it, to “demystify women’s bodies,” she inserted a speculum in her vagina and invited spectators to look inside it, with a flashlight, and describe her cervix. Sprinkle’s Post-Porn Modernism made money and its relationship to sex, power, and the agency of the commodity in question the main focus of her show. In early 1984 two semi-pornographic shows took place in New York: one was a performance titled The Second Coming by seven women artists called Carnival Knowledge, which explored “the possibility of a ‘new definition of pornography,’” and the second one was Deep Inside Porn Stars, “which promised ‘live performances by 7 top film stars from the sex industry’” (Fuchs 1996: 114).

Another strategy was to form a discourse around the vagina that would challenge the stereotypical relationship between patriarchy and creativity. The “cunt-masculinity” had its first inklings in the 1960s in the performances of such artists as Shigeo Kubota, who in 1965 at Perpetual Fluxfest in New York City attached a brush to her vagina and made Vagina Painting (with red paint simulating menstrual blood). In the 1990s more works focusing on female genitals emerged. In more eclectic art circles, Rocio Bolivar sewed up her labia with a plastic baby doll Jesus inside her vagina to protest the virgin/whore dichotomy which she blamed on the cult of the male/Jesus. In 1996, Holly Hughes published Clit Notes, based on her one-woman show. In the late 1990s, Eve Ensler’s The Vagina Monologues, a solo performance piece based on confessional interviews of women talking about their vaginas in various contexts (including rape), became a pop culture phenomenon. Heralded as “celebrating female sexuality,” The Vagina Monologues inspired a countrywide campus V-Day movement aimed at fighting violence against women and changing the meaning of Valentine’s Day (including the meaning of the Valentine’s heart, seen now as a symbol of the female genitals).

In recent performance art, many feminist artists have turned away from examining the female body to addressing the male body and masculinity. A good example of the new trend is Catherine MacGregor’s performance and video piece On the Rag. The video features a short scene in which a well-manicured female hand slashes the tip of a penis with a surgical razor. MacGregor’s piece is designed to do what Butler advocates in her recent book: “focusing on the question of what it might mean to undo restrictively normative conceptions of sexual and gendered life” (2004: 1).

Fenian movement

Matthew Wahlert

The Fenian movement – revolutionary secret societies dedicated to gaining independence for Ireland – arose when nineteenth-century Irish nationalists created the Fenian Brotherhood, named after the Gaelic hero Fionn mac Cumhail. The movement, which was active in both Ireland and America, was committed to liberating Ireland through “physical force”; its position was that revolution should be “sooner or never.”

The movement originated with veterans of the 1848 revolt of Young Ireland. In the wake of that uprising’s defeat two of its leaders, James Stephens and John O’Mahony, fled to Paris. In 1853 O’Mahony traveled to America with the intention of gaining political support from Irish refugees, and in 1858 he founded the Fenian Brotherhood in the United States. Also in 1858 Stephens returned to Ireland with the aim of establishing a similar organization; his efforts resulted in the creation of the Irish Republican Brotherhood. Stephens created the party journal of the Fenians, the Irish People, in Dublin in 1863.

The Fenians targeted artisans rather than the agrarian population for support. They faced stiff opposition in Ireland not only from the British authorities but also from the Catholic Church. In 1865 British officials made a concerted effort to suppress the Fenians, and Stephens was arrested. He escaped, however, and fled to the United States, where the Fenian Brotherhood had flourished and had attracted a significant number of Irish immigrants with military experience gained during the American Civil War.

The American wing of the Brotherhood was officially launched by an 1863 convention. However, the organization soon broke into two factions – one led by O’Mahony and the other by W. R. Roberts. In 1865 a convention of Roberts’ followers in Cincinnati, Ohio, demonstrated that the Fenians had developed significant support in the United States.

The Cincinnati convention took the decision to invade Canada. In June 1866 General John O’Neill and 800 men crossed the Niagara and took control of Fort Erie. The Fenians believed the Canadian transportation network could be easily seized, giving them a powerful bargaining chip in their struggle. Britain, they thought, would surely grant Ireland its freedom in exchange for British holdings in Canada. Some historians have suggested that the US government at first acquiesced in the Fenian plan as payback for Britain’s tacit support of the Confederacy during the Civil War. Be that as it may, US forces eventually intervened, cut off the Fenians on the Niagara River, and arrested approximately 700 of them.

In spite of the defeat, the Fenians were not demoralized and were obviously planning further actions of a similar nature. The following year, in 1867, a Fenian convention in Philadelphia put its intentions on display by parading an army of 6,000 Fenian soldiers in the streets in full uniform. A second attempt to invade Canada was decided – this time from Vermont – but it was also foiled.

Also in 1867, the Fenian organization in the United States made an effort to take a direct part in the fight in Ireland itself. The ship Erin’s Hope left for Ireland filled with Civil War veterans ready to join the struggle. They were taken into custody while attempting to land, however, and a number of small uprisings and attempts to rescue the jailed Fenians proved fruitless.

The Fenian movement persevered into the World War I era, when it was replaced by newly formed organizations, including Sinn Féin, a group founded by a former Fenian, Arthur Griffith. Although the Fenians failed in terms of their military objectives, they were important for having kept the plight of the Irish nation alive in the consciousness of worldwide public opinion, and for steadfastly maintaining the continuity of the Irish nationalist spirit from the revolt of 1848 to the Easter Rising of 1916. The Irish Republican Brotherhood was a direct antecedent of the Irish Republican Army. The term “Fenians” is still used today, by friend and foe alike, to refer to Irish nationalists in general.

Feuchtwanger, Lion (1884–1958)

Ian Wallace

Lion Feuchtwanger, the Jewish writer who reached a global readership in the three decades between the publication of his first bestselling novels in the 1920s and his death in exile, was deeply affected by his experience of revolution in his native Germany. Unlike writers such as Ernst Toller and Erich Mühsam, he did not take a leading role in the revolution in Bavaria following World War I, but as a citizen of Munich he observed it first hand and supported its main aims: free elections, a free press, and the removal of censorship. However, his “dramatic novel” Thomas Wendt (1919) reflects his anguish over the conflict he saw between revolutionary ideals and the seemingly inevitable use of brutal force. Herein are the seeds of that constant preoccupation with the tension between contemplation and action which characterize the intellectuals and writers who inhabit his subsequent literary work.

As a man of liberal persuasion, Feuchtwanger favored the American and French over the Bolshevik revolutionary model. He deviated from this position only in the mid-1930s, when the Soviet Union seemed to represent the best hope of defeating the Fascist forces which had forced him into exile – first in France in 1933 and then, after the fall of France in 1940, in the US. His short book Moscow 1937 (1937) is remarkable for its fulsome praise of Stalin and its disparaging asides against western democracies – controversial judgments which he never withdrew. Elsewhere, his sympathy for the revolutions in America and France prevails, especially in three historical novels which are also a tribute to the two countries which had provided him with refuge from Fascism: Proud Destiny (1947–8), This is the Hour (1951), and ’Tis Folly to be Wise (1952). The central figures in these novels are, respectively, Benjamin Franklin, Francisco Goya, and Jean-Jacques Rousseau – protagonists who both represent the idea of historical progress over reaction and also prefigure, in different ways, the lot of twentieth-century émigrés like Feuchtwanger.

His novel Success (1930), with its mocking portrait of Adolf Hitler in the fictional figure of Rupert Kutzner, was the first major prose work in any language to protest against the rise of National Socialism in Germany. When the National Socialist revolution arrived in 1933 Feuchtwanger was unsurprisingly among the first to be deprived of their German citizenship and to see their books publicly burned, but even in exile he continued to protest against the Nazis and, in The Oppermanns (1933), against their brutality towards the Jews. The attack on Hitler personally continued in the historical novel The Pretender (1936) and in the satire Double, Double, Toil and Trouble (1944), where Feuchtwanger exposed the Führer as a charlatan whose irrational hold over the masses is based on lies and an absurd belief in his exceptional powers. As a writer, Feuchtwanger protested particularly against the turgid and ungrammatical German of Hitler’s Mein Kampf, a sure indication that the revolution he represented was a betrayal of true German culture.

Fifth Monarchist women

Amy Lynch

The Fifth Monarchists are unique among the religious sects in seventeenth-century England for the specifically political content of their spiritual vision and practice. Inspired by the biblical prophecies of Daniel and Revelation, Fifth Monarchists understood history as the ascension and decline of four world empires, after which Jesus would reign directly on earth with his saints for 1,000 years. While other sects shared their millenarian beliefs, the Fifth Monarchists were distinct both in their expectation that the New Jerusalem would come from the ranks of ordinary citizens and soldiers, and in their commitment to bringing the revolution to fruition through violence if necessary. It was, they believed, the right and duty of godly people to take up arms in overthrowing the existing regime to shepherd in the New Jerusalem. In the new kingdom, godliness, rather than social class, would distinguish people, and the poor and oppressed would reign. They sought a social and political revolution with an end to centralization and hierarchical mediation in law as well as in religious matters, care for the poor, break up of monopolies, and an end to taxation.

The priority given to revelation as a source of truth and the right of the inspired to public voice among Fifth Monarchists opened the way for women to claim authority in social and political matters. Published writings from more than eighty radical women survive from the period 1640–1680 and an estimated 300 women were active as prophets from the period just prior to the English Civil War through the restoration of Charles II to the throne (Mack 1992). Of these women, Anna Trapnel was perhaps the most famous, garnering public attention for the visions and trances through which she and others believed God spoke to her. Mary Cary, by contrast, based her claim to divine inspiration on deep knowledge of scripture. Assumption of the prophetic voice enabled women to transcend the rigid gender roles that relegated them to domestic space and concerns. They challenged political authority and asserted their relevance not just to social matters within their own communities, but to national and international politics as well.

Anna Trapnel (fl. 1642–60) was the daughter of a shipwright and a devout mother whose deathbed blessing Trapnel considered the source of her own special connection with the divine. She began having prophetic visions in 1642, but claimed national attention when she went into a trance at the examination for treason of Vavasor Powell, a Fifth Monarchist minister, by Oliver Cromwell's Council of State in 1654. She neither ate nor drank during 11 days and 12 nights of prophesying. From the fifth day a member of the audience recorded her words, later published as The Cry of a Stone. Cromwell, the army, merchants, the clergy, and universities were all targets of Trapnel's wrath. Cromwell was vilified for having betrayed his responsibility to the new kingdom. Arriving on the heels of Cromwell's installation as Lord Protector and dismissal of the Barebones Parliament, her visions reflected the anger and frustration of the Fifth Monarchists at his thwarting of their revolution. She accused him of having been seduced by luxury and flattery and contrasted her own asceticism with his excesses. She likened the destruction of the corrupt aristocratic and popish order to the fall of Babylon and reveled in the specter of its demise.

In April 1654 Trapnel went to visit Cromwell on divine instructions and stayed with Fifth Monarchist members of the disbanded Barebones Parliament. She was arrested at the urging of local clergy on the grounds that she was spreading subversion and subsequently accused of witchcraft, treasonous declarations, and disturbing the peace, as well as madness, whoredom, and vagrancy. At her trial she defended her right as an independent English woman and a taxpayer to pursue God's will according to her own discretion. While imprisoned she continued her evangelism through correspondence, and eventually public outcry at her martyrdom led to her release.

In 1654 she published A Legacy for Saints, a spiritual autobiography, and Report and Plea, a description of her treatment by the authorities and response to the allegations against her. In both works she used her own life to affirm the truth of the Fifth Monarchist message and presented herself as a moral and political example by contrasting her own actions with those of the authorities and through her pointed challenges to their legitimacy. In Legacy for Saints she contested the prevailing social order on the basis of her belief in predestination. The elect were not evident by their clothes or the trappings of class. Instead, human value was determined by the divine rather than by social convention.

Another Fifth Monarchist woman, Mary Cary (b. 1620/1), invoked the prophetic form in articulating both the role of the saints in social and political transformation and her vision of the New Jerusalem. For her, prophecy was not a consequence of "any immediate revelation . . . or that she had been told it by an Angel" (Resurrection, Epistle to the Reader), but the result of proper understanding of how God's promises were manifest historically. She developed her ability to know the future through engagement with scripture, especially the books of Daniel and Revelation. The promises in those texts were about the world rather than the spirit and thus must be observed in historical time rather than experienced through direct revelation. The power to interpret was unique to the saints but could be developed through study. Saints could come from any sect or social class; the only requirement was recognition of the imperative to overthrow the existing regime to make way for the reign of Jesus.

The priority of the political task before the saints required cooperation with any who shared their cause regardless of their spiritual inclinations, and a willingness to use violence if it was necessary. In the New Jerusalem the converted would be filled with divine joy and justice and integrity would prevail in human relationships. That time, however, was not yet at hand. In this respect Cary disagreed with the Quakers, who sought immediate experience of the spiritual world and withdrew into their own hearts rather than assume responsibility for the political. Her concerns were situated nationally; the reign of the saints would begin in England and from there spread to the rest of the world (The Resurrection, 1653).

Cary championed lay preaching, condemned the use of force against members of nonconforming religious sects, and eschewed imposition of any orthodoxy (A Word in a Season, 1647). She proposed redistribution of wealth from university endowments to poor scholars and preachers, simplification of laws, and decentralization of courts (A New and More Exact Mappe, Description of New Jerusalems Glory, 1651). In the New Jerusalem she envisioned an end to physical suffering, especially the trauma of infant mortality, and equitable distribution of wealth such that people would no longer, "labour and toyl day and night . . . to maintain others that live . . . in idleness," but would "comfortably enjoy the work of their hands" (Little Horns Doom, pp. 307–8).

Fiji, parliamentary insurrection

Justin Corfield

The islands of Fiji, in the southwestern part of the Pacific Ocean, were visited by European explorers in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, with Abel Tasman's visit in 1643 being the first confirmed European contact with Fiji. Although trade in sandalwood started soon afterwards, it was usually through middlemen, and the first direct trade between the Europeans and the Fijians over sandalwood was in 1805. In order to get the wood, the Europeans often traded weapons, and the access to these in the Fijian islands usually led to fighting with violent tribal warfare during the first part of the nineteenth century.

During the 1830s European missionaries started to arrive in Fiji. By this time, tribes from Tonga had become involved in some fighting in Fiji, and the missionaries were also mediating between the various sides while trying to get chiefs to convert to Christianity. Starting with the high chief of Viwa, gradually several other chiefs converted, and the Methodists were even able to get the warlike Cakobau to convert. However, there was local disquiet over the influence of these missionaries, and Reverend Thomas Baker, who was proselytizing in the western highlands, was killed and eaten in 1867.

During this period European companies also set up sugar and cotton plantations in Fiji. The American Civil War had led to the destruction of many of the cotton fields in the United States, and an alternate source was needed. With the colonial need for indentured labor, many local people were pressed into working in the plantations, some by being misled, but many through kidnapping. This became known as blackbirding.

In 1873 the acting British consul in Fiji, J. B. Thurston, proposed that Fiji be annexed to the British crown. He saw it as preferable to the French or the Germans gaining control, and on October 10, 1874, at Levuka, Fiji was pronounced to be a British Crown Colony. The Deed of Cession was signed by Cakobau as "King of Fiji and warlord," Ma'afu, the chief of la Lau, Tavenui, and much of Navua Levu, and 11 other chiefs. This represented all but one chief from eastern Fiji. The absence of chiefs from the west was to become an important political issue for many years to come.

In 1875–6 the Kai Colo Uprising occurred, involving highlanders from the western part of Vitu Levu who were unhappy about Fiji becoming a British colony. When a measles epidemic broke out in 1875, killing about a third of the population of Fiji, the Kai Colo mountain people viewed this as a punishment inflicted by the gods for their abandoning of their tribal ways and the acceptance of British rule, so they revolted. Sir Arthur Gordon established a Fijian Constabulary of 1,000 men under the command of Nadroga Chief Ratu Luki. This force crushed the rebellion by killing many of the rebels and jailing many others.

After the end of the rebellion, much new capital was invested in Fiji, with the capital being moved to Suva in 1882. A land commission was established to review all the land that Europeans had obtained prior to cession, and whether or not it had been bought at a fair price. Most of the remaining land either became crown land or was retained by the traditional owners. Indeed, with the exception of the period 1905–9, when the rules making tribal land inalienable were waived to encourage investment, most of the Fijian traditional lands were kept by their traditional owners, and even today more than 80 percent of the land is owned by the Fijians.

To prevent a return to blackbirding and to stop the exploitation of the Fijians, Governor Arthur Gordon introduced regulations to prevent Fijians from being exploited as indentured labor. To solve the labor problems, the colonial government started bringing in large numbers of Indians, many from Calcutta in the northeast of India and Madras in the south. The laborers were often beaten by their employers, with regular reports of abuses of human rights. Many of these Indians – 80 percent of whom were Hindu – remained in Fiji, where they established communities, and with the ending of the system of indentured labor in the early 1900s there were large numbers of Indians in Fiji.

Manilal Maganlal Doctor, an Indian lawyer from Mauritius, came to Fiji in 1912 and provided a focus for the discontented Indian laborers. He helped organize strikes against the 12-hour working day and protests against rising prices and seemingly arbitrary taxation. This had little effect in Fiji, but it did lead to a decline in the number of Indians being transported to Fiji, with the ending of indentured labor in January 1919. The colonial authorities discouraged contact between the Fijians and the Indians, but gradually this became inevitable as many Indians started leaving plantations and setting up their own businesses.

The composition of the Legislative Council, established to advise the governor, changed in 1904. It had consisted entirely of nominees of the governor, all of whom were Europeans. The constitution was amended to allow two Fijians to be nominated by the Great Council of Chiefs, and six Europeans to be elected. In 1916 the first Indian was nominated to the Legislative Council, and in 1929 the first Indian members were elected.

Fijians participated in both world wars. In World War I there were about 700 Europeans from Fiji, and 100 Fijians went to serve in Europe. During World War II, in anticipation of Japanese attacks, 800 Fijians were recruited to form the Fiji Military Force, trained by American and New Zealand soldiers. They were involved in fighting in the Solomon Islands. After World War II Fijian soldiers were involved in fighting the communists in Malaya, and a strong military tradition started with the military subsequently serving in the Middle East in United Nations' peacekeeping forces, and in Zimbabwe.

During the 1960s moves were made towards independence with the start of ministerial government, the extending of the franchise to cover women, and the formation of political parties. Many of the parties were set up along racial lines, with the National Federation Party established by A. D. Patel urging independence from Britain, and all the electors of Fiji to be on a common electoral roll, rather than separate rolls for the Fijians, Indians, and Europeans. However, the main political force was the Alliance Party formed by Ratu Kamisese Mara, which drew most of its support from indigenous Fijians. They wanted electoral rolls drawn up along racial lines, but stated their support for multiculturalism.

In 1963 there were 38 members of the Legislative Council, divided between the Europeans, the Fijians, and the Indians. This perpetuated the separate electoral rolls, but in 1966 a new constitution was introduced to expand the Legislative Council to 40 seats, with less representation for Europeans, but maintaining the separate rolls. The Alliance won a majority in the 1966 elections and Ratu Mara became chief minister in September 1967.

On October 10, 1970 Fiji became independent, ending 96 years of colonial rule, with Sir Ratu Mara as prime minister (he had been knighted in 1969). The first governor general of the country was Ratu George Cakobau, a descendant of the Great Chief Cakobau, who ceded Fiji in 1874. The new Fijian constitution established a Senate which comprised the Fijian chiefs, and a House of Representatives with 22 Fijian, 22 Indian, and 8 general members (Europeans, part-Fijians, and Chinese). This entrenched segregation in the country.

A rise in Fijian nationalism in 1975 led to one politician, Sakesai Butadroka, calling a parliamentary motion which urged for the repatriation of the entire Indian population of Fiji. This was rejected by both the National Federation Party (NFP), which represented many Indians but which was badly split between Hindu and Muslim factions, and the Alliance Party. By contrast many extreme Fijian nationalists supported the idea. In the elections in 1977 Butadroka's Fijian Nationalist Party drew support away from the Alliance Party and allowed the NFP to win. However, a new election was called soon afterwards and the Alliance Party won a majority.

As Fiji prospered with a massive increase in tourism and the clothing industry, some Indian families came to dominate many parts of the economic life of the country. This led to a growing disparity between the wealthy Indians and the majority of Indians who remained poor. Many Indians, disillusioned by the infighting in the NFP, and some moderate members of the Alliance Party decided to come together and form the Fiji Labour Party (FLP) in 1985, which was led by Timoci Bavadra.

The FLP, in coalition with the NFP, managed to win 28 of the 52 seats in the House of Representatives in the April 1987 elections, with 19 Fijian Indians as part of the coalition. Bavadra, an ethnic Fijian, became prime minister and formed his government with a Cabinet which had a Fijian majority. In spite of this, many people saw the government as being Indian-dominated, setting the scene for the first military coup in Fiji.

On May 14, 1987 Lieutenant Colonel Sitiveni Rabuka staged the first of several coups d'état in Fiji. He led armed soldiers into the parliament and took over the control of the government, placing Bavadra and the Cabinet ministers under arrest. The governor general Ratu Penaia Ganilau then declared a state of emergency, and Rabuka set up a civil interim government which included many members of the former Alliance Party government, with himself as a "military member" with the role of "directing" the council of ministers. This was approved by the Great Council of Chiefs but the actions were widely condemned outside Fiji. When the Commonwealth moved against Fiji, on September 15, 1987, Rabuka staged a second coup d'état, imposing martial law. On October 7 Rabuka declared Fiji a republic, invalidating the 1970 constitution and appointing himself as head of the interim military government, holding that position until December 5.

Although Rabuka described how he planned the coups in Rabuka: No Other Way, written by Eddie Dean and Stan Ritova, even allowing them to publish his plans, there are still many different theories about the real causes of the coups. On an economic level there were immediate moves to prevent the Fijian Indian sugar farmers from increasing their economic power. The coups certainly caused large numbers of Indian professionals and artisans to emigrate. Many viewed the Methodist Church as having a major role in the coups, with some closely connected with the extreme Fijian nationalist Taukei movement. Church leaders certainly supported the coups, after which legislation was introduced to protect Sunday observances, including a ban on shops opening on Sundays. Others saw that the coups were essentially a dispute within the Fijian nationalist movement with the FLP-NFP wanting to limit the power of the Great Council of Chiefs. There were even theories that the US Central Intelligence Agency was involved because the Timoci Bavadra FLP-NFP government was against the presence of nuclear weapons in the South Pacific.

On December 5, 1987 Sir Ratu Kamisese Mara became prime minister again, and on July 25, 1990 a new constitution was proclaimed by President Ratu Ganilau. This massively increased the power of the Great Council of Chiefs, which was allowed to appoint the president and also a majority of members of the Senate. They also issued a special immunity to Rabuka and all the army, police, and prison services who had taken part in the coups. Also, 37 of the 70 seats in the House of Representatives were reserved for Fijian members, 27 for Indians, 1 for Rotumans/Polynesians, and 5 for others. The new constitution also entrenched the Christian church, legislating Sunday observance.

A major change in Fijian politics followed when, in March 1991, the Alliance Party was disbanded and the Soqosoqo-ni-Vakavulewa-ni-Taukei (Party of Policy Members for Indigenous Fijians) (SVT) was established. Soon afterwards the General Voters Party was formed for Europeans, part-Fijians, and Chinese, with the NFP and FLP initially planning to boycott the forthcoming elections, but later deciding to participate. In November 1991 Rabuka was elected president and leader of the SVT. Rabuka then sought to become a populist leader, and on June 2, 1992 he became prime minister, a position he held until May 19, 1999, leaving a SVT-GVP coalition government.

With the two coups, an outflow of Fijian Indian capital, and a lack of investment in the economy, the economic situation of Fiji declined quickly, made worse by Hurricane Kina hitting the islands in early 1993. However, in 1994 elections the SVT were able to increase their seats in parliament by one – winning 31 of the 37 seats reserved for indigenous Fijians. With the real possibility of Fiji being declared bankrupt, the Fijian government proposed a scheme to resettle 28,000 Chinese migrants from Hong Kong but abandoned the move as worries were raised about it.

Gradually, more and more pressure was placed on Rabuka by the international community to amend the 1990 constitution. Having promised a review in 1992, in 1995 he finally oversaw the establishment of the Constitutional Review Commission (CRC). The SVT wanted the 1990 constitution to be retained, but the Citizens' Constitutional Forum (CCF), a multiracial pressure group, submitted its own report to the CRC. It argued for the importance of a new constitution which embraced multiracial concepts and was seen as being fair to all Fijians. When the CRC presented its findings in 1996, its 800-page report urged for the creation of non-communal seats in parliament, where all Fijians could vote and stand for election. The report asked for 12 seats to be reserved for Fijians, 10 for Indians, 2 for other races, and the remainder (45) to be from a common electoral roll. It did accept that there could be a provision that ensured that the president had to be an indigenous Fijian, but did not believe that this provision should also apply to the office of the prime minister.

The result was the 1997 constitution, which went some way to meeting the points raised by the CRC. It allowed for a House of Representatives of 71 seats, with 23 being reserved for Fijians, 19 for Indians, 1 for Rotumans, and 3 for other races, with 25 open seats. Against the CRC report, the Great Council of Chiefs had the power to appoint the president, and it was compulsory to have a multi-party government so that any party which managed to get more than 10 percent of the seats was entitled to join the new government. There was also a Bill of Rights which outlawed racial discrimination, guaranteed freedom of speech and association and the right of equality before the law, and ensured the independence of the judiciary. With the passing of the Constitution (Amendment) Bill of 1997 the new constitution became law. Sitiveni Rabuka then apologized to Queen Elizabeth II for the 1989 Declaration of a Republic, and Fiji rejoined the Commonwealth on July 27, 1997.

The Fijian economy had been hard hit during the early 1990s. First, there was a long drought which wrecked much of the sugar cane crop. Then there was the outflow of Indian professionals and their capital. Finally, the Asian economic crisis resulted in a plunge in the number of Asian tourists going to Fiji.

In the May 8–15, 1999 elections, Fijian voters rejected Rabuka and the SVT. The FLP, led by Mahendra Chaudry, won a majority of seats in the House of Representatives and took power in coalition with the FAP. The SVT suddenly saw itself marginalized, and the NFP, led by former opposition leader Jai Ram Reddy, which had planned on an alliance with the SVT, was also marginalized. Rabuka resigned from the SVT and then from the House of Representatives and was elected chairman of the Great Council of Chiefs on June 17.

