Mandela, Nelson (b. 1918)

References and Suggested Readings

- D’Adesky, A.-C. (2006) Moving Mountains: The Race to Treat Global AIDS. New York: Verso.
- Friedman, S. & Mottiar, S. (2004) A Moral of the Tale: The Treatment Action Campaign and the Politics of HIV/AIDS. A Case Study for the UKZN Project entitled Globalization, Marginalization, and New Social Movements in Post-Apartheid South Africa. Available at www.ukzn.ac.za/ccs/ (accessed April 8, 2008).
- Smith, R. A. & Siplon, T. (2006) Drugs into Bodies: Global Treatment Activism. New York: Praeger.
- Treatment Action Campaign (2001) The Medicines and Related Substances Control Amendment Act 90 of 1997 – A Step Toward Ending Apartheid in Health Care. Press Release, February 1.

Triangle Shirtwaist fire protests

Anne F. Mattina

On Saturday, March 25, 1911, fire broke out on the eighth floor of the Asch building, home to the Triangle Shirtwaist Company in New York’s Washington Square neighborhood. Workers, the majority young immigrant women, found themselves trapped in what was claimed to be a “fireproof” structure. Some managed to make their way down smoke-filled staircases; others rushed to the fire escape doors only to find them locked, a common practice of the era. The first alarm brought firefighters to a horrific scene of panic and hysteria, as many trapped workers sought their escape by jumping from the windows of the eighth and ninth floors of the building. In total, 146 workers died as result of the fire, an event that gave rise to waves of protest over the next several weeks.

Though the fire itself, the trial of the factory owners, and the political response have been the subject of scholarly analysis, little attention has been focused on the public outcry in the days that followed. Protests occurred in several phases. The first phase was organized labor’s meetings demanding justice for the dead and a governmental response to issues of workplace safety; the second was an enormous funeral cortege preceding the burial of eight unidentified workers; and the third occurred surrounding the trial of the factory’s owners, along with spontaneous protests after their not guilty verdict.

Triangle workers played a significant role in the 1909–10 industry-wide strike of garment workers, known popularly as “The Uprising of the 20,000.” Within a day after the fire, the Women’s Trade Union League held an organizational session at its New York headquarters to discuss plans for a mass protest meeting. Over 20 philanthropic organizations and settlement workers joined in the efforts, designed to memorialize the dead and bring focus to the issue of workplace safety. It was decided to form a committee to collect information from workers regarding the status of fire safety in their place of employment.

The following day, March 28, a funeral service held for many of the victims evolved into a protest. Members of the Ladies’ Waist and Dressmakers’ and other unions refused to work that day, instead attending the funeral to both demonstrate support and object to working conditions. On March 30, the International Ladies’ Garment Workers’ Union (ILGWU) held a memorial meeting which drew some 2,000 workers to pray for the dead. The event served as a political rally as well, as workers were urged to attend an upcoming debate on insuring socialism a place in New York government.

The next day, more mass meetings were held, including an event at Cooper Union addressed by Dr. Anna Howard Shaw and Samuel Gompers. On April 2, the Women’s Trade Union League (WTUL)-sponsored meeting took place at the Metropolitan Opera House, where thousands of New Yorkers from all social strata gathered. It was here that WTUL organizer Rose Schneiderman voiced her scathing condemnation of events:

On March 25, 1911, the Triangle Shirtwaist Factory in New York City caught fire in one of the most notorious industrial disasters in US history. Over 140 garment workers, many of them young immigrant women, died in the blaze. Following the tragedy, the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union pushed for legislation to improve working conditions and safety standards. After the fire, friends and family come to the scene to identify the victims as they lay in coffins along the sidewalk. (Getty Images)

"I would be a traitor to these burned bodies," she began, "if I were to come here to talk of good fellowship. We have tried you good people of the public and found you wanting." Throughout this time, the WTUL and others were demanding the release of the unidentified bodies still being held in the city morgue, as another funeral parade was being planned. City officials, fearing an outpouring of mass hysteria, refused. Finally reaching a compromise, the city agreed to release the bodies for burial on the day of the march, separate from the actual parade.

Organizers called for participants to assemble Wednesday, April 5 at 1.30 p.m. at two locations – one uptown, one downtown – with plans to meet at Washington Square Park. By 9 a.m. participants began gathering, eventually reaching a multitude estimated at 400,000. The downtown contingent, led by survivors and 400 family members of the deceased, stepped off at the scheduled hour, following a horse-drawn carriage carrying an empty coffin. The uptown wing, comprised mostly of working women and suffragists, marched to meet them. Several hundred thousand more watched the procession from sidewalks and tenement windows along the route, some waving handkerchiefs in tribute.

Protesters marched silently through steady rain all afternoon. As the massive crowd filled Washington Square, the morgue released the bodies of the unidentified workers, and a much smaller cortege formed as two automobiles of city officials followed the eight hearses to the cemetery. There was a small graveside ceremony as thousands marched silently through the streets of the city. As the marchers converged on Washington Square, city officials forbade them from filing past the Asch building, fearing hysteria. Instead, the crowd groaned in unified sorrow and carried on, dissolving at Madison Square Park around 6 p.m.

On December 4, jury selection began in the trial of Isaac Harris and Max Blanck, indicted for manslaughter in the deaths of their employees. As they arrived at the courtroom, the co-defendants were surrounded by a mob of women, angrily shouting "murderer, murderer" at the men. When a "not guilty" verdict was pronounced several weeks later, the mob had grown considerably. Blanck and Harris fled the courtroom through a back door to avoid the crowd's anguish. Though there were calls for a new trial, a judge, citing double jeopardy, refused. Blanck and Harris later settled with some of the victims' families for an average of $75.00 per worker's life.

SEE ALSO: Labor Revolutionary Currents, United States, 20th Century; Socialism

References and Suggested Readings

- Duchez, L. (1911) The Murder of the Shirt Waist Workers in New York City. International Socialist Review (May): 667–73.
- Kenneally, J. (1981) Women and American Trade Unions. Montreal: Eden Press.
- Linder, D. (2002) The Triangle Shirtwaist Fire Trial. Available at www.law.umkc.edu/faculty/projects/ftrials/triangle/trianglefire.html.
- Triangle Factory Fire. Available at www.ilr.cornell.edu/trianglefire/default.html.

Trinidad, anti-colonial movement

Michael F. Toussaint

Trinidad and Tobago's anti-colonial struggle began with the late eighteenth- and early nineteenth-century agitation of the rising black and colored middle classes, their reform movements of the 1880s and 1890s, and the emergence of labor-based organizations from that period onwards. From the twentieth century to the present, such influences worked in tandem with international currents of anti-imperialism and race consciousness to impact attitudes and approaches to the nationalist question.

Trinidad's colonial history began in 1498 when Columbus arrived on the island and claimed it in the name of Spain. Thereafter, for some 285 years the island remained an underpopulated, colonial outpost of the Spanish Empire. In the closing decades of the eighteenth century, French white and colored planters, together with their enslaved Africans, settled in the colony at the invitation of the Spanish crown. The island also attracted royalist and republican sympathizers fleeing revolutionary upheavals elsewhere in the Caribbean. Britain captured the island in 1797 and encountered a society which, though governed by Spanish law, was markedly French in culture and imbued with related revolutionary ideologies regarding the rights of men. Some of the inhabitants had an immediate aversion to British rule, preferring to exit the colony under the peaceful terms offered by the British government. Those who remained were faced with the challenge of living in a society increasingly dominated by British colonialism, despite the retention of some Spanish laws.

An early anti-colonial response among the white French classes emerged and was decisively anti-British; however, from the days of military rule under Governor Picton, it was the colored class who waged the more aggressive and sustained campaign. In 1810 Britain introduced a system of crown colony government aimed at consolidating its control over the island's affairs. The system was based on the almost absolute subservience of the island's legislature to the governor, and, in turn, his subservience to the crown. Its introduction angered white French and Spanish inhabitants, who began to mount an essentially muted challenge to British rule. They were not concerned with changing the system of governance, however, so much as balancing the power shared by the various classes of white inhabitants, and continuing to enjoy land ownership and trade concessions granted earlier under Spanish rule.

Favorable concessions were also granted to coloreds, and by the 1820s some had emerged as well-to-do planters and professionals. The latter class included teachers, medical practitioners, lawyers and solicitors, minor civil servants, clerks, pharmacists, and journalists. Those who spoke on their behalf questioned the racial discrimination and prejudice meted out to them at the hands of whites and the colonial administration. In 1823 Jean-Baptiste Philippe, a medical doctor, made two trips to London where he addressed the Colonial Office on the diminished rights of the colored community vis-à-vis the civil and political privileges enjoyed by whites.

During the 1840s the more radical protagonists among the colored community began to attack the system of crown colony government, particularly following the introduction of immigration programs which reduced the bargaining power of the ex-enslaved and led to heavier taxes on the laboring population. When, in 1849, a riot occurred over the unfair treatment of black prisoners at the Royal Gaol, Alexander Fitzjames, defense counsel for rioters, argued that laws of the colony were obnoxious and tyrannical, and that the people felt the laws were enacted by individuals unsanctified by them, disapproved of by them, and not responsible to them.

In 1853, in protest against the crown colony system, hundreds of black and colored inhabitants abandoned the island to establish an independent state on the South American mainland. The initiative failed and they returned home to continue to challenge the system. As the century progressed, agitation mounted; the imperial government and colonial authorities seemed bent on reducing financial commitments to the colony and increasing the burden of taxation on the masses. During the 1880s a number of prominent inhabitants established a committee aimed at pressuring the colonial administration to introduce constitutional reform. Its members included notable black lawyers such as Mzumbo Lazare, Prudhomme David, and Sir Henry Alcazar. In 1887 a petition was presented to the Royal Franchise Commission requesting that the inhabitants be extended the right to elect representatives of their choice to manage the island's affairs. The commission's response was that the people of Trinidad were not fit to choose their own representatives. Undoubtedly, in 1889 a similar view of the inhabitants of Tobago had informed Britain's decision to link Tobago into a federal relationship which made that island subservient to the crown colony administration in Trinidad.

In the 1890s several public meetings were held to sensitize the population to the undemocratic nature of crown colony government. Two decades earlier the prejudice of leading British thinkers and imperial officials was confronted through J. J. Thomas's Fraudacity, which addressed in particular the disparaging treatment of West Indian blacks in James Anthony Froude's The Bow of Ulysses. The Canboulay and Hosea riots of the 1880s indicated the determination of the masses to make cultural statements of their own. The authorities remained unmoved by such expressions of political and social consciousness.

Developments during the opening decades of the next century continued to reflect the ways in which citizens were provoked by the insensitivity of the imperial and colonial administrations. The Water Riots of 1903 saw agitation against the proposed introduction of a meter system in Port of Spain. A number of protestors were killed or injured, and the Red House, the seat of political administration, was destroyed by fire. The roots of the riot lay in the dissolution of the Port of Spain City Council (the old Spanish Cabildo), through which the people of Port of Spain formerly managed their affairs.

During World War I young black males in the colony eagerly enlisted to serve the British crown, joining Allied forces in France, where they distinguished themselves despite limited training and experience, and discrimination at the hands of white officers. On returning home after the war they were again neglected by the British and colonial administration. Adequate preparation for their return had not been made, and many were forced to join the ranks of the destitute and unemployed. Many participated in the bloody 1919 waterfront strike. Following this strike, Captain Arthur Andrew Cipriani emerged as the leader of the working-class movement, converting its key organization, the Trinidad Workingmen's Association, into a political party. His constant agitation for adult franchise and representative government encouraged the appointment of a Royal Commission in 1921 to investigate the possibility of constitutional change in the West Indies. In 1925, based on the commission's recommendations, the constitution was amended to allow seven representatives, elected on a constituency basis, to serve in the Legislative Council. Representatives of the East Indian community had objected to the change, as they were convinced that the smaller size of their population relative to that of the African-descended community would place them at a great disadvantage. But as East Indians began to get elected to the Legislative Council there emerged an overall sense that representative government could work in everyone's interests.

During the interwar period (1919–38) Cipriani, who had been consistently elected to the Legislative Council, continued to push for constitutional reform. Across Trinidad and Tobago political consciousness deepened as locals were influenced by international developments such as Garveyism, Pan-Africanism, and socialism. One year before the end of the term of the Legislative Council the island erupted with a spate of labor disturbances. This time, however, the hero of the labor movement was Tubal Uriah Butler, a Grenadian who served in the West Indian Regiment during World War I and had come to Trinidad in search of work during the 1920s. Earlier in his career he worshipped Cipriani, under whom he had served during the war, as a hero. The two later parted ways because Butler began to perceive Cipriani as too conservative, while Cipriani viewed Butler as too hard hitting and uncompromising.

Butler's popularity soared to such an extent that the labor disturbances began to be spoken of as the Butler Riots. In 1937 he formed his own political party, the British Empire Citizens' and Workers' Home Rule Party. Butler was no radical; he was in fact extremely loyal to the British Empire, but his immense popularity, fiery rhetoric, and continuous defiance of the authorities brought a new and threatening dynamism to national politics. Meanwhile, labor disturbances across the Caribbean were also unsettling for the British government. The Moyne Commission, sent out by the British government to investigate the cause of these disturbances, recognized the widespread poverty and discontent of the West Indian population. Consequently, it recommended, among other things, the introduction of adult franchise and a gradual transition to internal self-government.

The implementation of these measures following the war ushered in a new phase of nationalism. There was a mushrooming of political parties, the majority of them one-man organizations, but most had a position on the nationalism question. Among the leading political figures were Albert Maria Gomes, publisher of The Beacon and founder of the Political Progress Groups; and Butler, who had been imprisoned and detained during World War II as part of efforts by the authorities to suppress all political activities. After his release from prison Butler founded the Butler Home Rule Party (later, the Butler Party) which captured the largest block of seats in the Legislative Council. However, in defiance of the popular vote, the governor installed Gomes as the chief minister. Historically anti-colonial and anti-crown colony, once installed in office Gomes abandoned the nationalist cause.

The system under which Gomes operated was one in which the responsibility for the conduct of the internal affairs of Trinidad and Tobago was passed to elected ministers who functioned under the supervision of the governor. The 1956 elections, however, provided for full internal self-government, placing the exercise of executive powers fully in the hands of elected members. Critical to the emerging nationalism from here onwards was the rise of Dr. Eric Williams and the People's National Movement (PNM). In the elections of 1956, nine months after the PNM was formed under his leadership, the party unseated the Gomes administration. Dr Williams became Trinidad and Tobago's first premier and stepped up the battle for political autonomy and national sovereignty. One example was the struggle to reclaim Chaguaramas, located in the northwestern peninsula of Trinidad. During the war years this area had been leased by Britain to the United States for use as a military base. The Lease-Base Agreement provided for the US occupation of the area for 99 years, and was one of several such agreements made by the Churchill administration in return for a number of US destroyers (warships to combat German U-Boats during the war effort). After the cessation of hostilities the United States continued to occupy the base at Chaguaramas. Williams and the PNM viewed this as an affront to national sovereignty. In 1961 Williams and thousands of PNM supporters staged a march to protest the continued occupation of the base. The march began at Woodford Square, where Williams set fire to a copy of the agreement. From there the marchers proceeded to the office of the United States consul-general, to whom a memorial demanding the return of the base at Chaguaramas was read. The march, undertaken in the pouring rain, attracted widespread national support and international attention. The United States, willing to retain good relations with Trinidad and Tobago, was eager to return the base.

Between 1958 and 1961 Trinidad and Tobago were part of the effort to establish a West Indian Federation; however, there were many people that thought the pursuit of independence should take precedence over the federal initiative. Jamaica's withdrawal from the federation in 1961 provided Trinidad and Tobago with the opportunity to do likewise. In December 1961 full internal self-government was attained, and an even more determined and focused anti-colonial PNM emerged after capturing 20 of the 30 seats in the House of Representatives. In January 1962 the PNM's General Council approved a resolution that the government should forgo the federal initiative and pursue national independence as quickly as possible. In February the government published a first draft of an independence constitution. After much public consultation an amended version was debated in the parliament and approved by a majority of 16 to 9 in the House of Representatives on May 11, 1962. Both government and opposition participated in the Marlborough Conference, which focused on the nationalism question and accepted the outcome of the debates in Trinidad and Tobago's parliament.

On August 31, 1962 Trinidad and Tobago became independent and joined the Commonwealth, but the country was still governed by the British Queen, and remained one of several constitutional monarchies in the Caribbean. There remained, among other things, the necessity to restructure the economy in the public's interest and to give nationals far greater say in decision-making processes. There was also the need to remove the many racial barriers and prejudices which limited the opportunities of the vast majority of the citizens and worked against their sense of belonging.

In February 1970 thousands of youths and workers led by black militants began marching throughout Trinidad and Tobago, demanding that political, social, and economic power be passed to the people. On April 20, one day after their leading spokesmen were arrested and detained on Nelson Island, a State of Emergency was declared. The following day some of the soldiers of the regiment stationed at Teteron Bay mutinied, surrendering after a 12-day standoff. In the main, these activities were perceived as efforts to bring about much needed social and economic changes. The Williams administration responded by implementing measures to lower unemployment, develop a people's sector, and reduce the dominance of foreign multinational corporations. A number of banks, insurance companies, and key financial institutions were nationalized.

In 1976 Trinidad and Tobago adopted a republican constitution. The queen was replaced by an elected president, who became the constitutional head of state and commander-in-chief of the armed forces. Greater emphasis has been placed on the development of national identity and the promotion of cultural nationalism. Given the cosmopolitan nature of the country's population, much attention is placed on promoting unity of the races and embracing the diversity of cultures. Further, against the background of greater effort at Caribbean integration the attempt is being made to develop local and Caribbean institutions to replace those which were representative of colonialism.

SEE ALSO: French Caribbean in the Age of Revolution; Trinidad, Labor Protests; Trinidad, Parliamentary Crisis; Williams, Eric (1911–1981)

References and Suggested Readings

- Collymore, G. (1995) Birth Pangs of a Nation. London: Minerva Press.
- Hackshaw, J. M. (1997) Party Politics and Public Policy: A New Political Culture Needed for Trinidad and Tobago. Diego Martin: Hackshaw.
- Meighoo, K. P. (2003) Politics in a Half-Made Society: Trinidad and Tobago 1925–2001. Princeton: Marcus Wiener.
- Ryan, S. (1972) Race and Nationalism in Trinidad and Tobago: A Study of Decolonization in a Multiracial Society. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.

Trinidad, labor protests

Jerome Teelucksingh

In Trinidad's era of indentured servitude (1845–1920) subtle protests emerged in the form of absenteeism and faked illness among Indian laborers on the sugar estates. This was due to strict labor regulations, police harassment, and judicial partiality. There was also a series of disturbances among the Indian working class which culminated in a phenomenal 12 strikes in 1884.

In 1903 the Water Riots in Port-of-Spain resulted in violence and repression brought upon the working class at the hands of the government. The initial protestors belonged to the middle and upper class; however, the working class was misled by anti-government propaganda which created fear concerning water distribution to the public. The working class was convinced to join the protest, and when the government discriminated against them in the issuing of tickets to the Legislative Council for the debate on the Water Works Ordinance, the crowd responded in a hostile manner. In the ensuing confrontation with police 16 persons were killed and 43 wounded.

The high cost of living due to World War I (1914–18), deplorable working conditions, and low wages contributed to labor protests in 1919. In February 1919 civil servants petitioned Governor J. R. Chancellor seeking increased salaries, and in March the atmosphere of discontent spread to stevedores and mechanics employed on the docks, along with porters and laborers at the Trinidad Government Railway. Other occupations were affected as protests spread to the Trinidad Rice Mills, and the borough council's waterworks and sewage department in Port-of-Spain. At Trinidad's Central Oilfields, workmen and fitters went on strike demanding a 25 percent salary increase; likewise, striking scavengers employed by the city council demanded a 50 percent salary increase. Strike action spread to the plantation sector and at the Woodford Lodge Estate one of the workers was killed. Faced with island-wide unrest, the British government dispatched the Royal Sussex regiment to restore order and its forces arrived in December 1919. The persistence of the Trinidad Workingmen's Association (TWA) culminated in a settlement on December 3, 1919, with a concession to the workers: shipping agents consented to a wage increase of 25 percent. Also in December 1919, tension engulfed the Lake Asphalt Company; reluctantly, the company met with the TWA, and in May 1919 workers were given a 33 percent wage increase.

This victory boosted the island-wide status of the TWA: 800 sugar workers protesting in 1934, at Brechin Castle and Esperanza Estates, were later joined by their comrades in the North. The complaints of the sugar workers included unemployment, withholding of wage packets, exploitative estate officials, and the like. The public marches by sugar workers in 1934 formed what Bridget Brereton (1981) describes as “a watershed in Indian participation in Labor movements in Trinidad.” O. N. Bolland (2001) suggested that the proposed hunger march of sugar workers on July 20, 1934 from Caroni to Port-of-Spain was planned to unite East Indian sugar workers and African hunger marchers in a massive city demonstration. The protests of the Indians set in motion a series of civil demonstrations as workers resorted to direct action.

There were further disruptions a few months later in March 1935, when workers at Apex Oilfields decided to undertake a strike action to protest unsuitable working conditions, wage reductions, and low wages in general. Eventually, the strike ended and the workers accepted a 2 percent wage increase. One of the leaders of the strike, Tubal Uriah Butler (1897–1977; a member of the TWA), would later play an important role in the labor riots of 1937.

Both long-term and short-term factors led to the eruption of June 1937. The agony of the Great Depression in the early 1930s lingered on and the 17 percent increase in the cost of living in 1937 added to the misery of the masses. It has been suggested that the Italian conquest of Abyssinia (Ethiopia) in June 1935 provoked anti-British feeling in the West Indies and increased tensions between whites and Africans in Trinidad. Brereton (1981) contends that rampant poverty among laborers contributed to malnutrition, poor sanitation, illiteracy, and unemployment. The combination of these factors, as well as the denial of wage increases for oil workers, finally exploded with a massive strike on June 19, 1937.

Despite being jailed twice, Butler continued to be a threat to colonial authorities and employers during the 1940s. He was the mastermind behind the three-week strike in central and south Trinidad in May 1947; more than 7,000 sugar workers from 11 estates of Caroni Limited were involved in this fiery protest. Similarly, Butler was responsible for the protest of 1948 involving 3,000 workers from 18 estates of the Ste. Madeleine Company. In both instances workers benefited from increased wages and improved working conditions.

The formation of the political party the United Labor Front (ULF) on February 18, 1975 was another attempt by trade unions to unite the Afro- and Indo-Trinidadians and capture political power from the ruling People's National Movement (PNM). On March 18, 1975 the short-lived ULF attempted a religious march from San Fernando to Port-of-Spain: 37 people were arrested, including union leaders.

SEE ALSO: Caribbean Islands, Protests Against IMF; James, C. L. R. (1901–1989); Trinidad, Anti-Colonial Movement; Trinidad, Parliamentary Crisis; Williams, Eric (1911–1981)

References and Suggested Readings

- Basdeo, S. (1982) 1934 Labor Disturbances. In B. Brereton & W. Dookeran (Eds.), East Indians in the Caribbean: Colonialism and the Struggle for Identity. New York: Kraus International.
- Bolland, O. N. (2001) The Politics of Labor in the British Caribbean: The Social Origins of Authoritarianism and Democracy in the Labor Movement. Kingston: Ian Randle.
- Brereton, B. (1981) A History of Modern Trinidad, 1783–1962. Port-of-Spain: Heinemann.
- Samaroo, B. (1972) The Trinidad Workingmen's Association and the Origins of Popular Protest in a Crown Colony. Social and Economic Studies 21: 205–22.
- Tikasingsh, G. (1982) Toward a Formulation of the Indian View of History: The Representation of Indian Opinion in Trinidad, 1900–1921. In B. Brereton & W. Dookeran (Eds.), East Indians in the Caribbean: Colonialism and the Struggle for Identity. New York: Kraus International.

Trinidad, parliamentary crisis

Michael F. Toussaint

Following independence in 1962, Trinidad and Tobago adopted a system of government based on parliamentary democracy according to the Westminster model. Executive power was vested in the prime minister and his Cabinet, which together exercised general direction and control over the governance of the country. A bicameral parliament was charged with the responsibility of making laws for the peace, order, and good governance of the country. It consisted of a lower house of 36 elected members, each representing an electoral district, and a 31-member Senate made of persons appointed by the president on the advice of the prime minister and leader of the opposition. In 1976 Trinidad and Tobago enacted a written republican constitution, which remains the supreme law of the land and cannot be amended, abridged, or infringed without the requisite parliamentary majority.

The bicameral legislature was retained and the parliament, unless dissolved, was required to sit for five years, after which a general election is held. Since independence, various challenges precipitated by different circumstances have emerged to frustrate the normal operations of the parliament.

In 1971, following a successful “No Vote” campaign by the opposition in protest against the introduction of the voting machine, the incumbent People’s National Movement (PNM) won the 36 seats contested in the general elections; however, absolute parliamentary non-cooperation had been achieved by the opposition forces. The development left the upper and lower houses of parliament without any opposition. Additionally, it frustrated the operations of the Public Accounts Committee, which could only function through the joint effort of members on both sides. Parliament was only able to resume normal operations when, in June 1972, two members of the PNM crossed the floor and formed an opposition.

Under its founder and leader, Dr. Eric Eustace Williams, the PNM dominated the parliament with sizable majorities since 1962, sometimes by as much as twice the number of seats controlled by the opposition. Notwithstanding the perception of a vacuum in the leadership of the PNM following Williams’ passing in 1981, under his successor George Michael Chambers the party was able to secure a two-thirds majority in the parliament in the elections held that year. Following this, the Chambers regime suffered a devastating 33–3 defeat in the elections of 1986 at the hands of the National Alliance for Reconstruction (NAR), led by Arthur Napoleon Robinson.

In July 1990, in an attempted coup and what amounted to the most violent development in Trinidad and Tobago’s political history, armed members of a radical Islamic group, the Jamaat al Muslimeen, stormed the parliament while it was in session and held at gunpoint all parliamentarians and members of the public in attendance. Their demands included the resignation of Prime Minister Robinson, the installation of a caretaker government, and the holding of general elections within 90 days. Six days later, however, the hostages were released from the Red House, following an agreement with the insurgents. During the impasse over 30 persons were killed and some 700 wounded. For months afterwards the parliament was unable to function. Inter alia, the Red House, the seat of the legislature, was severely damaged.

The PNM rebounded in the elections of 1991, winning 21 of the 36 seats contested. Subsequent developments conspired to mark the achievement as the end of the era of sizable or “comfortable” parliamentary majorities. In the second half of its term in office the PNM’s majority in the lower house began to dwindle. The party lost one seat in a special bye-election. Additionally, there was the expulsion of a PNM representative from the parliament. The PNM saw this development as part of a plot between the opposition United National Congress (UNC) and the Speaker, Occah Seepaul, to reduce the number of elected PNM members in the lower house. Consequently, the government declared a limited State of Emergency and the Speaker of the House of Representatives was removed and placed under house arrest. This led to the loss of yet another PNM member of parliament, when Ralph Maraj, the brother of Occah Seepaul, defected to the UNC. Cognizant of the declining PNM parliamentary majority, Prime Minister Patrick Manning called a snap election in 1995. The PNM and UNC won 17 seats each. The NAR having won two seats, it took a UNC–NAR coalition to form the next government.

The results of the elections of December 2000 returned the UNC to office with 19 seats, compared to 16 by the PNM and a single seat by the NAR. After six months in office, however, the UNC found itself challenged from within; three of its members of parliament declared their unwillingness to support the government, on the grounds that it seemed averse to investigate allegations of official corruption.

The elections of 2001 resulted in a hung parliament in which the PNM and UNC received 18 seats each. Guided by an agreement forged between the leaders of the two political parties in response to the crisis, President Robinson appointed Patrick Manning as prime minister. However, the operations of parliament were forestalled for the next 12 months as the prime minister remained unable to form a majority and parliament was unable to sit. The crisis was resolved when, upon a return to the polls, the PNM won 20 of the 36 seats contested. In the aftermath of the crisis precipitated by the election results of 2001, parliament approved in 2005 a proposal by the independent Elections and Boundaries Commission to increase the number of seats in the House of Representatives from 36 to 41.

SEE ALSO: French Caribbean in the Age of Revolution; Trinidad, Anti-Colonial Movement; Trinidad, Labor Protests; Williams, Eric (1911–1981)

References and Suggested Readings

- Deosaran, R. (1993) A Society Under Siege: A Study of Political Confusion and Legal Mysticism. St. Augustine: Mc Al Centre for Psychological Research, St Augustine University of the West Indies.
- Hackshaw, J. M. (1997) Party Politics and Public Policy: A New Political Culture Needed for Trinidad and Tobago. Trinidad: Hackshaw.
- Meighoo, K. P. (2003) Politics in a Half-Made Society: Trinidad and Tobago 1925–2001. Princeton: Marcus Wiener.

Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)

Paul Le Blanc

Leon Trotsky was one of the most impressive revolutionaries of the twentieth century, and his example and ideas have profoundly affected successive generations of labor and socialist activists. Born in the Ukraine, then part of the Russian empire, the scope of his thought and activism became quintessentially global. Born Lev Davidovich Bronstein, he adopted the underground name “Trotsky” (the pen) and became known not only for his eloquence as a writer, but also as an orator. These talents were inseparable, however, from his role as a political activist.

At the age of 18 Trotsky first become active in the revolutionary socialist movement in the Russian empire, and he was soon drawn to the revolutionary Marxist current around the newspaper Iskra, initiated by Vladimir Ilyich Lenin, Georgi Plekhanov, and Julius Martov. Initially close to Lenin, he broke with him when the newly reformed Russian Social Democratic Labor Party (RSDLP) split into Bolshevik and Menshevik factions in 1903, lining up with the anti-Leninist Mensheviks. In the course of the revolutionary upsurge of 1905, in which he played a central role, Trotsky developed the theory of permanent revolution (discussed below) which caused him to become independent of the Mensheviks in the complex factional line-up in the RSDLP. Although in some ways drawing closer to Lenin’s Bolsheviks, he was a firm partisan of RSDLP unity and sharply opposed the creation of a separate Bolshevik party in 1912. At the outbreak of World War I in 1914 he played a major role in organizing an anti-war opposition, with a diverse grouping of socialists from various countries which gathered in Zimmerwald, Switzerland.

When the Russian tsar was overthrown in February and March 1917 by a spontaneous workers’ uprising, Trotsky was living in exile in the United States. Hurrying back to Russia, he found that his thinking converged with that of Lenin – favoring a second workers’ and peasants’ revolution to replace the coalition of pro-capitalist liberals and moderate socialists with a revolutionary socialist regime based on democratic councils (soviets). This caused him and his followers to join Lenin’s party, in which he quickly became a central figure. He was also one of the central leaders of the Russian Revolution of October and November 1917, the organizer and leader of the Red Army that defended the early Soviet Republic in the face of civil war and foreign invasions, and a founder and leader of the Communist International.

In the 1920s, after Lenin’s death (1924), Trotsky became one of the foremost defenders of the original ideas and ideals of the 1917 Revolution and of the early communist movement against the bureaucratic tyranny, crystallizing around Joseph Stalin, that increasingly overwhelmed them. The left opposition that Trotsky helped lead was decisively defeated in 1927, and Trotsky found himself again in exile – first in Turkey, then in Norway and France, and finally in Mexico. In his later years, he helped organize the Fourth International (formally founded in 1938, made up of handfuls of revolutionary socialists who formed themselves into organizations in various countries, and who came to be known as Trotskyists). An unyielding opponent of the brutal regime and policies of Stalin in the Soviet Union and the world communist movement, Trotsky was assassinated by a Stalinist agent in Mexico in 1940.

The Nature of Revolution and Revolutionaries

Although he was a critical and original thinker, Trotsky’s theories and analyses involve a creative

Russian communist Leon Trotsky (1879–1940) speaking to Red Army troops in 1925. Trotsky was a leader of the Bolsheviks during the Russian October Revolution, second in command to V. I. Lenin. He was an outspoken critic of Joseph Stalin and after exile from the Soviet Union was a leader in the International Left Opposition and Fourth International. After his assassination by USSR operatives in 1940, Trotskyism, in many forms, gained currency as an international socialist ideology. (Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images) elaboration and application (or in some cases a parallel development) of ideas that one can find in Marx, Luxemburg, and Lenin. In particular, Trotsky shared their commitment to a radical form of democracy represented in the notion of workers' power. This is reflected in this passage from the introduction to his classic History of the Russian Revolution:

The most indubitable feature of a revolution is the direct interference of the masses in historic events. In ordinary times the state, be it monarchical or democratic, elevates itself above the population, and history is made by specialists in that line of business – kings, ministers, bureaucrats, parliamentarians, journalists. But at those crucial moments when the old order becomes no longer endurable to the masses, they break over the barriers excluding them from the political arena, sweep aside their traditional representatives, and create by their own interference the initial groundwork for a new regime. . . . The history of a revolution is for us first of all a history of the forcible entrance of the masses into the realm of rulership over their own destiny. (p. xvii)

For Trotsky there is a fundamental harmony between this view of revolution and the quality of socialism that he felt must be the goal of a working-class revolution. “Socialism signifies a pure and clear social system which is accommodated to the self-government of the toilers. . . . Socialism implies an uninterrupted growth of universal equality. . . . Socialism has as its goal the all-sided flowering of the individual personality. . . . Socialism would have no value apart from the unselfish, honest, and humane relations between human beings” (Trotsky 1973–9 [1936–37]: 328–9).

From the very beginning, Trotsky shared with Lenin and other revolutionary Marxists the belief that the working class under capitalism has the creativity, the latent power, and the potential consciousness that would be required to bring about this transformation. The more advanced layers of the working class, joined by radicalized students and intellectuals, must – as Trotsky saw it – organize themselves in order to help the laboring masses realize this revolutionary potential.

There is a striking harmony between his vision of socialism and the qualities that he believed must animate revolutionary activists. This quotation from a female veteran of Russia’s revolutionary movement of the early 1900s, offered with the author’s obvious agreement, appears near the beginning of Trotsky’s biography of Stalin, his final book: “Turning over in my mind the mass of comrades with whom I had occasion to meet, I cannot recall a single reprehensible, contemptible act, a single deception or lie. There was friction. There were factional differences of opinion. But no more than that. Somehow everyone looked after himself [and herself] morally, became better and more gentle in that friendly family.” Trotsky added: “The measure of ambition was to last as long as possible on the job [of engaging in labor and socialist activity] prior to arrest; to hold oneself steadfast when facing the gendarmes; to ease, as far as possible, the plight of one’s comrades; to read, while in prison, as many books as possible; to escape as soon as possible [into] exile abroad; to acquire wisdom there; and then return to revolutionary activity in Russia” (Trotsky 1967: 54).

Trotsky frequently insisted that “revolutionary discipline has nothing to do with blind obedience,” that any revolutionary worthy of the name “does not take anything on [just someone else’s] word. He judges everything by reason and experience” (1973–9 [1932]: 326; [1932–33]: 199). The organic connection between revolutionary commitment and integrity comes through in Trotsky’s comments – in the early 1920s – about the qualities of a genuine Bolshevik:

A Bolshevik is not merely a disciplined person; he is a person who in each case and on each question forges a firm opinion of his own and defends it courageously and independently, not only against his enemies, but inside his own party. Today, perhaps, he will be in the minority in his organization. He will submit, because it is his party. But this does not always signify that he is in the wrong. Perhaps he saw or understood before the others did a new task or the necessity of a turn. He will persistently raise the question a second, a third, a tenth time, if need be. Thereby he will render his party a service, helping it to meet the new task fully armed or to carry out the necessary turn without organic upheavals, without factional convulsions. (1975–81 [1923–25]: 127)

Such a description is consistent with Trotsky’s own character as a revolutionary. This first became clear with the development of his theory of permanent revolution – for many years a minority position among Russian socialists, until it was, in practice, embraced by Lenin and the Bolshevik party in 1917.

The Theory of Permanent Revolution

The majority of Russian Marxists insisted that the absolute monarchy and semi-feudal nobility in Russia must be overthrown by a democratic revolution that would also allow for an industrial capitalist development that could provide the material basis for socialism, which would be achieved by a later working-class revolution. The Menshevik faction among Russian socialists called for a worker–capitalist alliance to lead the democratic revolution. The Bolshevik faction insisted that the capitalists could not be trusted, that only a working-class alliance with Russia’s impoverished peasant majority would result in a victory of the democratic revolution. In this, Trotsky agreed with the Bolsheviks but then went much further.

Trotsky’s theory of permanent revolution linked the struggle for democracy – freedom of expression, equal rights for all, and rule by the people – with the struggle for socialism, a society in which the great majority of people would own and control the economic resources of society to allow for the free development of all. It also linked the struggle for revolution in Russia with the cause of socialist revolution throughout the world.

Trotsky’s theory contained three basic points. One held that the revolutionary struggle for democracy in Russia could only be won under the leadership of the working class with the support of the peasant majority. The second point held that this democratic revolution would begin in Russia a transitional period in which all political, social, cultural, and economic relations would continue to be in flux, leading in the direction of socialism. The third point held that this transition would be part of, would help to advance, and would also be furthered by an international revolutionary process.

The first aspect of Trotsky’s theory was related to his understanding that the relatively weak capitalist class of Russian businessmen was dependent on the tsarist system, and that the capitalists would be too frightened of the revolutionary masses to lead in the overthrow of tsarist tyranny. The struggle for democracy and human rights could only be advanced consistently and finally won under the leadership of the working class, which was capable of organizing labor unions and political organizations in Russia’s cities and towns. Allied with the workers would be the vast peasantry hungry for land, as well as other oppressed social layers – women, oppressed ethnic and national groups, religious minorities, and dissident intellectuals. A victorious worker-led revolution would bring the working class to political power. In other words, democratic revolutions in so-called “backward” countries such as tsarist Russia must spill over into working-class revolutions.

The second aspect of Trotsky’s theory was related to the understanding that the masses of victorious revolutionary workers would not be willing to turn political power over to their capitalist bosses. Instead, they would – with the support of the peasants – consolidate their own rule through democratic councils (known in Russia as “soviets”) and their own people’s army. Under working-class rule there would be dramatic efforts

- to spread education;
- to create universal literacy;
- to make the benefits of culture available to all;
- to provide universal health care to all as a matter of right;
- to ensure that decent housing would be available for all;
- to secure full and equal rights for women and all others oppressed (for example, on the basis of nationality, race, religion) in the old society;
- to include all people in building and developing an economy that would sustain the free development of all.

Increasingly and fairly rapidly, the development of society in this transitional period would go beyond the framework of capitalism and in the direction of socialism.

The third aspect of Trotsky’s theory was related to his understanding that capitalism is a global system that can only be replaced by socialism on a global scale. It was his conviction that it would not be possible to create a socialist democracy in an economically underdeveloped country such as Russia surrounded by a hostile capitalist world. In fact, a working-class revolution in one country would inevitably generate counterrevolutionary responses in surrounding countries – with efforts to repress the revolution. At the same time, it would inspire the workers and oppressed of countries throughout the world. The Russian Revolution would be one of a series of revolutions in country after country throughout the world. This would come about not only because of the example of revolutionary Russia, but especially because of the desire of more and more workers and oppressed people in all countries to end the exploitation and hardship that, Trotsky believed, are the inevitable result of capitalism. The process of socialist revolution can begin within a single country, but socialism can only be created on a global scale.

Opposing Bureaucratic Tyranny

Trotsky’s theory of permanent revolution was connected to his approach to revolutionary strategy in general, and also to his analysis of Stalinism. He explained that the Russian Revolution’s isolation – resulting from the failure and defeat of revolutions elsewhere – led to the bureaucratic and murderous distortions of the Stalinist dictatorship in the Soviet Union. “On the foundation of the dictatorship of the proletariat – in a backward country,” Trotsky wrote, “surrounded by capitalism – for the first time a powerful bureaucratic apparatus has been created from among the upper layers of the workers, that is raised above the masses, that lays down the law to them, that has at its disposal colossal resources, that is bound together by an inner mutual responsibility, and that intrudes into the policies of a workers’ government its own interests, methods, and regulations.”

Given the economic underdevelopment and general poverty of Soviet Russia, many in the Communist Party and government apparatus were inclined to translate their political power into personal economic privileges, and they were motivated by the desire to defend such power and privilege. Even this bureaucracy’s policies for developing the country’s economy were carried out in a bureaucratic manner. “Industrialization and collectivization are being put through by the one-sided and uncontrolled laying down of the law to the laboring masses by the bureaucracy,” Trotsky pointed out. “The bureaucracy cannot exercise its pressure upon workers and peasants except by depriving them of all possibility of participating in decisions upon questions that touch their own labor and their entire future” (1971: 213, 219, 220).

Increasingly the most undemocratic, unjust, and inhumane policies became associated with the “general line” of the bureaucratized Soviet Communist Party, headed by Joseph Stalin. Trotsky was scathing in his comments on the bureaucratic functionary “who manipulates the general line like a fireman his hose.” In this description, written in 1932, we see similarities between labor bureaucrats inside and outside of Stalinist Russia:

He eats and guzzles and procreates and grows himself a respectable potbelly. He lays down the law with a sonorous voice, handpicks from below people who are faithful to him, remains faithful to his superiors, prohibits others from criticizing himself, and sees in all of this the gist of the general line. . . .

The ruling and uncontrolled position of the Soviet bureaucracy is conducive to a psychology which in many ways is directly contradictory to the psychology of a proletarian revolutionist. Its own aims and combinations in domestic as well as international politics are placed by the bureaucracy above the tasks of the revolutionary education of the masses and have no connection with the tasks of the international revolution. In the course of a number of years the Stalinist faction demonstrated that the interests and the psychology of the prosperous peasant, engineer, administrator, Chinese bourgeois intellectual, and British trade union functionary were much closer and more comprehensible to it than the psychology and needs of the unskilled laborer, the peasant poor, the Chinese national masses in revolt, the British strikers, etc. (1971: 213–15)

The Revolutionary Socialist Defense of Democracy Against Fascism

Just as there is a link between Trotsky's view of labor bureaucracies inside and outside of the Soviet Union, there is a connection between the theory of permanent revolution and Trotsky's approach to revolutionary strategy in general. Every genuine and consistent struggle for democratic rights, he believed, must, if it was to be fought through to victory, be based on and led by the working class – by critical-minded working-class activists organically connected to and followed by masses of working people throughout society. Such democratic struggles and victories always have a revolutionary dynamic and pose the question of workers' power. In Trotsky's time there were a number of major right-wing attacks on democratic rights, including:

- in Russia of 1917, the attempted military coup by General Kornilov between the March and November revolutions;
- in Mussolini's fascist onslaught to take over Italy in the 1920s;
- in the rise and final 1933 triumph of Hitler's Nazis in Germany;
- in the Spanish Civil War initiated by the 1936 military–fascist–conservative uprising against the new democratic republic.

In each case, Trotsky rejected proposals for broad and far-reaching political alliances of working-class organizations with liberal capitalist forces for the purpose of defending capitalist democracy against the right-wing threat. He always insisted on remaining true to the Marxist perspective of working-class political independence. He therefore favored a united front of all working-class forces to uncompromisingly defend genuine democracy and the interests of the workers. The victory of such a working-class defense of democracy would, as had happened in Russia of 1917, create the immediate possibility of the workers taking political power and initiating a socialist transition.

Trotsky (in conjunction with Lenin) held that a united front could also be made with other class forces – including pro-capitalist liberals – around limited struggles (for democratic rights, for specific reforms, or against war), but never in a manner that compromised the political independence of the working class. Such united front efforts, for example, existed during the struggle against tsarism – but Lenin and Trotsky rejected the Menshevik orientation of turning this into the far-reaching strategy of a worker–capitalist alliance. In later years, Trotsky and his followers were prepared to form united fronts with bourgeois liberals to aid the Spanish Republic against fascist attack (while rejecting the far-reaching worker–capitalist alliance of the Popular Front), to expose the falseness and criminality of Stalin's Moscow trials (the Dewey Commission), and to oppose war (support for the Ludlow amendment in the US). A central thrust of the united front tactic, however, was always to make more effective the struggles of the working class in the defense of its interests – and to the extent that this is successful, a revolutionary dynamic is set in motion.

Trotsky's analysis of fascism is also linked to his revolutionary strategic orientation. Fascism involves the rise of right-wing mass movements whose goal is the creation of a permanent dictatorship dedicated to the systematic destruction of both democratic rights and independent workers' movements, combining a radical–populist rhetoric (often laced with racism) with super-patriotic and aggressive nationalism, and with the glorification of militarism and war. It developed in Italy and in Germany (taking an especially racist form) in the 1920s and 1930s. Trotsky believed fascism resulted from a social and economic crisis generating on the one hand a radical upsurge of the workers' movement and, on the other hand, deep fear from the upper classes and among the so-called “middle classes.” If the workers failed to take political power (and failed to begin a transition to a socialist solution to the crisis), then right-wing demagogues with fascistic “solutions” would gain an ever-greater hearing among the frightened “middle classes” and disappointed masses, and powerful upper-class elements would offer such movements substantial economic and political support. The rise of fascism indicates revolutionary socialist possibilities that have remained unrealized – and the only effective way to defeat fascism is to develop an uncompromising working-class defense of democracy that pushes in a revolutionary socialist direction.

Workers’ Democracy Against Reformism and Capitalism

One of the greatest obstacles to the forward movement of the working class, in Trotsky’s opinion, was the development of bureaucracies (in some cases Stalinist, in others moderate socialist, in many other cases anti-socialist, or “business unionist”) that had developed and become encrusted in the leaderships of working-class organizations – creating a great divide between the functioning of organizations claiming to represent the workers and the actual workers themselves. The ideology of the labor bureaucrats in capitalist countries was often labeled reformism, which held that the accumulation of reforms – won through pressuring and negotiating with the capitalists – makes socialist revolution unnecessary. “Both Marxism and reformism have a solid social support underlying them,” according to Trotsky. “Marxism expresses the historical interests of the proletariat [that is, the working class]. Reformism speaks for the privileged position of the proletarian bureaucracy and [higher-paid labor] aristocracy within . . . capitalist [society]” (1971: 211). Obviously, such elements in the labor movement would be inclined to establish far-reaching alliances with liberal capitalist politicians not only to oppose fascism but also to continue accumulating modest reforms. Near the end of his life, Trotsky observed that this was leading to something new as powerful capitalist corporations became increasingly entwined with the state apparatus:

The trade unions in the present epoch cannot simply be the organs of democracy as they were in the epoch of free capitalism and they cannot any longer remain politically neutral, that is, limit themselves to serving the daily needs of the working class. . . . The trade unions of our time can either serve as secondary instruments of imperialist capitalism for the subordination and disciplining of workers and for obstructing the revolution, or, on the contrary, the trade unions can become the instrument of the revolutionary movement of the proletariat. (1969: 71)

From Trotsky’s standpoint, there would be a need for unions, and other organizations of the working class, to be democratically controlled by their members for the purpose of defending their own interests and the interests of the working class as a whole. Active participation, serious and far-reaching political education, and the self-organization and self-mobilization of workers at the rank-and-file level would be required to secure improved working and living conditions, to defend the democratic and human rights of all, and to overcome the multifaceted social crises of our time. This could only be realized through socialism. “Life is beautiful,” Trotsky wrote in 1940. “Let the future generations cleanse it of all evil, oppression, and violence, and enjoy it to the full” (1973–9 [1939–40]: 159).

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Imperialism, Modernization to Globalization; Internationals; Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Luxemburg, Rosa (1870–1919); Martov, Julius (1873–1923); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Marxism; Plekhanov, Georgi (1856–1918); Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and “Revolution from Above”

References and Suggested Readings

- Broué, P. (1988) Trotsky. Paris: Fayard.
- Cliff, T. (1989–93). Trotsky, 4 vols. London: Bookmarks.
- Deutscher, I. (1954) The Prophet Armed, Trotsky: 1879–1921. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Deutscher, I. (1959) The Prophet Unarmed, Trotsky: 1921–1929. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Deutscher, I. (1963) The Prophet Unarmed, Trotsky: 1929–1940. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Le Blanc, P. (1996) From Marx to Gramsci: A Reader in Revolutionary Marxist Politics. Amherst: Humanity Books.
- Löwy, M. (1981) The Politics of Uneven and Combined Development. London: Verso.
- Mandel, E. (1995) Trotsky as Alternative. London: Verso.

- Trotsky, L. (1936) History of the Russian Revolution, 3 vols. in 1. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Trotsky, L. (1967) Stalin, An Appraisal of the Man and His Influence. New York: Stein & Day.
- Trotsky, L. (1969) On the Trade Unions. New York: Merit Publishers.
- Trotsky, L. (1970a) My Life. New York: Pathfinder Press.
- Trotsky, L. (1970b) The Revolution Betrayed. New York: Pathfinder Press.
- Trotsky, L. (1971) The Struggle Against Fascism in Germany. Ed. G. Breitman, M. Maisel, & D. Roberts. New York: Pathfinder Press.
- Trotsky, L. (1972) Permanent Revolution and Results and Prospects. New York: Pathfinder Press.
- Trotsky, L. (1973–9) Writings of Leon Trotsky, 1929–1940, 14 vols. Ed. G. Breitman et al. New York: Pathfinder Press.
- Trotsky, L. (1975–81) The Challenge of the Left Opposition, 1923–29, 3 vols. Ed. N. Allen & G. Saunders. New York: Pathfinder Press.

Truth, Sojourner (ca. 1797–1883)

Albert Rolls

Born around 1797 in Hurly, New York, and given the name Isabella, Sojourner Truth, who later in life earned fame as an evangelist, abolitionist, and women's rights advocate, remained a slave until 1827 when, on July 4, African Americans born before July 4, 1799 were freed in accordance with New York's 1817 emancipation statute. Her owners during her first 30 years included Johannes Hardenbergh and his son Charles Hardenbergh, who sold her to John Neely in 1806. Martinus Schryver bought her in 1808, and two years later she was sold to John Dumont.

Dumont remained Truth's master until the fall of 1826, when she emancipated herself after he reneged on a promise to set her free early. He insisted that she return, and while he and she argued the matter, Isaac Van Wagenen, an opponent of slavery, stepped in, paying Dumont $20 for the services he believed were owed to him. Thus for the last months of her legal status as a slave, she stayed with Isaac and Maria Van Wagenen, whose surname she took when she received her free papers.

For the next two years, Truth lived in Kingston, working as a domestic servant. She also successfully sued to free her 5-year-old son Peter, who had been illicitly sold to an Alabama slave-owner. During the same period she became a member of Kingston's Methodist Church. In 1829 she moved, with Peter, to New York City and joined the John Street Church, where she preached and, according to contemporary reports, managed to convert others with her zeal. Soon, however, she joined the all-black Zion Church.

In 1831 Truth went into the employ of Elijah Pierson, who introduced her to Robert Matthews, or the Prophet Matthias. She then joined Matthias's Utopian community, the Kingdom, in which she lived until 1834, when Matthias was accused of murdering Pierson. Truth was then accused of attempting to poison Ann and Benjamin Folger, a wealthy family also involved with Matthias. She successfully sued to clear her name.

On June 1, 1843 she quit her domestic position, took the name Sojourner Truth, and became a traveling evangelist, living in Northampton, Massachusetts, from 1844 to 1857 and in Battle Creek, Michigan, from 1857 until her death in 1883. During her first years as Truth, she extended her reputation as a powerful preacher. In 1850 she spoke at a women's rights convention in Massachusetts, and Oliver Gilbert's Narrative of Sojourner Truth (1850) first appeared. After that, she began traveling throughout the Northern states, speaking as an abolitionist and women's rights advocate.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Slavery Movement, United States, 1700–1870; Women's Movement, United States, 19th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Gilbert, O. (1850/1991) Narrative of Sojourner Truth. Intro. J. C. Stewart. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Mabee, C. (1995) Sojourner Truth: Slave, Prophet, Legend. New York: NYU Press.
- Painter, N. (1996) Sojourner Truth: A Life, a Symbol. New York: W. W. Norton.

Tubman, Harriet (ca. 1819–1913)

Albert Rolls

Primarily remembered for her work as a conductor on the Underground Railroad (UR), Harriet Tubman came to be known as "the Moses of her people" during her lifetime, yet her helping slaves escape to freedom represents only a portion of her accomplishments.

Given the name Araminta Ross at her birth in Dorchester, Maryland, in about 1819, Tubman spent the first 29 years of her life as the property of Edward Brodas. Brodas often rented her to other families, including that of James Cook when she was around 5, but most often to that of Anthony Thompson, whose father, Brodas's stepfather, served as the master of Harriet's parents before Brodas came of age.

At the age of 13, Tubman, who according to some accounts had already changed her name to Harriet, suffered a head injury at the hands of her overseer, who, while throwing an iron weight at another slave, hit her, leaving a permanent indent in her skull and inflicting her with a condition that caused her to fall asleep in the middle of daily activities. She nonetheless continued working for the families to which she was rented or on Brodas's plantation. In 1844 she married John Tubman. Five years later she escaped Thompson's plantation without her husband, who refused to run, and was taken to freedom on the UR.

After gaining her freedom, Tubman met William Still, one of the organizers of the UR, at the Philadelphia Anti-Slavery Society and began planning the emancipation of her sister, brother-in-law, and their two children, a plan that was put into action in 1850. Over the next decade Tubman continued working on the UR, emancipating over 300 slaves, including her brother in 1851 and her parents in 1857, without, it was said, ever allowing one to be captured. The year she rescued her parents, William Stewart, New York's governor, presented Tubman with a house in Auburn, New York, a gift Tubman insisted on paying for in small regular payments.

In 1860, after going to Maryland for the last time, Tubman went to Canada, as a $40,000 reward had been offered for her capture, but she returned the following year after the Civil War broke out, and for the next four years served in various capacities in the Union Army, including as a cook, nurse, spy, and scout. When the war ended, Tubman returned to her house in Auburn, where her parents were still living. There, she carried out what she called her "last work," providing a home for those who were unable to care for themselves. For the rest of her life, which ended on March 10, 1913, she supported that cause with help from supporters and earnings that she received from the two biographies, Scenes in the Life of Harriet Tubman (1869) and Harriet, The Moses of Her People (1886), written about her by Sarah Bradford.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Slavery Movement, United States, 1700–1870; Slave Rescues and the Underground Railroad, United States

References and Suggested Readings

- Clinton, C. (2004) Harriet Tubman: The Road to Freedom. New York: Little, Brown.
- Edmonds Crewe, S. (2005) Housing: Harriet Tubman's Last Work. Journal of Housing and Community Development 62 (3): 6, 8, 10–12.
- McMahon Humez, J. (2003) Harriet Tubman: The Life and the Life Stories. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

Tulip Revolution, Kyrgyzstan

Donnacha Ó Beacháin

Askar Akaev said he wanted Kyrgyzstan to be “the Switzerland of Central Asia,” but when the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991 the small country of five million people found itself ill-prepared for independence. The economy went into free fall and poverty was widespread. Despite an early reputation for being a progressive liberal, President Akaev adopted an increasingly authoritarian and corrupt style of rule, alienating many sections of the Kyrgyz electorate and influential members of the political elite. On March 24, 2005 his rule came abruptly to an end when the presidential palace was seized and the Akaev family fled the country. While it is well known who was unhappy with Akaev's presidency and who benefited from his overthrow, to this day it is not clear who was responsible for ousting the Kyrgyz president.

The Rise of Askar Akaev

By the middle of the 1990s, Kyrgyzstan, a newly independent former Soviet republic, was considered an island of democracy in a desert of Central Asian authoritarianism. It was ruled by a president who was a politician by accident, Askar Akaev. Born in 1944, the youngest of five sons, Akaev studied and taught physics in Leningrad from 1967 to 1977 before returning

Kyrgyz protesters raise their arms to vote for the resignation of President Askar Akaev during the Tulip Revolution in Kyrgyzstan on March 15, 2005. The Tulip Revolution sought to end the rule of Akaev, who was considered corrupt and authoritarian. On April 4, 2005, Akaev fled the country and signed his resignation in Moscow. (AFP/Getty Images) to Kyrgyzstan where he was respected as an academic, becoming president of the country's Academy of Sciences in 1989. On October 27, 1990, the Kyrgyz Supreme Soviet selected Akaev as a compromise choice for the new position of president of the republic. His surprise victory came shortly after the two major candidates – the president of Kyrgyzstan's Council of Ministers, Apas Jumagulov, and the first secretary of the country's Communist Party, Absamat Masaliyev – were eliminated from the contest after each failed to secure a majority of votes in the Supreme Soviet. Kyrgyzstan's relative liberalism (compared to other Central Asian republics) was attributed to Akaev's lack of a political background. As the 1990s progressed, however, Akaev's presidential rule became increasingly authoritarian, and there was a corresponding rise in dissatisfaction with the regime.

The political demise of Georgian President Edward Shevardnadze in the Rose Revolution of November 2003 and of Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma's nominee, Victor Yanukovich, in the Orange Revolution of November–December 2004 led many to look anxiously (or expectantly) to other post-Soviet countries for similar regime changes. Akaev had ruled Kyrgyzstan for 14 years and had said he would not contest the presidential elections to be held in October 2005. Thus, the parliamentary elections of February 27 and March 13 would have a direct bearing on his retirement. The bicameral parliament of 60 members in the Legislative Assembly (lower house) and 45 deputies in the People's Assembly (upper house) were to be replaced by a new unicameral parliament of 75 seats. Many suspected that Akaev would try to fill parliament with his own supporters and move the country away from a presidential form of government lest his successor prove unreliable in guaranteeing the interests, particularly the economic wealth, of the Akaev family. The fact that opposition candidates found it difficult to contest the election while several members of Akaev's family, including his son and daughter, were registered without difficulty reinforced this perception. Media freedom was increasingly stifled and the few remaining bastions of independent journalism – MSN and Respublika – found themselves threatened with closure. The most prominent opposition figure, Felix Kulov, was in prison, having been dispatched there on politically motivated charges of embezzlement once he had started to show signs of opposing Akaev. Kulov was a former vice-president of Kyrgyzstan (1992–3) before the position was abolished and governor of the Chui region (1994–7). He was also a popular mayor of the capital, Bishkek, but on resigning from that position in 1999 he established an opposition political party, Ar-Namys, and made it clear that he would contest the 2000 election against Akaev. Disqualified from running for the presidency by the government-appointed Central Election Commission, Kulov soon found himself in military custody and was not due to be released until November 2005, one month after a presidential election which many observers felt he would win if permitted to run.

Akaev had always sought good relations with both Washington and Moscow. His even-handed approach was reflected in his decision to permit both American and Russian military bases to operate on Kyrgyz territory. In the run-up to the election, however, there was a noticeable shift in Akaev's position as he sought refuge by strengthening his alliance with Russian President Vladimir Putin against the West. When Akaev introduced Putin to his son, Aidar, at a meeting in Moscow in January 2005, some suspected that he was grooming his heir for high political office. Allied with this increased reliance on Russia was Akaev's marked characterization of opposition within Kyrgyzstan as western-financed exporters of revolution. Akaev, along with other regional presidents, repeatedly claimed that the conditions for a velvet revolution did not exist in Central Asia. Such a revolution would be manufactured from abroad rather than be a response to indigenous problems. There were no economic or political premises for revolution, Akaev said, as in contrast to Georgia, for example, the Kyrgyz were well off or at least people had electricity and heat in their homes. Akaev was also aware that in an election whose outcome would be crucial to his retirement plans, he was likely to get a ringing endorsement from the delegations of election monitors from the Russian-dominated Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) while evoking embarrassing criticisms from western-based organizations like the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE). Indeed, the CIS monitors had already judged the Uzbekistan parliamentary elections in December and January, in which no opposition party had been allowed to register, to be free and fair, so they were unlikely to find fault with those to be conducted in Kyrgyzstan.

Elections and Protests

Opposition to the Akaev regime came from a number of prominent political figures, most of them former members of his administrations, but it was clear that there was no single leader around whom the opposition could unite. In Georgia and Ukraine, Mikheil Saakashvili and Viktor Yushchenko, respectively, had successfully personified opposition to the status quo, but in Kyrgyzstan, despite the plethora of political parties, the system was, and remains, dominated by individual rather than ideological competition. In this sense, the opposition suffered more from a dearth of leadership than leaders. Worthy of mention is Kel Kel (Kyrgyz: "It's Time"), a small group of anti-government dissidents, largely student intellectuals, who self-consciously modeled their actions on successful revolutionary youth organizations in Georgia (Kmara), Ukraine (Pora), and Serbia (Otpor). From the beginning of the year, Kel Kel began organizing small-scale demonstrations, mainly in Bishkek, and again following the examples of other movements, tried to adopt appropriate symbols and colors to identify and characterize the movement for change. Initially, there was indecision as to whether to adopt pink or yellow as a color and the lemon or the tulip as a symbol. The tulip won out (imitating the rose that symbolized the Georgian Revolution), and the violent ousting of Akaev was to be known as the Tulip Revolution among its supporters.

The two rounds of elections conducted on February 27 and March 13 passed without major incident. A novel feature of the contests was the use of voter marking in an effort to counteract organized fraud. The left thumb/index finger of the voter was marked with indelible ink to prevent repeat voting. The program was financed by the US government (costing $185,000) and distributed by the International Foundation for Electoral Systems (IFES). The first round of elections was inconclusive and only 32 candidates succeeded in securing election (Kyrgyzstani election law demands that a candidate secure more than 50 percent of the vote, otherwise a second ballot is required between the two strongest contenders). Most of the candidates successful in the first round of voting were wealthy local businessmen thought to be loyal to Akaev. Very few opposition figures were elected in this opening round, though several made it through to the runoff stage on March 13. The results of the second round, as predicted, saw most key oppositionists marginalized; only seven of the 75 deputies elected were clearly identifiable members of the opposition. There was no instant reaction to the results and Akaev even claimed on March 16 that, after studying carefully the Orange and Rose revolutions, he had developed an anti-virus to counter the color revolution disease that was plaguing the post-Soviet space. His boasts proved premature, however, and rumblings of discontent soon began in different parts of the country.

Initially, protests were of a local character and were carried out by supporters of defeated parliamentary candidates in Naryn, Talas, and Kochtor in the north of the country, and Osh and Jalalabad in the south. In the Osh region, demonstrators in Uzgen seized administration buildings, forcing the electoral commission to declare defeated candidate Adahan Madumarov the winner, while supporters of another defeated candidate in Alay blocked the main road to Osh, Kyrgyzstan's second largest city. In Talas, several thousand supporters of Ravshan Jeenbekov, a former Akaev insider turned opposition candidate, also blocked roads and seized government buildings but went one step further by holding the regional governor hostage for 24 hours. On March 15, a large rally of about 15,000 people took place in Jalalabad, where opposition protesters occupied administration buildings, and was addressed by a variety of prominent anti-government figures including Kurmanbek Bakiev, Rosa Otunbaeva, and Azimbek Beknazarov. The meeting called for Akaev's resignation and new parliamentary elections. It also elected a Coordinating Council for National Unity and chose Jusupbek Jeenbekov as its chairman and "people's governor" for the Jalalabad region. On March 18, protesters seized government buildings in Osh and three days later a large rally appointed Anvar Artykov as a "people's governor," thus creating a parallel system of government for the region. The choice of Artykov – an ethnic Uzbek – was partially to quell fears among the large Uzbek population in Osh, who had traditionally viewed Akaev as a bulwark against assertive Kyrgyz nationalism.

The government forces were caught unawares by the sudden rise in activism and were slow to respond. State security forces recaptured the government buildings in Osh and Jalalabad on March 19, but up to 10,000 protesters regained control of the building in Jalalabad the following morning and destroyed police headquarters and other state buildings. Similar events occurred in Osh and other towns. The police – obviously under orders not to precipitate a bloodbath – used minimum force and rapidly ceded control of much of the southern urban centers to the protesters. Jalalabad and Osh airports were seized to prevent the government flying in reinforcements.

Overthrow of Akaev

While the south was in turmoil, the capital Bishkek, situated in the far north of the country, remained calm. On March 22, the Kyrgyz president convened the new parliament and told the newly elected deputies that there would be no revolution. From his citadel in the White House (as the presidential palace is called), Akaev rejected all overtures from the opposition to negotiate a way out of the impasse. Rather, a harder line was in evidence when, on March 23, he fired the interior minister and the prosecutor-general. The following day, opposition leaders held a major rally in Bishkek with many protesters bussed in from other (particularly southern) regions. In the main square on Chui Street close to the White House, opposition leaders made speeches while Kel Kel activists brought tents, emulating the protesters in Kiev of a few months earlier, and prepared for a protracted battle of wills. When buses carrying several hundred people from Osh arrived they were met with a rapturous welcome; however, rather than join the rally, the Osh protesters continued onwards to the White House where they were joined by some young people from the rally. This group clashed with police protecting the White House and twice was forced back. The position of the security forces – under instructions not to open fire – was untenable and they eventually fled. With no one to hinder them, the protesters stormed the building and within a short time were waving from the windows and throwing furniture and pictures out onto the plaza. Akaev had already left the building some hours earlier, but those unfortunate enough not to escape – the heads of the presidential administration, public relations, and the National Guard – were badly beaten.

The old regime never regained control, nor was there a serious attempt of the ruling political elite to reassert its right to govern. Mass looting followed throughout Bishkek. Businesses thought to be connected with the Akaev family were targeted, as were foreign enterprises, particularly Turkish shops. There is considerable anecdotal evidence too that shops belonging to ethnic minorities within Kyrgyzstan suffered disproportionately and there was some intimidation of ethnic Slavs. In an attempt to avoid financial ruin, some shopkeepers put signs in their front window expressing support for the protests. The release of Felix Kulov from prison on March 24 by jubilant supporters and his rapid return to prominence greatly assisted in bringing the security situation under control. Kulov was immediately given the position of national security chief and entrusted with bringing the country back from the brink – quite a feat for a man who earlier that morning had woken up in a prison cell at a high-security correctional labor camp. Kulov managed to impose a curfew, persuade police to return to work, and ordered them to fire on looters in an attempt to restore stability. Despite widespread disorder, there were only three reported fatalities during the disturbances.

What was clear during the first few days is that the opposition had overstepped themselves. Having surpassed their most optimistic expectations so quickly, there was little time to put together a strategy and the lack of sustained coordination began to show. With the disappearance of the government and the breakdown of law and order, a political vacuum had been created that some force had to fill. Opposition leaders professed themselves eager to act within the constitution and to effect a peaceful transition, but to do that they had to get Akaev to formally resign; until then, Akaev would retain legal authority in the country. The problem was that for some time nobody knew the whereabouts of the president, though the most popular rumors suggested he was in Russia, Kazakhstan, or the Russian military base at Kant, 30 kilometers from Bishkek.

Into the breach stepped Kurmanbek Bakiev who, amid the chaos on March 24, assumed the positions of acting prime minister and, in Akaev's absence, acting president, appointments later confirmed by the newly elected parliament. Though not a particularly charismatic or even strong leader, Bakiev proved acceptable to many in the opposition. As a southerner, he could rely on the support of many in the south who felt alienated from the Akaev elite in Bishkek that had filled key positions in the administration with relatives and friends from the north of the country. For those in the more liberal and Russified north who feared dominance by the relatively traditional and nationalistic south, Bakiev was able to present himself as a moderate, and the fact that he was married to an ethnic Russian assuaged the fears of many national minorities. For political conservatives – both inside Kyrgyzstan and in other post-Soviet republics – who feared a radical departure from previous political and economic policies, Bakiev's experience in politics and his cautious tenure as prime minister from 2001 to 2002 allayed many suspicions. His conservative streak was immediately evident when it became clear that there would be no new elections and that the new parliament would be considered the legitimate legislature of the country. This, at a stroke, undermined the very basis on which Akaev had been overthrown: that he had engineered a compliant parliament before and during an election that was marred by irregularities. From Moscow, Akaev defiantly condemned the new administration as a group of political adventurers riding on the backs of anarchy and pogroms disguised by revolutionary slogans. For a while it seemed like Akaev might refuse to relinquish office, but following a meeting in Moscow with a delegation led by Kyrgyz parliamentary speaker Omurbek Tekebaev, on April 3, the Kyrgyz president agreed to step down. On April 4, Akaev traveled to the Kyrgyzstan embassy in Moscow to tender his resignation. This was accepted by the new parliament a week later, and July 10 was set as the date for presidential elections. Both Bakiev and Kulov declared their candidacy and there was speculation that the contest might increase tension between the north and south of the country (represented by Kulov and Bakiev respectively). These fears were eventually dispelled on May 13 when Kulov announced that he was withdrawing from the race and would support Bakiev. A pact was agreed whereby Kulov would allow Bakiev a clear run for the highest office (there would be other candidates but none had a realistic chance of success), and in return Kulov would be appointed prime minister by Bakiev. The pre-election pact took the heat out of the campaign, but some more democratically inclined observers criticized the deal, arguing that it deprived voters of a real choice. Certainly, Bakiev's landslide victory on July 10 – he took almost 90 percent of the votes in a six-man race – was more a coronation than an election. While a strong mandate was perhaps desirable to legitimize Bakiev's rapid and unorthodox rise to power, the scale of victory seemed to mirror the rigged elections of other post-Soviet autocracies.

Revolution?

The question remains whether what happened in Kyrgyzstan during March 2005 can be called a revolution. Certainly, groups like Kel Kel, who had prepared for peaceful regime change and self-consciously copied the style and tactics of successful protest movements in Georgia and Ukraine, believed that a revolution had occurred. Like a proud mother or father, they claimed parentage of the new order. However, these groups played a very small role in determining the composition of the new government. Indeed, so carried away were they with the euphoria that resulted from an unexpected victory that they did not seem to mind that the composition of the new cabinet included many old faces from the Akaev administrations. But while the intellectual opposition may have prepared for regime change and conferred legitimacy on the new order, it played no role in the decisive taking of the White House and overthrow of the regime. It remains a mystery why the police and army put up so little resistance to the crowds who besieged the presidential palace. Rather than being a revolution brought about by a strong opposition, it is arguable that what happened was simply the collapse of rotten state institutions, which could not survive even a minor frontal assault. Another mystery is who exactly were the few hundred individuals that stormed the White House and, more importantly, what were their motives? What is certain is that they had little to do with the peaceful protesters who had prepared for a long campaign. There is no evidence to link the sudden demise of the old regime on March 23 with the activities of the main opposition figures and groups, and the forces that did topple the Akaev regime – the few hundred men who stormed the White House – may have been adept at destroying the old order, but they played no role in creating a new one. That task was left to disparate opposition leaders like Bakiev, Kulov, Otunbaeva, and Beknazarov who had united against the established order, but their unity of purpose would be difficult to sustain now that Akaev was gone.

The Kyrgyzstan political elite today is not noticeably more democratic than that which governed during the last years of Akaev. However, parliament has asserted itself and there is evidence that civil society and political activism remain significant forces in Kyrgyzstan. The occupation of cities and mass protests in the south of Kyrgyzstan had a more popular revolutionary aspect than those that ousted Akaev in Bishkek. And it is important to note that during these mass demonstrations, there was no evidence of western-funded non-governmental organizations playing a prominent role, as was later suggested by other authoritarian leaders in the post-Soviet space, including Russian President Vladimir Putin and Akaev himself.

Less than two years after the overthrow of the Akaev regime, Bakiev and Kulov had parted ways and the president was fending off strong opposition from a number of civil society groups. On February 20, 2007, Bakiev declared that “any manifestation of radicalism is unacceptable and cannot be supported by the healthy forces and the people of Kyrgyzstan” – hardly the words of a revolutionary.

Even Akaev couldn't figure out who had been the author of his downfall. The “West,” in particular the Soros Foundation, received some of the blame from Akaev, while on March 31, 2005, he told the BBC that the US ambassador to Kyrgyzstan, Steven Young, had played a role in orchestrating the regime change. Six weeks later, in an article written for the Russian-language daily newspaper Izvestiya, he claimed the new administration that had replaced him was composed of old communist-era officials. “It is laughable to see the organizers of this coup d'état [described] as a ‘new political elite’ – these are mainly those who sprang from the [Communist] party and Soviet nomenklatura” (May 12, 2005). In the end, neither old Soviet nomenklatura nor new American acolytes had manufactured widespread disaffection against the Kyrgyz president. Akaev had done a good job of that all by himself.

SEE ALSO: Charter 77; Color Revolutions; Soviet Union, Fall of; Ukraine Orange Revolution, 2004–2005

References and Suggested Readings

- Abazov, R. (2007) Parliamentary Elections in Kyrgyzstan, February/March 2005. Electoral Studies 26, 2 (June): 529–33.
- Anderson, J. (1999) Kyrgyzstan: Central Asia's Island of Democracy. Oxford: Routledge.
- Cummings, S. N. & Nørgaard, O. (2004) Conceptualising State Capacity: Comparing Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan. Political Studies 52, 4 (December): 685–708.
- Fuhrmann, M. (2006) A Tale of Two Social Capitals: Explaining Revolutionary Collective Action in Kyrgyzstan. Problems of Post-Communism 53 (November–December): 16–29.
- International Crisis Group (2005) Kyrgyzstan: After the Revolution. Bishkek and Brussels: ICG.
- McMann, K. M. (2006) Economic Autonomy and Democracy: Hybrid Regimes in Russia and Kyrgyzstan. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Marat, E. (2006) The Tulip Revolution: Kyrgyzstan One Year After. Washington, DC: Jamestown Foundation.
- OSCE/ODIHR International Observer Mission (2005) Final Report of Parliamentary Elections in the Kyrgyz Republic, 27 February and 13 March 2005. Warsaw: OSCE/ODIHR.
- Yarkova, T. (2004) Applying the Concepts of Legitimacy and Trust in Kyrgyzstan. In C. Harrington, A. Salem, & T. Zurabishvili (Eds.), After Communism: Critical Perspectives on Society and Sociology. Oxford and New York: Peter Lang.
- Several useful articles covering events in Kyrgyzstan during 2005 are available at Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (www.rferl.org), Eurasianet (www.eurasianet.org), and Transitions Online (www.tol.cz).

Tunisia, protests under Ottoman (Bey) rule to 1881

Arnaud Lucien

The government of the Bey dynasty in Tunisia, in power from the seventeenth to the nineteenth centuries, originated in protest against Turkish hegemony as the regional janissary corps of the Ottoman empire sought autonomy and local administration over the province.

Tunisia emerged as a territory of independent principalities and harbor cities, setting the stage for wars between the Hafsid dynasty, the Ottoman empire, and the French and Spanish. In 1534, Khizirkhayn al din, also known as Barbarossa, distinguished himself by capturing Bizerte, la Goulette, and Tunis from the Hafsid dynasty, which had ruled them for three centuries. In 1535, Tunis was taken for Spain by Charles V, to be relinquished only in 1560 when the Ottoman navy under the command of Piyale Pasha and Turgut Reis defeated the fleet of Spain's Philip II in the Battle of Djerba. Shortly afterward, Spain returned Hafsid Sultan Hamid to the throne of Tunis.

In 1569, Uluj Ali, the Pasha of Algiers, seized Tunis and held it until 1573, when Don Juan of Austria recaptured it for Spain. In 1574, returning with a large fleet, Uluj Ali defeated Spain and returned Tunis to the Ottoman empire. Domination of the Ottoman province remained fragile, especially in central Tunisia. In 1590, 4,000 janissaries in Tunis launched an insurrection and placed a Dey in power, with a Bey under his command. The Beys were responsible for military control of the territory and for collecting taxes. In 1705, Hussein Ben Ali was elected Bey of Tunis and founded the Hussein dynasty, which installed a monarchy officially under the sovereignty of the Ottomans. However, throughout the Hussein period, Tunis gradually became more autonomous from the Turkish empire and its allegiance to the sultan became symbolic. Europe began negotiating directly with the Dey.

In 1735, Hussein Bey I was overthrown by his nephew, Ali I Bey, and later murdered by his grandnephew in 1740. Ali I Bey would later be overthrown by the sons of his predecessor, who took control of Tunis with the help of the Bey of Constantine, Rachid Bey (1756–9), and his successor, Ali II Bey (1759–82). In 1781, Hammouda Bey came to power and initiated a prosperous period for Tunis. Hammouda was also successful in halting an Algerian invasion in 1807 and a janissary revolt in 1811.

Following the end of a number of European conflicts in the early nineteenth century, economic activity in Tunisia entered a severe decline. By 1820, Tunisia had experienced plague and cholera epidemics, and in 1827 its fleet was destroyed. In the following years, Ahmad Pacha Bey (1837–55) initiated reforms and set about modernizing the army, administration, education, and health care. He also put an end to the country's slave trade. His successor, Muhammad Pacha Bey, continued his reforms by establishing a pact in 1857 that created a constitutional monarchy. He was succeeded by Sadiq Pacha Bey in 1859, who continued his predecessor's legacy by enacting policies that transformed the pact into a constitution.

Tunisia's independence under the hereditary rule of the Hussein family was recognized by the Turkish sultan, but the province suffered severe financial problems. By 1871 Tunisia was forced to obtain foreign credit, and when its debt grew to unmanageable levels, domestic commerce gave way to foreign investment. In April 1879, French troops entered Tunisia with no resistance from Sadok Bey. On May 12, 1881, the Treaty of Bardo was signed, turning Tunisia into a French protectorate, which it remained until 1956. While the Hussein Beys continued to perform administrative tasks, their power was restricted under French rule. In 1957, after Tunisia had gained independence from France, a republic was declared and the Beylic office was abolished, bringing an end to the Hussein dynasty.

SEE ALSO: Algerian National Revolution, 1954–1962; Tunisian Independence Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Brown, C. (1974) The Tunisia of Ahmad Bey 1837–1855. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Ganiage, J. (1959) Les Origines du protectorat français en Tunisie (1861–1881). Paris: Presses Universitaires de France.
- Moalla, A. (2003) The Regency of Tunis and the Ottoman Porte, 1777–1814: Army and Government of a North-African Eyalet at the End of the Eighteenth Century. New York: Routledge.
- Sebag, P. (1989) Tunis au XVII^e siècle. Une cité barbaresque au temps de la course. Paris: L'Harmattan.

Tunisian independence movement

Seema Shekhawat

The present-day Republic of Tunisia, al-Jumhuriyyah at-Tunisiyyah, achieved independence from France on March 20, 1956. Its history, however, is one of occupation, with the final colonization phase being under France.

Tunisia was under the control of the Berber dynasties until the sixteenth century. With their decline, this North African coastal region (known as the Barbary Coast because of the Berbers) became a bone of contention between Spain in the west and Turkey in the east (Perkins 1986). Though Turkey emerged as the winner in this contest, Tunisia did not come under its direct control as a unified territory. A line of chieftains, called Beys, who were ultimately responsible to Turkey, ruled Tunisia until 1881.

The modernization drive by the Beys financed by borrowing money from European countries finally bankrupted Tunisia. This consequently brought the regions of the Barbary Coast under the economic control of three major European powers – Italy, Britain, and France. In a later chain of events, the region eventually entered its last colonial phase when France turned it into a protectorate in 1881. This forced the Bey, Muhammad III al-Sadiq, to sign the Treaty of Bardo (also known as the Treaty of Al-Qasr as-Sa'id) with France on May 12, 1881.

As elsewhere, colonial status brought some modernization for the region, including education and infrastructure. But in due course it also awakened the desire to become free from occupation. Resistance movements can be traced back to the late 1880s even before the colonial masters had completed one decade of occupation. The launch of the weekly magazine al-Hadira in 1888, and later al-Zahra in 1890, initiated the process of mass unrest against colonial rule. In 1896 there followed a discussion group, the Khaldunniyya School, led by Bashir Sfar; the formation of the Young Tunisian Party in 1907; and the launch in 1909 of a journal, Le Tunisien, in French and Arabic editions by Ali Bash Hamba to promote indigenous rights.

In 1911 and 1912, a series of events set the stage for independence, including unrest within institutions of higher education, the launch of a new political party, al-Ittihad al-Islami (The Evolutionist), and mass demonstrations concerning religion. The colonial masters dealt with the situation with an iron fist, imposing martial law, and many Tunisians were killed during this period. Later in 1912, many nationalist newspapers were forced to shut down and several leaders of the independence movement, which was still in its infancy, were sent into exile in order to curb the growth of nationalist sentiments (Laroui 1977). Nationalist currents only resurfaced following the end of World War I.

The Destour (Constitution) Party was established in 1920 and put forward demands for full independence. Young nationalists who adopted a more aggressive stance on independence defected from the party in 1934 to form the Neo Destour (New Constitution) Party. This event was a turning point since it set the stage for the rise of the most important leader of the independence movement in Tunisia, Habib Bourguiba (1903–2000). French authorities banned the party and Bourguiba was imprisoned. However, his leadership skills ensured the continuation of the movement for independence.

During World War II, Tunisia's bid for independence came to a halt. The Axis powers unsuccessfully courted Bourguiba's influence in Tunisia to help them defeat the Allied powers. Following his release from prison in 1943, Bourguiba proposed a concept of gradual independence (gradualism is also known as Bourguibism, a consistent characteristic of Bourguiba's political approach). Paying no attention to his proposal for non-violence, the Neo Destour recommenced its violent campaign of planting bombs and carrying out attacks on colonial facilities to pressurize the French authorities, leading to a two-year prison term for Bourguiba in 1952. Nevertheless, the violent independence struggle continued.

In June 1954, the new, liberal-minded French prime minister, Pierre Mendès-France, introduced a policy of partial withdrawal from Tunisia as well as from Morocco, partly in order to avoid full-scale armed uprisings on either side of Algeria (Mazrui & Tidy 1984). The consequence of this was an agreement in April 1955 that led to a return to the situation of 1881, with Tunisia receiving internal autonomy while external affairs remained under French control. A Neo Destour government was formed, but Bourguiba refused to take charge until full independence.

Talks continued between Bourguiba and France in accordance with the former's policy of gradualism. The Algerian War of Independence and the independence of Morocco in November 1955 finally paved the way for full independence for Tunisia on March 20, 1956. Bourguiba became prime minister of the newly independent state of Tunisia, with Muhammad VIII al-Amin Bey as king. Following the abolition of the monarchy in 1957, Bourguiba became the first president of the Republic of Tunisia. Tunisia managed to emerge in the postcolonial era with its precolonial boundaries scarcely affected by the redrawing of the political map of Africa by European colonialism.

SEE ALSO: Algerian National Revolution, 1954–1962; Francophone Africa, Protest and Independence; Morocco, Protests, 1600s–1990s; Tunisia, Protests under Ottoman (Bey) Rule to 1881

References and Suggested Readings

Braudel, F. (1992) Mediterranean and the Mediterranean World in the Age of Philip II. Trans. S. Reynolds. New York: HarperCollins.

Kinross, P. B. (1977) The Ottoman Centuries: The Rise and Fall of the Turkish Empire. New York: Morrow Quill.

Laroui, A. (1977) The History of the Maghrib: An Interpretive Essay. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Mazrui, A. A. & Tidy, M. (1984) Nationalism and New States in Africa: From about 1935 to the Present. Nairobi: Heinemann.

Perkins, K. J. (1986) Tunisia: Crossroads of the Islamic and European Worlds. Boulder, CO: Westview.

Túpac Amaru (ca. 1540–1572)

Viviana Uriona

Túpac Amaru was the last indigenous leader of the Inca state in Peru. He was born in Cuzco in about 1540 and died there in 1572. He was the second son of Manco Inca Yupanqui, who had been recognized by Spanish explorer Francisco Pizarro as emperor. After his father's death, the eldest son, Sayri Túpac, submitted to Spanish rule. He was baptized and rewarded by a tract of land and by the command over the Indians at Urubamba. However, Túpac Amaru renounced his family claims and retired to the mountains

Túpac Amaru (ca. 1540–72) was the last indigenous leader of the Sapa Inca royal dynasty in Peru and led the final stronghold of Inca resistance against the Spanish conquest. This drawing by the chronicler Guaman Poma de Ayala in the seventeenth century depicts his execution by Spaniards in 1572. (South American Pictures) of Vilcabamba. Between 1534 and 1572, an anti-colonial resistance group emerged, consisting of the so-called Incas of Vilcabamba. Their four rulers, who did not actually have real political power, were Manco Inca Yupanqui (Manco Cápac II), Sayri Túpac Inca, Titu Cusi Yupanqui, and Túpac Amaru I.

In 1558 the Inca Sayri Túpac was defeated by the Spaniards and moved to Lima, but his brother Titu Cusi stayed in Vilcabamba, spearheading a group of resistant Indians. Túpac Amaru took over the imperial title after Cusi, his half-brother, died in 1571, poisoned, as the Incas believed, by the Spaniards. Unaware of the Inca chief's death, the Spaniards sent two delegates for further talks with the tribe, but these agents were killed by the Incas. The new viceroy, Francisco de Toledo, took advantage of this situation to justify an attack on Vilcabamba, fearing that their resistance could spread to the rest of the Andean population.

In 1572, on the pretext of sending auxiliaries to Chile, Francisco de Toledo ordered 250 men to march against the district of Vilcabamba, where they launched hostilities against Túpac Amaru and the indigenous people of the region. The latter resisted in self-defense, but were defeated several times. With all means of subsistence cut off, Túpac Amaru fled to safety with his family and some followers to the mountains. Receiving notice of his retreat, Captain Martin de Loyola led 20 men across the mountain stream that defended the Incas' retreat and captured the camp in a surprise night-time attack, taking the prince and his family prisoner. Túpac Amaru was transported to Cuzco, where he was baptized before being publicly and brutally executed. The last stronghold of Inca resistance and the royal dynasty of the Incas was thus destroyed, since Túpac Amaru left no male descendants. He did, however, leave two daughters; one of them, Juana Pilco-Huaco, married a chieftain of Surimaná. One of their descendants took the name of Túpac Amaru II and rebelled against the Spaniards in the eighteenth century.

SEE ALSO: Túpac Amaru Rebellion II and the Last Inca Revolt, 1780–1783; Túpac Katari (ca. 1750–1781); Tupamaros

References and Suggested Readings

- Antkowiak, A. (1977) Túpac Amaru oder die letzte Rebellion des Inka. Halle: Mitteldeutsche Verlag.
- Guillén Guillén, E. (1974) Versión inca de la conquista. Lima: Milla Batres.
- Hemming, J. (1970) The Conquest of the Incas. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich.
- MacQuarrie, K. (2007) The Last Days of the Incas. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Túpac Amaru Rebellion II and the Last Inca Revolt, 1780–1783

María N. Marsilli

The great-great grandson of Túpac Amaru I, the last Incan leader and a provincial Indian nobleman, José Gabriel Condorcanqui Noguera, alias Túpac Amaru II (1742–81), led the most significant Indian rebellion that took place in the Americas between the Spanish conquest and independence. Aware of the conditions endured by common Indians, in 1780 he organized a revolt that appealed to the Incans' sense of justice and thus attracted large numbers of native fighters. After much effort, the Spaniards suppressed the movement and executed Condorcanqui. They subsequently implemented major changes in their imperial administration of the Peruvian viceroyalty.

Condorcanqui was born in Tinta (province of Cuzco) into an upper-class Indian family. Through his maternal side, he was a descendant of Túpac Amaru I, the last Incan rebel executed by the Spaniards in 1570. He received a Jesuit education, spoke fluent Spanish and Quechua, and read Latin readily. He amassed a sizable fortune thanks to muleteering, a profitable activity in colonial Peru. Condorcanqui was nicknamed the “muleteer-cacique” when he inherited the caciqueship (leadership position in Andean communities) of Tungasuca and Pampamarca from his older brother. He married Micaela Bastidas Puyucahua, a pure-blooded Indian woman, and fathered three children, Hipólito, Mariano, and Fernando. His duties as a chief acquainted him with the harshness of life experienced by common Indians. He found that several time-honored practices were particularly detrimental to the well-being of everyday Indians: inhumane working conditions in textile workshops and mines; the mandatory purchase of superfluous products (reparto); burdensome labor obligations (mita); and unfair taxation.

Condorcanqui initially assisted the Indians in trying to correct these abuses by using legal means. But in November of 1780, when all legal channels proved hopeless, the chief arrested Don Antonio de Arriaga, the Spanish governor of Tinta province, for his abuses against the natives, claiming he was following orders from the Spanish king. Arriaga was hanged in front of the crowd, and within a week the region was in open revolt. Soon a vast number of Indians throughout the Peruvian viceroyalty joined the rebel forces, unleashing the greatest open challenge to Spanish rule in the Americas since the time of the conquest. The rebellion spread throughout most of the viceroyalty, largely because it sparked and converged with a parallel insurgency initiated in Upper Peru (now Bolivia) by the Cataris, a noble Indian family from Potosí.

Many Indians, both commoners and noblemen, supported Condorcanqui's rebellion. The chief led the Indian peasantry in a mass uprising against both exploitation by the Spanish and the profound injustices of colonial society. But the Great Rebellion, as scholars have named it, also appealed to Indians because it represented the reassertion of traditional ideals of time, space, and social relations inherent to Andean culture. The uprising embodied an eighteenth-century revival of Incan identity, a motivation that was already common among Indian ruling groups throughout the Andes. Shortly after the beginning of the rebellion, Condorcanqui changed his name to Túpac Amaru II, in honor of his Incan ancestor. He also adopted a more native style of dress and spoke to his troops in Quechua, their native language. Most importantly, Condorcanqui and his wife proclaimed themselves Inca emperor and empress, thus encouraging Andean peasants to believe that the Inca empire had returned. While Túpac Amaru II repeatedly claimed to be following orders from the Spanish king to correct the numerous injustices of the colonial system, in truth his troops launched an ethnic war against the Spaniards, killing anyone suspected of European ancestry. For instance, at the battle of Sagarará, where he beat numerous Spanish forces, Condorcanqui ordered 600 soldiers to be burned to death inside the church where they had taken refuge.

Túpac Amaru II and his wife Micaela Bastidas fought together, sharing the command of the insurgent forces. They besieged the city of Cuzco, once the center of the Inca empire, but were not able to capture it. The violence of the war intensified, as many Indians and Creoles wanted to take revenge against Spanish bureaucrats and their collaborators. Although the Spaniards deeply feared the rebel army, they fiercely defended the city of Cuzco. As the siege took excessive time and effort, the rebellion started to lose momentum. This allowed the Spaniards to organize a powerful army to fight the insurgents. After a series of defeats, his closest collaborators betrayed Túpac Amaru II and the Spaniards captured him and his family.

Colonial judges wanted to set a precedent against further Indian revolts by giving the rebels an exemplary punishment. After a short trial, Condorcanqui, his family, and most of his loyal associates were sentenced to public execution. The lawyer defending Micaela Bastidas tried to save her life, alleging that she was a married woman and, therefore, had to obey her husband. The judges denied the petition, arguing that Bastidas had exhibited exceptional initiative and command during the revolt, and that she ought to die as a man. Túpac Amaru witnessed the execution of his wife, his eldest son Hipólito, his uncle, his brother-in-law, and some of his captains. He was sentenced to die by dismemberment, a form of execution in which four horses simultaneously pulled body and limbs apart. But the rebel leader was a strong man, and the horses could not complete the procedure. Condorcanqui was then drawn and quartered in the main square of Cuzco, where his great-great grandfather had been executed 200 years earlier.

The Spaniards wanted to eliminate all vestiges of Incan blood to prevent future rebellions. The only survivor of Condorcanqui's family was his youngest son, Fernando. Because of his young age (he was 12), he was sentenced to live in Spain for the rest of his life. It is not known if any other member of the Incan family survived this extermination.

The Spaniards also introduced administrative changes to hinder future Indian revolts. To this end they changed colonial taxation, created new administrative jurisdictions, inaugurated special courts with exclusive powers over Indian matters, and eliminated the compulsory selling of products. But the major change experienced by Indian communities was a dramatic reduction in the power of their leaders. The Spanish crown abolished caciqueships as hereditary positions and authorized Creoles and mixed-race individuals to become community leaders, thus irreversibly eroding the significance of Indian representation in the Andes.

SEE ALSO: Túpac Amaru (ca. 1540–1572)

References and Suggested Readings

- Campbell, L. (1981) Social Structure of the Túpac Amaru Army in Cuzco, 1780–81. Hispanic American Historical Review 61 (4): 675–93.
- Campbell, L. (1985) Women and the Great Rebellion in Peru, 1780–1783. The Americas 42 (2): 163–96.
- Fisher, L. E. (1966) The Last Inca Revolt, 1780–1783. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.
- Flores Galindo, A. (Ed.) (1976) Túpac Amaru II – 1780. Lima: Retablo de Papel.
- Golte, J. (1980) Repartos y Rebeliones: Túpac Amaru y las Contradicciones de la Economía Colonial. Lima: Instituto de Estudios Peruanos.

- O'Phelan Godoy, S. (1988) Un Siglo de Rebeliones Anticoloniales: Perú y Bolivia, 1700–83. Cuzco: Centro Bartolomé de Las Casas.
- Serulnikov, S. (2003) Subverting Colonial Authority: Challenges to Spanish Rule in Eighteenth-Century South Andes. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Stavig, W. (1999) The World of Túpac Amaru: Conflict, Community, and Identity in Colonial Peru. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Stern, S. (Ed.) (1987) Resistance, Rebellion, and Conscientiousness in the Andean Peasant World, Eighteenth to Twentieth Centuries. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Walker, C. F. (1999) Smoldering Ashes: Cuzco and the Creation of Republican Peru, 1780–1840. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Túpac Katari (ca. 1750–1781)

Robin Stock

Túpac Katari was an Aymara leader in the so-called Great Rebellion in Upper Peru (now Bolivia) of the indigenous population against the Spanish in the 1780s. Although born with the Christian name Julián Apaza in 1750 in Sicasica (La Paz), he adopted the name Túpac Katari in honor of the indigenous leader Túpac Amaru II (leader of the insurgency in Cuzco) and Thomás Katari (leader of the insurgency in Chayanta – Potosí) who fought against the Spanish colonial power in the same years. Túpac Katari grew up as an orphan and without any formal education and later lived the life of a common salesman of coca leaves in the Andes.

Katari shared the suffering of his indigenous people and publicly stated his resistance against the Spanish, although it is not known exactly how his leadership evolved. In comparison to Túpac Amaru II and Thomás Katari he did not enjoy much social prestige and was not allied to the powerful community leaders (the cacique or kurakas). He became the leader of the rebellion against the Spanish colonial troops and on March 13, 1781 he and his wife Bartolina Sisa laid siege to the city of La Paz with an army of about 40,000 indigenous people. The rebellion was extended all through the Bolivian highlands, mainly influencing the regions of Cochabamba and Oruro. Attempts to conquer the city of La Paz, though, were unsuccessful because of a lack of weapons and the desperate defense by the Spanish. The siege was finally broken by Spanish forces advancing from Lima and Buenos Aires in June. Another attempt to besiege the city began in August of the same year, supported by Andrés Túpac Amaru and Miguel Bastidas Túpac Amaru (nephews of Túpac Amaru II), but was quelled again by colonial forces. In the end the indigenous uprising left about 10,000 people dead, many of them from starvation because of the siege. After being captured by Spanish colonial forces, Túpac Katari was imprisoned, tortured, and finally executed on November 15, 1781.

The Túpac Katari rebellion is seen as the largest – geographically as well as by number of participants – and therefore most important insurgency against the Spanish in the Aymara region. Just some 25 years before the independence wars in the nineteenth century, the rebellion, inspired by attempts to overthrow Spanish colonialism and to reinstall indigenous rule, society, and customs, seriously endangered the colonial rule of the Spanish. Túpac Katari is today remembered as a hero in Bolivia, and social movements and guerrilla groups (e.g., the Túpac Katari Guerrilla Army) have adopted his name.

SEE ALSO: Katarismo and Indigenous Popular Mobilization, Bolivia, 1970s–Present; MRTA (Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru); Túpac Amaru (ca. 1540–1572); Túpac Amaru Rebellion II and the Last Inca Revolt, 1780–1783

References and Suggested Readings

- Stavig, W. & Schmidt, E. (Eds.) (2008) The Tupac Amaru and Catarista Rebellions. Indianapolis: Hackett.
- Vale de Siles, M. E. del (1977) Tupac Katari y la rebelión de 1781. Radiografía de un caudillo aymara. In Anuario de estudios Americanos, Sevilla.

Tupamaros

Stefan Thimmel

The urban guerrilla movement called Tupamaros (officially described as the National Liberation Movement, Movimiento de Liberación Nacional – Tupamaros) (MLN-T) was founded in 1963 in Uruguay and was composed mainly of trade unionists, socialists, and former members of the traditional Uruguayan Blanco Party. Its name was derived from the Peruvian rebel leader Túpac Amaru II (1738–81), who in 1780 led a rebellion of natives in the vice-kingdom of Peru and was executed by the Spanish conquerors in 1781. One of the founders of Tupamaros was the attorney and trade unionist Raúl Sendic (1925–89).

The political aim of the Tupamaros in the 1960s was a socialist society in general but especially in terms of land reform. From the mid-1960s they went underground, and in the beginning of their activities they fought with non-violent means against the Uruguayan state by exposing corrupt politicians and state employees and by attacking banks and distributing the money to the poor of the Uruguayan capital. These so-called expropriations were a typical form of action of the Tupamaros. Between 1968 and March 1971 the police attributed 74 bank assaults to the revolutionary organization.

Unlike the Cuban Revolution, which nevertheless influenced the Tupamaros, the members organized themselves not in rural areas but in urban regions, since already in the 1960s Uruguay had an urbanization rate of more than 80 percent. The example of the Tupamaros also had a large influence on Western Europe, where revolutionaries saw them as proof that a guerrilla movement could also be set up in an urban context. In 1968 in West-Berlin the Tupamaros West-Berlin (TW) followed their lead by becoming the first militant group in that region to go underground. In their heyday in the late 1960s and early 1970s the Tupamaros in Uruguay had around 3,000 militants, and with their Robin Hood-like actions they gained broad support among the Uruguayans.

In the late 1960s, however, authorities reacted by creating special military forces whose only purpose was the annihilation of the Tupamaros. As a result, the Tupamaros began to radicalize in the early 1970s, calling attention to their cause with kidnappings and killings. The best-known case is the one of FBI agent and expert in torture methods Dan Mitrione, who on July 31, 1970 was kidnapped by a Tupamaro command in Montevideo, and who was executed several weeks later, after being interrogated in a so-called "People's Prison." This resulted from the Uruguayan government's refusal to liberate all political prisoners as the Tupamaros had demanded. This led to a turning point for public opinion in Uruguay. The Tupamaros failed in communicating that Mitrione really was a US expert whose only purpose was the training of Uruguayan Special Forces in torture and counterinsurgency, so the execution of Mitrione remained a flaw and the myth of Robin Hood was gone.

Starting in 1970 the new Special Forces succeeded in arresting leading members of the Tupamaros. On August 7, 1970 Raúl Sendic, using the code name Bebe, was arrested for the first time. However, on September 6, 1971 he and 109 other prisoners, mostly Tupamaros, succeeded in a spectacular escape from the Punta Carretas Prison in Montevideo by means of a tunnel they had dug. Tupamaros came under even stronger attack after the reactionary Juan María Bordaberry was elected president in 1971 and became dictator in June 1973. In 1972 hundreds of Tupamaros were detained, among them nearly all leading members (the majority men, but traditionally there was also a strong branch of militant women involved in Tupamaros activities). The Uruguayan authorities distributed the detainees to prisons all over the country and from then on nine leading personalities of the Tupamaros were considered "hostages of state," among them the legendary founder of the movement, Sendic. Incarcerated in absolute isolation and sometimes buried in burrows, most of the hostages remained imprisoned for 12 years and were physically and psychically mistreated and tortured. The military regime guaranteed the lives of the prisoners, but only under the condition that there were no assaults or activity by Tupamaros. This tactic of using the leaders as hostages meant the end of any resistance against military dictatorship in the country. A deathlike silence remained until the mid-1980s.

In 1984 the altered geopolitical situation allowed the Uruguayan people to enforce elections, and Julio María Sanguinetti from the right-wing Colorado Party was elected president. He decreed an amnesty and on March 14, 1985 the surviving prisoners were released. Most Tupamaros leaders decided to found a new legal political party. They created the Movement for People's Participation (Movimiento de Participación Popular) (MPP) in 1986, and it joined the Frente Amplio (Broad Front), which had been founded in 1971. In 2004 the center-left coalition won the elections, and for the first time in the history of independent Uruguay a left-wing president came to power in March 2005. The MPP succeeded in becoming by far the largest force of the coalition and participated with two ministers in the government of socialist president Tabaré Vázquez (among them minister of agriculture José Mujica, one of the founders of the Tupamaros). Like Sendic, who died in 1989, “Pepe” Mujica had been a hostage of the state for 12 years. Today, he is the undisputed leader of the Tupamaros Party.

The MPP, though it has its limits, promotes a strong welfare state and support for small farmers (important in Uruguay, where even now meat production is one of the most vital industries). In economics, however, they support market-liberalism and oppose radical land reform, which remains as necessary as it was when it was one of the Tupamaros’ main purposes. Mujica, who in March 2008 was displaced as secretary, and since then returned as senator to parliament, is considered the presidential candidate for elections in October 2009.

SEE ALSO: Sendic, Raúl (1926–1989); Túpac Amaru (ca. 1540–1572); Túpac Amaru Rebellion II and the Last Inca Revolt, 1780–1783

References and Suggested Readings

Fernández Huidobro, E. (1989–90) Historia de los tupamaros. 3 Vols. Montevideo: Banda Oriental.

Turati, Filippo (1857–1932)

Donatella Cherubini

Filippo Turati is the most influential figure in Italian anti-revolutionary socialism from the 1890s to the rise of fascism, having a prominent role throughout Europe. Like many early Italian socialist leaders, he received a degree in law, and later became actively involved in the literary and intellectual milieu of Milan. Influenced by positivist culture, in the 1880s Turati was immersed in politics. His ties with the Russian revolutionary Anna Kuliscioff and close contact with the Milanese labor environment led him from democratic ideals toward socialism.

From 1891 Turati edited Critica Sociale, the most important journal of Italian anti-revolutionary socialism. Founding the Italian Socialist Party (Partito Socialista Italiano, PSI) in 1892, he was deputy member of the Socialist International and sustained a gradual (reformist) program. Between the 1890s and the rise of fascism, Turati was de facto leader of the reformist socialists, opposing a revolutionary stance. He was committed first and foremost to guaranteeing the growth and development of the socialist union and political network, which was spreading especially in the central and northern part of the country. As a result, his politics were forcefully attacked by those who favored the south, in particular the historian Gaetano Salvemini.

In the late nineteenth century Turati opposed protectionism, which he believed led to the popular rebellion against the high price of grain and bread in Milan and throughout Italy. Arrested during the political repression, Turati had a leading role in the parliamentary opposition against attempts to transform the Italian constitutional regime into a reactionary dictatorship. When the crisis was overcome and Giovanni Giolitti emerged as liberal democratic leader at the beginning of the twentieth century, Turati supported liberal democratic governments against a revolutionary position, favoring the introduction of social and welfare legislation. A pacifist before World War I, after Italy entered the conflict Turati upheld a position neither of support nor of sabotage regarding the war effort.

Nevertheless, Turati did not wish the PSI to stand in distinct opposition to the homeland, especially after the enemy invasion. In the postwar crisis, Turati maintained a prominent position in the Italian Chamber of Deputies, while anti-parliamentarism was becoming widespread on both the left and right. Turati proposed alliances with the liberal bourgeoisie in contrast to the socialist left, which was strongly influenced by the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia. Meanwhile, fascism had emerged as a political phenomenon, pitting itself violently against Italian reformist political and economic structures. Turati’s opposition to fascism was firm, deeply rooted in his confidence in liberal institutions.

However, the climate of violence and the support of fascism by wealthy industrialists and landowners made the survival of the socialist network continually more difficult, while differences and disputes among socialists became insurmountable. Drawing on his past political experience, Turati proposed in parliament “to remake Italy [rifare l’Italia]” in the name of democratic and legalistic political traditions, even as Benito Mussolini was taking over the government. After the birth of the Italian Communist Party (Partito Comunista d’Italia, PCI) in 1921, Turati was expelled from the PSI and became a member of the United Socialist Party, which inherited its reformist stance and was headed by Giacomo Matteotti. Turati participated in anti-fascist protests after the murder of Matteotti in 1924 by fascist assassins, at a time when the government was eliminating political opposition.

Sentenced to confinement in 1926, Turati immigrated to France after a daring escape organized by Carlo Rosselli and other liberal socialists. In exile, Turati supported the reunification of the two socialist parties, which was finally achieved in 1930, and actively opposed fascism as president of the Concentrazione di Azioni Antifascista, a federation of non-communist political groups of Italian emigrants in Paris. He was criticized within the movement for his inability to arrest the rise of fascism, especially by Carlo Rosselli and the liberal socialists who rejected the traditional pacifism of Italian socialism.

Turati remained influential in international socialism and participated actively in the debates of the new Socialist International. In the last years of his life, Turati took a stand in favor of a United States of Europe. In Italian socialism, the adjective Turatian remained a synonym for gradualist, reformist, and anti-revolutionary politics, even after the fall of fascism and the end of World War II.

SEE ALSO: Fascism, Protest and Revolution; Italian Socialist Party; Kuliscioff, Anna (1853/1857–1925); Rosselli, Carlo (1899–1937); Salvemini, Gaetano (1873–1957)

References and Suggested Readings

- Arfè, G. (1965) Storia del socialismo italiano, 1892–1926. Turin: Einaudi.
- Di Scala, S. (1980) Dilemmas of Italian Socialism: The Politics of Filippo Turati. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.
- Miller, J. E. (1990) From Elite to Mass Politics: Italian Socialism in the Giolittian Era, 1900–1914. Kent, OH: Kent State University Press.

Turkey, anti-secular protest, 1980–present

Özlem Tür

In May 1980 worshippers in Istanbul's Fatih Mosque jeered and booed at the mention of Atatürk in a broadcast service, an open challenge to the secular order of Turkey. On September 6, at a mass rally in Konya, supporters of Necmettin Erbakan's Milli Selamet Partisi (MSP) refused to sing the national anthem and called for a return to Shari'a law. During the same period, clashes between leftist and rightist groups deepened social polarization. The growing instability at the time was seen as challenging the modernization project. Islamist forces and leftist groups were seen as a threat to the regime. Within the framework of the Cold War, the army was already conscious of the threat of a Soviet takeover and the leftist forces were seen as elements that could contribute to such a possible scenario. On September 12, 1980 the military carried out a coup and intervened in politics for a third time.

After the coup d'état, in order to maintain stability and contain future protests, the military cadres tried to initiate a new framework that would secure the continuation of the Kemalist project. This new framework was designed in line with what some have termed the Turkish-Islamic synthesis (Türk-Islam Sentezi – TIS). The TIS was implemented as a policy to decrease the power of the leftist groups and glue society together. Nationalism and secularism were kept as the official ideological components of the regime, but bringing Islam into the official discourse added an element of cultural authenticity. Seeing the left as the main threat for society, the Turkish Confederation of Revolutionary Trade Unions (Türkiye Devrimci İşçi Sendikaları Konfederasyonu) (DİSK) was closed down and its property confiscated. A new constitution was put into effect in 1982 that dramatically curbed individual and associational rights and freedoms. Socially and politically, the state moved back as the main source of power at the expense of individual and organizational rights. After the 1980 coup, apart from the reaction to the DİSK's closure, Türk-İş leaders hoped that the coup would not do much harm to their organizational base. However, there was disappointment with the new constitution. The period after the coup was one of the most repressive periods in the republic's history, especially regarding workers' rights and collective action based on class.

Following the return of civilian politics, the Motherland Party (Anavatan Partisi) (ANAP) of Turgut Özal (1927–93) won the 1983 elections and became the leading party until 1991.

Workers' unions believed that the ANAP would allow them to increase their bargaining power under civilian rule by pushing for changes in the constitution. However, this did not materialize. Turgut Özal was himself the architect of the economic liberalization policy known as the 24 January Decisions. The capitalist class became the main ally of the government, to the detriment of the workers, especially before 1989.

Economic liberalization and export-oriented growth strategies brought the Turkish economy into a new phase from 1980 onwards. By the end of the decade Turkey had gone a long way towards integrating with the world economy through trade and foreign investment. These developments led to the rise of a newly enriched stratum, composed of businessmen from of Istanbul, İzmir, Adana, and major cities, as well as other small towns of Anatolia. In addition to this new bourgeoisie, sometimes referred to as the Anatolian Tigers, new professionals in the service sector emerged. The illicit wealth of certain groups and charges of corruption became widely discussed issues in the media during this period. Conspicuous consumption of luxurious imported goods and a show-off culture seemed to take root among the nouveaux riches of the period. This led to increasing resentment, especially among the wage and salary earning masses.

Losing their organizational base and bargaining power, workers' movements and class politics continued to decline dramatically during the 1980s. However, populist policies returned in 1989. This had two main causes. Firstly, opposition to the government was increasing rapidly. This became evident when the large demonstrations known as Spring Demonstrations in 1989 were continued in following years by workers' syndicates after long years of silence. Secondly, in 1989, restrictions on former party leaders and parties that were put into effect after the coup were lifted and competition from these parties led Özal to resort to populist policies for support. In 1989 public sector workers received high wage increases, amounting to 150 percent in some instances. Subsidies for the agricultural sector also came back. The parties reentering politics used a discourse that mainly capitalized on the position of the workers, state officials, and agricultural sector that were hard hit by the economic policies of the 1980s.

During his period in office as prime minister, Özal advocated political liberalism in addition to economic liberalism. Civil society occupied an important place in state discourse and was seen as a dynamic force for maintaining sustainable growth and enhancing the democratic structure of the country. The increasing number of private TV channels, radio stations, publications, and different organizations that capitalized on these newly developing identities provided an environment conducive to free discussion and the creation of public opinion. Within this context, feminist, gay, and lesbian and environmentalist groups began to emerge, but they remained limited in scope and, according to some observers, confined to elitist groups.

An important exception to this was the resistance organized by the villagers of a town called Bergama in the Aegean. Bergama villagers, relatively rich with fertile soil and intense mechanization and irrigation networks, organized in resistance to gold mining by Eurogold. In 1989 Eurogold was given permission by the ministry of energy to search for gold in the region. Initially, the project received a positive response as it would create new jobs. However, when the environmental impact of the project became evident, there was huge opposition. The resistance campaigns brought rural women into protests, demonstrating against state authorities, closing main roads, and distributing leaflets. This was a novelty, as the rural population, men and women alike, had not demonstrated in this manner in Turkey before.

An important challenge to the Kemalist modernization project during the mid-1980s came from the illegal Kurdish Workers' Party (PKK), which was founded at the end of the 1970s. The PKK became active after 1984. It adopted terrorist tactics, aiming at the formation of a separate Kurdish state in the southeast of Turkey. Describing itself as Marxist-Leninist from the beginning, it adopted anti-imperialist rhetoric. Kurdish groups challenged the state from the mid-1980s onwards and especially during the 1990s, when they entered the Turkish parliament through coalitions with leftist parties, but their expressions of a separate Kurdish identity and support for the terrorist PKK led to their expulsion. In the fight with the PKK, over 30,000 people died in Turkey. Schools and medical centers were closed down in 3,000 villages; around 3 million people migrated from the southeast of the country. The conflict ended in 1998 when the head of the PKK, Abdullah Öcalan, was captured in Nairobi, Kenya. In 1999 the PKK was declared to be militarily defeated. However, it recommenced its activities in 2005.

Radical Islamist groups also posed an important challenge to the state, especially to its secular ideology. In July 1993 in Sivas, 37 people who came to a festival in the city, among them many Alevi poets, intellectuals, and musicians, were burnt to death by radical Islamist groups, chanting and demonstrating with slogans for Shari'a rule.

Increasing economic hardship during the 1990s contributed to the radicalization of politics. Increases in wages and salaries from 1989 had eroded under spiraling inflation and the austerity measures implemented after the 1994 economic crisis. The privatization of state-owned enterprises also led workers to protest. Unlike the 1960s and 1970s, workers' activities were concentrated in the state sector, especially from the 1990s onwards, parallel to privatization. Türk-İş organized several demonstrations about the deteriorating standard of living, but its power was radically diminished during this period compared with previous decades. By the mid-1990s global capital and transnational corporations and multinational companies were increasingly perceived as the main threat to workers' interests. The discourse in demonstrations shifted from demands for workers' rights to defense of national property, sovereignty, and resistance to the International Monetary Fund (IMF). The patriotic slogans in demonstrations were especially important within an emerging identity politics and later with deepening relations with the European Union.

By the mid-1990s the political scene was once again increasingly polarized. Political parties proved unable to incorporate emerging identities. Discussions on the nature of the public sphere and what kind of identity symbols could be used within it became significant. The Islamic headscarf became an important issue. As an officially secular but overtly Muslim country, strict rules on the use of Islamic symbols led to a polarization between Islamists and secularists, especially after Necmettin Erbakan of the Islamist Welfare Party – a continuation of the former MSP – became prime minister in 1995. Erbakan promised in his election campaign to build a “just order.” Suffering economically under austerity measures and rising unemployment, as well as increasing corruption and nepotism, building such an order appealed to many different groups, making the Welfare Party a party of the masses demanding change. Erbakan became prime minister in a coalition government with Tansu Çiller's True Path Party. Çiller became the head of the True Path Party when its leader Süleyman Demirel became president in 1993, after Turgut Özal's sudden death. Çiller was Turkey's first female prime minister and often portrayed herself as the guarantor of the secular republic. Her coalition with Erbakan was met with surprise.

A traffic accident near the Western Anatolian town of Susurluk in November 1996 became an important incident leading to popular protests in Turkey. Involved in the accident were a former head of the Istanbul police, a murder suspect, and an MP from the True Path Party, all traveling in the same car. What brought the murder suspect, Abdullah Çatlı, together with police and the MP Sedat Edip Bucak, leader of one of the largest tribes in the southeast that supported the government in its struggle with the PKK, led to many questions. Widespread corruption and rumors about the state using criminals in its fight with the PKK led to debate about a “deep state” (derin devlet), a web of clandestine relations working outside the rule of law. Following this event, campaigns were organized around the country calling for an end to corruption, and support for transparency and rule of law. The main campaign was called One Minute of Darkness for the Sake of Continuing Light, in which citizens turned off their lights every evening at 21:00 for a minute. Soon, this darkness was accompanied with loud whistles. The campaign lasted for months.

The mid-1990s also witnessed protests by a group of mothers whose children had disappeared, mostly in state custody. The Saturday Mothers gathered and sat-in for years with pictures of their children every Saturday in Beyoğlu district in Istanbul. Most of their missing children were thought to have been killed under torture. Their demonstrations increased calls for transparency and the rule of law.

The coalition government of the Welfare and True Path parties came to an end in 1997 by means of indirect army intervention. The calls of Erbakan and his party for Shari'a rule and their excessive use of Islamic symbols led the military to intervene, this time indirectly through decisions taken in the National Security Council on February 28, 1997. The military demanded the implementation of new policies to ensure the continuity and stability of the secular regime. These policies included the closing down of private Quran courses, the implementation of the dress code (prohibiting the wearing of headscarves for women and long beards and religious caps for men) with no exceptions, and extending compulsory education from five to eight years, which would lead to the closure of the secondary parts of the Imam-Hatip high schools that give religious education. Erdogan was ousted from power and another coalition government was formed. These policies generated reaction, especially from Islamists. There were mass meetings calling for Shari'a rule, as well as calls for a liberal approach to wearing headscarves. There are restrictions in Turkey on wearing headscarves in public, including at universities. The headscarf is not seen merely in religious terms or in terms of individual liberties by the regime. It is perceived as a political symbol against the secular modernization project.

In the European Union's Helsinki Summit in 1999, Turkey was given candidate-member status. A series of reforms were carried out in 2002 and 2003 in harmonization with the EU. Freedom of organization and association that was limited by the 1982 constitution was extended, impediments to the use of languages other than Turkish were lifted. The death penalty was also abolished. However, another economic crisis hit Turkey in 2001. Austerity measures once again worked against wage/salary earners and increased unemployment. Turkish governments have remained unable to deal with growing poverty, the remedy for which was seen as economic growth, so that no real poverty alleviation programs were implemented. The gap between rich and poor widened as the share of wage/salary earners in income distribution was radically decreased. During the 2000s Türk-İş and workers' movements tried to increase the living standards of workers, but without much success. The workers' movement began to use a patriotic and anti-imperialist discourse.

Negotiations with the EU led to positive gains in democratic rights and also opened up debate about the limits of national sovereignty and possible concessions from Turkey's core interests, including that of Cyprus. The debate about a revival of the Treaty of Sévres through the EU negotiation process acted as an important factor in increasing nationalism and patriotism in the country at large. This perception was shared by most of the working class, as reflected in slogans during demonstrations: "It is enough, this country is ours"; "Stand up for your work, bread and country"; "Down with IMF, Sovereign Turkey"; "Down with European, American Imperialism."

Protest movements in Turkey became diversified from 1980 to 2005, bringing class, identity, ideology, and center/periphery dynamics into the political sphere. Workers' movements and class politics declined from the 1980s. Identity issues took the upper hand in collective actions. These emerging identities were often seen as threats to the survival of the regime by the military-bureaucratic elite. This not only limited the representation of such identities and the scope of collective action, but also led to the radicalization, resulting in a series of crises.

The coming to power in 2002 of the Justice and Development Party (Adalet ve Kalkınma Partisi) (AKP), an offshoot of the Welfare Party of Erdogan, can also be understood within this context, although it still remains to be seen to what extent the party will be able to respond to identity politics. Apart from domestic developments, collective action in the 2000s has also been affected by global and regional factors. The increasing impact of globalization, relations with the EU, and developments in the Middle East affect collective action. Both the negotiation process for full membership of the EU and the US policy in the Middle East as reflected in the Iraqi War feed into Turkish nationalist and patriotic movements, adding another dimension to identity issues and politics.

SEE ALSO: Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938); Kurdistan Nationalist Movement and the PKK (Kurdistan Workers' Party); Turkey, Protest and Revolution, 1800s–1923; Turkey, Working-Class Protest, 1960–1980; Turkish Republic Protests, 1923–1946

References and Suggested Readings

- Ahmad, F. (1993) The Making of Modern Turkey. London: Routledge.
- Altunışık, M. B. & Tür, Ö. (2005) Turkey – Challenges of Continuity and Change. London: Routledge.
- Berkes, N. (1965) The Development of Secularism in Turkey. Montreal: McGill University Press.
- Bianchi, R. (1984) Interest Groups and Political Development in Turkey. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Evin, A. (Ed.) (1984) Modern Turkey – Continuity and Change. Oplagen: Leske.

- Göle, N. (1996) Authoritarian Secularism and Islamist Politics: The Case of Turkey. In A. R. Norton (Ed.), Civil Society in the Middle East, Vol. 2. Leiden: E. J. Brill.
- Hale, W. (1994) Turkish Politics and Turkish Military. London: Frank Cass.
- Heper, M. (1985) State Tradition in Turkey. Beverley: Eothen Press.
- Heper, M. & Evin, A. (1988) State, Democracy and the Military – Turkey in the 1980s. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Jung, D. & Piccoli, W. (2001) Turkey at Crossroads: Ottoman Legacies and a Greater Middle East. London: Zed Books.
- Karpat, K. (2001) The Politization of Islam: Reconstructing Identity, State, Faith and Community in the Late Ottoman State. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kasaba, R. & Bozdoğan, S. (Eds.) (1997) Rethinking Modernity and National Identity in Turkey. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- Kedourie, S. (Ed.) (1988) Turkey Before and After Atatürk – Internal and External Affairs. London: Frank Cass.
- Kirişçi, K. & Winrow, G. (1997) The Kurdish Question and Turkey: An Example of a Trans-state Ethnic Conflict. London: Frank Cass.
- Özbudun, E. (2000) Contemporary Turkish Politics – Challenges to Democratic Consolidation. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Parla, T. (1991) Türkiye’de Siyasal Kültürün Resmi Kaynakları (Official Sources of Political Culture in Turkey). Istanbul: İletisim.
- Zürcher, E. (1993) Turkey: A Modern History. London: I. B. Tauris.

Turkey, protest and revolution, 1800s–1923

Özlem Tür

Protest and social movements in the Turkish republic carry important continuities from the late Ottoman period. The reforms of the nineteenth century led to the development of a new group, the military bureaucracy, which became the central power in the administration of the Empire and later the Turkish republic. The reforms led also to the development of a duality between the center, represented by the reform-minded military bureaucracy, and the periphery, which continued to stick to traditional values and norms albeit making use of the social mobility the reforms provided. This duality continued to evolve during the Turkish republic. Protest movements continued the legacy of this duality to a great extent in challenging state ideology.

Most analysts of Turkish politics underline the centrality of party politics. Almost all social movements are in time turned into political parties, or existing political parties take over the cause of the movements and voice protest through their channels in politics.

The Turkish republic went through a consolidation process from 1923 to 1946, under single-party rule. In this process, protests were often against the secular, western, Turkish nature of the republic. During the multi-party period challenges to state ideology continued along these lines, but class politics and class identity also developed, as well as ideological conflicts based on left-right divisions. From the mid-1980s onwards, identity issues returned to the political stage, with protests and movements shaped by identity and the rights of expression of distinct identities in the public sphere.

Nineteenth-Century Reforms in the Ottoman Empire

The roots of the social movements and protest in the Turkish republic go back to the nineteenth century. Modernization efforts in the Ottoman Empire started in the late eighteenth century with Selim III (1789–1807) and continued during the reign of Mahmut II (1808–39). Reforms in the military field with the abolition of the Janissary system were carried out, a medical school and a military academy were established in Istanbul, and centralization efforts that strengthened the role of the bureaucracy were put into effect. Seeing the economic and military supremacy of the West and having faced a series of defeats at the hands of the western powers, the belief that the only way to save the Ottoman Empire was to introduce European-style reforms started to take root in the ruling circles of the Empire. Further reforms in the military, judicial, and administrative fields were announced and implemented from 1839 to 1871 – what came to be known as the Tanzimat (New Order) period.

These reforms were parallel to those that improved the position of the Christian minorities in the Empire. With a decree in 1839, all members of the Ottoman state were given equal rights, independent of their religion. This was reiterated in the 1856 Islahat Fermam. It was generally under pressure from the European powers that the sultan granted equality before the law to all his subjects, enhancing the status of the Christians to that of the Muslim majority. The increasing trade of the Ottoman Empire, especially as a result of the agreements signed with Britain and France that gave these two countries trading rights in 1838, was important during this process. One of the consequences of the regime's capitulations was the withdrawal of local merchants from trade and their replacement with Greek, Armenian, and other non-Muslim minority tradesmen who carried the passports of foreign countries and therefore were outside the Ottoman tax and legal systems. They started to act as intermediaries with the foreign firms conducting business in the Empire. There was a class of small and medium-scale Turkish-Muslim traders mainly concentrated in domestic trade within the Empire, but compared to the wealthy and powerful minority merchants they were weak, unorganized, scattered, and generally dependent on the latter's activities.

As a part of the Tanzimat, secularization of laws was carried out as well as significant reforms in the central bureaucracy in line with the principles of rationalization and specialization. A complete set of ministries and boards, as in the European system, was established in the capital Istanbul. Consultative assemblies and commissions were formed that aimed to help prepare for the new measures and legislation in areas like building and trade. Secular educational institutes were formed to train future bureaucrats and army members. These reforms created new elites from the ranks of the military and the bureaucracy, who constituted the major actors in the late Ottoman and new Turkish republic's political life. While this new elite, educated in the secular institutions of Istanbul, was promoting constitutionalism, adhering to western ideas, and seeking the westernization of Ottoman political and social life, the rest of the population continued to stick to traditionalist values.

During the 1860s antagonism towards the reforms intensified on the part of the Ottoman Muslim community, who saw them as subservience to European powers and non-Muslim communities whose power and wealth were increasing. The group later called the Young Ottomans criticized Tanzimat policies as superficial imitations of Europe and serving European interests. They saw the solution to the ills of the Tanzimat system in a constitutional, representative, and parliamentary system that would build up a true feeling of patriotism and loyalty to the state among all Ottoman subjects, Muslim and non-Muslim alike. They tried to create and influence a politically conscious public with their writings. The call of the Young Ottomans resulted in a constitutional system in 1876. The Young Ottomans can be regarded as the first ideological movement and the first opposition movement in the Ottoman Empire.

The first Ottoman constitution (Kanun-i Esasi) was enacted in 1876 and the first parliamentary elections were held in December 1876 and January 1877. However, the parliamentary regime was rather short-lived, as Sultan Abdülhamid II (1876–1909) closed down the parliament in 1878, using the defeat against Russia as a pretext. This also started a period of repression within the Empire. Abdülhamid had gone so far as to form a group of spies and agents to alert him to any developments among his subjects. Against such repressive rule, secret organizations were founded around the Empire. In time some of the members of these groups were arrested and most fled abroad, mainly to Paris, where they carried on their activities. The groups called the Young Turks (Jön Türkler) founded a small committee, the Committee of Union and Progress (Ittihat ve Terakki Cemiyeti) (CUP), an umbrella organization against Abdülhamid's repressive policies, under which most of the secret organizations united. The Young Turks started to challenge the sultan's rule. Different from the Young Ottomans, they not only wanted to save the Empire but also radically reform the regime, mainly to westernize it. Increasing pressure from the Young Turks led the sultan to reintroduce the 1876 constitution and call for elections in July 1908. The decision to reinstate the constitution after 30 years was met with great enthusiasm in the Empire, as the new era was seen as promising equality, justice, and liberty to all groups regardless of their differences. The press was now free to publish without fear of censorship and people could gather together without fear of palace spies. The Committee of Union and Progress won the elections by an overwhelming majority.

The Young Turks continued with the reform process. Although the reforms were not radical, they paved the way for the future reforms of the republican period. In family issues, judicial rights were transferred from Shari'a law to civilian courts. Polygamy was restricted with severe measures that made it almost impossible in practice. Girls were accepted at university, medical schools, and humanities departments. There were books and journals published during this time on women's rights. The influence of the ulema (Muslim clerics) on secular schools was further restrained. The Quran and some prayers were translated into Turkish.

However, CUP rule was not without opposition, firstly against its centralizing efforts from liberal decentralization supporters, and secondly against its westernizing reforms from religious and traditional circles. Various magazines advocated "Islam as the powerful ideology" as an alternative to CUP ideology, to save the Ottomans from decline relative to the West and to help return the Empire to the glory days of the past. On April 13, 1909 some of these groups gathered in Istanbul against the Young Turks and the CUP and revolts started with a call for Shari'a rule. The CUP reaction was harsh. It repressed the revolt, dethroned Abdülhamid, and brought Mehmet V (1909–18) to the throne. Under Mehmet V the CUP managed to further consolidate its power.

During the rule of the CUP three main ideological lines of thought continued to develop in the Empire: Ottomanism, (Pan) Islamism, and (Pan) Turkism. Ottomanists adhered to the Young Ottoman ideal of the unity of the different communities around the Ottoman throne; (Pan) Islamism sought to regenerate the Empire on the basis of Islamic practices and solidarity within the Muslim umma (Muslim society); Turkism sought the unity of the Turkic peoples under the Ottoman flag. Within these ideological circles discussions as to how much to westernize and what should form the basis of loyalty in the future Ottoman state constituted the main differences between groups. Ottomanism became the main ideology of the CUP after 1908 and remained as such until the 1913 Balkan wars. Turkish nationalism was a relative latecomer on the scene, but was strengthened as different territories, one by one, declared their independence from the Empire. Leading the main opposition to the CUP, the (Pan) Islamists were deeply suspected by the regime after the 1909 demonstrations. Especially after the rise of nationalist movements in the Empire, Turkish nationalism began to dominate over the ideas of Ottomanism and Islamism.

The Armenian groups that had joined the enthusiasm of 1908 and the end of repression became one of the groups that were suspicious and resentful of rising Turkish nationalism. They started to advocate their own independence, which they thought could be secured through the weakening of the Ottoman state and the help of the western powers. Thus, as World War I started, CUP leaders became wary of Armenian activities, and the Armenians were increasingly seen as an internal enemy by the CUP leadership.

One of the priorities of the CUP regime was to strengthen the economy and develop indigenous industry. The propertied classes were mainly the non-Muslim commercial bourgeoisie who were interested in trade rather than investing in manufacturing. The Muslim bourgeoisie was weak and involved in small-scale manufacturing based on handmade goods. Thus it was the state that took on the role of industrializing the country. The aim of creating a "national bourgeoisie" with the backing of the state became a priority in the development of the country.

The 1914 Law for the Encouragement of Industry (Teşvik-i Sanayi Kanunu) was passed with the aim of developing national production. In 1915 Muslim businessmen founded the Tradesmen's Association (Esnaf Cemiyeti) with the aim of taking the domestic market under their control. In 1916 parliament approved a new customs law that would apply 30–100 percent customs duty on imported goods to encourage and protect local production. While the policies of encouraging industrialization and the creation of a native bourgeoisie continued, World War I and the War of Independence changed and affected the whole of the peninsula, resulting in the abolition of the Ottoman Empire and the formation of the Turkish republic.

World War I and the War of Independence

The Ottoman Empire entered the war in November 1914 on the side of the Axis powers. Ottoman armies were defeated on many fronts. In 1915 the Ottoman regime began forcibly to relocate the Armenians living in the eastern provinces of the Empire with the aim of reducing the possibility of Armenian insurrections behind the Eastern front. During the relocation many Armenians were killed. Some estimate around 500,000 deaths, while others estimate it to be as high as 1.5 million.

The war resulted in the Ottoman Empire's defeat and the occupation of its Arab provinces by Britain and France. The Armistice of Mudros was signed on October 30, 1918. The military administration of the Allied powers was established in Istanbul in December 1918. In addition, Italian forces landed in Antalya in April 1919 and Greek forces entered Izmir and began to occupy the area in May 1919. The signing of the Armistice and the occupation of the Empire led to the emergence of a resistance movement, which was further bolstered by the Greek occupation.

From 1919 onwards, Associations for the Defense of Rights (Müdaafa-i Hukuk Cemiyetleri) were formed throughout Anatolia and Thrace which later constituted the roots of the national resistance movement. The organizational base of the CUP was of great importance for the national resistance. After the Congresses of Erzurum and Sivas that called for a fight against occupation and partition, as well as the restoration of the Sultanate and the Caliphate, the War of Independence began. Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938) (later named Atatürk – the father of Turks) became the leader of the national struggle. Kemal cooperated with many local notables and prominent families, as well as regional militias. On March 16 the Allied powers invaded Istanbul. On April 23, 1920 the Turkish Grand National Assembly was opened in Ankara as the representative and legislative body of the national resistance. This led to a duality of administration – one in Istanbul led by the sultan who was collaborating with the Allied powers to ensure the survival of the Sultanate and the other one in Ankara representing the resistance to foreign occupation, again with the aim of ensuring the survival of the Sultanate and Caliphate but independent of foreign powers. The Ankara government that was composed of representatives from all regions declared all agreements signed by the Istanbul government after March 16 invalid.

The Allied powers were in disagreement over how to divide the territories of the Empire. In June 1920 Greek armies started to progress into Anatolia from the west with the aim of crushing the national resistance as well as compelling the Istanbul government to sign a peace agreement with the Allies. In August 1920 the Allied powers proposed the signing of the Treaty of Sèvres. The treaty left a small piece of land for the Ottoman state in the Northern Asia Minor with Istanbul as its capital. Eastern Thrace and the area around Izmir were given to Greece. An independent Armenian state was proposed in the eastern provinces. While the Kurdish-populated areas north of the Mosul province remained under Ottoman rule with autonomy, they were given the right to appeal to the League of Nations for independence within a year. Arab lands were divided between British and French rule. Straits were to be administered by an international Straits Commission and the territories around it were demilitarized. The Istanbul government signed the treaty. The national resistance in Ankara, after declaring that sovereignty belonged to the nation and that it represented the national will through the nationalist assembly in Ankara, rejected it.

The Greek advances from the west were stopped by the national resistance. The victories of the resistance on the Eastern front led to agreements with and swift withdrawals of French and Italian forces. One of the problems that the Ankara government faced during this process came from the local militias that wanted autonomy and rejected becoming a part of regular forces. Çerkes Ethem (1885–1948), influential in organizing the national resistance in the west, refused to become a part of the regular forces. Later, through the general offensive that was led against the Greek forces, which surrendered on September 2–3, 1922, the forces of Çerkes Ethem could be defeated as well. After Greek withdrawal, British forces agreed to withdraw in October 1922. Negotiations for a new peace treaty began. When the Allied powers invited both the Ankara and the Istanbul governments to Lausanne where the peace negotiations would take place, this led to uproar in the Ankara government. The Ankara government abolished the Sultanate in reaction. On November 17, 1922 the last sultan, Vahdettin, left the country on a British battleship. The Treaty of Lausanne was signed after long negotiations and was ratified by the Assembly on August 21, 1923.

The economic and social conditions of the country were very poor after long years of continuous warfare. What was left of the Ottoman Empire, the future Turkish republic, was highly depopulated, impoverished, and in ruins. The emigration, relocation, and expatriation of non-Muslim communities during and after the war led Anatolia to lose 10 percent of an already much-reduced population. This had two other major consequences: the migrations led to a highly homogenized Muslim community in the territories and resulted in the loss of capital owned and run by non-Muslim communities. With them, technological know-how and international links were also lost to a great extent.

After the victory of the War of Independence, energies were diverted towards the future of the country and the direction of political and social development. Mustafa Kemal had already begun to consolidate his political position before the Treaty of Lausanne was signed. The People's Party was founded under the leadership of Kemal in September 1923. By taking over the main organization of the wartime resistance to foreign occupation, the People's Party gained an already established network all over Anatolia. The first parliament that carried out the War of Independence was dissolved and new elections were held that carried the People's Party to parliament. The consolidation of power in the National Assembly and the party, which were both under the control of Kemal, continued as the main feature of the coming decades, generally referred to as the consolidation period of the new republican regime.

SEE ALSO: Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938); Kurdistan Nationalist Movement and the PKK (Kurdistan Workers' Party); Turkey, Anti-Secular Protest, 1980–Present; Turkey, Working-Class Protest, 1960–1980; Turkish Republic Protests, 1923–1946

References and Suggested Readings

- Ahmad, F. (1993) The Making of Modern Turkey. London: Routledge.
- Berkes, N. (1965) The Development of Secularism in Turkey. Montreal: McGill University Press.
- Hale, W. (1994) Turkish Politics and Turkish Military. London: Frank Cass.
- Heper, M. (1985) State Tradition in Turkey. Beverley: Eothen Press.
- Jung, D. & Piccoli, W. (2001) Turkey at Crossroads: Ottoman Legacies and a Greater Middle East. London: Zed Books.
- Kansu, A. (1997) The Revolution of 1908 in Turkey. Leiden: E. J. Brill.
- Kedourie, S. (Ed.) (1988) Turkey Before and After Atatürk – Internal and External Affairs. London: Frank Cass.
- Kinross, L. (1965) Atatürk: A Biography of Mustafa Kemal, Father of Modern Turkey. New York: Morrow.
- Lewis, B. (1961) The Emergence of Modern Turkey. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Mardin, Ş. (1962) The Genesis of Young Ottoman Thought: A Study in the Modernization of Turkish Political Ideas. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Parla, T. (1991) Türkiye'de Siyasal Kültürün Resmi Kaynakları (Official Sources of Political Culture in Turkey). Istanbul: İletişim.
- Pope, N. & Pope, H. (1997) Turkey Unveiled – Atatürk and After. London: John Murray.
- Zürcher, E. (1993) Turkey: A Modern History. London: I. B. Tauris.

Turkey, working-class protest, 1960–1980

Özlem Tür

The Turkish military launched a coup d'état on May 27, 1960. The leaders of the Democratic Party (DP), Adnan Menderes, Hasan Polatkan, and Fatin Rüştü Zorlu, were executed after trial. Although this coup had many causes, including repression of the regime, allegations of corruption against the rulers, dependency on foreign powers, and attacks on Kemalist principles in general and secularism in particular were important factors. May 1960 was the first time the military intervened in Turkish civilian politics. Since Ottoman times the army has played a major role in the political life of the country. The DP's policy of de-bureaucratizing meant official elites lost not only their representation in parliament and their close links with political elites, but also much of their economic power, prestige, and influence. There is agreement among many researchers that the 1960 coup demonstrated the quest of the military-bureaucratic elite to return to the center, to revive its diminishing role in the nation's politics.

The environment after the 1960 coup was relatively more liberal than the past. The new constitution enacted by the military rulers in 1961 guaranteed basic rights and freedoms and adopted a more liberal approach to secularism, religion, and freedom. A full bill of civil liberties was attached to the constitution. It supported associational rights, providing different groups with the opportunity to develop their own organizations. Remembering the DP experience, the military wanted to prevent a monopoly of any political party, so counterbalancing institutions to the national assembly were founded through the new constitution.

A second chamber called the Senate (Senato) was introduced and all legislation was required to pass through both chambers. An independent constitutional court was introduced. Universities and media were guaranteed full autonomy under the new system. Through the constitution, the military carved itself a special place within the politics of the country via the establishment of a National Security Council (Milli Güvenlik Kurulu) (NSC), whose constitutional duty was to advise the government on different policy issues. The NSC comprised the leaders of the military forces and the head of the general staff, as well as related ministers – varying according to the subject under consideration. The role of the NSC increased in time, extending its influence over government policies.

During this period ideology began to shape collective action and protest in Turkey and political parties also increasingly defined themselves on ideological grounds. After the military returned power to civilians and general elections were held on October 15, 1961, the Justice Party (Adalet Partisi) (JP) that had assumed the legacy of the Democratic Party won power. The JP represented center-right politics. Süleyman Demirel became its leader in 1964. There was also a change of leadership in the Republican People's Party (RPP), with Bülent Ecevit. In order to secure its position and increase its popularity, the RPP leadership adopted a new slogan determining its place in the political spectrum: "Left of center."

As well as ideological differences, class politics began to take shape from the 1960s onwards. The project of developing the capitalist class had been successful to some extent and started to bear fruit by the 1960s. The working class had been developing and increasing its power and collective action based on class had been emerging in society. The Türk İşçi Partisi (TWP) was formed in February 1961 by leftist organizations, workers, and trade unionists. According to the party program, except for the ownership of major means of production, private property would be supported, and some economic activities should be left to private initiative in a mixed economy. Despite taking a moderate stand on the economy in the short term, the party questioned the private and state-capitalist dominated development and considered a non-capitalist path as a long-term objective. The TWP contributed to the class-based nature of politics in the 1960s, forcing other parties to take a stance in clearer ideological terms.