On May 19, 2000, the first anniversary of Mahendra Chaudry coming to power, a group of armed men led by failed businessman George Speight invaded the parliament and took hostage Chaudry and 30 other senior politicians. They declared themselves in favor of Fijian rights as hundreds of supporters of the coup then attacked and looted Indian businesses in Suva. The outbreak of violence occupied the police while Speight and his armed supporters were able to entrench themselves and secure the grounds of the parliament against any attack. President Ratu Sir Kamisese Mara then declared a state of emergency.

The Great Council of Chiefs offered major concessions in return for the release of Chaudry and the other hostages, and on May 27 Ratu Mara announced that he had dismissed the Chaudry government and offered amnesty to George Speight. By this time Speight was giving regular interviews to the press, revealing his charisma. His control of the parliamentary compound by armed supporters and large numbers of poor Fijians who could come to his aid when needed, also became evident. Although Australia, New Zealand, and many other countries condemned the coup, no diplomatic action was taken against Speight for fear of reprisals against Chaudry and the other hostages.

The situation in Fiji changed again on May 29 when Commodore Frank Bainimarama, the commander-in-chief of the armed forces, announced that Ratu Mara had resigned as president, and that the military had imposed martial law and a curfew. Negotiations with Speight continued and on June 6 Fiji was partially suspended from the Commonwealth. Ten days later the new Military Executive Council announced that it would amend the 1997 constitution which had given the Indo-Fijians more political rights. On July 12 nine of the hostages were released, and on the following day Chaudry and the other 17 still held were also freed. Laisenia Qarase, leader of the United Fiji Party, formed an interim government with elections to be held within three years.

On July 26 the amnesty was lifted and George Speight was arrested. In the next week more than 500 of his supporters were also arrested, with 300 of them charged with unlawful assembly. Speight argued that he was still covered by the amnesty, but even that only covered actions from the date of the coup of May 19, 2000, leaving Speight open to charges of preparing an armed rebellion which clearly took place before the date of the actual coup. On August 11 Speight and 14 of his most prominent supporters were charged with treason and conspiracy to commit treason with armed force.

Fiji was in turmoil again soon afterwards with the Counter Revolutionary Warfare unit of the Fijian armed forces staging a mutiny on November 2, 2000. Eight of the officers in the unit had been charged with treason, and the mutiny attempt, during which Commodore Frank Bainimarama only narrowly escaped capture, was seen as possibly another coup attempt – eight soldiers died in that action. On November 15, 2000 the High Court ruled that Bainimarama's abrogation of the 1997 constitution was illegal and restored Ratu Mara as president, declaring the government of interim prime minister Laisenia Qarase illegal. The matter was appealed, and Ratu Mara retired from public life, dying four years later. In the meantime Laisenia Qarase was sworn in as prime minister and formed a Cabinet made up of entirely ethnic Fijians, which was sworn in on September 10.

George Speight and ten of his associates were found guilty of treason on February 18, 2002 for their role in the May 2000 coup. Speight himself was sentenced to death but the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. In April it was announced that the new Fijian constitution would be put to the people in a referendum. On November 6, 2002, 15 members of the Counter Revolutionary Warfare unit were found guilty of mutiny in their attempt to overthrow Commodore Frank Bainimarama. On May 8, 2003 Jopi Seniloli, one of the people arrested for the swearing in of the Speight provisional government in May 2000, was also found guilty of treason and sentenced to life imprisonment.

On June 3, 2003 Rabuka was reelected president of the SVT and on July 18 the Supreme Court ruled that the party of deposed prime minister Mahendra Chaudhry was entitled to hold one third of the seats in the Cabinet, but Prime Minister Laisenia Qarase rejected this. With many people still uncertain about who was exactly behind the May 2000 coup, investigations were started by the Australian Andrew Hughes, who held the post of police commissioner. His task force to investigate the coup was established on March 22, 2004.

After many warnings that he was planning a coup d'état, Commodore Frank Bainimarama finally took power on December 5, 2006, deposing Laisenia Qarase. He had warned the government that it should stop plans to introduce three bills to parliament. The main one would have questioned the legality of the 2000 attempted coup d'état, offering pardons to the participants still being held in custody, notably George Speight. Bainimarama had set a deadline of December 1, and three days later used the military to establish roadblocks around Suva. On the following day he placed key government ministers and other politicians under house arrest. The Great Council of Chiefs condemned the coup on December 7, and the Anglican archbishop was critical of the coup. However, there were no outbreaks of looting as had taken place in 2000, and although the international community disapproved of the coup, it largely remained inactive as Bainimarama initially assumed the role of the president but handed the presidency to Ratu Josefa Iloilo on January 4, 2007. On the following day Iloilo appointed Bainimarama as the interim prime minister.

Finland, civil war and revolution, 1914–1918

Kyle E. Frackman

The revolution or civil war of 1917–18 in Finland is one of the decisive events in the nation's history. Representing a forceful break with Russia, which had controlled Finland since 1809, the conflict put Finland on the short path toward independence and democratization. The concerted movement for independence began around World War I, as the Finnish political scene had previously been absent of plans for separation from Russia. The only revolutionary tendency before World War I was for a restoration of Finnish autonomy within the Russian empire.

Since the thirteenth century, Finland had been under Swedish rule, administered by Swedish-speaking nobles and bureaucrats. For some time and to varying degrees, many Finns had been dissatisfied with their position under Sweden's control. Finland found itself situated literally between these two greater powers. Nonetheless, Sweden-Finland had the benefit of a strong constitutional government, something that Russia began using to its advantage already in the eighteenth century in order to weaken the position of the Swedish monarch. In 1809, following the successful military efforts of Alexander I of Russia (1777–1825), Finland became a part of the Russian empire. As part of the Grand Duchy of Finland, Finns were promised autonomy under the Russian tsars.

From Finland's creation as a Grand Duchy through the 1880s, Finnish autonomy was largely a reality. As it had before, Russia encouraged the constitutional aspirations of Finns, because it furthered the separation of Finland from its former ruler, Sweden. Alexander III (1845–94), however, who ascended the throne in 1881, grew increasingly critical of Finland's exceptional status as an autonomous Grand Duchy. He was not alone, as concerns about Finnish connections to Germany, Sweden, and Britain abounded and agitated Russian nationalists. In 1890, Alexander III initiated a series of efforts aimed at bringing Finland under tighter Russian control. After Alexander's death and the accession of Nicholas II (1868–1918), this period of Russification continued and expanded throughout the Russian empire. In Finland, this gained full force in 1899 when Finnish legislation came under the purview of the Russian government, starting the first "period (or years) of oppression" (sortokausi or sortovuodet in Finnish).

There were several factors that contributed to the revolutionary climate in Finland in the first quarter of the twentieth century. First and foremost were conflicts and friction between Finland and Russia. The aforementioned Russification fomented conflict as it prevented or hindered Finnish control of national legislation. Finns desired representation in the Russian parliament, the Duma, created after the tsar's 1905 allowance. Largely involuntary support of the Russian military was required and simultaneously offensive to a great portion of the Finnish population. Russian involvement in official uses of Swedish and Finnish fostered Finnish national antagonism. Additionally, there was internal Russian discord over Finland's exceptional status as a Grand Duchy. Furthermore, Finns were increasingly indignant about the poor state of the Finnish economy and the country's overwhelming poverty. These sources of Finnish rancor led merely to developing support of the restoration of Finnish autonomy; up to 1910 none of the political parties was planning on Finland becoming an independent nation.

Two groups were integral in the developments surrounding Finland's conflicts with Russia. The Young Finnish Party (Nuorsuomalainen Puolue) or Young Finns (nuorsuomalaiset) became a political party in the 1890s, comprising a younger generation of Finnish speakers as well as Swedish-speaking liberals who sought a constitutional solution to problems with Russia. Many Finnish nationalists were suspicious of the Young Finns, because of their willingness to collaborate with the Swedish-speaking upper class. The Old Finns (vanhasuomalaiset) or the members of the Finnish Party (Suomalainen Puolue), on the other hand, were concerned that the Young Finns' desired resistance would further erode the Grand Duchy's autonomy and wished to cooperate as much as possible with the Russian government. Internal Russian strife, specifically the 1905 Revolution, made it possible for the Finnish Diet (Suomen valtiopäivät) to abolish the system of the four Estates with the creation of a new unicameral, 200-member legislative body, the Eduskunta. Suddenly, Finland had a progressive form of government elected by equal and universal suffrage. Despite these advances, Finnish civil rights continued to be threatened until Finland had complete independence.

Again in 1917 internal Russian affairs created a climate in which Finland's status could change. Following the "March Revolution" in which the tsar was overthrown, political dissidents who had been living in exile returned to Finland after the replacement of the Russian Governor-General Franz Albert von Seyn (1862–1918) by Mikhail Stakhovich (1861–1923). The new provisional government reinstated Finland's constitutional rights. Simultaneously, parliament convened after a 1916 election in which the Social Democratic Party (Suomen Sosialidemokraattinen Puolue) was overwhelmingly victorious and elected a government headed by Oskari Tokoi (1873–1963), who was the first socialist in the world to become prime minister of a democratically elected government. On July 18, 1917, the Eduskunta passed an Enabling Act or Power Act in order to proclaim Finland's independence from Russia in all areas except defense and foreign affairs. The Russian provisional government, however, did not accept and promptly dissolved the parliament in favor of new elections, in which the conservatives then took power. Leaders of the Democratic Party and the Trade Union Federation called a general strike for November 14, 1917. According to Oskari Tokoi, "what ensued was more than a strike; it was rebellion and revolution" (Singleton 1998: 107). A new government, elected by the Eduskunta, assumed control under the leadership of a conservative Finnish nationalist, Pehr Evind Svinhufvud (1861–1944). This new parliament issued on December 6, 1917 a declaration of independence drafted by K. J. Ståhlberg (1865–1952), which Vladimir Ilyich Lenin (1870–1924) promptly accepted.

Meanwhile, tension grew between two active segments of the population, namely the Reds (punaiset), the socialists, and the Whites (valkoiset), the non-socialist conservatives. The Finns had no army, due to the waiving of conscription for soldiers in favor of a monetary contribution to Russian military efforts. In the disorder during and following the Russian revolutions of 1917, the absence of force was filled by the Red Guards, formed by the labor movement, and the White Guards, organized and populated by conservatives and nationalist youth, volunteers from Finland and Sweden, and defectors from the Russian army. Some of the Whites had been secretly trained in the Prussian 27th Jäger Battalion, specially created to support the cause of Finnish independence from Russian and Germany's interests therein.

On January 27/28, 1918, civil war finally erupted. Overnight, the Red Guards took control of Helsinki and declared a revolutionary government, the People's Commission (Kansanvaltuuskunta), headed by Kullervo Manner (1880–1939). With the Whites headquartered in Vaasa under the command of Carl Gustaf Emil Mannerheim (1867–1951), an Imperial army general, Finland was effectively divided between the Whites' area of control in the north and the Reds' area, including the cities of Pori, Tampere, Lahti, Lappeenranta, and Viipuri in the south. In addition to the Finnish Jäger battalion, more German forces arrived in February to aid the Whites' efforts to take back Tampere and Helsinki. The latter fell on April 13, 1918 to a German expeditionary force led by General Rüdiger von der Goltz (1865–1946). The end of the civil war was celebrated with a parade in Helsinki on May 16, 1918. It has been estimated that around 5,500 men on both sides died in battles, although this figure does not include numbers of executions and deaths by neglect or starvation in prison camps. Indeed, another source approximates the casualties of the revolution to be 23,000 people, that is, those killed legally and illegally as a result of battle and acts of "terrorism."

As the violence ceased, the pressing issue facing Finns was how their government would be structured. The two options under consideration were monarchy and republic. Not unrelated to Germany's considerable involvement and support in the revolution, a German, Prince Friedrich Karl of Hesse (1868–1940), was offered the crown. The issue became irrelevant after Germany's defeat in World War I. Svinhufvud, who had been regent of Finland, stepped down and was succeeded by Mannerheim. Following new elections and a new constitution, Mannerheim lost as the right-wing candidate to Ståhlberg, a leading force behind the constitutional reform, who became the first president of the Republic of Finland.

Fitzgerald, Lord Edward (1763–1798)

Karen Sonnelitter

Lord Edward Fitzgerald was born on October 15, 1763 into the highest level of the Irish aristocracy. His father, James Fitzgerald, was the Duke of Leinster, and his mother, Emily, was the daughter of the Duke of Richmond. Lord Edward arrived in Ireland as an infant and was placed in the care of a private tutor, William Ogilvie, who schooled him according to the ultraprogressive educational theories of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. After the death of his father in 1773 his mother took her children and Ogilvie (her lover) to France.

Lord Edward embarked upon a military career in 1776, transferring regiments several times in his early years. He fought on the British side in the American Revolutionary War and in 1781 almost died in battle. His life was saved by a recently freed black slave named Tony Small, whom Lord Edward subsequently employed, but treated more as a boon companion than a servant. He and Tony Small spent some time among the Huron Indians, whom he affectionately perceived as representative of Rousseau's "noble savages." On his return to Ireland in 1783 he was "elected" to the Irish parliament for the borough of Athy in Kildare. (His seat was in fact bought for him by his brother, a common practice at the time.) He aligned himself politically with the Whig Party led by his cousin Charles James Fox, and with a group of Irish patriots, including Richard Brinsley Sheridan.

During the 1780s Fitzgerald traveled a great deal. In 1792 he experienced Parisian radicalism at its height, befriended Thomas Paine and Girondin leaders, and became an enthusiastic partisan of the French Revolution. While in France he met and married a young woman named Pamela, who was widely believed to be the unacknowledged daughter of her "governess," Madame de Genlis, and the Duke of Orléans (a.k.a. "Philippe Egalité," a member of the royal family who supported the Revolution in its early stages but was eventually guillotined).

Fitzgerald returned to Ireland in 1793 and immediately became deeply involved in revolutionary circles. In 1796 he traveled to Hamburg with Arthur O'Connor seeking French military support for an Irish rebellion. Upon his return he formally joined the Society for United Irishmen, and was the group's most experienced military leader. In 1797 he made the mistake of trusting half-hearted radical Thomas Reynolds, who betrayed Fitzgerald and the United Irish's Leinster directory to the police. Fitzgerald fled and lived in hiding for a time before his dramatic capture in May 1798. He was wounded and imprisoned in Newgate Gaol. An attempt was made to rescue him before the outbreak of the Rebellion but it failed. In prison his wounds became infected and he died in his cell on June 4, 1798.

Lord Edward Fitzgerald in life and death was the very model of a romantic revolutionary hero. Irish nationalists continue to this day to regard him as one of the most revered figures in their pantheon of martyred Irish patriots.

Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley (1890–1964)

Heather Squire

Elizabeth Gurley Flynn was a prominent labor activist, feminist, communist, and one of the founding members of the American Civil Liberties Union. The daughter of Irish immigrants, Flynn was born in Concord, New Hampshire, but raised primarily in a poor neighborhood in the Bronx (New York City). Flynn was introduced to socialism at an early age by her parents, and gave her first political speech at the age of 16. Flynn joined the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) in 1906, and a year later became a full-time organizer for the radical union.

Flynn led of a number of important IWW strikes, such as the 1912 Lawrence textile workers' strike and the 1913 Paterson silk workers' strike. The Lawrence strike was a great success, but neither she nor the other IWW leaders were able to secure a long-term presence. Still determined, however, she agitated among restaurant workers in New York, and miners in Minnesota, Montana, and Washington. She also became more vocal about women's rights at this time, championing birth control and suffrage, as well as castigating the male union leadership for not addressing the needs of women workers. From 1914 to 1915, Flynn corresponded with Joe Hill, the imprisoned IWW activist and working-class songwriter. Before his execution, Hill wrote the song "Rebel Girl" about Flynn, dedicating it to her and all the other women in the IWW.

In 1916, Flynn was the center of a controversy surrounding a court case involving two other IWW organizers, three miners, and her. The miners as well as the three IWW organizers were arrested for the murder of a hired gunman; because of a plea bargain debacle, Flynn was accused of saving herself and the organizers, and leaving the miners to face prison. As a result, she and another IWW organizer were ousted from the IWW. Four years later, Flynn co-founded the American Civil Liberties Union and was an active proponent of free speech, as well as an advocate for Sacco and Vanzetti. Flynn would be dismissed in 1940, however, due to her membership in the Communist Party.

Flynn moved to the West Coast in 1926, spending ten years as a birth control activist and continuing to support the labor movement. She joined the Communist Party in 1936. Back in New York during World War II, she ran for US Congress as an independent, but did not garner enough votes to win. In 1951, Flynn and several other Communist Party members were arrested for violating the Smith Act (a US statute that makes it illegal to "knowingly or willfully advocate, abet, advise or teach the duty, necessity, desirability or propriety of overthrowing the Government of the United States"; many political activists of the left were charged under the Smith Act in the 1950s). Flynn was found guilty and sentenced to two years in prison. Her book, The Alderson Story: My Life as a Political Prisoner (1963), details her experiences.

After her release from prison, Flynn remained politically active until her death in 1964, becoming the Communist Party national chairperson in 1961 and visiting the USSR numerous times. Flynn died in Moscow in 1964 and received a state funeral there.

Fo, Dario (b. 1926)

Mauro Stampacchia

Dario Fo is an actor, director, and playwright of international fame whose artistic career is characterized by his advocacy of civil, democratic, and workers' rights. In 1997 he was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature.

Born on March 24, 1926 in San Giano, in the province of Varese, he studied at the Brera Academy in Milan and wrote satirical texts for radio, television, and cinema. Italian public television (RAI) censored his work and that of his wife, actress Franca Rame, so heavily that they were forced to turn to theater, in many cases performing in factories and public places (Case del popolo) to appeal to popular audiences.

Fo drew on the tradition of commedia dell'arte, writing pieces on social and political issues that had great impact. In Mistero Buffo, a solo piece, he used a new theatrical language, gramelot, which was made up of words that resemble (but do not actually correspond to) many northern Italian dialects. His plays have been defined as narrative theater.

In the 1970s Fo and Rame founded La Comune, an artistic and political collective that sided with the new left and staged dramas dealing with political issues, such as Accidental Death of an Anarchist (Morte accidentale di un anarchico, 1970), which focused on the recent supposedly accidental death of anarchist activist Giuseppe Pinelli. Fo's theater pieces generally center on characters from the humble classes. For their militancy the couple have often paid a high price, facing press campaigns against them as well as subtle discrimination. Rame has even suffered physical assaults.

The Nobel Prize opened for Fo the way to international acknowledgment. He was awarded a laurea honoris causa by the University of the Sorbonne in 2005 and by La Sapienza University in Rome in 2006. In January 2006 he ran unsuccessfully in the primaries for mayor of Milan, but was elected as a councilor. Rame was elected senator in the 2006 general elections.

Fonseca, Carlos (1936–1976)

Robert Sierakowski

Carlos Fonseca Amador was born the illegitimate scion of one of the wealthiest local families in the northern mountains in the region of Matagalpa, Nicaragua. Though his father was a liberal Somoza supporter, Fonseca developed a passionate drive to overthrow the regime and the reigning social order. Early in his youth, Fonseca and childhood friend Tomás Borge (b. 1930) came upon the Marxist critique of capitalism and the necessity for a transition to socialism. The young Carlos Fonseca joined several groups that were active in the movement against the dictatorship before becoming involved in the then-outlawed Socialist Party of Nicaragua, which was the Moscow-line communist party. He attended the local National Institute of the North where he graduated at the top of his class before heading to León to attend law school at the National University of Nicaragua. While at the university he was very active in the growing anti-regime student movement, particularly through the Student Council of the National University (CUUN).

In 1957, Fonseca traveled to the Soviet Union, an experience which further solidified his commitment to a Marxist-Leninist analysis, political strategy, and vision of social change. The 1959 Cuban Revolution had a seismic effect upon Latin American politics, with a particular resonance in Nicaragua. Armed struggle and the development of a rural-based guerilla insurgency became the touchstones of leftist political praxis throughout the region. Fonseca participated in the 1959 El Chaparral invasion from Honduras led by traditional opposition parties, of which he later wrote: “it wasn’t a battle, it was the most terrible of massacres.” It was this experience that convinced him that the foundation of a new guerilla organization outside of the framework of long-established political parties was necessary. “The danger of adventurism must not become an excuse for moving at a turtle’s pace,” Fonseca argued.

In the early 1960s, Fonseca was integral in the foundation of the Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN), which went through several name-changes before settling upon the reference to Augusto César Sandino (1895–1934) in its name. Founded by Fonseca, Borge, and Silvio Mayorga, the FSLN built directly upon student activism. Fonseca’s chief contribution was in the realm of ideology. He is credited with the rediscovery and reinvention of the figure of Sandino, a guerilla leader who militarily resisted the United States occupation from 1927 until the Marines’ withdrawal in 1933. Following the cessation of hostilities, Sandino was captured and assassinated by Somoza’s National Guard. Through investigations and propaganda recasting Sandino as a “proletarian guerilla,” Fonseca created a national symbol of guerilla struggle and anti-imperialism through which he could link Che Guevara’s model to a profoundly national project. Sandino, he wrote, was “a kind of path” they could use in the struggle for national liberation. In defending the historical search for antecedents, Fonseca opined that “to the same extent that we are able to use our rifles effectively, we will also be able to revive our people’s historical traditions, and to the same extent that we master our popular traditions, we will also find ourselves able to use our rifles.” Among other activists, Fonseca earned a reputation for moral rectitude and a tireless passion to see the revolution brought to fruition.

The Sandinistas' initial attempt at recreating Sandino's struggle, a 1962–3 operation in the Ríos Coco y Bocay region, was less than successful and the FSLN returned to the urban underground. The National Guard captured and jailed Fonseca in June 1964. While imprisoned, his courtroom speech, "From Jail I Accuse the Dictatorship," allowed him to denounce the poverty, corruption, and violence with which the Somozas and their American backers had saddled Nicaragua. After popular pressure won his release, he was deported to Mexico and continued to be active in the exile communities of Latin American countries, fomenting opposition to the dictatorship.

In 1967, Fonseca and his fellow Sandinistas again attempted to draw on Che Guevara's foco model of guerilla strategy in the isolated northern regions of Nicaragua. In Pancasán, the FSLN lost much of its leadership members in a very uneven confrontation. Fonseca himself was badly wounded and left the country, only to be jailed for a bank robbery in Costa Rica. He was only freed when a fellow Sandinista carried out an airplane hijacking in 1970.

As Fonseca languished in exile in Havana, the FSLN divided into various factions in disagreement over the correct manner for combating the dictatorship. Without taking sides, Fonseca entered the country clandestinely in 1976 and headed for the mountainous guerilla zone, hoping to bring the three factions together. In an isolated group and on the run, Fonseca would fall victim to the National Guard, being shot in Zinica, Matagalpa, in November 1976.

In 1979, the Somoza regime fell to a popular insurrection, largely under the leadership of the Sandinistas. Of the FSLN's early leadership, only Fonseca's childhood friend Tomás Borge remained alive. With the advent of the Sandinista Revolution in power, Fonseca was elevated by the governing Sandinistas to the status of national hero with his visage – tall, thin, and with thick glasses – becoming a central symbol of the revolutionary pantheon.

Food Not Bombs, United States

Stacy Warner Maddern

Food Not Bombs is a global movement of volunteers who seek to end poverty, hunger, and war by distributing surplus food to those in need. Currently, Food Not Bombs has hundreds of autonomous chapters throughout the world that share free vegetarian food with hungry people as a means of protesting war and poverty. As a grassroots organization its activity has spread not only throughout the United States, but into Europe, Africa, the Middle East, Asia, and Australia as well. In its 25-year history, Food Not Bombs has fought to end hunger and support an end to globalization of the economy, restrictions to the movements of people, and the exploitation and destruction of the earth.

Food Not Bombs was founded in Cambridge, Massachusetts after a group of anti-nuclear activists began spray painting the slogan "Money for Food Not for Bombs" on the side of a nuclear power plant. The slogan was later shortened and put into action as an all-volunteer organization dedicated to non-violent social change. The action began by recovering food that would otherwise have gone to waste, collecting it from grocery stores, bakeries, and sometimes even dumpsters. The food was then prepared into fresh hot vegetarian meals to be served outside in public spaces. The group later began providing meals at rallies, protests, and other events.

As nuclear power protesters, the first organizers in Cambridge wanted to remind people of a 1930s-style soup kitchen to highlight the waste of valuable resources on weapons while many people were hungry and homeless. At first, they thought of using actors to play the part of the homeless, but then realized that they could feed the actual homeless as a means of protest. They began by distributing flyers at local shelters and collected day-old bread from bakeries and fruit and vegetables from local co-ops. The next morning they set up a table with a huge pot of soup in front of the Federal Reserve Building in Boston and nearly a hundred homeless showed up for a meal. Thus, a movement was born.

By the summer of 1988, Food Not Bombs was operating in Boston, San Francisco, and Washington, DC, but it did not become a national movement until the San Francisco chapter was shut down by riot police for serving free food in Golden Gate Park. By the end of that summer a total of 94 arrests would be made in San Francisco as successive mayors Art Agnos and Frank Jordan instituted campaigns to criminalize the organization, leading to 700 felony arrests for sharing free food. In the wake of such events, instead of defeat, the organization only grew. Because of the media attention that Food Not Bombs was getting in San Francisco, other chapters began to form all over the world in the 1990s.

Food Not Bombs states as a fundamental principle that “society needs to promote life, not death.” Its criticism is that societies, in general, spend far too much time concerned with developing, using, and threatening to use weapons of massive human and planetary destruction. Because governments spend money on bombs instead of food, violence and poverty are exacerbated.

On the revolutionary premise, Food Not Bombs commits neither its time nor its resources to attack, tear down, or overthrow the existing power structure. Instead, it exerts its rights of free speech and association to challenge the power elite. While the idea of food recovery and recycling is not new, it is a revolutionary concept to recover large amounts of food in an organized and consistent manner in order to feed the hungry.

Food Not Bombs provides food to those who want it without the bureaucratic control that often attempts to humiliate those who are poor. It also invites those who are receiving food to provide it as well, allowing them an opportunity to regain their self-esteem by recognizing their ability to contribute. It also provides food and supplies to the survivors of natural disasters and terrorist attacks. In 1989, after an earthquake shook San Francisco, Food Not Bombs was the only organization providing hot meals to survivors. It also provided hot meals to the rescue workers responding to the September 11 World Trade Center attacks, as well as the survivors of both the Asian tsunami and Hurricane Katrina. Supporting protest against the Iraq War, Food Not Bombs has supplied food to protests on a global scale. Because of its involvement with the anti-war movement on the campuses of the University of Texas, Food Not Bombs was placed on the FBI’s Central Texas “Terrorist Watch List.”

Food riots

Theories of Food and Riot

“Food riot” is a term applied to mass protests over the price and accessibility of key foods. The protests usually occur in urban areas and are associated with other kinds of political organizing. The foods over which protests are made are usually staple cereals or products such as bread that are made from such cereals, though people have also rioted over other important food such as meat (Orlove 1997).

The phenomenon of people taking to the streets to protest hunger has a very long history. Cicero (106–43 BC) witnessed this first-hand, when his house was attacked by a hungry and angry mob. The first serious study of the food riot as a political phenomenon was conducted by E. P. Thompson in a piece entitled “The Moral Economy of the English Crowd in the Eighteenth Century” (1971). Thompson’s aim was to tease apart the term “riot,” situating the events surrounding this form of protest in a broader political context. Key to this was his idea that food riots were not a direct function of food shortage in the material economy, but a sign of contest over the rules of how the economy worked. He used the term “moral economy” to point to the cluster of political and pre-political ideas circulating within society that governed the natural and desirable means of the distribution of common wealth. This moral economy was not only manifest in times of protest, but a fixture of social life and governance in the eighteenth century. “The word ‘riot’ is,” Thompson observed, “too small to encompass all this” (1971: 79). His analysis offered a means to understand some of the most spectacular food riots of the eighteenth century, which were not to be found in England, but in France.

The French Revolution

Tilly (1971) points to two key features that spawned food riots, also linking them to Thompson’s idea of moral economy. First, she suggests the formation of a national market in grain eroded the kinds of local control over the economy that were possible for peasants and the urban poor to exercise in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Second, the French government’s withdrawal from strong market regulation and price-setting meant an end to the varieties of paternalism and noblesse oblige on which large swathes of the working poor depended in times of crisis.

The gap between people’s expectation of the moral economy and their experience of poverty within the material economy has been explained by development economist Amartya Sen as an “entitlement failure.” Sen’s seminal work on hunger and famine serves as a helpful corollary to Thompson – if the latter’s work made it much harder to use the term “riot” unproblematically, Sen did the same for the term “famine.” His 1981 work on the Bengal Famine of 1943, in which between 1.5 and 3 million people died, pointed to a key problem in food economics. In times of modern famine, food has always been available. Famine is, in other words, not a result of a food shortage. The reason that people died in Bengal was that they lacked the means to buy food on the open market. Having seen that this was not, then, a problem of inadequate supply or want of demand, Sen theorized this as an “entitlement failure.”

This thinking around entitlements has been deployed in understanding the French Revolution. It was, of course, about more than simply food, but the sentiment “let them eat cake” – mistakenly attributed to Marie Antoinette rather than, more plausibly, to Maria Theresa of Spain, the wife of Louis XIV – points to the tenor of the protests. Tilly notes that the Sans-Culottes had explicit food-related demands: “During the French revolution, the Maximum . . . [a] Jacobin version of ‘war communism,’ was a response to entitlement loss” (1983: 339).

It is the dynamics of the moral economy and the perception of injustice, not a simple shortage of food, which explains the emergence of mass protest in the run up to, and in the 50 years after, the French Revolution. Food riots continued in France well into the 1850s. This can again be explained with respect to shifts within the moral economy, for the shift from paternalism to laissez-faire was protracted – the replacement of one set of entitlements with another was not smooth or swift, but fragmentary, disjointed, and sometimes violent. Theorists attribute the end of protests, however, to the successful completion of the bourgeois project. Protests end when markets in food have successfully been instituted and, similarly, when other forms of protest (such as a strike for higher wages to afford better or more food) became predominant.

World War I Protests

Food riots did not, however, disappear. At the end of World War I a number of instances of food riots were observed, particularly in North America. Food riots broke out in Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, Toronto and, most notably, in New York (Frank 1985: 264). The price of food in North America had, after 1916, started to rise dramatically. Increasing quantities of North American grain were being diverted to Europe, still in the throes of the war. This drain on the grain markets, while welcomed by farmers, caused tremendous hardship in urban areas. Again, however, the hardship was widespread, but while some areas saw protest, others did not.

Beyond being in urban areas, the protests had two key common features: they were usually linked to radical (usually socialist or communist) organizations and the majority of participants and organizers were women. The idea of a moral economy works well here. The gap between expectations and reality was fueled, on the one hand, by food price inflation making food less attainable, and on the other by revolutionary organizing that suggested an economic logic at variance with capitalism. There were, furthermore, no ready alternative means for women to register their protest. In the US, the Nineteenth Amendment to the Constitution, recognizing women's right to vote, was only passed in 1920, about five years later (with some variation across provinces) than in Canada. The streets were the only place that women could make their voices heard. Food riots were also a means through which organizing to win the vote was carried out. As a contemporary New York magazine reported, "the need of votes for women, to strengthen this new woman's movement, will be emphasized at every anti-high price meeting" (Frank 1985: 279).

It was no accident that women found themselves in the front line – the gendered division of labor laid the duties of domestic reproduction at their door. The language of protest in 1917 still rings true. Consider this quote: "With $14 a week we used to just make a living. With prices as they are now, we could not even live on $2 a day. We would just exist." The woman who said this was interviewed in New York on the front lines of an East Side Jewish Women's protest. But she might have come from any of the developing countries that have, in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, experienced agricultural inflation-related riots.

IMF Riots

As part of the disciplines of structural adjustment, governments have rolled back state-based entitlements, particularly in the domain of social welfare. These entitlements, such as access to education, healthcare, and basic needs, are not eroded uniformly (Tilly 1983). That the disproportionate burden borne by the poor, and poor women in particular, has resulted in women's organizing, has been central (Daines & Seddon 1994) to the increasing incidence of what have been called "IMF riots." Between 1976 and 1982 there were at least 146 such riots, with a peak at the beginning of the widespread imposition of monetarist economic policy between 1983 and 1985. Explaining this, Walton and Seddon suggest that austerity protests be defined as "large-scale collective actions including political demonstrations, general strikes, and riots, which are animated by grievances over state policies of economic liberalization, implemented in response to the debt crisis and market reforms urged by international agencies" (1994: 39). They further suggest that because the economic policies that mandated austerity were often authored by multilateral institutions such as the World Bank and International Monetary Fund, such protests have come to be called IMF riots. The term can, however, be a little misleading, in that it suggests that the ire of the crowds was directed exclusively at a Bretton Woods institution rather than at a cluster of individuals and policies, domestic and international. Indeed, the strength of the link between actual IMF involvement in economic policy management and subsequent riots has been disputed. Despite strong claims for an association between the two (Walton & Ragin 1990), some scholars have seen a more complex relationship, in which IMF riots occur either at the beginning or several years after a structural adjustment policy.

Thompson's theories of moral economy continue to be useful in explaining these phenomena. Again, the incidence of protest is not correlated to material indicators of deprivation, but to the gap between expected and actual entitlements, and the available repertoire of forms of protest. Pre-existing political organizing, whether in unions, Islamic brotherhoods, churches, or housewives' clubs, raises expectations, and expands the repertoire of protest.

Recently, however, a new phenomenon has precipitated a fresh round of food riots. In 2007 grain harvests were particularly poor. This combined with the high price of fossil fuels (used throughout fertilizer and farming processes), an increasing demand for meat (and therefore feedgrain for livestock), and a reduction in the available food supply due to demand for bio-fuels, led to increasing prices for food. The price rises, known as "agflation," have been so rapid that even modest expectations of entitlement have been rendered moot. With governments increasingly unresponsive to popular pressure (most structural adjustment programs are unpopular), conventional petitions to parliaments are often ineffective.

Thus, in the period 2007–8, the world has seen widespread political protest around food, from the pasta protests of Italy, to Mexican tortilla riots which resulted in a government promise for price stability, to the rise of protests in parts of Africa considered immune to them, such as Senegal, Burkina Faso, and Mauritania. It seems as if the food riot is not quite ready for the dustbin of history.

Food sovereignty and protest

Brenda Biddle

Origins and Definitions of Food Sovereignty

Food sovereignty is an alternative model for agriculture and trade first introduced in Rome at the World Food Summit in 1996 by Via Campesina, a transnational movement of peasants and small farmers. Via Campesina was formed in 1993 by farm leaders from various countries to address the escalating global agrarian crisis experienced by small farmers, peasants, fisher people, pastoralists, and landless laborers in food production. Initially a concept that critics dismissed as utopian, food sovereignty is increasingly promoted and supported by social movements, non-profit organizations, academics, consumer groups, the former UN (United Nations) Rapporteur on the Right to Food, as well as several regional and national governments.

The fundamental premise of food sovereignty is that food is more than a commodity to be traded on world markets; it is a basic human right, inscribed in international law. For the right to food to be realized, peoples, communities, and nations must have the autonomy to determine their own food and agriculture policies, ones that are socially, culturally, and environmentally appropriate to their unique circumstances. Food sovereignty advocates do not oppose all international trade, but free trade policies, such as those enshrined in NAFTA (North American Free Trade Agreement) in 1994, and in the Agreement on Agriculture of the Uruguay Round, activated with the creation of the World Trade Organization (WTO) in 1995, and multiple bilateral treaties and Free Trade Agreements (FTAs). These trade agreements override or dismantle national policies, such as supply management, price floors, food security reserves, and even health standards needed by governments to guarantee the right to food.

Background

The Via Campesina has had a strong presence at global justice events, G8 meetings, WTO ministerials, and NGO (non-governmental organization) forums on food and agriculture. More than a decade of dialogue about hunger, poverty, world trade, rural displacement, agrarian reform, and peasants' rights has taken place between Via Campesina members, international NGOs, and other members of civil society, resulting in the dissemination of the food sovereignty platform in a further proliferation of texts, conferences, websites, blogs, theatrical performances, tribunals, caravans, marches, and other actions related to promoting food sovereignty at local, regional, and global levels. One of these international gatherings was a parallel civil society forum held in conjunction with the High Level Conference on World Food Security in June 2008 at the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) in Rome. The alternative forum, organized by the International Planning Committee for Food Sovereignty (IPC) was called Terra Preta: Forum on the Food Crisis, Climate Change, Agro Fuels and Food Sovereignty.

In May 2007, in the village of Nyéléni, Mali, food sovereignty held another international gathering. Via Campesina worked with members of other major global civil society groups including IPC, Food Sovereignty Network; World March of Women; two international forums of fisher people; and ROPPA, a network of farmer and producer organizations of West Africa.

Principles of Food Sovereignty

From 1996 onward the Vía Campesina platform for food sovereignty encompassed varying principles, including food as a basic human right and food as first and foremost a source of nutrition for people and only secondarily an item for trade. Food sovereignty entails the proper stewardship of natural resources based on both the practice of agro-ecology and traditions of peasant knowledge, and real agrarian reform is necessary. Food sovereignty opposes corporate control of multinationals over food and agriculture. The organization opposes multilateral trade and economic agency policies that commercialize food – the WTO, the International Monetary Fund (IMF), and the World Bank (WB). Food sovereignty seeks to curtail new trade conventions, including biopiracy, and patenting of life forms. The platform seeks gender equity in all practices and policies related to food production, and freedom from violence and oppression; and seeks to end ongoing displacement of rural people. The organizers seek to advance the voice of small-scale agriculturalists and traditional food producers – including fishermen and nomadic herdsmen, indigenous people, and rural women – in determining agricultural policies at all levels.

Subsequent definitions of food sovereignty stress the importance of access for all people, especially women and marginalized groups, to productive resources, such as land and water, and of traditional practices such as seed saving. Vía Campesina and other groups in the food sovereignty movement also call for the democratic creation of an International Commission on Sustainable Agriculture and Food Sovereignty, as well as an independent dispute settlement mechanism to be tied to an international court of justice to enforce the prohibition against commodity dumping which disrupts local agricultural markets.

According to an extensive 2005 report on food sovereignty by the Food First Information and Action Network (FIAN) most of the analyses about the need for food sovereignty written in the last 12 years converge, but policy proposals about enacting it diverge. This is to be expected since food sovereignty is not a top-down concept, to be imposed by one group on another; it is a flexible, grassroots, participatory model based on the principles listed above.

Current Dimensions of Food Sovereignty

Food sovereignty is gaining considerable traction as a policy platform. Several national governments, including Mali, Bolivia, Nepal, and Venezuela, have embraced the concept and some have written it into their constitutions. The International Assessment of Agricultural Knowledge, Science, and Technology for Development (IAASTD) released a series of reports based on four years of research, jointly sponsored by the World Bank, farmers' organizations, and agribusiness and biotech firms (who eventually pulled out). The findings confirm that the type of production that food sovereignty promotes – sustainable, small-scale, based on techniques of agro-ecology that are adapted to local needs and conditions – is the way forward for world agriculture in this age of climate change and vanishing resources.

In June 2008, 12 years after Vía Campesina first introduced the idea of food sovereignty at the FAO, an emergency meeting of the High Level Conference on World Food Security was held at the FAO. Attended by several heads of state, this high-profile meeting was convened to discuss factors in the current world food crisis – ever rising food prices for consumers, the growing demand for biofuels, the annual addition of one million hungry people to the ranks of the 854 million lacking adequate food, the outbreak of food riots around the globe, and the potential destabilization of 34 national governments.

The official meeting on World Food Security, previously one of the few multilateral arenas in which Via Campesina has consistently engaged in dialogue, ignored the IAASTD report on the future of agriculture, and the joint statements on food sovereignty produced by Via Campesina and a multitude of civil society allies at the Terra Preta parallel forum. The official summit concluded that the dominant paradigm of neoliberal, corporate, agro-industrial agriculture, based on trade liberalization and chemical inputs of biotechnology, was a means to expand food availability for the rapidly growing ranks of poorly nourished people in the world. Food sovereignty advocates disagreed.

At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, the global corporate agriculture model and the food sovereignty model, based on small-scale, sustainable, healthy, local food production, were at odds. Food sovereignty is more than a program or policy, but represents a paradigm. As an organizing principle, food sovereignty delineates two paradigms, the past and the future. The old paradigm stresses industrial rationality and corporate profit as the ultimate good; the new paradigm, one that peasants have struggled for over hundreds of years, demands access to the commons, sustainability, and freedom from hunger as ultimate goods.

Foreign intervention and revolution

Paul Rubinson

The importance of foreign intervention and external forces on a revolution cannot be overestimated. Each of these factors can both cause a revolution and determine the outcome. States do not exist, and revolutions do not occur, in a vacuum. The fates of states and revolutions depend to a large extent on the actions of other powerful state actors in the geopolitical landscape. Scholars have shown that war, ideology, and imperialism can act as agents of revolution and counter-revolution; furthermore, these three factors can also be the targets of revolutions and revolutionaries themselves. Specifically, war can cause a country to become destabilized enough to encourage the outbreak of revolution. Alternately, countries themselves can initiate wars in order to spread revolutions. Using war intentionally to spread revolution usually stems from a revolutionary ideology. Imperialism (an ideology of its own) acts to repress revolution by forcing states into colonial subservience, though this process inspires as many revolutions as it thwarts. Other scholars have analyzed the role of foreign powers in revolutions through the lens of world systems theory, which offers an attempt to make and test predictions about the effects of external factors on revolutions. Finally, scholars have also begun to study what revolutionaries themselves have thought and done about foreign intervention during revolutions.

War: Forcing Revolutions

Scholars have long recognized that of all the ways nations interact, war has the most potential to influence revolutions. Sociologist Charles Tilly, an experienced scholar of social movements and revolutions, argues that the “connections among state-making, the building of armed forces, and the maintenance of internal control help account for the tendency of revolutions to occur in conjunction with the preparation and the termination of war” (1975). The most direct way in which war leads to revolution, according to Tilly, is by destabilizing in one way or another the state’s control of the means of violence. Tilly identifies two general paths this process could take: first, “the exaction of men, supplies, and – especially – taxes for the conduct of war incites resistance from crucial elites or important masses,” and second, “the absorption or weakening of a government’s repressive capacity by war, coupled with a decline in the government’s ability to meet its domestic commitments, encourages its enemies to rebel.” The state suddenly finds itself with depleted “coercive reserves.” Preparation for war and a build-up of the means of social control lead to what Tilly (1975) describes as a paradox: “the building up of the government’s coercive capacity for war sometimes has that very consequence [of encouraging revolution], because it leads to diversion, dilution, disloyalty or defeat of the forces destined for domestic control.”

Skocpol and Social Revolutions

In 1979 Theda Skocpol published a landmark comparative study of the Chinese, French, and Russian revolutions that further elaborated the role of war in the making of revolutions. In States and Social Revolutions, Skocpol argues that these three revolutions, in very different time periods and disparate parts of the world, stemmed from remarkably similar factors. In all three cases, war with foreign nations acted as an external force that destabilized power in each state. The disruption of a war – especially when the war does not go well – creates opportunities for revolutionaries. But war alone is not enough. In China, France, and Russia, war combined with internal distress to force a government collapse (war alone can often unify a nation behind its flag and prevent revolution). In Skocpol’s words, “a combination of unusual external pressures with particular internal structures and developments” can spark a “revolutionary political crisis.”

In the cases of China, France, and Russia, revolution did not arise from within the state. Instead, external forces created the instability that eventually led to internal revolutions. France under the Bourbons, Russia under the Romanovs, and China under the Manchu all found themselves in conflict with neighboring states. These neighboring states had, in each instance, overwhelming economic and military power, having already achieved an industrialized economy and military. Thus, in order to preserve their states, the ruling classes had to transform completely the socioeconomic structures with which they ruled their states.

Notably, these three states all proved unable to transform and instead became paralyzed. In Skocpol’s (1979) words, revolutionary political crises, culminating in administrative and military breakdowns, emerged because the imperial states became caught in cross-pressures between intensified military competition or intrusions from abroad and constraints imposed on monarchical responses by the existing agrarian class structures and political institutions. The old-regime states were prone to such revolutionary crises because their existing structures made it impossible for them to meet the particular international military exigencies that each had to face in the modern era.

Any attempts to reform signaled the weakness of the old regime. With the old regime revealed as weak, class struggles broke out in each state that eventually led to revolution.

China

For centuries, and well into our own present day, capitalists in western nations have looked to China’s tremendous population with greed and envy. The competition to open and control China as a market for western goods has caused numerous geopolitical conflicts during vastly different eras of history – Columbus, after all, had hoped to find a faster route to China in 1492 (of course, by the twenty-first century, the situation had become reversed, with the United States becoming the market for goods produced in China by cheap Chinese labor). At any rate, in the mid-nineteenth century, industrial empires from the West attempted to seize control of the China market. Britain's Opium Wars (1839–42) menaced the Chinese Empire from the outside, just as the internal government structure came unbalanced from within.

External powers continued to weaken the authority of China's government. As Skocpol notes, China lost a war against Japan in 1895, forcing the government to realize it must reform from within or face destruction from external forces. France and Germany followed Britain's scramble for the China market, which resulted in the carving up of China into various "spheres of influence" controlled by foreign empires. The United States, arriving too late to win its own sphere, called for an "Open Door" policy, essentially a plea to replace the spheres system with a free market. Eventually, the foreign intervention inspired nationalist rebellions in China, of which the Boxer Rebellion (beginning in 1899) was the most notable.

At the turn of the century, China's imperial government slowly began reforms to preserve power, but quickly learned that reform movements can harm governments as often as they can help them – as happened with Mikhail Gorbachev's glasnost and perestroika reforms of the late 1980s which undermined Communist Party authority in the Soviet Union. In China the reform movement similarly undermined the government and revolution began in 1911.

France

As with China, France felt "unwonted pressures from more developed nations abroad," which led to internal class conflicts in the French homeland. In Skocpol's (1979) words, by early 1793 foreign enemies were pressing in anew upon France. Simultaneously there were internal revolts. Spurred by the threat of conscription to the national army, the peasants of the Vendée rose against the revolutionary government in March. . . . What emerged to meet the crisis of defending the Revolution from its armed enemies at home and abroad was a dictatorial and arbitrary system of government.

Eventually, of course, Napoleon took control of the revolution and embarked upon a military conquest of Europe, in the process forcing revolutionary changes across the continent.

Russia

Skocpol's analysis of the Russian Revolution illustrates how external factors besides war can indirectly encourage a revolution. By the late 1800s, according to Skocpol, Russia's process of industrialization had "international implications." In other words, the Russian state and economy had become tied more and more to Europe. Foreign capital had invested heavily in Russia, whose economy depended upon agricultural exports to England and Germany, as well as loans from England, Germany, and France. Thus, when a depression swept Europe in 1899–1900, the Russian economy fell apart.

Ultimately, however, it was war that led directly to the Russian Revolution – specifically, the debacle of World War I. Overpowered by Germany, Russia's experience in World War I proved so devastating by 1917 that the government brokered a settlement and withdrew from the war. Subsequently, the Russian state essentially collapsed, replaced after a civil war by a communist system.

Exceptions: Japan and Prussia

In some cases, Skocpol shows, foreign intervention does not lead to revolution. During the nineteenth century, states facing threats from an industrialized nation could avoid revolution by adapting to a western-style government. Japan, for example, faced foreign interventions during the nineteenth century, but instead of revolution, Japan simply transformed into a western-style nation during the Meiji Restoration. This transformation could take place, Skocpol argues, because there was no "politically powerful landed upper class." As a consequence, reform did not instigate class conflicts as it had in China. Similarly, Skocpol shows that after invasion by Napoleon, Prussia refused to collapse entirely. Instead, it adapted, as the Junkers passed economic reforms, freed serfs, and started universal military conscription – a move that encouraged a nationalist fever following years of French intervention. As a result, war did not lead to revolution as in China and France. Eventually, German unification in the mid-nineteenth century quickened Germany's emergence as the most powerful state in Europe.

In all these cases, however, foreign conflict led to drastic change, be it a genuine revolution or transformation into a state that resembled the foreign power itself. Where the ruling class had greater control, they remained in power; elsewhere, misfortune in war signaled a weakness that allowed class conflict to turn into revolution. Therefore, war must be considered the swiftest and most dramatic way in which external forces can influence the structure of states.

Ideology: Exporting Revolution

Inherent in Tilly's and Skocpol's analyses is the fact that war so often causes revolutions because war itself occurs as a regular and ordinary feature of the nation-state system. Sometimes, however, revolution can be the policy of a state's ideology. In other words, ideology urges a state to attempt to cause revolutions abroad; war is but the best instrument for doing so. Thus, where the above analysis sees revolution as a likely but essentially accidental outcome of war, the following analysis looks at war as a method of intentionally creating revolutions.

Revolutionary France

Although the export of revolution is most commonly associated with the communist nations of the twentieth century, the French Revolution, begun in 1789, led to a similar policy. During the early nineteenth century, the French Emperor Napoleon embarked on a conquest of Europe, establishing democratic states in all the conquered lands. Tilly (1975) explains: "With the French Revolution and its Napoleonic aftermath, state-building received a new emphasis while the concept of the nation and of the nation-state became full blown both in the sense of a shared community of purposes, privileges, and benefits, and in the sense of a 'peculiar people' exercising its right of self-determination." Napoleon's conquest resulted in the spread of a democratic and nationalistic ideology, which "now became a political dogma that was self-consciously grasped and philosophically elaborate and embellished." More recently, modern states have attempted to create "regime change" – essentially a revolution without violence – through the process of "nation building," the efficacy of which has been clearly revealed by the cataclysm of violence unleashed by the US war with Iraq, which began in 2003.

Communism

Most instances of exporting revolution stem from the Marxist and Leninist goals of spreading revolutions across countries through the power of the proletariat. Indeed, Marx himself expected the working class to do as much, judging by his remarks in the Communist Manifesto:

The Communists are distinguished from the other working-class parties by this only: (1) In the national struggles of the proletariat of the different countries, they point out and bring to the front the common interests of the entire proletariat, independently of all nationality. (2) In the various stages of development which the struggle of the working class against the bourgeoisie has to pass through, they always and everywhere represent the interests of the movement as a whole.

The conception of working-class solidarity embodied by communism essentially urged the proletariat to erase such concepts as nationalism and borders by subverting national boundaries and joining with fellow workers in other countries. The Manifesto continues:

The working men have no country. We cannot take from them what they have not got. Since the proletariat must first of all acquire political supremacy, must rise to be the leading class of the nation, must constitute itself as the nation, it is, so far, itself the nation, though not in the bourgeois sense of the word. National differences, and antagonisms between peoples, are daily more and more vanishing, owing to the development of the bourgeoisie, to freedom of commerce, to the world market, to uniformity in the mode of production and in the conditions of life corresponding thereto. The supremacy of the proletariat will cause them to vanish still faster. United action, of the leading civilized countries at least, is one of the first conditions for the emancipation of the proletariat. In proportion as the exploitation of one individual by another is put an end to, the exploitation of one nation by another will also be put an end to. In proportion as the antagonism between classes within the nation vanishes, the hostility of one nation to another will come to an end.

Shortly after the consolidation of the Soviet Union, Lenin made it the official policy of the proletariat to seek revolution in the industrial world. For the rest of the first half of the twentieth century, however, a transition to communist rule most often occurred not by workers' uprisings, but behind the gun barrels of the Red Army as it liberated Eastern Europe from Nazi rule and replaced it with puppet communist governments. In China, however, Mao Zedong's 1949 triumph reflected both indigenous communist rebellion as well as aid from the Soviet Union. Camaraderie between China and the Soviet Union quickly turned to enmity by the late 1950s, however. Each nation vowed to support national "wars of liberation" in the Third World; this common cause sprang not from solidarity but from a competition for the allegiance of the Third World and for the mantle of true revolutionary power.

Despite their rivalry, the Soviet Union and China encouraged a host of revolutionary movements throughout the second half of the twentieth century. In the 1960s Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev promised to "bring imperialism to its knees" by supporting "wars for national liberation." He declared that "Communists are revolutionaries, and it would be a bad thing if they did not exploit new opportunities." Thus the Soviet Union supported struggles against western imperialism throughout the Third World, especially Latin America and the Middle East. China meanwhile supported communists in Indochina (later Vietnam) led by Ho Chi Minh in their fight against French colonization and, later, American militarism.

Even indigenous movements, such as Fidel Castro's Cuban Revolution (1959), eventually found support from the Soviet Union. Because of the Soviet support, Cuba itself supported in turn other revolutions, as the communist-Soviet-revolutionary ethos mandated. One cannot dismiss revolutionary rhetoric as merely symbolic, however. Instead, the concept bred a shared solidarity and purpose among many people. In a word, ideology mattered – Cuba, for example, aided revolutions in Africa despite the risk of alienating potential allies like France.