After 1962 the economy was regulated by five-year plans. The main industrialization strategy implemented after 1960 centered on import-substitution industrialization (ISI), based on the notion that industrial goods previously imported should be produced by domestic industries under state supervision. Until the 1970s, domestic markets produced basic consumption goods, but the new program initiated the production of intermediary and light manufacturing. A division of labor was created between the state and private sector, with state industries directed to invest in large-scale intermediate goods industries, while private firms participated in the profitable consumer goods sector, protected from foreign trade.

The 1960s witnessed significant growth of big businesses. The strengthening capitalist class began to demand that the government clearly designate those sectors that were open or closed to government intervention. In the 1960s the perception of arbitrary state intervention became a common theme in the economy and the demand from the capitalist class for a more planned economy increased the belief that predictable planned actions and policies of the state would increase profitability. The upper classes demanded that the areas of operation of the state and the private sectors should be clarified for businesses to determine areas of secure investment. Government and business leaders engaged in negotiations on establishing holding firms and a new legal framework for family businesses, securing and institutionalizing the business community.

In addition to arbitrary interventions in the market, small businesses criticized the system of favoring big Istanbul capitalists and ignoring the interests of family firms. Special incentives for businesses were granted for the private sector, but small business owners claimed the process was arbitrary and had no transparency. Small businesses did not have equivalent opportunities to the large firms who enjoyed close relations with political power. They struggled to survive under competition and were forced to invest in tertiary areas of the economy.

In the 1960s the development of a strong upper class and growth of private capital accumulation hastened the creation of a working class and class-consciousness. Worker rights were seen as important but nonetheless secondary to the interests of capitalists on the government's agenda. However, the 1961 constitution provided workers with the right to strike and engage in syndicalist activity. As such, worker organizations began to expand in economic and political importance, albeit slowly. The subordinate position of workers started to change as their negotiating power with employers increased and strikes over wages and conditions broke out across industries. Boycotts and strikes for better working conditions surged during the 1960s. In May 1962, 5,000 building workers organized under the Construction Workers' Syndicate marched on parliament, known as the March of the Hungry for better working conditions. In 1965 workers employed in Ereği Coal Mines engaged in a major demonstration, and in 1966 a significant strike was waged by workers at Paşabahçe glass producing factory that led to the formation of the Confederation of Revolutionary Workers Syndicates (DİSK) in 1967. The DİSK advocated workers' rights in socialist and even communist terms.

Realizing the increasing power of the working classes during the 1960s, the JP regime sought to introduce corporatist structures of cooperation between capitalists and laborers in an effort to control and institutionalize both groups into political life. It advocated a corporatist structure for the workers' union by asserting that an independent and politically active labor union would promote class warfare, presenting new challenges to the authority of the state. By the end of the 1960s, the Türk-İş leaders had brokered an agreement with JP leaders in which they were given the right to represent workers and guaranteed access to policy-making, in return for continued moderation in exercising rights to strike and engage in collective bargaining. However, this corporatist effort of the JP failed as factionalism inside Türk-İş and increasing influence and power of leftist ideology opposed cooperation with the JP. The support of the workers was mainly directed towards the RPP's new "left of center" discourse during this period. By the late 1960s, support for the JP within the union was marginalized.

From 1968 on, inspired by university students' activities, and by the DİSK, there were large sit-ins and factory invasions by workers aiming at halting the restrictions on association and syndicate rights in the workplace and solving problems with employers. In 1969 workers employed at the Alpagut Coal Mine, unpaid for months, organized and seized the factory's production and management by force, paying their own wages from sales. The activities of workers in the state sector remained limited compared with the private sector during this period, and protest among government workers was scarce. Those rare instances of protest were typically in reaction to late payment of wages or arbitrary firing of workers.

The intensification of conflict and class-based activities in the late 1960s alarmed the government. As a response it proposed a new law to ban the DİSK and member syndicates from operation in Turkey. In reaction, on June 15–16, 1970, over 100,000 workers in syndicates across employment categories and throughout Turkey held protests and demonstrations in what was the largest workers' demonstration in the country's history. In response, thousands of workers who led the demonstrations were fired, leading to further radicalization of the leftist movement and forcing legal, organized syndicate activity to go underground. The repression of labor organization led to the emergence of small, urban guerilla groups from the mid-1970s on. During the 1970s, while organized labor was on the defensive, the conditions and wages of workers improved marginally, and syndicate activities were essential in these gains.

The corporatist effort of the JP with the capitalist class was more successful. The National Union of Chambers of Commerce, Chambers of Industry and Commodities Exchanges (Türkiye Odalar Birliği) (TOB) represented simultaneously the interests of all merchants, industrialists, and commodities brokers. The close cooperation of its members with the JP, most of whom had top positions in JP provincial organizations, increased the importance of this board in the 1960s. However, commercial interest groups were dominant within TOB and it was mainly with this group that the JP had close ties. Industrialists were not well represented in the organization. Although they were cooperating closely with the JP in projects for investment, in the late 1960s they began to press the government for a change in economic policy-making in their favor over commercial groups. In an attempt to differentiate themselves, in 1967 industrialists founded the Union of Chambers of Industry, under the TOB. Later, in 1971, industrialists founded the Turkish Industrialists' and Businessmen's Association (Türkiye Sanayici ve İşadamları Derneği (TÜSIAD), aimed at promoting capital accumulation of manufacturing over commercial and agricultural interests.

While Turkey entered a period of turmoil during the 1960s, by the decade's end the struggles between extremist movements on both the right and the left culminated in near civil war. The radicalization of the population, especially university students, during the 1960s stimulated the development of a radical mass movement. By the end of the decade the actions of leftist urban guerillas were a fixture of everyday life in Turkey. The leftist groups and their radicalization in turn led to a harsh response from the Turkish right and formation of the Society for the Struggle against Communism. In addition to this organization, which gathered the center-right under its banner, the formation of radical nationalist groups under the Nationalist Action Party (which developed a racial ideology during the 1960s and became known as the Grey Wolves) added another dimension to social formation. In 1970 Necmettin Erbakan founded the National Order Party as representative of the conservative circles in the country, bringing political Islam onto the stage.

The demonstration of 1970 against the plan to ban the DİSK was an important sign of workers' dissatisfaction with the system. Nine months later the government announced an austerity program leading to further national protests and urban guerillas launched a series of bank robberies and kidnappings to finance their activities. On March 12, 1971 Turkish generals sent a memorandum demanding a strong and credible government capable of restoring order. The government was warned that if order was not restored by elected officials, the army would exercise its constitutional duty and intervene directly. The military was once more on the political scene, this time not terminating civilian politics but intervening with a memorandum.

Ideological differences and collective action in terms of class politics continued to intensify during the 1970s. The disagreement between the reforming military-bureaucracy and the traditionalists regarding the modernization of the country developed side by side with class action and ideological divisions. After the military memorandum, Necmettin Erbakan formed the National Salvation Party (Milli Selamet Partisi) (MSP) to replace the disbanded National Order

Party to represent political Islam in Turkey. MSP emerged as the primary representative of professionals and small business owners. Small businesses in Anatolia that were struggling to compete with Istanbul businesses formed the backbone of MSP, which appealed to conservative Islamist circles and small businesses.

In the late-1970s Turkey's population expanded and urbanization increased dramatically. The decline in agriculture as a share of GNP triggered migration to the cities, providing a workforce for the rapidly expanding industries. Unlike previous waves of urbanization, most new migrants to cities were landless peasants who could not survive in rural villages. The newest wave of propertyless migrants formed the base of the proletariat in Turkey's major cities.

Despite a huge increase in GNP, the end of the 1970s were years of economic hardship for Turkey. ISI had reached a second stage in which production demanded more capital and high technology. With the growth in industrial production, demand for imports was also producing a foreign exchange crisis and a production crisis. The shrinking domestic market, decreasing productivity, world oil shocks, and the increasing costs of production led to the crisis of the ISI economic regime.

Until 1977 when signs of the crisis became apparent, economic growth propelled the real incomes of Turkey's population. Union/syndicate activity succeeded in improving wages for the working classes even as the state began to erode the power of workers, for example the 1971 removal of bargaining rights for state officials. Nonetheless, until 1977 populist policies maintained salaries relatively high. In 1978 the incomes of government workers were devastated by spiraling inflation; agricultural workers, who benefited from state subsidies, also saw their standard of living fall dramatically. By the end of the 1970s, with spiraling inflation and stagnation, crisis began to be felt more strongly throughout the economy. Workers' syndicates were struggling to retain their bargaining power and maintain workers' wages. However, in 1979, in a policy shift, rather than responding to workers' demands, capitalists began calling openly for a change in the system of wage growth and suppression of workers' unions and syndicates. Business also demanded that the government create secure conditions for capital and investment.

As economic hardship increased in the late-1970s, crisis in the political sphere reached a new high. From 1976 to 1980 the ideological polarization between left and right erupted into violence, claiming the lives of more than 4,000 people. Street violence became common. Rivalries on the basis of ethnic and religious identity were emerging as well, still overshadowed by ideological divisions. Most notably, the era saw the growth of the Kurdish opposition, though still within the larger ideological picture of leftist politics. The Kurdistan Workers' Party (in Kurdish: Partiya Kerkoran Kurdistan) (PKK) formed in the late 1970s, but remained a minor force until 1984. By the end of the 1970s the heterodox Alevi community also espoused demands for political rights distinct from the dominant Sunni Islam. Tension between the Alevi groups and the Sunnis erupted in the late 1970s. In 1978, 111 Alevis were killed in Kahramanmaraş; in 1980, 50 were killed in Çorum.

On January 24, 1980 the government announced a series of economic reform policies to remedy the economic deterioration of the country – known as the 24 January Decisions. Seeing the bankruptcy of ISI policies and the deteriorating economy, a new set of policy measures aimed at introducing a neoliberal market economy. These economic policies sought to control inflation and stabilize the economy by encouraging exports, and decreasing state initiatives and state enterprises in heavy industry and primary goods.

In place of ISI policy, the government adopted a new strategy of export-oriented growth or export promotion. The new economic program included devaluation of the currency, the primacy of market forces, and the ending of subsidies on goods produced by the state sector, leading to huge price increases. The reform package incorporated reforming state economic enterprises, limiting employment in the state sector, tax reform, incentives for foreign investment, and privatization of state industries. Close cooperation with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank was instrumental in implementing the new pro-capitalist policies.

The neoliberal reforms served to benefit multinational corporations and capitalists in Turkey at the expense of workers and farmers, whose wages were curbed and agricultural subsidies cut. To decrease internal demand, the government chose to limit wages. Workers, whose wages and salaries were already declining under high inflation, saw their standard of living decline further. For many, the reform package was a means to reduce the political and economic power of the working class and a broad-scale effort to create greater instability that would undermine labor organizations and political militancy. As political opposition expanded in the months after the introduction of the neoliberal reforms, the military staged a coup d'état on September 12, 1980 to ensure the continuation of the measures.

SEE ALSO: Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938); Kurdistan Nationalist Movement and the PKK (Kurdistan Workers' Party); Turkey, Anti-Secular Protest, 1980–Present; Turkey, Protest and Revolution, 1800s–1923; Turkish Republic Protests, 1923–1946

References and Suggested Readings

- Ahmad, F. (1993) The Making of Modern Turkey. London: Routledge.
- Altunışık, M. B. & Tür, Ö. (2005) Turkey – Challenges of Continuity and Change. London: Routledge.
- Berkes, N. (1965) The Development of Secularism in Turkey. Montreal: McGill University Press.
- Cizre-Sakalhoğlu, Ü. (1997) The Anatomy of the Turkish Military's Autonomy. Comparative Politics 29, 4: 141–66.
- Hale, W. (1994) Turkish Politics and Turkish Military. London: Frank Cass.
- Jung, D. & Piccoli, W. (2001) Turkey at Crossroads: Ottoman Legacies and a Greater Middle East. London: Zed Books.
- Keyder, Ç. (1988) Class and State in the Transformation of Modern Turkey. In F. Halliday & H. Alawi (Eds.), State and Ideology in the Middle East and Pakistan. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Landau, J. (1974) Radical Politics in Modern Turkey. Leiden: E. J. Brill.
- Mango, A. (1994) The Challenge of a New Role. New York: Praeger.
- Poulton, H. (1997) Top Hat, Grey Wolf and the Crescent. London: Hurst.
- Zürcher, E. (1993) Turkey: A Modern History. London: I. B. Tauris.

Turkish rebellions, 1918–1925

Hülya Küçük

At the end of World War I, on October 30, 1918, the defeated Ottoman Empire signed the Truce of Mudros, which included 25 articles with provisions for the Allied military occupation of the Straits, control of the railways and telephone lines, demobilization and disarmament of Ottoman troops, and the freeing all Allied prisoners of war. The most perilous clauses of the truce for the Ottoman Empire were Article 7, granting Allied Powers the right to occupy Ottoman Empire lands deemed a threat to security, and Article 24, conferring Allied Powers the right to intervene militarily in the Armenian provinces in the event of breakdown of law and order. Turkish nationalists were troubled by the extensive reach the two articles granted Allied Powers. Public opinion shifted to the Turkish nationalist resistance following the decision to permit Greek troops to land in İzmir on May 15, 1919, and Allied occupation of Istanbul, seat of Ottoman power, in March 1920.

The Liberation War is the name given for the Turkish struggle against Allied Powers from May 19, 1919 to July 25, 1923, a resistance extending from formal combat, underground activities of the Young Turk Unionists, and regional uprisings, stirrings, and rebellions by traditional forces against the emergent state.

The Turks were weary of the wars that began in 1911, and while economically and militarily weak, continued struggling for national independence after World War I. Even the Sèvres Treaty, in which the Allies abolished the Ottoman Empire on August 10, 1920, could not prevent the growth of the modern Turkish nationalist movement. The Allied Powers, under strong British pressure, accepted the Greek offer to enforce the Sèvres Treaty by military means, resulting in a full-scale war between Turks and Greeks, until 1922 when Turkish nationalists declared victory.

On October 11, 1922 the Truce of Mudanya was signed, and the Allied Powers invited Turkey to a peace conference in Lausanne, Switzerland, commencing on November 21, 1922. The Allied Powers viewed themselves as victors of World War I and considered the conference an opportunity to adjust the terms of the Sèvres Treaty. In contrast, following national liberation, the Turks viewed themselves as triumphant, considering World War I and the Allied occupation historical artifacts. The Ankara nationalist delegation, led by Mustafa İsmet İnönü, sought to overturn the stringent terms of the Sèvres settlement. After many months, on July 24, 1923, a treaty was signed, whereby the Straits were neutralized, Christian minorities and foreigner legal status was guaranteed, and disputes between Greeks and Turks were to be resolved. A demilitarized zone was established, and exchange of populations arranged between Greece and Turkey. On October 1, 1923 the British and Allied occupying forces departed Istanbul.

No reliable data are available on the population of Ottoman Anatolia in 1918, though following the national liberation in 1922, an estimated 3.5 million Anatolian Muslims, Greeks, Armenians, Nestorians, Chaldeans, and others lost their lives – more than 20 percent of the population – while another 1.8 million migrated abroad.

Liberation War as Rebellion

The Turkish Liberation War was a two-faceted rebellion: an uprising of the Turkish nation and a revolt against the Ottoman sultan. During the Liberation War the Istanbul government issued a fatwā (a verdict of the highest religious order) on April 11, 1920, declaring Turkish nationalists “rebellious against the sultan” and described their acts as “Khurūj ‘ala’s-Sultan” (uprisings against the sultan). In response, the sultanate formed the Kuwā-yı Ahmadiyya (Ahmadian Forces), Kuwā-yı Muhammadiyya (Muhammadian Forces), both named after the Prophet Muhammad, and Khilāfet Ordusu (Army of the Caliphate). Some sultanate supporters were given responsibility for arresting Mustafa Kemal as he launched the Liberation War. The Ali Ghālip Incident (August 20–September 15, 1919) is a distinctive instance of a rebellion against a rebellion. The Istanbul government ordered Ali Ghālip, governor of Mamuretulaziz (present-day Elazığ in Eastern Anatolia), to recruit 100–150 Kurdish horsemen to arrest Mustafa Kemal and disperse the Congress, in an effort that was aborted. Ali Ghālip saw it as too risky to dispatch Kurds, who were pursuing their own independent state, on the raid. Although Ali Ghālip was loyal to the Istanbul Ottoman government and willing to act against Mustafa Kemal, he shared a fear of Kurdish nationalism.

The Istanbul government considered Kuwā-yı Milliye (National Forces) rebels and guerilla forces independent of the sultan’s central command. As such, a Fatwa was declared against the nationalists as “rebellious against the sultan.” Officially, the sultan and the nationalists conflicted over liberating the country from the Allied forces.

But the sultan altered his political sympathies according to the benefit that might bring. In April 1920 with the rift between Istanbul sultanate and Ankara nationalists rapidly widening, the Sheikh al-Islām (Grand Mufti), at the request of the Istanbul government, issued a fatwā declaring the nationalists rebels. But after the Treaty of Sèvres, all legal action was suspended against the nationalists, as the Istanbul government signed a document declaring: “There was no doubt that the ‘national forces’ had sought to defend the country and that they should therefore be praised rather than arraigned in court.”

Later, ‘Abd al-Madjd, the sultan’s heir apparent, sought to assist the nationalist movement, sending his son ‘Umar Fārūk to Anatolia in April 1921 to advance the effort. However, Mustafa Kemal rejected the assistance, contending that in the national interest the country was not ready to use the services of the “exalted” dynasty. Nonetheless, the nationalists proclaimed liberation of the sultan-caliph from the enemy as their goal. In so doing, Mustafa Kemal concealed his plan for an ideological and administrative separation of Anatolia from Istanbul through proclamation of a republic.

The Ulemā (religious scholars) and meshāyikh (Sufis) perceived the sultan-caliph as guardian of religion, while supporting the nationalist movement and ostensible goal of liberating the SULTAN-CALIPH from the enemy. Members of parliament (MPs) of the First Turkish Grand National Assembly (TGNA) with the rank of ‘ulemā’ and meshāyikh gathered under the presidency of ‘Abd al-Halīm Çelebi to discuss the opening of the TGNA. The meshāyikh or Sufis supporting the national cause sought reconciliation between the nationalists and the sultan. ‘Abd al-Karīm (Abdulkerim) Pasha served as mediator between the Palace and Mustafa Kemal at the beginning of the Liberation War.

Rebellions Against the Nationalists

During the Liberation War, separatist, religious, and economic revolts broke out throughout Turkey against the nationalists as popular opinion was not fully unified behind the creation of a new state. The eshrāf (notables) were divided on a Turkish future, but nonetheless provided money and food to the nationalists, and helped suppress local and regional uprisings during and after the Liberation War.

Khādjas (religious leaders) and aghās were popular spokesmen in many cases. Religious men were the most influential layer of society and indispensable as mediators between the state and different societal actors, and emerged as leaders of the Anatolian peasants and farmers during the Liberation War. Even though the struggle was officially organized by the bureaucratic and military leadership, and intelligentsia, most peasants would pay heed to the khādja traditional religious authorities.

Although the Liberation War sought popular legitimacy, most uprisings were viewed as anti-nationalist and pro-sultanate. Before using force, Ankara and Istanbul sought to quell dissent in their realms through dispatching Hey’et-i Nasīhas advisory delegations to reassure opponents. Advisory delegations were established in 1919 to prevent enmity, though they failed to reassert Ottoman ideology.

The most harmful rebellions in the West of Turkey were led by Ahmed Anzavur. The first Anzavar rebellion began on September 22, 1919, and the second on February 16, 1920 in the northern district of Balıkesir Province. Anzavur’s forces were defeated and eventually dispersed by the nationalists. The Istanbul government continued encouraging Anzavur to engage in a new upheaval, promising him the rank of a Pasha (governor). In May 1920 nationalists succeeded in suppressing Anzavur’s planned uprising in Adapazarı and Geyve.

The Bozkır Uprisings from September 27–October 4, 1919 and October 20–30, 1919 broke out in response to rebel claims that nationalists were invading villages and indiscriminately killing Muslims and Christians. The uprisings ended through the mediation of Hey’et-i Nasīha, as nationalists agreed to cease entering Bozkır. ‘Abd al-Halīm Çelebi, the Mawlawī sheikh and a Konya MP, mediated many uprisings in the province through writing letters to the sultan and sending delegations to meet with rebels, or directly participating in peace negotiations.

The leaders of the Eastern rebellions were usually organized by sheikhs. A small religious order was established in 1908 in a small village near Gümüşhane by Sheikh Eshref, who claimed to be the messiah, and spread Islamic Shi’ism throughout the eastern towns of Bayburt, Sürmene, and Erzurum, gaining a small cult following in the region. To suppress an emerging insurrection a delegation was sent led by müfitt

(the highest religious leader), several Ulemā (religious scholars) and eshrāf (notables). Conciliation efforts failed and Sheikh Eshref continued to resist the government. A detachment was ultimately sent under Lieutenant Colonel Khālīd Bey's command on December 25, 1919. Sheikh Eshref and some of his adherents were killed and the insurrection defeated on January 1, 1920. Similar opposition emerged from Sheikh Redjeb's partisans of the sultan and his adherents, who disparaged Mustafa Kemal in letters and in an effort to publish an anti-nationalist newspaper Der Sa'adet (Istanbul), which was banned by Allied censors.

The Düzce-Hendek and Adapazarı Rebellion was a multiregional rebellion of some 5,000 insurgents who seized the prison in Düzce, released detainees, confiscated military arms, and captured officers and government officials. A division from Geyve was dispatched, but the rebellion had already spread to nearby Hendek and Adapazarı regions. On April 25, 1920 a division ordered to intervene and occupy Düzce was trapped, taken as prisoners of war, and their commander executed. Thereupon, military forces under the command of General Ali Fuat (Cebeşoy) were sent to Adapazarı, and military forces under the command of Colonel Refet (Bele) sent to Bolu. After three months, in July 1920, the rebellion was defeated and Ankara regained control over the region.

The uprising of Yozgat (Çapanoghlu), from May 15 to June 27, 1920, was organized by Çapanoghlu Edīb, leader of the provincial Freedom and Understanding Party (HIF). In the pre-World War I era, the feudal clan had clashed with the Committee of Union and Progress (CUP) modernizers, and traditional authorities also viewed Mustafa Kemal's nationalists as opponents. Situated within the province of Ankara, the Yozgat Rebellion threatened nationalist headquarters and was viewed as a major political and military threat to the Liberation War.

Most Alevī (Alawī) villages in Alaca joined the insurrection, which could not be controlled by local army units. Failing to control the uprising, Mustafa Kemal summoned Kılıç Ali and his forces (Kuvā-yı Milliye), who were fighting the French in the southeastern Cilicia region. The Çapanoghlu insurrection was defeated by Çerkes (Circassian) Ethem, who was summoned from the west with 2,000 men.

Yozgat was captured on June 23 and the Çapanoğulları insurgents fled. The effort to contain the revolt was bloody. The town of Yozgat was looted by Circassian Ethem's forces, who demanded that Ankara's governor Yahya Ghālib (Kargı) be held responsible for the spread of the rebellion, and called to answer court martial charges of negligence. But Mustafa Kemal sought to prevent the dismissal of Yahya Ghālib. He thus arranged for the interior ministry to advise Circassian Ethem that Yahya Ghālib was too ill to travel. Circassian Ethem was persuaded to leave Yahya Ghālib in peace, and received a hero's welcome by the TGNA on his arrival in Ankara.

In September 1920 irregular armies at the western front, including the Circassian Brothers guerilla forces, were put under the command of Ali Fuat (Cebeşoy). During an attack on Gediz, some 200 members of Circassian Ethem's militia were killed and 500 wounded. Mustafa Kemal replaced Ali Fuat with the chief of the general staff, Colonel İsmet İnönü of the northern district, and dispatched interior minister Colonel Refet (Bele) to prevent further hostility with Circassian Ethem and his brother Tawfīk, acting commander of the Kütahya forces. But the Circassians refused orders from the front commander.

The Ankara government, unable to calm down the hostilities, sent 15,000 troops against the Circassians. Ethem resisted the regular army occupation of Kütahya, his stronghold in the district. On January 2, 1921 Ankara offered to pardon the Circassian brothers if they relinquished their commands, but on January 17 they instead aligned with the Greeks. Ethem was proclaimed a traitor and condemned to death along with his accomplices by the Independence Tribunal. After the war, Ankara expelled Circassian Ethem and his followers. Circassian Ethem was brought to Athens by the Greeks.

The Delibash Insurrection, named after its leader, broke out on October 2, 1920. Zayn al-'Ābidīn Khōdja, leader of the Hurriyet wa 'Itilāf Fırkası HIF, was primary organizer of the rebellion. Delibash Mehmed, supported by a rebel army of 500, was joined by a militia of more than 3,500 from Konya region. On November 15, 1920 the rebellion was suppressed with the help of Colonel Refet (Bele), minister of the interior, who was entrusted with the task of protecting Konya by the Ankara government.

The official report given by Mustafa (Sırrı) Bey, MP for Karā Hisār-ı Sharkī, present-day

Şebinkarahisar in the Black Sea region of Turkey, and his friends held ‘Abd al-Halīm Çelebi and Kāzım Hüsni (MP for Konya) responsible for the incidents. ‘Abd al-Halīm Çelebi denied participation in the Delibash uprising, arguing he only served as a mediator. He was not punished by the TGNA, but on October 17, 1920 dismissed from the meshīkhat (Sheikhdom) of Mawlānā dargāh and exiled to Erzurum. Nevertheless, as no satisfactory evidence was found against him, he was reinstated in June 1921 and pardoned by the TGNA.

Milli Uprising

In southern Turkey a local ethnic group called Milli initially cooperated with the Kumā-yı Milliye (National Forces) during the independence struggle of Urfa against the French. The Milli were later persuaded by the French to join the invasion of Urfa and Siverek. On August 24, 1920 some 3,000 horsemen and 1,000 foot soldiers from the Milli arrived in the vicinity of Viranşehir in northeast Turkey under pretense of submitting to the nationalists, but occupied the district instead, until reinforcements arrived and the Milli militia fled further south to the desert region.

Alevī Kurdish Uprisings

Unlike the Bektāshī leaders, some Alevī leaders (dedes) were deeply involved in anti-nationalist uprisings in Dersim (present-day Tunceli) from 1916 to the 1930s, and more importantly, Koçgiri. Based on the TGNA debate on December 18, 1920, the unrest in Dersim was unrelated to regional Alevī religious syncretism, but rooted in Kurdistan demands for independence. Protracted dissent continued in the region without Ottoman or Ankara improving the poor economic conditions. According to Ferīd Bey, Istanbul finance minister, the unrest was organized by nomadic inhabitants, Dersim (yörük), who sought to settle in the region. Led by Kurdish chiefs demanding autonomy, the insurrection was suppressed by the nationalists.

Kurdish nationalism was dated from the period of Sultan Mahmūd II (1808–39). Kurds had been divided along tribal lines. Under Sultan Mahmūd II the Kurdish emirates were repressed and society became increasingly fragmented. After the constitutional revolution in 1908, members of the Kurdish elite founded the Kürt Te’āwün me Terakkī Djem’iyyeti (Society for Support and Progress of the Kurds). Later, in 1918, the Kurdistan Te’ālī Djem’iyyeti (Society for the Elevation of Kurdistan) was established in İstanbul, with branches in Kurdistan. The leaders wanted a Kurdish state founded in southeastern Turkey. To this end, they provoked the Alevī Uprisings in the East against the National Government. The Kurds supported the resistance movement, in spite of the efforts of British agents to influence them and despite the fact that they gained autonomy under the Sèvres Treaty. There were Kurdish representatives at the Erzurum and Sivas Congresses, and even on the nationalist Representative Committee.

The Koçgiri Uprising, also known as the Alevī Uprisings, lasted from March 6 to June 17, 1921. The rebellion erupted under the leadership of Haydar Bey, head of the Koçgiri tribe and founder of a branch of the Kürt Te’ālī me Te’āwün Djem’iyyeti (Association of Kurdish Elevation and Mutual Assistance), as rumors were spreading that the Ankara government would deport Kurds similarly to Armenians. A report from the British High Commissioner Sir Horace Rumbold to Minister for Foreign Affairs Lord Curzon described this rebellion as a regional “anti-Kemalist.”

Despite fierce resistance, the uprising, a precursor of the Sheikh Sa’īd revolt of February 1925, was suppressed by the army under Nūr al-Dīn (Nurettin) Pasha’s command. The Sheikh Sa’īd revolt broke out after the caliphate was banned. With the abolition of the caliphate, the most important symbol of Turkish-Kurdish brotherhood disappeared and the Ankara government was increasingly condemned as irreligious.

The rebellion, primarily an expression of Kurdish and religious sentiment, is viewed as significant in the evolution of Middle Eastern history after 1925 in Turkey and Iraq, and in the foreign policies of several European countries. The rebellion was motivated primarily by efforts to create an independent Kurdish state with respect for Islamic principles, which went against the Mūhāk-ı Millī, goal of the Liberation War. The Kurdish case went unmentioned in the Treaty of Lausanne and nationalist promises of autonomy during the Liberation War were abrogated to the great disappointment of Kurdish nationalists.

The discontent led to a great rebellion planned by the Āzādī (Freedom) Society, founded in 1923 by former militia officers, and the Nakshbandi sheikh, influential among the Zaza and Kormandji, who led the insurrection in Diyarbakır, which spread widely. Ultimately, the Kurdish rebels were repelled into the mountains, Sheikh Sa'îd was seized on April 15, 1925, and he and his accomplices were sentenced to death by the Independence Tribunal in Diyarbakır on June 29, 1925.

The Sheikh Sa'îd rebellion created the atmosphere and the mechanism necessary to silence the opposition through the Takrîr-i Sükûn Kânûnu – Maintenance of Order Law – which was passed on March 4, 1925, empowering the government to ban by administrative measures for two years any organization or publication it considered to cause disturbances detrimental and prejudicial to law and order. Two Independence Tribunals were reinstated to help this desired order and carry out the purges of 1926 of Mustafa Kemal's opponents.

The rise in regional insurrections during and after the War of Liberation from 1918 to the 1930s evinces the cultural, regional, religious, and economic impediments to the consolidation of the state and establishment of a Turkish national identity.

SEE ALSO: Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938); Kurdistan Nationalist Movement and the PKK (Kurdistan Workers' Party); Turkey, Protest and Revolution, 1800s–1923; Turkish Republic Protests, 1923–1946

References and Suggested Readings

- Aydemir, Ş. S. (1992–3) Tek Adam. Mustafa Kemal 1881–1919, 3 vols. İstanbul: Remzi.
- Bardakçı, C. (1940) Anadolu İsyamları. İstanbul: Koşkun.
- Erdeha, K. (1975) Milli Mücadele'de Vîlâyetler ve Valiler. İstanbul: Remzi Kitabevi.
- Güneş, İ., et al. (1997) Türk Parlamento Tarihi. I. ve II. Meşrutiyet, 2 vols. Ankara: TGNA.
- Küçük, H. (2001) The Role of the Bektâşîs in Turkey's National Struggle. Boston: Brill.
- McCarthy, J. (1983) Muslims and Minorities: The Population of Ottoman Anatolia and the End of the Empire. New York: New York University Press.
- Olson, R. W. (1989) The Emergence of Kurdish Nationalism and the Sheikh Said Rebellion, 1880–1925. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Olson, R. W. (1990) The International Sequels of the Shaikh Said Rebellion. In S. Selek (Ed.), Milli Mücadele, 2 vols. İstanbul: Örgün.
- Zürcher, E. J. (1993) Turkey, A Modern History. New York: I. B. Tauris.

Turkish Republic protests, 1923–1946

Özlem Tür

Once the Turkish state secured power in 1923, Mustafa Kemal and his colleagues designed a reform plan as a “modernization project” to constitute the foundations of the country's future. This modernization project was formed with the goal of developing the Turkish state and “catching up with the developed countries of the West.” The main aim of the new ruling circle of the country was to make Turkey a developed, modern, and respectable nation in the international sphere.

The first pillar of the Kemalist modernization project consisted of capitalist industrialization, seen as critical to replicating the success of Western European economies. Economically, Turkey was seen as weak and backward, and Turkey's new leaders focused their efforts on industrializing and incorporating the economy into capitalist international markets. The state was given the main role in this process of modernization. The second and third pillars were nationalism and secularism. The new state was formed around the notion of Turkish nationality and Turkishness. Religion was assigned a minimum role in public life and reserved for the private sphere, as a belief system only relevant to relations between the individual and God. Nationalism filled the unifying role previously assigned to Islam. Westernization emerged as an important component of the project. Reforms were initiated to realize this modernization project and they were implemented under the single party rule of the People's Party, which was later re-named the Republican People's Party (Cumhuriyet Halk Partisi, RPP) after the announcement of the republic on October 29, 1923.

One of the main changes of the republican elite, the Kemalist military-bureaucracy, was abolition of the caliphate in March 1924, which drew widespread political opposition. In November 1924, some members of the RPP split with the party cadres to form the Progressive Republican Party (Terakkiperver Cumhuriyet Fırkası, PRP) as a reaction to the early changes. The new party announced its basic aim as protection of individual rights against the growing power of the rulers. Republicanism, liberalism, and democracy were other unifying principles of the party. As liberals, the party aimed primarily to protect religion against the secularist principles of the government in the name of freedom of belief.

Turkey's economic policy was shaped around state-led capitalist industrial development. Under the Committee of Union and Progress, measures to encourage the manufacturing sector and the development of the national bourgeoisie were already underway. Nationalism became one of the main pillars of the Kemalist modernization project, through politics, ideology, and the economy. The nationalist stand of the Kemalist regime was revealed in the Izmir economic congress of February 1923, where the leadership was unified in establishing a state-directed economy to gain complete sovereignty. The economic congress promulgated new measures such as a protectionist tariff policy, nationalization of foreign trade, and establishment of a national bank, and revived opposition to foreign concessions.

However, the economic implications of the Lausanne Treaty following World War I prevented implementation of these policies. Lausanne was not only a peace treaty but a framework that drew up the international economic relations of the new Turkish Republic. As the Lausanne Treaty was signed, three main economic guidelines for Turkey's relations with European powers were also drawn up. The first was abolition of the capitulations that provided concessions to foreign powers during the Ottoman period. Second, Ottoman external debt was renegotiated and apportioned between the successor states. Turkey was due to pay 67 percent of the total in gold sterling, beginning in 1929. Third, the free-trade treaties renewed periodically during the nineteenth century were discontinued, and a new agreement was drawn up for existing low tariff rates and restrictions against quotas to continue until 1929, when the new republic would be free to pursue its own commercial policies.

Within this context, during 1923–1929, capitalist development took its place on the agenda of the government as the main pillar of the modernization process. The primary aim of creating a national bourgeoisie continued, as did state support for the private sector. State monopolies that were operational in many sectors of the economy were transferred under favorable terms to private firms. Individuals and companies with political connections to the ruling Republican People's Party received most of the largesse. During this period, foreign capital was also invited into the country and cooperation with local capital was encouraged. The objective was that while the foreigners would provide capital, local partners with connections to state power would operate businesses. During this period estates and property left behind by the minorities leaving the country were expropriated by the state. This property was mainly used to further expand the formation of capital and development of a national bourgeoisie.

The encouragement of the industrial sector was the main task of the ruling elite. However, agriculture remained the leading economic sector. Although the government maintained close relations with the large landowners, peasants became an important symbol of the Kemalist revolution. The peasant was described as the "master of the nation" and policies that were aimed at improving peasant status became important. The abolition of the tithe (öşür vergisi) – by which peasants were forced to give the central authority one-eighth of their total production as a tax – in 1925 was an important factor in improving standards of living in rural areas. With the tithe terminated, peasants were left with an excess of production, helping to integrate them into the market without intermediaries. The commercialization of agriculture by the peasants themselves helped increase the income of the peasants and the villagers as a whole.

Despite the positive developments in the economy – both capitalist industrialization and improvements in the agricultural sector – and relative calm in the country, the Kemalist modernization process was not without opposition. By the beginning of February 1925, the Kurdish population, under Sheikh Sait of East Anatolia, started a rebellion against the republic with the aim of founding an independent Kurdish state and reinstating the caliphate. The abolition of the caliphate, an important religious symbol, led to resentment against the RPP rule. In addition, the nationalist ideology of the regime to construct a national consciousness around Turkishness, loosely defined as including anyone who called themselves a Turk, led to growing opposition. As the rebellion broke out, the Ankara government declared martial law and the Law for the Maintenance of Order (Takrir-i Sukun) was passed by the parliament, giving the government absolute power to crush the rebellion.

In addition to these measures, Independence Tribunals had been formed in 1920 to deal with cases of treason and offenses against the regime, which reinstated the right to carry out the death sentence without sanction of the Assembly. After the rebellion had been suppressed, government attention turned to political opposition from the newspapers and the Progressive Republican Party. Leading Istanbul newspapers – conservative, liberal, and Marxist – were closed down and some journalists were arrested and tried in the courts. The opposition party was banned in June 1925, after the short-lived multi-party experience, strengthening the single-party government which extended its power to every region of the country and curbed political opposition against its project. After 1925, new reforms were implemented.

In 1925, all religious shrines and religious orders (tarikats) were closed down. In 1926, Islamic Shari'a laws regarding the family and individual were abolished. In addition, the regime ended the religious education system and introduced harsh penalties for secret religious education. The state passed reforms including disestablishment of the state religion (1928), adoption of the Latin alphabet (1928), and the use of the Turkish language in the Islamic call to prayer (1932).

The year 1929 was an important milestone in Turkish economic development since it marked the end of the economic implications of the Lausanne Treaty and was a year of world economic crisis. The ending of the provisions of Lausanne freed the Turkish Republic to determine tariffs and quotas on foreign trade. The main consequence of the 1929 economic crisis was the decline in agricultural commodity prices. Between 1925 and the early 1930s, prices of agricultural goods fell by one-third. Since Turkish exports were primarily agricultural, the country's balance of trade was devastated. The severity of the crisis forced the government to take some serious protectionist measures through asserting greater control over foreign trade and foreign exchange. In June 1929, average tariff rates on imports almost tripled.

While some people supported a more active state role in the economy and increasing protectionism as a response to the crisis, others argued instead for a liberal economic policy with limited state intervention. As this debate intensified, in August 1930, Mustafa Kemal Atatürk announced that Fethi Okyar (1880–1943), one of his closest colleagues, planned to form an opposition party – the Free Party (Serbest Firka, FP). Okyar, a liberal on economic policies, was opposed to the statist stand of the RPP after the 1929 economic crisis.

The FP sought to abolish monopolies, cut taxes, and promote the importation of foreign capital. Rather than attracting the industrial and commercial bourgeoisie, the FP became a center of right-wing forces opposed to the Kemalist “modernization project,” thus becoming a core of counterrevolutionary reaction. In the local elections of October 1930, the FP's strong showing surprised and alarmed the RPP. The FP members accused the RPP of fraud in the elections, which led to open and fierce attacks between the two parties. Mustafa Kemal, amid this environment of tension, announced that it was impossible for him remain impartial as president, and sided with the RPP. Fethi Okyar was forced to close down the FP on November 16, 1930.

On December 23, 1930, several weeks after the closure of the FP, a small group of Islamic radicals began calling for Shari'a law in a town called Menemen. This event is regarded as the second most important protest against the “modernization project” after the Sheikh Said rebellion. The radicals killed and beheaded Kubilay, a young teacher. The uprising was suppressed swiftly by the army, and the attackers were caught and executed. Kubilay became a symbol of the Kemalist revolution.

After 1930, the regime grew more authoritarian and suppressed opposition. Aware of the strength of the opposition, the ruling circle adopted a more forceful strategy in advancing reforms. New powers were given to the RPP to close down any organization or newspaper that contradicted the general policy of the regime. Having consolidated its power and secured its position through eliminating opposition from the FP which advocated liberal policies, the RPP more freely asserted the state role in the economy. The RPP implemented policies encouraging industrialization, and in 1931 adopted an import substitution strategy calling for high tariff rates and a quota system in foreign trade.

In 1931, the basic principles of the modernization project, the Kemalist principles, were laid down officially in the RPP program: republicanism, secularism, nationalism, populism, statism, and revolutionism. These six principles, represented by arrows, constituted the new RPP emblem. As the reforms were put into place, populism was incorporated into the principles to promote solidarity and cooperation in a society seen as growing more conservative and fragmented.

Despite the concessions to the upper classes, the RPP elite were disenchanted with the growing class divisions. Kemalism as an ideology considered the interests of the nation as superior to those of any group or class. The state denied the existence of any classes in the European sense in Turkey and prohibited political activity based on class interests. Populism and the emphasis on national solidarity became one of the main principles of the Kemalist project. Ziya Gökalp (1876–1924) is seen as the major ideologue of Turkish nationalism, with his ideas about a state-centric corporatism constituting the basis of the Kemalist populist principle. Gökalp's ideas about "solidarism" and corporatist state-centered organizational structure became the basic characteristic of collective action in the early republican ideology.

The new nationalist economic philosophy was accompanied by a shift towards étatist economic policy and provided much of the ideological justification for Kemalist experiments with state corporatism during the 1930s. During 1932–1934, corporatism was further developed by a group of intellectuals gathering around the journal Kadro. The Kadro group portrayed the Kemalist modernization project as a struggle against capitalism and imperialism, arguing that Turkey represented economic development without the social contradictions it brought in other countries, and that Turkey would accumulate capital while avoiding class struggle.

From 1932 to 1940, the state's role in investment, management, and production became the main feature of the economy, and industrialization was initiated. The first five-year economic plan was concluded in 1933, aiming to establish the main industries. The basic goal of this plan was "self-sufficiency" – to produce the goods necessary for local consumption in peace and war, and to establish industries that utilized local raw materials. The first five-year plan was implemented largely successfully and most basic industries were established by 1938.

Agriculture also developed quite well during this period. The foreign trade deficit recovered and, except for in 1938, the Turkish trade balance was positive during the period. From 1930 to 1939, the trading bourgeoisie, which had been strengthened in the previous era, lost its privileged position, especially those members engaged in importing goods who were now subject to protectionist policies. On the other hand, members of the bourgeoisie who had supplemented the state's investment, rather than acting as rivals, managed to benefit greatly. The advent of the state sector did not lead to dramatic declines in the profits of private capital. Through investing in large, expensive projects in intermediate goods and providing them as inputs, the state sustained the growth of private enterprises in the manufacturing of the final goods for the consumer. The private sector continued to be supported and subsidized all through the 1930s. Although the benefits to the bourgeoisie were significant, capitalists feared the speed of state sector development and the limitations to operating a private market in the future.

The RPP began using the term populism, describing itself as "the synthesis of the people and as the sole authoritative interpreter of the national interest." Representation of interests through alternative, non-party or non-bureaucratic channels was regarded as unnecessary and as encouraging the acquisition of illegitimate privilege. The period between 1925 and 1946 is considered as an era of inactivity in Turkish associational life, with only modest attempts to sponsor corporatist professional organizations. For workers, organizational membership was prohibited. The labor law of 1936, bringing some safeguards to industrial workers (which materialized only after 1946), prohibited the formation of trade unions and even appeals for strikes.

1940–1945: War Economy

With the death of Mustafa Kemal Atatürk on November 10, 1938, İsmet İnönü (1884–1973) became the president of the republic and single-party rule continued. During 1939–1945, the Turkish economy was affected by World War II. Although Turkey did not enter the war and managed to remain out of it, it was affected by the shortages in the world market. Besides, keeping and equipping its army, which was increased tenfold during the war, brought great economic strains for the country. The government had to increase taxes and print money to finance these expenses.

In 1940, a new wave of state intervention came with the implementation of the National Defence Law (Milli Koruma Kanunu), giving the government full authority to fix prices and impose forced labor. An important development was the initiation of the "wealth tax" by the RPP to increase state income. Although the tax was imposed on all wealthy people, ethnic minorities were most deleteriously affected. According to the Lausanne Treaty, minorities in Turkey are non-Muslim groups. The main implication of the "wealth tax" was the suppression and impoverishment of minorities without access to state authorities. Most minorities had to sell their property to pay the tax, generally to the nouveaux riches of Anatolian roots.

The war years also enriched the landowners and the merchants who depended on trading agricultural products. High ranking bureaucrats with special ties to the ruling elite and Anatolian merchants were enriched by the wartime policies of the RPP. However, the rich bourgeoisie of Istanbul with international links and composed of minorities was estranged by the wealth tax, as were large landowners by the agricultural production tax (toprak mahsulleri vergisi) and the Law for Village Institutes and Land for Peasants (Köy Enstitüleri ve Çiftçiyi Topraklandırma Kanunu).

Introduction of Multi-Party Politics

At the end of World War II, the domestic forces in Turkey combined to demand political and economic changes from the government. By 1946, a growing number of social groups were dissatisfied with single-party rule. Wartime policies, especially the economic policies of the RPP, alienated much of the population. The dissatisfaction and differences of opinion within the RPP also intensified and turned into intra-party opposition during the discussions on land reform in 1945. The reform was aimed at improving the rapidly deteriorating conditions of peasants, and led to growing opposition from large landowners.

Despite increasing agricultural production, the living standards of peasants declined dramatically during World War II due to new regulations implemented as the war started, including the obligation to sell agricultural products to the state, which set the prices lower than the market price in order to keep the cost of bread and other food low in the cities. The production demands placed on peasants were determined by the state in advance, except subsistence family needs.

Amid growing peasant dissatisfaction with the agricultural policies, the government passed a land reform law in June 1945 to gain their support. The Land Reform Law allowed for the redistribution of land and supply of necessary equipment for landless and smallholding peasants. The first lands slated for redistribution belonged to the state, municipalities, and charitable organizations, followed by large plots of privately owned land. Support for the RPP from local notables with large land holdings in the countryside was weakened as a result of the discussion of the land reform in parliament. In the end the reform did not in fact materialize as opposition became more forceful.

After the debate over land reform was initiated in parliament, in June 1945, some prominent members of the RPP submitted a petition calling for the democratization of political life in Turkey. The petition called for more active parliamentary control over the government, increased individual liberties, and especially more room for opposition. Despite the support of President İnönü for the proposal, the RPP party leaders in parliament rejected the petition.

Despite the reluctance of the RPP group in parliament, President İnönü declared in a speech on November 1, 1945 that the main shortcoming of Turkish democracy was the lack of an opposition party, and he announced general elections for a multi-party system in 1947. Shortly thereafter, new parties were formed and most of them tried to reach the rural population. Twenty-four different parties were founded, most with programs emphasizing traditionalist values and Islamic principles. Most parties mainly challenged the secularization and westernization pillars of the Kemalist modernization project. Since open attacks on secularism and Kemalist principles were banned by the constitution, the new parties attacked the RPP as the vanguard of secularism, while calling for increased emphasis of Islamic principles in political life. One of the newly founded parties, the Nation Party (NP; Millet Partisi), openly advocated an increased role for Islam in public affairs.

Among many parties, the formation of the Democrat Party (Demokrat Parti, DP) on January 7, 1946, under the leadership of Celal Bayar (1883–1986), and by MPs opposing the Land Reform Law in parliament, was an important development in Turkish politics. Shortly thereafter, popular support for DP leaders expanded significantly in opposition to the “elitist one-party rule” of the RPP.

All opposition to RPP rule coalesced around the DP as this new party took on the mission of “mobilization for freedom,” or what the DP members termed “movement against despotism,” manifested in their election slogan of “That’s Enough!” (Artık Yeter!). The DP candidates were met with great enthusiasm during their visits to different cities, and became highly popular, not necessarily as a result of their program, but mainly on the credentials of opposition to RPP rule. Their criticisms against the RPP revolved around the high cost of living, lack of freedom and liberties, and anti-democratic laws. Alarmed with the increasing popularity of the opposition, the RPP government held elections a year early, on July 21, 1946, when the DP party structure was not yet fully organized. The DP won 62 seats in the 465-seat parliament.

Despite winning the elections with a large majority, the RPP was aware of the support that the DP had gathered. By 1947, the Republican People's Party had begun implementing some policies advocated by the opposition, such as greater reliance on private capital and a new definition of étatisme. The emphasis on state control and étatisme in the five-year economic plan was amended in 1947 to suit the wishes of Istanbul businesses, to include free enterprise and the development of agriculture and related industries, to appeal to the rural segments of society.

After the policy shift, the economic policy positions of the RPP and the DP were nearly identical – with the DP seeking to privatize state enterprises, and the RPP seeking an equal division between public and private sectors.

In the social sphere, in 1946 the RPP government lifted the ban on organizations with a class base, giving rise to the formation of trade unions. In 1947, with a new Law on Trade Unions, workers were given the right to organize in trade unions, but at the same time all political activity and strikes were forbidden. Despite the prohibition of politics in the trade unions, both the RPP and the DP sought their support in the coming elections. The DP promised workers the right to strike in return for their support, a promise soon forgotten.

In the second multi-party elections in 1950, the RPP lost power to the Democrat Party. During the election campaign, the DP promised to bring services to the peasants, to de-bureaucratize Turkey, and to liberalize religious practices. The DP regime is regarded by many observers as the periphery's accession to power. Prime Minister Adnan Menderes (1899–1961) took a critical stance against the republican reforms and called for a more liberal approach towards secularism.

Changes to secular practices included a law permitting prayer in Arabic (it had been conducted in Turkish under the Republican People's Party), and the reading of the Qur'an in public and over the radio; and optional religion courses in high schools were made mandatory. The government made large amounts of funds available for religious education, which provided intensive religious instruction to children in many rural localities.

Since its foundation as a political party, the DP had advocated a liberal and anti-statist economic policy. Upon coming to power, the DP directed all its efforts towards loosening state controls on the economy and encouraging the private sector. Capitalist groups were strongly encouraged and creating a national bourgeoisie became the economic priority. As such, the 1950s were important years for capital accumulation and the founding of new private businesses. Private establishments more than doubled in the 1950s, as did the number of employees in the private sector. Besides a developing capitalist class, a working class also emerged in growing numbers, and class consciousness and class politics began to take root in the country.

In 1952 the Türk-İş Workers Union was founded as an organization to represent the interests of the labor class. Despite the founding of Türk-İş, the DP did not keep its election promise for the “right to strike” upon coming to power, and workers' wages and working conditions remained poor.

Although the process of industrialization was leading to the formation of class identities among capitalists and workers, limitations were placed on the formation of class politics in Turkey. The profitability for the private sector of investing in speculative areas had obstructed full-scale industrialization. The DP's policies as reflected in its slogan of “a millionaire for each neighborhood” (her mahalleye bir milyoner) encouraged capital accumulation, but not necessarily investment. Besides, the dependence of private capital on the state and state credits and projects limited the formation of an independent bourgeois class and the deepening of class identities. In addition, the duality of society between the military-bureaucratic elite and the traditional liberal circles limited collective action on the basis of socioeconomic class.

The economic policy of the DP prioritized private capitalists in rural areas, where it drew most of its support. The expansion of cultivated areas by 55 percent led to a doubling of output, in part due to the mechanization of agriculture. The government implemented the Land Distribution Law of 1945, not for land reform, as originally envisaged, but for the distribution of state-owned lands. Under this law, communal pastures were transferred to peasants and village cooperatives, serving to strengthen small land ownership across Anatolia.

The Democrat Party used US Marshall Plan aid to finance the import of agricultural machinery and especially tractors. Wealthy landowners purchased tractors with favorable credits from state banks, helping to increase the cultivated area and productivity in the agricultural sector. Despite these policies, the weaknesses of the agricultural sector were nonetheless evident, especially after 1953, when stagnation in agricultural production became visible as the country continued to rely on dry farming – irrigation was not a priority of the government, and expansion of cultivated land ended.

The lack of productivity in agriculture spurred urban migration as industrialization necessitated a new workforce. However, most migrants retained some property in their villages, and workers in the 1950s were generally not destitute and stripped of all property, due to continuing ties to the village and agricultural land, limiting the formation of class identities based on ownership and relation to production.

The liberal environment accompanying the DP in the early 1950s began reverting to “authoritarian party” rule from 1954 onwards as the economy began stagnating and inflation was spiraling. After 1954, Turkish trade balance deficits became chronic and IMF advice regarding stability policies became central to the national political economy.

However, against the IMF proposals calling for devaluation, deflationist policies, and liberalization of foreign trade, the DP regime chose to implement the National Protection Law (Milli Koruma Kanunu) to control prices and markets, introduce import substitution policies, and pursue inflationist policies accompanied by populist, distributive policies. As the agricultural sector constituted two-thirds of its electoral power, the Democrat Party could not risk economic stagnation in rural areas. As such, the DP introduced subsidies and protective measures for the agricultural sector, later to cover most of the economy.

Authoritarian policies of the DP were seen in the measures against opposition. The DP introduced amendments that tightened the press law and changed the electoral law, and the power of the bureaucracy was curtailed as the executive powers were given the right to retire civil servants, including university professors. There was growing opposition to the DP regime, and by the end of the decade there were mass demonstrations, especially in the universities, against the increasing repression of the regime. As a result of demonstrations in April 1960 in Istanbul and Ankara universities, a state of emergency was declared in these two cities and mass student arrests followed. Protests continued in May 1960, when Prime Minister Menderes was booed by the crowd on many occasions; and a demonstration by military academy students in protest against the government followed.

SEE ALSO: Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938); Turkey, Anti-Secular Protest, 1980–Present; Turkey, Protest and Revolution, 1800s–1923; Turkey, Working-Class Protest, 1960–1980

References and Suggested Readings

- Ahmad, F. (1993) The Making of Modern Turkey. London: Routledge.
- Berkes, N. (1965) The Development of Secularism in Turkey. Montreal: McGill University Press.
- Bianchi, R. (1984) Interest Groups and Political Development in Turkey. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Evin, A. (Ed.) (1984) Modern Turkey: Continuity and Change. Oplagen: Leske Verlag.
- Kedourie, S. (Ed.) (1998) Turkey Before and After Atatürk: Internal and External Affairs. London: Frank Cass.
- Kinross, L. (1965) Atatürk: A Biography of Mustafa Kemal, Father of Modern Turkey. New York: Morrow.
- Pope, N. & Pope, H. (1997) Turkey Unveiled: Atatürk and After. London: John Murray.
- Poulton, H. (1997) Top Hat, Grey Wolf and the Crescent. London: Hurst.
- Zürcher, E. (1993) Turkey: A Modern History. London: I. B. Tauris.

Turkmenistan, protest and revolt

Summer D. Leibensperger

Turkmenistan, a constituent republic of the USSR until 1991, was one of the last to secede. Tribalism was prominent in the area that is now Turkmenistan until Russian forces began to control the region in the late 1800s and early 1900s. Soviet Russia encouraged nationalism within the region to support modernity, although Turkmen wanted greater control over the process than the Soviets would grant. Turkmen anti-Soviet movements, such as the Jadidism and Basmachi movements, were generally suppressed through a combination of Soviet force and reversal of policy.

Russian Control of the Region

Russia had gained control of the area that is now Turkmenistan by the late 1800s (through events like the massacre of thousands at the Battle of Gök-Tepe in 1881) and built a fortress near Ashgabat to establish a seat of occupation. The fortress provided protection to the city, thereby attracting wealthy merchants, and, after the building of a major railroad, Ashgabat became a major industrial center. In 1907, Russian control over Turkmenistan solidified with the Anglo-Russian Convention, an agreement that defined Russian and British spheres of influence.

Prior to 1917, concepts of nationalism in Turkmenistan were vague – tribalism was prominent, and people were bound together by ancestry and not by clearly defined national borders, a defined political system, or language. Members of a tribe might consider another tribe just as much of an enemy as another state.

Nationalism, Turkmen Protest, and the Turkmen Soviet Socialist Republic

The Turkmen Soviet Socialist Republic (or Turkmen SSR) was created when the Bolshevik government divided Central Asia into multiple republics; the area was initially part of Turkestan Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic, but became the Turkmen SSR in 1925. During 1917, Turkmen likely hoped that the provisional government and then the Bolsheviks would acknowledge the right of the Turkmen to self-determination. Such hope was misplaced: Soviet policy was generally aimed at reducing the influence of tribes and the authority of Islamic clergy as the latter was a strong anti-Bolshevik force.

Soviets were interested, however, in fostering nationalism. Historians suggest different motivations for why, but many contend that Soviets saw fostering nationalism as the quickest way to encourage progress (the Turkmen people were viewed as backward by the Soviets and in desperate need of modernization) and to gain the confidence of the Turkmen people. Soviets who were worried that peoples of Central Asia might have some kind of natural unity also saw fostering nationalism as a way to divide that unity.

The Soviet Union fostered nationalism initially by creating republics that were based on ethnicity and then promoting ethnic cultures and a standardized language. Further, to help with modernization, the Soviet Union established political (and later, educational) institutions. Turkmen were generally excluded from government positions, although that should not imply that the Turkmen themselves were not involved in the formation of their nation, hence the protests and disagreements with the Soviets.

Nationalism discussions (and the ensuing constitutional conflicts) in the 1920s and 1930s were shaped by tribal concepts of genealogy and identity alongside Bolshevik concepts of nationhood and class. As early as 1917, Turkmen were protesting their disfranchisement through congresses where Muslims demanded autonomy, at one point even suggesting that Turkmen leaders should provide governmental leadership to rural villages while Soviets should rule cities, which were primarily dominated by Russians. These protests were suppressed.

Perhaps the most dramatic of these suppressions relates to the Jadids, a group of Muslim reformers. As early as the 1880s, the Jadids were concerned about (and had begun to question) traditional cultural and religious identity, especially in light of the struggles with European colonialism. The reformers were particularly interested in educational reform: schools would teach a common Central Asian Turkic language and secular subjects like history and science. Jadids wanted to promote secular notions of nationalism as well; they created a provisional government that proclaimed autonomy in December 1917 in Kokand. In early 1918, the town of Kokand was destroyed, and thousands of residents, including many Jadidist leaders, were killed. A political party known as the Young Bukharans rose from the Jadids in 1918.

The Basmachi movement was another Muslim uprising against the Soviets. The movement began in or before 1917 and rose, in part, out of dissatisfaction with Russian policy that changed Muslim exemptions from military service. By 1920, in response to unpopular and harsh Soviet policies, the Basmachi had gained wide support throughout Turkestan, and Soviets began to worry they would lose the territory. Fighting among members of the group combined with Soviet reversal and revisal of policy lessened support for the Basmachis in the 1920s.

By early 1922, Basmachi had grown again under the direction of Ismail Enver, a Turk war minister, with the goals of pan-Turkism and pan-Islamism. Enver developed a professional army to fight the Soviets, but again the Soviets were able to defeat the Basmachis through policy changes (political and economic) and through greater numbers in combat: the Basmachis were defeated in the Battle of Kafrun. Some Basmachis who survived began a guerilla war that lasted until 1931. Their tactics of terror combined with Soviet concessions caused the Basmachis to lose support from peasants.

Less formal and less violent protests were happening in day-to-day government office environments. While Turkmen were promised roles in government institutions and an environment where their native language would be spoken, they encountered prejudice and discrimination from the Russians who held posts. Despite numerous commands from the Soviets for employees of government agencies to speak the native language of the Turkmen SSR and for agencies to hire native Turkmen, few Russians learned the language and few native Turkmen were hired. Turkmen who were hired were often the victims of discrimination when meetings were held in Russian and no translators were available; Turkmen were often simply ill prepared and ill trained to take on positions.

A national language was a critical part of protest. Many Turkmen were frustrated by the failure of government institutions to use their language. They also worried about the loss of Turkmen identity when the interest in learning the Turkmen language declined in the 1930s and 1940s since Russian was clearly the language that citizens needed to use to get ahead. Indeed, one of the first moves after the dissolution of the USSR was cultural reform related to language: Turkmen readopted a Latin alphabet it had been forced to abandon by the Soviets.

Many traditionalist Turkmen also protested Soviet initiatives to change the role of women in Turkmen society. Women were expected to conform to very traditional gender roles, but Soviet officials wanted to encourage gender equality political activism among women. Officials met with little success: few women participated, and Soviets were unhappy that the women who participated were generally older women. Young women simply were not accustomed to speaking in front of strangers or even older relatives and were burdened by cultural expectations for housework and childrearing; older women had moved past some of these cultural expectations. Generally, the numbers of women participants involved in political activism slowly grew throughout the 1920s and 1930s; women also made gains in literacy through Soviet literacy programs and schools, although in some cases husbands had to be threatened by Soviet officials to send their wives to school. Women's roles perhaps changed most notably in their economic contributions to their households: they began contributing to the household's income through the sale of carpets.

Soviets also created laws related to women and family life which angered many traditional Turkmen. Laws related to divorce that enabled women to divorce men without a reason were especially troubling to Turkmen, who fought fiercely for harsher restrictions on women (under Qur'an law, men could divorce women by saying "I divorce you" three times). Turkmen also opposed laws banning polygamy, child marriage, and bridewealth practices.

After Nikita Khrushchey's de-Stalinization speech in 1956, Turkmen started to make greater headway in terms of political presence, and by the 1970s they had greater political and budgetary power.

Dissolution of the USSR and Turkmenistan's Independence

The 1991 dissolution of the USSR changed little in Turkmenistan. The Turkmenistan Communist Party (TCP) was dismantled, but in name only; most leaders of the TCP became leaders of the Turkmenistan Democratic Party. Saparmurat Niyazov, the former secretary of the Communist Party who had been in power since 1985, was "elected" president: he was the only candidate in the election. In 1999, Niyazov became president for life. Niyazov is known for his cult of personality, cruel acts of repression, and his odd decrees and actions: he has banned car radios and long hair on men and closed libraries and hospitals.

Turkmenistan's constitution suggests the country is a democracy with a separation of powers and guarantees some human rights, including gender and social equality, freedom from cruel and unusual punishment, and freedom of movement and religion. The wording is careful, though. While the constitution indicates that citizens can create associations, including political parties, for example, it also indicates that the government can prohibit those organizations if they "encroach on the health and morals of the people."

In practice, the country has a one-party system; many government officials are appointed rather than elected, and opposition is viewed as treason. In practice, many of these freedoms do not exist: police brutality and confessions gained by torture are suspected to be common; religious groups are closely watched, and Niyazov's book of spiritual writings, Ruhnama, is imposed on religious communities; the media is heavily censored. In practice, few organizations do not encroach on the government's definition of what is good for the "health and morals of the people."

In the late 1980s and early 1990s, various opposition groups were formed which carried out protests (often in the form of strikes and pickets) against Niyazov's rapidly entrenching government. In 1989, members of the intelligentsia formed the first opposition movement, named Agzybirlik. The group called for democratic reforms and cultural revival. In 1991, members of the Academy of Sciences created Paikhas. The group wanted to promote public discussion of politics. Also in 1991, a group named Genesh was founded that functioned as a coalition among Agzybirlik and other democratic reform organizations: its goal was to coordinate the movements of opposition groups.

Niyazov moved to suppress his critics by arresting leaders, and by 1993 the KNB (the successor to the Soviet-era KGB) had suppressed much of the public unrest. Some dissidents chose to leave the country; those who did not were often kept under surveillance by the KNB. Instead of charging his critics with political crimes, Niyazov was more likely to charge them with criminal actions (sometimes related to the drug trade).

By the mid-1990s, much of the opposition to Turkmenistan's policies was situated in Moscow and led by Avdi Kuliev. Kuliev was Turkmenistan's first foreign minister and left Turkmenistan when he grew uncomfortable with Niyazov's policies. In Moscow, he founded the Turkmenistan Foundation, which later evolved into the United Democratic Opposition of Turkmenistan or UDOT. Kuliev advocated for the creation of a multiparty system to foster political change; he also wanted an immediate internationally monitored national election to occur. The KNB has tried to destroy the organization, in part through the arrest of two leaders (Khoshali Garayev and Mukhamedkul Aitmuratov) in October 1994, one of whom later died while being held in prison.

In 2001, the former minister of foreign affairs, Boris Shikhmuradov, faced criminal charges and fled Turkmenistan. Shikhmuradov did not approve of Niyazov's isolationism practices and favored closer ties with the West. Unlike Kuliev, Shikhmuradov wanted to put an 18-month hold on elections for a transitional period after Niyazov fell. Other members have since joined Shikhmuradov, and together they are sometimes referred to as the nomenklatura opposition.

During Niyazov's rule, women also lost ground that had been gained under Soviet leadership. In many ways, traditional notions of gender roles have reemerged, in part because Niyazov's Ruhnama teaches a traditional role for women, and the book is required reading in schools and political arenas. There are no advocacy groups for women, and women often do not attend school.

Ultimately, Soviets introduced the concepts of nationalism to Turkmen, but in many ways the Soviets limited the Turkmen's abilities to achieve a unified country. The fight against Soviet Russia strengthened the desire for genuine democratic processes, although the first leader of post-Soviet Turkmenistan, Niyazov, continued with Soviet suppression and created a legacy of human rights abuses. Niyazov died in 2006. His replacement, Gurbanguly Berdimuhamedov, reversed some of Niyazov's less popular decrees and more harmful policies, although many worry that he is working toward developing his own cult of personality.

SEE ALSO: Afghanistan, 1978 Revolution and Islamic Civil War; Bolsheviks; Central Asian Protest Movements; Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Leninist Philosophy; Marxism; Soviet Union, Fall of; Tajikistan, Protests and Revolts; Uzbekistan, National Movement and Protests

References and Suggested Readings

- Allworth, E. (Ed.) (1994) Central Asia: 130 Years of Russian Dominance, A Historical Overview, 3rd ed. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Bremmer, I. & Taras, R. (Eds.) (1997) New States, New Policies: Building the Post-Soviet Nations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Edgar, A. L. (2004) Tribal Nation: The Making of Soviet Turkmenistan. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Khalid, A. (1998) The Politics of Muslim Cultural Reform: Jadidism in Central Asia. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Wheeler, G. (1964) The Modern History of Soviet Central Asia. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.

U

Uganda, protests against British colonialism and occupation

Raphaela von Weichs

From the beginning, British colonial rule in East Africa encountered severe protests and manifold resistance. When the Uganda protectorate was established in 1894, almost everywhere local populations struggled against foreign domination, albeit with differing degrees of success. Resistance was most pronounced in the Kingdom of Bunyoro-Kitara in the western Nile region. This centralized state dominated the Great Lakes area until the early eighteenth century when its eastern neighbor, the Kingdom of Buganda, began to expand. In the late nineteenth century, the rival kingdom collaborated effectively with British imperialism and became the center of power in the protectorate. Local resistance was therefore directed not only against European hegemony, but also against African sub-imperialism. Though uprisings and rebellions spilled over almost everywhere in the protectorate, Bunyoro-Kitara excelled in military resistance under King (Omukama) Kabalega from 1893 to 1895.

In the 1880s, when Kabalega had regained power in the Great Lakes area, slave raiders from Equatorial Egypt encroached in the north of Bunyoro-Kitara. They pillaged villages and enslaved Kabalega's subjects, the local Banyoro. Ironically, the acting governor of the Equatorial province, Sir Samuel Baker, utilized the slave raiders as irregular troops in his effort to annex Bunyoro-Kitara to Egypt. He failed dismally and was defeated in the battle of Masindi in 1872. Thereafter Kabalega's army chased him out of Bunyoro-Kitara. As a consequence of this humiliation, Baker ostracized Omukama Kabalega in his publications as an anti-imperialist. This reputation stimulated imperial incentives in Britain to crush Kabalega's power and to use his expansion into neighboring kingdoms as a pretext for war. In this way, the Westminster government tried to secure the British sphere of influence against the interests of France, Belgium, and Germany. Because of the Mahdist revolt in the Sudan, which began in 1881 and continued until 1898, Bunyoro-Kitara was cut off from the northern route of long-distance trade. As a result Kabalega ran short of guns, which were supplied by Arabs from Equatorial Egypt in exchange for slaves and ivory. Trade routes to the Indian Ocean, the Swahili coast, and Zanzibar on the other side were controlled by the rival kingdoms of Buganda, Karagwe, and Nkore. Nevertheless, Kabalega succeeded in drawing more and more trading caravans to his kingdom. He consolidated his power on the basis of a newly created standing army (Barusura), which he equipped with firearms.

In 1891, the Imperial British East African Company (IBEAC) under the leadership of Captain Lugard provoked Kabalega by re-installing a king in Toro. This province had seceded from Bunyoro-Kitara in 1830 as an independent kingdom. In 1876 Kabalega reconquered Toro, but lost the province again through Captain Lugard's intervention. Kabalega consequently lost control over Katwe, a center of commerce and salt production in the Great Lakes area. Bunyoro-Kitara's resources in cattle, trade, and land shrank quickly and Lugard's dominion in Toro augured what was to follow over the coming years. By 1892, Lugard's expeditions had ruined the IBEAC to such an extent that the British crown accepted the protection of the colony. This decision was taken among other reasons to safeguard the Nile as a trading route for Great Britain's imperial economy.

The Colonial Office sent Colonel Colvile to remove all obstacles, especially resistance in Bunyoro-Kitara. Colville declared war on the western kingdom in 1893 and marched there in company with a handful of British officers and a huge army of 14,000 Baganda. The army of King Kabalega repelled the attacks successfully, but by 1895 another army of 20,000 Baganda, some Sudanese companies, and a few British officers conquered the main areas of the Kingdom of Bunyoro-Kitara. Meanwhile, the king had fled to the north of the Nile. Kabalega had realized early on that an open battle would be detrimental to his position in the face of an overwhelming enemy, equipped with the Maxim gun. Drawing on guerilla tactics, he thus successfully kept on fighting against the occupation of his territory for two more years. Likewise he ordered sabotage against the supplying caravans for the British forts. These stretched in a line from Lake Albert in Bunyoro-Kitara to Lake Victoria in Buganda. Though most of the Banyoro chiefs had officially surrendered to the British and accepted occupation, Kabalega still influenced their politics from his exile north of the Nile. Out of loyalty to the king, Barusura army leaders continued the warfare and attacked British forces until 1896. From then on, Kabalega was pursued by British expeditions with the objective of expelling the king from Bunyoro-Kitara and ending military as well as cultural resistance. In 1899, Omukama Kabalega was captured, together with Kabaka Mwanga, the deposed king of Buganda. Both were taken to the Seychelles Islands in the Indian Ocean. Mwanga himself had resorted to resistance in 1897 against the British protectorate government. He realized that he was stripped of his powers and patronized by his leading chiefs, who collaborated with the European government.

From 1888 to 1892, Buganda was divided by a power struggle between Muslims, Catholics, and Protestants, in which French Catholic and British Protestant missionaries as well as the IBEAC had interests. To appease the Catholics and Protestants, they were given various counties of the conquered Bunyoro-Kitara kingdom. Two of the counties, Bugangaizi and Buyaga, lay in the former heartland of Bunyoro-Kitara and contained the kingdom's royal tombs. They came under the rule of Catholic chiefs, who opened up the land for Baganda settlers. Buganda had thus expanded at Bunyoro-Kitara's expense and exercised a harsh rule over the conquered Banyoro population in the so-called "lost counties." Baganda tended to see the Bunyoro "lost counties" as a reward for their alliance with the British in the war of conquest. Ironically, the British government considered the transfer as a political strategy to consolidate colonial power over both kingdoms. The whole of Bunyoro-Kitara was to be ruled by the Baganda system of administration. This meant that Baganda took over leading chiefships, acquired freehold land, imposed and collected taxes, and demanded labor from Banyoro. Women were exploited for sexual or reproductive labor. Another major grievance of Banyoro was the use of Luganda as the lingua franca in the new system. The language debate increased fears among Banyoro that Bunyoro-Kitara was to be absorbed as a province of Buganda. By 1907 Banyoro sub-chiefs who were under the tutelage of Baganda chiefs turned to strikes against the Baganda administrative regime. They refused to cooperate and chased Baganda chiefs out of the villages back to the administrative center in Hoima. The protectorate government reacted to the rebellion by punishing and arresting the ringleaders and deporting most of them out of Bunyoro-Kitara. Though violent in character, the boycott remained passive, recognizing British military superiority. The rebellion was therefore called "Nyangire," meaning "I have refused." In fact, it was a continuation and transformation of active resistance against conquest and occupation.

From 1908 onwards, the protectorate government in collaboration with its Baganda agents introduced cotton to the occupied territory. Bunyoro-Kitara was still without a peace treaty and under ceasefire. Cotton did not provide an alternative to agricultural subsistence production. Rather, this cash crop commercialized economic activities in Bunyoro-Kitara and introduced it to the global market. Although imperialism and capitalist development in the protectorate accelerated, these processes did not contribute to progress in Bunyoro-Kitara. Many Banyoro suffered from the aftermath of the war, especially from new diseases, epidemics, drought, and famine. Large parts of the kingdom were depopulated and infested with the tsetse fly. The remaining cattle that were not taken or slaughtered during the conquest died from rinderpest epidemics spread by the tsetse fly. Until the end of World War II, Bunyoro-Kitara did not improve in population, economy, or infrastructure. It lacked roads, markets, hospitals, and schools, especially for higher education. Compared to other parts of the protectorate, notably Buganda, the western kingdom lagged behind capitalist development. In local discourse, the protectorate government was accused of privileging Buganda and discriminating against Bunyoro, as the reduced kingdom was now referred to by colonial officials.

October 1, 1955: Mutesa II, king of the Buganda people, is permitted to return to Uganda as a constitutional monarch after several years of protest against British colonialism. Mutesa II, the first president of Uganda from 1963 to 1966, was deposed and forced into exile by his eventual successor, President Milton Obote. (Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

Already in the 1920s, a group of Banyoro in the “lost counties” had formed a committee for the liberation of the land that was given to Buganda. The Mubende Banyoro Committee (MBC) pronounced grievances concerning Baganda chiefs. It sent petitions to the governor of the protectorate to return the “lost counties” to the kingdom of Bunyoro-Kitara. The committee also complained about discrimination against the local language, Runyoro, and against the use of Runyoro personal names, the Baganda chiefs’ unwillingness to sell land to Banyoro, and the lack of Banyoro chiefs who would apply justice. Though the king of Bunyoro, Omukama Tito Winyi, supported the Committee’s demands with petitions to the colonial secretary and to the queen of England, no changes came about until after World War II. By then, a veteran of that war, Joseph Kazairwe, returned from serving the British empire in the King African Rifles army. He became secretary of the MBC and used his influence to both militarize and radicalize the movement. The leaders of the MBC now called for a peasant revolt. Most of the peasants had become bona fide tenants of the “Mailo land” (miles of land) given to Baganda by the protectorate government. Few possessed letters of occupancy, which would secure their rights in the land under cultivation. On top of one month’s labor, tenants paid rent and 10 percent of their local produce to their landlord. Baganda chief-landlords levied hut tax, and later poll tax and gun tax, for the protectorate’s revenues. They also forced labor for projects in the public infrastructure. The system of coercion and administration did not differ much from other parts of the protectorate. Yet it affected Banyoro in the “lost counties” even more deeply because of the combined effects of administrative and cultural domination by Baganda. More settlers from the rival kingdom had come to live permanently on what was seen by Banyoro as their ancestral soil.

The revolt gained force under the mobilization of the MBC. The leaders began to channel frustration and strategically used peasant riots for political protests against foreign occupation. Petitions became more ambitious and were sent to the major political parties in Britain, as well as to the United Nations in 1956, all for the purpose of liberating the “lost counties” from Buganda. Around the same time, in 1952, the Mau Mau movement in Kenya had culminated in a war between Gikuyu freedom fighters and British armed forces. Like the MBC, the Mau Mau leadership declared land and freedom as the major objectives of Gikuyu resistance to the British government. Both movements rejected foreign occupation of indigenous land for political and social reasons. Yet Mau Mau resistance was openly directed against European settlement, while the MBC fought against African sub-imperialism. Under this cover, Banyoro struggled against British colonial land policy and the colonial system of administration. By 1956, the Mau Mau revolt in Kenya was over and its political leaders were in detention. Land was no free asset but restricted to loyalists of British government policy. Thousands of Gikuyu freedom fighters had been killed during the war, while British forces had far fewer casualties. These incidents might have influenced the struggle of the MBC for freedom and land. Though violence was directed against Baganda settlers, it never culminated in an open war against the protectorate government. Instead, Banyoro political strategies increasingly focused on legal solutions.

On the eve of independence, Banyoro prepared for the Constitutional Conference in London where they wanted the "lost county" issue to be put on the agenda. They feared that the British would withdraw from colonial rule without rectifying the land problem they had created. However, the British government did not comply with the Banyoro conflict resolutions. Instead, the government privileged any move that kept Buganda in the constitutional process. The Kabaka of Buganda had threatened to boycott the conference if the integrity of his kingdom was tampered with. Consequently, the political party of the monarchists, Kabaka Yekka, was only willing to share power with the Uganda People Congress, a Protestant party, when Buganda obtained its sovereignty and political leadership in the new nation-state. Both parties agitated against the Catholics in the Democratic Party. Thus they perpetuated the religious competition of nineteenth-century politics which had led to the alleged "reward" for Baganda of the "lost counties." Banyoro efforts to find a legal solution to the transfer of their territories before independence were frustrated. They were followed by riots and violence in the "lost counties." The protectorate government declared the counties "disturbed areas" and sent out police patrols, which further militarized the conflict. Peasants had no choice but to support the protest movement or to stay neutral. Collaborators with Baganda chiefs were deemed traitors and were threatened by MBC supporters. In fact, this divide led to tragic disruption of Banyoro communities where members of both ethnic groups had intermarried. Other Banyoro had gained privileges, work, or other rewards in Buganda's administrative system.

Finally, a compromise was found in 1961, after a privy council committee had investigated the disturbed areas and recommended that a referendum should be held two years after independence. In six counties, the population had to vote on whether it belonged politically to either Buganda or Bunyoro. Since the Baganda population was in the minority in Buyaga and Bugangaizi, the Kabaka's government quickly initiated a settlement program for war veterans on the shores of Lake Albert. Large sums of money were invested in the Ndaiga Settlement Scheme and the Kabaka himself stayed in this remote area to attract settlers by his mere presence. Despite all efforts to increase the Baganda population in the two "lost counties" with a Banyoro majority, the strategy was a self-deception on the part of the Baganda royalists and failed. The referendum took place in 1964 and a majority of Banyoro in Buyaga and Bugangaizi voted for a return to Bunyoro-Kitara. The other four counties remained in Buganda. Undeniably, the MBC had utilized its power base in the two returned counties by demanding ethnic loyalty and promoting ethnic nationalism in the Kingdom of Bunyoro-Kitara. Banyoro regained control of their land and the MBC was in control of political governance, though now under the hegemony of the government of the Bunyoro-Kitara kingdom. The leaders of the MBC ascended to the highest chiefships in the former "lost counties." Yet the victory was ambiguous, since the Baganda landlords were still in possession of their land certificates and were thus foreign capitalists in absentia. Since the 1960s, the land question has perpetuated legal and violent conflicts which have not been resolved to the present time.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism and Sabotage; Anti-Slavery Movement, Britain; Imperialism and Capitalist Development; Mahdist Revolt; Mau Mau Rebellion, 1952–1959

References and Suggested Readings

- Doyle, S. (2006) From Kitara to the Lost Counties: Genealogy, Land and Legitimacy in the Kingdom of Bunyoro, Western Uganda. Social Identities 12, 4 (July): 457–70.
- Green, M. (1990) Mau Mau Oathing Rituals and Political Ideology in Kenya: A Re-Analysis. Africa 60 (1): 69–87.
- Jorgensen, J. J. (1981) Uganda: A Modern History. London: Croom Helm.
- Kiwanuka, S. (1974) The Diplomacy of the Lost Counties and its Impact on Foreign Relations of Buganda, Bunyoro and the Rest of Uganda, 1900–1964. Mawazo 4 (2): 111–41.
- Roberts, A. D. (1962) The Sub-Imperialism of the Baganda. Journal of African History 3 (3): 435–50.

- Steinhart, E. I. (1977/1999) Conflict and Collaboration in the Kingdoms of Western Uganda, 1890–1907. Kampala: Fountain.
- Strayer, R. W., Steinhart, E. I., & Maxon, R. M. (1973) Protest Movements in Colonial East Africa: Aspects of Early African Response to European Rule. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Uzoigwe, G. N. (1970) Revolution and Revolt in Bunyoro-Kitara. Part Two. The Kyanyangire, 1907: Passive Revolt against British Overrule. Makerere History Paper 5. Kampala: Longman.

Uhuru movement

Ernest A. Amador

Stemming from the perception that the non-violent approach of the early 1960s civil rights movement was ineffective, the Uhuru movement, a multi-organization crusade founded in 1973 in Saint Petersburg, Florida, set forth to liberate oppressed blacks victimized by a white-dominated capitalist society. The African People's Socialist Party (APSP), the leading organization of the movement, campaigned for a socialist society and endorsed the use of armed self-defense. Although many of its initiatives failed, the APSP's labors to improve the quality of life for blacks worldwide have been considered a revival of the Black Power movement of the 1960s and a source of inspiration for other revolutionary organizations.

Omalı Yeshitela (born Joe Waller), founder and decades-long leader of the APSP, was a victim of police harassment even as a young teenager. While serving overseas in the US Army, he witnessed racial discrimination – both within and outside of the military. Disgruntled at the oppression of blacks at the hands of capitalist societies, he formed the movement's ideology by fusing Marcus Garvey's "race-first," Marxist philosophy with Malcolm X's call for armed resistance.

Although the Uhuru movement (Uhuru is Swahili for "freedom") was spearheaded by the APSP, its mission was carried out by several "sister" organizations, each created to perform a particular function. Noting that the majority of the imprisoned population were blacks, Yeshitela created the African National Prison Organization in 1979, which has been labeled the earliest effort to organize prisoners for a revolution. After the Uhuru movement relocated its headquarters to Oakland, California in 1981, it created the African National Reparation Organization (ANRO). The first of its 11 annual War Reparation tribunals (held in Brooklyn) demanded that the United States pay over $4 trillion to blacks for their centuries-long oppression.

Within a few years of its inception, the Uhuru movement's leadership realized that the movement would not survive long without substantial financial backing and wanted to secure every available resource – even from whites (which some argue contradicted Garvey's doctrine of self-reliance). In 1976, the APSP created the African People's Solidarity Committee, allowing whites to support the movement financially.

Like Marcus Garvey decades previously, the APSP took its black liberation mission to the international arena. In 1999, the APSP helped form the African Socialist International, an organization aimed at ending worldwide black oppression by ending capitalism. (This organization was still active as of 2008.)

It was not until after the Uhuru movement moved its headquarters back to Saint Petersburg in the early 1990s that the APSP's armed self-defense philosophy gained national attention. After two Saint Petersburg police officers were acquitted of murder charges for the 1996 killing of 18-year-old Tyron Lewis, members and supporters of the APSP forced police out of local black neighborhoods, which sparked what have been said to be the largest, most violent rebellions in the city's history. Although the police patrolled the black neighborhoods again, many claimed that the disturbances unified the black community.

Like other radical Black Power organizations (such as the Black Panther Party and the Revolutionary Action Movement), the APSP became a routine target of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the police. Many members were harassed, and the APSP headquarters was even raided by police. Yeshitela himself was jailed numerous times. The movement, however, withstood the persecution of federal and local authorities, although divisions among the APSP leadership grew (as in many other black revolutionary organizations) in the late 1990s, stifling the movement's momentum. While it is clear that many, if not most, of the Uhuru movement's objectives were never reached, the APSP and its goals have been credited with the successful decades-long effect of raising social consciousness.

SEE ALSO: Black Nationalism, 19th and 20th Centuries; Black Panthers; Civil Rights, United States, Black Power and Backlash, 1965–1978; Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940) and Garveyism; King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC); League of Revolutionary Black Workers; Malcolm X (1925–1965); Revolutionary Action Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Ahmad, M. & Stanford, M. (2007) We Will Return in the Whirlwind: Black Radical Organizations, 1965–1975. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr.
- English, J. (2008) Black Power Still Lives: The Uhuru Movement in Saint Petersburg, Florida (1972–2001). Master's thesis, Florida Agricultural and Mechanical University. Available at www.uflib.ufl.edu/ufdc/?c=fhpc&m=hd1&i=52105 (downloaded July 10, 2008).

Ujamaa villages

Ayokunle Olumuyiwa Omobowale

At the outset, Ujamaa socialism was viewed as a new development model divergent from established capitalist economies in Africa and throughout the world. Largely dissociated from the dominant Soviet and Chinese brands of socialism, emphasizing Marxist ideology, Tanzania held out Ujamaa (community/socialist) villages as a solution to poverty and advanced the new development model for poor countries in Africa and the global South.

The foundation of Ujamaa socialism is based on the opinions, ideas, and writing of Julius Nyerere, Tanzania's first president, who led the country from independence in 1961 to his retirement from public life in 1985. Whereas the thoughts that produced Ujamaa socialism are contained in a 1962 publication entitled Ujamaa: The Basis of African Socialism, the program was implemented in 1967 through the Arusha Declaration.

The Ujamaa: African Socialism

Tanzania's President Nyerere ascended the leadership of his country in 1961, with a personal commitment to the development and improvement of the lives of his people. Starting with political reforms, culminating in remaking Tanzania into a one-party state in 1965, Nyerere went ahead in applying development/socioeconomic reforms to reposition Tanzania as a distinctly African socialist country, a brand of socialism termed Ujamaa. The kernel of Ujamaa socialism did not derive from the orthodox Marxian-socialist perspective. It was based on sociocultural values in synchrony with African ways of life. The emphasis of Ujamaa was equality, freedom, cooperation, and self-reliance. In rural areas, Ujamaa, the peasant village model Nyerere championed, was rooted in a collective and communal production and cooperation for the benefit of all those in society rather than individual needs. Through Ujamaa socialism, the entire community marshals collective resources and skills to the benefit of the entire society. Nyerere considered Ujamaa as an alternative to development based on external capital investment, foreign aid, and modern technology, which failed to develop society or improve the lives of most Tanzanians. Rather, foreign development produced an unequal society led by a few political elites that impoverished the vast majority.

In order to ensure equality within the framework of the Ujamaa, the government of Tanzania nationalized foreign companies and limited the number of properties government officials could own. Nyerere was convinced that Ujamaa could only succeed through equitable distribution of productive resources, and the forces of production must be in public hands. The educational system was redesigned for retraining the mind toward the ideal of Ujamaa.

Ujamaa was directed to the development of rural areas that were profoundly impoverished through reorganizing scattered communities into Ujamaa villages, whose residents were expected to cooperate and jointly engage in the production and distribution processes. Also, the villages were to be organized without compulsion, with villagers given free latitude to decide the forms of cooperation, governance, production, and distribution they preferred for development purposes. The Ujamaa village model was not to be imposed on communities.

From 1968 when villagization for actualization of Ujamaa socialism commenced to 1975, as many as 7,000 villages were reorganized on the basis of the Ujamaa system, though in many cases not with the full support of the community. Rather, officials who had the responsibility of ensuring the implementation of the Ujamaa provision frequently resorted to coercion in the fulfillment of their duties.

Challenges to Ujamaa Socialism

Inasmuch as the Ujamaa came out as a novel and seemingly celebrated phenomenon, the program faced significant challenges from the outset. Indeed, the program was designed as a policy that would be carried out without compulsion and emphasized freedom. However, the bureaucrats given the responsibility to ensure the implementation of Ujamaa resorted to the use of coercive measures, including imprisonment and payment of fines to ensure forceful villagization and Ujamaa living and production among peasants. The result of the often compulsory system pushed unenthusiastic peasants into villages. Peasants frequently viewed the Ujamaa system as imposed by government officials who dictated to villagers how they should live, produce, and cooperate. A significant impediment to the functioning of the system was the 1970s drought that produced food shortages and a financial crisis that signaled an end to self-reliance, forcing dependence on international assistance.

As a consequence of the drought and financial crisis, Tanzania's dependence on international funds and foreign financial inflow from western countries expanded dramatically by 1978 to US $800 million. In addition, by the mid-1970s, about 5,000 expatriates were deployed from foreign nations under diverse aid programs, diluting the principles of self-reliance. Foreign aid to Tanzania was often conditioned on the withdrawal of the state from economic activities and decontrol of fiscal policies. The rise in private business commercial activity in the 1970s displaced the public sector and dramatically increased inequality as well as ending the notion of social responsibility rooted in the community. In impoverished rural areas, Ujamaa villages were viewed as a means of developing society, but the program failed due to lack of resources, mismanagement, bureaucracy, drought, and the urgent necessity for success.

SEE ALSO: Charismatic Leadership and Revolution; International Socialism: Mass Politics; Nyerere, Julius (1922–1999); Tanzania, Protest and Independence

References and Suggested Readings

- Blommaert, J. (1997) Intellectuals and Ideological Leadership in Ujamaa Tanzania. African Languages and Cultures 10 (2): 129–44.
- Linton, N. (1968) Nyerere's Road to Socialism. Canadian Journal of African Studies 2 (1): 1–6.

- Mohiddin, A. (1968) Ujamaa: A Commentary on President Nyerere's Vision of Tanzanian Society. African Affairs 67 (267): 130–43.
- Pratt, C. (1999) Julius Nyerere: Reflections on the Legacy of His Socialism. Canadian Journal of African Studies 33 (1): 137–52.
- Samoff, J. (1981) Crises and Socialism in Tanzania. Journal of Modern African Studies 19 (2): 279–306.
- Schneider, L. (2004) Freedom and Unfreedom in Rural Development: Julius Nyerere, Ujamaa Vijijini and Villagization. Canadian Journal of African Studies 38 (2): 344–92.

Ukraine Orange Revolution, 2004–2005

Abel Polese

Ukrainians responded to corruption and electoral fraud in the second round of the 2004 presidential elections with massive protests. Thousands of hardcore activists occupied the center of Kiev, where they set up residence in tents and organized sit-ins, strikes, and various forms of non-violent protest to demand a revote in the run-off between opposition candidate Viktor Yushchenko and the ordained successor of outgoing President Kuchma, Viktor Yanukovych. International reports of fraud and widespread public perception of intimidation and abuse by the authorities in favor of the government's candidate resulted in an enormous outpouring of support for Yushchenko and democratic change. Hundreds of thousands of citizens filled the capital, with the number of demonstrators reaching as many as 1 million on November 27, 2004. Mass strikes and rallies took place around the country. As a result of the protests the election results were voided and a revote was ordered by the Ukraine Supreme Court at the end of December. Yushchenko won 52 percent of the vote in the new election to become the third president of the Ukraine.

These events were designated the Orange Revolution because orange, the color Yushchenko had chosen for his campaign, came to symbolize discontent with the Kuchma regime. Opposition supporters wore orange scarves and ribbons, while supporters of the president-backed candidate, Yanukovych, wore blue. Civic organization were a major force behind the Orange Revolution; the NGO PORA ("It's time"), in particular, is regarded as the primary coordinator of the protests. PORA successfully managed the tent city (palatochnyi gorodok/nametove mistechko) where thousands of protestors lived in the center of Kiev. It further coordinated the flow of resources and information between the capital and the rest of the country, and maintained a non-violent ethos, employing strategies of resistance suggested by Gene Sharp. The Orange Revolution is one of several organized protests in former communist countries at the beginning of the twenty-first century that have come to be known as “colored revolutions”. These revolutions share a non-violent strategy, color imagery, and the pursuit of democratic change in entrenched authoritarian regimes.

One hundred thousand Ukrainians braved freezing temperatures and snow to mark the first anniversary of Ukraine's Orange Revolution. Former Prime Minister Yulia Tymoshenko (center) is carried by supporters during a huge rally in Independence Square. Tymoshenko is considered a hero for her role in the revolution, which succeeded in establishing a democratic reelection for the presidency after the initial election was marred by massive fraud, corruption, and intimidation. (© Aleksandr Prokopenko/epa/CORBIS)

In 1991 Ukraine became a sovereign and independent republic with a multi-party system and a legal opposition. Despite a ban on the Communist Party in 1991 – waived in 1993 – no lustration was carried out and the communist elites continued to have a major role in the country. Consolidation of a political opposition, however, does not mean that authoritarian rule is wiped out, and most of the power remained in the hands of the president – Leonid Kravchuk (1991–4) and successor Leonid Kuchma (1994–2004) – who often manipulated the media and consolidated the role of oligarchic clans in politics.

In 2000 journalist Hrihory Gongadze was murdered while investigating corruption in President Kuchma's entourage. On the basis of audio tapes that implicated Kuchma in the crime, socialist leader Oleksandr Moroz accused the president of Gongadze's murder and a political crisis ensued. The opposition gained momentum and civil society was prompted into action: after a decade of silence thousands of protesters gathered in Kiev in 2000, and again in 2001 and 2002 to protest the president, whose popularity was in steep decline.

The 2002 parliamentary elections resulted in the first victory for a non-communist party. The electoral bloc Nasha Ukraina headed by Viktor Yushchenko – former head of the national bank and prime minister 1999–2001 – became the lead party in parliament. Yushchenko rapidly emerged as the most popular politician in the country and the favorite for the 2004 presidential elections, given Kuchma's extremely low popularity. Kuchma appointed the governor of Donetsk, Viktor Yanukovich, prime minister in 2002 with the intention of positioning him to become the next president. In the first round of the 2004 presidential elections Yushchenko won 39.9 percent of the vote and Yanukovich 39.26 percent, despite allegations that government corruption biased the results in Yanukovich's favor. On November 21, 2004 Yanukovich won the run-off elections by a margin of less than 3 percent. Motivated by accusations of electoral fraud, the next day protestors in unprecedented numbers came from all over Ukraine to occupy the center of Kiev, refusing to acknowledge the official results of the elections.

Prior to August 2004 there were two organizations named PORA. They operated in the same milieu and held similar goals until they formally joined forces at a conference in August 2004. The organization distinguished as Yellow PORA because of the color chosen for its campaign was conceived in December 2003, and headed by Vlad Kaskiv. It was established to monitor the results of the 2004 elections, and its official campaign began in March 2004, when the website www.pora.org.ua was launched. The organization later developed into a political party that ran candidates in the 2006 elections. The other group, known as Black PORA for printing its literature in black and white, was involved in the 2000 movement “Ukraine without Kuchma” in response to Gongadze's murder, and had participated in various protest movements since that time. Black PORA began its 2004 campaign in February by hanging posters asking “What is Kuchmism?” in the main cities of Ukraine. The posters directed viewers to a website where “Kuchmism” was described as authoritarian rule, corruption, lack of liberty, and lack of economic prosperity – all of which were attributable to President Kuchma and his corrupt collaborators. This group developed into a new NGO, Opora, after Yushchenko’s election.

Just as the Orange Revolution is related to the color revolutions movement, it is possible to consider PORA as one of the “color organizations” that were behind the massive mobilization of people in recent years. The protest movements in the former communist bloc since 2000 have in common the adoption of Gene Sharp’s ideology and formation of a strategy based on his non-violent action methods. Additionally, they all employ a short easy-to-remember name, use humor and satire to discredit the regime, and massive distribution of gadgets, posters, strips, badges, and flags, all of a bright color to better attract public awareness. PORA had well-established ties with the organizations that facilitated these similar movements. It was connected to the OK in Slovakia that was instrumental in marginalizing Prime Minister Mečiar in the 1998 elections; to the Serbian organization Otpor, which played a major role in demanding the dismissal of President Slobodan Milošević; and the organization Kmara which aided the opposition in demanding the resignation of Georgian president Edvard Shevarnadze in December 2003.

Activists from these various organizations were networked within the NGO milieu and the political opposition of several Eastern European countries. They shared their experience, technology, and forces to train the Ukrainian opposition in anticipation of an occasion for mass uprising. The 2004 elections provided the perfect conditions for a society-wide challenge to the status quo: a weakened president, a compact opposition agreeing to put aside ideological differences and support a single candidate, a popular opposition candidate, well-trained social activists, and a receptive and active population that exceeded the most optimistic expectations.

The strategy followed in the Orange Revolution resembled that of the other colored revolutions. Two civic campaigns, one positive the other negative, raised citizen awareness of the issues. The positive campaign aimed to maximize voter turnout, while the negative campaign sought to discredit the regime by exposing its corrupt practices. These goals were achieved by holding meetings, setting up an information hotline, and opening new channels for communication. This twofold approach raised civic and political activism in Ukraine to unprecedented levels, galvanizing hundreds of thousands of people.

To give legitimacy to the protests and foster people’s anger against the regime, a parallel vote counting was arranged for the second round election. The results of the independent vote provided legal evidence to support the protesters’ declaration that the election was invalid. Once people occupied the capital, protests were organized peacefully but tenaciously, with the explicit message “we will not go away until we get what we want.” A huge stage was set up in Maidan nezaleshnosti (Independence Square) for artistic performances and political announcements that maintained high spirits among the gathered crowd – many of whom spent day and night in the street with sub-zero temperatures. Mass strikes around the country combined with city rallies of overwhelming numbers prevented repression by the authorities. As in the “Ukraine without Kuchma” movements, evidence of popular support for President Yushchenko drew international attention to the protests and prompted the EU, led by Poland and Latvia, to take part in the negotiation process.

A striking feature of the protests was the massive use of the Internet to circulate information. The Internet was an effective vehicle for activists in the face of state monopolization of traditional media in Ukraine. Only one TV channel, 5 kanal, was a source of unbiased information and it was unable to broadcast over the whole Ukrainian territory. Independent news sources moved from print to the web to avoid government pressure. The Internet was a primary means of communication and its importance grew throughout the protests. Portals like www.maidan.org.ua, where live updates from Kiev were available, inspired hundreds of new websites.

One of the main innovations of the Orange Revolution in Ukraine relative to previous protest movements was the introduction of humor to circulate the message. Members of the regime were ridiculed through computer games, cartoons, songs, and re-synchronized films. In one example, when presidential candidate Viktor Yanukovich was knocked out by an egg thrown by a student in Ivano Frankivsk (Western Ukraine) a satirical website “veseli yaytsya” (merry eggs) was created and the “egg” became a leitmotif of the movement on the web. Thousands of employees spending their workdays in front of a PC had the opportunity to liquidate Viktor Yanukovich and his bodyguards by throwing eggs at them, or watch parts of soviet classic films transformed into parodies of political meetings between Yanukovich and his Cabinet of Ministers. Webpostings of old Soviet songs reinterpreted to comment on the current political situation in Ukrainian also entertained people and raised their awareness of the authoritarian character of Kuchma’s regime.

Finally, unity was a decisive element of the protests. Feeling themselves to be part of an immense engine gave the protestors the motivation to withstand the freezing cold and continue striking. Wearing orange or possessing orange gadgets became an expression of this solidarity.

The Orange Revolution brought about significant political, institutional, and social change. The second round of the presidential elections was repeated, and Viktor Yushchenko was elected president of Ukraine on December 26, 2004 with 51.99 percent of votes against 44.2 percent for Yanukovich. Although they committed some major political mistakes, Yushchenko and his team began a number of democratizing reforms: presidential dominance in politics was curtailed, and measures to address corruption and establish a free media were put in place. Political activism increased throughout the country; Black PORA developed into a civic NGO, while Yellow PORA founded a political party that would prompt a new generation of Ukrainians to enter politics. However, it did not win any seats at the 2006 elections.

At an institutional level the main consequence of November 2004 was the transformation of Ukraine from a presidential system into a parliamentary republic. Additionally, changes in electoral law to support the institutionalization of political parties and increase representation by requiring candidates to be nominated by a political party were introduced in 2006.

Perhaps the most striking change in Ukraine, however, is evident at the social level. Ukrainians showed an unprecedented interest in politics during the presidential campaign and participated collectively in the political events of their country, whether their support had been for the existing regime or for the opposition. Despite the enormous pressure on media and individual activists, Ukrainians lost their fear of the authorities and learned to express their opinions, overcoming the self-censorship that plagues many post-Soviet societies. Furthermore, the collective nature of the protests increased the civic consciousness of Ukrainians and as a result self-conscious civic engagement and civic initiatives significantly increased after November 2004. Finally, Ukrainian unity as a civic nation was boosted despite the persistence of regional polarization in the country. The citizens of Ukraine in 2004 were for or against the protests, but the quasi-totality of them were for Ukraine – a significant achievement in a country where according to the 2001 census Russians account for 17.3 percent of the population.

SEE ALSO: Color Revolutions; Non-Violent Revolutions; Serbian Revolution of October 2000; Sharp, Gene (b. 1928); Soviet Union, Fall of; Tulip Revolution, Kyrgyzstan

References and Suggested Readings

- Aslund, A. & McFaul, M. (Eds.) (2006) Revolution in Orange: The Origins of Ukraine’s Democratic Breakthrough. Washington, DC: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.
- Kuzio, T. (2009) Democratic Revolution in Ukraine: From Kuchmagate to Orange Revolution. New York: Routledge.
- Wilson, A. (2005) Ukraine’s Orange Revolution. New Haven: Yale University Press.

UNAM Strike, 2000, and Mexican student movement

Leticia Pacheco Espejel

The student movement of the National Autonomous University of Mexico (UNAM) from 1999 and 2000 was sparked when university rector Francisco Barnés de Castro announced various reforms that included increasing tuition fees from US$25 to about US$150 and the elimination of the pase automatico, which had allowed aspirants to enter the university automatically after completing preparatory exams for the College of Science and Humanities (Colegios de Ciencias y Humanidades) (CCH) without additional entrance examinations.

In March 1999 students organized a general university consultation at the University Students Assembly (AEU) about students' opinions concerning the imposed reforms: 90 percent of the students rejected the reforms. The students took two decisions. One was the transformation of the AEU into a General Strike Council (Consejo General de Huelga) (CGH) and the second was to establish an indefinite cessation of the university's laboratories. The strike began on April 20 with the following demands: abolition of the general regulation of payment; an end to repression (intimidation by the federal police and by the so-called porros – a group of thugs); the restoration of lost class hours; an open discussion about the future of the UNAM.

The CGH was ignored as interlocutor by Rector Barnés de Castro and he declared the students' strike illegal. The months between April and November witnessed numerous protest activities and the students organized various marches. Other universities, independent syndicates, parents, and intellectuals throughout the country protested in solidarity with them. At the same time, opponents of the strike organized a continuation of university lectures off-campus (clases extramuros) which made dialogue impossible. Strikers continued to be intimidated. The authorities tried to break the strike with violence and the escalation of this conflict caused students and professors to call for the resignation of Barnés de Castro. On November 13, 1999 Barnés de Castro resigned, which was a huge triumph for the students' movement. Students demanded that the new rector, Juan Ramón de la Fuente, accept the CGH as an intermediary and liberate detained students. The new rector stated publicly that dialogue could only take place if all installations of the university were handed back to the authorities without any preconditions.

In January 2000 the CGH was split when the strikers of CCH-Naucalpan handed over installations without consulting the CGH. At the same time, Juan Ramón de la Fuente called for the Federal Preventive Police (PFP) on the pretext that they should observe the handover of installations to UNAM. University authorities declared the termination of the strike whereas the CGH kept on insisting on the continuation of dialogue. In February 2000 the PFP violently entered the installations of UNAM and arrested 1,000 students. About 400 were convicted and imprisoned. The declarations of the detained students demonstrated innumerable violations of their human rights. The decision to bring the PFP to the campus was made by the Executive with President Ernesto Zedillo.

SEE ALSO: Oaxaca Uprising, 2006; Student Movements; Student Movements, Global South; Student Movements, Korea; Tlatelolco 1968 and the Mexican Student Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Aranda, S. J. M. (2001) Un movimiento estudiantil contra el neoliberalismo: UNAM 1999–2000. México: Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México.
- Preston, J. & Dillon, S. (2005) Opening Mexico: The Making of a Democracy. New York: Farrar Straus & Giroux.

Unemployed protests

Alex Zukas

It is impossible to comprehend fully the course and long-range impact of the Great Depression in the major capitalist countries of the world (Great Britain, France, Germany, and the United States) without first understanding the mass protests of unemployed workers in the 1930s. Their protests form an indispensable element of the histories of class struggle, the working class, and modern notions of citizenship and the welfare state. They also form an indispensable background to the German elites' invitation to the Nazis to join them in the halls of power, with all of its terrible consequences.

While most histories of the Great Depression assume that the majority of the unemployed passively accepted their fate, and there is evidence to support this view, the repeated mass protests of many of the jobless were central to the short-term and immediate alleviation of their suffering as well as the medium-term development of the labor movement and the long-term expansion of the welfare state. Movements of the unemployed in the 1930s asserted the rights of the unemployed as citizens to certain levels of support when they were out of paid employment, and in so doing renegotiated boundaries of social acceptability. The cry heard at almost every unemployed demonstration in the major capitalist countries was a version of "work or full maintenance." That slogan unsettled old associations between relief payments and malingering, feckless, undeserving paupers who shirked work. The goal was to remove the stigma attached to applying for relief (“a handout”) during an era of mass unemployment, when the idea that poverty was an individual and moral failing rather than a result of systemic economic failure was hard to uphold. As part of a larger cultural shift, workers began viewing unemployment relief as a right and a matter of public discussion, not a discretionary fund of government bodies, and in the process developed an expansive conception of citizens’ rights. This discussion focuses on Britain, France, Germany, and the US because they were the world’s leading capitalist industrial nations and they led the world in recorded unemployment: some 10.5 million of the world’s estimated 30 million unemployed in 1932 lived in continental Europe (with Germany alone having six million registered unemployed) while about 15 million unemployed lived in the US.

Background

When Wall Street crashed in October 1929 and initiated the Great Depression, few nations had unemployment insurance for workers. Most industrialized countries experienced a boom in the 1920s and industrial unemployment before World War I was slight. Under these circumstances, it was commonly believed in prewar Europe and the United States that anyone who really wanted a job could find one. In Germany, for instance, average unemployment in the decade before 1914 was 2.6 percent. The situation in the US, France, and Britain was similar. After World War I, these industrial countries took separate paths. In Britain unemployment was chronic and never went below one million persons at any time between 1920 and 1929, averaging above 8 percent for that period. In Germany unemployment averaged 4.2 percent from 1919 to 1923 and 13.7 percent from 1924 to 1929.

The US and France experienced some unemployment during postwar demobilization but, unlike Britain and Germany, the US and France had no problem of continuous mass unemployment in the 1920s. In fact, the 1920s was a period of labor shortage in France despite three acute recessions. Partly because of very strong labor movements and partly because of rising labor unrest which fed elite fears of working-class insurrection as postwar revolutions swept Europe, the German and British governments established emergency relief as a step toward general unemployment insurance. On November 13, 1918, at the start of the German Revolution, the German state instituted a nationwide emergency relief system to be administered by municipalities, while the British state not only distributed emergency relief to demobilizing soldiers, some of it administered by the local Poor Law Guardians, but in 1920 it greatly expanded the very limited national compulsory unemployment insurance plan of 1911.

Under trade union pressure in the face of chronic unemployment, a similar compulsory unemployment insurance system, financed by contributions of employees and employers, finally came to Germany in 1927. France followed the Ghent system, a form of non-contributory, voluntary, departmental or communal (i.e., local government) unemployment funds subsidized by the central government. Coverage was slight and did little to help the jobless. At the start of the Depression only 10 percent of the French working class were in a union and only 4 percent had collective bargaining agreements. The balance of class power did not support improvements to the unemployment relief system in France.

Similarly, due to the relative weakness of the labor movement in the US, and the hostility of American business to the British model of unemployment insurance as an unnecessary intrusion and a socialist menace, there was no national unemployment insurance or relief system and the jobless had to turn to municipal relief (administered punitively much like the Poor Law in Britain, to discourage vagrancy) or private charities for support. In addition, conservative labor leaders like Samuel Gompers (1850–1924) of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) contemptuously believed that unemployment insurance was a “dole.” As a consequence, provision for unemployed workers in the US before 1933 remained local, inadequate, and punitive.

Germany’s highly developed unemployment insurance system with relatively good levels of support was introduced just two years before the Depression started but it was never meant to provide long-term benefits: it provided 35 percent of weekly average earnings for 26 weeks. After that, the unemployed had to apply for crisis relief or means-tested municipal relief. Since German unemployment insurance was the most generous of its day, one can easily grasp how the loss of a job during the Depression, even when new employment could be found, usually meant a future of economic hardship, deskilling, and insecurity, while long periods of unemployment led to complete impoverishment. The often humiliating experience of qualifying for relief was coupled with the discouraging and increasingly useless search for work in key sectors of the economy.

In all of the industrialized countries, unemployment was concentrated in staple industries (coal, iron, steel, and shipbuilding), large cities, rural mining communities, textile centers, and port cities. In the US the heartland of unemployment stretched in a large crescent from Boston in the northeast to Milwaukee and Minneapolis in the west through Pittsburgh, West Virginia, and Chicago. Almost all major ports also experienced high levels of unemployment.

In Germany unemployment was concentrated in industrial and port towns like Rostock, Hamburg, Bremen, Cologne, and Düsseldorf, but also in major industrial districts like the Ruhr and the Rhineland in the west, Saxony Thuringia in central Germany, Greater Berlin, and most large German cities. Likewise, the major industrial regions of France had the greatest unemployment (17 out of 61 departments contained nine-tenths of all unemployed workers in France). They were the Paris basin, Nord, Pas-de-Calais, Lorraine, Lyons-St. Etienne (Rhône), Loire-Inférieure (Saint-Nazaire, Nantes), and Seine-Inférieure (Rouen, Le Havre). French industry was fairly dispersed compared to other industrialized nations but it formed a crescent through the northern and eastern parts of the country. In Britain, deep recession in coal, iron, steel, shipbuilding, and textiles concentrated unemployment in Scotland, South Wales, northeast England, Coventry, and Lancashire.

A major hurdle in comparing the impact of the Great Depression across national boundaries involved the way governments of different nations gathered official unemployment data. In France the government used data collected by trade unions and unemployment exchanges, while in Germany and Britain the numbers came from people applying for compulsory unemployment insurance benefits. As a result, the reliability and scope of the numbers varied, preventing sound comparisons and, in addition, the statistics did not address the problem of "hidden unemployment," those workers who wanted work but were discouraged from registering at labor exchanges or who were no longer eligible for benefits and so stopped reporting at unemployment offices. In Germany (as in Britain), domestic help and farm laborers were excluded from unemployment insurance; estimates of hidden unemployment in Germany ran between 20 and 40 percent of statistically visible unemployment, or roughly two million additional people, in 1932.

Nevertheless, keeping these caveats in mind, some general trends stand out in the historical scholarship on the Great Depression. The economic crisis of the Great Depression was more acute in the US than in Britain and Germany and it was more chronic in Britain than elsewhere. Between 1929 and 1932 industrial production fell in Britain by 9.3 percent, in Germany by 11.6 percent, and in the US by a massive 44.8 percent. Statistics give some picture of the scale of the economic crisis in the US: from 1929 to 1932 employment fell from 14.3 million to 8.8 million in agriculture, mining, manufacturing, and building. Most estimates of the level of unemployment in the US are less reliable than employment or production statistics until 1935 when the Social Security Act allowed better data gathering on unemployment. Estimates of unemployment in the US ranged from 13 to 18 million by late 1932 or early 1933, with perhaps one-third of the labor force out of work by 1933. Germany had six million officially unemployed workers at the height of the Depression, February–March 1932, or over 30 percent of its workforce. In the peak year of 1932 British unemployment reached 3.4 million (17 percent of its workforce). The Depression arrived later in France, in 1931, and unemployment appeared to peak in 1936.

National averages hid important regional variations. In November 1934, unemployment in Britain stood at 17 percent but it was 35 percent in the so-called "Distressed Areas" (i.e., Scotland, South Wales, northeast England, and Lancashire). Long-term unemployment was a major problem in all of these areas. In France, Paris's industrial suburbs suffered tremendous unemployment as did Nord and Pas-de-Calais, the Seine estuary (Rouen), Lorraine, the Rhône and Loire regions, and seaports like Nantes and Saint-Nazaire. In Germany, the Ruhr had around a 40 percent unemployment rate, and it was over 50 percent in mining; Saxony and Thuringia neared 40 percent while Greater Berlin was not far behind. In the US, the northeast (New England, New York, Pennsylvania) and the midwest (Ohio through Minnesota) were hardest hit, as were mining areas in West Virginia and textile towns in North Carolina. Not surprisingly, it was these areas that would spawn the most powerful and sustained unemployed protests during the Great Depression.

Any change to government support was one of the main spurs to unemployed action since those changes would worsen an already dire standard of living. Faced with rising deficits, governments usually reduced expenditure on unemployment by administrative measures that disqualified individuals or cut their benefits. The two main administrative measures that disqualified individuals were the means test and the "genuinely-seeking-work" test. The means test became a much-hated symbol of the coarse treatment of the unemployed by authorities in the 1930s because it assessed household income and resources such as savings, furniture, and parental or youth employment. It involved an assessor coming to one's home, poking into every corner, and tallying up a family's meager resources, usually on a monthly basis, to make sure the household qualified for welfare. The genuinely-seeking-work test involved the jobless reporting to a labor exchange for work even when the likelihood of a job being posted was slim or non-existent. In addition, governments faced with rising deficits simply cut overall benefits.

In July 1930 the new chancellor of a minority government, Heinrich Brüning (1885–1970), had the president of Germany sign emergency decrees that reduced insurance benefits and raised contributions to 6.5 percent of wages. Subsequent decrees in June 1931 and June 1932 cut benefits for unemployment insurance and relief even further. While still substantial, given the paltry sums dispensed by unemployment support of all kinds, the British unemployed suffered less severe cuts to their living standards. Both Germany and Britain introduced means tests in the early 1930s but Brüning's decrees reduced benefit by 40 percent whereas British cuts under the National Government after October 1931 reduced benefit by 10 percent.

While mortality (death) rates did not increase much during the Great Depression in the US, France, Britain, or Germany, morbidity (disease) rates did. The most common diseases were tuberculosis, rickets, and catarrh in adolescents and adults, rickets in children, skull-softening in infants, and a decline in general immunity due to increased malnutrition, especially among children. Part of the explanation for the rise in morbidity concerned the worsening provision for the jobless. To take Germany, which had the best levels of support in 1929, 52 percent of jobless workers were drawing insurance benefits, 17 percent municipal relief, 17 percent national emergency relief, and 14 percent no relief in January 1931.

By the end of 1931, only 11 percent received insurance payments and the remainder subsisted on very meager means-tested emergency or municipal relief or drew no relief at all. By all contemporary reports from the US, Britain, Germany, and France, as the Depression deepened after 1929 the unemployed experienced their enforced idleness as an affront to their personal dignity, a threat to their family's cohesion, a risk to their and their loved ones' health, and an inducement to crime, migration, and/or suicide. When the unemployed had had enough, when conditions were right, they took to the streets to make their voices and concerns heard.

Protests

There was no simple formula that turned increasing unemployment into radical protest. The American and European unemployed moved between despair and anger, apathy and action, quiescence and insurrection, and there are many clues that help clarify the dialectic of unemployed protest. The ideological foundation of unemployed protests was that the unemployed suffered from a predicament that was not of their own making. They did not control the business cycle and they were involuntarily idle. In many respects, unemployed protest and the demand for adequate government support were a call for recognition and respect. In addition, protest offered collective endeavors to unemployed workers for whom suicide was both a temptation and a far too common option given that long-term unemployment could result in feelings of insecurity, worthlessness, inferiority, and anxiety, leading to social isolation and withdrawal.

The year 1932, that of greatest unemployment, was also the peak year for suicides across Europe and the US. While many unemployed protests were spontaneous affairs in late 1929 and early 1930 in the US and Europe, they soon became a chief activity of unemployed organizations, called “unemployed councils” in Britain, France, and the US and “unemployed committees” in Germany. Communists figured prominently in the majority of these organizations although socialists in Britain, France, and the US and anarchists in France also created unemployed organizations, usually in response to already existing communist councils.

One reason why communists were so prominent in unemployed organizations had to do with the fact that with the onset of the Depression the Communist International (Comintern) exhorted communists throughout the world to build unemployed movements as part of its Third Period strategy of “class against class.” In 1928 the Comintern had concluded that the capitalist world was entering a Third Period of crisis characterized by ascending revolutionary class struggles that would overthrow capitalism. These predictions coincided with the beginnings of worldwide depression and the elemental anger of those thrown out of work, but the prospects for building an unemployed protest movement varied greatly: for instance, not only did the Depression come earlier and harder to Germany than it did to Britain or France, but the German Communist Party (KPD) with 350,000 members at the end of 1932 was the only mass Communist Party in the industrial capitalist world. Other parties were tiny in comparison: the Communist Party of Great Britain (CPGB) could claim around 6,000 members, the Communist Party of the United States (CPUSA) around 26,000, and the Communist Party of France (PCF) around 30,000.

Unemployed organizations were generally not spontaneous creations in any of these countries but were formed through tireless and often frustrating activism in the Third Period (1928–1934). The unemployed were notoriously difficult to organize and to keep organized due to the poverty, despair, and transitory nature of unemployment. Finding even a temporary or part-time job would cause workers to leave the movement and interrupt organizing.

A few factors helped organizers: mass unemployment was concentrated in certain regions; in many of these regions socialist or communist parties and unions had a strong presence; as a result, many unemployed had a background of party or trade union radicalism and activism, especially in mining, metallurgy, engineering, and longshoring, and could help the movement; finally, party and union resources could provide material support to unemployed organizations whose members paid minimal dues or none at all. If concentration of unemployed workers was a necessary precondition to protest, systems of relief, changes in qualifications or relief payments, community cohesion, and strong leadership could help activists transcend difficulties in organizing the unemployed. Close relationship with another working-class organization, a party or union, was essential to the success of unemployed movements. Political militants also seem essential to the development of unemployed movements. In the US, for instance, activists from the Socialist Party, the Industrial Workers of the World, the Trotskyist Socialist Workers’ Party, and the Marxist Musteites organized unemployed either in opposition to communist activists or where communists were not present in large numbers. Unlike in the US, in France, Britain, and Germany, rival organizations of non-communist activists were very short-lived. In all cases, where activists were not present, unemployed movements never got off the ground.

The strength of unemployed protests, organized and led mainly by communists, varied from country to country, partly because the scale, severity, and persistence of joblessness varied considerably, as did the psychological dimension of unemployment, the social welfare net, the strength of trade unions and working-class parties, the changing tactics of activists, and the response of authorities. It should be said that non-communist reformist working-class parties and unions in Britain, France, Germany, and the US were at best indifferent and usually hostile to the prospect of unemployed protest (Welsh unions were the major exception), while the mainstream capitalist press in all these countries was unremittingly hostile. Unemployed councils and committees in these countries organized demonstrations, hunger marches, relief work strikes, school student strikes, occupations of city halls, and other forms of collective action and public protest.

The National Unemployed Workers’ Movement (NUWM) in Britain was the most cohesive, successful, and long-lasting unemployed workers’ organization of the period, thanks to communist activists Walter Hannington (1896–1966) and Harry McShane (1891–1988), who showed a great deal of independence from CPGB directives. Headquartered in London, the NUWM took an activist approach to unemployed problems and always stressed that if the unemployed organized themselves and acted they could improve their lot and not be passive victims of fate. Founded in 1921 and finally disbanded in 1946, it organized successful national hunger marches in 1922, 1929, 1930, 1932, 1934, and 1936 (almost all of which began in Scotland and ended in London), but its activities, like those of all unemployed movements, were wider than that: it led numerous local protests against relief cuts, physically prevented evictions, won rent reductions, played a role in preventing strike-breaking, and advised and represented the unemployed in appeals tribunals. It participated in over 2,000 individual appeals to rescind cuts and was successful in about a third of the cases.

While unemployed organizations in France, Germany, and the US advised the unemployed of their rights, they were never granted the legal right of representation that the NUWM won in Britain as a "union of the unemployed." Major unemployed protests and hunger marches occurred in Britain between 1931 and 1936, especially in the Distressed Areas, usually in response to government cuts in benefits, application of means tests, and changes in eligibility. Local authorities who administered relief were very susceptible to mass pressure at city hall. For instance, locally run Public Assistance Committees (PACs) faced fierce local opposition to the means test and benefit cuts in late 1932. While large demonstrations rocked Rochdale, Glasgow, and Bristol in the spring of 1932, unemployed uprisings occurred in Dundee, Newcastle, Liverpool, Birkenhead, and Belfast in the fall of 1932 and gained significant concessions from the city councils to raise relief scales, give more money for public works, and soften the means test.

Thanks to its well integrated nationwide network, the NUWM also had success pressuring national governments to alter policy, something few other unemployed movements achieved. The high point of unemployed protests in Britain occurred in response to the Unemployment Assistance Board's (UAB) attempt in January 1935 to implement new scales which lowered unemployed payments. The size and fury of unemployed protests (for example, 300,000 people demonstrated across South Wales on February 3) led to the Standstill Act of February 1935 which allowed payment at UAB or PAC scales, whichever was greater. Unemployed militancy may have contributed to the Labour Party's and the CPGB's partial recovery at the polls in the 1935 election but it did not prevent huge defeats in 1931. The campaign against the UAB was the high point of unemployed activity in Britain and extracted a major policy reversal by militant means. The fall of 1936 saw the last significant phase of unemployed protest in Britain and once again the NUWM mobilized the unemployed against the national UAB scales. With the national hunger march of October–November 1936 the NUWM achieved broad working-class unity involving left-wing national Labour Party members as well as the Welsh miners' union, the Welsh Labour Party, and the Welsh Trades Union Congress. The march ended with the customary mass demonstrations in London (250,000 people) and the government postponed introducing the new scales. They were only fully implemented nationwide in May 1938 when the NUWM was in decline. In fact, the decline in NUWM membership and activism began soon after the 1936 hunger march.

While many historians attribute this decline to difficulties in sustaining a movement based on unemployed workers because of the "natural" apathy and resignation of the unemployed, such an explanation is not persuasive. Historians have estimated that about one million people passed through the ranks of the NUWM from 1921 to 1939. As would be expected, annual membership fluctuated: the NUWM had 40,000 dues-paying members in 1932 and claimed 100,000 members in early 1933. Beyond these numbers, the NUWM was able to mobilize hundreds of thousands of protestors when the British working-class movement as a whole was at its nadir in the early years of the Depression, and succeeded in getting cuts restored and benefits increased. A more satisfactory explanation would regard the timing of the NUWM's decline as the outcome of a gradual return of economic growth to Britain due to rearmament which boosted employment, and, ironically, the result of the very success of the NUWM in gaining concessions which took some of the ragged edge off being unemployed. Back in work, NUWM activists turned their energies to rebuilding the union movement in Britain at the end of the 1930s.

Unlike Britain, one cannot speak of a coherent national unemployed movement in France. There were no national hunger marches and there was no NUWM. National direction came from the Parisian unemployed movement or the communist trade union federation, the CGTU. Because the Depression and mass unemployment struck France late, the upsurge in unemployed activity occurred in the mid-1930s, but Paris, like London, was fairly active throughout the Depression. Upsurges in unemployed protests and activism occurred from 1931 to 1932 and from 1934 to 1935. The PCF tried to launch a national unemployed movement from its Parisian stronghold in the early 1930s, and combined neighborhood protests with regional days of action and demonstrations at the Chamber of Deputies on November 12, 1931 and January 12, 1932, but the movement did not live up to the leaders' expectations.

Organizing the Parisian unemployed coincided with the first upswing in unemployment in France, much of which was concentrated in the Paris basin, and despite the sectarian hostility to the rest of the left, unemployed committees attracted numerous unemployed into their ranks and mobilized substantial numbers of protestors. The Parisian movement declined after 1932 but regional unemployed movements arose in Saint-Etienne, Rouen, Nord, Valence, Limoges, and Lyons. The most famous episode of French unemployed protest was the Lille to Paris hunger march in late 1933. The marchers had a successful entry into Paris on December 2, 1933 and inspired activists to see new possibilities and prospects of struggle. A new phase of militancy followed the Lille to Paris hunger march, with two months of turmoil in Calais starting on January 5, 1934.

The events in Calais inspired and anticipated militancy elsewhere, with widespread demonstrations, hunger marches, relief workers' strikes, and occupations of mayors' offices. In 1935, early in the Comintern's Popular Front period (1934–9), there was heightened unemployed activity with hunger marches in the Ardennes, Brittany, the Somme, and Rouen which fused with anti-fascist protests. In contrast to Britain, unemployed organization and protests greatly aided the electoral fortunes of the PCF. The period of the greatest unemployed activity (1934–1935) preceded significant electoral gains for the PCF in municipal (1935) and national (1936) elections, and party and union membership was growing as well. PCF wins in municipal elections created advantages for local unemployed movements and improved the social provision for the unemployed who resided in "red" cities. As in Britain, however, success and mild economic recovery also meant the decline of unemployed organization and protest as former unemployed activists joined the workplace struggles that swept France in great waves from 1936 to 1938. Finally, momentum died when the PCF abandoned its demand for radical action by the unemployed in support of the Popular Front government (1936–7).

The German unemployed movement fitted somewhere between the British and the French. While there were no successful national hunger marches and there was no NUWM in Germany, there was a National Committee for Unemployed Committees which oversaw regional efforts and coordinated activities through the Revolutionary Trade Union Opposition (RGO). In Germany, the unemployed movement was treated as part of a trade union movement and the RGO was quite successful in preventing unemployed workers from becoming strike-breakers.

Unlike Britain and France, the vast majority of Communist Party members (over 90 percent) were unemployed, so the movement had a highly motivated and fairly well trained cadre despite incessant turnover. The KPD also took much more seriously the "class against class" line of the Comintern and took the class struggle to the streets every chance it could. Unemployed struggle and protest had greater intensity in Germany from 1930 to 1932 largely because unemployment was a much more catastrophic experience there and the KPD was much larger than the CPGB or the PCF and constantly exhorted the unemployed to fight for their right to adequate support in the face of a capitalist economic crisis. Regional demonstrations and hunger marches where militant unemployed clashed with police were common in almost all urban areas of Germany from January 1930 to November 1932. The largest regional hunger marches and demonstrations occurred routinely in Bremen, Hamburg, Berlin, the Ruhr, the lower Rhineland, Saxony, Silesia, and most large industrial cities.

German unemployed protests tended to anticipate or follow emergency decrees that cut benefits and restricted eligibility, so May through July 1930, May through October 1931, and May through November 1932 were periods of intense mobilization and protest. Unlike in Britain or France, the harsh winters were a period of relative quiet. The RGO estimated that there were 1,500 unemployed committees with 80,000 members in the summer of 1931 and 15 newspapers with a circulation of 485,000. Given the increase in activism, the figures would likely be higher for 1932 and the unemployed committees' influence reached far beyond their members. Besides organizing jobless protests against benefit cuts and strikes by municipal relief workers, the committees engaged in anti-eviction fights and campaigns for emergency provision of coal and food. The unemployed achieved notable victories in these struggles by resisting and reversing cuts in benefits and obtaining back pay for dismissed relief workers in the Ruhr, Düsseldorf, Cologne, Offenbach, Chemnitz, Hamburg, Bremen, and Berlin. As more unemployed were pushed onto local poor relief and off national insurance as the Depression continued, the communists had far more success pressuring local authorities to accede to unemployed demands than they ever did at the national level. Unemployed activism brought the party a measure of success by late 1932: it trebled its membership and won six million votes for the national parliament (17 percent of the total vote).

Due in large part to unemployed activism, Germany faced urban civil war by the end of 1932 and the fear of the elites that anarchy and communism would soon follow induced them to offer the position of prime minister to Adolf Hitler (1889–1945) whose Storm Troopers (SA) had some support among the unemployed. The SA almost never organized protests of the unemployed against rate cuts or better support levels but instead ran a private political charity for the unemployed with soup kitchens, housing, indoctrination, and uniforms, which served to integrate some unemployed into the Nazi movement. Hitler swiftly instigated class war from above and violently suppressed all workers' organizations, including the KPD and the communist unemployed workers' movement. It was not how the KPD thought that "class against class" would end but, interestingly, the Nazis' public relief works projects were no better liked by the unemployed than those of Weimar: police reports from the mid-1930s ascertained that autobahn construction sites were hotbeds of communist sedition.

As in Europe, successful unemployed protests in the US occurred in regions with high levels of industrialization, heavy clusters of unemployment, and high concentrations of political activists with good organizing skills. In the US non-communist groups were more significant to unemployed protest than in Britain, France, or Germany but the CPUSA was nevertheless the first to organize the unemployed in 1930, mainly because other left parties had not made it a political priority. The CPUSA organized marches and formed local unemployed councils in early 1930 and organized demonstrations with thousands of participants outside city halls in the northeast and midwest, along the Pacific coast, and in larger cities in the south, for the next two years. Many were peaceful demonstrations but others ended in sharp conflict with police.

In July 1930 a national conference of Unemployed Councils held in Chicago with 1,300 delegates made demands that were national in scope, demanding emergency relief, and organizing a petition campaign for a "Workers' Unemployment Insurance Bill" (an idea the AFL only endorsed years later), and hunger marches. The petition soon gained 1.5 million signatures. The councils staged national hunger marches in December 1931 and December 1932 when unemployed workers converged on Washington, DC from across the country to make their demands to Congress and the president, but in general local relief agencies were the targets of agitation. The purely local and often arbitrary criteria for judging need generated a sense of injustice that resulted in unemployed sit-ins, pickets, and demonstrations which often brought concessions (for example, the restoration of cuts by relief agencies in Atlanta and Chicago in 1932). The actions of the unemployed certainly shaped the national mood for Franklin Roosevelt's (1882–1945) landslide electoral victory in 1932 and subsequent administration of federal emergency relief.

After 1932, communist efforts languished while the Socialist Party and the Musteites, identified with socialist Abraham Muste (1885–1967), organized the unemployed with some success. The most important non-communist organizations of the jobless were the Unemployed Leagues created by local chapters of the Socialist Party in 1931 and later. At first they emphasized self-help but as unemployment grew they adopted more militant tactics, fought evictions, and protested at relief agencies against cuts. The leagues were especially active in industrial towns in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Indiana as well as in Chicago and New York City. Musteite councils were active in Seattle, Pittsburgh, Ohio, western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and the textile towns of North Carolina, with their strongest base in Ohio and Pennsylvania.

In 1936 all three strands joined to form the Workers' Alliance of America (WAA), but, once again, success meant the slow erosion of unemployed protest and organizing. The New Deal, in the form of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, Social Security, and New Deal public works, was a response to the unemployed protests of the early 1930s for a coherent and fair system of relief. Responding to unemployed militancy, New Deal relief institutions adopted approaches reminiscent of British practices with complaint procedures and rights to representation and appeal; consequently, conflict became institutionalized, channeled and sparked less public outrage. The Works Progress Administration recognized the WAA as the legitimate representative of relief workers and negotiated with it, giving it a status much like that of the NUMW in Britain, but only with regard to relief workers. Their bitterest complaints seem to have been heard and, as a result, some unemployed activists became enthusiastic supporters of the New Deal. Perhaps mirroring the turn from the Third Period to the Popular Front, the unemployed movement in the US became less insurrectionary and mirrored trade union practices, while at the same time many unemployed activists went back to work and organized in the Congress of Industrial Organizations after 1935 and took many of the unemployed movement's tactics with them into the mines and factories.

SEE ALSO: Agitprop; Bolsheviks; Britain, Strikes, 1905–1926; Britain, Trade Union Movement; Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA); Confédération Générale du Travail and Syndicaliste Révolutionnaire; Food Riots; Hitler, Adolf (1889–1945) and German Nazism; Labor Revolutionary Currents, United States, 20th Century; Marxism; Socialism; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940); US Labor Rebellions and the Rise of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO)

References and Suggested Readings

Bagguley, P. (1991) From Protest to Acquiescence? Political Movements of the Unemployed. London: Palgrave Macmillan.

- Bahne, S. (1981) Die Erwerbslosenpolitik der KPD in der Weimarer Republik (KPD Policy toward the Unemployed in the Weimar Republic). In H. Mommsen & W. Schulze (Eds.), Vom Elend der Handarbeit: Probleme historischer Unterschichtenforschung (On the Misery of Manual Labor: Problems of Historical Research regarding the Lower Classes). Stuttgart: Klett-Cotta.
- Crew, D. F. (1998) Germans on Welfare: From Weimar to Hitler. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Croucher, R. (1987) We Refuse to Starve in Silence: A History of the National Unemployed Workers' Movement. London: Lawrence & Wishart.
- Croucher, R. (1990) Communist Unemployed Organisations between the World Wars: International Patterns and Problems. Archiv für Sozialgeschichte, pp. 584–98.
- Folsom, F. (1991) Impatient Armies of the Poor: The Story of Collective Action of the Unemployed, 1808–1942. Boulder: University of Colorado Press.
- Garraty, J. A. (1978) Unemployment in History: Economic Thought and Public Policy. New York: Harper & Row.
- Huber-Koller, R.-M. (1977) Die kommunistische Erwerbslosenbewegung in der Endphase der Weimarer Republik (The Communist Unemployed Movement during the Late Weimar Republic). In Gesellschaft: Beiträge zur Marxschen Theorie 10 (Society: Contributions to Marxist Theory 10). Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp.
- Kingsford, P. (1982) The Hunger Marchers in Britain, 1920–1939. London: Lawrence & Wishart.
- Leab, D. (1967) United We Eat: The Creation and Organization of the Unemployed Councils in 1930. Labor History 8: 300–15.
- Lorence, J. J. (1996) Organizing the Unemployed: Community and Union Activists in the Industrial Heartland. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- MacDougall, I. (Ed.) (1991) Voices from the Hunger Marches. London: Polygon.
- McElligott, A. (1987) Mobilising the Unemployed: The KPD and the Unemployed Workers' Movement in Hamburg-Altona during the Weimar Republic. In R. J. Evans & D. Geary (Eds.), The German Unemployed: Experiences and Consequences of Mass Unemployment from the Weimar Republic to the Third Reich. London: Croom Helm.
- Perry, M. (2000) Bread and Work: Social Policy and the Experience of Unemployment, 1918–39. London: Pluto Press.
- Piven, F. F. & Cloward, R. (1978) Poor People's Movements: Why They Succeed, How They Fail. New York: Vintage.
- Rosenhaft, E. (1983) Beating the Fascists? The German Communists and Political Violence, 1929–1933. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Rosenzweig, R. (1983) Organizing the Unemployed: The Early Years of the Great Depression. In

- J. R. Green (Ed.), Workers' Struggles, Past and Present: A "Radical America" Reader. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Schöck, E.-C. (1977) Arbeitslosigkeit und Rationalisierung: Die Lage der Arbeiter und die kommunistische Gewerkschaftspolitik 1920–28 (Unemployment and Rationalization: The Situation of the Workers and Communist Trade Union Politics 1920–28). Frankfurt am Main: Campus.
- Stevenson, J. & Cook, C. (1994) Britain in Depression: Society and Politics, 1929–1939. New York: Longman.
- Tartakowsky, D. (2000) Syndicats et mobilisations de chômeurs dans les années trente (Unions and Mobilizations of the Unemployed in the Thirties). Cahiers de Ressa 3–4: 16–21.
- Zukas, A. M. (2001) Lazy, Apathetic and Dangerous: The Social Construction of Unemployed Workers in Germany during the Late Weimar Republic. Contemporary European History 10 (1): 25–49.

União dos Lavradores e Trabalhadores Agrícolas do Brasil (ULTAB-Brazil)

Fabiana de Cássia Rodrigues

The União dos Lavradores e Trabalhadores Agrícolas do Brasil (ULTAB-Brazil) was founded at the Peasants' Conference in September 1954, in the city of São Paulo. This organization resulted from the efforts of the Brazilian Communist Party (Partido Comunista Brasileiro, PCB) to unite protests around the country. ULTAB was created in order to encourage wage-earners to fight for their rights, but it also supported other categories of workers, including leaseholders.

The 1950s in Brazil were characterized by the emergence of many agrarian struggles: the state of Paraná saw resistance by the Porecatu guerillas and struggles between leaseholders and colonists' companies; in the state of Goiás there were fights with the Trombas and Formoso; conflicts of peasant leagues erupted in northwest Brazil; and strikes broke out in São Paulo. The emergence of these conflicts resulted from the capitalist expansion to the countryside and rural areas. These circumstances arose during intense intellectual debates on how to solve the agrarian question in Brazil.

The PCB had a particular role in these discussions and in political struggles. The efforts of the PCB included gathering complaints and articulating a set of general objectives, including agrarian reform. It also ran a journal, Terra Livre (Free Land), whose purpose was to publicize the injustice occurring in rural areas. The actions of the PCB throughout Brazil were highly significant for the success of ULTAB. According to Lyndolpho Silva, the first secretary of ULTAB, in the beginning the struggle was more efficient where the party had previously organized workers (Cunha 2004). ULTAB was present in many states in Brazil, including Minas Gerais, Paraná, Maranhã, Ceará, and especially in Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo, where there was a larger number of wage-earners. ULTAB supported rural workers organically and politically. To accomplish these objectives, it worked alongside lawyers to avoid threats against the exploited rural population.

ULTAB left a legacy of worker organization, education, and awareness. It helped produce political pressure that culminated in 1963 with the foundation of the National Confederation of Agriculture Workers, Contag (Confederação Nacional dos Trabalhadores em Agricultura). This organization survives today as an important rural trade union at the national level.

SEE ALSO: Brazil, Labor Struggles; Brazil, Workers and the Left: Partido dos Trabalhadores and Central Única dos Trabalhadores

References and Suggested Readings

- Cunha, P. R. (2004) O camponês e a História. São Paulo: Instituto Astrojildo Pereira.
- Martins, J. de S. (1986) Os camponeses e a política no Brasil. Petrópolis: Vozes.
- Medeiros, L. S. (1989) História dos Movimentos Sociais no Campo. Rio de Janeiro: FASE.
- Rodrigues, F. de C. (2005) O papel da questão agrária no desenvolvimento do capitalismo nacional, entre 1950 e 1964. Em Caio Prado Jr., Ignácio Rangel, Celso Furtado e autores pecevistas. Available at www.libdigi.unicamp.br/document/?code=vtls000377296 (downloaded April 20, 2008).

Unión Patriótica

Andrés Otálvaro H. and Hermann Ruiz

The Unión Patriótica (Patriotic Union, UP) was a Colombian political movement that emerged in the middle of the 1980s as a civil alternative to the political forces when peace negotiations under the government of Belisario Betancur took place. Since then PU leaders and militants have been targeted and over 5,000 have been murdered by army men, paramilitaries, and drug smugglers who were deeply involved with the right-wing political elite of the country.

After unsuccessful peace agreements with the guerrillas in 1957, these groups attained a significant presence in large zones of Colombia. In 1977 and 1982, two huge national protests occurred. This led to a determination on the part of the government to open new spaces for dialogue. In 1984 the Betancur administration agreed on an armistice with the FARC-EP (Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia-Ejército del Pueblo) in order to implement the necessary measures for an urgent political debate.

This explains why in 1985 the UP was founded, including militants from FARC, ELN (Ejército de Liberación Nacional), and Autodefensa Obrera (Workers' Self-Defense). Meanwhile the government compromised by guaranteeing free speech for the leaders of these illegal movements and the option to participate as candidates in general elections. At the beginning the UP was the political expression of a widespread mass movement and its development was accompanied by a surge of civil protest rallies by native Indians and peasants. One of the most important goals was the recovery of farmland as a way to overcome the century-old accumulation of huge amounts of property in the hands of a few owners, a legacy of Spanish colonial rule.

In light of a rigid two-party system, the initiatives promoted by the UP (popular participation in the state administration, right of opposition against official policies, popular elections for local administrations, equal access to the media and information, land reform, and peasant production subsidies) gained legitimacy among other traditionally marginalized social actors such as the Communist Party, some peasant unions, indigenous and women organizations, popular housing associations, organized students, artists, and intellectuals. More than 3,300 leaders from all over the country converged on the UP First National Congress which materialized thanks to the creation of 2,200 Juntas Patrióticas (local organizations of the UP). In 1985 the UP succeeded in organizing 500 large concentrations, with one million people participating.

In the 1986 elections, UP candidates won a significant number of seats in different state organs (14 congresistas (congressmen), 19 diputados (representatives), and 335 consejales (city councilors). Indeed Jaime Pardo Leal (magistrate and union leader), the presidential candidate for the UP, achieved 4.5 percent of the ballot and came third: the most significant result for a non-traditional party in Colombian history. In 1988, UP candidates won 15 seats by themselves and 150 seats within a coalition after the national approval of the general community election. From the first moment, prosecutions, kidnappings, assassinations, and violent assaults against UP advocates became daily occurrences.

In 1986, after the elections, Jaime Pardo Leal was assassinated. A series of demonstrations expressed people's anger against this crime and other attempts to silence the movement. Because of the lack of security for FARC-related members of the party, they resumed the armed struggle in 1987. In 1990 the new presidential UP candidate, Bernardo Jaramillo Ossa, was killed. Two other political candidates were killed during the same year: Luis Carlos Galán and Carlos Pizarro (a former M-19 guerilla leader). The massive intimidation spread a deep feeling of terror among all social institutions, and continues to do so. Due to generalized fear, and the impunity of those who committed the crimes, the movement progressively lost its popular pressure.

SEE ALSO: Colombia, Armed Insurgency, Peasant Self-Defense, and Radical Popular Movements, 1960s–1970s; FARC (Revolutionary Armed Forces and Popular Liberation Army)

References and Suggested Readings

- Cepeda, I. & Girón, C (2005) El genocidio contra la Unión Patriótica. Le Monde Diplomatique, May: 614.
- Dueñas, O. (1990) Unión Patriótica: venciendo dificultades. Bogotá: Universidad Incca de Colombia.
- Giraldo, F. (2001) Democracia y discurso político en la Unión Patriótica. Bogotá: Centro Editorial Javeriana.
- Herrera, J. (1985) Unión patriótica por la tregua y la paz. Medellín: Lealón.
- Ortiz, I. (2004) Veinte años del genocidio contra la Unión Patriótica. Revista Taller, No. 9, Bogotá.

Union for Women's Equality

Giuseppina Larocca

After the Russian Revolution in 1905, many liberal women – especially those who had attended universities – began asking for civil and political rights. From this moment began the second period of the development of Russian feminism. (The first had started with the philanthropic “triumvirate” of Maria Trubnikova, Anna Filosofova, and Nadezhda Stasova). The women’s movement became more diverse, but the main aim of each association and society was women’s civil and political equality.

In February 1905, a group of 30 liberal women in Moscow declared the formation of a national women’s political organization, the All-Russian Union for Women’s Equality (Vserossiiskii Soyuz Ravnopraviya Zhenshchim), whose general aim was “freedom and equality before the law without regard to sex.” Its first act was to petition the city Duma and the local zemstvo (the elective district council in pre-revolutionary Russia) for voting rights in those bodies (Stites 1978: 199). The leaders were journalists like Mariya Chechkova and Lyubov Gurevich from St. Petersburg, and Zinaida Mirovich-Ivanova and Anna Kalmanovich from Moscow. Soon two other important figures joined the association and strengthened it: the journalist Ariadna Tyrkova (1869–1962) and Anna Milyukova (1859/1861?–1935), wife of the future leader of the “liberal” Kadet Party (Party of Constitutional Democrats), Paul Milyukov (1859–1943).

Together they organized the first political meeting for women in Moscow on May 7–10, 1905. More than 1,000 participated, and Milyukova presided over the 300 recognized delegates. The charter adopted by the congress provided for an elected central bureau, autonomous local chapters, and special committees for politics, education, labor, and organization. The main points of the program were immediate convocation of a constituent assembly elected by the so-called seven-tailed suffrage (equal, direct, secret, and universal, without any distinctions), national autonomy, equality of the sexes before the law, equal rights for women, and laws for welfare, insurance, and protection of women workers.

Different approaches inside the movement (especially socialist and liberal ones) divided the Women’s Union and at the end of 1907 it collapsed, due to lack of unity and leadership together with official persecution by the social democrats. The congress of women on December 10–16, 1908 signaled the gap between the two main ideologies: liberal (represented by the Kadet Party of Tyrkova and Milyukova) and socialist (represented by Alexandra Kollontai and Varvara Volkova). Kollontai could not read her essay against a “bourgeois” feminism and was obliged to escape to Germany, where the Russian émigré community was fairly strong.

SEE ALSO: Kollontai, Alexandra (1872–1952); Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907; Society for Cheap Lodgings; Women in the Russian Revolution; Women’s Movement, Soviet Union

References and Suggested Readings

- Ajvazova, S. G. (1998) Russian Women in the Equality Maze: Essays on Political Theory and History. Moscow: Rusanov.
- Bisha, R. M., Gheith, J., Holden, C., & Wagner, W. G. (2002) Russian Women, 1698–1917: Experience and Expression. An Anthology of Sources. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Kollontai, A. M. (1908/2003) Woman-Worker in the Contemporary Society. In V. I. Uspenskaia (Ed.), Marxist Feminism. Text Collection. A. M. Kollontai. Tver’: Feminist Press, Russia.
- Shelochaev, V. V. (1999) Ariadna Vladimirovna Tyrkova. Questions of History 11–12: 67–81. Moscow.
- Stites, R. (1978) The Women’s Liberation Movement in Russia: Feminism, Nihilism, and Bolshevism, 1860–1930. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Venturi, F. (1952) The Russian Populism, 2 vols. Turin: Riuniti.

United Englishmen/ United Britons

Michael T. Davis

The United Englishmen was an underground revolutionary society that existed in England between about 1796 and 1802 and which sought to overturn the government by means of a coordinated insurrection in England, Ireland, and Scotland. The foundations for the United Englishmen were laid after attempts to seek political reform through constitutional avenues were unsuccessful in the first half of the 1790s. Following the passage of the repressive Two Acts in 1795, sections of the English democratic movement shifted their tactics to a more physical force approach to promoting reform. In this climate, a reinvigorated United Irish society was able to find willing recruits in England. Political tours by United Irishmen in the winter of 1796–7 helped disseminate the prospect of insurrection and foster an interest in establishing societies modeled on the Irish example. Many English radicals, particularly in the northern manufacturing districts, were lured by the opportunity offered through the United movement and the first cells of the United Englishmen were established in late 1796.

The United Englishmen directly modeled its organization and agenda on the United Irishmen. It conducted its proceedings in secret and members guarded their identity through oaths and esoteric handshakes. The structure of the United Englishmen was borrowed from the United Irishmen, involving an intricate network of branches that helped facilitate their clandestine operations and geographical reach. Each branch was made up of 15 members, and it would split into two branches when membership reached about 30. The organization was administered from above by a network of baronial, county, provincial, and national committees, which operated in complete secrecy and made the society difficult for government agents to infiltrate.

The United Englishmen and United Irishmen maintained close contact. Irish radicals frequently toured England teaching new signs and reinforcing the merits of insurrection to their English counterparts. Irish immigrants were engaged in distributing political literature and teaching new oaths to local revolutionaries, whose minds were inflamed by the promise that insurrection was imminent and necessary. In particular, it was radicals in the northern districts of England, where trade contacts with Ireland had been well established, who were most attracted by the revolutionary call. Disillusioned members of the reform societies in places like Manchester, Leicester, Wolverhampton, Birmingham, and Nottingham soon joined the United Englishmen. Although precise membership numbers cannot be determined, by all accounts the organization grew rapidly during 1797 with hundreds of recruits reportedly signed on to the revolutionary cause.

The United Englishmen also began taking root in London, where the society was variously referred to as the United Britons and the True Britons. The London cells of the organization drew most of their prominent members from the London Corresponding Society (LCS). Their meeting places were either the smoky parlors of local public houses, like Furnival's Inn on the Strand, or the private residences of leading United activists. Indeed, these were the same spaces and often the same personnel that underpinned the LCS, and as such the distinction between LCS politics and the agenda of the United Englishmen is easily blurred during 1797 and 1798.

While the agenda of the United Englishmen did, in part, reflect the reformist aims of the LCS, the fundamental mantra of the United men was revolution. Cells of the United Englishmen conducted armed drills and the grand vision was for a coordinated uprising in England, Ireland, and Scotland, with the backing of a French invasion. United Irishmen toured England in 1797 and 1798 galvanizing support for the cause and delegates from the United Scotsmen were at times active in English radical circles. In the turbulent period of the late 1790s, the members of the United Englishmen were intoxicated by the potential for revolution and the French were seen as critical allies.

The Irish republican and Catholic priest James O'Coigly was a key player in linking the United societies with the French. In late 1797, he returned from France promoting the word of French plans for invasion, but in February 1798 he was arrested, along with some leading members of the United Englishmen, with damning evidence in his possession of a letter inviting Napoleon Bonaparte to invade Britain. Further arrests were made from among the ranks of United Englishmen in April 1798, and when O'Coigly was executed in June 1798 for high treason, the spirits of United men were deflated.

The following year, the government arrested more revolutionaries, and on July 12, 1799 the United Englishmen, along with other popular political organizations, was banned by legislation. However, depleted sections of the United Englishmen remained active, albeit subdued, and in 1800–1, when economic conditions fueled popular discontent and made revolutionary action seem possible, the United Englishmen regrouped. The arrest and subsequent execution of Edward Marcus Despard in 1802–3, who acted in concert with United Englishmen to plot an attack on the government, saw the final collapse of resolve among United men. The organization ceased to exist after this time, but the revolutionary sentiments of those former members who survived the 1790s were taken with them into the ultra-radical movement led by Thomas Spence.

SEE ALSO: Despard, Colonel Edward Marcus (1751–1803) and the Despard Conspiracy; London Corresponding Society; Spence, Thomas (1750–1814); United Irishmen; United Scotsmen

References and Suggested Readings

- Elliott, M. (1982) Partners in Revolution: The United Irishmen and France. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Goodwin, A. (1979) The Friends of Liberty: The English Democratic Movement in the Age of the French Revolution. London: Hutchinson.
- Graham, J. (2000) The Nation, the Law and the King: Reform Politics in England, 1789–1799, 2 vols. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.
- McCalman, I. (1988) Radical Underworld: Prophets, Revolutionaries and Pornographers in London, 1795–1840. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Wells, R. (1983) Insurrection: The British Experience, 1795–1803. Gloucester: Alan Sutton.

United Irishmen

Karen Sonnelitter

The United Irish Society, or United Irishmen, was initially a liberal political organization in eighteenth-century Ireland that sought parliamentary reform by legal means. It evolved into a radical republican organization with a massive underground army that launched the Great Rebellion of 1798 and aimed at forcefully ending British rule of Ireland and creating an independent republic.

Origin

The 1770s and 1780s were a period of patriotic agitation in Ireland. The American Revolution had inspired the development of an extra-governmental organization, the Volunteers, which exerted pressure on the Irish government to make political concessions. In the 1780s, liberal members of the Protestant Ascendancy sought a measure of legislative independence from Great Britain, which they obtained in 1782. Influenced ideologically by Britain's radical Whig tradition, they also promoted the idea of increasing the rights of Catholics and Protestant Dissenters.

Classical republicanism and John Locke's theories of government provided the intellectual foundations of the United Irish movement and created a shared set of political assumptions that the United Irishmen would draw upon. The outbreak of the French Revolution was also an inspiration to radicals everywhere, and Ireland was no exception. The decline of the Volunteer movement in the 1780s meant that there was no longer a national organization as the focus of reformers' activities. There was a Whig Club operating in Ireland but it was limited to the political elite, so more radical circles felt the need for a broader organization.

A group of nine Belfast Presbyterians interested in reforming the Irish parliament invited a young lawyer named Theobald Wolfe Tone to compile resolutions on their behalf. While they initially balked at his support for Catholic emancipation, they reconciled themselves following the publication of his Argument on Behalf of the Catholics of Ireland. The organization that their collaboration produced, the United Irish Society, was a nonsectarian movement that sought to transcend the lines of religious affiliation which had traditionally divided Irish society. Though the Society was dominated by Protestants, it worked to appeal to Catholics as well, drawing on their resentment of the Protestant Ascendancy. Radical dissenting Protestants, who were the primary founders of the Society, appealed to the common enemy they shared with Catholics, the established Anglican Church and the members of the Anglo-Irish ruling class.

Founding and Early Years

On October 18, 1791, the Belfast group invited Wolfe Tone and Thomas Russell to the first meeting of the United Irish Society, where three resolutions written by Tone were passed:

First, that the weight of English influence in the government of this country is so great as to require a cordial union among all the people of Ireland to maintain that balance which is essential to the preservation of our liberties and the extension of our commerce.

Second, that the sole constitutional mode by which this influence can be opposed is by the complete and radical reform of the representation of the people in parliament.

Third, that no reform is practicable, efficacious, or just which shall not include Irishmen of every religious persuasion.

Thirty men attended that first meeting. In addition to Russell and Tone, others included William Sinclair, Henry Joy McCracken, Samuel Nielson, Henry Haslett, Gilbert McIlveen, William Simms, Robert Simms, Thomas McCabe, and Thomas Pearce. A few weeks later a Dublin branch of the Society was established, with James Napper Tandy serving as secretary. The United Irishmen worked closely with the Catholic Committee to promote Catholic emancipation and repeal the discriminatory penal laws. It was hoped that Catholic emancipation would lead to reform along republican lines.

The new organization was primarily centered in Belfast and Dublin, but it spread throughout the country. Though the rhetoric of the society made clear its desire to appeal to men of all social backgrounds, its membership was largely middle class and its strongest chapters were in commercial and industrial centers. The United Irishmen's desire to secure a mass following seemed headed for success. The movement's growth was stimulated by the wide circulation of pamphlets, leaflets, and newspapers such as the Northern Star. However, the rapid spread of the movement alarmed the government and in 1793, following Britain's declaration of war on France, the United Irish Society was banned.

Underground Years

From the mid-1790s onward the movement was forced to go underground, and its character changed dramatically. The suppression of their organization convinced the majority of members that the peaceful pursuit of parliamentary reform was impossible and that "physical force" – armed revolution – was their only option. They drew upon Ireland's rich tradition with regard to the formation and maintenance of secret societies. Renowned dissident political leaders such as Lord Edward Fitzgerald and Arthur O'Connor joined their ranks, bringing with them a wealth of military knowledge and experience. Before long, paramilitary units throughout Ireland were arming themselves and secretly engaging in nocturnal military training.

Meanwhile, the militancy of the mostly Protestant United Irishmen attracted the attention of the multitudes of oppressed Catholics, who had begun to come together in a plebeian organization known as the Defenders. Government repression drove the Defenders and United Irishmen into each other's arms. Defender militants began joining United Irish military units in large numbers, swelling the ranks of the underground army to massive proportions. By the time of the outbreak of the Great Rebellion in 1798, the United Irish had the capacity to put hundreds of thousands of men in arms in the field.

Decline and Fall

The middle-class and landowning Protestant leadership of the United Irish was hesitant to unleash the energy of the land-hungry Catholic peasants, so instead of mobilizing them for a revolutionary explosion, a more "controlled" form of revolution was sought through an alliance with France. United Irish emissaries, including Fitzgerald, O'Connor, and Wolfe Tone, negotiated with the French government to request ships, troops, arms, and ammunition to overthrow British rule in Ireland, while leaving the existing social order in Ireland essentially intact. French aid was eventually provided to the Irish rebels, but far too little and far too late.

The inadequacy of French military support, however, was not the most important factor in the failure of the United Irishmen's 1798 attempt at insurrection. Ireland's long experience with rebellious secret societies had also equipped the authorities with methods of combating them. The government's most effective weapon was the police spy. The United Irish organization was riddled with informers from its highest levels down. On the eve of the Rebellion of 1798, police raids netted almost all of the organization's central leaders who were not already dead or in exile. Lord Edward Fitzgerald briefly escaped, but was soon thereafter captured and died of wounds sustained during his arrest. The movement had been decapitated, and with only low-ranking leaders on the scene, the Rebellion unfolded in a piecemeal manner. A series of isolated risings was easily suppressed by the British military forces and their Irish partners.

Following the failure of the 1798 Rebellion, the United Irishmen continued to function clandestinely. The replacement of the Irish parliament with direct rule by the British parliament, and the puppet Irish government's increased efforts to play Catholics and Protestants against each other, led to an increase in sectarianism, which undermined the movement. In 1803 an aftershock of the Great Rebellion occurred in the form of an event known to history as Emmet's Rebellion. Despite the admirable courage of Robert Emmet and his followers, their rising was a debacle, after which the United Irish Society effectively ceased to exist. In its wake Ireland's population experienced a deepening sectarian gulf. Except for the failed Young Ireland movement of the 1840s, the United Irishmen's attempt to bring Catholics and Protestants together in common cause has not been repeated.

SEE ALSO: Emmet, Robert (1778–1803) and Emmet's Rebellion; Fitzgerald, Lord Edward (1763–1798); Ireland, Age of Revolutions, 1775–1803; Ireland, Great Rebellion, 1798; Napper Tandy, James (1737?–1803); O'Connor, Arthur (1763–1852); Tone, Theobald Wolfe (1763–1798); Young Ireland

References and Suggested Readings

- Curtin, N. J. (1998) The United Irishmen: Popular Politics in Ulster and Dublin, 1791–1798. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Elliott, M. (1982) Partners in Revolution: The United Irishmen and France. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Elliott, M. (1989) Wolfe Tone: Prophet of Irish Independence. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Knox, O. (1997) Rebels and Informers: Stirrings of Irish Independence. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Packenham, T. (1972) The Year of Liberty: The Great Irish Rebellion of 1798. London: Granada.

United Scotsmen

Michael T. Davis

The United Scotsmen was an underground revolutionary society that sought radical political reform in Scotland through a campaign of physical force activism and conspiratorial politics in association with the United Englishmen, United Irish, and French. Although the United Scotsmen was not directly descendant from the earlier Glasgow Society of United Scotsmen founded in 1793, it did share in common an emphasis on universal suffrage and parliamentary reform and probably some overlap of membership. However, a more direct influence on the origins and agenda of the United Scotsmen was the reinvigoration of the United Irishmen in 1795. The passing of the repressive Two Acts in that year made a clandestine existence an increasingly important and unavoidable feature of the United Irishmen, and it was United Irish deputies and Irish refugees who exported ideas of revolution to Scotland in the latter part of the 1790s. In July 1796, the first recorded contact between United Irish missionaries and Scottish radicals took place when two delegates from the Belfast United Irishmen were sent to Scotland. Armed with a copy of the constitution of the United Irishmen, the missionaries found the Scottish to be generally enthusiastic about forming a sister organization based on the Irish model.

Within six months of this contact between Irish and Scottish democrats, the United Scotsmen society was formed. Government authorities first became aware of the United Scotsmen in early 1797 and it was believed the organization was nothing more than a local branch of the United Irishmen. Indeed, the constitution of the United Irishmen was drawn heavily upon by the United Scotsmen and the two groups fostered a close relationship with regular visits from United Irishmen to stir republican sentiments in Scotland and to facilitate the spread of the United movement.

The United Scotsmen also sought to further its cause by collaborating with the French. Some contemporaries believed that the United Scotsmen was guided by French principles, and while this may be overstating the connection, it is true that there were important linkages. At times, French radicals toured Scotland with promises of revolutionary support, and from 1797 to his death in 1799 Thomas Muir lived in Paris where he acted as a conduit between the United Scotsmen and the French directory. The United Scotsmen were also able to develop productive relations with English radicals, particularly in the northern districts of England where the United Englishmen was active.

The United Scotsmen was most active in 1797 and the rapid growth of the society concerned authorities. Against a backdrop of active recruitment, popular discontent with the Scottish Militia Act of 1797, and the increased immigration of Irish radicals to Scotland following the imposition of martial law in Ulster, the United Scotsmen expanded to a peak of about 10,000 men in September 1797, although some estimates range as high as 200,000 recruits. While the precise level of membership cannot be determined, 26 United organizations in Scotland are recorded in the government records.

While the authorities were acutely aware of the United Scotsmen, the society remained elusive. It was an oath-bound society, with secret handshakes and a commitment to communicating in secrecy with fellow radicals. There is also some evidence to suggest that the United Scotsmen infiltrated the freemasons' lodges in Scotland, facilitating its clandestine operations and providing a network through which to attract new members.

Despite the underground nature of the society's operations, the government was able to make inroads into the United Scotsmen. Irishmen suspected of carrying with them radical sympathies were apprehended and sometimes deported at Scottish ports in an effort to break the exchange between the United societies in Ireland and Scotland. The Illegal Oaths Act of 1797 resulted in some sections of the United Scotsmen ceasing to meet and discouraging potential members from taking the oath. The government also made an important impact on the confidence of the United Scotsmen when George Mealmaker, one of the society's leading activists, was arrested in 1797 and transported to Botany Bay the following year. The United Scotsmen was eventually outlawed by name, along with other radical societies, in legislation passed on July 12, 1799. Remnants of the United Scotsmen continued to meet after 1799, but their activities were infrequent and lacked coordination, and ultimately the society disappeared in 1802.

SEE ALSO: Muir, Thomas (1765–1799); United Englishmen/United Britons; United Irishmen

References and Suggested Readings

- Dickson, D., Whelan, K., & Keogh, D. (Eds.) (1993) The United Irishmen: Republicanism, Radicalism and Rebellion. Dublin: Lilliput.
- Fry, M. (1992) The Dundas Despotism. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Goodwin, A. (1979) The Friends of Liberty: The English Democratic Movement in the Age of the French Revolution. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Graham, J. (2000) The Nation, the Law and the King: Reform Politics in England 1789–1799, 2 vols. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.
- McFarland, E. W. (1994) Ireland and Scotland in the Age of Revolution. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Wells, R. (1983) Insurrection: The British Experience. Gloucester: Alan Sutton.

Urabi movement

Andrew J. Waskey

The Urabi Arabi movement, also known as the Arabi Revolt, was led by Colonel Ahmed Arabi (1841–1911) (Urabi or Orabi) in Egypt in 1881. A protest movement against foreign intervention in Egypt, its slogan was “Egypt for the Egyptians.” It ended with the death or exile of many of its leaders in 1882.

The origin of the Arabi movement lay years earlier in the imperial ambitions of the Khedive Ismail (r. 1863–79). Western-educated and fluent in French, he was a promising ruler who failed financially. Like his grandfather Mohammed Ali Pasha, he had continued to spend money seeking to profit from trade in the Sudan. He financed numerous public works as well as the military with the tax returns from the 1863 cotton boom Egypt enjoyed when the war in the American South had immensely contracted the world's cotton supply. Nominally, Egypt was a possession of the Ottoman empire. In reality it was quite autonomous. However, by 1877 Khedive Ismail was bankrupt due to bad investments, expeditions to the Sudan, and lavish spending on a number of projects. He met the financial crisis by allowing France and Great Britain to set up a dual financial control over Egypt's state revenues. On June 25, 1879, the Ottomans replaced Khedive Ismail with his much more compliant son Khedive Tawfiq. The latter was faced with a growing sense of nationalism, especially among the increasing numbers of educated Egyptians.

A leading opponent of foreign control was Ahmed Arabi. Educated at Al-Azhar University in Cairo, which was a center of emerging nationalism, he joined the Egyptian army and rose through the officer ranks to become lieutenant colonel by the age of 20. A powerful public speaker, Arabi's peasant origins gave him great rhetorical power among the peasants, who hailed him as the voice of the Egyptian people. In January 1881, Arabi headed a delegation of Egyptian officers who tried to visit the prime minister. Khedive Tawfiq was dealing with the financial crisis by retiring soldiers and blocking promotion for Egyptians while allowing it for non-Egyptians. It meant the exclusion of Egyptian peasants from the army.

The war minister, Uthman Rifqi, tried to have the Arabi delegation arrested as it attempted to see the prime minister. However, it had brought enough troops that it was able to violently prevent the arrests. In the face of this crisis, Tawfiq fired Rifqi and replaced him with Colonel Mahmud Sami al-Barudi (1839–1904). A power struggle then ensued between the Tawfiq and the Egyptian officers. Mass public demonstrations drew people from all segments of Egyptian society. The movement recruited a group of politicians and legal scholars to write a constitution, which was adopted. The protest soon developed wider aims. Joining with the peasants, Arabi and others sought to free Egypt from foreign controls. They also fought to end the absolutism of the Khedive.

In June 1882 riots erupted in Alexandria. Thousands of Egyptians were injured or killed and 50 Europeans were killed or wounded. Large numbers of frightened Europeans sought refuge on the ships of the British and French fleets anchored at Alexandria. The commander of the British fleet bombarded Alexandria's forts when the Egyptians refused to dismantle them. The French fleet just sailed away.

Tawfiq, fearing the Egyptian officers, sided with the Europeans while the government in Cairo declared war on the British. Seeking to leave Egypt, the British found that they were also faced with the Mahdist movement in the Sudan. Troops were sent to Egypt that had to first suppress the nationalists. The British force of 17,500 and 60 cannons, led by Garnet Woolsey, met the Egyptian army with 25,000 men at Tel-el-Kebir on September 13, 1882. The battle lasted two hours, ending with complete victory for the British. Arabi was captured and sentenced to death after a trial. However, the British commissioner, Lord Fredrick Dufferin, granted a plea of clemency to Arabi and others. Instead they were sent to the British colony of Ceylon, remaining in exile from December 28, 1882 to October 1, 1901.

The anti-colonialism of the Urabi movement failed to gain independence. However, its members became folk heroes, encouraging later generations to resist colonialism. Egyptian nationalism can be traced to the movement.

SEE ALSO: Egypt, Peasant Rebellion of 1824; Mahdist Revolt; Sudanese Protest in the Turko-Egyptian Era

References and Suggested Readings

- Cole, J. R. (1993) Colonialism and Revolution in the Middle East: Social and Cultural Origins of Egypt's Urabi Movement. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Farwell, B. (1972) Queen Victoria's Little Wars. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Goldschmidt, A., Jr. (2008) A Brief History of Egypt. New York: Checkmark.

Urban rebellions, United States

Sven Dubie

American cities have been centers of social and political ferment since they first emerged in the seventeenth century. With greater regularity than is commonly known, they have been the site of a wide range of disturbances that have been variously referred to as riots, civil disorders, mob actions, insurrections, and uprisings. Indeed, depending on how one defines any given disturbance of the peace – be it a genuine uprising against the established authority, a mob action directed at a particular individual or group of people, or a rowdy group of sports fans venting their joy or frustration – the list could be practically limitless. However, in the twentieth century, and especially during the half-century following the end of World War II, a particular manifestation of unrest known as an urban rebellion became one of the most common – and certainly the best known – examples of civil disorder in the history of the United States.

Customarily, these disturbances are referred to as simply riots or race riots. Yet neither of these terms is quite accurately descriptive. Riot is overly broad, and race riot is misleading, especially since the term has often been used to describe racially motivated mob attacks by one group (often whites) on another group (often blacks). In the latter instance, this term would best describe the unrest in Chicago in 1919, or in Tulsa, Oklahoma in 1921 when, in each case, a large group of whites invaded the black section of town with the intent of attacking blacks and their property in order to maintain white supremacy. By contrast, the urban rebellions of later in the twentieth century were not aimed at reinforcing the racial status quo but, rather, challenging it. Likewise, the unrest was not the result of interaction between the races that was undesired by one group. Instead it stemmed from one group's perception that, because of its race, it was isolated and alienated from the mainstream of society.

Another important distinction between urban rebellions and the more generic riot is that while both contain an element of spontaneity and chaos, in most cases urban rebellions reflect a greater degree of deliberate and sustained resistance to the governmental or societal status quo – sometimes lasting for numerous days. In fact, rebellions can even have brief periods of quietude, during an overnight period, for instance, or when authorities temporarily regain control over the situation, before being restarted by some new provocation.

The urban rebellions of the twentieth century, and especially those of the 1960s, are also deeply rooted in the context of the time in which they occurred. Since the early part of the twentieth century, African Americans had migrated out of the rural South and into the urban North in search of economic opportunity and to escape the repressive system of officially sanctioned segregation that was widespread in the South. However, the harsh reality of life in the Northern urban ghetto, including the limited economic opportunities, the substandard living conditions, the pervasive racism and discrimination, and the persistent neglect and occasional abuse of the rapidly growing black population by local government, fueled deep resentment toward city officials in nearly every urban center. Such frustration was heightened during the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s, and not simply because the movement instilled a stronger sense of racial pride and a greater willingness to lay claim to one's basic rights among the black population of the urban North. Many of the movement's justifiably heralded accomplishments did little to address the problems of urban centers. Indeed, the triumphs of the civil rights movement in the South in some ways seemed to stand in cruel mockery to the persistence of the status quo in the black ghettos. When that lack of progress was underscored by some perceived act of police brutality or other official injustice, the stage was set for a rebellion.

Significantly, the Harlem riots of 1935 and 1943 were harbingers of the kind of unrest that was to plague many of the urban centers in America in the 1960s. The Harlem riots reflected a new type of unrest that was not the result of labor unrest or the invasion of the black community by whites determined to perpetrate violence as an expression of white supremacy. Instead, these disorders reflected widespread and growing discontent in the black community over living and working conditions, allegations of police brutality, lack of adequate public services, and other manifestations of racial oppression. In this instance, a riot broke out on March 19, 1935, after a young black boy attempted to steal a pocket knife from a Harlem department store. Although the boy gave up the knife when apprehended by store employees and was subsequently allowed to go on his way, suspicion and hostility toward the white community helped give rise to a rumor that the boy had been beaten and killed by the white employees in the basement of the store. In response, African Americans lashed out against white-owned businesses, smashing store windows and looting some 600 properties. Before police were able to restore order, three people were killed and scores were injured, most of whom were black.

The August 1943 Harlem riots are less notorious than the race riots that occurred two months earlier in Detroit – in large part because city officials had taken steps to address some of the grievances of black Harlem after the 1935 riots and were on guard because of the disturbances in Detroit. Nevertheless, like the unrest in Harlem eight years earlier, this incident stemmed from misunderstanding about a minor altercation between whites and blacks and then, fueled by rumors and racial tensions, a similar outburst of rage threatened to consume the community. Events that led to the unrest began when several African Americans and a white police officer got into an argument at a Harlem hotel. Eventually one of the African Americans, a soldier on leave who was visiting with his mother, was shot after scuffling with the officer. The wound was minor but both the black man and the officer were taken to a nearby hospital.

Almost immediately, however, word swept through Harlem that a black soldier had been gunned down by a white officer while trying to protect his mother. Such rumors, when seen against the backdrop of the recent Detroit race riot and the general mistrust of white officials that existed in the black community, were all that was needed to provoke unrest. Individuals and then groups began to break windows and then looting ensued. When stores had been emptied of their wares to the satisfaction of looters, some of the properties were set alight. The mêlée continued through the night until order was restored the next morning, but not before six people – all black – were killed and nearly 200 were injured. Hundreds of arrests were made and nearly 1,500 stores suffered damage and/or theft totaling several million dollars. Subsequent studies of the disorders credited the swift but measured response of New York City officials, who were determined not to allow matters to get out of hand as they had in Detroit, for keeping the situation from becoming far worse.

The pent-up frustration felt by those living in black ghettos like Harlem at the persistent economic inequality and racial oppression that fueled the disturbances of 1935 and 1943 was similarly the root cause for many in the long series of rebellions in the 1960s. While many of these took place in the urban centers of the North, among the first manifestations of this new variety of disturbances occurred in Birmingham, Alabama, in the late spring at the conclusion of a long series of civil rights demonstrations, led by Martin Luther King, Jr. and others that aimed at ending official segregation in the city.

The Birmingham Campaign, as the demonstrations came to be known, is legendary for the use of police dogs and fire hoses by city authorities against demonstrators, some of whom were young children. The situation, which had hovered on the brink of catastrophe for several tense days in early May, eased when a truce between city officials and demonstrators was announced on May 10. However, when three bombs exploded the following night, in all probability detonated by the Ku Klux Klan as they targeted the leaders of the demonstrations, several thousand African Americans flooded the streets of the city and for the next several hours unleashed a torrent of anger and frustration that provided an ugly, if understandable, coda to the Birmingham Campaign, which, by design, had been conducted upon principles of non-violence.

Leaders of the desegregation campaign called for an immediate cessation of the disturbances, but the calls for peace were ignored as angry youths poured out their fury across a 28-block area. Police cars, fire engines, and private vehicles, along with their occupants, were attacked, resulting in scores of injuries. White-owned stores and properties in the neighborhood were the initial targets, but several black properties were eventually looted and destroyed as well. When authorities tried to quell the violence, they were pelted with rocks, bricks, and bottles, and the anger of the mob was further fueled when the police surged into the black community and assaulted its members indiscriminately. Not before the early morning hours of May 12 was order finally restored, ending the first urban rebellion of the tumultuous mid-1960s. Ominously, following the unrest in Birmingham, there were widespread protest demonstrations across the country, reflecting a new spirit of militancy in black communities. Over the course of the summer of 1963, there were over 750 demonstrations in 186 cities, with some of the most serious disturbances lasting several days in Cambridge, Maryland, and Danville, Virginia.

In response to the injustices and discontent brought to light by the demonstrations and subsequent riot in Birmingham, President John F. Kennedy introduced sweeping civil rights legislation that was designed to eliminate formal racial discrimination and to begin to address some of the other grievances in the African American community. This bill was eventually enacted in early July 1964, as the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Ironically, within weeks of the landmark legislation's passage, there were major disturbances in Harlem, Rochester, New York, and Philadelphia, as well as lesser ones in cities in northeastern New Jersey and suburban Chicago, establishing a pattern of waves of urban unrest sweeping through the nation's cities that would be replicated with discouraging predictability during the next several years.

The first incident took place in Harlem July 18–20, after an off-duty white police officer shot and killed a black teenager who had allegedly threatened him with a knife. Although a grand jury would eventually exonerate the officer of any wrongdoing, local residents charged the killing was reflective of the routine police brutality to which the African American community was subjected. In response to the killing, the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), a leading civil rights organization at the time, organized a series of peaceful protests demanding, among other things, the immediate dismissal of the officer and the resignation of the police commissioner. When demonstrators marched on police precinct headquarters in Harlem, the police not only resisted the demonstrators but also conducted a series of heavy-handed sweeps through Harlem in which innocent bystanders were beaten by the police. The perceived overreaction of the police provoked a violent response in the African American community, leading to two days of rioting. One person died, more than 100 were injured, and hundreds more were arrested.

The next major disturbance, which took place July 24–6, came to be known as the Rochester Riot. While unrest might have been predicted in an expansive and notoriously impoverished ghetto such as Harlem, Rochester, situated in western upstate New York, seemed like an unlikely candidate for civil disorders, given the relative affluence of the community and modest, albeit rapidly growing, size of the black population. Nevertheless, for the several thousand African Americans who were confined to the city's poorest wards, the lack of economic opportunity and frustration with authorities continually stoked resentment.

The civil unrest in Rochester was sparked when a confrontation erupted during the course of a routine arrest at a large outdoor street dance in one of the city's black wards on a hot Friday night. It did not help matters that when police arrived on the scene, they included a K-9 patrol, reviving memories of Birmingham. In short order, rumors of police brutality began to circulate, provoking a fierce reaction in the black community that set off two nights and three days of rioting. There was extensive looting in the downtown area, scores were injured and arrested, and four persons were killed – three of them when a helicopter surveying the riot damage crashed into a house. Eventually New York Governor Nelson Rockefeller was forced to call for National Guard assistance, marking the first time during the civil rights era that these forces had to be called out in the North. Significantly, most of those arrested in the disturbances were gainfully employed and had no previous record of arrest, indicating there was more to the rebellion than just poverty.

A month later, a riot erupted in predominantly black North Philadelphia, once more against a backdrop of allegations of police brutality. Relations between the city's black population and the predominantly white police force had long been tense, but they had grown worse since the city's black newspaper, the Philadelphia Tribune, routinely spotlighted incidents of alleged brutality that occurred with impunity. Thus, when a black woman whose car had stalled at an intersection got into an argument with two police officers – one white and one black – which then escalated into a scuffle, word began to spread that a white policeman had beaten a pregnant black woman to death. A crowd soon gathered in the area and emotions spilled over. For the next several days, from August 28 to 30, blacks looted white-owned shops in North Philadelphia's central commercial district. While there were no deaths, there were hundreds of injuries and arrests and over 200 stores were damaged or destroyed.

The following summer brought the most notorious of all the 1960s riots in the largely black sector of Los Angeles known as Watts. The disorder lasted for six days, making it one of the longest and, as a result, most destructive riots of the era. In what was a familiar pattern, the unrest began in response to a confrontation between several local blacks and the police. On August 11, in the midst of a late summer heat-wave, a white California Highway Patrol official pulled over a car he suspected was being operated under the influence. Inside the car were two black men, brothers Marquette and Ronald Frye. By all accounts the officer handled the situation in a fully professional manner but, in due course, and perhaps related to the arrival of the Fryes' mother on the scene, Marquette, who was driving the vehicle, became unruly. By this time a crowd had gathered, and more police had also arrived. One of them determined the situation was getting out of hand and rushed the Frye brothers, striking them with his baton. When their mother attempted to intervene, she, along with her two sons, was shoved into a police car. The rough handling of the Fryes, combined with an eager willingness to believe the worst about law enforcement officials, sent rumors racing through the ghetto about the excessive use of force and police beating a pregnant woman. Within minutes, rocks and bottles began to fly, storefront windows were smashed as a prelude to looting, and a tempest of violence commenced that would continue for five days and involve some 35,000 people. In addition to state and local officers, 16,000 National Guard troops were brought in, and a declaration of martial law was required to end the rebellion.

The extent of destruction in Watts was staggering compared to the 1964 disturbances and marked a serious escalation of urban unrest. By the time peace was restored, 34 people had been killed, the majority of whom were black; at least 1,000 had been injured and four times that number arrested. Although rioters often failed to distinguish between white- and black-owned properties, to a considerable extent, white-owned businesses and homes were initially targeted by the angry mob, as these were seen by blacks to be the most visible and readily accessible symbols of their oppression. However, as the riots spread, hundreds of white and black properties were damaged or destroyed and an estimated $200 million in property damage occurred.

What further made the Watts riot unique was the imperviousness of the community to calls from prominent African Americans to stop the orgy of destruction. When comedian and activist Dick Gregory went into the neighborhood to appeal for calm, he was shot in the leg. One looter, when asked by the renowned black writer Louis Lomax how he could justify such wanton theft, ordered Lomax to get out of his way, as he was interfering with his ability to get a chair that matched the one he had already taken. After the riot ended, black youths famously bragged to Martin Luther King that they had won a victory despite the fact that they had effectively destroyed their own community because they finally had forced whites to turn their attention to the ghetto. Surprisingly, given the pattern of multiple riots that erupted in other years, the Watts rebellion marked the only major incident of unrest in 1965.

During the summer of 1966, and for several years thereafter, however, the pattern of multiple riots would reassert itself. The first of the 1966 disturbances occurred along Division Street, near Humboldt Park, in Chicago and are thus referred to as either the Division Street or Humboldt Park Riots. It was remarkable in that it marked the first rebellion during the contemporary era based in a Hispanic community. However, the sources for the unrest – chronic poverty, inadequate public services, alienation from mainstream society, and anger over perceived mistreatment at the hands of authorities – were nearly identical to those that had sparked rebellions in black neighborhoods. And, as with many of the African American rebellions, the Division Street Riot began with an incident between police and local youth.

Following celebrations to mark the first Puerto Rican Day celebration in Chicago on June 12, 1966, officers shot a young Puerto Rican man, Aracelis Cruz, whom police were trying to arrest after breaking up a fight. Officers also said Cruz was carrying a gun. The community reaction to the shooting was nearly spontaneous, as hundreds of Puerto Ricans filled the streets to protest what they said was a wholly unprovoked but all too common attack by police. As more officers rushed to the scene, bringing with them police dogs, tensions quickly escalated. Police tried to disperse the crowd with tear gas and night sticks, which simply provoked more anger in the Puerto Rican community. For the next three days, unrest wracked the neighborhood, as locals battled with police and the National Guard for control of the streets. There was widespread looting and numerous police vehicles were set afire or damaged. While no deaths occurred during the unrest, more than a dozen people were injured and dozens were arrested.

A month later, on July 11, a rebellion broke out in the poor and predominantly black Near West Side of Chicago. While not as extensive as the Humboldt Park disorders, the unrest served as a reminder that resentments also ran deep among Chicago's African Americans. Ironically, the unrest corresponded with the arrival of Martin Luther King in Chicago, as he began a campaign to spotlight the poverty and injustice that afflicted African Americans in the urban North. When authorities shut off fire hydrants that had been opened by youngsters seeking relief from the July heat, adults protested, particularly since three blocks away, but in a heavily Italian community, police had not taken similar action. When police arrested one of the adults who tried to reopen the hydrant, tempers boiled over. The crowd that had gathered to observe the scene hurled insults and rocks at the police. The situation was exacerbated by the involvement of area gang members and false rumors that the youngsters who had tried to cool themselves by opening the hydrants had been beaten by the police; the mêlée quickly became a riot, as the windows of buildings and cars in the area were shattered. Over the next several days, the violence spread into nearby black neighborhoods and housing projects. Despite King's calls for peace and efforts to mediate an end to the disorder, looting and vandalism were widespread, and there was even scattered sniper fire, reflecting the limits of King's influence in the disaffected urban centers of the North. Eventually, the National Guard was called out for the second time in a month to restore order, but not before two bystanders had been killed. Eighty others were seriously wounded, and six of these were police hit by snipers' bullets. All in all, hundreds of arrests and several million dollars of property damage were incurred.

Only days after the rebellion on Chicago's Near West Side, unrest erupted in the poor and predominantly black Hough neighborhood of Cleveland. The Hough Riot, as the incident is known, proved to be the country's most serious disturbance that summer. The unrest began on the night of July 18, when a black man entered the white-owned Seventy-Niner's Café at the corner of Hough and 79th Streets. After purchasing a bottle of wine, he asked for some ice water but his request was denied. The customer stormed out of the bar and soon afterward a crowd comprised mainly of African Americans gathered outside the bar. Tempers quickly escalated in the summer heat, and the arrival of a significant force of Cleveland police seemed to touch off an explosion of pent-up anger and frustration. When the police tried to disperse the crowd, a shower of rocks and bricks rained down upon them. Simultaneously, the windows of nearby stores, many of which were owned by whites, were shattered, leading to looting and arson. As additional police reinforcements and firefighters were called in an effort to gain control over the situation, snipers began firing at them, prompting some of them to withdraw, which allowed the crisis to deepen. The next day Cleveland's mayor called for National Guard support, but the arrival of more than 2,000 Guardsmen only served to drive the violence outside the Hough neighborhood and into some of the adjacent black communities. Order in Cleveland was not restored for a week, and during the unrest, four people died, 30 were injured, and hundreds were arrested. Scores of businesses were severely damaged or destroyed, resulting in millions of dollars in property losses that would leave the neighborhood deeply scarred for decades to come.

Two months later, the last of the major riots began in the Hunters Point section of San Francisco, the site of a large naval shipyard on San Francisco Bay and home to a large African American population. On September 27, a young black man was shot and killed by police as he fled from a car that had been stolen. In response to the shooting, a large crowd gathered demanding that the police be held accountable for what many in the black community deemed excessive use of force. San Francisco officials suspended the officer pending an investigation into the incident, but this did not placate the crowd, which began jeering and even pelted with rocks a black community leader brought on to the scene to prevent the situation from getting out of hand. Subsequently, there were scattered outbreaks of looting, arson, and rock throwing throughout Hunters Point. Over the course of the next several days the unrest also spread to other sections of the city with sizable black populations. As in Chicago and Cleveland, the National Guard was called out to restore order in San Francisco. Compared to the other major riots, the casualty rates at Hunters Point were relatively low: other than the young black man killed fleeing from the stolen car, no one died and only ten civilians were injured, though several hundred thousand dollars of property damage was inflicted, generally to white-owned or official buildings and vehicles.

In addition to these major rebellions, there were numerous other disturbances, albeit on a smaller scale, over the course of the summer of 1966. These took place in Omaha, Nebraska, Benton Harbor, Michigan, Waukegan, Illinois, and the Summerhill section of Atlanta. All told, there were some 40 separate disturbances in 1966. Seven lives were lost, 400 people suffered significant injuries, 3,000 people were arrested, and property losses were estimated at $5 million.

In retrospect the disturbances of 1966 seemed simply to be a warm-up for 1967, which was by far the worst of the years for unrest. Not only did the summer provide some of the deadliest and most destructive riots – in Detroit and Newark alone 70 people were killed and an estimated $60 million in property damage was incurred – but the sheer number of disturbances was unlike anything in the modern history of the United States. All told there were more than 150 disturbances scattered across 125 cities and no section of the country emerged unscathed by the unrest. Before the five-day riot in Detroit was ended, army tanks rumbled through the city's streets and a combined force of 17,000 policemen, National Guardsmen, and army troops – some with machine guns mounted atop their jeeps – were called out. As widespread as the disturbances were, however, their root causes were all too familiar: chronic frustration with poor living conditions, the lack of economic opportunity, and perceived police brutality.

The outbreak of violence during the summer of 1967 was of sufficient severity that it prompted President Lyndon Johnson, on July 28, to establish a blue-ribbon National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, popularly known as the Kerner Commission after its chair, Otto Kerner, the governor of Illinois. The mandate of the commission was simply to report back to the president on the causes for the unrest in recent years and to recommend measures that might prevent unrest in the future. The committee delivered its report in February 1968, concluding famously that “our nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white – separate and unequal.” It noted that “segregation and poverty have created in the racial ghetto a destructive environment totally unknown to most white Americans,” and, more controversially, laid much of the blame squarely with white America: “What white Americans have never fully understood – but what the Negro can never forget – is that white society is deeply implicated in the ghetto. White institutions created it, white institutions maintain, and white society condones it.” This, of course, was what participants in the urban unrest had been saying all along and, not surprisingly, it did not settle well with either the president, who all but ignored the findings of the report, or with mainstream white America, which felt the report failed to sufficiently acknowledge recent improvements in race relations or the efforts whites had made to reach across the racial divide.

Just over a month after the release of the Kerner Commission Report, and as if to underscore the commission’s findings, another epidemic of rioting swept across the nation in the wake of the assassination of Martin Luther King on April 4, 1968. There were disturbances of a varying degree of severity in over 100 cities, the worst of which occurred in Northern urban centers with large, disaffected black populations such as New York, Chicago, Baltimore, and Washington, DC. Thirty-nine people were killed and several thousand were injured. In Washington, where some of the worst rioting occurred, peaceful demonstrations to mourn King’s passing quickly turned violent as anger and frustration were vented through vandalism, looting, and arson. At their peak, an estimated 20,000 rioters roamed the streets of Washington, coming at one point within sight of the White House. The District of Columbia’s police force was overwhelmed, prompting President Lyndon Johnson to pour over 13,000 federal troops and National Guardsmen into the nation’s capital. Soldiers patrolled the grounds of the White House and machine guns were mounted on the steps of the United States Capitol. In addition to the dozen deaths and over 1,000 injuries, property damage in excess of $30 million devastated the core of Washington’s black community.

Although there were numerous small rebellions in the years after the nationwide conflagrations that erupted in response to the assassination of Martin Luther King, the next substantial rebellion did not occur until the Miami Rebellion in the spring of 1980. The unrest centered on the largely poor and black districts in Liberty City, Coconut Grove, Overtown, and Brownsville. The roots of the disturbance went back to December 1979, when a black insurance executive by the name of Arthur McDuffie was beaten to death by four white police officers. McDuffie, riding his motorcycle, was alleged by police to have run a red light and then led the officers on a high-speed chase. After crashing his motorcycle, McDuffie tried to flee, but pursuing officers caught up to him. A scuffle ensued and during the ensuing mêlée, McDuffie received several blows to the head that proved to be fatal. In the aftermath of the incident, officers tried to make it appear that McDuffie’s death was a result of the motorcycle crash.

Unlike in many earlier rebellions, there was no immediate outburst of violence in black Miami when word of the incident spread. Indeed, following an investigation, the officers were indicted for manslaughter and put on trial in the spring of 1980. In light of the potential volatility of the situation in Miami, however, the case was tried across the state in Tampa. Eventually, on May 17, 1980, an all-white jury acquitted the officers of all charges. Fearing a backlash in black neighborhoods, community leaders quickly called for a massive but silent march of protest in Miami, but events rapidly spun out of control, as thousands of disaffected African Americans poured into the streets to vent their anger at the perceived injustice. For the next three days, blacks across Miami went on a violent rampage, looting and burning mainly white-owned property. Rioters shot at police trying to quell the violence; passengers were burned alive in their cars, and countless shops, stores, and other businesses were destroyed. More than 3,500 National Guard troops were needed to bring the rebellion to an end, but only after 18 people had died and $100 million in property damage had been incurred. Veteran civil rights activist Jesse Jackson expressed the shock of many leaders – black and white – when he described the rebellion as one of “the most bitter and mean I’ve ever seen.”

After the passage of another decade without significant unrest, the largely black community in South Central Los Angeles erupted in the spring of 1992 in one of the most serious instances of civil unrest in the history of the United States. The uprising was rooted in the classic sources for urban unrest: poverty, lack of opportunity, alienation from the mainstream of society, as well as long simmering anger over incidents of police brutality. In this case, however, there was video evidence to substantiate charges against police. In March 1991, a bystander videotaped four white Los Angeles policemen subjecting Rodney King, an African American, to a savage beating after King had led the police on a high-speed car chase and, allegedly, was violently resisting arrest. The video was widely broadcast on national television and the images provoked widespread condemnation. Subsequently, charges of using excessive force were brought against the police by the Los Angeles district attorney. Given the publicity surrounding the videotaped beating, the venue for the trial was moved to neighboring Simi Valley, which was largely white and Hispanic. On April 29, 1992, a 12-person jury – ten of whom were white and none were black – acquitted the officers of the charges.

The verdict pointedly reinforced perceptions in the black community of South Central Los Angeles that the judicial system, like the law enforcement system, was stacked against them. Only hours after the verdict was handed down, a crowd that had gathered in South Central to protest the decision began attacking non-African American passengers in vehicles passing through the community. Shortly thereafter, there were outbreaks of vandalism, looting, and violence, directed in particular at the Asian community which had a significant presence in South Central. The violence continued to escalate and lasted for nearly a week. In addition to the Los Angeles police, the National Guard was mobilized and President Bush eventually called out federal troops to help quell the violence. Tens of thousands of people were involved in the rebellion and over 12,000 arrests were made. Before it was over, 53 people had died, including 25 African Americans, 16 Hispanics, and 8 whites, and more than 4,000 people were injured. The community suffered catastrophic property damage, as hundreds of buildings were damaged or destroyed. Property losses were valued at upwards of $1 billion and affected white, Asian, and black owners.

Finally, in an incident much smaller in scale than the South Central Riot of 1992, or many of the rebellions in the 1960s, Cincinnati police, in April 2001, shot and killed an unarmed black teenager whom they had been pursuing on foot. The killing occurred in the predominantly black and poor Over-the-Rhine neighborhood, and the victim was the fifteenth African American to be killed in a series of confrontations with city police over the previous six years, fueling charges of police brutality and official callousness toward the black community. Two days later, nearly 200 black Cincinnatians interrupted a city council meeting to demand action in response to the killing. When they were rebuffed after several tense hours, the crowd reluctantly left the building but reassembled, now nearly 1,000 strong, in front of the headquarters of the police precinct where the shooting had occurred. Individuals in the crowd threw rocks and bottles at the phalanx of officers who stood guard in front of the building, and police began firing tear gas and bean-bag projectiles which dispersed the crowd. The next day, however, the demonstrations resumed and, as they moved into the heart of downtown Cincinnati, they turned violent. Protesters began to smash store windows and overturn garbage cans and street vendor stands. Over the next several days, the magnitude of the violence increased as shops were looted and burned, gunfire was exchanged with police, and the mayhem spread over a larger portion of the city. At times, non-blacks were threatened, and on several occasions assaulted, by the mob. Eventually the unrest subsided, leaving behind dozens of injuries and arrests and damage estimated at nearly $4 million. To be sure, the situation could have been much worse. Yet the Cincinnati riots were an ominous reminder that many of the root causes for civil unrest in America's urban centers during the past 60 or so years clearly persisted in the new century.

SEE ALSO: Civil Rights Movement, United States, 1960–1965; Civil Rights, United States, Black Power and Backlash, 1965–1978; Civil Rights, United States: Overview; CORE (Congress of Racial Equality); Red Summer, United States, 1919

References and Suggested Readings

- Capeci, D. (1977) The Harlem Riot of 1943. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Conot, R. (1968) Rivers of Blood, Years of Darkness. New York: William Morrow.

- Gilje, P. A. (1996). Rioting in America. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders* (1968) Washington, DC: Government Printing Office.
- Sugrue, T. J. (1996) The Origins of the Urban Crisis. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Thompson, H. A. (2001) Urban Uprisings: Riots or Rebellions? In D. Farber & B. Bailey (Eds.), The Columbia Guide to America in the 1960s. New York: Columbia University Press, pp. 109–17.

Urracá, Cacique of Veraguas (d. 1516)

Viviana Uriona

The name Urracá comes from the extended Taíno term for “Hurricane” that was introduced by the Spaniards. The name of Urracá – in the language of his group, the Bugle – was “Molenan” (Puma). He led efforts to resist Spanish forays into his territory in search of gold.

In his quest for gold, the Spaniard Gaspar de Espinosa founded the base of Natá in Urracá’s territory, but Urracá sustained the fight against the invaders for almost ten years. He used guerrilla tactics, developing an apparently weak offensive and ceding the battleground to his enemy before really starting to fight. The Spaniards, encouraged by what they thought to be the fear and weakness of the enemy, forged ahead, but in the ravines and gorges they were besieged by legions of indigenous fighters. In 1527 a powerful confederation of people against the Spaniards was organized, led by Urracá and other chieftains, Pocoa and Trota, who defied the invaders.

Francis Compañón (one of Natá’s men) was appointed by the governor Pedrarias Davila to open friendly talks with Urracá in 1531. Urracá attended a meeting, confident of good intentions, but was arrested, chained, and sent to Panama, to the city of Nombre de Dios from where he was supposed to be brought to Spain. Two days before the ship set sail, Urracá escaped. Both the official and the traditional history agree that Urracá died in 1531 or disappeared in the midst of his people.

SEE ALSO: Agüeybaná I (d. 1510) and Agüeybaná II (d. 1511); Aracaré (d. 1542); Caonabo (d. 1496); Cuahtémoc (1502–1525); Hatuey (ca. 1400s–1512);

Jumandi (d. 1578); Lautaro (d. 1557); Lemba, Sebastian (d. 1547); Lempira (d. 1537); Panama, Cemaco’s Anti-Colonial Resistance, 1510–1512; Sepé Tiarajú (1722/3–1756); Tisquesuza (d. 1537); Túpac Amaru (ca. 1540–1572); Túpac Katari (ca. 1750–1781)

References and Suggested Readings

- Alba, C. M. M. (1979) El Cacique Urracá. Revista Lotería 277. Panama-Stadt.
- Cooke, R. G. (1993) Alianzas y relaciones comerciales entre indígena y españoles durante el período de contacto: el caso de Urraca, Esquegua y los vecinos de Natá. Revista Nacional de Cultura 25, 111–22. Panama-Stadt.
- Durán, Pastor E. (2006) Natá de los “Caballeros.” Available at: www.argenpress.info/notaold.asp?num=027248 (accessed May 25, 2008).

Uruguay, labor and populist movements, 1965–present

Raul Zibechi

In the mid-1950s, economic and political crisis was apparent in Uruguay. After a long period of domestic growth and the formation of a welfare state, Uruguay’s fledgling domestic industry was battered by economic stagnation resulting from economic recovery in the core countries after the Korean War (1952) and dry weather, which reduced agricultural production.

In factories, trade unions were divided among different political ideologies, reducing the effectiveness of organizing. But in 1956, workers went on a long strike in the refrigeration industry – Uruguay’s largest (by number of workers employed) and, because of the national export of meat products, most significant industry. The powerful militant pressure emerging from among workers at the grassroots factory level forced national union leaders to rebuild bridges to the rank and file.

In 1964 the National Convention of Workers (CNT) was founded as a trade union coordinating body, planning the complete formation of a new labor federation in 1966. Concomitantly, the government, falling further into debt, signed the first Letter of Intent with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and initiated systematic alignment with the United States through adopting a program to suppress worker and labor union opposition (a policy remaining in force until March 2005) and the election of the leftist Frente Amplio (Broad Front, FA) government. From 1965 to 2005 the CNT was the most prominent association of workers' resistance in opposition to the new economic model driven by the elites.

One of the first decisions of the CNT was to build a great social alliance aimed at national Uruguayan liberation and independence from foreign economic interference. The proposal resulted in the convening of the People's Congress including, in addition to workers, students, artisans, scholars, pensioners, and small and medium producers to formulate an agenda to resolve the crisis and organize an effective popular alternative. The congress met August 12–15, 1965, with 1,376 delegates from 707 organizations representing 800,000 people, a third of the country's population. The approved program centered on three basic principles seeking to return to endogenous development – fundamental agrarian reform; nationalization of the banking system, foreign trade, and industry; and a moratorium on foreign debt. Simultaneously, the CNT promoted deepening democratic measures that would defend wages, education, health, and access to housing for the working class, peasants, and all popular sectors.

In the intervening years from 1965 to the coup d'état of 1973, the trade union movement, closely allied with students and university teachers and the cooperative movement, intensely resisted the government's effort to profoundly restructure Uruguay's economy and weaken the social movements to resolve the economic crisis in favor of the upper classes and state bureaucrats. One of the most dramatic protests surfaced in the winter of 1969 when Jorge Pacheco Areco's government called a state of emergency and martial law, severely restricting freedom of expression and social mobilization.

The urban guerilla MLN-Tupamaros (National Liberation Movement-Tupamaros), simply called Tupamaros or Tupas, challenged the state with armed propaganda actions, hijacking personalities on the right and attacking the police. Within a relative balance of forces, the government began restructuring the refrigeration industry, which entailed massive closures of large plants. At the same time, adjustment measures to the economy entailed a sharp deterioration in workers' income.

At that juncture, the main branches of production recorded long and combative strikes that led union leaders to propose a general strike to curb the country's rightward lean. After a bitter controversy within the CNT between communists and other groups (socialist, nationalist left, democrats, anarchists, and radical), it was decided not to hold the strike, since the Communist Party felt that the extreme conditions necessary to implement it were lacking. Those opposed to the communist position argued that broad sectors of workers were already on strike and that it was just a question of making the strike official to give it greater force. In fact, the communists were working to build a broad alliance that could be transferred to the electoral terrain.

From November to February 1971, the FA ran a selection of candidates in the national elections. Although the party failed to gain 20 percent of the vote, this new political force managed to break the traditional electoral bipartisanship between the National Party and the Colorado Party. In 1972, a strong police and military offensive was launched against the guerillas. The military gained prominence and began to impose conditions on the political system. In February 1973, amid a deepening military crisis, there were sharp divisions within the CNT. The communist front formed an alliance with progressive sectors of the armed forces, whom they considered peruanistas for their ostensible resemblance to the progressive government of Peruvian military leader Juan Velasco Alvarado. However, a significant portion of the social movement remained deeply mistrustful of the military.

Finally, on December 27, 1973, President Juan Maria Bordaberry dissolved parliament and installed a dictatorial government, consolidating power throughout Uruguay with the backing of the armed forces. The trade union movement organized resistance to the military coup d'état by launching a general strike that included sit-downs and occupation of workplaces. The strike lasted 15 days before a major military onslaught crushed the labor action and all forms of protest. The military fiercely suppressed working-class resistance, banning the CNT, the student movement, and left-wing parties and declaring unlawful any form of political activity and social protest. CNT leaders and activists were arrested and those who escaped went into hiding or exile.

The military regime engaged in state repression, imprisoning tens of thousands of people over a period of 12 years.

Under the dictatorship, union locals were occupied by the armed forces and any attempt at union organization was suppressed. By breaking social resistance, the regime was able to impose an export-focused economic model and completely abandon endogenous development, putting an end to social rights. This left thousands of people unemployed and resulted in a sharp drop in real wages.

Beginning in 1982, however, the workers' movement revived. Trade unionists created new groups to oppose the legislation imposed by the dictatorship, which also continued to crush students. On May 1, 1983, labor activists and supporters founded the Workers' Interunion Plenary (PIT), a horizontally based assembly representing the first broad-based public opposition to the dictatorship. The massive popular mobilization encouraged the formation of new social organizations that shaped the formation of a popular working-class campaign for democracy, known as the Intersocial, an association encompassing labor, students, cooperatives, and the human rights movement.

The consolidation of opposition at the grassroots level ushered in a new cycle of popular social movements that placed the military regime on the defensive. Former trade union leaders and banned political parties began to return from exile. Under pressure, the regime called elections for November 1984 but did not allow Liber Seregni, leader of the FA, or Wilson Ferreira Aldunate to participate, thus facilitating the triumph of rightist Julio María Sanguinetti, leader of the Colorado Party, and ensuring the continuation of a state of repression against workers and peasants.

The trade union movement went through painful transformations in that year. The return en masse of exiled party and trade union leaders hindered the construction of a new culture and social association. Thereafter, a similar logic that had prevailed in the CNT was reestablished in a movement dominated by the Communist Party (which had been most active in the clandestine resistance to the dictatorship), renamed the PIT-CNT. A major crisis soon developed within the movement, leading to a split during the Third Congress held in 1985. An Extraordinary Congress held in 1986 reconciled the different ideological currents, but the internal crisis had weakened the movement.

In the ensuing years the battle of the human rights movement against military oppression was at the center of social protest. In late 1986, parliament adopted a controversial law that provided amnesty for military officials who had violated human rights during the dictatorship, thereby preventing the delivery of justice. The popular reaction was impressive: in less than a month, more than 300 neighborhood commissions, acting without party or social organization backing, were created in Montevideo to demand a referendum to repeal the law on amnesty. In this powerful social movement that was decentralized and dispersed throughout the country, young people and women, who had had little involvement in the institutionalized movement, played a prominent role.

This movement transformed Uruguayan society. For a year, thousands of activists traveled throughout the country to large urban areas and small towns in remote rural areas, collecting signatures as they sought at least 25 percent of the electorate to call for a plebiscite to challenge the law that gave the military immunity for crimes against humanity. While the referendum of April 1989 was won by those who sought to prevent trials of crimes against humanity, the human rights movement expanded its influence throughout Uruguayan society to people who had previously never been in contact with the popular forces and burgeoning social movements. The political campaign successfully broke patronage barriers and questioned the control of solidly ensconced regional political institutions and leaders. Through the growth of grassroots protest by youth and workers, a new democratic political culture emerged that parted significantly from traditional forms of institutional representation, leading the way for the extension and solidification of social protest in the 1990s.

In 1989, the year in which the referendum was defeated, leftists won the mayor's office in Montevideo, home to half of Uruguay's population, for the first time. The human rights movement had played a major role in that victory, but, following a national tradition, had never openly expressed its electoral preferences and policies.

The 1990s was a decade of neoliberal market reforms, including plans to promote labor flexibility and dismantle the domestic industry, particularly textiles and metallurgy. In the early 1990s the government, at the instigation of foreign multilateral organizations and capital, sought to end agreements governing the tripartite negotiation of wages and working conditions between employers, unions, and the state. The model inspired by the Washington Consensus weakened the union movement, especially in private companies. The PIT–CNT experienced some of the most acute problems in its history, with a substantial drop in membership and a decline in its national influence. Traditional forms of struggle – strikes and pressure on the authorities – failed to have a positive effect on building the movement.

However, the movement did succeed in halting the privatization of public enterprises, appealing for a referendum on the basis of the experience gained by the human rights movement. In 1992, a broad coalition in which unions in state enterprises played a decisive role managed to halt the imminent privatization wave triggered by the neoliberal administration of Luis Alberto Lacalle. The recent Argentinian experience, where massive privatization driven by President Carlos Menem engendered a huge social cost, provided an example that made the Uruguayan movement's arguments more convincing. In the years that followed, the movement used referendums, which were generally successful, to prevent further privatization and to help the state regain full control of basic resources such as water.

Thanks largely to the active role played by social movements since the end of the dictatorship in 1985, the first government of the left assumed control in 2005. This new situation represented an unprecedented challenge for the social movements. The unions held a congress before the electoral triumph of the FA in which they reaffirmed their independence from political parties but proclaimed that they would not remain indifferent to any debatable aspects of government policies. The new government established smooth relations with the trade unions, reinstated collective bargaining, and awarded wage increases and improvements in working conditions, thereby promoting a remarkable growth in union membership. For the first time in decades, unions regained prominence.

Broadly speaking, the trade union movement recognized the positive aspects of the government of the left (in areas such as wages, health, human rights, and the fight against poverty), but criticized economic policy and the government's alignment with the administration of George W. Bush. In March 2007, social movements and trade unions staged a large demonstration on the day President Bush arrived in Uruguay to express their opposition to the possible signing of a free trade agreement (FTA) with the United States.

The triumph of the left fostered a change in the social and cultural climate that enabled the expansion of new movements. Great strides were made toward sexual diversity rights, and women gained freedom through the decriminalization of abortion. The construction of two large pulp mills brought the country's small environmentalist movement to the forefront. The question of appropriate economic models was taken up by the PIT–CNT, which before the elections had argued for the return to a manufacturing economy against the service economy promoted by financial neoliberals.

In 2008, the social movements convened their Second Congress of the People to define and debate future directions. Leaders argued that just as the congress of 1965 had provided a decisive influence in the program that moved the country to the left after 1971, so the new congress could influence the government in the changed economic climate of 2008, pushing for a new model of endogenous development that involved parting ways with neoliberalism.

SEE ALSO: Artigas, Gervasio José (1764–1850); Tupamaros; Uruguay, Left-Wing Politics from the Tupamaros to the Frente Amplio; Velasco Alvarado, Juan Francisco (1910–1977)

References and Suggested Readings

- Botaro, J. (1985) 25 años de movimiento sindical uruguayo. Montevideo: ASU.
- Chagas, J. & Tonarelli, M. (1989) El sindicalismo uruguayo bajo la dictadura. Montevideo: Nuevo Mundo.
- Elissalde, R. (2003) Under the Umbrella. New Internationalist 26, 2 (May 1).
- Remedi, G. (2004) Carnival Theatre: Uruguay's Popular Performers and National Culture. Trans. A. Ferlazzo. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Winn, P. (1995) Frente Amplio in Montevideo. NACLA Report on the Americas 29 (1).
- Zibechi, R. (1997) La revuelta juvenil de los 90. Las redes sociales en la gestación de una cultura alternativa. Montevideo: Nordan.

Uruguay, left-wing politics from the Tupamaros to the Frente Amplio

Raul Zibechi

Until the early 1960s the left in Uruguay occupied a marginal position in the political arena and had a significant presence only in the trade union movement. In barely three decades, the left emerged as the hegemonic force in the country, rising to an absolute majority in the 2004 elections. Established in 1971, the Frente Amplio (Broad Front) has demonstrated a remarkable and sustained progression. Previously divided, the left obtained less than 5 percent of the vote until it unified and leaped to 18 percent in the 1971 election, bringing to an end the dominant bipartisanship maintained by the Colorado and National parties. Since 1971, the left vote has never ceased to grow, reaching a record 51 percent in the election that brought Tabare Vazquez to the presidency (2005–10).

The factors behind the surge in support for the left reflect the cultural, political, and social history of Uruguay, and especially the failure of the neoliberal model that destroyed the country's homogeneous social fabric and weakened the most robust state welfare in Latin America. The Uruguayan left is the legacy of a tradition forged during the 1903–7 and the 1911–15 administrations of President José Batlle y Ordóñez, which laid the foundations for a modern state separated from the economic elites that, in turn, created vast social democratic forms of social legislation. Historians agree that unlike most of Latin America, Uruguay never had an oligarchy forcing its dominant economic groups to “delegate” the state administration to professional politicians.

Under these circumstances, the left found it difficult to establish a base in a socially and ethnically integrated society that was heavily buffered by the cultural hegemony of the middle layers, composed of professionals, skilled workers, and a large mass of public employees. The political map was monopolized by the Colorado Party, rooted in Montevideo and the most prosperous cities, and the National Party (also known as the White Party), of rural origins, which had remained at the helm of the country since the founding of the republic. It was not until the recovery of the core countries and the crisis in the industrial model revealed the limits of the country's dependence, with the implementation of the prescriptions of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in the late 1950s, that the left lost its marginal position in Uruguay's political landscape.

During this decade, the trade union movement led some major conflicts, especially in the meat-packing industry and then in the textile industry, in response to the growing unemployment generated by the economic crisis and the closure of large factories. At the same time, a young law student with a socialist political background settled in the north of the county and began organizing workers in the rural sector, which had until then been marginalized from the national trade unions. Led by Raúl Sendic, the cane and beet sugar industry workers created their first organizations in the early 1960s.

In search of solidarity to combat the harsh repression against their movement, cane-cutters sought the support of urban organized sectors and conducted long marches to the capital city of Montevideo. These actions marked the origins of one sector of the Uruguayan left, a sector that was non-traditional and sharply differentiated from socialists and communists since it relied on direct action and later lent its support to armed struggle. The sugar cane workers' organization Artigas Sugar Workers' Union (UTAA) was the first solid social base of what in the mid-1960s would become the National Liberation Movement-Tupamaros (MNL-T).

In a few years the Tupamaros obtained what the traditional left had not achieved in decades: it placed the social problems and desperate situation of the poorest at the center of the political stage. With ingenious armed propaganda actions, it caught the attention of the middle sectors (students and professionals in particular) and succeeded in uniting the broad discontent bred by the increasing economic crisis devastating the country.

The final years of the 1960s were plagued by strikes, demonstrations, and mass actions led by trade unions and student organizations. In this climate, both the Tupamaros and the traditional left experienced a significant quantitative growth. Two major trends developed within the social movements: the communists became interested in channeling social conflicts into the electoral terrain; and an informal alliance developed between the Tupamaros, socialists, anarchists, and “radical” groups who favored direct action. The 1967 ban on several radical organizations and newspapers by the conservative administration of President Jorge Pacheco Areco indirectly benefited the presence and visibility of the communists in the social movement.

As the state of emergency (curfews, suspension of individual rights) became routine and relations between the social movements and the opposition became increasingly tense, urban guerilla actions were met sympathetically among broad sectors of the population. In these circumstances the communists initiated the formation of a broad electoral front. Named the Broad Front (Frente Amplio, FA), this new electoral grouping was founded on February 5, 1971. Overcoming old enmities, communists and socialists joined together for the first time. Although the Tupamaros did not formally support the FA, organizations identified with the armed struggle joined the alliance. Christian Democrats joined the FA as well as dissident sectors from the Colorado Party – among them former cabinet member Zelmar Michelini – the White Party, and nationalists. Only anarchists rejected participation in the Broad Front.

The forging of unity among such heterogeneous forces was not an easy task. It was the communists who showed greater flexibility to attract allies, giving in on the most confrontational issues. In a moment of great political polarization with the guerillas and unions, the left managed to appoint Liber Seregni – a former general with a long and distinguished career – as head of the FA. As a leader he showed brilliant strategic skills, prioritizing negotiation and dialogue over confrontation and the widening spectrum of alliances – attitudes which at the time could be attacked as overly pragmatic, but almost always paid rich dividends.

The unity and legitimacy of the newly founded FA were reinforced by the 1973–85 dictatorship. Since the reinstatement of democracy, the left had regained not only its legality but also a very prominent place in the political arena. The public recognition of their leaders transcended political boundaries and ideologies, not only in the case of Seregni but also that of the Tupamaro leader Sendic, who bravely endured 13 years of torture and imprisonment in harsh conditions, spending months in prison cells ankle-deep in water. The dictatorship consolidated the left’s identity, both at the grassroots level and at the leadership level, through a sort of “blood pact” that sealed loyalties.

It was during the period of authoritarian rule that the left became dominant in major cultural events and collective daily life. Despite harsh repression and mass migration, left-wing culture managed to preserve itself within the family, and later reproduced itself through the existence of strong bonds of solidarity. The left attained cultural hegemony long before obtaining the electoral majority. The public university and theater have constituted, for more than half a century, the bulwark of a non-partisan middle-sector left. By the 1960s, left-wing culture was already hegemonic among professionals and academics. Over the years, leftist sympathies became relevant in popular music, carnival, and major mass demonstrations, and were also prevalent among some leading football stars, who made no secret of their preference for the FA. From 1990, the left’s successful management of the municipality of Montevideo, where half the country’s population lives, was crucial in strengthening and deepening its social and cultural hegemony. This hegemony is grounded in the acknowledgment that the central ideas embodying the FA – the welfare state, honest government, national sovereignty, social justice, among others – have become “common sense” for Uruguayans in the early twenty-first century.

From its inception, the FA’s original contribution to the political culture of the country became one of the keys to its acceptance by the population: the grassroots committees where militants and activists of all the different currents come together. With a dense network of committees from its foundation, the FA sought to penetrate society on a committee basis, with militants and activists from all currents. The dense network of committees became spaces for socialization, through which a frenteamplista identity was forged that subsumed the previous identities of the different organizations in the FA. This is one of the peculiarities of the Uruguayan left: the unit is much more than the sum of its parts.

The FA’s organizational network is impressive. In 2000, the FA had 207,000 affiliates – in a country of three million people, this figure represents slightly more than one in every ten adults. In the 1999 election the FA obtained approximately 800,000 votes, which meant that at least one in ten registered voters was organized within the committee networks of the FA. Currently there exist around 300 committees, but during the democratic transition 500 committees were formed in Montevideo alone (in a city of 1.2 million inhabitants) – one committee for every 2,500 inhabitants. This kind of network not only sustains the growth of the Uruguayan left but also ensures its permanence, despite socialist failures and their consecutive electoral defeats.

Supporters pay a monthly fee, choose the leaders of their own committee, and elect the leadership of the FA. Committees are grouped into zones, of which there are 18 in Montevideo and a similar number nationally. The grassroots elect delegates to the National Plenary and the National Political Bureau – the FA's permanent governing bodies between congresses. Being frenteamplista meant much more than voting every five years, an attitude that reflected the best political traditions of the social democratic sector of the Colorado Party, known as batllismo. José Batlle y Ordóñez, the popular president from 1903 to 1907 and from 1911 to 1915, fought for unemployment compensation, eight-hour workdays, and universal suffrage.

A significant milestone for the growth of the left was the 1986 adoption of the law declaring the expiration of crimes against human rights perpetrated during the military dictatorship (1973–85). Adopted with the support of both the Colorado and White parties, the legislation granted virtual immunity from prosecution to members of the military involved in illegal repression against leftists and popular leaders. For a population accustomed to living in a country with political and legal equality, the “impunity law” was a severe blow to their social consciousness. In response, an impressive social movement to repeal the law was formed through the creation of 300 neighborhood committees throughout the country, including not only frenteamplistas but also progressive members of the Colorado and White parties.

The campaign lasted two years and created a genuine social dialogue among ordinary citizens. In order to collect the 25 percent of the total number of registered voters required to call a referendum to repeal the law, local activists carried out home visits among neighbors to explain the importance of their demand. In all, 30,000 activists took part in the campaign, visiting approximately 80 percent of all households in the country and talking to more than one million people, sometimes returning to a household two, three, and up to seven times to obtain a signature.

This was the biggest social movement ever in Uruguay, and it changed the face of the country, despite the fact that in April 1989, 42 percent voted to repeal the law of impunity, while over 56 percent voted to retain it. The campaign, however, helped the left to break its historical boundaries by bringing thousands of activists into rural areas. Shortly afterward, the left won the municipal elections for the first time in the capital city of Montevideo.

Through massive mobilization, the left was able not only to halt privatization and neoliberalism but also to recover the powerful statist tradition that began with batllismo. The referendum of 1992 against privatization had the backing of 70 percent, although the left still did not reach 30 percent of the vote. At the height of privatization worldwide, Uruguayans’ “common sense” pointed in the opposite direction. The crisis of neoliberalism finally hastened the end of right-wing governments in Uruguay, and the victory of the left was only a matter of time. Trends in society as well as generational impulses were eroding irreversibly the hegemony of the traditional parties.

The 2002 economic recession ushered in by the Argentine crisis dealt a death blow to the right. Between January and July 2002, the country risk index for Uruguay rose from 220 to 3,000 points; 45 percent of bank deposits were repatriated out of the country; the price of the dollar doubled; and gross domestic product was equivalent to half that for 1998. Unemployment climbed to 20 percent and the percentage of the population below the poverty line reached 40 percent. The crisis facilitated the electoral triumph of the left. The collapse of the Colorado Party gives an idea of the enormity of the change: it passed within a few years from commanding more than 40 percent of popular support to a mere 10 percent of the vote in 2002.

The FA maintained its meteoric electoral progression. In 1994 it obtained 30 percent of the vote and was only two points short of winning. For the next election, the right amended the constitution and increased the voting age, seeking to hinder an eventual left-wing victory. In 1999, the FA rose again, reaching 44 percent in the second round. Finally, in November 2004, it received 51 percent of the vote to form the first left-wing government in Uruguay on March 1, 2005.

SEE ALSO: MRTA (Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru); Sendic, Raúl (1926–1989); Tupamaros; Uruguay, Labor and Populist Movements, 1965–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Blixen, S. (2004) Sendic. Montevideo: Trilce.
- Caetano, G. et al. (1995) La izquierda uruguaya. Tradición, innovación y política. Montevideo: Trilce.
- Demasi, C. (Ed.) (1998) Cronología del Uruguay de la crisis y de la dictadura, 1967–1984. Montevideo: Facultad de Humanidades y Ciencias.
- Turiansky, W. (1997) El Uruguay desde la izquierda. Montevideo: Cal y Canto.

US labor rebellions and the rise of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO)

Harris Freeman

The year 1934 was a turning point in the US class struggle. That year, militant strikes by truckers in Minneapolis, auto parts workers in Toledo, and longshoremens in San Francisco spurred broad labor solidarity in these cities, transforming the strikes into massive working-class social upheavals. These three strikes, all led by revolutionary-minded workers, proved to be strategic victories for industrial unionism and paved the way for the organization of basic industry in the United States by the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO).

By 1934, the Great Depression that began in 1929 had thrown almost one-third of the workforce, more than 15 million workers, onto the streets. Union membership had fallen from a high of over four million in 1920 to a low of around two million in 1933. As one historian put it, these figures are history's sad commentary on the American Federation of Labor's policy of favoring craft unionism in a country dominated by a mass production economy.

From the start of the 1929 economic collapse, US President Herbert Hoover, backed by the bulk of the employing class, resisted every measure to provide federal assistance for the hungry and homeless. Nevertheless, fearing the political consequences of what was widely seen as a brutal, repressive government labor policy, Congress enacted important labor reforms. In 1932, the Norris-LaGuardia Act outlawed the yellow-dog contract (in which employees agree, as a condition of employment, not to be a member of a labor union), proclaimed the right to organize unions as federal policy, and restricted the ability of the federal courts to issue labor injunctions to suppress the right to strike. This did not stop local police and federal troops from unleashing brutal attacks on unemployed workers' demonstrations in the summer of 1932. Indeed, neither Democrats nor Republicans protested the use of tanks and tear gas against hunger marchers that year.

Labor rights and working-class relief were not on the mainstream political agenda during the 1932 presidential election campaign. The platform of the Democratic presidential nominee, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, other than a vague call for a new deal, differed little from that of the Republicans. As his future labor secretary, Frances Perkins, would later explain, "the New Deal was not a plan with form or content." His victory over President Hoover was unsurprising. Roosevelt did not need to present a program for working-class relief to win the election; it was widely stated at the time that even Mickey Mouse could have defeated Hoover in 1932.

Roosevelt's first 100 days were dominated by relieving the distress facing American business. In the meantime, the industrial working class had grown impatient. A. J. Muste, leader of the Toledo Auto-Lite strike, recounts that "all hell began to pop" in early 1933. "Strike followed strike with bewildering rapidity." That year the number of work stoppages doubled to 1,856 actions and the number of strikes increased fourfold, involving more than 1,100,000 workers. The strike activity, focused primarily on union recognition and wage increases, began even before the National Industrial Recovery Act (NIRA) was signed by Roosevelt in mid-June. Initially, the NIRA did not even address collective bargaining rights. It was only after protests by American Federation of Labor (AFL) President William Green and pressure from United Mine Workers' (UMW) leader John L. Lewis that Roosevelt added Section 7(a) to the NIRA.

However, Section 7(a)'s support for the right to organize was so vague that it was interpreted to recognize the then-flourishing company-dominated unions side by side with genuine labor organizations. It offered nothing by way of rights or remedies that were not already offered by the Norris-LaGuardia Act. But its enactment did spur the US labor leadership to authorize more organizing. The immediate results were huge. In two months the UMW signed up 300,000 workers and the International Ladies' Garment Workers signed up 150,000. But the NIRA's enactment could not protect workers from the employer's bitter resistance to the new wave of union organizing.

This was seen most clearly in the failed textile strike led by the AFL's United Textile Workers of America (UTW). The UTW's membership mushroomed from around 50,000 to over 400,000 by mid-1934. In August, the UTW delegates called a national strike for recognition and the 30-hour workweek at the pay scale for the 48-hour workweek established by NIRA. Over 400,000 workers headed the union call. The New York Times expressed alarm at the flying picket squads, women workers' active role in picketing, and the military efficiency of the strikers. The employers responded with a brutal reign of terror. In the South, this included armed racist mobs whipped into frenzy by red baiting promoted by the mainstream press. Throughout New England, National Guard troops occupied mill towns. The AFL failed to provide the kind of leadership needed to win this battle. Fortunately, labor battles fought in the spring and summer of 1934 in Minneapolis, Toledo, and San Francisco led by groups and individuals not tied to the old ways of the AFL shifted the momentum of the class struggle.

Toledo, Ohio, a little Detroit built on the glass and auto parts industries, was decimated by the Depression. The city's major employer of 28,000 crumbled in bankruptcy and one out of three workers was on relief. A unique political feature of the Toledo workers' movement was the formation in 1933 of the Lucas County Unemployed League, led by A. J. Muste, a Dutch-born preacher and veteran leader of the 1919 textile strike in Lawrence, Massachusetts. Muste became dean of the Brookwood Labor College in 1921 where he trained many who rose to prominence in the 1930s workers' movement. He also formed a small revolutionary organization, the American Workers' Party (AWP). Under the AWP's leadership the Unemployed League led mass actions of the Toledo unemployed, winning cash relief for them. Importantly, the League operated on broad labor solidarity principles, mobilizing the unemployed not to scab and to aid strikes.

In this context, the fight for industrial rights began in 1933 with the AFL chartering of Federal Local 18384 to organize workers at the Toledo Auto-Lite factory. A February strike was called demanding recognition, a 10 percent wage hike, and seniority. It was quickly ended by AFL leaders who sought a negotiated agreement mediated through NIRA's National Labor Board. When the company refused to negotiate, the Local called a second strike in April. But fewer than half the workers followed the Local and the boss hired strikebreakers to keep the plant operating. Picketing at the factory gates threatened to shut the plant and the employer sought and was granted a court injunction limiting the pickets to 25 at each factory entrance. The union officials obeyed the terms of the injunction, and in three weeks the company had secured 1,800 scabs to work at the Auto-Lite factory.

The strike seemed doomed until a group of union members approached the Unemployed League. Soon, unemployed workers joined the picket line to support the strike and AWP leader Louis Budenz suggested the tactic of disobeying the court injunction with mass picketing. Two Unemployed League officers, Sam Pollack and Ted Selander, along with several auto Local members, wrote Judge Roy. R. Stuart advising him that they would violate the injunction and encourage mass picketing. When League members blocked the entrance to the factory gates, they were arrested on contempt of court charges and released on suspended sentences. They immediately returned to the picket lines. The company responded with hired armed guards, special deputies to protect the scabs, and the storing of munitions in the plant.

Budenz soon addressed a series of rallies during the week of May 21 outside the Auto-Lite factory. Over the course of the week, the crowds grew so that by Wednesday, May 23, a crowd of 10,000 strikers and unemployed were massed outside the Auto-Lite plant. The Battle of Toledo began here with street fighting that continued from mid-afternoon until midnight, effectively imprisoning 1,500 scabs inside the factory. National Guard troops were called out and a pitched battle involving tear gas, bricks, and bullets occurred on the streets of Toledo for six days. Strikers and their supporters not only fought the Guard, they engaged them in dialogue to try to win them over to the cause. Some Guardsmen quit and others voiced support for the strike. Nevertheless, the Guard killed two strikers and wounded 25. It was not until Friday, May 31 that the troops were withdrawn when the company agreed to close the plant to scabs. By that time, however, 98 out of 99 of the AFL local unions voted for a general strike. That day 40,000 workers gathered at the courthouse square protesting the arrest of over 200 strikers.

By June 4, an agreement was reached. Local 18384 was deemed the exclusive bargaining agent at Auto-Lite; it was the first agreement that did not include proportional representation for a company-sponsored union. The six-month contract also required the company to rehire all strikers and granted a 5 percent wage increase. By year's end 19 auto parts plants were organized in Toledo. Within a year, the first successful strike at a General Motors auto plant occurred, beginning the union's conquest of the largest manufacturing firm in the US.

Even before the Toledo Auto-Lite strike erupted, the ground was being laid in Minneapolis for a campaign that transformed the International Brotherhood of Teamsters from a stodgy craft union, with 80,000 members nationwide, into a powerful labor union organized along industrial lines. The city's role as a distribution hub for the upper Midwest region provided the objective conditions for this campaign. In the course of the Depression, thousands of displaced and unemployed railwaymen, lumberjacks, miners, farmers, and their families from throughout the upper Midwest ended up in Minneapolis, Minnesota. Their movement into Minneapolis reinforced an already established multi-ethnic working class with a rich tradition of class struggle born of historic ties to the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and the Socialist Party traditions of Eugene Debs. The overall political climate in the state was also favorable. Farmer-Labor Party governor of Minnesota at that time, Floyd Olsen, was among the most left wing of elected officials in the nation, proclaiming, "I am not a liberal . . . I am a radical" who wanted "a definite change in the system." However, unionism in the city was thwarted by a powerful business organization. The Citizens' Alliance had for more than 20 years used espionage, stool pigeons, and thugs to do whatever was necessary to thwart unionism in Minneapolis.

In this stew, a small cadre of revolutionary communist workers cooked up a plan in 1930 to transform Teamster General Local 574 into an industrial union encompassing drivers, helpers, and warehouse workers. The radical leadership included Ray and Vince Dunne, brothers and communists with a long history of union organizing experience and participation in the IWW, and Carl Skoglund, a Swedish immigrant, veteran railroad worker, and founder of the American Communist Party (CP). By 1934, all were collaborators of James Cannon, a founding leader of the American CP who was expelled for allying with Leon Trotsky, the Russian revolutionary who led the fight against Stalinism. Cannon's group organized into the Communist League (CL). The CL's Minneapolis cadre provided leadership and a strategy that in the winter of 1934 quickly and decisively organized the city's coal yard truckers into Local 574. In the course of this first stage of the Minneapolis struggle, the Dunne brothers and Skoglund recruited coal yard worker Farrell Dobbs to the CL. Dobbs went on to become a central figure in the anti-Stalinist left and the key leader of the Teamster rebellion in the city and then architect of the drive that successfully organized over-the-road truckers throughout the Midwest.

The victory in the coal yards led Local 574 to push for unionizing all drivers and helpers in a city where trucking was at the center of its economic life. By spring of 1934, thousands had joined Local 574. At the end of April the union placed its demands before the trucking bosses: closed shop and recognition of Local 574, a hefty wage demand, and premium pay for overtime. Backed by the Citizens' Alliance, whose pedigree included smashing the 1916 drivers' strike, the trucking owners categorically rejected the demands. On May 12, Local 574 voted to strike.

The union rented a garage that served as strike headquarters where thousands gathered each night. A 75-person rank-and-file strike committee took the lead. A kitchen was set up that fed up to 10,000 workers each day, staffed round the clock by a women's auxiliary. Picket captains stationed on major roads throughout the city phoned in messages on scab truck movements. Flying picket squads of strikers were dispatched to stop any truck without union clearance. Nothing moved except unionized coal, ice, and milk trucks. Thirty-five thousand building workers walked off work in solidarity as did the city's taxi drivers. The union published The Organizer, a daily strike newspaper, a first for the US labor movement, with runs of 10,000 each day.

Within days newspaper editorials red baited the strike. The Citizens' Alliance organized its members, deputized by the local police. Pitched battles created casualties on both sides. In the largest confrontation on May 22, 1,500 police and armed strikebreakers, sworn in as deputies, attacked a gathering of 20,000 strikers. Known as the "Battle of Deputies Run," the strikers defeated the cops and strikebreakers in vicious hand-to-hand combat. Union members soon were directing traffic in the street of the market where the battle occurred. A tentative agreement was then reached on May 25 with the aid of Governor Olsen and the regional office of the National Labor Board that banned discrimination in hiring and promotion and recognized seniority; wages remained under discussion. Among the more problematic features of the accord was lack of clarity as to who was an employee of the trucking firms, i.e., the employers sought to exclude "inside" warehouse workers from Local 574's jurisdiction. Both sides prepared for a resumption of class struggle.

The May 25 agreement quickly broke down as the trucking bosses refused to rehire strike leaders and did not engage in any serious negotiations on wages or other terms. Red baiting attacks on Local 574 resumed in the major media. The international president of the Teamsters, Dan Tobin, an opponent of industrial unionism, joined in the red baiting attack on Local 574's leadership. In early July, Local 574 struck again. After more than two weeks during which no trucks moved without union approval, the trucking bosses staged an ambush on strikers who arrived at a major city market in their vehicles to stop the movement of a scab truck. The 50 heavily armed police who guarded the truck opened fire on picketers. Two picketers died and 65 others were wounded. Later that night a journalist at the hospital reported that almost all the strikers had bullet wounds on the backs of their head, arms, and shoulders. The cops shot the workers as they ran away from the bullet fire. One striker, Henry Ness, a World War I veteran, had 37 bullets in his body. One hundred strike leaders including Local 574 president Bill Browne and the Dunne brothers were arrested. The next day, a mass funeral march of more than 20,000 accompanied Ness's body as it moved to the strike headquarters. The governor now proclaimed martial law and ordered more than 4,000 National Guard troops to Minneapolis.

In the face of military strikebreaking, a protracted struggle by the union continued for five weeks. The union ultimately won its demand for broad representation of truckers, helpers, as well as the inside workers. Within two years, the union had collective bargaining agreements with 500 Minneapolis employers. Local 574 and its revolutionary leadership soon moved on to be the organizing hub for an expansive campaign that organized over-the-road truckers in the upper Mississippi Valley.

In the 1920s labor conditions on the San Francisco docks were among the worst of any industrialized city. Longshoremen referred to the shape-up system of hiring on the docks as the "slave market." Thousands of men would descend upon the docks each morning with no certainty of employment. Employers would pick who they wanted, leaving others without any work. Kickbacks, favoritism, nepotism, and all forms of corruption were endemic to this casual labor market. Given these conditions, it is not surprising that 95 percent of longshoremen on San Francisco's Embarcadero joined the International Longshoremen's Association (ILA) in the summer of 1933.

When the ILA leaders failed to take any steps to challenge the hated shape-up, a militant rank-and-file movement took shape. In the winter of 1934, this movement called a West Coast convention, excluded the union's paid officers as delegates, and called for a strike if the shape-up was not replaced with a union-sponsored hiring hall. The most prominent leader of this bottom-up movement was Harry Bridges, an Australian seaman with a Wobbly (IWW) past, revolutionary politics, and close ties to the Communist Party members who worked in this industry. Bridges was elected as chairman of the San Francisco strike committee. On May 9, longshoremen struck in major ports from Seattle and Tacoma to Oakland and San Francisco and as far south as San Diego. The strike was not officially sanctioned by the ILA but still involved between 10,000 and 15,000 members. It soon spread to other seamen and involved over 25,000 workers. Attempts to thwart the strikers were made by their own union's president, Joseph Ryan, who first repudiated the main strike demand – the union hiring hall. After the strikers repudiated this effort, he tried to negotiate separate agreements at each port. This too failed. The strikers, like the truckers in Minneapolis, were red baited by the employer groups and William Green, AFL president.

As had happened in Minneapolis, on July 5 shipping bosses orchestrated a violent assault on strikers in San Francisco, the West Coast's strike center. The "Battle of Rincon Hill" resulted in the deaths of two strikers and wounded more than 100 others. The response to this assault on the longshoremen was the fabled San Francisco general strike. For two days, the working class brought the city to a standstill. The workers directed traffic and assumed many municipal tasks. Workers in other industries and trades began formulating and pressing their own demands. Over 130,000 workers joined the strike. The San Francisco Central Labor Council eventually backed the strike after previously branding the strike leadership as "communist." The Council's conservative leadership then attempted to orchestrate a quick ending to a labor uprising that was spreading to other cities on the West Coast.

More than 4,000 National Guardsmen entered the city. The Los Angeles Times wrote that the events in San Francisco were being improperly labeled as a general strike. Rather, "[w]hat is actually in progress is an insurrection; a Communist inspired and led revolt against organized government." The editors wrote that the revolt must be put down "with any force necessary." Over 30 gangs of vigilantes raided the offices of socialist, communist, and IWW offices. Over 300 were jailed. The strike ended with a poor settlement – arbitration. However, the workers returned to work as an organized body and guerilla job actions and quickie strikes gave ongoing expression to the demands of the longshoremen. Within a year, job actions won union hiring halls on the docks up and down the West Coast.

The examples of the union battles in Toledo, Minneapolis, and San Francisco – all led by revolutionary, class-conscious Marxists – showed the way for the even larger class battles that followed in 1936–7. But it was these struggles that demonstrated to future CIO leader John L. Lewis that the American working class had the potential to construct a social movement to transform the industrial landscape. Saul Alinsky, radical organizer and biographer of Lewis, noted that Lewis observed these battles and became convinced that American workers "were seething and aching to be organized so they could strike back . . . America was becoming more class conscious than at any time in its history."

SEE ALSO: Alinsky, Saul (1909–1972) and the Industrial Areas Foundation; Cannon, James P. (1890–1974) and American Trotskyism; Debs, Eugene (1855–1926); Industrial Workers of the World (IWW); Labor Revolutionary Currents, United States, 20th Century; Socialist Party, United States

References and Suggested Readings

- Bernstein, I. (1970) A History of the American Worker, 1933–1941: Turbulent Years. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.
- Boyer, R. & Morais, H. (1955) Labor's Untold Story. New York: United Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers of America.
- Brecher, J. (1997) STRIKE! Cambridge, MA: South End Press.
- Dobbs, F. (1972) Teamster Rebellion. New York: Pathfinder Press.
- Preis, A. (1964) Labor's Giant Step: Twenty Years of the CIO. New York: Pathfinder Press.
- Smith, S. (2006) Subterranean Fire: A History of Working-Class Radicalism in the US. Chicago: Haymarket Books.
- Yellen, S. (1936) American Labor Struggles, 1877–1934. New York: Monad Press.

Utopian communities, United States

Richard Goff

In 1516 Thomas More, an English lawyer, statesman, and humanist scholar, published Utopia, a fantastic traveler's tale taking place in the "New World." Inspired by the voyages of Amerigo Vespucci, More imagined an idyllic island nation governed by a communitarian and egalitarian ethos that sharply contrasted with the corruption and materialism of England. While More's book, part satire, part social critique, was never intended as blueprint for a society, the term "utopian" (which literally means "no place") has since come to describe intentional attempts to create "perfect" societies, separated from the rest of the world.

Although More's description of life in the New World was hardly accurate, his choice to place

Utopia in the newly discovered lands across the Atlantic was prophetic. America has been the repository of the hopes and dreams of a multitude of reformers, radicals, and revolutionaries. In 1630 John Winthrop's "city on the hill" sermon argued that in the New World it would be possible to correct the evils of mankind. Many Puritans left behind the turmoil of revolutionary England to settle in the "wilderness" of Massachusetts Bay and carve out their utopia, an orderly Christian society that would stand as a model for all others. Although the Puritans never achieved their city on the hill, they contributed to the notion that America is, quoting James Madison, "useful in proving things before held impossible." More's Utopia also predicted the role of the Atlantic as being the conduit through which Europeans, frustrated with the decaying feudal order or dismayed with the emerging capitalist one, would find fertile ground for social experimentation. European communalists, both religious and secular, have flocked to the New World, particularly to the American West, looking for an opportunity to make the world anew.

Since the American Revolution, the United States has hosted a multitude of utopian communities motivated by faith, ideology, and lifestyle choice. Although these communities are often dismissed as hopeless creations of ideologues or simply as failures, they represent significant, and quite often practical, attempts to reconcile the ideas of social justice, equality, and shared economic activity. Moreover, collectively, they offer salient critiques of the existing social order. While many utopian communities were authoritarian in some respects, they challenged established religious practices, gender norms, or conventional economic arrangements. Utopian communities also served as proving grounds for future activism and reform.

The diversity of American utopian experiments is immense; however, some generalizations are possible. Most communities were either explicitly religious (typically Christian and Protestant, but there are exceptions) or secular socialist. Religious communities varied in practice but generally shared a commitment to apostolic communalism and were motivated by millennial prophecy. Secular communities have generally been cooperative in nature and hoped to provide an alternative socioeconomic model to industrial capitalism. Both religious and secular utopians believed that separation from the corruption of society was necessary to the success of their groups; however, most utopians also believed that limited interaction with the outside world was necessary for the survival of the community.

Utopian communities developed in fits and starts over the nineteenth century with some new experiments emerging in the late twentieth century. The initial utopian push took place during the 1810s and 1820s in the wake of the American and French revolutions, and during the Second Great Awakening and the early Industrial Revolution. A second utopian moment, more of an echo of the first, followed in the 1840s and 1850s, as the United States expanded rapidly to the west and the country moved towards Civil War. During the period of Civil War and Reconstruction, interest in utopian experiments waned, as reformers, both secular and religious, focused their attention on the issue of slavery and rebuilding the nation. As the second Industrial Revolution developed, interest in utopian experimentation reemerged, shaped by the notion of the "cooperative commonwealth," an American version of socialism that reconciled collectivism with individualism. The cooperative moment was quickly eclipsed by the development of Debsian socialism, with its emphasis on working-class self-activity and electoral politics. In the mid-twentieth century utopian imaginings, drowned by totalitarianism and war, gave way to the pragmatic social experimentation of the New Deal. More recently, frustration with liberal capitalism has prompted a new interest in communitarian experiments and in the study of utopianism.

SEE ALSO: Amana Inspirationist Utopians; Cooperative Commonwealth; Father Rapp (1757–1847) and Harmony; Fourier, Charles François Marie (1772–1837) and the Phalanx Utopians; Icaria Utopian Community; New Harmony; Oneida Perfectionist Utopians; Owen, Robert (1771–1858); Shakers Utopian Community; Utopian Intentional Communities; Wright, Frances "Fanny" (1795–1852)

References and Suggested Readings

- Andelson, J. G. (1974) Communalism and Change in the Amana Society, 1855–1932. Ann Arbor: University Microfilms.
- Bestor, A., Jr. (1950) Backwoods Utopias: The Sectarian Origins and the Owenite Phase of Communitarian Socialism in America, 1663–1829. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Claeys, G. & Tower Sargent, L. (Eds.) (1999) The Utopia Reader. New York: New York University Press.

- Foster, L. (1981) Religion and Sexuality: Three American Communal Experiments of the Nineteenth Century. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Hayden, D. (1976) Seven American Utopias: The Architecture of Communitarian Socialism, 1790–1975. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Holloway, M. (1951) Heavens on Earth: Utopian Communities in America 1680–1880. London: Turnstile Press.
- Jacoby, R. (1999) The End of Utopia. New York: Basic Books.
- Miller, T. (1998) The Quest for Utopia in the Twentieth Century. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- More, T. (2003) Utopia. New York: Penguin.
- Morris, C. (1992) Fanny Wright: Rebel in America. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Oved, Y. (1988) Two Hundred Years of American Communes. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction.
- Pitzer, D. E. (1997) America's Communal Utopias. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Pitzer, D. E. & Elliot, J. (1979) New Harmony's First Utopians, 1814–1824. Indiana Magazine of History 75 (September): 225–300.
- Sutton, R. P. (1994) Les Icarions: The Utopian Dream in Europe and America. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Sutton, R. P. (2004) Communal Utopias and the American Experience. Westport, CT: Praeger.
- Sutton, R. P. (2005) Modern American Communes. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.

Utopian intentional communities

Timothy Miller

Intentional communities have dotted the American historical landscape for over three centuries and their presence continues, if not always prominent. They have always embodied a radical critique of prevailing society; their members have consistently had a vision of a better world, and have had the courage to live that vision.

The first communal movement to exhibit great longevity and gain widespread public recognition was that of the Shakers, who arrived from England in 1774 and ultimately established about twenty communal villages. They continue, although by 2007 they had dwindled to one village with three members.

The nineteenth century saw the creation of many intentional communities of immigrants, especially Germans seeking religious freedom. The Harmony Society, founded in Pennsylvania in 1805 (and later located in Indiana and then again in Pennsylvania); the Amana Society, whose members began to arrive in New York state in 1843 (and moved on to Iowa in 1854); and the Society of Separatists at Zoar, Ohio, who arrived in 1817, were just three prominent examples of a remarkable burst of communal energy in the first half of the century. Other religious communes would follow, including the Oneida Community, whose members engaged in a long-lived group marriage and prospered from the manufacture of animal traps and then silverware, and the Hutterites, German-speaking Anabaptists who arrived from Russia in 1874 and grew into a still-thriving movement of over 40,000 members living communally in over 400 colonies in North America.

Not all communes were based in religion, however. In the 1820s the Scottish industrialist Robert Owen brought his considerable communitarian energies to the United States, where he purchased the recently abandoned New Harmony, Indiana, and invited others to join him in building a “new moral world.” Although the Owenite New Harmony was short-lived, it inspired several additional communities and other experiments in collectivism, such as cooperative stores, as well.

As Owenism was winding down, another movement, that of the Icarions, arose from a utopian novel (Voyage en Icarie) whose readers wanted to create the fetching society depicted in the book. From 1848 to 1898 the French-speaking Icarions lived in colonies in several states, part of the time under the personal leadership of the Voyage's author, Étienne Cabet.

The later years of the nineteenth century saw the creation of a series of explicitly socialist and anarchist communal settlements. An early one was Kaweah Colony, founded by a group of socialists in the Sierra Nevada mountains in 1884. The Kaweah colonists were prodigious workers, but they were denied the fruits of their labors when the federal government decided to create a Sequoia National Park in the area and evicted the colonists without compensation. The world's largest tree, which the colonists had named the Karl Marx Tree, became the General Sherman.

The largest cluster of socialist and anarchist colonies erupted in Washington state in the years bracketing the turn of the twentieth century. Most of that great burst of communal energy stemmed from the work of the Brotherhood of the Cooperative Commonwealth, a socialist organization that arose from frustration over the failure of socialism to achieve lasting success within the American political system and saw demonstration colonies as a way to illustrate the virtues of socialist life. The BCC thus sought to open colonies, one by one, that would lead to the socialization of the state of Washington and eventually the nation. The first BCC colony was Equality, named for Edward Bellamy's latest novel and founded near what is now Bellingham in 1897. In its first few years Equality operated several businesses, and published Industrial Freedom, a leading radical periodical of the day. Its population soon declined, though, and then factional conflicts took a toll. A disastrous fire was the last straw, and Equality closed in 1907.

An anarchist colony known as Home, in the southern reaches of Puget Sound, was Equality's contemporary. Home's members owned small plots on which they helped each other build homes, and enjoyed such common amenities as a community building and a school. Despite hostility from its neighbors (a nearby newspaper crusaded against the colony as a nest of far-left radicals and free lovers) Home continued until its formal dissolution in 1919, and several of its members lived on the site for decades afterwards.

Several other communal enclaves dotted western Washington at roughly the same time: the Puget Sound Cooperative Colony, Burley, and Freeland. As a center of left-wing political communalism, the area has had no peer in American history. But that is not to say that reformers were not organizing intentional communities elsewhere in the United States as well. For example, the single-taxers, like the BCC colonists, turned to colony building in the face of their failure to prevail in the political arena. Henry George had published his manifesto Progress and Poverty in 1879, and a substantial movement arose to implement George's central principle, the imposition of a single tax (i.e., to the exclusion of all other taxes) on the value of unimproved land. Failing to convince any jurisdiction to enact the single tax, some of the activists decided to test the theory in communally owned enclaves in which residents rented lots, reallocating the tax bill of the community according to Georgist theory. Some ten such enclaves were created from the 1890s through the 1930s, most prominently Fairhope, Alabama; Arden, Delaware; and Free Acres, New Jersey. Several of them continue as pleasant, congenial neighborhoods today, and Fairhope, in particular, has continued to follow its single-tax principles.

Yet another communal enterprise was Ruskin, which operated in Tennessee and then briefly in Georgia. J. A. Wayland, in his day the most prominent socialist editor in the country, founded The Coming Nation in 1893 and saw it quickly become the nation's most-read radical periodical. Soon he began to envision an intentional community that would provide good jobs and rich culture to working people, and proposed to fund it with profits from the newspaper. In 1894 Wayland located a suitable 1,000-acre tract of land west of Nashville, Tennessee, and called for his charter members to join him at the site. A printing press for The Coming Nation was soon installed, and the colony grew apace. The prickly Wayland, however, was soon involved in disputes with many of the other colonists, and he left in 1895. He went on to found the Appeal to Reason, America's all-time highest-circulating socialist periodical. Ruskin continued until 1899; a splinter colony in Georgia lasted two years longer.

The most prominent socialist colony of the early twentieth century was Llano del Rio, founded in California in 1914. Its founder, Job Harriman, was yet another radical who had become disillusioned with socialism's political progress and turned to the idea of creating a model socialist colony. Soon he acquired land near Palmdale, California, and invited others to join him. Over the next few years the population of Llano colony shot up to 1,100. The colony might have survived its serious internal conflicts and implacable opposition from the Los Angeles Times, but its failure to secure water rights vital to its plans for farming in the desert was insurmountable. However, many members were unwilling to give up, and in 1917 some hundreds of them moved to a large tract of land in Louisiana with a small existing town they renamed Newllano. There, despite endemic poverty and internal strife, they had a robust social life and continued to live their socialist principles. Newllano endured until 1938.

In the early twentieth century New York City was home to a group of anarchists centered on the radical magazine Mother Earth. In 1915 several of them founded a colony on 143 acres of land near Stelton, New Jersey. Although getting out of the city was an important goal of the founders, the real center of Ferrer Colony was the Ferrer Modern School, an alternative educational institution known for its unstructured approach to education. At its peak the colony had over 80 homes and over 200 residents who enjoyed a lively intellectual and social life. In the early years the colony's neighbors were aghast at having a colony of radicals in their midst, but over time tensions subsided. Ferrer came to an end during World War II, when Camp Kilmer was suddenly built next to the colony. Many residents sold their homes to soldiers, and the colony faded away.

In the meantime another anarchist colony, the Sunrise Co-Operative Farm Community, had been founded near Alicia, Michigan. Its principal founder, Joseph J. Cohen, had been one of the founders of Ferrer Colony; he intended for Sunrise to be more fully collective than Ferrer had been, with common labor and ownership of land. By the spring of 1933 he had come up with a down payment on a 9,000-acre farm, and a membership dominated by anarchists and other radicals – most of them Jewish, although Sunrise was not officially a Jewish colony – reached 300 the first year. Many things went well for Sunrise, but problems emerged as well, ranging from a housing shortage to a conflict over a proposal that Yiddish be the only language permitted at the colony. In 1936 the property was sold to the federal Resettlement Administration.

Alongside the single-tax enclaves and anarchist colonies were other communities dedicated to specific reformist causes. Among them were feminist colonies, whose presence paralleled the rise of modern feminism in the second half of the nineteenth century. One that was widely noticed was the Woman's Commonwealth, organized in 1879 in Belton, Texas, by Martha McWhirter, who embraced celibacy following her Wesleyan experience of entire sanctification and soon attracted other women (and, briefly, a few men) to her cause. The community soon reached 50 members, many of them leaving their husbands. The community enjoyed great economic success from its operation of a hotel and other businesses, and in 1898 the sisters used their capital to buy a large house in Washington, DC and a farm outside the city in Maryland. A few years after McWhirter's death in 1904 they consolidated the community at the farm, where they continued to run successful businesses. The last sister died there in 1983.

Yet another set of radical/reformist communities with specific constituencies and missions was that of the communal colleges. The most thoroughly radical of them was Commonwealth College, founded at Newllano Colony in 1923 with the goal of producing labor leaders from the working class. Commonwealth soon moved to its own campus in the Ozarks near Mena, Arkansas, where students and faculty labored side by side, and it became widely known as a center of leftist thought and activism. Its presence in the conservative South led to continual outside pressure, however, and by the mid-1930s the state legislature was trying to figure out how to get rid of the school. In 1940 the college was convicted of failing to fly an American flag, among other "crimes." Its assets were sold to pay the fines levied by the court.

Although the 1940s and 1950s were lean years for commune building, a few did manage to emerge here and there. One was the Glen Gardner Cooperative Community, founded by the peace activist David Dellinger, his wife Betty Dellinger, and others in New Jersey in 1947. In 1950 the community changed its name to St. Francis Acres and deeded the land to God. For several years the community operated a radical printing and publishing business; it survived until 1968, when, during the Vietnam War era, it suffered a series of attacks. The Dellingers felt forced to leave, and St. Francis Acres closed.

The great wave of communes that emerged after 1965 naturally included many radical political enclaves. Communal solidarity helped some young men resist the military draft, and communes near the border helped shepherd more of them to the draft-free nation of Canada. Communes became natural organizing bases for anti-war protests. Depicting the full panoply of those communes is far beyond the scope of a short article; suffice it to mention just one of the many. Black Bear Ranch was planned as a radical enclave where revolutionaries would be able to practice using weapons and hide from the authorities. The 80-acre property was a ghost town left over from gold-mining days in a remote area of mountainous northern California. The commune's radical goals, however, were never fully realized, mainly because less-militant settlers arrived in considerable numbers, diverting full attention from revolutionary praxis, and in any event simple survival in the rugged wilderness was taxing. Black Bear did survive, though, and continues as a rural outpost for the self-sufficient.

Most of the communities mentioned so far were essentially secular in orientation, but some of the most radical communities of all were religious. In 1896, for example, at the height of the Social Gospel movement, a group of committed Protestants founded the Christian Commonwealth Colony near Columbus, Georgia. They gave up all they owned, pooling all assets, and opened their doors to all in an attempt to emulate the early Christians described in the second and fourth chapters of the biblical Book of Acts. Although the colony closed amid poverty and disease in 1900, its impact on Christian idealists endured.

A more enduring example of Christian community has been the Catholic Worker movement. Founded in 1933 by bohemian radical Dorothy Day and grassroots philosopher Peter Maurin in New York, the movement is devoted to communal sharing, voluntary poverty, and service to society's neediest. The movement's Houses of Hospitality have been founded by the hundreds in most major American cities, and dozens of communal farms have provided food for the urban houses as well as quiet places for personal renewal. In their communal dedication the Workers feed the hungry, house the homeless, and, importantly, challenge a society and its government that let the ills of poverty and violence fester.

Thousands of intentional communities have been founded over the course of American history, and although the majority tended to be short-lived, some have lasted for decades, even centuries. Communal people are true radicals, willing to put everything – their money, their individual preferences, their very lives – on the line for their beliefs.

SEE ALSO: Amana Inspirationist Utopians; Catholic Worker Movement; Cooperative Commonwealth; Father Rapp (1757–1847) and Harmony; Fourier, Charles François Marie (1772–1837) and the Phalanx Utopians; Icaria Utopian Community; New Harmony; Oneida Perfectionist Utopians; Owen, Robert (1771–1858); Shakers Utopian Community; Utopian Communities, United States; Wright, Frances “Fanny” (1795–1852)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bestor, A. (1970) Backwoods Utopias: The Sectarian Origins and the Owenite Phase of Communitarian Socialism in America: 1663–1829. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Chmielewski, W., Kern, L., & Klee-Hartzell, M. (Eds.) (1993) Women in Spiritual and Communitarian Societies in the United States. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Fogarty, R. (1990) All Things New: American Communes and Utopian Movements, 1860–1914. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Hine, R. (1983) California's Utopian Colonies. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- LeWarne, C. (1975) Utopias on Puget Sound, 1885–1915. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- Miller, T. (1998) The Quest for Utopia in Twentieth-Century America. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Miller, T. (1999) The 60s Communes: Hippies and Beyond. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Pitzer, D. (Ed.) (1997) America's Communal Utopias. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Uzbekistan, national movement and protests

Immanuel Ness

Central Asia includes the former socialist republics of the Soviet Union (also known as transitional states), Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan. The region also encompasses Afghanistan and the Xinjiang province of western China. Prior to 1500, the region was conquered and occupied by Turkic, Persian, and Russian forces. Central Asia's modern history has been dominated by imperial forces countered by fierce resistance from the local nomadic inhabitants, who frequently repelled invasion through their knowledge of the rugged and mountainous terrain.

In the early eighteenth century, the region now known as Uzbekistan had come under Russian imperial control. Russians entered the region in 1716, during the reign of Peter the Great, in a supposed move to assist the Khanate of Khiva (much of it having been in today's Uzbek territory) against the incursions of neighboring Kazakh and Turkmen tribes and to establish trade connections with the region. The Russians were initially repelled by regional forces in 1716. Under the leadership of Tsar Nicholas, Russia attempted another major incursion into the region in 1839, yet their forces were again repelled. Finally, in 1875, Russian forces gained control over much of what is considered as Central Asia and became the protectorate of Turkistan.

The Soviet Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 had dramatic aftershocks in Uzbekistan, especially in Tashkent, its multi-ethnic capital. In the late nineteenth century, Uzbekistan was still under tsarist Russian rule and suffered severely from the autocratic government that banned all dissent. In the aftermath of the Russian Revolutions, political movements in Uzbekistan emerged and expanded dramatically. While virtually all residents supported ending tsarist rule, communists and Muslims emerged as the primary political forces following the 1905 Russian Revolution and the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution.

Communists and Jadid Muslim modernizers unified to establish a new state free of repression and economic inequality. The primary goal of the Jadid movement was expanding and improving enlightened education through providing modern facilities and increasing access to schools. As the tsarist Russian state crushed the growing socialist movement, so it suppressed the Jadidists seeking to build a modern society and establish a system of equality. While many believed the 1905 Russian Revolution would lead to important reforms, tsarist rule continued and pushed activists in the socialist and Jadid movements into secretive societies underground. In summer 1916, Tsar Nicholas issued a decree that Central Asians be conscripted into service in the Russian army in World War I; violent demonstrations erupted, leading the government to reverse the order.

In 1916 and 1917, the events leading up to the Bolshevik Revolution sent political tremors throughout Central Asia as communist and Jadid Islamic reformist militants sought to gain state power against local traditional clans allied previously with tsarist Russia. Less than a year later, protests expanded throughout Uzbekistan during the Bolshevik Revolution from February to October 1917, led by socialist and Jadidist activists. Following the Russian Revolution in Petrograd, the tsarist government in Tashkent was overthrown and a state of rebellion prevailed over the entire region. The Jadidists and communists gradually unified to defeat the tsarist guard in the violent battles of Bukhoro and Khiva. Amid a civil war, the Bolshevik–Jadid forces formed the Bukharin People's Party, with the ultimate objective of taking power in Tashkent.

In 1917, insurgents controlled the territory, known as the Bukharan People's Republic. However, a fissure emerged between Jadidists and an alliance of communists and former Jadidists and traditional Islamic opponents. The Jadid or communists could not consolidate power, and a violent civil war broke out in 1918 against insurgents loyal to the Emir of Bukhara, seeking to retain traditional control and defeat modernizing forces allied with the Soviet Union. The Basmachi rebellion lasted from February 1918 through 1924, setting local traditional clansmen against Soviet and Jadid forces.

Enver Pasha, the Islamic modernizer and leader of the Jadid, was defeated and Faizullah Ubaidullaevich Khojaev, a former Jadid, joined forces with the communists, who prevailed in the violent civil war, in which some 15,000 lost their lives. The Basmachi rebellion against the local Bolshevik leaders ultimately sought to create a Central Asia-wide Islamist entity. Instead, the USSR divided Soviet Central Asia into six states that were mere administrative boundaries among otherwise friendly entities within the USSR. Ethnicity in Central Asia was not considered to be significant prior to the Bolshevik Revolution and the subsequent formation of the ethnic states – Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, and Tajikistan. People throughout Central Asia were unified in their opposition to the authoritarian leadership of tsarist Russia.

There were no major uprisings or popular protests in Uzbekistan's history as a Soviet republic from 1925 to the 1980s, other than raids by Islamic traditional forces into the territory. In a break with the tsarist era, the USSR sought to develop Uzbekistan's infrastructure and improve the standard of living. While insurgencies continued in some areas, the lack of popular protest was largely due to Soviet economic and social progress having highly benefited the majority and thus bought the allegiance of most of its citizens. During the 1980s, in the waning years of the Soviet Union, Mikhail Gorbachev's policies of glasnost (openness) and perestroika (economic restructuring) engendered new political divisions in Uzbekistan. One local movement sought to replace Russian as the official language with Uzbek. Some western observers – though not the majority or the most heavily funded intelligence agencies – had rightly stated that Gorbachev's Soviet reforms were to lead to further decay of the USSR. And indeed, due to the new openness brought about by Gorbachev's policies and the economic problems encountered by the Soviet system that was mired in military spending, ethnic and class tensions broke out in Uzbekistan and the Central Asian republics.

After the August 1991 failure of the Soviet coup, all five former Soviet republics of Central Asia declared independence, Uzbekistan on August 31. While some freedom was granted in the aftermath of the dismantling of the Soviet Union, soon after a new post-communist dictatorship consolidated power, forcing nearly all opposition groups underground. Boris Yeltsin's formation of a nationalist Russian state and the dissolution of the USSR intensified social, political, and economic problems, engendering violent protest in Uzbekistan.

In December 1991, Islom Karimov, former first secretary of the Communist Party, won the election. Subsequently, an Islamic organization known as Adolat (Justice), likely inspired by its Muslim cohorts in Afghanistan and Iran, sought autonomy for Uzbekistan's province of Namangan in the northeast. Insurgents seized the Communist Party headquarters in Namangan and sought to convert it to the local Islamic center, demanding an amendment to Uzbekistan's constitution to adopt Islam as the official state religion and Islamic Shari'a law. The Uzbek government, led by President Karimov, allowed limited autonomy to Namangan, but thereafter rescinded the decision and arrested over 70 Adolat activists, crushed the movement, and forced the activists into exile.

Conflict in Namangan continued unabated. By 1997, a series of ostensible political assassinations in Namangan led to accusations by the Uzbek government of Wahhabi (Islamic extremist) participation in the killings. Government authorities arrested thousands of suspected Islamists, many devout Muslims with little or no political motives. In turn, suspected Islamists were accused of kidnapping and beheading Uzbek government officials. Violence continued in 1999, as car bombs exploded in Tashkent in February 1999 in a failed attempt to assassinate Karimov by Islamists.

On May 12, 2005, an armed militia of 50 stormed the prison in the provincial town of Andijon in northeast Uzbekistan. The insurgents were allegedly followers of the Islamic Akramiya, which sought to unify Muslims into a religious caliphate. Several hundred prisoners were released and many government personnel and insurgents were killed. The militia kidnapped government officials in Andijon, leading to public protests in Andijon square against Uzbek local and national officials. The next day, Uzbek armed forces surrounded the protesters in Andijon and began shooting directly on the mostly unarmed crowd, killing and wounding many, leading to a death toll ranging from 300 to 1,000 persons.

The primary cause of the uprising, however, was the unmet expectations of the authoritarian government and the failure of the government to provide jobs, education, housing, and other opportunities in the post-Soviet era. Poverty is concentrated in the Ferghana Valley, the agriculturally rich region that straddles the Central Asian nations of Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan. The Ferghana Valley is the most densely populated region in Central Asia. Nearly 75 percent of the ten million inhabitants of Ferghana Valley live in Uzbekistan.

In the early twenty-first century, Uzbekistan ranked fourth in global production and export of cotton and the nation is one of the world's largest producers of gold and natural gas products. Nonetheless, poverty among the country's working class and poor intensified as resources were concentrated among a small upper-class population. The vast majority of Uzbekistan's population does not benefit from the country's natural wealth and is falling into deeper poverty as the current government fails to provide subsidies as in the Soviet era. Both poverty and income inequality have been growing dramatically since the collapse of the Soviet Union.

Given that the income distribution is skewed in favor of a small upper class that is supported by what many perceive to be a corrupt government, many residents view the post-Soviet rulers with skepticism. To quell any form of dissent, the government has banned most forms of public opposition. In addition, the standard of living sinks further for the majority of the population, because the government is unwilling to democratize the society and provide basic political freedoms, such as the right of expression and legal political dissent.

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Central Asian Protest Movements; Gorbachev, Mikhail (b. 1931); Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Soviet Union, Fall of; Tajikistan, Protests and Revolts; Turkmenistan, Protest and Revolt

References and Suggested Readings

- Akbarzadeh, S. (2005) Uzbekistan and the United States: Authoritarianism, Islamism and Washington's New Security Agenda. London: Zed Books.
- Khalid, A. (1999) The Politics of Muslim Cultural Reform: Jadidism in Central Asia. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Melvin, N. J. (2000) Uzbekistan: Transition to Authoritarianism on the Silk Road. London: Harwood Academic.
- Nazparv, J. (2002) Post-Soviet Chaos. London: Pluto Press.
- Whitlock, M. (2003) Land Beyond the River: Untold Story of Central Asia. New York: St. Martin's Press.

V

Vaneigem, Raoul (b. 1934)

Roger Farr

Raoul Vaneigem is a writer and social philosopher born, and currently residing, in Belgium. He is the author of dozens of books and tracts on politics, literature, and the history of ideas, many of which have been written pseudonymously. Vaneigem's influence and reputation are largely due to his role as a leading theoretician for the Situationist International (SI), from the time he joined the organization in 1961 until his forced resignation in 1970. Along with Guy Debord, to whom he was introduced by the sociologist Henri Lefebvre, Vaneigem's work was instrumental in shaping the intellectual and political culture of France in the 1960s. His much-cited book Traité du savoir-vivre à l'usage des jeunes générations (1967; published in English as The Revolution of Everyday Life), written in Paris between 1963 and 1965 and published in 1967, is often read, along with Debord's Society of the Spectacle, as having prompted the 1968 student and worker unrest in France.

Prior to his contact with the SI, Vaneigem studied romance philology and French literature at the Free University of Brussels, graduating in 1956 with a dissertation on Lautréamont, a figure whom Vaneigem views as exemplary of a certain tradition within French culture which has as "its basic principle the abolition of culture as a separate sphere through the realization of art and philosophy in everyday life" (1976/1999: 7). Indeed, it could be argued that this "basic principle" also underlies and organizes Vaneigem's entire oeuvre: in the "Introduction" to Traité du savoir-vivre, he writes that "[e]ver since men grew up and learned to read Lautréamont, everything has been said yet few have taken advantage of it" (1967/1983: 7). However, given that his earliest writing was often co-authored, and was written explicitly to propagandize ideas developed collectively by the SI, it makes sense to divide his work into two phases: Situationist (1961–70) and post-Situationist (from 1971).

In the first, Situationist phase, Vaneigem's writing appears mainly in the group's journal, Internationale Situationiste, which published 12 issues between 1958 and 1969. In 1962, Vaneigem joined the Central Council responsible for editing the journal, and seven articles published between August 1961 and September 1969 bear his name (although he is believed also to have written many of the unsigned articles). His major work of this period, however, is Traité du savoir-vivre, a work which elaborates in poetically charged prose his major critical concerns: "everyday life" ("People who talk about revolution and class struggle without referring explicitly to everyday life . . . have a corpse in their mouth"), the qualitative nature of revolution and transcendence ("Only the qualitative permits a higher stage to be reached"), and "radical subjectivity" ("the consciousness that all people have the same will to authentic self-realization, and that their subjectivity is strengthened by the perception of this subjective will in others") (1967/1983: 15, 151–2). Traité du savoir-vivre, often regarded as both a stylistic and theoretical counterbalance to the austerity and rigor of Debord's writing, was read widely by French students.

Since leaving the SI, Vaneigem has been prolific. English translations of his post-Situationist work include Movement of the Free Spirit, a radical reinterpretation of heretical religious movements as antecedents in the ongoing struggle of "life" against totalitarian ideologies and "a repressive power that has been in place for thousands of years" (1986/1994: 7); A Cavalier History of Surrealism (1976/1999); and A Declaration of the Rights of Human Beings (2001/2003), a new declaration of human rights and an attack on the presumed sovereign powers of global capitalism and democracy on behalf of the “sovereignty of life.” At the time of writing, his most recent book (2008) is Rien n’est sacré, tout peut se dire: Réflexions sur la liberté d’expression (Nothing is Sacred, Everything Can Be Said: Reflections on Freedom of Expression). A critical biography, Raoul Vaneigem, was published in 2007.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Debord, Guy (1931–1994) and the Spectacle; May 1968 French Uprisings; Situationists

References and Suggested Readings

- Knabb, K. (Ed.) (2006) Situationist International Anthology. Berkeley: Bureau of Public Secrets.
- Lambrette, G. (2007) Raoul Vaneigem. Chaucer: Éditions Libertaires.
- Vaneigem, R. (1967/1983) Revolution of Everyday Life. London/Seattle: Rebel Press/Left Bank.
- Vaneigem, R. (1976/1999) A Cavalier History of Surrealism. San Francisco: AK Press.
- Vaneigem, R. (1986/1994) Movement of the Free Spirit. New York: Zone Books.
- Vaneigem, R. (2001/2003) A Declaration of the Rights of Human Beings. London: Pluto Press.

Vanguard party

Soma Marik

The idea of a vanguard party has caused controversy in Marxist circles centered around the debate over whether workers need to be led to socialism by outside forces. Academic Marxology has held that Lenin’s concept of a vanguard party signaled a change from Marx’s focus on proletarian socialism to a revolution led by a tightly organized minority of intellectuals who would take socialism into the working class from outside. Marx’s thrust on the self-emancipation of the working class certainly meant rejection of any imposition of socialism from above by a wise leadership. But this did not solve the problem of revolutionary strategy.

Marx and Engels believed that the propaganda on the necessity of, and the road to, communism by the conscious minority of workers alone would not suffice to make the revolution. Their political practice and writings show particularly during the stage of the Communist League (1847–51) that a revolutionary party was a crucial instrument in the proletariat’s struggle for self-emancipation. It was this organization that could give them the self-confidence essential for becoming a “class for itself” active in their emancipatory struggles from a “class in itself.” The specificity of the communist party, according to the Communist Manifesto, lay in its internationalism and in its emphasis on the interests of the proletarian movement as a whole as opposed to partial or fragmentary interests. In this sense, the intention of the creators of the League was to set it up as a vanguard party. Marx did write that the communists were, on the one hand, practically, the most advanced and resolute section of the working-class parties and, on the other hand, theoretically, the far-sighted section. Clearly, a revolutionary centralization of the advanced workers was being advocated to ensure class independence and unity.

Marx and Engels’ subsequent move away from this perspective was more due to a temporary lull in the revolutionary ferment than any moderation on their part. Their activities and writings indicate attempts to build a broad-based working-class party where no class independence existed at all, and attempts to develop a socialist vanguard when independent working-class politics already existed.

Lenin, hoping to build a disciplined Russian Social Democratic Party, considered the problem of having a spontaneous working-class movement forging ahead while revolutionaries were unorganized and lagging behind. In his book What Is To Be Done? he emphasized the centralization of revolutionary experience of advanced workers who could lead the class movement toward a political direction. Repeating an argument of Karl Kautsky, the most authoritative German socialist theoretician, he observed that like all science, socialist theory is created by bourgeois intellectuals, and has to be brought into the working class from outside.

Marxist activist writers like Molyneux (1978) and LeBlanc (1990) have challenged the idea that this was a dogma that Lenin clung to all his life. According to them, the emphasis on taking ideology into the working class from outside was a polemical response to the position of another group of Russian social democrats, the Economists, who derided theory and argued that the spontaneous economic struggles were adequate to generate revolutionary consciousness and a revolutionary struggle. Lih (2006) argues that Lenin was simply trying to create an orthodox revolutionary party, in Russia, on the German model.

Lenin, like Marx, emphasized the self-emancipation of the working class. But being politically active in a more revolutionary era, he did not suffer from Marx's dichotomy. The concept of professional revolutionary meant a serious attempt to create working-class leadership within the party, formed of working-class militants so as to centralize and coordinate their efforts against the system. The idea was to give these activist-workers a respite from daily wage-work, enabling the vanguard to be active on a more permanent basis. The flexibility of tactics displayed in different periods shows that Lenin attempted to draw in masses of radicalizing workers during periods of mass upsurge and fought to retain revolutionary principles in periods of downturn. He rejected both minority revolutionism and any idea of parliamentary socialism to be accomplished on behalf of the working class. The revolutionary organization has to help the working class understand collectively the need for a socialist transformation of society, for the socialist revolution. That is the dialectical relationship between the vanguard party and the mass self-organization of the working class.

The concept of vanguard party was turned into a caricature by Stalinists and self-proclaimed Leninists. For them, the possession of correct doctrine makes the party a vanguard proletarian party, regardless of whether the real class vanguard is with the party or not, and regardless of whether party policy is made democratically by them. Trotsky, the Russian revolutionary and an early critic of Lenin, acknowledged that Lenin had been right in focusing on building a revolutionary party. The Trotskyist alternative model of vanguard party has stressed building a democratic party from working-class cadres, and being resolutely internationalist.

SEE ALSO: Class Struggle; Kautsky, Karl (1854–1938); Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)

References and Suggested Readings

- LeBlanc, P. (1990) Lenin and the Revolutionary Party. London: Humanities Press.
- Lih, L. T. (2006) Lenin Rediscovered: What is to be Done? In Context. Boston: Brill.
- Marik, S. (2008) Reinterrogating the Classical Marxist Discourses of Revolutionary Democracy. New Delhi: Aakar.
- Molyneux, J. (1978) Marxism and the Party. London: Pluto Press.
- Shapiro, L. (1970) The Communist Party of the Soviet Union. New York: Random House.

Vanuatu, land reform protests

Justin Corfield

Vanuatu, formerly the New Hebrides, was jointly ruled by the French and the British until its independence on July 30, 1980. It was visited by French and English sailors in the eighteenth century, and both Louis Antoine de Bougainville and James Cook landed there. Chinese merchants also visited in search of sandalwood. The Irish trader Peter Dillon started to harvest sandalwood in large amounts in 1825; before long, the sandalwood was largely depleted and most trees had been felled by 1868.

This destruction was followed by “blackbirding,” in which people from the New Hebrides were used as indentured laborers in sugar cane plantations in Fiji and in Queensland, Australia. Many people were seized and chained or enticed aboard ships to serve for up to 12 years in what was effectively a form of slavery. Presbyterian missionaries used the White Australia Policy to put an end to blackbirding, but much damage had been done to the society in the New Hebrides, with the population falling from 650,000 in 1870 to about 100,000 by 1890. By 1935, the indigenous Hebrideans were estimated at only 41,000, and the islands of Aneityum, the location of the early sandalwood trees, and Erromano lost up to 95 percent of their original population.

The American Civil War led to high prices for cotton. Thus, cotton plantations were established on the New Hebrides, followed later by coconut and cocoa plantations. After acquiring New Caledonia in 1853, the French took over nine-tenths of the mainland and were obviously planning to annex the New Hebrides. The Presbyterian Church there urged Australia to become involved, which ultimately led to joint Anglo-French rule. Many of the settlers, mostly from Australia, were nearing bankruptcy by the early 1880s, and there was hope that French investment money might revive the economy. To this end, an Irish-born French property developer named John Higgonson founded the Compagnie Calédonienne des Nouvelles-Hébrides (CCNH) and bought up a fifth of all the agricultural land there, some of it from Australians, but most of it from local chiefs, or people thought to be local chiefs, who put their thumbprints on French legal documents they could not understand. The CCNH became the Société Française des Nouvelles-Hébrides (SFNH) in 1894, by which time it owned more than half of all agricultural land in the islands.

In response to antagonisms between British and French business interests, in 1887 the Anglo-French Joint Naval Commission was established, followed in 1906 by the Anglo-French Condominium. The New Hebrides at that time had 65,000 islanders, 2,000 French settlers, and 1,000 British settlers. An Anglo-French Protocol was signed in 1914 but, because of World War I, was not ratified until 1922. As a result, two parallel police forces were created, as well as parallel education systems, health services, currencies, postal systems, and even prison services.

In the 1950s plans were developed to give the New Hebrides self-government and later independence, but problems immediately arose, mostly concerning land ownership. With the European settlers owning nearly a third of the land, half of which had been turned into coconut plantations and the other half left undeveloped or used for cattle ranching, protests emerged among the indigenous people who claimed that much of the undeveloped land was not being used and was therefore the property of the nearby village. Many others challenged the titles of some of the settlers, since the land had originally been bought from people who may not have had the right to sell the land. These problems were common to all the islands, but on the island of Espiritu Santo, a local bulldozer driver and nationalist named Jimmy Stevens formed the Nagriamel movement in order to put pressure on the authorities to allow indigenous people to take over undeveloped land.

With financial backing from the US Phoenix Foundation, which was interested in developing real estate, the Nagriamel movement became heavily associated with French interests. At the same time, the New Hebrides National Party, later renamed the Vanua'aku Party (My Land Party), founded by Anglican priest Walter Lini, drew most of its support from the English-speaking Protestants. Initially it was Stevens who, in 1971, petitioned the United Nations for independence for the New Hebrides. However, three years later when the Vanua'aku Party petitioned the UN, Stevens and his supporters opposed it, wanting greater autonomy for Espiritu Santo and other islands. To try to resolve this impasse, the colonial authorities held elections in November 1979, with the pro-French parties forming the Union of Moderate Parties (UMP). Lini's Vanua'aku Party won decisively and Lini himself was appointed chief minister, having control of the largest block of seats in the new representative assembly.

This situation caused disquiet among the mainly French-speaking supporters of Stevens on Espiritu Santo, and they started to talk of secession. They seem to have been encouraged by some French officials, but it is debatable whether they acted independently or with the support, albeit tacit, of the French government. On the island of Tanna in May the following year, rebels tried to take control. In June the northern islands, Malekula, Ambae, Maewo, and Ambrym, all proclaimed their secession and formed the Provisional Government of the Northern Islands. Stevens himself had led his supporters into Luganville, the main town on Espiritu Santo, on May 27, 1980, and, with his Nagriamel movement armed with bows and arrows, declared the independent country of Vemarana. The British and French sent in their soldiers, who stood by while Luganville was looted. The subsequent arrival of soldiers from Papua New Guinea stopped the looting; they arrested the settlers who supported Stevens and quickly put an end to the secession. The New Hebrides became Vanuatu on July 30, and Stevens was finally arrested on September 1. A long series of trials was held for the secessionists and Jimmy Stevens was sentenced to 14 years 6 months in prison. A general amnesty was granted in 1991 and Stevens was released. He died three years later.

Meanwhile, the independent republic of Vanuatu still faced many problems associated with land ownership. A number of breakaway movements from the Vanua'aku Party challenged Lini and others for the leadership. In the November 1983 elections, the Vanua'aku Party again won, with Lini remaining as prime minister. Even though his party lost votes in the November 1987 elections, it was still returned to power. Lini was dismissed as prime minister in December 1988 by the country's first president, Ati George Sokomanu, who caused a constitutional crisis by dissolving parliament and appointing his nephew, Barak Tame Sope, as head of an interim administration. Sokomanu and Sope were subsequently arrested by security forces loyal to Lini, who was restored to office. During these years Lini was in poor health, suffering a cerebral haemorrhage in early 1987 and a heart attack in May 1991. This immediately led to feuds in the ruling Vanua'aku Party, and Lini was forced to stand down on September 6. He was replaced by Donald Kalpokas, who served as prime minister for just over two months, until a factional dispute caused defections from the Vanua'aku Party and Kalpokas was forced to resign. Maxime Carlot, the leader of the UMP, then came to power. He had been involved in the separatist government of Sope in December 1988 – serving as the titular deputy prime minister – and although jailed for sedition, had been quickly released. Carlot had 19 seats in the 46-seat parliament but managed to attract enough of Lini's supporters to remain in power.

In July 1992 relations between Australia and Vanuatu soured and the Australian acting high commissioner was ordered to leave the country. Australia introduced bans on official visits to Vanuatu, and Vanuatu officials were prevented from coming to Australia. Although these bans were lifted in the following year, relations remained tense. Further dissension arose over the large-scale commercial operations of the Malaysian logging company Parklane. After the elections of November 1995, Serge Vohor came to power as the second pro-French prime minister. Subsequent elections were held on March 6, 1998.

As Vanuatu became enmeshed in political and financial crises, local protests arose against corruption and the marginalization of the audit department's role. However, elections continued to be held regularly and in February 2004 US President George W. Bush named Vanuatu as one of the 63 countries that were eligible for part of the US$1 billion in aid for its commitment to democracy and free market reform. Vanuatu has remained a popular tourist destination, and in spite of the fractious political scene since independence, it has never experienced the civil unrest of many nearby Pacific nations.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Nuclear Protest Movements; Anti-Nuclear Protests, Marshall Islands; Cape Verde, Independence Struggle; Fiji, Parliamentary Insurrection; French Polynesia, Protest Movements

References and Suggested Readings

- Ray, C. (1992) On the Way Up: A UDI for New Caledonia in September '82? Pacific Islands Monthly (January): 13–18.
- Van Trease, H. (Ed.) (1995) Melanesian Politics: Stael Blong Vanuatu. Christchurch, NZ: Macmillan Brown Center for Pacific Studies, University of Canterbury.