Piero Gleijeses has offered the most penetrating analysis of Cuba's efforts to aid revolutionaries, especially in Africa. Throughout the 1960s, Cubans – often led by Che Guevara – participated in several African missions to support revolutions. Cuba's assistance in Zaire, for example, proved to be "Cuba's most daring move yet in the Third World," according to Gleijeses (2002); "more Cubans fought in Zaire than in all of Latin America through the first two decades of the Castro regime."

More than perhaps any communist nation, Cuba embraced the concept of spreading and supporting revolutions. Lúcio Lara, leader of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola, talked about Cuban assistance in 1965. "We wanted only one thing from the Cubans: instructors," he said.

The war was getting difficult, and we were inexperienced. We wanted Cuban instructors because of the prestige of the Cuban Revolution and because their theory of guerrilla warfare was very close to our own. We were also impressed with the guerilla tactics of the Chinese, but Beijing was too far away, and we wanted instructors who could adapt to our way of living. (Cited in Gleijeses 2002)

In some cases, however, the revolutionary ideology did not reflect solidarity. Castro, for example, could use the pretext of aiding revolutions in a cynical, self-aggrandizing manner. After Che Guevara arrived in Bolivia hoping to aid revolutionaries, Castro essentially left Guevara to wither and eventually die in the Bolivian countryside. After his comrade's death, Castro frequently evoked Guevara's crusades in order to coopt the martyr's revolutionary efforts as his own.

Imperialism: Controlling and Causing Revolution

The ideological basis of pro-revolutionary activity in communism (especially during the twentieth century) springs from an inherent opposition to imperialism. Imperialism, however, can have its own role to play in revolutions, both within and without the context of communism. In 1958, while Castro was engaged in a rebellion against the Batista regime, but before he had embraced communism, he declared that his movement consisted entirely of a nationalism adamantly opposed to US domination of his Cuban homeland. "The Americans are going to pay dearly for what they are doing," he stated. "When this war is over, I'll start a much longer and bigger war of my own: the war I'm going to fight against them. That will be my true destiny."

Imperialism has two types of effects on revolutions. On a basic level, imperial powers hope to suppress revolutions in colonial lands in order to protect and maintain their economic and national interests. At the same time, as Castro's words indicate, imperialism can plant the seeds of opposition exactly because of this suppression. Many examples indicate that empires have caused as many revolutions as they have suppressed by inspiring nationalist movements against imperialism.

From the perspective of an imperial nation, their role in revolutions is to thwart them. The imperial system prefers stability, often at the expense of ideology. Thus the United States, formed in its own Revolutionary War, has attempted to stop and frequently stifled many revolutions, often siding with imperial and autocratic powers to do so. For example, President Woodrow Wilson ordered US troops to Russia during the 1917 revolution in an attempt to stop a communist victory. Throughout the early twentieth century the United States backed a corrupt Chiang Kai-Shek against Mao's communist insurgency. And in Latin America the United States has consistently intervened, using more-or-less covert operations to overturn or prevent genuine populist revolutions and governments and instead install leaders of its own choosing. In 1954, for just one example, the CIA overthrew Jacobo Arbenz, the popularly elected leader of Guatemala who had nationalized 400,000 acres of land belonging to the United Fruit Corporation, a US company. The new leader installed by the CIA instantly returned the land to United Fruit. As another example, in 1965 the Lyndon Johnson administration interrupted a civil war in the Dominican Republic that had broken out after the fall of dictator Rafael Trujillo. Unwilling to let revolution and counter-revolution take its course, the United States sent thousands of Marines to the Dominican Republic in order to establish a regime of which it approved. In other revolutions, the United States would merely support one of the contestants for power, as when Wilson alternately supported Venustiano Carranza, Pancho Villa, and Carranza again during the Mexican revolution of the early twentieth century.

The United States is not unique in betraying its revolutionary ideals. Although the Soviet Union pledged support for Third World revolutionaries during the Cold War, Soviet leaders would not tolerate revolutionary yearnings among its own captive satellite nations. Thus the USSR brutally repressed anti-Soviet

(and thus anti-imperialist) uprisings in Hungary (1956) and Czechoslovakia (1968).

The influence or rule of an imperial power can also have the opposite effect: inspiring a nationalist revolution. The Cuban Revolution, as we have seen, started because the grip of the United States on Cuba became unbearable. Iran's revolution, begun in 1978, started as a backlash against the Shah of Iran, who the CIA had installed in the 1950s. The many conflicts that ravaged Africa during the 1960s also contained more anti-imperialist than pro-communist ideology. While Che Guevara oversaw the Cuban efforts in Zaire, he told a reporter: "I have found here in Africa . . . entire populations that are, if you'll allow me this image, like water on the verge of boiling. I have found leaders who understand the importance of the struggle against colonialism and neocolonialism."

World Systems Theory: Predicting Foreign Intervention

World systems theory, as espoused by Immanuel Wallerstein and his disciples, offers a useful theoretical framework in which to view the relationship between external factors and revolutions. In short, world systems theory sees the world as divided into a core of capitalist nations that exploit peripheral regions as producers of raw materials and as markets for consumer goods. Thus, intervention in revolutions occurs as the result of the core attempting to keep the periphery docile. According to David Kowalewski (1991), the nature of world systems theory suggests that core nations will intervene when the periphery exhibits "revolutionary activity." Because the economy of the core nations depends on the raw materials and markets of the periphery, revolutions threaten to disrupt the core's hegemony and economy since revolutions discourage investment, target elites in the periphery, and seek to spread to other nations.

Intervention by the core in the periphery does not occur in a perfectly consistent manner, however. At different times in history, Kowalewski (1991) shows, the core has dedicated very different amounts of time and resources to preventing revolutionary activity in the periphery. World systems theory predicts that intervention in revolutions will occur more often during a growing economy (what world systems theorists would call an expansion of the Kondratieff cycle of the world economy). The core wants greater control over the periphery to maximize profits, hence revolutions are more threatening when the economy exhibits growth. At the same time, the core has an increased tax base enabling the state to fund military ventures and maintain a high standard of living at home. Finally, a good economy shifts the nation's attention away from domestic issues and toward international relations; as a result, the core becomes more confrontational. When the economy stagnates, on the other hand, economic expansion subsides, resulting in retrenchment at home. Production output drops, the value of raw materials from the periphery falls, and revolution appears as far less of a threat to the core. Additionally, in times of economic stagnation, few among the populace of the core nations support expensive military intervention abroad.

Politics also plays a role in determining the likelihood of core intervention in revolutions, Kowalewski (1991) argues. When one nation dominates the core – acting as a hegemon – competition among the core states declines. Control of the periphery becomes the responsibility of the lone hegemon, and intervention in the periphery becomes less common. When no single hegemon exists, however, intervention becomes more likely because the core is in flux and competing nations hope to take advantage of the periphery, such as when France aided the American Revolution in order to harm its rival, Great Britain. Ascending core nations, such as the Soviet Union and China during the Cold War, might even encourage revolutions in the periphery in order to destabilize the core. In short, when no clear hegemon exists, rivalry within the core makes the periphery more important and revolutions there more of a threat, causing the likelihood of intervention in the periphery by the core to increase.

At times, then, intervention in revolutions can be “periphery-driven” in that more revolutions result in more intervention by the core. When the economy is strong, the core-periphery power structure is destabilized by revolution and restabilized by intervention. But revolutions can be “core-driven” as well, particularly when no hegemon dominates the core. At these times, revolutions can be a threat to one core nation but opportunity to another. In summary, at all times the core hopes to control the periphery, but intervention becomes more likely during times of economic expansion and non-hegemony. When the global economy contracts and when a hegemon dominates, revolutions in the periphery merit only a moderate response from the core.

Revolutionaries: Crafting Foreign Policy

Although scholars have long recognized the importance of external factors for revolutions, revolutionaries themselves have for just as long or longer known to take external factors into account. In essence, modern revolutionary movements have developed their own unique foreign policies. Some of the most innovative and recent works about the Cold War have provided a chance to learn how revolutionaries themselves have conceived of and confronted foreign intervention in and external factors on revolutions.

The historian Odd Arne Westad (1992) has offered the best analysis of the role of the Third World during the Cold War. Revolutionary movements, he finds, have always been aware of potential allies and enemies abroad; they knew that their revolution existed in a capitalist world system ruled by “powerful and intervention-prone US administrations.” (Of course, as we have seen, the Soviet Union intervened in revolutions as well.) During the Cold War, the bipolar US–Soviet conflict enhanced the likelihood of revolutions because regimes in the Third World could not monopolize foreign support; revolutionaries could always appeal to the other Cold War power not allied with the ruling regime.

Westad (1992) finds that Third World revolutionaries acted to attain international support or prevent foreign intervention in three ways. First, revolutionaries could mobilize nationalist sentiment in their native land (their most visible action), as Chinese communists did in 1947 and 1948, and Iranians did in 1978. Second, they could form an alternative alliance with a foreign power (their most productive action). This method aimed at forestalling foreign intervention as well as enlisting foreign allies to give legitimacy to a revolutionary regime; in addition many revolutionaries hoped a shared ideology with a foreign power might lead to cooperation or assistance. Third, they could spread anti-interventionist propaganda (their most meaningful action). Westad (1992) argues that such demands for non-intervention were often in reality attempts to strike a deal with interventionist power.

Of special interest is Westad's argument that during the Cold War, revolutionary movements attempted to make deals with potential interventionists without regard to ideology or history. In contrast to the above discussion of Cuba, Africa, and the export of revolution, assistance often proved far more important to revolutionary groups than ideology. Mao and Zhou Enlai attempted to strike a deal with the United States even as late as 1946. Other Third World revolutionary movements, including those in Iran, Vietnam, Angola, and Nicaragua, were willing to deal with the United States – and “let bygones be bygones” in Westad's words – if it refrained from intervention. Perhaps ideology was not as important as simply acting like – and being treated like – a legitimate nation-state. After all, according to Westad, most revolutionary groups had a cadre of foreign officers (for example, Zhou Enlai in China and Lopo do Nascimento in Angola), the leaders of the movement tightly controlled foreign policy, and they had foreign policy expertise and experience. Most revealing, Third World revolutionaries saw their revolution as a part of the geopolitical world structure.

Conclusion

Thus we see that the polarization of the world during the Cold War led to more revolutions by forcing revolutionary leaders to choose either capitalism or communism, despite a desire for Third World nationalism and some efforts at non-alignment. For example, the US refusal to see Ho Chi Minh as an independent nationalist encouraged him to seek help from communist nations; likewise, the Eisenhower administration's suspicion of Castro's revolution drove him into the welcoming arms of the Soviet Union.

Revolutions – and even mere attempts at revolution – can shake the foundations of the geopolitical system. A revolutionary movement attempts to stake its place in the globe, rather than in merely a local or regional area. Instead, revolutions can be acts of defiance against the power structure of the entire world. At the same time, revolutionaries can be great pragmatists by cooperating with unexpected allies for limited ends. Just as different states in the geopolitical system can see revolutions as a threat and an opportunity, revolutionaries see their movement in the same global context. Revolutionaries also see themselves as connected to other revolutionaries from the past. After all, when Ho Chi Minh declared Vietnam free from colonial rule on September 2, 1945, in Hanoi, he turned to Thomas Jefferson and the American Revolution for inspiration. “All men are created equal,” Ho stated.

They are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. This immortal statement was made in the Declaration of Independence of the United States of America in 1776. In a broader sense it means: All peoples on earth are equal from birth, all peoples have a right to live, be happy and be free.

Twenty years after this declaration, Ho would find himself at war with the very nation that inspired his own rebellion. It seems that the title of “revolutionary” can thus overshadow all other identities, which perhaps explains the camaraderie that freedom fighters see with others who define themselves as revolutionaries, no matter how distant in space, time, or ideology. And as unlikely as Ho's embrace of American rhetoric may seem, it shows that influences on revolutions can come from the past, as well as from overseas.

James R. Barrett

Born in Taunton, Massachusetts and raised in the slums of Philadelphia, William Z. Foster passed through the Socialist Party, the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), and a series of his own syndicalist organizations to become one of the key figures in the Communist Party USA (CPUSA). He was the party's presidential candidate in 1924, 1928, and 1932 and its chairperson from 1932 to 1957, years which saw the party's decline from a major progressive influence in the Popular Front of the late 1930s and the World War II era to an isolated, sectarian organization during the McCarthy era of the early 1950s.

After leaving school in the third grade, Foster hoboed around the United States and worked a series of jobs ranging from deep water sailor to locomotive fireman. He played a key role in the IWW's 1909 Spokane, Washington Free Speech fight and traveled throughout Europe studying the continent's labor movements in 1910–11. Foster taught himself to read in German and French and devoured the Marxist classics. During the World War I era he earned a national reputation as a brilliant strategist for his successful union organizing campaigns in meat packing and steel and his direction of the 1919 steel strike, the largest industrial conflict in the United States up to that point. Drawn to the Soviet model during a visit to Russia in 1921, Foster secretly joined the American party later that year. In the 1920s he built the Trade Union Educational League (TUEL) which provided the main radical opposition to the American Federation of Labor (AFL). For more than a decade he directed the party's trade union work, including the Trade Union Unity League (TUUL), a federation of dual revolutionary unions.

Foster suffered a severe physical and psychological collapse during the 1932 presidential election and spent the mid-1930s recovering from this crisis. During the following decade he represented the only serious left-wing opposition to Earl Browder's leadership (1935–45) which took the party's policies far in the direction of social democracy. A staunch Stalinist, Foster led the party back toward a more sectarian Marxist-Leninist position in the postwar era. In the context of Cold War, severe government repression, and increasingly conservative domestic politics, this turn proved disastrous for American communism. In 1956–7 Foster resisted efforts to democratize the CPUSA in the wake of the Soviet invasion of Hungary and Khrushchev's revelations of Stalin's crimes. His own physical deterioration in the late 1950s paralleled his party's decline. Foster died in September 1961 in Moscow where had gone for medical treatment.

Petros Metafas

A prominent philosopher, historian, sociologist, critical thinker, and activist, Michel Foucault rose to become one of the most highly regarded intellectuals within French mainstream circles while simultaneously retaining his focus on social groups diverging and excluded from this very mainstream. Foucault's study of certain social institutions derived to a large extent from his lived experiences: for a significant part of his life he suffered from depression, subsequently examining psychiatry and medicine (Foucault 1973). Similarly, his own homosexuality might have triggered his interest in the history of sexuality (Foucault 1978, 1985, 1986). Foucault provided some of the most excellent and critical studies of repressive social institutions and structures, explained through his analysis of power according to which the latter runs through the entire social body and is incorporated into all social relationships.

Distrustful of so-called social progress, he denounced the dark side of the Enlightenment and attacked the prescriptions which comprise “normality.” Foucault refrained from exploiting the authority of his intellectual skills, thus never suggesting a concrete alternative welfare social condition. And yet his critical study of structural societal repression was embraced by those who were faced with and opposed to it: his work came heavily to influence poststructuralist radical thought primarily within the fields of social history, feminism and gender studies, anthropology, cultural studies, and human geography. Foucault’s most direct encounter with a revolutionary movement was arguably also the most controversial: his enthusiastic support of the Iranian Revolution (1978–9) largely overlooked, as claimed since, the repressive elements of the new regime.

Foucault’s work can be divided into three periods, namely archaeology, genealogy, and ethics. In his first period (ending with the Archaeology of Knowledge) he showed that the so-called objectivity of “human sciences” is a facade: following a Nietzschean perspective he argued that there is no possibility for neutral, general criteria to be set against “independent truth,” against “right” and “false” in such sciences. In his second period, now as a genealogist (ending with the first volume of The History of Sexuality) Foucault reached nihilism: he concluded that what we count as a statement of order and reason is in fact a product of dominance and subjection. Power, then, is not simply something that is imposed on us via prohibitions and restrictions; it is “positive,” crossing through boundaries and producing discourses, bearing pleasure, effecting modes of knowledge, and finally, producing identities. And yet, power encompasses the potentiality of its reversal: the subject is not the foundation of thought and history but rather their product. In his third and final “ethical” period Foucault turned to an aesthetics of existence. Here, he argued that we need to create ourselves as a work of art: “care of the self” is not a process for the discovery of our deeper “real self,” but rather an invention and creation of what someone could be.

An identifiable link seems to exist between the political philosophy of anarchism and the post-structuralism of Foucault. There is no single, privileged point for resistance and social transformation in either. Since power is diffused, a critique against it must also be exercised everywhere: at the level of the human race, of teaching relations, in relations between psychiatrists and “mad” people, in the field of sexuality and beyond.

Foucault wrote for the dark side of our society, for the people who have no political rights, for delinquents, for the confined, for the factory workers, for the poor, for sexual deviants, even for the oppressed students of severe schools of an earlier century. He eventually rejected centralized disciplined political actions. He chose specialized, local, and “partial” battles against the micro-physics of power rather than economy based “class struggle.”

He did not refuse the revolutionary proletarian movement, but preferred the struggles of the imprisoned, of women, of institutionalized “insanes,” of homosexuals, of deviants of all kinds. It is through this unique perspective that Foucault came to influence and intellectually arm – directly or indirectly – a vast array of contemporary revolutionary thought, thus leaving a precious legacy. He had a dramatic end in 1984 as one of the first famous victims of AIDS.

Fourier, Charles François Marie (1772–1837) and the Phalanx Utopians

Richard Goff

Following the collapse of the Owenite communities, Arthur Brisbane became the new leader of the utopian socialist movement. Influenced by the ideas of French utopian socialist Charles Fourier, Brisbane's "phalanxes" prompted thousands to engage in social experimentation over the 1840s and 1850s. Brisbane's secular communities sought to solve the problems of civilization through communitarian organization.

Brisbane's intellectual inspiration came from Fourier. Born in 1772 and maturing during the Age of Democratic Revolution, Fourier developed an interest in social experimentation and city planning. In 1808 he published his massive work, The Theory of Four Movements and of General Destinies, in which he criticized modern industrial civilization for its corrupt and exploitative practices. Fourier believed that a radical change was necessary to save humanity and that change would come through cooperative communities.

Fourier argued for the creation of planned communities, or "phalanxes," which would provide the economic and social basis for humanity's transformation. These phalanxes would be comprised of 1,620 people (twice the number of personality traits Fourier believed to exist) living in 4,000-acre compounds. These communities would include people with various skills; however, they would function on the basis of equality within the community. Women would enjoy equality with men and freedom of sexual choice. Members would freely choose their vocation and would rotate jobs as desired and as needed for the well-being of the community. The community would blend work, leisure, and intellectual development, allowing individuals maximum freedom to develop their capacities. Fourier hoped that his quite specific, but grand vision would produce millions of communities, transcending national borders, and would provide the basis for a new civilization.

Fourier's theories remained a European phenomenon until Arthur Brisbane discovered his writings and became an instant convert. Brisbane, having grown up in an intellectually curious household, traveled to Europe to attend college and began translating Fourier's works. Upon his return to the United States, Brisbane started the newspaper The Phalanx, which popularized Fourier's ideas. In 1840 Brisbane published his major work, The Social Destiny of Man, in which he made the case for Fourierism.

Throughout the early 1840s over twenty-five phalanx communities formed across Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa. Although these initial communities were generally short-lived, the burst of experimentation is significant. The movement initially attracted an eclectic lot of intellectuals, idealists, workers, and farmers. Although Fourier's description of the phalanx was relatively specific, implementing his ideas proved to be more challenging. Most communities lacked the initial capital to construct the necessary housing, farming, and production facilities to make the phalanx economically viable. Fourier's "instant" commune approach left members with little choice but to significantly scale back their idealism for practicality, and in most cases, the communities failed due to infighting.

A handful of the phalanxes survived the initial surge and retreat. In 1843 approximately 200 people created a phalanx in central Wisconsin. The community successfully blended farming and industrial production with rotating labor assignments and elected supervisors. The community initially prospered, attracting additional members, including many single parents seeking a desirable social arrangement for rearing children, before dissolving in 1849. Similarly, the North American Phalanx of New Jersey, established in 1843, continued to function into the 1850s, ultimately breaking up over religious issues pertaining to the abolitionist and women's rights movements.

Although Brisbane's Fourierest communities failed, they left their imprint on the American social and political landscape. The Brook Farm community attracted many notables of the time, including prominent transcendentalists Ralph Waldo Emerson and George Ripley, as well as Nathaniel Hawthorne, Margaret Fuller, and

Horace Greeley. In many cases, Phalanx veterans, following the collapse of their communities, created socialist clubs and cooperatives, and became more deeply involved in social and labor reform movements. By the 1850s the impetus for gradualist reform had replaced the immediacy of Fourier's vision; however, the desire for social change remained.

Fox, Charles James (1749–1806)

Gordon N. Pentland

Charles James Fox was a leader of the Whig Party in the British parliament. Spending 37 years in parliament and achieving high office on two occasions, he gained a reputation as a champion of religious and civil liberty after pushing for the Libel Act of 1792 (known as Fox's Act) and the abolition of the slave trade in 1806.

His family background augured well for a political career. He was the son of Henry Fox (1705–74), a well-known political manager, and Lady Caroline Fox (1723–74), daughter of the second Duke of Richmond and a great-granddaughter of Charles II. He enjoyed all the privileges of aristocratic life – Eton, Oxford, and a Grand Tour – and early on he developed, under the eye of his indulgent father, the crowded and lively private life that would so persistently shape the perceptions of the public man.

It was through his impeccable connections that Fox was able to enter parliament in 1768, at the age of 19. In his early career he acted with his father's friends and against his father's enemies, who included those Rockingham Whigs with whom he would later be associated. In spite of his later reputation as a friend of America, he initially supported Lord North's colonial policies, twice holding minor office in his ministry and twice resigning precipitately for family reasons.

After the death of his father in 1774, Fox gravitated slowly toward the Whig opposition to North's ministry and developed a close relationship with Edmund Burke. There was, however, no Damascene conversion, but a process whereby Fox's politics coalesced around two broad concerns: first, a growing dislike of George III and a fear that royal influence was being used to undermine the cherished Whig shibboleth of a "balanced" constitution; secondly, a growing association with the American cause and a developing conviction that royal influence was being used for the same pernicious ends in America.

His first experience of real ministerial power – which was to imprint itself strongly on his later politics – came in the period of political and ministerial flux that accompanied the latter stages and the ending of the war with America. First, he acted as foreign secretary in a ministry headed by the Earl of Shelburne and the Marquess of Rockingham from March 1782 until the latter's untimely death in July of the same year; second, he formed a coalition with his erstwhile bitter opponent, Lord North, which lasted from March until December 1783. If this Fox–North coalition established Fox's reputation for political opportunism, the manner in which it ended – with the king putting pressure on the House of Lords to throw out the coalition's India Bill – cemented Fox's belief in the pernicious power of the crown.

The dismissal of the coalition saw William Pitt (the Younger) come to power, and it was against this celebrated opponent as well as George III that Fox was to play out the rest of his political career. The principles and the contests derived from his experience in 1782–4 drove Fox's politics in the 1780s, notably during the Regency Crisis (1788–9) and the impeachment of Warren Hastings (1788–94). If both of these crises illustrated his fundamental principles, they also demonstrated deficiencies in his political leadership.

The French Revolution was to mark another turning point both in British politics as a whole and in Fox's individual career. Fox, constantly in contact with liberal members of the French nobility, interpreted the Revolution as a French version of Britain's Glorious Revolution, designed to create a constitutional monarchy along British lines. This was in stark contrast to the gloomy predictions of Edmund Burke in his Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790). Fox's ambiguity over questions of popular sovereignty and democracy also distanced him from the more radical fringe of his supporters. These ideological fissures presaged the division of the entire party after 1794. After this point the term "Whig" was increasingly replaced by "Foxite," which demonstrated not only that the hemorrhaging of support left Fox in command of a small rump which could scarcely be called a party, but also that it was Fox's dominant personality that was taken to shape the convictions and command the loyalty of this rump.

Throughout the 1790s Fox spoke consistently against the restriction of civil liberties and against the ministerial conduct of the war with France. The tangible political achievements of the 1790s were slim – some early victories over foreign policy questions and securing the passage of the Libel Act of 1792 – and Fox's own dithering leadership and the disastrous policy of secession after 1797 must take much of the blame.

When the Peace of Amiens of 1802 seemed briefly to vindicate Fox's anti-war stance, he was among the many Whigs who took the opportunity to visit France and held three interviews with Napoleon. On the resumption of war, his belief in the peaceful intentions of the French was just as quickly discredited. An increasingly domesticated Fox was to enjoy one last taste of power as foreign secretary in the Ministry of All the Talents, whose signal achievement was the abolition of the slave trade. He died in September 1806 and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Fox was almost immediately canonized by his political support and a cult of Fox survived well into the nineteenth century. His dilatoriness as a leader and his ambiguity over questions such as parliamentary reform and the role of the people in politics were quickly airbrushed by supporters in favor of a projection of him as "the perpetual advocate of freedom" and as a tragic figure assailed by political misfortune. Less partisan assessments in the twentieth century have tended to point out Fox's deficiencies as a parliamentary leader and the ambiguities of his thinking on issues such as parliamentary reform, but have confirmed his reputation as a mesmerizing politician with sincere commitments to religious toleration, the abolition of slavery, and the protection of civil liberties.

Fox, George (1624–1691)

Amy Linch

George Fox was founder of the Religious Society of Friends (Quakers) in the mid-seventeenth century. A social and spiritual reformer, Fox asserted that true knowledge came directly from God, without intercession from textual or priestly authority, and he encouraged his followers to recognize the "inner light" of faith available to all regardless of gender or class. His followers, dubbed Quakers by critics of their emotional enthusiasm, eschewed social conventions of speech, dress, and manner that maintained class boundaries. Fox's spiritual doctrine and practice represented a profound challenge to the social and political structures with which the institutional church was entwined. For over three decades he and his fellow Friends endured dispossession, imprisonment, physical abuse, and death as they asserted their right to freedom of conscience and responsibility to reshape the world in accordance with their view of social justice.

Fox was born in Drayton-in-the-Clay (now Fenny Drayton), Leicestershire, England to a relatively affluent Puritan family and was apprenticed to a cobbler in his late teens. In 1643, at the beginning of the Civil Wars in Britain and Ireland, a spiritual crisis prompted him to begin wandering about England wrestling with depression and pondering religious questions. He sought relief to no avail from clergy, an experience that shaped his perspective that priests were largely a vain and hypocritical group of dissemblers. He began reading the Bible and emulated the simple practices of the early Christians, preaching, praying, and protesting against the trappings of wealth and power represented by the churches in the towns he traveled through. Fox began to convert people to his understanding of the Christian faith as the experience of Christ as an immediate, life-changing reality; of the church as a fellowship of believers; and of ministers as people who serve and reveal Christ to others.

Much like the Fifth Monarchists, Fox envisioned a world transformed, in which equality before the law and among men and women would be instantiated by rule of the virtuous. He published a pamphlet in 1659 that placed 59 demands before the parliament. Among his requirements were conversion of abbeys to almshouses for the poor and elimination of the death penalty for property crimes, which were most likely to be committed by the poor. He further maintained that courts should be held near the people and laws should be written in common language so that people could represent themselves and be freed from the burden of lawyers' fees. He argued for reform of prisons and care for the lame by the nation as "the way to bring the nation like a garden, and make a free nation, a free people." Fox's concern with the accessibility of courts and the state of prisons was based on regular personal experience with these institutions. His public preaching and practice of disrupting church services to argue doctrine with priests resulted in five periods of imprisonment.

Fox encouraged his followers to pursue reform through political participation. He asserted the duty of Quakers to monitor and instruct magistrates and to use the courts and electoral process to change oppressive laws. He placed a heavy burden of responsibility on individuals to evaluate the dictates of the state according to their own consciences. Civil disobedience against unjust laws and his unrestrained evangelizing in the reactionary climate of the Restoration led to several more periods of imprisonment for Fox. Between 1660 and 1680, more than 10,000 of his followers were incarcerated and over 250 died in prison. In this climate, in 1661 Fox first declared the doctrine of pacifism that has come to be associated with Quakers as he struggled to reconcile the demands of conscience and the survival of his community in the face of political hostility.

Despite Fox's denunciation of institutionalized religion, by 1700 the Friends represented the largest nonconformist sect in Britain. In North America, Pennsylvania was established as a Quaker colony by his associate William Penn, and Fox led teams of missionaries to Barbados, Jamaica, Holland, and Germany. As the Society of Friends became institutionalized, many of the more radical practices of Fox's followers were circumscribed. The question of women's power in the organization resulted in a schism, but Fox defended the power and dignity of women as their "right and possession." The Friends became a major force in promoting women's literacy and pioneered humane, non-violent approaches to educating children. Fox's followers also played important roles in campaigns for the abolition of slavery, women's suffrage, prison reform, and native rights. Fox died in London on January 13, 1691.

FPMR (Frente Patrioco Manuel Rodriguez)

Iván Torres Apablaza

The Manuel Rodriguez Patriotic Front (FPMR) is a political-military organization that operated in Chile from December 14, 1983. In its early years it worked as an armed extension of the Chilean Communist Party (CChP). It was formed against the background of military dictatorship and progressive growth of popular discontent. This contingent was formed mainly by communist militants trained militarily in Cuba.

After a 1973 coup in Chile the Communist Party, with support from countries like Cuba, East Germany, Bulgaria, and Vietnam, began the military preparedness of young communists to graduate as officers and promote a force in Chile's military capable of sustaining a popular victory. This system provided Chile with about 200 officers. In 1978 some of them were sent to Nicaragua to fight alongside the Sandinista National Liberation Front. These officers are those who later led the FPMR.

In 1980 the CChP proclaimed the People's Political Mass Revolt that validated all forms of struggle against the dictatorship. Its first job was the formation of the Front Zero as the embryo of what would become the FPMR three years later. The work began with small military combat units responsible for carrying out destabilizing actions. In 1982 a military command structure within the party itself, with the capacity to plan and decide on direct actions, was implemented. Approximately 130 new fighters were trained in Cuba, which later formed part of the middle structure of the FPMR. Special units for kidnapping, interrogation, and the use of military technology were formed and trained in socialist countries of Eastern Europe.

In 1983 Chilean officers entered the country from Cuba, assuming the leadership of the military commission of the CChP. On December 14, 1983 the FPMR was launched with a military campaign of sabotage, including a nationwide blackout. In 1985 the FPMR had 500 battle units with a total force of 1,500 cadres and logistical support for the mobility of the military cadres. Between 1983 and 1986 the protest against the dictatorship reached its peak. In that context the FPMR proposed a strategy of national revolt to overthrow the dictatorship. The actions taken included sabotage, activities of agitation and armed propaganda, attacks and ambushes, executions of officials of the dictatorship, and kidnappings. The FPMR saw 1986 as the decisive year because it carried out two of its most important actions: the interment of more than 100 tons of armaments that soon was detected by the dictatorship; and Operation XX Century, the intent to assassinate dictator Augusto Pinochet, who nevertheless managed to escape. In 1987, 12 members of the FPMR were killed by state security agents.

After the failure of the most important actions and the withdrawal of the mass movement, the CChP removed its political and military support for the FPMR and generated its division into two fractions: Autonomous FPMR (FPMR-A) – which was the largest military contingent – and the Manuel Rodriguez Patriotic Movement (MPMR) that joined the electoral politics of the CChP and abandoned the insurrectionist strategy. The FPMR-A implemented a policy of “redesign” to evaluate the organization's strategy. Its analysis oriented it to the constitution of a combative social base and military operations to execute the agents of the dictatorship. At the same time the workers' militia, Milicias Rodriguistas, and social work with structures like Patriotic Youth, were strengthened. The redesign gave substance to what was defined as a National Patriotic War in 1988, whose strategic goal was a mass revolt in order to take control of the most important political centers of the country, putting an emphasis on rural guerrilla units. The FPMR-A decided to take four towns in rural areas. The operation succeeded in its immediate objectives, although in one of the villages the coordinated work between military police and secret service – which had infiltrated the structure of the FPMR-A – led to the arrest and killing of two of the main FPMR-A commanders.

As a result of the assassination of top leaders of the organization, and the constant internal challenge to focus more on military activity than on the construction of social bases and a political debate, at the end of dictatorship in 1990 the FPMR-A began a process of “national consultation” among the rank and file to discuss collectively the strategy to implement. The result of the analysis was a characterization of the period as the structural continuity of the dictatorship and the reaffirmation of the necessity of the armed struggle, focusing on the killing of emblematic figures of the dictatorship. The FPMR-A sentenced to death a senator and kidnapped the son of the owner of a newspaper which consistently supported the dictatorship.

In 1992 the FPMR-A was at its most critical stage because strong repression during the dictatorship had dismantled its bases, the organization had been infiltrated, many arms depots had been discovered, and a political debate involving the whole organization was absent. The excessive emphasis on the military even generated a loss of popular support and the criminalization of its actions. In the middle of this crisis about twenty FPMR-A militants were imprisoned or killed. In 1992 the organization entered a process of internal discussion, seeking "a new political project." The process did not achieve the expected results and the FPMR-A broke up into several small autonomous groups continuing with armed operations.

In 1996 only a variety of small groups were left of what was once the FPMR. The same year the First Encounter for the Reorganization of Rodriguismo took place. Its main conclusion was the need to gain legitimacy for the organization politically and socially and give up the armed struggle. A national leadership was created, but it failed to activate the organization. By 2008 there were several expressions of political "rodriguista culture," including the MPMR, Identidad Rodriguista, Manuel Rides Again (Manuel Cabalga de Nuevo), and a structure called FPMR, which seeks to set up a political project in Chile, structuring its work in political and social fronts, following a Marxist-Leninist ideology and form of party organization.

France, 1830 Revolution

Bradford C. Brown

The French Revolution of 1830 (July Revolution) was a popular rebellion that succeeded in overthrowing the rule of King Charles X and his ministers. The revolt was prompted by the government's rejection of legitimate election results and its suspension of the constitution. Armed crowds in Paris and other cities throughout France took to the streets to oppose the king and to support the elected representatives of the parliamentary opposition. Three decisive days of fighting, July 27–9, gave the insurrection its other names: la Révolution de Juillet and les trois glorieuses. Revolutionary leaders moved quickly to force the king's family into exile and to crown one of his distant cousins, Louis-Philippe, the Duc d'Orléans. The new regime, called the July Monarchy (or sometimes the Orléans Monarchy), would last until the February Revolution of 1848 created the Second Republic.

Origins

Charles X became king of France in September 1824. He had been waiting a long time, and the years had marked him. Even before the Revolution of 1789, as the Comte d'Artois, he had opposed any reform that would diminish the power of the monarchy. After the fall of the Bastille, he chose emigration. Detesting the revolutionary changes and plotting for their reversal, Charles learned of the beheading of his eldest brother, King Louis XVI, in 1793. For 20 more years he lived in exile, watching as French armies spread revolutionary ideas across Europe and Napoleon crowned himself emperor. The great general and his armies were eventually defeated in 1814 and again in 1815 at the Battle of Waterloo. After both defeats, the monarchy was restored to power and Charles returned to France in the shadow of foreign armies. His pragmatic older brother, now King Louis XVIII, accepted a compromise between monarchical authority and revolutionary liberties that was inscribed in a new constitution, the Charter of 1814. Charles did not approve. Ten more years would pass before Charles, the aged but still living symbol of counterrevolution, claimed the throne at the age of 67. He commemorated his personal triumph by reenacting the medieval religious ceremony of anointing the new king at the Cathedral of Reims. Providence, the ritual insinuated, had restored the union of church and state.

The accession of Charles X to the throne in 1824 altered every political calculation. From 1815 until his death, Louis XVIII and his ministers had tried to rule from the center of conservative elite opinion with the support of moderate royalists in the two houses of the legislature, the Chambers of Deputies and Peers. The moderates accepted the compromises embodied in the Charter. However, even for the wealthy who were allowed to vote under the Restoration (about 100,000 men in a population of 30 million, or less than 0.4 percent), and the even richer elite eligible for office, politics was divided between conservative and liberal poles. With the crown on the head of a reactionary, the balance of power had tipped to the right.

Conservatism was a new political ideology that appeared to be ancient. Writers like René de Chateaubriand, Louis Bonald, and Joseph de Maistre envisioned a return to the values of an idealized pre-revolutionary past in which the French nobility worked in concord with the monarchy and the Catholic Church to reestablish national glory and social order. Extreme conservatives were called ultra-royalists, or simply ultras, because they professed to be “more royalist than the king.” Ultras had demonstrated their capacity for violence and ruthlessness in the wake of Waterloo. During the “White Terror,” counterrevolutionary attacks and murders escalated in the south and west, and ultras purged their opponents from administrative, judicial, and National Guard positions. Ultras controlled the Chamber of Deputies in 1815–16 and were a potent force from 1821 to 1827. In religious matters, the high tide of conservative power was evidenced by evangelical missions against the legacies of the Revolution (featuring elaborate processions, enormous expiatory crosses, and the burning of irreligious literature), the return of the Jesuits (banned since 1764), the return of the Congrégation (a Catholic organization suppressed by Napoleon), and increasing church control over all levels of education.

Behind the scenes, the salons of the Faubourg Saint Germain and a secret society with rich and powerful members, the Chevaliers de la Foi (Knights of the Faith), connected the social, religious, and political agendas of the ultras. To atone for the sins of the Revolution, the Chapelle Expiatoire was built on the site where Louis XVI and Marie-Antoinette had been buried after their executions. Ancient symbols of the monarchy returned to erase the memory of revolution and empire. The white flag of the Bourbons flew over government buildings. The flag of the Revolution, the tricolor, and the revolutionary national anthem, La Marseillaise, were banned. Other emblems and mementos were seized and destroyed as part of an official policy of forgetting the past. The statue of Napoleon on the Vendôme column was melted down to recreate a statue of King Henri IV on the Pont Neuf.

Liberalism was the political ideology of secularism, liberty, and equality. By 1815, the glories of the Enlightenment, the early Revolution, and the triumphs of revolutionary armies throughout Europe had been tarnished by the experiences of the Terror, the personal corruption of revolutionary leaders, the privations of more than two decades of war, and the tyranny of Emperor Napoleon. The left was in disarray; revolution was in disrepute. Liberals turned in a variety of directions. English and American examples lent support for the bicameral compromise of the Charter of 1814. Moderation became the watchword for the most significant new interpreters of the liberal political tradition: Pierre Daunou, Antoine Destutt de Tracy, Madame de Staël, Benjamin Constant, Pierre-Paul Royer-Collard, Victor Cousin, and François Guizot. Others, less theoretical, turned to conspiracy. Old revolutionaries, freemasons, Napoleonic veterans, and enthusiastic students banded together in a series of clandestine societies – such as the Black Pin, the Devilishly Philosophical Society, the Knights of Liberty, and the Charbonnerie – in preparation to seize power for loosely defined ends. A series of small local revolts revealed the existence of these plots without ever seriously threatening the government.

In 1821, Napoleon’s early death in exile on Saint Helena dashed the hopes of Bonapartists for another spectacular return to power. Yet, popular Bonapartism, mixing myth and nostalgia with current discontents, continued to thrive.

Universally vilified, republicans were slow to regain a public voice for the far left. Socialists and communists remained tiny splinter factions. Given the tenor of the times, liberal opinion found better expression in history, poetry, plays, novels, and the arts. The popular songs of Pierre-Jean de Béranger blended nationalism, Bonapartism, and anti-clericalism in anthems to liberty. Liberal salons, newspapers, and journals, such as Le Constitutionnel, Le Globe, and the provocatively titled Le Figaro, provided rallying points for the otherwise divided opponents of a series of conservative governments.

By the late 1820s, however, the tide of political initiative had turned. Broader social, economic, and cultural changes put increasing pressure on the French political system. Economic growth between 1818 and 1825 gave way to a downturn that would last until 1832. The crisis was at once financial, industrial, and agricultural. As always, the rural and urban poor suffered the most as bread prices rose, wages fell, and unemployment became chronic. Incidents of protest and civil disobedience proliferated in the countryside. Discontent mounted in cities, too, where a growing population, swelled in the summer by seasonal laborers, strained traditional institutions and an aging infrastructure. The social crisis was also generational as a new cohort came of age under the Restoration. The literate were increasingly influenced by a changing world. Echoes of liberal revolution could be heard all throughout the West as rebellions in Spain, Russia, and the Italian kingdoms were brutally suppressed, while others succeeded in creating independent states in Greece and throughout Latin America. The spirit of rebellion was simultaneously transforming the arts through Romanticism.

Therefore, between 1824 and 1830, French politics became increasingly polarized as the right pushed for counterrevolutionary measures and liberals organized in response. A war of words escalated as pamphlets flew off the presses. With Charles X on the throne, conservatives pushed through legislation that compensated landholders who had lost assets after 1789, imposed new censorship restrictions, and tried to make primogeniture legal again. In religious matters, new laws insisted on the sacristy of Catholic worship and expanded the numbers of female Catholic religious orders. The government also seized every opportunity to undermine free elections by excluding eligible voters, scratching candidates, and manipulating the press. The church got involved in elections as well; bishops endorsed candidates from the pulpit. In reaction, liberals rallied to the defense of liberties enshrined in the constitutional Charter of 1814. They organized programs and events to mobilize popular support. Free schools were established in Paris and an anti-clerical publishing campaign cheaply distributed the works of Voltaire, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, and free thinkers. Funeral processions for famous liberals, such as General Maximilien Foy, François-Alexandre, Duke de la Rochefoucauld-Liancourt, and Jacques-Antoine Manuel, brought thousands out into the streets. Meanwhile, two associations, Friends of Freedom of the Press and Heaven Helps Those Who Help Themselves (Aide-toi, Le Ciel t'aidera), disseminated information about voting rights. The result was a surprising liberal electoral victory in November 1827. Celebrations led to a riot, barricades were erected in the streets of Paris, and five people died before the popular revolt was suppressed. The new Chamber of Deputies worked quickly to roll back censorship laws and reduce church control over education.

Confronted by a resurgent political opposition, the king and his ministers bided their time. Charles had signaled his defiance before the election in April 1827, when elements in the Paris National Guards expressed political dissent during an annual review. He disbanded this militia, sending them home with their weapons.

By August 1829, the king decided to directly challenge the liberal tide. He appointed as prime minister the ultra-royalist Prince de Polignac, who then formed a right-wing government. Liberals protested publicly in their newspapers, organized a banquet campaign, and circulated a petition to refuse to pay taxes. Republicans began to reorganize. In his customary speech, the king asked for support for his government. After much debate, 221 out of 402 deputies voted in March 1830 for an Address to the King that registered their loyal opposition and asserted that the government did not have the support of the nation. The response of Charles X was indignant: "As father of my people, my soul was wounded, as king I was offended; the Chamber is thus dissolved." New elections were held and a landslide victory increased the liberal opposition to 274. Before the deputies could gather, the king signed four emergency decrees on July 25, 1830. These ordinances imposed strict press censorship, dissolved the new parliament, rewrote the rules for elections by reducing the number of electors, and set a date for new elections. The king's ministers claimed that Article 14 of the constitution authorized these extraordinary powers for the protection of state security. The long-anticipated counterrevolution had begun. It would last less than a week.

Revolution

In July 1830, Adolphe Thiers was an editor of a new opposition newspaper, Le National. A commoner from the south, he had arrived in Paris less than ten years before, a short lawyer in spectacles. Within that decade, however, Thiers had written his way to the forefront of the liberal press with spirited articles and a popular history of the French Revolution. When notice of the ordinances first appeared on July 26, Thiers was immediately involved in the first acts of civil disobedience. In an extra edition, his paper denounced the ordinances for pushing the country toward revolution and called for the refusal of tax payments. The offices of Le National quickly became a center for organized resistance. Thiers called for and drafted a formal protest signed by 44 editors and journalists from 11 newspapers. After detailing the unconstitutionality of the ordinances, the protest concluded with an appeal: "Today the Government has lost the stamp of legality which commands obedience. We will resist it in that which concerns us; France must judge how far to extend its own resistance." Four papers published the protest the following morning. Copies were posted on walls and read aloud to crowds in the streets. The police moved rapidly to close down the presses and tried to seize the printed newspapers. Arrest warrants were issued for all who signed the protest. Among others, Thiers fled the city.

The spontaneous urban uprising that followed astonished observers. Augmented by the closing of printshops and other workshops, large crowds of men and women formed early on Tuesday, July 27, in and around the Palais Royal looking for news and a target for their anger. Shouts of "Long live the Charter!" and "Down with the ministers!" were heard. At first, the crowds focused on symbols of the monarchy, destroying royal signs and coats of arms. Efforts by the police to clear the area heightened tensions. Royal troops arrived to confront the unarmed crowds here and elsewhere in the city. Cavalry charges led to injuries in the crowds. The first barricades were erected out of anything on hand: paving stones, trees, omnibuses. Pelted with rocks and other missiles from crowds in the street and supporters in buildings on either side, the soldiers fired back. The bodies of the dead were taken up and paraded through the city. That night crowds raided arms shops and museums in search of weapons. Street lamps were broken everywhere.

By Wednesday, July 28, the battle for Paris had begun in earnest. Barricades were erected throughout the city. The fight for City Hall, the Hôtel de Ville, raged back and forth. Columns of troops struggled to confront the elusive enemy by clearing the main thoroughfares only to have the insurgents vanish in front and reappear behind them. Diminished by other deployments, including the invasion of Algeria earlier that spring, government forces were also poorly provisioned and lacked ammunition. With telescopes, courtiers with the king at his palace at Saint Cloud observed the tricolor flag flying from the towers of Notre Dame Cathedral.

Thursday, July 29, was the decisive day of street fighting. More barricades made the streets impassable for cavalry and cannons. Tired, hungry, and unconvinced of their cause, regular soldiers deserted in growing numbers to the rebels. Finally, after being pinned down, a withdrawal of troops from positions in the Louvre and Tuileries became a rout. The crowds who occupied the palace marveled at its opulence, raided the cellars, selectively attacked symbols of the monarchy, took turns sitting on the throne, and set guards to prevent looting. Later that day, the archbishop's palace was sacked and its valuables thrown into the river.

In the course of the fighting, at least several thousand people were wounded and perhaps as many as 1,000 died. Official records of compensation for casualties (211 killed, 1,327 wounded) offer a useful (if imperfect) guide to the social background of the revolutionary crowds. The majority were skilled artisans (carpenters, masons, shoemakers, locksmiths, jewelry makers, printworkers, and tailors). A substantial number were day laborers and servants. Middle-class professionals and shopkeepers made up a much smaller remainder. These numbers also argue against the significance of women, students, and street urchins in the July Days, even though they became important symbols of the revolution for contemporaries.

Since the revolution was accomplished in defense of an existing constitution, a political settlement emerged rapidly. Only a small number of the recently elected deputies and peers were in Paris on July 25; every day thereafter, though, allowed more to reach the capital. Caution and even resignation dominated the perspective of most of those present at meetings in the first days of protest against the ordinances, despite the revolutionary enthusiasm of a few and the encouragement of crowds who gathered outside. On July 28, some deputies attempted to negotiate a ceasefire but could not move either Polignac or Marmont. That same day, the deputies were able to agree on a declaration of protest, drafted by Guizot. The printer came back to demand signatures, and the deputies who remained added the names of 63 of their colleagues. The following day, fearing the influence of republicans and Bonapartists, the deputies moved to establish authority in the city, approving the Marquis de Lafayette as commander of the reconstituted National Guard and empowering five deputies (Casimir Périer, Jacques Laffitte, François Mauguin, General Georges Mouton, Auguste de Schonen, and Pierre-François Audry de Puyraveau) to take charge of the city as a provisional municipal committee at the Hôtel de Ville. Late in the day on July 29, Charles X was persuaded to withdraw the ordinances and replace Polignac's government.

Confident from the victory of Paris, deputies rejected the authority of the king's new orders on the following day, and voted a proclamation calling on Louis-Philippe, Duc d'Orléans, to assume executive power as Lieutenant General of the Realm. On returning to the city, Thiers had composed a poster extolling Louis-Philippe as a "Citizen King" and went himself to convince the duke to join the rebels. The next morning, July 31, the deputies presented the proclamation to the duke at the Palais Royal and then together they paraded to the Hôtel de Ville. There the duke repeated his promises to preserve the constitution and, in one of the iconic moments of the revolution, Lafayette and Louis-Philippe waved an enormous tricolor flag and embraced on a balcony to elicit the cheers of a vast crowd assembled on the Place de Grève. This ritual, repeated in other locations over the following months, and other forms of symbolic fraternization between Louis-Philippe and the revolutionary crowds (including repeated choruses of La Marseillaise and La Parisienne, a new patriotic anthem) garnered popular acceptance for a renewed constitutional monarchy. After retreating to another palace at Rambouillet, Charles X abdicated in favor of his 7-year-old grandson, the Duc de Bordeaux (later the Comte de Chambord). A regency had insufficient support, however, and the final act of the revolutionary crowds was a disorganized march of tens of thousands that forced Charles to accept exile for himself and his family.

By August 7, the Chamber of Deputies had worked out the basis of a revised constitution. They discarded the old absolutist preamble, while preserving the basic protections of liberty and equality in the Charter of 1814. In addition, they formally separated the state from the Catholic Church, eliminated electoral restrictions imposed during the Restoration, doubled the franchise, and abolished censorship. The deputies then declared the throne vacant and called Louis-Philippe and his male heirs to take up the crown. On August 9, the former duke, wearing the uniform of the National Guard, swore (and signed in triplicate) an oath to the constitution and received the traditional symbols of the monarchy: crown, scepter, sword, and hand of justice.

While the revolution had been achieved in the capital, it was ratified throughout France by local action. Tax records and toll-houses were burned. Liberty trees replaced missionary crosses. Tricolor flags and cockades appeared everywhere. Local liberals and notables moved quickly to establish committees in support of the new regime and to contain popular violence with the reestablishment of the National Guard. Conservative resistance was rare and often cut short by the news of the victory in Paris. The adhesion of the country to the new regime was celebrated on August 29, when the new king reviewed 50,000 National Guardsmen assembled on the Champ de Mars from all over the country. The revolution was over, or at least for the moment. A new period of public dissent and intermittent revolt would follow.

Interpretations

The great painter Eugène Delacroix was an eyewitness to the events of the July Days in Paris.

A contemporary of Thiers, he had established himself in the art world of the 1820s by a daring use of color and his depiction of Romantic literary subjects: scenes from Shakespeare and Goethe, Lord Byron and Sir Walter Scott, medieval conflicts and the exotic East. In the Salon of 1831, Delacroix exhibited a painting that would become the most famous image of the Revolution of 1830. Liberty leading the People (now hanging in the Louvre) portrays a woman, or goddess, mounting a barricade, carrying a large tricolor flag and a musket, followed by an armed crowd, advancing over the dead. The new government inducted the artist into the Legion of Honor and bought the painting. Critics were divided over the merits of his celebration of popular revolution. Exhibited for a while, the canvas was shelved, and the artist moved on to new commissions. Today the painting is an icon of France, modernity, and the spirit of revolution; it is reproduced constantly in new and surprising contexts.

Like the painting, the reputation of the Revolution of 1830 has changed over time. Debate about its meaning and significance commenced almost immediately. Two basic questions have preoccupied interpreters. Did the revolution really change much? And, if so, what?

In the aftermath, both radicals and conservative liberals argued that there had been no real revolution. Casimir Périer, a prime minister of the new government, called it “a mere change in the person of the head of state.” Some historians persist in treating 1830 as a relatively minor political crossroad in the history of an essentially unchanged period of constitutional monarchy stretching from 1814 to 1848. On this view, political ideologies and organizations were weak factors in dividing a moderate political elite with common interests, and the four ordinances were mistakes of judgment rather than symptoms of a cultural war. The July Days seem an accidental combination of separate socioeconomic and political crises aggravated by minor circumstances of military preparation and urban geography. In consequence, they argue that 1830 did not fundamentally transform a society that continued to be dominated by traditional, landholding notables and racked by ongoing social discontent.

Prosper Enfantin, a utopian socialist, also believed that the July Days could not be called a revolution. Without a “basic change in the existing social structure,” he insisted, the revolt had not gone far enough. For a number of historians on the left, social revolution in 1830 had been cut short by class conflict. On this view, the revolution was made by the sweat and blood of workers before being stolen by middle-class elites who seized control of the state for their own purposes. Karl Marx famously described the July Monarchy in The Eighteenth Brumaire as “the political expression of the usurpation of power by the upstart bourgeoisie” accompanied by a “retinue of lawyers, professors, and smooth-tongued orators.”

For most contemporaries, however, 1830 constituted a genuine revolution. A revolution made even more marvelous by its brevity. Jules Michelet argued in his Introduction to Universal History that, as a revolution, 1830 represented a profound moment in the evolution of humanity; a revolution of the people that balanced liberty, equality, law, and order revealed the road to the future. Many other historians have echoed this appreciative spirit, even as they have offered more critical analyses and disagreed about the revolution’s origins, character, and consequences. If the July Days represent the culmination of political and religious conflict during the Restoration, then what are the relevant factors? Was the revolution a consequence of mass politicization (revealing a subterranean radical tradition, a resurgent anti-clericalism, or even a resilient popular royalism), the development of political movements (with new organizations, ideologies, and repertoires of protest), or unresolved contradictions in the categories of political discourse? For some historians, 1830 reveals a high-water mark for the influence of new communications media. For others, it is a step in the further centralization of state power. Scholars are increasingly less convinced that revolutions are simple expressions of class conflict, yet some have argued that 1830 represents an important stage in the development of both working-class and bourgeois identities.