Vázquez, Genaro (1931–1972)

Vittorio Sergi

Genaro Vázquez Rojas was born in San Luis Acatlán, Guerrero, Mexico on June 10, 1931. He was a teacher, political organizer, and trade unionist belonging to dissident organizations in Guerrero. After intense repression against the popular movement, he went underground and formed an armed guerilla group. He died in a car accident during an undercover operation in Morelia, Michoacán, on February 2, 1972.

Vázquez, as well as the other guerilla leader from Guerrero, Lucio Cabañas, had been a popular teacher who had studied in the rural college of Ayotzinapa in the town of Tixtla. In the summer of 1960, he led the opposition to the government of General Caballero Aburto through the Civic Association of Guerrero (ACG) and the Independent Farmers' Coordination (CCI), both political and unionist organizations that claimed independence from the ruling party's political line. Vázquez became vice-president and an important leader of the movement. The main contrast was established with the oligarchy of landlords, military, and political bosses who ruled the region with repression.

On December 2, 1962, the ACG presented its candidates for the state and municipal elections. The result was an open fraud against them and the ruling Revolutionary Institutional Party (PRI) candidate won. The ACG reacted with the occupation of several municipalities and a blockade (paro cívico) of the capital Iguala, demanding the deposition of the governor. After severe repression leading to several deaths, Caballero Aburto was removed from power, but the repression continued. From 1963 to 1966, Vázquez led the ACG to more radical Marxist and revolutionary political positions.

On November 9, 1966, while linking the ACG to the dissident Movement of National Liberation, Vázquez was arrested in Mexico City and transferred to jail in Iguala. He was freed by an armed commando of ACG comrades on April 22, 1968 and went underground, founding the Civic National Revolutionary Association (ACNR), which began acting as a guerilla group in Guerrero and Mexico City. It attacked banks and local bosses to obtain resources, then shifted its attacks against the Mexican army and local police. The group kidnapped Jaime Castejon Diez, headmaster of the University of Guerrero, on November 21, 1971, exchanging him for the release of nine guerilla group prisoners and a ransom. The group constantly struggled between popular support and heavy repression by the state and the army, never managing to establish consistent cooperation with other guerilla groups in Mexico nor with Lucio Cabañas's Party of the Poor (PDLP), which was active in the same period in Guerrero.

From the beginning of 1971 the ACNR and its popular bases suffered repression, and when Vázquez died, the group was disbanded. Vázquez's legacy influenced the historical background and political legitimization of guerilla armed movements such as the Popular Revolutionary Army (EPR) and Revolutionary Army of the Insurgent People (ERPI), which emerged in 1996 and 1998 in the same regions of Guerrero.

SEE ALSO: Mexico, Armed Political Movements, 1960s–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Baloy, M. (1980) La guerrilla de Genario y Lucio. Mexico City: Diogenes.
- Bartra, A. (1996) Guerrero bronco. Campesinos, ciudadanos y guerrilleros en la Costa Grande. Mexico City: Sinifiltro.
- Bellingeri, M. (2003) Del agrarismo armado a la guerra de los pobres. Mexico City: Casa Juan Pablos, Secretaria de Cultura de la Ciudad de México.
- Castellanos, L. (2007) México armado, 1943–1981. Mexico City: Era.

Vegetarian protests and movements

Amy Buzby

Vegetarianism has a long and varied history as a protest movement. Before the nineteenth century, the avoidance of meat and other animal products was generally justified with moral, religious, and metaphysical arguments: in ancient times writers like Plutarch and Ovid decried the killing of animals for food, while philosophers like Pythagoras and Porphyry argued that the consumption of animal flesh was an act of violence upon the human soul (Whorton: 1994). This early vegetarian thought engendered a holistic view that connected and enmeshed physical and spiritual health and utilized the vegetarian diet as a means of transcending the status quo.

During the early 1800s, an intensified drive for improved health, combined with the Enlightenment ascendancy of science, led to a new breed of vegetarians who also lobbied for vegetarianism as a healthful dietary alternative and means of protest against unsanitary conditions in the meat industry. By using the objective and convincing language of science as a forum for moral reaction and outcry, importantly, vegetarianism entered the social mainstream and began to attract a growing following, who flew first to the Bible Christian Church founded by Manchester minister John Cowherd. The first major publication of the nascent movement was John Oswald's The Cry of Nature, or, An Appeal to Mercy and to Justice, on Behalf of the Persecuted Animals (Whorton 1994).

This wave of new converts to vegetarianism led directly to the formation of the first vegetarian organization, the Vegetarian Society, and the coining of the term "vegetarian," in 1847 in Ramsgate, Kent. This scientific drive is showcased by the first resolution passed by the American Vegetarian Society, founded in 1850, which demanded that "comparative anatomy, human physiology, and . . . chemical analysis . . . unitedly proclaim the position, that not only the human race may, but should subsist upon the products of the vegetable kingdom" (Whorton 1994). The International Vegetarian Union, an international organization of national vegetarian societies, was founded in 1908.

Vegetarians range in the scope of the restriction of animal products in their diets. Those who abstain from the consumption of any animal products of any derivation are known as vegans and generally constitute the most radical populations of vegetarians as protesters. Some vegans, known as "Freegans," combine the moral protest against the use and consumption of animal products with a socioeconomic protest against capitalism and acquire all foodstuffs through means other than monetary exchange. Fruitarianism carries the moral protest inherent in vegetarianism further and eat only plant products that can be gathered without harming the plant.

Vegetarianism has generated or been adopted by many protest movements. Romanticism and vegetarianism were famously linked by moral outcries and also by the public conversion of figures like Mary Shelley to a vegetarian lifestyle. The popular health reform movement, started by Presbyterian minister Sylvester Graham, espoused vegetarianism as a cardinal principle. When the alternative health movement gradually supplanted Graham's movement, vegetarianism became intimately connected with it as well (Whorton 1994). By the 1860s, vegetarianism had generated a large literature and was a relatively organized movement. This literature had a profound effect on John Harvey Kellogg, who famously brought vegetarianism more scientific credibility and moral urgency through the publication of his work Shall We Slay to Eat?, which uncovered the frightful conditions present in slaughterhouses a year before the publication of Upton Sinclair's The Jungle.

Many vegetarians engage in further protest by demanding the protection and liberation of animals from the factory farm industry, animal testing operations, and other potentially abusive situations. This moral call for the cessation of cruelty to animals and the adoption of compassion in relation to all living things takes many forms. The animal rights movement, broadly speaking, is ideologically linked to the antivivisection movement led by members of the English upper class during the Victorian era and the contemporary American feminist and environmentalist movements. The movement is predominantly composed of middle-class females (Einwohner 1999). A 1991 survey by The Animals' Agenda, one of the largest animal rights publications, further found that 82 percent of respondents had at least some college education, and that 39 percent had incomes exceeding $50,000 per annum (Einwohner 1999).

The cause of animal rights was famously adopted by scholar Peter Singer with the publication of his book Animal Liberation: A New Ethics for Our Treatment of Animals in 1975. Singer's argument is a fervent attack on the prevalent social position of "speciesism," or the belief that all members of the human species have a special moral status that other species fail to attain (Singer 1978). Singer's arguments are based on the suffering of animals in modern society, not on the question of killing animals, but he does endorse the adoption of a vegetarian diet as the most practical solution to the ethical quagmire of speciesism (Singer 1975).

Vegetarianism has also been famously endorsed by philosopher Tom Regan as part of a case for animal liberation. Like Singer, Regan argues that vegetarianism is a moral obligation, but Regan goes beyond Singer in maintaining that animals are the bearers of rights that must be recognized and respected (Regan 1980). The publication of Francis Moore Lappe's Diet for a Small Planet also bolstered the case for vegetarianism by articulating the advantages of vegetarianism as a major facet of a lifestyle that utilizes the earth's resources in a limited and responsible fashion.

This rich tradition of protest and recent intellectual support has led to a thriving vegetarian community in contemporary society, including many vegetarian organizations with a wide range of advocacies and actions. Contemporary vegetarian protest organizations and social movements include Food Not Bombs (independent cooperatives that provide vegetarian food to the needy), Compassion Over Killing (an animal protection advocacy group), People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, the Christian Vegetarian Association (a non-denominational group that advocates responsible stewardship of natural resources and animal life), Food for Life (a vegetarian food relief organization), the Animal Liberation Front (a militant organization that advocates direct action on behalf of animals against abusive industries), the Revolutionary Cells – Animal Liberation Brigade (a resistance movement that advocates open violence against industries that mistreat animals), and the Animal Rights Militia (a British militant group that advocates direct action on behalf of abused animals).

SEE ALSO: Ecological Protest Movements; Environmental Protest, United States, 19th Century; Food Not Bombs, United States

References and Suggested Readings

- Einwohner, R. L. (1999) Gender, Class, and Social Movement Outcomes: Identity and Effectiveness in Two Animal Rights Campaigns. Gender and Society 13, 1 (February): 56–76.
- Lappe, F. M. (1971) Diet for a Small Planet. New York: Ballantine.
- Regan, T. (1980) Utilitarianism, Vegetarianism, and Animal Rights. Philosophy and Public Affairs 9, 4 (Summer): 305–24.
- Singer, P. (1975) Animal Liberation: A New Ethics for Our Treatment of Animals. New York: Random House.
- Singer, P. (1978) The Fable of the Fox and the Unliberated Animals. Ethics 88, 2 (January): 119–25.
- Singer, P. (1982) Ethics and Sociobiology. Philosophy and Public Affairs 11, 1 (Winter): 40–64.
- Whorton, J. C. (1994) Historical Development of Vegetarianism. American Journal of Clinical Nutrition 59, 5 (May): 1103S–1109S.

Velasco Alvarado, Juan Francisco (1910–1977)

Gabriel Cabrera M.

Juan Francisco Velasco Alvarado was a Peruvian military leader and politician who led the Revolutionary Government of the Armed Forces in Peru during its first phase (1968–75). He instituted economic, social, political, and cultural reforms of an anti-oligarchic and anti-imperialistic nature with the aim of democratizing Peruvian society and encouraging modernization. Although this process was interrupted, many of the transformations initiated by Velasco became irreversible and changed the face of the country.

Velasco Alvarado was born to a poor working-class family on the Peruvian north coast. In 1929 he moved to Lima, the capital of the republic, and after serving in the army as a foot soldier he acceded to a higher military career, graduating in 1934 at the top of his class. His talent allowed him to become an instructor and professor in several military institutions. Promoted to brigadier general in 1959, he became military attaché for the Peruvian embassy in France in 1962. In 1965 he reached the rank of major general, the highest grade in the Peruvian army. This occurred during the presidency of Fernando Belaunde Terry, who also named Velasco General Commander of the Army and Chief of the Armed Forces Joint Command in January 1968. This made him the second-highest national authority in military affairs after the president.

During his military career, Velasco was involved with the Center for Higher Military Studies (CAEM). Under the influence of leftist and progressive teachers, a strong ideological tendency inside the CAEM considered the military best suited to carrying out the democratization of society and guiding national development. The goal was to end the traditional and anachronistic privileges of the oligarchy, composed of landowners, the agro-export bourgeoisie, and the elite in general linked to imperialist, especially US, interests. Such changes were thought necessary to avoid a Marxist or communist revolution. Thus, when Velasco participated in courses given to the military by the Alliance for Progress in Latin America, he maintained a highly critical outlook.

On October 3, 1968, Velasco and eight other members of the military high command carried out a coup to overthrow President Belaunde, who had attempted moderate agrarian reform but whose government had veered progressively to the right, especially after entering into an agreement with the US International Petroleum Company (IPC). A few days after the coup, Velasco's military government occupied and expropriated IPC installations. The day was declared the "Day of National Dignity."

By means of the "Inca Plan," Velasco implemented the very first organic project of national development, based on what was termed "democracy of a social nature" (defined as neither capitalist nor communist). To execute this plan, Velasco nationalized oil production, which was mainly US-controlled, and the vast mining, telecommunications, rail transportation, fishing, and other strategic industrial and economic sectors, pursuing a policy of national modernization and the creation of a solid domestic market. He sought to promote workers' participation in the industrial community through co-management, and also extended national insurance, health, and basic services. Strict controls on imports were implemented to encourage domestic production. In response to a trade blockade enforced by the US government, Velasco established trade and political relationships with the Soviet bloc countries, China, Cuba, and Salvador Allende's Chile.

One of Velasco's most impressive reforms was his agrarian agenda, which began in 1969 and is considered one of the most radical in Latin American history. In an attempt to diversify landownership, the state not only expropriated huge tracts of land but kept the production complex, creating cooperatives and social property enterprises on the expropriated land. In addition to these units, producers' associations were created and national plans implemented for soil use, territorial planning, and technical counseling to peasants and farmers. Velasco liquidated the landowners' class, which was based on an enclave economy on the coast and feudalism in the Andean region.

Educational reform was another fundamental part of the government's plans, inspired by the hope of strengthening national identity and popular and indigenous culture. One of its goals was to diffuse and establish Quechua as an official language, while another was to spread new values based on social equality and the eradication of discrimination. Velasco believed he could realize his reforms through a militarily controlled political monopoly of state, without political parties and class struggle. For this purpose he created the National System for Social Mobilization (SINAMOS), a state organ whose aim was to bring under its control all organized social sectors.

It is unclear why the Velasco regime fell into crisis in its final years. From the beginning it faced opposition from the political right, but the Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana (APRA), which had initially defended most of Velasco's reforms, also turned against the regime. Even though some leftist parties supported the government, many others joined the opposition. During this era the left was especially popular among the working classes, but in 1973 the cost of living rose dramatically due to rising inflation. In 1974 there were protests, including a police strike. In the face of economic crisis, oligarchic sectors and their political allies promoted social instability. The situation forced the government to adopt repressive measures. Privately owned television and newspapers were expropriated as part of a plan to democratize media contents. Velasco also suffered intoxication in 1973; he may have been poisoned by one of his political enemies, probably in complicity with the CIA. As a result, one leg was amputated and his health was severely undermined.

In August 1975, Prime Minister Francisco Morales Bermúdez seized the presidency through a military coup, using Velasco's ill health as justification. Velasco convened his cabinet near Lima, but his illness forced him to accept the new situation. Morales vowed to continue Velasco's reform program and named his government "the second phase of the Peruvian revolution." Instead, he began dismantling the reforms and initiated a long process of economic liberalization.

Velasco's health deteriorated and he died in 1977 at the age of 69. Controversy still exists as to the characterization of the Velasco regime. It has been considered as bourgeois reformist, fascist, nationalist, socialist, popular or patriotic, and also as a mixture of some of these, although in fact many tendencies were encompassed within his government.

SEE ALSO: Peronist Resistance; Peru, Labor and Peasant Mobilizations, 1900–1950; Peru, "People's War," Counterinsurgency, and the Popular Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Béjar, H. (1978) Velasco: ¿reformismo burgués? Socialismo y participación 5 (December).
- Castillo, M. (1982) La burguesía industrial y el reformismo militar: 1968–1978. In Debates en sociología 7. Lima: Pontificia Universidad Católica del Perú.
- Franco, C. (Ed.) (1983) El Perú de Velasco, 3 vols. Lima: Centro de Estudios para el Desarrollo y la Participación.
- Juventud Nacionalista – Partido Nacionalista Peruano (n.d.) Juan Velasco Alvarado. Available at www.partidonacionalistaperuano.com/juventudes/velasco.htm.
- Marutían, J. I. (2003) El Gobierno del General Juan Velasco. Estudio de un caso de Cesarismo. Work Document No. 17. Buenos Aires: IDICSO. Available at www.salvador.edu.ar/csoc/idicso.
- Zimmermann, A. (1974) El Plan Inca. Objetivo: la Revolución peruana. Lima.

Velázquez, Francisco José (1884–1954)

Vittorio Sergi

Francisco José Múgica Velázquez was born in Tinguindín, Michoacán, on September 3, 1884. He was a military leader in the Mexican Revolution on the Constitutional side against Porfirio Díaz and Victoriano Huerta. As a politician, he was oriented to socialism and to the defense of national sovereignty.

From 1898 Velázquez lived in Zamora, Michoacán, where he studied medicine and wrote in liberal newspapers in opposition to the Díaz regime. He led the opposition to the reactionary governor of Michoacán, Don Aristeo Mercado, from the newspaper Ideal. In 1910 he traveled to San Antonio, Texas, in the United States to build the military organization of the Juntas Revolucionarias, and in 1911 he fought with Pascual Orozco in Ciudad Juárez. In 1915 he rose to the rank of general in the Constitutional army with Venustiano Carranza. The same year he became chief of military operations and then governor of the southern state of Tabasco. At the end of 1916 he was elected deputy to the federal congress and took part as representative of Michoacán in the Constitutional Convention of 1917.

He had a strong influence on the drafting of articles 3, 27, and 123 of the Political Constitution of the United States of México, which ruled on the collective and national property of land and natural resources, the public character of basic education, the right to strike, and the eight-hour workday. In 1917 he was one of the founders of the Socialist Party of Michoacán (PSM) and ran for state elections. He was elected as governor of Michoacán in 1920, where he promoted land reform in Patzcuaro and other Indian territories. He presented a stark contrast with the president, General Alvaro Obregón. Velázquez was eventually sentenced to death, but because of his close relationship with Lázaro Cárdenas he was not prosecuted, and in 1932 he ascended to the rank of general of brigade.

Velázquez was a firm ally of President Cárdenas within the left wing of the National Revolutionary Party (PNR), opposing Catholic clergy and the more conservative elements in the parliament and advocating for political asylum for Leon Trotsky in Mexico. In the government of Lázaro Cárdenas, Velázquez was minister of economy (December 1934–June 1935) and of public works (June 1935–July 1939), and in 1938 he was highly influential in pushing the government's oil expropriation bill. He sought the presidency in 1939 but Cárdenas supported the secretary of national defense, Manuel Ávila Camacho, against Joaquín Amaro y Juan Andrew Almazán of the conservative National Action Party (PAN). On December 17, 1940, Velázquez was designated governor of Baja California Sur. He continued to serve as a public administrator until his death in Mexico City on April 12, 1954.

SEE ALSO: Cárdenas, Lázaro (1895–1970); Mexican Revolution of 1910–1921; Mexico, Worker Struggles and Labor Unions, 1950s–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Ceballos Garibay, H. (2004) Francisco J. Múgica: crónica política de un rebelde. Mexico City: Eds. Coyoacán.
- De María y Campo, A. (2004) Dos aproximaciones a la figura de Francisco J. Múgica. Mexico City: INEHRM.
- Gilly, A. (1977) La revolución interrumpida. Mexico City: El caballito.
- Mondragón Aguirre, M. (1967) Cuando la Revolución se cortó las alas. Mexico City: Costa-Amic.
- Múgica Velázquez, F. J. (1985) Hechos, no palabras: prensa, parlamento. Mexico City: Instituto Nacional de Estudios Históricos de la Revolución Mexicana.

Velvet Revolution, 1989

Stanislav J. Kirschbaum

There are two names given to the events of November–December 1989 that brought about the collapse of the communist regime of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic. “Velvet Revolution” is the name that the Czechs give these events and that is used in the West. There are many theories about the origin of the term; what is known is that it was used by a journalist after the first demonstrations and that it gained international currency thereafter. In Slovakia, on the other hand, from the very beginning these events have always been referred to as the “Gentle Revolution.”

The public demonstrations, strikes, political meetings, and formation of political groups that provoked the collapse of state socialism in the former Czechoslovakia were preceded by a series of major political changes in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe during the previous year and a half. In June 1988 Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU) general secretary Mikhail Gorbachev all but abandoned the Brezhnev doctrine, which stipulated that the USSR and other socialist countries had a duty to come to the aid of any state where forces hostile to socialism were trying to turn its development towards capitalism. CPSU general secretary Leonid Brezhnev had developed this doctrine to justify the military invasion of Czechoslovakia in August 1968 and, retroactively, that of Hungary in 1956. The doctrine gave communist authorities in Eastern Europe the justification and capacity to prohibit and punish severely any dissident political activity. Gorbachev officially rejected it in March 1989. Its abandonment meant that the threat of a Soviet/Warsaw Pact military invasion was removed and that each Soviet bloc country could henceforth embark on its own political development. In Eastern Europe, Poland led the way with political change in September 1988 when round table discussions between the Communist Party and Solidarity were held. The round table led to the elections of June 1989, which resulted in the appointment of the first non-communist government in Eastern Europe since 1947. Regime change was also slowly taking place in Hungary during 1988 and 1989; major reforms occurred following the replacement of János Kádár as general secretary of the Supporters of Václav Havel gather in Wenceslas Square in Prague to celebrate his election and the fall of communism. In 1989 the “Velvet Revolution” led to the peaceful overthrow of the communist government in Czechoslovakia and the election of Havel to the presidency. On January 1, 1993, after Czech and Slovak political leaders failed to reach an agreement on coexistence in one state, Czechoslovakia broke apart into two separate entities. (Getty Images)

Communist Party of Hungary in May 1988. The Hungarian parliament adopted a series of measures, which included freedom of association, assembly, and the press; trade-union pluralism; a new electoral law; and a radical revision of the constitution. In October 1989 the party changed its name to the Hungarian Socialist Party. During the summer and fall of 1989 in the German Democratic Republic thousands of East Germans departed for Hungary, which had opened its border with Austria in May, and Czechoslovakia, and there were regular demonstrations for change, especially in Leipzig and East Berlin.

Czechoslovakia was at that time in the grip of “normalization,” the name given to the repressive measures that were imposed after the Warsaw Pact invasion that put an end to the Prague Spring in 1968. Public reaction to the new order expressed itself through “inner emigration,” where the people turned their interests and energy to their country cottages. Nevertheless, in 1977 a group of intellectuals led by the playwright Václav Havel made public Charter 77, a document that challenged the regime to comply with the commitments found in Basket III of the Helsinki Final Act of 1975. After Gorbachev became secretary general of the CPSU in March 1985, Czechoslovakia began to experience challenges to the regime, namely the growth of public criticism, economic difficulties, and protest inspired by the changes that were taking place elsewhere in Eastern Europe. In December 1987 the author of normalization, Gustáv Husák, was removed from his position as general secretary of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPCS). The change of personnel did not indicate a political opening, however, as he was replaced by another hard-liner, Miloš Jakeš and, furthermore, Husák remained president of Czechoslovakia. Jakeš maintained the repressive measures of his predecessor in responding to the increasingly mobilized society. During 1988 there were public demonstrations throughout Czechoslovakia, including a candlelight vigil for religious freedom in Bratislava on March 25 that was brutally repressed, demonstrations marking the August 21 anniversary of the 1968 invasion in Prague and other cities, and demonstrations in Prague to mark the October 28 anniversary of the creation of Czecho-Slovakia, and, on December 10, the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The Czechoslovak government’s response was to ban demonstrations in 1989, especially those planned in January to commemorate the 1969 death of Jan Palach and the alternative May Day demonstration. However, the November 3, 1989 decision by the Czechoslovak authorities to allow thousands of East Germans hiding in the West German embassy to travel directly to West Germany became a catalyst for dramatic change. In the days to come, thousands more East Germans traveled through Prague on to West Germany until the Berlin Wall was opened on November 9. This new freedom to travel abroad extended to East Germans did not go unnoticed by the citizens of Czechoslovakia.

The revolution began on November 16, 1989 with a peaceful student demonstration in Bratislava, Slovakia to celebrate International Students Day. The next day a similar demonstration in Prague for the same purpose was brutally repressed by the police, provoking a chain of events that brought down the regime. On November 18 students from the Academy of Performing Arts in Prague launched a strike that over the course of several days mobilized university students throughout Czechoslovakia, as well as theater employees and actors in Prague and other cities. These strikes set the stage for the next step: political change.

On Sunday, November 19 Czech political dissidents, including members of Charter 77, formed Civic Forum in Prague, thereby initiating the political process that brought down the regime by the end of the year. Civic Forum was not a political party in the strict sense of the word; rather, it brought together various political dissidents and activists. Civic Forum representatives met with federal Prime Minister Ladislav Adamec the next day, November 20, demanding abolition of the political and social control the constitution accorded to the CPCS. Communist leaders resisted the demands but proved unable to reassert their authority as successive public demonstrations in the towns and cities of Czechoslovakia increased the pressure for change. Civic Forum representatives met again with Adamec on Tuesday, November 21 while a mass demonstration was taking place in Prague. That evening, CPCS general secretary Jakeš appeared on television vowing to preserve order. The government intended to deploy the People's Militia to crush the protest, but these plans were called off at the last moment and public demonstrations continued to take place throughout Czechoslovakia. On Wednesday, November 22 Civic Forum announced a 2-hour general strike for Monday, November 27. On Thursday, November 23 the authorities again considered asking the military to intervene and changed course. That evening the minister of defense appeared on television with assurances that the army would not act against the people and a plea for an end to the demonstrations. On Friday, November 24 general secretary Jakeš resigned and was replaced by an unknown apparatchik, Karel Urbánek. Czechoslovak radio and television announced that they would join the general strike planned for November 27, and supported the popular demand for political change by broadcasting an address by Havel on the general strike. On Sunday, November 26 Adamec finally met with Havel, the leader of Civic Forum, but still refused to accede to any of the organization's demands. Finally, on Monday, November 27 the 2-hour strike at noon took place throughout the country as planned, with the support of a reported 75 percent of the population.

For a regime that had used mass demonstrations to mobilize the people, the general strike sent an unambiguous message about the desire for political change. But the CPCS leaders were not yet ready to give up power. In the days that followed, it took a series of political events to bring down the regime. On November 29 the Czechoslovak Federal Assembly eliminated Article 4 of the 1960 constitution, which gave the CPCS control over the state and society; the communist speaker of the assembly resigned. On November 30 the teaching of Marxism-Leninism was eliminated from institutions of higher learning and the government decided to remove the barbed wire along the Austrian border and let its citizens travel abroad without exit permits. On December 3 President Husák named a new government headed by Adamec with 15 communist and 5 non-communist ministers, but Civic Forum rejected it. On December 8 President Husák declared amnesty on political crimes and on December 10 he resigned after naming a federal Cabinet agreed upon by Civic Forum and the CPCS. The new Cabinet was headed by a Slovak communist, Marián Čalfa, but was made up of a majority of non-communists. The People's Militia was abolished on December 21. The next day Civic Forum, PAV, CPCS, and student representatives agreed that Alexander Dubček, leader of the Prague Spring, would become speaker of the Czechoslovak Federal Assembly and Havel President of the Republic. On December 28 the assembly, still consisting of a majority of communist deputies elected in 1986 from a single CPCS list, allowed for the cooptation of new deputies, thus changing its composition and giving it much-needed legitimacy. Dubček was elected speaker. Finally, on December 29, the Czechoslovak Federal Assembly elected Havel as president. Čalfa, the last prime minister of communist Czechoslovakia, remained in his post, while another Slovak, Ján Čarnogurský, a leading Catholic dissident, was appointed deputy prime minister. The election of Havel to the presidency formally marked the end of the communist regime. The first free post-communist elections were held in June 1990.

In Slovakia, where the Gentle Revolution had been launched on November 16, events unfolded much along the same lines as in the Czech Socialist Republic during the first week. The first political movement to arise was founded on November 20 and was called Public Against Violence (PAV). It initiated and organized mass demonstrations throughout Slovakia. Among its founders were Ján Budaj, Fedor Gál, and a well-known stage and television actor, Milan Kňažko. Public meetings took place in Slovak towns and cities, most importantly in Bratislava, under the leadership of Kňažko and Budaj in an atmosphere that was specifically Slovak, that is to say very relaxed and informal, at times even theatrical. On November 21 PAV was the first post-communist group to demand the abolition of the leading role of the CPCS that was enshrined in the constitution of 1960. That same day there was a student demonstration encouraging the population to participate in the November 27 strike and another one asking for the release of Černogurský, jailed at that time for dissident activity, at which Dubček spoke, marking his first appearance during the Velvet/Gentle Revolution. On November 30 communists resigned from the Slovak National Council and were replaced by PAV members and other dissidents. When the federal government announced the freedom to travel to Austria on December 4, the following weekend some 250,000 Slovaks crossed the border where they were met by Austrians with bread and salt, the customary form when welcoming a guest. On December 8 a new Slovak government was formed under the prime ministership of Milan Čič.

Despite the similarities of most events during the Velvet and Gentle Revolutions, the political development that followed showed that the return to democracy had a different meaning in the Czech Republic and in Slovakia. The first signs of this difference appeared in March 1990 when the Federal Assembly debated the change in the name of the country as it abandoned the communist term Czechoslovak Socialist Republic. Slovak deputies suggested that the name be simple and revert to the one used in the Peace Treaties of 1919–20, namely Czecho-Slovakia, rather than Czechoslovakia, which had been introduced in the 1920 constitution. The refusal on the part of the majority of Czech deputies and some Slovak ones provoked a mass demonstration in the streets of Bratislava on April 1, where once again the chant of an independent Slovakia was heard. After some acrimonious discussions, two compromises were reached. It was agreed that in the short version the hyphen could be used in Slovakia, although in the Czech Lands and abroad the unhyphenated spelling would apply. Then, on April 20, the Federal Assembly voted the official name Czech and Slovak Federative Republic (ČSFR, and in Slovakia Č-SFR). This incident was the first to show how very different were the Czech and Slovak conceptions of their common state and brought into the open the need to re-examine the state of Czech-Slovak relations. Nevertheless, initially the political process unfolded along similar lines in Slovakia and the Czech Republic, and the elections of June 1990 produced a clear rejection of the communists as both Civic Forum and PAV won the elections.

Over the next three years, differences between the Czech and Slovak communities became politically salient as the country made the transition from communist rule to democracy. Both the relationship between Czechs and Slovaks in their common state and the particular economic and social policies that would replace state socialism were matters of contention. In the Czech Republic political parties and most citizens favored the introduction of a market economy and a centralized federal system. In Slovakia, on the other hand, the approach was more social democratic, favoring a slower pace of economic change with continued social security measures and state intervention in the economy, and a decentralized political system. Despite many attempts to find a constitutional solution satisfactory to both communities, these differences could not be bridged. When the elections of June 1992 provided clear evidence of the polarization between the two parts of the country, the prime ministers of the Czech Republic and Slovakia, Václav Klaus and Vladimír Mečiar, respectively, agreed to the break-up of Czechoslovakia on December 31, 1992.

SEE ALSO: Charter 77; Dubček, Alexander (1921–1992); Gorbachev, Mikhail (b. 1931); Prague Spring; Slovakia, Dissidence in the 1970s

References and Suggested Readings

Bradley, J. F. N. (1992) Czechoslovakia's Velvet Revolution: A Political Analysis. Boulder, CO: East European Monographs.

- Čarnogurský, J. (1997) Videné od Dunaja (Seen from the Danube). Bratislava: Kalligram.
- Havel, V. (2007) To the Castle and Back. Trans. P. Wilson. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.
- Kenney, P. (2002) A Carnival of Revolution – Central Europe 1989. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Kirschbaum, S. J. (2005) A History of Slovakia: The Struggle for Survival, 2nd ed. New York: Palgrave.
- Leff, C. S. (1997) The Czech and Slovak Republics: Nation versus State. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Shepherd, R. H. E. (2000) Czechoslovakia: The Velvet Revolution and Beyond. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Wheaton, B. & Kavan, Z. (1992) The Velvet Revolution: Czechoslovakia, 1988–1991. Boulder: Westview Press.

Venezuela, exclusionary democracy and resistance, 1958–1998

Gregory Wilpert and Dario Azzellini

Venezuela's democratic era can be divided into three distinct periods. The first represents its economic glory days, from the end of its last dictatorship in 1958 to the height of its oil boom years in 1978. The second period, which lasted from 1979 to 1998, was marked by decline and by popular reactions in the form of constant protests, an uprising, and two military rebellions, as well as state repression of these popular reactions. The third period is the era of the Hugo Chávez presidency, which began with his assuming office in 1999.

Between 1958 and 1978 there was a self-reinforcing dynamic between Venezuela's oil-based economy and a political culture that favored rentierism. On the one hand, oil income tended to drown out all other economic activity, and on the other, the dominance of the oil economy produced rentierism, whereby all the main political and economic actors were focused on obtaining a piece of the country's oil revenues.

Until 1989 Venezuela was generally considered an exemplary democracy in Latin America. The criteria generally considered by liberal analysts as indicators for stable democracies – regular elections, possible alternation of the parties in power, respect of certain civil rights – were all seen as present. In reality, however, it was more a repressive democracy in which two parties – the formally social democratic Democratic Action (Acción Democrática, AD) and the conservative Political Electoral Independent Organization Committee (Comité de Organización Política Electoral Independiente, COPEI) – shared power. From the fall of the dictatorship of Marcos Pérez Jiménez in 1958 up to the seizure of power by Hugo Chávez in 1999, they filled the entire institutional space of interaction with the state and the whole social life.

The Pérez Jiménez dictatorship was overthrown on January 23, 1958 by an alliance of the Democratic Republican Union (Union Republicana Democrática, URD), COPEI, AD, and the Communist Party (PCV), which together had formed the Patriotic Junta to coordinate the struggle against the dictatorship, as well as employers, trade unions, and significant sectors of the military. The alliance also enjoyed the support of a mass movement. At that time the political, social, and economic model for Venezuela had already been decided. With a number of pacts among the most powerful social sectors (bourgeois parties, employers, military, trade union, and church), a hermetically sealed bourgeois representative democracy was installed and tightened from 1958 on.

Already before the elections of 1958 the chairmen of the three bourgeois parties, Rómulo Betancourt (AD), Rafael Caldera (COPEI), and Jóvito Villalba (URD), signed the so-called Pact of Punto Fijo (PPF), named after the Venezuelan city where it was signed. The pact was an agreement on how to establish governability in a framework of representative democracy. The PCV, which had played a leading role in the Patriotic Junta, was excluded from the agreement.

The PPF signatories committed themselves to respect and defend the results of the forthcoming elections in December 1958. They agreed, regardless of the electoral result, that no party should govern alone, but that the three should build together a government of national unity. A minimum program for joint government was also decided in the PPF but not included. The pact was signed separately on December 6, 1958. All parties agreed that nobody could present a program contrary to the minimum program in which, among other things, they agreed on a mixed economy, a development plan based on import substitution, the elaboration of a new constitution and social legislation, and a strong alliance with the United States. The minimum program also specified the future role of the armed forces, which were to be apolitical and obedient, while guaranteeing public peace.

The PPF model was particularly strengthened by the integration of the trade union federation, the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), which signed the Worker–Employer Pact with the representatives of the entrepreneurs. The pact established that the CTV, as the only federation, would defend the existing democracy and satisfy social and wage demands by means of negotiations and consent, avoiding strikes or any work interruptions. The CTV was established as the intermediary between government and entrepreneurs on the one hand and workers on the other. The AD government controlled the CTV after expelling the leftists.

The social climate in Venezuela at the beginning of the 1960s was strongly influenced by the success of the Cuban Revolution. A protest movement that started on October 19, 1960 spread through the country and turned into an open rebellion, which was suppressed on October 23. On November 21, students and police clashed heavily in Caracas. Strikes followed, and the movement was finally smashed on November 29 with the storming of the Central University of Venezuela (UCV) and over 4,000 arrests.

After the URD left the PPF in 1960 and was marginalized, AD and COPEI controlled the state. AD's shift to the right provoked two leftist splits in 1960–1, when it lost almost all its youth members to the new Movement of the Revolutionary Left (MIR). The PCV and MIR began to prepare the armed struggle but were outlawed by Betancourt after their participation in a leftist military uprising against the government in May 1962. From 1960 to 1962, several leftist military revolts took place. The former head of the Patriotic Junta, URD member of parliament Fabricio Ojeda, left parliament on June 30, 1962 in order to oversee the construction of a guerrilla front in the Andes.

Over the following years the Punto Fijo system (puntofijismo) was further elaborated with a greater number of pacts. AD and COPEI agreed on a voting system that benefited parties having a nationwide apparatus and strong finances. Voters could elect parties by paper ballot, but decisions about candidates were made by the party leadership. Direct elections of mayors and governors of the federal states, established in the 1961 Constitution, did not occur. Instead, the president appointed the governors, who then appointed the mayors. This system impeded electoral success for small parties or independent candidates.

On March 6, 1964, the Vatican and the Venezuelan government signed an agreement in which the government assumed responsibility for the maintenance of bishops, vicars, and church institutions, in exchange for which the Catholic Church gave the government a veto against the appointment of any archbishop, bishop, or prelate. Thus the two-party system extended its control to the social influence of the church. In 1970 an Institutional Pact established that at the beginning of each presidential term, the posts of chairman of the national congress, general prosecutor, high court judges, and other organs of the judiciary and the electoral council had to be shared among AD and COPEI.

The URD obtained success in the presidential elections of 1968 when its candidate, Miguel Angel Burrelli Rivas, won 22.2 percent of the vote. After that its political importance declined, and it supported COPEI and AD candidates in subsequent presidential elections before almost completely disappearing from political life.

However, the elections of 1968 are interesting for another reason. With an election turnout of 96.7 percent – the highest in Venezuelan history – AD and COPEI together obtained only 57.37 percent of the vote. Luis Beltrán Prieto Figueroa, a high school teacher and union leader, won 19.34 percent as candidate of a leftist coalition under the leadership of the Electoral Movement of the People (MEP). The MEP had split off from AD in 1967. Its candidate was supported by the PCV which, although still illegal, had created the Union to Advance (UPA) in order to participate in the elections. Because of the split of leftist votes, the COPEI candidate, Rafael Caldera, won the presidency with just 29.13 percent against the AD's Gonzalo Barrios with 28.24 percent.

Since neither of the two alternative candidates had succeeded in breaking the AD–COPEI alliance, and the parties supporting them lost significant support in the following elections, the two-party system can be regarded as being consolidated from the next general elections on in 1973. AD candidate Carlo Andrés Pérez won the presidency with 48.7 percent, while the left presented three different candidates, obtaining 12.4 percent altogether.

AD and COPEI became nationwide mass organizations. From 1973 to 1988, together they won 80 percent of the votes in general elections and 90 percent in presidential elections. All substantial government decisions – above all those concerning defense, foreign affairs, and oil policies – were made with the consent of both parties. The decisions were taken by a small inner circle of the parties' leaderships (called cogollos). MPs had to vote as a bloc in favor of their leaderships' decisions if they did not wish to jeopardize their careers.

Members of AD and COPEI were subjected to an iron party discipline and were expelled when they refused to accept decisions from above. In addition, both parties penetrated numerous social organizations and institutions – including state enterprises, trade unions, neighborhood, peasant, and student organizations, professional bodies and foundations – and put them to work for party political purposes. Beyond that, they maintained close relations with the military and the private capitalist sector, who were both endowed with enormous advantages (funds, training, subsidies, tax exemptions, protection, privileges, and state contracts) in exchange for their non-interference in political affairs.

Thus, puntofijismo represented a corporate pact unifying the forces that could guarantee a formally democratic system servicing the interests of the United States, transnational companies (mainly oil), and the Venezuelan bourgeoisie. All subordinated forces had access to resources and power; all others were excluded. The articulation of demands and decision-making had to occur through the established mechanisms of the party system. Protests were not accepted as instruments of democratic struggle and were equated with communism or guerilla action. Until 1994, even peaceful protests were met with brutal repression and numerous deaths.

As the world's largest exporter of oil between 1925 and 1986, Venezuela experienced a "golden decade" from 1974 to 1983. On August 29, 1975, President Carlos Andrés Pérez (1973–8) nationalized the oil industry, but the traditional oligarchy and the new upper class created through the party system continued to take advantage of the nationalized enterprises and use them as their private treasure. They also used the state apparatus to guarantee maximum profits with the lowest risk in the private sector.

In the expectation that oil prices would remain high, the Venezuelan state became heavily indebted to international banks and institutions. By raising hopes of social ascent and improvement, it pacified the situation in the country.

Popular Reactions against Neoliberalism and the Rise of Chávez, 1989–1998

A fundamental shift began in Venezuelan society, however, once the oil bonanza began to wane. The country entered a 20-year decline and suffered one of its worst economic shocks in 1984. There were occasional oil booms in this period, such as during the Iranian Revolution (1980) and the Gulf War (1991), but these short-lived booms could not make up for heavy indebtedness, increasing oil production costs, declining oil prices, and massive population growth. The decline in per capita oil income and thus also in per capita GDP was steady and unprecedented in the world during this period. Real per capita income declined by 27 percent between 1979 and 1999. No other economy in South America experienced such a dramatic decline. Along with this, poverty increased from 17 percent in 1980 to 65 percent in 1996. When oil income began to decline, it was not as easy to reduce government spending as it had been to increase it. The result was that the government gradually went deeper and deeper into debt. In addition, interest rates for the foreign debt increased dramatically, so that between 1970 and 1994 foreign debt rose from 9 percent to 53 percent of GDP.

Compounding the declining revenues and the rising debt burden was a massive capital flight, largely in response to the deteriorating economic situation and the impression that the government was unable to do anything to stop the decline. In 1982 alone, $8 billion left the economy, which had a GDP of $56 billion at that time. To stem this capital flight, President Luis Herrera Campins dramatically devalued the currency, which decreased the value of Venezuelans' wealth and income relative to the outside world. Middle-class Venezuelans, who had become used to going on shopping sprees to Miami, could suddenly no longer afford to do so. Other consequences of this economic decline were increasing unemployment (reaching 13.4 percent in 1984), a growing informal sector (reaching 54 percent in 1998), and a dismantled welfare state.

By 1988, while a secret revolutionary movement was being organized within the military, Venezuela seemed to be on the brink of an abyss. That year, former President Carlos Andrés Pérez (known as CAP) campaigned on a promise to reinstitute Venezuela's glory days of the mid-1970s, on anti-neoliberalism, and on not bringing in the International Monetary Fund (IMF) to help with the country's fiscal deficit. CAP easily won a second (non-consecutive) term in December 1988. However, three weeks after his inauguration in February 1989, he effected a complete reversal of his campaign promises and introduced a full package of IMF-required neoliberal measures, such as gasoline price increases, privatization, social spending cutbacks, and deregulation of prices.

The economic shock treatment hit the population with unprecedented force. However, since the most immediate measures of the package affected all Venezuelans evenly in absolute terms, they affected the poor more than anyone else in relative terms. The 30 percent increase in bus fares, for example, affected the poor much more than the middle classes.

Protests against the IMF-mandated bus fare increases began immediately and soon turned into full-blown riots, in which stores were looted, first in Caracas and, as word spread, to almost all other cities throughout Venezuela. The protests and riots appeared to be spontaneous and neither the country's political leadership, from the government or the opposition, nor the unions made any declarations about them one way or the other. At first the police stood by, but as the riots and lootings continued all night and into the following morning, the government finally reacted with a televised call for calm. The statement had no effect and President Pérez declared martial law, suspending constitutional guarantees. The government then proceeded to suppress the protests and riots with violence, bringing in the military who, together with the police, fired indiscriminately at protesters and rioters.

The repression continued for several days after the riots had ended, with military forces going into poor neighborhoods (barrios), attacking people and homes at random. Finally, when the shooting ended on March 4, the official death toll stood at nearly 400. Most other unofficial estimates, however, place the number of dead between 1,000 and 3,000, some even higher. Weeks later, human rights groups found mass burial sites in the barrios, with bodies too decomposed to be identified.

The Caracazo acted as a wake-up call for the secret Bolivarian movement within the military, the Bolivarian Revolutionary Army (Ejército Bolivariano Revolucionario, EBR-200). It was completely unprepared for such a civilian uprising, even though this was more or less the kind of event it believed it needed in order to be successful in toppling the government. Numerous soldiers and officers began approaching the group.

In the aftermath of the IMF-imposed structural adjustment plan that had initiated the Caracazo, unemployment rose from 7 to 10 percent, the economy shrank by 10 percent, real salaries dropped by 11 percent, and inflation rose to 94 percent for 1989. On May 18, the country's main labor union federation, the CTV, which was normally controlled by the ruling AD, called for a one-day general strike against the government it had originally supported.

By 1990 a recovery had set in. That year the economy grew by 4.4 percent, then by 9.2 percent in 1991. The economic expansion was attributable to the privatization of state enterprises and the momentary oil price boom due to the Gulf War, both of which provided the state with fresh cash. However, despite the economic turnaround, numerous protests continued throughout these years, largely because the structural adjustment program still affected the poor disproportionately.

Social movements began emerging throughout the barrios, such as the Barrio Assemblies, in which communities gathered together to discuss their needs and organizers tried to channel them through protests. The number of protests between 1989 and 1993 increased steadily, from 675 in 1989–90 to 1,047 in 1992–3. Pérez's popularity plunged in light of the constant protests, so that by 1992 he had lost control over his own party and was facing strong pressure to resign, even among former supporters. Numerous scandals involving Pérez's associates surfaced during this period, making matters even worse for the president.

Meanwhile, the EBR-200 was renamed the MBR-200 (Bolivarian Revolutionary Movement) and was preparing a military uprising for 1992. Two failed Bolivarian attempts to overthrow the government followed in February and November 1992. The insurrection attempt of February 4 failed militarily, since the insurgents did not succeed in arresting the president or conquering important military positions in Caracas.

In other federal states the military insurrections had greater success. In Zulia, for example, the military succeeded in gaining control of the regional government, oil fields, and central airport, but when it became clear that the rebellion was doomed to failure, Hugo Chávez surrendered with his troops in Caracas and asked to give a short speech on television to his fellow combatants. He spoke for barely one minute, thanked the soldiers involved, assumed responsibility for the coup d'état and its failure, and declared the objectives out of reach "for now" (por ahora). He added that there would be new possibilities for the country to change its path, but for the time being people should lay down their arms and avoid senseless bloodshed. His speech raised huge sympathies and transformed him into a symbol of hope for change. The second military uprising on November 27, 1992 also failed after heavy fighting and the death of more than 300 soldiers.

In the aftermath of the two coups, corruption scandals, further economic decline, and governmental deadlock, it came as no surprise that in the December 6, 1992 regional elections, the main winner should be a political newcomer, the leftist union-based party La Causa R (R[adical] Cause, LCR). By then even Carlos Andrés Pérez's own party rejected him, and he had to face a corruption trial for embezzling $17 million. On May 20, 1993, the Supreme Court removed his immunity and by June he was removed from office. Ramón Velásquez, a prominent historian, was named to complete the remainder of Pérez's term in office.

The December 1993 presidential vote proved to be the official beginning of the end of the puntofijo system that had been in place since 1958. Voters could choose between four major candidates: Claudio Fermín from Acción Democrática, Osvaldo Alvarez from COPEI, Andrés Velásquez from La Causa R, and Rafael Caldera, the former president and founder of COPEI, who had formed a new party for his candidacy, Convergencia (Convergence). The vote was almost evenly split between the four candidates, but Caldera won with a relatively small 30 percent of the vote, since no run-off elections or absolute majority is needed to win the Venezuelan presidency. However, there was evidence that many votes had been stolen from Velásquez when ballots cast for him were found in a garbage dump in Caracas. Also, LCR said it had evidence of forged vote counts that were sufficiently high to have given its candidate enough votes to win the presidency. Velásquez, though, told his party to accept the results and work toward an even stronger showing next time around.

Caldera's Convergencia was a coalition of parties that included the support of the Movement Toward Socialism (Movimiento al Socialismo, MAS) and 15 other parties and organizations. The success of Convergencia and of La Causa R, which combined received over 50 percent of the presidential vote, signaled the end of the dominance of the two parties that had traditionally governed Venezuela for the previous 35 years. However, abstention had also reached record levels, increasing from 22 percent in 1988 to 44 percent in 1993, thus indicating the huge loss of confidence in Venezuela's political system during this period.

Making Venezuela's economic and political situation worse, in late 1993, shortly before Caldera was due to be sworn into office, a banking crisis erupted. The government decided to nationalize the bank's losses by bailing them out with newly printed money, amounting to 10 percent of the country's GDP, or $8.5 billion, while numerous bank managers and owners fled the country, along with some of the bail-out funds. The result was massive inflation, which was to reverberate through the entire Caldera presidency. The annual average inflation rate was thus 61 percent – the highest average in the country's democratic history. The Caldera government vainly tried to gain control over the country's economic chaos, but oil prices kept dropping, reaching an all-time low of $10 per barrel in 1998.

Caldera presented several very different economic plans during his presidency. The first tried to keep his campaign promise not to follow neoliberal precepts. However, with inflation skyrocketing and oil prices plummeting, none of these worked. So, in the second half of his presidency, Caldera, just like Pérez before him, switched gear and began implementing measures more aligned with neoliberalism, under a plan called Agenda Venezuela, which he presented in April 1996. With this plan, designed by planning minister Teodoro Petkoff from the MAS, he initiated the privatization of the state telephone company and began to explore the privatization of the state oil company. Also, gasoline prices were increased by 600 percent. Caldera's popularity plummeted, from 66 percent to 33 percent in a two-year period, and Venezuela's political class faced yet another crisis of confidence.

While President Pérez had been struggling with the continuing decline of Venezuela's economy and its political institutions and his own impeachment, Chávez was meeting numerous political leaders in prison. When Caldera assumed the presidency, however, Chávez was released from prison in an amnesty for all of the participants in the coups of 1992. Caldera had made the release of the coup plotters one of his campaign promises, and kept this promise shortly after assuming office. Chávez and his fellow former conspirators had clearly acquired much popular support and had raised expectations among large parts of Venezuela's population. Also, within the military, Chávez's organization had been destroyed, making any renewed military coup attempt virtually impossible.

An important factor during this time was that Venezuela's two-party system had fallen apart. Already in 1989, Velásquez (of La Causa R) won the governorship of Bolívar state – practically the first time anyone from a party outside the two-party system had obtained public office. Then, in 1993, Caldera won the presidency mainly because he had left his party and had made a political comeback on the basis of sympathizing with Chávez's coup attempt. Next, in December of 1995, one of Chávez's former closest allies, Francisco Arias Cardenas, ran for governor of the state of Zulia and won on the Causa R ticket.

In 1997 the MBR-200 decided to opt for electoral participation. Since Venezuelan electoral law prohibits any party from using the name of Simón Bolívar in its party name, Chávez's party was named the Fifth Republic Movement (Movimiento Quinta República, MVR). The party counted four republics since Venezuela's independence and wanted to found a fifth with the passage of a new constitution if Chávez were elected.

Hugo Chávez went on to win the December 6, 1998 presidential election with 56.2 percent of the vote. The reasons for his success were directly related to the country's 20-year economic decline and the consequent disintegration of its two-party system and popular revolts. Chávez presented himself as someone who would bring about radical change for Venezuela, even though he was somewhat vague as to what this change would consist of, beyond the passage of a new constitution and an end to neoliberal politics, especially the imminent privatization of the oil sector. However, his complete outsider status and the fact that he had tried to overthrow the old regime more than six years earlier gave him a solid base of support among the voting public.

SEE ALSO: Bolivarianism, Venezuela; Caracazo, 1989; Chávez, Hugo (b. 1954); Chávez, Hugo and the Bolivarian Revolution, 1998–Present; Venezuela, Guerilla Movements, 1960s–1980s; Venezuela, MAS and Causa Radical; Venezuela, MBR-200 and the Military Uprisings of 1992

References and Suggested Readings

- Buxton, J. (2001) The Failure of Political Reform in Venezuela. Aldershot: Ashgate.
- Coronil, F. (1997) The Magical State: Nature, Money, and Modernity in Venezuela. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Ellner, S. (2008) Rethinking Venezuelan Politics: Class, Conflict, and the Chávez Phenomenon. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.
- Gott, R. (2005) Hugo Chávez and the Bolivarian Revolution. London: Verso.
- Karl, T. L. (1997) The Paradox of Plenty. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Lopez Maya, M. (1999) La protesta popular en Venezuela entre 1989 y 1993. Caracas: Nueva Sociedad.
- Lopez Maya, M. (2003) Movilización, institucionalidad y legitimidad en Venezuela. Revista Venezolana de Economía y Ciencias Sociales 1: 211–26.
- Lopez Maya, M. (2005) Del viernes negro al referendo revocatorio. Caracas: Alfadil.
- Ochoa Henríquez, H. & Rodríguez Colmenares, I. (2003) Las fuerzas armadas en la política social de Venezuela. Política y Cultura 20: 117–35.

Venezuela, guerilla movements, 1960s–1980s

Dario Azzellini

Venezuela was the second country in Latin America (after Cuba) to have a significant guerilla movement during the second half of the twentieth century. After the Venezuelan Communist Party (PCV) and other leftists had played a central role in overthrowing the dictatorship of Marcos Pérez Jimenez in 1958, the bourgeois parties excluded them from decision-making.

Mexican magazine editor Mario Menendez (center) poses late 1962 with guerilla forces commander in chief Douglas Bravo (right) and his assistant Luben Petkoff (left). After being expelled from the Communist Party of Venezuela in 1965, Bravo went on to lead the military wing of the Partido de la Revolución Venezolana (PRV). In 1980 he recruited a young military officer within the Venezuelan army, Hugo Chávez, to help foment revolution from within. (AFP/Getty Images)

The formerly center-left Acción Democrática (AD) aligned the country with the US and followed a politics of repression toward the left. The result was a guerilla war from 1962 to 1973, inspired by the Cuban revolution. But even if the level of armed confrontation dropped after that, the existence of armed leftist organizations persisted.

Following the Cuban model, tactical combat units (Unidades Tácticas de Combate, UTC) were formed as urban guerillas in Venezuela, starting in 1960. They were formed as military apparatus of the PCV, the Revolutionary Leftist Movement (MIR), and smaller leftist organizations. They gained visibility from 1961 on with attacks on US enterprises and strategic institutions. Especially during 1961 and 1962, the units of the MIR were the most active Venezuelan guerillas.

The MIR was founded on April 8, 1960, by young AD militants who had been involved in the struggle against the dictatorship. It was founded as a Marxist party with the goal of introducing a socialist system through revolution. The founders had been expelled from the AD between 1958 and 1960 because, influenced by socialism and the Cuban revolution, they were demanding agrarian reform and criticizing the interior, economic, financial, and foreign policies of the party.

In 1961, guerilla units of the PCV, MIR, and URD (Unión Republicana Democrática)

dissidents joined together to form the Forces of National Liberation (FNL). Rural guerilla fronts were organized in the federal state of Merida (starting from 1960), in the mountains of Lara (starting from 1961), in the mountains of Falcón and Yaracuy, in the east of the country (starting from 1962), and last in the levels of Apure (starting from 1965).

On January 18, 1962, a transportation strike grew into a country-wide rebellion, which was put down after two weeks, while a planned civilian-military rebellion in the coastal area close to Caracas was aborted before it began. This was the first attempt of leftist forces and army sectors to start an uprising. After that a military uprising in Carúpano, in eastern Venezuela, took place but was defeated. More than 400 people, including PCV member of parliament Eloy Torres and other PCV and MIR members who had taken part in the rebellion, were arrested.

President Rómulo Betancourt banned the PCV and MIR on May 9, 1962. Thousands of arrests followed. However, until the end of 1963 a democratic image was maintained and the elected members of parliament of the PCV and MIR kept their seats. On June 2, 1962, a marine battalion in Puerto Cabello, in the federal state of Carabobo, started an uprising in coordination with the PCV and its youth organization Communist Youth of Venezuela (JCV). The uprising was put down two days later with massive military attacks from air and sea, causing 300 to 400 deaths. After the two military rebellions, the FLN initiated its transformation into FLN Armed Forces of National Liberation (FLN-FALN), a structure to coordinate all groups and build a People's Army. All organizations, not just the PCV, were strongly influenced by Cuba and China, and both the guerilla activities and the repression grew.

On June 30, 1962, journalist, congressman, and former leader of the Patriotic Junta that had coordinated the uprising against the dictatorship, Fabricio Ojeda, announced that he would join the armed struggle. He went to the Andes in order to command a front of the FLN-FALN. Ojeda was arrested in 1966, tortured, and killed by the Intelligence Service of the Army Forces (SIFA) on June 21, 1966. Official sources said he committed suicide.

The FALN carried out armed attacks, as well as spectacular propaganda operations. On January 18, 1963 an urban guerilla unit stole five paintings by Van Gogh, Picasso, Cézanne, Braque, and Gauguin from a special exhibition in Caracas. On February 18, 1963 the FALN hijacked the Venezuelan cargo ship Anzoátegui and while heading toward Brazil sent out to the world messages about the situation of political prisoners in Venezuela. On August 24, MIR units kidnapped the Argentine football star Alfredo Di Stefano, who was playing for Real Madrid, and released him after 54 hours.

After the FALN killed several National Guard members on September 29, 1963 during an attack on a tourist train line, President Betancourt ordered the arrest of the PCV and MIR members of parliament. As a consequence, in January 1964, the MIR and PCV defined the armed struggle as the central task of the left in Venezuela. At this time more than 1,000 Guérilleros were active. In October 1964 Douglas Bravo and Elías Manuitt of the general command of the José Leonardo Chirinos guerilla front issued a report that was approved by the PCV-FALN calling for the cooperation of revolutionary sectors of the army, and the guerilla was declared for the first time an important strategy.

In late 1965, part of the PCV central committee (among them Teodoro Petkoff, Guillermo García Ponce, and Pompeyo Marquez), from prison, criticized the armed struggle as an error which had isolated the left. Parts of the MIR supported the criticism. Douglas Bravo and others were excluded from the PCV, so the PCV split and on April 23, 1966 the Party of the Venezuelan Revolution (PRV) was founded. The guerilla fronts in Falcón and Lara, defining themselves as revolutionary Bolivarian Marxists, named Simón Bolívar, Simón Rodríguez, Ezequiel Zamora, and the heritage of black and indigenous resistance as the base of Venezuelan socialism and the civilian-military uprising as the way to the Venezuelan revolution. They decided to continue the armed struggle as PRV-FALN under the leadership of Douglas Bravo, taking up the intentional infiltration of the military. The PRV-FALN succeeded in organizing important members of the army, and their work remained largely undiscovered until they left the armed forces. The PCV-FALN stopped military operations in 1966 and dissolved officially in February 1969. The final break of the PCV with the armed struggle and Cuba, which supported it, took place in 1967, and in 1968 the PCV participated in elections under a different name.

The MIR split into a hard (MIR duro) and a soft (MIR blando) faction. The MIR blando gave up armed struggle and dissolved in the middle of the 1970s into the Movimiento Al Socialismo (MAS). The MIR duro, which continued the armed struggle, split in 1968 into the Frente Guerrillero Antonio José de Sucre (FGAJS), which remained a guerilla organization, and the MIR, which became the legal party. In 1979–1980 the party disintegrated into five different organizations and lost importance.

With the seizure of power of Rafael Calderas of the conservative Copei in 1969, the high tide of the guerilla war was over. Caldera put an emphasis on the pacification of the conflict. About 300 members of armed organizations, above all the PCV and MIR, accepted offers of a remission of penalty or exile and gave up armed struggle. The PCV and MIR were admitted again as legal parties.

In 1970 the guerilla FGAJS split into two main currents. One formed the guerilla Red Flag (Bandera Roja – BR) with a Stalinist-Maoist orientation and a military front. The other current advocated a combination of armed struggle and legal political activities by founding the urban guerilla Organization of Revolutionaries (OR) and then, in 1973, the Socialist League (LS) as a legal political organization. At the beginning the LS defined itself as Marxist-Leninist-Maoist but as time passed it moved more and more to an undogmatic Marxism. During the 1970s it had a certain influence in the student sector with the Student Movement of Popular Unity (MEUP) and later with the Movimiento 80.

After the 1976 kidnapping of the US entrepreneur William Frank Niehaus, accused of working for the CIA, by the Groups of Revolutionary Commandos (GCR), a split-off of the OR advocating for an offensive of the armed struggle, the repression forces led a brutal campaign against the LS and the OR. The LS founder and chairman, Jorge Rodríguez (father of Jorge Rodríguez Gómez, vice-president of Venezuela since 2007), was murdered. The repression led to the weakening of the LS, which had experienced a reinforcement before the kidnapping, and led to the dissolution of the OR in the following years. The LS participated in elections in 1983 and 1988 with small success and supported the 1998 candidacy of Chávez. In 2007 it dissolved into the United Socialist Party of Venezuela (PSUV).

The guerilla front of BR and its leadership split off during 1976–1977 and created BR-Marxista-Leninista (BR-ML), which was disbanded by repression a short time after. BR rebuilt the military structures as Frente Americo Silva (FAS) and in August 1977 organized the escape of imprisoned militants. A phase of intensive and successful military activities followed, which lasted until 1982. At the beginning of October 1982 the army bombarded a BR-FAS camp during a large meeting and surrounded the region with huge military forces, killing 23 guerrillas, some of whom were literally executed. BR declared a ceasefire and accomplished no further military operations, officially abdicating in 1994. At that point, BR concentrated on political work in schools and universities. Most of the BR finally dissolved in Bolivarian organizations. The remaining BR rejects Chávez and the Bolivarian movement, calling them false socialists. BR became part of the right-wing opposition alliance and became a legal party in 2000. With fewer than 100 members, however, it lost its party status in 2008.

The PRV-FALN remained active until the end of the 1970s and carried out numerous armed operations, especially during the first half of the decade. The PRV-FALN also had an urban command. The Mobile Unit (Unidad Móvil) was founded at the end of the 1960s and operated up to the early 1980s, concentrating on financing operations such as bank robberies.

The idea of a continental liberation like that envisioned by Simón Bolívar was already common among the Venezuelan left in the 1970s. The Brigada Internacionalista Simón Bolívar supported the liberation struggle in Nicaragua militarily. The PRV organized international armed solidarity with movements in Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Colombia.

The political and military defeat of the armed struggle in Venezuela led huge parts of the Venezuelan left between the end of the 1960s and the beginning of the 1970s to question dogmatism, a missing connection with the everyday life struggles of the population, imported political models, the focus concept, and the authoritarianism of the Communist Party. Most armed organizations put their emphasis on grassroots work. Most cadres were not militarily active, but political organizations alongside social movements (the PRV with Ruptura, the OR with the LS, BR with the Committees of Popular Struggles – CLP).

The magazine and publishing house Ruptura, created by the PRV in 1974, grew into a broad movement. Ruptura became a strong reference point in the cultural sector and developed broad grassroots work with fronts for peasants, workers, students, and neighborhoods. Meanwhile the guerilla activities of the PRV continued. On January 18, 1975 the PRV-FALN, together with the BR, organized a mass escape of 23 political prisoners from the San Carlos prison in Caracas.

As a revolutionary strategy PRV-Ruptura continued to support the civilian-military rebellion and continued to try to infiltrate the army in order to organize the rebellion. The success of Ruptura's political work with mass movements led to an intensive internal debate in 1978–1979. The activists from the movements questioned the military structure. A current led by Ali Rodríguez split off from the PRV and founded the Revolutionary Tendency (TR) as a legal organization, which later merged with the PCV faction that had split off, Causa R. Ruptura broke up during a PRV crisis in 1979, but many networks of militants and grassroots organizations persisted.

The PRV dissolved in 1983. In 1985 the current around Douglas Bravo founded PRV Third Way (Tercer Camino) as a legal political organization. It developed activities in neighborhoods, factories, and universities. In addition, it had clandestine structures which participated in the civilian-military rebellions of 1992. Douglas Bravo was condemned for his participation in the rebellions and later pardoned.

During the early 1980s the GCR, led by Carlos Lanz, merged with the Guevaristic currents of the poor Caracas 23 de Enero neighborhood and formed the Revolutionary Workers' Movement (MRT). This guerilla organization was small and short-lived, but their political orientation had a great influence on the Venezuelan left during the following decades.

Like the PRV, the MRT followed the strategy of the civilian-military alliance and the continental revolution. Although the majority of the MRT militants came from very avant-gardist organizations, the MRT understood itself not as avant-garde, but as a further resistance experience. It referred to the experiences of the indigenous and Afro-Venezuelan resistance as well as to practices of counter-culture. It advocated for an alliance of different resistance forms and movements, hoping to unite workers, students, sexual minorities, human rights activists, and the oppressed of various races and ethnicities.

Breaking with Leninism, the MRT studied Rosa Luxembour, Leon Trotsky, and the experiences of self-management, in order to develop a libertarian socialism. The MRT questioned the Leninist democratic centralism and insisted upon the necessity of horizontal forms of organization. Instead of cooperating with trade unions and official student associations the MRT supported and cooperated with workers' and students' councils. The MRT postulated neither full legality nor absolute clandestinity. Based on an analysis of Venezuelan capitalism and different concepts of armed struggle, it assumed that organized people's power would lead to social revolution. Therefore the struggle was not limited to armed operations but was part of everyday life. The organization's structure consisted of mobile urban militias, which had legal and unarmed tasks as well as military clandestine ones.

Social circumstances and increasing repression during the 1980s led to a resurgence of armed groups. Especially in Caracas's poor neighborhoods many local armed militias were founded for self-defense against police repression and to fight the drug economy, which was frequently allied with the police. The armed structures of the MRT were the origin of the Revolutionary Tupamaro Movement, also known as Tupamaros. From Caracas's well-known 23 de Enero neighborhood, the organization spread over the country. The Tupamaros supported the candidacy of Chávez in 1998 and has participated in elections since 2004. In 2002 in Caracas the Revolutionary Movement Carapaica and the Tactical Combat Unit Nestor Zepa Cartolini (UTCNZC) split off as exclusively clandestine urban militia structures. Beyond these, other armed militias exist, particularly in the poor neighborhoods of Caracas.

There were rural groups in addition to the urban groups. The Bolivarian Liberation Forces-Liberation Army (FBL-EL) was founded in 1986 and became public in 1992. This group had contact with neither the guerillas of the 1960s and 1970s nor the rebellious army members. The FBL-EL still exists as an armed guerilla organization, but officially it does not undertake any armed operations. It supports Chávez as well as the Bolivarian process, but it postulates the necessity of armed self-organization of the population beyond the army.

SEE ALSO: Bolivarianism, Venezuela; Chávez, Hugo (b. 1954); Tupamaros; Venezuela, MAS and Causa Radical; Venezuela, Military Uprisings, 1960–1962

References and Suggested Readings

- Bonilla-Molina, L. & El Troudi, H. (2004) Historia de la Revolución Bolivariana. Caracas: Ministerio de Comunicación e Información.
- Gabaldón Márquez, E. (2007) Por el camino de Chimiro. Caracas: El perro y la rana.
- Garrido, A. (2000) La Historia Secreta de la Revolución Bolivariana. Merida: Editorial Venezolana.
- Garrido, A. (2002) Documentos de la Revolución Bolivariana. Caracas: Ediciones del autor.

Venezuela, MAS and Causa Radical

Dario Azzellini

As a consequence of the debates provoked by the defeat of the armed struggle and the invasion of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic (CSSR) by the Soviet Union, the Venezuelan Communist Party (PCV) split in 1970. The PCV had recently been legalized, but tensions within the international communist movement led to local debates. As a result, the Movement to Socialism (MAS) and the Radical Cause (Causa R) formed by splitting off from the PCV in 1971.

In January 1971 MAS was formed under the leadership of Teodoro Petkoff, Pompeyo Marquez, Eloy Torres, and others, some of them former PCV central committee members. Instead of maintaining Marxism as its main ideology, MAS followed a reformist orientation. Because of these more conservative currents, former guerilla commander Alfred Maneiro, in turn, broke with MAS and led a small group of approximately ten activists to create a new political organization. This group acted first as Venezuela 83 but changed its name to Causa Radical (Causa R) in 1973. From 1973 to the beginning of the 1990s, MAS represented the main left-wing voting option, putting forward José Vicente Rangel, well known for his strong advocacy of human rights, as a presidential candidate in 1973.

MAS

While Causa R focused on building independent trade unions, the split-off from MAS had also provoked a split in the PCV union federation CUTV. The MAS sector of the CUTV negotiated power quotas with the official union federation CTV and joined the federation the communists had left years before, winning three seats on the CTV leadership board at the group's seventh congress in 1975. In the 1978 general elections MAS won 6.08 percent of the votes. In 1980 it had approximately 40,000 members, enjoying special support from the middle class and universities.

In the course of the 1980s, MAS moved increasingly to social-democratic positions, joined the socialist international, and consolidated its institutional presence. The Movement of the Revolutionary Left (MIR), a party built out of the MIR faction which gave up armed struggle in 1969, merged with MAS in 1983. In the general elections the same year, MAS won 5.74 percent of the votes, gaining ten seats in Congress and two in the Senate. In 1988, MAS nearly doubled their vote to 10.2 percent (18 congressional seats and three senators). But after this peak the votes began to drop, and with the participation of Rafael Caldera in the government (1994–1998) MAS experienced a huge loss of confidence among the voters. Above all, Teodoro Petkoff caused huge disappointment with his neoliberal politics. A former communist and ex-guerrilla, he had joined the Caldera government as minister for planning and was responsible for the structural adjustment program known as Agenda Venezuela, negotiated with the International Monetary Fund (IMF). Pompeyo Marquez worked in the same government as a minister for borders. Just before the end of Caldera's term MAS withdrew its support.

The growing distance of the party representatives from the rank-and-file, however, did not only concern MAS, but also Causa R. The reason was not just the individual incapacity of party representatives or the party itself, but the immanent systemic limits of representative democracy. The parliamentary logic set clear limits to an organic relationship between the organized movements and the institutional representation of left parties. The endless debates and negotiations in parliament led even the left parties into the logic of negotiation and to ensure their own parliamentary presence. This led the masses to question not only the representation legitimacy of the right parties but also that of the new leftist parties. In turn, they increasingly questioned the entire parliamentary system of representative democracy.

MAS faced further splits. When they decided in 1998 to support Hugo Chávez as a presidential candidate, Petkoff protested and left the party. Pompeyo Marquez also split off and formed the small social-democratic anti-Chávez party Democratic Left (ID). In 2002 MAS split again. While the majority of MAS leaders and representatives in parliament decided to follow Petkoff and Marquez in joining the opposition, most of the rank-and-file members joined Podemos, under the leadership of Didalco Bolívar and Ismael García, and continued in their support for Chávez. For the presidential elections of 2007 MAS supported the opposition alliance candidate, Manuel Rosales, and won only 0.61 percent of the votes, the worst result of its history. Podemos finally broke with the Chávez government in 2007, with a great majority of their representatives and rank-and-file members joining the newly formed United Socialist Party of Venezuela (PSUV).

Causa R

The group which later adopted the name Causa R decided to concentrate its 1971 political activities on three axes – the Central University of Venezuela (UCV) in Caracas; the workers of the Siderúrgica del Orinoco (Sidor) steel plant in Ciudad Guayana, where a large strike had been crushed with the dismissal of 514 workers and the magazine Matancero was available to support their work; and Catia, a poor neighborhood of Caracas.

In contrast to MAS or the PCV, from whom the group always kept a clear distance, Causa R was to a large extent organized in a very informal way. No foundation congress was held, and Causa R had no statute or platform. It did not even have regulated decision structures. Instead, the group tried to be a mixture of movement and party, whereby decisions were made by a reduced leading circle. Although its analysis instrument was Marxism, Causa R resisted being classified as Marxist, socialist, or communist.

The political axes of Causa R developed unequally. The university sectors were excluded or left Causa R in the middle of the 1970s, criticizing Causa R as too pragmatic and demanding more programmatic clarity, theory, work, and political formation. After Maneiro's death in 1982 Causa R was fractionated by debates around political axes and electoral politics.

Causa R had organizational and political success in Sidor, where in 1979 a Causa R group based around the labor leader Andrés Velásquez won the majority in the internal elections of the industrial union SUTISS. In 1981 the AD-controlled union intervened in SUTISS, some trade union activists were fired, and all representatives were exchanged for unionists supporting AD (Acción Democrática). In 1988, however, with the first free internal elections after the intervention, Causa R supporters again won a majority. That same year Causa R obtained its first electoral success on a national level and won three seats in parliament. This was due to their extraordinary strength in the federal state of Bolívar, while country-wide they only garnered 0.54 percent of the votes.

Because of its position and its work close to the movements, Causa R was seen by the people as an alternative to the established parties between 1989 and 1993. In 1989 Andrés Velásquez won the first governor elections for Causa R. Causa R collaborated with the military uprising in November 1992, although it had withdrawn from the February 1992 rebellion at the very last moment. In the presidential elections of 1993, Velásquez ran as the Causa R candidate and came fourth with 21.95 percent of the votes. The leadership of Causa R thought there had been some fraud but did not protest. In these elections Causa R for the first time won even more votes than MAS (MAS had 10.81 percent, 24 Congress members, and 5 senators, while Causa R had 20.68 percent, 40 Congress members, and 9 senators).

One year earlier Causa R had already achieved some important local and regional electoral victories. In Bolívar, Velásquez was voted in for a second term as governor with 63.36 percent of the votes; and Causa R won mayoral elections for a second time in places such as the municipality of Caroní (Ciudad Guayana and the surrounding industrial region), where Clemente Scotto won 68.36 percent of the votes, and Libertador, the most populated of Caracas's five districts, where Aristóbulo Istúriz won with 34.45 percent of the votes. As after the elections in 1989, mass mobilizations forced the state to recognize electoral results, and Causa R became the third most popular party in the polls.

In the next governor elections, in 1995, Causa R suffered severe setbacks, even though it remained the third strongest party, since MAS likewise registered losses. In Bolívar, Causa R lost the governorship. The rank-and-file, especially the middle-range cadres, argued that there had been electoral fraud. They saw this confirmed by the strong discrepancies during the vote count and transmission of the results. They began to mobilize in order to defend their victory. But a majority of the party leadership and the gubernatorial candidate Victor Moreno stopped the mobilization and negotiated with AD. In exchange for stopping the mobilizations, AD recognized the victory of Causa R in the mayoral elections of Caroní but not in the others. In Caroní, mayor Clemente Scotto introduced a model of participatory municipal budget and participatory town planning.

With more and more people coming to see Causa R as just another typical party, Istúriz lost the next elections in Libertador due to low voter turnout in the poor neighborhoods. According to López Maya (1996) the reason for this loss of enthusiasm was that Causa R from 1992 on did not take advantage of its institutional role, nor did it maintain a connection with the social movements. Central questions such as the democratization of the unions or labor conditions were not part of the parliamentary work of Causa R. The party limited itself to demanding a Constitutional Assembly and trying to obstruct important government projects.

Causa R did not succeed in adapting its organization and decision structures to the new circumstances. Thus it had neither a clear organizational structure nor transparent methods of decision-making. Due to the increased size of the party, decisions could no longer be taken by consensus, so decisions were generally made by a small circle of party leaders, especially in matters pertaining to strategic orientation and decisions about the staff or candidates.

In 1997 Causa R split. About 80 percent of the members and cadres formed Motherland for All (Patria Para Todos – PPT), reinforcing a leftist orientation. In 1998 PPT supported the candidacy of Chávez. The party managed to consolidate politically and organizationally and still existed in 2008 as an independent party, part of a government alliance supporting Chávez. Another group of members left Causa R to join the newly founded United Socialist Party of Venezuela (PSUV). Thus, beyond the name and individuals using it, Causa R is no longer a party with any visibility, public profile, or militancy.

SEE ALSO: Venezuela, Exclusionary Democracy and Resistance, 1958–1998; Venezuela, Guerilla Movements, 1960s–1980s

References and Suggested Readings

- Bonilla-Molina, L. & El Troudi, H. (2004) Historia de la Revolución Bolivariana: Pequeña crónica, 1948–2004. Caracas: Gobierno Bolivariano, Ministerio de Comunicación e Información.
- Ellner, S. (1988) Venezuela's Movimiento al socialismo: From Guerrilla Defeat to Innovative Politics. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Ellner, S. (1995) El sindicalismo en Venezuela en el contexto democrático (1958–1994). Caracas: Fondo Editorial Tropykos. Universidad de Oriente.
- López Maya, M. (1995) El Ascenso en Venezuela de La Causa R. Revista Venezolana de Economía y Ciencias Sociales 2–3: 205–39.
- López Maya, M. (1996) Nuevas representaciones populares en Venezuela. Nueva Sociedad 144 (July–August): 138–51.

Venezuela, MBR-200 and the military uprisings of 1992

Dario Azzellini and Gregory Wilpert

Founded in December 1982, the Revolutionary Bolivarian Army 200 (EBR-200), later renamed Revolutionary Bolivarian Movement 200 (MBR-200), was a clandestine civil-military organization with the goal of overthrowing the government and building a more just system. Founding members Hugo Chávez Frías, Yoel Acosta Chirinos, and Jesús Urdaneta Hernández symbolically swore a Bolivarian oath under the same tree (Samán de Güere), where Simón Bolívar is said to have rested. The organization worked intensively against social injustice and corruption within the political system of Venezuela. They were inspired by Simón Bolívar, Ezequiel Zamora, and Simón Rodríguez. They were also influenced by Jean-Jacques Rousseau, especially his radical democratic ideas. MBR-200 was finally dissolved before the elections in 1998 and integrated into the Movimiento V República (MVR).

The movement spread quickly throughout the army, especially among the young officers, who found its Bolivarian orientation and anti-corruption stance appealing. It was a politically broad discourse which concentrated on bridging the growing gap between the constitution and reality. Inside the army and the National Guard, discontent grew after the brutal repression of the anti-neoliberal rebellion in Caracazo in 1989, and MBR-200 expanded rapidly.

The experience of Caracazo and pressure by civil groups persuaded MBR-200 to bring forward to 1992 the armed rebellion actually planned for 2000. Intensive networking with political and social movements and organizations, as well as individuals, began. Apart from former guerillas, MBR-200 also discussed the idea of rebellion with representatives of the political party Causa R (Radical Cause). Though Causa R at first agreed to take part, the group had important sectors that did not want to support the coup, so ultimately they decided not to participate officially. Instead, only some of their militants participated. MBR-200 also conspired with the Electoral Movement of the People (Movimiento Electoral del Pueblo, MEP).

At 2.00 am on February 4, 1992, President Perez appeared on national television and announced that a military rebellion was taking place and that it was in the process of being subdued. Rebellious military forces, under the leadership of Chávez, had attempted to take control of several key installations in Venezuela: the Caracas military airport, La Carlota; the presidential palace, Miraflores; the Caracas historical museum; the state television channel; the president's residence, La Casona; the defense ministry and Caracas's main barracks, Fuerte Tiuna; the military installations of Maracaibo, Venezuela's second largest city; the air force base of Maracay; and several other military installations throughout the country.

President Perez was returning from an overseas trip early that morning, and the coup leaders had planned to detain him on his way from the airport. However, word of the rebellion had leaked out and Perez was prepared. He managed to prevent the interception on his way from the airport by reinforcing his security, making it to the Miraflores presidential palace, from which he was able to make his televised address to the nation. Also, Chávez managed to occupy the Caracas historical museum, which was supposed to serve as his communications headquarters, but he was surrounded and without the communications equipment that was supposed to be there. He was thus unable to communicate with his commanders in other areas of Caracas and Venezuela. In Fuerte Tiuna, La Casona, Maracay, and several other locations, the rebel forces had to surrender after relatively brief confrontations. Some deaths occurred in these confrontations, but almost always after the rebel forces had surrendered. In the end, 14 soldiers were killed in the coup and over 1,000 were detained.

Several of the rebellious commanders were successful in their objectives, though. Francisco Arias Cardenas was able to take over the city of Maracaibo. Chávez's men also seized the air base of La Carlota, in the middle of Caracas, and bases in Aragua and in Valencia, where soldiers even distributed weapons to the civil population. Realizing that the failures outweighed the limited successes, and to avoid more loss of life, at 9.00 am Chávez decided to surrender. As a condition of his surrender, he asked to address the tank regiment in Valencia and the parachute regiment in Aragua, via national television, in order to tell them to lay down their weapons. Around noon that day, Chávez was thus given one minute on television, which turned him into an instant hero.

There were two main reasons why the television appearance turned Chávez into the undisputed leader and gained him broad support throughout the population. First, he assumed all responsibility for the coup d'état and its failure. Many found this refreshing and honest since leaders rarely publicly assume responsibility for failure. Second, people also admired him because he did not retreat or renounce the political project behind the civilian-military uprising. He clearly maintained his goals, but agreed to surrender for the time being. This encouraged hope that the struggle had just started and sooner or later the objective of getting rid of the corrupt and dysfunctional regime would be possible.

The coup failed for a number of reasons. It had been organized as a civilian-military rebellion in connection with social movements and political organizations, but the unity did not last. Some civilians who were involved say that few civilians participated because Chávez was unwilling to give them a larger role in the uprising. Chávez, however, says that the civilians proved to be unreliable.

Even so, the uprising found immense sympathy in the social movements and among the impoverished population. The uprising was led by young officers who rose against a delegitimized leadership. Also, Chávez and the other leaders came from the lower social classes. Finally, the discourse of the rebellious militaries did not concern order, but originated around freedom (Denis 2001).

Another coup attempt took place about ten months after the first, on November 27, 1992. This attempt was led by higher-level officers than the first one – by navy Admiral Hernan Grüber Odreman and air force General Francisco Visconti. Again, Perez discovered the coup shortly beforehand and again addressed the nation in the early hours of the morning to say that it was in the process of being subdued, which it was by midday. This time, however, the fighting that broke out was much more serious and led to the deaths of about 300 soldiers, mostly in battles for the control of key military installations in Caracas and Maracay.

The participants of the uprisings were released in 1994 due to an amnesty declared by the newly elected president Rafael Caldera, and they started to build MBR-200 as a country-wide mass organization with horizontal structures, despite the military background of the founding members. On a local level Bolivarian circles formed. Their members swore an oath to be honest, laborious, and modest, and to maintain solidarity. The circles held frequent meetings to discuss concrete social alternatives. The results were gathered on a local level by the Bolivarian Coordination of Municipalities. Further organizational levels were the regional coordinations, the national coordination, and the National Direction. The results of the discussions in the circles formed the basic orientation of the National Project Simón Bolívar, the social project of MBR-200. The National Direction consisted of five people, two of whom were former soldiers.

MBR-200 opposed strengthening and consolidating the organization through participation in elections and institutional collaboration. But the refusal was not shared by everybody, and this led to divisions and split-offs in MBR-200. Francisco Arias Cárdenas, former army officer, participant of the uprisings, and charismatic number two after Chávez in MBR-200, left the organization after his release from prison in 1994. Further ex-militaries did the same. During the following years various former members stood in elections as candidates for Causa R. In 1995 Arias Cardenas, supported by Causa R, was elected governor of the federal state of Zulia, and he ran as a rival candidate to Chávez in the 2000 presidential elections. Some years later he moved again closer to the government and was appointed UN ambassador of Venezuela in 2006. Chávez, unlike others, rejected all offices offered by President Caldera and dedicated himself to the transformation of MBR-200 into a mass organization. In this process of transition, the leading role of Chávez, the most radical of all military officials, was consolidated and became unquestioned.

The political strategy of MBR-200 during the era of their first public appearance, from 1994 to 1996, was marked chiefly by building grassroots structures and also by the demand for a constitutional assembly. In 1994, MBR-200 presented seven papers concerning a constitutional assembly and a draft for a new constitution. MBR-200 stressed the necessity for a total transformation of all social structures, and they proposed the creation of five powers: executive, legislative, judicial, electoral, and moral. They advocated in favor of a people's democracy – a direct democracy in which the people are the protagonists of the decisions.

By 1996 MBR-200 had built local and regional organizational structures across the entire country. Decisions were taken by consensus, including the decision not to participate in the regional elections of 1995. This was a tactical decision. In April 1997 MBR-200, at a national congress, decided to participate in the parliamentary and presidential elections of 1998. The reasons for the participation in the elections lay in an analysis of the situation, which assumed that the next elections would be of massive importance and non-participation would have weakened the organization. For the elections the alliance with the Movimiento V República (MVR) was created, since it is forbidden in Venezuela to participate in elections with the name of Bolívar, and MBR-200 was dissolved.

SEE ALSO: Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830); Chávez, Hugo (b. 1954); Venezuela, Exclusionary Democracy and Resistance, 1958–1998; Venezuela, Guerilla Movements, 1960s–1980s

References and Suggested Readings

Azzellini, D. (2007) Venezuela Bolivariana. Cologne: ISP.

Bonilla-Molina, L. & El Troudi, H. (2004) Historia de la Revolución Bolivariana: Pequeña crónica, 1948–2004. Caracas: Gobierno Bolivariano, Ministerio de Comunicación e Información.

Denis, R. (2001) Los Fabricantes de la rebelión. Caracas. Garrido, A. (2000) La Historia Secreta de la Revolución Bolivariana. Merida: Editorial Venezolana.

Garrido, A. (2002) Documentos de la Revolución Bolivariana. Caracas: Ediciones del autor.

López Maya, M. (1996) Nuevas representaciones populares en Venezuela. Nueva Sociedad 144 (July–August): 138–51.

López Maya, M. (2003) Hugo Chávez Frías, su movimiento y presidencia. In S. Ellner & D. Hellinger (Eds.) (2003), La Política venezolana en la época de Chávez. Caracas: Nueva Sociedad, pp. 98–120.

Zago, A. (1998) La Rebelión de los ángeles. Caracas: Warp Ediciones.

Venezuela, military uprisings, 1960–1962

Dario Azzellini

The beginning of the 1960s in Venezuela was marked by general discontent with the results of the overthrow of dictator Marcos Pérez Jiménez. The bourgeois parties, entrepreneurs, Catholic Church, and high-ranking military officials had agreed to share power and had excluded the Communist Party and the leftist and progressive forces which had played a crucial role in the struggle against Pérez Jiménez. Since 1957, the revolutionary left had begun to infiltrate the army and form the Frente Militar de Carrera, a clandestine organization.

On June 26, 1961, the Barcelonazo, a military rebellion in the eastern coastal city of Barcelona, took place. While some authors describe the event as a right-wing conspiracy against the government of Rómulo Betancourt and Acción Democrática, other authors and contemporary witnesses, mainly former members of the guerilla Movement of the Revolutionary Left (MIR), who were involved in the rebellion, tell a different story. The Barcelonazo was led by nationalistic and anti-imperialistically oriented soldiers with connections to the entrepreneurs association Fedecamaras and to the old elites, and cooperating also with leftist sectors of the Republican Democratic Union (URD) and the MIR.

The rebels brought the city and one military barracks under their control. But the rebellion failed, because no further army units followed. Moreover the rebellion had been infiltrated since the time of its planning, and the entrepreneur Eugenio Mendoza is supposed to have financed the uprising on behalf of Betancourt, who wanted to verify who was willing to conspire against him.

In 1962 two left army rebellions and one attempt failed. On February 28, following a demonstration in support of a public transport strike in the coastal town of La Guaira near Caracas, hundreds of people gathered at the barracks of Marine Battalion no. 1, expecting to be armed. The commander of the battalion informed the police, but later investigations revealed that in fact the commander had been part of a rebellion plan in coordination with the left.

Then, on May 4, 1962, the Carupanazo took place. Marine Battalion no. 3 and unit no. 77 of the National Guard, based in the city of Carúpano in the federal state of Sucre in the east of Venezuela, rose against the government. They occupied the city and the airport and announced the manifesto of the Movement of Democratic Recuperation (MRD). The rebellion was put down by the military on May 6, and more than 400 people were arrested. The congressman Eloy Torres of the Communist Party (PCV), other PCV members, and several MIR members were among those arrested. Both organizations had taken part in the rebellion.

President Betancourt used the events as an opportunity to ban the PCV and the MIR on May 9, 1962. Severe repression with thousands of arrests followed. However, the government still preserved its democratic image until the end of 1963, by not arresting the parliament members of the PCV and MIR.

On June 2, 1962, a further military rebellion, known as El Porteñazo, took place in the coastal city of Puerto Cabello in the federal state of Carabobo. Marine Battalion Rafael Urdaneta no. 2 rose in coordination with the PCV and its youth organization, Communist Youth of Venezuela (JCV). The rebels arrested soldiers loyal to the government and took control of the airport and most of the city. They also freed 50 imprisoned Guerilleros, who then joined the uprising. One day later, the navy destroyer Zulia joined the rebellion. On June 4, however, the uprising was bloodily put down by military forces loyal to the government. The city was bombarded from air and sea, with the number of deaths estimated at approximately 300–400, and over 700 people injured. With the Porteñazo, the infiltration of the army by revolutionaries apparently came to an end. Most leftist soliders joined the guerillas during the following years.

The last attempt at a military uprising was aborted on October 30, 1966 before it even started. Nearly 100 National Guard members at the National Guard training school, Ramo Verde, in Los Teques, a satellite city of Caracas, were arrested.

SEE ALSO: Venezuela, Exclusionary Democracy and Resistance, 1958–1998; Venezuela, Guerilla Movements, 1960s–1980s; Venezuela, MBR-200 and the Military Uprisings of 1992

References and Suggested Readings

- Blanco Muñoz, A. (1981) La Conspiración cívico-militar: habla el Guairazo, Barcelonazo, Carupanazo y Porteñazo. Caracas: Universidad Central de Venezuela.
- Blanco Muñoz, A. (1994) Venezuela 1962: Carupanazo: la chispa que encendió la pradera. Caracas: Centro de Estudios de Historia Actual – Cátedra Pío Tamayo – Universidad Central de Venezuela (CPT-CEHA-UCV).
- Blanco Muñoz, A. (1996) Venezuela 1962–1963: El Porteñazo: trágica expresión de una aventura. Caracas: CPT-CEHA-UCV.
- Bonilla-Molina, L. & El Troudi, H. (2004) Historia de la Revolución Bolivariana: Pequeña crónica, 1948–2004. Caracas: Gobierno Bolivariano, Ministerio de Comunicación e Información.
- Duarte Parejo, A. J. (2005) El Carupanazo. Caracas: Gobierno Bolivariano, Ministerio de Comunicación e Información.

Venezuela, Negro Miguel Rebellion, 1552

Dario Azzellini

In 1553, the first recorded revolt by Africans enslaved by the Spanish colonial authority disrupted a gold rush in Venezuela's Burla mining region. The uprising was led by Negro Miguel, an African slave who established a maroon colony and who is now recognized as a leader in the historical struggle for racial justice in Venezuela.

Following the discovery of gold reserves by Spanish explorer Damián del Barrio on the edges of the Buría River, now in Venezuela's Yaracuy State, near the city of Nirgua, a gold rush ensued, leading to the founding in 1551 of Real de Minas de San Felipe de Buría, the first miners' settlement in Venezuela. In its wake, gold miners established the town of El Tocuyo in 1545 as a prospecting center. In 1550, the Spanish crown decided to permit the involuntary transport of the first African slaves to the region to work the mines. By 1552, 80 Africans, including Miguel, his wife, and his children, were forced into slavery in the Real de Minas region. In 1553, Negro Miguel fled the mining operation with his family and other slaves to the surrounding mountains, from where they planned a nocturnal ambush of colonial guards and miners in Real de Minas. The attack was successful, making possible the collective escape of enslaved African miners.

After the successful rebel attack on Spanish colonial authorities, the reputation of Negro Miguel and his rebel force was widely celebrated among Africans of the region, some of whom escaped to the mountains where he had established a fortified community. Miguel was proclaimed king of the maroon community, and his wife Guiomar was made queen. Both were crowned in a West African-style ceremony.

In his colony, Negro Miguel founded a church that blended animistic African cults and Catholic belief systems and appointed a government with a functioning administration. While Spanish monks described the town as an "imperial" system, little is recorded or known of its social organization. The community was defended by more than 180 male and female African and indigenous warriors, who attacked Spanish colonial settlements and destabilized mining and agriculture in the region. As the economic, political, and religious power of Negro Miguel and his community expanded, a growing number of Spanish settlers abandoned Real de Minas. To counter the growing influence of Negro Miguel, the Spanish reinforced their military forces to reestablish control over the region.

Miguel was thwarted and killed by Spanish troops under the command of Diego de Losada. Those rebels who did not die on the battlefield were executed, and others were tortured by the Spanish colonial forces as a warning to Africans against further unrest. Following Miguel's defeat and death, some rebels who survived managed to escape and continued to harass colonial settlers through the end of the sixteenth century. While they did not have the military power to challenge Spanish troops directly and refrained from attacking major urban centers, maroons of African descent continued to perpetrate road assaults and sabotage goldmining operations.

Real de Minas remained a stronghold of culture, freedom, and liberation for descendants of African slaves who founded several towns. Nirgua retained special status as a settlement of free people of African descent, and Zambos, a community populated by descendants of Africans and Indians, gained self-determination, a status forbidden in the rest of the colony.

In popular imagination Negro Miguel became a heroic figure among people of African descent and his name is evoked for spiritual protection among members of the María Lionza cult (a Venezuelan Yoruba variation). Negro Miguel remains a national hero and icon in the struggle for African liberation in Venezuela and South America.

SEE ALSO: Guaicaipuro (ca. 1530–1568); Queen Nanny and Maroon Resistance

References and Suggested Readings

- Acosta Saignes, M. T. (1978) Vida de los esclavos negros en Venezuela. Havana: Casa de las Américas.
- Brito Figueroa, F. (1982) El problema tierra y esclavos en la historia de Venezuela. Caracas: Universidad Central de Venezuela, UCV.
- Ramos Guédez, J. M. (2001) Contribución a la historia de las culturas negras en Venezuela Colonial. Caracas: Alcaldía de Caracas, Instituto Municipal de Publicaciones.

Venezuela, solidarity economy, social property, co-management, and workers' control

Dario Azzellini

When Hugo Chávez assumed the presidency in 1999, Venezuela was in a serious longstanding crisis. Capital flight and deindustrialization had led to the closure of thousands of production sites since the early 1980s. The goal became to diversify the production of the largely oil-dependent economy, begin the further processing of natural resources, and transform as much property and means of production as possible into collective forms of ownership and management.

Beyond the oil revenue, the prospects looked bleak as the new government set out to build what it defined as a "humanistic and solidarity economy," putting Venezuela on the path to a "socialism of the twenty-first century." Democracy was central to this agenda.

Cooperatives

In 1998 only 700 cooperatives existed, so to fulfill the goal of building a social and solidarity economy, the government in 2001 simplified the creation of cooperatives. They were made exempt of institutional charges and, if they fulfilled the statutory framework, income tax. Credits at favorable terms were handed out through specially established state banks and funding institutions. Small cooperatives could even get interest-free loans. Cooperatives also received preferential loans to buy abandoned companies. These conditions led to a boom in the foundation of cooperatives. At the end of 2006, 37,552 working cooperatives were officially registered.

However, the creation of cooperatives is not free of problems. Having many owners instead of one does not automatically change anything fundamentally in the capitalist mode of operation, even if it means an improvement in working conditions. There is also a risk in some areas of deregulating labor relations through cooperatives. Criticisms were directed at employee-controlled means of production, especially in companies with mixed ownership (state/employees cooperatives).

In 2007 a new model was launched – the communal cooperative. These are established in organized communities and owned by the community. While the workers are part of the community, they are not owners of the cooperative, neither individually nor collectively.

Social Production Enterprises

The social production enterprise (EPS) was a new model created in 2005 that was meant to ease the transition to a socialist production model. What is important is not the form of ownership, but the acting of enterprises: cooperatives, state enterprises, joint ventures, or even private companies can become social production enterprises, a status with several benefits, such as priority in having state contracts assigned. The EPS weighs social profit higher than private profit and orientates its production toward social needs instead of aligning it primarily along market logics and capital accumulation. In an EPS the internal work organization should follow a democratic model, the activities should rotate, and alienation in the production process should be gradually abolished. The EPS has to invest a part of the profits (at least 10 to 15 percent) in local social needs and infrastructure and integrate with the surrounding community through the community council. EPS must also organize suppliers and customers of the processed products in cooperatives, and maintain transparent and public accountability.

Because an official, universally valid definition of EPS has never existed, different government agencies have developed different models. As a result, for example, the EPS formed by the state-owned oil company PdVSA, pays a part of their profits to a fund which is used to pay for community projects. This is more like an additional tax than a form of integration with the community.

Recovered Companies

The Spanish term empresas recuperadas (recovered companies) refers to companies that have been removed in different ways from the control of the private capitalist sector and are under the control of employees, the state, and collective or combined forms of administration. In Venezuela this includes closed enterprises acquired by the state, companies expropriated because of the national interest, and, up to a certain point, the nationalization in 2007 of the formerly privatized electricity sector and national telephone company CANTV.

Although the constitution of 2000 allows expropriations, up to the end of 2006 only a few cases existed. In January 2005, the paper factory Venepal (now Invepal) was expropriated, and in April the Constructora Nacional de Válvulas (CNV, now Inveval), producing valves for the oil industry, followed. From July 2005 the government began to pay special attention to closed production sites. In September the process of expropriation of an occupied sugar cane processing plant and a pipe manufacturer for the oil industry started. In the following months an industrial slaughterhouse, a tomato processing plant belonging to the US Heinz Corporation, a corn-flour processing plant, and some others followed. The abandoned or occupied plants were handed over to cooperatives of former workers. The owners got an indemnization equivalent to the market value.

At the end of July 2005, on the television show Aló Presidente Chávez presented a list of companies that were in the process of expropriation, another of companies whose expropriation was due to be examined, and yet another of companies that had reduced their production facilities partly or wholly – all in all 1,149 sites. Labor minister María Cristina Iglesias urged unions and former workers of the companies to recover them. However, only a few were occupied, and the total number of occupations, expropriations, and purchases by the state remained well below the 1,149. A systematic expropriation policy in the productive sector does not exist. Most expropriations are the result of pressure on state institutions exerted by occupations and mobilizations.

Co-Management and Worker Control

Co-management was implemented in 2005, mainly in state enterprises and those of mixed ownership (mostly those owned by both the state and workers' cooperatives). As yet no legal basis exists, and there are different models discussed and implemented. The trade union UNT (Union Nacional de Trabajadores) proposed a law to the National Assembly that stipulated that the workers should have access to the operational, legal, and financial documents of the company, and that at least 50 percent of the board of directors should be workers, but the law was withdrawn under criticism of the workers. Companies with co-management have easier access to credit and cheaper government services. A new law and national commission are being planned to monitor co-management in public and private companies, but at the end of 2007 the law had not yet been presented.

The process of democratization of enterprise structures is not harmonious, and in numerous state enterprises there is no co-management. This is especially the case in the oil company PdVSA. Conflicts also occur in the expropriated, formerly occupied factories. Alcasa, part of a state-owned industrial conglomerate and the second largest aluminum smelter in Venezuela, represents a prime example of far-reaching co-management leading to workers' control. In mid-February 2005, Carlos Lanz was named director of Alcasa. The assembly was established as the highest authority of the plant, followed by round tables of spokespeople elected in the departments. All representatives were elected in assemblies and decisions could be revoked. The six-hour work-day was introduced. Alcasa became an EPS and set up cooperatives for further aluminum processing. In July 2006 Lanz was elected director with 1,800 out of 1,920 workers' votes. In 2007 Alcasa started organizing in workers' councils.

Fábrica Adentro

Private firms not fulfilling their production targets have had access to preferential loans through the program Fábrica Adentro (Inside the Factory) since the end of 2005. They have to agree with their employees on a co-management model. They have to transfer a part of the profits (5–15 percent) to a fund for industrial transformation. No workers can be dismissed, and new job opportunities must be created. By the end of 2007 nearly 900 companies had joined the program.

In one way, co-management leads to a dilemma. While many private entrepreneurs see it as a social partnership to avoid conflicts and increase production, the UNT, many employees, and parts of the state apparatus see it as an interim step toward workers' control in a socialist society. Moreover, many private companies, although they handed over part ownership to the employees through individual shares or as a cooperative with minority participation, failed to give the workers real participation in the decision-making structures. So workers simply share the risk with the capitalist owner as well as a stake in increasing added value.

Endogenous Development and Job Training

Venezuela follows a strategy of endogenous development, aiming to integrate the excluded population and develop new forms of self-managed social and productive organization. It puts people at the center and is based on education, training, and popular knowledge, with an emphasis on cultural practices and ecological aspects. It promotes the development of productive chains covering the different phases of production for elaborating natural resources. Venezuela also aims to encourage endogenous distribution and consumption.

Training is important to this transition. Since 2004 the Misión Vuelvan Caras has trained workers in these ideas, preparing them for jobs in such fields as construction, tourism, agriculture, catering, services, and industry. The trainees, about 65 percent of whom are women, are paid a small grant to participate in the program for between six months and two years. The participants establish cooperatives and receive credits and technical assistance. The workers who take over their enterprises often also assist the Vuelvan Caras. The training usually takes place in the Núcleos de Desarrollo Endógeno (endogenous development cores), where networks of cooperatives exist, offering the communities the opportunity to use the potential of the region. Between 2004 and 2005, 264,720 people completed this job training, and 284,040 attended the courses in 2006.

In mid-2007 the program was relaunched as Misión Che Guevara. The name change is connected to a reorientation that aims to establish a new economic system by building its own networks and no longer strengthening the capitalist market. The first 40,000 participants completed the new job training program in September 2007. The participants of Misión Che Guevara are mainly trained to work in the new socialist factories.

Socialist Enterprises

After difficulties experienced with the different models, especially with mixed ownership, the ministries asked the state factories in April 2007 to propose criteria defining what a socialist enterprise could be. Various factories and ministries presented projects and a debate began. In the constitutional reform of December 2007, which was ultimately rejected, two types of social ownership were defined: direct, where businesses are managed by the people (community councils, workers), and indirect, where they are managed by the state. The goods produced are not sold on the market but transferred to those who are most in need of them. Workers are proposed by the local communal councils. While specialized workers are provided by the state, the plan is to hand the socialist factories gradually over to the control of workers and communities.

Conclusions

Venezuela has implemented a variety of measures to promote structural changes in the economy and the democratization of relations of ownership and labor. Some measures aim to overcome exploitative conditions, the separation between manual and intellectual labor, and, in the long term, capitalist relations. Other initiatives aim merely at democratization of capitalist labor relations. In many institutions, a degree of restraint regarding structural changes can be noted. Moreover, while some policy is set from above, in various institutions, programs, and regions there is no uniform policy – indeed, in many cases, there aren't even any generalized criteria. But all in all, there are many successful initiatives, and a significant growth in initiatives from below can be observed.

SEE ALSO: Chávez, Hugo (b. 1954); Chávez, Hugo and the Bolivarian Revolution, 1998–Present; Venezuela, Exclusionary Democracy and Resistance, 1958–1998

References and Suggested Readings

- Azzellini, D. (2007) Venezuela Bolivariana. Cologne: ISP.
- Bilbao, L. (2002) Chávez y la Revolución Bolivariana. Buenos Aires.
- Blanco Muñoz, A. (1998) Habla el Comandante. Caracas: Fundación Pio Tamayo.
- Bonilla-Molina, L. & El Troudi, H. (2004) Historia de la Revolución Bolivariana: Pequeña crónica, 1948–2004. Caracas: Gobierno Bolivariano, Ministerio de Comunicación e Información.
- Denis, R. (2001) Los Fabricantes de la rebelión. Caracas: n.p.
- Harnecker, M. (2002) Hugo Chávez Frías. Un hombre, un pueblo. Available at www.nodo50.org/cubasigloXXI/politica/harnecker24_310802.pdf.
- López Maya, M. (1996) Nuevas representaciones populares en Venezuela. Nueva Sociedad 144 (July–August): 138–51.
- López Maya, M. (2003) Hugo Chávez Frías, su movimiento y presidencia. In S. Ellner & D. Hellinger (Eds.), La Política venezolana en la época de Chávez. Caracas: Nueva Sociedad, pp. 98–120.

Venezuelan War of Independence

Jan Ulrich

Venezuela's War of Independence (1811–21) was one of many Latin American revolutionary uprisings between 1810 and 1825 that brought three centuries of colonial domination by the Spanish monarchy to an end. An aspiring Creole social and economic elite, tired of the political domination of the royalist aristocracy and inspired by the conflictive transformations in Europe at that time, realized the vulnerability of the Spanish monarchy and rose to play a fundamental role in developing a republican movement in Venezuela. Certainly the War of Independence profoundly changed Venezuelan society when the Congress of Cucutá founded the independent Great Columbian Republic in 1821. Whether or not the Venezuelan process of independence was also a social revolution remains the object of historical disputes and ideological conflicts today.

The social and economic structures in colonial Spanish America changed fundamentally during the second half of the eighteenth century. The increased production of export goods outside the mining sector, in Venezuela the production of cacao, was now changing the integration of the colonies in the European metropolis. The renovation of the Spanish colonial pact in the second half of the eighteenth century had opened new opportunities within the colonial economy, but the reluctant administrative reform had not resolved the antagonism of the colonial racial and hierarchical society. The Mantuanos, a Creole cacao-producing oligarchy, became the economically and socially dominant class in Venezuela, while political domination remained in the hands of Spanish officials. Spain's maintenance of the trade monopoly over their American colonies and the rise of a new class of Cadiz merchants, who by the end of the eighteenth century were controlling the colonies' trade markets, aggravated the opposition of local Creole elites who called for direct trade relations and access to the industrializing markets in Europe.

Hostilities against Spanish officials and Cadiz merchants were growing by the end of the eighteenth century but did not lead to fundamental opposition against the Spanish crown. Europe was reconstituting its monarchies under the ideas of the Enlightenment, and for the local elites, reforms of the colonial order seemed to be the better option to assure their domination over the indigenous and mestizo population than ideas of an independent republic. Until Spain's affiliation with Napoleon's France in 1795, republican ideas in Venezuela, inspired by the French Revolution and the independence of the United States, remained confined to a small group of the politically adventurous. One of these was Francisco de Miranda (1750–1816), who began a first expedition for independence in 1806 when he landed near Venezuela's city of Coro. Napoleon had brought Spain into the war that was separating Britain from its American colonies, while British domination of the sea implied the end of the Spanish trade monopoly. The result of the European war was the successive decline of the colonial trade order and, consequently, of the political-administrative domination in the Spanish American colonies during 1795 and 1810.

The dismissal of the popular Bourbon successor Fernando VII by Napoleon in 1808 led to the Spanish War of Independence against French occupation and brought the Spanish monarchy into a new alliance with Britain. In Spain and in its colonies regional juntas were founded in order to assert Fernando VII's return to the throne. The Creole elites in the Americas began to distinguish themselves as the legitimate inheritors of the ancient order, while Spain had lost almost its entire European territory in 1810. The colonial institutional organization was then dismantled by the erupting political conflicts between the Spanish and the new American elites in order to reconfigure the relations with the decadent mother land. The institution of the Cabildo, the urban municipal council, in which the urban Creole oligarchy was represented without effectively being able to influence colonial administration, became the basis of the revolutionary changes. On April 19, 1810 the Cabildo of Caracas forced the resignation of the Spanish governor, General Captain Vincente Emperan, to establish a governing junta. On March 2, 1811, the first Venezuelan Congress was established by the seven regions that supported independence from Spain. The first Venezuelan constitution was based on the declaration of civil rights, the formal equality of races, the protection of private property, and the division of powers. Francisco de Miranda, who had gone to London after his failed attempt in 1806, came back to Venezuela and became the designated leader to organize an effective republican army to defeat the royalist resistance in the western provinces of Coro and Maracaibo. At his side was the young colonel Simón Bolívar, associate of the literary society Sociedad Patriótica that had become the republican Creole think tank.

Spanish captain Domingo Monteverde had mobilized a popular royalist army of the mestizo and mulatto castes against the plenary dominance of the Mantuanos republicans. A disastrous earthquake in Caracas in 1812 had killed over 20,000 people and the absence of broader support by the population was debilitating the First Republic when Monteverde defeated the republican army of Colonel Bolívar in Puerto Cabello. Miranda capitulated under the initiative of the congress in July 1812. To ensure their own escape, Bolívar and other republican commanders had delivered Miranda to the royalists. He was arrested and died in a Spanish prison in 1816. Bolívar retreated first to Curaçao and then to New Granada's Cartagena de la India, where he joined the struggle of the republican United Provinces of New Granada against the remaining royalist regions.

In January 1813 Bolívar took New Granada's city of Ocaña, in the north of today's Columbia, and went with the permission of the republican government of Cartagena into Cucutá. From there he started his "Admirable Campaign" in February 1813. With his Andean army of herdsmen, Bolívar, who had received the title of The Liberator on his way to Merida, and Colonels Atanasio Girardot and José Félix Rivas defeated Monteverde's troops near the Venezuelan city of Valencia and went into Caracas in August 1813. The Second Venezuelan Republic was established.

The increasing brutality of the war became institutionalized in the Decree of War to Death. Bolívar proclaimed the extinction of all Spaniards and Canarians who did not actively work in favor of the independence of the Americas. The Decree was also an attempt to convert the civil war between Venezuelans into a colonial war of Venezuelans against Spaniards. But Bolívar's nationalist dream failed at that time. José Tomas Boves had recruited a royalist rebel army in Los Llanos, the lower lands in the southwest of Venezuela, by mobilizing the llanero mestizo cattlemen against the white-Creole landowner oligarchy. Bolívar's troops had to draw back from Caracas and were defeated in Maturín in December 1814. Santiago Mariño (1788–1854) in Cúmana and Juan Bautista Arismendi (1775–1841), who had recruited an army of mulatto fishermen on the island of Margarita, resisted the royalists' reaction in the eastern regions of Venezuela. Bolívar went to Cúmana, where he found himself in the forlorn situation of a divided republican movement of several caudillos that were now faced by reinforced royalist troops under Spanish general Pablo Morillo (1775–1837). The War to Death had unleashed its cruelty, and the count of victims had become enormous, yet the majority of the population refused to support the republican struggle.

In 1815 Napoleon was defeated by English and Spanish troops and Ferdinand VII returned to the Spanish throne. He sent 10,000 soldiers to Venezuela and brought an end to the first period of revolutionary uprisings. But even the violent reassertion against those who had supported the republicans was not able to reconstitute the ancient colonial order.

The first period of the War of Independence was originally a conflict of elites, but unintentionally the militarist mobilization of the marginalized population had profoundly changed the social order. The mixed-race population of mestizos, which amounted to 60 percent of the Venezuelan society at that time, could now socially advance in the prevailing militarized order. Rebellious against their oppression by the Creole landowner oligarchy, they had predominantly joined the royalist lines, while peasants from the Andes and the lower urban classes had advanced their social status in the republican army. Slaves had fought on both sides also for emancipation and personal freedom. The claims of the republican leaders Arismendi and Piar to abolish slavery became a serious threat to the coffee oligarchy and their slavery-based plantation economy. The first period of the war had also significantly reduced the extensive wealth of the urban oligarchy, while the new free trade with Europe had brought cheap industrial products to the markets and debilitated the manufacturing sector.

The debilitation of the dominant social groups, also by political violence, had created divergences between the revolutionary movement and the urban Creole oligarchy. Venezuela's War of Independence was no longer a competition of aspiring Creole elites fighting against the representatives of the ancien régime. It had also obtained an ethnic and social dimension.

In May 1815 Bolívar went to Jamaica, where he wrote his famous Letter from Jamaica. Defending the struggle against Spanish tyranny, he called for the abolition of racial hierarchies and slavery, considering prudently that the oppressed castes of mulattos and mestizos had predominantly supported the royalists. Independent Haiti under General Alexandre Pétion (1770–1818) sent the expedition from Los Cayos by Admiral Luis Brión and Bolívar in March 1816 to Ocumare de la Costa, offering liberty to the slaves if they joined the struggle for the republic. Angostura, today's Ciudad Bolívar, and parts of the eastern regions on the Orinoco River were liberated in 1817 by the republican troops of mestizo Manuel Piar (1774–1817) and José Francisco Bermúdez (1782–1831).

Two main factors were then hoped to accomplish Venezuela's independence. First, the republican leaders could subsume the ethnic and social dimension of the conflict under the construction of a national identity directed against the renewed relentless Spanish domination. Second, the ongoing debility of the Spanish monarchy and the liberal Revolution of 1820 was increasingly affecting the situation of the royalist troops under the command of Pablo Morillo, due to the absence of reinforcements and supplies.

Since 1816 José Antonio Páez (1790–1873), later a Venezuelan president, had successively won the llanero militia over to the republican idea of independence. The same caste of mestizo herdsmen who had fought before under the royalist Boves was now facing the Spanish troops. Francisco de Paula Santander (1792–1840) had led several successful rebellions in Los Llanos de Casanare of New Granada against Morillo in 1818. In Guiana, Santiago Mariño (1788–1854) and Piar had claimed leadership of the republican forces, deferring their victorious campaigns. Bolívar's nationalist project became threatened by their incited racial competition and conflicts that had evoked internal divisions among the republicans. While the republican leaders Bermúdez and Páez had recognized Bolívar's national leadership, Piar was finally condemned to death. Bolívar had achieved the unity of the republican forces under his command.

In 1818 the constitutional congress in Angostura was established. In his Angostura Address on February 15, 1819, Bolívar announced his principal idea of the Great Columbian Republic, a union of New Granada, Venezuela, and Quito in which slavery would be abolished, a free and popular education system established, and civil rights, the right to work, to think, to speak, and to write, would be respected. A centralized executive power would be accountable to the parliament, while Bolívar promulgated his skepticism on the concept of federalism.

The international political constellation had changed by the abandonment of British neutrality in the Spanish Americas, and the Legión Británica (British Legion), an army of predominantly Irish volunteers, was now supporting Bolívar's daring liberation campaign in 1819. From Angostura, Bolívar crossed the Andes through the Páramo de Pisba with an army of 2,500 soldiers. On July 25, 1819, the Spanish troops fled in the Battle of Pantano de Vargas, and Bolívar's patriot army reached the city of Tunja in August. There he united forces with Santander. Bolívar and Santander then headed to Bogotá and confronted the royalist army on August 7, 1819 in the decisive Battle of Boyocá. The republicans under Bolívar's command then controlled the north and center of New Granada. On December 17, 1819 the Great Columbian Republic was proclaimed by the improvisatory government of Angostura.

In the Battle of Carabobo in June 1821, Bolívar had decisively defeated the royalists in Venezuela. At the same time, Sucre took Quito, today's Ecuador, after the battles of Riobamba and Pichincha. In May 1821, the Constitutional Congress of Cucutá was established. Venezuela, New Granada, and Quito were united under the new centralist government in Bogotá. Santander became the vice-president, while The Liberator Simón Bolívar became the first president of the new republic. In 1823, Great Columbia, after a series of smaller royalist uprisings, was completely liberated from the Spanish troops. José de San Martín (1778–1850) had liberated the colonies of the south, while Antonio José de Sucre (1795–1830) and Bolívar achieved victories in the battles of Ayacucho and Junín in Peru in 1824. The colonial domination in the American mainland had come to its definitive end. In the Caribbean, Cuba and Puerto Rico remained under Spanish rule until 1898.

The stabilization of the Great Columbian Republic was threatened from the beginning by a multitude of factors. Not only did the church oppose a new order, but the Mantuanos resisted the abolition of slavery. Merchants and manufacturers were also organizing their opposition against a new free trade order. Santander's government was trying to compromise with a moderate administrative reformism, without seriously confronting the conservative forces. The ongoing war in Peru and in the new-found Republic of Bolivia, after 1821, limited the financial resources of the central Great Columbian government, and the growing particular interests of the provinces prevented the stabilization of a new order. Venezuela under the administration of General Páez evaded the domination of the centralist government, and Bogotá was divided by different republican fractions. Bolívar's authority could momentarily unite the different interests, but almost 15 years of war had produced a hybrid militarized order. Large landowners, often higher ranks of the republican army that had appropriated land during the war, were now extending their political influence in Venezuela. In contrast, the urban Creole elites who should have filled the positions of the republican institutions to enforce a new civil order were debilitated. The war had exhausted their properties, while the ascent of the landowner oligarchy was now threatening their anticipated political domination.

The country was devastated in many ways. First, 140,000 people (more than 20 percent of the population) had died in Venezuela. Agricultural production had declined almost 90 percent during the war, and the mestizo population was no longer disposed to work under the ancient conditions of labor. Coffee production based on the slave workforce had declined, and emancipation had led to changes in the work discipline of the former slaves. The export-orientated agrarian economy that had developed in Venezuela at the end of the eighteenth century, though beneficial for integration in world markets, did not lead to economic prosperity because of the lengthy duration of the war. Great Britain had become the most important trading partner. The Venezuelan markets were flooded with industrial import goods and local crafts declined. A growing external debt to Britain and the economic influence of the United States after 1825 enforced external economic dependence, while duty income had become the main resource of the republican government. The liberal ideal of economic egalitarianism, with equal economic opportunities for all individuals, had not reduced prevailing differences of wealth distribution in the postwar era and foreclosed the modernization of the old economic structures.

Growing opposition between federalists and centralists, who had been in competition since the Angostura improvisational government, was now threatening the republic's unity. Antonio Nariño (1765–1823), who represented the conservative urban elites of Bogotá, opposed the liberal faction of Santander. In this situation of growing division, the call for Simón Bolívar to assume power to ensure the unity of the new republic opened the way to authoritarianism. Bolívar's political realism attempted to pacify the revolutionary forces and the dominant social groups of the old order. But the attempt to consolidate the republic by replacing militarized structures with an aristocratic organization failed. The reconciliation with Páez, who had led a secessionist rebellion, brought Bolívar into conflict with Santander. The constitutional convention of Ocaña in 1828 had only intensified the political divisions. Bolívar was declared dictator on August 27, 1828, but Great Columbia had already entered into decline. Peru and Bolivia had deprived Bolívar of control and were now at war with Bogotá. In 1830 Venezuela and Quito fell apart, and Bolívar died the same year. The War of Independence and the conflictive formation of a new postcolonial order determined Venezuelan history for the coming decades.

SEE ALSO: Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830); Bolivarianism, Venezuela; Chávez, Hugo and the Bolivarian Revolution, 1998–Present; Venezuela, Guerilla Movements, 1960s–1980s; Venezuela, MBR-200 and the Military Uprisings of 1992

References and Suggested Readings

- Ayala Mora, E. (2006) Simón Bolívar: pensamiento fundamental. Quito: Campaña Nacional Eugenio Espejo por el Libro y la Lectura.
- Bakewell, P. J. (2004) A History of Latin America: c.1450 to the Present. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Halperín Donghi, T. (1993) The Contemporary History of Latin America. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Liévano Aguirre, I. (1988) Bolívar. Caracas: Academia Nacional de la Historia.
- Pino Iturrieta, E. A. (Ed.) (2004) La independencia de Venezuela: historia mínima. Caracas: Funtrapet.
- Rivas, J. (1994) Independencia y guerra a muerte. Caracas: Fondo Ed. Venezolano.

Vesey's Rebellion

Douglas R. Egerton

Denmark Vesey, a free black carpenter, organized perhaps the largest slave conspiracy in North American history, in Charleston, South Carolina in 1822. Although brought into the city in 1783 as a slave of Captain Joseph Vesey, Telemaque, as he was then known, purchased his freedom in December 1799 with lottery winnings. For the next 22 years Vesey earned his living as a craftsman, respected by both the white and black communities. His last (and probably third) wife, Susan Vesey, was born a slave but became free prior to his death.

Around 1818 Vesey joined the city's new African Methodist Episcopal congregation. The African Church, as both whites and blacks called it, quickly became the center of Charleston's enslaved community. His wife Sandy also joined, as did four of his closest friends: Peter Poyas, a literate ship carpenter; Monday Gell, an African-born Ibo who labored as a harness maker; Rolla Bennett, the manservant of Governor Thomas Bennett; and "Gullah" Jack Pritchard, an East African priest purchased in Zinguebar in 1806. The temporary closure of the church by city authorities in June 1818 and the arrest of 140 congregants reinforced the determination of black Carolinians to maintain a place of independent worship and established the motivation for his conspiracy.

At the age of 51 Vesey resolved to orchestrate a rebellion followed by a mass exodus from Charleston to Haiti, where President Jean-Pierre Boyer had recently encouraged black Americans to bring their skills and capital. Perhaps learning from past revolts, Vesey did not intend to tarry in Charleston long enough for white military power to present an effective counterassault. For all of his acculturation into Euro-American society, Vesey, as a native of St. Thomas, remained a man of the black Atlantic.

Vesey planned the escape for four years. His chief lieutenants included Poyas, Gell, Pritchard, and Bennett. Although there are no reliable figures for the number of recruits, Charleston alone was home to 12,652 slaves. Pritchard, probably with some exaggeration, boasted that he had 6,600 recruits on the plantations across the Cooper and Ashley rivers. The plan called for Vesey's followers to rise at midnight on July 14 – Bastille Day – slay their masters, and sail for Haiti and freedom.

Those recruited into the plot during the winter of 1822 were directed to arm themselves from their masters' closets. Vesey was also aware that the Charleston Neck militia company stored their 300 muskets and bayonets in the back room of Benjamin Hammet's store, and that Hammet's slave Bacchus had a key. But as few slaves had any experience with guns, Vesey encouraged his followers to arm themselves with swords or long daggers, which in any case would make for quieter work as the city bells tolled midnight. Vesey also employed several enslaved blacksmiths to forge "pike heads and bayonets with sockets, to be fixed at the end of long poles."

Considerably easier than stockpiling weapons was the recruitment of willing young men. With Vesey and Pritchard employed about the city as carpenters, it is not surprising that so many other craftsmen became involved in the plot. Most of all, Vesey and his lieutenants recruited out of the African Church. As a class leader, Vesey was not only respected by the church membership, but he knew each of them well; he knew whom to trust and whom to avoid.

Even so, the plot unraveled in June 1822 when two slaves, including Rolla's friend George Wilson, a fellow class leader in the African Church, revealed the plan to their owners. Mayor James Hamilton called up the city militia and convened a special court to try the captured insurgents. Vesey was captured and hanged on the morning of Tuesday, July 2, together with Rolla, Poyas, and three others. According to Hamilton, the rebels collectively "met their fate with the heroic fortitude of martyrs." In all, 35 blacks were executed. Forty-two others, including Sandy, were sold outside the United States; some, if not all, became slaves in Spanish Cuba. Robert Vesey lived to rebuild the African Church in the fall of 1865. Susan Vesey and her free daughter, Diana, sailed for Liberia in 1833.

In the aftermath of the conspiracy, Charleston authorities demolished the African Church and banished Morris Brown to Philadelphia. The state Assembly subsequently passed laws prohibiting the reentry of free blacks into the state, and city officials enforced ordinances against teaching African Americans to read. The City Council also voted to create a permanent force of 150 guardsmen to patrol the streets around the clock at an annual cost of $24,000. To deal with the problem of black mariners bringing information about events around the Atlantic into the state's ports, in December 1822 the legislature passed the Negro Seamen Act, which placed quarantine on any vessel from another "state or foreign port, having on board any free Negroes or persons of color." Although United States Circuit Court Judge William Johnson struck the law down as unconstitutional, a defiant Assembly renewed the act in late 1823. It would be no coincidence that many of those who nullified federal law in 1832 – including Governor James Hamilton, who resigned his office in 1833 to command troops in defense of his state's right to resist national tariffs – were veterans of the tribunals that tried Vesey and his men a decade before.

SEE ALSO: Nat Turner Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Egerton, D. R. (1999) He Shall Go Out Free: The Lives of Denmark Vesey. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Lofton, J. (1964) Insurrection in South Carolina: The Turbulent World of Denmark Vesey. Yellow Springs, OH: Antioch Press.
- Paquette, R. L. (2002) Jacobins of the Lowcountry: The Vesey Plot on Trial. William and Mary Quarterly 49.

Vía Campesina and peasant struggles

Marc Edelman

Vía Campesina (“Peasant Road”) is a transnational social movement, founded in 1993, that links over 100 organizations of “peasants, small- and medium-sized agricultural producers, landless, rural women, indigenous people, rural youth and agricultural workers” (www.viacampesina.org), in almost 60 countries in the Americas, Europe, Asia, and Africa. The membership is diverse and includes landless peasants in Brazil, small dairy farmers in Europe, well-off farmers in South India, wheat producers in Canada, and land-poor peasants in Mexico. The main issues of concern to Vía Campesina (always referred to by its Spanish name) include global trade rules, intellectual property and genetically modified organisms, the survival of family farms, sustainable alternatives to corporate-controlled industrial agriculture, agrarian reform, the human rights of peasant activists, and “food sovereignty,” which it defines as the right to protect national production and to shield domestic markets from the dumping of low-priced agricultural imports. Vía Campesina and its component subnational, national, and regional organizations have participated in numerous militant and theatrical protest actions against the World Trade Organization (WTO), the World Bank, and International Monetary Fund (IMF), G8 summit meetings, and large agribusiness corporations such as Monsanto, Cargill, and Syngenta. The movement has also been a prominent participant in global civil society gatherings, such as the World Social Forums.

The rise of transnational agrarian movements during the 1980s and 1990s is a direct result of a global farm crisis. The origins of the crisis in the 1970s included skyrocketing prices for petroleum and fossil-fuel-based fertilizers and other inputs; sharply higher interest rates, resulting from oil-price shocks and monetary policies intended to slow inflation; and the breakdown of the Bretton Woods system of capital controls and fixed exchange rates, which set the stage for the rapid expansion and liberalization of global agricultural trade. At the same time, growing concentration among input and machinery suppliers, and in the processing, storage, brokering, and exporting stages of key commodity chains, allowed a handful of giant corporations to garner a rising share of the total value added between field and dinner plate. In the late 1970s, as commodity and land prices plummeted and interest rates soared, many US and Canadian producers defaulted on loans and lost their land, spurring militant farmers’ movements and reviving anti-foreclosure tactics such as “farm gate defenses” not seen since the 1930s depression. In Europe, farmers’ organizations had been struggling since the mid-1980s to reform the European Economic Community’s Common Agricultural Policy (CAP), demanding a per-farm ceiling on price supports, so that large enterprises would not be the main beneficiaries of CAP subsidies and arguing for improved supply management to prevent the production of huge surpluses, which had to be stored at public expense and which were frequently “dumped” in less developed countries, undermining peasant livelihoods.

In poorer countries, notably in Latin America, the debt crisis of the early 1980s, also caused in part by rising interest rates and oil import bills, brought neoliberal reforms that devastated small agricultural producers accustomed to guaranteed prices, low-interest loans, and state-sponsored extension services. Peasant movements in several countries were at the forefront of protests against neoliberal structural adjustment programs imposed by the World Bank and IMF. In India, peasant organizations spearheaded direct action campaigns against corporate efforts to patent traditional rice varieties and other cultigens and, in the 1990s, began to stage protests against economic liberalization.

Prior to the formation of Vía Campesina, peasant and farmer movements had already started to found transnational organizations in several world regions. The European Farmers' Coordination, established in 1985, eventually linked organizations in over a dozen countries. In Central America, where peasant groups from the different countries of the isthmus had long participated in cross-border peasant-led agricultural extension efforts, a regional alliance formed in 1991 with the goal of combating trade liberalization and structural adjustment programs. As part of the 1992 continental indigenous protests against the Columbian quincentenary, native and Afro-descendant movements from throughout the hemisphere initiated a process that culminated in the founding two years later of the Latin American Coordinating Group of Rural Organizations (Coordinadora Latinoamericana de Organizaciones del Campo, CLOC).

The initial nucleus of Via Campesina included a small number of Central American, Canadian, and European activists who met at the 1992 congress of the Nicaraguan National Union of Agriculturalists and Livestock Producers (Unión Nacional de Agricultores y Ganaderos, UNAG), an organization that ultimately opted not to join the emerging transnational movement. Via Campesina's founding convention in Mons, Belgium, in 1993, coincided with an upsurge in farmer protests in Europe against the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (the precursor to the WTO), many of which were attended by delegations of farmers from the Americas and Asia.

For its first three years, Via Campesina's structure was based on an International Coordinating Committee (ICC), with representatives of organizations from different regions, each of which was responsible for overseeing activities in their respective areas of the world. Many communications activities were initially centered in the offices of the Canadian National Farmers' Union in Saskatoon and the European Farmers' Coordination in Brussels. In 1996, an International Operational Secretariat was established to oversee the entire network and complement the work of the ICC. Because of the Central Americans' extensive experience in cross-border organizing, responsibility for the secretariat was entrusted to the Honduran member coalition and its coordinator Rafael Alegría. In 2004 the headquarters moved to the office of the Federation of Indonesian Peasants, and Henry Saragih became the Via Campesina coordinator.

Much of Via Campesina's organizing is carried out by its constituent groups, often with funds from European and Canadian non-governmental organizations (NGOs). The Via Campesina itself has a tiny staff and a small budget. Despite its reliance for funding on developed country NGOs, Via Campesina has frequently criticized the claim of some NGOs to represent or to advocate on behalf of the rural poor, and has argued that this type of advocacy is best carried out by the peasant organizations themselves. Via Campesina has, however, formed strategic alliances with organizations such as the International Planning Committee for Food Sovereignty, the German-based Food First Information and Action Network (FIAN), and the Land Research Action Network (LRAN), an international team of activist researchers sponsored by research centers based in Brazil, Mexico, the United States, and Thailand. These alliances have permitted Via Campesina access to state-of-the-art information and analysis on issues such as global trade negotiations, the World Bank's market-oriented land reform program, and the implications of genetically modified crops.

In addition to being a movement or action-oriented network, Via Campesina is also an arena in which peasant and farmer activists from different world regions meet, exchange experiences, share protest repertoires, and develop strategic plans about how best to meet their goals. The member organizations have found, however, that not all experiences are easily transferred across borders. The efforts of the Brazilian Landless Movement (Movimento dos Trabalhadores Rurais Sem Terra, MST), for example, to aid the South African Landless Peoples' Movement were recognized by both sides as having yielded at best mixed results. Via Campesina and its allies maintain active websites and also use Yahoo and Google list serves to distribute news and position papers in English and Spanish and at times in French, Portuguese, or other languages. Periodic congresses, as well as other international meetings that members attend, provide opportunities for refining the movement's short- and long-term agendas.

Although Via Campesina claims to be a "global" or "world" movement, its geographical coverage is uneven. Probably the largest single member movement is the Brazilian MST. Via Campesina supporters typically sport green kerchiefs and baseball caps at public events, a practice adopted from the MST, whose members often wear matching caps and red tee-shirts.

Many other member movements, however, are quite small and in several countries, including France and the United States, the largest peasant and farmer organizations are affiliated with the more conservative International Federation of Agricultural Producers (IFAP) and not with Via Campesina. In China, where rural protests against corrupt officials and land privatization schemes have become common, the government has managed to prevent the emergence of durable independent peasant organizations. Via Campesina has no presence in China or in a number of other countries, such as Burma and most of the former Soviet republics, where repressive regimes have blocked peasants from organizing. It has a large number of member organizations in Latin America and Europe and only a handful in Africa. In Francophone Africa many peasant organizations are affiliated with ROPPA (Réseau des Organisations Paysannes et de Producteurs de l'Afrique de l'Ouest [Network of Peasants' and Producers' Organizations of West Africa]), an alliance with similar aims to Via Campesina but which has remained outside it.

Most of the Asian Via Campesina members have only joined since 2004. The Korean Peasant League has demonstrated a capacity for mobilizing thousands of supporters for international protests, as occurred at the 2005 WTO ministerial meeting in Hong Kong, when hundreds of Korean protesters donned orange life vests and plunged into the harbor in an effort to bypass a police cordon and swim to the meeting. Many Korean rural activists also participated in the 2003 anti-WTO demonstrations in Cancun, Mexico, and one, Lee Kyang Hae, who was holding a sign that said "WTO kills farmers," stabbed himself to death as a protest during a large march. Even though Lee belonged to a non-Via Campesina organization (the Korean Advanced Farmers' Federation), Via Campesina commemorates September 10, the anniversary of Lee's death, as an "international day of struggle against the WTO." Member organizations of Via Campesina also frequently stage protests on April 17, "the international day of peasant struggle," which commemorates the 1996 massacre by hired gunmen of 19 peasants involved in a land occupation in Eldorado dos Carajás, Brazil. The killing occurred while a Via Campesina international conference was taking place in Tlaxcala, Mexico, which contributed to giving the event immediate international resonance. Subsequent Via Campesina conferences have been held in 2000 in Bangalore, India, in 2004 in São Paulo, Brazil, and in 2008 in Mozambique.

Via Campesina has come to have a high profile in global civil society. The actions it has taken, along with its allies, have arguably contributed to slowing global trade negotiations. It has helped to return agrarian reform to the international development agenda. It has forged significant ties between peasant and farmer movements in diverse world regions as well as with a range of sympathetic action research, advocacy, and funding organizations. Some of its constituent organizations participate in the civil society consultative bodies of United Nations (UN) agencies, such as the Food and Agriculture Organization and the International Fund for Agricultural Development. Increasingly, Via Campesina has sought to call attention to violations of peasants' rights in different world regions, issuing annual reports that tally abuses in the parts of the world where its members are active. In its 2002 "Draft International Convention on the Rights of the Peasant," which it hopes to have ratified by the UN, Via Campesina includes the rights "to a proper living standard," to agrarian resources, to seeds, to information and technology, to biological diversity and environmental preservation, and to freedom of association.

SEE ALSO: Korea, Peasant and Farmers' Movement; Movimento Sem Terra (MST); World Social Forums; World Trade Organization (WTO) Protests, Cancun, 2003; World Trade Organization (WTO) Protests, Hong Kong, 2005; World Trade Organization (WTO) Protests, Seattle, 1999

References and Suggested Readings

- Borras, Jr., S., Edelman, M., & Kay, C. (Eds.) (2008) Transnational Agrarian Movements Confronting Globalization. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Desmarais, A. A. (2007) La Via Campesina: Globalization and the Power of Peasants. London: Pluto Press.
- Holt-Giménez, E. (2006) Campesino a Campesino: Voices from Latin America's Farmer to Farmer Movement for Sustainable Agriculture. Oakland: Food First.
- Mazoyer, M. & Roudart, L. (Eds.) (2002) Via Campesina: Une alternative paysanne à la mondialisation néolibérale. Geneva: Centre Europe-Tier Monde.
- O'Brien, K. & Li, L. (2006) Rightful Resistance in Rural China. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Via Campesina (2002) Peasant Rights—Droits Paysans—Derechos Campesinos. Jakarta: La Via Campesina. Available at www.viacampesina.org/main_en/images/stories/pdf/peasant-rights-en.pdf (downloaded June 7, 2007).

Vieques

Victor R. Quiñones Guerra

Vieques or La Isla Nena is located in the Caribbean 10 miles (16 km) east of Puerto Rico. At 18.5 miles (30 km) in length by 6.2 miles (10 km) in width, this small island has only two main towns, Isabel Segunda and Esperanza, with a population of approximately 9,400. The island is one of 78 municipalities of the commonwealth of Puerto Rico. In the 1940s during World War II, the United States purchased and occupied two-thirds of the island for military use by the Navy. The occupied regions were divided into three main areas: the naval ammunition facility, Camp García (also known as the eastern maneuver area), and Atlantic fleet weapons training facility. Vieques was viewed as a unique and valued training site by officials of the US armed forces, allowing for training in air, land, and sea.

Controversy was perpetuated among residents of Vieques due to the use of live shellfire and bombs. The presence of depleted uranium-coated shells raised concern among residents, who argued that live fire practices were causing the destruction of the environment and contaminating the air, water, and soil. Some regions were found to have high levels of radiation. Health problems also emerged as a result of decades of Navy occupation. Indicators showed an increment of infant mortality, death, and cancer rates that outranked rates in mainland Puerto Rico.

However, scientists commissioned by the US government conducted numerous studies and found no evidence correlating the Navy's practices to deteriorating natural resources at Vieques and poor health of residents on the island. Others argued that residents could not be affected physically by the military training facility since they resided 9 miles (14.4 km) away. Skeptics were critical of health research findings, which did not account for alcoholism, drug abuse, HIV infection, or lack of sound medical services.

Protests on the island did not gain momentum until the death of Angel Sanes, a civilian security guard, who was killed accidentally in April 1999 when a US Navy deployed two live bombs. After Sanes's death live fire training was suspended, allowing only inert bombs to be used for training purposes. However, the Navy's emphasis on the importance of live fire training called for its reinstatement, and it was at this juncture that the protest battle took off.

Protests against the Navy have occurred at Vieques since the 1970s. Resistance to the Navy was expressed by politicians, community groups and organizations, religious groups, local government bodies, and residents from both Vieques and Puerto Rico. The majority of the protests took place in the form of vigils, marches, civilian penetration of restricted military zones, and the establishment of protest camps. Right after Sanes's death, a week-long series of protests led to the arrest of 65 protesters who trespassed into the Navy's restricted zone. However, it was not until May 2000 that organized civil disobedience camps were forcibly evacuated by military personnel.

The struggle for the removal of the Navy from Vieques gained national attention across the United States. The protests made it beyond Vieques and Puerto Rico when on September 22, 2000, approximately 2,500 activists traveled from the US and Puerto Rico and marched in front of the White House: 78 participants were arrested that day. The State of New York also hosted a series of protests, where established Puerto Rican leaders brought Vieques to the attention of their elected officials to garner support on the mainland and in Congress. Protests asking for the liberation of Vieques took place at Yankee Stadium, on Fifth Avenue, and at the Statue of Liberty. The movement gained solidarity from celebrities and prominent public figures.

However, not all acts of protest were peaceful. Although minimal, acts of violence took place in June 2000 when protesters in boats struck and injured Navy officials patrolling the shores with iron bars. Other instances of violence on land have included protesters throwing rocks at Navy engineers trying to repair fences that protesters had broken as a means of penetrating restricted areas. Protesters also injured five Navy officials with rocks and bottles and damaged several vehicles. Since Sanes's death, over 1,500 have been arrested in the US and Puerto Rico for civil disobedience.

Given Puerto Ricans' resistance and the Navy's desire to resume live fire practice, intervention from the Department of Defense's special panel on Vieques was called upon. It offered the solution of a five-year phase-out of the Navy from the island. However, Governor Pedro Rosselló was opposed to the Navy's intention to resume live fire practice and called for the Navy's immediate removal. President Bill Clinton's mediation efforts included offers of economic incentives so that the Navy could remain, and a referendum so that the people of Puerto Rico could decide whether the Navy should leave or remain on the island. The results of the referendum showed that the majority of Puerto Rican citizens wanted an immediate departure of the Navy from Vieques. After changes in administration, Governor Sila Calderon conducted difficult negotiations with President George W. Bush following the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks in New York. The US government claimed it needed Vieques to train and prepare for war. As a result, the November referendum was disregarded and a firm exit date was established for May 3, 2003, when the Navy finally left Vieques.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Puerto Rico; Puerto Rican Independence Movement, 1898–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Barreto, A. A. (2001) Vieques, the Navy and Puerto Rican Politics. Gainesville: University Press of Florida.
- McCaffrey, K. T. (2002) Military Power and Popular Protest: The US Navy in Vieques Puerto Rico. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- Meléndez, A. (1982) La Batalla de Vieques. Rio Piedras, PR: Editorial Edil.
- Sued, G. (2001) Vieques: Crónicas desde la Desobediencia. San Juan, PR: La Grieta.