By any standard, the July Days became an important symbol of the development of modern political culture: a victory for secularism, nationalism, popular sovereignty, parliamentary democracy, and freedom of the press. It was a clear defeat for monarchical despotism and hereditary privilege. The role of the new king was now circumscribed; his court abolished, he ruled as king “of the French” and not “of France.” The Revolution of 1830 was, moreover, a defeat for the international containment of revolution associated with the Holy Alliance. Inspired by the example of France, revolution once again spread across Europe from Belgium to Poland and Italy. Witnesses of the Revolution of 1830 and its interpreters alike have been struck by the force of that historical past in informing the practical and symbolic actions of the revolutionaries of July. Therefore, in August 1830, the Church of Sainte Geneviève again became the Pantheon, as it was during the French Revolution, a temple to the greatest names of the nation. Later, the July Column, a monument to the heroes of the July Days topped by a statue of the Spirit of Liberty, was erected to commemorate the tenth anniversary of the revolution in 1840. The column still stands on the Place de la Bastille.

France, June Days, 1848

Casey Harison

The June Days rebellion in Paris (June 23–6, 1848) was the largest and most violent urban uprising in Europe between the French Revolution of 1789–94 and the Paris Commune of 1871. It erupted in the wake of the dashed hopes of the February Revolution and ended only after three days of bitter street fighting between workers and the armed forces of France's new republican government. For a long time, the June Days would stand as the clearest example of class struggle in the modern European experience.

Revolution swept across much of Europe in 1848, including in France where the February Revolution replaced the Orleanist monarchy with a republican provisional government. Among the many reforms of this "springtime of revolution" were the right to vote and hold elected office (for males), plans for a constitution and National Assembly, better access to education, the abolition of slavery in French colonies, and, for the working class, the promise of improvements in housing, pay, hiring practices, and working hours. In the end, these advances proved difficult to sustain. Within three years the republic and most of its reforms were ended.

Yet another development of the spring of 1848 was the creation of National Workshops, which provided menial labor for the unemployed of Paris, partly in the hopes of stifling political unrest. Disliked by a portion of the nation's middle and upper classes, the Workshops were dissolved in June – a signal of a shift in the political mood and the final spark for the June Days. Within days of the end of the Workshops, the city's working class was erecting barricades, mostly in the narrow, winding streets of central and eastern Paris, as well as in neighborhoods on the Left Bank of the Seine River. Learning from the experience of February, General Eugène Cavaignac suppressed the rebellion with the tremendous armed forces at his disposal: police, regular troops (many of them brought to the city by railroad from outlying areas), and the newly established urban militia – the Garde Mobile, itself made up mostly of young workers. In the end, the rebellion failed because of the ferocity of the repression and because potential leaders such as Armand Barbès (1809–70) and Louis Auguste Blanqui (1805–81) had been arrested earlier.

The exact number of casualties from the June Days is unknown, though scholars have estimated 1,500 to 3,000 insurgents killed or summarily executed. Judging from these figures and from the nearly 12,000 arrests that followed, a sizable minority of Paris's working-class population took part. Alexis de Tocqueville, one of the best-known political writers of the century and a member of the National Assembly, believed that virtually all of the city's working class supported the eruption in spirit if not in deed. Among the various trades that joined in, building and metal workers proved most susceptible to arrest, as did the provincial workers from central and northern areas of France who had come to the city to look for jobs. Drawing upon the abundant arrest and trial records produced by the June Days, scholars also discovered that most of the insurgents fought as independent groups and in their own neighborhoods – characteristics that contributed to the struggle's awful ferocity. The hopes of a “Democratic and Social Republic” in spring 1848 concluded tragically with the June Days. Soon, counterrevolution had set in almost everywhere across Europe. By 1852, France was ruled autocratically by an emperor (Napoleon III).

The June Days rebellion had declared an open break between working-class and bourgeois segments of Paris's population. In 1848 and after, the French state and the middle and upper classes it mostly represented had won out, though at the cost of thousands of casualties and a deepening of the class struggle. Contemporaries saw the June Days as undiluted class war, a “sort of ‘Servile War,’” Tocqueville wrote, the experience bringing to mind the wars of antiquity when the besieged population of a city, here the middle and upper classes of modern Paris, believed they had no recourse but to think in terms of the most ruthless kind of repression. Not only Tocqueville, but also Karl Marx (1818–83) (situated on the other end of the political spectrum from Tocqueville) agreed about the essential nature of the rebellion. In his classic “The Class Struggles in France, 1848–1850,” Marx cast the rebels as proletarians, the historical class whose destiny was to usher in the last age of human history.

Though the concept of class struggle has been difficult for scholars to define and locate historically, it is almost unanimously agreed that it was present in June 1848. Ever since the nineteenth century, historians have echoed the assessments of Tocqueville and Marx about the salient role of social class in the rebellion, and the proposition that the June Days represented a genuine turning point in modern French and European history.

France, post-World War II labor protests

Marcelline Block

Large-scale labor demonstrations – including strikes, protests, and insurrections – are a major political, economic, and social presence in post-World War II France, a legacy of the French Revolution, itself the biggest social protest in the country's history. Although the largest, best-known, and most important labor protest in the postwar era occurred in May 1968 – “an explosion of revolutionary lyricism,” according to Milan Kundera – several significant protests occurred in 1958 and 1995, as well as through the first decade of the twenty-first century. Major labor uprisings occurred in 2006 and 2007 and continued throughout 2008 during the presidency of Nicolas Sarkozy. In May 2008 France’s leading trade union, the Communist Confédération Générale du Travail (CGT), called for port workers to have a 24-hour strike each week, blocking tankers on May 20 and June 9, 10, 17, and 18 at the biggest French oil port, Fos-Lavera, near Marseille, which is also the world’s third largest oil port.

Fos-Lavera was the scene of labor protests throughout March 2007, starting with port workers staging a 12-day strike against Gaz de France management policies (strikes went on throughout the month and work resumed on March 31, 2007). On July 7, 2008 a CGT protest took place in Nantes, briefly interrupting the Tour de France.

Yet May 1968 remains the largest strike in the history of France and in French cultural memory, a point of reference for social and cultural upheaval. May 1968 was predated by the 1958 strikes.

On April 1, 1958 a million French public workers went on strike for 24 hours in an attempt to force the government to raise wages in nationalized areas of French industry, particularly the transportation sector. This brief, yet intense, labor protest paralyzed France, since nearly all transportation was halted while train, plane, bus, and subway workers were on strike. This strike was called by a coalition of communist, socialist, and Roman Catholic labor leaders as a “warning” to the French government.

This massive labor protest arrived on the heels of the May 13, 1958 riots in Algiers by French settlers who demonstrated against the French government of the time, and which nearly led to a coup d’état or civil war in France. The appointment of General Charles de Gaulle as premier by President René Coty on May 29, 1958 eventually led to the formation of the Fifth French Republic, of which de Gaulle would be elected president in December of the same year. The political chaos including the workers’ strike of 1958 brought de Gaulle out of his self-imposed 1946 political exile/retirement to lead the French government; ten years later, the labor protests of 1968 would bring about his downfall, although not before the inauguration of the infamous, specially trained and equipped French riot police, the Compagnies Républicaines de Sécurité (CRS), created directly in response to the 1958 labor protest. This branch of the French police is notorious for brutality. CRS officers in their ominous, dark uniforms – complete with lead-lined capes that can easily harm, maim, and even kill – have been a ubiquitous presence at French riots throughout the postwar period since 1958.

Ten years after the 1958 labor protest, in the spring of 1968, students in Paris organized to demand reforms of the French university system, which they perceived as rigid, elitist, and sexist. Most of all, university facilities were not equipped to accommodate the postwar baby boom in student population. At the University of Nanterre outside of Paris, discontent had been brewing since the fall of 1967 when a small-scale student strike occurred after the Marxist, anarchist student leader Daniel Cohn-Bendit – also known as Danny le Rouge (Danny the Red) – was to be expelled by university officials for his activism. On March 22, 1968 – after the arrest of several student leaders at the behest of university administrators on March 20–21 – students occupied administrative buildings, leading to the closing of the campus in early May. Student activism moved to the Sorbonne, located in the heart of Paris, which was also quickly shut down and student leaders were arrested on May 3. On May 10 and 11 violent clashes occurred between students and police in Paris’ Latin Quarter, where barricades were erected among flying Molotov cocktails and smashed cars set on fire. There was a great deal of police repression and brutality against student leaders, activists, and protestors – including the use of tear gas and mass arrests – yet the student movement only grew rather than diminished.

Student activism catalyzed around Cohn-Bendit, who, although born in France, was of German-Jewish ancestry, leading to one of the movements’ major slogans, “Nous sommes tous des Juifs allemands” (We are all German Jews). In effect, Cohn-Bendit participated little in the movement of May 1968, yet ironically is perhaps its best-known participant and is remembered as the poster child of 1968. Cohn-Bendit’s political and social activism continued, and today he is the highest-ranking official of the European Greens in the European parliament.

Most significantly for the 1968 student movement, on May 13 French trade unions declared their solidarity with the student protestors and called a general one-day strike, which was backed by the CGT, the French Communist Party, and the Force Ouvrière (FO). Over 1 million demonstrators marched in Paris to support the solidarity of students, teachers, and workers, as well as to demand the resignation of de Gaulle. Soon more than 10 million employees of all sectors, representing two-thirds of the French labor force – initially beginning with truck drivers and encompassing nearly all other industries and professions – went on strike, decrying unemployment and demanding better wages as well as other social reforms to improve working conditions and to uphold the right to self-management. It was the largest group of French labor strikes since 1936, as well as the longest strike in French history. Workers occupied factories throughout France, such as the Sud Aviation plant near Nantes and the Renault factories in Rouen, Flins, and Boulogne-Billancourt, among others.

Yet due to their fear of spontaneous revolt, the CGT and the Communist Party, two of the most influential organizations for French laborers, did not actively support the workers' strikes. Although the CGT negotiated with the French government for numerous reforms – among others, a 35 percent pay increase for over 1 million workers, a shorter working week, improved benefits, half of their pay for their time on strike and a younger retirement age – the workers rejected these reforms because their goal was to overthrow capitalism, not to work within the existing system. The workers' agenda was more radical than that of the CGT, yet the protestors were fragmented in their aims and disorganized. They refused to return to work, nor would they leave the factories they were occupying (some of the protestors held their managers hostage, imprisoning them inside their own offices). As part of the labor protests, the French Stock Exchange building was set afire. The Grenelle agreements – which proposed to increase the minimum wage by 25 percent as well as general salaries by 10 percent – were rejected by the protestors, who continued to strike, demanding a total transformation of workers' conditions, as well as the overthrow of the government.

Although de Gaulle called the protests of 1968 “incomprehensible,” taken within their global context they are representative of a period of dramatic global instability as well as social and political upheaval. Other significant moments of uprising, protest, instability, and revolutionary movements in 1968 include worldwide youth protests against the Vietnam War, as well as the Vietnamese Tet Offensive; the Chinese Cultural Revolution; the Prague Spring; the Naxalite movement in India; the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr. in Alabama; and the Black Power movement in the United States. Massive international student protests were inspired by May 1968 in Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Italy, Mexico City, Poland, Senegal, Spain, and Yugoslavia, as well as later on in the United States during the early 1970s, as exemplified by the Kent State Student Uprising and its brutal police repression.

While the labor protests paralyzed French society at the time, without more concrete goals other than the overthrow of de Gaulle's government and capitalist ideology in general, the protests subsided. The protests of May 1968 temporarily paralyzed France, yet without a motivating factor to move the protestors forward; work resumed in June after de Gaulle dissolved the National Assembly and ordered workers to return to their employment. The Sorbonne was taken over by French police on June 16.

May 1968 rang the death knell of de Gaulle's career, and was followed by his death shortly thereafter on November 9, 1970. Although his government survived the demonstrations – indeed, the Gaullist Party emerged even stronger in the June 1968 elections – de Gaulle himself resigned in April, 1969. His successor was his prime minister, Georges Pompidou, who was responsible for the government's survival during the 1968 chaos; forging agreements with the protestors and the unions, he prevented the unified, well-organized right-wing deputies from dismantling the government. Pompidou successfully negotiated an acceptable group of measures that satisfied both the CGT and the protestors, including an increase in the national minimum wage and salary increases of 7–10 percent throughout the country.

The legacy of 1968 is the emergence of such cultural and social theories as feminism, anti-colonialism, gay civil rights, the green movement, and anti-nuclear awareness. Studies have been undertaken of the slogans, signs, and graffiti of May 1968 from the perspectives of literary theory, semiotics, and sociology. Slogans such as “We are all German Jews,” as well as the many examples of graffiti, signs, and posters (in particular, those likening de Gaulle to Hitler), prove to be noteworthy. It is a lasting topic of analysis about different aspects of French culture and society in the 1960s and 1970s, in particular the influence of the Situationists. Not only, though, did Situationism play a role in the events of May 1968, but also, according to Jean-François Sirinelli, “May 1968 is the first French crisis of the media age . . . the media dimension played a definite role” (Sirinelli 2007: 109–10). Indeed, the events of 1968 have been commemorated in numerous films, including Guy Debord’s 1973 The Society of the Spectacle, Chris Marker’s 1977 documentary A Grim Without a Cat, Louis Malle’s Milou in May (1990), and Bernardo Bertolucci’s The Dreamers (2003), among others. It has also been featured in novels and song.

After 1968, several labor protests occurred in France: postal workers in 1974; nurses in 1989; social workers in 1991. The most important were the large-scale labor strikes of November–December 1995, whose magnitude and significance are reminiscent of May 1968. This group of strikes mainly protested Prime Minister Alain Juppé’s plan to cut welfare and other social programs. On October 10 and November 24, 1995 civil servants struck in protest of Juppé’s pay freeze on the workers of the public sector as well as the Juppé Plan in general. These strikes were organized and supported by all the trade unions. In December 1995 railway unions called out their workers on strike against the Juppé Plan, severely disabling France’s railroad system and eventually all public transportation. The railway workers protested against abolishing retirement at age 55 and the French National Rail Company (SNCF)’s planned eliminations of thousands of jobs as well as of railroad tracks deemed “useless.” Paris’ metro conductors, gas and electric employees, postal employees, schoolteachers, hospital personnel, streetcar drivers, and other union members and public sector workers joined the railway workers in the protests. Strikes, marches, and demonstrations soon spread from Paris to the rest of France, the most important of which took place on December 12 and 16. After Juppé abandoned his retirement reform plan, the strike ended on December 15, 1995.

There are parallels between 1968 and the protests of 1995. As in 1968, the labor protests of winter 1995 destabilized the government leadership of President Jacques Chirac. The 1995 strikes were also preceded by a student protest that started, this time, at Rouen University in October 1995. Yet the labor strikes of 1995 differed from those of 1968 in several ways. Unlike those of 1968, the 1995 labor protestors were more united and coherent, with clearly stated demands: in 1995 “there was a great uprising against the Juppé Plan and in favor of defending public services (these were the themes which, beyond the particular concerns of each sector, consolidated the movement) . . . because everyone felt strongly that a safety net of social protection and high quality public services were necessary to avoid further deepening of social inequality” (Trat 1996: 232). Unlike in 1968, it was the unions such as the CGT that called for the 1995 strikes. It was not a general strike, since workers in the private sector did not participate. Following the student protest in 1995 was a large-scale demonstration in November in favor of abortion, contraception, and reproductive rights, after which the labor protests followed.

Labor protests continued in France into the twenty-first century. In November 2002 public sector employees – including air traffic controllers, railway and postal employees, and radio technicians – went on strike in Paris in order to obtain better job security and retirement benefits. They were also protesting Prime Minister Jean-Pierre Raffarin’s policies allowing employers to fire employees at will. Just before this strike, truck drivers had walked off the job and had set up blockades around Paris.

Gas and electricity employees, hospital personnel, and schoolteachers struck in May 2003 against government plans to reform public employee pensions, which once more forced school closings all over France; more than half of the teaching force went on strike.

Labor protests have not only affected public education and transportation, but also artistic and cultural life has been disrupted by striking employees. In June 2003 performing artists – actors, singers, dancers, circus performers, choreographers, lighting technicians – went on strike to protest new limitations on unemployment benefits, thus disrupting several cultural events such as the annual Montpellier Dance Festival and other festivals in Aix-en-Provence, Avignon, Caen, and Marseille. Paris theaters including the Comédie Française cancelled performances. Protestors were supported by the CGT as well as by star actors and directors.

In 2006 a major youth labor protest took place against Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin's approval of a bill that would allow for the implementation of the Contrat première embauche (CPE or First Employment Contract). Although the CPE supposedly was going to create new jobs, it would allow employers more easily to dismiss employees under 26 years of age during their first two years on the job. It also allowed for physical apprenticeships for 14 year olds and night labor for adolescents as young as 15 (as opposed to the previous age limit of 16). Even before the bill was signed, protests against it began in February 2006. Those opposing the bill believed it not only would diminish job security and lower wages, but would also lead to tolerance of sexual harassment and other forms of mistreatment on the job, since employees would fear their complaints about personal abuse would lead to retaliation and dismissal. Protests continued from February through April in all of France; student protestors once more occupied universities in Rennes, Toulouse, and Marseille, among others. Violent altercations between the protestors and the police took place on a daily basis. Nearly 5,000 people were arrested. Most of the protesters were university or high school students, and several student unions, such as Dijon's, actively supported and called for general strikes. Air and train transportation, postal services, and public education were disrupted by the strikes. On April 10 the CPE was rejected by President Chirac, who was under pressure from the ongoing protest and blockades across France. Within a week of the withdrawal of the CPE, the protests ceased and universities were either reopened by April 18 or set to do so.

Several weeks before the 2007 French elections, Airbus employees, demonstrating against proposed company changes and rumored job cuts, went on strike in French cities that housed Airbus factories, such as Toulouse, Nantes, Méaulte, and Saint-Nazaire. The Airbus employee strike can be seen as a prelude to the November 2007 general strikes against President Nicolas Sarkozy and Prime Minister François Fillon's plans to end early retirement benefits for 500,000 public employees whose dangerous and/or hazardous professions allow them to retire after 37.5 years of work rather than 40. The Sarkozy government believed this early retirement policy costs $7 billion per year (one of Sarkozy's campaign slogans being "Work more to earn more"). In eliminating fiscal penalties on overtime for workers, Sarkozy essentially ended Prime Minister Lionel Jospin's 35-hour work week, instituted in 2000 as a solution to unemployment. On November 13, 2007, after the CGT called a strike, French rail workers and Paris Métro personnel, along with gas and electric employees as well as performers from the Opéra National de Paris, were the first groups to walk off their jobs. Some university students also participated and blocked the entrances to their campuses, including once more the University of Nanterre, which had been the starting point of the events of 1968. A counter-strike took place on November 18, 2007, but by November 20, a key day of protest, many other union members had joined the demonstrations, including teachers, postal workers, air traffic controllers, and newspaper printers. Railroad tracks were set on fire, an act of arson and vandalism condemned by the unions and the government. The strikes continued until the end of November, with the employees of the justice system protesting on November 29.

In response to the December 2007 negotiations when the French government rejected employee demands for salary increases, civil servants went on strike in January 2008 throughout France, demonstrating in Paris, Lyon, Toulouse, Bordeaux, and Marseille to protest job cuts and demand higher salaries for all French government workers. The protestors – teachers, hospital workers, firefighters, and postal workers, among others – were called upon to strike by the major labor unions representing them.

On May 16, 2008 the continuing clash between Sarkozy and labor unions erupted when teachers and civil servants demonstrated against Sarkozy's proposed cuts of civil service positions. Demonstrations occurred in Paris, Marseille, Toulouse, and Strasbourg. A week later the transport unions also went on strike. These union-backed strikes continued in June and July of 2008. In April 2008 journalists of Le Monde, one of France's established and prestigious daily newspapers, went on two 24-hour strikes against chairperson Éric Fottorino's proposed job cuts aiming to solve the newspaper's budget and circulation problems. During each of the 24-hour strikes, the newspaper did not publish, which had not happened for decades.

According to Sarkozy, "every time we change something in our country, actions undertaken to better answer the expectations of the French for their schools raise worries, even dissatisfaction, and these worries sometimes, like today, express themselves through strikes” (Erlanger 2008). Despite the omnipresence and seemingly endless wave of labor protests since the start of his administration, Sarkozy declared he would go ahead with his intention to cut 22,900 civil-service jobs in 2008 and 35,000 in 2009, likening his economic policies to a “French New Deal.”

The words of one striking civil servant succinctly describe the prevalence of French labor protests well into the twenty-first century: “We have to keep our tradition of strikes. It’s a French thing to do” (Sciolino 2002).

France, resistance to Nazism

Timothy M. Neeno

The French resistance movement can be said to have begun on June 18, 1940 with Charles de Gaulle’s appeal to Frenchmen everywhere to continue the struggle against Nazi Germany. De Gaulle had been one of the few French military commanders to have success against the invading blitzkrieg (“lightning”) strategy. Promoted to brigadier general on June 1, 1940, he was later appointed under-secretary of state for national defense. With the French army collapsing, however, he had to flee in exile and issue his appeal for resistance from London.

Initial French resistance to the Nazi occupation was limited. While de Gaulle established a Free French movement in the French colonies with the backing of the British, most notably in French Equatorial Africa, resistance at first had little support in France itself. The overwhelming defeat of the French army in May–June of 1940 had deeply shocked and demoralized the French. Hitler also allowed a Zone Libre in the southern part of France, where a collaborationist French state was established under Marshal Philippe Pétain at Vichy. Pétain’s authoritarian government was popular, at least initially, with conservative and reactionary groups in France. Resistance was made more difficult by the ill-considered British attack on the French fleet at Mers-el-Kebir in July of 1940. This attempt to prevent the French navy from falling into German hands, along with the bungled British-Free French assault on the French base at Dakar in West Africa in August, served only to reawaken traditional French suspicion of the English.

German rule, however, remained unpopular, and gradually a resistance movement formed, printing and distributing underground newspapers, carrying out sabotage, and smuggling downed Allied pilots to safety. The British Special Operations Executive (SOE) attempted to aid the French Resistance and set up a network of intelligence agents inside occupied France. However, the German Gestapo was very effective in rooting out nascent spy networks. The SOE and de Gaulle's own intelligence service, the Bureau Central de Renseignement et d'Action (BCRA), were also hampered by their inability to cooperate with each other. Yet even displaying the double-barred Cross of Lorraine, the symbol of the Free French movement, or vandalizing German posters with the ubiquitous V-for-Victory symbol popularized by Winston Churchill, was a form of resistance.

Three events transformed the situation. The first was Hitler's invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941. Up until this time, the French communists, at Stalin's behest, were generally quiescent, as Hitler and Stalin had maintained a non-aggression pact since 1939. Now the French communists, with their large and secretive underground network, joined the resistance in earnest. On August 21, 1941 a team of communist assassins carried out the first successful attack on a German officer, gunning down a naval cadet in the Paris Metro. The wave of German reprisals only made the Resistants more popular.

The second event was the success of Operation TORCH, the Allied invasion of French North Africa. This, and the willingness of French troops in North Africa to go over to the British and Americans, led the Germans to occupy the Zone Libre. This move undermined the authority and credibility of the Vichy regime at the exact moment when de Gaulle's Free French movement was growing in prestige, and the Allied cause in general was on the rise.

The third milestone in the growth of an active guerrilla resistance was the Vichy decree of October 4, 1942 establishing the Service du Travail Obligatoire (STO), a compulsory labor draft for able-bodied Frenchmen. The STO was created at the insistence of the Germans, who by this time were desperately short of factory workers. However, the Germans were known to treat foreign workers as virtual slaves. So when the first labor draftees were called up under the law in February 1943, widespread evasion ensued. Many able-bodied Frenchmen fled to the countryside. By the end of 1943 some 150,000 Frenchmen were in hiding from the labor draft. By mid-1944 this figure had risen to nearly 300,000. At first just hiding out, these groups became the seeds of the Maquis, armed French guerrilla groups resisting German occupation by force. Maquis was originally a term for the scrub brush of the rugged hill country of Corsica and southeastern France, and became the name of a Corsican resistance movement against French rule in the eighteenth century. There had been sporadic resistance in the countryside before, but now the maquisards became widespread and increasingly effective.

The Resistance was also becoming better coordinated. In May 1943 Jean Moulin, an agent for de Gaulle, brought five clandestine groups together in a secret meeting in Paris and established the Conseil National de la Resistance (CNR). A week later, on June 4, 1943, the French Committee of National Liberation was proclaimed in Algiers, which quickly came under the undisputed control of General de Gaulle. The British soon after began coordinating SOE operations with de Gaulle, making it easier to get arms, supplies, and agents into occupied France to help the Resistance and coordinate intelligence gathering. The Germans were skillful at using radio direction finding gear to ferret out clandestine radio transmissions. In order to keep these to a minimum, the British transmitted coded signals to underground groups in France disguised as "personal messages" over the BBC. Even so, many Allied agents and French Resistance members were hunted down and killed.

In January 1943 the Vichy government established the Milice Française under a militant French fascist, Joseph Darnand. The miliciens were a brutal mix of French fascists, opportunists, and thugs. They were used by the Germans to hunt down the Maquis, Jews, and others deemed "troublemakers," and were bitterly hated by the Resistants. The Germans and their milicien allies ruthlessly pursued any who they perceived as a threat. Taking of hostages and wholesale reprisal executions were standard practice.

De Gaulle's proclamation of the Free French movement in June 1940 had signaled the start of what was in effect a civil war in France's far-flung colonial empire. From the spring of 1943 on, it is possible to interpret France itself as being in a state of civil war, with the Germans aiding one side, and the Allies aiding another. The Resistance was always a heterogeneous movement. It included militant communists, democratic socialists, Gaullists, and moderate nationalists. There were also exiled Germans: Jews, communists, and opponents of Hitler who had fled the Nazi takeover. In the southwest of France as many as 60,000 exiled Spanish Loyalists who had fled pro-fascist General Francisco Franco's takeover of Spain joined the Resistance, perceiving it as a continuation of the struggle against fascism. Vichy supporters were also mixed in their views but were generally more conservative. The divide between Resistants and Vichyites was, in a sense, a continuation of the ideological divisions of the prewar era.