Vietnam, anti-colonial, nationalist, and communist movements, 1900–1939

Daniel Hémerly

Of all the national and revolutionary movements that emerged between World Wars I and II in the European colonial empires of Asia and Africa, those of Indochina were, aside from those of India, the most precocious, most diversified, most radical, and most dynamic.

Vietnam lay at the heart of nationalism in the Indochinese peninsula. In Vietnamese society the nationalist project was elaborated slowly in the image offered by colonial France, itself the product of a powerful nationalism. Two figures came to embody Vietnamese nationalism: Phan Boi Chau (1867–1940) and Phan Chu Trinh (1872–1926). Phan Boi Chau, an intellectual from Nghe An, gathered around him patriotic intellectuals in order to define a new nationalist path. From 1902 he crisscrossed the country from North to South to articulate this new way. In 1905 he went into exile in Japan and led young partisans in activities against the colonial French power. His group established active exchanges with the Japanese Pan-Asiatics, the Chinese Guomindang of Sun Yat-sen, Chinese and Japanese anarchists, and the Chinese constitutionalist movement of Kang Youwei and Liang Qichao. In exile first in Japan, and after his expulsion in 1908, in China, he sought to create a revolutionary organization composed of young men with political and military education in Japan. The organization gained the attention of the educated Vietnamese elite through clandestine propaganda and sought to prepare a national uprising to liberate the country from colonialism. With a member of the imperial family, Prince Cuong De, Phan Boi Chau created in the summer of 1906 the Viet Nam Zuy Tan Hoi (Society for the New Vietnam) and put his ideas to work.

As early as 1900, however, a reformist approach opposed this project of state nationalism. In several texts of 1906 and 1907, Phan Chu Trinh articulated this reformist approach. Trinh resigned as a government mandarin in Hué, met Phan Boi Chau in 1906 in Tokyo, and returned disappointed and reticent with regard to the new Japanese militarism and expansionism. No less suspicious of Confucianism, Trinh believed nation-building demanded a radical break with contemporary Vietnam and its institutions of the monarchy and mandarinat. He was resolutely against any use of violence.

Phan Boi Chau advocated borrowing from colonial adversaries to advance nationalism through the use of science, democracy, education, and modern exchange and production. He considered education essential for disseminating the new culture. The challenge was to pressure the colonial power, and form external alliances with the liberal currents of colonization and the democratic forces of the metropole: freemasons, the League of Human Rights, radicals, socialists, unions, and the intellectual left. Vietnamese society would be incapable of emancipating itself as long as it remained a prisoner of its own stifling conformism and subjected to the crushing pressure of foreign domination.

Reformists and partisans of violence had a dialectical relationship. Modernist and democratic nationalism seemed for a long time to be the most credible of the two. In 1906–8 reformists undertook a campaign throughout the country. Associated with the members of the Zuy Tân League, they created new schools and a network of stores and modern businesses, and in March 1907 in Hanoi opened Dong Kinh Nghia Thuc (Hanoi School of the Just Cause), which was hugely successful.

On March 12, 1908, in the central provinces of Annam, vast peasant protests began after the number of days of labor were increased, and against extortion by the mandarin and village notables. Reformists sought to combine this revolt with their own project. Thousands of peasants cut their hair as a sign of acceptance of new ideas and attempted to present their grievances to the mandarins and to French provincial residents. In several places, riots occurred. Partisans of armed action were no less active, and attempted to poison the Hanoi garrison in June 1908. The colonial authorities struck back by closing the Dong Kinh Nghia Thuc in January 1909, used the military to quell the peasant demonstrations, and condemned hundreds of reformers to prison. In some cases, mandarin courts used torture against reformers. Phan Chu Trinh was condemned to life imprisonment by the Hué government and deported to Poulo Condore penitentiary (he was pardoned in 1911 and sent to France) with approximately sixty of his friends.

Partisans of armed struggle suffered a similar fate. Lacking Chinese aid and popular support, they could not break the grip of the colonial regime, even during World War I. Their actions included attacks in December 1912 and April 1913 in Tonkin, attacks on military stations on the Chinese border in 1915, the conspiracy of Tran Cao Van in Hué on May 3, 1916 in which the young emperor Zuy Tân participated, and the uprising of the garrison and prisoners of the penitentiary of Thai Nguyen on August 30, 1917, supported by provincial miners.

Conservatism prevailed within the French colonial regime, but in the metropole the above examples of Vietnamese nationalism stirred activists such as the League of Human Rights, the Socialist Party, the anarchist press, intellectual leftists, some unions of the CGT, and Christian groups. They campaigned against official Indochinese policies and against its scandals, lawsuits, and colonial crimes.

Albert Sarraut, a young Radical deputy, undertook in his two successive terms as general governor of Indochina (1911–14 and 1917–19) his “Sarrautist” reforms for developing “Franco-Annamite collaboration,” an unequal partnership that the colonial regime was forced to build with traditional and modern elites to combat intransigent nationalism. The principal innovations were the creation of indigenous and Franco-indigenous assemblies elected through suffrage based on a tax threshold in the five territories of Indochina. However, colonization did not evolve further toward democratization. From 1930, any effort to modify the political status of Indochina disappeared from the agenda of the metropole. The colonial regime was isolated through protracted political inaction accompanied by relentless repression.

Nevertheless, Sarrautist colonial reformism had provoked real expectations within the Vietnamese nationalist movement. Following reformist and middle-class modernist initiatives, from the 1910s onwards many young people undertook a “voyage towards the West” with the goal of appropriating the tools of modernity and power. Many were attracted to study in France. The principal consequence of colonial reformism was to prevent reformist nationalism from resonating with the popular masses, to remove or neutralize their political initiative. Reformist nationalism in the 1920s thus underwent a crisis that also saw the formation of Vietnamese communism.

In Vietnam the majority of intellectuals were students, secretaries of administrations or enterprises, schoolteachers, professors, and journalists, often from families of the ancient educated elite. In the 1920s they were confronted with the emergence of an embryonic proletariat and modern social struggles, such as the first workers’ strikes in Saigon. Vietnamese intellectuals were forbidden to exercise the functions of the modern scholar. Instead, they were maintained in a subordinate social status compared to French colonialists and civil servants. Some among the younger generation demonstrated their alienation by becoming social dissidents and by adopting revolutionary beliefs. They constituted themselves as revolutionary elites, as an intelligentsia in the most fundamental sense of the term. Their revolt was first expressed through the iconoclastic rejection of Confucian tradition, the family, and gerontocracy, and the affirmation of individual liberation. Young intellectuals and the transient new press led a permanent campaign for radical modernization of society and culture, constituting themselves as irreconcilable adversaries of the colonial administration.

These intellectuals were fascinated by western literature and philosophy and leftist European ideologies. A vigorous feminism was affirmed in the educated elite and inspired Phu Nu Tan Van (Women's News), the most influential opposition newspaper in Saigon in the early 1930s. The intelligentsia was attracted to a range of traditions, from Marxism to the ideas of Gandhi, Tagore, Sun Yat-sen, and Lenin. This cross-generational transformation among intellectuals, elevating youth as a political force, was completely unexpected in a Confucian society.

In 1925–6 Vietnamese youth plunged into political radicalism. Multiple confrontations with the French authorities increased following the arrest of Phan Boi Chau in Shanghai and his sentencing to death in November 1925 (later commuted), and the funeral of Phan Chu Trinh in April 1926 provoked mass demonstrations and a wave of strikes and boycotts in schools that spread throughout Indochina. The Vietnamese intelligentsia then turned to illegal action – printing tracts and manifestos, and publishing the first clandestine newspapers, especially among the growing number of Vietnamese students who traveled to study in China and France. A first generation of clandestine revolutionary groups was born, principally the Revolutionary Party of the New Vietnam in Annam and the Viet Nam Quoc Zan Dang (VNQZD), founded in November 1927 in Hanoi by Nguyen Thai Hoc on the ideological model of the Chinese Guomindang and a program of armed action, which rapidly recruited hundreds of militants in Tonkin.

Nguyen Tat Thanh – the future Hô Chi Minh, then known under the pseudonym Nguyen Ai Quoc – had settled in Paris and was a member of the Socialist Party. He traveled to Moscow in June 1923 and received his initial communist education. Sent to Canton in December 1924, he was from then on one of the clandestine leaders of the Comintern in Eastern Asia. With a young group of revolutionary youth, Hô Chi Minh formed in Canton the first cadre of Vietnamese communists. Centralized and disciplined, it ensured the political formation in Canton of some three hundred Vietnamese youths from Indochina, who returned home to create workers' cells. The young revolutionary intelligentsia thus arrived at an endogenous communism that offered coherent answers to the problems Vietnam confronted. This communism allowed the intelligentsia to end its social isolation and lead new social movements. The first major protests were workers' strikes that grew in number from 1925 onwards in cities, rubber plantations, and agrarian regions. Communism placed intellectual youth in direct contact with the immense indigenous population. The era of revolutionary politics and ideological coherence had begun.

Upon Comintern instructions, Hô Chi Minh organized a meeting of representatives of the three main communist groups in Kowloon (Hong Kong) in February 1930, where they were unified into the Dang Cong San Viet Nam (Communist Party of Vietnam) on the basis of a program of national liberation and proletarian direction. Tran Phu, a young militant returning from Moscow, was named general secretary. Although the Communist Party was barely born in Indochina, the insurrection was already underway.

The period from 1929 to 1932 was marked by social polarization and dissatisfaction with heavy colonial taxes and the corruption of mandarins and notables, who seized collective lands from villages and thus broke traditional solidarity that had guaranteed a precarious equilibrium to peasant life. The assassination in Hanoi by the VNQZD of the director of an office of recruitment of coolies on February 9, 1929 unleashed a spiral of repression and revolutionary violence. The repressive operations of General Security led to massive roundups and big trials that decimated revolutionary groups but suddenly aggravated tensions. VNQZD militants were arrested by the hundreds in Tonkin and forced to confess. From May to July 1929 the French held huge trials of 227 VNQZD militants in Hanoi. On January 26, 1930, those leaders remaining free decided to risk everything. A general uprising was set for February 9.

On the night of February 9, 1930, 40 garrison riflemen of the great Yen Bay fortress that commanded the valley of the Red River secretly allied with the nationalist cause. Reinforced by approximately 60 outside insurgents, they mutinied, killed French officers, and occupied their installations. The remaining 550 soldiers refused to join and hours later the revolt was crushed. A few attacks occurred elsewhere, unsuccessfully. Other insurrections of the VNQZD were repressed within 15 days, its chiefs and militants arrested en masse, and terror was unleashed over the North. The Criminal Commission of Tonkin judged 536 of the accused, condemning 80 to death and the others to hard labor. Nguyễn Thái Hoc stepped on the scaffold at Yen Bay on June 17, 1930 with 12 of his comrades to the cry of “Viet Nam Van Tuê! Viet Nam Van Tuê!” (Let Vietnam live! Let Vietnam live!).

Even before these events, workers and peasants unexpectedly laid the foundation for the second phase of the revolutionary crisis of 1930. They joined together to construct a communist framework sufficient to counter the power of rural notables in the villages. During Tết on February 4, 1930 in Cochinchina, young Communist Party militants coordinated a strike in the immense rubber plantation of Phu Rieng: 3,000 coolies controlled the plantation for three days. In March and April strikes erupted in small industrial centers in North Annam, Nam Dinh in Tonkin, and Cochinchina. In worker demonstrations on May 1 – the first in Vietnamese history – protesters were shot dead by the Indigenous Guard. In Tonkin, striking workers planned meetings and nighttime processions, placing red banners under trees, and peasants marched on administrative offices in Tonkin. From May to October, in Cochinchina and Annam, the workers’ movement expanded incessantly. In Annam, the northern provinces, and Quang Ngai, notables were tried, beaten, and shot; bloody battles broke out between protesters and the army and Foreign Legion throughout the spring of 1931.

After a poor harvest in October 1929, rising food scarcity had increased tensions; famines led peasants and workers to march on administrative centers. The marches continued throughout May 1932 at the initiative of some 1,300 communist militants. Peasants attacked official offices, tax registers were burned and prisoners liberated, and stores monopolizing alcohol destroyed. In the summer of 1930 the militia of self-defense (“tu ve”) had appeared, the local administration disintegrated, and notables fled to cities, leading to a political vacuum in the countryside. On September 1, 1930 leaders of the regional Committee of Annam established rural soviets modeled after Chinese soviets in Jiangxi. The soviets abolished debts and taxes and established communal rice fields on land previously confiscated by the rich for redistribution among the poor. In an atmosphere of exaltation, meetings of villagers, peasant unions, and armed militias were improvised. Between September and December 1930 perhaps 17 soviets were established in Nghe An and, a few months later, 14 others in Ha Tinh.

The breadth of the movement surprised and influenced the Communist Party. During 1930, 100 strikes and more than 400 peasant demonstrations were staged. Reunited in Hong Kong in October 1930, the Central Committee was radicalized, rejecting the latent nationalist theses of Hồ Chí Minh, prioritizing the struggle for independence, and recommending formation of a “worker and peasant government” on the Stalinist plan adopted by the Comintern within the framework of a “middle-class democratic” revolution simultaneously “anti-imperialist” and “anti-feudal,” with proletarian direction, which would remain the central concept of the party until 1975. The new name of the party was Dong Duong Cong San Dang (Indochinese Communist Party) (ICP). The Comintern admitted the ICP in April 1931.

In early 1931 revolutionary sentiment continued to rise and colonial repression expanded. The ICP did not have significant control over the popular uprising and was unable to organize a retreat. After two successive lost harvests, from late 1930 to spring 1931, a famine had expanded throughout northern Annam, violence increased, and the peasant movement slipped into riots, isolated itself, and died. French planes bombed demonstrations and the districts where uprisings occurred were militarily occupied – “Red” villages were burned, and suspects and prisoners were gunned down. In July 1931 in North Annam the insurrection was defeated, thousands of suspects filled the prisons, perhaps 3,000 peasants were killed, and an equal number of judgments pronounced with lengthy punishments. By the end of 1931, throughout Vietnam, there were probably 9,000–10,000 political prisoners. The clandestine apparatus of the ICP was entirely dismantled by General Security, which in April 1931 captured the central committee of Saigon, shortly before Hồ Chí Minh was arrested by British police in Hong Kong on June 15. After his arrest Hồ Chí Minh owed his life to his lawyer’s skills. In 1933 he set out again for the USSR.

Those revolutionary nationalists who survived took refuge in southern China and were unable to reorganize inside Indochina before 1945. The nationalist political culture remained, immersed in the communist movement, subsequently the principal adversary of colonization.

The Great Depression had worsened living conditions for workers, leading to the collapse of the prosperous Indochinese colonial economy. Public finances and budgets were drastically cut, reducing the capacity for colonial economic and social intervention, leading to the disintegration of the partnership between colonial and indigenous elites. The crisis created a political vacuum between the colonial regime and society.

Colonial policies were organized around absolute rejection of any idea of decolonizing or substantial change in the political status of the colonies. Instead of responding to demands for self-determination, Paris opted for the modernization of existing colonial capitalism, denying “self-government.” The French chose to restore the authority of the councils of notables in the villages, modernizing the mandarinat, fighting peasant poverty, and developing the countryside through irrigation schemes and intensification of agriculture. This conservative choice was accomplished by repression of both the revolutionary and democratic opposition.

The colonizers’ strategy gave the Vietnamese communist movement a new chance to advance. The Comintern sent back to Indochina and to the Chinese border the young Vietnamese Moscow-educated executives, who reorganized fragile regional structures. The French Communist Party actively intervened in support of the communists, establishing as early as 1930 a permanent campaign against repression in Indochina, intensified in 1933 by the formation of the Committee of Amnesty for the Indochinese. Vietnamese prisons, notably the important Bagne of the Poulo Condore Islands, were quickly transformed into true “red universities” – centers of political formation and new militants for the CPI.

Driven back to Indochina by the French police in May 1930, Trotskyists teaching at private schools in Saigon organized in 1931 several clandestine organizations that were dismantled by General Security in August 1932. On the initiative of Nguyen An Ninh, their ideological leader, a unique front for legal worker resistance was built among brilliant francophone intellectuals.

The Comintern supported the labor project and undoubtedly provided funds. On April 24, 1933 in Saigon the Worker weekly paper was legally constituted, as was The Fight and the political group of the same name. The Fight quickly gained ascendancy from May 1933 to May 1935. “The Fighters” carried out an uninterrupted campaign against repression, engaged in investigative journalism to reveal the miserable conditions workers and peasants lived under, exposed the crimes of rural notables, the administration, and the collusion of the indigenous bourgeoisie, and called for political and labor union democracy. Gradually, they succeeded in turning public opinion. Thanks to the group’s action, in 1935 the workers of Saigon-Cholon started again to strike, the convicts of Poulo Condore engaged in hunger strikes, prisons were agitated, and the southern peasants dared to protest. Communist cells were reorganized in the South and in North Annam. The ICP held its first regular congress in Macao in March 1935, which adopted a leftist position (quickly abandoned because it countered the Comintern position that had just adopted a strategy of popular fronts), and appointed a new secretary general, Hong Phong, a young militant “returned from the USSR.”

In 1936–7 France’s Popular Front – the electoral and governmental alliance of the three socialist parties, communists, and radicals – provoked immense hope among the Vietnamese. There began a wave of hundreds of strikes, big and small, perhaps a thousand in total and undoubtedly the largest in Vietnamese history. Strikes mobilized from August 1936 onward on the model of the French general strike of June that year. In their tens of thousands, workers in cities and the southern countryside engaged in militant agitation. Strikes were peaceful: workers and coolies wrote down their claims, elected delegates charged with negotiation with bosses, and restarted work after obtaining satisfactory concessions. The Vietnamese proletariat and semi-proletariat were in the process of assimilating the model of the European strike. Taken aback, the colonial administration – under pressure from the Popular Front government in France – grew anxious about a social and political crisis in Indochina and the risk of a return to 1930.

Colonization had lost the historical initiative against communism. The legal form of communism acquired considerable authority, evinced by its success at various official elections in 1938–9. But the still-clandestine ICP was the principal beneficiary of the militancy. It reconstituted itself in a great number of provinces and prepared for the future. According to the French police, the ICP comprised perhaps 2,000 militants carefully recruited in 1939 and divided into 150 cells. It was the only party operating in all of colonized Vietnam, incontestably dominating national opinion in Tonkin and in Annam. In the South, political forces were more diverse. Throughout Indochina, several hundred clandestine unions were operating.

For the French colonialists, as World War II approached, the question was how to modernize and restore colonial authority. For the leaders of French socialism, any reform, however limited, was dangerous, since it was likely to benefit the ICP. In 1936–7 French communists fell silent about anti-colonialism. The Popular Front government tolerated legal political activity, but in mid-1937 engaged in a showdown with “The Fight,” the motor of the great movements of 1936–7, and condemned its three leaders, Ta Thu Thau, Nguyen An Ninh, and Nguyen Van Tan. It broke the general strike of the railway employees of the Transindochinese in August 1937, arresting hundreds. As a result, the revolutionary alliance – primarily between Trotskyists and communists – was broken in the summer of 1937. Their common newspaper, The Fight, remained with the Trotskyists, and from then on ideological war raged.

On the eve of World War II, Trotskyist criticism of the ICP, which, as a member of the Comintern, was forced to support the Popular Front, gained some traction, particularly in Cochinchina. Communists were stimulated by Trotskyist exploration of a strategy comparable to Maoist communism in China, but by 1939 Vietnamese communists had returned to an anti-imperialist position, like most of the Comintern. This Indochinese Democratic Front adopted by the ICP in March 1938 was deeply impregnated with Indochinese communism. However, divisions between nationalism and communism created political confusion. Notably, the National Alliance Dai Viet (Grand Vietnam) was founded in December 1938.

Although the colonial regime held firm in Indochina, it was on the defensive. The regime was unable to take back the initiative, which passed to adversaries it could only oppose through repression. The decree of September 26, 1939 dissolving every revolutionary organization led to hundreds of arrests and the disappearance of Trotskyist groups and remnants of nationalist parties, forcing the ICP to retreat into absolute clandestinity as prisons again filled up. However, it was evident that the showdown had only been deferred.

SEE ALSO: Cambodia, Anti-Colonial Protests, 1863–1945; Cambodia, Communist Protests and Revolution; Cambodia, Rebellion Against France; Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949; Hồ Chí Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh) (1890–1969); Laos, Protest and Revolution, 19th and 20th Centuries; Leninist Philosophy; Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Marxism; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940); Vietnam, First Indochina War, 1945–1954; Vietnam, Protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974; Vietnam, Protests, 1975–1993; Vo Nguyen Giap (b. 1911)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bizot, F. (2000) Le Portail. Paris: Editions de la Table Ronde.
- Boudarel, G. (1965) Phan Bội Châu et la société vietnamienne de son temps. Paris: France-Asie, 199.
- Boudarel, G. (1991) Cent Fleurs écloses dans la nuit du Vietnam. Paris: Jean Bertoin.
- Bourdeaux, P. (2003) Emergence et constitution de la communauté du Bouddhisme Hoa Hao. Contribution à l'histoire sociale du delta du Mékong (1935–1955). Thesis, Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes, IV.
- Brocheux, P. (Ed.) (1981) L'Asie du sud-est. Révoltes, réformes, révolutions Lille: Presses Universitaires de Lille.
- Brocheux, P. (1995) The Mekong Delta: Ecology, Economy and Revolution, 1860–1960. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Brocheux, P. (2003) Hồ Chí Minh. Paris: Payot.
- Brocheux, P. & Hémery, D. (2001) Indochine, la colonisation ambiguë (1858–1954). Paris: La Découverte.
- Bui Tin (1995) Following Hồ Chí Minh: Memoirs of a Vietnamese Colonel. London: Hart.
- Duiker, W. J. (1976) The Rise of Nationalism in Vietnam, 1900–1941. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Duiker, W. J. (2000) Hồ Chí Minh. New York: Hyperion Press.
- Fourniau, C. (2001) Vietnam, domination coloniale et résistance nationale, 1858–1914. Paris: les Indes Savantes.
- Gosha, C. (1999) Thailand and the Southeast Asian Networks of the Vietnamese Revolution (1885–1954). Richmond: Curzon Press.
- Hémery, D. (1975) Révolutionnaires vietnamiens et pouvoir colonial en Indochine. Communistes, trotskystes,

- nationalistes à Saigon de 1932 à 1937*. Paris: François Maspero.
- Hémery, D. (1990) Hô Chi Minh. De l'Indochine au Vietnam. Paris: Gallimard.
- Hô Chi Minh (1994) Toan Tap. Hanoi: Nha Xuat Ban Su That.
- Hue Tam Ho Tai (1983) Millenarianism and Peasant Politics in Vietnam. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Huynh Kim Khanh (1982) Vietnamese Communism, 1925–1945. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Huynh Ly (1992) Phan Châu trình. Than Thê va Su Nghiep. Da Nang.
- Hy Van Luong (1992) Revolution in the Village: Tradition and Transformation in North Vietnam, 1925–1988. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.
- Lockhart, G. (1989) Nations in Arms: The Origins of the People's Army of Vietnam. Sydney: Allen & Unwin.
- Marr, D. (1971) Vietnamese Anticolonialism, 1885–1925. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Marr, D. (1981) Vietnamese Tradition on Trial, 1920–1945. Los Angeles: University of California Press.
- Phan Bôi Châu (1968) Mémoires. Paris: France-Asie.
- Ponchaud, F. (1998) Cambodge, année zero. Paris: Kailash.
- Quinn-Judge, S. (2003) Hô Chi Minh, The Missing Years. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Trinh Van Thao (1990) Vietnam. Du Confucianisme au Communisme. Paris, L'Harmattan.
- Werner, J. S. (1981) Peasant Politics and Religious Sectarianism: Peasant and Priest in the Cao Dai in Vietnam. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Translated by Marcelline Block

Vietnam, First Indochina War, 1945–1954

Daniel Hémery

In the summer of 1945, the world emerged exhausted from World War II. Nevertheless, violence continued almost without interruption in Southeast Asia and Indochina for the next three decades, with only two brief intermissions, between 1954–61 and 1975–8.

In September 1945, the Vietnamese communists prepared a military showdown with colonial France, leaving no possibility for a negotiated compromise. From the outset the likelihood of confrontation was clear, since the French were determined to apply the Indochinese Federation project developed by Admiral d'Argenlieu, the high commissioner, with the support of successive French governments in 1945–6. Begun in September 1945 in Cochinchina, the spread of the conflict was deferred for over a year owing to the relative weakness of each adversary and the necessity for the Vietnamese as well as the French to remove Chiang Kai-shek and his armies, which had been occupying the north of Indochina since September 1945, by means of negotiation.

After more than 15 months of negotiation to December 1946 between the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (DRV), the French, and the Chinese, the Chinese finally ceded in February–March 1946 when General Leclerc's troops landed at Haiphong. The French troops settled in Hanoi in an uneasy coexistence with the government of the DRV, its self-defense militias (Tu ve), and the emergent People's Liberation Army (PLA), organized by Vo Nguyen Giap.

The Agreements of March 6, 1946 concluded in extremis on the eve of the French arrival in Tonkin between Hô Chi Minh and the French negotiator Jean Sainteny apparently opened the road to a compromise with France, recognizing a free State of Viet-Nam that would be part of the Indochinese Federation and the greater French Union, whose unification was due to be decided by referendum in Cochinchina. This initial compromise bought time for the two adversaries and allowed the communists to defeat their nationalist opponents. Over the next few months the nationalists were dispersed or defeated, and they were no longer represented in the subsequent government formed on October 6, 1946.

Franco-Vietnamese negotiations proved difficult and seemed destined to fail after the lack of progress at the first Conference of Dalat in May 1946. Hô Chi Minh was well received as virtual head of state in Paris in July, but the Conference of Fontainebleau in July–August ended in complete disarray. After the conference, conflict was already developing in the Mekong Delta between French troops and Viet Minh guerillas in the jungle, reorganized by their new chief, Nguyen Binh. Armed confrontation was deliberately prepared in April 1946 by the French high command and by d'Argenlieu who, protected by Paris, blocked the Cochinchinese preparations for a referendum and promoted the establishment of a transitional Autonomous Republic of Cochinchina, headed by Nguyen Van Tinh, a former leader of Saigon constitutionalism who had obtained the recall of General Leclerc. The bombing of Haiphong by the French fleet on November 20–3, 1946 increased tensions. Further attempts at dialogue were futile. On the evening of December 19, the Viet Minh engaged the Battle of Hanoi against the French troops, which they lost after a month of ferocious fighting.

For France, the Indochinese War – for the Vietnamese, the “First Resistance” – was first lost politically and then militarily. The initial balance of military forces was unfavorable to the Viet Minh. The CEFEO (French Expeditionary Task Force in the Far East) numbered approximately 100,000 men in 1947, with modern equipment and an air force. It faced 80,000 regular Vietnamese combatants, who also had village militias and regional units carrying out large-scale guerilla warfare according to concepts tested in 1927 in the regional Chinese communist bases then at Yan’an. Nevertheless, in October 1947, the Viet Minh and PLA emerged unscathed from CEFEO’s offensive in Upper Tonkin, where the government and the central apparatus of the Indochinese Communist Party (ICP) had withdrawn. The initial French hypothesis of a short war proved illusory. It turned out in fact to be a long war imposed by the Viet Minh, theorized initially by the secretary general of the ICP, Truong Chinh, in his “On the Prolonged War,” and later by General Vo Nguyen Giap in his “People’s War, People’s Army,” adapting the military concepts of Mao Zedong to the Vietnamese situation. Success was achieved, at enormous cost to the peasantry, through the development of rural guerilla warfare, forcing the CEFEO to disperse manpower and become mired in an exhausting combat that produced no lasting results. As early as 1945, the CEFEO faced a vast network of resistance, from Thailand to South China, patiently constructed through extensive international political alliances throughout Asia, the communist world, and the French left.

The war was fought for high ideological stakes. Vietnamese communists and the Viet Minh led a daily combat to preserve national legitimacy. This had largely been achieved by 1945–6 and was maintained through popular mobilization on the dual themes of the struggle for independence and the unity of Vietnam. The pledge to end economic and social underdevelopment was important in this combat for national legitimacy. The DRV government that emerged in 1945–6 implemented effective social measures to reduce tenant farming, eliminate illiteracy, introduce education for the masses, and create a basic health care system.

In order to analyze the Vietnamese communist phenomenon, a distinction needs to be drawn between communism rooted in the Confucian and national tradition, which constituted the intellectual apparatus of Hô Chi Minh, Pham Van Dong, and Vo Nguyen Giap, and orthodox communism promoted by leaders such as Bui Cong Trung, Tran Van Giau, and Truong Chinh, secretary general of the ICP until 1956. This binary tension manifested itself through partisans seeking national maximum unity and those who sought to prioritize class struggle and the communist project.

Hô Chi Minh gained legitimacy through the Revolution of August 1945 and the proclamation of independence on September 2 to the masses. At the same time, communist ideology was embraced by successive generations of revolutionary intelligentsia as well as by the proletariat in the towns, factories, mines, plantations, and villages. During the long Indochina war, the party was constantly attentive to the military struggle and the peasantry, which in North Vietnam and in part of the South had provided recruits for the popular army. Unlike the small urban nationalist parties, Vietnamese communism presented itself as the historical alternative to the crisis of rural society, which had suffered underdevelopment in several regions since the 1930s. In December 1953, it experimented with agrarian reform in the liberated region of Thai Nguyen, confiscating and redistributing land, possibly under pressure from the USSR and the People’s Republic of China (PRC), which was involved in its own agrarian revolution to eliminate the landowning class.

From this complex historical meeting between communism, nation, and society emerged the August Revolution and the transformation of the intelligentsia and communist leaders into a powerful civil and military bureaucracy. The communist leaders of the war effort represented the foundational structures of the Vietnamese party-state. In the ethnic minority zones in the northeast of Laos, the Pathet Lao political front was founded on the Viet Minh model by Prince Souphanouvong after the dissolution of the Lao Issara movement in 1949.

In Vietnam, the five “inter-zones” (lien khu) and a large proportion of the regions occupied by the CEFEO and the administration of the State of Vietnam were surrounded by an immense network of party cells. Society was reorganized for the production of war supplies for the army, mobilized in numerous rural campaigns by the party through large mass organizations. The effort demanded of peasants was enormous and willingly granted, with little resistance other than locally to the intensification of agricultural production and the improvisation of workshops for the manufacture of tools and small arms.

Ultimately, political society was totally substituted by the party, which was developed in the cities and its principles of organization borrowed from Stalinist and Maoist communism. The bureaucracy was defined by its monopoly of power, structured in the party and popular units of the army, which were themselves under the strict control of the hierarchy of cells.

With the official reappearance of the party in 1951, the repressive practices of “correction” and personal “rectification” (chinh huan) became for several decades essential components of the training of militants, then of a growing number of the population. The aim was to establish conformity with the official ideology. There was no room in this system for plurality of opinion and even less for opposition, as demonstrated through the assassination of political adversaries throughout 1945–6.

The initial effect of the First Resistance was to force France to abandon the bulk of its Indochinese Federation project by early 1947 and substitute a new geopolitical option: the installation of three “Associated States” unified through treaties with the French Union. The concern of the High French Commission was how to impose nationalist, anti-communist regimes in opposition to Vietnamese communism and its Khmer and Laotian allies. It began to prepare what Nixon would later call the “Vietnamization of the war,” establishing Associated State accords with the Cambodian and Laotian constitutional monarchies.

Long and difficult negotiations began with ex-emperor Bao Dai in December 1947, then with the small Vietnamese nationalist parties and the Cao daist and Hoa Hao sects of the South, whose armed militias had doubled in size. The Auriol-Bao Dai Agreements of March 8, 1949 recognized the independence of the State of Vietnam, with Bao Dai as leader. However, his unstable and fragile administration, with an army trained with considerable support from the French, was unable to impose power.

Almost at the same time, the proclamation in Beijing of the People’s Republic in October 1949, with armies reaching to the border of Tonkin, was the decisive turning point of the Indochina War, even more so than Dien Bien Phu. The final outcome of the war had always depended on the attitude of the Chinese. As a consequence, France could no longer win over the Vietnamese popular army, which had quickly transformed itself into a regular army equipped and supported, materially and intellectually, by China. Beginning in early 1950, a permanent Chinese military and political mission began working in the DRV. By 1954, nearly 10,000 Chinese advisors and technicians were active in the administrative management of the DRV. Nevertheless, Indochinese communism did not slip into the Chinese sphere of influence, which was itself split between Maoism and the pro-Soviet factions. In February 1951, at the second congress of the Chinese Communist Party, the ICP was officially transformed into a communist party.

In October 1950, the French disaster at Cao Bang and on Colonial Road 4 (RC 4), added to the catastrophic evacuation of the French strategic base of Lang Son, confirmed a military turning point: the CEFEO had lost vital control of the Chinese border, providing a strategic initiative to the Viet Minh.

With this new balance of military forces, the Viet Minh were able to maneuver large regular divisional units, with a sizable armed infantry and modern artillery, together with the local guerilla and regional units. The new strategy of General de Lattre de Tassigny, appointed high commissioner and French commander in chief in December 1950, was to accelerate the establishment of a Vietnamese imperial-dominated army of nearly 300,000 men, which gave the French a fragile military advantage during 1951. In France, opposition to the war, carefully cultivated by DRV leaders, was already strong among the working class and the Christian and intellectual left. After 1950 it spread to the middle classes, the Socialist Party, and parties of the center, and in 1953 it found a distinguished spokesman in the French National Assembly in the person of Pierre Mendès-France.

Meanwhile, the war had spread throughout the peninsula, reaching Cambodia and Laos. The Viet Minh installed bases among its allies, who were certainly weak but by no means insignificant. They included the small Revolutionary Party of the Khmer People, which in 1951 numbered nearly 1,000 members, and the Lao Popular Party, created in February 1951. The widening of its strategic space was the response of Vietnamese communism to the military superiority of its adversaries: initially the French, and later the Americans. In both Laos and Cambodia, the Vietnamese neutralized all those associated with the French, particularly among social elites. In Laos in March–April 1953, the PLA helped install a government allied to the Pathet Lao in the city of Sam Neua, in Houaphon Province. In October, through bilateral negotiations, the Laotians gained full independence. In Cambodia, King Norodom Sihanouk left Phnom Penh and launched the Crusade for Independence in the first half of 1953, achieving huge popular success and forcing the French to yield in 1954.

With the entrance of the People's Republic of China, the Indochinese War had become an international event. With the setting up of the State of Vietnam and army, it became a civil war. From 1949, the stakes continued to be raised beyond the confines of the peninsula, turning the conflict into a struggle over decolonization. This transformation was certainly apprehended by global strategists in the United States.

Diplomatic recognition of the DRV by China occurred on January 18, 1950, and by the USSR on January 30, a few days after the first meeting of Hô Chi Minh and Stalin in Moscow. For their part, the United States and Britain recognized the Associated States on February 7, applying the notorious “domino theory” to Indochina, reportedly the brainchild of President Eisenhower’s Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, but in fact earlier conceived by French geopolitical strategists. From 1951, the US assumed a growing proportion of French military expenditure: 40 percent in 1953, 70 percent the following year. Indochina was emerging as the hot front of the Cold War.

In 1953 Vietnamese communists were able to turn victoriously against the French. A plan devised in 1953 by the staff of General Navarre, the last French commander in chief, was inspired by the “hedgehog” strategy tested by the Germans against Soviet offensives after Stalingrad and adapted successfully to Vietnamese terrain in 1952 at the Battle of Nasan. He set up a defensive complex at Dien Bien Phu, which would block the route of the Viet Minh forces trying to return to camps in neighboring Laos. Navarre assumed that in an attempt to reestablish the route to Laos, General Giap would be forced to organize a mass attack on the French forces at Dien Bien Phu. However, the Navarre plan gravely underestimated the capacity of the Popular Army to transport the heavy material and artillery necessary across difficult mountain terrain to encircle and besiege what would be an Asian Verdun. The challenge was met by 50,000 to 70,000 citizen workers (zan cong) for 40,000 combatants, men and women recruited through intensive political mobilization from the peasant communities of North Vietnam, who built a road through 500 kilometers of jungle. Road 41 was completed on January 25, 1954, along which Chinese artillery and material were transported by truck to Dien Bien Phu.

The battle, which began on March 13, ended in complete disaster for the French. After two months of relentless combat, on May 7, 1954 Dien Bien Phu was taken by storm by the PLA. The French command had practically no mobile reserves. In Geneva, Mendès-France urgently negotiated the Agreements of July 20–1 with the support of the Soviets and the Chinese, who pressured leaders of the DRV. An armistice divided Vietnam into two “provisional” zones in the North and the South, separated by the 17th parallel. A final declaration obtained the departure of the CEFEO in April 1956 and provided for general elections in Vietnam before July 1956 to unify the country. However, on July 16, 1955, the South refused to hold elections. Presided over by the former Catholic mandarin Ngo Dinh Diem and supported by the US, the South challenged the armistice as well as the final declaration of Geneva. Moreover, neither the USSR nor the PRC wanted the unification of Vietnam, and in 1957 Moscow proposed the admission of two Vietnams to the United Nations.

After nine years of war, the French colonial project of 1945 was in ruins. The Vietnamese communists and the DRV succeeded in decolonizing Vietnam, but had not achieved unification. Less than a year after Geneva, war again became an implacable necessity.

SEE ALSO: Cambodia, Anti-Colonial Protests, 1863–1945; Cambodia, Communist Protests and Revolution;

Cambodia, Rebellion against France; Hô Chi Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh) (1890–1969); Sihanouk, Norodom (b. 1922); Souphanouvong, Prince (1909–1995); Vietnam, Anti-Colonial, Nationalist, and Communist Movements, 1900–1939; Vietnam, Protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974; Vietnam, Protests, 1975–1993; Vo Nguyen Giap (b. 1911)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bizot, F. (2000) Le Portail. Paris: Editions de la Table Ronde.
- Boudarel, G. (1991) Cent Fleurs écloses dans la nuit du Vietnam. Paris: Jean Bertoin.
- Brocheux, P. (Ed.) (1981) L'Asie du sud-est. Révoltes, réformes, révolutions. Lille: Presses Universitaires de Lille.
- Brocheux, P. (1995) The Mekong Delta: Ecology, Economy and Revolution, 1860–1960. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Brocheux, P. (2003) Ho Chi Minh. Paris: Payot.
- Brocheux, P. & Hémerly, D. (2001) Indochine, la colonisation ambiguë (1858–1954), 2nd ed. Paris: La Découverte.
- Bui Tin (1995) Following Ho Chi Minh: Memoirs of a Vietnamese Colonel. London: Hart.
- Cesari, L. (1995) L'Indochine en guerres, 1945–1993. Paris: Belin.
- Devillers, P. (1952) Histoire du Viêt-Nam de 1940 à 1952. Paris: Le Seuil.
- Duiker, W. J. (2000) Ho Chi Minh. New York: Hyperion Press.
- Fall, B. (1960) Le Viet-Minh, La République Démocratique du Viêt-Nam, 1945–1960. Paris: Colin.
- Hémerly, D. (1990) Hô Chi Minh. De l'Indochine au Vietnam. Paris: Gallimard.
- Lockhart, G. (1989) Nations in Arms: The Origins of the People's Army of Vietnam. Sydney: Allen & Unwin.
- Mus, P. (1952) Vietnam. Sociologie d'une guerre. Paris: Le Seuil.
- Nguyen Van Ky (1995) La Société vietnamienne face à la modernité. Le Tonkin de la fin du XIXe siècle à la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Paris: L'Harmattan.

Translated by Marcelline Block

Vietnam, protest against colonialism, 1858–1896

Daniel Hémerly

At the time of the Second Opium War (1858) initiated by Britain, France, and Spain against China, Napoleon III began to colonize Vietnam. After a failed attempt to take the Imperial Court in Hue, Saigon was conquered on February 17, 1859. However, the city and its Chinese annex of Cholon were effectively besieged by more than 12,000 soldiers and Vietnamese militiamen gathered by the imperial authorities in the south. It was only in February 1861 that resistance fell to a French task force, inaugurating the French conquest of the interior provinces.

Hue's government was divided between partisans seeking a conciliatory strategy to modernize the country and those favoring resistance to French colonial rule. Partisans were militarily weakened by an uprising of the Catholic Le Duy Phung in the old Le dynasty in Vietnam's northern provinces and were forced to cede three eastern provinces of the south (My Tho, Gia Dinh, and Ba Ria) to France, along with Saigon and the archipelago of Poulo Condore. These areas constituted the territorial core of French Cochinchina. In the Treaty of Saigon of June 5, 1862, Hue's government agreed to open three commercial ports in the center and north of Vietnam.

First Anti-Colonial Insurrections, 1868–1873

In 1863 in the occupied provinces, a small group of influential intellectuals organized in the villages with the clandestine support of the Hue Imperial Court. They formed an active guerilla resistance movement in the swamps of the west. Opposition emerged in the mangroves at the edge of the immense Plain of Reeds, led by a young military chief, Truong Cong Dinh. His death in August 1864 weakened the resistance movement, which nevertheless reemerged in 1866 in the provinces west of the delta (Vinh Long, Chau Doc, and Ha Tien) that had remained Vietnamese.

Negotiations initiated by the Vietnamese embassy in Paris in 1863 clashed with a campaign led in France by a nascent colonial party, composed of a coalition of the navy, commercial traders, and the Cochinchinese colonial administration and supported to some extent by the opposition republican party. On August 11, 1863, Admiral de la Grandière of the Cochinchinese administration negotiated a treaty with King Norodom Promborirak of Kampuchea making Cambodia a French protectorate. Norodom's reign was weakened by a revolt by his half-brother Si Votha, which was encouraged by Siam (Thailand). In order to protect his crown and ward off the double threat from the Thais and the Vietnamese, Norodom accepted the protectorate treaty with France.

For the French, Kampuchea – a “sanctuary” for the Vietnamese guerrillas of the south as well as a strategic key to the Mekong basin – was needed to control Cochinchina and the important Mekong River. Between 1866 and 1868, a scientific mission by Doudart de Lagrée and Francis Garnier had explored the course of the Mekong River north into China. Control of Kampuchea was essential to dominate the south of Vietnam, which could also become a geographical base for expansion into Siam.

The fate of the final southern Vietnamese provinces was sealed when they were annexed to French Cochinchina. From June 1866 to June 1867, with the support of Bangkok, the three Khmer provinces of Battambang, Sisophon, and Siem Reap were transferred to the French protectorate of the Khmer Kingdom. Annexation of these last southern Vietnamese provinces was strongly resisted on the ground. In Kampuchea, several peasant risings led by charismatic local leaders disrupted the countryside, including Achar Sua (1864–6) and the revolt of the former monk Pou Kombo in the border region between Cochinchina and Kampuchea between June 1866 and December 1867.

In western Cochinchina, where an administrative vacuum was created by the withdrawal of the mandarins, the imperial police chief (kinh luoc) Phan Thanh Gian yielded to the military superiority of the French. After his suicide, peasant guerilla uprisings led by his sons began in early 1867, but were defeated in December of that year. In the following decade, anti-colonial agitation sporadically revived in Cochinchina on the initiative of secret societies or millenarian sects, in particular the revolt of February 1873, which destabilized the regions of Soc Trang, Tra Vinh, and Ben Tre in the central delta, but did not seriously threaten French domination in the south.

The nucleus of anti-colonial protest and resistance shifted toward central and northern Vietnam, renamed Annam and Tonkin by the French. French business interests and adventurers from China actively lobbied for the commercial opening of Tonkin. The turning point came with an attempt by Admiral Dupré, governor of Cochinchina, to annex Tonkin in October 1873. Dupré sent a small expedition commanded by Lieutenant F. Garnier to Hanoi, which seized the city in November and sought to occupy strategic points of the Red River delta, installing pro-French authorities in the four provinces with the assistance of Catholic missionaries and Vietnamese Christians.

There was vigorous popular resistance supported by the Black Flag, bands of former Chinese insurrectionists from the Taiping Rebellion recruited by the provincial Vietnamese administration as additional troops. In 1864, after the defeat of the Taiping Rebellion, members of the Black Flag took refuge in the Red River region in the northern Vietnam borderlands. Lieutenant Garnier was killed on December 21 during a Black Flag attack on Hanoi. In 1873, the Van Than movement, a powerful nationalist and anti-Christian association, mobilized intellectuals in the northern and central regions to attack French colonial residences. These protests won the support of some of the high traditional mandarins and the court of Hue, where there was resistance to French demands. Calls for the massacre of Christians were made, and several Christian villages were attacked and burned. As in China, the anti-Christian movement persisted until the early twentieth century.

Tonkin progressively slid into chaos and rural misery, with the collapse of agricultural production, local famines and epidemics, and banditry. After the treaty of March 1874, France evacuated Tonkin in exchange for economic and consular advantages and the acceptance by Hue of French protection.

Resistance to the French Protectorate (1883–1896)

Patriotic resistance was reinforced by the brief but violent 1873 crisis, while successive French governments pursued a program of conquest and colonization of the Indochinese peninsula. On April 25, 1882, an expedition led by Commander Rivière seized the citadel of Hanoi. In March 1883, China sent 30,000 men to Tonkin to resist the French conquest of the principal cities of the delta. The French task force, arriving in August, occupied Tonkin and drove the Chinese army back toward the border. A French navy squadron prevented rice deliveries from the southern provinces of China to the north, and launched swift attacks along the coast of Formosa.

The imperial government was weakened by the death of Emperor Tu Duc in July 1883. He was succeeded by three regents who were seriously divided on a plan of resistance. The Hue government finally agreed to negotiate with France and signed a protectorate treaty on June 6, 1884. The treaty was recognized by China, which signed its own agreement with France on June 9, 1885. With the collapse of the weak imperial army in Tonkin, imperial Vietnam essentially lost its struggle against colonial subjugation. Nevertheless, resistance continued for another ten years.

The long war of French “pacification” began in July 1885 when General de Courcy, Resident General of France, began the process of eliminating resistance in Hue, led by the regent Ton That Thuyet. In 1883–4, Thuyet organized Tan So, a secret military base across acres of mountainous terrain in the middle of the Muong country west of Quang Tri and the mountain road towards Upper Tonkin. He attacked French legations and quarters on the night of July 4–5. The attack failed and the French seized Hue as well as the Purple Forbidden City. Overnight, the regents fled toward Tan So with members of the court and the 14-year-old emperor, Ham Nghi. A few days later, Ham Nghi and Tan So launched an appeal for general resistance – “Support the King!” (Chieu Can Vuong!) – with a call to massacre Christians.

In September De Courcy crowned a new emperor, the nephew of Tu Duc, Dong Khanh (1885–9). Ham Nghi’s call for resistance had launched a formidable national uprising, which spread as far as Cochinchina, where several conspiracies in the Saigon area were thwarted in 1885. The situation was exacerbated for the French by a general insurrection in Cambodia in January 1885. King Norodom refused to cooperate with the protectorate authorities, who could not fight on two fronts. Can Vuong forced the French to divide their military operations and, in August 1886, abandon the idea of annexing the Khmer kingdom.

Resistance intensified in the center and north of Vietnam. Although Can Vuong did not have unanimous support, it had nevertheless been a general insurrection. In spite of official French denials of the uprising’s broad scope, shrewd politicians and high-level civil servants such as general governor De Lanessan (1891–6), as well as brilliant young officers such as Colonels Pennequin and Servière, recognized a new indigenous politics of patriotic resistance.

An unprecedented national crisis, caused by the installation of the protectorate and the partition of Tonkin, had significantly destabilized Vietnamese society. With the capitulation of the imperial court, the divine mandate that was supposed to uphold the dynasty weakened. As in 1945, the Vietnamese in 1885 were confronted with the problem of “national security” (cuu quoc) and national survival. For many in this dilemma, the only recourse was to answer the appeal of the legitimate sovereign, who symbolized the fatherland in the people’s fight against foreign invasion.

Until 1890–1, although broad, the movement was regionally fragmented in poorly coordinated local uprisings. In Annam – the center of present-day Vietnam – the entire society led by intellectual elites rose up to defend the throne, particularly in northern Annam, where the dynasty had originated. Christians, considered internal enemies, were massacred en masse. In early 1888, however, the insurrectionists appeared to be defeated, as Ham Nghi was handed over to the French by his Muong warriors. Resistance resumed locally at Thanh Hoa from 1889 to 1892, then in Nghe An and Ha Tinh in 1890 under the prestigious imperial scholar Phan Dinh Phung, who led the resistance until his death in 1895. As of July 1895, Can Vuong gained popular support in the southern provinces of Annam, but collapsed the following year.

All central authority had broken down in the Tonkin delta provinces, devastated for 25 years by revolts, Chinese banditry, poor harvests, and floods, and then by the colonial war of 1884–5. Resistance was mobilized among the farming peasant community, who reacted as much against French efforts to recruit local porters as in response to the imperial call to arms against the foreign occupation.

Throughout most of the delta, particularly in the broad marshy Bai Say Plain between Hanoi and Hung Yen, a situation of dual power arose. Indigenous peoples apparently submissive to the colonial power during the day developed a clandestine resistance network by night. Dozens of armed bands, each containing no fewer than 250 men, went on the move and were impossible to detect in the immense plain that remained under water during the rainy season. The mountains and thick forests of the middle region surrounding the delta were bastions of the most resilient guerillas. They were well equipped with modern arms, often Winchester automatic rifles, whereas the French only had Gras rifles, bayonets, and revolvers. The guerilla troops were led by Vietnamese chiefs, among them Hoang Hoa Tham in the Yen The Mountains, or by Chinese from the remnants of Taiping groups.

The resistance troops built fortified systems composed of hideouts, forts, and several lines of traps. But the northern region on the Chinese border fell into the hands of Chinese bands, who had no connection to Can Vuong and who controlled travel in the frontier zone. The region was dominated by former Chinese soldiers or Taiping insurgents, itinerant Hunan gangsters, or the Hakka people of Hainan, such as the band of Luu Ky, who had thousands of rapid-fire rifles and operated in Dong Trieu in 1892.

At Ba Dinh the Can Vuong unsuccessfully sought to develop a coordinated resistance. Constructed amid rice plantations that were under several meters of water and connected to land by four narrow dams, the village fortress measured 1,200 by 400 meters and was protected by bamboo spikes. Ba Dinh was commanded by Dinh Cong Trang and 3,000 men. The French colonial authorities needed 3,500 men to conquer Ba Dinh, along with 5,000 peasant soldiers, 20 artillery pieces, and a two-month siege between December 1886 and January 1887. Nevertheless, although some chiefs conceived daring raids, the armed resistance groups could not advance beyond two or three provinces.

The resistance failed for several reasons. First, the Can Vuong insurrectionists were unable to put across the significance of the popular struggle against the French task force from Tonkin and Annam and did not have Chinese aid – so often decisive in the Indochinese wars of the contemporary era. Second, French authorities shrewdly exploited divisions within Vietnamese society as well as internal weaknesses within Can Vuong. Although the movement gained sympathy, in Tonkin it faced old suspicions toward the dynasty coupled with a wait-and-see attitude. Third, Christian dissidents provided invaluable support to the colonial troops. More generally, the Can Vuong failed to articulate a project of social transformation and global modernization. It proclaimed no social reforms, as it belonged to a Confucian and imperial order that addressed appeals only to the elites. In fact, the issue of “progress” was addressed only by the colonizers, who used it as a major justification for their actions.

The defeat of Ton That Thuyet and Ham Nghi, and the final rallying of the dynasty and the high mandarin to the protectorate, had the direct consequence of seriously weakening and even breaking all dynastic and monarchic identifications with the nation. The court, the dynasty and, to a lesser degree the mandarinates were all discredited and henceforth disqualified as legitimate rulers in the eyes of the defenders of independence.

SEE ALSO: Cambodia, Anti-Colonial Protests, 1863–1945; Cambodia, Communist Protests and Revolution; Cambodia, Rebellion against France; Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864; Vietnam, Anti-Colonial, Nationalist, and Communist Movements, 1900–1939; Vietnam, First Indochina War, 1945–1954; Vietnam, Protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974; Vietnam, Protests, 1975–1993

References and Suggested Readings

- Boudarel, G. (1991) Cent Fleurs écloses dans la nuit du Vietnam. Paris: Jean Bertoin.
- Brocheux, P. (Ed.) (1981) L'Asie du sud-est. Révoltes, réformes, révolutions. Lille: Presses Universitaires de Lille.
- Brocheux, P. (1995) The Mekong Delta: Ecology, Economy and Revolution, 1860–1960. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Chandler, D. P. (1991) The Tragedy of Cambodian History: Politics, War and Revolution since 1945. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Chandler, D. P. (1992) A History of Cambodia. Oxford: Allen & Unwin.
- Devillers, P. (1998) Français et Annamites. Partenaires ou ennemis? 1856–1902. Paris: Denoël.
- Duiker, W. J. (1995) Sacred War: Nationalism and Revolution in a Divided Vietnam. New York: McGraw Hill.
- Forest, A. (1980) Le Cambodge et la colonisation française. Histoire d'une colonisation sans heurts. Paris: L'Harmattan.
- Fourniau, C. (1989) Annam-Tonkin (1885–1896). Lettrés et paysans vietnamiens face à la conquête coloniale. Paris: L'Harmattan.
- Fourniau, C. (2001) Vietnam, domination coloniale et résistance nationale, 1858–1914. Paris: Les Indes Savantes.
- Gosha, C. (1999) Thailand and the Southeast Asian Networks of the Vietnamese Revolution (1885–1954). Richmond: Curzon Press.
- Hémery, D. (1990) Hô Chi Minh. De l'Indochine au Vietnam. Paris: Gallimard.
- McLeod, M. W. (1991) The Vietnamese Response to French Intervention, 1862–1874. New York: Praeger.
- Marr, D. (1971) Vietnamese Anticolonialism, 1885–1925. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Werner, J. S. (1981) Peasant Politics and Religious Sectarianism: Peasant and Priest in the Cao Dai in Vietnam. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Vietnam, protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974

Daniel Hémerly

The first regional effect of the compromise of Geneva was the push to neutrality and non-alignment encouraged by China, which feared the installation of US military bases in Indochina. This impetus quickly weakened, except in Cambodia, where the government remained neutral for a decade under Prince Sihanouk, who seized power in 1960. Sihanouk fought American influence with Chinese support, tolerating the establishment of Vietnamese communist bases at the border of South Vietnam until the pro-American coup d'état of 1970. The US-backed coup ended Cambodia's capacity to restrain the action of the Khmer communists.

In Vietnam, antagonism between the party-state installed north of the 17th parallel and the army-state that the Eisenhower administration sought to consolidate in the south under the Republic of Vietnam was evident from the start. The Republic of Vietnam was officially founded following the departure of ex-emperor Bao Dai in May 1955 and elected through a referendum of October 23, 1955, won by Ngo Dinh Ziem with 98 percent of the vote.

For the powerful bureaucracy of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (DRV), the reunification of Vietnam with the Lao Dong (Communist Party of South Vietnam) according to the model of the North was seen as a necessity. The North did not exclude the possibility of elections as envisaged in Geneva, which would probably have been favorable to the political transformation of the Viet Minh. However, the North's strategic view did not include the spread of pluralist political democracy. After Geneva and the partial victory of 1954, conditions appeared optimal in a war-ravaged society for establishing a planned economy and total control of the state party. North Vietnam would thus be a test bench for a radical transformation.

The establishment of a state-planned economy began in 1956 with the broad implementation of agrarian reform, conceived according to the Chinese model of 1953. In the fight to eliminate landowners and the rich, the liberation army established special popular courts, where public accusations were made and summary executions carried out. Around 20,000 arrests and 15,000 executions of rich peasants took place. Villages were terrorized and peasant revolts erupted in several provinces that were bastions of the Viet Minh, in particular in Nghe An. The party was forced to retreat and engage in self-criticism, relieving its general secretary Truong Chinh in 1956 and replacing him temporarily with Hô Chi Minh.

While the scale and intensity of the persecutions declined, the essential measures were maintained: the old elite of notable villagers was replaced by a local bureaucracy of political and administrative leaders, and 810,000 hectares of land were equally redistributed to 2,100,000 families of poor or landless peasants. The villages were deeply divided, and the former solidarity was broken. In 1958, in order to expand farm production, land was collectivized on the Soviet and Chinese model into cooperatives (hợp tác teststemxà), generally the size of a village. Cooperatives were obliged to deliver agricultural products to the state at fixed prices.

In 1960, 86 percent of families belonged to cooperatives and family farming virtually disappeared. A program for accelerating industrialization was launched with foreign aid – more than $3 billion between 1968 and 1970 – from the USSR, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, and the Chinese. More than 650,000 rural youth were transferred to jobs in new factories and power stations, the metallurgical industry, modernized mines, mechanical engineering, and cotton factories. The rapid economic transformation made the DRV the most industrialized nation in Southeast Asia at that time.

In the larger cities, the political isolation of the most brilliant intellectuals of the DRV began, including romantic poet Phan Khoi, lexicographer Dao Zuy Anh, attorney Nguyen Manh Tuong, and philosopher Tran Duc Thao. The crackdown was organized at the same time as the Hundred Flowers (May–July 1956) in China, with the banning of independent reviews such as Nhan Van and Giai Pham and the denunciation of their editors as part of a violent mass campaign. The editors were banned from publishing and condemned to hard labor.

After the vote of the Ninth Plenum of the Central Committee in December 1963 condemning “modern revisionism,” and the purge of 1967 – the imprisonment and execution of generals, former ministers, and executives who were considered pro-Soviet and pro-Khrushchev – the political monopoly of the party was absolute. Real power was exercised by a core of virtually unchangeable leaders, in particular Truong Chinh, Le Duan, secretary general of the party after 1960, Le Duc Tho, Nguyen Chi Thanh, and Pham Van Dong. Considered pro-Soviet and thus “revisionist,” Vo Nguyen Giap was pushed aside. After 1960, Hồ Chí Minh possessed symbolic rather than effective power, embodying the figure of father of the country.

The communist movement faced a new adversary: the French-appointed imperial government of the Republic of Vietnam in the South. From the outset the regime was organized along authoritarian lines, with a military and police bureaucracy supported by US power. Two small nationalist parties survived from the earlier conflict: Dai Viet and the VNQZD. In 1955, power in Saigon was in the hands of the Ngo Dinh Ziem family, generals of the corps of army officers (ARV), French-educated administrative and police elites, and increasingly the American-educated elites of the Can Lao Party.

This official party of the South, created in September 1954 by the brother and mentor of Ziem, Ngo Dinh Nhu, attempted to militarize and rebuild society on the basis of anti-communism. Supporters included 600,000 Tonkinese Catholic refugees and, to a lesser extent, the landed bourgeoisie and business elites. The political system was maintained only with the support of the US, which provided US$1.4 billion – or 60 percent of its budget – from 1955 to 1960. The regime was also sustained through the presence of thousands of US counselors and military instructors (9,000 in January 1962) and civilians assisting the South Vietnamese army and state apparatus. For Eisenhower and his successor, John F. Kennedy, and Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara, the goal was to provide South Vietnam with practical experience in “nation building” on the South Korean model, while crafting the army as the backbone of the anti-communist state. The militarist state-building model served as a framework for Southeast Asia and for the global US strategy of anti-communist “containment.”

The South Vietnamese strategy quickly failed. The coalition regime of Ngo Dinh Ziem engaged in harsh repression and was politically isolated. In 1960, the government acknowledged the existence of 50,000 political prisoners in detention camp. It entered into open military conflict in the spring of 1955 with the Caoaists and Hoa Hao, which controlled militarily important territorial enclaves. The religious armed militias were crushed and their remaining forces went into hiding in the maquis (forests). In the delta countryside, where land was controlled by large neutral landowners, the government maintained the agrarian status quo. The small peasantry was forced to renounce ownership of land redistributed by the Viet Minh during the war (approximately 600,000 hectares). In 1955, government measures gave farmers a 25 percent ceiling of the harvest and provided for fixed-term leases. The army helped large owners recover unpaid rents. In 1956 and thereafter, agrarian reforms placed a ceiling of 100 hectares on property but were largely unenforced. By 1965, 10 percent of the richest proprietors owned 55 percent of the land. As a result, endless campaigns to denounce communists launched by Ziem failed against the militants and the guerillas of the Viet Minh remaining in the South (between 5,000 and 15,000), whose actions against the regime were increasingly supported. An ordinance of January 11, 1956 authorized the internment without trial of communists and another on August 21, 1956 made communism a crime punishable by death.

For the Lao Dong, armed resistance became the only means to oppose government repression. A threshold was crossed in May 1959: the 15th Plenum of the Central Committee of the Lao Dong pronounced in favor of relaunching the armed struggle to reunify the country and authorizing guerilla operations. The DRV began to send men and material to the South and in May started operating the Hồ Chí Minh Trail in Laotian territory. At the third Congress of the Lao Dong of January 1960, the party proposed a new direction. Le Zuan, the first secretary, Le Duc Tho, the organization’s secretary, and General Nguyen Chi Thanh, head of the political department of the army, actively prepared for war. In the South, guerillas successfully provoked an uprising in the province of Ben Tre in the Mekong Delta. On December 20 in Tan Lap, in the province of Tay Ninh in the northwest of Saigon, it created the National Liberation Front (NLF), headed by Nguyen Huu Tho, an upper-class lawyer from Saigon and a former member of the Viet Minh. The NLF was controlled by militant communists of the South, not directed from Hanoi by Lao Dong’s political office. In January 1961, Lao Dong decided to prepare an armed insurrection, combining political action and military struggle.

The NLF updated the Viet Minh program: priority was given to constituting a democratic coalition government in the South that would negotiate a peaceful reunification with the DRV. In 1961 the People's Liberation Army (PLA) was constituted, comprising 15,000 combatants spread over regular forces, regional guerilla units, and village militias by the end of the year. With the DRV, the NLF quickly developed an international presence, particularly on the diplomatic scene and in public opinion, where it aroused an unprecedented movement of international solidarity. Lao Dong also used the Sino-Soviet conflict that was declared at that time. By advocating the intensification of anti-imperialist struggles, the Vietnamese Party maintained an equal balance between the two antagonists who lent political and material support. For the PRC it was important to draw America away from the South, to make itself the dominant force of the Indochinese peninsula and transform the DRV into a satellite. For the USSR, Vietnam was a valuable example of a successful communist state that could open up an anti-American front in the context of a second Cold War and with which it could renew an alliance against its Chinese adversary.

Hence China and the USSR provided aid to the North Vietnamese and the NLF. From 1967 to 1970, according to American estimates, China provided US$995 million and the USSR US$2.335 billion in assistance. On a similar scale to the previous revolutionary war in the peninsula, the "Second Resistance" of Vietnamese communism was proving itself capable of meeting the formidable challenge of a war against the US, the world's greatest power.

Never, perhaps, has the expression "total war" been so apt than in Indochina in the 20 years that followed Geneva. It was at one and the same time a civil war between the Vietnamese, an indirect international war between Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia and the three great world powers, and a war for the example that the US wanted to prevent the advent of revolutionary regimes or simply neutral regimes in the Third World. Even more than before, the war would be a world war: "The border of the US extends to the 17th parallel," in the words of Ngo Dinh Ziem on May 13, 1957.

From 1962 to 1963, the Southern government installed "strategic hamlets," often by force, displacing 10 million peasants in the South as an essential part of the "counterinsurrection" strategy of General Maxwell Taylor and the MACV (Military Assistance Command in Vietnam). The government sought to control entire regions of the Mekong Delta, infiltrating the cities and carrying the war to the high Southern plateaus. After an unexpected success in Ap Bac in the delta in early 1963, the PLA began to seize the military initiative. The result was that the regime of President Ngo Dinh Diem, the heavily armed South Vietnamese army, and their American advisors lost control of large parts of the territory.

Ziem's hostile measures and bloody repression of a Buddhist demonstration in Hue on May 8, 1963 aroused the opposition of the influential Vietnamese Buddhist community. On June 11 the first Buddhist monk committed suicide by setting himself alight, leading to further Buddhist protests. The Buddhists had readily accepted the idea of negotiation between the South and North, which was encouraged by the NLF and Hanoi. In summer Nhu and Ziem, fearing rapprochement between Washington and Moscow, secretly negotiated with Hanoi to form a coalition government with the NLF. Relations became tense in the summer of 1963 between the government of Ngo Dinh Ziem, Nhu, and the US embassy. Worried by the overtures made to Hanoi, generals prepared a coup d'état, and on November 1, 1963, Ziem was assassinated along with his brother.

In the second stage of the war, Vietnamese communists were brutally opposed by the American superpower. The Vietnam Republic fell in a succession of military coups d'état. From then on, a violent military dictatorship was installed through repeated appeals of the US. The American administration was convinced that in post-colonial societies of the Third World, only the army could rule – as in South Korea or in Indonesia – as a bulwark against revolutionary opposition. In Vietnam, however, the remedy was not working.

In the spring of 1964, the US estimated that the NLF controlled approximately half the population of the Southern territory. The administrative disorganization that followed the change of personnel after Ziem's assassination facilitated the installation of a parallel territorial administration, which won over the peasantry by destroying the latifundism that dominated in the South and achieving the agrarian reforms begun by the Viet Minh. In these “liberated regions,” private property was limited to 5 hectares as opposed to 100 in the government zones. Each family received approximately 1.2 hectares. Small peasant landowners were from then on in the majority. In the cities, in spite of the police, the NLF formed workers’ militias and a vast clandestine network. The PLA became a genuine army, organized in battalions, and was in the process of staging a regular war. In December 1963, at the Ninth Plenum of the Central Committee, the Lao Dong secretly decided to reinforce the military fight in the South and prepare for a general uprising.

The Saigon government was incapable of achieving national stability and at risk of seeing the total collapse of the army in the South, which was demoralized and provided little threat despite a crushing material superiority. At the beginning of 1964, the option of using aerial bombardment north of the 17th parallel as well as American land forces in the South seemed the only possible solution to General Westmoreland.

In the spring of 1964, President Johnson, Secretary of Defense McNamara, and Secretary of State Dean Rusk launched a graduated escalation of conflict in Vietnam by air and on land. In Laos civil war started again in May between Phoumi Nosavan’s right-wing forces and the Pathet Lao. In Cambodia Norodom Sihanouk remained neutral. Naval provocations by the Americans and South Vietnamese and the ensuing incidents in the Tonkin Gulf on August 2 and 4 allowed the Johnson administration to obtain the agreement of Congress to directly enter the war, without a war declaration. After Johnson’s reelection in November, a continuous bombing campaign was launched on North Vietnam following the NLF attack against the American air base at Pleiku on February 7, 1965.

On March 8, the first battalions of Marines arrived at Da Nang. The US not only assumed leadership of the war, but also took over the administration of South Vietnam. The government army was defeated at Bin Gia in late May and, after a final coup d’état on July 11, 1965, the regime of General Nguyen Van Thieu and Vice-President Nguyen Cao Ky was installed. The new regime was quickly discredited. It was a brutal and repressive police state, corrupt and inefficient.

Its army of 968,000 men in 1970 was ineffective, and the regime never became more than a semi-military dictatorship under the façade of the 1967 constitution.

Without no popular support for the government and a cruel police state in place, PLA guerilla operations expanded throughout the South. In the presidential elections of September 3, 1967, even with massive fraud, Thieu and Ky managed reelection with only 35 percent of the vote. The opposition candidate Truong Dinh Dzu, an attorney and almost unknown Buddhist partisan, received 17 percent of the vote, and was imprisoned the following year.

Never had there been such a great disparity of material forces in any revolution. However great the military advantage of the Americans, the disparity had potentially dangerous consequences. The military advantage only prolonged the war for the US, according to a war hypothesis that the Twelfth Plenum of the Central Committee of December 1965 secretly examined and adopted. The war hypothesis was close to the victorious experience of the “people’s war” against France.

Four factors bear out the hypothesis of the prolonged war. First, the US was immediately overwhelmed by the relentless escalation of the war, being forced to engage more troops for a hypothetical quick victory that never arrived. Certainly Westmoreland’s tactic of attrition – a combination of bombings and massive land offensives by the American army which grew to 536,000 men in 1968 – succeeded in stabilizing the military situation in the South in the second half of 1965. But the US plan did not lead to reconquest or a regaining of the military initiative, in particular because of the temporary return of the South Vietnamese PLA to a guerilla strategy.

In June–July 1965, the first protests appeared in large American universities. Global opposition to the American war, encouraged by the subtle attitude of openness of Hô Chi Minh, the DRV, and the leaders of the NLF, grew incessantly, seriously hampering the initiatives of the Johnson and Nixon administrations. The cost of the US war reached 13.5 percent of the federal budget. After 1966, demonstrations against the war multiplied and fatigue settled in among the majority of Americans, particularly among professors and young people, who became hostile to the continued intervention in Vietnam. As opposition grew in the US, demoralization began to increase among troops engaged in the war.

Second, the theory of the “war as example” for the Third World lost much of its point with the anti-communist coup d’état of October 2, 1965 in Indonesia. The break of the Peking (Beijing)-Jakarta axis, the return of Indonesia into the western camp, and the Cultural Revolution (1965–9) considerably weakened China’s capacity for foreign engagement, and in fact demonstrated the success of the anti-communist “containment” strategy in Southeast Asia. Military disengagement was therefore possible, increasing internal opposition to the war.

Third, both the Soviet Union and China remained supporters of the DRV and NLF, although they remained rivals as the Vietnamese refused to choose between them, a position Hô Chi Minh defended until his death in 1969. Vietnam finally leaned toward the Soviet Union only after Henry Kissinger’s trip to China in 1969. However, the Chinese provided the DRV with rice, medicines, light and heavy arms, and ground-to-air missiles. The assistance was used with maximum discipline by the DRV and NLF, unlike American aid to South Vietnam, which was frequently squandered. From 1965 to 1969, China provided logistical support and air defense as far as the 21st parallel, with some 80,000 Chinese soldiers and two anti-air divisions protecting the North from economic blockade.

Finally, popular resistance in the DRV, stimulated by the party and its mass organizations, galvanized support for the idea of democratization and unification of the country. These political ideas were so firmly entrenched that no opposing ideas could reverse them. US bombardment did not break the morale of the North. From 1965 to 1968, 212,000 US Air Force operations dropped 425,000 tons of bombs on the DRV, and over a million tons of bombs were dropped from 1965 to 1973. The bombings disrupted DRV transportation and basic public services, and slowed the deployment of troops and equipment to the Southern fronts through the Hô Chi Minh Trail. But despite the bombing, North Vietnam held. As bombs continued to fall, hundred of thousands of women and men repaired destroyed infrastructure, buildings, ports, railroads, bridges, roads, trails, and ferry-boats. The infiltration of material and troops from the North to the South via the Hô Chi Minh

Between January 30 and September 23, 1968, Viet Cong forces and the North Vietnamese Army launched a massive military campaign against the forces of the Republic of Vietnam. This campaign, later known as the Tet Offensive, marked a turning point in the Vietnam War. A female Viet Cong soldier is seen here in action with an anti-tank gun during fighting in southern Cuu Long delta. (AFP/Getty Images)

Trail continued, mitigating potential difficulties in local recruitment to the PLA. After 1966, the NLF was forced to institute conscription and provisions for obligatory work service: in March 1967, 53,000 regular northerners supported some 63,000 soldiers of the PLA, added to which were between 220,000 and 280,000 regional guerillas and local militiamen. In 1968, the American and South Vietnamese command were still unable to prevail.

The turning point of the war was the striking offensive of the PLA and the PAV (People’s Army of North Vietnam) at Tet in 1968. Its political aim was to subvert American and world opinion. Giap wanted to start a battle by the PAV on the 17th parallel in order to attract American forces there rather than organizing a general uprising in the city of Le Zuan. The battle was that of Khe Sanh on October 10, 1967, in which Westmoreland threw a good part of his forces. This was followed by an attack on the cities by the PLA and the NLF, with the PAV kept in reserve. This attack was to be followed by a general uprising in the South. The attack on tens of cities started on January 31, 1968. Except for Saigon, where the PLA reached the US embassy, and in Hue, where fighting extended for weeks and where 2,500 functionaries of the regime were liquidated, the Tet Offensive was a serious military failure – almost half the leaders of the NLF were killed or captured, considerably weakening the PLA – but a real political success.

American carpet bombing of the cities caused colossal civilian losses. The passivity of the army of the South – saved only by American troops – and the futility of the escalation were now demonstrated in the US, opening up the perspective to American public opinion of a war without end. The political effect of the offensive was thus largely attained: on March 31, in a televised speech, Johnson proposed negotiations with the DRV, which were quickly accepted. The Conference of Paris began on May 13 involving all the parties – the DRV, United States, South Vietnam, and the NLF, with the aim of finding a formula for the military withdrawal of the US.

The “Vietnamization” of the conflict invented by Nixon, who had been elected president in November 1968, and his secretary of state Henry Kissinger involved restoring functionality to the Southern army and the ARV and stabilizing the Saigon regime: a Sisyphean task. There was never any question that the Vietnamese communists would yield to the intransigency of Nguyen Van Thieu’s regime or to the determination of Nixon and Kissinger to strengthen it by forcing them to renounce reunification.

The DRV and the NLF demanded a ceasefire, an American withdrawal, Thieu’s resignation, and a coalition government in the South to prepare for reunification in the long term. NLF militants established two organizations to rally democratic and neutral opinion in the South: the Alliance of National Democratic Forces and Peace, headed by a former minister of Bao Dai in 1945, Me Trinh Dinh Thao, and the Revolutionary Provisional Government (RPG), formed in July 1969 with representatives of the Alliance and the NLF. The proposed formula of political rule was supported by world opinion.

While world opinion was essential for the leaders of Vietnamese communism, it did not influence their position. After the failure of the 1968 uprising and the weakening of the NLF, the CIA, with the assistance of the Southern police, had between 1968 and 1972 assassinated 20,000 local executives of NLF through the Phoenix Plan. The only strategy open to the NLF from that point was that of a classic war, carefully prepared by the reinforcement of the PAV in heavy Soviet tanks and artillery, to be used after the withdrawal of the American troops. Troops began to withdraw in June 1969 and by late 1971 only 157,000 American soldiers remained, falling to 24,200 by the end of 1972, when the American command ceased effective operations in Vietnam.

“Vietnamization” was predicated on four risky wagers: (1) the reduction of foreign aid to the DRV and the exploitation of the Sino-Soviet conflict; (2) the application of real agrarian reform in the South in 1970; (3) the transfer of considerable firepower to the Southern army; and (4) the deliberate extension of the aerial and land war to Cambodia and Laos to destroy the PLA’s logistical system in the north and any bases remaining on the Vietnamese–Cambodian border. This was a departure from the policy of the Johnson administration, which had respected the Cambodian neutrality of Sihanouk.

Of these wagers, only the first was successful: the rapprochement between the US and China following Nixon’s trip to Peking in February 1972 and China’s admission to the UN in October translated into an effective reduction of Chinese support and, consequently, Soviet aid to Hanoi, as well as greater pressure on the Vietnamese to accept a diplomatic solution. The Chinese feared the success of Soviet hegemony in Southeast Asia more than they supported the weakening of American regional power.

The other wagers, however, failed. In the US, the peace movement increased public pressure to end the war, reinforced by the Watergate scandal of June 1971. On December 22 Congress prohibited the use of land troops and American counselors in Cambodia and Laos. But the relative improvement in the fighting capability of the South Vietnamese army and its influence on the ground achieved nothing other than to reinforce the DRV’s determination to win. Furthermore, the last of the American military’s major initiatives in the peninsula ended badly. Finally, the disastrous failure of the invasion of Southern Laos by two South Vietnamese divisions on August 2–3, 1971 allowed the Pathet Lao to reinforce its military operations in the east of the country.

In Cambodia, the fragility of the Khmer Republic proclaimed on September 10 after the coup d’état by Lon Nol and his army, with the assistance of the US, had serious implications for America. The destruction of Vietnamese bases in Cambodian territory proved to be impossible: the American–South Vietnamese offensives of May 1970 and February 1971 managed only to displace PAV and NLF bases to the west. But the extension of the war to Cambodia exacerbated the agrarian crisis and created social destabilization, which coincided with the emergence of a new national Indochinese communism among a small segment of Khmer society that was radical in its terrorist leanings.

The “Easter offensive” of March 30 to June 8, 1972 toward Hue, the last to be organized by Vo Nguyen Giap before he was supplanted by General Van Tien Zung, was a repeat of the strategy implemented at Tet in 1968, demonstrating once more the frailty of the South Vietnam army (with 20,000 desertions per month), which was only rescued by repeated bombings north of the 17th parallel. But the PAV was forced to retreat, leaving 100,000 dead on the battlefield, and in the South the regime remained intact. In September, the DRV renounced its call for the resignation of Nguyen Van Thieu, forming the basis of a temporary compromise negotiated by Kissinger and Le Duc Tho.

After the “Christmas bombing” of December 18, 1972 throughout North Vietnam to forestall North Vietnamese violation of the accord, the Paris Accords of January 27, 1973 provided for the total retreat of American forces, the maintenance of PAV and NLF troops in enclaves they occupied in the South, and the administration of the latter by the RPG. The Council of Reconciliation and Concord was created to organize free elections in South Vietnam, and the government was to negotiate a long-term peaceful reunification with the DRV. Finally, there was to be a financial contribution by the US to the reconstruction of the DRV and the whole of Indochina. In Laos, a similar treaty was concluded between Prince Souvanna Phouma and the Pathet Lao on February 20, and a government of national union was constituted on April 5, 1974.

In Cambodia, where the PAV refused to evacuate its bases, fighting between the Khmer Rouge and the Khmer Republic of Lon Nol continued after February 9, with heavy American aerial bombardment of densely populated regions (in six months, the US Air Force dropped more bombs on Cambodia than on Japan during the whole of World War II). Approximately 1.5 million refugees – out of 6.5 million inhabitants – migrated to the cities. Nevertheless, in the spring of 1973, the Khmer Rouge battalions defeated Lon Nol’s army.

On July 1, 1973, Congress prohibited American participation in operations on the whole peninsula from August 15: this marked the US’s definitive withdrawal from the long Indochinese War. The way was virtually clear for the victory of Indochinese communists. It was not long in coming. It occurred first in Cambodia where Lon Nol’s regime proved itself incapable of defeating the Khmer Rouge guerillas – themselves directly supported by both China and the North Vietnamese.

In Vietnam, discussions between Hanoi, the NLF, and the Saigon government came to a dead end. In the South, the reduction of American credit and the departure of the US Army brought social disintegration. In the cities half of the active population was unemployed. After the Paris Accords nearly a million more refugees left for urban areas, three-figure inflation ravaged cities and the countryside, tens of thousands of soldiers deserted, and corruption was denounced by the Catholic clergy. As communist troops were strengthened in an effort to wear down the opposition in the territory, the regime reached the final stages of self-destruction.

In Hanoi in December 1974, the Party’s Political Bureau decided to launch a test attack for January some 70 kilometers northwest of Saigon. The province of Phuoc Long fell in 15 days. In the second offensive on March 9, Ban Me Thuot in Central Vietnam was taken in three days. Hanoi then launched the “Hô Chi Minh Campaign.” Under the assault of columns of armed tanks, the Southern army collapsed.

The decisive military event was the taking of Da Nang on March 29. America did not intervene: “For the US, the Vietnam War is over,” pronounced President Ford on April 23, to applause from a student audience. Hanoi rejected a late French proposal to form a transitional government headed by General Duong Van Minh. Nguyen Van Thieu resigned in time for the North to transmit a radio order to capitulate on April 30, while the reinforced tanks of North Vietnamese General Tran Van Tra surrounded the presidential palace.

SEE ALSO: Cambodia, Anti-Colonial Protests, 1863–1945; Cambodia, Communist Protests and Revolution; Cambodia, Rebellion against France; Hô Chi Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh) (1890–1969); Le Duan (1908–1986); Sihanouk, Norodom (b. 1922); Souphanouvong, Prince (1909–1995); Vietnam, Anti-Colonial, Nationalist, and Communist Movements, 1900–1939;

Vietnam, First Indochina War, 1945–1954; Vietnam, Protests, 1975–1993; Vo Nguyen Giap (b. 1911)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bizot, F. (2000) Le Portail. Paris: Editions de la Table Ronde.
- Boudarel, G. (1991) Cent Fleurs écloses dans la nuit du Vietnam. Paris: Jean Bertoin.
- Brocheux, P. (Ed.) (1981) L'Asie du sud-est. Révoltes, réformes, révolutions. Lille: Presses Universitaires de Lille.
- Brocheux, P. (1995) The Mekong Delta: Ecology, Economy and Revolution, 1860–1960. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Brocheux, P. (2003) Ho Chi Minh. Paris: Payot.
- Brocheux, P. & Hémery, D. (2001) Indochine, la colonisation ambiguë (1858–1954), 2nd ed. Paris: La Découverte.
- Bui Tin (1995) Following Ho Chi Minh: Memoirs of a Vietnamese Colonel. London: Hart.
- Cesari, L. (1995) L'Indochine en guerres, 1945–1993. Paris: Belin.
- Devillers, P. (1952) Histoire du Viêt-Nam de 1940 à 1952. Paris: Le Seuil.
- Duiker, W. J. (1995) Sacred War: Nationalism and Revolution in a Divided Vietnam. New York: McGraw Hill.
- Duiker, W. J. (2000) Ho Chi Minh. New York: Hyperion Press.
- Fall, B. (1960) Le Viet-Minh, La République Démocratique du Viêt-Nam, 1945–1960. Paris: Colin.
- Hémery, D. (1990) Hô Chi Minh. De l'Indochine au Vietnam. Paris: Gallimard.
- Hy Van Luong (1992) Revolution in the Village: Tradition and Transformation in North Vietnam, 1925–1988. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.
- Lockhart, G. (1989) Nations in Arms: The Origins of the People's Army of Vietnam. Sydney: Allen & Unwin.
- Mus, P. (1952) Vietnam. Sociologie d'une guerre. Paris: Le Seuil.
- Nguyen Van Ky (1995) La Société vietnamienne face à la modernité. Le Tonkin de la fin du XIXe siècle à la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Paris: L'Harmattan.
- Qiang Zhai (2000) China and Vietnam Wars, 1950–1975. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Quinn-Judge, S. (2003) Hô Chi Minh: The Missing Years. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Smith, R. (1983, 1965, 1986) An International History of the War of Vietnam, 3 vols. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Turley, W. (1980) Vietnamese Communism in Comparative Perspective. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Woodside, A. B. (1976) Community and Revolution in Modern Vietnam. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

Translated by Marcelline Block

Vietnam protests, 1975–1993

Daniel Hémery

On May 1, 1975, the day after the North Vietnamese entered Saigon, Khmer Rouge troops launched their first incursions into the Vietnamese islands of the Gulf of Siam. This third Indochinese War, the first between the communist states, posed a new political and military problem throughout Southeast Asia: who would succeed the US and France as the new regional hegemonic power? The reunification of Vietnam under a communist regime had immediately raised the question of the reorganization of the Indochinese peninsula.

For the People's Republic of China (PRC), which had always considered Indochina its "natural" sphere of influence, the issue was to prevent Vietnam, which supported the USSR after the Sino-American rapprochement, from succeeding the US as the dominant power in Southeast Asia. For the USSR, on the other hand, maintaining Vietnamese hegemony in the peninsula was a strategic necessity for several reasons, primarily to contain China's growing influence.

The four adversaries in the third Indochinese War formed two main alliances between 1975 and 1978: Cambodia and the People's Republic (linked by a secret military accord of February 6, 1976, followed on February 24, 1977 by the non-renewal of Chinese aid to Vietnam) against Vietnam and the USSR (through a treaty of friendship of November 3, 1978), together with the Soviet allies and the countries of the socialist camp. For US President Carter and his ally Thailand, the conflict between PRC-supported Cambodia and Soviet-supported Vietnam was an obvious gift for their triangular relationship with the two rival communist powers, and had the additional advantage of getting rid of the communist guerillas of Southeast Asia. Diplomatic relations established between the US and China on December 15, 1978 indirectly benefited Thailand and the defeated Khmer Rouge forces.

In April 1978 the first Khmer military units in Vietnam were set up among the refugees, often former Khmer Rouge threatened by the Pol Pot regime, and in December formed a political front allied to the Vietnamese, the Kampuchean United Front for National Salvation (KUFNS).

The war, which had so far remained at the border, reached a brief but decisive conclusion with the offensive of the PAV (People's Army of North Vietnam) on December 25, 1978, ending the genocidal Khmer Rouge revolution. Phnom Penh fell on January 7, 1979, and in three weeks the Khmer Rouge regime collapsed.

The historical project of the Vietnamese communists to build a unified nation-state and forge a path toward socialism had been put on hold by a third of a century of war. Subjected to an American embargo that lasted until February 1994 and blocked from international investment, the population was living in destitution: between 1960 and 1975, two million had been killed, five million wounded, and ten million displaced. In the South, the import economy financed by American credit collapsed. The reconstruction of the devastated country seemed to offer a unique opportunity for implanting socialism based on the post-Stalinist Soviet model.

From 1975 to 1977, after the military conquest of South Vietnam, the structure of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (DRV) was imposed with some minor adaptations. The immediate reunification of Vietnam was proclaimed on July 2, 1976 with the establishment of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam (SRV). The fourth Congress of the Communist Party of Vietnam (CPV) of December 1976 planned to increase agricultural production and accelerate industrialization through the nationalization of the economy, with massive financial and technical assistance from the USSR and other Comecon (Council for Mutual Economic Assistance) countries. In the North, cooperatives were reorganized, concentrated in large units and managed on a district scale.

The collectivization of agriculture promulgated by the Saigon regime in 1970 initiated huge transformations. Over the medium term the state planned for the internal migration of part of the urban population and peasantry in the overpopulated deltas of the North and the Center toward the New Economic Zones of the Mekong Delta, the high plateaus of the Center, and the mountainous areas of the North, displacing approximately 3.6 million people from 1975 to 1989. This revolutionary transformation of society was accomplished by grafting the much more diversified social formation of South Vietnam onto the North and extending communist administrative bureaucracy throughout the country. Several hundred thousand leaders (can bo) from the North took hold of the South and the country's largest city, Saigon, which was renamed Hô Chi Minh City. In 1975 a relentless police campaign began in the South that sent between 500,000 and 1 million people to "reeducation" camps for prolonged internment. The operation lasted for a decade and aimed to prevent the development of political opposition.

In 1975, the majority of the population was disposed to reconciliation, and protest was primarily passive. Opponents who had the financial means fled the country. Between 1975 and 1985, from 1 to 2 million "boat people" of all social origins, predominantly middle class and educated elites, left the country illegally, with approximately 100,000 a year heading for refugee camps on the Thai border, Hong Kong, the US, Europe, Australia, or non-communist countries in Asia. By its sheer visibility, the exodus had world repercussions, destroying the immense sympathy the Vietnamese communists had accumulated as well as hopes for a new form of communism after the experience of Soviet Stalinism and the Chinese Cultural Revolution.

The Vietnamese peasantry, integral to the communist victory, forced the regime to change its project. In 1978–9, in the South and increasingly in the North, resistance to collectivization, the killing of cattle, peasants' withdrawal to individual plots of land, and underproductivity in the collective units led to a food catastrophe, aggravated by the effects of a demographic explosion. Food shortages increased as the parallel private market was extended. Production then seemed to improve, but crisis returned with the missed monetary reform of 1985 followed by inflation of more than 400 percent a year at the beginning of 1989. Partial famines occurred in 11 provinces in the North and peasant demonstrations erupted (notably in November 1988 in the South), encouraged by groups of former resisters. The CPV could no longer guarantee to feed the people. Another decisive factor in the failure of the Vietnamese communist project was the inability of the PAV to end Khmer Rouge guerilla actions in Cambodia. Added to this were the costs of political and military tension with China, then, in 1991, the suspension of Soviet financial assistance – at least $21 billion from 1978 to 1986. Ten years after victory, the legitimacy of the communist regime in Vietnam was under threat.

Divided between pragmatic and conservative reformers, the CPV leadership in 1979 opted for partial reform, including establishing family contracts in the cooperatives, restoring small family production, and free markets. Internal pressure, the end of Soviet communism, and the successful adoption of market socialism in China from 1976 triggered a debate within the CPV over its future strategy. At its sixth party congress in December 1986, the party opted for a completely new course: doi moi (renovation).

The historical transformation accomplished in one decade redefined the tacit pact between the party-state and society. Through the progressive acceptance of market reforms, specific and carefully controlled measures were taken to govern the rules of operation of the open market. The country was opened up to large enterprises and foreign investors and the Vietnamese economy became part of the globalized world.

From 1986 to 1995 new policies were established, including the decollectivization of land and a return to small-scale family farming, freedom of trade, and the deregulation of prices governing agricultural and artisanal products. The system of administered industrial prices was abandoned and direct state management of the country's 5,800 enterprises was ended. The state developed an increasingly wide sector of collective local enterprises and private firms that were opened up to foreign investment, especially to multinational Asian companies. The state created tax-free zones, drastically reduced customs tariffs, and adopted a monetary system, including a floating rate of exchange (1991), reduction of interest rates, and radical budget stabilization.

Vietnam's neoliberal policies opened the way to linkages with the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF), unblocking international investment. Vietnam emerged as a low-cost industrial producer, as did Cambodia and Laos. These developments led to the peaceful evacuation in 1989 of Vietnamese troops from Cambodia through the Paris Peace Treaty of October 23, 1991. The admission to ASEAN (Association of Southeast Asian Nations) of all three countries marked the end of their international isolation. On January 11, 2007, Vietnam became a member of the World Trade Organization (WTO).

These transformations indicated a historical rupture in the Indochinese peninsula, which had been a major center of revolutionary action and communist thought for more than 50 years. In contemporary Vietnam, doi moi and market socialism have replaced the planned economy without leading to major crisis, due to the fact that peasant agriculture is now entirely private (in 1997, food availability increased to 398 kilos per capita). Through its "green revolution," Vietnam is a leading exporter of rice, coffee, and rubber, facilitated by massive foreign investment.

The decline of the peasant class has opened up a cycle of industrialization in Vietnam that is equivalent to the current industrial development of China, and it is a major producer of textiles, shoes, crude oil, and more recently electronics due to the low cost of labor. After China, Vietnam has the highest growth rate of Eastern Asia (an annual average of 7.5 percent since 1996, 8.1 percent in 2006) and is the central pole of development in the vast zone known as the Greater Mekong. Its economy is one of the most dynamic in the world. Foreign investment grew to 45 percent in 2005, with exports totaling $5.5 billion. The United States has become Vietnam's largest market.

From 1945 to 2006, Vietnam's population increased nearly fourfold from 23 million to 84 million, and is expected to exceed 100 million by 2020. Meanwhile, the country is becoming increasingly urbanized. In 2006, Hô Chi Minh City grew to 10 million inhabitants, and socio-economic polarization is expanding. A large proportion of the population lives in poverty, and the country's public sector is collapsing. Even with the recent growth of Vietnam's GDP per capita, the country is among the poorest in the world. A new class of private and public contractors has emerged, benefiting from the growth in corruption in the regional and national bureaucracy. These developments have also come at the cost of ecological disaster. Forests declined from 13.5 million hectares in 1943 to 9.2 million in 1995, and there are huge imbalances in regional development. The urban region of Hô Chi Minh City furnished 58 percent of industrial production in 2006.

SEE ALSO: Cambodia, Anti-Colonial Protests, 1863–1945; Cambodia, Communist Protests and Revolution; Cambodia, Rebellion against France; Hô Chi Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh) (1890–1969); Vietnam, Anti-Colonial, Nationalist, and Communist Movements, 1900–1939; Vietnam, First Indochina War, 1945–1954; Vietnam, Protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974; Vo Nguyen Giap (b. 1911)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bizot, F. (2000) Le Portail. Paris: Editions de la Table Ronde.
- Brocheux, P. (Ed.) (1981) L'Asie du sud-est. Révoltes, réformes, révolutions. Lille: Presses Universitaires de Lille.
- Chandler, D. P. (1991) The Tragedy of Cambodia History: Politics, War and Revolution since 1945. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Chandler, D. P. (1992) A History of Cambodia. Oxford: Allen & Unwin.
- Chandler, D. P. (1993) Pol Pot: Frère Numéro Un. Paris: Plon.
- Chandler, D. P., Kiernan, B., & Boua, C. (1988) Pol Pot Plans the Future: Confidential Documents from Democratic Kampuchea, 1976–1977. New Haven: Yale University Southeast Asian Monograph 33.
- Duiker, W. J. (1995) Sacred War: Nationalism and Revolution in a Divided Vietnam. New York: McGraw Hill.
- Heder, S. & Ledgerwood, J. (1966) Propaganda, Politics and Violence in Cambodia. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe.
- Hy Van Luong (1992) Revolution in the Village: Tradition and Transformation in North Vietnam, 1925–1988. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.
- Kiernan, B. (1985) How Pol Pot Came to Power. London: Verso.
- Kiernan, B. (1998) Le Génocide au Cambodge, 1975–1979: Race, idéologie et pouvoir. Paris: Gallimard.
- Locard, H. (1996) Le Petit Livre rouge de Pol Pot ou les paroles de l'Angkar. Paris: L'Harmattan.
- Ponchaud, F. (1998) Cambodge, année zero. Paris: Kailash.
- Scott, J. C. (1976) The Moral Economy of the Peasant: Rebellion and Subsistence in Southeast Asia. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Smith, R. (1983, 1965, 1986) An International History of the War of Vietnam, 3 vols. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Stuart-Fox, M. (1986) Laos: Politics, Economics and Society. London: Pinter.
- Stuart-Fox, M. (1997) A History of Laos. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Translated by Marcelline Block

Villa, Pancho (ca. 1878–1923) and the division of the North

Janet E. McClellan

The early life and times of Francisco “Pancho” Villa are shrouded in mystery and little is known of his past except that he was born Doreoteo Arango in San Juan del Rio in the state of Durango around 1878. His father was Agustín Arango, and his family was extremely poor. It was said that at the age of 17 he killed his sister’s rapist, the landowner’s son on the ranch where he and his family worked. He went into hiding, became a bandit, and assumed the name the world would come to know him by. In 1912, during the Mexican Revolution, Villa joined the federal troops under General Victoriano Huerta and enjoyed the rank of honorary brigadier-general. But Huerta feared him and his successes in battle and had him falsely charged with an infraction and sentenced to death. President Madero commuted his sentence to imprisonment, which he served until his escape in 1913. Villa lived in Texas until the assassination of revolutionary President Madero.

In assessing the Mexican Revolution, most urban intellectuals of Mexico City regarded both Villa and his associate Emiliano Zapata as primitives but favored Villa over Zapata. Villa was considered faithful to Madero, while Zapata renounced Madero and continued his war against the haciendas. Villa’s public image included tales of his cruelties, womanizing, volatile temperament, and audacity in battle. When Madero became president, Villa enjoyed the support of the public as the military strategist and defender of the revolutionary regime.

After Madero’s assassination, Villa joined the Constitutionalist Army and became the head of the División del Norte (North Division). His popularity increased amongst the populace as the indomitable campaigner in the war. Many citizens believed that he was a friend of the poor and a true revolutionary, but his popularity hinged on the tales of his exploits, military victories, and explosive temperament. He was a larger-than-life figure of popular imagination and fascination.

Villa, as ranking member of the military and popular campaigner, recognized General Carranza as the leader of the Constitutionalist-supported revolution. However, he was aware of his popular support and its ability to translate into political power and therefore stipulated that delegates from the many revolutionary armies arrange a democratic presidential election and set up a new government to ensure the well-being of workers, their economic emancipation, and equitable distribution of land. Although he conceded the stipulations, Carranza was not in favor of reforms protecting the indigenous people. Thus, in mid-1914 Zapata and Villa entered Mexico City and secured the capital.

During the Mexican Revolution Emiliano Zapata (1879–1919) (right) and Pancho Villa (ca. 1878–1923) (left) were military leaders in the Mexican Revolution. Villa fought for agrarian reform and the establishment of communal land rights for Mexico’s indigenous population. Here, Villa and Zapata gather with a group of soldiers on January 2, 1915. (Getty Images)

Villa was forced out of Mexico City in 1915, following a number of violent incidents involving citizens, himself, and his troops. Additionally, the return of Carranza and the Constitutionals to Mexico City from Veracruz followed and Villa rebelled against Carranza. Villa’s military prowess seemed to have faded as he lost various skirmishes and a major battle against the Constitutionals. With supplies running low, Villa sought out American arms dealers. On March 16, 1916 Villa ordered his troops to make a cross-border attack against the community of Columbus, New Mexico as a response to being cheated by arms dealers within the community. The attack on American soil resulted in United States President Woodrow Wilson sending 6,000 troops under the command of General John J. Pershing into Mexico to pursue Villa and his raiders. Villa was then pursued by the US army and the Mexican Constitutionals army under the direction of President Carranza. Over the next four years Villa eluded capture but was reduced from the engagements of military tactics to those of a guerilla force commander. In 1920, Villa negotiated peace with Mexican President Adolfo de la Huerta and went into retirement. He was assassinated on the morning of July 20, 1923 in the town of Parra, Chihuahua. The assassins were never captured.

SEE ALSO: Mexican Revolution of 1910–1921; Zapata, Emiliano (1879–1919) and the Comuna Morelense

References and Suggested Readings

- Brunk, S. (1995) Emiliano Zapata: Revolution and Betrayal in Mexico. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press.
- Hodges, D. C. & Ross, G. (2002) Mexico, the end of the Revolution. Westport, CT: Praeger.
- Krauze, E. (1997) Mexico: Biography of Power: A History of Modern Mexico, 1810–1996. New York: HarperCollins.
- O’Malley, V. (1986) The Myth of the Revolution: Hero Cults and the Institutionalization of the Mexican State, 1920–1940. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.

Vinegar Hill/Castle Hill Rebellion, 1804

Andrew Moore

Unlike the Eureka rebellion at Ballarat, Victoria in 1854, Australian historians have been slow to recognize the 1804 convict revolt near present-day Castle Hill in western Sydney as a legitimate expression of political resistance. Established in 1788, the fledgling British colony of New South Wales was then a place of penal servitude, small and isolated, but with a significant component of political rebels among its convict population. In the wake of the 1798 rebellion in Ireland at least 300 and probably more than 600 United Irishmen were transported to the infant thief colony. As a result New South Wales had a strong undercurrent of republicanism and a persistent anti-authoritarianism to British rule. On March 5, 1804 about 200 convicts, principally Irishmen, confronted the NSW Corps at Vinegar Hill, thus named after a battle in the 1798 rebellion. According to Patrick O’Farrell, the Irish were led to rebel by semi-mystical impulses, “frustrations, sickness of heart, and impulses of affront: in a word pride.” Lynette Ramsay Silver also implies that the rebels were merely homesick romantics.

More recently historians Ann-Maree Whitaker and Ruan O’Donnell have recognized the political imperatives that shaped the rebellion. In large part the Irish rebels were fired by news arriving in the colony of Robert Emmett’s uprising in Dublin in 1803. United by the rallying call “Death or Liberty (and) a Boat Home,” their aspiration was to return to Dublin to assist their country in overthrowing its colonialist oppressor.

Convict uprising at Castle Hill, 1804 (watercolor, National Library of Australia). Major Johnston, with Quartermaster Laycock and 25 privates of the New South Wales Corps, defeat 266 armed rebels, March 5, 1804. The uprising of Irish prisoners against the British colonial administration, led by convicts Philip Cunningham and William Johnston, ended with more than 100 rebels killed. (National Library of Australia, Rex Nan Kivell Collection NK10162)

In as much as the rebels had a leader, that person was Phil Cunningham. A Clonmel United Irishman, Cunningham was a hardened revolutionary. A stonemason and republican in Clonmel, he was regarded as “an articulate man who moved in high social circles.” During the 1798 rebellion it is probable he helped coordinate the United Irish insurgency in the Clonmel district, perhaps holding the rank of captain. In 1799 Cunningham was involved in rescuing prisoners and conducting arms raids. Captured and charged with sedition at Clonmel on October 9–11, 1799, a legal technicality caused the death sentence to be commuted to transportation to Botany Bay for life. In 1800 he was placed aboard the Anne, the third transport to carry rebel prisoners to New South Wales, on which he became one of the leaders of a shipboard mutiny. Cunningham was dispatched to Norfolk Island, a place of secondary detention even more forbidding than “Botany Bay.” However, because his skills as a stonemason were needed in New South Wales, he did not stay there long. Assigned to duties in the government farming settlement at Castle Hill, Cunningham ultimately became the overseer of government stonemasons. Cunningham’s rebellious spirit was not expunged. With the fellow Anne convict Conor Sheehan, in October 1802 Cunningham tried to abscond, seeking to join a departing French vessel. They did not get far. Both were apprehended in nearby Parramatta and received 100 lashes.

In 1804 Cunningham was reputedly building his own stone home but, like many of his comrades, was greatly excited when the news of Emmett’s uprising arrived on a whaling ship, the Ferrett, on January 22, 1804. Six weeks later, on March 4, he became the principal leader of the Irish rebels and uttered the republican battle cry, “Death or Liberty.” After addressing his followers at Toongabbie’s Constitution Hill, Cunningham dispatched several columns of men to obtain guns and reinforcements prior to the planned attacks on Parramatta and Port Jackson. The tactics used by the United Irishmen in 1798 – massing centrally controlled forces on high ground sites – were again deployed.

After limited skirmishes and several successful raids in the Seven Hills/Pennant Hills areas, on March 5 George Johnston of the NSW Corps staged a tactical coup by quickly taking the battle to the rebels. Cunningham and his colleagues, William Johnston and Samuel Hume, two Protestant United Irishmen from the north of Ireland, had expected more of a lull in which to rally their troops. They sought a ceasefire. Johnston initially agreed, but then reneged, ordering his troops to open fire. The rebels were largely without ammunition and soon scattered. Estimates of the numbers of casualties vary. O’Donnell suggests that 30 rebels were killed. In 2004 the “official” Vinegar Hill Bicentenary view was that 15 rebels died. Martial law was declared for the first time in Australian history. Nine of the rebel leaders were hanged. A similar number were flogged. Dozens more were sent to Van Diemen’s Land (Tasmania) or Coal River, working the coal mines beneath Fort Scratchley, thus founding the city of Newcastle. The event O’Donnell styles “the most serious insurrectionary challenge directed against the Australian state” was over.

Typically, there is debate about what happened to Cunningham. One tradition has it that during the ceasefire negotiations with Johnston, a certain Lieutenant Laycock struck Cunningham with his rifle or shot him in the back, either the blow or the bullet killing him. Another tradition has it that Cunningham initially escaped, perhaps wounded, but was captured on a patrol later that night or early on the morning of March 6, whereupon he was taken to the Hawkesbury and hanged in a storehouse. It might be that the two theories can be married. Given early nineteenth-century notions of exemplary justice, it is possible that Laycock did kill Cunningham, and the gibbeting of his body followed in order to show all the other cropy boys that the state would brook no further dissent. As part of the Bicentennial commemorations of Vinegar Hill in 2004, a historic marker was unveiled on the site of the 1803 Government Store in Windsor, the site of Cunningham's hanging.

The effect of the state repression was salutary. Vinegar Hill extinguished the dying embers of rebelliousness among the Irish convicts, at least in terms of their willingness to take up arms. The fighting of 1798 was at last over, though the United Irish rebel traditions lived on in New South Wales through the transmission of revolutionary methodology and the creation of a radical Irish subculture. Subsequently enjoying the patronage of Governor Lachlan Macquarie, the Irish rebels excelled in other areas, in commerce, surveying, construction, and exploration, and later formed the backbone of the Catholic Church in the colony.

SEE ALSO: Emmet, Robert (1778–1803) and Emmet's Rebellion; Eureka Stockade; Kelly, Edward "Ned" (1855–1880) and the Kelly Gang; Ireland, Great Rebellion, 1798; Lalor, Peter (1827–1889); United Irishmen

References and Suggested Readings

- O'Donnell, R. (1996) "Marked for Botany Bay": The Wicklow United Irishmen and the Development of Political Transportation from Ireland 1791–1806. PhD thesis, Australian National University.
- O'Donnell, R. (1998) Philip Cunningham: Clonmel's Insurgent leader of 1798. Tipperary Historical Journal 17: 150–7.
- O'Donnell, R. (2003) "Liberty or Death": The United Irishmen in New South Wales 1800–4. In T. Bartlett, D. Dickson, D. Keogh, & K. Whelan (Eds.), 1798: A Bicentenary Perspective. Dublin: Four Courts Press, pp. 607–19.
- O'Farrell, P. (1987) The Irish in Australia. Sydney: New South Wales University Press.
- Moore, A. (1998) An "Indelible Hibernian Mark"? Irish Rebels and Australian Labour Radicalism: An Historiographical Overview. Labour History 75: 1–8.
- Moore, A. (2004) Phil Cunningham: A Forgotten Irish-Australian Rebel. The Hummer. Available at www.asslh.com/sydney/hummer/vol4no2/cunning.htm.
- Silver, L. R. (1983) The Battle of Vinegar Hill. Sydney: Watermark Press.
- Whitaker, A. (1994) Unfinished Revolution. Sydney: Crossing Press.

Vo Nguyen Giap (b. 1911)

Justin Corfield

Vo Nguyen Giap is considered among the greatest generals of the twentieth century for his involvement in the Vietnamese communist planning of the war against the French, the defeat of the United States, and the invasion of Cambodia that overthrew the Khmer Rouge regime of Pol Pot.

Vo Nguyen Giap was born into a peasant family on August 25, 1911 in the central Vietnamese village of An Xa in Quang Binh province. He had sufficient scholarly connections to attend the Quoc Hoc (National Academy) in Hue, the imperial capital in central Vietnam, where he came into contact with leading opponents of the reimposition of French colonial rule. As a teenager he joined the Tan Viet (New Vietnamese Revolutionary Party) and took part in demonstrations against the French after the death in 1926 of Phan Chu Trinh, a Vietnamese patriot jailed and then exiled to France before being allowed to return to Saigon in 1925. Giap was expelled from the school for participating in the protests.

In 1930 Giap joined the newly created Indochina Communist Party. He was arrested later that year and held in captivity for two years. On his release Giap went to study law at the University of Hanoi. He taught history at the Thang Long School, where he met and married Nguyen Thi Minh Giang, the daughter of Dang Thai Mai, a progressive intellectual, and the sister of Nguyen Thi Minh Khai, the wife of Hồ Chi Minh. By this time Giap had read, and was heavily influenced by, books by Napoleon Bonaparte and the Chinese military theoretician Sun Tzu.

When the Popular Front government came to power in France and conditions changed in Vietnam, Giap was allowed to become a journalist in Hue, founding the paper Le Travail, a French-language journal, and co-authoring a pamphlet, The Peasant Question, with Truong Chinh, a leading communist intellectual. Active in the Viet Minh armed resistance, Giap served under Hồ Chi Minh during World War II and became a commander of the Armed Propaganda Brigade, the precursor of the Vietnamese Liberation Army.

His influence gradually led to his rise to become a member of the Communist Party Politburo and the highest-ranking general in the People's Army of Vietnam.

As an advocate of the Maoist policy of "People's War," Giap led the Vietnamese communists in the First Indochina War. He was a leader in the campaign against the French, culminating in the Battle of Dien Bien Phu in 1954. At that battle Giap was aided by Chinese advisors and followed their plan for a massive artillery barrage to start the attack on the French base, thought to be impregnable. The Vietnamese communists then launched "human wave" attacks resulting in horrendous casualties. While the Chinese advised continued attacks to wear down the French quickly – before the US became involved – Giap decided to conserve his strength, which involved digging trenches around the French lines and gradually tightening the noose. These actions led to the French defeat before the start of the Geneva Conference on Vietnam, and as a result Giap was hailed a military genius. Later interviewed about the battle, he said: "in war there is only one goal, and that is to win."

With the establishment of North Vietnam, Giap was appointed minister of defense, a position he held until 1975, becoming the prime architect of the "armed conflict" by which the North Vietnamese and South Vietnamese communists combined to defeat the United States and South Vietnamese forces, forcing their withdrawal from South Vietnam. As at Dien Bien Phu, Giap believed he had time on his side. As such, he tried to wear down the United States, gradually increasing the number of attacks on the South Vietnamese and the United States forces until the rising number of US casualties spurred an anti-war movement back home. To achieve maximum publicity, with the North Vietnamese army devastated by the Battle of the Ia Drang Valley in January 1968, Giap masterminded the Tet Offensive as the US presidential election began. Although the Tet Offensive was considered a disaster as a military campaign, the insurrection turned public sentiment in the US firmly against the war, leading Richard Nixon, after his election in 1968, to extricate US forces from Vietnam. At the time of the Easter Offensive in 1972, Giap appeared on the front of Time magazine.

Giap remained leader of the communist war effort, which ended in the final defeat of South Vietnam in 1975. Although Giap was officially sidelined soon afterwards, he continued to consult on military matters, particularly the invasion of Pol Pot's Cambodia from late December 1978, culminating a fortnight later in the capture of Phnom Penh on January 6, 1979 and the occupation of 90 percent of the country days after. The ousting of Pol Pot was one of the fastest campaigns in the region in modern times. However, Giap's influence waned, and in 1982 he was dropped from the Politburo and placed in charge of the promotion of science and technology. He lives in retirement in Hanoi, granting occasional interviews to the press, including meeting with the former US Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara in 1995. Giap wrote a number of books about his military ideas. He is hailed as one of the great military geniuses, while remaining despised and feared by opposing forces who were soundly defeated in armed engagements.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Vietnam War Movement, United States; Hô Chi Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh) (1890–1969); Khmer Rouge and Pol Pot; Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Vietnam, Anti-Colonial, Nationalist, and Communist Movements, 1900–1939; Vietnam, First Indochina War, 1945–1954; Vietnam, Protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974

References and Suggested Readings

- Macdonald, P. G. (1993) Giap: The Victor in Vietnam. New York: W. W. Norton.
- O'Neill, R. J. (1969) General Giap: Politician and Strategist. Melbourne: Cassell Australia.
- Simpson, H. R. (1994) Dien Bien Phu: The Epic Battle America Forgot. Washington, DC: Brassey's.
- Vo Nguyen Giap & Van Tien Dung (1976) How We Won the War. Philadelphia: RECON.

Voltaire (1694–1778)

R. O'Brian Carter

Voltaire was the penname of François Marie Arouet. As a writer and philosopher, he was one of the prime movers of the Enlightenment, the revolutionary intellectual movement that exalted reason (as the alternative to religious faith) and progress, and shaped the modern world by promoting the values of human rights, religious toleration, and democracy. Voltaire's primary weapon was his wickedly satirical pen, which he used to advocate social reform, defend civil liberties, and criticize French institutions and the Catholic Church. His voluminous work includes poems, plays, fiction, history, philosophical dialogues, scientific treatises, encyclopedia entries, tracts, pamphlets, and volumes of letters.

Born in Paris to a well-off middle-class family on November 21, 1694, Voltaire harbored resentment toward the French nobility, which refused to accept him as an equal despite his supreme intellectual and artistic achievements. The young man's sensitivity to arbitrary injustice was sharpened when some satirical verses he wrote in 1716 landed him in the Bastille for almost a year. In 1726 when a nobleman, the Chevalier de Rohan, mocked Voltaire's origins, he published an acerbic and witty reply that earned him a beating at the hands of men in the Chevalier's employ. Voltaire's appeals to aristocratic circles for justice backfired. Nonetheless, his antipathy toward the nobility did not mean that he would not have liked to have joined their ranks. He added the aristocratic particle "de" to his chosen pseudonym, signing himself "Arouet de Voltaire" in the early stages of his career, and he spent his final years living in an aristocratic manner at his Ferney estate, where he promoted local industry in the manner of the ideal enlightened nobleman.

French conservatives have long tried to pin the "blame" for the French Revolution on Voltaire, asserting that it was he who started the ideological ball rolling in the revolutionary direction. Voltaire, however, was not a proponent of democracy, nor was he one to foment or even endorse revolt driven by social inequality. When on rare occasions he mentioned "the people" in his writings, his concerns were with the upper tiers of the bourgeoisie, and the educated elite in particular. Protests against social inequality were left to his literary rival, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, whom Voltaire derided for having once served, it seems, as a valet. Voltaire, himself a successful entrepreneur, for the most part supported the social status quo and never strayed from his endorsement of "enlightened monarchy" as the best form of government.

Nonetheless, his long ideological struggle against aristocratic privilege was neither hypocritical nor insincere. His fervent advocacy of reason and religious toleration and his powerful condemnations of bigotry and arbitrary injustice were profoundly revolutionary for the period in which he lived, an age when the strictures of royal censorship were acute. For that reason, a large portion of his work was published anonymously and clandestinely, and he was compelled to spend significant periods in voluntary exile, in England (1726–9), Prussia (1750–2), and Geneva (1754–8). The Ferney estate where he lived for the last two decades of his life was situated on the French border with Switzerland, in case a quick escape should prove necessary.

Although frequently condemned by religious-minded contemporaries as an agnostic or even an atheist, Voltaire was in fact a Deist in his religious outlook. In accordance with the precepts of what he saw as "natural religion," he acknowledged a higher and ultimately unknowable intelligence as God, but refused to go beyond saying that this intelligence created and ordered the universe as a divine "clockmaker." This view ruled out divine revelations and providence, making prayer superfluous, and dismissed the pomp, ceremony, and rituals of the Catholic Church as mere "superstition." Voltaire's critique of organized religion put him at odds with the Catholic hierarchy, which he regarded as socially parasitic.

Voltaire's early period of self-imposed exile in London, from 1726 to 1729, was an important formative phase of his financial and intellectual life. Successful investments increased his personal fortune, and he made the acquaintance of Jonathan Swift and Alexander Pope. He gathered materials for his first important work in prose, the Philosophical Letters, also known as Letters Concerning the English Nation, which was published in 1734. This work displayed Voltaire's admiration of English commercial prowess and constitutional monarchy, and helped to further French knowledge of Francis Bacon, John Locke, and above all, Isaac Newton.

Too audacious despite their apparent moderation, Voltaire's Letters warranted another exile from Paris. In 1734 he took up residence in a château at Cirey, owned by Emilie, the Marquise du Châtelet, in the Lorraine countryside, and they formed a close relationship. The marquise was herself a scientist and mathematician. She translated Newton's Principia into French, encouraged Voltaire's own attempts at scientific experimentation, and influenced him to write Elements of the Philosophy of Newton, which popularized the Englishman's scientific universe on the continent. While at Cirey, Voltaire also took up correspondence with the Prussian crown prince, the future Frederick II, in whom he found a potentially "enlightened monarch."

The death of the Marquise de Châtelet in 1749 sent Voltaire reeling emotionally. At the behest of Frederick II, he accepted a post at his court in 1750. Petty grievances with fellow French émigrés at the Prussian court, and disagreements with the king himself, prompted Voltaire's departure two years later.

In addition to his polemical writing, Voltaire also functioned as a campaigning activist to further his views. His most notable success in this regard was his intervention in the notorious Calas Affair of 1762. The court of Toulouse had condemned a Huguenot, Jean Calas, to be tortured to death for the murder of his son, ostensibly because the father could not tolerate his son's Catholicism. The sentence was carried out despite evidence that the son had committed suicide, and friends of the family convinced Voltaire that it was a horrible miscarriage of justice caused by Catholic bigotry against Huguenots. Voltaire used his fame to make it into a cause célèbre that had an overwhelming impact on public opinion throughout Europe. Eventually the judgment against Calas was reversed, his name was cleared posthumously, and the government was ordered to pay the family an indemnity. The case secured Voltaire's reputation as a crusader against injustice in the legal system and religious intolerance.

Voltaire resided at Ferney until March 1778, when he was invited to Paris for one last triumphal tour. His great celebrity made him the object of adulation, which he no doubt enjoyed, but it was physically fatiguing and the ordeal hastened his death on May 30, 1778, at the age of 84.

Voltaire's prodigious output included works of history (The Century of Louis XIV, The History of Charles XII, and New Thoughts on History), philosophy of science (Elements of Newton's Philosophy, Philosophical Dialogues, and the Philosophical Dictionary), and critiques of religion (Poem on Natural Religion, Treatise on Tolerance, and The Cry of Innocent Blood). His plays have not withstood the passage of time as well as his other writings, but those of his works that are most similar in character to modern fiction are perhaps his most accessible, and they encompass, in varying degrees, the themes central to his thought: Zadig, or Destiny, and Candide, or Optimism. He also contributed a dozen or so articles to the central literary project of the Enlightenment, the Encyclopédie overseen by Denis Diderot and Jean Le Rond d'Alembert. Also of note are Voltaire's posthumous Memoirs and his voluminous epistolary, regarded as a literary genre in its own right in the eighteenth century.

SEE ALSO: Diderot, Denis (1713–1784); Enlightenment, France, 18th Century; Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712–1778)

References and Suggested Readings

- Carlson, M. (1998) Voltaire and the Theater of the Eighteenth Century. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Davidson, I. (2005) Voltaire in Exile. New York: Grove.
- Parker, D. (2005) Voltaire: The Universal Man. New York: Sutton.
- Pearson, R. (2005) Voltaire Almighty: A Life in Pursuit of Freedom. New York: Bloomsbury.
- Schui, F. (2006) Early Debates about Industry: Voltaire and His Contemporaries. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Voltaire (1977) The Portable Voltaire. Ed. B. R. Redman. New York: Penguin.
- Voltaire (1994) Political Writings. Ed. D. Williams. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Voltaire (2000) Treatise on Tolerance. Ed. S. Harvey. Trans. B. Masters. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Voltaire (2001) Candide, Zadig, and Selected Stories. New York: Signet Classics.

W

Walentynowicz, Anna (b. 1929)

Edyta V. Materka

Anna Walentynowicz is widely understood to be the catalyst for the Gdańsk shipyard strikes and was the face of the anti-communist propaganda posters of the Solidarność (Solidarity) movement in the 1980s. A member of the free trade unions of Gdańsk, Walentynowicz was fired in August 1980 from her job as a crane operator at the Lenin shipyards in Gdańsk (preceding Lech Walesa, who worked in the same shipyard) for distributing the journal Robotnik Wybrzeża (Coastal Worker). She was editor of the illegal newspaper, which advocated workers' rights to unionize and a 1,000-złoty pay raise. Walentynowicz and Walesa organized labor union strikes demanding their reinstatement and a 2,000-złoty pay raise in the Lenin shipyards. Once the government allowed Walentynowicz to return to work, she became one of only two female members of the Interfactory Strike Committee Presidium and one of the signatories of the Gdańsk Agreements of August 1981 that legalized the Solidarity trade union.

As the Solidarity movement gained momentum, Walentynowicz's prominence waned when her local chapter elected a male delegate to the National Solidarity Congress in Gdańsk in the fall of 1981. The new local, regional, and national boards systemically excluded women who were involved in the Solidarity movement. Nevertheless, Walentynowicz's activism, in conjunction with the many shipyard strikes that led to the formation of the Solidarity movement, helped overthrow the Polish Communist Party (PZPR) in Poland in 1989.

In post-1989 Poland, while Lech Walesa (by then a Nobel Peace Prize winner) became the president of Poland, Anna Walentynowicz felt excluded because of her status as a woman. She criticized Walesa's policies and withdrew from political life.

SEE ALSO: Solidarność (Solidarity); Walesa, Lech (b. 1943); Women in the Solidarity Movement, Polish Underground

References and Suggested Readings

- Jancar, B. (1985) Women in the Opposition in Poland and Czechoslovakia in the 1970s. In S. Wolnik & A. Meyer (Eds.), Women, State and Party in Eastern Europe. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Long, K. (1996) We All Fought for Freedom: Women in Poland's Solidarity Movement. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Penn, S. (2005) Solidarity's Secret: The Women Who Defeated Communism in Poland. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Wales, nationalist protest, 19th century

Mark J. Crowley

Popular protest had become a distinctive feature of Welsh politics and society by the nineteenth century. Although trade unionism had not at that time developed substantially, the tradition dates from the eighteenth century, when unions were commonly known as "associations" and were predominantly rural. A rudimentary form of unionism was clearly manifested in the late eighteenth century in a rebellion of Swansea dockyard workers against their tyrannical employers. The unionization of Flintshire coal miners in 1830 placed radicalism solidly on the Welsh agenda, and it would gather strength from that point forward.

The inception of the Welsh trade union movement dates from agitation in western Wales in 1811. Its development in that period was affected by two important factors. First, communications between groups of workers were limited by the complexities of Welsh geography, with its mountainous terrain and large distances between towns and villages, coupled with a poor transportation infrastructure. This increased the likelihood that issues would differ from place to place. In the tinplate industry, for example, the workers' pay was the predominant issue, whereas in the coal industry the main concerns were reducing working hours (frequently as much as 16 hours per day) and improving the safety of workers underground.

The second factor was that many of the workers in the mechanical and manufacturing industries during this period were categorized as "unskilled," and thereby denied the right to vote. The workers' lack of political rights caused them not to be taken seriously by the elites with whom they had to negotiate, and their trade unions were hampered by their relative lack of power to influence government policy with regard to workers' rights.

Skilled workers did have some influence when their trade unions took action in defense of their rights, but because they were considerably fewer in number than those in the unskilled category, their protests' effectiveness was limited in the early era. They faced stiff opposition from factory owners, as well as from religious leaders who preached that trade unionism and strikes were inherently anti-religious. The religiosity of Welsh workers in this period prevented many from joining unions, but a shadowy group called Scotch Cattle rebelled against the preachers' attempts to dissuade them.

Scotch Cattle

Solid evidence is lacking as to exactly what and who the Scotch Cattle really were. The group formed in response to industrial disputes in the tinplate and coalmining industries in the period from 1810 to 1815. It operated as a secret society and behaved in a disciplined manner; historians have often portrayed it as a terroristic group. It first appeared in the north and western areas of Sir Howi, Rhymney, and Monmouthshire valleys, and spread westward to the semi-isolated valleys of the Ebbw Fach and Ebbw Fawr, where the iron extraction industry predominated.

The Scotch Cattle were predominantly Welsh speaking, and evidence relating to their activities can only be gleaned from contemporary court proceedings. They were mostly young men who worked as ironworkers or colliers. After about 1815 they were joined by less respectable colleagues, including local criminals and murderers, who apparently played an ever-growing role in the movement until its unexplained demise around 1850.

The movement was greatly involved in propagandistic activities, including what later generations might describe as "propaganda of the deed." It is unclear how many people actually adhered to this group, yet evidence suggests that the number was at least in the hundreds and perhaps in the thousands. The origin of the movement's name is also unknown, although historians have offered various hypotheses. It probably derives from the fact that participants blackened their faces and wore animal skins to avoid being recognized while carrying out their actions, not unlike the way the Rebecca rioters disguised themselves later in the nineteenth century.

Scotch Cattle arose in response to the oppressive nature of employment policies that affected all workers, but especially the coal and iron miners. Their jobs were highly insecure, and continual fear of losing their livelihood provoked widespread unrest. Rising food costs due to the Corn Laws, constant threats of wage cuts, frequent delays in wage payments, and a trend toward absentee bosses all contributed to the volatility of the social situation. The workers also resented being drawn into debt by the price-gouging "truck shops" (company stores) owned and operated by their bosses. A portion of the workers' wages was paid in food tokens, redeemable only in those truck shops.

Scotch Cattle targeted many people in their protests, including factory owners, strikebreakers, independent contractors who performed jobs for less than the going rate, "unspoken masters" (i.e., those who refused to support the workers' cause), "master miners" (who worked underground but held managerial positions), bailiffs, turnpike keepers (who collected tolls from farmers along the rural roads of Wales), and exploitative shopkeepers. The movement's tactics were designed to intimidate these people, and ultimately to ensure that injustices would be punished.

What Was the Purpose of Scotch Cattle?

Scotch Cattle tried to restrict the number of people in mines by imposing what would later be called a “closed shop” on the mine owners. They also attempted to keep demand for their labor high by restricting mine output. They enforced unwritten rules prohibiting any worker from filling his coal cart higher or more quickly than others at the same workplace. The aim was to prevent large inequalities in pay that would tend to exacerbate disunity among the workers. The ultimate objective was to create a unified movement that could stand up for the workers’ interests. Workers’ solidarity, especially in the coal mines, was enhanced by the fact that the workforce was predominantly Welsh speaking and the owners were predominantly monoglot English speakers.

Pressure was exerted through collective action and the threat of the “midnight visit.” Those who declared their opposition to the movement or who opposed granting more rights to workers faced violent retribution, such as having their houses smashed up. The circumstances of the time were such that the bosses were often forced to negotiate with the Scotch Cattle leaders.

Scotch Cattle meetings were announced by notices placed at workplaces, railway sidings, and other prominent locations. The posters’ blood-curdling warnings against non-attendance were usually sufficient to ensure a large turnout. Modern observers would find the meetings to be highly dramatic affairs. They took place on hillsides in the dead of night, sometimes attended by thousands, to the accompaniment of banging drums and guns firing. Participants wore face paint and wild-animal costumes to frighten any who might happen upon them, and carried the Croes Penmaen (Penmaen Cross), which became the symbol of the movement.

The movement managed to unite workers from many of the Welsh valleys. In 1834, hundreds of Scotch Cattle followers marched through a village, smashing it to pieces. They were sufficiently well disciplined to leave no clues behind as to who had inflicted the damage, so that Scotch Cattle could not officially be charged with a crime. The movement’s members swore an oath of silence to their leaders, and refused to cooperate with authorities.

In 1835, however, the leader of Scotch Cattle, Edward Morgan, was hanged for the murder of a man named John Thomas who had received a Scotch Cattle nocturnal visit, and this signaled the beginning of the movement’s demise. The authorities regained control and from that point onward, Scotch Cattle was a minority movement and its effectiveness declined. To the movement’s loyal partisans, however, Edward Morgan remained a heroic martyr.

The Merthyr Riots, 1831

The Merthyr riots were a further manifestation of widespread unrest in Wales during the early decades of the nineteenth century. They were not, however, attributable to an organization, but were a response to an incident that occurred in Merthyr in 1831. The roots of the disturbance date from the seventeenth century, when agitators from London conducted spirited campaigns for political change. Social class awareness then became a prominent part of Welsh politics and society, and by the latter half of the nineteenth century a distinct Welsh nationalism had developed. The Merthyr rising grew out of a disturbance in the town that led to a general strike. A militia from Brecon established itself there, putting the town effectively under military occupation.

Many changes had been occurring within Welsh industry and society. First, following a significant economic boom, the iron industry faced a slump resulting from reduced foreign demand. Second, the oppressive ways in which regulations were applied meant that if people fell into debt due to harsh economic conditions, the authorities could seize parts of their property. Third, industrial disputes in Merthyr during this period had profoundly influenced the psyche of the workers, who were becoming more politically aware and politically discontented. Furthermore, the reform of the parliamentary franchise had at last given ordinary working people a means of wielding political influence so they could campaign for improved legal and political rights.

Some historians have maintained that the trial and execution of one of the primary Merthyr leaders, Dic Penderyn, who had been arrested for killing a police officer, sparked the rise of a distinct working-class consciousness that spread across Wales. At the same time, the development of the radical press, with newspapers such as The Worker, gave the working classes a medium through which they could express their political views. The effectiveness of the working-class press, however, was limited by the 1832 Reform Act, which restricted the output of radical publications. Although Merthyr's first working-class parliamentary campaign was unsuccessful, the Merthyr rioters' demands for "bread" and "reform" were not inconsequential; the way had been paved for the development of the Chartist movement in Wales.

The Rebecca Riots, 1834

The Rebecca riots were a response to an agricultural economic depression that severely affected the Welsh farming community. A memorable feature of these disturbances was the presence of men concealing their identities by dressing in women's clothing as they waged terror throughout Wales. The protesters' main target was the tollgates placed by English landowners along the rural roads that farmers had to use to take their produce to the local market. In addition to the rents they were paying, the farmers were also forced to pay tolls to the landowners for the transportation of their goods, an imposition that was deeply resented.

Angry protesters, who took inspiration from the biblical story of Rebecca's fight against injustice, did not abstain from violence. The typical pattern involved a primary instigator calling himself "Rebecca's mother" leading a riotous assault, removing gates from their hinges, and destroying the tollbooths. The violence of these protests struck at the heart of the communities where they occurred, and its impact was profound, because it seemed at odds with the religious pacifism that was predominant in Wales during the period. Religion, however, was itself a primary source of conflict between Welsh tenant farmers and English landowners. The Englishmen belonged to the Anglican Church and the Welsh farmers, who did not, were nonetheless required by law to pay 10 percent of their income to support that church. Not surprisingly, the compulsory tithes were often resisted.

In one controversial incident, an elderly tollgate keeper named Sarah Davies was killed during an attack on the tollgate in Efailwen. The 73-year-old woman had been perceived by the Rebeccas as an instrument of their oppression, but many in the community, especially Welsh religious leaders, felt the protesters had unjustly murdered an innocent employee of the landowners. Nevertheless, widespread sympathy for the Rebeccas was sufficient to shield them from the expected legal consequences of their actions, which might have included death sentences. A court inquiry on Davies's death ruled that she had died of lead poisoning!

The Rebecca riots alerted the British government to the problems of the Welsh agricultural community. In response, some measures were taken to address the grievances and quell the revolutionary impulses of the Welsh people, but they were only partially successful. Protests continued, and very little time separated the end of the Rebecca movement and the rise of the Chartists.

The Chartists

The Chartist movement was not a Welsh phenomenon per se; it was a working-class political movement that spread throughout England, Scotland, and Wales. It was organized around six particular demands for reform that were to be presented as a petition – the Charter – to the British parliament. The reforms aimed at providing genuine political representation for working people in the expectation that as the majority they would achieve political power, thus enabling them to materially improve their lives.

Chartism developed enormous support in Wales. Hugh Williams, a supporter of the movement with connections in London, established the first Chartist branch in Wales. Chartist associations in Merthyr, Monmouthshire, Aberdare, and Glamorganshire soon emerged. The organization proved able to rally support on a number of fronts, including against the Poor Law and the system of parish relief. The New Poor Law Act of 1834 instituted workhouses, a harsh system abhorred by many. Chartism also once again took up the fight against the tollgates that had been the focus of the earlier Rebecca movement.

Chartism was particularly strong in mid-Wales, where, when parliament rejected the Chartist petitions, major protests occurred in places such as Newtown and Llanidloes. The most significant action was the Newport rising of 1839, the nature of which has been debated by historians, but which apparently was an insurrectionary attempt to overthrow the local government. The uprising was militarily suppressed by the authorities, but it made a powerful impression. Chartism in Wales, as in the rest of England, has been recognized as a highly significant chapter in the history of the development of working-class political movements.

Nonconformity and the Influence of Religion

“Nonconformity” was the generic name for religious groups, including Methodists, Baptists, and Independents, that stood outside the Anglican Church. Even though the nonconformist movement had different strands, all with antipathy toward one another, its characteristic feature was the impressive ability of the movement as a whole to present a powerful united front when under attack.

The nonconformist chapels were perceived as social institutions as well as places of worship. The chapels were important in how they shaped their members’ lives – socially, politically, culturally, and even linguistically. Influential nonconformist religious leaders organized local meetings and political associations, and worked to develop their congregants’ social consciousness. Despite the 1851 Census’s report that more than 50 percent of the population did not attend any form of worship, it is nonetheless undeniable that nonconformist religion played a significant part in the formation of the Welsh identity.

The 1851 Census must be interpreted with caution due to its flawed methodology, but its evidence that nonconformists held a 20 percent majority over Anglicans cannot be ignored. Because the Anglican Church, or Church of England, was the established church with official preference giving it immense advantages over the others, the political focus of Welsh nonconformists was to “disestablish” the established church, thus separating themselves from the Church of England.

Linguistic disputes increased as a rise in the number of immigrants to Wales sparked debate within the chapels over whether to offer services in English to accommodate the newcomers. The difference between being English and being Welsh came to the fore, and the nonconformists’ grievances and the attack on the established church became the central issue of the day. This was primarily manifested in attacks on the tithes laws, which nonconformists blamed for preventing them from developing a Welsh economic identity.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Corn Law Agitation, Britain, 19th Century; Chartists; Newport Rising, Wales, 1839; Poor Law, Britain, 1834; Reform Acts, Britain and Ireland, 1832

References and Suggested Readings

- Davies, D. W. (2004) Hugh Williams: The Man Who Was Rebecca? Machynlleth: Machynlleth and District Civic Society.
- Davies, J. (1993) A History of Wales. London: Penguin.
- Evans, D. G. (1989) A History of Wales, 1815–1906. Cardiff: University of Wales.
- Jenkins, P. (1992) A History of Modern Wales, 1536–1990. London: Longman.
- Jones, I. G. (1981) Explorations and Explanations: Essays in the Social History of Victorian Wales. Llandysil: Gwasg Gomer.
- Jones, R. T. (2000a) The Church and the Welsh Language in the Nineteenth Century. In G. H. Jenkins (Ed.), The Welsh Language and its Social Domains. Cardiff: University of Wales Press.
- Jones, R. T. (2000b) Nonconformity and the Welsh Language in Nineteenth-Century Wales. In G. H. Jenkins (Ed.), The Welsh Language and its Social Domains. Cardiff: University of Wales Press.
- Smith, D. (1990) Focal Heroes: A Welsh Fighting Class. In R. Holt (Ed.), Sport and the Working Class in Modern Britain. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Williams, D. (1986) The Rebecca Riots: A Study in Agrarian Dissent. Cardiff: University of Wales Press.
- Williams, S. R. (1991) The True Cymraes: Images of Women in Women’s Nineteenth-Century Welsh Periodicals. In A. V. John (Ed.), Our Mothers’ Land: Chapters in Welsh Women’s History. Cardiff: University of Wales Press.

Walesa, Lech (b. 1943)

Amy Linch

Lech Walesa (Wałęsa) was co-founder and leader of the Independent Self-Governing Trade Union “Solidarity” (Niezależny Samorządny Związek Zawodowy “Solidarność”) through its decade of struggle against the communist regime in Poland. As the face and voice of Solidarity, Walesa is arguably the most significant figure in the revolution that precipitated the collapse of the Soviet Union. In 1989 he chaired the opposition delegation to the Round Table negotiations with the communist government that ended the communist monopoly over political and social life in Poland. In December 1990 he became the first freely elected president of Poland’s Third Republic.

Born in the small village of Popowo, Poland to peasant farmers during the Nazi occupation, Walesa’s early life was marked by the reconstruction of Poland under the dominance of the Soviet Union. His father, a carpenter, died in 1946 from exposure and abuse he suffered under the Nazis and Walesa was raised by his mother and paternal uncle. He attended a parish primary school and trained to be an electrician at the state vocational school in Lipno. After graduating he worked as a car mechanic until 1965 and subsequently served two years in the army, rising to the rank of corporal. In 1967 he was employed as an electrician in the Lenin Shipyard in Gdańsk.

Walesa was a member of the strike committee in his shipyard during the 1970 workers' protests against the dramatic increase in food costs. He was a member of the delegation that met with the authorities in Warsaw, and was later elected an officer in the union. During the strikes he addressed a crowd of demonstrators from the police headquarters in Gdańsk while they took over the building and tried to set it on fire (Zuzowski 1992: 48). He was detained briefly for his participation in the strikes. Over the next several years he was the target of police surveillance and occasional questioning for his continued agitation for better working conditions. Walesa was fired from his job in 1976 for organizing shipyard workers in strikes against a new round of price increases. With the support of the Committee for the Defense of Workers (KOR) and the Catholic Church, Walesa and other activists begin to organize and participate in protest activity on the Baltic coast. As he became increasingly involved in dissident activities initiated by KOR between 1976 and 1980, he suffered state surveillance and periodic detention. He was invited to join the Coastal Free Trade Union by Bogdan Borusewicz in April 1978 (Zuzowski 1992: 101) and in 1979 he was a signatory of the Workers' Rights Charter – the first comprehensive document of workers' rights to be published by an independent group in any of the purported “workers' republics” (Kubik 1994: 162).

In July 1980 price increases again sparked a wave of worker protests that paralyzed the Baltic coast and quickly spread throughout Poland. Within a month workers had occupied the Lenin shipyard in Gdańsk. Walesa scaled the walls to join his former co-workers and was declared the leader of the strike. The workers demanded reinstatement of Walesa and Anna Walentynowicz, who had been fired ten days earlier for participating in the illegal trade union. Recognizing the need to overwhelm the capacity of the government to maintain control through force, Walesa chaired the Interfactory Strike Committee, which linked the workers from the Lenin shipyard to strikes in 20 other facilities on the Baltic coast and in the coalmining center of Silesia. On the behalf of over 500,000 workers the committee issued 20 political and economic demands, including the right to strike and legalization of the independent trade union, Solidarity.

Within two weeks the government capitulated to the workers' demands. On August 31 Walesa and Poland's first deputy premier Mieczyslaw Jagielski signed the Gdansk Agreement, which recognized workers' right to organize. In September the Interfactory Strike Committee officially became a national federation of unions, renamed Solidarność (Solidarity). Elected chair of the new organization, Walesa represented a constituency of nearly ten million – a quarter of the Polish population.

Over the next 15 months Walesa traveled to Japan, Italy, Sweden, France, and Switzerland as a guest of the International Labor Organization (ILO). He was received at the Vatican by Pope John Paul II, who assured Walesa and the Polish people that after his visit two years earlier, “during your difficulties I have been with you in a special way, above all through prayer.” Walesa traveled around Poland persuading workers to support his moderate approach to reform, recommending cooperation with the government and cautioning against action that would provoke the Soviet Union. He was advised by a team of dissident activists and intellectuals, who availed him of expert political and economic analysis of the problems endemic to state socialism. The power of Walesa's leadership lay with his ability to translate this advice into simple direct terms. He was a savvy politician with an excellent crowd sense and a charismatic speaking style. He wove an image of himself as the embodiment of an expansive Polish identity through the use of coarse Polish, while wielding elements of Polish patriotism and religious culture to challenge the authority of the Communist Party.

Walesa's approach to reform came under criticism on several occasions during the fall of 1981. He was opposed in the union elections by three candidates who criticized him for being highhanded in his decision-making, and overly conciliatory with respect to the government. His participation in tripartite talks with the church and the Communist Party and efforts to tame the wildcat strikes occurring around the country were challenged by some factions within the movement, who favored a more confrontational strategy. Meanwhile, in a shocking demonstration of the deteriorating power of the Communist Party, the Sejm refused to pass a bill restricting the right to strike. The recently declared head of the party, General Jaruzelski, prepared to impose martial law to regain control of the country. He used force to break up demonstrations and began an attack campaign against Walesa. In early December, against Walesa's counsel, more radical members of the union proposed a referendum on the continued existence of communism and Poland's alliance with the Soviet Union, giving Jaruzelski the pretext he needed to cease tolerating Solidarity.

Jaruzelski declared martial law, curtailed civil liberties, outlawed Solidarity, and arrested thousands of activists. Walesa was taken from his apartment by the police in the middle of the night and detained for nearly a year. He was released in November 1982 and reinstated at the Gdańsk shipyard but kept under close government surveillance. As Solidarity's unity was strained under conflicting opinions about how to best resist government repression, Walesa remained the central figure in the movement. His receipt of the Nobel Peace Prize in 1983 emboldened the movement as it struggled to survive underground.

In 1988 over three months of coordinated action by workers in transport, coal, steel, and the shipyards compelled the government to negotiate with Solidarity. Walesa called an end to the strikes and organized a committee, including many prominent artists, intellectuals, and dissident leaders, to prepare for official talks with the government. Walesa chaired the Solidarity delegation and traveled around the country giving speeches and meeting with government representatives to generate support for the negotiations. The Polish Round Table, as the 59 days of talks begun in February 1989 came to be known, dramatically changed the course of Polish politics and ultimately precipitated the collapse of the Soviet Union. Solidarity was relegalized, the Senate was reintroduced to parliament with limited veto powers over the Sejm, the presidency was instituted, and Solidarity was allowed to run candidates in free elections.

Solidarity won all of the lower house seats it was allowed to contest in June 1989, and 99 of the 100 seats in the newly created Senate. Walesa refused to allow Solidarity to be a minority partner in a governing coalition, and Solidarity took control of the government. The following year Walesa became president of Poland with 77.5 percent of the vote in the second round of the first direct presidential election in the country's history. Motivated by the conviction that democracy required competition, he declared a "war at the top" of Solidarity against his own former advisors. While many of his critics have argued that introducing real political competition too early frustrated the growth of democratic institutions in Poland, Walesa feared that the cooperative approach to running the country during the transition from communism could easily devolve into autocracy. He thought Solidarity needed to foster competition from within as the former communist leaders retreated to ensure the development of a robust democracy. He served as president until 1995 when he was narrowly defeated in a bid for reelection by former communist Aleksander Kwasniewski.

In 1995 Walesa formed the Lech Walesa Institute to consolidate democracy and a free market economy in Poland and promote European integration. He continued to actively participate in Polish politics after leaving office, running for president again in 2000. Throughout his political career Walesa has been haunted by accusations that he collaborated with the secret police in the early 1970s. He was exonerated by a 2000 court decision but such allegations continued to plague him nearly a decade later. In 2008 two historians associated with the Institute of National Memory published a book claiming that Walesa did collaborate with the secret police during the early 1970s. He vigorously denied the charge and the ensuing national debate strongly polarized both experts and the public. An August 2008 survey showed that the renewed allegations had no effect on Walesa's popularity; most people seemed to accept that even if he engaged in some talks with communist agents for a brief period in the 1970s, his position as a national hero was secure.

SEE ALSO: Kuroń, Jacek (1934–2004); Michnik, Adam (b. 1946); Poland, Committee for Workers (KOR); Poland, Trade Unions and Protest, 1988–1993; Poland, Student Movement, 1968; Solidarność (Solidarity); Soviet Union, Fall of; Walentyńowicz, Anna (b. 1929); Women in the Solidarity Movement, Polish Underground

References and Suggested Readings

- Craig, M. (1987) Lech Walesa and His Poland. New York: Continuum.
- Garton Ash, T. (2002) The Polish Revolution: Solidarity. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Krzysztof, J. (1997) Poland: Wałęsa's Legacy to the Presidency. In R. Taras (Ed.), Post-Communist Presidents. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 13–167.
- Kubik, J. (1994) The Power of Symbols Against the Symbols of Power. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.
- Kurski, J. (1993) Lech Walesa: Democrat or Dictator. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Walesa, L. (1987) A Way of Hope. New York: Henry Holt.
- Walesa, L. (1992) The Struggle and the Triumph. New York: Arcade.
- Zuzowski, R. (1992) Political Dissent and Opposition in Poland. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Walker, David (1785–1830)

Beverly Tomek

David Walker is often cited as one of the first militants in the African American anti-slavery and civil rights struggle. Born in Wilmington, NC, to a free mother and an enslaved father, and thus free himself, he gained literacy and read extensively on the topics of resistance and revolution. After growing up witnessing the horrors of slavery first hand, including an incident in which a slave was forced to whip his mother until she died, he left the South and eventually settled in Boston, where he opened a used clothing store in the 1820s. While in Boston he made friends with a number of other black activists and became an agent and contributor for the country's first African American newspaper, the New York-based Freedom's Journal.

In 1829, Walker put four of his abolitionist articles together and published them as the pamphlet known as Walker's Appeal. This pamphlet caused an immediate stir because it appeared to call for slaves to revolt against their masters. Taken South by the sailors who bought clothes in Walker's store, it immediately frightened and enraged whites, who responded by passing laws forbidding black literacy and the distribution of abolitionist literature. Some states expelled free black settlers, and others offered monetary rewards for Walker's capture or death.

What was unique about Walker's pamphlet was that it was one of the first to grapple with the issue of violence in the struggle for freedom. On the surface, it called for slaves to rise up against their masters and fight for their freedom. Indeed, many historians have shown that this call influenced Nat Turner's decision to revolt. Importantly, however, Walker's Appeal was primarily an attempt to resist the American Colonization Society's efforts to repatriate blacks in Africa. He wanted to show that blacks had worked just as hard as whites, if not harder, to build the United States and thus should not be driven from their homes and country.

Though known for its militant rhetoric, Walker's pamphlet was equally a call for acceptance. Aware of the pro-slavery horror stories of blacks slaughtering babies, raping women, and murdering men during the Haitian Revolution, he called upon his black readers not to rise up and kill whites but to fight to earn white respect. He prevailed upon educated black men to lead the rest of the race out of degradation through the dissemination of education and religion and "prove to the Americans and the rest of the world, that we are MEN, and not brutes."

Near the end of his address, Walker introduced the argument that, regardless of how black men felt about violence toward whites, whites feared them. He argued that if black men would shed their "servile spirit" and "death-like apathy" they could stand up for themselves by asserting their manhood. He argued that vengeance belonged "to the Lord" and even offered hope that God would forgive the oppressors if they would repent and aid in black enlightenment. "Treat us like men," he concluded, "and there is no danger but we will all live in peace and happiness together."

SEE ALSO: Anti-Slavery Movement, United States, 1700–1870; Haiti, Saint-Domingue Revolution, 1789–1804, Aftermath; Nat Turner Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Aptheker, H. (Ed.) (1965) One Continual Cry: David Walker's Appeal, Its Setting and Its Meaning. New York: Humanities Press.
- Bennett, L. (1968) Pioneers in Protest. Chicago: Johnson.
- Walker, D. (1829/1972) Walker's Appeal, in Four Articles; Together with a Preamble, to the Coloured Citizens of the World, But in Particular, and Very Expressly, to Those of The United States of America, Written in Boston, State of Massachusetts, September 28, 1829. In S. Stuckey (Ed.), The Ideological Origins of Black Nationalism. Boston: Beacon Press, pp. 39–117.

Wang Ming (1904–1974)

Alexander V. Pantsov

Wang Ming, whose real name was Chen Shaoyu, was among the important early leaders of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). He was born on May 23, 1904 in the town of Jinzhai, Liuan (now Jinzhai) County, Anhui Province. In 1924 Wang graduated from Liuan Agricultural College and entered the preparatory department of Wuchang University of Commerce. In 1924 he joined the Chinese Socialist Youth League, and the following year both the Chinese Communist Party and the Guomindang (Nationalist Party). He worked in the Propaganda Department of the Hubei Provincial Guomindang Committee.

In the fall of 1925 Wang went to Moscow and on November 23 enrolled in Sun Yat-Sen University of Toilers of China (UTK). From February through April 1927 he accompanied UTK vice rector Pavel Mif to China as a member of the Soviet Communist Party propagandists' delegation. Beginning in May 1927 he worked in the Party's Central Committee (CCP CC) Propaganda Department, and served as an editor of the CCP CC magazine Xiangdao (Guide). He returned to Moscow in August 1927 and studied and worked at UTK as an instructor and translator through April 1929. On assignment from the Executive Committee of the Comintern (ECCI), from January through July 1928 he participated in the preparations for convening the Sixth Congress of the CCP that was held at the Pervomaiskii collective farm near Moscow. He headed the translators' section of the congress secretariat. Between July and September 1928 he engaged in similar preparatory work in connection with the Sixth World Congress of the Comintern.

In February 1929 Wang returned to China and worked in the Shanghai Eastern Region CCP Committee. Starting in October 1929 he served as an editor of the CCP CC magazine Hongqi (Red Flag). In January 1931 at the Fourth Plenum of the CCP Central Committee, under Comintern representative Pavel Mif's pressure on the party leadership, Wang was coopted onto the CC Politburo. He, Lu Futan, and Zhou Enlai formed a triumvirate to lead the party.

On September 25, 1931, along with Meng Qingshu, Lu Jingru, and Wu Kejian, Wang left Shanghai for the Soviet Union again, this time to head the CCP delegation to the ECCI. He arrived in Moscow via Vladivostok on October 18, and from 1932 until the Comintern was dissolved in 1943 he served as a member of the ECCI and the ECCI Presidium. From November 1931 until August 1935 he was also a member of the ECCI Political Secretariat. In August–September 1932 he attended the Twelfth Plenum of the ECCI, delivered a report, and made a speech on the Chinese Revolution. At the Thirteenth Session of the Plenum he was elected its executive chairman. This marked the first time that a CCP representative chaired an ECCI meeting.

On December 29, 1933 Wang was elected a full member of the highest organ of the World Communist Movement, the Political Commission of the Political Secretariat of the ECCI. He served as a member of the commission until its devolvement at the Seventh Comintern Congress in July 1935. In early 1934 he was elected a delegate to the Seventeenth Congress of the Soviet Communist Party with a consultative vote.

After that Wang participated in preparations for the Seventh World Congress of the Comintern, which adopted the tactics of the united anti-fascist front. In July–August 1935 he attended the Seventh World Congress as chairman of the CCP delegation with full voting rights and was elected to the 42-member Presidium of the Congress. On August 1 he presented the CCP's declaration of principles regarding the united front against Japan and against Chiang Kai-shek. On August 7 he made a report analyzing the revolutionary movement in colonial and semi-colonial countries and discussing the tactics of the communist parties. The congress elected him to membership on the ECCI. Following the congress he was reelected to membership on the ECCI Presidium and became an alternate member of its Political Secretariat. In addition to the Chinese question, he was put in charge of Latin American affairs. In September 1935 he attended the Sixth Congress of the Young Communist International and was elected to the Presidium of the Congress. In November–December 1936 he also attended the Eighth Extraordinary Soviet Congress, which accepted the so-called Stalin Constitution of the Soviet Union.

During his sojourn in the Soviet Union he cooperated closely with the NKVD, Stalin's secret police, in fabricating false charges against many Chinese communists, and was responsible for the arrest and execution of numerous members of the CCP and Communist Youth League of China (CCYL). In November 1937, along with Kang Sheng, he returned to China. En route he stopped in Xinjiang and concocted a set of false charges against the leaders of the CCP CC Xinjiang organization. He accused them of being Trotskyists and persuaded the local militarist Shen Shicai to arrest them and hand them over to the Soviet authorities, who consequently executed them.

In 1937–8 Wang served as secretary of the CCP CC Changjiang (Yangzi) bureau. In 1938–9 he headed the CCP CC United Front Department. He was criticized during the intra-party “rectification” campaign of 1941–5 that served to strengthen Mao Zedong’s position within the CCP leadership. However, at the Seventh CCP Congress in April–June 1945 Wang was reelected, on Mao Zedong’s initiative, to membership in the Central Committee (a position he held until the Tenth Party Congress in April 1969). In 1945 Wang became head of the CCP CC Judicial Commission. After the Communist victory in 1949, he headed the Commission on Legislative Proposals of the Central People’s Government.

In January 1956 Wang went to the Soviet Union for medical treatment. He remained there for the rest of his life – a fortunate circumstance for him, because it allowed him to avoid persecution during the Cultural Revolution – and died in Moscow on March 27, 1974.

SEE ALSO: China, May 4th Movement; China, Student Protests, 20th Century; Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949; Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Zhou Enlai (1898–1976)

References and Suggested Readings

- Deng Liqun (Ed.) (1996) Zhonggong dangshi renwu zhuan (Biographies of the Chinese Communist Party History Activists), Vol. 58. Xian: Shanxi renmin chubanshe.
- Dangshi yanjiu ziliao* (1982) (Study Materials on Party History), Vol. 3. Chengdu: Sichuan renmin chubanshe.
- Meng Qingshu (n.d.) Vospominaniya o Wang Ming (Memories of Wang Ming). Manuscript in Russian. Moscow.
- Xiang Qing (1985) Gongchan goji yu Zhongguo geming guanxi lunwenji (Collection of Articles on the Relationship between the Comintern and the Chinese Revolution). Shanghai: Shanghai renmin chubanshe.
- Zhou Guoquan et al. (1991) Wang Ming nianpu (A Chronicle Biography of Wang Ming). Hefei: Anhui renmin chubanshe.

War communism and the rise of the Soviet Union

David Mandel

Contrary to the analyses and predictions of all currents in Russian Marxism, the revolution in Russia survived without the support of victorious revolutions in the West. But it survived in a much distorted form compared to the original project and at a terrible cost that was borne first of all by the revolution’s main social support, the urban working class. How can one account for the victory of a revolutionary state that began its existence without any serious armed forces, with no experience in public administration, and which almost at once was confronted with the armed hostility of the propertied classes, who were supported by most of the intelligentsia, the old officer corps, as well as the most powerful capitalist states in the world?

Among the domestic factors that favored the Soviet regime, the most important was undoubtedly its working-class base. Workers provided the committed backbone of the mainly peasant Red Army and of the new Soviet state administration (which also retained much of the old state personnel). These workers brought with them qualities they had developed in the struggle against tsarism – political acuity and commitment, solidarity, self-sacrifice, initiative, discipline, and organizational talent. Even the disillusionment and wavering of the less committed strata of the working class were based more on hunger than on the attraction of the alternatives, and these workers were often brought around by good Soviet orators and an increased supply of food. In the end, they continued to identify with the Soviet regime.

Largely because of its working-class base, the Soviet state, even at the lowest point of its fortunes in the civil war, never lost control of Russia’s core territories, the provinces around Moscow, including St. Petersburg. This was where the bulk of the industry and the hub of railway communications were located. The government was thus able to equip the Red Army in spite of the economic blockade. Its central geographical base gave the army great mobility, allowing for the rapid transfer of limited shock troops from one front to the next. The White armies, on the other hand, were scattered on four fronts in southern Russia, western Siberia, northern Russia, and the Baltic region and were never able to link up or seriously coordinate their operations. The central region continuously occupied by the Soviet regime was also Russia's most populous and so provided a much larger manpower pool than the Whites possessed, allowing the Soviet forces great numerical superiority. At the same, this territory was sufficiently large to allow the Soviet forces to retreat tactically without creating a serious threat to the state.

Another critical domestic factor was what might best be termed the "benevolent neutrality" of the mass of the peasantry. The peasants were not eager to fight on either side. They willingly fought really only when the front passed near their own region or when they were defending their local autonomy. However, they definitely did not desire the victory of the White armies, whose only program was the "restoration of order," meaning a return of the landlords and their terrible vengeance against the peasants. No more than the workers were the peasants attracted to the Menshevik and Socialist Revolutionary (SR) slogan of the constituent assembly, which in any case was not espoused by the White generals, who did not trust the people and made little effort to mobilize them on a political, rather than coerced, basis.

A serious peasant revolt that erupted in the spring of 1919 in the central Volga region proclaimed the slogan "Long live soviet power on the platform of the October Revolution." This was hardly a position the White generals or even the SRs could approve. Later that summer, as the White Army of General Denikin, who was counting on the peasant uprising for support, drew nearer to Moscow, the peasant insurrection simply died down of its own, and almost a million peasant deserters voluntarily returned to the Red Army. The peasants did not like the Bolshevik policies of requisitioning their produce and giving little or nothing in return (as there was nothing to give), or the policy of mobilizing their men, horses, and cattle for the Red Army. But they also knew that the Bolsheviks were the only political force capable of organizing the defeat of the Whites.

The most menacing and widespread peasant rebellion erupted only in the spring of 1920, when the White armies had already been defeated in almost all of Russia proper. The only serious remaining threats came from the Polish invasion of Ukraine, which was soon beaten back, and from General Wrangel's army in the Crimea, which was vastly outnumbered. Meanwhile in May 1920, the SRs, encouraged by this peasant uprising, returned to their policy of armed struggle against the Soviet government, which they had abandoned the previous year. Everywhere, the slogans of the peasant revolt were "soviets without communists" and free trade in grain. The Soviet government met these risings, some led by former allies, with the same ruthlessness it had displayed in the case of earlier military threats. But these uprisings, together with the revolt of the sailors of the Kronstadt fortress in February 1921 under similar slogans, and simultaneous strikes in Petrograd's factories, convinced Lenin and the rest of the Bolshevik Party to revise the economic policy. Another factor that favored the change was the improvement of Russia's international situation in 1921.

A third domestic factor was the attitude of the movements of the national minorities of the former tsarist empire. In many ways it was akin to the peasants' "benevolent neutrality." The leaders of these national movements and of the newly independent states of Poland and the Baltic region were pro-capitalist and strongly anti-Soviet but they too did not want a victory of the White armies, whose slogan was "Russia, one and indivisible" and whose generals, in any case, ruled out cooperation with separatists. As for the popular classes of these national minorities, like the Russians, they were attracted to the Bolsheviks' socialist message. The White forces were notorious for their anti-Jewish pogroms, while the Bolsheviks firmly opposed any expression of Russian chauvinism and were sincerely prepared to grant a measure of self-government to national groups and to encourage their national-cultural awakening (at least until Stalin put a stop to that at the end of the 1920s), as long as the ruling Communist Party and the army remained centralized institutions.

The national factor played a direct military role at two critical junctures. In September 1919, when General Yudenich marched on Petrograd, the Finnish and Estonian bourgeois governments decided not to participate in the offensive, which otherwise would almost certainly have proved successful. This is hardly surprising, since the supreme White authority refused to recognize the independence of those states. For much the same reasons, capitalist Poland sat out the major White offensive of March 1919, when its action on Russia's western border would have made possible the capture of Moscow. Instead, Poland waited for the White armies to be defeated before launching its own invasion aimed at annexing the Ukraine.

The other set of factors that explains the Soviet victory is of an international nature. The internationalism of the Bolsheviks and the Russian workers as a whole was not abstract idealism. They genuinely believed their fate depended on the revolution in the West, not just because of the threat posed by international intervention but also because the internal contradictions of the Russian Revolution, such as those that arose between the workers and peasants in connection with the food question, could not be easily resolved at Russia's level of socioeconomic development. The Bolsheviks and workers showed in practice that they were prepared to sacrifice much to aid the international revolution, including by military means. The Soviet counteroffensive against the Poles in 1920 that reached the outskirts of Warsaw before being beaten back (with the help of French officers) was motivated largely by the desire to bring material and military aid to the German Revolution. The Soviet counteroffensive into Poland aroused tremendous enthusiasm among Russian workers, since victory would have provided the Russian Revolution with direct access to Germany's revolutionary workers.

If the victorious socialist revolutions on which the Bolsheviks were counting did not materialize, the years 1918–20 nevertheless witnessed an unprecedentedly powerful radicalization and upsurge of the workers' movements in all industrialized countries and regions. In Germany, Austria, Finland, and Hungary these produced revolutions; in Italy and (some argue) in parts of France they created revolutionary situations which, however, failed to develop into revolutions. But all the countries, including Great Britain, Canada, and the US, witnessed a tremendous growth in trade union membership and in offensive strike action. There was a similar growth in membership in socialist parties, especially the revolutionary ones.

Since this labor upsurge was beaten back by the capitalist states and the bourgeoisie, historians usually argue that the Bolsheviks were deluding themselves about receiving aid from revolutions abroad. Some deny there was any revolutionary potential outside of Russia. But as is so often the case, one's judgment as to whether the revolutionary glass was half empty or half full depends, in the end, on one's ideological leanings. But there is no doubt that the European bourgeoisie itself was deeply frightened at this time. In a memorandum to the Paris Peace Conference dated March 25, 1919, Lloyd George, prime minister of Britain, wrote that "the whole of Europe is in a revolutionary mood. The workers have a deep feeling of dissatisfaction with conditions of life as they existed before the war; they are full of anger and indignation. The whole of the existing social, political and economic order is being called into question by the mass of people from one end of Europe to the other." Nor was North America immune to this unrest.

But in the end, this labor upsurge did not produce victorious socialist revolutions. It was, however, powerful enough to prevent the capitalist powers from intervening with sufficient force to crush the revolution in Russia. American historian W. Chamberlin writes: "The statesmen [at the peace talks] in Paris were sitting on a thin crust of solid ground, beneath which volcanic forces of social upheaval were seething. . . . So there was one absolutely convincing reason why the Allied powers could not fulfill the hopes of the White Russians and intervene with large numbers of troops: no reliable troops were available. It was the general opinion of leading statesmen and soldiers alike that the attempt to send large numbers of soldiers to Russia would most probably end in mutiny." And mutinies did occur, notably among the troops sent by the French government, the most anti-Bolshevik of all the interventionists.

In the midst of a massive British strike wave and with the red flag flying atop the city hall of Glasgow, Lloyd George told the Paris conference that "if Britain were to start military action against the Bolsheviks, Britain herself would go Bolshevik and we would have a soviet in London." Britain never really got very near to a revolutionary situation, but the British labor movement did play a direct role in saving the Russian Revolution. When Poland invaded the Ukraine in the spring of 1920, the British dockworkers prevented their government from sending arms to the Poles. And when the Red Army approached the gates of Warsaw, and Britain threatened to declare war on Soviet Russia unless she withdrew her troops, the British Labour Party organized huge demonstrations across Britain and, together with the trade unions, set up hundreds of local action committees in towns throughout the country in preparation for a general strike. The leader of the Labour Party warned Lloyd George that if he moved to help Poland, "there will be a match set to explosive material, the result of which none of us can foresee today." This unselfish act of the British working class was decisive in dissuading the government from a new effort at direct military intervention. Of course, the British workers also understood well that defeat of the revolution in Russia would greatly encourage their own employers and government to move against their gains.

Another international factor was the conflicting imperialist interests that kept the intervening powers from coordinating their activities and giving the degree of support to the Whites that they otherwise might have given. For example, the US was competing with Japan for control of the Pacific area and was not at all enthusiastic about Japanese intervention in Siberia, which was aimed at annexation of this resource-rich region. Nor were France and England very happy about the Whites' dream of restoring the grandeur of the Russian empire. All the imperialist powers wanted a capitalist Russia, but they preferred one that was weak and accommodating to their economic and geopolitical interests. The tsarist state had been a traditional rival of Britain in Asia. And France was now banking on newly independent Poland as its chief ally in Europe on the eastern border of Germany, France's traditional enemy. But tsarist Russia had been Poland's traditional oppressor.

Socioeconomic Consequences of the Civil War

The civil war, together with the destruction inflicted earlier by the world war, left the Russian economy in a shambles. In 1921, Russian industry was producing at only a seventh of its prewar level. It would take almost five more years to restore the economy to the level of 1914. A quarter of the cultivated land had been abandoned, and agricultural output was down by 40 percent from the prewar level. Famine stalked the countryside and the largely depopulated cities.

Approximately four and a half million people, about 3 percent of the population, had died as a consequence of the civil war (on top of the almost two million killed in the world war). There were 4.5 million homeless children (up from two million before the war). Most of the civil war deaths were not direct participants or victims of the armed struggle, but the result of hunger and epidemics. Some two million people emigrated, including many of the highly educated. A famine in the months following the civil war took additional hundreds of thousands of lives, some claim several millions. As with almost any significant aspect of the Russian Revolution, figures on deaths are widely disputed.

From a political point of view, however, the biggest loss was the dispersal of the working class. The Vyborg district of Petrograd, the radical heart of the labor movement in 1912–14 and in 1917, virtually ceased to exist in the spring of 1918, reduced from 69,000 industrial workers in January 1917 to only 5,000. In March 1918 only a single large metalworking plant was still operating there. That spring Lenin wrote to Petrograd's workers, urging them to abandon the hope of resuscitating their factories in the near future and to leave for the countryside where they could feed their families and organize the peasants. The most committed workers and the Bolsheviks first of all fought in the Red Army. Others went to occupy positions in the new state and economic administrations. The minority that remained in the factories were demoralized by the cold, hunger, and the necessity of supplementing their meager rations, when they could, with petty trade or theft.

The working class that had been the leading force of Russia's revolutionary movement exhausted itself in its heroic struggle. The Communist Party, with 612,000 members in 1920, claimed to represent the working class and act in its name. But the working class itself ceased to exist as an independent political force capable of imposing its interests, and of posing limits, on the state that it had brought into being.

At the end of the civil war, with the working class dispersed and much of the propertied classes and intelligentsia gone, Russia was much more than before the revolution an overwhelmingly peasant society. Russian – but not only Russian – history shows that a peasantry, and all the more so an impoverished peasantry, is incapable on its own of wielding state power in its own interests.

Peasants may aspire to democracy in some form, but left to their own resources they constitute a social basis upon which dictatorships arise. A secret Soviet report on the Tambov region, one of the main centers of armed peasant opposition to the Bolsheviks at the end of the civil war, offered the following assessment of the peasants' political capacity: "Even the kulaks [well-off farmers], the most cultured, the most politically developed stratum . . . do not, in general, show any capacity for raising their sights to thinking in terms of the state as a whole; their economic [outlook] has not carried them very far beyond the outskirts of their villages or rural districts. . . . Without the guidance of parties of the . . . bourgeoisie, this movement can lead only to anarchistic rioting and bandit destruction."

Russia under Lenin after the Civil War

In 1921, as the fighting came to an end and the immediate prospect of revolution in the West receded, the Bolsheviks had to decide what to do with the state power that they held. As Marxists, they found themselves in an unexpected and highly anomalous position at the head of a socialist state that was governing a society in which the social forces and the material conditions of socialism were very weak, practically nonexistent. They recognized that, on their own, without the help of socialist states in more developed countries, they could not make a socialist society out of the existing material. But having fought so hard to retain power, they were not going to hand it over to a pro-capitalist force, which was how they saw the consequence of holding free soviet elections at that time: the Bolsheviks would certainly have won only a minority of the vote.

Instead, the party adopted a rather paradoxical program of partially restoring capitalism while tightening the party dictatorship. The New Economic Policy (NEP) introduced in the spring of 1921 restored free trade, abandoning the food monopoly. Grain requisitions were replaced with a fixed tax in kind, and the peasants were free to sell what was left on the open market. Small-scale private commercial and industrial enterprises were legalized. Inflation was eventually brought down, the ruble stabilized.

This did not mean, however, that the Bolsheviks abandoned their socialist project. If Russia independently lacked the conditions for socialism, the Soviet government could nevertheless strengthen the conditions for socialism while it awaited, and to the degree possible encouraged, a new revolutionary upsurge in the West, as well as anti-colonial struggles in the East. To do this, the state had to retain the "commanding heights" of the economy – the large industrial enterprises, banks and railroads, a monopoly on foreign trade. The goal was to restore and then expand Russia's industry, thus reinforcing the numerical and political weight of the working class in society. The state would also encourage the peasants, especially the poorer peasants, to produce on a cooperative basis, thus creating a pro-socialist base in the countryside too.

But this economic plan went in parallel with reinforcement of the party dictatorship. From a Marxist perspective, the Soviet state was in a completely unnatural situation. It was socialist in terms of its ultimate goals, but it was governing a society that spontaneously aspired to capitalism. The peasants in particular, as small independent producers, despite their largely egalitarian values constantly reproduced capitalist relations in their daily practice. The NEP itself was in large part a response to the pressure of the peasantry. The working class, the only force interested in socialism, was extremely weak. It would take considerable time before it could again become a dominant political force. At the same time, Lenin in particular believed that the peasants, at least the poor and middle majority of peasants, could be won over to collective production if the state led them in that direction through education, economic incentives, and the provision of material and technical support.

But for any of this to happen, the state had to protect its socialist character from the corrupting capitalist influences emanating from the society it governed. If the state had to be responsive to the society – coercion as a means of transforming society and administering the economy was abandoned at the end of the civil war – it could not simply reflect the peasant society, which spontaneously favored capitalist relations. Hence the revolutionary leaders sought to reinforce the party dictatorship and the unity of the Communist Party itself. This explains why it was only at the end of the civil war that the Menshevik and SR parties were definitively banned.

Meanwhile, the Communist Party itself was riven by passionate debates over policy. Self-discipline had kept these differences in check during the civil war emergency. But they now erupted with great force, creating the danger that the party, in the absence of other competing parties, would come to reflect all the divergent interests in society and in the end split. If that happened, it would lose its capacity to guide society's development in the desired socialist direction. This is why the tenth party congress in the spring of 1921 adopted a ban on organized tendencies within the party. The intention was not to suppress free debate but to safeguard the party's unity by prohibiting permanent groupings around separate platforms. This measure, which was supposed to be temporary, would play an important role in stifling democracy in the party under Stalin's leadership and, with that, destroy the party as a living political movement, as opposed to a mass organization to be mobilized and manipulated at the will of a self-appointed leadership.

But in other ways this was a period of broad social and cultural freedom. For example, the government adopted a very liberal Labor Code in 1922. Strikes were legal and treated sympathetically by the press. Trade unions enjoyed a limited, but nevertheless real, degree of independence. Cultural experimentation of all kinds flourished. National groups enjoyed recognition and a genuine degree of autonomy that gave a boost to the development of national cultures.

But from a Marxist point of view, a materialist theory, the project smacked of idealism, that is, it lacked the necessary sociopolitical underpinnings. In Marxist theory, the state is seen as dependent upon, or "reflecting," the nature of the underlying society. The state can in turn influence the society, but it can hardly change its fundamental nature unless the economic and political conditions for that are ripe. And the socioeconomic conditions for a socialist state in Russia after the civil war were certainly not ripe. Lenin, who had a firm understanding of Marxist analysis, undoubtedly realized that. But he could find no acceptable alternative. The Bolsheviks saw the Soviet state as a foothold of the world revolution. They had fought and died to save it and they were not prepared to give up. Moreover, they felt that the stabilization of western capitalism in the early 1920s was temporary, as it indeed turned out to be.

It did not take long, however, for Marxist theory to prove its strength. The Soviet state was not able for very long to "float" above the peasant society and retain its socialist character. In the years before his death at the beginning of 1924, Lenin himself became increasingly alarmed that the Soviet state was displaying despotic and Russian chauvinist traits reminiscent of the old tsarist regime. His proposals suggest that he understood that the only real solution was democratic control of the state. But he could not find a way out of the dilemma of a socialist state in a society dominated by spontaneously pro-capitalist forces. All he could propose were half-measures, which Stalin, who was accumulating power at the head of the party-state administration, carried out in a formalistic way that subverted Lenin's intention. Lenin also saw Stalin himself as personifying many of the problems he had identified and he called for Stalin's removal from his positions of power. However, by that time Lenin was too sick and politically marginal to win over the party leadership.

In the end, a new autocratic regime arose, one that displayed many of the traits of the old tsarist autocracy. Hiding behind the ideological façade of socialism, it was opposed to socialism (defined minimally as a society without exploitation), either in Russia or abroad. At the same time, the ruling group, led by Stalin, did not restore capitalism, as the left opposition in the 1920s had feared. The capitalist forces in Russia, mainly within the peasantry, proved too weak to impose their will on the state. Instead, at the end of the 1920s, the state took direct control of the entire economy, both urban and rural, and in the process deprived both workers and peasants of their rights as citizens. This totalitarian system was then presented to the Soviet people and the world as socialism.

The main social support of this new autocracy was the state administration itself, the army of full-time government and party functionaries who had backed Stalin's rise to power. But the social terrain out of which this regime arose was, in the final analysis, the impoverished, overwhelmingly peasant society that had only recently emerged from semi-feudal, tsarist barbarism and seven years of brutal warfare and destruction. The system that resulted, neither capitalist nor socialist, was historically unviable and would eventually be destroyed by its own internal contradictions.

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; German Revolution, 1918–1923; Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Marxism; Russia,

Revolution of 1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Russia, Revolutions: Sources and Contexts; Russian Civil War, 1918–1924; Russian Revolutionary Labor Upsurge, 1912–1914; Soviet Union, Fall of; Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and “Revolution from Above”

References and Suggested Readings

- Carr, E. H. (2004) The Russian Revolution: From Lenin to Stalin (1917–1929). New York: Palgrave.
- Carrère d’Encausse, H. (1981) Lenin. New York: Longman.
- Chamberlin, W. H. (1935/1965) The Russian Revolution, 2 vols. New York: Grosset & Dunlap.
- Lewin, M. (1975) Lenin’s Last Struggle. London: Pluto Press.
- Liebman, M. (1980) Leninism under Lenin. London: Merlin Press.
- Rosmer, A. (1972) Moscow Under Lenin. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Serge, V. (1984) Memoirs of a Revolutionary. London: Writers & Reader.

Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 1943

Blake W. Remington

The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising marked the first instance of open, armed resistance against the Nazis by an underground organization and was the largest Jewish revolt during the Holocaust. Although the fighting ended with the complete destruction of the ghetto and the deaths of nearly all the Jewish resistance fighters involved, news of the uprising spread quickly and influenced resistance movements in Jewish ghettos throughout Europe.

On Yom Kippur, October 12, 1940, loudspeakers located throughout Warsaw announced the establishment of the Jewish Residential Quarter of Warsaw; the Judenrat (Jewish council) was responsible for carrying out the mass relocation of over 150,000 Jews. Cordoned off from the rest of Warsaw, the ghetto was designed to bring about the death of its residents. Jews were allotted a daily ration of 184 calories, compared to 669 for Poles and 2,613 for Germans. By the summer of 1941 the ghetto population surpassed 400,000. Corpses lined the streets; typhus, starvation, and a brutal winter added to the casualties. More than 60,000 perished in the first 15 months.

On the morning of July 22, 1942, SS officers announced to Judenrat President Adam Cziernoków that deportations would begin within the next few hours. Members of the Judenrat were taken hostage; if the evacuations failed, the hostages would be shot. Each day, thousands were gathered at the Umschlagplatz (transfer point) and taken by freight train to Treblinka, the extermination camp. On September 21 the deportations ceased. A total of 265,040 Jews had been deported to their deaths.

The Jewish Fighting Organization (Zydowska Organizacja Bojowa) (ZOB) had been active since the first week of deportations. Formed out of an assembly of Jewish youth organizations, the ZOB served as the chief resistance group within the ghetto. Plagued by setbacks and internal arguments, the ZOB was initially only effective in its retaliation against known Jewish collaborators. Following the deportations, the ZOB strengthened due to the return of some of its leaders who had left the ghetto in an attempt to secure arms and external support. A separate resistance group, the Jewish Military Union (Zydowski Związek Wojskowy) (ZZW), emerged in October 1942. Comprised of right-wing Zionists, the ZZW operated independently of the ZOB.

In the aftermath of the deportations the composition of the ghetto drastically changed. Whole blocks of residential buildings were now vacant; there was no movement in the streets. Most of the 35,000 Jews remaining were healthy individuals working in shops and factories, but 25,000 more remained in hiding. Four areas were designated as residual residential enclaves and all communication between them was banned. The fate of the summer’s deportees became more apparent as rumors made their way into the ghetto, bringing reports of Jews being murdered by gas and burned alive in ovens. But as the ZOB gained control of the ghetto, despair transformed into stern determination. Many of the resistance fighters had already accepted the certainty of their fate: Yitzhak Zuckerman acknowledged that “we will be killed . . . but our honor will be victorious.”

On January 9, 1943 Reichsführer-SS Himmler visited the ghetto and subsequently ordered the deportation of 8,000 Jews. Nine days later, German police arrived to carry out the new Aktion. Resistance erupted in an organized, yet independent fashion. Because the January Aktion was mostly unexpected, the disparate members of the fighting organizations were unable to coordinate a combined retaliation. The commander of the ZOB, Mordechai Anielewicz, devised a simple plan: five armed fighters would join the ranks leading to the Umschlagplatz, wait for the signal, break from the lines, and attack the nearest Germans. The German police were taken completely by surprise. Upon hearing the pistol shots, the assembled Jews dispersed. The Germans ceased their attempted deportation after having rounded up only 6,500 Jews over a period of four days.

Two Jewish resistance fighters are arrested by German troops after the uprising in the Warsaw Ghetto during World War II. The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising is considered the largest revolt by the Jews during the Holocaust. (Getty Images)

The success of the revolt in January boosted the fighters' confidence; the numbers of the resistance increased. By spring 1943 roughly 750 fighters comprised the Jewish resistance in the Warsaw ghetto. Yet while the ZOB possessed an intimate knowledge of the ghetto's labyrinthine network of interconnected buildings and bunkers, they profoundly lacked weapons. Between January and April the leaders of the resistance increased their acquisition of arms and prepared for a protracted struggle with the Germans and their collaborators. Most importantly, the various factions of ghetto fighters had resolved to fight not for victory, but for the preservation of Jewish honor.

When the Germans approached the ghetto on the night of April 18, the inhabitants were prepared. News had traveled from the Aryan side that another Aktion was imminent; ZOB members spent the night observing the German mobilization from the rooftops. At 6 a.m. the next day, 16 Waffen-SS officers and 850 soldiers entered the ghetto. As in the January Aktion, the insurgents initiated the fighting – this time with hand grenades and a barrage of Molotov cocktails. The ghetto fighters surprised the Germans enough to force a retreat. Following this initial defeat, SS General Jürgen Stroop took over operations and recalculated its strategy. Stroop's forces reentered the ghetto and began searching for and attacking hidden bunkers, flooding underground tunnels, and pursuing the Jews through their network of passageways, but their efforts were repeatedly met with forceful resistance.

Over the next few days Stroop called upon the Waffen-SS, the German police and Wehrmacht, nationalist auxiliaries, and the Jewish police for reinforcements. Open fighting persisted and fierce battles ensued in the streets. Resistance continued even as the fighters were forced to retreat to the bunkers. Stroop's forces responded by setting entire blocks on fire. On April 23 Anielewicz wrote: "Jewish retaliation and resistance has become a fact. I have been witness to the magnificent heroic battle of the Jewish fighters." On May 8 the SS discovered what had become the ZOB's command center, at 18 Mila Street. Among the victims of the Nazi assault on the bunker was the commander of the ZOB, Mordechai Anielewicz.

Within the first two weeks of the uprising nearly every Jewish resistance fighter was killed, along with most of the non-combatant Jews remaining in the ghetto. As the ghetto burned to the ground, General Stroop decided "officially" to end the Aktion through destroying Warsaw's Great Synagogue. On May 16, 1943 Stroop pushed a button on an electronic detonator and watched the synagogue explode. Stroop titled his 75-page report of the uprising, "The Jewish Residential District in Warsaw No Longer Exists."

SEE ALSO: Hitler, Adolf (1889–1945) and German Nazism; Germany, Resistance to Nazism; Jewish Resistance to Nazism; Poland, 1956 Uprising; Poland, Revolutions, 1846–1863

References and Suggested Readings

- Bartoszewski, W. (1991) The Martyrdom and Struggle of the Jews in Warsaw under German Occupation 1939–1943. In W. T. Bartoszewski & A. Polonsky (Eds.), The Jews in Warsaw: A History. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Bartoszewski, W. & Polonsky, A. (1991) Introduction. In W. T. Bartoszewski & A. Polonsky (Eds.), The Jews in Warsaw: A History. Oxford: Blackwell.

- Friedländer, S. (2008) The Years of Extermination: Nazi Germany and the Jews, 1939–1945. New York: Harper Perennial.
- Gutman, I. (1982) The Jews of Warsaw, 1939–1943: Ghetto, Underground, Revolt. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Gutman, I. (1994) Resistance: The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.
- Kaplan, C. (1999) Scroll of Agony: The Warsaw Diary of Chaim A. Kaplan. Ed. A. I. Katsh. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Kurzman, D. (1976) The Bravest Battle: The Twenty-Eight Days of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. New York: Putnam.
- Stroop, J. (1979) The Stroop Report: The Jewish Quarter of Warsaw Is No More! Ed. S. Milton. New York: Pantheon.
- Zuckerman, Y. (1993) A Surplus of Memory: Chronicle of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Washington, George (1732–1799)

Beverly Tomek

George Washington was more than the first president of the United States, he was the very model delegates at the Constitutional Convention of 1787 had in mind when they agreed to create the executive office. Known for his military achievements and leadership ability, it is his character that captivated his contemporaries and historians alike. The embodiment of the concept of “virtue,” he was the only major leader of the Revolutionary Era to free his slaves.

The future president was born to Augustine and Mary Ball Washington, a family of moderate means, in Westmoreland County, Virginia. His formal studies were minimal – the equivalent of a modern elementary-level education. By age 15 he was an able field surveyor, gaining skills of wilderness survival as well as an appreciation for land that would feed his later interest in westward expansion and a brief career in land speculation. From an early age he was known as a practical person concerned with proper manners and outward appearances.

Washington first gained notice during the French and Indian, or Seven Years’, War. His ability to rally his fellow troops and his bravery under fire led Virginia governor Robert Dinwiddie to place him in charge of the state’s troops at the rank of colonel. Though most of the real fighting was directed from Britain and conducted by British regulars, Washington took his duties seriously, working diligently to prepare his militia recruits and maintain discipline and order. He used the skills he gained in commanding strong-willed men in his later efforts as leader of the American forces in the War for Independence. He also used the resentment he developed toward the British due to their mismanagement and ill treatment of colonial forces during this war to help fuel his efforts during the Revolution.

As the colonies began to consider armed action against the British, the Continental Congress invested Washington with “full power and authority to act as you shall think for the good and welfare of the service.” This was a dangerous move that, under the appropriate circumstances, could have opened the door to a military dictatorship. Washington agreed, however, that Congress would retain the ultimate power.

Washington proved an able leader during the Revolution. In addition to making wise tactical decisions, often managing to immobilize British forces, he made effective use of foreign advisors such as Prussian general Friedrich von Steuben, an aide-de-camp to Frederick the Great. He also used important victories, such as that at Saratoga, to convince the French to enter the war on the side of the colonists. Just as importantly, he employed his skills of leadership to keep his troops going despite their lack of pay and inadequate supplies, especially during the winter of 1777–8 at Valley Forge, Pennsylvania.

Though American mythology celebrates the role of the citizen-soldier, as embodied in the volunteer Minutemen, the reality is that Washington realized early on that he needed more help than they alone could offer. As a result, he set out to build a Continental Army of regular soldiers. This act was, in itself, revolutionary. The prevailing belief at the time was that only volunteer soldiers with property, and thus a true stake in society, could be relied upon and that soldiers recruited from among the poorer ranks would be naturally untrustworthy. Washington, however, realized that common people were essential, not only in filling the ranks of the army, but also in producing the supplies. He fought to ensure that his soldiers were well paid and adequately supplied, even when the Continental Congress made these efforts difficult. He was known among the rank and file for sharing the dangers and hardships they faced. At the same time, he worked to minimize suspicion of his troops by ensuring tight discipline and order. One of his main goals was to serve as a moderating force between the left wing's complete support for popular rule and the right wing's fear of too much democracy. When some of the army's officers grew disenchanted with Congress's failure to pay them as promised, he used his personal sway over them to convince them to settle peacefully. As a result, Congress granted the officers five years' pay and the tensions ended. After the fighting ended, Washington retired his commission to the Continental Congress in a highly symbolic display of the virtue he was, and is, well known for.

Virtue in the eighteenth-century context was a very important characteristic, essential in all good leaders. It meant, first and foremost, a willingness to sacrifice one's own interests for the greater good. It also meant restraint from selfish or passionate behavior. This characteristic is what led members of the Second Continental Congress to offer him complete power as commander in chief and the delegates at the Constitutional Convention to create the executive office with him specifically in mind. In an age where many people held to the "commonwealth ideology," or the fear that power always corrupts, and when a war had just been fought to break away from a system that had been thus corrupted, it took a great deal of faith to award one man the kind of power that was invested in George Washington.

Washington the president knew just as well as Washington the general how to lead and when to relinquish power. He was inaugurated in New York City on April 30, 1789 and labored from the beginning under the realization that his actions would set important precedents for the future. He often sought the advice of those he considered more knowledgeable, the most famous example being his reliance upon Alexander Hamilton for advice in creating a financial plan to get the new nation on its feet. He also continued his efforts to moderate disagreements among those around him and discouraged party affiliation.

Of all of the founding generation, Washington was perhaps the least educated, but he was also perhaps the most open and willing to learn from experience. Unlike some Enlightenment figures, notably Thomas Jefferson, who disdained organized Christianity, Washington saw spiritual and social value in religion. While some of his cohorts spoke publicly about the evils of slavery yet failed to do anything concrete to fight the system, Washington never spoke out against the institution yet was the only one to free his slaves in his will. He ultimately rejected slavery, not out of some abstract philosophical consideration, but simply because he realized it violated the revolutionary principles he fought for. His role as leader of what became a racially integrated army also gave him first-hand experience that led him to respect blacks and rethink their bondage. Not only did he provide for his slaves' freedom, he also provided for their support and education to help them establish themselves.

The will that freed his slaves went into effect after he died on December 14, 1799. He died after suffering from cold symptoms for two days.

SEE ALSO: American Revolution of 1776; Paine, Thomas (1737–1809); Shays' Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Elkins, S. & McKittrick, E. (1993) The Age of Federalism: The Early American Republic, 1788–1800. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Martin, J. K. & Lender, M. E. (1982) A Respectable Army: The Military Origins of the Republic, 1763–1789. Wheeling, IL: Harlan Davidson.
- Wienczek, H. (2003) An Imperfect God: George Washington, His Slaves and the Creation of America. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux.
- Wood, G. S. (2006) Revolutionary Characters: What Made the Founder Different. New York: Penguin.

Wathbah of 1948

Johan Franzén

In late 1947 and early 1948, Iraqi and British politicians sat down in London to "renegotiate" Iraqi–British relations. Saleh Jabr, the prime minister, led the Iraqi delegation. His appointment in March 1947 had been intended to ease the pressure from the Shi'i part of the population. Being a Shi'i himself, it was thought that his appointment, as the first Shi'i to occupy that post, would appease growing anti-British sentiment that had been brewing among the politically conscious since 1920.

When these "negotiations" produced nothing more than a revision of the 1930 Anglo-Iraqi Treaty, protests began. These protests have come to be known in the annals of Iraqi popular history as al-Wathbah – "the Awakening." The first phase of the Wathbah started on January 3, 1948 when the Iraqi foreign minister, Fadil al-Jamali, who was a member of the Iraqi delegation in London, made the claim that much of the criticism against the old treaty was without justification and was a result of oppositional party politics. The nationalists were incensed. On January 5, students from a Baghdad secondary school responded by demonstrating on the streets and were met by mounted police. When the students failed to disperse, they were fired upon. On January 6, the right-wing nationalist Istiqlal (Independence) Party came out to support angry students now striking throughout the capital.

On January 16, when the terms of the new treaty were finalized, new strikes and protests were now being coordinated by the illegal Iraqi Communist Party (ICP), steering them toward a more radical stance. A Student Cooperation Committee, controlled by the ICP, was the driving and uniting force of the protests. Initially, the Committee managed to unite with the Istiqlal Party, Progressive Democrats, Kurdish Democratic Party (KDP), and the National Democratic Party (NDP). But on January 19, the Istiqlal Party ordered its student supporters to disassociate, leaving the ICP as the driving force behind the Wathbah.

On January 20, the protests reached another level as the Shurugis, impoverished rural migrants from the 'Amarah province living in the shantytowns of Baghdad, and radical railway workers joined the protests. Faced with this united front, the police began firing indiscriminately into the crowds, resulting in several casualties. The following day, while escorting their fallen comrades, students were again attacked by police inside the Royal Hospital, leaving two dead and another 17 wounded. These acts incensed the public even further as crowds rushed onto the streets armed with whatever they could lay their hands on. Suddenly, the streets of central Baghdad were transformed into a battle ground.

While the Istiqlal Party had decided to stop its protests, it did little to appease the other parties. Unwisely, Saleh Jabr further incensed the crowds by announcing on January 22 that the protests were only the work of a few seditionists. On the following day, huge crowds poured onto the streets of Baghdad, with no immediate confrontation by the police. On January 26, Jabr, after returning from London, announced in a public statement that the terms of the treaty would soon be explained in detail, insinuating that the protests somehow had been caused by a misunderstanding. Angry protesters took to the streets again, only to be met by the machine guns of the police. The following day, crowds from all over Baghdad made their way toward the center of the city to join forces and deal a decisive blow to the regime. The first skirmishes took place in the al-Rasafah neighborhood, where police again fired upon the crowds. Four people were left dead, but the angry crowds nevertheless managed to push the police back and headed for Rashid Street, Baghdad's main avenue, but were eventually met by police reinforcements.

The fighting would continue all day and end in a massacre. However, the death-defying crowds showed no signs of relenting, and eventually the police, realizing the futility of the situation, withdrew. The total death toll of the carnage is not known. Many of the bodies were quickly buried by the authorities without being registered, but the figure is believed to be somewhere between three and four hundred. The Wathbah would have important implications for Iraqi politics, beginning with the regent's ability to repudiate the treaty and discredit the regime. This not only weakened the monarchy but also eroded the legitimacy of the political process.

SEE ALSO: Iraq, Anti-British Nationalists; Iraq, Revolt of 1920; Iraq, Revolution of 1958

References and Suggested Readings

- Ismael, T. (2008) The Rise and Fall of the Communist Party in Iraq. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kingston, P. (2002) Britain and the Politics of Modernization in the Middle East, 1945–1958. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Polk, W. R. (2005) Understanding Iraq: The Whole Sweep of Iraqi History, from Genghis Khan's Mongols to the Ottoman Turks to the British Mandate to the American Occupation. New York: HarperCollins.
- Salucci, I. (2005) A People's History of Iraq: The Iraqi Communist Party, Workers' Movements and the Left, 1924–2004. Chicago: Haymarket Books.

Webb, Sidney (1859–1947) and Beatrice (1858–1943)

Andrea Geddes Poole

Sidney and Beatrice Webb were social reformers, influential early members of the Fabian Society, and principal founders of both the London

English author, Labour Party member, and social reformer Sidney James Webb (1859–1947) with his wife, socialist thinker and writer Beatrice Webb (1858–1943). Both were influential members of the Fabian Society, an organization that sought to inform on the evils of capitalism. The Webbs were prominent theorists of labor unions and social reform. (Getty Images)

School of Economics and the New Statesman. Their writings on trade unionism, the cooperative movement, labor history, and local government had a considerable effect on contemporary political theory and practice. Theirs was, on the face of it, an unlikely partnership. Beatrice Potter Webb was the daughter of a wealthy businessman. Sidney Webb, in contrast, was the son of a London shopkeeper. Their intellectual partnership, however, was productive. They married in 1892 and for the next 50 years jointly worked toward creating a science of society.

Following Beatrice Webb's appointment in 1905 to the Royal Commission on the Poor Law, both Webbs applied themselves to researching and identifying deficiencies in the existing poor law structure. Their dissenting minority report advocated the abolition of the existing structure of poor law guardians, replacing it with specialized agencies to meet the needs of the sick, the aged, and the very young. But the Webbs worked within the political system as well. Sidney Webb served as chairman of the Technical/Education Board of the London County Council. During his tenure he restructured London's educational system, creating a scholarship ladder that could take talented London schoolchildren from elementary school on to university.

Throughout the Webbs' work ran a consistent respect for expertise and the abilities of the trained and experienced professional, as opposed to the talents of the gifted amateur. In 1894, the Webbs persuaded their colleagues in the Fabian Society to use a recent bequest to establish a modern, research-based school, radically different from the gentlemanly, classical education of Oxford and Cambridge. The London School of Economics (LSE) was to be an institution that would produce professional economists, political and social theorists, and public administrators. As a member of the Labour Party's executive from 1915, Sidney Webb drafted most of the party's postwar policy statements, including the 1918 manifesto, Labour and the New Social Order, and key elements of the party's constitution. He went into parliament in 1922, representing the Durham mining district of Seaham. He served as president of the Board of Trade in 1924 and as colonial secretary from 1929 to 1931.

Both the Webbs had been highly critical of Bolshevism in its early stages and in the Labour manifesto of 1918, Sidney Webb had attempted to enunciate the Labour Party's position on nationalization of key industries and common public ownership of land as an "anti-Bolshevist" but essentially anti-capitalist and parliamentary alternative. However, by the late 1920s, faced with the collapse of Great Britain's economy, the Webbs toured the Soviet Union and returned to Britain impressed not only with the apparent ability of central planning to avoid the boom and bust cycle of free-market capitalism, but equally with the collective assumption of self-denial and the subsuming of individual needs to the common good. Their book, Soviet Communism: A New Civilization? (1935), appeared to many to show the Webbs' abandoning of their belief in gradual social and political evolution. Although for many the Webbs' reputation as political theorists was tarnished by their faith in the Soviet system, their legacy is found in the emergence of the postwar welfare state, the predominance of planning and expertise, and the rejection of unbridled, free-market capitalism.

SEE ALSO: Britain, Trade Union Movement; Socialism, Britain

References and Suggested Readings

Dahrendorf, R. (1995) LSE: A History of the London School of Economics and Political Science, 1895–1995. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

McBriar, A. M. (1962) Fabian Socialism and English Politics, 1884–1918. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Muggeridge, K. & Adam, R. (1968) Beatrice Webb: A Life, 1858–1943. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

Royden, J. H. (2000) The Life and Times of Sidney and Beatrice Webb 1858–1905: The Formative Years. London: St. Martin's Press.

Wei Jingsheng (b. 1950)

J. Megan Greene

Wei Jingsheng became a symbol of the disaffection of Chinese intellectuals with the communist government following his bold call for democracy in 1979. In 1978, China's premier, Deng Xiaoping, called upon the nation to follow a new path to greatness by implementing the Four Modernizations of industry, agriculture, science and technology, and national defense. At the same time, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) made it clear that it now welcomed intellectual participation in shaping this new path for China's development. In this heady atmosphere of change and considerably increased political openness that followed years of repression of intellectuals in accordance with Mao Zedong's dictum that it was better to be red than expert, many intellectuals began to express their views on politics as well as economic development in an array of new journals and study groups and in other public venues such as Beijing's "democracy wall." It was in this environment that in 1978, Wei Jingsheng, a 29-year-old electrician employed at the Beijing zoo, posted a big character poster on democracy wall that called upon Deng to implement a fifth modernization, democracy.

Like many urban Chinese of his generation, Wei was a member of a Red Guard unit during the Cultural Revolution (1966–76). During that time, he traveled around northern China, was eventually sent down to the countryside with other Red Guards, and toward the end of the Cultural Revolution he served for a time in the People's Liberation Army. Wei's poster and later essays reflected many of the observations that he had been making regarding Chinese politics ever since his experience as a Red Guard. In them, he called for power to be given to the masses, who, he argued, should have the right to replace their representatives when they misgoverned or deceived them. Wei also published essays in the journal Explorations, which he co-edited with a physicist by the name of Yang Guang, which were directly critical of Deng for opposing democratic reforms, and which called upon the government to have greater respect for human rights, and in particular the right to express political ideas contrary to those of the CCP.

Not the only protester against the tyranny of the state, Wei was perhaps the best known, and many other intellectuals and students found his call for a fifth modernization an exciting point around which to rally in the spring of 1979. They were also emboldened by his willingness to sign his own name to his work. Along with other intellectuals, Wei was arrested in May 1979 and charged with inciting counterrevolutionary activity and giving information to a foreign journalist. In October 1979 he was sentenced to 15 years in prison. Released in September 1993, having served 14 years of his sentence, Wei returned to publishing essays critical of the Chinese government, many of which he had originally written on toilet paper while in prison. He was arrested again after less than six months and sentenced to another 14-year term, but in 1997, after serving four years of his term, he was removed from prison and put on a plane to the United States, where he remains active as an advocate for political and human rights reforms in China.

SEE ALSO: China, Student Protests, 20th Century; Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949

References and Suggested Readings

Wei Jingsheng (1997) Courage to Stand Alone – Letters from Prison and Other Writings. New York: Viking. www.weijingsheng.org.

Wells, Ida B. (1862–1931) and the anti-lynching campaign

Summer D. Leibensperger

Best known as the pioneer of the international anti-lynching campaign, Ida B. Wells-Barnett was a civil rights activist who fought for women's suffrage and against racial discrimination and segregation. A skilled protest writer and speaker, Wells used graphic descriptions of rape and lynching to show that the underlying cause of

Ida B. Wells Barnett (1862–1931) was a journalist and Progressive reformer who fought for civil rights and women's suffrage. She is best known for her efforts to call attention to the atrocities of lynching. She also fought against racial segregation and helped to found the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). (Getty Images) this form of racial brutality was reinforcement of white hegemony.

Wells was born on July 16, 1862, in Holly Springs, Mississippi to James and Elizabeth Wells. Although born into slavery, Wells and her siblings grew up in a home her father owned, and she attended Rust College. In 1878, Wells's parents and her youngest brother died from yellow fever. Wells kept her family together and supported them all by teaching at a rural school. She later moved to Memphis, Tennessee to teach, but, in 1891, was dismissed from her teaching position after she wrote about the inequality of segregated education.

Wells began writing for church bulletins and weeklies in 1887, and this grew into an editorship at Free Speech (where she became part owner). After 1891, she focused entirely on writing for Free Speech. In 1892, Wells's articles about the March 9 lynching of three black businessmen who operated a grocery that had taken business away from white grocers provoked a reaction that changed Wells's life. She was in Philadelphia when a mob destroyed the presses of Free Speech and vowed to lynch her. After receiving warnings not to return to Memphis, she stayed in the north and began writing for the New York Age about the evils of lynching.

In 1892 Wells published Southern Horrors: Lynch Law in All Its Phases. This work, along with A Red Record: Tabulated Statistics and Alleged Causes of Lynchings in the United States 1892–1893–1894, published in 1895, contained graphic descriptions of lynching violence and provided statistics that proved that sexual offences (rape) against white women were not the principal reason for lynching black men.

Between 1893 and 1895, Wells conducted international (primarily in England) and national speaking tours as part of the effort to raise awareness about lynching. She also helped set up anti-lynching organizations in both the US and abroad. The American publicity related to this tour was often critical of Wells, but it enabled her to get her message over to whites.

Wells also attended or led various protests, lobbied for an anti-lynching bill to be passed, personally investigated lynchings, spoke at trials, and was involved in the establishment of a number of organizations and clubs, including the National Association of Colored Women (1896) and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) (1909).

Traditionally, whites had justified lynchings by arguing that the black men they lynched had raped white women. Wells's efforts, however, exposed this lie. She argued that many so-called rape cases were actually cases of consensual sexual contact between white women and black men. She also drew attention to the often-overlooked experiences of black women who were raped by white men. Ultimately, Wells demonstrated that lynching functioned as a mechanism to reinforce the social, economic, and political oppression of blacks by showing that it was used as justification for torturing black men, most of whom had really done nothing more than succeed economically or socially.

Wells is also known for suing a railroad (1884), protesting against the exclusion of black Americans in the 1893 Chicago Columbian Exposition, forming a settlement house for blacks modeled on Jane Addams's efforts, and fighting for universal suffrage. She also ran for Illinois state senate in 1930 but lost. In 1895, Wells married Ferdinand Barnett, a lawyer and founder of the first black newspaper in Chicago, and they had four children. She died of kidney disease on March 25, 1931.

In some sense Wells's life ended in frustration; she was either pushed out of organizations she helped to form, or resigned when she believed the organization was not active enough. The anti-lynching movement never resulted in the passing of federal anti-lynching legislation: even though over 200 anti-lynching bills were introduced, none was passed by the US senate (for which the senate apologized in 2005). Wells laid the groundwork, though, by forcing a reconsideration of the nature and role of black Americans and by leading the way for a number of efforts ranging from anti-lynching to universal suffrage.

The anti-lynching effort was pursued by the NAACP (which adopted some of her tactics) and, in the 1930s, by the Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching. The number of lynchings per year generally declined after the early 1890s, and several states had passed anti-lynching laws by 1940.

SEE ALSO: African American Resistance, Jim Crow Era; African American Resistance, Reconstruction Era; Radical Reconstruction, United States, Promise and Failure of

References and Suggested Readings

- Bederman, G. (1992) "Civilization," the Decline of Middle-Class Manliness, and Ida B. Wells's Antilynching Campaign (1892–94). Radical History Review 52: 4–30.
- Sterling, D. (1988) Black Foremothers: Three Lives, 2nd ed. New York: Feminist Press.
- Wells, I. B. (1970) Crusade for Justice: The Autobiography of Ida B. Wells. Ed. A. M. Duster. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Zangrando, R. L. (1980) The NAACP Crusade Against Lynching, 1909–1950. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

Wesley, John (1703–1791), Methodism, and social reform

Srividhya Swaminathan

John Wesley

John Wesley was at the forefront of the religious revival in Britain during the eighteenth century and his influence spanned church and secular interests. He was born into the large family of the rector of Epworth and steeped in religious doctrine at a very young age. After completing his BA at Christ Church, Oxford in 1724, he decided to seek holy orders on the advice of his father. After completing his MA in 1727, he was ordained in the Anglican Church in 1728. Wesley's copious writings document the spiritual journey of a man committed to social change.

His sense of Christianity from his early studies focused on rigorous self-examination and practicing various forms of religious discipline that would later shape Methodist doctrine. While serving as a tutor at Oxford he formed the Holy Club to promote piety and morality, which came under heavy criticism for its religious excesses. In 1735 he traveled to Georgia under the auspices of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Initially sent to convert the Native Americans, Wesley soon found himself ministering to the colonists. He preached a strict adherence to church doctrine in order to curb the excesses of the colonists, which did not win him any great support. Upon returning to England in something of a disgrace, he had an intense conversion experience in 1738 and entered fully into the evangelical revival that was sweeping England. Wesley left the notion that good works alone could lead to salvation and became more interested in preaching Christian discipline to organize life and work in the pursuit of perfection. Salvation occurred solely through faith, not works; however, this idea did not keep Wesley from pursuing social reform.

Methodism

John Wesley broke with conservative Anglican orthodoxy and embraced the charismatic preaching style that evoked religious renewal across Great Britain. He allied with George Whitefield, a dynamic and powerful orator, and began a long career as itinerant preacher. Wesley and Whitefield traveled throughout Great Britain and her colonies, bringing the doctrine of absolute faith to disenfranchised members of the population. Though Wesley quarreled and eventually parted from Whitefield over a doctrinal issue, the two are often seen as the most charismatic religious figures to emerge in the eighteenth century. Wesley eschewed staid High Church practices and preached to large audiences in open fields. He organized his followers into smaller prayer groups devoted to reading and understanding scripture. He also encouraged those followers to use their personal experience with faith to deliver their own sermons, creating an entire cadre of lay preachers.

These practices disturbed Anglican orthodoxy and Wesley's followers soon became known as Methodists. Though the term was more widely applied to Calvinists, followers of Whitefield, and evangelical ministers, Wesley's organized congregations came to be the primary group associated with the term by the mid-century. Wesleyan Methodists did not see themselves as independent of the Anglican Church, and only in the nineteenth century, long after Wesley's death, did followers break away and establish a separate church. In fact, most Methodists, including Wesley, allied themselves with the conservative Tory party, so the push for reform did not come from radical ideology. Rather, Methodists practiced the doctrine of charity and ministered to the poor and disenfranchised in society. For example, Wesley accepted and promoted sermonizing by women in his lay ministry, an act not supported by the Anglican Church. In Advice to the People call'd Methodists, Wesley defined his followers as the "steady Imitation of Him they worship . . . particularly, in Justice, Mercy, and Truth, or universal Love filling the Heart, and governing the Life" (Wesley 1745: 3).

Social Reform

Wesley's most active contribution to social reform came after years of travel and observation. He was an avid reader and keenly interested in understanding his world. He corresponded with the Quaker Anthony Benezet and read with interest Some Historical Account of Guinea (1771). The friendship with Benezet may have also acquainted him with Granville Sharp, and he avidly followed the historic Somerset case, in which an impassioned Sharp exhaustively researched English civil law to prove that slavery was not legal in England. Since he had spent time in Georgia as a youth, he would probably have witnessed firsthand the practice of slavery in the colonies.

Two years after the decision in the Somerset case, Wesley published Thoughts upon Slavery (1774). Though the text was primarily lifted from Benezet's work, Wesley admonished slavers and masters alike for participating in the "execrable" trade. He advocated abolition, not only of the trade but of slavery itself, arguing "Liberty is the right of every human creature, as soon as he breathes the vital air" (Wesley 1774: 27). His essay was so popular that it went through four editions. When the movement to abolish the slave trade gained momentum in the 1790s, abolitionist societies throughout Great Britain distributed free tracts to educate the public about the atrocities of the trade. Wesley's essay was reprinted and widely distributed. He traveled to Bristol in 1788 and preached an anti-slavery sermon that was violently disrupted, most probably by slavery advocates. In the last months of his life he wrote a letter to William Wilberforce encouraging him to continue his campaign against the slave trade.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Slavery Movement, United States, 1700–1870; Benezet, Anthony (1713–1784); Sharp, Granville (1735–1813); Wilberforce, William (1759–1833)

References and Suggested Readings

- Carey, B. (2005) British Abolitionism and the Rhetoric of Sensibility: Writing, Sentiment and Slavery, 1760–1807. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Hindmarsh, D. B. (1996) John Newton and the English Evangelical Tradition: Between the Conversions of Wesley and Wilberforce. New York: Clarendon Press.
- Kent, J. (2002) Wesley and the Wesleyans. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Rack, H. D. (2004) John Wesley. In The Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Wesley, J. (1745) Advice to the People call'd Methodists, 3rd ed. Bristol.
- Wesley, J. (1774) Thoughts upon Slavery, 2nd ed. London.

West German "new left"

Belinda Davis

The West German "new left" (or extraparliamentary movement) refers generally to a broad movement, coming to prominence in the 1960s, constituted primarily of younger activists who sought to realize freedom and democracy. The movement was very much part of the larger protest of the period, but also bore distinct characteristics. West German activists perceived freedom and democracy as promised, but not delivered, by a postwar government and society defined in contrast both to the Nazi past and to the contemporary Cold War enemy. In pursuit of these principles, activists sought changes from the most global (e.g., concerning the Vietnam War and brutality in Iran) to the most local and personal (e.g., challenging conventional living and social arrangements). The "new left" and postwar protest movement are conventionally defined in West Germany as constituted primarily by the Social Democratic Student Organization (Sozialistische Deutsche Studentenbund) (SDS) and other university students. This was an important, although not the only, component of the West German movement in the longer history of this movement, which stretched from the late 1950s to the early 1980s, and reflected the actions of hundreds of thousands of protesters in the two "capitals" of protest (West Berlin and Frankfurt) and well beyond.

Forms and Content of Protest

Early campaigns, beginning in the early 1960s, included demands for educational reform – at all levels of schooling – in response to perceived residual authoritarian practices, and a corresponding sense of being silenced and ignored. Activists quickly applied these concerns more broadly to combat similar practices they found in government and in society. These activists were among the first to push successfully for serious encounters with the Nazi past – and with its residues in the present. The very forms of protest were communicative in themselves, redefining popular political participation for the era. Protesters defied efforts to manage their self-expression through narrow and what seemed often fruitless channels, for example, through formal "student councils" and other top-down methods of organizing. They engaged in an infinite range of creative forms, inspired by direct circumstances – and by the idea that serious politics could be fun – often provoking others to win attention to their concerns. Examples range from the more conventional demonstrations that filled city and village centers to protest imposition of "emergency laws" that would limit public expression, to a tiny group of Hamburg women who bared their breasts in public to garner public attention for an imprisoned co-activist and comment simultaneously on women's position in society. West Berlin's "Commune I" was one important source of inspiration for these more provocative and "situationist" modes of protest. An example of members' provocative style is a 1967 flyer calling for the burning of department stores, so that complacent West German consumers could "feel the crispiness" of burning North Vietnamese villagers. This last example has provided ammunition for some to suggest that the larger protest movement was fundamentally violent, in character or impact, and begot in turn the physically violent acts carried out by a tiny number (primarily in the Red Army Faction) that dominated media coverage throughout the 1970s. However, this argument ignores the non-violent practices of the overwhelming number of protesters – despite the brutality they often faced from police and others. The argument also draws attention from the lasting successes of the movement, from democratization of the political culture to the breakdown of repressive norms governing social roles and relations.

Early History and Transnationalism

From the beginning, the West German movement reflected the larger movement's transnationalism, across Cold War boundaries and well beyond European borders. Unprecedented postwar mobility, coupled with likewise new heterogeneity in the country (from American GIs to Turkish "guest workers"), meant that prospective activists challenged their norms and expectations, often still as schoolchildren, through personal contact, as well as via a globalizing media. Activists borrowed the term "new left" from Britons, thereby distancing themselves from a Stalinist left after 1956 – and from the West German parliamentary left, who were perceived as uninterested in change. They were inspired by the non-violent direct action of American civil rights activists, as well as by American rock 'n' roll. They drew on notions of freedom, democracy, and authoritarianism conceived by Frankfurt School sociologists, circulating from Germany to America and back. Activists drew on examples set by Iranian, Greek, and African students on West German campuses from the late 1950s, who protested their governments back home. Thus, in 1964, German- and African-born demonstrators together decried the official visit of Congolese dictator Moïse Tschombé to West Berlin. Activists also looked to indigenous examples and traditions of protest. In a move some see as the official start of the movement, charismatic activist Rudi Dutschke, an East German student at West Berlin's Free University, borrowed a concept from postwar peace activists, declaring in 1966 the need for an "extraparliamentary organization" (APO). The APO, explicitly imagined as bringing together a broad population well beyond students, was to provide some means of political resistance in the face of a new grand coalition government that left no parliamentary opposition – and that was led by a former Nazi party member, Kurt-Georg Kiesinger.

Intensification of Activity: 1967–1968

A watershed moment came on June 2, 1967, a moment that both disoriented those already closely involved and galvanized the participation of tens of thousands more. On this day, demonstrators peacefully assembled around the country to protest the state visit of Iranian Shah Reza Pahlevi. In West Berlin, police violently dispersed the demonstration, beating protesters and bystanders alike with billy clubs. Police killed Benno Ohnesorg, a theology student, new father, and first-time protester, shooting him in the back of the head as he knelt on the ground. This seemed to confirm activists' worst fears about the West German state, and contributed to a year of especially intense and populous activity. This included massive demonstrations against the proposed reinstatement of emergency laws (associated with Hitler's rise to power) and the international Vietnam Conference, convening in West Berlin in February 1968. The "miracle year" 1968 itself became as much a time of anguish as of hope, drawing from international and local sources, from the crushing of the Prague Spring in Czechoslovakia, to the attempt on Dutschke's life (from which he died in 1979), to the ultimate enactment of the emergency laws. Crushed in the criminal justice system and disillusioned within, activists splintered off, a tiny few proclaiming the need for violence against "the Auschwitz generation," some joining new parties looking to East Germany or to China, and others opting for more mainstream political means, joining the Social Democrat Party (SPD), finding hope in reforms promised by new SPD chancellor Willi Brandt.

The Protest Continues

The 1970s saw a burgeoning of popular extraparliamentary activism, now manifested primarily in underground and subcultural form. Thousands of groupings emerged across West Germany and West Berlin, from the enduring new social movements (anti-nuclear, environmental, and, above all, feminist), to the more fleeting "citizens' initiatives" forming around every imaginable cause, to experiments in lifestyle, community, education, media, production, and commerce, designed to challenge existing norms, and, for many, to build a new self from the inside out. This proliferation of a subculture was not epiphenomenal to the "60s movement" but was arguably the most popular and influential component. Indeed, despite harsh measures by Helmut Schmidt's SPD government to contain protest and an overall hysteria whipped up by the yellow press over terrorism and all protest, by the end of the decade there was an overall if grudging legitimacy of the civic right to express oneself politically beyond the ballot box and party membership (officials also lowered the voting age from 21 to 18, as in several countries during the era). Activists had gained substantial public and official attention to and action on many of the issues they had identified. Many activists coalesced in 1980 in a new formal political party, the Greens, which has worked with some success to open up the political process, and which influenced the formation of like parties in many other countries. Popular former foreign minister and Green Party leader Joschka Fischer emerged from extraparliamentary activity in the 1970s. The broader movement played a major role in inspiring and enabling the peace demonstrations of the 1980s, which brought millions of West Germans to the streets. This was the most populous and most diverse movement in German history to that time, and part of the largest international movement ever. This longer history helps challenge characterizations of 1968 as a revolution versus the product of longer-term changes in culture and politics, suggesting rather a far more interactive process. These changes in political culture, including a broader sense of politics, of what constitutes democratic participation in politics, and of the relation between the personal and the political, have in significant measure been lasting transformations.

SEE ALSO: Dutschke, Rudi (1940–1979); Germany, Red Army Faction (Baader-Meinhof Group); Kelly, Petra (1947–1992); Situationists; Student Movements

References and Suggested Readings

- Baumann, M. "Bommi" (1979) Terror or Love: Bommi Baumann's Own Story of His Life as a West German Urban Guerrilla. New York: Grove Press.
- Davis, B. et al. (Eds.) (2008) Changing the World, Changing Oneself: Political Protest and Collective Identities in the 1960s/70s West Germany and US. New York: Berghahn Books.
- Dutschke, R. (1980) Mein langer Marsch: Reden, Schriften und Tagebücher aus zwanzig Jahren. Ed. G. Dutschke-Klotz et al. Reinbek bei Hamburg: Rowohlt.
- Enzensberger, U. (2004) Die Jahre der Kommune 1. Berlin 1967–1969. Cologne: Kiepenheuer & Witsch.
- Fichter, T. & Lönnendonker, S. (2007) Kleine Geschichte des SDS. Essen: Klartext.
- Fraser, R. (Ed.) (1988) 1968: A Student Generation in Revolt. London: Chatto & Windus.
- Kätzel, U. (2002) Die 68erinnen. Berlin: Rowohlt.
- Koopmans, R. (Ed.) (1995) Democracy from Below: New Social Movements and the Political System in West Germany. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Kraushaar, W. (1998) Frankfurter Schule und Studentenbewegung. Von der Flaschenpost zum Molotowcocktail 1946 bis 1995, 3 vols. Hamburg: Rogner & Bernhard.
- Kraushaar, W. (2000) 1968 als Mythos, Chiffre und Zäsur. Hamburg: Hamburger Edition.
- Thomas, N. (2003) Protest Movements in 1960s West Germany: A Social History of Dissent and Democracy. New York: Berg.
- Von Dirke, S. (1997) All Power to the Imagination! The West German Counterculture from the Student Movement to the Greens. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.

Whiskey Rebellion

Nathan King

In 1791 the sapling federal government, in dire need of money to pay off revolutionary war debt, imposed an excise tax on whiskey. Prior to imposition of the tax, westerners sought protection from Native American attacks and a treaty with Spain for the use of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers from the federal government. Neither of these occurred. The tax thus embittered already angry westerners, particularly Western Pennsylvanians and Virginians, against the federal government. In addition the tax had to be paid in money and not whiskey, which was frequently used as currency. Also, under the new law, tax evaders would be tried in federal court in Philadelphia. Almost immediately upon learning of the tax, Western Pennsylvanians and Virginians voiced their dissent through petitions, protests, and the formation of democracy clubs. President Washington believed these clubs were subversive of the power of the constitution and undermined the federal government.

Through 1791 and into 1792 the protest of the tax escalated into violence against the tax collector. In an attempt to placate the rising insurrection, Congress, at the behest of Alexander Hamilton, lowered the tax rates and agreed to allow monthly payments. The rebellion continued, and by September Washington proclaimed that any organization or assemblage that obstructed federal law would be dissolved.

By 1793 collection of the excise tax had halted and the federal government had slowed because of a yellow fever epidemic that swept through Philadelphia. Rebels took the opportunity to demand the repeal of the excise tax. Their demands were not met. Radical rebellion leaders changed strategy in 1794 and harassed anyone who followed the tax law. Distillers who registered under the excise tax law were targeted. Congress took heed of the new tactics and on June 5, 1794, amended the excise tax law to allow for local trials for accused tax evaders and special licenses for small distilleries. However, that same day, Congress passed taxes on snuff and sugar and the rebels' fears of expansion of taxes came true.

By midsummer of 1794, federal agents began arresting supposed tax evaders and violence ensued. On July 16, 40 rebels surrounded the mansion of John Neville and demanded his resignation as inspector of revenue for Western Pennsylvania. Prior to his appointment Neville was against the excise tax, which spurred the rebels to believe he was bribed. The rebels advanced upon Neville's yard but were driven back by his slaves. In all, four were wounded and one killed in the skirmish. They retreated and returned later with a small army led by Captain James McFarlane. Ten federal soldiers were set to defend Neville's mansion against the rebels. After negotiations failed, rebels set fire to several estate buildings and exchanged gunfire with the troops. Hearing what he thought was a call for a parley, McFarlane came out from hiding and was shot. The troops guarding the mansion surrendered as it filled with smoke. Subsequently, rebels looted the mansion. Neville and his family escaped before the rebels entered his property. Upon hearing of McFarlane's death, rebel David Bradford rallied militia forces at Braddock's Field and marched into Pittsburgh, intending to burn the city to the ground to send a message to the federal government. Pittsburgh residents greeted the rebels with a party-like atmosphere by offering them food, whiskey, and agreeing to banish all federalist sympathizers. Pittsburgh was spared. After the Pittsburgh incident, President Washington and Secretary Hamilton decided that the federal government must take action or else face full-scale revolution.

Although the excise tax was disobeyed throughout Georgia, Kentucky, North Carolina, and Virginia, the most violent opposition occurred in Western Pennsylvania, and suppression of the rebellion there would send a message to other insurrectionists. Although it was decided that military coercion was the best option, Washington wanted to appear conciliatory by sending a series of peace commissioners to Western Pennsylvania to meet with insurgents. As an army was being assembled to march into Western Pennsylvania, particularly Allegheny, Westmoreland, Fayette, and Washington counties, moderate dissidents like Albert Gallatin persuaded some insurgents to stop their violence. By October 1794, a 12,000-plus army was assembled to stop the insurrection. Through October and into November the army marched into Western Pennsylvania, and the Whiskey Rebellion appeared to dissipate before its arrival. Some rebels were apprehended, but none were die-hard rebels like David Bradford because they had escaped further west. By late November, 20 rebels were sent to Philadelphia for trial and two were found guilty of treason. Washington pardoned both of them. In celebration of the end of the Whiskey Rebellion, he declared February 19 a holiday to give thanks.

Although the rebels were not successful in the immediate repeal of the excise tax, the Whiskey Rebellion, and more specifically the response from the federal government, did solve some of the region's problems. The army's westward march pumped money into the starving economy and jumpstarted it. Within a year of the rebellion westerners were given protection from Native American attacks through the Jay Treaty and the Treaty of Greenville. Furthermore, the Pinckney Treaty with Spain allowed westerners to use the Mississippi River for trading purposes. In the end the federal government asserted its power and solved the problems that had spurred the Whiskey Rebellion. The Whiskey Rebellion also set the stage for the development of the two-party system of politics by showing the differences in thought between easterners and westerners, agriculture and commerce, and order versus liberty. In 1802 the Republican Congress repealed the hated excise tax on whiskey.

SEE ALSO: American Revolution of 1776; Fries's Rebellion; Shays' Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Barksdale, K. T. (2003) Our Rebellious Neighbors. Virginia Magazine of History and Biography 111 (1): 5.
- Boyd, S. R. (Ed.) (1985) The Whiskey Rebellion: Past and Present Perspectives. Westport: Greenwood Press.
- Hogeland, W. (2006) The Whiskey Rebellion: George Washington, Alexander Hamilton, and the Frontier Rebels who Challenged America's Newfound Sovereignty. New York: Scribner.
- Kohn, R. H. (1972) The Washington Administration's Decision to Crush the Whiskey Rebellion. Journal of American History 59, 3 (December): 567-584.
- Slaughter, T. P. (1988) The Whiskey Rebellion: Frontier Epilogue to the American Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press.

White Rose (Weiße Rose)

Peter Rosenbaum

The White Rose (Weiße Rose) was an anti-Nazi resistance group founded in June 1942 by Hans Scholl and Alexander Schmorell, who were subsequently joined by Scholl's sister Sophie, Christoph Probst, and Willi Graf, all of whom were students at the University of Munich. The core group also included and was advised by philosophy professor Kurt Huber and later expanded into a network of supporters in Berlin, Freiburg, Hamburg, and Vienna. Compared to other youth opposition groups such as the Edelweiß Pirates (Edelweisspiraten) and the Swing Kids, (Swingjugend), White Rose resistance was both distinctly political and guided by religious and humanistic principles.

Motivated by their Christian sense of responsibility and their idealistic and philosophical cultural heritage, the group produced and distributed a total of six leaflets that called for resistance. These pamphlets drew on the ideas of a wide range of philosophers, theologians, and classical writers including Aristotle, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, Friedrich Schiller, and Laozi. In the first phase of activities in June and July 1942, four leaflets aimed at mobilizing the educated elite by condemning the elimination policies against the Jews and Poles, appealing to the responsibility and guilt of all Germans for the crimes perpetrated in their names, and urging passive resistance to Hitler by sabotaging arms production and war propaganda.

After Hans Scholl, Schmorell, and Probst had returned from a three-month army service at the Russian front, the core group issued its fifth leaflet in late January 1943. Instead of restricting its intended audience to the academic intelligentsia, as during its first phase, the group now focused on reaching a larger audience. The fifth leaflet, entitled “Leaflets of the Resistance Movement in Germany,” was addressed to all Germans and vehemently rejected Prussian militarism and National Socialism, calling for a federalist political structure in Germany and Europe with guaranteed civil liberties.

In the wake of the German army’s defeat in Stalingrad and the surrender of the last German forces on February 2, 1942, the White Rose entered its third and final phase of resistance activities. In their sixth leaflet, the members of the group called on their fellow students to fight against the Nazi terror. While distributing their last leaflet in the entrance hall of the University of Munich on February 18, 1943, Hans and Sophie Scholl were denounced by the building janitor and arrested by the Gestapo. On February 22, they were brought in front of the People’s Court in Berlin and, together with Probst, convicted of treason by the court’s presiding judge, Roland Freisler, one of Nazi Germany’s most infamous judges. They were executed only hours after the verdict. Later that same year, Schmorell, Graf, and Huber were sentenced and executed. Many of the other members of the group received prison sentences.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Fascist People’s Front; France, Resistance to Nazism; Germany, Resistance to Nazism; Hitler, Adolf (1889–1945) and German Nazism; Hitler, Assassination Plot of July 20, 1944; Jewish Resistance to Nazism

References and Suggested Readings

Axelrod, T. (2001) Hans and Sophie Scholl: German Resisters of the White Rose. New York: Rosen.

Chaussy, U. & Miller, F. J. (Eds.) (1991) The White Rose: The Resistance by Students against Hitler 1942/43. Munich: White Rose Foundation.

Moll, C. (1994) Acts of Resistance: The White Rose in the Light of New Archival Evidence. In M. Geyer & J. W. Boyer (Eds.), Resistance Against the Third Reich, 1933–1990. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Scholl, I. (1983) The White Rose: Munich, 1942–1943. Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press.

Wijeweera, Rohana (1943–1989)

Balasingham Skanthakumar

Patabandi Don Nandarisi Don Rohana Wijeweera was a revolutionary leader and socialist born in Kottegoda in the deep south of Sri Lanka. Later, he adopted the name Rohana derived from Ruhuna, the ancient name for that region. His father Don Andris Wijeweera was a stalwart of the Communist Party (CP) of Ceylon. Physical assault by right-wing United National Party (UNP) thugs on his father during the election campaign (1947) and the resulting paralysis left a lasting impression on him. While studying medicine at Patrice Lumumba University in Moscow Wijeweera got embroiled in the Khrushchev-Mao ideological disputes and became a partisan of Maoism. Consequently, in 1964 he was refused re-entry to the Soviet Union and was forced to abandon his studies.

Wijeweera joined the pro-Peking group of the Ceylon CP led by N. Shanmugathasan in 1964. His political education and international experience propelled him to leadership of the youth wing of the party. From the outset he was critical of his party’s position that the majority Sinhala community would never accept leadership by Shanmugathasan, an ethnic minority Tamil. He was also frustrated by its emphasis on trade union work among the urban and Tamil plantation proletariat. As his factionalizing became more obvious, Wijeweera was expelled in 1965.

Between 1965 and 1970 Wijeweera and his co-thinkers, many of whom were contemporaries at Dharmasoka College in Ambalangoda, began conducting clandestine educational classes known as the Five Lessons and training in armed insurrection. In 1970 this charismatic personality founded the Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna (JVP, People's Liberation Front) to carry out the revolutionary seizure of state power and socialist transformation of society. But Wijeweera was arrested by the UNP government in May 1970 and was released after two months following election of the United Front coalition grouping the Sri Lanka Freedom Party (SLFP), Lanka Sama Samaja Party (LSSP), and CP (Moscow).

From early 1971 the JVP began arming itself. A state of emergency was proclaimed and Wijeweera and other leaders were arrested again on March 13, 1971. He was transferred to Jaffna in the Tamil-dominated far north to isolate him from the party. His comrades persisted with his plan for a "one day revolution" to seize state power and on April 5 there were simultaneous attacks on police stations in several districts and an abortive jail break to rescue Wijeweera.

Wijeweera's speech before the Criminal Justice Commission created to prosecute the leaders of the insurgency was his first public statement of JVP ideology and his own political evolution reflecting an eclectic blend of Sinhala nationalism and Marxism-Leninism. His life sentence was later commuted to 12 years rigorous imprisonment.

In 1977 Wijeweera was released by the UNP government following its resounding electoral victory. Between 1977 and 1983 he led the JVP's open, legal, and mass work as it became popular among the losers from economic liberalization. Once critical of participation in bourgeois democratic politics, Wijeweera contested the 1982 presidential election. He was placed third after the UNP and SLFP candidates, receiving 4.19 percent of the vote.

In July 1983 an anti-Tamil pogrom was unleashed by the UNP government but blamed on the JVP among others. Banned and driven underground, Wijeweera reverted to the earlier strategy of armed revolution. Clandestine recruitment and military training commenced. JVP ideology also shifted under Wijeweera's influence towards Sinhala chauvinism, with a greater influence on wider society than socialism and with quicker results for recruitment.

The Indo-Lanka Accord of July 1987 and arrival of Indian troops in the north and east provided the fillip the JVP needed to marshal Sinhala resentment against the UNP government's political and socioeconomic policies and anxiety over Tamil separatism into an armed youth insurgency. Two terror-filled years followed in which 40–60,000 were killed mainly by state-sponsored paramilitaries.

During the insurgency Wijeweera and his family adopted new identities and were comfortably housed and cared for by the JVP. On November 12, 1989 their hide-out was betrayed and Wijeweera was captured and executed the following day. The authorities concocted the story of an armed confrontation to explain his extra-judicial killing. Thereafter the rudderless insurgency was easily crushed. Well after his death he remains the idol of the JVP, and his images adorn JVP rallies. But former comrades sometime equate him with Pol Pot.

SEE ALSO: Lanka Sama Samaja Party (LSSP) and Sri Lankan Radicalism; People's Liberation Front of Sri Lanka (JVP)

References and Suggested Readings

- Gunaratna, R. (1990) Sri Lanka – A Lost Revolution? The Inside Story of the JVP. Kandy: Institute of Fundamental Studies.
- Wijeweera, R. (1974) Speech before the Ceylon Criminal Justice Commission. New Left Review 1, 84 (March–April): 85–104.

Wilberforce, William (1759–1833)

Srividhya Swaminathan

William Wilberforce provided the anti-slavery movement with a dynamic and charismatic political force that effected change in both houses of parliament. He was born in Hull of a prosperous merchant family but decided early that he did not wish to go into trade. An indifferent student, Wilberforce discovered an interest in politics very early and became a member of parliament for Hull in the House of Commons at the age of 21. Only four years later he was elected as representative for Yorkshire, England's largest county. Even in his early political career he exhibited a zeal for reform, and he learned much about dealing with parliamentary politics. He made important political contacts, including William Pitt the younger, who became prime minister in 1783. Pitt later encouraged Wilberforce to champion the cause of abolishing the slave trade. In 1785,

William Wilberforce (1759–1833) was a British politician who led the movement to abolish the slave trade that culminated in the passage of the Slave Trade Act of 1807. Wilberforce also campaigned for the Slavery Abolition Act of 1833. Wilberforce was a member of parliament for nearly 50 years, during which time he was considered to be a moral reformer. (© Wilberforce House, Hull City Museums and Art Galleries, UK/The Bridgeman Art Library)

Wilberforce underwent a profound conversion experience and embraced evangelical Christianity. Pitt and evangelical minister John Newton, however, counseled him against giving up his political career for church life, and his religious zeal translated into a strong desire to make a positive contribution to society, which he perceived as sliding toward moral bankruptcy.

Biographical evidence conflicts on how Wilberforce first became involved with the anti-slavery cause. Wilberforce began collecting information on the slave trade sometime in 1786, alerted to the atrocities by Sir Charles and Lady Middleton and the Reverend James Ramsay. Thomas Clarkson's compelling essays prompted Wilberforce to become quite passionate about the cause, and in 1788 he became the political arm of the anti-slave trade campaign by initiating a parliamentary review of the African slave trade. Though illness temporarily kept Wilberforce from pursuing his cause, his return to parliament marked a renewed vigor as he carefully directed the inquiry into the practices of the trade. After two years of careful research, Wilberforce made a motion to bring the bill for abolition to a vote – and was defeated. Abolition would not come for another 17 years.

Abolishing the African Slave Trade

The inquiry into the slave trade initiated by Wilberforce, and formally proposed to parliament by Prime Minister William Pitt, revealed for the first time the extent of slaveship atrocities. Speeches against the trade cited the famous cases of the slave ship Zong, whose captain had callously thrown overboard 132 slaves in order to collect the insurance money. Because of Wilberforce's eloquence, another captain, Kimber, was tried (but acquitted) for the murder of a slave girl on board his ship. Sentiment against the slave trade seemed to be rising; however, the revolution in France, and then the revolution in Haiti (most colonial slaveholders' worst nightmare), shifted sentiment in favor of maintaining the status quo.

Though the House of Commons defeated his bill in 1790, Wilberforce reintroduced it in 1792 only to have it pass in a moderated fashion. Henry Dundas proposed adding the word "gradual" before abolition, setting a deadline of 1796 for complete abolition. Even so, it languished in the House of Lords, giving slavery advocates time to regroup and intensify their support of the trade.

Undaunted, Wilberforce refocused his energies to directing the Sierra Leone Company under the auspices of Granville Sharp. He worked with Thomas Babington and John Clarkson (brother of Thomas Clarkson) to relocate former slaves, who fought for the British during the revolution, from Nova Scotia to West Africa.

From 1793 to 1797, Wilberforce continued to chip away at the slave trade by reintroducing bills for immediate abolition to the Commons and attempting to pass a Foreign Trade Bill limiting Britons from supplying slaves to other European colonies. However, the growing unrest in France as it systematically dismantled its monarchy created tensions in the British government that effectively blocked the passage of these subsequent abolition bills.

Toward the close of the eighteenth century, Wilberforce turned his attention to other kinds of reform. Still deeply religious, he renewed his commitment to bringing a Christian morality to the kingdom and allowed the cause against the slave trade to lapse temporarily. The new century brought many fresh faces to the Commons that revived hope for abolition; however, the growing threat from Napoleon once again shifted attention from the cause. The bill passed the Commons in 1805 but proved too late in the term to be introduced to the Lords. Pitt’s death in 1806 brought Lord Grenville and Charles Fox, two ardent abolitionists, to power and sounded the end of the trade. Wilberforce published A Letter on the Abolition of the Slave Trade, marshaling all the arguments against the practice, and on March 25, 1807, parliament and the king formally agreed to end Great Britain’s participation in the trade immediately.

Moving Against Slavery

Once abolition (hypothetically, at least) took care of new slaves coming into British dominions, Wilberforce turned his attention to those currently enslaved. His concern for both the physical and spiritual welfare of slaves made him an integral contributor to the newly formed African Institution, an organization looking into slavery in the West Indies. He continued to work with the Sierra Leone Company. Wilberforce soon came to believe that only emancipation would improve the condition of slaves, so in 1823, he helped form the Anti-Slavery Society. His health failing, he still participated in the debates for emancipation in 1824. Unfortunately, health issues forced him to give up his seat in parliament and retire. Just before his death in 1833, the bill to abolish slavery seemed to have enough support to pass both houses of parliament. Though he did not live to see full emancipation achieved (1838), William Wilberforce was content that his lifelong campaign against slavery would come to a most satisfying end.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Slavery Movement, Britain; Anti-Slavery Movement, British, and the Founding of Sierra Leone; Benezet, Anthony (1713–1784); Clarkson, Thomas (1760–1846); Equiano, Olaudah (1745–1797); Sharp, Granville (1735–1813)

References and Suggested Readings

- Blackburn, R. (1988) The Overthrow of Colonial Slavery, 1776–1848. London: Verso.
- Brown, C. L. (2006) Moral Capital: Foundations of British Abolitionism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

- Carey, B. (2005) British Abolitionism and the Rhetoric of Sensibility: Writing, Sentiment and Slavery, 1760–1807. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Davis, D. B. (2006) Inhuman Bondage: The Rise and Fall of Slavery in the New World. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Metaxas, E. (2007) Amazing Grace: William Wilberforce and the Heroic Campaign to End Slavery. New York: HarperSanFrancisco.
- Tomkins, S. (2007) William Wilberforce: A Biography. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans.
- Wilberforce, W. (1823/1969) Appeal to the Religion, Justice, and Humanity of the Inhabitants of the British Empire. New York: Negro Universities Press.

Wilkes, John (1725–1797) and the “Wilkes and Liberty” movement

Jason M. Kelly

John Wilkes, the son of a Clerkenwell distiller, played a central role in the development of English radicalism during the reign of George III. Wilkes was responsible for prompting several controversies that brought an end to the “general warrant” in England as well as a reassessment of the concepts of habeas corpus, due process, and freedom of the press. Wilkes’s mother was a wealthy heiress of a tanner, and it is largely due to her inheritance that Wilkes received a boarding school education in Hertford. In 1744, his family sent him to the University of Leiden, but he left in 1746 without taking a degree, a common practice among the eighteenth-century elite.

Upon his return to England, Wilkes married Mary Mead, a childhood friend who was ten years his senior. Mismatched, Wilkes was an affable rake while Mary was a devout Presbyterian and recluse. With his father’s marriage present of land, in addition to his wife’s substantial trust, Wilkes set himself up as a country squire in Aylesbury. The couple was perpetually unhappy, and by 1756 they permanently separated. Their marriage resulted in the birth of a daughter in 1750. Mary, or Polly as Wilkes called her, was his closest companion throughout his life.

Wilkes was incredibly successful at cultivating the social network that he would need in the principal pursuit of his life, politics. He joined the Royal Society in 1748/9, the Sublime Society of Beefsteaks in 1754, and he became a governor

John Wilkes (1727–97) was an English radical who fought for voters' rights to determine their own representatives. As a member of parliament he advocated anti-government legislation and was often removed from office by his political enemies. Wilkes was instrumental in promoting the right of the press to publish parliamentary debates, which in turn made the workings of government a public affair. (Dover Publications) of the Foundling Hospital in 1759. During these years, he and his close friend, Thomas Potter, engaged in the activities of the Monks of Medmenham Abbey, a club for libertines that included such notables as Sir Francis Dashwood and John Montagu, 4th Earl of Sandwich. Wilkes's introduction to parliamentary politics came through Potter in 1754. Having supported Potter's bid for an Aylesbury seat in parliament, Potter's patrons, William Pitt and Richard Grenville, 1st Earl Temple, orchestrated Wilkes's appointment to High Sheriff of Buckinghamshire. This association with the Pitt–Temple alliance led to his election as MP for Aylesbury in 1757.

Wilkes's election to parliament took place during Britain's first bleak years in the Seven Years' War. Improved British fortunes by 1759 coincided with the subsequent rise of a new monarch and his Scottish favorite, John Stuart, 3rd Earl of Bute. Wilkes and other followers of Pitt and Temple found themselves in the opposition, for which Wilkes became the leading journalist. Wilkes published the North Briton between 1762 and 1763, turning his acid pen against the Bute ministry, including his friends Dashwood and Sandwich, now political rivals. When Wilkes's attacks became too much for the ministry with the publication of North Briton, number 45, it attempted to suppress Wilkes's voice, issuing a general warrant in May 1763 and arresting 48 printers in addition to Wilkes. His arrest, despite his parliamentary privilege, and the heavy-handed approach by the ministry sparked popular resentment, especially among the middling orders. Broadside and newspapers came to Wilkes's defense, and crowds shouting "Wilkes and Liberty" were a common scene outside Wilkes's cell. By the time Wilkes was released under parliamentary privilege, he was a popular hero in London. And, even as the government attempted to build a case against him, he built a case against the arbitrary arrest and imprisonment of the printers as well as the illegal seizure of his papers.

During the spring of 1763, Wilkes helped organize 25 printers to bring suits against the government for illegal arrest and seizure of property. The printers, and later Wilkes, won their cases against the execution of the general warrant and received compensation. The precedent effectively ended the issuing of general warrants. Meanwhile, Wilkes embarked on printing a new edition of the North Briton as well as a scandalous poem, the Essay on Woman, which he and Potter had written for their fellow Monks of Medmenham Abbey. Unfortunately for Wilkes, the government was orchestrating a counteroffensive. In November, parliament, which had obtained a stolen copy of the Essay on Woman, declared Wilkes guilty of seditious libels in both the Essay and the North Briton. It condemned the "Forty-Five" to be burned by the hangman. Once again, however, Wilkite "mobs" came to his defense, preventing the December 3 burning of the "Forty-Five." Nevertheless, Wilkes's fate was sealed and he escaped to France, where he remained an outlaw for four years.

Wilkes's return to Britain in 1768 reveals that his popularity had not waned. Despite being imprisoned for libel and expelled from parliament, he was undefeated in three parliamentary elections. Wilkite supporters would not have their electoral wishes denied, and they voted him a London city alderman while they petitioned for the revocation of his parliamentary expulsion. One of the best-organized Wilkite groups was the Gentlemen Supporters of the Bill of Rights, or the Bill of Rights Society. The Bill of Rights Society's initial mission was to pay Wilkes's extensive debt so that he would not find himself in debtors' prison upon his 1770 release. However, the Bill of Rights Society's interests became more general, especially under the influence of John Horne, who argued for annual parliaments and the reform of the corrupt electoral system. Unfortunately, Horne and Wilkes's relationship was acrimonious, and, in 1771, Horne split to form the Constitutional Society. The ministry would use the split to undermine radical causes in the years leading to the American War of Independence.

While Wilkes had challenged arbitrary government in the 1760s, setting important precedents, his position in London City government allowed him to permanently transform the status of the press in Britain. Long denied the right to report on parliamentary debates, the press's ability to accurately cover the government was limited. In fact, the Commons actively prosecuted several printers in 1771. Led by Wilkes, the City of London defended the printers, claiming that it alone had the right of arrest within city boundaries. With massive support, and the potential for violence should the government pursue the matter, parliament backed down, beginning the period of modern parliamentary reporting.

Despite the fact that Wilkes continued to push for reform in city and national politics – even introducing the first parliamentary reform bill in 1776 – the final decades of Wilkes's life found him increasingly criticized by the public. His role in suppressing the 1780 Gordon Riots and his ever closer association with governmental ministries suggested to many that Wilkes was no longer the radical that he was in the 1760s. A more likely assessment may be that Wilkes's political positions did not change as rapidly as the face of radicalism. Thus, Wilkes could not find common ground with the more radical supporters of the French Revolution.

SEE ALSO: Gordon "No Popery" Riots, Britain, 1780; Horne Tooke, John (1736–1812)

References and Suggested Readings

- Cash, A. H. (2006) John Wilkes: The Scandalous Father of Civil Liberty. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Rudé, G. F. E. (1962) Wilkes and Liberty: A Social Study of 1763 to 1774. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Sainsbury, J. (2006) John Wilkes: The Lives of a Libertine. Aldershot: Ashgate.
- Thomas, P. D. G. (1996) John Wilkes, A Friend of Liberty. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Wilkes, J. & Potter, T. (2000) An Essay on Woman. Ed. A. H. Cash. New York: AMS.

Williams, Eric (1911–1981)

Rhayn Garrick Jooste

Eric Eustace Williams was prime minister of Trinidad and Tobago from 1956 to 1981, and an anti-imperialist historian who outlined a divergent theory of social development based on economics and the dynamics of slavery, based particularly on racial exploitation and the accumulated concentration of capital giving rise to modern capitalism.

Born in Trinidad, Williams' father worked for the post office. His mother's lineage was rooted in the Creole elite. He attended Queens Royal College in Port of Spain from 1931 onward, where he captained the football team and excelled academically. In 1932 he was awarded the Lone Island Scholarship which allowed him to attend Oxford, where he studied modern history and obtained his Doctor of Philosophy in 1938. Williams extended his doctoral thesis from Oxford and published it as Capitalism and Slavery (1944). In this book he elucidated the relationship between Britain and the West Indies from an economic perspective, based on slavery. His framework of analysis has transcended its purely historical narrative to become indispensable to the development of a Caribbean identity. Williams expounds upon the basic premise that western capitalism (based on the British experience) was founded on the slave trade; hence, the British motivation for ending slavery was economically opportune and allowed the western industrialists to limit what would have been a West Indian monopoly on sugar.

Williams immigrated to the US in 1939 to teach social and political science at Howard University as an assistant professor. He obtained full professorship in 1947 and published Documents

Illustrating the Development of Civilization (1947) based on his experience teaching in America. During his stay in the United States he began to work as a consultant for the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission, which was established after World War II for the study of the Caribbean. In 1948 he resigned from Howard University to head the research branch within the commission. His book The Negro in the Caribbean (1942) was a study of the economic and social conditions of the Caribbean and reflected Williams' burgeoning interest in politics.

Williams' pan-Caribbean ideals stemmed from the period he spent traveling for the commission (1948–55); this gave him the practical experience in politics at an international level that formed the basis for his innovative reforms he would eventually implement as prime minister. His frustration at being held back in the commission pushed him into the political arena. He left the commission in 1955 due to a disagreement over policy. His first political speech, My Relations with the Caribbean Commission (1955), held in Trinidad, reflected his years working for the commission and his view of policy change in the Caribbean. He was a charismatic lecturer on the topic of colonialism, which he framed as the enemy of progress in Trinidad and Tobago. Utilizing middle-class tenets enabled Williams to achieve his political goals, as he addressed this social stratum, which was to become a primary disagreement with C. L. R. James (1901–89), who believed that the masses (peasants and workers) were more important from the perspective of social transformation; however, both men shared the same vision: an independent Trinidad.

Once he left the commission, Williams' political career took off; from the now-famous lectures in Woodford Square – the main square in Port-of-Spain – Williams' following grew into the People's National Movement (PNM). In 1956 the PNM won the national elections and Williams became chief minister for Trinidad and Tobago. In 1959 he became the premier, and in 1961 the prime minister. Williams continued to dominate political life in the Islands for 25 years. He was reelected several times, and directed Trinidad and Tobago into the Federation of the West Indies in 1958; however, this venture collapsed in 1962 due to internal disagreements. Later that same year, he led Trinidad to independence from the Commonwealth. Williams was able to construct a strong self-determined stance on the world's political stage due to Trinidad's growing economic security. This was forged through his skillful policy-making and the fact that Trinidad had the highest per capita income in the Caribbean due to its local oil industry. During his tenure, however, he had to contend with trade unionist problems, a militant black power movement (which included a coup d'état in 1970), and the Tobago Independence movement.

Williams was unique in the Caribbean, as his position of power combined with his education allowed him to explore the ideals he had acquired through his intellectual studies. He was dedicated to the self-determination of the Caribbean. Williams' political agenda was broadly informed by his life experiences: industrialization for economic expansion (from his research on the Caribbean), social development (from his childhood and his experiences teaching at Howard University), liberal democracy and political development (based on the Westminster system of government in London), and finally, self-determination. Self-determination was a powerful ideal that he shared with many other Caribbean intellectuals of the 1950s and 1960s. A crowning moment was when Williams signed the treaty for the Caribbean Community and Common Market in 1973.

Williams' later books, British Historians and the West Indies (1964), and From Columbus to Castro: The History of the Caribbean 1492–1969 (1970), were criticized for not being as incisive as his first, as they were more factually based. Once he left the academic environment he was unable to recapture the earlier radicalism of Capitalism and Slavery, as his early attraction to Marxism and socialism waned. Writing became a meditative exercise that reflected his change in occupation rather than a tool for social transformation.

Williams was an informed and methodical scholar and historian. There is an ongoing debate in the literature suggesting that his early radicalism did not persist as the basis of his political philosophy as he developed as a statesman. However, his ruling years allowed Trinidad to advance and attain self-determination in a meticulous manner, a legacy that he left to the Caribbean as a whole. He died on March 29, 1981 while still in office as prime minister. In Trinidad he is known as the Father of a Nation.

SEE ALSO: French Caribbean in the Age of Revolution; James, C. L. R. (1901–1989); Rodney, Walter (1942–1980); Trinidad, Labor Protests; Trinidad, Parliamentary Crisis

References and Suggested Readings

- Palmer, C. A. (2006) Eric Williams and the Making of the Modern Caribbean. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Solow, B. L. & Engerman, S. L. (Eds.) (1987) British Capitalism and Caribbean Slavery: The Legacy of Eric Williams. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Williams, E. (1994) Capitalism and Slavery. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Williams, E. (2006) Inward Hunger: The Education of a Prime Minister. New York: Marcus Weiner.

Williams, Raymond Henry (1921–1988)

Amy Hatmaker

British critic and scholar Raymond Williams is considered to be the founder of cultural studies. A man who maneuvered between two realms, he revolutionized traditional cultural interpretations.

Born August 31, 1921 in Llanfihangel Crucorney, Monmouthshire, Wales, Williams was the only child of Henry Joseph and Gwendolene (Bird) Williams. His father worked as a railroad signalman and supported the labor movement. An exceptional student, Williams received a full scholarship to study literature at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1939; however, the outbreak of World War II temporarily halted his education. Williams began his service in 1941 and would achieve the rank of tank commander, returning to England following the war.

Having already joined the Communist Party during his first enrollment at Trinity, Williams eagerly joined with other socialists in supporting the Labour Party. He graduated from Cambridge in 1946 and worked in adult education for several years at Oxford, during which time he wrote two of his most influential works, Culture and Society 1780–1950 (1958) and The Long Revolution (1961). Williams returned to Cambridge as a lecturer, taught for a brief period at Stanford University, and accepted the position of Professor of Drama at Cambridge in 1974.

A prolific writer and playwright, Williams's theoretical developments reflected both his working-class upbringing and the influence of the elitism in academia. Though influenced by some conservative scholarship, Williams's work also showed his Marxist ideologies. His theoretical arguments challenged both the vehicles and purveyors of cultural interpretation. Williams argued against the traditional belief that art and literature were the only true definers of culture, subject only to intellectual interpretation. Instead, he argued that true culture was “ordinary,” maintaining an inclusive view of both high and popular culture that provides meaning to daily life. This interpretation, known as “cultural materialism,” with its emphasis on societal experiences based on human agency, would radically alter the study of humanities.

Williams also dramatically changed the way popular culture, television especially, was viewed. His critical work Television: Technology and Cultural Form, published in 1974, sets out his theory that the popular medium of television is influenced by social and historical relationships. Williams saw television as a means of leveling societal divisions and a legitimate cultural form.

Williams produced hundreds of publications throughout the course of his career as well as a number of plays. He died in London, England, on January 26, 1988.

SEE ALSO: Critical Theory; Labour Party, Britain; Marxism; Socialism; Socialism, Britain

References and Suggested Readings

- Colini, S. (2004) The Literary Critic and the Village Labourer: “Culture” in Twentieth-Century Britain. Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 6th ser., 14: 93–116.
- Dworkin, D. & Roman, L. G. (Eds.) (1993) Views Beyond the Border Country: Raymond Williams and Cultural Politics. London: Routledge.
- Neal, R. S. (1984) Cultural Materialism: A Critique. Social History 9 (2): 199–215.
- Pendergast, C. (Ed.) (1995) Cultural Materialism: On Raymond Williams. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Williams, R. (1989a) The Politics of Modernism: Against the New Conformists. Ed. T. Pinkney. London: Verso.
- Williams, R. (1989b) Resources of Hope: Culture, Democracy, Socialism. Ed. R. Gable. London: Verso.
- Woodhams, S. (Ed.) (2001) History in the Making: Raymond Williams, Edward Thompson and Radical Intellectuals 1936–1956. London: Merlin.

Williams, Robert F. (1925–1996)

Thomas Edge

Robert F. Williams was an African American civil rights activist whose tactics challenged some widely held notions of the origins of Black Power and the nature of the Southern civil rights movement. He was born on February 26, 1925 in Monroe, North Carolina. His first taste of activism came during World War II, when he worked in Detroit with Local 600 of the United Automobile Workers of America, CIO. Between 1944 and 1955, Williams served stints in the Army and the Marines, attended three different colleges, and sought work outside the South to relocate his family. By 1955, Williams returned to Monroe and became president of the local chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

As president, Williams began to recruit among lower-class blacks, including tenant farmers and domestic workers, with a particular emphasis on young people. Williams helped organize protests against segregated facilities in town at a time when the local Ku Klux Klan (KKK) experienced a dramatic resurgence. On October 5, 1957, Williams responded to Klan violence, organizing armed resistance to a KKK motorcade when it attacked the home of an NAACP officer. The Klan members quickly dispersed, and the Monroe city council immediately banned the group's motorcades.

Several high-profile court cases brought further attention to Williams. In the 1958 "kissing case," two black boys, aged 8 and 10, were arrested and convicted for allegedly kissing a 7-year-old white girl, igniting international protests. Williams worked in 1959 on behalf of two black women assaulted by white men. When both cases were dismissed on the same day, Williams told reporters that blacks "must be willing to kill" in the absence of real justice. The NAACP immediately suspended Williams, who responded by starting a journal, The Crusader, that echoed his belief in armed resistance, black-owned institutions, and anti-colonialism.

In 1961, during a tense racial standoff in Monroe, a white couple drove into the black section of town. Williams took the couple into his home for their safety and was charged with kidnapping by local police. Friends helped Williams and his wife, Mabel, escape to Cuba, where Williams established a radio program, Radio Free Dixie. Here, Williams wrote his classic work, Negroes with Guns, which in turn had a tremendous impact on the development of Black Power in the late 1960s. By 1965, tensions with the Cuban government forced the couple to move to China. Williams returned to the United States in 1969 and, after a brief stint with the University of Michigan's Center for Chinese Studies, he moved to Baldwin, Michigan, where he remained until his death on October 15, 1996.

SEE ALSO: Civil Rights Movement, United States, 1960–1965; Civil Rights, United States, Black Power and Backlash, 1965–1978

References and Suggested Readings

- Joseph, P. E. (2006) Waiting 'til the Midnight Hour: A Narrative History of Black Power in America. New York: Henry Holt.
- Tyson, T. T. (1999) Radio Free Dixie: Robert F. Williams and the Roots of Black Power. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Winnipeg general strike of 1919

James Naylor

In the wave of working-class rebellion that swept much of the world in the aftermath of World War I, the Winnipeg general strike stands as one of the key confrontations on the North American continent. Winnipeg, the capital of Manitoba and the largest city on the Canadian prairies at the time, was a transportation, industrial, and service hub whose boosters liked to consider the "Chicago of the North." For six weeks, from May 15 until late June, about 35,000 Winnipeg workers effectively shut down the city. The immediate cause of the strike was the refusal of the city's employers to bargain with the newly established building trades' and metal trades' federations. Consequently, the Winnipeg Trades and Labor Council organized a poll of its affiliated members, who voted 11,000 to 500 in favor of organizing a general strike.

Both the scale of the strike and the employers' response to it suggest that much more was at stake than the collective bargaining rights of two groups of workers. The majority of those who struck were not union members and had little to gain directly from their struggles. In fact, large numbers were Central and Eastern European immigrants who had largely been excluded from the craft union movement. Even the demand that employers recognize their union federations represented a move from craft unionism to a desire to build broader and more unitary working-class organizations. These developments were rooted in local history, including a near-general strike the previous year in support of municipal workers, but largely reflected a broader frustration with the challenges of war and reconstruction. Anger at the way in which workers had sacrificed on the battlefield and suffered the effects of inflation and restricted rights while capital was enriching itself largely explains the wave of approximately 20 general strikes in towns and cities across Canada, of which Winnipeg's was the largest.

Local business and professional leaders organized the Citizen's Committee of One Thousand to fight the strike. Their newspaper, the Citizen, relentlessly assailed the strikers as "enemy aliens" and "Bolsheviks." When the city council dismissed the entire police force for refusing to sign a loyalty oath, the Citizen's Committee helped recruit 1,800 anti-strike "specials" to police the city. Not surprisingly, the federal government was active as well. Besides preparing a potential military response, a new immigration act was rushed through parliament in mere hours allowing for the unprecedented possibility of deporting British subjects, and a sweeping new definition of sedition was added to the criminal code. Nonetheless, the opponents of the strike had to tread carefully. They were particularly concerned that railway running trades would join the strike and cause it to spread beyond Winnipeg. Once a deal was forged with the railway unions, action was undertaken to smash the strike. Strike leaders were arrested in late-night raids in mid-June, along with a number of immigrants to give credence to the Citizen Committee's claim that it was an "enemy alien" conspiracy. On June 21, soon dubbed "Bloody Saturday," a silent parade of pro-strike returned soldiers was ferociously attacked by mounted police and "specials," killing two men and injuring dozens. Authorities shut down the strikers' paper, the Western Labor News. The strike ended on June 25.

Much of the debate about the strike in its aftermath and in the historiography has focused on the degree to which it represented a political challenge to capital as opposed to a simple industrial relations dispute writ large. To some extent, this was framed by the accusations by the Citizen's Committee that the strike represented a revolutionary challenge to authority, and by the explicitly political trials that followed. Facing the potential threat of martial law during the strike, the Central Strike Committee was intent on maintaining order while the Western Labor News focused on rebutting the rhetorical attacks of the Citizen's Committee. In their own history of the event, written under the auspices of the Defense Committee in the context of the trials, the strike leadership explicitly denied broader political goals and focused on the assaults by the Citizen's Committee and by the state on collective bargaining as well as attacking their exaggerated and often racist rhetoric. However, the trials themselves addressed the political radicalism of several of the strike leaders.

In attempting to make the charge of seditious conspiracy against eight of the leaders, the prosecutors pointed to the participation of some of them in the Western Labor Conference in Calgary in March 1919 that had approved the general strike as a weapon to achieve the six-hour day and to oppose Canadian military intervention against the Bolshevik revolution. It was this convention that had initiated the secession of Western Canadian unions from the craft union-dominated Trades and Labor Congress of Canada into the One Big Union, a movement influenced by revolutionary syndicalist ideas. Similarly, they pointed to their active role in meetings in Winnipeg sponsored by the Socialist Party of Canada, a party that had consistently opposed the war and that saw itself as a revolutionary Marxist organization. Unsurprisingly, given an unsympathetic judge and packed jury, convictions were obtained. Still, while serving their sentences, three of them were elected to the Manitoba provincial legislature and two others who had been charged but not convicted of seditious libel were elected to the legislature and the federal parliament. Only by gerrymandering the city's ward boundaries was labor excluded from dominating Winnipeg's city council in the aftermath of the strike. The ongoing presence, for decades to come, of a strong working-class representation in civic politics, including both laborites and communists, is generally attributed to the strike.

Liberal and social democratic historians have, for the most part, accepted the argument that the strike was limited to the demand for collective bargaining rights and that the local business community simply overreacted. More recently, though, historians have come to see the strike as part of a broader social crisis, the outcome of which was very much up in the air. The strike could have easily spread along the railway lines of western Canada and the volatile participation of large numbers of returned soldiers added a considerable measure of uncertainty. Notably, however, the sizable socialist and social democratic parties in Winnipeg, both of which were increasingly active in the previous months, had very little political presence during the strike. The failure of socialists to provide more leadership in the strike was part of the process that led to the split in socialist ranks and the emergence of the Communist Party. In the end, the strike was clearly defeated, although all working-class political currents in the city, and beyond, including the Independent Labor Party, the One Big Union, and the Communist Party, claim it as part of their heritage.

SEE ALSO: Canada, Rebellion of 1837–1838; Regina Riot; Saskatchewan Socialist Movement; World Trade Organization (WTO) Protests, Quebec City, 2001

References and Suggested Readings

- Bercuson, D. J. (1990) Confrontation at Winnipeg: Labour, Industrial Relations, and the General Strike. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press.
- Heron, C. (Ed.) (1998) The Workers' Revolt in Canada, 1917–1925. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Penner, N. (Ed.) (1972) Winnipeg 1919: The Strikers' Own History of the Winnipeg General Strike. Toronto: James Lorimer.

Winstanley, Gerrard (1609–1676)

Soma Marik

Gerrard Winstanley was born in Wigan, Lancashire to a clothier and became a freeman of the Merchant Tailors' Company. He married Susan King, the daughter of London surgeon William King, in 1639. The Civil War and the disruption of commercial networks between London and Lancashire bankrupted this modest trader around 1643 and exposed him to the horrors, humiliations, and powerlessness of the poor in the face of eviction by landlords or speculative land purchasers. This situation awakened his radical consciousness and led him to adopt communal values.

Winstanley's early pamphlets, particularly The Mysterie of God Concerning the Whole Creation and The Saints Paradise, written around 1648, displayed a typically religious mysticism. In these writings he was dealing with the relationship between God, the world, and humans, to understand the origins of evil and to trace the path of salvation. His view of God evolved rapidly, leading him to pantheism and then practically to materialism through rationalism. Along the way, he adopted ideas that supported a communist outlook.

In The New Law of Righteousness (1649) Winstanley laid the foundations of his communism. He argued that in the beginning all men and women were governed by the spirit of justice, harmony, and peace. The growth of a love of private property, however, led to the fall. Selfishness and covetousness had led to the rule of man over man. To create private property through enclosures was to live according to the law of Satan. If all were to live as brothers, the earth must be taken as the common treasury of the children of God. He advocated using lands belonging to the king, the church, and the Royalists to provide for the poor. Others before him had suggested expropriating the rich and establishing a communist society, but Winstanley systematically worked out a theory of communism that could be put into practice immediately by the activism of the landless class.

St. George's Hill

In the spring of 1649, in the aftermath of poor harvests and rising prices, Winstanley and the Leveller William Everard led activists in taking up a piece of land in St. George's Hill in the county of Surrey, to cultivate it in common. Located close to London, this place had a sustained history of radicalism. At the same time, it was not an isolated action. Buckinghamshire Levellers had issued two pamphlets calling for equality of property, and the Diggers, or True Levellers as they called themselves, began to appear in a number of places such as Northamptonshire, Hertfordshire, Middlesex, Bedfordshire, and Leicestershire.

The term "Digger" had a long pedigree, signifying resistance to enclosures. But the colony at St. George's Hill, as the first self-consciously communist colony of modern times, caused panic among the nearby prosperous farmers and landowners. Receiving a report about the activities of the Diggers, the Council of State sent a cavalry unit on April 16, 1649. In response, Digger leaders William Everard and Winstanley appeared before General Lord Fairfax in London to explain their aims. At the meeting, Everard explained that they were peaceful and did not intend to take away any private property but only to cultivate common land. Fairfax promised that henceforth troops would not interfere in the conflict.

In the face of continuous attacks by the landlords, however, Fairfax visited the colony on May 29 and tried to persuade the men to disperse. But Winstanley responded that the poor had the right to cultivate common land, which was not privately owned. Winstanley's A Declaration from the Poor Oppressed People of England shows that the Diggers believed themselves outside the sphere of action of laws protecting private property and market. In a remonstrance to Fairfax, he argued that the Norman Conquest had deprived the English of their inherent right to the land, turning them into the servants of the Norman Lords. He argued that the victory in the Civil War should also profit the poor. Winstanley defined freedom widely enough to cover not only the landless, but also the interests of the small owners, who were demanding the complete abolition of feudalism. But by the spring of 1650 repeated attacks led to the collapse of the community.

The Law of Freedom

After the collapse of the Digger community, Winstanley wrote his most significant work, The Law of Freedom in a Platform or True Magistracy Restored (1651). In the beginning, he said, there was no private property, no class inequality. The power of enclosing land and owning property was brought about by the sword. True freedom lies in the free enjoyment of the earth. So, all laws not grounded upon equity and reason, not giving a universal freedom to all, differentiated according to persons, ought to be abolished. In the earlier writings a millenarist vision had prevailed and the state and all laws were expected to fall away rapidly. But now he decided that a period of transition would be necessary, so he drafted laws for his future society.

While Winstanley was opposed to the use of physical coercion, a new kind of force would be brought to bear through the setting up of a collectivist community. Labor available to the landlords would soon be withdrawn. Family farming by peasants could survive, but at a lower level of efficiency than cooperative farming. Higher productivity would lead to the peaceful triumph of the collectivist communities. While land was central to his conception, he had a well thought out plan for industry as well. Though Winstanley called for the abolition of buying and selling, and the abolition of toll collection, he argued in favor of the establishment of a state monopoly of foreign trade. Collective production meant the abolition of wage labor. Crafts were to be taught by the apprentice system, one of the genuine backward elements left in his model society.

What is striking in his analysis and prescription is not just the communism, but the class analysis. He wrote that it was the labor of the common people that lifted up the landlords to rule as tyrants over them. The dedication of this book to Oliver Cromwell reflected both a note of despair and the argument that a republic (commonwealth) is incompatible with private ownership of land. The book was divided into three parts – a critique of exploitative society, arguments on the nature of the state and law, and a description of the new society. Since knowledge of God is the knowledge of his manifestation in his creation, to know the secrets of nature is to know God. The law of nature and the laws of God are the same for him. He developed the idea that every individual born in England had an equal right to maintain their lives by the fruits of their own labor, produced on land freed from private ownership.

Winstanley represented the most theoretically articulate ideologue of the far left in the English Revolution and even sought to go beyond its bourgeois democratic boundaries. For him, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth becomes possible only by casting out the selfish, imaginary, covetous, murdering power, hence by establishment of a communist order. Winstanley accepted the need for specialized work, only arguing that the produce should be brought to shops for exchange without sale, with everyone having the right to get what he or she needed. He also accepted the right to personal property, like one's house, furniture, and items of personal use.

Winstanley clearly affirmed that women would not be property, a point of great importance owing to recurrent charges that communists wanted to hold women in common. He advocated punishment of polygamy, as well as of men who forced sexual relations on unwilling women. But this was not just a variant of the Puritan idea of sexuality. In The Law of Freedom he put it very clearly that every man and woman should have the liberty to marry whom they loved, provided they had the willing consent of the other person. So it was simple marriage of trust and love, devoid of money considerations and church rituals. But he opposed divorce, fearing that it would mostly be against the interests of women, who would be abandoned along with their children. He therefore objected to the property relation in which the wife lost autonomy and became the servant of the husband. A stable family within a society where all worked and all could eat was, for Winstanley, a superior alternative to the hypocritical Puritan action where nobody recognized that the break up of the family had been caused in the first place due to poverty and male migration. Despite his progressive ideas, however, Winstanley cast women in the same patriarchal mold where they were willing and respected sources of nurturance, victims and objects of male desire, not agents in their own right.

Unlike much early communist work, Winstanley's was realist. His ideal had been developed out of concrete struggles of the propertyless poor in a revolutionary era. The Digger experiment showed a desire to convince through practical action. At the same time, his acceptance of Cromwell's Protectorate, while a step back, was a realistic move. He could not wish away what really existed. And he could not hope that a royalist restoration would look with greater kindness to his project than the republic. Defense of the republic, even though degenerated, seemed a necessary action. Politically, he wanted adult suffrage, annually elected officials, and accountability of officials before the people. By and large, punishment in his ideal community was light, though the death penalty still remained, possibly because counterrevolution could not be wished away.

SEE ALSO: Cromwell, Oliver (1599–1658); English Revolution, 17th Century; English Revolution, Radical Sects

References and Suggested Readings

Barg, M. A. (1990) The English Revolution of the 17th Century Through Portraits of its Leading Figures. Moscow: Progress Publishers.

- Boulton, D. (2000) Gerrard Winstanley and the Republic of Heaven. Hobsons Farm, Dent, Cumbria: Dales Historical Monographs.
- Hill, C. (1985) The World Turned Upside Down. London: Penguin Books.
- Sabine, G. H. (Ed.) (1941) The Works of Gerrard Winstanley. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Shulman, G. M. (1989) Radicalism and Reverence: The Political Thought of Gerrard Winstanley. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Sutherland, D. R. (1991) The Religion of Gerrard Winstanley and Digger Communism. In Essays in History. Corcoran Department of History at the University of Virginia. Available at www.etext.lib.virginia.edu/journals/EH/EH33/suther33.html (accessed November 12, 2007).

Wirat Angkathawon (1921–1997)

Pierre Rousset

The Kingdom of Thailand entered into a period of turmoil in 1973 when the military dictatorship was overthrown. Wirat Angkathawon, at the age of 42, became a principal leader of the Communist Party of Thailand (CPT) and a distinctive representative of the militant post-World War II generation.

Wirat was born in 1921 in Bangkok to a family of Chinese origin from the town of Swatow, a port in the South of China. Although relatively affluent, his family encountered financial difficulties due to his father's health problems. After studying in a Chinese school, Wirat joined the communists and began working in a match factory in 1940. Subsequently, Wirat was sent to the South of Thailand, meeting his future wife, Somphon, from a Sino-Thai trading family from the southern province of Patthalung. Somphon spent a short period in China for studies and became a member of the Communist Party in 1943. Wirat returned to Bangkok in 1944 and was elected to the Central Committee of the CPT and the political department at the second congress in 1952. He was re-elected to the Central Committee and elected to the five-member secretariat of the CPT at the third congress in 1961.

From 1950 to 1951 Wirat resided mostly outside of Thailand, in China and Laos or in mountain bases on the border of Thailand. He first studied at the Marxist-Leninist Institute in Peking and returned to Thailand in 1957–8 and regularly went to China for Communist Party meetings. From 1965 to 1976 Wirat lived alternatively in China and a remote base of Nan in northern Thailand. Wirat settled in Laos where he led the “re education” of the dissident cadres of “the region of three provinces” (Phetchabun-Phitsanulok-Loei) before traveling to China in the late 1970s. In 1982 he joined a base of CPT to participate in the fourth congress.

Wirat used the pseudonyms of Comrade Than, Jang Yuan, and Tho Phianwithhaya. It was under this last name that he signed, in 1978, the principal document analyzing the history of the CPT from the point of view of his leadership. He was the writer of important official declarations of the party.

Wirat Angkhathawon advanced the prestige of the CPT among the generation of Thai radicals in the 1970s. The CPT was the only Thai party successfully to organize resistance against the military dictatorship, and was widely recognized for its political and economic integrity. But after 1978 the CPT entered a period of crisis when the People’s Republic of China moved decisively toward a market, pro-capitalist economy. The CPT’s staunch “pro-Chinese” stance impaired the party’s reputation among leftists and youths in Thailand.

In late 1982 Wirat suffered a stroke. After hospitalization in Bangkok, he returned to China in 1983 for treatment before his death on June 16, 1997.

SEE ALSO: Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Thai Communist Party; Thailand, Popular Movements 1980s–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Jeamteerasakul, S. (2003) Prawat pho kho tho chabab pho kho tho (History of CPT by the CPT). Fa dieo khan January–April (part 1) and May–June (part 2). Phianwithhaya, T. (2003) The History of Our Party and Some of its Lessons. Journal of Contemporary Asia, October 1.

Witbooi, Hendrik (ca. 1825–1905)

Tilman Dederling

Hendrik Witbooi was born into a prominent family of the Witbooi Nama, a subgroup of the southern African Khoekhoe, who roamed the northern frontier region of the Cape Colony as pastoralists, hunters, and cattle-raiders. Hendrik was educated by European missionaries and was profoundly influenced by their religious teachings. He was highly literate and communicated in writing to other Namibian chiefs and German officials. Witbooi became famous as an exceptional leader seeking to maintain the independence of his people from colonial intruders. In contemporary Namibia, Hendrik Witbooi is officially commemorated as among the most important figures in the anti-colonial struggle.

In 1863 the Witboois moved away from the advancing colonial frontier in South Africa to settle at Gibeon in southern Namibia. The Witboois consolidated their position as an important force in the predatory relations among Nama groups in the south and the Herero cattle breeders in central Namibia. Hendrik groomed his leadership qualities performing important functions in the Christian community. He also sharpened his martial skills as leader of the Witbooi commandos, which maintained paramilitary structures that were a hallmark of the political organization of the Khoekhoe in Namibia. In 1880 Hendrik nearly died in a clash with the Herero, crediting his narrow survival through spiritual revelation. Hendrik subsequently viewed himself as a Christian prophet chosen by God as a leader in Namibia.

In response to armed Herero resistance he could not realize his ambitious dream of unifying southern and central Namibia under his supreme command. Instead, he consolidated his dominance among southern Namibians through diplomatic and military campaigns from the late 1880s. In 1889 Hendrik established a new residence at Hornkrans in central Namibia, from where he conducted raids on the Herero. The Germans, who had annexed the territory in 1884, regarded Hendrik as the major obstacle to consolidating German rule. In contrast to most Namibian chiefs, Witbooi vehemently refused to sign any “protection treaty” with the colonial rulers. In 1893 German troops attacked Hornkrans, but Witbooi escaped to launch attacks on the invaders until his resources were depleted. In 1894 Hendrik was forced into accepting cooptation into the German system of indirect rule. He was required to return to his old settlement at Gibeon as a salaried headman, and actively support several German military expeditions against other African groups. He could not prevent the loss of ownership of large tracts of land to white settlers, compounding the economic hardships of the Witboois and intensifying their disempowerment. When the Herero rose against colonial rule in 1904, Hendrik initially remained committed to his treaty with the Germans. However, as the German military campaign against the Herero turned into genocide, Hendrik severed relations with the colonialists even as settlers were calling for his elimination.

Hendrik's millenarian tendencies, dormant for many years, were reignited by an itinerant colored prophet from South Africa envisioning white colonial rule coming to an end soon. Many German officials clung to an idealized image of Hendrik Witbooi as a noble savage who learned to settle into an inferior but honorable position in the colonial system. Thus, Germans were shocked when the Witboois and their allies launched a bitter guerrilla war in October 1904. On October 29, 1905 Hendrik Witbooi was wounded in a skirmish with German soldiers and died of his injuries about two weeks later.

SEE ALSO: Namibia, Struggle for Independence; South Africa, African Nationalism and the ANC

References and Suggested Readings

- Dedering, T. (1993) Hendrik Witbooi, the Prophet. Kleio 12: 54–78.
- Drechsler, H. (1980) Let Us Die Fighting: The Struggle of the Herero and Nama against German Imperialism (1884–1915). London: Zed Books.
- Lau, B. (1989) The Hendrik Witbooi Papers. Trans. A. Heywood & E. Maasdorp. Windhoek: National Archives of Namibia.
- Steinmetz, G. (2007) The Devil's Handwriting. Precoloniality and the German Colonial State in Qingdao, Samoa, and Southwest Africa. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Wollstonecraft, Mary (1759–1797)

Rachel Finley-Bowman

Mary Wollstonecraft was an author, educator, and journalist whose influential work A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792) became the foundation of modern rights-based feminism. She championed equal education for women and equality in marriage. In all cases, she strove to disprove any notions of female inferiority.

Wollstonecraft was born in London to a middle-class family in April 1759. The second born and eldest girl of seven children, Wollstonecraft's early years were marked by her father's repeated business failures and by an intense rivalry with her older brother, the family heir. Edward John Wollstonecraft, an apparent alcoholic and purveyor of physical and emotional abuse, squandered away the family's wealth through a series of failed ventures, creating a foreboding atmosphere of domestic enmity and financial uncertainty. In response to her husband's tyranny, Elizabeth, Mary's mother, became cold and withdrawn, leaving Wollstonecraft and her siblings with little support.

These years of familial discord and the constant upheaval associated with her father's schemes took their toll on an adolescent Wollstonecraft. Her perspective on men and marriage became skewed, as she blamed her mother's descent into cowardly acquiescence upon her father. She repeatedly vowed never to marry, and grew increasingly disillusioned by the limitations imposed by her gender. Wollstonecraft possessed an innate desire to learn, but because of family and social circumstances it was left largely unfulfilled. Opportunities and privilege were only given to her eldest brother Edward. Yet, by her own determination, she resolved to emancipate herself from this experience, using education as her liberator. Against her parents' wishes, she left home in 1778, seeking employment, and more importantly, solace, as a companion to the Widow Dawson of Bath. She hoped this new position would provide both stability and the opportunity to pursue greater academic study.

Nonetheless, this time in Bath would be brief, as a series of family tragedies forced Wollstonecraft to return to London in 1780. She nursed her dying mother and tended her sister Eliza, who suffered from post-partum depression. Four years later she opened a school for girls in Islington with the help of her childhood friend and confidant, Fanny Blood. The school was initially successful, affording Wollstonecraft cherished opportunities for scholarship, intellectual growth, and interaction with the local liberal intelligentsia of the Enlightenment period. Yet Blood's marriage in 1785 would uproot this period of relative calm.

Fanny Blood moved to Portugal with her new husband, eventually falling ill, and Wollstonecraft abandoned her work to tend to her

Mary Wollstonecraft (1759–97) was a leading eighteenth-century British feminist and writer. In 1792 she published A Vindication of the Rights of Woman in which she argued that women were not naturally inferior to men. Wollstonecraft is considered a founder of feminist philosophy and served as an inspiration for a global feminist movement into the twenty-first century. (Private Collection/The Bridgeman Art Library) ding friend. When she returned to England the following year, her school was in financial ruin. Wollstonecraft closed the institution, channeling her frustrations about the experience, and women's lack of opportunities in general, in her first work, Thoughts on the Education of Daughters (1787). Now seemingly destitute, she reluctantly accepted the position of governess to the daughters of Viscount Kingsborough. She moved to Ireland that same year to fulfill her duties and, despite publishing her first novel, she remained confined and unhappy. She lasted only 12 months in the position, with the apparent confirmation that the actions of idle, aristocratic females such as Lady Kingsborough contributed little to the advancement of women or society. Such ideas shaped her later writings and critiques on feminine behavior.

Upon her return to London, Wollstonecraft joined the editorial staff of the Analytical Review, the radical philosophical magazine of her publisher, Joseph Johnson, in 1788. Through her connections to the magazine, Wollstonecraft interacted with many of Johnson's influential friends, including the political theorist William Godwin. Her ideas and concerns began to grow during this period beyond the specific injustices experienced in her own life because of men, inadequate education, and the burdens of marriage and motherhood to the broader plight of oppressed women everywhere. With the French Revolution dawning, Wollstonecraft seized upon the opportunity to make a significant comment about the role of women, or at least their perceived role, writing A Vindication of the Rights of Woman in 1792. This work openly celebrated women as moral, rational, and strong beings worthy of education, autonomy, and equal rights, decrying their historical subjugation and exploitation.

Her main argument in Vindication was built upon the "simple principle" that if woman "be not prepared by education to become the companion of man, she will stop the progress of knowledge and virtue." She contended that education represented the path of emancipation for all women, just as it had been for her personally, and that in every role, whether wife, mother, or other, their positions would be improved. Wollstonecraft called for women to share equal rights with men and be perceived as independent, rational beings that were held to, and judged by, the same virtues, standards, and concepts of morality. Reflecting her radical political views, she condemned despotism of all kinds, whether carried out by a king, father, or husband, and urged the overthrow of arbitrary power for the rewards of social equality. These arguments demanded profound change at most levels of society, beginning with the reconstruction of traditional gender roles. Popular but controversial, Vindication challenged the opinions and theories of many Enlightenment thinkers, most notably Jean-Jacques Rousseau.

On the excitement generated by this publication Wollstonecraft left for France to join the cause of the Revolution and continue writing. Her work was ironically interrupted, however, by a passionate love affair with American businessman Gilbert Imlay. Although married, the relationship with Imlay consumed Wollstonecraft, taking her across Europe and leading to the birth of their daughter, Fanny, in May 1794. The affair eventually cooled, prompting Wollstonecraft to attempt suicide. She later relayed the torture of this relationship in Letters Written During a Short Residence in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark in 1796.

Later that same year Wollstonecraft was reintroduced to William Godwin. The two, who had met years earlier, now became close friends and lovers. Despite earlier protestations to the contrary, she married Godwin in a private ceremony in March 1797, and in August gave birth to a daughter. The delivery was difficult and Wollstonecraft died of a subsequent infection ten days later. Godwin published Wollstonecraft's final novel, Maria, or The Wrongs of Woman (1798), posthumously and wrote a memoir of her life as homage to her extraordinary contributions.

Unfortunately, the publication of Godwin's Memoirs of Mary Wollstonecraft had the opposite effect. It damaged Wollstonecraft's reputation by exposing the full details of her extramarital affair with Imlay and Fanny's illegitimacy. Branded as wanton and immoral, she was viciously attacked from all sides for her unconventional life choices. The scandalous revelations of this work eventually eclipsed the larger social relevance of Vindication and her other writings. Nineteenth-century feminists even rejected her theories on education and women's rights, fearing the taint of her conduct would jeopardize their own causes. Such perceptions only shifted with the passage of time.

Feminists of the early twentieth century, particularly suffragettes whose own personal experiences had paralleled those of Wollstonecraft, embraced her contributions to the women's movement, placing her in the venerated position she enjoys today. Wollstonecraft became seen as a pioneer for the cause of gender equality and independence who attempted to model change by example, regardless of the consequences. Her philosophy on education became particularly relevant, with its emphasis upon rational self-improvement and the acquisition of knowledge. To her, education represented the basic foundation of reform and civic progress, and its perpetual absence had relegated women to historical inferiority, unable to realize their true potential. Eradicating these stifling social constructs would afford women, including her daughters, the opportunity fully to explore the possibilities of their own identities, becoming better wives, mothers, and citizens of the world. (Her younger daughter, in fact, later grew up to become the famed author of Frankenstein, Mary Shelley.) Two hundred years after her death, Wollstonecraft's broad message of reform continues to transcend experience and situation, inspire political action, and facilitate theoretical debate.