In the spring of 1944 matters came to a head, as the Allies prepared to launch the D-Day invasion of France from Britain. As the Allies stepped up air raids across France to disrupt German communications, teams of American and British agents were parachuted into occupied France to make contact with the various Maquis cells. On February 1 the French Committee of National Liberation proclaimed the creation of the Forces Françaises de l'Intérieur (FFI) in an attempt to further unite the Resistance movement. In this same period the Nazis increased the size and scope of Milice operations. Milice headquarters was moved from Vichy to Paris, and a new decree gave it the power to conduct its own courts martial, effectively making it a French Gestapo. The Germans and the Milice also stepped up anti-partisan operations.

The Maquis could harass the occupiers, raiding, sniping, and carrying out acts of sabotage, but it was extremely difficult for Maquis groups to gain undisputed control of large tracts of land for very long. For example, in February 1944 one Maquis group attempted to establish a liberated zone in the Glières Plateau of Haute Savoie in the French Alps. They successfully repulsed an assault by Vichyite forces on March 20 in a pitched battle. However, on March 26 the Germans arrived with elite mountain troops, backed by aircraft and artillery support. The Germans and Vichy troops suffered heavy casualties, but the issue was not in doubt. Of 458 maquisards, 125 were either killed, wounded, or captured, and the Glières Plateau redoubt was abandoned.

Yet the Maquis as a whole were invaluable to the Allied cause, providing intelligence on German movements, tying down troops to protect vital installations, and making it difficult for the Germans to operate freely in the countryside. Starting in May, the Resistance began targeting locomotives, making it harder for the Germans to move reinforcements around. By the time of the Normandy invasion, it took three days to go by rail from Paris to Toulouse, and some 400,000 French men and women were part of the FFI.

Immediately following the D-Day invasion of Normandy on June 6, 1944, FFI groups began a wave of coordinated attacks against German communications across the length and breadth of France. Their effectiveness can be gauged by the savagery of the reprisals carried out by the Germans. One FFI group blew up the main fuel dump for the elite SS Das Reich Panzer division. Instead of being able to race to the beaches at Normandy, this powerful armored unit was forced to crawl along, scavenging fuel from wherever they could. In retaliation the SS massacred the entire French village of Oradour-sur-Glane, murdering 642 men, women, and children in cold blood.

In July Allied forces broke out from their beachhead in Normandy, while on August 15 Americans, backed by the French first army, landed in Provence. Nazi control of France collapsed. The day after the Allied landings in southern France, the Germans moved the Vichy premier out of Paris under armed guard to Belfort, in German controlled Alsace-Lorraine. Four days later, they did the same to Marshal Pétain. The Milice melted away. The Vichy regime was over.

As the Allies pushed eastward, Paris loomed large, both as a population center and as a symbol. American General Dwight Eisenhower would have bypassed Paris to push directly toward the Rhine, but the French Resistance forced a change of plans. On August 15, 1944 strikes began in Paris, including the police and Metro workers. By August 18 Paris was in the grip of a general strike. On August 19 Parisians took to the streets, erected barricades, seized key points, and trapped the German garrison in the center of the city. Partisan street fighting raged for days, as the Allied forces turned south to relieve the rebellious Parisians. On August 25 elements of the French Second Armored Division rolled into Paris. The German garrison surrendered. The next day, General de Gaulle paraded in triumph through the city. On September 19 de Gaulle, now in control, declared the FFI dissolved and reintegrated into the regular French armed forces.

If the Liberation of Paris is used as the marker for the end of a French civil war, the Épuration, the reprisals dealt out to Axis collaborators, can be interpreted as its aftermath. Statistics are difficult to come by, but at least 11,000 collaborators met their end before angry mobs. To put things in perspective, it is estimated that, in four and a half years, the Germans and their Vichy cohorts killed some 300,000 people, including some 80,000 Jews deported for extermination in Nazi death camps. In Lyons alone, the Gestapo chief, Klaus Barbie, oversaw the deportation of 7,500 people, the murder of 4,300 others, and the arrest and torture of over 14,000 people accused of being Resistance fighters. In comparison, French retaliation was mild. Of 125,000 people formally tried as Nazi collaborators in courts, only 767 were finally executed. In comparison to the population of France, the percentage of those executed is smaller than comparable retaliation in Belgium. Percentage-wise, the French sent to prison only a fraction of those jailed in the other western occupied countries. By being relatively merciful, de Gaulle helped ensure that the wounds of the French civil war would heal.

France, Revolution of 1848

Stephen W. Sawyer

February 22, 1848 in Paris marked the uncontested beginning of a year of revolution. In its wake, France would once again be the spearhead of a republican movement on the European continent, giving birth to political emancipation in the form of universal suffrage and the abolition of slavery. This year would also witness some of the fiercest social and class struggles seen to date. It is no coincidence that the young Karl Marx would carve his intellectual teeth on this event by writing Class Struggle in France. The year 1848, then, suggests far more than just a few days of revolution; it represents a transition in the history of nineteenth-century politics. The two key turning points that were essential to this year of political and social upheaval occurred in June and December. The workers' revolt during the June Days framed the last gasp of a radical social revolution led by early socialists and based as much on the right to work as the right to vote. The presidential elections of December, on the other hand, marked the first election of a French president through universal suffrage and outlined an attempt to anchor republican political foundations within the French nation. These two traditions within 1848 reveal the dominant threads of this transformative moment.

The February Revolution or the "Lyrical Illusion"

The roots of 1848 began during the banquet campaigns organized by the political opposition in 1847. The campaigns were designed to mobilize the population against the limited suffrage that reigned in France during the July Monarchy (1830–48). François Guizot, minister of the interior since 1840, had categorically refused any reforms of the electoral system, which required, as a condition for voting, that the individual pay 200 francs in taxes per year.

The revolutionary fervor was driven by an unprecedented level of organization within the press, political associations, and proto-political parties, which organized the opposition since the mid-1840s. The republican press consisted of primarily two newspapers, Le National (radical republican), edited by Armand Marrast, and La Réforme (republican and socialist), edited by Flocon. These papers fanned the flames of social and political discontent throughout the last years of the July Monarchy, and their presence during the Second Republic's provisional government is indicative of the press's influence during this revolution. Marrast would even be named mayor of Paris during the first months of 1848.

The press was seconded by an unprecedented level of political organization emanating from the Central Committee of the Opposition of the Seine. This committee managed the banquet campaigns in Paris, organized the lists of candidates for the opposition for municipal and national elections in many of the provinces, and maintained an extensive correspondence with the opposition outside Paris. It also organized the elections to the National Guard, which had been reestablished during the July Monarchy, and succeeded in placing members of the opposition within its officer corps.

By the winter of 1847, the opposition movement had gained steam, and on January 14, 1848, the government banned a political banquet to be held in the 12th arrondissement in Paris. When the banquet was suspended again on February 21, riots ensued in the capital. On February 22, the revolt continued and, in spite of Guizot's dismissal on February 23, the National Guard rallied behind the insurgents. Louis-Philippe, the king of the July Monarchy, abdicated on February 24, and thus left the door open for a Second French Republic.

On February 25, the provisional government established itself in the Paris Hôtel de Ville (City Hall), which once again, as so many times before in the Revolutions of 1789 and 1830, had become the center of a national revolution. Within the Hôtel de Ville, the revolutionaries attempted what Henri Guillemin has called "the first resurrection of the Republic." Indeed, the memory of the Revolution of 1789 and its Reign of Terror had been, and would be, at the heart of political debates in 1848. In an effort to call upon the greatest moments of the Revolution, and at the same time leave behind its darkest hours, the provisional government immediately abolished the death penalty for political acts and adopted the tricolor flag (instead of the red flag desired by the socialist far left). These two declarations summarize the provisional government's desire to appropriate the progressive legacy of 1789, while turning its back on the Terror of the first French Revolution.

The period following the establishment of the provisional government up to the month of June has been widely interpreted as the period of the "lyrical illusion." That designation suggests the temporary euphoria and lack of realism within the republican resurrection during this "springtime of peoples." However, it would be inaccurate to suggest that these first months of 1848 were inconsequential for the political and social history of France. While certain elements of this "first 1848" have been interpreted as a chimera, they contributed greatly to the history of Paris, French republicanism, and nineteenth-century European politics.

Universal Suffrage and National Workshops

Two declarations mark the early moments of the 1848 Revolution. First, on February 25 the provisional government declared the right to work and three days later created the National Workshops to alleviate unemployment among the workers. Then, on March 2, it announced universal manhood suffrage for all elections (excepting the municipality of Paris). These two declarations evidenced the extent to which political and social equality were integral parts of the Second Republic.

The image of Alexandre Auguste Ledru-Rollin (1807–74) at the Hôtel de Ville declaring universal suffrage would become a cornerstone of the political history of France. Other key advances in political and civil equality were achieved with complete liberty of the press and public meetings, which led to the publication of more than 171 newspapers printed in the spring of 1848. The new government also allowed for equal access to the National Guard, and the abolition of slavery on April 27.

In this period of "Absolute Republic," social and political equality were seen as integral parts of a new age of republican justice. Convinced that social injustice was perpetuated by unequal access to the ballot boxes, the radical opposition of the July Monarchy had been confident that political equality would alleviate all social divisions within the republic. However, once in power, following the February Revolution, the confrontation between the unified voice of the people and the persistence of political and social conflicts kept the provisional government off balance during the first months of 1848.

The Two 1848s

That these two declarations, the right to work and the right to vote, were part of the same moment suggests that there were two 1848s: the first four months of 1848 were marked by a struggle between the achievement of political and social rights. The first 1848 was marked by attempts at an organized socialism, while the second 1848 would be an attempt to organize elections and consolidate political order in the hands of more conservative liberals.

From February to June 1848

The right to work was understood as the counterpart to equal voting rights. The provisional government, reluctant to create a minister of work, created the Luxembourg Commission (the name came from the fact that it met in the Luxembourg Palace in Paris) led by Louis Blanc and Albert l'Ouvrier (born Alexandre Martin and known as "Albert the Worker") as well as delegates elected from among the workers. This commission was to handle issues raised by the newly created National Workshops designed to employ all workers. The creation of the Luxembourg Commission gave hope to the socialists who pushed for a more radical conclusion to the days of February. However, in spite of their aspirations for social and economic equality, the events that followed revealed the divisions inherent within the republic.

The first parliamentary elections to be conducted under universal suffrage were scheduled for April 9. However, the Parisian socialists and radicals feared that this early date for elections did not allow sufficient time for the provinces to be persuaded to support the radical cause, and would lead to a political backlash. The provisional government accepted a symbolic postponement of the elections for two weeks. On April 16, Parisian workers, led by Louis Auguste Blanqui, came out into the streets in a show of force but met the National Guard at the Hôtel de Ville. The national guardsmen showed sufficient determination to cause the workers to back down without a fight. The day ended calmly, but it revealed the first cracks in the revolution's unity as the workers confronted the intransigent armed forces of the republic.

The first signs of armed conflict came following the parliamentary elections in Rouen on April 26. The organizer of the National Workshops in Rouen, Frederic Deschamps, ran against the conservative Antoine Marie Jules Sénard. When Sénard won the seat in the legislative assembly, conflict mounted within the city, and workers took to the streets and built barricades. Sénard called out the National Guard and then brought in troops and cannons to tear down the barricades. The bloody ending to this revolt foreshadowed the June Days in Paris two months later.

The confrontations in Paris between the people in the streets and the political authorities continued in May when a group of radicals took over the National Assembly. They did not ultimately topple the newly elected chamber, but the incident did lead to the arrest of most of the far-left leaders. The last phase of this cycle of revolution took place a month later. The June Days were brought on by the decision to close the National Workshops on June 21. On June 22, the first riots began and erupted into a full-scale revolt of Parisian workers. The working-class neighborhoods in the western part of the capital took to the streets and built barricades. The revolt lasted for three days, as the workers faced the National Guard and General Louis Eugene Cavaignac on June 23, 24, and 25. But in the end, the workers' revolt was crushed and the socialist ambitions of 1848 ended. The June Days marked a historical turning point; they signaled the end of a radical revolution that simultaneously fought on the dual front of social and political rights.

The Search for Stability, July to December 1848

With the passing of the June Days, the Second Republic settled into the second phase of this tumultuous year. The remaining months of 1848 were characterized by the introduction of elections – municipal elections on July 31, departmental elections on August 27, presidential elections on December 10 – and a search for stability.

In the field of political organization, the year 1848 marked a new horizon in French politics. First, the Second Republic was charged with writing a constitution, a process lasting much of the year. The Constituent Assembly, elected on April 23, met for the first time on May 4. The final vote of the constitution was held on November 4. In the end, the Second Republic's constitution created a unicameral legislative body and a president of the republic, and both were to be elected directly through universal male suffrage. The directly elected president would be an exception in the republican history of France prior to the Fifth Republic, marking one of the first attempts to overcome the fear of an overly strong executive that has marked French republican history.

The establishment of universal suffrage also gave birth to new electoral opportunities for much of the French population. With the institution of universal suffrage, all French men over age 21 – almost 9.5 million people – had the right to vote, an unprecedented exercise in European democracy. The preparation for the presidential elections marked a fundamental turning point in the evolution of the French political landscape. On November 4, Ledru-Rollin marked a new phase in the organization of French politics by creating one of the first political parties under the name “Republican Solidarity.”

At the same time, Louis-Napoleon Bonaparte, nephew of Napoleon Bonaparte, entered the political scene. He had been exiled from France following an attempted coup d'état in the 1840s. Already in June 1848, following the legislative elections, there had been extensive debates as to whether he should be admitted into the country and allowed to participate in government. On June 13 he was accepted, but he relinquished his position as member of parliament only to return to run for president a few months later. He would win the presidential elections in December 1848 with a majority of the peasant vote. He received 5,400,000 votes while Cavaignac, in second place, won only 1,400,000 votes. The pitiful 8,000 votes cast for Lamartine suggest the political change that had occurred between February and December 1848. Louis-Napoleon's election marked the end of a tumultuous year of revolution and political innovation as the republic settled into its new institutions. It also foreshadowed the quick demise of the Second Republic, as Louis-Napoleon, following a coup d'état in 1851, ended the short-lived republic. He later declared himself Napoleon III, the head of the Second Empire, on December 2, 1852.

Since 1789, Parisian revolution had been tantamount to national revolution; however, the June Days marked the end of this Parisian domination. Louis-Napoleon was elected by the rural peasant vote, and Paris remained relatively silent during Louis-Napoleon's coup in 1851, while the provinces were surprisingly active. Paris's last revolutionary uprising of the nineteenth century occurred with the Paris Commune of 1871.

Thus, while the Revolution of 1848 has been understood generally as a Parisian phenomenon, it did have a strong impact on the rest of France. The creation of universal suffrage gave new weight to the provinces, which would be increasingly dominant in nineteenth-century French politics. Furthermore, while the revolution in Paris has been considered primary, and has received most of the attention, historians have also begun to explore the extent to which the history of 1848 is a history of cities throughout France, including Lyons, Marseilles, Bordeaux, and Limoges. If 1848 began in Paris, it ended in the countryside.

Francophone Africa, protest and independence

Ayokunle Olumuyiwa Omobowale

Just like other European nations, France assumed colonial control of stretches of territory in Africa, starting with Senegal in 1677 and gradually laying claim to other areas by the early twentieth century. French rule extended from North Africa to West Africa, Equatorial Africa, and African islands in the Indian Ocean. Colonial rule was meant to implement reforms which would modernize the ways of life, technology, administration, and culture of the supposedly primitive indigenous people. Conveniently, the territories also served as a market and source of raw materials for France. French rule in Africa, however, was not devoid of popular protests against colonial domination, especially as nationalists emerged around the mid-twentieth century, clamoring for self-determination and independence.

North Africa

Algeria

French rule in North Africa commenced with the invasion of Algeria in 1830. France subsequently moved eastward and westward to bring Tunisia and Morocco respectively under its rule. Of course French incursion into Algeria did not occur without resistance from the locals. The French war in Algeria subsequently continued for another 30 years, ending in 1860, when Algeria effectively came under French rule. From the outset, French officials viewed the newly acquired territory neither as a colony nor a protectorate. Rather it was seen as a part of France in mainland Africa. Algeria was therefore divided into three departments – Algiers, Oran, and Constantine – and a governor-general was appointed to be in charge of the general administration of the territory.

Indeed, having Algeria as an extension of France also meant an integration of the territory into the larger French society. Aside from French administration, French citizens and other Europeans continually migrated to Algeria. Thus, from a population of 300,000 Europeans in 1870, Algeria accommodated as many as 752,000 in 1911. This new population of predominantly French citizens inevitably shared the notion of Algeria as a French territory to which their claim was superior to that of the indigenous population. Thus began a process of refoulement – an action directed at repression and forceful acquisition of land from the local population for redistribution to European settlers. This process apparently continued more vigorously from 1870 with the overthrow of Napoleon III, who had declared a decade earlier that Algeria was an Arab kingdom where both French men and Arabs were equal. With the fall of Napoleon III, the way was clear to further the refoulement process, and thus every act of resistance by the local populace was an opportunity to appropriate land on a massive scale. In addition, the French government policy of divesting land from family/communal holdings left land in the hands of private individuals from whom French/European speculators could easily buy cheaply.

Consequently, a racial system of differentiation into colons (French/European settlers) and indigènes (local population) emerged, with the colons controlling economic resources and occupying political and administrative positions while the majority of the indigènes lived in abject poverty. Of course, there was a policy of assimilation in place through which educated indigènes who accepted the French way of life and renounced their subjection to Islamic law could become French citizens. Very few indigènes were assimilated, however, because Islam was not just a religion to them. It was a way of life which could not be easily repudiated. Thus, as much as France wanted to have Algeria French, the indigenous population just as clearly saw in the French the reflection of a domineering alien force that should be resisted.

The sentiment for Algerian self-determination within Islamic/Arab social identity, which the leadership of the local population believed would engender equality, fair play, and liberty, served as a precursor for Algerian nationalism. Hence, by the 1920s, nationalist sentiments had been concretized through the works of nationalists such as Messali Hadj, who founded the Etoile Nord-Africaine (North African Star) in France in 1920 and the Party of the Algerian People in 1936. The latter particularly attracted Muslim workers. Likewise Ferhat Abbas successfully brought nationalist groups together under an umbrella body, the Algerian Muslim Congress, in 1936 and 1944. Engaging the French in armed conflict, however, was almost unthinkable at this time, so the nationalists asked only for reforms which would abrogate certain offensive rules, avoiding categorical calls for independence.

Apparently in order to douse mounting nationalist tensions, the French government implemented reforms in 1947 which allowed all Algerians to become French citizens irrespective of religious affiliation. Supposedly, therefore, indigènes could enjoy the same rights as colons. In reality, however, the reform further exacerbated the colon-indigène divide by creating different electoral colleges for the minority colons, along with the small population of assimilated indigènes, and the majority indigènes. Each electoral college was empowered to elect the same number of representatives to both the French National Assembly and the Algerian Assembly. In essence, therefore, the dominance of the minority colons was preserved against the possible interest of the larger number of the local citizens who constituted about 90 percent of the Algerian population.

With widespread disenchantment continually growing, a group of nationalists, some of whom had been militant members of the Party of the Algerian People, formed the National Liberation Front (Front de Libération Nationale, FLN) in 1954, with an armed wing called the National Liberation Army (Armée de Libération Nationale, NLA), with the ultimate objective of engaging France in armed conflict in order to win independence. Having sought and received assistance from the Egyptian government, the FLN launched an armed attack on French interests on November 1, 1954. Thus, the Algerian revolution, which would last another seven years, commenced.

The NLA gradually developed from a rag-tag army to become a disciplined and relatively well-equipped force of about 40,000 troops. About 30,000 of the troops were stationed in safe havens in Morocco and Tunisia, and about 6,000 fighters and other irregulars numbering in the thousands were stationed in Algeria. The NLA adopted guerilla tactics, attacking government and civilian targets in urban areas and escaping by simply melting into the civilian population afterwards.

Furthermore, the FLN had an external arm called the External Delegation stationed in Cairo and Tunis, which carried on the struggle at the diplomatic and international levels. The External Delegation subsequently became an Algerian government in exile in 1958, based in Tunis and with Abbas as head. It enjoyed recognition especially from Asian and African governments.

Of course, both the French armed forces and the colons stepped up reprisal and counterinsurgency attacks on the NLA, with the civilian population bearing the brunt of the operations. By 1956, French forces in Algeria amounted to over 400,000 and had been able to arrest some of the leadership of the FLN, including Ahmad Ben Bella, Hocine Ait Ahmed, Mohammed Khida, and Mohammed Boudiaf, after a plane conveying them to Tunis was forced to land in Algiers. Thus, as the years went by, the FLN, along with its armed wing the NLA, was increasingly forced on the defensive, with superior French firepower and sheer ruthless repression. By 1958, however, unfolding political events in France led to the collapse of the Fourth Republic, while army officers who felt French power was increasingly waning into ignominy staged a coup d'état in Algeria on March 13 and sought to advance on Paris to sack the French government, unless Charles de Gaulle was made leader. The appointment of de Gaulle was approved by the French parliament on May 29.

Indeed, the coup leaders initiated the putsch that brought de Gaulle to power in order to strengthen the French hold on Algeria. Subsequent events, however, had the contrary effect. By purging the army, de Gaulle established himself as the indefatigable leader of France and commenced a process of negotiation with the leadership of the FLN. The negotiations eventually culminated in the signing of the Evian Agreement, which led to Algerian independence in March 1962, with the election of Ahmad Ben Bella as the first president of independent Algeria. By the time the war ended, however, about 141,000 insurgents, 15,000 French troops, 20,000 local civilians, and 3,000 Europeans had been killed. In addition, about two million Algerians became refugees. With Algeria in the hands of the locals, it was no longer home for the colons who had hitherto been in control. Thus, by 1962, out of over a million Europeans, about 900,000 had left Algeria en masse, since their security could no longer be assured.

Tunisia

Unlike Algeria, the French colonial territories of Tunisia and Morocco were administered as protectorates. Hence, it appears that the consciousness that French rule was to last only for a while was kept alive among both indigènes and European settlers/administrators. French control over Tunisia effectively began in May 1881, after the bey of Tunisia agreed to place his domain under French protection in order to defend it against the rampaging Kroumir rebels. Thenceforth, French colonial rule in Tunisia commenced, with a process of transformation of the territory in line with standards stipulated by France. Of course, just as in Algeria, Tunisia subsequently attracted an influx of European migrants who served as business merchants and colonial officials. By 1955, the population of Europeans in Tunisia was about 250,000, compared with an indigenous population of about 3,250,000.

Nevertheless, nationalist pressures against colonial rule commenced in Tunisia early in the twentieth century. By 1920, the nationalists, who were mostly educated young Tunisians, formed the Destour Party. Although the Destour Party agitated for a parliamentary system of government which would eventually lead to Tunisian independence, the party lacked a large following around the country, and thus was largely moribund.

This was the case until Habib Bourguiba came onto the scene in 1930. Bourguiba was a young and educated Tunisian lawyer married to a French woman. He was largely dissatisfied with the state of affairs in the Destour Party and so he founded the Neo-Destour Party in 1934. The new party quickly appealed to the hearts and minds of Tunisians, such that by 1938, the Neo-Destour Party had about 28,000 members spread across over 400 local branches. Bourguiba's efforts at advancing nationalist demands were so intensive that he was arrested in 1939 and imprisoned in France. After his release, Bourguiba returned to Tunisia in 1944 to resume an active role in the Neo-Destour. Around the same period, the party worked in collaboration with two of Tunisia's vigorous workers' unions, the Union Générale des Travailleurs Tunisiens (UGTT) and the Union Générale de l'Agriculture Tunisienne (UGAT).

By 1952, when independence did not seem to be in sight, with increased suppression from France, Tunisian guerilla groups called the Fellagha engaged the French in armed struggle, especially in the countryside. The French government claimed the Fellagha were working for Neo-Destour, an allegation the leadership of the Neo-Destour stoutly denied as it publicly advocated for a peaceful resolution. Consequently, French premier Pierre Mendès-France entered into negotiation with the nationalists in 1954 and Tunisia achieved home rule in 1955 and finally independence on March 20, 1956.

Morocco

Morocco was the last of the three North African territories to come under French rule. French rule in Morocco commenced in March 1912, following Sultan Mulay Hafiz's decision to place his kingdom under French protection in order to save it from imminent collapse as a result of attacks from Berber insurgents. Hafiz was subsequently forced to abdicate the same year and was replaced by his brother, Yusuf. For as long as the reign of Sultan Yusuf lasted, French officials enjoyed official collaboration in policy formulation and implementation without opposition from the royal court, whose head, the sultan, was empowered by the 1912 treaty to endorse all French decrees (dahirs) before they took effect. In an apparent move to ensure a reenactment and possible continuation of the experience under Yusuf, the French authorities chose 18-year-old Prince Sidi Mohammed as sultan in 1927, in place of his older brother, who was the heir apparent. Against the expectations of the French authorities, however, upon ascending the throne, Sultan Sidi Mohammed emerged as a leader of his people, supporting the nationalist quest even at the risk of his throne.

Just as in Tunisia, nationalist organizations emerged in Morocco, beginning in the 1920s with the pioneering efforts of Allal al-Fasi and Ahmad Balafrej, who organized congresses of young men in Fez and Rabat respectively in 1926 to discuss the future of Morocco. From this relatively small beginning, Moroccan nationalists were able to successfully protest against the introduction of the Berber Decree in the 1930s, which recognized Berber customs and largely freed them from subjection to the Islamic law. For the nationalists, the implementation of the Berber Decree was like a deemphasizing of Islam and a veiled granting of autonomy to "recalcitrant" Berbers who had often resisted the authority of the sultan. With a victory over the Berber Decree, Moroccan nationalists gained the support of a wide spectrum of Moroccan society, leading eventually to frequent clashes with the French authorities, who usually applied repressive measures to control protesters. By 1939, many nationalist leaders were in jail, while Allal al-Fasi was exiled to Gabon.

A new trend, which would eventually lead to open support of the efforts of the nationalists by the sultan, began in 1943. After a meeting with President Roosevelt of the United States, during which the president expressed his opposition to colonialism, Sultan Mohammed was emboldened more than ever before to identify with the quest of the nationalists. The following year Moroccan nationalists founded the Istiqlal (Independence) Party, which presented a document demanding Moroccan independence to both the sultan and the French authorities. In 1947, Sultan Mohammed openly supported the cause of the nationalists in a speech he delivered in Tangiers. With rising independence consciousness among Moroccans, the colons were apparently also becoming conscious of their alien status in Morocco. If this was not redressed, independent Morocco might mean the loss of the special privileges and rights they had always enjoyed.