SEE ALSO: French Revolution, 1789–1794; Godwin, William (1756–1836); Women's Movement, Britain

References and Suggested Readings

- Gordon, L. (2005) Vindication: A Life of Mary Wollstonecraft. New York: Harper Collins.
- Jacobs, D. (2001) Her Own Woman: The Life of Mary Wollstonecraft. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Todd, J. (2000) Mary Wollstonecraft: A Revolutionary Life. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Tomalin, C. (1992) The Life and Death of Mary Wollstonecraft. New York: Penguin.
- Wardle, R. M. (1951) Mary Wollstonecraft: A Critical Biography. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press.

Woman's Christian Temperance Union

Carolyn DeSwarte Gifford

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU) was the largest women's organization in the United States at the turn of the nineteenth century. Its leaders mobilized several hundred thousand women in a fight against what the WCTU perceived as the danger to American society of excessive alcohol use, especially to its most vulnerable members – women and children.

Temperance reform in America began at the beginning of the nineteenth century, resulting in significant lowering of liquor consumption before the Civil War. However, drunkenness rose in the postwar era due to several factors, especially the development of a nationally powerful liquor industry with the encouragement of the federal government that relied heavily on revenue from taxes on liquor dealers. By the late 1860s temperance reformers geared up again to fight the liquor business and its government allies.

The WCTU emerged out of the Ohio Women's Temperance Crusade of 1873–4, a spontaneous uprising of Protestant church women marching to protest the sale of alcohol in the saloons that lined the main streets of their communities. The Crusade rapidly spread throughout the Midwest, the Northeast and the far West. In the wake of this protest women called for a national organization to carry on the work of the Crusade. The National WCTU was founded in November 1874 and its leadership labored to recruit members into the temperance ranks and create a strong, active network of local and state WCTUs.

The WCTU was the first national temperance group comprised solely of women, neither dominated nor directed by men. Its founding marked the rise of female leadership in the campaign for prohibition of the sale of alcohol. The WCTU trained women to be change agents, skilled at influencing institutions at all levels of society – governmental, economic, social, and religious. After its most famous leader Frances Willard became president of the organization in 1879, she widened its agenda to address the issue of women's equality in all aspects of life. She also extended its reach throughout the nation and globally with the founding of the World's WCTU in the mid-1880s.

By the early 1880s the WCTU endorsed women's suffrage, demanding "The Ballot for Home Protection" as a tool for enacting prohibition legislation and also from a belief in women's right to full citizenship. Working closely with other temperance organizations, the WCTU campaigned for statewide prohibition in many areas of the country and began to call for a national prohibition amendment in the mid-1880s. Doubting that either of the two main political parties – Democratic or Republican – would endorse prohibition and women's suffrage, the organization entered the arena of third-party politics. By 1884 it had swung its considerable weight and influence behind the Prohibition-Home Protection Party, which espoused the WCTU's two primary aims.

During the last two decades of the nineteenth century the organization became a powerful pressure group, influencing the American political process at all levels, even though its membership still could not vote. The formidable lobbying skills the WCTU developed in working with state legislatures and Congress were quickly copied by other reform groups. In what were perhaps its two most significant legislative victories during the period, the WCTU succeeded in convincing most states to institute temperance education in the public schools and raise the age of consent for female sexual activity to 16 years or older. These victories reflected the organization's concern to develop a new generation of temperance reformers and to protect girls from rape.

By the late 1880s Willard began to address the glaring issue of poverty, decrying the great gap between the few rich and the many poor. She led her organization to champion the aims of the rising labor movement, focusing particularly on the plight of women and child workers. By the 1890s Willard herself espoused Christian socialism, believing it to be the best way to tackle the economic inequities of the Gilded Age and bring justice to the poor. Although some of the WCTU's members agreed with Willard in this analysis, the organization as a whole did not. Some members began to call for narrowing its scope to the single issue of prohibition.

After Willard's death in 1898, WCTU leaders joined with the Anti-Saloon League in the final push for national prohibition. With the passage of the Eighteenth (Prohibition) Amendment in 1918 and the Nineteenth (women's suffrage) Amendment in 1919, the two most enduring aims of the organization were achieved. Following the prohibition victory, WCTU enjoyed great popularity and attained a membership of 500,000. However, with the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment in 1933, the organization began to lose both power and prestige. The WCTU still exists in the twenty-first century but its membership has shrunk to below 5,000 and has become politically and socially conservative. Yet its aim of educating against substance abuse remains important.

SEE ALSO: Women's Movement, United States, 16th–18th Centuries; Women's Movement, United States, 19th Century; Women's Movement, United States, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Blocker, J. S., Jr. (1989) American Temperance Movements: Cycles of Reform. Boston: Twayne.
- Bordin, R. (1981) Woman and Temperance: The Quest for Power and Liberty. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Gifford, C. D. & Slagell, A. R. (Eds.) (2007) Let Something Good Be Said: Speeches and Writings of Frances E. Willard. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Gordon, E. P. (1924) Woman Torch-Bearers: The Story of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Evanston, IL: National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.
- Series III – Woman's Christian Temperance Union (1977) The Temperance and Prohibition Papers (microfilm edition). Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Women in the 1848 Revolution, Poland

Edyta V. Materka

The Entuzjastki (Enthusiasts) were a small, organized faction of Polish female writers, educators, and conspirators whose activism, centered in Russian-occupied Warsaw, generated the first, second, and third waves of what became known as the women's movement in partitioned Poland from the 1840s to the 1880s. Their name was coined by Enthusiast leader Narcyza Żmichowska (pseudonym Gabryella) in the 1870s. Since many scholarly works written about the Enthusiasts did not survive World War II, there are very limited resources available, and the scope of interpretation concerning the Enthusiasts' political and social influence has been disputed among scholars.

What is known and agreed upon about the Enthusiasts is that the group of women emerged in one of the most tempestuous periods of Polish history. Their activities were vested in the midst of the country's uprisings, insurrections, conspiratorial activities, and peasant rebellions against the Russian occupation. Although the Enthusiasts introduced the idea of women's emancipation in Poland, the movement never broke through the survivalism barrier of promulgating the nationalistic identity and women's integral role as mothers in raising the next Polish generation to fight against the occupying forces during Poland's politically tumultuous times.

The Enthusiasts organized prior to the failure of Poland's November Insurrection in the 1830–1 Uprising (Cadet Revolution) against the Russian government, which resulted in the emigration of over 9,000 defeated, male, leftist leaders, noblemen, and conspirators. The emigration unshackled traditional fetters that bound upper-class women's lives to the private, familial sphere of proper conduct. As a result, the Enthusiasts were able to produce a unique literary and social movement of public female dialogue which complicated the traditional values and virtues that defined the power structure of the szlachta (noble classes of Polish society) taught by famous pedagogues of the day such as Stanisław Jachowicz and Klementyna Hoffmanowa. The Enthusiasts founded schools, taught, became involved in charitable activities, undertook editorial work, wrote, carried out lively correspondence, organized social life, and distributed illegal literature.

Some notable Enthusiasts, including Narcyza Żmichowska, Tekla Dobryznka, Bibiana Moraczewska, Wincenta Zablocka, Faustyna Morzycka, Emilia Gosselin, and Paulina Zbyszewska, were unmarried noblewomen from land-owning families and were economically forced to engage themselves in educational and civic activities in order to financially support themselves. They were neither anti-male nor isolationist, as they had non-marital relationships with men and extended their conspiratorial networks with male insurgents. According to Narcyza Żmichowska's letters, however, the Enthusiasts did not have a shared dogma or creed but were rather united by "sincere friendship" even if they had opposite principles.

Ideologically, however, the Enthusiasts, influenced by George Sand, Fourier, Saint-Simon, and other French feminist resistance writers, propagated post-Enlightenment ideas of liberation in monthly literary journals such as Przegląd Pedagogic (Pedagogical Review) and Przegląd Naukowy (Scientific Review) where they announced their objectives in seeking "truth and goodness, independent action, economic self-sufficiency, access to higher education, and social and legal freedom." They were supported by Eleonora Ziemiańska, editor of a philosophical and literary monthly, Pielgrzym (Pilgrim), and of Mysli o wychowaniu kobiet (Thoughts about the Conditioning of Women), and opposed by a group of public female activists named the "Lionesses" and female-represented popular magazines such as Pierwiosnek (Primrose) and Biblioteka Warszawska (Warsaw Library).

In 1848, the Enthusiasts participated in nationalistic conspiratorial organizations such as Towarzystwo Demokratyczne Polskie (Polish Democratic Society), Stowarzyszenie Ludu Pulsing (Polish People's Association), and Związek Plebejuszy (Plebeian Association), which incited the Greater Poland Uprising of 1848 against the occupying Prussian forces. The crucial link between the Enthusiasts and the artisans' conspiracy was Żmichowska's role as the emissary who met with famous insurgents Karol Libelt (father of the word "intelligentsia") and Ludwik Mierosławski, but also others who plotted toward the assassination of the Russian tsar. Although the nature of Żmichowska's role in actively carrying out conspiratorial activity is unknown, when she was arrested by the tsarist secret police, she denied the accusations and was kept in a Lublin prison for three years. The Russian government's incessant arrests of male and female conspirators until the early 1850s led to the eventual end of the Enthusiasts' political work.

SEE ALSO: Hungary, Women Radicals, 1848–1849; Polish Revolution of 1830; Women and National Liberation in Africa; Women in the Russian Revolution; Women in the Solidarity Movement, Polish Underground

References and Suggested Readings

- Borkowska, G. (2001) Alienated Women: A Study on Polish Women's Fiction 1845–1918. New York: Central European University Press, pp. 23–54.
- Lorence-Kot, B. & Winiarz, A. (2004) The Polish Women's Movement to 1914. In S. Paletschek & B. Pietrow-Ennker (Eds.), Women's Emancipation Movements in the Nineteenth Century: A European Perspective. Stanford: Stanford University Press, pp. 206–20.
- Women in Poland during the 1848 Revolution. In Encyclopedia of 1848 Revolutions. Available at www.ohiou.edu/~Chastain/rz/womenpol.htm.

Women and national liberation in Africa

Alicia C. Decker

African liberation from colonial rule was the product of years of intense negotiation, compromise, and armed struggle. In 1957, Ghana became the first Sub-Saharan African country to receive independence. As president and “father of the nation,” Kwame Nkrumah symbolized liberation and potential to Africans across the continent. The following year, in 1958, Guinea's independence brought to power another important nationalist figure – Sékou Touré. Like Nkrumah, Touré personified the hopes and possibilities of the new nation. Shortly thereafter, others who also represented African independence and autonomy joined them: Patrice Lumumba (Zaire), Julius Nyerere (Tanzania), Jomo Kenyatta (Kenya), and Kenneth Kaunda (Zambia). But “big men” were not the only ones responsible for their countries' liberation; many women also struggled alongside men for independence. In most cases, however, they agreed to put gender demands aside until the struggle was over. Few women assumed that their significant contributions would be forgotten; yet this is exactly what happened in country after country. For this reason, it is fair to say that African liberation was partial at best.

Colonialism and Women's Struggles for Liberation

African women have a long history of instigating and participating in resistance actions against the colonial state. Throughout the colonial era, they struggled against discriminatory policies and practices. Many of their efforts were non-violent, relying instead on “traditional” methods of peaceful confrontation. At other times, however, women actively engaged in protracted guerilla struggles, both in combat and in supportive capacities.

Harry Thuku Riot (Kenya)

In the 1920s, Harry Thuku and his political party – the East African Association – championed the grievances of Africans living under British colonial rule in Kenya. They struggled against taxation, forced labor, and pass laws. Thuku and his party also resisted the lack of land ownership for Africans and the forced removal of young girls for employment in settler plantations. The colonial power structure saw Thuku's activism as a threat and arrested him on March 14, 1922. Soon after, a large crowd gathered outside the police station demanding justice. Kenyan women were outraged when African male leaders failed to secure Thuku's release. One woman responded by exposing her genitals to the offending party, a traditional Kikuyu insult known as Guturama. Tabitha Kanogo (1987) argues that Guturama was the ultimate recourse for those who were consumed by anger, frustration, humiliation, and revenge (see also Wipper 1989). The woman then challenged the group of men to hand over their trousers as symbols of their manhood to signify that they were incapable of handling the situation effectively. The gathered women ululated in support and prevented the crowd from dispersing. Police opened fire, killing 21 people, including four women. Although the women were ultimately unable to release Thuku, their use of Guturama was a powerful challenge to the male monopoly of political power and colonial rule.

Igbo Women's War (Nigeria)

Nigerian women also relied on traditional forms of non-violent protest to resist British colonial rule. In November 1929, thousands of Igbo women collectively organized against "warrant chiefs," a group of Nigerian men who served as the functionaries of indirect rule. The band of women "sat" on the chiefs, singing, dancing, and following them everywhere. The women ordered the chiefs to turn over their red felt caps, which were important symbols of their allegiance to British colonial rule. If the chiefs gave up their caps without a fight, the women levied a fine and verbally abused everyone within the compound. If the chiefs refused to submit to their demands, the women damaged property and threatened physical violence. In the end, however, they were the only ones injured; British colonial soldiers killed more than 50 women. The Igbo Women's War is a classic example demonstrating how women used traditional forms of protest and how oblivious colonial officials were to the meanings and significance of their actions (Bastian 2002; Van Allen 1976).

Kabaka's Protest (Uganda)

In 1953, the British colonial government deported the Kabaka of Buganda because of his opposition to the proposed East African Federation. The king refused federation and insisted on independence for his kingdom. The British governor, however, felt that the Kabaka was impeding the transition to independence with his obstinacy. He believed that by removing the king from power, a more progressive nationalism would emerge. The governor was sorely mistaken. After the Kabaka was deported, several members of the Mothers' Union formed a subsidiary group called the Mothers of the Nation, traveling throughout the country and rallying support for the king. Eventually, they organized three busloads of women to protest before the governor. The women assembled at the governor's mansion in mourning dress, refusing to sit on chairs, drink tea, or speak in English. They gave the governor a memorandum, chastising him for not consulting the "Mothers of the Nation" before taking action. The Baganda, they argued, were the only ones with the right to dethrone their king. Surprisingly, the governor was receptive to the women's demands and agreed to meet with the Buganda parliament about the matter. He later conceded that Uganda should become an independent state and within two years, the king was permitted to return from exile. In 1962, the country gained independence and the Kabaka was elected the nation's first president.

Forms of Resistance

In the late 1950s and early 1960s, many African nations achieved independence after years of intense political negotiation and compromise. A handful of others, however, were unable to celebrate the turning tide because they remained under the grip of colonial rule. They were left with no alternative but to launch revolutionary wars of liberation. The armed struggle against the Portuguese was particularly brutal, though after the Caetano regime was overthrown in 1974, Angola, Mozambique, and Guinea-Bissau soon won their independence. In 1980, Zimbabwean freedom fighters forced out the white settler regime and ten years later, Namibians were released from the shackles of South African occupation. In 1993, Eritrea gained autonomy from the imperialist grasp of Ethiopia, and in 1994 South Africa held its first multiracial democratic elections. African women were active participants in all of these struggles. The problem, however, was that many of the promises of liberation made to women during the struggle were broken once the wars were won. This has been a major source of contention for African women and continues to stoke their activism today.

How did women contribute to the liberation struggles? Despite the popular image of the female revolutionary with a baby strapped on her back and an AK-47 across her chest, relatively few women participated in direct combat. During Algeria's liberation struggle from France, for instance, only 0.5 percent of women in the army were combatants. Even in contexts where the percentage of women fighters was significantly higher, such as in Zimbabwe or Eritrea, most women played supportive roles. Many used their femininity subversively by carrying weapons underneath their skirts or in their babies' nappies. Because existing gender norms viewed women primarily as wives and mothers, they were not suspected of subversive activity. At the same time, many women provided vital logistical support such as cooking, cleaning, and doing laundry for the comrades. Though less glamorous, these activities were crucial to the success of the struggle. Despite the importance of their involvement, both on the frontlines and in non-combative roles, there is agreement among scholars that women's emancipation has been limited at best.

Women's Movements in Postcolonial Africa

Women's movements in Africa are broadly categorized as either welfare-oriented or feminist, depending on their ideological orientation. Because emphasis may shift over time, it is difficult to classify any given movement. Nevertheless, it can be generally argued that the first type of women's movement seeks to improve women's welfare, but does not necessarily challenge existing gender inequalities. Instead, it strives to make women's lives easier by increasing their efficiency and productivity. Feminist women's movements, on the other hand, seek to fundamentally alter the existing patriarchal gender order. They question the inequitable distribution of power and resources and seek radical transformation of the status quo.

Autonomy from government intervention or co-optation has been a major challenge for women's movements in Africa. Without the ability to set their own agenda, women's groups have been deradicalized. In Mozambique, for example, women played an active role in the anti-colonial struggle against the Portuguese. As early as 1964, women joined the liberation movement as part of the Front for the Liberation of Mozambique (FRELIMO). Although they were initially barred from guerilla training, women fought for the right to participate in combat operations. In 1966, FRELIMO established a Women's Detachment, giving women the opportunity to become actively involved in the armed struggle. By 1968, women were considered candidates for minor leadership roles within the army, though they were still excluded from top leadership positions within the movement.

"The woman question" became increasingly important as the struggle intensified. FRELIMO theorized that the root of women's oppression was the capitalist system of labor exploitation, which promoted cultural practices that were harmful to women, such as bridewealth and polygamy. In 1973, they created the Organization of Mozambican Women (OMM) "to guarantee the implementation of women's emancipation as defined by the Frelimo Party" (Sheldon 1994: 33).

Because of their Marxist orientation, they believed that women would be emancipated through the national liberation struggle. The major problem was that the party, not the women themselves, articulated women's liberation. As a result, women were seen primarily as wives, mothers, and workers. After winning independence in 1975, the OMM became the official "women's wing" of the FRELIMO government. Although women were technically incorporated into the political arena, they lacked the autonomy to set their own agenda. As a result, most OMM projects reinforced "traditional" social expectations about women's roles as wives and mothers. In 1991, after Mozambique became a multiparty state, the OMM broke away from FRELIMO and registered as a non-governmental organization. For the first time since its inception, OMM could advocate solely for women's rights. Unfortunately, its ability to function as an independent organization was seriously compromised by funding obstacles. In 1996, the group decided to realign with the government. The extent to which the OMM can now advance its own agenda is debatable.

The Nigerian women's movement also has inextricable links to the state, resulting from a pattern known as "wifeism" (Abdullah 1995) or "the cult of the first lady" (Amadiume 2000). In response to the demands of the UN Decade for Women (1975–85), the government of Ibrahim Babangida established the National Committee on Women and Development in 1982 to serve as a liaison between state and non-governmental organizations. The committee initiated a variety of projects that were designed to improve rural women's lives, including home economics, arts and crafts, health and hygiene, literacy, and income-generating schemes. However, because most of the committee members were from the urban upper class, they did not represent the interests of the rural majority.

Interest in women's issues also coincided directly with macroeconomic restructuring, such as structural adjustment programs. The state needed women's labor in order to increase cash crop production, so it launched the Better Life for Rural Women Program (BLP) in 1987. According to Hussaina Abdullah, this represented the "direct intervention by the state in the formation and funding of women's organizations and the systematic appointment of wives of high-ranking government officials as leaders of these organizations,” a process she calls “state pseudo-feminism” (1995: 214). By maintaining indirect control over the movement and bureaucratizing women’s concerns, the state prevented challenges to the regime and advanced class interests. The founder and coordinator of the BLP was the president’s wife, Maryam Babangida. While the BLP’s programs did benefit some women, they did not fundamentally transform larger social relations. Women were still viewed primarily as wives, mothers, and secondary income earners. When the Babangida government was overthrown in 1993, the same pattern was repeated. The new president’s wife, Maryam Abacha, dismantled the BLP and repackaged it as the Family Support Program. By institutionalizing patronage for the wives of military dictators, autonomous feminist organizing became exceedingly difficult.

Feminist Movements in Postcolonial Africa

Given the realities of government co-optation and funding scarcities, independent feminist organizing in Africa has been a major challenge. Nonetheless, African women have persevered, paving the way for social change. As a political project, African feminism challenges structures of power and domination. In Nigeria, for instance, there is also a feminist movement that is coterminous with the state-centric women’s movement described above.

In 1982, Women in Nigeria (WIN) emerged as a national women’s organization with a radically different ideological bent than the first lady’s Better Life Program (BLP). It maintains that women’s subordination is rooted in class and gender oppression and works toward their eradication. Although they claim to represent the interests of the poor, most of WIN’s members are educated women from the urban middle class. They have been criticized for their elitism and their identification with western feminists. Unlike the BLP, which focused primarily on income-generating projects for women, WIN seeks to fundamentally enhance women’s economic status and independence. It also focuses on broader issues such as reproductive rights, sexual harassment, and violence against women. For this reason, WIN’s relationship to the Nigerian state has been tenuous; the government has attempted to co-opt the group on numerous occasions. Since WIN has consistently refused to give up its autonomy, it is an excellent example of a feminist political project, even if, as Molaria Ogundipe-Leslie (1994) has pointed out, the term feminism carries a negative stigma in Africa because it is associated with western feminists.

Ogundipe-Leslie argues that African feminists waste precious time responding to charges that they are imitating the West or antagonizing men. If there were alternative terminologies, energy could be channeled toward the real struggle – improving the conditions of women in Africa. She proposes the term stivanism, an acronym standing for Social Transformation Involving Women in Africa. Similar to the earlier “add women and stir” approaches to development, “STIWA” seeks to include African women in the “contemporary social and political transformation of Africa” (1994: 230). Obioma Nnaemeka, on the other hand, embraces the term feminism, but adds “nego” as an important qualifier. She argues that nego-feminism (the feminism of negotiation or no-ego feminism) is a way of naming African feminisms (2004). It is an inclusive feminism that is based on shared values common within African cultures. As Nnaemeka suggests, nego-feminism “knows when, where, and how to negotiate with or negotiate around patriarchy in different contexts” (2004: 378). In this way, then, feminism in Africa is a dynamic process versus a static framework. It is constantly evolving based on emerging needs and politics.

Renaming feminism is one strategy that has been used to make women’s liberation more palatable to the masses. Another strategy is to reclaim the term feminism and imbue it with meaning. African feminists have articulated a feminism that stems from continental realities such as slavery, colonialism, and neocolonialism. Because it is relevant to Africans and defined on their terms, it should be considered a proactive social movement (Steady 2006). African feminists do not see oppression as hierarchical. Instead, they focus on the salience of particular issues in local contexts in order to determine what is oppressive and what is empowering. For example, while some western feminists may view motherhood as disempowering to women, most African feminists would disagree. As an individual decision and as a collective ideology, motherhood is embraced and not rejected. Their concern is not whether to have children but how to combine mothering with other social roles.

Just as children are central to African women’s identities, so are men. According to Nnaemeka, there is a deep “inter-gender partnership” among men and women in African cultures. Gender complementarity and cooperation are therefore important values. At the same time, she warns scholars not to ignore the reality of gender inequality and oppression. While African feminists do not want equality with men, they need equity and empowerment. Unlike radical feminists, they do not want to overthrow or disrupt the system. Instead, they seek alliances and engage in coalition building. They value power sharing, communalism, negotiation, and compromise.

African feminists also value tradition and modernity. They try to understand the importance of customs practiced in specific cultural and historic contexts and rework those that may be harmful to women. The point is that African women are setting the agenda and determining which traditions are oppressive or empowering. This does not mean that western feminists cannot work in coalition with Africans to eradicate practices which may be harmful. It does mean, however, that they must assume an ancillary position in the struggle and allow African women to take the lead. Similarly, elite African women must be willing to listen to women at the “grassroots.” Most importantly, their theories must be related to practice. Academic feminists have to work with local activists so that their feminisms are situated in local realities. A number of important feminist networks have emerged on the continent, thus ensuring that research is practice-oriented and socially grounded. These include the Association of African Women for Research and Development (AAWORD) and CODESRIA.

Even though it is possible to articulate some basic tenets of African feminism, the discourse remains fraught with disagreement. One arena concerns the origins of feminist activism; some claim that feminism is indigenous to Africa environments, while others see it as a social movement still in its infancy. Another tension revolves around who should lead the movement. Those believing that feminism is indigenous to Africa would argue that strong women leaders should come from the rural communities and the “grassroots” level. In contrast, those seeing feminism as a nascent movement assert that leadership needs to be in the hands of academic and elite women. In addition, there are disagreements about the origins of patriarchal oppression. Some say that the roots of oppression lie within traditional cultural practices, while others assert that patriarchy is a product of colonialism and not inherent to African cultures. Finally, there is contestation regarding what actually constitutes feminist action. Academic feminists would claim that the Harry Thuku Riot, the Igbo Women’s War, and the Kabaka’s Protest were not feminist because they were not specifically aimed at ending gender inequalities. Indigenous feminists, however, would view feminist engagement in much broader terms and therefore classify the actions as feminist.

In addition to theoretical challenges, African feminists also struggle with a number of pragmatic issues, many resulting from the continent’s tremendous size and diversity. For example, language barriers make coalition building more difficult. Differences in social class and education levels may also present challenges to feminist mobilization, and identity politics further complicate the situation. Many women may feel a greater sense of loyalty to their ethnic or religious groups and do not want to risk alienating themselves from the larger collective. By fighting for women’s rights, they face a very real threat of being labeled as traitors to their community. And finally, the lack of autonomy experienced by many feminist organizations on the continent make it extremely difficult to organize around issues that challenge patriarchy, particularly if they are linked to the state. Thus, while it is not impossible to build pan-African feminist alliances, it requires a high level of creativity and diligence.

Although women have made tremendous contributions to anti-colonial and nationalist movements, their emancipation has been far from complete. Most women continue to live in patriarchal households, communities, and nations that view them as second-class citizens. Nonetheless, African women are not victims. They have crafted a political and ideological resistance movement seeking liberation for all Africans from racist, imperialist, and patriarchal oppression.

SEE ALSO: FRELIMO (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique); Women’s Movement, Southern Africa; Women’s War of 1929

References and Suggested Readings

- Abdullah, H. (1995) Wifeism and Activism: The Nigerian Women’s Movement. In A. Basu (Ed.), The Challenge of Local Feminisms: Feminisms in Global Perspective. Boulder: Westview Press.
- Aina, O. (1998) African Women at the Grassroots: The Silent Partners of the Women’s Movement. In O. Nnaemeka (Ed.), Sisterhood, Feminisms, and

- Power: From Africa to the Diaspora*. Trenton: Africa World Press.
- Amadiume, I. (2000) Daughters of the Goddess, Daughters of Imperialism: African Women Struggle for Culture, Power and Democracy. London: Zed Books.
- Bastian, M. L. (2002) Vultures of the Marketplace: Southeastern Nigerian Women and Discourses of the Ogu Umanwaaniy (Women's War) of 1929. In J. Allman, S. Geiger, & N. Musisi (Eds.), Women in African Colonial Histories. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Kanogo, T. (1987) Kikuyu Women and the Politics of Protest: Mau Mau. In S. MacDonald, P. Holden, & S. Ardener (Eds.), Images of Women in Peace and War. London: Macmillan.
- Nnaemeka, O. (2004) Nego-Feminism: Theorizing, Practicing, and Pruning Africa's Way. Signs 29, 2 (Winter): 357–85.
- Ogundipe-Leslie, M. (1994) Re-Creating Ourselves: African Women and Critical Transformations. Trenton: Africa World Press.
- Oyèwumi, O. (Ed.) (2005) African Gender Studies: A Reader. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Ranchod-Nilsson, S. (1994) "This, Too, Is a Way of Fighting": Women's Participation in Zimbabwe's Liberation War. In M. A. Tetreault (Ed.), Women and Revolution in Africa, Asia and the New World. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.
- Sheldon, K. (1994) Women and Revolution in Mozambique: A Luta Continua. In M. A. Tetreault (Ed.), Women and Revolution in Africa, Asia and the New World. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.
- Steady, F. C. (2006) Women and Collective Action in Africa: Development, Democratization and Empowerment, with Special Focus on Sierra Leone. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Van Allen, J. (1976) Aba Riots or Igbo Women's War? Ideology, Stratification and Invisibility of Women. In N. J. Halfkin & E. G. Bay (Eds.), Women in Africa: Studies in Social and Economic Change. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Wipper, A. (1989) Kikuyu Women and the Harry Thuku Disturbances: Some Uniformities of Female Militancy. Africa 59 (3): 300–37.

Women in the Russian Revolution

Soma Marik

Revolutionary Origins

A long-drawn-out event, the roots of the Russian Revolution go back to the reforms of Tsar

Alexander II, notably the emancipation of the serfs. Unhappy with the limited reforms (for example, emancipation came with a price tag as serfs had to pay huge compensation), many young radicals, influenced by a number of Russian and western political thinkers and activists, became revolutionaries. Belonging to the Russian upper and middle classes and notably the intelligentsia (men and women), they came to accept socialism as the goal, but hoped to avoid the West European path, through banking on peasant collectivism and moving directly to socialism, bypassing capitalism. Because of their call to go to the people they were called Populists or Narodniks (people). Early efforts at raising people's consciousness to overturn the exploitative state and social order failed, as did the efforts to form revolutionary terrorist organizations. One such organization named Narodnaya Volya (Peoples' Will or Freedom) succeeded in killing Tsar Alexander II, but perished in the subsequent state repression. Among those hanged was Sophia Perovskaya. Vera Figner spent many years in prison for her role in the revolutionary movement. Vera Zasulich began her career as a militant by shooting a notorious general, but became the supporter of a minority current, led by G. V. Plekhanov, which formed the first Marxist group in Russia, the Emancipation of Labor Group.

Although issues of women's equality were among the subjects of discussion in the political movements, a fully fledged women's movement did not develop till 1905, the year of Russia's first revolution. Then, given the sharp class conflict in Russian society as well as the clear position of Russian and international social democracy as regards feminism, two distinct women's movements arose.

Suffrage Struggle

In times of general political unrest, twentieth-century feminism took on a decidedly more political color. Younger feminists were not satisfied with philanthropy. In Finland, ruled by the Tsar but with a different political system, feminism had progressed from philosophical reflections to education, and thence to social work and eventually a battle for women's suffrage.

Around 1905 a number of liberal organizations such as the Union of Liberation invited Russian women to their political banquets. In February 1905 several hundred women members of Moscow society published in the liberal paper Russian News a lament for Bloody Sunday (January 9, 1905, when a huge number of peaceful workers were gunned down by the tsarist armed forces). By late February an all-Russian Union for Women's Equality (Women's Union) was formed, calling for freedom and equality before the law irrespective of sex. It began by petitioning the City Duma (municipality) and the local zemstvo (self-governing body) for voting rights in those bodies. Soon St. Petersburg became its headquarters. Leaders of the Union included Zinaida Mirovich-Ivanova, Anna Kalmanovich, Lyubov Gurevich, and Mariya Chekhova. A meeting on April 10, 1905, attended by around a thousand women, laid the foundations for the Union's Congress. Held on May 7–10 in Moscow, the Congress demanded a constituent assembly elected by equal, direct, secret, and universal vote, without distinction of nationality, religion, or sex. Its progressive demands included equality of the sexes before the law, equal rights for peasant women in any land reforms, laws for the welfare and insurance of women workers, equal opportunity for women, coeducation, reform of laws relating to prostitution, and abolition of the death penalty. In July 1905 the Union of Unions, an all-inclusive liberal formation, accepted the Women's Union as a member, though the future Kadet (Constitutional Democratic) leader Paul Miliukov was opposed to it. When the Women's Union threatened to turn to revolutionary working-class parties for support, male liberals of the zemstvos gave in.

In December 1905 Dr. Maria Ivanovna Pokrovskaya and some supporters formed the Women's Progressive Party. They demanded a democratic constitutional monarchy and opposed united action with men in the struggle for women's rights. More moderate than the Women's Union, it was opposed to strikes, but called for factory reforms for women workers.

The demand for women's suffrage met a diverse response among the political parties. The Social Democratic Party had incorporated women's equality, including the right to vote, in its party program in 1903. Within the Socialist Revolutionary Party (SR), the latest Narodnik organization, Viktor Chernov, the main leader of the party, was entirely in favor of women's complete equality, including women's suffrage. However, some peasants in the party were completely opposed to equality, suggesting women should get the vote but not the right to be elected. Peasant women fought against such prejudices and in the end the Peasant Union joined the SR in endorsing political equality for women. The liberals were more strongly divided. At the Kadet Congress of January 1906 there was a sharp division, with Miliukov opposing Ana Miliukova and Tyrkova. But Professor Petrazhitsky's support tilted the balance and the feminists won by a narrow margin. Parties to the right of the Kadets, like the Octobrists, refused to give feminists any hearing. Till January 1906 the suffragists had partially sided, with great hesitation, with the extreme left. The vote at the Kadet Congress came as a relief for them, and many turned to the liberals. A small left wing oriented to the Trudoviks, a group of moderate Narodnik deputies to the Duma, Russia's semi-constitutional representative body.

During the elections of March 1906, women organized meetings, raised money, and helped in counting votes. This approach of loyalty in return for rights, originally taken by the Women's Union, would lead many feminists to support the Russian state during World War I. After the elections the feminists tried to mobilize opinion in favor of a women's suffrage bill without much headway.

After June 1907, when new Premier Stolypin used martial law to smash the revolutionary struggles, there was a general decline in radical activities. Kadets like Miliukova and Tyrkova devoted their main efforts to their party. Zinaida Mirovich was aligned with Carrie Chapman Catt of the USA and Millicent Garrett Fawcett of England on the right wing of the women's suffrage movement and opposed to universal suffrage movements. On the left wing of the feminist movement were people like Gurevich and Olga Volkenstein. They criticized the bourgeois character of the Women's Union. Gurevich had some Marxist links (as her familiarity with the works of August Bebel, Karl Kautsky, and Klara Zetkin shows), but she was not a member of any Marxist party. Her attempts to organize women workers occurred within a feminist context of organizing women separately. This led to women social democrats like Alexandra Kollontai turning very sharply against her. The final confrontation between the organized Marxists and the feminists came in 1908 at the First All Russian Women's Congress.

Russian Socialist Movement

Though the Russian Social Democratic Labor Party (RSDLP) was intended to be an orthodox party on the German model, in fact Lenin's party building strategy focused much more on organizing militant proletarians. In addition, his concept of building up the party with an initial scaffolding of "professional revolutionaries" had both a positive impact on making it a revolutionary workers' party, and a more complex impact on women workers. Lenin wanted a party of vanguard workers. In order to centralize the political experience of a fragmented class, it was necessary to bring together vanguard workers and unify the sectional experiences of the class by giving them respite from routine waged work. Though the concept of full-time professional revolutionary was aimed at ensuring the proletarian democratic content of the vanguard, very little was done to integrate the experiential or existential realities of the women workers, who had no respite from housework and who were routinely treated as backward.

In Russia in the early twentieth century the average woman worker married and had children by the time she was 20–22. Without party education to enhance the value of work done by women or to organize them separately, the formal equality of comrades in the party could not erase the real inequality of the private sphere, where women had to look after children, do housework, and earn money for their professional revolutionary husbands. Cecelia Bobrovskaya, a veteran revolutionary and a midwife, wrote later that during a long underground career she had met a number of committed women who were so tied down by domestic work that they could not become professional revolutionaries. A large number of male Bolshevik workers became leaders, while the percentage of women leaders was low and only two of them, Alexandra Artiukhina and Klavdiia Nikolaeva, came from the working class. On the eve of the February Revolution, out of 24,000 members there were about 2,500 women in the Bolshevik Party.

In 1901 Nadezhda Krupskaya's pamphlet Zhenshchina Rabotnitsa (The Woman Worker) urged the party to turn to women workers as a group and to look at their demands for the first time. Until Kollontai's book appeared in 1909, this was the only Russian Marxist work that warned Russian working men that taking women out of the labor force would not end exploitation. The writings of the founders of Russian Marxism had said virtually nothing about women. So while reviewing in 1899 the first Russian Marxist program of 1885, Lenin stressed the need to add a demand for complete equal rights for men and women, possibly as a result of Krupskaya's influence. Certainly, like the men, the women who joined the RSDLP felt that the Marxist program offered a way out of the exploitative society and the autocratic tsarist order. The liberal feminist analysis and the limited reforms seemed inadequate compared to the Marxist analysis, which linked the real emancipation of millions of working-class and peasant women with the social revolution.

Relatively larger numbers of women joined the SR Party than the Social Democratic Party. There were a number of reasons for this. First, the Populist movement had deeper indigenous roots. Second, Populism attracted large numbers of women from the intelligentsia. While Marxist socialism also attracted some of the latter, its focus on the proletariat made it very different from the Populists. According to one assessment (Stites 1991), over 9 percent of mandated delegates to SR congresses or conferences in 1905–8 were women. The Union of School Teachers was dominated by the party and these teachers were crucial in spreading SR politics in the countryside. The party believed in revolutionary terrorism and its terrorist wing also had a number of women. General Min, who led the military repression of the Moscow uprising of 1905, was killed by the SR Zina Konoplyanikova. She was hanged at Schlüsselburg Fortress. The most important of such SR women was Maria Spiridonova. Following the instructions of the local committee, she shot General Luzhenovsky, who had subjected her province to punitive raids in 1905. She was arrested by soldiers and tortured brutally. International protests resulted in her being exiled to Siberia instead of being hanged.

The revolution of 1905 resulted in relatively larger numbers of women coming to the Social Democratic Party. Also, with an increase in women's recruitment into industry, the party had to pay more attention to work among women. Secretaries of the city committees were professional revolutionaries. The usual structure was to have three secretaries – one for the basic political decisions, one for publication of pamphlets and leaflets, and one for the technical work of the committee. Evans Clements' (1997) survey showed that women secretaries were mostly technical secretaries. This reflected internalization within the party structure of a typical gender division of labor.

The picture among émigrés was even clearer. No woman other than Alexandra Kollontai ever obtained recognition as a theoretician in the Bolshevik Party. It was always thought better to engage women in other kinds of work – working in the underground, as couriers, as assistants, working to earn money so that theoretician husbands need not work, and so on. As the life of Inessa Armand shows, the party leadership (in this case, Lenin) exerted considerable pressure on women, asking them to do more “useful” work. From the Second Party Congress of 1903 to the February Revolution, women theoreticians, Central Committee members, and members of any other émigré committee, whether Bolshevik or Menshevik, numbered no more than a dozen.

The 1905 revolution brought many women workers into the political and trade union movements. Moreover, feminists were trying to create women-only unions. As a result, some Marxist women turned to organizing women workers. When a few working women were elected to the Shidlovsky Commission appointed to inquire into the tragedy of Bloody Sunday, the government refused to seat them. This led to protests by women workers. In Ivanovo-Voznesensk some 11,000 female textile workers took part in a huge strike. Kollontai played an important role in this period. Coming into contact with Marxists while living in West Europe, by 1903 she was a committed party activist, engaged in illegal socialist work in St. Petersburg. Bloody Sunday found her in the streets. She worked hard for the party, writing, distributing literature, and raising money. Participating in the inaugural meeting of the Women’s Union, Kollontai was appalled at the support given to a bourgeois liberal feminist meeting by many socialist women. She spoke sharply against “classless” feminism and was attacked by the feminists in response. Her attendance at a meeting of German socialist women in Mannheim convinced her that a special effort among women workers was needed. But now she was faced with the accusation of a “harmful tendency towards feminism.” When the Party Committee grudgingly gave her permission to hold a women-only meeting, she found the premises locked and a sign that read that the meeting had been cancelled.

Organizing women was difficult both in the party and trade unions. Unequal educational opportunity was supplemented by lesser pay for women, who were also saddled with the double burden of being workers and housewives. Despite all this, Kollontai was able to work among the Union of Textile Workers, made up largely of women. She organized a number of meetings where, under the guise of discussing women’s health, she explained the nature of social exploitation and liberation and fought against Kadet feminism. In 1908, hearing of feminist plans for the All-Russian Women’s Congress, Kollontai wanted to intervene. Unlike the official line of simple rejection of the Congress, or participating purely rhetorically in order to “expose” the liberal feminists, Kollontai tried to turn women workers’ participation in this Congress into a political education for them. Her theoretical intervention came through The Social Bases of the Woman Question (1908). It involved a simultaneous criticism of the class limitations of bourgeois feminism and a critique of the ungendered nature of social democratic politics. By rejecting a resolution on universal suffrage and other measures, liberal feminists showed clearly enough their opposition to the demands of working-class women at the Congress.

Between Two Revolutions

One result of the struggles by women workers was the recognition by a number of Bolshevik women that some kind of women-specific effort should be made to mobilize women. One major step in creating an autonomous space for women came in 1912 when, looking at women readers’ responses to a women’s page in Pravda, a number of Bolshevik women activists decided to launch a paper for women. Inessa Armand and Krupskaya among the exiles, and Anna Elizarova and Konkordia Samoilova within Russia, were the main figures behind the launching of Rabotnitsa. There were two perspectives among them, with Krupskaya writing that women were backward and had to be brought into the movement, while Armand stressed that without more encouragement to the struggles of women workers the socialist movement could not move forward. In article after article women workers highlighted the dual oppression faced by women workers, thereby compelling Pravda to pay more attention to women workers.

In 1913 Bolshevik and Menshevik women in Moscow were also able to organize a meeting in honor of International Proletarian Women's Day, despite the problem of police intervention, and deep suspicion in many socialist quarters about such a program. A day for spontaneous self-expression also signified the global struggle for proletarian women's rights.

As a result of the initial lack of socialist attention to the struggles of women workers, women's strikes and agitation sometimes remained unorganized. In 1917 women textile workers forced concessions out of their director in ways trade union organizers would oppose as "spontaneous violence." But the "general demands" chalked out by these organizers seldom talked about equal wages for men and women. In 1905 the demand was for 90 kopecks daily for men and 75 for women. In 1917, when factory committees won a minimum wage clause from the owners in Petrograd, the rates were 5 rubles for men and 4 for women. When women themselves took a leading role, the demands could change. In 1912–13 several strikes in which women were significantly present were organized in protest against sexual harassment when workers were searched as they left factory premises. Women workers were aware of problems posed by male bias in the unions. Tsvetkova, a woman worker in the leather industry, pointed out that male workers did not regard women workers as full and equal members of the working class, and tried to pass the burden of unemployment and lay-offs onto women (Marik 2004).

War and Revolution: 1914–1917

The coming of World War I intensified class conflicts in Russia and within a few years led directly to the revolutions of February and October 1917. Nobles and many women from the intelligentsia, including pacifist feminists, supported the war in the hope that their patriotism would be rewarded by suffrage and other rights by the government. A number of women also fought in the army, the best-known being Maria Bochkareva, who tried to organize women's battalions in 1917. Though none of this led to women's enfranchisement before 1917, upper-class women gained in educational and employment opportunities. The demand for more engineers, for example, led to granting graduates of the Women's Technical Institutes the right to become full-fledged engineers. In 1917 the feminist organizations therefore had legal existence and ample funds. After the February Revolution, the pro-war League for Women's Equality reemerged as the Republican Union of Democratic Women's Organizations. It won over the aged Vera Figner to its cause and organized a demonstration to the Provisional Government. The radicals ridiculed this, with the Bolshevik women pointing out that women's right to vote for the constituent assembly should not depend on the blessings of the Provisional Government. By May, Bochkareva had taken the initiative in forming a Women's Battalion of Death, hailed by feminists like Anna Shabanova. In August a Women's Military Congress was held. One unit of these battalions fought to defend the Kerensky regime in its last days. In the face of rising Bolshevik power, differences between bourgeois liberal feminists and women of the moderate socialist parties tended to vanish.

By 1917 women formed 43 percent of the workforce. Before the Bolsheviks entered the field, women workers themselves had taken initiatives. The February Revolution began on International Working Women's Day (February 23) when women textile workers determinedly launched a general strike, ignoring the advice of the Bolshevik local leadership not to do so. The first weeks after February saw an unprecedented increase in the number of women organizing themselves to make political and economic demands. Bolsheviks were active among them. In Petrograd Bolshevik women were active in organizing the Soldatki (soldiers' wives) helping to increase Bolshevik influence in the army. The social peace established by the Mensheviks and the SRs after February was broken for the first time by several thousand women laundry workers in Petrograd. Bolshevik women like Goncharskaya, Novikondratieva, and Sakharova led these struggles for an 8-hour working day and minimum wages. Under the influence of Kollontai, Pravda regularly reported about the strike. After a month's strike, there was a partial victory.

However, liberal feminists and right-wing socialists or ex-socialists were active in mass movements and had to be combated. Among them was E. D. Kuskova, an early social democrat famous in Russian Marxist history as a major target of Lenin for her support for revisionism, and Menshevik women like Lyubov Akselrod, who said in 1917 that Marxism was closer to liberalism than to anarchism, especially in times of revolution. The League for Women's Equality, working among women, was able to put up socialists as well as democrats in its list of candidates for the constituent assembly. A meeting of the executive committee of the Petersburg Committee of the Bolsheviks suggested the necessity of setting up a bureau of working women under the city committee, as some kind of autonomy was essential to enable women to think out things for themselves, to talk freely, and to express their political concerns while at the same time being part of the party and the class movement. Despite resistance to Slutskaya and Kollontai's attempts to create autonomous space in the party for women, the latter's return to Russia from exile, and her enthusiastic support to Lenin's April Theses, put power behind the work of agitating among women. Rabotnitsa was revived and became the center of agitational and organizational work among women workers. As one activist named Prokhorova wrote in the women's journal, whatever was done without women's participation was likely to be dangerous for them. But within their work it is possible to find the stirrings of a Bolshevik-"feminist" discourse that went beyond Bolshevik orthodoxy. They organized working-class women and strove to incorporate gender equality within class-struggle politics in a big way. This resulted in significant gains after the October Revolution, including autonomous organization for women.

SEE ALSO: Kollontai, Alexandra (1872–1952); Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917

References and Suggested Readings

- Donald, M. (1982) Bolshevik Activity Amongst the Working Women of Petrograd in 1917. International Review of Social History 27: 129–60.
- Elwood, R. C. (1992) Inessa Armand: Revolutionary and Feminist. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Evans Clements, B. (1997) Bolshevik Women. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Farnsworth, B. (1980) Aleksandra Kollontai: Socialism, Feminism and the Bolshevik Revolution. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Knight, A. (1979) Female Terrorists in the Russian Socialist Revolutionary Party. Russian Review 38, 2 (April): 139–59.
- McDermid, J. (1999) Midwives of the Revolution: Female Bolsheviks and Women Workers in 1917. London: University College Press.

- Marik, S. (2004) Gendering the Revolutionary Party: The Bolshevik Practice and Challenges before the Marxists in the 21st Century. In B. Chatterjee & K. Chattopadhyay (Eds.), Perspectives on Socialism. Calcutta: Progressive.
- Smith, S. A. (1994) Gender and Class: Women's Strikes in St. Petersburg, 1895–1917, and Shanghai 1895–1927. Social History 19, 2: 141–68.
- Stites, R. (1991) The Women's Liberation Movement in Russia: Feminism, Nihilism and Bolshevism 1860–1930. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Women in the Solidarity movement, Polish underground

Shana Penn

In communist Poland women made up 50 percent of the labor force and 50 percent of the 10-million-strong membership in the Solidarity free trade union movement, but less than 8 percent of Solidarity's decision-makers. Underrepresented in the trade union's male-dominated governance and political platform, women expressed their activism through other civic and communal means such as education, grassroots union organizing, parish projects, and most importantly, the opposition press. One group of women in particular played a historic role in building a free press and rescuing the Solidarity movement during the 1980s martial law era.

Solidarity, Martial Law, and the Patient Revolution

Solidarity was born of strikes by shipyard, factory, and transportation workers that spread across Poland in July and August 1980 until an estimated 1 million workers laid down their tools and added their weight to the non-violent protests. The largest strike in world history achieved a landmark victory – the founding of Solidarity, the first and only free trade union movement in the Eastern bloc and a dream come true among workers in a so-called workers' state. Solidarity set in motion a social revolution which in nine years' time would bring about the collapse of the Polish communist system and, by extension, of the entire Soviet bloc.

By the time it celebrated its one-year anniversary in August 1981, Solidarity had become so powerful that the Polish Communist Party – and the Kremlin – were determined to quash the grassroots movement. On December 13, 1981 the Polish government declared martial law and arrested an estimated 10,000 activists in the first week – 9,000 men and 1,000 women, including most of Solidarity’s male leadership. The few leaders who eluded arrest went into hiding. Tanks swept across the country, police and militia raided homes and offices, and General Wojciech Jaruzelski, the Communist Party leader, cracked down on the nation with communication and transportation bans, nighttime curfews, and myriad other restrictions on daily life. Solidarity was in a shambles, with a vacuum in leadership and the population traumatized.

In Warsaw, the nation’s capital, a group of women activists immediately rose up to counter the political crisis. Through word of mouth and the help of trusted contacts they found one another and met clandestinely in the first days of martial law to plot the rescue of their crippled movement. Their first actions were to locate and protect the leaders in hiding and to disseminate information about the military coup to the general population. By January 1982 this uniquely all-female team of journalists had organized hideouts and volunteers, moved typewriters and printing presses into attics and basements, and produced and distributed a news bulletin which informed people of arrests and imprisonments, strikes and protests, and how to otherwise weather the curfews and communication blackout that paralyzed the country.

These seven women were Helena Luczywo, Joanna Szczesna, Ewa Kulik, Anna Bikont, Anna Dodziuk, Zofia Bydlinska, and Malgorzata Pawlicka. In their 20s and 30s at the time of martial law, one was a wife and mother; three were single mothers; and three were single, with or without “significant others.” Prior to martial law they had been editors of various opposition presses; in the mid-1970s Luczywo had edited Robotnik and Szczesna had edited Bulletyn Informacyja. Some were old friends who had met in high school or university and whose activism spanned a decade. In September 1980 Luczywo, Szczesna, Dodziuk, and others had set up the Solidarity newswire service AS, and while Solidarity remained legal they built a network of contacts around the country. These experiences served them well when they went underground 16 months later and established a powerful media network. As these women discovered, there was power in the press and power in their numbers. When police swept through their community and arrested most of Solidarity’s leadership, these women took control.

Their overriding mission was to preserve the voice and authority of Solidarity developed during its legal phase and to keep the membership informed, actively engaged, and hopeful that their movement would survive. In order to manage the safety of the male leaders-in-hiding, the women set about rebuilding Solidarity into an underground network. They created an elaborate matrix of apartments, which would provide shelter and continuity to a movement that was in danger of extinction. Equally important, the women published a newspaper to provide a platform from which the leaders could be heard and to break the government’s monopoly over communication. Their newspaper Tygodnik Mazowsze (Regional Weekly), became the voice of Solidarity during the underground years of the 1980s. Its weekly print run of up to 80,000 copies was all done secretly, illegally, and without real editorial offices, real printing houses, real distribution centers, and sometimes even without real ink.

The female cabal organized other women to serve as couriers, typists, smugglers, distributors, and all-purpose conspirators. They organized housing networks to hide the men, the print production, and themselves. Drawing inspiration from the anti-Nazi resistance model of Flying Universities (secret study groups formed after the Nazis had shut down Polish universities), they created Flying Offices for newspaper production. Like a defiant game of musical chairs, the editing, printing, and distribution of the newspaper moved through a chain of apartments every few weeks, to protect the production teams and their cherished equipment, supplies, and weekly editions. They had, in effect, moved Solidarity into the home, where according to Polish tradition, women rule. This women’s network made it possible for its female masterminds to persist for close to eight years, evading arrest, and hiding in ever-changing apartments, often leaving their children in the care of their own parents, and working round the clock to keep the spirit of Solidarity alive.

Their formula for saving Solidarity rested on the realization that martial law would not be a time for large-scale public actions, such as mass protests and nationwide strikes. Nor would it be a time for negotiations with the Communist Party, which had delegatized the trade union movement. With martial law, Solidarity had entered the long, slow period when a revolution gestates. Solidarity underground was not-quite public space and not-quite private space. It was a third space, which made use of the domestic sphere to incubate a nascent civic life. It was feminine space where, in the absence of men who were in jail or in hiding; women of various ages and backgrounds could overstep traditional gender role restraints and become politically active. For some, like the Tygodnik Mazowsze editors, this meant assuming leadership roles. The underground also fostered an uncanny gender role reversal because the male leaders in hiding were housebound and reliant on the female editors who were able to move about in public. According to Szczesna, the Solidarity underground was a safe haven and power center for women because “women will only assume responsibilities where there is no competition with men.” The underground was not a valued sphere, she said in an interview, because its clandestine operations precluded public recognition, which men valued and demanded more than women.

Gender Roles and Icons

The seven women called themselves the Damska Grupa Operacyjna (Ladies Operational Unit) or simply DGO. It was the clearest symbol of their gender awareness. They had left their children in the care of their parents, separated from their male partners, and lived together, enduring crowded conditions, sharing political dreams and confidences. They quickly stopped using the DGO as a means of formal identification in the signing of communiqués, etc., however, because they rightfully feared it could unmask their highly guarded anonymity. These women knew that the government was mainly searching for the men behind the newspaper’s bylines and not aggressively hunting for women. The DGO exploited this oversight by using the female stereotype of the Good Polish Mother – the Matka Polka – to camouflage their activism. They smuggled petitions and brochures between cities by stuffing the papers under their dresses and feigning pregnancy when in transit. They concealed their newspapers inside washing machines, under refrigerators, and wherever else the police never thought to search. Sexism became the wild card to their success.

Matka Polka, who selflessly protected her nation and her men, has a long history in Poland. Historical continuity and religious symbolism were powerful unifiers in Solidarity. Matka Polka was actually the personification of the Black Madonna, which has been Poland’s icon of protection since 1655, when a battle was won in her name at Jasna Gora in eastern Poland. Centuries later, Solidarity hero Lech Walesa wore a Black Madonna brooch pinned to his shirt. After receiving the 1983 Nobel Peace Prize, Walesa placed the award in the Jasna Gora monastery. Some of the most interesting Solidarity graffiti include cartoon images of the baby Jesus sitting on the Madonna’s lap – he is holding his tiny fingers in a V for Victory sign, and she is waving her fist.

The Madonna’s “example” suffused the lives of Polish women. Under tsarist occupation in the nineteenth century, when Polish men were sent to Siberian labor camps and prisons, their women smuggled food and clothing into the prisons and operated clandestine networks across Poland. In the anti-Nazi resistance, girls ran messages through Warsaw’s sewers and took up arms against the German occupiers. Martial law perpetuated an old tradition: when men were arrested, or went into hiding or exile, women battled political oppression as they had always done in the absence of their men.

Telerevolution

The DGO’s most important achievement was as editors of the most popular and influential opposition press. An independent press is crucial to the health of a democratic society. The women of Tygodnik Mazowsze succeeded in breaking the government’s monopoly over information. According to the British historian Timothy Garton Ash, Solidarity was a “telerevolution” because it was able to circulate reliable news and information quickly, which mobilized, educated, and uplifted millions of people. Women were at the center of this telerevolution – although Garton Ash failed to report this fact.

After the communist government stepped down in 1989, the DGO helped found Gazeta Wyborcza, the first independent national news daily in Poland, and the first independent press in all of the then-crumbling Eastern bloc. The DGO's pioneering of a free press had nurtured the growth of civil society, showing that Solidarity was much more than a typical trade union. Hundreds of thousands of people nationwide were involved in the newspaper's production and dissemination. Tygodnik Mazowsze mobilized a grassroots civic movement that, even in the underground, educated the population in democratic values and practices, and promoted non-violent, evolutionary, and deep-rooted transformation of the communist state. The female editors were a critical force in incubating the spirit and organization of Solidarity during martial law, and in promoting these key aspects of democratic political culture.

But in 1989, when Solidarity's leaders stepped forth to celebrate their historic victory over communism, only men took the stage. Women's contributions were not acknowledged; nor did the women themselves demand their due recognition. The strategy of invisibility that made them so effective in resisting communism backfired in the face of their success. Their role in keeping Solidarity alive throughout the 1980s was eclipsed as the male leaders returned to dominate the Round Table negotiations with the communist regime and formation of Poland's democratic government. It was over a decade before women's leadership role was finally recognized and recorded.

SEE ALSO: Poland, Committee for Workers (KOR); Poland, Revolutions, 1846–1863; Poland, Student Movement, 1968; Polish Revolution of 1830; Socialism; Solidarność (Solidarity); Walesa, Lech (b. 1943); Women in the 1848 Revolution, Poland

References and Suggested Readings

- Brown, B. (2003) The Private Revolution. London: Hera Trust.
- Garton Ash, T. (1983) The Polish Revolution. London: Trinity Press.
- Kenney, P. (1999) The Gender of Resistance in Communist Poland. American Historical Review 104 (April).
- Long, K. (1996) We All Fought for Freedom. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Penn, S. (2005) Solidarity's Secret: The Women Who Defeated Communism in Poland. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Reading, A. (1999) Polish Women, Solidarity and Feminism. London: Macmillan.

Women's movement, Anglophone Caribbean

Reena N. Goldthree

Since the late nineteenth century, women in the Anglophone Caribbean have demanded greater social, economic, and political rights by petitioning government officials, marching collectively for food and relief work, taking part in mass strikes and public demonstrations, organizing labor unions and political organizations, launching far-reaching public education campaigns, and participating in Marxist-oriented revolutionary struggles. Although historiography on protest politics in the region focuses overwhelmingly on the contributions of charismatic male trade union leaders and political figures, feminist historians and sociologists since the 1970s have convincingly challenged notions of female docility by highlighting the critical contributions of female activists. While the degree to which women have been involved in protest movements varies significantly by country and historical period, Anglophone Caribbean women have actively participated in all of the major social and political struggles of the past century, while also organizing autonomously to promote women's rights and gender equality.

The earliest women's organizations were middle-class reform and self-help societies such as the Lady Musgrave Self-Help Society and Women's Social Service Club (WSSC) in Jamaica and the Trinidad Home Industries and Self-Help Association and the Coterie of Social Workers in Trinidad. While the Lady Musgrave Self-Help Society and the Trinidad Home Industries and Self-Help Association primarily helped women to earn additional income through craft and cooking projects, the WSSC and the Coterie of Social Workers combined traditional self-help efforts with progressive calls for women's suffrage, female jurors for trials involving women defendants, and a greater voice for women on government committees and boards.

Whereas middle-class women reformers of the 1910s and 1920s advocated for social welfare programs and greater political participation for women through self-help organizations and socio-religious clubs, many working and lower middle-class women flocked to black nationalist organizations such as the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). Co-founded by Amy Ashwood and Marcus Mosiah Garvey in Jamaica in 1914, the UNIA was a mass movement that promoted black economic self-sufficiency, political empowerment, and repatriation to Africa through grassroots chapters in North America, the Caribbean, Africa, and Central America. The association's "race-first" platform and gendered dual leadership structure attracted widespread support from women, who served in local leadership positions and filled the ranks of the association's two all-female auxiliaries, the Black Cross Nurses and the paramilitary Universal African Motor Corps. By 1926 there were 67 UNIA chapters in the Anglophone Caribbean and Garveyite women challenged colonial policies through public speeches, mass demonstrations, petition-writing campaigns, and racial uplift projects. Despite the association's masculinist rhetoric and praxis, the UNIA was an important political training ground for a generation of formidable women activists, including Daisy Crick of Trinidad, Una Marson, Amy Bailey, Amy Jacques Garvey of Jamaica, and Elfreda Reyes of Belize.

Starting in Belize and Trinidad in 1934, an unprecedented wave of strikes, riots, and protests swept the Anglophone Caribbean, erupting in St. Kitts, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, and British Guiana (Guyana) in 1935; in St. Lucia, Barbados, and Trinidad in 1937; and Jamaica in 1938. Although most labor unions during this period were male-led, rural and urban women workers figured heavily in these labor disturbances and contemporary observers frequently claimed that women protesters were more aggressive and determined than the men. In July 1934 hundreds of Indo-Trinidadian women sugar workers launched a month-long series of hunger marches and protests to demand steady employment and food. Female laborers from the Brechin Castle and Esperanza sugar estates in central Trinidad also struck repeatedly in order to reduce their daily task assignment, at times violently attacking the managers and overseers.

When labor unrest erupted once again in Trinidad in 1937, Elma Francois' militant Negro Cultural and Welfare Association (NWCSA) provided vital support for striking workers in southern Trinidad and mobilized workers and the unemployed in Port of Spain. During the massive series of strikes and riots which rocked Jamaica in 1938, female agricultural workers joined their male colleagues in violent work stoppages while groups of dressmakers, barmaids, and domestic servants in Kingston established unions and called on local lawmakers to help them secure better wages and working conditions.

In the aftermath of the 1930s labor rebellions, women helped to establish the region's first mass-based political parties as a part of the nascent nationalist movement. In Belize thousands of militant working-class women took to the streets in a series of anti-colonial marches and demonstrations in Belize City in early 1950 and campaigned vigorously on behalf of the newly formed People's United Party (PUP). In Guyana Janet Jagan co-founded the leftist People's Progressive Party (PPP) in 1950 along with her husband Cheddi Jagan and trade union leaders Ashton Chase and Jocelyn Hubbard. Four decades later, Janet Jagan became the first woman head of state in the Anglophone Caribbean when she served as president of Guyana from 1997 to 1999.

The emergence of the "second-wave" feminist movement internationally during the 1960s and 1970s spurred a major shift in women's political mobilization in the Anglophone Caribbean. Throughout this period, feminist activists pressed political party leaders and government officials to systematically address the social and economic needs of women and to combat gender discrimination. In 1970 Viola Burham of the People's National Congress (PNC) in Guyana founded the Caribbean Women's Association (CARIWA), a regional network of women's political and social organizations. In response to calls by feminist activists within the People's National Party (PNP), Jamaica established the first Women's Bureau in the Anglophone Caribbean in 1973. Over the following two decades official Women's Bureaus or Women's Desks were created in every Anglophone Caribbean nation and CARICOM opened a Women's Desk in Guyana in 1980. Several political parties also established women's subgroups, such as the Women's Revolutionary Socialist Movement (WRSM) of the PNC in Guyana, the National Women's Organization of the New Jewel Movement in Grenada, the United Women's Groups of the PUP in Belize, and the PNP Women's Movement in Jamaica.

Additionally, the United Nations Decade for Women (1975–85) provided a critical opening for women in the Anglophone Caribbean to formulate alternative development programs to enhance the quality of life of women and to establish autonomous women's advocacy groups. In June 1977 the members of CARIWA and the Caribbean Conference of Churches met with representatives from 12 Caribbean governments, international development agencies, and the University of the West Indies (UWI) in Jamaica to draft a regional strategy to implement the "women and development" goals of the UN Decade for Women. This meeting produced a Regional Plan of Action which called for the creation of national and regional bureaus to foster development programs for women and a host of related research and public education projects based at the UWI.

The introduction of International Monetary Fund (IMF) structural adjustment policies in Jamaica in 1977 and other Anglophone Caribbean territories in the 1980s severely undermined efforts to implement development programs formulated during the UN Decade for Women. As Caribbean governments privatized state-owned enterprises and curtailed social spending and economic redistribution programs, real wages declined and women's unemployment increased. In response to these profound economic challenges, a coalition of women's groups in Jamaica – including the Committee of Women for Progress (CWP) and the PNP Women's Movement (PNPWM) – joined forces to address rising food costs and demand a national maternity leave law (which was passed in 1979).

In April 1985 the Women and Development Unit (WAND) of the UWI crafted a collective Statement of Caribbean Women which argued that "conventional growth-oriented models of development" caused "increasing unemployment and inequalities" and forced women to "take on more of their governments' responsibility for the health, education, and social well-being of the society" (quoted in Reddock 1998: 70). Women in Trinidad, after witnessing the impact of structural adjustment policies in Jamaica, formed the Women against Free Trade Zones: Work with Dignity working group in 1988 to lobby against the introduction of free trade zones and to highlight the ways in which free trade zones negatively impact women workers.

In addition to protesting the introduction of structural adjustment policies, women across the Anglophone Caribbean since the mid-1980s have successfully mobilized to protest domestic violence and sexual abuse. As Reddock (1998: 62) has observed, "the issue of sexual violence in its many forms has been a key factor in mobilizing women throughout the region, uniting women of all classes, races and ethnic groups." Between 1985 and 1986 women in St. Vincent and the Grenadines led a grassroots Campaign Against Violence to Women, while women in Trinidad and Tobago vigorously lobbied for the passage of the Sexual Offenses Bill. Likewise, the Caribbean Association for Feminist Research and Action (CAFRA), a regional network of feminist activists founded in 1985, spearheaded several groundbreaking education and training programs to combat domestic violence and sexual assault in the 1980s and 1990s. More recently, the Dominica Women's Bureau and the Dominica National Council of Women sponsored a year-long campaign from 1997 to 1998 denouncing violence against women and calling for a national domestic violence law.

SEE ALSO: Belize, National Independence Movement; Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940) and Garveyism; Jagan, Cheddi (1918–1997); Jamaica, 1938 Labor Riots; New Jewel Movement; Postcolonial Feminism and Protest in the Global South; Trinidad, Labor Protests

References and Suggested Readings

- Bolles, L. (1983) Kitchens Hit by Priorities: Employed Working-Class Women Confront the IMF. In J. Nash & M. P. Fernandez-Kelly (Eds.), Women, Men, and the International Division of Labor. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Bolles, L. (1996) We Paid Our Dues: Women Trade Union Leaders of the Caribbean. Washington, DC: Howard University Press.
- Macpherson, A. (2007) From Colony to Nation: Women Activists and the Gendering of Politics in Belize, 1912–1982. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Martin, T. (1988) Women in the Garvey Movement. In R. Lewis & P. Bryan (Eds.), Garvey: His Life and Work. Kingston, Jamaica: Institute of Social and Economic Research, University of the West Indies.
- Phillip, N. (2007) Women in the Grenada Revolution, 1979–1983. small axe 22 (February): 39–66.
- Reddock, R. (1994) Women, Labour and Politics in Trinidad & Tobago: A History. London: Zed Books.
- Reddock, R. (1998) Women's Organizations and Movements in the Commonwealth Caribbean: The Response to Global Economic Crisis in the 1980s. Feminist Review 59 (Summer): 57–73.
- Vassell, L. (1993) The Movement for the Vote for Women. Jamaican Historical Review 18, 11: 40–54.

Women's movement, Australia

Marilyn Lake

Power of the Ballot

In 1902, just one year after the inauguration of the Commonwealth of Australia, Australian women were the first in the world to win full political rights – the right not just to vote, but to stand for election to the national parliament. Their victory was secured after a decade's long struggle across all the Australian colonies, which involved grassroots campaigns as well as political deputations, prodigious journalism, and the gathering of vast petitions. In 1891, for example, Victorian women sent a "monster petition" with 30,000 signatures into the parliament to demonstrate that, contrary to the claims of their opponents, women did really want the vote. The Woman Movement, as it was called, desired radical reforms in the relations of men and women and the vote promised power to effect these changes through the ballot box.

Most men had been enfranchised in the Australian colonies with the introduction of manhood suffrage fifty years earlier in the 1850s. Some women also claimed an equal voice in the fledgling democracy, but the emergent doctrine of separate spheres ensured that self-government – and economic independence – remained the preserve of men. When women began to mobilize politically in the 1880s they usually addressed the particularities of women's condition – as wives, as mothers, as household drudges, as prostitutes – rather than making arguments about abstract or equal rights. It was the oppressed condition of women, especially married women, which commanded the movement's attention and inspired their passion.

The economic dependence of wives subjected them to men's personal power and sexual coercion, which rendered many a bedroom a "Chamber of Horrors," according to Louisa Lawson, a leader of the Woman Movement in New South Wales. "A nerve of iron," she wrote, "must be possessed by frail women, who are expected to endure this horrid ordeal, and put a cheerful face upon it in the morning, well knowing that this is her fate so long as her power of endurance holds out" (Lake 1999:

19–20) To promote the cause of women's freedom and economic independence, Lawson established the magazine Dawn in 1888 and a city club of the same name. Like many suffrage leaders, Lawson demanded the vote in the name of motherhood: "If we are responsible for our children give us the power and sacredness of the ballot, and we will lift ourselves and our brothers to a higher civilization" (Lake 1999: 20).

A Welfare State

Leaders of the Woman Movement assumed that women would bring different experiences and values to public life and that they would thus contribute to the building of a "welfare state," rather than one dedicated to making money or war. Suffragists also argued that the enfranchisement of women would purify political life of its selfishness and corruption. "I can imagine no more effectual way," explained another New South Wales leader, Rose Scott, to her Sydney audience, "of raising the tone of Public Opinion, of purifying its moral sentiments, than by imparting into Public Life the woman's influence and something of that tenderness, refinement and Purity for which women are especially noted" (Lake 1999: 28).

Scott ran a salon to which she invited leading politicians and journalists to discuss the issues and legislation of the day. The reforms to which she and other women attached highest priority were: raising the age of consent, securing married women's property and custody rights, employing women in public offices in government, hospitals, and factories, and winning their right of access to higher and professional education. Labor women also placed importance on the reform of working hours and conditions in factories and played a key role in forming women's trade unions. For example, Mary Lee became secretary of the Working Women's Trades Union in 1890 in South Australia; Emma Miller became the first woman member and life member of the Brisbane Workers' Political Organization and president of the Women Workers' Political Organization in Queensland in 1903; while in New South Wales Kate Dwyer was a founder of the Women's Progressive Association and founding president of the Women's Organizing Committee of the Political Labor League in 1904.

Women initially won the vote in Australia on a colony by colony basis, with two colonial governments, in South Australia (1894) and Western Australia (1899), granting womanhood suffrage before it was won on a federal basis in 1902. New South Wales women were also granted the state suffrage in 1902, Tasmanian women in 1903, Queensland women in 1904, and finally, Victorian women in 1908. For six years, then, Victorian women were able to vote in federal elections, but not in state elections. It was thought that the very longevity and persistence of the campaign in that state provoked organized opposition and thus played a role in the tardiness of their victory.

Although Australian women were at the forefront in international terms in winning full political rights, they lagged significantly when it came to securing representation in parliament. Not until 1921 did the first woman enter a state parliament, when Edith Cowan was elected in Western Australia; and not until 1943 did the first women win seats in the federal parliament, when Labor woman Dorothy Tangney was elected as a Western Australian Senator and conservative (United Australia Party) Edith Lyons won a Tasmanian seat in the House of Representatives. At the same time, however, the broader women's movement flourished, with new organizations such as the Australian Federation of Women Voters and older ones such as the National Council of Women playing a key role as citizens in civil society. They were successful in having women appointed to a range of public positions, as police officers, factory inspectors, doctors, magistrates, wardens, and lawyers. Some feminists argued for the appointment of women as protectors of Aboriginal women and children and some activists in Western Australia, notably Mary Bennett, were outspoken in their condemnation of the separation of Aboriginal children from their families.

Most feminist organizations at this time conceived of their role in non-party terms, while Labor Party women were exhorted by the men in their party to eschew the "sex antagonism" associated with feminism. These different groups of women sometimes worked together, however, in campaigns for reforms such as the Maternity Allowance, a one-off payment to mothers on the birth of a baby, introduced in 1912, which extended payments to unmarried mothers, but denied them to all non-white mothers (a policy criticized by radical Vida Goldstein, editor of the Woman Voter, as "the White Australia policy gone mad") (Lake 1999: 76). Other goals such as motherhood endowment (the payment of a regular income to mothers) and equal pay championed by trade union organizer Muriel Heagney, author of the book Are Women Taking Men's Jobs? and leading non-party feminist Jessie Street, proved rather more elusive.

Equal Pay and Equal Rights

Following Commonwealth Arbitration Court judgments that awarded men a living wage in recognition of their obligations to support wives and children, and defining women as economic dependents, Australian women lobbied for the principle of "the rate for the job" regardless of the sex of the worker. A large Women's Industrial Convention was held in Melbourne in 1913 addressed by activists such as Sarah Lewis from the Hotel and Caterers' Union, who insisted on the justice of a decent living wage being paid to women. A campaign for motherhood and childhood endowment also argued for women's right to economic independence, while they worked at home as wives and mothers. New South Wales passed legislation granting childhood endowment to mothers in that state in 1927, but a federal Royal Commission enquiring into the feasibility of a more radical scheme of motherhood endowment decided against the reform because in offering women economic independence it would cause, they said, "a revolution in the family." Labor women and non-party feminists reluctantly concluded that the only way for women to win economic independence was to enter the labor market and demand equal pay on the same terms as men. The Council for Action for Equal Pay was established in 1938, just as World War II was about to begin.

Women's experience on the home front during the war was formative in reinvigorating campaigns for equality and economic independence. A new wartime tribunal, the Women's Employment Board, ensured that many thousands of female employees conscripted into men's work for the duration were paid equal or near-equal wages so as not to undercut men's employment on their return from the war. To enable mothers to join the labor market in this time of national need, the government introduced childcare centers, thereby setting another precedent for the postwar world. Following concerted lobbying by women's groups, a Commonwealth Arbitration Court decision lifted the standard women's wage from 54 percent of the male rate, which had been prescribed by H. B. Higgins in the famous Harvester judgment of 1907, to 75 percent in 1949.

In 1950, Communist Party and other left-wing women formed a new organization, the Union of Australian Women, to campaign for equal pay, Aboriginal rights, housing reforms, and child welfare. They joined feminist groups such as the United Associations and trade unionists such as Kath Williams in campaigning for equal pay, which was achieved in a piecemeal fashion, state by state, with New South Wales granting teachers and other public servants equal pay in 1958. But still women were usually required to resign from paid work on marriage until 1966, when the federal government lifted the marriage bar, even while continuing to deny women employees access to the executive levels of the public service.

It was the demand for equal access to the professions and to public life that prompted two young academic women in Brisbane in 1965 to chain themselves to the rail of a local public bar, which was also a men's only space. Among other sources of inspiration, Merle Thornton and Ro Bognor quoted from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights to demand an end to discrimination. In earlier decades, feminists had espoused the cause of temperance, seeing alcohol consumption as responsible for much of men's ill-treatment of women and children; now in the 1960s women activists demanded the right to drink in the same ways and in the same places as men, and to enjoy the same sexual and social freedoms. In earlier phases of the women's movement feminist leaders had seen sexual relations as the source of men's oppression of women; now in the 1960s a new generation of activists saw sexual liberation as integral to women's liberation, as the new women's movement came to be called. When women's leaders had earlier demanded an end to the double standard, they had demanded that men be as chaste as women; from the 1960s – armed with the Pill – women's liberationists demanded the same sexual freedoms, the same rights to sexual fulfillment as their brothers and lovers. But they also demanded the right to be free from sexual relations with men if they so chose; and the right to take women as sexual partners. By the 1970s lesbianism was often promoted as a political position as well as an individual sexual choice.

Femocrats

The Australian women's movement of the 1970s and 1980s shared many goals with movements around the world, but as well as drawing on a shared critique of sex roles, sexism, conditioning, and patriarchy – new concepts popularized by key texts such as Germaine Greer's Female Eunuch and Kate Millet's Sexual Politics – the movement also joined a national political tradition of looking to the state to effect radical reform. The Australian women's movement expected state and federal governments to outlaw discrimination, to subsidize childcare and women's refuges, and to introduce affirmative action and equal pay and opportunity. The movement also secured the appointment of dedicated feminists to work with the public service, at both state and federal levels, in achieving these reforms: hence was born the distinctively Australian figure of the "femocrat."

A key organization in achieving legislative change and in securing the election of women to parliament was the Women's Electoral Lobby (WEL), formed in 1972, just in time for it to play a role in the change of government at the end of that year. The election of the Whitlam government brought an end to 23 years of conservative political rule in Australia and brought the Labor Party and the women's movement into a productive, if often fraught, working relationship. The appointment of Whitlam's first advisor on women's affairs, Liz Reid, a former university tutor in philosophy, gave women a voice at the highest level.

The following decade, with the election of the Hawke Labor government, a new minister for women's affairs and former WEL member Susan Ryan presided over the passage of the Anti-Discrimination Act of 1984 and the Affirmative Action (Equal Employment of Women) Act in 1986. That same year a new kind of feminist organization was initiated with the formation in Melbourne of the Victorian Women's Trust, which combined advocacy with feminist philanthropy to achieve change as a local and state level.

At the beginning of the new century the women's movement as a collective, powerful, vocal presence was no longer as visible as it had been 20 or 100 years before, but its beneficiaries – including several high-profile women politicians such as Deputy Prime Minister Julia Gillard and former premiers Carmen Lawrence and Joan Kirner – testify to its long-term impact. The continuing challenges posed by the excessive workloads carried by women trying to combine paid work and domestic responsibilities and widespread evidence of ongoing sexual violence against women remind us of the work that lies ahead.

SEE ALSO: Australia, New Social Movements; Australian Labor Movement; Women's Movement, Britain; Women's Movement, France; Women's Movement, Germany; Women's Movement, India; Women's Movement, Latin America; Women's Movement, Southern Africa; Women's Movement, United States, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Caine, B. (Ed.) (1998) Australian Feminism: A Companion. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Dux, M. & Simic, Z. (2008) The Great Feminist Denial. Melbourne: Melbourne University Press.
- Lake, M. (1999) Getting Equal: The History of Australian Feminism. Sydney: Allen & Unwin.
- Lake, M. & Holmes, K. (Eds.) (1995) Freedom Bound 2: Documents on Women in Modern Australia. Sydney: Allen & Unwin.
- Paisley, F. (2000) Loving Protection? Australian Feminism and the Aboriginal Women's Rights 1919–1939. Melbourne: Melbourne University Press.
- Radi, H. (1989) 200 Australian Women: A Redress Anthology. Sydney: Women's Redress Press.
- Ryan, E. & Conlon, A. (1975) Gentle Invaders: Australian Women at Work 1788–1974. Sydney: Nelson.
- Sawer, M. (1990) Sisters in Suits: Women and Public Policy in Australia. Sydney: Allen & Unwin.
- Sawer, M. (2008) Making Women Count: A History of the Women's Electoral Lobby in Australia. Sydney: University of New South Wales Press.

Women's movement, Britain

Susan Kingsley Kent

Though the term was not introduced until 1890 or so, the movement that came to be called “feminism” became large and outspoken during the second half of the nineteenth century, arising in response to the exclusion of women from participating in political and public life. Women's exclusion was argued for and justified by references to their sexual differences from men, differences, it was asserted over and over again, that derived from nature. As a consequence, feminists had to answer their opponents in the language used to categorize women as inferior. They had to refuse the ideology of sexual difference that established their inferiority as fact, to transgress the boundaries and practices that normalized “women.” But they had also to focus on women as a collectivity on whose behalf they advocated. Paradoxically, they had both to embrace and refuse their identities as “women.” Feminists cast their arguments in the context of a larger discussion about the value and function of the family and its individual members' roles in industrial capitalist society, reserving their most furious objections for representations that equated the female with the sexual.

Patriarchy, Sexual Difference, and the Rise of Feminism

The discussion of gender roles took place within a framework of centuries of political and economic change. The patriarchal household had rested on the presumption that the male head of the household owned his wife, his children, his tenants, his animals and tools, and his land. Throughout the nineteenth century, however, England experienced the dismantling of aristocratic, patriarchal institutions and concentrated on building a society based on liberal, individualistic, egalitarian philosophies. Middle- and working-class groups of men agitated and asserted their rights to participation in the new industrial order, basing their claims on the ideology of liberalism. With traditional forms of power and authority facing challenge from insubordinate groups, women joined the fray, seeking out changes in law and custom that would more clearly reflect their changing role in the family.

Under the law of coverture, married women had no rights or existence apart from their husbands. The popular aphorism “my wife and I are one, and I am he” described a situation in which a married woman had no legal rights to her property, her earnings, her freedom of movement, her conscience, her body, or her children; all resided in her husband. Throughout the nineteenth century, women and their male allies challenged these holdovers of aristocratic patriarchal society, seeking property rights, education and employment opportunities, and the right to divorce, insisting that rather than protecting women in the domestic sphere of home and family, these legal disabilities exposed them to the brutalities of the world at large.

The most radical challenge of the women's movement to patriarchal control consisted of demands for enfranchisement on the same lines as men. The Reform Acts of 1832, 1867, and 1884 had afforded to increasing numbers of men the opportunity for political participation, until virtual universal manhood suffrage prevailed. When women began to agitate for inclusion in the public arena in the 1860s, their claim was continually denied on the basis of their sex.

The contradiction between, on the one hand, a liberal ideology that had legitimated the dismantling of aristocratic power and authority and the enfranchisement of middle-class, and later working-class, men and, on the other, the denial of the claims of women to full citizenship was resolved by appeals to biological and characterological differences between the sexes. Adherents to this "separate spheres" ideology asserted that men possessed the capacity for reason, action, aggression, independence, and self-interest, while women inhabited a separate, private sphere, one suitable for the so-called inherent qualities of femininity: emotion, passivity, submission, dependence, and selflessness, all derived, it was claimed insistently, from women's sexual and reproductive organization. Upon the female as a biological entity, a sexed body, nineteenth-century theorists imposed a socially and culturally constructed "femininity," a gender identity derived from ideas about what roles were appropriate for women. This collapsing of sex and gender – of the physiological organism with the normative social creation – made it possible for women to be construed as at once pure and purely sexual; although paradoxical, these definitions excluded women from participation in the public sphere and rendered them subordinate to men in the private sphere as well.

These arguments at once idealized women and expressed profound fear of them. On the one hand, women were aligned with morality and religion, whereas men represented corruption and materialism. Women were construed as occupying the ethical center of industrial society, invested with the guardianship of social values, whereas men functioned in a world of shady dealings, greed, and vice, values generally subversive of a civilized order. On the other hand, women were also identified with nature – wild, unruly, yet to be explored and mastered; whereas men belonged to culture – controlled, systematic, symbolic of achievement and order. Correspondingly, women were assigned an exclusively reproductive function, in contrast to men, who allegedly held a monopoly on productivity. In each case, notions of femininity, or female nature, ultimately rested upon the perceived sexual organization of women, who were construed to be either sexually comatose or helplessly nymphomaniacal. Whether belonging to one category or the other, women were so exclusively identified by their sexual functions that nineteenth-century society came to regard them as "the Sex." This in turn set up yet another dichotomy, which offered two possible images for women: that of revered wife and mother, or that of despised prostitute. Both roles effectively disqualified women from economic and political activity. At the same time, as middle-class feminists and working women argued, the characterization of women as "the Sex" created the potential for the sexual abuse of women.

The contradiction between the ideal wife and mother on the one hand and the degraded prostitute on the other was simply too extreme to reflect the real experiences of women. Nineteenth-century women were, indeed, participants in and agents of culture; they did operate in the material and productive world of industrial society; and their contribution to the economic sphere was not limited to the reproduction of babies or the servicing of male sexual needs. Working-class women battled valiantly against enormous economic odds to bring in precious shillings to the household exchequer while at the same time maintaining a household in such a way as to affirm their families' respectability. Many middle-class women coopted the vision of "the angel in the house" in order to justify stepping out of it and engaging in public campaigns to end slavery, increase education, or reform the lives of poor Britons at home or colonized subjects abroad. Other middle-class women protested the image of femininity assigned to them, and, borrowing the very terms liberals used to justify enfranchising men, embarked on a movement to gain recognition for their full and complete humanity, thereby eliminating the reductively sexualized definition of femininity that threatened their integrity and dignity.

Some of the most prominent nineteenth-century writers on domesticity, like Sarah Stickney Ellis, incorporated the notion of women's greater spirituality and morality in calling upon women to utilize their influence to effect reform outside the home. Ellis identified the domestic sphere as the proper one for women, and eschewed the idea of women engaging directly in the political or economic sphere. But Ellis and others like Harriet Martineau and Hannah More also believed that women's influence could be felt far beyond the arena of home and family, and urged women to exercise their power in order to change things in the political, social, and economic realms. Women had a "mission," a duty to bring their special qualities to the immoral world outside, a concept that authorized women's activities outside the home that appeared to contradict the mandate that they remain within it. Martineau, Ellis, and More insisted that women required education if they were to use their talents for beneficial ends rather than simply fritter away their time in idle pursuits. Convinced of their greater virtue and of their duty to bring their moral strengths to bear on the harsher aspects of society, women flocked to a number of campaigns that were in fact political in nature. They formed moral reform associations to fight prostitution – directing their attacks on the men who solicited prostitutes, not on the prostitutes themselves – and temperance societies to reduce the incidence of alcohol abuse. Above all, British women joined the anti-slavery campaign in huge numbers.

Quest for Equal Treatment

The contradictions of separate sphere ideology opened up space within which women could contest their positions of powerlessness. For women such as Bessie Raynor Parkes and Barbara Leigh Smith Bodichon, women's inability to find respectable work by which they might support themselves, and, indeed, to actually end up owning for themselves any wages they might earn, rendered them unable to leave abusive or potentially abusive situations. Bodichon's A Brief Summary in Plain Language of the Most Important Laws Concerning Women, published in 1854, laid out in a systematic fashion the legal situation that condemned women to a position of chattel of men. The solution to these problems lay in increasing educational and employment possibilities for women and obtaining the passage of bills that gave married women the right to own property and retain their earnings, just as single women, or femes sole, might currently do.

To this end these "ladies of Langham Place," as they came to be called after the location of their office in London, founded the English Woman's Journal in 1858. In its pages contributors publicized "the cause" of women throughout Britain, raising issues of concern for women such as property rights and divorce laws. Langham Place also provided space for the Society for Promoting the Employment of Women, founded by Jessie Boucherett in 1859, to provide a kind of clearing house of employment opportunities for mostly middle-class women without means of support outside the overcrowded, low-paying, and humiliating profession of governing, which was currently the only work they might obtain without compromising their class position. The society argued that middle-class parents must recognize that their daughters might not be able to marry, given the "redundancy" of women relative to men, and must be educated for work beyond governing or teaching. They recognized that for women to become economically independent of men they must break down the barriers that kept them from being educated in sound educational institutions for work that was remunerative.

Queen's College had been founded in 1848 and began to grant degrees to women. In the 1850s Mary Frances Buss and Dorothea Beale had opened the North of London Collegiate School for Ladies and Cheltenham Ladies' College, respectively, so that single middle-class women might qualify for employment that would provide an income to support them. But the Ladies of Langham Place had their sights set on bigger targets – the British universities and medical schools. Their activities on behalf of women's higher education ensured that Girton College at Cambridge in 1871, the University of London in 1878, and Newnham College at Oxford in 1879 admitted women to examination. Anna Jellicoe, an Irish advocate for women's education, helped found Alexandra College in Dublin. The University of Edinburgh admitted five women to its medical school in 1869, and in 1874 the London School of Medicine for Women opened its doors and matriculated 14 women.

The ladies of Langham Place also helped to set in motion the campaign for women's property rights. With the passage of the Married Women's Property Acts of 1870 and 1882, married women secured the right to retain and own any property or earnings they might bring to their marriage. Husbands no longer enjoyed full and free access to their wives' assets.

The feminist critique of marriage necessarily involved a critique of masculinity. Male sexuality, exemplified in microcosm by the institution of marriage, was, British feminists like Josephine Butler, Elizabeth Wolstenholme Elmy, and Frances Swiney believed, destructive both to women and ultimately to the whole of humanity. The experiences of women in marriage where, in the words of Wolstenholme Elmy, they were subject to "the excess of sexual proclivity and indulgence general on the part of man," led feminists to demand the right to control their bodies and their fertility.

Yet artificial means of birth control were anathema to most mainstream nineteenth-century feminists, who believed that they would simply allow men easier and more frequent access to their wives by eliminating the fear of pregnancy. With only a few exceptions, they opposed contraception because they feared it would "give men greater sexual license." Feminists certainly favored "voluntary motherhood" – the right to abstain from sexual intercourse. For some, in fact, the right to refuse intercourse stood at the core of their movement. But abstinence from sexual intercourse was possible only if men agreed to it, something feminists doubted the willingness of most husbands to do. Feminists charged that the rights of husbands to force sexual intercourse and compulsory childbearing on their wives established a condition of "sex-slavery," as Common Cause, the official newspaper of Britain's National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, described it in 1910. For many, this issue stood at the center of the feminist movement. Couched in rather vague terms, the issue that so inflamed the passions of feminists was marital rape. A husband's right to sexual intercourse with his wife was absolute, superceding even the right of a woman to protect herself and/or her unborn children from disease.

Feminists' critique of masculinity instilled in them the conviction that only a massive transformation in the laws, customs, mores, and traditions of Britain could produce a society in which women could exercise the same freedom and liberty accorded to men. That transformation, they insisted, required that women arm themselves with the vote. The campaign for the vote was designed to eliminate the notions of separate spheres and "natural" differences between the sexes insisted upon by domestic ideology. The British women's suffrage campaign as an organized movement began in April 1866, when Barbara Bodichon, Jessie Boucherette, Emily Davies, and Elizabeth Garrett, all members of prominent Liberal families, set out on a petition drive to demand votes for women. By June they had collected 1,499 signatures. John Stuart Mill, who had stood for election to parliament on a platform that had included the enfranchisement of women, presented the petition to the House of Commons.

Although feminists identified the contradictions contained in domestic ideology and liberalism as they pertained to power relations between women and men, they were blind to the implications they had for inequalities based on class and race. Few feminists questioned their white, bourgeois status, or considered how working-class or colonized women fared under their strictures. Instead, they tended to embrace the divisions and prejudices based on class and race that informed liberalism and their societies as a whole. British feminists participated uncritically in an imperial discourse that cast subject Indian and African peoples as savage and immoral. Closer to home, feminists rarely intended their dreams of a new world for men and women to extend to the working classes of their nation. Socialist feminists, always in a minority, did make far more radical claims on behalf of women workers. The icy receptions they met from their bourgeois sisters very often reinforced their beliefs that capitalist relations of production, rather than the relations between men and women in patriarchy, stood at the center of women's inequalities and oppressions and would have to be removed if equality between men and women were to be attained.

By the beginning of the twentieth century the suffrage campaign had attained the status of a mass movement. With the advent of militancy arising out of the Women's Social and Political Union (WSPU) in 1905, the whole of the feminist movement centered on suffrage as the means by which women could free themselves from servile bondage to men. As a symbol of civic and political personality, the vote would be an effective agent in eliminating the notion of women as "the Sex." As an instrument of power, feminists believed – as did their adversaries – it would transform the elevating "influence" of women into a tool with which to create a greater and truer morality among men by eliminating the distinctions between public and private spheres. They meant to use it to build a sexual culture in Britain that would reflect the needs, desires, and interests of bourgeois women.

Birth of "New Feminism"

The outbreak of world war in August 1914 brought to a halt the activities of suffragists in their efforts to gain votes for women. When war ended, feminists continued to agitate for votes on the same terms as they had been granted to men; but organized feminism, despite the fact that a considerable portion of the potential female electorate remained disenfranchised, never regained its prewar status as a mass movement. By the end of the 1920s feminism as a distinct political and social movement had become subsumed in other causes. The experiences of the Great War – articulated and represented in specific languages of gender and sexuality – forged dramatically different ideas about gender and sexual identity for many men and women than those prevailing in the late Victorian and Edwardian eras. These languages and the identities they spawned provide the context within which interwar feminism operated and by which it was constrained. Feminists' understandings of masculinity and femininity – of gender and sexual identity – became transformed during the war and in the postwar period. Their insistence upon equality with men gradually gave way to an ideology that emphasized women's special sphere – a separate sphere, in fact – and carried with it an urgent belief in the relationship between the sexes as one of complementarity.

Prewar feminists had vigorously attacked the notion of separate spheres and the medical and scientific discourses about gender and sexuality upon which those spheres rested. Many feminists after World War I, by contrast, pursued a program that championed rather than challenged the prevailing ideas about masculinity and femininity that appeared in the literature of psychoanalysis and sexology. In embracing radically new – and seemingly liberating – views of women as human beings with sexual identities, many feminists accepted theories of sexual difference that helped to advance notions of separate spheres for men and women. This shift did not take place suddenly and was resisted throughout the 1920s by many other feminists, but the acceptance of the dominant discourse on sexuality represented a fundamental abandonment of prewar feminist ideology. By the end of the 1920s feminists found themselves in a conceptual bind that trapped women in "traditional" domestic and maternal roles, and limited their ability to advocate equality and justice for women.

A faction within the largest feminist organization, the National Union of Societies for Equal Citizenship (NUSEC), declared that they would now refer to themselves as "new feminists" in order to distinguish their thinking from that of the prewar period still held onto by many of their colleagues. "New feminism," explained Eleanor Rathbone, president of NUSEC in 1925, embodied the belief that the equality of women with men had been achieved. "Women are virtually free," she announced, and feminists could now turn to the needs of women as women, not as imitators of men. "At last we can . . . demand what we want for women, not because it is what men have got, but because it is what women need to fulfill the potentialities of their own natures and to adjust themselves to the circumstances of their own lives." Justification for "new feminist" demands like the endowment of motherhood, birth control, and protective legislation for women centered on the role of women in the home and "the occupation of motherhood – in which most women are at some time or another engaged, and which no man . . . is capable of performing."

The "new feminist" agenda was not inherently anti-feminist by any means; such demands can be quite radical. Indeed, as Rathbone argued, women's needs are often very different from those of men, and a strictly egalitarian line failed sometimes to address those needs. The right to access to contraceptive knowledge, for instance, became an explicit aspect of the feminist agenda, as activists like Marie Stopes and Dora Russell began explicitly to demand the right of women to the use of contraception. The difficulty arose from the arguments "new feminists" advanced to legitimate their demands. Not the rights of women but the needs of women as mothers backed feminist appeals now. Not equality but sexual difference characterized the relationship between men and women as "new feminists" understood it.

When "new feminists" made demands based on women's traditional special needs and special functions, when they ceased to challenge the dominant discourse on sexuality, their ideology became difficult to distinguish from that of anti-feminists. To "old" feminists like Emmeline Pethick-Lawrence, Cicely Hamilton, Rebecca West, Winifred Holtby, and Vera Brittain, espousing a strictly egalitarian line, "new feminist" arguments reminded them of nothing so much as the anti-feminist arguments marshaled in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries to deny women equality with men. In 1927 NUSEC split over the change in emphasis and lost much of its momentum and status as an organization. More importantly, "new feminism," by accepting the terms of the larger culture, by putting forward a politics of sexual difference, compromised its ability to advocate equality and justice for women.

Second Wave of Feminism, 1960s to the Present

What is called the second wave of feminism, known at the time as women's liberation, arose in the West in the 1960s. Inspired in part by the civil rights movements in the United States and the new left movements in Europe, women in Britain began to demand freedom from the roles, portrayals, and expectations that limited, diminished, and oppressed them. The sexual revolution of the 1960s had placed a premium on men's pleasures and the fulfillment of their sexual desires, at the expense of women, whose highly sexualized images appeared in magazines like Playboy and Penthouse, on billboards and posters. Women's liberation activists protested loudly and vividly against such depictions of women as sexual objects. One of their first actions took place in 1970 at the Miss World beauty contest in London, when a group of women interrupted the pageant by leaping on stage and blowing whistles, hooting, mooing like cattle, and brandishing signs that read "Miss-conception," "Miss-treated," "Miss-placed," and "Miss-judged." They lobbed stink bombs, flour bombs, and smoke bombs at the contestants, the judges, and at Bob Hope, the master of ceremonies. Their actions resembled those of the militant suffragists of the first decade of the twentieth century, and earned them the same result – arrest. They created a spectacle that succeeded in garnering for the movement enormous publicity.

Some 70 women's liberation groups existed in London alone by 1969. Publications like Shrew, Red Rag, and Spare Rib appeared, analyzing women's oppression, recounting earlier feminist efforts, spreading the feminist message, and making claims for women's personal, sexual, and familial freedom. "Second wave" feminists looked for more than equality with men before the law; they sought changes in the law, the social and economic system, and the culture that would "liberate" them from current conceptions of femininity that, they argued, locked them into stifling, unfulfilling, slavish positions, and often made them vulnerable to sexual predations from men. Unlike contemporary liberal feminists and those of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, feminists seeking liberation believed that the very system in which they lived required abolition or complete overhaul.

Feminists differed in their designation of just what system it was that oppressed them. Socialist feminists identified capitalism as the source of conditions that rendered them inferior to men. The family, in particular, required complete transformation. For socialist feminists, adherence to Marxist doctrine and to socialist groups remained a significant aspect of their politics, the goal of which was to eliminate the unjust class system produced by capitalism and reproduced by the family. The achievement of feminist aims would follow upon its extinction. At the same time, their insistence that women's work, experiences, and functions in a capitalist society could not simply be subsumed into those of men forced traditional socialists to enlarge their understandings and expand their analyses of capitalism.

Radical feminists, by contrast, saw domination by men in patriarchy, not in the economic system, as the root of their oppression. They insisted that if women were to be liberated, they would have to arrive at a "consciousness" of their oppression. In "consciousness-raising" sessions where they explored their personal lives in depth, many feminists gained an understanding of how patriarchy operated in the most insidious ways to make women complicit in their own subservience to men. In consequence, some radical feminists – many of them lesbians who had been ostracized by straight feminists who feared that their movement would be tainted by association with lesbianism – became convinced that they would ultimately have to remove themselves from sexual and social relationships with men. Separatism, as they saw it, provided the only avenue to liberation.

Despite their differences, which would become increasingly evident and acrimonious in the mid- and late-1970s, feminists of virtually every stripe agreed that women's sexual freedom, their capacity to choose the kind of intimate or social grouping in which they would live, and the right to determine for themselves the kind of work they would do, were vital to their liberation. They could readily come together to support reforms that contributed to that end: access to free and legal contraception and abortion; equal pay; health, educational, and social services; increased penalties for rape and domestic violence; nursery and daycare for children; and provisions that enabled women to be legally and financially independent like divorce law reform and wages for housework. They made clear from the start that they intended their varieties of feminism to create entirely different roles, expectations, identities, and material realities for women than those currently operative. Their focus on personal and family issues, and on social and cultural practices – like the clubs, bookstores, magazines, and literature of the “sexual revolution” that gratuitously portrayed women as the proper objects of male sexual desire and violence – gave their movement a broad comprehensiveness that touched the lives of generations of women – and men – to come.

Race in the Women's Movement

Women of color in Britain found themselves in a kind of political no-man's-land in the late 1960s and early 1970s. Disconcerted by their treatment at the hands of the male-dominated black power movement, yet finding women's liberation and feminism entirely irrelevant and blind to their needs and desires, women of color began to form their own organizations to gain liberation for themselves. When they looked toward white feminist groups, black women saw a political program that addressed few of their concerns. In order to deal with a dual oppression arising from racism and sexism, a number of women formed other local black women's groups throughout London and in cities like Leicester, Manchester, Liverpool, Sheffield, and Nottingham.

Coalitions of women of color such as the Organization of Women of Asian and African Descent (OWAAD) enabled a broader national movement to emerge within which issues of racism and sexism that concerned women of color could be addressed and a national dialogue established. The structures of racism meant that black women experienced different kinds of subjection than white women. What white women regarded as an oppressive institution – the family – black women often found to be a place from which to resist political and cultural forms of racism. White radical feminists might espouse separatism from men; black women relied on “progressive” men in their struggles for equality and justice. Finally, white feminists had not recognized their role in continuing imperialist and colonialist regimes around the world, or indeed, in acting as oppressors of black people at home, and it was left to black feminists to raise these issues.

Feminism has proven to produce tough and resilient ideologies and movements, reflecting both the strength of opposition to women's demands for freedom and equality, and the power of those ideals to move millions to take action to realize them. Feminists' successes have resulted from their ability to analyze the power relations obtaining between men and women in any given time and place, and from their challenges to the assumptions, policies, and practices that structure social, economic, political, cultural, and familial life.

SEE ALSO: Britain, Women's Suffrage Campaign; Pankhurst, Emmeline (1858–1928), Christabel (1880–1958), and Sylvia (1882–1960)

References and Suggested Readings

- Carby, H. V. (1999) Cultures in Babylon: Black Britain and African America. New York: Verso.
- Halbersleben, K. I. (1993) Women's Participation in the British Antislavery Movement, 1824–1865. Lewiston: Edwin Mellen Press.
- Ingram, A. & Patai, D. (1993) Rediscovering Forgotten Radicals: British Women Writers, 1889–1939. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Kent, S. K. (1990) Sex and Suffrage in Britain, 1860–1914. London: Routledge.
- Purvis, J. (2004) Emmeline Pankhurst: A Biography. London: Routledge.
- Smith, H. L. (1990) British Feminism in the Twentieth Century. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.

Women's movement, Cuba

Jean Weisman

The women's movement in Cuba in many ways illustrates the broader Latin American women's movement. Looking more closely at the events in Cuba and the feminist leaders who have made an impact in that country can further bring to life the picture of the Latin American women's movement.

Women's Congresses in Cuba, 1923 and 1925

Hundreds of women from various provinces in Cuba joined together in women's congresses in 1923 and 1925 to work for reforms that included equality for women, the right to vote, and an end to child abuse consistent with principles of reverence for motherhood, the home, and the family, and respect for Cuban nationhood. These were the first congresses of women in Latin America. While most of the women were white middle-class and upper-class women, many were concerned about issues that involved poor and working-class women.

In the 1923 Congress, women spoke out in favor of solidarity and knowing and defending their rights. They emphasized the historical role of women in the struggle for Cuban independence and called for the right to vote and greater participation of women in government. Some called for the need for special courts for women and children and respect for the rights of illegitimate children. They spoke out against the abuse of drugs and alcohol and addressed the special needs of women professionals in journalism and the arts. They called for decent wages for working women and an end to discriminatory laws, such as the one that allowed husbands to murder wives who committed adultery but did not allow for any punishment of unfaithful husbands. As part of the congress, they visited women's institutions such as daycare centers, orphanages, and maternity homes. They also invited politicians to receptions to discuss women's rights, hoping to work with men to win reforms.

At the 1925 Congress speakers called for women's suffrage, the necessity of giving women jobs in all categories of the government and administration, equal pay for equal work, a six-hour day for working women, the necessity of time off from work before and after delivery of a baby, the need to help poor and abandoned women, the need for women to join trade unions, the right of women to be part of tribunals, the creation of dining halls for working women, the creation of low-price clinics, and the struggle against prostitution. They called for more women to work in the upper levels of education and participate in boards of education, and they urged the creation of more schools with an emphasis on home economics. President General Machado, seen at the time as a liberal reformer and not the dictator he later became, spoke at the congress. He promised to give women the vote, but the vote was not granted until 1934, after his term was completed. Ofelia Dominguez Navarro, an attorney from Santa Clara, reintroduced a resolution from the previous congress in support of the rights of illegitimate children, and when the resolution failed, ten women walked out. Several years later these proposals, put forth by the radicals, became law.

MAGIN and other Cuban Women's Organizations

In the last decade of the twentieth and the first decade of the twenty-first century, organizations in Cuba flourished that were dedicated to the study of women and the creation of programs to bring about improvements in their social, political, and economic conditions. Some of these organizations included the women's studies departments at several universities; MAGIN, an organization of communicators dedicated to improving the image of women in the media and an increase in women in upper-level decision-making positions; CENESEX, dedicated to sexual education; and Casa de las Americas, which encourages research on women in literature, the publication of women's writings, and a conference on violence and women's culture in Latin America and the Caribbean.

The first women's studies program at a Cuban university was created in Villa Clara in 1989, and later programs were developed in eight other provinces. Research on women developed in the departments of sociology, demographics, psychology, anthropology, economics, literature, economics, and law, and each program studied the relation of gender to their particular fields and made recommendations about the improvement of the role of women in Cuban society. Beginning in 1995, the Women's Studies Faculty in Havana began organizing international conferences every two years on the role of gender in Cuba and other societies. Some of the workshops were Gender Theory; Methodology and Feminist Thought; Gender, Identity, and Subjectivity; Studies of Masculinity; Gender and Violence (Including Wars and Armed Conflicts); Gender and the Environment; Gender and Power; Gender and Work; Gender, Race, Class, and Ethnicity; and Gender and Religion. A master's program in women's studies has been created at the University of Havana.

In 1993, professional women who participated in an international conference on women and communication in Havana saw the need to have a broad discussion of gender in the area of media and government. They decided to form MAGIN, which means inspiration, image, and imagination. This organization, with a collective non-hierarchical structure, sponsors study groups, workshops, and conferences around the theme of gender. It defines gender not primarily in terms of the biological differences between men and women but in terms of the social, cultural, and political construction of relationships between men and women in society, pointing out that although the Cuban Family Code requires men to participate equally in housework and child care, women still have a triple day, involving care of their family, their jobs, and their political work.

Conference participants decided to focus on two critical issues: the image of women in the Cuban media and the need for more women in the upper levels of government decision-making. MAGIN organized workshops to develop women's self-esteem and empowerment and succeeded in creating television and radio programs and articles that challenged prevailing views of women. It reached out to younger women and women throughout the island and developed committees that involved a total of 400 women. It developed a proposal on women and the media which was submitted to the 1995 Beijing Women's Conference and was later adopted by the Cuban government.

In 1996 MAGIN began to have trouble finding places to meet, and representatives from the Cuban Women's Federation (Federation de Mujeres Cubanas, FMC) began to withdraw from the organization. It was called to a meeting of the Politburo of the Central Committee and ordered to disband, being told that it duplicated the work of the FMC and that independent organizations were being influenced by foreign non-governmental organizations (NGOs) that were trying to overthrow the Cuban government. While the US government, through the Helms-Burton Act, was trying to manipulate Cuban organizations with funds provided by the Agency for International Development, MAGIN's members were strong women who could not be influenced by subversives. The women in MAGIN had a long history of support for the Cuban Revolution, and while they did receive some funds from UN and women's organizations in Canada and Europe, they never received funds from US governmental organizations.

The MAGIN women reluctantly decided to disband because they did not want to be considered dissidents and threaten their personal professional development. They were encouraged to continue to do their work through the FMC and organizations at their workplaces. They became strong advocates for women's rights in various governmental and non-governmental organizations.

In 1979, the FMC formed a committee on sex education. In 1989, this committee became CENESEX, the National Working Group on Sex Education. It developed extensive sex education programs, worked to develop a greater understanding of the needs of transsexuals, and encouraged sex-reassignment surgery. It is working on reforming the Cuban Family Code to include articles on sexual orientation and gender identity. At this time it is pushing for recognition of same-sex legal unions but not for same-sex marriages in order to avoid "complications and rejections."

Numerous other organizations in Cuba have formed study groups, committees, and conferences around the issues of gender. In February 2008, the national cultural organization Casa de las Americas held a conference on "Violence and Counterviolence in the Culture of Latin American and Caribbean Women."

Some Leading Cuban Women Activists

Vilma Espin (1930–2007)

Vilma Espin was a revolutionary leader in Cuba in the 1950s. President of the FMC from 1962 until her death in 2007, she was also a member of the Central Committee and the Politburo of the Cuban Communist Party and was married to Raúl Castro, Fidel Castro's brother.

Espin was born to an upper-middle-class family in Santiago de Cuba. She spent two years in parochial schools and received all her undergraduate education at the University of Oriente in Santiago. She graduated as a chemical engineer and went to Cambridge, Massachusetts to do graduate work in engineering at MIT. She was deeply affected by the poverty in her country, and the March 1952 coup by Batista spurred her to action. The students formed a political school for workers at the University of Oriente, hoping to free Cuba from tyranny. They organized demonstrations and fought with the police. Espin met Fidel Castro after the attack on Moncada in 1953 and his famous "History Will Absolve Me" speech. That year she joined Frank Pais's revolutionary cadre in Oriente, working with him to organize support for the revolution.

Espin offered to bring messages from Fidel Castro to the revolutionaries in Cuba and organized First Aid Brigades. She was also part of a failed plan to stage an uprising to support the landing of the Granma boat with Cuban revolutionaries from Mexico. The young women in the First Aid Brigades also transported medicines and weapons. Some women also carried and planted bombs and engaged in supportive activities.

After the triumph of the revolution in 1959, Espin went to the International Federation of Democratic Women's Conference in Chile with 75 other Cuban women. This group became the nucleus of the Cuban Women's Federation, which united all Cuban women's organizations in 1960. The main goal of the federation was to incorporate women into educational programs and the workforce, and hundreds of thousands of women got involved in education and cultural programs. They established dressmaking classes, first aid centers, and daycare centers. Women attended schools for peasants, domestic workers, prostitutes, and daycare workers. Women enrolled in the militia through the FMC. The women's militia became a branch of the FMC and were very active in the defense of the country during the Bay of Pigs invasion. They were also active in social work, dealing with juvenile delinquency, health preventative care programs, hygiene, and baby care.

Although Espin did not originally see herself as a feminist, through the course of her work with the FMC over many years she began to accept a certain kind of feminism. She said: "I believe in those feminists who tie the solution to the oppression of women, the liberation of women, the liberation of all the exploited, the oppressed and discriminated against, which also means taking into consideration social, political, and ideological as well as economic problems, from the perspective of a class, sex, and race analysis." Crucial to her hopes was the raising of Cuban women's political, cultural, and ideological consciousness so that they would understand what socialism had to offer. Her emphasis was in creating programs for Cuban women, rather than bringing about changes in the structure of the male-dominated government.

Celia Sanchez (1920–1980)

Celia Sanchez was a major leader who played a critical role in the development and success of the Cuban revolution. Creating a network of peasants in the Sierra Maestra Mountains when Fidel Castro was in prison and in Mexico, she became an expert in the trails, the rivers, and the swamps of the area. A leading strategist in the Cuban Revolution, she was appointed secretary to President Castro after the revolution and continued to be a leading decision-maker.

Sanchez was born in Media Luna, a small town in eastern Cuba, to a landowning father who was also the leader of the Cuban Medical Association. She studied biology at the university and nursing at home, and she developed a way to process swamp water so that it could be used to irrigate farms. She also assisted her father in providing medical services to peasants in Oriente. When Castro was in prison and in Mexico, she was busy building a base amongst the peasants in the Sierra Maestra.

In 1953 she began visiting towns and farms in the Sierra Maestra, recruiting peasants to fight in the revolutionary war, developing safe houses, and collecting weapons. She recruited 200 men and women to join her army and found 50 more people to transport supplies and weapons. The first troops that Batista sent to the Sierra Maestra ended up in swamps as a result of Celia's maneuvers and the revolutionaries captured the weapons. Fidel Castro wrote her: "What you have done and are doing has thrilled me and inspired me beyond anything I have ever imagined" (Haney 2005: 29). Pedro Alvarez Tabio, director of the Cuban Council of State's Office of Historical Affairs, interviewed 300 Sierra rebels, and they overwhelmingly said that Sanchez was the organizer and leader of the Cuban Revolution.

While secretary to the president, Sanchez responded to the specific requests received from the Cuban people. She was highly organized and provided homes for peasants in the former mansions of the Batista people who left Cuba, gave cars to peasants, and set up medical, cultural, educational, and sports programs. Although never publicly acknowledged, she was widely believed to be the companera of Fidel Castro, in work and in love. She never married or had any children, but she was seen as the mother of the people of Cuba. Always wearing ribbons in her hair and maintaining her femininity, she worked tirelessly to provide for others, seeking no personal gain.

Haydée Santamaría (1922–1980)

Haydée Santamaría fought in the Battle of Moncada in 1953, was a revolutionary leader throughout the 1950s, and after the revolution was the director of Casa de las Americas.

She was born to a family of small landowners in central Cuba and moved to Havana with her brother in the early 1950s. Concerned about the oppressed people in Havana, she became involved in the student movement, helping to publish an underground newspaper and allowing her apartment to become a base for the revolutionaries who planned the attack on the Moncada garrison in Santiago. She and Melba Hernandez were the only two women who participated directly in the attack. Her brother and fiancé, along with 65 other men, were tortured and killed in the attack, but she continued fighting in order to allow for more time for Fidel Castro to escape.

Santamaría and Hernandez were arrested and sentenced to seven months in prison. After being released, Santamaría worked with others to print and distribute over 10,000 copies of Fidel Castro's "History Will Absolve Me" speech and began work to organize the 26th of July Movement. In 1956 she was one of the leaders of an uprising in Santiago that was planned to coincide with the arrival of the Granma ship from Mexico. Although they lost the battle, they received considerable support from the people of Santiago, preventing many rebels from dying. When the Granma ship landed in 1956, Santamaría did underground work, fought in the Sierra Mountains, and traveled to the US to collect funds and weapons.

After the revolution Santamaría became the director of Casa de Las Americas, a cultural organization designed to promote literature, the arts, drama, poetry, theater, and music throughout Latin America. After Casa de las Americas was formed in 1959, she worked with Silvio Rodríguez and Pablo Milanes to develop the New Song movement. She was deeply committed to internationalism and in 1967 directed the Latin American Organization for Solidarity Conference in Havana.

Santamaría believed that the revolution provided economic support to women. Poor women no longer had to marry to get support for their children. After the revolution thousands of women participated in various activities, and they were more committed than men. She called for more daycare centers, understanding from men, scholarships, and workers' dining rooms to complete the revolution. She committed suicide in 1980 for unknown reasons.

SEE ALSO: Castro, Fidel (b. 1926); Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959; Music and Protest, Latin America; Rodríguez, Silvio (b. 1946); Women's Movement, Latin America; Women's Movement, Venezuela

References and Suggested Readings

- Bedregal, X. (2002) Los encuentros Feministas: Lilita y el todo poder UNO. Available at www.creatividad-feminista.org (downloaded December 12, 2007).
- CIMAC (2003) Hacedoras de la historia. Impulso Consuelo Zavala el primer Congreso Feminista. Available at www.cimacnoticias.com/noticias/03sep/s03090204.html (downloaded June 20, 2008).
- Chomsky, A. et al. (2003) The Cuba Reader: History, Culture, Politics. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Fernandes, S. (2005) Transnationalism and Feminist Activism in Cuba: The Case of MAGIN. Politics and Gender 1, 3 (September).
- Haney, R. (2005) Celia Sanchez: The Legend of Cuba's Revolutionary Heart. New York: Algora.
- MacLean, B. (2003) Haydée Santamaría. Melbourne: Ocean Press.
- Randall, M. (1974) Cuban Women Now. Toronto: Women's Press.
- Rodríguez Calderon, M. (1995) Recovering the History of Women. In Cuba Update (June). New York: Center for Cuban Studies.
- Stoner, K. L. (1991) From the House to the Streets: The Cuban Women's Movement for Legal Reform 1898–1940. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Weisman, J. (2004) The Continuing Revolution. In M. Azicri & E. Deal (Eds.), Cuban Socialism in a New Century: Adversity, Survival and Renewal. Gainesville: University Press of Florida.

Women's movement, France

Marcelline Block

One of the prominent legacies of the May 1968 French uprisings is the modern French women's movement. Founded by feminists Antoinette Fouque, Monique Wittig, and Josiane Chanel, the movement was dubbed MLF by the press in reference to the American women's liberation movement, which was at its most visible expression of public activism during the 1960s and 1970s. MLF was mainly used during the initial period of the movement in the early 1970s, after which independent groups were created.

Provocative actions during the formative years of the MLF include public demonstrations, such as in August 1970 when a group of women placed a wreath on the tomb of the unknown soldier at the Arc de Triomphe in order to commemorate his wife, whom they declared was "more unknown" than he was. This action sparked the first public discussion of the MLF in the media. Another major media event drawing attention to the MLF was the April 1971 Manifeste des 343. Three hundred and forty-three women, many of whom were famous artists and writers, signed the manifesto, admitting to having had an illegal abortion. It was published in important print media such as Le Nouvel Observateur and Le Monde, garnering attention for the MLF. In May 1972, 5,000 women congregated at the Maison de la Mutualité conference center in Paris, testifying to the injustices they suffered, such as rape, domestic violence, sexual harassment, and discrimination. Only two weeks later women marched down the Champs Élysées to protest Mother's Day, claiming that it celebrated mothers for one day and overlooked the fact that they were exploited all year long.

While the term MLF is a catchphrase that refers to the entirety of post-1968 French feminism, in actuality the MLF encompasses numerous groups, all of which are devoted to the general goals of ending the oppression of women in society in order to achieve women's equality and liberation. However, the various groups and movements within the MLF are often in conflict with each other in terms of their ideologies, methods, politics, claims, and objectives. To foster these varying aims, as many as 18 different feminist publications, including Questions féministes, Revue d'en face, Des Femmes en mouvements, Des Femmes en mouvements hebdo, Parole, Modes et Travaux, Nous Deux, and F Magazine, among others, have existed at different times. La Ligue du Droit des femmes (The League of Women's Rights), whose president was Simone de Beauvoir, published the Nouvelles féministes (Feminist News) newsletter and the journal Questions féministes (Feminist Questions). By 1977, each particular feminist group had its own journal.

In the early 1970s the MLF split along class lines. Women wanting to include working-class women formed groupes de quartier (neighborhood groups), which led to the formation of the Mouvement pour la liberté de l'Avortement (Movement for the Freedom of Abortion, MLAC). Les Pétroleuses (1974–6) was the original journal of this branch of the MLF. At the end of the 1970s, this movement became the Mouvement autonome des femmes (Autonomous Women's Movement, MAF), a Marxist, feminist, working-class group.

Another important branch of the MLF was Les Féministes révolutionnaires (Revolutionary Feminists), an umbrella term covering many feminist groups throughout France (some of which broke up and then reappeared later), which took Simone de Beauvoir's Le Deuxième Sexe (The Second Sex) as their foundational text. One of the groups associated with Féministes révolutionnaires was Choisir (Choose), a movement founded in 1971 by lawyer Gisèle Halimi, devoted to women's reproductive rights. This movement contributed to passing the contraception and abortion law proposed by Simone Veil, the first female French government minister of health, in 1975. Other groups associated with this branch were SOS Femme-Alternative (SOS Domestic Abuse) and SOS Femmes violées (SOS Rape). The women who belong to these organizations define themselves against their Marxist feminist counterparts, who attribute the oppression of women to capitalism. Rather, the revolutionary feminists, who consider themselves influenced by radical feminists in the US, struggle against the oppression of women within patriarchy and a phallographic society.

Another group, Psychanalyse et politique (Psychoanalysis and Politics), more commonly known as Psych et po, PsychePo or psykép, is a non-feminist, non-Marxist group founded by psychoanalyst Antoinette Fouque. It was based upon and centered around the writings and teachings of Jacques Derrida on deconstruction and Jacques Lacan on psychoanalysis. Psych et po emphasized semiotics, language, sexual difference, and the feminine, seeking to recuperate through women's writing the feminine from patriarchal oppression. Psych et po created the publishing house Editions des femmes (founded by Fouque, Marie-Claude Grumbach, and Sylvina Boissonnas), and organized the Librairie des femmes, a women-only bookstore in Paris. Editions des femmes published the short-term journal Le Torchon Brûlé (Burning Rag). Some of the major figures of French feminism, such as Hélène Cixous, Julia Kristeva, and Luce Irigaray, were part of Psych et po at one time or another. Because of its intellectual orientation, and particularly its preoccupation with language and high levels of abstract theorizing, this movement was not accessible to most feminist activists; furthermore, it aligned itself against "feminism" since the group's aims were not to make men and women equal, but rather to affirm the "essential" difference of women. For these and other reasons, Psych et po has a limited following.

Further dramatic fissures within the MLF were to follow and would overshadow the progress and development of feminism in France in the post-1968 era, demonstrating the complexity and fragmentary and often contentious nature of the feminism of this period. This lack of cohesion among feminists and feminist groups remains a significant aspect of second-wave French feminism. However, this is not surprising given the overall French political climate, which is usually fragmented among a multitude of parties, voices, groups, and sub-groups, rather than being monolithic. Over the years, not only have some MLF groups waged political battles against one another – often in the form of articles appearing in competing feminist/women's journals printed by rival feminist/women's publishing houses – but some of the groups and individual members have become embroiled in legal battles over accusations of libel and slander, among others.

One of the best-known controversies within the MLF, known as the "Barbara Affair," occurred in 1976 when women aligned with Féministes révolutionnaires took over the Librairie des femmes, which was maintained by the Editions des femmes publishing house of the Psych et po movement. This action was in retaliation for the dismissal of Mireille "Barbara" Dekoninck, manager of the Librairie des femmes. In January 1977, Dekoninck and her colleagues responded by screening a film denouncing the Editions des femmes at a fête des femmes (women's festival) in Paris. In May 1979, Editions des femmes successfully sued the makers of the film for defamation.

In 1979, Psych et po unleashed another controversy when Antoinette Fouque, its leader, registered the name MLF, causing Simone de Beauvoir, the leftist newspaper Libération, and other members of the feminist press in France to decry Psych et po's attempt to claim the MLF. The anthology of essays entitled Chroniques d'une imposture (Chronicles of a Forgery), prefaced by Beauvoir, denounced both Psych et po's claiming of the term MLF and the works published by Editions des femmes. In 1980, 11 feminist publishers signed a petition against Psych et po and Editions des femmes. Editions des femmes sued, going against its rival feminist publisher, Editions Tierce, for slander and unfair market practices. Editions des femmes won its case in June 1981. While Psych et po has ceased to exist, its founder, Antoinette Fouque, has been elected as a member of the European Parliament and has organized another feminist group, L'Alliance des femmes pour la démocratie (Women's Alliance for Democracy), which is shunned by most other feminist organizations and societies who do not wish to be associated with Fouque or her group.

The French feminist movement found itself in disarray by the late 1970s, although by the end of the decade France was second only to Sweden for the highest number of female government ministers: President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing (1974–81) had nine women in his cabinet, including Simone Veil, the first female minister, and Françoise Giroud, minister for women. Yet there were still very few women in the National Assembly and in 1977, to protest the absence of women in the senatorial elections, 67-year-old Senator Janine Alexandre-Derbay started a hunger strike. In 1981 many feminists, including the usually apolitical Psych et po group, supported the presidential candidacy of François Mitterrand.

When Mitterrand won in May 1981, the French women's movement made many inroads, such as the approval of a 1983 law against sexism sponsored by Yvette Roudy. In May 1981, Mitterrand appointed the first French female prime minister, Edith Cresson, who was not a feminist. Cresson was subsequently mocked for making undiplomatic comments such as, among others, declaring that British men were less “sexy” than French men, and that homosexuality was mainly a “problem across the Channel” (in Britain), not a Latin one. Her sexist comments matched by racist ones against the Japanese exemplify her lack of political savvy. Cresson became very unpopular and resigned her position after less than a year in office. Cresson spent the shortest time in office of all the French prime ministers of the Fifth Republic. The Secretariat à la condition féminine (Women’s Secretariat) and the Ministère des droits de la femme (Ministry of Women’s Rights) were created during Mitterrand’s presidency.

The election of Jacques Chirac in 1995 heralded a return to the right and conservative politics, leading to a major feminist protest on November 25, 1995 in Paris. Over 100 women’s organizations throughout France called for women to march to defend women’s rights and warned that past gains of the women’s movement, such as free and legalized abortions, were under threat. More than 40,000 women demonstrated. In 1996, female ministers from the left and the right signed the Manifeste des 10, demanding equal representation of women in politics. In March 1997, the National Assises for the Rights of Women, another pro-women’s rights demonstration, took place, although on a smaller scale than in 1995 (approximately 2,000 women and numerous men, at the behest of over 150 women’s groups, participated).

Many feminist organizations flourished in France at the end of the twentieth century, especially since the 1990s were viewed by feminists as a time of backlash against the gains made by the post-1968 French women’s movement. (This conservative trend continued with the election of Nicolas Sarkozy of the UMP Party to the presidency in 2007.) In 1995, for example, over 1,700 women’s rights organizations existed in France. Several significant women’s rights non-governmental organizations (NGOs) were created in the late twentieth century: the Chiennes de garde (Female Guard-dogs) founded in 1999 by Florence Montreynaud; Ni Putes, Ni Soumises (Neither Whores, Nor Doormats), founded in 2002 by young French Muslim women in response to violence against them – in particular, gang rape and the much publicized vicious murder of a Muslim teenager named Sohanne Benziane, who was burned alive by her ex-boyfriend – in suburbs and housing projects outside of Paris and other major French cities; and the Collectif des féministes indigènes (Collective of Indigenous Feminists), formed in 2007, which combats racism and sexism as well as what its members consider the domination of non-western women by western feminists.

In 2007, the first national French female presidential candidate, Ségolène Royal (Socialist Party), was defeated by Nicolas Sarkozy of the Conservative UMP. However, in the 1974 elections, Arlette Laguiller had become the first woman to attempt a presidential campaign as part of the Workers’ Struggle Party, and continued to run for president in 1981, 1988, 1995, 2002, and 2007. Laguiller never made it to the national election level as did Ségolène Royal. Sarkozy appointed Fadela Amara (b. 1964) as his secretary of state for urban policies. Amara is a life-long feminist who began her political activism as a teenager against French Islamist movements and Islamic fundamentalism by founding the Association des femmes pour l’échange inter-communautaire (Women’s Association for Inter-communal Exchange) when she was 18 years old. Amara went on to organize the Women’s Commission in 1989 as well as Ni Putes, Ni Soumises. Sarkozy’s appointment of Amara to his cabinet – although not without controversy – demonstrated that across the political spectrum from left to right, in the early twenty-first century the women’s movement in France continues to progress steadily.

SEE ALSO: Beauvoir, Simone de (1908–1986); Immigrant and Social Conflict, France; May 1968 French Uprisings; Women’s Movement, United States, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Adkins, L. & Leonard, D. (Eds.) (1995) Sex in Question: French Feminism. London: Taylor & Francis.
- Allen, J. & Young, I. M. (Eds.) (1989) The Thinking Muse: Feminism and Modern French Philosophy. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Amara, F. & Zappi, S. (2003) Ni putes ni soumises. Paris: La Découverte.
- Aubin, C. & Gisserot, H. (1994) Les Femmes en France: 1985–1995, rapport établi par la France en vue de la quatrième Conférence mondiale sur les femmes (Breaking the Silence: French Women’s Voices from the Ghetto, trans. H. Chenut). Paris: La Documentation Française.

- Bellil, S. (2003) Dans l'enfer des tournantes. Paris: Gallimard.
- Duchen, C. (1986) Feminism in France: From May '68 to Mitterrand. New York: Routledge.
- Evans, M. N. (1987) Masks of Tradition: Women and the Politics of Writing in Twentieth-Century France. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Fraser, N. & Bartky, S. L. (Ed.) (1992) Revaluing French Feminism: Critical Essays on Difference, Agency, and Culture. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Gorrara, C. (1998) Women's Representations of the Occupation in Post-'68 France. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Jardine, A. & Menke A. (Eds.) (1993) Shifting Scenes: Interviews on Women, Writing, and Politics in Post-'68 France. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Scott, J. W. (1996) Only Paradoxes to Offer: French Feminists and the Rights of Man. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Stewart, D. (1980) The Women's Movement in France. Signs 6, 2 (Winter): 350–4.

Women's movement, French Windward Islands

Jennifer Westmoreland Bouchard

In Francophone Caribbean societies, women have traditionally served as the head of household. Outside the home, however, women have had extreme difficulty establishing any sort of equality, much less authority. Women are marginalized in the workforce, and they are rarely represented in politics. Though more women have entered the workforce during the past 20 years (mostly in the fields of administration, education, health, and tourism), they tend to work longer hours and are compensated less than their male counterparts. In addition, women hold drastically fewer managerial positions than men. On the whole, Francophone Caribbean feminist movements have typically responded to these types of gender-based injustices, as well as issues surrounding race.

In Francophone Caribbean islands, colonial discourses regarding race played an important role in shaping economic, social, and gender relations. During the colonial period, Europeans commonly preached their “cultural and racial superiority” to the native inhabitants of the islands. Even after decolonization these cultural mores and practices of ingrained racism remained in most of these island societies. Therefore, the issue of race is one of the largest and most controversial concerns of current Francophone Caribbean feminist movements.

Francophone Caribbean feminisms have historically sought to examine and critique rigid social structures and reform the roles of Caribbean women throughout the twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. The emergence of Francophone Caribbean feminism was closely tied to movements such as Pan-Africanism, Pan-Caribbeanism, and Négritude. Pan-Africanism, a movement that originated in Anglophone communities, is a cultural and political philosophy based on the assumption that African people dispersed throughout the world share similar struggles and goals. Négritude was essentially Francophone intellectuals' response to Pan-Africanism. Male scholars and poets Léopold Sédar Senghor (Senegal), Aimé Césaire (Martinique), and Léon Damas (French Guiana) are typically credited as the founders of Négritude. However, literary research has shown that Jane and Paulette Nardal, feminist writers from Martinique, were influential in establishing the intellectual and theoretical bases for this movement. Their writings were published in La Revue du monde noir (Paris) in the 1930s and 1940s.

The second wave of Caribbean feminism was inspired by the international women's movement of the 1970s. Following a Pan-Caribbean period of radical politics concerning race, class, and identity, a series of strong Caribbean feminist activists emerged during the 1970s and 1980s. The leaders of these second-wave feminist groups were also active in socialist and left-wing politics. These movements were postcolonial in nature, focusing on female issues of identity, race, and difference. Other important concerns included sexual exploitation, globalization, and women's roles in economic development at home and abroad. Using these movements as a springboard, in-depth feminist scholarship on the inherently “gendered” nature of race and ethnicity began in the 1990s.

There are several key organizations that support feminist activism and scholarship in the Caribbean. The most influential include the Caribbean Association for Feminist Research and Activism (CAFRA), the Center for Gender and Development Studies at the University of the West Indies, and Women Working for Social Progress (also known as Workingwomen). In 1985, CAFRA was established by Peggy Antrobus (Grenada and Barbados), Rawwida Baksh-Soodeen (Trinidad and Tobago), Sonia Cuales (Netherlands Antilles), Joan French (Jamaica), Honor Ford-Smith (Jamaica), and Rhoda Reddock (Trinidad and Tobago). Their outreach and educational programs have included the following areas: women in agriculture; women and the law; women's history and creative (artistic/literary) expression; women, development, and sustainable livelihood; women's health and reproductive rights; sexuality; and gender and youth. The Center for Gender and Development Studies at the University of the West Indies was established in September 1993. Its institutional goals include establishing Caribbean feminism as a reputable field of scholarship, disseminating information on gender in the Caribbean on an international scale, and supporting research and policies that will aid in making Caribbean societies more just for people of all genders and races. Workingwomen was founded in 1985 in Tunapuna, Trinidad, with anti-racism as its focus. Throughout the 1990s, Workingwomen sought to eliminate racism and level the playing field between Afro-Trinidadian and Indo-Trinidadian women.

Thanks to the members of these and other organizations, Caribbean feminism has evolved into an academic field of study with a strong body of theory and literature. Principal theorists in this field include: Peggy Antrobus (Grenada and Barbados), activist and professor of economics, sociology, and social work at the University of the West Indies; Eudine Barriteau (Barbados), professor of gender and public policy in the Center for Gender and Development Studies at the University of the West Indies; Rhoda Reddock (Trinidad and Tobago), head of the Center for Gender and Development Studies at the University of the West Indies, activist in the Caribbean Women's movement, and founding member of CAFRA; Brinda Mehta (India), author and professor of French and Francophone Studies at Mills College; Patricia Mohammed (Trinidad and Tobago), who founded the Rape Crisis Center in Trinidad and is senior lecturer at the Center for Gender and Development Studies at the University of the West Indies; and Rawwida Baksh-Soodeen (Trinidad and Tobago), deputy director/head of the gender section in the Social Transformation Programs

Division of the Commonwealth Secretariat. The influential theories of these writers typically discuss themes such as the intersection of race and gender, women and work, feminist epistemology, gender-based violence, legislation, sexual tourism, sexual and reproductive health, and migration, among others. Similar themes are discussed in the works of Francophone Caribbean fiction writers Suzanne Dracius-Pinalie (Martinique), Maryse Condé (Guadeloupe), Edwidge Danticat (Haiti), and Myriam Warner-Vieyra (Guadeloupe).

SEE ALSO: Césaire, Aimé (1913–2008); Négritude Movement; Senghor, Léopold (1906–2001); Women's Movement, Anglophone Caribbean

References and Suggested Readings

- Baksh-Soodeen, R. (1998) Issues of Difference in Contemporary Caribbean Feminism. Feminist Review 59 (1).
- Mohammed, P. with Perkins, A. (1998) Caribbean Women at the Crossroads: The Dilemma of Decision-Making among Women of Barbados, St. Lucia and Dominica. New York: UWI Press and IPPF.
- Momsen, J. (1993) Women and Change in the Caribbean: A Pan-Caribbean Perspective. Kingston, Jamaica: I. Randle.
- Reddock, R. (2007) Diversity, Difference and Caribbean Feminism: The Challenge of Anti-Racism. Caribbean Review of Gender Studies 1.
- Sharpley-Whiting, T. D. (2002) Négritude Women. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Shelton, M.-D. (1990) Women Writers of the French-Speaking Caribbean: An Overview. In S. Cudjoe (Ed.), Caribbean Women Writers: Essays from the First International Conference. Wellesley, MA: Cataloux Publishing, pp. 346–56.

Women's movement, Germany

Jennifer A. Miller

In 1847–8, as revolutions broke out across Europe, international movements for women's suffrage, economic independence, and property rights emerged as feminists began to reach out to one another for inspiration and help. German feminists Louise Dittmar (1807–84) and Louise Aston (1814–71) took radical positions on property and other rights, while middle-class feminist Louise Otto (1819–95) emphasized the distinctive contributions of “German womanliness” in her politically radical work and in her long-running publication Frauenzeitung (Women’s Newspaper). Following unification in 1871 and the establishment of national male suffrage, Hedwig Dohm (1831–1919), inspired by the British suffrage campaigns, made a case for German female suffrage in 1873.

Marxist-socialist feminists contributed landmark texts to the German women’s movement, such as August Bebel’s Women in the Past, Present and Future (1878) and Clara Zetkin’s 1889 address to the founding congress of the Second International Working Men’s Association, “Women Workers and the Woman Question.” In 1894 when the Bund Deutscher Frauenvereine (National German Women’s Association) (BDF) was founded, women’s political participation was forbidden in Wilhelminian Germany; the BDF cautiously included only charitable, educational, and philanthropic groups and chose to campaign for women’s educational and economic issues over suffrage.

In the twentieth century the women’s rights movement emerged with renewed intensity from the seeds of previous attempts. In 1904 in Berlin, the International Women’s Suffrage Alliance (IWSA) began a worldwide suffrage campaign and lobbied for labor rights, world peace (after World War I), and better access to education, divorce, and property rights for women. The Weimar Republic (1919–33) included in its constitution full and equal suffrage for women; every political party had a women’s committee; and, culturally, Germany saw the birth of the “new woman,” who believed in equal rights and self-reliance. Then National Socialism vehemently opposed women’s rights and tried to limit women’s roles in the workforce and their access to education. In 1933 the BDF disbanded in the face of Nazi threats to take it over, though some feminists debated the connection of the BDF to the Nazi state.

After the end of World War II the splitting of Germany into two states along ideological lines divided the German women’s movement. The new West German (FRG) and East German (GDR) constitutions of 1949 contained virtually identical, basic equal rights provisions, proclaiming that men and women were equal under the law. In West Germany the SPD renewed its call for equal pay for women, while middle-class women lobbied for a new civil code to regulate marriage and family relations. In the early 1950s West German feminist activists such as Marie-Elisabeth Lüder (1878–1966) were influential leaders in postwar political battles, including the pledge to gender equality, for example with the 1957 revision of the Family Law. In East Germany women activists mobilized formally from 1947 in the Democratic Women’s League of Germany (DFD) and in grassroots organizing for homosexual rights or the right to form “voluntary households.” They also participated in dissident groups such as Women for Peace and New Forum.

West German feminist critiques of patriarchy, including those in leftist organizations, developed in the context of 1960s radical social movements. Sigrid Rieger, for example, famously threw a tomato at the leading theorist of the Socialist German Student Organization (SDS) for not taking feminists’ demands seriously. In West Germany self-help campaigns and consciousness-raising groups mobilized into strong forces for social change, including demands for equal access to education and public life, equal pay, full-time nursery facilities, free contraception and access to abortion, lesbian rights, and an end to domestic and sexual violence. Grassroots movements were able to achieve success in abortion and family law, in the transformation of urban housing policy, and in galvanizing popular support for projects such as women’s bookstores and cafes, rape-crisis and domestic-violence shelters, and feminist journals and publishing houses. The 1970s and 1980s also saw heightened politicization of sexuality under the impact of gay, lesbian, and feminist activism.

In 1990 East German feminists such as Ina Merkel (with her “Manifesto for the Independent Women’s Movement”) and West German feminists hoped that German unification would bring progressive women’s policies into legislation. In the post-unification era, national women’s organizations such as non-governmental organizations have replaced community based feminism, resulting in the professionalization of German feminism and leaving policy decisions in a few individuals’ control – a worldwide phenomenon.

SEE ALSO: European Revolutions of 1848; German Democratic Republic Protests, 1945–1989; German Revolution, 1918–1923; Germany, Resistance to Nazism; Germany, Socialism and Nationalism; International Congress of Women at The Hague

References and Suggested Readings

- Davis, B. (2008) Civil Society in a New Key? Feminist and Alternative Groups in 1970s West Germany. In K. Hagemann et al. (Eds.), Civil Society, Public Space and Gender Justice: Historical and Comparative Perspectives. New York: Berghahn.
- Herzog, D. (2005) Sex After Fascism: Memory and Morality in Twentieth-Century Germany. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Karapın, R. (2007) Protest Politics in Germany: Movements on the Left and Right Since the 1960s. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.
- Moeller, R. (1993) Protecting Motherhood: Women and the Family in the Politics of Postwar West Germany. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Offen, K. (2000) European Feminism, 1700–1950: A Political History. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

Women's movement, Greece, formation of

Maria Anastasopoulou

After a six-year war of independence from Ottoman Occupation, Greek independence was secured in 1827. A small section of the southern peninsula of the Balkans was allotted to the neo-Hellenic nation and the 18-year-old Bavarian King Otto was installed. The newly established nation was set on a course of reconstruction and identity-building, and women played an important role in this effort.

Functioning under the pressure of Bavarian historian G. Fallmerayer's nineteenth-century theories that present-day Greeks had no connection whatsoever with the ancient inhabitants of the country, as well as Bulgaria's forceful annexation of Eastern Romulia in September 1885, which threatened the ethnic identity of Greek populations in the area, the country launched a process of redefining modern Hellenism by a two-directional course: to westernize its culture and, at the same time, to find its fundamental Greekness in local customs and mores. As a result, there was manifested a "tilt toward Europe," even as Greeks began re-examining and emphasizing their own local everyday customs, which proved to be similar to those of the ancient Greeks. Purging the country of all vestiges of its oriental/Ottoman influences and emulating a West nurtured on ancient Greek values would move the country away from its recent past and thus closer to its classical roots.

Consequently, in less than 50 years, the western style of life had prevailed in urban centers like Athens, not only among the upper middle classes but also among the working classes.

The woman question, which raised the feminist awareness in Greek society toward the end of the nineteenth century, was intertwined with the country's ongoing struggle to define its ethnicity and secure its national viability. Cultural leaders realized the important role women could play as mothers and schoolteachers in the process of identity-building, both in the newly established country and the occupied territories. Public discussions began promoting a new messianic role for Greek women in forging a younger generation of Greeks with a strong ethnic and national identity, ready to sacrifice themselves for the liberation of their still enslaved brothers beyond the borders of the country.

Thus, toward the end of the 1880s, women began to be praised as the repository of Greek traditional values and of the Greek language and were considered the cornerstones of the country's regeneration. Their role as active agents in the formation of ethnic identity was emphasized and promoted as nineteenth-century Greek nationalism adopted the image of woman as a fundamental agent in achieving its irredentist dream of liberating and unifying all Greek populations within the boundaries of a free Greek state. At the same time, reminiscent of the contradictory attitude towards women in the West, the public and the private spheres were sharply separated, schools were segregated, women's education narrowed down to religious and domestic issues, and the function of women as wives and mothers was idealized and valorized. Responding to the social demands of the newly established country, women in the larger cities began claiming the public place by organizing Ladies' Associations which addressed the practical problems of Greek society, and those qualified as schoolteachers volunteered to teach grade school in the occupied territories under harsh conditions and often at risk of their own lives.

It is not accidental that Callirrhoe Parren (1859–1940), born in the small village of Platania in the Rethymnon Prefecture of Crete, chose that time to start the publication of the Efimeris ton Kyriou or The Ladies' Newspaper, which became the forum for promoting social change and feminist positions for 30 years (1887–1917). Persecuted by the Turks in his native island of Crete because he supported the Cretan revolt of 1866, Parren's father, Stylianos Siganos, took his family to Piraeus and then to Athens where Callirrhoe, the eldest of six children, attended the French Nuns Grade School, then the Sourmeli High School for Girls, one of the best private schools in Athens, as public education for girls ended with the four grades of elementary school. She qualified as a teacher in 1878 and taught for four years at the Rodokanakeion Greek Community High School for Girls in Odessa, Russia, and then a couple of more years in Andrianoupoli, Turkey. In one of her visits to Constantinople/Istanbul, she must have met Jean Parren, who was of French and English descent. The couple must have married in Constantinople in the early summer of 1886 and soon settled in Athens where Jean, having taken Greek nationality two years earlier, was employed at the Athens News Agency.

Callirrhoe did not go back to teaching. She was in for the leisurely life of a bourgeois wife. But she was restless. Observing the life of women around her, she had come to the conclusion that their position was regrettable and decided to lift women out of their ornamental role and boredom and teach them how to lead a meaningful life as independent agents, potentially wielding enormous influence in society. She wanted to help those lucky enough to finish high school to continue growing intellectually, and she wanted to help raise poor girls' self-esteem and give them the opportunity to learn a profession that would free them from poverty and dependence. She wanted to write a book, but decided that women read very little, so she came up with the idea of a women's newspaper, through which she would slowly change their thinking, an undertaking her husband supported her with. Her newspaper was an immediate success and soon became second in circulation among Athenian journals.

Through her editorials Parren launched the "woman question" and incited discussions that pushed Greek society towards a feminist awareness at the turn of the century. Her weekly became a forum of literary expression for women as well as an authority for information on literature, art, home economy, health, beauty, childrearing, and world news, especially that pertaining to the international feminist movement and women's achievement in developed countries. She also included biographies of Greek women of achievement and promoted women's social issues. She pressured successive governments for women's equal rights to education and employment opportunities, for passing appropriate bills protective of working children and women, and for hiring women as state employees. To decongest the teaching profession, she insisted on state supported Technical Education and Home Economy Schools for girls and applauded the admittance of the first female students to the University of Athens in 1891, publicizing every female success or achievement.

Through her paper Parren mobilized women to philanthropy. She encouraged the establishment of Sunday Schools for illiterate young women, mainly factory workers and maids who swarmed to the capital city in search of jobs. She supported the Woman's Hospital for Incurable Diseases and St. Catherine's Asylum, which offered needy working girls and unwed mothers accommodation and moral support. She organized fundraisers, often recruiting the support of the queen and the princesses of Greece, in redressing social needs like the construction of hospitals – Evangelismos, with its all-female board of directors and Saint Sophia Children's Hospital.

In 1896 Parren established the National Women's Association, which was mobilized to participate in the Greco-Turkish War of April 1897. In spite of fierce opposition to the Women's Association, which often took the form of sneering or satirical comments, Parren's women went to the front with five surgical units managed by Maria Kalapothaki, the first Greek female surgeon.

After the war Parren remained active in philanthropy. She started a school of home economics and professional arts on her own funds and founded a nursing school and a Froebelian early childhood development school with an accompanying daycare center, the first of its kind in Athens. She also founded the Epheveion, a full grade school furnished with a hospital, the penitentiary section of the Averof Prison in Athens, the PIKPA summer camp for children by the sea south of Athens, and in 1911 the Lyceum of Greek Women for the purpose of preserving national dances and songs. For her contributions to the development of Greek society, Parren was later awarded three of the highest honors: the Silver Cross of the Phoenix (1921), the Silver Medal of the Academy of Athens (1936), and the Gold Cross of the Phoenix (1936).

Parren had embraced her mission for the emancipation of women with the dedication of an apostle. She admitted that she belonged to that group of people who “sign sacred contracts with society” and therefore they are not “free to tend to their own personal needs, to have friends . . . for they are slaves to their duty to society” (letter to Agathoniki Antoniadou, December 1889). Later, in 1896, when a fellow writer attacked the “scribbling women,” calling her an “apostle of women’s emancipation,” she accepted the title with pride.

Parren soon began receiving invitations to represent Greek women in international conferences. In 1889 she went to Paris for the Congrès Français International des Droits des Femmes, where she networked with the representatives of the international feminist movement. In 1893 Parren participated in the Congress of Representative Women in Chicago, where she found social models worth promoting in her own country. She was especially encouraged by Susan B. Anthony (1820–1906), the leader of the American feminist movement, to go on with the struggle for women’s rights that she had launched in her country.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century, already recognized as the leader of the feminist movement in Greece, Parren decided to fictionalize her vision of the new woman as she had witnessed it in the United States. To this end, between 1900 and 1903 she wrote three novels which comprise a trilogy on the woman question and convey not only the messianic role Greek society expected women to play, but also Parren’s vision of a brave new world in which equality of the sexes would bring happiness to the human species. Through her novels, Parren introduced the attributes of the new woman: educated and modest, independent and self-reliant, working and a wife who would raise her husband to new moral levels, and above all a good mother who would create a younger generation of Greeks with strong ethnic identity and willingness to sacrifice their lives for their country’s freedom. The three novels – The Emancipated (1900), The Sorceress (1901), and The New Contract (1903) – are not only technically impeccable, but more importantly, they are deeply enmeshed in the ongoing cultural debate on the woman question and the changing conception of women’s role in the developing Greek society. The novels were turned into a play entitled The New Woman, performed in September 1907 in Athens and later in Cairo, Alexandria, and Constantinople for the local Greek communities.

Although some prominent men, and undoubtedly the majority of the public, bemoaned “the death of that fragile and weak creature that the Middle Ages had idealized and poets had written poems about, that creature men had always protected and adored,” as writer N. Episkopopoulos put it in an article in the journal Panathenaea in 1901, other, more liberal and progressive men clearly saw the significant contribution educated and socially active women could play in the regeneration of the nation and showed their support in different ways. Preeminent among them was Greek poet Costis Palamas (1895–1943), who wrote poems which clearly reflect the notion of the messianic role of women which prevailed in Greek society toward the end of the nineteenth century.

SEE ALSO: Greek Nationalism; Women’s Movement, United States, 16th–18th Centuries

References and Suggested Readings

- Anastasopoulou, M. (1997) Feminist Awareness and Literary Discourse at the Turn of the Century Greece. Journal of Modern Greek Studies 15, 1.
- Fallmerayer, J. P. (1945) Fragmente aus dem Orient II. Stuttgart: J. G. Cotta.
- Jusdanis, G. (1991) Belated Modernity and Aesthetic Culture: Inventing National Literature. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Varika, E. (1987) I Exegerisis ton Kyrion: The Genesis of a Feminist Awareness in Greece 1833–1907. Athens: Foundation for Research and Education of the Commercial Bank of Greece.
- Xerathake, K. (1972–3) From the Records of the Council of School Supervisors: Girls’ Schools and Female Teachers of the Enslaved Hellenism. Athens.

Women’s movement, Haiti

Grace L. B. Sanders

Haitian women have used protests and activism to negotiate their compromised positions in the national citizenry. Their protests reflect the nuanced and multiple social locations of women in Haiti and have varied from infanticide and marronage in the eighteenth century, to guerrilla warfare, public demonstrations, and political organization in the nineteenth century, to a “literature of revolution,” and the development of individual, national, and transnational feminist discourses by the twentieth and twenty-first centuries.

The oppressive conditions of slavery during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries pushed Haitian women to early forms of protest. Through individual and collective acts of work stoppage, infanticide, suicide, marronage, manumission, and armed revolt, enslaved women resisted both the system of slavery and their role within that system as free labor and sexual objects. In 1791 the centuries of slave resistance came to a climax as women participated in the slave revolts that led to their emancipation and Haitian independence. The particular ways in which women contributed to the Haitian Revolution are scarcely documented. However, a number of women have been noted as influential to these protests. These women include an unnamed Vodou priestess who is believed to have assisted in officiating at the ceremony at Bois Caïman; Catherine Flon, who is credited with sewing the Haitian flag in 1803; and Defilée (Dedee Bazile), who is best known for gathering Jean-Jacques Dessalines' remains after his death. Although the accuracy of these women's historical narratives and their involvement in these specific events are unverified, Haitian women's historical resistance to slavery suggests women played a significant role in these foundational moments in Haitian history.

Regardless of the accuracy of these women's resistance narratives, their place in the Haitian historical memory held “real” consequences for how women organized and protested oppression throughout the end of the nineteenth century and into the twentieth. One such outcome was the 1844 Piquet Revolt in which Louise Nicolas, a peasant woman from southern Haiti, was the lead organizer and sought to both redistribute wealth in Haiti away from the elite and elect a black president. Although the revolt was unsuccessful, the revolutionary precedent set by women in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries extended into the twentieth century as women continued to resist multiple oppressions.

The most extensive research on women and protest has been conducted on the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. Within this body of scholarship, the history of Haitian women and protest has been divided into three stages: the Haitian women's movement in the early twentieth century (1934–56); the Haitian transnational women's movement in the mid-twentieth century (1956–86); and a combination of both national and transnational “new feminism” in Haiti at the end of the twentieth and beginning of the twenty-first century (1986–2008).

Women's involvement in early twentieth-century protests began with their participation in anti-US occupation movements. During the 19-year US occupation in Haiti (1915–34) the most aggressive armed resistance came from the Caco rebellions. In these armed struggles between Caco rebels and US soldiers, peasant women played strategic roles in the guerrilla tactics. Peasant women's mobility as market women and domestic servants allowed them to transport ammunition and sensitive US intelligence information inconspicuously to Caco rebel leaders. In addition to peasant women's involvement in anti-occupation protests, elite and middle-class women were also involved in anti-occupation coalitions and organizations such as the Union Patriotique. During their involvement in these campaigns, women continued to be treated as second-class citizens. Feeling marginalized, women demanded equal rights for Haitian women and men at the end of the US occupation.

After the US occupation ended (1934), women's demands for gender equity continued to be ignored. Thus, women began to organize themselves to fight for the improvement of women's rights, which included suffrage and increased educational and career opportunities. The Ligue Feminine d'Action Sociale was the primary organization through which these claims were made. A self-identified feminist organization, led by attorney Madeleine Sylvain-Bourchereau, the Ligue fought for women's political, social, and economic equality. Motivated by the prospect of improving Haitian women's citizenship and social status, the Ligue conducted research projects on the social conditions of Haitian women, founded a women's journal (La Voix des Femmes), lobbied for the modification of marriage laws, hosted educational and social events, and demanded universal suffrage. In 1950 the Ligue hosted the first Women's Congress in Haiti. With delegates from 57 women's organizations throughout the Caribbean and the United States, the full-scale feminist crusade led to women's suffrage by the end of that year, and Haitian women voted for the first time in 1957.

The Duvalier military state that developed in the 1960s presented women with various other forms of repression. Under François Duvalier (1956–71) women were seen as the “political subjects” of the state, whose abuse and harassment were used to threaten women and men alike. The state-sanctioned violence against women was a primary legacy of the Duvalier regime and a catalyst for Haitian women’s migration in the 1960s.

In the early 1960s thousands of Haitians moved to North America, France, and other locations in the Caribbean to flee Duvalier’s repressive regime. The first migrants were elite Haitians and anti-Duvalierists; however, by the late 1980s, thousands of Haitians from all socioeconomic classes and political affiliations migrated. Thus, in the mid-1980s there were approximately 500,000 Haitians living in North America alone. In these diasporic locations women organized public protests and organizations to denounce women’s oppressive conditions in and outside of Haiti, including domestic violence, illiteracy, and sexual violence. In many of these organizations, including the Union of Patriotic Haitian Women and Rally for Haitian Women, women developed feminist, anti-racist, and anti-imperialist agendas that included transnational organization between women in the Haitian diaspora and women in Haiti.

Transnational women’s activist networks were strengthened in 1986 when Jean-Claude Duvalier was forced into exile. Almost immediately a wave of new activist spaces emerged in Haiti to address the human rights violations that occurred against Haitian women during the Duvalier regime. On April 3, 1986 women of all socioeconomic classes voiced their concerns in a public demonstration where over 30,000 women marched the streets of Port-au-Prince demanding recognition of women’s marginalized social position in the nation. Following this demonstration, various organizations such as ENFO-FANM, SOFA (Worker Solidarity with Haitian Women), and Fanm D’Ayiti (Women of Haiti) were established to address Haitian women’s needs, particularly those concerning protection from domestic violence, healthcare, and access to higher education. These organizations not only represented an emerging new feminist consciousness among women in Haiti, but also reflected the influence of transnational networks among Haitian women. Many of the members of these organizations had lived abroad and were closely affiliated with other women’s organizations in the Haitian diaspora.

In 1991 the establishment of the ministry of women’s affairs reflected the decades of activist work and protest organized by various Haitian women’s coalitions. Likewise, in 1995, Haitian women activists participated in the Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing, China, where Haitian activists not only expressed their national struggles as women, but also defined their particular experiences and acts of protest as reflections of their social location as Third World women and activists. Haitian women also used feminist scholarship, literature, and prose to resist gender and imperial oppression. Works by Edwidge Danticat, Marie-Cécile Agnant, Carole Charles, and Myriam Chancy, among others, contributed to a body of scholarship and “literature of revolution” that articulated Haitian women’s multidimensional social location. In the twenty-first century, Haitian women continue to use protests and activism as tools for negotiating their multiple identities as Haitians, women, transmigrants, and Third World women, while at the same time constructing their acts of resistance to effect both their local and global location.

SEE ALSO: Haiti, Protest and Rebellion, 20th Century; Haiti, Resistance to US Occupation; Migration Struggles and the Global Justice Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Bell, B. (2001) Walking on Fire: Haitian Women's Stories of Survival and Resistance. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Bellegarde-Smith, P. (1990) Haiti: The Breached Citadel. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Castor, S. (Ed.) (1990) Centre de Recherche et de Formation Economique et Sociale pour le Developpement. Haiti.
- Chancy, M. J. A. (1997) Framing Silence: Revolutionary Novels by Haitian Women. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- Charles, C. (1995) Gender and Politics in Contemporary Haiti: The Duvalierist State, Transnationalism, and the Emergence of a New Feminism, 1890–1990. Feminist Studies 21, 1 (Spring): 135–64.
- Moitt, B. (1996) Slave Women and Resistance in the French Caribbean. In D. B. Gaspar & D. C. Hine (Eds.), More Than Chattel: Black Women and Slavery in the Americas. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Neptune-Anglade, M. (1986) L'Autre moitié du développement. Port-au-Prince & Montréal: Eds. des Alizes & ERCE.

- N'Zengou-Tayo, M. (1998) "Fanm Se Poto Mitan": Haitian Women, the Pillar of Society. Feminist Review 59 (Summer): 118–42.
- Peabody, S. (2005) Négresse, Mulâtresse, Citoyenne: Gender and Emancipation in the French Caribbean, 1650–1848. In P. Scully & D. Paton (Eds.), Gender and Slave Emancipation in the Atlantic World. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Sylvain-Bourchereau, M. (1957) Haiti et ses femmes: une étude d'évolution culturelle. Port-au-Prince: Les Presses Libres.

Women's movement, India

Soma Marik

Once India achieved independence, the Constituent Assembly of India passed a number of laws supporting basic rights for women. On paper, modernity was achieved, but the immediate concerns were not constitutional proposals but hard realities. Partition and communal violence reached ferocious levels, resulting in the world's largest migration. Women and children often bore the brunt of hardship, including abduction of 80,000 to 150,000 women. By 1957 the two states, as stand-in patriarchs, had "recovered" over 30,000 women. For many, it was indeed a case of getting out of a traumatic experience. But others had adjusted to the situation, and the recovery in turn created a trauma.

Middle-class and upper-class women and the mainstream liberal organizations like the All India Women's Conference (AIWC) were drawn into a share of the administrative work by the government. Since the 1930s the women's movements had sought to pass a Hindu Code Bill, aimed at abolition of polygamy, equality in the right to divorce of men and women, raising the age of consent and marriage, and giving women the right to maintain an inheritance of family property. This was sharply challenged by Hindu communal and right-wing nationalist forces, including President Rajendra Prasad and Home Minister Ballabh Patel. The comprehensive package for which the women had fought was dropped, and Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, the law minister, resigned in disgust. Eventually, bits and pieces were enacted as separate laws in the mid-1950s. Full equality, however, was not achieved for Hindu women. The stress on the Hindu Code rather than a Uniform Civil Code (UCC) also meant that non-Hindu women, including Muslims, the largest minority, were excluded.

The Communist Parties

After the initial euphoria that followed the transfer of power from the British, workers, peasants, tribals, oppressed castes, and women of all these social categories began to feel betrayed as their conditions did not improve. Moreover, this was a time when the flames of revolution spread across many countries, most notably China. Inspired by these, and prodded by the Cominform under Cold War conditions, the Communist Party of India resorted to varieties of ultra-leftism, including a Chinese-style line of guerrilla warfare. Agrarian struggles going on from before independence in Bengal and Andhra were also continued regardless of the changes in situation. The government responded by outlawing the CPI.

Bengal sharecroppers' struggles (1948–9) for a greater share of the crop and land ownership, which were widespread before independence, had become more militant yet also more localized, especially in Kakkdwip and Lalganj. A large number of women participated in the struggles, and quite a significant number were martyred, but equality between women and men was not fully realized within the peasant movement. The Telengana movement in Andhra, a peasant struggle for land that attempted to transform into an agrarian revolution, was unusual for the attention paid to women's issues, though only as a tactical device to ensure women's mobilization. But most women were expected to provide auxiliary tasks for the revolutionary men. Ultimately, too, the party's attitude remained one of benevolent paternalism.

The ultra-left line of the CPI also meant forced militancy in urban areas. In May 1948 the Mahila Atma Raksha Samiti (Women's Self-Defense Association) (MARS), the women's organization launched by CPI women activists in collaboration with many non-CPI women, launched a campaign for prisoners' release. There was severe state violence, including arrests, as well as banning the organization and its organ, Ghare-Baire (At Home and Outside). On April 27, 1949, after a meeting called by the Mayeder Samiti (Association of Mothers of Prisoners) and the MARS, police opened fire at a demonstration, killing four women, including Latika Sen, the first-ever woman member of the CPI in Bengal.

The CPI eventually gave up the line of armed struggle after fresh pressure from Moscow. Though Maoist-inclined cadres in Andhra felt betrayed, the party and many front organizations gained legal status in 1951. In May 1953 an All India Coordination Committee was set up with Anusuya Bai Gyanchand and Hazara Begum as the Joint Conveners. In June 1954 this Coordination Committee organized a national women's congress, out of which was born the National Federation of Indian Women (NFIW), which essentially functioned as the women's wing of the CPI. In 1964 the CPI split, and the Stalinists and Maoists formed the Communist Party of India (Marxist) (CPI(M)). The pro-CPI(M) women eventually set up new organizations, culminating in the formation of the All India Democratic Women's Association (AIDWA) in March 1981. While numerically the NFIW and later the AIDWA registered significant growth, politically they represented an increasingly deradicalized current.

Until the rise of the autonomous women's movements, the party-controlled women's organizations tended to see women's oppression as subsumed entirely by class oppression, while their engagement in struggles was linked to the tactical lines of the parties to which they were affiliated. The communist-led organizations had mixed relations with the autonomous women's movements. They collaborated on law reforms and issues ranging from the anti-dowry movement of the 1980s to the anti-globalization struggles going on presently. At the same time, the left women's groups often dismissed the autonomous women's groups as petit-bourgeois. Their attitude to anti-globalization struggles, for example, changes when friendly parties are in power in a particular province, most notably in West Bengal, where the AIDWA and its leaders have actively opposed anti-globalization struggles.

Rise of Feminist Currents

The formation of the Communist Party of India (Marxist-Leninist) ("Naxalites" – CPI-ML) in 1969 gave an impetus to the radicalization of many women, both poor peasants and urban youth. Within a short while the tendency to support the revolutionary terrorist line of "annihilation" of the class enemy dominated the party. Women fought in various capacities. Naxalite politics hit existing social values in a number of ways. The call for rebellion included rebellion against family control and conservatism. The politics of revolution, regardless of its ultra-leftism and confusions, made the man-woman relationship less hierarchical.

A generally worsening economic situation around 1972 gave rise to anti-price rise movements. In Maharashtra a series of events crystallized feminist ideas and activities. Famine and hoarding led to skyrocketing prices of basic consumer goods, infuriating lower-middle-class and poor women. A particularly inspiring agitation occurred in Shahada, Dhulia district, where agitations by Bhil tribals saw a militant and leading role played by women. Activists of the far left combined with local workers, including Gandhians, to form a grassroots organization – the Shramik Sangathana (Workers' Organization). Women in this movement also raised the issue of wife-beating, which subsequently led to militant anti-alcohol and anti-price rise campaigns led by women.

The anti-price rise movement in 1973–4 saw huge numbers of women from the working and middle classes take to the streets. This movement soon spread to Gujarat and became known as the Nav Nirman (New Construction) movement. Originally a student-led movement against rising prices, corruption, and black-marketeering, it was joined by thousands of middle-class women. Later, former socialist Jayaprakash Narayan joined in and behind him anti-Congress parties tried to turn it into one more electoral battle. Neither the anti-price rise movement nor the Nav Nirman movement were consciously anti-patriarchal, and they sometimes used gender-defined symbols of contempt, like offering bangles to men to denote their unmanly nature or lack of ability to hold public office. Yet the fact that women acted collectively in the public domain made these movements forerunners of the contemporary feminist movement.

In 1974 the first of the autonomous women's groups was formed – the Progressive Organization of Women (POW) in Hyderabad. Identifying the existence of gender oppression as a distinct category of oppression, the POW's manifesto contrasted women's constitutional equality with their actual inequality in sharp terms. From the start this new wave feminism in India had a strongly socialist thrust. The POW manifesto ended: "We proclaim solidarity with all women! We proclaim solidarity with all oppressed classes" (Patel 1985: 113).

A landmark year for feminism in India, 1975 saw International Women's Day observed on March 8 by autonomous organizations for the first time. (Till then, women's wings of the left parties had observed the day.) In Maharashtra, feminism and anti-caste struggles were linked together. Janvedana, a Marathi dalit ("untouchable" castes) newspaper, published a special number on women entitled "In the Third World Women hold up Half the Sky." A dalit women's group formed, calling itself the Mahila Samta Sainik Dal (League of Soldiers for Women's Equality). Unlike the POW, it saw religion as a major force in the oppression of women as well as dalits.

By the late 1970s and early 1980s there were a large number of autonomous women's organizations all over India. Many called themselves feminist even though they came from Marxist backgrounds and Indian Marxists had traditionally seen feminism as a divisive ideology. Their definition of an autonomous organization was that women organized and led the movements; the fight against oppression, injustice, and discrimination against women was the first priority of the organization and women's rights were not to be subordinated to any supposedly higher cause which must be served first; and the organization was not to be subordinated to the decisions and necessities of any political group. Later, autonomy was also maintained from the state, religious, or any funding agency. Between 1977 and 1979 organizations that came up were Stree Mukti Sanghatana (Women's Liberation Organization), Purogami Stree Sanghatana, Socialist Women's Group, Samta (Equality), Stree Sangharsh (Women's Struggle), and Mahila Dakshata Samiti (Women's Capability Society).

In West Bengal the situation was rather different. In 1978 the Pragatisheel Mahila Samiti (Progressive Women's Association) was formed in West Bengal as a "third stream" (neither liberal nor mainstream-CP dominated) organization, but in 1977 the Left Front, led by the CPI(M), had come to power, and the CPI(M)'s frontal organizations all insisted that progressivism consisted of giving a blank check to the activities of the Left Front government. In the eyes of the Pashchimbanga Ganatantrik Mahila Samiti, the West Bengal chapter of the AIDWA, all women's organizations not geared to the Left Front were bourgeois organizations. Eventually, a number of organizations came up, like Sachetana, Mahila Pathagar, Mahila Pathachakra, Mahila Gabeshanakendra, Lahari, and Protibidhan. These groups came together in 1983 to form a broad platform, the Nari Nirjatan Prairodh Mancha (Forum Against Oppression of Women) (NNPM), which later became a separate, unitary organization.

The relationship between these organizations and the CPI(M)'s women was far more antagonistic than elsewhere in India, and it would be a long time before even the feminists outside West Bengal would realize the degree of violence the CPI(M) was prepared to use against women in West Bengal as part of the fight to retain its domination in the province, as well as the fact of its transformation into a party of order supporting the police, the upper classes, and entrenched interests. The autonomous women's groups, notably the NNPM, waged sustained struggles against state violence on women. When Archana Guha, a political prisoner tortured by the police under the previous regime, brought a case, she had to wage a two-decade struggle, with only the Association for the Protection of Democratic Rights and the NNPM as her consistent supporters, while the AIDWA simply ignored the issue and the CPI(M) helped the accused police officers.

State violence, and violence by party-controlled thugs, on protesting women has become a common feature in West Bengal. During anti-globalization struggles in 2006–7 women have been beaten up, sexually abused, evicted from their land, and shot at. While the women's networks, including Maitree, have fought in their defense, the AIDWA, including its all-India leader Brinda Karat, have defended the actions of the West Bengal government and CPI(M).

Anti-Dowry and Anti-Rape Movements

The issues that brought many feminist groups together were anti-rape and anti-dowry campaigns. Violence within the family includes torture and often murder because of dowry demands, cutting across class, caste, and religious and regional boundaries. The POW manifesto demanded enforcement of anti-dowry legislation. Some of their demonstrations mobilized 2,000 people. A few years later a movement developed in Delhi. The Mahila Dakshata Samiti and Stree Sangharsh took up the campaigns. Deaths by fire, passed over as suicides, were challenged, and mass demonstrations were organized in mid-1979. But the organizations found that it was not so easy to encourage a battered woman to leave her husband's family. Feminists thus found themselves compelled, much to their dislike, to advising couples to live in a nuclear family instead of acting directly against those who used violence. Dowry death was particularly difficult to tackle because police routinely ignored dying declarations.

However, after years of campaigns, in 1983 Section 498A to the Indian penal code was introduced whereby cruelty to a wife was made a cognizable offense, punishable by up to three years' imprisonment. Shifting the onus of proof to the accused in the Indian Evidence Act enabled courts to convict husbands and in-laws. Finally, post-mortem examination of any woman who died within seven years of marriage was made compulsory, by amending Section 174 of the Criminal Procedures Act (Cr.P.C.).

The anti-rape movement began with a number of police rapes. They included rape of a beggar woman named Laxmi in Punjab, Rameeza Bee and Shakeela Bee, both in Hyderabad, and most famously, the Mathura Rape Case in Chandrapur, near Nagpur, Maharashtra. The shocking judgment of the Supreme Court in the last case, when policemen-rapists were found not guilty on the grounds that Mathura had a boyfriend and was therefore a woman of loose morals, sparked off countrywide demonstrations on March 8, 1980, in Bombay, Delhi, Nagpur, Pune, Ahmedabad, Bangalore, and Hyderabad, demanding a retrial. In Bombay the Forum Against Oppression of Women decided to campaign for reopening the case. This case brought together feminists from all over India on a national campaign issue.

Subsequent rape cases showed how mainstream politicians were seeking to utilize the issue and transform it by stressing the "honor" of women and the need to "protect" them, shifting back to a patriarchal discourse. Based considerably on suggestions from feminist groups, a 1983 bill was introduced to define custodial rape. Controversy raged over shifting the burden of proof to the accused, as opponents alleged that this paved the way for women to frame innocent men. Feminists also pushed for the implementation of law, rather than just the enactment of new laws. The significant gains of the anti-rape campaigns were the creation of wider networks, the bringing of rape into the open as a major threat to women's equality, and also the very definition of rape (whether only penile penetration should be treated as rape, or whether the term "sexual assault" should replace rape.)

National Campaigns and Networks

The autonomous women's movement in India has carried out many campaigns and built various networks. The definition of autonomy never meant a narrow focus on women's issues, though. The origins of the movement and the socialist-feminist inclination of many activists meant the various organizations were often involved with other kinds of rights organizations and movements. The major countrywide network was the National Conferences of the Autonomous Women's Movement. From the 1980s to the present, seven have been held. The sheer scale of the movement and the variety of organizations and concerns mean a multiplicity of panels and parallel workshops, with sub-networks in particular themes commanding more internal cohesion.

Two major debates that have rocked the feminist movement are those over the UCC and the reservation of seats for women in parliament and legislative assemblies. Feminist activists took up the demand for a UCC in the 1980s, arguing that substantive equality for women was possible only through a uniform set of non-religious personal laws (relating to marriage, property inheritance, maintenance, and related areas). However, the growing threat of communalism made this a contested domain. On one hand, the Hindu communalist campaign for a UCC argued in essence that the existence of a Muslim personal law meant that Muslims were somehow not proper Indians. Such views occasionally influenced court judgments as well. Muslim fundamentalists also insisted that Muslim law was derived from the Shariat (Islamic law derived from the Koran) and could not be tampered with, ignoring the reality that the current laws were the product of colonial legislation in the 1930s for maintaining centralized rule.

Muslim women in particular faced the problem of being forced to choose between women's rights and the rights of the Muslims as a threatened minority. The issue first became controversial in 1985, after the Supreme Court judgment of April 23 in the Shah Bano case, granting her maintenance from her husband under Section 125 of the Cr.P.C. Responding to Shah Bano's husband's claims that he was governed by Muslim personal law, the judges suggested that a UCC would remove disparate loyalties, thereby insinuating that Muslims have loyalties in some sense outside the nation. So UCC became a weapon to Hinduize the nation. Muslim communal leaders took this up in a big way and the central government, in order to keep this Muslim vote-bank intact, brought in a bill seeking to exclude Muslim women from the purview of Section 125 of the Cr.P.C. At the same time, the Hindu Right now demanded UCC, presenting the case that only Muslim women were oppressed by Muslim personal law, completely ignoring the still-existing unequal Hindu personal laws. In the Bombay national conference (1996) over the reform of personal laws there were attempts to shift the focus to gender justice, not merely uniformity. Some groups like Majlis felt it necessary to retreat from the demand for UCC altogether, while others like NNPM refused to do so.

Finally, there was the debate over reservation of seats for women. This issue was not raised by feminists. Given the socialist origins of many of them, they had if anything looked down upon parliamentary politics and representation in it generally. It was the Congress that proposed that one third of all parliamentary and state assembly seats should be reserved for women, to increase their representation in these institutions. The patriarchal attacks on this proposal angered many feminists. Feminists and Trotskyists have sometimes demanded reservation of a proportion of jobs for women. But the issue became crucial in the context of the debates on representation. Many feminists felt that self-representation of women could be the only way to defend women's rights, as it has been for dalits. Others have questioned how far, in the communally charged political scenario, with extremist Hindutva fundamentalists or fascists mobilizing greater numbers of women, such a demand would in reality serve a progressive cause.

Women from the Margins

The autonomous women's movement has stressed that there are a diversity of goals and has sought to build bridges. Some of these movements, however, have been treated by urban and upper-class India as marginal. Best known is the Chipko movement in Garhwal from 1974, where women were central to the environmental protection movement. In central India the Chhattisgarh Mukti Morcha, a radical movement among a people who wanted a separate province, generated a women's movement, the Mahila Mukti Morcha (Women's Liberation Front). Originating after 1977 in a struggle against exclusion of tribals due to the Bhilai steel plant's policy of mechanization, the Morcha became a militant mass organization. In North East India, where the Armed Forces Special Powers Act has been in force since the late 1950s, violence by the Indian state has been endemic. Women in the province of Manipur have repeatedly protested in diverse forms to rapes and murders by the army, and civil rights violations in general, by forming the Meira Paibi since the 1970s. Finally, the Bhopal gas disaster, the world's biggest industrial environmental disaster, which remains unsettled, with Union Carbide having paid a pittance in compensation, has seen women mobilize massively in protest. The Bhopal Gas Peedit Mahila Udyog Sangathan (Bhopal Gas Affected Women's Initiative Organization) played the leading role in the struggles to secure justice for the affected people.

SEE ALSO: Hindu Nationalism, Hindutva, and Women

References and Suggested Readings

- Chattopadhyay, M. (2001) Shottor Dashaker Nari Andolan Paschim Banglae. In M. Chattopadhyay (Ed.), Eso Mukto Karo (Come, Liberate). Calcutta: People's Book Society.
- Gandhi, N. & Shah, N. (1993) The Issues at Stake. Delhi: Kali for Women.
- Karat, B. (2005) Survival and Emancipation. Gurgaon, Haryana: Three Essays Collective.
- Kumar, R. (2002) The History of Doing: An Illustrated Account of Movements for Women's Rights and Feminism in India 1800-1990. Delhi: Kali for Women.
- Mukhopadhyay, K. (1993) Narimukti Andolan O Amra (Ourselves and the Women's Liberation Movement). Kolkata: National Book Agency.
- Omvedt, G. (1980) We Will Smash This Prison! New Delhi: Zed Press.
- Patel, V. (1985) Reaching for Half the Sky: A Reader in Women's Movement. Baroda: Antar Rashtriya Prakashan.
- Roy, K. & Marik, S. (2007) Women Under the Left Front Rule: Expectations Betrayed. Vadodara: Documentation and Study Center for Action.

Women's movement, Italy

Vinzia Fiorino

In Italy, the Jacobin years (1796–9) and the revolutionary processes of 1848, linked to the struggle for national unity, are the two most important occasions of female commitment in the modern public sphere.

From the end of the eighteenth century the political sphere, a place for state authority, social conflict, and political representation, grew steadily away from the private sphere, a place for family, for affections, for “natural” relations. The attribution of the first to men and of the second to women was a historical process of major importance, capable of radically influencing the structure of future societies. From the French Revolution on, the abstract and general concept of “man” and “citizen” embodied only one particular subject: the adult male, making the exclusion of women one of the basic elements of modern politics. It should be no surprise, then, that women's struggles to gain political rights – often objects of radical criticism, ferocious satire, and archaic ostracism – were the most difficult and the most strenuously fought.

A Long Nineteenth Century

A number of women posed the question of the female role in the new constitutional order brought on by the French Revolution. They did not advocate political rights but, rather, a precise role in the public sphere, consistent with the general project of moral and political renewal of the entire society. Forms of women's political writings – from minor writings, newspaper articles, and leaflets to petitions and public questioning – were numerous. Women complained of the partiality of the application of universal revolutionary principles. They cited the lack of acknowledgement of many rights as an element of robust continuity with the ancien régime.

In the 1799 Neapolitan Republic the noblewomen Eleonora Fonseca Pimentel, Luisa Sanfelice, and Giulia Carafa played important roles, and the assault on Forte Sant' Elmo in January 1799 was also due to Neapolitan women. Their experiences put forward themes and problems that remained the focus of women's claims in the long nineteenth century. The first of these was education. An adequate education shaped on the rational model had been central in revolutionary and Enlightenment culture, but women were often left out. This was an offense to the dignity of the person, and they resented the frivolous education they were offered. They also sought opportunities for honorable work and fought their exclusion from inheritance. They hoped to overturn the unchallengeable authority of paterfamilias, and they sought free choice in terms of marriage and everyday life. This also led them to confront the complex problem of sexual morality, another of the central issues in the revolutionary period and throughout the nineteenth century.

The new political and revolutionary lexicon led to an emphasis on the concept of virtue. For men, it summarized all the qualities of a (male) citizen: to work for the benefit of the common good, to put public happiness before individual self-interest, and to spread a strong ethic capable of renewing the political and social structure from the very foundations. For women, on the other hand, it referred to the capability of educating future citizens in patriotic values and new structures. Modernity seemed to recognize a new and fundamental role for women: excluded from political rights, they could be citizens as wives of male citizens and particularly as mothers of citizens brought up in the new patriotic values. What resulted was a public role for women as the “mother-citizen.” Female heroism consisted of offering sons to the homeland and accepting the possibility of losing them.

As single persons, in groups, or organized in movements, Italian women kept as a central theme the issue of motherhood, both as a value specific to women and with the aim of elaborating in political terms the symbolic values linked to maternity. Motherhood came to symbolize a sphere of female virtues and skills that, if confined to the home, could turn into subjection and exclusion, but if turned into the public sphere could be the stepping stone to redefine the spaces and contents of politics.

On the eve of the 1848 insurgencies there was a strong contraposition between the exclusion of women from the public sphere and the reevaluation of women as supporters of military action. However, women did not want only to support male actions. The spontaneous participation of women in insurgencies occurred throughout the whole country. The collective oath and the option to bear arms were the two most important channels of political involvement. The oath underlined a commitment to bring alive communities and placed emphasis on popular sovereignty in contrast to a monarchist and supernatural conception of its origin. Female oaths voiced an equality claim to men, but also broke the homoerotic pact that men-only oaths implied. The option of bearing arms had in any case a strongly subversive character.

Female virtues thus expanded from maternal tenderness and mercy to strength, energy, and firmness in sacrifice. In this context, in Venice and other cities, women active in the revolutionary process asked not only to bear arms but also to constitute a women's battalion. Many women dressed as men for the purpose of gaining the battleground. Colomba Antonietti fought alongside her husband in Venice and then in Rome, where she died; Luigia Sassi Bartoletti fought in the Milan Cinque giornate at the head of 100 men. These are the best known among the many women who fought in the armed struggle. Others epitomized women's political commitment. Caterina Franceschi Ferrucci fought to promote female education. Cristina Trivulzio di Belgioioso, a protagonist in Milan's insurgencies and an international figure, was an essayist and a salon promoter. Laura Solera Mantegazza was a Mazzini follower who matched conspiratory activity with social efforts for women workers and their education.

The second half of the nineteenth century brought major changes, the first and most important being the passage from single individuals or group action to an emancipationist movement, fully structured and independent from all other political organizations. The political path of the most representative figure of the Italian emancipationist movement, Anna Maria Mozzoni, is a significant one. She brought together Fourier's ideas first with Mazzini's postulates, then with the socialist workers' movement, to create an independent women's association. A restless militant, she was the founder in 1881, together with Paolina Schiff, of the Lega promotrice degli interessi femminili (League for the Promotion of Female Interests), which gave priority to struggles for women's education, access to liberal professions, equality of women in the legal field, and the right to vote. The subjection of women within the family through the Pisanelli civil code (much like the Napoleonic code), which embodied the concept of marital consent and thus became symbolic of women's subjection, became her most significant issue. But she was also critical of the relationship between the nation-state and women that perpetuated women's subjection.

From the 1880s the foundation of Leghe per la tutela degli interessi femminili (Leagues for the Defense of Women's Interests) brought the political women's movement to the national fore with a strong pacifist and anti-colonial stance. Italian women's associations, with Catholic, socialist, or liberal orientations, moved on issues such as the fight against prostitution and against marital consent, and in favor of paternity search, of suffrage, and of access to professions.

After the political crisis of the end of the century and the consequent repression of all active associations, the new century saw the reconstitution of the better-known groups, such as the Associazione per la donna in Rome, and in 1905 the Unione Femminile Nazionale in Milan, chaired up to World War I by Ersilia Majno Bronzini. With more conservative positions, but with a large membership, the Consiglio Nazionale delle Donne Italiane (National Council of Italian Women) (CNDI), founded in 1903 as the Italian section of the International Council of Women, was established in Washington in 1888.

The Unione Femminile left deep marks on the history of Italian feminism for two reasons. First, Ersilia Majno refused Mozzoni's gender equality for its being a limited issue in view of specific female aptitudes and of the difference maternity brings with it. Unione Femminile practiced what was to be called "practical" or "social" feminism. It represented a large movement of political and social action to redefine the very concept of citizenship and to build a social welfare state that included women and minors. On the basis of values thought to be specifically feminine (devotion, altruism, sensitiveness) the Unione gave birth to many structures in favor of mother-workers, single mothers, prostitutes, poor workers, and elders, carrying out many functions later to be occupied by Welfare. The creation in 1910 of a Cassa per la maternità (maternity funds) was, for all its limitations, the most important gain of that period.

The other great battle, the one in favor of the right to vote, galvanized the women's movement and reached its apex in 1906–8. Committees in favor of women's suffrage were established from 1906, and the issue was raised and debated with high political figures of the time, earning much press coverage. In March 1906 a petition, whose first signature was Mazzoni's, was presented to parliament. The petition sparked parliamentary debate but met with no real results.

Twentieth Century

At the outbreak of World War I, interventionist propaganda influenced the women's movement, implying that participation in the war could lead to national redemption and a chance to gain full access to the national political sphere. Women's activity during the war, from work in factories to assisting soldiers, seemed to legitimate claims of equality and suffrage.

The rise of Fascism, however, changed the general context. Mussolini closed many associations and called feminism an antiquated model. Instead, he proposed a substantially different model of the "new Italian woman." Women played a role in wartime resistance. Because of the end of the separation between private and public spheres, Italian women were able to play important roles in such endeavors as food rationing and protests on essential goods. They also participated informally in municipalities and constituted an important network of direct democracy. The right to vote was granted on January 31, 1945.

In La Zanzara, a student paper of the Parini Lyceum in Milan in 1966, some girls wrote about their sexual activity, creating a national scandal that revealed changes that were already at work and were about to break out in Italian society. In doing so, they introduced a new feminism that was strictly connected to student and youth protests at the end of the 1960s. This new movement kept its distance both from the emancipation and feminist movements of the past and from the two organizations affiliated with the two major mass parties, the Unione Donne Italiane (UDI) to the Communist Party and the Centro Italiano Femminile (CIF) to the Christian Democratic Party. This more modern feminism aimed at a final overcoming of the patriarchal heritage in Italian society and legislation. Themes connected to physical subjection, gender oppression, and free expression were put in the front line, encouraged by international events such as the American civil rights movement, pacifism, anti-authoritarianism, and social and cultural nonconformity.

The most relevant novelties in the new movement were separatism and the centrality of women's liberation. Separatism implies great political and innovative value given to private and political relations between women only. In this context, lesbian groups, traditionally less visible, found free expression and a larger public space. Self-consciousness, the principle of "starting from oneself," innovations in political language and practices, a particular attention to internal democracy, and a refusal of separations between leaders and militants were the tenets of new feminism. The most famous slogan – "the personal is political" – summarized the radical nature of the movement and implied the overcoming of the distinction between private and public spheres and the political relevance of issues linked to women's subjectivity, such as maternity, sexuality, contraception, and abortion. The struggle to gain an abortion law galvanized the whole movement, creating a truly mass movement in 1975 and 1976. Passed in 1978, the law was confirmed by a referendum in 1981. The feminist movement also fought for, and obtained, women's health advisory bureaus, kindergartens, and a new family law that almost completely abrogated previous patriarchal heritages.

SEE ALSO: Civil Rights, United States: Overview; Italian Communist Party; Women's Movement, United States, 19th Century; Women's Movement, United States, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Banti, A. M. (2005) L'onore della Nazione. Identità sessuali e violenza nel nazionalismo europeo dal XVIII secolo alla grande guerra. Turin: Einaudi.
- Bertolotti, T. & Scattigno, A. (2005) Il femminismo degli anni Settanta. Rome: Viella.
- Bravo, A. & Buzzone, A. M. (1995) In guerra senza armi: storie di donne, 1940–1945. Rome-Bari: Laterza.
- Buttafuoco, A. (1988) Cronache femminili. Temi e momenti della Stampa emancipazionista in Italia dall'Unità al fascismo. Siena: Facoltà di Magistero.
- De Grazia, V. (1992) How Fascism Ruled Women: Italy, 1922–1945. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Offen, K. M. (2000) European Feminisms, 1700–1950. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Pieron Bortolotti, F. (1975) Alle origini del movimento femminile in Italia (1848–1892). Turin: Einaudi.

Women's movement, Japan

Jill M. Nussel

To western observers, putting radical and Japanese feminism in the same sentence may seem incongruous. After all, this is a nation where women did not receive the franchise until the postwar constitution of 1947. Women were granted rights to abortion the following year, but did not have legal access to the pill until 1999. Today, women are guaranteed constitutional equality, but it is perfectly acceptable for businesses to deny women promotion on the basis that they might someday marry and have children. Japanese women still practice a distinctly gendered style of writing and speech, while household labor is esteemed as virtuous. As recently as February 2008, efforts to reform domestic violence laws faced a backlash from critics claiming the legislation infringed men's rights and promoted the destruction of families by encouraging radical feminism. Perhaps in this context any feminist consciousness would be considered radical, and indeed, the concept needs to be understood within its own framework and not simply accorded western values.

Throughout the nation's modern history, the Japanese have consistently endeavored to define what it means to be Japanese (kokutai), embracing modernity in concert with tradition. Japanese historiography has viewed radicalism as a reactionary impulse against the western order, expressing an emotional preoccupation with traditional and conservative moral and spiritual values threatened by the West. Whether as imperial subjects before 1945 or as citizens in the postwar decades, radical feminists resisted many of the gender-specific policies intended to bend Japanese women and men to the will of the modern Japanese state.

Since the late eighteenth century, the role of women has been profoundly influenced by the neo-Confucian text Onna daigaku (Precepts for Children and Greater Learning for Women), in which Kaibara Ekken (or possibly his wife Kaibara Token) wrote that women were expected to master domestic skills and moral character to raise strong, intelligent sons. In the creation of a modern industrialized nation-state in the late nineteenth century, this concept also included women as passive supporters of fukoku kyōhei (wealthy country and strong army). The family became a crucial link of loyalty from subject to emperor and nothing was more important to the development of the state than motherhood. As a result, women did not exist independently and were subordinate to their fathers, then their husbands, and to their husbands' families.

By 1875, women's roles were being described as ryōsai kenbo (good wives and wise mothers). The result was the development of a fledgling feminist consciousness with origins reflected in western influence, state policy, and growing working-class consciousness. Japanese feminists were certainly influenced by western thought as writers including John Stuart Mill and Charlotte Perkins Gilman were translated into Japanese. Their Marxist ideas of communal work were enticing to many Japanese people whose belief in support of the collective, rather than the individual, was more in keeping with neo-Confucian thought. At the same time, state policy codified men as the absolute authorities. The Meiji Civil Code of 1898, which remained largely intact until after the Pacific War, gave husbands and fathers sole discretion over marriages, property, and children. One provision even lumped wives with "cripples and disabled persons." Ultimately, the patriarchal family became a part of state policy, and neo-Confucian principles were extended to all women, regardless of class. It was in this context that Japan's military-industrial complex was built on sons who became soldiers and daughters who marched into factories. While men took up arms, women worked in squalid conditions and sent their pay home to their parents.

It was this labor dichotomy that prompted women to begin asking questions out loud and often led to their radical expression. Many thoughts, practices, and activities intersected with the elements of Japanese modernity. Japanese radicalism split into several divergent groups whose participants and leaders occasionally overlapped, and whose ideologies often crossed as well. Radicalism was most manifest in movements for basic rights, suffrage, and birth control where they were often coupled with socialism, communism, and anarchism as they sought recognition and legislation to improve the conditions of women. It is important to note that most radical participants did not see their activities as subversive to the modernization efforts, but as better patriotic ways of improving all of Japan.

There were several incidents of radical action in the years of the twentieth century. Heimminsha (Commoners' Society) was formed in 1900 and included several women who supported campaigns opposing the repeal of the Peace Laws that made it illegal for women to join, speak at, or convene political meetings. This organization, associated with the socialist movement, was the first organized attempt on the part of women to attain political rights. The following year, Aikoku Fujin Kai (Patriotic Women's Association) published its first journal, and by 1912 it had over 800,000 members, making it the largest women's organization of the Meiji period. This organization was meant to embrace ryōsai kenbo in an effort to gain women's continued support for the war effort with Russia, but in 1904, Yosano Akiko's poem translated as "do not give up your life for the Emperor" exposed the conflict between women and patriotic obligations. This was seen as so threatening that many newspapers branded Yosano a traitor.

"In the beginning, woman was the sun," was the rebellious statement of writer, journalist, and political activist Hiratsuka Raicho. In an effort to give women a literary voice, she founded a Seitō-sha (Bluestockings Society) in 1911 and began publishing the journal Seito later the same year with many feminists among the contributors. Members of Seitō-sha were subjected to harsh criticism and Seito was regularly censored by authorities, further inflaming members. After four years of publication, an exhausted Hiratsuka turned the reins over to Itō Noe, who was living with the anarchist Ōsugi Sakae. Itō, who had been inspired by Emma Goldman, saw to it that Seito became more radical as it increasingly dealt with social injustices in Japanese society. However, due to financial difficulties, Seito ceased publication in 1921. Itō was murdered in 1923 along with Ōsugi in the chaos following the great Kanto earthquake. The killing of such high-profile anarchists, along with a young child, sparked surprise and anger throughout Japan.

In addition to traversing the spatial boundaries of respectability, Seito brought formerly taboo topics into public discourse and spurred the appearance of several other intellectual journals that generated liberal, socialist, suffragist, and anarchist ideology. Men who were confounded by the sudden voice women seem to have found labeled Seitō-sha members as "new women," a term whose negative connotations Japanese feminists originally rejected. However, by 1920, they were embracing the term and formed the Shin Fujinkyōkai (New Women's Association). Taisho Japan's new women were characterized by urban living, consumerism, and more western dress. Cutting the hair was illegal for women, but Taisho new women did just that. Hiratsuka, along with Ichikawa Fusae, used the New Women's Association to call for a revision of the laws that made women's political organization illegal as well as calling for measures that would prevent men afflicted with venereal disease from marrying. However, the most radical concept was their call for universal suffrage. Although unsuccessful at gaining the franchise before the war, women made noticeable gains in accessing public space. Even though women had been working in factories since the 1870s, more women were now better educated and moving into teaching, nursing, and clerical work.

Operating in the same general sphere, Ishimoto [Kato] Shidzue pushed for birth control availability as part of a broad spectrum of progressive reforms. Married to eccentric and liberal Baron Ishimoto Keikichi at age 17, Ishimoto spent her honeymoon on Kyushu where her husband managed Mitsui's Miike Coal Mine. Here, she observed the squalid conditions of women burdened with many children and no way to care for them. Her meeting the following year with Margaret Sanger in New York proved to be the turning point in Ishimoto's life. This exposure showed her that enabling women to plan their families responsibly rather than suffer the miseries of unwanted children would elevate the conditions not only of Japanese women, but of the Japanese people as a whole. While Ishimoto did not face the religious opposition that stymied efforts of many western reformers, she did face serious opposition from the growing militaristic regime of Taisho Japan of the 1920s and 1930s who were fiercely hostile to her efforts. In fact, the government made it illegal to even discuss the subject so that public meetings during Sanger's 1922 visit had to be translated with coded terms. Ishimoto's marriage failed and it took 14 years and approval from the Imperial Household Agency to secure a divorce. After considerable scandal she was married in 1944 to radical labor organizer Kato Kanju, with whom she had had a longtime affair.

Radical feminism was thrown into disarray as Japan's militarist propensities of the 1930s and 1940s led to the invasion of China and eventually to the Pacific War. Hiratsuka Raicho and Takamura Itsue criticized the relative silence of women's groups. An even more radical response came from anarchist Yagi Akiko, who described the annexation of Manchuria as having created a slave state exchanging one invader for another. Ultimately, even feminists by and large supported the war effort.

Ironically, it was the 1947 postwar constitution, largely compiled by American occupation forces, which gave Japanese women many of the reforms they had been seeking since the Meiji Restoration. The new constitution granted (at least on paper) universal suffrage for the first time and granted women equality with their husbands. This included property ownership, rights to divorce, rights to appeal divorce, the right to marry without parental consent, and the right to inherit property. Abortion was legalized that same year. Buoyed by their successes, 39 women were elected to the 466-seat Diet in the first election in which women participated, including Kato Shidzue and her husband. Not everyone, however, was convinced that women belonged in political office.

In the postwar years, Japanese feminism has been caught up in many of the same issues that have affected women in other industrialized countries. Yet many feminists believe that oppression has become invisible and internalized as they cannot express the experiences of oppression with a common voice. During the Women's Lib movement of the 1970s, women's groups fought for reforms, built Women's Studies departments at universities throughout Japan, obtained greater education, and entered into the professional workforce in far greater numbers than before the war.

Kanai Yoshiko characterizes the postwar experience for women as those who made up a "feminist generation." These are the women who struggled for sexual equality and for self-reliance, forced to choose between careers and family. By the mid-1980s, the issue of self-reliance manifested itself in "ecofeminism," which argues a fundamental connection between women and nature that comes from a shared history of oppression by a patriarchal society. Radical feminists launched into debate on how to recognize the background of sexual oppression, but debate continued to be centered around "housewife feminism," where women made the biggest gains in government programs that favored wives and mothers. To radicals, it seemed women were satisfied as long as they could involve their husbands more in house-work and childcare.

Western feminists need to understand that the image of patriarchy is different in Japan than in the West. Radical feminists developed the concepts of domestic and reproductive labor and contributed to an analysis of capitalism as a system to provide non-wage labor, believing the lack of radical feminism can be explained by the lack of discourse on power relations. In Japan, "housewife feminism" has influenced all of the major issues of second-wave feminism: equality in employment and sexual division of labor; domestic labor and reproduction; and an overall demand for sexual independence and self-determination.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Japan; Goldman, Emma (1869–1940); Itō Noe (1895–1923); Ōsugi Sakae (1885–1923); Sanger, Margaret (1879–1966) and the American Birth Control Movement; Women's Movement, Britain; Women's Movement, United States, 16th–18th Centuries; Women's Movement, United States, 19th Century; Women's Movement, United States, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Buckley, S. (1997) Broken Silence: Voices of Japanese Feminism. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Hopper, H. (2002) Kato Shidzue: A Japanese Feminist. New York: Pearson.
- Mackie, V. (2003) Feminism in Modern Japan. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Yoshiko, K. (1996) Issues for Japanese Feminism. In AMPO-Japan Asia Quarterly Review. New York: M. E. Sharpe.

Women's movement, Latin America

Berenice Hernández

The story of women's political participation in Latin America is a long one. Latin American women not only have been involved as pioneers and activists in various social movements, but also have been constructing, via national and international alliances, their own movement as women: Latin American feminism. It is a movement so wide-ranging and diverse that it converges in many others. Along with the indigenous and black movements, it is a fundamental bastion of the struggles and political practices taking place in Latin America at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

Women's Organizing up to the 1950s

Although it has historically been blocked or rendered invisible by the patriarchal narrative, women's political participation has occurred for more than a century almost everywhere in the region. Between 1870 and 1900, women's movements surfaced in Mexico, Chile, Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay, and Peru. These movements then reappeared with greater force in most Latin American countries during the first decades of the twentieth century. In this period, known as the first wave of Latin American feminism, women's movements mostly articulated their struggle around obtaining civil and social rights. Women's legal, economic, and social inequality was brought to light by the different movements, which made concrete and urgent demands for suffrage, for access to education and to land, and for wage equality, while also claiming rights in the private sphere.

A series of women's meetings took place in various Latin American countries to discuss these topics. Though many participants were middle or upper class, workers, schoolteachers, and peasants played crucial roles in broadening the discussion of the feminist platform.

A first meeting, the International Women's Congress, took place in Buenos Aires, Argentina, in 1910. There, Chilean, Uruguayan, and Paraguayan women discussed international laws, matrimonial issues, and wage inequality. They also drew up a resolution of support for the Uruguayan government, expressing approval of the first law permitting divorce in Latin America in 1907. Anarchist and socialist women founded the female workers' society Unión Gremial Femenina, made up of proletarian women, the Women's Socialist Center, and the National Council of Women. The National Feminist Union was formed in 1918, promulgating the civil and political emancipation of women, access to education, and wage equality. In 1919 Elvira Rawson de Dellepiane and Alfonsina Storni created the Association for Women's Rights, which was led in 1922 by Julieta Lanteri Renshaw.

In Mexico, feminism emerged hand in hand with social struggles. The Mexican Revolution (1910–1921) gave way to the first Feminist Congress in the state of Yucatan in 1916, where the school teacher Consuelo Zavala was president of the Organizing Commission. There 700 women, especially elementary school teachers, debated the social means necessary to emancipate women from the yoke of tradition. These women discussed access to education, declaring themselves in favor of secular education, as well as free access, so that women would “cease to be led and can be leaders.” The participants agreed upon the need to have women recognize their own capacities and to encourage free thinking while “promoting the spectacle of a socialist tendency.” In addition to being granted more legal rights and freedoms, they argued, women must also be given the option to earn money for themselves and be able to relate to their partners as equals.

That first meeting in 1916 marked the beginning of feminism in Mexico, aiding in the emergence of other women's groups, which strove for access to land, wage equality, and the expansion of popular education. More radical feminist movements also emerged, such as the Radical Women's Center (1918) within the Casa del Obrero Mundial (COM). The COM already had a history marked by anarchosocialist women like Juana Belén Gutiérrez de Mendoza, who in 1901 conspired with the Flores Magón brothers against the dictatorship of Porfirio Díaz, and in 1907 founded the Daughters of Anahuac, an organization that brought together almost 300 anarchist women. Thanks to these movements, by the middle of the 1930s the United Front for Women's Rights (FUPDM) had reached 50,000 members.

Uruguay was one of the first Latin American countries to grant legal rights to women. In 1911, Maria Abella created the first feminist group, the Feminist Section of the Pan-American Women's Federation. By 1901 anarchist women had formed resistance societies of laundresses, ironing women, match makers, and cigarette makers, and in 1910 the Women's Association of Various Trades was created within the Anarchist Federation of Uruguay (FAU). In 1919 Paulina Luisi founded the Uruguayan Alliance for the Women's Vote (AUSF) and in 1923, along with worker women, the Uruguayan Women's Alliance was announced.

Similar processes occurred in other countries in the region. In Cuba at the beginning of the 1920s, the Women's Club for Equal Rights (CFDIM) was founded, and in 1928 the Labor Union of Women was created to resist the Machado dictatorship. In Ecuador the proletarian women's group Rosa Luxemburg gathered to participate actively in the first general strike of Guayaquil in 1922. In Venezuela, the Women's Cultural Group combated the Gómez dictatorship (1934). This organization, along with the Venezuelan Association of Women, called the first Women's Congress, laying out reforms to the civil code. In Peru, María Jesús Alvarado created the group Women's Evolution in 1915, and in Bolivia the Worker Woman's Federation of Peace was founded.

In Chile, with the inspiration of Belén Sárraga, anarchist and worker women formed the League of Freethinking Women and the Women's Anti-Clerical Center, as well as the Belén Sárraga Women's Centers in the saltpeter (nitrate) towns of the Chilean Pampa. In 1936 the Movement for the Emancipation of Chilean Women was also created, with its own publication, La Mujer Nueva (The New Woman). In its newspaper it criticized discrimination against women in the workplace, the home, and education. Representatives, belonging to the middle classes, used the newspapers to call domestic workers to join the ranks and contribute to the trade union organization.

Out of these women's social organizations arose the first feminist parties, including the Female Republican Party (PRF), Brazil (1910); the National Feminist Party (PNF), Argentina (1919); the Civic Female Party (PCF) in Chile (1922); and the Democratic Female Party (PDF), Uruguay (1937).

As a result of the development of these organized struggles, diverse Latin American countries begin to grant suffrage to women, beginning with Uruguay in 1917, Ecuador in 1929, Cuba in 1934, the Dominican Republic in 1942, Guatemala in 1945, Argentina in 1947, Venezuela in 1947, Chile in 1949 (and since 1935 only in municipal elections), Bolivia in 1952, Mexico in 1953 (although since 1853 in the province of Vélez Santander, a right which was lost temporarily in 1857), and Brazil in 1961.

The Second Wave of Latin American Feminism

After achieving one of the principal demands of the movement, women's suffrage, a period of

"readjustment" took place in the 1950s and 1960s. Feminism resurged in Latin America during the 1970s in the context of a sharp radicalization of social struggles, the leading expressions of which were the Chilean cordones industriales (industrial belts), the Cordobazo civil uprising in Argentina, and the student mobilization in Tlatelolco, Mexico. These set off diverse liberation, urban guerilla, and peasant movements that questioned the imperialist policies of the US and the dictatorships in Latin America, and it was in this atmosphere of emancipation that the hippie movement, sexual liberation, environmentalism, pacifism, and anti-racism were born. Alongside feminism, these are the most important political expressions of the period, giving way to what were later called "new social movements."

In the heat of these emancipation movements, Latin American feminism demanded the abolition of patriarchy as a system of social oppression and the patriarchal structures of power that extend into social relationships. The authoritarianism of the state, parties, education, and even of fellows in the struggle was questioned. Claims were made for free sexuality, the right to abortion, and the choice of sexual orientation. Different forms of violence, as well as the division of labor by gender, were denounced as reinforcing the patriarchal capitalist logic.

However, by the end of the 1970s, the bloody counterrevolutionary offensive in Latin America led to a reconsideration of the practices and discourses of social movements – including the feminist movement – that was reflected above all in the next decade. On the one hand, the establishment of dictatorial regimes in parts of the continent weakened the social movements. This was due not only to the imposition of a conservative and reactionary ideology based on the defense of tradition and the family, but also to state terrorism against civil society – murders, persecution, torture, forced exile, imprisonment, and disappearances. But, on the other hand, the repression of the movements had as a consequence the delineating of new strategies for struggle and resistance, based on the elaboration of a new discourse: the struggle for the defense of human rights. These new movements were to a large extent led by women. Examples include the emblematic Madres de la Plaza de Mayo in Argentina (1977) or the Arpilleristas in Chile (1974).

The year 1975 represented a year of relevant events for the feminist agenda: the World Conference on Women called by the United Nations, and the proclamation of that year as International Women's Year. The inclusion of indisputably feminist demands in the international agenda had important repercussions for the movement's development over the next decades.

During the 1980s the movement again took a new direction thanks to the fall of the dictatorships, the ensuing democratizing attempts, and the movement's proximity to the struggles for human rights. Here they outlined a political repositioning of Latin American feminism in relation to the state, political parties, and social movements. These spaces were then used by the feminist discourse to make public their particular demands, emphasizing the social significance of "being women" through experiences of oppression and inequalities in the social-political arena, and revealing the public character of the subordination of women in private environments. This discourse generated new categories of analysis, and it even proposed a new political language that at the end of the 1980s took a place at the center of democratization debates: domestic violence, sexual harassment, the feminization of poverty, sex work, the "double day," and health and reproductive rights, among others. Thereby a need was acknowledged for creating proper places for meeting and articulating the discourse and lines of action, giving way, from 1981 on, to the Latin American and Caribbean Feminist Meetings.

However, it was also in this context of the expansion of the movement in which a split occurred over the debate between autonomy and the danger of institutionalization and co-optation. These two sides marked the development of feminism in the 1990s. Also, as to be expected of any movement that grows and diversifies, splits, affiliations, and differences between feminists began to become more and more evident, translating into sometimes contradictory conceptions about the relationship between theory, ideology, and the practice of feminism as a political movement.

Essential in this debate was the critique made by black, indigenous, and lesbian women, who questioned the idea of homogeneity, demanding the inclusion in the Latin American feminist discourse of other relationships of subordination, such as those of class, ethnicity, "race," sexual orientation, and what results from their intersection. They also criticized the relations of power existing within the movement, interrogating the classist, racist, and homophobic behavior of some white/mestizo, upper-middle-class heterosexual feminists.

The 1980s closed at the meeting in Taxco (1987) with a profound reflection on the state and direction of the movement. A document of important repercussions laid out the political line of Latin American feminism and listed a number of impediments faced by feminists. For one thing, feminists were not interested in power, and they had a different approach to politics. Despite differences among feminists, the document argued that all feminists were equal and encouraged the recognition of a natural unity among women. Other problems included the fact that feminism only existed as a policy of women for women and that their numbers were small. It also pointed out that the personal is automatically political and that consensus is democracy.

Latin American Feminism between Neoliberalism, Autonomy, and Diversity

In the 1990s, processes of globalization, its neoliberal policies, its negative repercussions, and its promises – economically, politically, and socio-culturally – produced new quandaries for social movements. Particularly for Latin American feminism, globalization's effects were contradictory. On the one hand, the United Nations summits and international conferences dealing with issues relevant to the discussion of democracy opened up global spaces of debate in which women's issues took on importance. At the same time, international organisms like the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund (IMF), and multinational corporations began to set aside funds for the "development of the Third World," where they established and prioritized their own ideas of work, as well as involved social actors in their logic of problem solving in the face of worsening poverty and social inequalities in the region – the consequence of the application of their own neoliberal recipes. The non-governmental organizations (NGOs) were the executors of their specialized projects.

On the other hand, new social movements arose as a consequence of still unhealed democratic transitions, "development" projects that stripped disadvantaged social groups of civil, social, and cultural rights. Here women saw themselves especially affected, due to the intersection of their multiple affiliations (class, ethnicity, and race). In these resistance movements against the “democratizing,” neoliberal logic, black, indigenous, and worker women took on central roles, bringing their experience to the feminist platform and vice versa.

For example, in January 1994, in the face of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) between the US, Canada, and Mexico, the EZLN Zapatista indigenous group emerged, disrupting the narrative of democracy and development and showing up neoliberal policy’s character of exclusion with the symbolic “ya basta!” (enough!). In the EZLN, indigenous women were not only protagonists, represented by Comandante Ramona, the “arm and heart” of Zapatism, but they also promulgated their own laws: the Zapatista Women’s Revolutionary Law. The EZLN reincorporated elements central to feminist discourse, emphasizing the critique of vertical power resulting from subordination, the valuing of differences that do not necessarily imply inequality, and the practice of solidarity so discredited in patriarchal political language and activity. The mutual influence between neo-Zapatism and the Latin American feminist movement is indisputable.

However, it is in this situation that the split between “official” and “autonomous” feminists, present since the 1980s, became evident. Tired of marginalization, parts of feminism that enjoy recognition, knowledge, and a political history in the struggle for women’s rights claimed themselves as experts. They opted to use institutional spaces with funds administered through NGOs, to insert claims in the name, category, perspective, or focal point of gender from the Anglo-Saxon discourse. Another part of feminism criticizes this posture, arguing that there is a loss of autonomy and of the political character of feminism through its “institutionalization” and “NGO-ization.” This splitting into sides did not manage to break up the Latin American feminist movement, but instead generated debate that led both currents to recognize one another and reposition themselves. Bases were laid down for facing new challenges at the beginning of the new century, where the movement’s influence on new important struggles and political practices in the region is undeniable.

Latin American and Caribbean Feminist Meetings (1981–Present)

The Latin American and Caribbean Feminist Meetings are stages for meeting, reflection, dialogue, debate, criticism, controversy, and the formation of coalitions between the distinct lines of thought in the region. Through them, Latin American feminism goes on to weave networks of collective action, define dates of common struggles, and affirm transnational ties to address issues that transversally affect women. In them November 25 was proclaimed as the Latin American Day against Violence toward Women, and September 28 as the Day of the Fight for the Legalization of Abortion. These meetings are a privileged space for carrying out key discussions on feminism in the region, covering such issues as the relationship of feminism with social movements; globalization, social exclusion, and gender justice; the inclusion in the feminist discourse of critique made by young women, indigenous women, lesbians, and women of African descent; the relationship of feminism with the state, political parties, and international organisms; autonomy and institutionalization, financing and representation; and democracy. One major victory of the movement was achieved in Mexico in 2007, when the legalization of abortion was achieved after decades of struggle, mobilization, information campaigns, marches, disputes, and the discrediting of feminism and feminists by the conservative right (PAN) and the Catholic Church. Abortion is currently between the first and third cause of death of women in Latin America, so its legalization in Mexico City was a triumph for the Latin American feminist movement.

Latin American Feminism: Recent, Western, White, and Bourgeois?

Today, the Latin American feminist movement brings together many tendencies, orientations, and discourses that join together, take a stance, and ally with one another in their diversity. And it is precisely this feminist diversity – constructed by different trajectories, political projects, contradictions, by the participation of women from the multiplicity of their alliances, whether they be of class, ethnicity, race, or sexual orientation, and their capacity to struggle to insert themselves in different arenas, whether they be social organizations, parties, unions, institutions, and/or academic discourses, among others – that makes Latin American feminism a women's political movement that is wide-ranging, diverse, and anti-establishment, and that has a reciprocal reflection in movements and social events emerging at the beginning of the twenty-first century in the region.

SEE ALSO: Casa del Obrero Mundial; Cordobazo and Rosarizao Uprising, 1969; Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959; Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo; Madres de la Plaza de Mayo; Magón, Ricardo Flores (1874–1922) and the Magonistas; Mexican Revolution of 1910–1921; Tlatelolco 1968 and the Mexican Student Movement; Women's Movement, Cuba; Women's Movement, Venezuela; Zapatismo; Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas Uprising

References and Suggested Readings

- Bedregal, X. (2002) Los encuentros Feministas: Lilith y el todo poder UNO. Available at www.creatividad-feminista.org (downloaded December 12, 2007).
- CIMAC (2003) Hacedoras de la historia. Impulso Consuelo Zavala el primer Congreso Feminista. Available at www.cimacnoticias.com/noticias/03sep/s03090204.html (downloaded June 20, 2008).
- Carneiro, S. (2005) Ennegrecer al feminismo. In Feminismos Disidentes en América Latina y El Caribe. Nouvelles Questions Feministas 24 (2).
- Chomsky, A. et al. (2003) The Cuba Reader: History, Culture, Politics. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Curiel, O. (2007) Los aportes de las afrodescendientes a la teoría y la práctica feminista. Desuniversalizando el sujeto "Mujeres." In Perfiles del Feminismo Iberoamericano, Vol. 3. Buenos Aires.
- D'Atri, A. (2004) Entre la insolencia de las luchas populares y la medida de su institucionalización. Luchas de clases 2 (April). Buenos Aires.
- Fernandes, S. (2005) Transnationalism and Feminist Activism in Cuba: The Case of Magin. Politics and Gender 1, 3 (September).
- Gargallo, F. (2006) Ideas feministas latinoamericanas. Caracas, Venezuela: El Perro y La Rana.
- Haney, R. (2005) Celia Sanchez: The Legend of Cuba's Revolutionary Heart. New York: Algora.
- Hernández, B. (1996) Feminismos, las jóvenes y horizontes. LUNATIKA 1: 14–15.
- MacLean, B. (2003) Haydee Santamaria. Melbourne: Ocean Press.
- Pisano, M. (1997) Ponencia en el VII Encuentro Feminista Latinoamericano y del Caribe. Cartagena, Chile: Edición de la Comisión Organizadora.
- Randall, M. (1974) Cuban Women Now. Toronto: Women's Press.
- Rodriguez Calderon, M. (1995) Recovering the History of Women. In Cuba Update (June). New York: Center for Cuban Studies.
- Stoner, K. L. (1991) From the House to the Streets: The Cuban Women's Movement for Legal Reform 1898–1940. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Vitale, L. (1987) La mitad invisible de la historia latinoamericana. Buenos Aires: Planeta.
- Vitale, L. (n.d.) El movimiento Feminista Latinoamericano del siglo XX. Available at www.clasecontraclase.cl/generoHistoria2.php?id=20 (downloaded May 27, 2008).
- Weisman, J. (2004) The Continuing Revolution. In M. Azicri & E. Deal (Eds.), Cuban Socialism in a New Century: Adversity, Survival and Renewal. Gainesville: University Press of Florida.

Women's movement, Southern Africa

Lorna Lueker Zukas

Women have always been involved in – and often led – struggles for self-determination and freedom in Southern Africa. Oral histories from indigenous sovereign states of pre-colonial Southern Africa, archival records from the colonial period, and ongoing activism in the current nation-states of Southern Africa (Angola, Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, Namibia, South Africa, Swaziland, Zambia, and Zimbabwe) provide ample evidence of the existence of women's movements and women's resistance to colonialism, racism, and gender oppression.

Early Women Leaders

Women in pre-colonial Southern Africa were activists and leaders and not, as they have often been characterized, peripheral members of their societies. While one cannot generalize about the nature of women's positions for all of Southern Africa, one can say that women were fierce fighters, leaders in resistance movements, and rulers among their people. Women struggled for justice in myriad ways. Some struggles have become legendary, while others have become only distant memories, but all were significant moments of revolution and protest. Women leaders were found among Khoi, Sotho, and Venda speakers and the Lovedu, who ritually passed leadership from mothers to daughters. Zulu royal women were influential in state affairs as advisors and decision-makers.

Recorded histories of women leaders in Southern Africa date from the sixteenth century.

This portrait by late seventeenth-century artist Giovanni Antonio Cavazzi shows Queen Nzinga of the Ndongo and Matamba Kingdoms in southwestern Africa meeting with the Portuguese governor in 1624. Nzinga, known as a warrior queen, was determined to oppose Portuguese dominance of her country (present-day Angola). After observing that the only seat in the room belonged to the governor, she summoned a woman, who fell on her hands and knees in what became Nzinga's "seat." (Courtesy of the John Carter Brown Library at Brown University)

Queen Nzinga M' Bandi (ca. 1581–1663) of Angola flourished in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. She led a powerful guerilla army which repulsed Portuguese colonization during her lifetime. She joined and broke alliances with the Dutch and Portuguese to protect her rule and her people as it suited her. She offered freedom and protection to individuals running away from slave traders. She conquered the Matamba and fought African leaders involved in slavery. She actively appointed women as war leaders, council advisors, and members of her fighting forces. In the seventeenth century Chieftainess Hoho (d. ca. 1750) of the Khoikhoi and Chieftainess Kaipkire (b.-d. unknown) of the Herero both led their people in struggles for freedom. Mmanthatisi of the Sotho (ca. 1781–1835), ruling for her young son, led her people out of defeat and became a respected warrior. As the chieftainess of the Tlokwa tribe during a time of vast social and political change in Southern Africa (a period in the early nineteenth century of severe drought and warfare often referred to as the Difaqane, Mfecane, or Lifaqane), she led a fighting force of 25,000 warriors. In 1896–7 the Shona and Ndebele peoples of Zimbabwe collaborated in the first Chimurenga, a war against white invaders. The Shona were led by a spirit medium named Nehanda Nyakasikana (1862–98). She helped organize the combined resistance effort and instructed that her people should touch nothing that belonged to the white man. Nehanda was captured and sentenced to death in 1898. She remained important not only for her part in the rebellion, but for her prophecy mapfupa angu achamuka: my bones will rise to win back freedom. Her legend inspired women sixty years later to participate in the 1966–80 liberation war in Zimbabwe.

Colonial Struggles and Women's Movements, 1900–1970

Clearly, the legacy of women leaders in Southern Africa laid the groundwork for women's participation in twentieth-century movements against colonialism, imperialism, and apartheid. During the colonial period traditional spaces of power for women were erased by western and Christian ideas which reshaped African cultural landscapes. European hegemony and notions of patriarchy worked to redefine African women as docile creatures, with desire only to provide a home, children, and labor power to men. While forced by circumstance into domestic and reproductive roles, women did not settle in the space created for them by European and African men.

Women's movements in the twentieth century centered on struggles for and commitments to family, self, ethnic group, and nation. Women's struggles for emancipation took place more often in local arenas than on national stages. Women's struggles for power and voice incorporated upper-class women and rural women who had little to struggle with but their hearts and minds. Women protested when there was not enough food, when their children suffered, or their livelihood or families were threatened. Rural women who were de facto heads of households when husbands migrated to work in the mines or on agricultural plantations formed peasant societies, joined churches and welfare societies, and created self-help associations to enable them to meet their family, religious, cultural, and political obligations and fulfill their productive and reproductive roles. Organizations such as the ANC Women's League, the Association of Women's Clubs in Zimbabwe, and the YWCA were used to defend women's interests throughout the twentieth century.

Women's movements engaged issues directly relevant and pressing to women's daily lives. They organized campaigns to bring domestic oppression to light and stop it. For example, in 1904 Namibian women organized a sexual intercourse strike and refused to bear children following the German genocide of the Herero people. Women understood this as an active measure to help end German occupation of their lands. In subsequent years, under South African occupation, Namibian women organized against working for whites; they only worked for whites if they could not earn a living any other way. In 1936, 60 Herero women protested to the superintendent of the Waterberg East Native Reserve that colonialism was ruining their families. They demanded support to end alcoholism, encourage marriage, and prevent sexual promiscuity and the birth of illegitimate children – all problems they believed resulted from colonialism. In 1955 women participated in the BaHerero anti-Lutheran Church revolt and helped found the Oruano Independent Church. In 1959 Namibian women under the leadership a fierce militant woman named Kakurukaze Mungunda (d. 1959) of the South West African National Union participated in a mass demonstration to protest South Africa's forceful land confiscation policy in Windhoek. South African forces opened fire, killing 12 people, including Mungunda, and injuring 54 more. In honor of Kakurukaze Mungunda, December 10 is celebrated as Women's Day in Namibia. In 1908 the Indian Women's Association formed in South Africa to protest Act 17 of 1895 which required that all non-indentured Indians pay £3 per year to purchase residence licenses or return to India. Women added their voice to the ongoing protests and published several petitions in the African Chronicle. The Indian Women's Association helped organize the fourth Passive Resistance Campaign which culminated in the multiracial march on Pretoria in 1956. The group continues to exist today as the Durban Indian Women's Association.

Women's activism in South Africa is best known for mass organized anti-pass protests. The first occurred in Bloemfontein in 1894 when women signed petitions against pass laws. In 1898 the Association of Women of the Household and the Location Women wrote letters protesting passbooks. In the Orange Free State the passage of Law 8.2 in 1893 extended influx control legislation to women by requiring that they carry passes and take up domestic work in order to remain in urban areas. In 1912 native and colored women of the Province of the Orange Free State organized a women's association to protest against women carrying passes. More than 5,000 women, of all classes and colors, signed the petition. Women's resistance grew in 1913 when the enforcement of pass laws increased; 80 women were arrested when they publically burned their passes. The following day 600 women turned out in support of those arrested and shouted demands to end pass laws. In 1914 the government relaxed the laws towards women and the resistance ended. In 1918, with the reintroduction of pass laws, the Bantu Women's League was founded under the leadership of Charlotte Maxeke (1874–1939). An active women's movement again curtailed pass laws in 1919. The Bantu Women's League became the African National Congress Women's League in 1948 and again aggressively protested pass laws in the 1950s. In 1955, 2,000 women participated in a demonstration. Then on August 9, 1956 Lilian Ngoyi (1911–80), a longtime trade unionist, led a march of 20,000 women in Pretoria to deliver a petition against passes to the prime minister. This was the largest of the anti-pass protests and it was made possible by the collective action of multiple organizations. As a result, August 9 is now known as Women's Day. Ngoyi eventually became president of the African National Congress's Women's League (ANCWL) and she was the first woman to join the National Executive Committee of the African National Congress (ANC). To provide women with greater power and voice she helped to found (with Hilda Watts Bernstein, Ray Alexander, Frances Baard, Ida Mtwana, Josie Palmer, Helen Joseph, Dorothy Nyembe, and Amina Cachalia) the Federation of South African Women, a non-racial group determined to end apartheid and create racial and sexual equality in society. Ngoyi also advocated within the international women's movement to create solidarity for all women engaged in liberation struggles around the world.

Women's activism in colonial Southern Africa included published letters to newspapers and petitions presented to colonial administrators seeking justice for themselves and their families; when this failed they marched and demonstrated against government policies. They were active in trade union organizing, became active in underground organizing for revolutionary nationalist movements and, finally, when peaceful means of protest failed, women were trained as guerilla warfare and became freedom fighters in national liberation struggles.

Women in Pre- and Post-Independence Movements

The era of European conquest and colonization in Africa altered women's forms of leadership and protest styles, but women never ceased organizing resistance to tyranny. In the second half of the twentieth century women joined revolutionary struggles to overthrow colonial and settler regimes and to protest patriarchy and gender oppression imposed upon them under the guise of "tradition." Women stepped easily into the roles of their pre-colonial ancestors. Women resisted the oppression of racially based, gendered societies where most benefits went to whites and men. Despite banning, imprisonment, and banishment women struggled for national and personal liberation. Women struggled because their men were jailed and their children were ill, hungry, or hurt, and they were surrounded by poverty. Mamphela Ramphele (b. 1947) exemplifies the women's movement in Southern Africa in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. Early in her life she refused to let racism, sexism, or classism define her opportunities or goals. She did not accept conventional ideals of women's roles, especially those for black women in apartheid South Africa. Ramphele joined the South African Student Organization at the University of Natal and actively participated in the Black Consciousness movement. She organized other black students, helped operate a clinic for low-income black families and, after leaving the university, continued her social justice and women's activist work. She started a daycare center, a literacy project, and a communal vegetable garden. Breaking new ground, she joined the anthropology department at the University of Cape Town, where she earned a PhD. She insisted on writing on patriarchy and introducing gender analysis into her work. In 1996 Ramphele became a vice chancellor at the University of Cape Town and developed programs not only for racial equality, but also for gender and class equality.

Elsewhere in Southern Africa women were active revolutionaries. In Zimbabwe's liberation struggle thousands of women joined the fighting forces. The Zimbabwe African National Liberation Army (ZANLA) included 1,500–2,000 female combatants, while 7,000–10,000 women supported the struggle from refugee camps. The Women's Brigade of the Zimbabwe People's Revolutionary Army (ZIPRA) constituted about 10 percent of ZIPRA's soldiers. The women's movement was strong in this liberation struggle; women in urban areas gave money to buy provisions for the struggle and they organized and led mass demonstrations to voice African concerns about inequality. Moreover, rural women cooked food and washed clothes, and transported these items and military supplies to the guerilla armies. These women were in large measure responsible for the success of the Zimbabwe liberation struggle.

Women also worked actively outside of the country, bringing international attention to the plight of the African population in Rhodesia under the white settler regime. Zimbabwean women were commanders of refugee and training camps in Zambia and Mozambique. Many women traveled to the United States, England, the former Soviet Union, and other Eastern bloc countries to receive political and educational training in order to develop skills necessary to run the country at independence. Margaret Dongo (b. 1960), one such ex-combatant and former member of parliament, continued her struggle for equity in Zimbabwe. After independence, when the Zimbabwe African National Union-Patriotic Front (ZANU-PF) party failed to uphold the promises of the liberation struggle, Dongo spoke out. In the 1995 general election she lost her seat in parliament. She accused ZANU-PF of vote-rigging and the registrar general's office of incompetence. She took the matter to court and won. She regained her seat in parliament as an Independent. A dynamic, intelligent ex-combatant, she refused to bow to the ZANU-PF hierarchy or be silenced on issues that matter. Dongo started the Zimbabwe War Veterans Association and she began rural cooperatives to provide education and income-generating projects for women.

Namibian women also actively participated in their country's struggle for independence. In 1960 the South West African People's Organization (SWAPO) was officially constituted and it developed both legal and extra-legal resistance movements. Urban women under the leadership of Lucia Hamutenya, Getrude Kandanga, Nora Chase, Martha Ford, Pendukeni Ithana, Libertine Amathila, Ida Jimmy, Rauna Nambinga, Maria Kapere, and Ida Hoffman held mass demonstrations and political rallies, participated in bus and beer hall boycotts, and supported the liberation struggle in myriad ways. In 1969 the SWAPO Women's Council was formed in exile and members worked to support the struggle from outside the country. Since independence, the Namibia women's movement has worked to engage women as a political force for social transformation.

In Angola women joined the liberation struggle in 1962 with the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola's (MPLA) formation of the Organization of Angolan Women (OMA). Women received military training and took part in the guerilla struggle; the women's movement quickly demanded literacy training, job skills, and political positions for women on village committees. Deolinda Rodrigues and Helena de Almeida, along with Ruth Neto and Ruth Lara, laid the groundwork for women's active involvement in political work after independence. Women's Day in Angola (March 2) marks the day five female combatants were slaughtered by the Front for the National Liberation of Angola (FNLA).

Not all peoples in Southern Africa were forced to wage armed struggle to obtain independence. Botswana gained independence in 1966 peacefully. Botswana created a Women's Affairs Department as part of the government and the main opposition party also has an active women's wing, the Botswana National Front (BNF) Women's League. But outside the political parties, Botswana women formed a coalition of groups (trade unions, non-governmental associations, women's civic and professional associations) to constitute the women's movement. The Emang Basadi Women's Association (EB) is perhaps the best recognized. Since the 1980s women have moved into waged employment, gained university educations, and taken up professional and political positions. The equal rights of women workers are firmly entrenched in the political landscape.

Women's wings in the nationalist movements and seemingly innocuous women's groups and associations, social service and civil groups, mothers' clubs, and income-generating and market women's associations often worked to support nationalist struggles. Women's participation in armed struggles and other forms of resistance formed a critical part of the women's movement in Southern Africa in the late twentieth century and in the construction of gender identities and relationships within the state and civil society of post-colonial Africa. In the opening decade of the twenty-first century the women's movement in Southern Africa actively promoted economic, social, and political equality for women; women's organizations such as the Women and Law in Southern Africa Research Trust engaged in cross-border activism to combat gender oppression. Women once again have political and customary leadership roles. Legislation granting women majority status, equal pay, and family leave benefits has been passed in many nations, while in rural areas women gained access to agricultural extension services and women's groups openly discussed domestic violence, rape, and the need for education and healthcare reforms. Notions of freedom and self-determination bind women from ruling families in pre-colonial Southern Africa to women in early colonial and labor struggles, to women in anti-colonial struggles and guerilla movements, and to the women who served in politburos and new parliaments, and accepted posts as cabinet ministers and in civil service. The threads of solidarity can be traced in women's multiple and varied experiences and in their evolving political and activist consciousness.

SEE ALSO: South Africa, African Nationalism and the ANC; Women and National Liberation in Africa

References and Suggested Readings

- Brickhill, J. (1995) Daring to Storm the Heavens: The Military Strategy of ZAPU, 1976–79. In N. Bhebe & T. Ranger (Eds.), Soliders in Zimbabwe's Liberation War. Portsmouth, NH: Heinemann.
- Coquery-Vidrovitch, C. (1997) African Women: A Modern History. Trans. B. G. Raps. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Daymond, J. M., Driver, D., Meintjes, S., Molema, L., Musengezi, C., Orford, M., & Rasebotsa N. (Eds.) (2003) Women Writing Africa: The Southern Region. New York: Feminist Press.
- Geisler, G. G. (2004) Women and the Remaking of Politics in Southern Africa: Negotiating Autonomy, Incorporation and Representation. Uppsala: Nordic African Institute.
- Lapchick, R. E. & Urdang, S. (Eds.) (1992) Oppression and Resistance: The Struggle of Women in Southern Africa. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.

- Lueker, L. L. (1998) Women, War and Social Change: The Challenge of Independence in Zimbabwe. PhD dissertation, University of California, San Diego.
- Quanta, C. N. (1987) Outstanding African Women, 1500 BC–1900 AD. In C. Quanta (Ed.), Women in Southern Africa. London: Allison & Busby.
- Scott, C. V. (1994) Men in our Country Behave Like Chiefs. In M. Tétreault (Ed.), Women and Revolution in Africa, Asia, and the New World. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.
- Van Allen, J. (2001) Women's Rights Movements as a Measure of African Democracy. In S. N. Ndegwa (Ed.), A Decade of Democracy. Leiden: Brill.
- Weir, J. (2007) Chiefly Women and Women's Leadership in Pre-Colonial Southern Africa. In N. Gasa (Ed.), Women in South African History. Cape Town: Human Sciences Research Council Press.
- Weiss, R. (1986) The Women of Zimbabwe. London: Kesho.

Women's movement, Soviet Union

Soma Marik

Women played a number of significant roles in the Soviet Union. They participated politically, fought in the revolution itself, and pushed for their own rights in areas such as reproduction and sexual liberation. They also took part in resisting the counterrevolution.

Political Efforts

Shortly after the October Revolution, the Conference of Working Women of the Petrograd Region was organized to mobilize women's support for the elections to the Constituent Assembly. Planned by Aleksandra Kollontai and Konkordiya Samoilova, two Bolshevik women, the conference brought together 500 delegates representing 80,000 Petrograd women workers, as well as a few people from Moscow, Ivanovo-Vozhenesnsk, Tula, and Kaluga. This meeting also heard a non-Bolshevik, Dr. Doroshevskaya, of the separatist feminist League for Women's Equality. The conference passed a resolution calling for the establishment of a fund administered by soviets with substantial democratic participation by proletarian women, so that women would play a guiding role in the institutions that emancipated them. Yakov Sverdlov, head of the Party Secretariat, chairperson of the Central Executive Committee of the Soviets, and husband of a politically active communist, K. T. Novgorodtseva-Sverdlova, was sensitive to women's subordinate status. So he became a strong ally of the communist women involved in organizing women. Lenin, too, felt that the revolution needed women's support in order to succeed. Despite accusations of separatism, this support and the party's need to mobilize masses enabled the Bolshevichki (Old Bolshevik Women) to press forward. They organized the First All-Russian Congress of Worker and Peasant Women (November 1918), though some leaders, like Zinoviev and Rykov, were unwilling to endorse such a nonparty women's congress. Creation of a provisional bureau and the tireless work by the women resulted in an unexpectedly large turnout of over 1,000 elected delegates. The important programmatic issues raised in the congress included opposition to domestic slavery, double standards of morality, protection of women's labor and maternity, abolition of prostitution, and drawing women into party and state activities.

Following the congress the provisional women's bureau became the Central Commission for Agitation and Propaganda among Working Women, an official institution attached to the Central Committee (CC) of the Bolshevik Party. Later in 1919, the commission was upgraded by being reorganized into the Zhenskii Otdel (Women's Section – Zhenotdel) of the CC with Inessa Armand as its first director. Armand had been involved in organizing the 1918 Congress as Kollontai and had delivered two of the major reports there. The effective organizational technique used by the Zhenotdel had emanated from Armand, who had proposed that the congress delegates should report back in women's meetings in order to disseminate the significance of the congress decisions to other women. In the Zhenotdel Armand and Samoilova took this up and suggested that women entering soviet or trade union work should periodically report back to local meetings on their experiences, thereby increasing awareness among women and attracting others to public activity. The Zhenotdel, along with the Evseksiia (Jewish Section), breached the sexual, ethnic, and organizational unity of the party in an effort to reach and mobilize an otherwise inaccessible constituency, thereby giving women autonomy.

The Zhenotdel work was based on three levels into which any party work was usually classified:

propaganda, agitation, and mobilization. Rabotnitsa remained the central organ, and Kommunistika became the theoretical journal. In 1921 Kommunistika had a print run of 30,000, suggesting a considerable growth of women activists. A number of other journals came into existence at different stages, aimed at different groups of women. But printed propaganda was not enough. Agitational techniques included face-to-face discussions and delegate meetings. Organizing delegate elections was difficult work, especially in the countryside.

The death of Inessa Armand in 1920 led to Kollontai's being given charge of Zhenotdel. Particularly important was her work in organizing among the women of Caucasia, the Volga, and Central Asia, often involving campaigns against the control exercised by religion over women (both Islam and Christianity) and the veil. This was viewed as a serious obstacle to mobilizing women and fighting for women's equality. On one occasion there was the dramatic gesture of Muslim women mounting the podium and taking off the veil. Hundreds, and later on thousands, of women worked their way into the Zhenotdels in these regions, ignoring ferocious male hostility. But Kollontai's role as a leader of the Workers' Opposition, a faction that demanded the immediate restoration of working-class democracy and opposed the introduction of the market-linked New Economic Policy, resulted in her removal from her position in 1922. Sofia Smidovich followed Kollontai, to be followed by two proletarian women, Klavdia Nikolaeva (a Zinovievist for a brief while in 1925–6) and Aleksandra Artiukhina (1927–30). Zhenotdel organized masses of women. It raised issues that went beyond suffrage, such as the social and economic rights of women. The shutting down of Zhenotdel in 1930, as a part of the Stalinist counterrevolution, meant that henceforth, decisions concerning women, whether good or bad, would overwhelmingly be taken by male policy-makers, and by an increasingly bureaucratic state, rather than by women themselves.

Revolution and Liberation

Complete civil, legal, and electoral equality was decreed for women in January 1918, and subsequently incorporated into the Constitution adopted a few months later. Six weeks after the revolution, civil marriage replaced the rule of the church, and before a year was out the marriage code was produced. This proclaimed full equality of husband and wife and abolished the concept of illegitimacy. The Family Code, by exclusively recognizing civil marriage, broke the historic monopoly powers of the church to sanctify marriages. It invalidated the old code with its language of domination by allowing freedom in choosing which surname to use, and by forbidding spousal control in business, friends, correspondence, and residence. Given the extremely limited forms of contraception available in Russia at that time, abortion was made legal in 1920, ensuring maximum safety for women since the Bolsheviks thought that some limitation on family size was necessary for women's emancipation to be meaningful.

Women played a significant role in political struggles, including the Civil War. Though relatively few women actually fought in the army, in 1920 there were at least 73,858 women combatants, of whom 1,854 became casualties. Women were also active partisan fighters and paid for it when caught, as in the case of the women in Yakutsk who were frozen alive by their captors. A number of women also worked in the Cheka (Extraordinary Commission to Combat Counter-Revolution), though stories of atrocities committed by them come only from extreme anti-Bolshevik and anti-Semitic sources.

Sexual Liberation

Kollontai also played a significant role in the movement for sexual liberation by insisting that love-life and sex should not be central to a woman's life. She faced frankly the likelihood that, freed from economic concerns and family responsibility, marriages might be less stable and could take the form of comradely but short-lived relationships. She believed that women should learn to view love and the emotions within family relationships in the same way as men – as only one part of their total existence instead of the most important part of life.

Kollontai had no clear political explanation as to why comradely love or emotional attachment between equals would be of short duration. Perhaps she expected that the new women, in the interests of personal liberation, could not permit themselves to be entangled irrevocably in love for one man. In her essay "Make Way for Winged Eros," and in the stories collected as The Love of Worker Bees (1923), she suggested that the proletariat would evolve its own morality as an enriching experience of emotional and physical eroticism that would take the place of a universal sexual code. She did, however, believe in the natural function of motherhood. She also believed that society had an obligation to help mothers raise their children.

In some ways Kollontai's views were out of touch with reality. In urban Russia in the 1920s there was a sharp lowering of the age of sexual activity, which also involved callousness towards women and unwanted pregnancies. Equality also brought new problems. Some couples had to live apart, either for lack of space or because of circumstances such as jobs and educational plans. Women activists also enraged many husbands. But the laws, and the existence of the Zhenotdel, also meant the ability of women to resist marital coercion.

The major problem, however, was soon perceived to be the way equality had been imagined. Marriage could be dissolved on the spot by mutual consent, or by a brief court hearing if sought by a single claimant. By abolishing the concept of guilt and the humiliations associated with divorce, full freedom of divorce had been established. In 1925–6, when a revised Family Code was being drafted, it was decided to simplify divorce even further. De facto marriages, which were given equal status, could also have a registered divorce. But simplified divorce seemed to have facilitated irresponsibility among men; women were either being deserted or betrayed. The poverty of the country meant that alimony or support for children was very limited.

The Family Code was publicly debated and redrafted several times. Peasants opposed the new code on the basis that it would undermine the household's economic stability, and women's groups generally opposed the code on moral grounds. Protectionists believed that marriage and the family were important while the means of production were not yet socialized, and progressive jurists argued that the new laws were there to protect women and not the traditional family. But the pressure of social groups, notably the peasantry, as well as concerns about deserted women, combined to compel a step back. In addition, a very conservative strain surfaced within the party and upper layers of administration, exemplified by Aron Zalkind of the Society of Marxist Psycho-neurologists, who argued that the sole legitimate function of sex was the reproduction of children.

In this connection it is necessary to stress that within Bolshevism there were different positions on women. For Vladimir Ilyich Lenin (1870–1924), any talk about sexuality was irrelevant or a move away from really serious work. For many on the left wing, like Leon Trotsky (1879–1940) and Evgenii Aleksevich Preobrazhenskii (1886–1937), the struggle against bureaucracy and social progress included greater rights for women. But the majority of party members were men, and they held the average woman, if not in contempt, at least in lesser esteem, shown by the lack of women at the top-most levels of state and party leadership.

Counterrevolution

The revolution was followed by a bloody civil war and imperialist intervention, resulting in the collapse of soviet democracy as well as a breakdown of economic structures. It also meant the death and annihilation of much of the politically alert section of the working class and the transformation of the rest often into administrators. Through the middle 1920s, battle had raged in the Soviet Union. A bureaucratic layer had developed, and it found in Joseph Stalin (1878–1953) a leader who could enable it to seize power while hiding behind the mask of the revolution. With the consolidation of Stalin's victory in 1929 came a partial counterrevolution, a political regression of immense dimensions, even though capitalism was not restored.

One dimension of this bureaucratic counterrevolution was a massive retreat from gender equality. It established a conservative regime in certain ways, while preserving some of the gains of the revolution. Industrialization and forced collectivization transformed the Soviet Union between 1928 and 1940, as the number of female workers and employees rose from 24 percent to 39 percent of the total workforce. Though this was portrayed as the foundation of women's liberation, in fact it created a double burden. The pattern of industrialization, with a focus on heavy industry and a total neglect of housing, consumer goods, and services, was of no help to the women workers and peasants. Nevertheless, the reversal in Soviet family policy by the mid-1930s was not primarily the result of Russia's backward economy, or the lack of state facilities

(many more childcare centers and communal dining halls were set up in the early 1930s). The turnabout was primarily due to the ideological shift which went hand in hand with Stalin's reactionary policies in other areas.

The new rulers found the family a useful institution. It provided domestic work and childcare with no financial burden for the state. Motherhood became a regular propaganda theme. In 1934 homosexuality was made a criminal offense. In 1936 legal abortion was abolished except where life or health was endangered. Divorce was made increasingly difficult and cumbersome by imposing stiff fees and restoring much power to the courts. The effect was to make people avoid going to court and simply separating and even starting new de facto families. To combat this, sexual freedom was virulently attacked. De facto marriages were made adulterous and their progeny were declared illegitimate. Children born after July 8, 1944 could not claim the patronymic, the surname, or the inheritance of their biological father. In 1943 co-education was abolished. The construction of a new image of women was shown clearly in the manner in which the unemployed wives of the privileged members of society were positively evaluated.

Despite Stalinism, there remained some gains. By the end of the Second Five Year Plan (1937) the number of employed women had tripled since 1927. By the end of the 1960s women made up over half the workforce. Over 80 percent of able-bodied women were employed. A wide range and variety of occupations were open to Soviet women. Women often received technical education of a high order. Equal wages for equal work was enforced for the most part but modified by the informal but pervasive system of occupational segregation, so that women were pushed into relatively low-paying and low-status occupations with a gender gap in incomes. Equal educational opportunity was not very successful, though compared to many countries it looked bright. But much of the gain was achieved at the high price of double burdens. The state never took up public responsibilities of the kind envisaged by Lenin or Kollontai.

An economy of full employment and public healthcare and education meant a great deal of advantage, particularly for the most underprivileged. The overthrow of the bureaucratized workers' state and the restoration of capitalism resulted in the loss of remaining gains. To give one example, in 2001 women's life expectancy had fallen to 71.8, and in 2006 it has been estimated to be 64.

SEE ALSO: Kollontai, Alexandra (1872–1952); Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Russian Civil War, 1918–1924

References and Suggested Readings

- Clements, B. E. (1997) Bolshevik Women. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Cliff, T. (1987) Class Struggle and Women's Liberation: 1640 to the Present Day. London: Bookmarks.
- Elwood, R. C. (1992) Inessa Armand: Revolutionary and Feminist. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Farnsworth, B. (1980) Aleksandra Kollontai, Socialism, Feminism and the Bolshevik Revolution. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Goldman, W. Z. (1993) Women, the State and Revolution: Soviet Family Policy and Social Life, 1917–1936. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kollontai, A. (1971) Communism and the Family. Sydney: D. B. Young.
- Lapidus, G. W. (1978) Women in Soviet Society: Equality, Development and Social Change. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Stites, R. (1978) The Women's Liberation Movement in Russia: Feminism, Nihilism, and Bolshevism 1860–1930. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Women's movement, Spain

Pedro García Guirao

Despite the existence of distinctive female personalities and individual interventions on behalf of women, feminism – understood as a mass movement – remained a rarity in Spain until April 14, 1931; that is, until the proclamation of the Second Republic. For feminism to triumph, two things were necessary: first, the popularization of the ideas represented by the French Revolution, and second, the Industrial Revolution. Neither of these two prerequisites existed in Spain until the Second Republic and the country remained in the grip of conservative Catholicism, without anything resembling the Industrial Revolution that was happening in the rest of Europe.

María de Zayas Sotomayor (1590–1661?) is often considered as the first Spanish “feminist” and female novelist. The heroines of her works are women who, in the social sphere, are capable of gaining access to education. In the private sphere, they are framed in the picaresque, with a certain degree of sexual freedom typical of the aristocracy, which enabled the author to attack concepts deeply rooted in the Spanish mentality, such as "honor" and "virtue." Even though María de Zayas Sotomayor was translated into a number of European languages, the Inquisition in the eighteenth century prohibited and persecuted the publication of her works, accusing them of undermining "the habits and customs of Christian morality." The era was particularly marked by the proliferation of prejudices against women and there are virtually no movements that illustrate even minimal freedom for women.

During the nineteenth century, two historical events might have altered the position of women in Spain; both of them, however, ended up having little impact. First, during the Revolution in 1868 and the subsequent First Republic (1873–4), activities resembling feminism emerged in connection with the philosophy of Krausism. Second, in the course of the 1875 Restoration, the Institución Libre de Enseñanza (Free Institute of Education) was founded. Its guiding principles were laicism, apoliticism, and the defense of the freedom of knowledge. Nevertheless, these two historical phenomena hardly contributed to the emergence of Spanish feminism since, when they considered women's roles in the society, they addressed merely their roles in the family. In other words, women – even though educated – remained enclosed in the private sphere.

Despite the general conservatism of Spanish society, the nineteenth century witnessed the emergence of at least three important female figures. Flora Tristán (1803–44) was the first person in Spain to connect the demands of feminism and socialism. In her view, without an anti-capitalist revolution, it was impossible to liberate anybody: neither men nor women. According to some theorists, such as Lidia Falcon, Tristán was repeatedly marginalized by the Marxists as a feminist intellectual, even though Marx possibly plagiarized his most important ideas about the working class from her work. In any case, Tristán never defended a separate feminist movement. The second influential female from the nineteenth century, Concepción Arenal (1820–93), was the first world-renowned criminologist who worked as an inspector of prisons and correctional institutions for women. She claimed that women had always lived on the margins due to their being denied worthwhile education, instead being taught basic lessons about gallantry, the picaresque, and the inevitability of marriage. In 1859, Arenal founded the Conferencias de San Vicente de Paúl women's group, and exactly ten years later, together with Fernando Castro, a literary and artistic association for women, the Ateneo Artístico y Literario de Señoras. Despite the subsequent social repercussions, the latter association served as a model for similar organizations in the future. The last significant woman of the era was the countess Emilia Pardo Bazán (1851–1921), who criticized the disastrous position of women through her novels. She pointed out that it was precisely in the area of education that differences between men and women originated. The only "education" that Spanish women of the time received was in preparation for marriage and motherhood. Pardo Bazán also attacked the contradiction in the law that enabled women (if they had a well-off husband or father) to study but not to use their education in a profession. On one of her trips to Oxford, she became fascinated with the life and works of John Stuart Mill, especially The Subjection of Women, which she translated into Spanish and provided with a prologue.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, in 1918, María Espinosa de los Monteros founded the Asociación Nacional de Mujeres Españolas (National Association of Spanish Women, ANME). It devoted itself to women's suffrage and soon cleared space for the creation of other similar associations such as Juventud Universitaria Femenina, Mujer del Porvenir, Progresiva Femenina, Liga Española para el Progreso de la Mujer, and Sociedad Concepción Arenal. In 1936, ANME attempted to define itself as a political party and join the Popular Front under the name Acción Política Feminista Independiente. This effort, however, proved fruitless and ANME was dissolved at the beginning of the Spanish Civil War. Another organization that appeared in the 1920s was Cruzada de Mujeres Españolas. One of its members was the writer and journalist Carmen de Burgos (better known as Colombine), who organized the first demonstration of suffragists in the streets of Madrid in 1921. Although these associations included activists from various social backgrounds and did not belong to any political party, they all leaned toward the left. The more traditional right, alerted by the proliferation of "feminist associations of indecorous radicalism, unsuitable for Spanish women," created in reaction Acción Católica de la Mujer in 1919, dedicated to the defense of the ideal traditional woman.

With the advent of the Second Republic, women for the first time obtained seats in the parliament: Clara Campoamor (1888–1972), Margarita Nelken (1896–1968), and Victoria Kent (1892–1987). All three belonged to ANME, even though they held different opinions regarding the question of women's suffrage. Campoamor, who was a firm defender of universal suffrage, also belonged to Asociación Femenina Universitaria and Unión Republicana Feminista and defended the slogan "one woman, one vote," since the new government enabled women to be elected but not to vote. Nelken, on the other hand, was a member of Comité de Auxilio Femenino and Comité Nacional de Mujeres Antifascistas, but she did not promote female suffrage. She argued that Spanish women were not ready to vote since the majority of them were so influenced and manipulated by the church that they would elect reactionary parties. Similarly, Kent opposed women's suffrage, although as a vice-president of Lyceum Club Femenino (founded in 1926 by María de Maeztu) she always addressed problems relating to women's position in the society.

In broad terms, the Spanish Revolution and Civil War gave rise to two types of women who were heard in different ways. On the one hand, there were radical women from the republican side, split into two major organizations: Mujeres Contra la Guerra y el Fascismo (its members were communists, socialists, and republicans) and Mujeres Libres (which included anarchists). The former group, created in 1933, was led by Catalina Salmerón and Dolores Ibárruri (1895–1989). Its priority was to win the war, and in order to achieve that, it thought it best for women to temporarily return to their traditional gender roles as mothers, wives, and daughters. The slogan of the organization was: "Men on the front, women in the rear guard." The anarcho-feminist organization Mujeres Libres emerged in 1936 out of correspondence between Grupo Cultural Femenino, founded two years earlier in Barcelona, and the Madrid-based newspaper Mujeres Libres. The main initiators were Lucía Sánchez Saornil (1895–1970), Mercedes Comaposada Guillén (1901–94), and Amparo Poch y Gascón (1902– 1968). The group did not form alliances with the Confederación Nacional del Trabajo (National Confederation of Work, CNT), the Federación Anarquista Ibérica (Iberian Anarchist Federation, FAI), or the Federación Ibérica de Juventudes Libertarias (Iberian Federation of Anarchist Youth, FIJL), preferring to remain independent within the anarchist movement in order to address more specifically the issues related to women. On the other hand, the Francoist side promoted the reactionary model of the traditional, submissive, and obedient woman.

In April 1939, the dream of an emancipated woman with equal rights to men vanished along with the victory of the Francoists. Women returned to being the slaves of the home, the church, and men. Laws concerning divorce, civil marriage, and abortion were immediately eliminated from Spanish society. For more than 30 years, Sección Femenina of the Falange, directed by Pilar Primo de Rivera (1907–91), imposed its one and only female role model.

After the death of Franco, all legal barriers preventing women from achieving their liberty were removed from the constitution in 1978. In spite of this, a crisis and polarization within the feminist movement emerged. On the one side stood the radical feminists, such as the groups Lamar, Colectivo Feminista, and Organización Feminista Revolucionaria, which were independent of political parties and unions. On the other side was institutionalized feminism, supported by political parties, unions, and universities. Representative examples include Partido Feminista, founded in 1979 under the direction of Lidia Falcón and legalized in 1981; Instituto de la Mujer, created in 1983 by the ministry of culture; and finally, the incorporation of Spain in 1986 into the European Union (EU), which led to the adoption of its requirements and programs concerning women's equality. The new feminism that was born out of this historical and institutional conjunction gave rise to other organizations dedicated to specific problems, such as Comisión Pro-derecho al Aborto, Ateneo Feminista, Centro de Estudios e Investigación Feminista, Forum para una Política Feminista and Ágora Feminista.

In conclusion, contemporary Spanish citizens have absorbed various values for which feminism has been struggling for many years, "although it is necessary to emphasize that there still exist problems that the society as a whole and public institutions should eradicate: violence against women [and] the violation of certain fundamental rights of women within the framework of political, civic, social, and cultural rights” (Folguera 2007: 196). These social maladies have been addressed by such organizations as Red Feminista de Organizaciones Contra la Violencia de Género, Federación de Asociaciones de Mujeres Separadas y Divorciadas (in 1973 known as Asociación de Mujeres Separadas Legalmente), and Asociación Democrática de la Mujer.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism and Gender; Confederación Nacional del Trabajo (CNT); Federación Anarquista Ibérica (FAI); International Women's Day; Mujeres Libres; Sánchez Saornil, Lucía (1895–1970); Spanish Revolution

References and Suggested Readings

- Cook, A. T. (1977) Emilia Pardo Bazán y la Educación como Elemento Primordial en la Liberación de la Mujer. Hispania 60, 2 (May): 259–65.
- Folguera, P. (Ed.) (2007) El Feminismo en España. Dos Siglos de Historia. Madrid: Editorial Pablo Iglesias.
- Garrido, E. (Ed.) (1997) Historia de las Mujeres en España. Madrid: Síntesis.
- Kaplan, T. E. (1971) Spanish Anarchism and Women's Liberation. Journal of Contemporary History 6 (2): 101–10.
- Nash, M. (1986) Mujeres, familia y trabajo en España, 1875–1936. Barcelona: Antrophos.
- Scanlon, G. M. (1986) La polémica feminista en la España contemporánea, 1868–1974. Madrid: Akal.

Women's movement, United States, 16th–18th centuries

Lucille A. Adkins

Traditional history locates the birth of the women's rights movement in the nineteenth century, coinciding with the development of a women's political rights movement. Viewing any woman's written expression or individual action that strayed from the traditional patriarchal definition of female roles and behavior, however, feminist historians have broadened this scope in the last thirty years. They have shown that, though women's resistance to patriarchal dominance has not always been a movement, a level of consciousness, a firm stance, and an attitude of confidence, has done just as much as the organized, collective effort in challenging oppression. The oppositional efforts of women in the United States began with isolated radical insights and sparks of feminist consciousness expressed through the actions of individual women long before the nineteenth-century birth of the women's rights movement.

Colonial America

The legitimization of male dominance and female subordination in colonial American society was linked to church teachings, specifically Genesis and the story of the Fall (Genesis 3:1–24). Eve's guilt in bringing about the fall of man and the loss of paradise was accepted as evidence of the natural weakness of women and God's punishment of subordination to her husband. New Testament texts most often cited derive from St. Paul, who seems to dictate women's submissiveness and public silence: 1 Timothy 2:8–15; 1 Corinthians 14:33–35; Ephesians 5:22–23. The Church of England's assumptions about the natural weakness, inferiority, and preordained subordination of women accompanied the people who founded Plymouth (1620), Massachusetts Bay (1630), Connecticut (1635), and New Hampshire (1638) and were formidable barriers to women who attempted to redefine themselves as the equals of men. Known as Puritans, these separatist dissenters from the Anglican Church of England established settlements in the New World and dedicated themselves to creating a righteous and disciplined life based on a covenant with God. Church and state were one, giving religious and moral values the force of law. Puritans drew clear boundaries to delineate women's proper place and to contain women who presumed to challenge male authority. Nevertheless, challenge it they did.

Few Puritan women wrote diaries or books. Only 4 of the 911 books produced in seventeenth-century New England were written by women. The most famous of these was Anne Bradstreet's Several Poems Compiled with Great Variety of Wit and Learning (1678). Bradstreet (1612–72) arrived with her family in Massachusetts in 1630. While she lived her life within the dicta of traditional Puritan domesticity, she interjected the inner life of a poet. In fact, Anne Bradstreet was the first American poet. When her brother, the pastor Thomas Parker, wrote that “Your printing of a Book, beyond the custom of your sex, doth rankly smell,” Bradstreet took his apparent insult of woman’s intellectual literary pursuits seriously by noting in one of her poems:

I am obnoxious to each carping tongue
Who says my hand a needle better fits,
A Poets Pen all scorn I should thus wrong for such despight they cast on female wits;
If what I doe prove well, it won’t advance,
They’l say it’s stolne, or else, it was by chance.

Anne Bradstreet subtly subverted the gender constraints Puritan society imposed on women’s intellectual expression by challenging the “carping tongues” cautioning female limitations and duty, and continuing to publish as a poet.

Other challenges were raised in far less subtle ways by Puritan women. Once they testified to their salvation to the satisfaction of the clergy and other male community leaders, Puritan women shared with men the right to be members of the church, and this led some to challenge the power of the male clergy and offer their own doctrinal interpretations. One example was Anne Hutchinson, who in the 1630s contested both religious orthodoxy and assumptions of female roles within Puritan society.

Hutchinson arrived in Massachusetts in 1634 and almost immediately began proselytizing to all-female groups in conjunction with her role as midwife. She moved on to holding informal religious meetings in her home where her preaching to mixed groups, an act considered “promiscuous,” challenged not only religious doctrine but also the male clergy who interpreted it and the magistrates who enforced Massachusetts colony laws. Hutchinson’s heresy was her belief that people were “saved” by the direct and sudden infusion of God’s spirit, not by the mere adherence to Puritan moral code. As Hutchinson’s popularity among the colonists grew, so did the threat of her radical religious views to the male clergy and leadership of the colony. Armed with both civil and religious power, they attempted to convince Hutchinson of her theological errors and to cease her rebellious and disruptive activities. Hutchinson refused.

In 1637 Hutchinson was brought to trial for heresy. Trial transcripts describe her as “a woman of haughty and fierce carriage, of a nimble wit and active spirit, and a very voluble tongue, more bold than a man, though in understanding and judgment, inferior to many women.” The formal complaint brought against her charged: “You have stepped out of your place, you have rather been a Husband than a Wife and a preacher than a Hearer; and a Magistrate than a Subject.” In his admonition of Hutchinson’s actions, Boston minister John Cotton preached to his female congregants that Hutchinson “is but a Woman and many unsound and dayngerous principles are held by her.” Hutchinson defended both her religious ideas and the right of a woman to preach, but was excommunicated and banished from the colony. She moved to Rhode Island, which was established in 1636 as a refuge for a growing number of refugees from Massachusetts orthodoxy.

Anne Hutchinson was what Puritan leaders called an “unquiet” woman. Mary Dyer (1611–60) was another. A follower of Anne Hutchinson in the 1630s, Dyer shared Hutchinson’s discontent with the models of feminine virtue offered by her Puritan clergy. She traveled to England in 1652 and became a member of the Society of Friends. Reborn in “the Light,” Quaker women enjoyed an active spiritual role in their church. Dyer returned to New England in 1657 to preach Quaker doctrine. She was received as Hutchinson had been received and was banished, first from Massachusetts and then from New Haven. She returned to Boston but was again expelled. Defying the court, Dyer returned several times during 1659, recognizing that to do so was to invite the death penalty. She was arrested and sentenced to be hanged for heresy. At the last minute, Dyer’s death sentence was overturned and she was once again banished from the colony. In 1660 she undertook her last act of defiance and returned once more to Boston, where she was arrested and executed.

Revolutionary Era

As the values of the Enlightenment reached the colonies, the philosophies of such thinkers as John Locke weakened somewhat the view that women were subordinate to the natural rule of their husbands. Yet a married woman (a feme covert, literally, “covered woman”) lost control of her property upon her marriage. A married woman was deemed to be under the protection and influence of her husband, her baron, or lord; and her condition during her marriage was called her coverture. Even a single woman, or feme sole, was without legal rights to make contracts or sue in court. The democratic ideals born of the American Revolution, however, held the promise at least for expanding opportunities for women in the new republic.

Women actively participated, although usually in distinctively gendered ways, in the American Revolution and the founding of the new nation. Historians debate the extent to which participation in the Revolution changed women's lives in the long term. Some say women's rights declined after the war as white men's rights expanded. Others, however, argue that participation in the war, even if through traditional avenues such as sewing bees and boycotts, led women to develop a new consciousness which encouraged them to push for greater educational opportunities and increased presence in the public sphere. As Norton (1980) has shown, women were able to use the revolutionary climate to argue that, because of their duties as mothers, they should be better educated so they could train the next generation of citizens.

The Great Awakening also helped empower women during this time. As early as the 1730s and 1740s, waves of religious revivalism began to sweep the colonies. Inspired by English minister George Whitefield, this Great Awakening challenged the Puritan emphasis on salvation by good works and right behavior, focusing instead on the conversion – an immediate and ecstatic religious experience. The egalitarianism and challenge to traditional orthodoxy that marked this period of revival offered women a greater voice in religious worship and church affairs than had been available previously. In particular, two radical religious groups centered around charismatic women emerged as the Great Awakening reached its greatest intensity shortly before the 1770s.

Jemima Wilkinson (1752–1819), a former Quaker, had visions that led her to believe she was the female incarnation of Christ. She attracted devoted followers in Rhode Island and Connecticut. Wilkinson threw off her female identity, opting to dress in clothing similar to men's and refusing to answer to her female name. She insisted that she be called the Publick Universal Friend. For more than forty years Wilkinson preached and prophesied for her 200 settlers at New Jerusalem, her utopian community near Seneca Lake, New York.

British-born Ann Lee (1736–84), founder of the “Shaking Quakers” or, more simply, Shakers, was also directed following ecstatic experiences to deny her femaleness and form a utopian community. Lee's religious doctrine revitalized the woman-centered concept of an androgynous God. Shakers believed in the equality of the sexes, and Mother Ann required celibacy for herself and her followers, teaching that marriage was based on the subjugation of women and thus violated Divine law. Leadership, teaching, and preaching within their communities were shared between men and women. Mother Ann had been the victim of marital rape and domestic abuse. The celibate way of life and the alternative she offered to the private, patriarchal family strongly appealed to her and to her followers.

Both Wilkinson and Lee dramatically broke with tradition. Each sought female spiritual and mental emancipation for themselves and freedom from restrictive sex-gender roles for their followers. By denying their sexuality and femaleness, they removed the issue of gender and its potential for undermining their religious leadership.

Barriers to consistent radicalism by women persisted despite the revolutionary fervor and the appeal by many for a loosening of the restrictions on women's access to education and the public arena. Abigail Adams' (1744–1818) plea to her husband, John Adams, as he worked to write the “Declaration of Independency” is often cited as an example of an emerging feminist consciousness among women of Abigail's social class. Her early letters reveal a youthful radicalism for women's rights. She advocated a separate legal system for women, one that would denounce the legal subjection of wives to husbands, believed a woman should be free to marry a mate of her choice and to limit the number of children she bore. She also staunchly refused to accept the intellectual inferiority of women, adding her influence to the growing demand for the education of girls. Abigail's reminder to John to “remember the ladies” in creating the new republic evidenced her awareness of the liabilities of being born female in a paternalistic society.

As radical as her request might have appeared, Abigail accepted the doctrine of separate spheres, in which women were restricted to domestic space and subordinate to men, as evidenced by the last line of that letter. She said, “Regard us then as Being placed by providence under your protection and in imitation of the Supreme Being make use of that power only for our happiness." That acceptance fixed the boundaries of her feminism. Within those limits she maintained that the private political role of women in the new republic was fully as important as the public role of men. The role that Abigail Adams exemplified and advocated for other women in her class can be summarized as Republican Womanhood – a political function for women by which their private virtue was expanded to include the obligation to nurture husbands and sons dedicated to self-sacrificial public service and incorruptible patriotism. Republican Womanhood provided for the first time a political function for women. Despite her tacit support of separate spheres, Abigail Adams' petition for the expanding involvement of women in the political sphere would be invoked countless times in the next 200 years by both First Wave and Second Wave advocates for women's rights.

There have always been women who have asserted their right to expression and creativity despite the social constraints that sought to deny their talents. Confidence in their own creativity empowered colonial and revolutionary women as thinkers and writers, but their intellectual autonomy had to be won before their creativity could be released. Two stand out as breaking through the social barriers to female literary expression.

Mercy Otis Warren (1728–1814) was born in Massachusetts. She married James Warren in 1754 and had five sons. Of the many ways in which women supported the patriot cause before and during the American Revolution, Mercy Otis Warren chose writing. She was especially acclaimed for her two political plays, The Adulateur (1773) and The Group (1775). Published but apparently not performed, these satires characterized the royal governor of Massachusetts, Thomas Hutchinson, and his administration as greedy and unprincipled. Warren was also most likely responsible for anti-federalist newspaper contributions under the pseudonym "A Columbian Patriot." Her major work, however, was a three-volume history of the American Revolution. The History of the Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution, Interspersed with Biographical, Political and Moral Observations (1805) runs to more than 1,200 pages. It includes brutal and eroticized representations of attacks on American women by the English and their mercenary allies. It was the only history of the American Revolution written by a woman of that era.

There is debate as to the extent to which Warren challenged the sexual politics of her time and advocated, like her friend Abigail Adams, the extension of republican concepts of liberty to women. Yet she is generally thought by many feminist scholars to have been one of the most emancipated women of her day and one of the most literate women of the eighteenth century. She held absurd the idea that women had no stake in politics and government. Her letters commenting on the status of women do endorse a strong version of the separate spheres doctrine. Through her history, however, Warren expressed the right of women, even from within the female domestic realm, to formulate and express political views as well as to compose history.

Judith Sargent Murray (1751–1820) was at the center of the post-Revolutionary discussion concerning the proper role for women in the new republic. Unlike Abigail Adams who espoused a separate but equal status for women, Murray's views of gender relations represented the cutting edge of what could be labeled feminism in eighteenth-century America. Murray expressed a feminist consciousness through her prolific writing, which challenged the limits that constrained even the most educated women of her time. Writing with more authority than any American woman dared to do at that time, she pushed for equality and full opportunities for women, offending many of her contemporaries.

In 1790 Murray wrote the essay On the Equality of the Sexes. In it, she argued for educational equality, believing that the minds of men and women were capable of equal intellectual attainment. She took issue with prevailing sex-gender roles, arguing that the supposed superiority of men was not a function of innate sex differences but the result of the fact that from their early years, the minds of girls were "depressed" while those of boys were "exalted." To excel, she argued, girls needed more than an education focused on domestic skills.

Warren and Murray stand out as pioneers who challenged gender definitions and used their minds' potential, yet even with such logic, a changed environment for women who sought an education beyond the domestic sphere and for talented women who chose the life of a writer would not develop in the United States until the nineteenth century.

SEE ALSO: Hutchinson, Anne (1591–1643); Women's Movement, United States, 19th Century; Women's Movement, United States, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Berkin, C. (1996) First Generations: Women in Colonial America. New York: Hill & Wang.
- Dubois, E. C. & Dumenil, L. (2005) Through Women's Eyes: An American History with Documents. Boston: Bedford/St. Martin's Press.
- Koehler, L. (1980) A Search for Power: The "Weaker Sex" in Seventeenth-Century New England. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Lerner, G. (1993) The Creation of Feminist Consciousness: From the Middle Ages to Eighteen-Seventy. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Norton, M. B. (1980) Liberty's Daughters: The Revolutionary Experience of American Women, 1750–1800. New York: Little, Brown.
- Norton, M. B. (1996) Founding Mothers and Fathers: Gendered Power and the Forming of American Society. New York: Knopf.

Women's movement, United States, 19th century

Lucille A. Adkins

What is often termed the First Wave of feminism, involving the conscious struggle for equal rights for women, began in the early nineteenth century. It culminated in a vigorous reaction against the refusal to grant women equal citizenship rights, including the right to vote, in the wake of the Civil War, when the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments (having to do with the expansion of civil rights and voting rights, respectively) were added to the US Constitution. The seeds of this feminist upsurge were sown, however, during the previous two centuries, germinating in the democratic aspirations, struggles, and disappointments associated with the American Revolution.

The New Republic

Abigail Adams (1744–1818) could not hide her disappointment that the final draft of the Declaration of Independence contained no references to slavery, as had a previous draft sent to her by her husband. The final draft also contained no reference to the women's issues Abigail had raised with him. While there had been heated debate over the existence of slavery in the new republic, there was no debate over the definition of a voter as male. Women were not to become members of the polity. Abigail suggested to her friend Mercy Otis Warren (1728–1814) that she join in signing a petition to Congress, but later dropped the subject in her letter to John:

I can not say that I think you very generous to the Ladies, for whilst you are proclaiming peace and good will to Men, Emancipating all nations, you insist upon retaining an absolute power over Wives. But you must remember arbitrary power is like most other things which are very hard, very liable to be broken – and notwithstanding all your wise Laws and Maxims we have it in our power not only to free ourselves but to subdue our Masters, and without violence throw both your natural and legal authority at our feet.

Abigail had enjoyed a liberal relationship with her husband, expressing her love and affection instead of obedience and subservience. In the first three decades of the nineteenth century, however, most women were still subordinated, legally and socially, to their husbands. Disenfranchised, only the roles of wife and mother were open to them.

The 1830s and 1840s were decades of reform in the nation. The belief in the natural moral fiber of woman, and her role as cultivator of morality in her husband and children, further expanded the principles of Republican Motherhood. What emerged was a cult of domesticity, which imposed four standards of behavior on women: piety, purity, domesticity, and submissiveness. While an ideal, with little application to the lives of most women, particularly the poor and working women, the cult of domesticity constrained the lives of middle- and upper-class women and was a formidable barrier to their emergence as leaders of the women's rights movement in the nineteenth century.

Social Reform

A powerful wave of religious revival beginning in the late 1820s (the Second Great Awakening), followed by the physical and economic transformation of the United States by the 1830s, generated an intense wave of moral and social activism from the 1840s to the Civil War. Women played prominent roles in moral reform, with as many as 10 percent of adult women in the Northeast active in benevolent and reform societies in that period.

With its idealization of woman's premier position within the private sphere of the home, the middle-class cult of domesticity was often a locale for domestic violence, sexual abuse, and female disempowerment. Family and sexual life were appropriately important concerns of female reformers. Among the women calling for radical change in women's sexual and reproductive lives were female health activists who violated the taboo against direct, public speech about women's bodies and their sexuality.

Mary Grove Nichols was one of the most infamous and influential women in America. A radical social reformer and pioneering feminist, Nichols became a national figure in the 1840s and 1850s. A victim of emotional and sexual abuse at the hands of her first husband, she wrote and lectured forcefully and explicitly about the physical suffering and sexual frustrations of married women, equality in marriage, free love, spiritualism, the health risks of corsets and masturbation, the benefits of the cold-water cure, and the importance of happiness. Considered too radical even by other reformers, Nichols and her second husband, medical writer and social reformer Thomas Low Nichols, were often excluded from the very social causes they had helped to establish. Excluded also from the history of that time, Nichols' campaign for the awakening of women's desires and needs reveals the diversity of opinion within nineteenth-century America's social reform movements and the budding radical feminist network of the time.

Paulina Wright (1813–76) was also a health lecturer. She shamelessly used a female manikin to teach women about their sexual and reproductive anatomy. Her exposure to the abuses women suffered within marriage propelled Wright (later Wright Davis) to become a leader in the women's rights movement.

Frances (Fanny) Wright (1795–1852) was born to a wealthy family in Dundee, Scotland. By the age of 18 she had written her first book. In 1818 she immigrated to the United States. Wright was co-founder of Free Inquirer newspaper and authored several books, including Views of Society and Manners in America (1821). She was the first woman to lecture publicly before a mixed audience when she delivered an Independence Day speech at the utopian community, New Harmony, in 1828. Dubbed by her critics as the Great Red Harlot for her personal life, which included several illicit romances, as well as her progressive views on sexual relations, Fanny Wright was a political figure in the early labor movement and is credited with bringing the political struggle for women's rights to America.

Allying with Robert Owen, founder of the utopian community New Harmony, Wright launched a campaign for education reform and against organized religion. She advocated a system of free state boarding schools in which children would be educated without religious doctrine but receive training in traditional subjects as well as industrial skills. Wright saw this system as relieving families of the burden of raising children. From her desire to see these educational proposals enacted, Wright moved into the political sphere and became a central figure in the workingmen's movement. She differed in some technical aspects from the broader workingmen's movement, which consisted of activism by small farmers, artisans, and workers in early factories, but her name became synonymous with their protests. Those opposing the workingmen's movement referred to the movement as the Fanny Wright Party.

In 1825 Wright founded the Nashoba Commune near Memphis, Tennessee. Her goal was to build a self-sustaining multi-racial educational community comprised of slaves, free blacks, and whites. Nashoba did not fare well despite her persistent efforts. Her outspoken political rhetoric and attacks on racially segregated schools, organized religion, racial taboos in sex relations, marriage, and cultural standards on Christian womanhood, left her on the fringes of mainstream society, and Nashoba suffered a financial collapse. Wright emancipated the slaves and paid for their transportation to Haiti as she had promised.

Wright also took issue with the widening gulf between the classes within capitalist America. She saw women as particularly affected by the increasing emphasis on the market as industry shifted away from the home into the city. Her multiple ideologies converged in the popular health movement of the 1830s. Because she saw the workingmen's movement as a reaction to an increasingly aristocratic culture in which the "professionals" controlled the system as well as the information, doctors were included in her target. Similarly, by advocating the woman's voice, Wright gave credence to women becoming involved in health and medicine. She had strong views on social reform, as well. She condemned capital punishment and demanded improvements in the status of women, including equal education, legal rights for married women, liberal divorce laws, and birth control.

After the midterm political campaign of 1838, Wright suffered from a variety of health problems and died in 1852. She never achieved much individual success; after a lifetime of struggling for high ideals, she spent the last years of her life embroiled in financial problems and a complicated divorce. However, her life struggles proved to be the greatest model for the women's movement. Her defiance of women's proper place led her to tackle highly controversial issues well before their time. From birth control to affirming sexuality as "the noblest of passions," Wright chipped away at a rigid sex-gender structure and paved the way for other women to make changes regarding women's rights, health, and woman's place within society.

A number of utopias emerged in the nineteenth century and expressed ideas important to women's rights. Perhaps the most famous secular utopia was Brook Farm, founded in Roxbury, Massachusetts, in 1841. The most prominent woman associated with Brook Farm was Margaret Fuller (1810–50). In 1844 Fuller wrote an article on the conflict between women's possibilities and their assigned roles. One year later she wrote Woman in the Nineteenth Century (1845), the first full-length feminist treatise in American history. Less overtly political than other women's rights advocates of that time, she was widely admired for her vision of the creative power of women.

In 1844 Fuller moved to New York City to become the first literary editor of Horace Greeley's progressive Whig newspaper, the New York Daily Tribune. As one of the first female members of the working press and the first woman to serve on the editorial staff of a leading American newspaper, Fuller published 250 articles in her 20 months on the job. Her journalistic investigations focused not just on the conditions and concerns of women. In a city ripe with nativist resentment of immigrants, she called for her readers to "learn from all nations" and to build understanding across race, class, and gender lines. Fuller's life was cut short when in 1850 the vessel carrying her and her family from Europe to the United States was shipwrecked off the coast of New York.

Of all the expressions of antebellum social activism, abolitionism had the most profound impact on the growth of an organized political movement for women's rights. By the mid-1830s a growing number of women abolitionists went beyond the limits of female propriety. Their defiance resulted in a split in the abolitionist movement over the role of women. That division redirected the more radical women within abolitionist ranks to the broader struggle for women's rights.

In 1831 Maria Stewart (1803–79), a black domestic servant from Connecticut, defied racial and gender conventions and became the first black woman to publicly criticize slavery before a mixed audience of women and men. She boldly insisted, "The whites have so long and so loudly proclaimed the theme of equal rights and privileges, that our souls have caught the flame also, ragged as we are." In her lectures, Stewart encouraged black women to work to strengthen the African American community, and by 1833 her activities had aroused such opposition among Boston's black leaders that she left the city. It was not so much her message that disturbed them. It was that the message was being delivered by a black woman who dared to speak out.

Isabella Baumfree (1797–1883) was born a slave in New York and, upon emancipation, spent several years in a religious community in New York City. In 1846 she emerged from the community as Sojourner Truth and became an itinerant preacher and prophet. She was unlike most female abolitionists of the time. She was black. She was not a member of the respectable middle class. She was, instead, unlettered, opinionated, emotionally intense, and direct. Her passion for equality and unconventional style had a tremendous impact on white audiences, and she ranks among the most influential radical female abolitionists.

Lucy Stone (1818–93) graduated from Oberlin College the first woman to earn a bachelor's degree in the United States, and the first to earn a doctorate of divinity from an American college. Against her family's wishes, she chose the “unladylike” vocation of professional public speaker and adopted abolition as her cause. Like other abolitionist women, Stone was harassed wherever she spoke. Opponents tore down posters advertising her talks, threw pepper into the auditoriums where she lectured, and doused her with cold water one winter day. Yet she continued to speak out in support of abolition and women's rights. When told by the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society that she had been hired to speak on abolition, not women's rights, Stone replied: “I was a woman before I was an abolitionist. I must speak for the women.”

Sarah (1792–1873) and Angelina Grimké (1805–79) also weathered attempts to silence their outcries against slavery and the denial of rights for women. Born into a wealthy slaveholding family in South Carolina, the sisters ran away to Philadelphia in 1829, became Quakers and joined the abolitionist movement. They followed Maria Stewart's lead and preached against slavery in front of “promiscuous” (mixed) audiences. What set the Grimké sisters apart were their shocking descriptions of the sexual corruptions of slavery. So scandalous were their actions that they earned a reprimand from the Massachusetts General Association of Congregationalist clergy, demonstrating that little had changed since the days of Anne Hutchinson's challenge to male clergy. The Grimkés neither apologized nor retreated. Instead, in 1838, Sarah published a series of letters and abolitionist and feminist essays titled “Letters on the Equality of the Sexes and the Condition of Women.”

The Grimkés defense of their claim to the equal rights of women as moral beings and social activists led to a split in the abolitionist movement over the role of women. In 1840 William Lloyd Garrison, editor of the leading abolitionist newspaper The Liberator, formed the American Anti-Slavery Society. Under Garrison's leadership the society included women as full and equal partners in the struggle against slavery. Frederick Douglass, who insisted that the issue of women's equality should be kept separate from that of abolition, drove the second wing of the once-unified abolitionist movement.

The conflict that raged over women's full and equal participation mirrored a separate but connected issue – the denial of the franchise to women. Their inability to function as full citizens of the nation wearied and angered abolitionist women who lacked political rights but were the primary support and workforce of a movement that was moving beyond moral arguments against slavery to political methods, including the formation of political parties against slavery.

Focus on Women's Rights

By the 1840s all of these issues – moral reform, temperance, petitions against slavery, and the Grimké sisters' defense of woman's equal participation – drew many women reformers to the broader question of women's rights. One of the first lines of attack was aimed at the extensive body of state laws that deprived married women of all independent property rights. The legal principle of coverture treated wives as non-persons before the law on the grounds that they were dependent on and subordinate to their husband's authority. In effect, marriage buried a wife's selfhood in that of her husband. Attempts to undo coverture laws started as early as 1836 with Ernestine Rose (1810–92), a Jewish immigrant who had fled an arranged marriage in Poland and settled in a “free-thinking” (atheistic) community in New York City. Rose assisted New York State legislator Elisha Hertell in gaining support for his bill intended to grant married women the same right to earnings and property as single women and all men. Despite Rose's best efforts, however, only a handful of women would sign a petition on behalf of Hertell's bill.

In the 1840s two other women joined Rose in her continuing efforts to undo coverture laws. The first was Pauline Wright (later Davis), a feminist activist who had started her career as a women's health educator. The second woman to champion the cause was Elizabeth Cady Stanton, who would become the greatest women's rights activist of the nineteenth century. Rose, Wright, and Stanton continued their campaign until April 1848 when the New York legislature passed a bill that gave wives control over inherited, but not earned, wealth. Change in the law giving wives the right to own and sell their own property, to control their own wages, and to claim rights over their children upon separation and divorce would not be won until 1860.

For nearly thirty years Ernestine Rose was a passionate campaigner on the lecture circuit, attending every National Women's Rights Convention between 1850 and 1869 and many state and local conventions as well. Known as the Queen of the Platform, she was considered the best female orator of mid-nineteenth century America. Rose traveled to over 23 states by railroad car and stagecoach, speaking in churches, barns, and state legislatures, and addressing new immigrants in German and French. She stirred women to work tirelessly for their own emancipation. Rose's social status may have contributed to the relative lack of recognition she received from historians. She was an immigrant in a period of rising nativist sentiment, a Jew in largely Protestant reform movements, an outspoken freethinker and atheist in movements that often turned to the Bible for authority. She challenged American society to its very core – its Puritan past. Susan B. Anthony recognized Ernestine Rose as one of the foremothers of the nineteenth-century women's rights movement in the United States and kept a photograph of her on the wall of her study.

It had taken decades of defiant acts by individual women to bring the issue of women's rights to the forefront of American life. National and international events occurring in 1848 helped accelerate the process and transform the efforts of individual women into a national political movement. Shortly after the February Revolution, a group of French feminists published a daily newspaper devoted to women's interests. In the March 23, 1848 issue of La Voix des Femmes (The Voice of Women), they spoke up in defense of women who had been denied important roles in the anti-slavery movement when male abolitionists expelled them from the 1840 London World Anti-Slavery Convention. Among the women expelled were Quaker abolitionist Lucretia Mott (1793–1880) and Elizabeth Cady Stanton (1815–1902).