Apparently in an attempt to address this, the French embarked on pro-European settler reforms in which French citizens would become indigènes and both the minority French settlers and the majority indigenous Moroccans would send the same number of representatives to the parliament. Likewise, the sultan would share co-sovereignty with the French government. In spite of pressures from colonial officials, Sultan Mohammed refused to append the legislation, which he saw as an infringement of his sovereign status and as short-changing his subjects. Since the sultan's endorsement was required for it to be effected, in line with the Fez Treaty of 1812, the sultan's refusal effectively stalled the implementation of the legislation. Consequently, Sidi Mohammed was deposed on August 20, 1953, and exiled to Madagascar, while the new Sultan Mohammed ben Arafa appended the controversial legislation.

Following the deposition of Sultan Sidi Mohammed and the imprisonment of most of their leaders, the remnants of the Istiqlal Party launched guerilla attacks against French interests and local collaborators, and also organized a militia force – the Moroccan Liberation Army – which mostly operated along the Moroccan–

Algerian border. Nonetheless, following peace negotiations initiated by Pierre Mendès-France, the French premier, Sidi Mohammed was reinstated in 1955. Morocco eventually became independent in March 1956.

Sub-Saharan Africa

Unlike North Africa, popular anti-colonial protests were less commonplace in sub-Saharan Africa. Whereas some cases could be reported, especially in Madagascar, Ubangui-Shari (now Central African Republic), Congo-Brazzaville, and Cameroon, most of the territories earned their independence as a consequence of the French decision to divest itself of its African colonies. Nevertheless, the inter-territorial Rassemblement Démocratique Africain (RDA) and its local affiliates took a relatively active role in demanding reforms in the colonies which would allow Africans greater participation in administration.

Madagascar

Starting with Madagascar, French rule commenced following the capture of the Merina Island Kingdom on September 30, 1895. Prior to the French invasion, the Merina dynasty, which had survived for over 100 years, had begun moving towards modernization by adopting elements of western systems of government and military organization, unifying the different tribes under a Malagasy national identity, and even adopting Christianity as the state religion. French forces met little resistance as they marched into the capital Antananarivo.

Within two months, however, the Menalamba revolt erupted, lasting until 1897. The Menalamba protesters, who were mostly traditionalists, directed their action against identifiable elements of westernization. Hence, the protesters principally attacked Europeans, missionaries, churches, and local converts. By the time the revolt was quelled, 750 churches had been destroyed and 200 Europeans and about 5,000 natives had been killed. The quelling of the revolt was a crushing defeat for the nationalists and a spectacular victory for the French, which kept further protest at bay for about five decades.

After a period of political tranquility, nationalist sentiments once again evolved, apparently in response to de Gaulle's assurance in 1943 that African colonies would have representatives in the French Assembly once World War II was over and the assembly was reconstituted. In Madagascar, two medical doctors, Joseph Ravoahangy and Joseph Raseta, emerged in the mid- to late 1940s to champion the Malagasy nationalist cause. The duo subsequently formed a political party, the Mouvement Démocratique de la Rénovation Malgache (MDRM), in 1946. The party thereafter swept the polls in elections for the newly created Malagasy Assembly, while both Ravoahangy and Raseta moved to Paris to join the French Assembly.

However, what Malagasy nationalists wanted was far beyond just representation in France. Thus, Ravoahangy and Raseta lobbied the French authorities for self-rule as a precursor to independence. At the same time, in Madagascar, nationalists were beginning to form secret societies, which attracted a good number of Malagasy conscripts who had participated in World War II. With possible independence not yet in sight and a rumor of American support, a band of guerillas numbering hundreds attacked a French military base in northern Madagascar on March 29, 1947, and killed 200 French soldiers and Europeans.

The insurrection came as a surprise to the French authorities. In order to quell the revolt, the French government dispatched a force of 18,000 men, mostly Senegalese conscripts, to the island. The ensuing events were a form of outright massacre as officers and men of the requisition force used brute force to quell the uprising. By the time the insurrection ended, 90,000 Malagasy men, women, and children had been killed on the battlefield or in prison, or through starvation and disease; and over 200,000 Malagasy nationalists were in prison; while Ravoahangy and Raseta were arrested, tried, and sentenced to life imprisonment.

The repression did not put a stop to nationalist yearnings, and the leftists increasingly won local polls in Madagascar, especially in 1959. France therefore stepped up measures aimed at handing over power to pro-French Malagasy nationalists who would not court the friendship of the communists, especially during the crucial period of the Cold War. Hence, after holding a conference with moderate Malagasy politicians in February 1960, France granted Madagascar independence on June 26, 1960, with Philibert Tsiranana, a pro-French politician, as the first president.

Central African Republic

Another popular revolt worthy of note was the Gbaya rebellion of 1928–31 in Ubangui Shari (now Central African Republic). The initial stage of the rebellion was spearheaded by Barka Ngainoumbey, a religious leader nicknamed Karmu. Following certain spiritual revelations which he claimed he had seen, Karmu prophesied that a day was coming when all blacks would be united and the whites would leave. He subsequently called for resistance through the boycott of European goods and non-payment of taxes. From 1924 onwards, his influence and message spread from his base at Nahing to other Gbaya settlements in Central African Republic, and onward to parts of neighboring Cameroon and Congo. Karmu apparently became a messianic leader among the people, who were coerced into forced labor for the construction of the Congo–Ocean railroad and the Bangui–Yaounde road and faced a huge increase in the head tax from 3 francs to 7.5 francs. The colonial authorities' excruciating demands must have made Karmu's words appear as those of a likely liberator. Gradually Karmu built up a considerable following, and he allocated a hoe handle to each follower, supposedly as a protection against European bullets.

As intelligence reports reached the colonial authorities about the activities of a prophet in the countryside spreading sentiments against the French and other Europeans, and asking his followers not to pay taxes, a decision was made to remove him. The actual onslaught did not, however, start until some Gbaya fighters resisted colonial officials and African guards who had gone to villages to collect taxes in September 1928, attacking them with arrows, spears, and stones. Of course, this attack was attributed to the followers of Karmu, and French colonial officials consequently resolved to suppress the uprising with military force. Hence, the French military commenced a scorched-earth operation on October 24, burning and destroying villages as the troops advanced towards Karmu's base at Nahing. French troops eventually reached Nahing on December 11, after heavy resistance from Karmu's men. Nahing was captured and Karmu was killed in action. His death was not an end to the revolution, however, and the repression continued.

Karmu was succeeded by new "prophets" who continued to spread Karmu's message and prophecies and led a resistance against the French authorities. Between 1930 and 1931, these leaders were either killed or captured, one after the other, and the resistance was gradually whittled down. The last "battle" occurred around Bocarango, where the local African troops had brutally treated local residents in the maintenance of French rule. The local residents retaliated by identifying and attacking in particular those African soldiers who had been brutal to them. French troops responded to the attacks with an enormous military offensive against the entire population. The people escaped to underground holes from where they were "smoked out with pepper-laden fires and massacred by machine guns" (O'Toole 1984: 338). This was the end of the Gbaya revolt, and Central African Republic (formerly Ubangui-Shari) nationalists did not take up violence again until the country attained independence in August 1960.

Congo-Brazzaville

Popular protest against colonial rule in Congo-Brazzaville was rather short-lived. It largely centered on the pioneering efforts of André Matswa, who had served in the French army in Morocco between 1924 and 1925. Upon discharge, he formed an organization in Paris in 1926 with the main objective of assisting underprivileged Congolese living in France, and received considerable support from the French Communist Party. The group subsequently spread to Congo where it had a large following. With supposedly increasing nationalist influence, Matswa's group started protesting against French rule, which was considered draconian by the local population. The response of the French authorities was the proscription of Matswa's organization and the arrest and imprisonment of Matswa in 1929. This culminated in widespread demonstrations and resistance against the colonial regime. Matswa died in prison in 1942, but his followers made his thinking their guiding ideology. In 1956, a Catholic priest named Abbé Fulbert Youlou eventually emerged as a successor to Matswa. Youlou was subsequently elected the leader of Congo-Brazzaville at independence in 1960.

Cameroon

Cameroon was seized from Germany during World War I and subsequently split between France and Great Britain as Mandate Territories of the League of Nations in 1919, and Trust Territory under the United Nations at the end of World War II. The nationalist quest was championed in the French section from the mid-1940s by the Union des Populations du Cameroun (UPC), which served as the local affiliate of the radical inter-territorial RDA. The UPC right from its inception unequivocally called for Cameroonian independence and retained strong links with the French Communist Party, against pressures from the French government, and was able to build a network of local branches, which cut across a wide spectrum of the Cameroonian polity, right to the grassroots. It thus became a strong political party, which was vocal enough to challenge the policies of the French government, even before the United Nations.

Indeed, the unabating effrontery of the UPC to challenge the French government and its policies in Cameroon was interpreted as a manifestation of support from the communists. In the absence of a viable opposing party, the UPC could have been the party to take over power from the French. However, a party with communist ideology and links was not to be allowed to take over a French trust territory. Thus, a policy of repression of the UPC commenced from 1954, involving an alignment with local chiefs and officials for the suppression of the UPC and its supporters, and the strengthening of the police and the military to intensify anti-UPC actions. After a series of acts of repression from the police, military, and pro-government groups, the UPC resorted to revolt in 1955 through violent attacks on state institutions. The government responded by banning the UPC and imprisoning its members.

Many of its leaders, however, escaped and went underground or into exile. Reuben um Nyobe emerged as a leader of those who had remained underground in Cameroon. Nyobe's initial strategy was to appeal for amnesty for UPC militants, issue statements condemning French policies, and call for the unbanning of the UPC so that it could participate in elections as the only truly nationalist party. However, by 1957, the French authorities had been able to evolve a collection of moderate politicians, constituting the parliament and government under the leadership of Prime Minister Mbida, who would rather have French control over Cameroon retained. Mbida did not see the possibility of Cameroonian independence for another decade.

Hence, following the unsuccessful appeal for amnesty and the unbanning of the UPC so that it could participate in elections in preparation for self-rule, the UPC, under the leadership of Nyobe, again carried out violent attacks on mission stations, government structures, local opponents, and plantations in the Sanaga-Maritime province. Nyobe was captured, however, and killed a year later in 1958. The death of Nyobe did not bring an abrupt end to revolt among his loyalists, in whose hearts and minds he had become something of a martyred revolutionary leader. Thus, in 1959, the Bamileke people resorted to popular revolt, which spread across southern Cameroon. By this time, Mbida had fallen from power, and another anti-nationalist, Ahmadu Ahidjo, had stepped in as prime minister in his stead.

Ahidjo's approach to the insurrection was a combination of repressive measures and promises of amnesty for insurgents who laid down their arms. The struggle nevertheless lasted for three years, resulting in about 20,000 casualties among militants and civilians, and the death of about 1,000 soldiers. The French authorities, however, granted independence on January 1, 1960, with Ahidjo as the first president. Ironically, France thus handed power over to those who would rather have France retain its control over Cameroon.

Rassemblement Démocratique Africain (RDA)

Quests in other French territories across Africa did not develop into violent protest as such. Nonetheless, the RDA emerged as an inter-territorial party, especially in West and Equatorial Africa, to formulate and coordinate local African interests within the French empire. The RDA evolved following the failure of the French government to implement the reforms it had promised African nationalists during World War II, which could have included Africans in administration and moved colonial territories closer to independence. Thus, to address this issue, 800 nationalist delegates across Africa gathered at Bamako, Mali (formerly French Sudan) in October 1946 and subsequently formed the RDA under the leadership of Félix Houphouët. The RDA thereafter got the support of local parties and labor organizations and affiliates.

As the RDA came into being, the French Communist Party was the only French political organization which identified with the yearnings of the nationalists; thus the RDA became closely associated with French communists. However, when the communists left the French government in 1947 and moved to the opposition, the government and colonial authorities descended heavily and repressively on the RDA (along with its local affiliates) and its leaders, because of both its support for the French communists and its nationalist quest.

By 1950, the RDA had severed links with the communists and aligned with the French government. Consequently, nationalist leaders across French sub-Saharan Africa began to share the view that African colonies could not survive without French paternalistic support, and so independence was not a priority and should not be immediate. This notion apparently remained until Guinea's dramatic vote for independence in 1958 under the leadership of Sékou Touré. Guinea's vote against retention in the French union culminated in the immediate withdrawal of French officials and an end to economic assistance from France. Yet, Guinea survived in spite of its poor state. Of course, the Guinean example was an essential success story which possibly enhanced independence for other French territories in West and Equatorial Africa by 1960.

Frankfurt School (Jewish émigrés)

Christina Gerhardt

The Institute of Social Research – more commonly known as the Frankfurt School (a term that was first applied in the 1960s) and, in Germany, as Kritische Theorie (critical theory) – was founded in Frankfurt, Germany in 1923. It sought to bring together a wide variety of disciplines – spanning sociology and philosophy, psychology and history, economics and aesthetics, and literary and music criticism – within a critical Marxist framework. The most central and best-known members of the Frankfurt School's first generation included Theodor W. Adorno, Erich Fromm, Max Horkheimer, Leo Lowenthal, Herbert Marcuse, and Friedrich Pollock.

Loosely affiliated with the University of Frankfurt, which had itself been established relatively recently in 1914, the institute was founded with private funding by Felix J. Weil, whose father had amassed a fortune as a grain merchant. Together with Kurt Albert Gerlach and Pollock, Weil drew up the plans for the institute. All three were committed to formulating a critical approach to society and culture that linked these disciplines to a Marxist analysis. In fact, they had initially intended to name the new research center the Institute for Marxism. All three were conversant with Marxism and shared a commitment to many of its principles: earlier in 1923, Weil had organized the First Marxist Work Week, which had inspired the idea of establishing the institute; Gerlach had previously been a professor of economy at the Technische Hochschule in Aachen; and Pollock had written his dissertation on Marx's labor theory of value.

Gerlach was to serve as the first director of the institute, but after his sudden death in 1922, Pollock served briefly as interim director until Carl Grünberg assumed the permanent position from 1922 until 1928, when he stepped down for medical reasons. Pollock again served as interim director until Horkheimer assumed directorship of the institute in 1930.

Although not typically remembered for its Weimar years, the early Frankfurt School had vital ties to political and social movements. The early institute dedicated itself primarily to studying the history of European workers' movements outside the context of political parties, be it the Communist Party (KPD), which was going through upheavals and transitions after the October Revolution, or the Socialist Party (SPD), which was going through various transitions subsequent to the Spartacus Uprising and the murder of Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg. In addition, when Grünberg took over as director, he brought to the institute his work on labor movements in the form of a journal he had begun editing in 1910. Entitled the Archive for the History of Socialism and the Workers' Movement, but commonly known as the Grünberg Archiv, the journal sought to assemble a history of the labor movement. Lastly, the early institute helped to forward copies of the unpublished manuscripts of Marx and Engels to the Marx-Engels Institute in Moscow for inclusion in their collected works, the famous MEGA (Marx-Engels Historisch-Kritische Gesamtausgabe). While several of its early members – Wittfogel, Borkenau, and Gumperz – were involved with the Communist Party, the institute was officially unaligned with any political party, which its relationship with the University of Frankfurt would not have allowed. Instead, it drew on a Marxist framework and contributed to the history of labor without an explicit political affiliation.

Undoubtedly, this separation of Marxist analysis from party allegiances was both beneficial and detrimental. It allowed for an analysis that did not have to adhere to positions dictated by the party line. Yet it also resulted in critiques of the Frankfurt School as disconnected from concrete political struggles and organizing efforts. These critiques were to reappear during the late 1960s student movement.

The institute's focus and approach shifted somewhat when Horkheimer became director in 1930. It moved away from a concentration on the history of the European workers' movement, which Grünberg had underscored, to a broader exploration of Marxist analysis. Horkheimer sought to develop a critical theory of contemporary society, bringing a Marxist framework together with an array of disciplines including, naming only a few, psychoanalysis through the work of Fromm and Marcuse, literature and music through the studies of Lowenthal and Adorno, philosophy and sociology. Horkheimer's methodology was laid out in his inaugural address, "The Present Situation of Social Philosophy and the Tasks of an Institute for Social Research." In it, he argued for an analysis "of the connection between the economic life of society, the psychical development of individuals, and the changes in the realm of culture in the narrower sense (to which belong not only the so-called intellectual elements, such as science, art, and religion, but also law, customs, fashion, public opinion, sports, leisure activities, lifestyle, etc.)."

In March 1933 the Nazis closed the institute for "tendencies hostile to the state" and weeks later revoked Horkheimer's venia legendi, his right to teach in Germany. The institute relocated first to Geneva and in May 1934 Horkheimer secured offices for the institute in New York City and an affiliation with Columbia University. Publication of the institute's journal moved to Paris. The institute remained in the US in exile, first in New York and then in Los Angeles, until it was reconstituted in Frankfurt, officially reopening its doors on November 14, 1951.

This move from Germany to the United States marked a shift in the research priorities of the institute. Drawing on a combination of Hegelian, Marxist, and Freudian analyses of the family, Studies on Authority and Family (1936), for example, no longer focused exclusively on the working class but rather on the structure of the family in various classes in times of economic crisis. Additionally, the work brought a Freudian analysis to the fore. The volume included both introductory theoretical essays – written by Horkheimer, Fromm, and Marcuse – and data. In this way it marked the first instantiation of the theoretically informed empirical studies that Horkheimer had called for in his inaugural speech of 1931.

The second volume to reflect such an approach, again combining sociological and psychological studies, was The Authoritarian Personality (1950), for which research was conducted between 1944 and 1950 in US exile. Adorno and Lowenthal were principal contributors to this latter volume, which examines various forms of prejudice, including anti-Semitism, a topic that had been conspicuously absent from previous studies. This volume and the Studies on Authority and Family represented the main collaborative works of the institute.

Of its central members, Pollock (1894–1970) and Horkheimer played pivotal roles in the institute from its beginning until their deaths. Their close friendship began in 1911 and lasted until Pollock died in 1970. Pollock studied sociology, philosophy, and economics, finishing his PhD in economics at the University of Frankfurt in 1923. In 1927 he participated in the tenth anniversary of the October Revolution in the Soviet Union, research that ultimately led to his habilitation entitled "Attempts at Planned Economy in the Soviet Union 1917–1927." Pollock, like Horkheimer, fled to New York – via London, Geneva, and Paris – after the Nazis assumed power in 1933. Tending mostly to the institute's administrative matters, Pollock nonetheless occasionally published articles in the institute's journal. He returned to Frankfurt in 1950 to reestablish the institute with Horkheimer and Adorno. In addition to his work with the institute, he was also professor of economics and of sociology at the University of Frankfurt until his retirement in 1958. Pollock and Horkheimer moved to Montagnola, Tessin in 1959, where Pollock died.

Horkheimer (1895–1973) studied philosophy and psychology, finishing his PhD in philosophy at the University of Frankfurt in 1922 with a dissertation on Kant. In 1925 he completed his habilitation, writing on Kant's Critique of Judgment. His work would show an abiding interest in critiquing Kantian metaphysics. In his 1932 essay "Materialism and Metaphysics," for example, Horkheimer defines materialism as explicitly anti-metaphysical. In 1930 he assumed a chair in social philosophy at the University of Frankfurt and directorship of the institute. Two years later he founded the institute's journal, Zeitschrift für Sozialforschung, which appeared annually until 1939. In light of the institute's American exile, the journal was renamed Studies in Philosophy and Social Science in 1940 and appeared in English, though its publication was discontinued after a year. In 1940 Horkheimer moved to California for health reasons, joined by his younger colleague Adorno. Here, they wrote Dialectic of Enlightenment – first published in 1947 – a meditation on the relation between myth and reason that examines and critiques the potentially barbaric consequences of idealist thinking (the historical reference point is German fascism). Touching on a broad array of disciplines and texts, the volume weaves together Marxian materialism, Freudian psychoanalysis, and a Weberian critique of rationalization and disenchantment in its analysis of the “culture industry,” anti-Semitism, and “instrumental reason.” Horkheimer lays out related arguments about the dialectic of idealism in his Eclipse of Reason, written in 1941 and first published in 1947.

Horkheimer was also interested in the relationship between authoritarianism and changing familial structures, and their political consequences. The institute explored these topics, collaborating on the previously mentioned volume Studies on Authority and Family: Horkheimer, Fromm, and Marcuse wrote the introductory essays to the volume, while other scholars gathered and evaluated empirical studies for the project. Horkheimer's 1942 essay “The Authoritarian State” revisits some of its arguments.

Adorno (1903–69) began his intellectual career in Frankfurt, studying philosophy and psychology. He met Horkheimer in 1922, when both attended a seminar on Edmund Husserl taught by Hans Cornelius, who served as dissertation adviser to both students. Adorno completed his PhD in 1924, writing his dissertation on Husserl's phenomenology. Subsequently, Adorno moved to Vienna, where he lived from 1925 to 1928, in order to study music with Alban Berg. Music played a central role in his life from an early age: his mother was an accomplished singer and her sister, who lived in the household, was a well-regarded pianist. Adorno returned to Frankfurt and to philosophy in 1928, completing his habilitation on Kierkegaard in 1931. During the 1930s Adorno worked on Kierkegaard's aesthetics and Husserl's phenomenology while also writing articles on the sociology of music. After the institute was shut down and most of its members went into exile, Adorno studied at Merton College, Oxford from 1934 to 1937. He officially joined the institute there when he emigrated from England in 1938. In 1940 he would follow Horkheimer to California, where their collaborative work on Dialectic of Enlightenment would begin.

Adorno's writings encompass a broad array of disciplines, spanning music and literary criticism, philosophy and sociology, psychology and aesthetics. He published book-length studies on Alban Berg, Gustav Mahler, and Richard Wagner, as well as on Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel and Søren Kierkegaard. In addition to articles on music and philosophy, his collections include essays about the writings of Franz Kafka, Thomas Mann, and Samuel Beckett; the poetry of Friedrich Hölderlin, Heinrich Heine, and Joseph Freiherr von Eichendorff; and aspects of popular and mass culture including astrology, television, radio, and jazz. The multidisciplinary approach Adorno takes in these essays expresses his belief that the concerns of one medium inform those of another.

Most of Adorno's major works were published after he returned to Germany in 1950 to reconstitute the institute with Horkheimer and Pollock. These publications include Minima Moralia, Notes to Literature (1974), Prisms (1977), and Critical Models (1977). Additionally, he published the co-authored Dialectic of Enlightenment (1947), Negative Dialectics (1966), and Aesthetic Theory (1970).

Lowenthal (1900–93) joined the institute in the late 1920s. He studied literature, history, philosophy, and sociology at the University of Frankfurt, finishing his PhD in philosophy in 1923 and becoming involved with the institute in a limited manner in 1926 and full time in 1930. In 1933 he immigrated to Geneva where the institute had an office until it was reestablished in New York City, to which he moved along with Horkheimer, Pollock, Fromm, and Marcuse in 1934. Together with Adorno, Lowenthal brought a shift towards aesthetic concerns to the institute. He also served as the managing editor of the institute's journal, although final editorial decisions were left to Horkheimer. Additionally, according to Martin Jay (1973: 33), “Only Lowenthal and Fromm . . . ever evinced any real interest in Jewish theological issues.” Unlike Horkheimer, Pollock, and Adorno, Lowenthal remained in the United States, joining the Department of Sociology at the University of California at Berkeley in 1956, where he taught until his retirement in 1968.

Fromm (1900–80) was brought into the institute in the early 1930s. He had studied sociology at the University of Heidelberg, finishing his PhD in 1922. Subsequently, he trained to become a psychoanalyst and opened his own practice before he joined the institute in 1930. Fromm's writings and research brought Freudian psychoanalysis together with Marxist critiques that were to have a lasting impact on Frankfurt School writings (cf. Horkheimer and Adorno's Dialectic of Enlightenment). In 1934 he immigrated to the United States, joining the group in New York City. Here, he encountered the writings and work of Karen Horney. In the early 1930s, Fromm was Horkheimer's most important interlocutor – a role that Adorno would assume in the late 1930s. During their time in New York City, relations between him, Horkheimer, and other members of the institute became increasingly strained, a tension due in part to Fromm's increasingly critical stance toward Sigmund Freud. Consequently, Fromm split from the institute in 1939, though his efforts to combine psychoanalysis with political analyses would leave its mark on the later work of the Frankfurt School.

Marcuse (1898–1979) joined the Frankfurt School in 1932. He had been involved in the Social Democratic Party in Berlin before studying philosophy at the University of Freiburg, finishing his PhD in 1922 with a dissertation on the Deutsche Künstlerroman (“German artist's novel”). Subsequently, he returned to Berlin and worked in publishing before returning to Freiburg, studying with Edmund Husserl and Martin Heidegger, and finishing his habilitation with the latter on “Hegel's Ontology and the Foundation of a Theory of Historicity.” Marcuse joined the institute shortly before its move to New York. Aside from his interest in philosophy, he brought a Freudian framework to his analyses and to those of the Frankfurt School. Despite diverging opinions and approaches, unlike Fromm, Marcuse never split from the Frankfurt School, although he did remain in the United States. His earlier writings, such as Reason and Revolution (1941) and Eros and Civilization (1955), brought together a critique of Karl Marx and Hegel, and of Marx and Freud, respectively.

And although neither was officially ever a member of the Frankfurt School, it should be mentioned that Walter Benjamin and Siegfried Kracauer are often associated with it. Some of the institute's members, especially Adorno and Horkheimer, held their work in high esteem. Adorno admired Benjamin's work and tried to use his influence on Horkheimer to bring Benjamin into the institute. Yet although Benjamin did receive a modest amount of funding from it in the late 1930s and published articles in its journal, he was never officially welcomed into the group.

The institute was reestablished in 1951 in Frankfurt when Horkheimer, Adorno, and Pollock returned to Germany, while Lowenthal, Marcuse, and others stayed in the United States. Key figures of the Frankfurt School's second and third generations include Detlev Claussen, Jürgen Habermas, Axel Honneth, Oskar Negt, Alfred Schmidt, and Albrecht Wellmer.

In the late 1960s Marcuse's writings – of the Frankfurt School members – had the most influence on the New Left and the student movement in the United States, Germany, and elsewhere. The members of the institute, who had returned to Frankfurt, too, supported student movements, especially – and contrary to popular belief – Adorno. In the summer of 1967, after the police's killing on June 2 of the student Benno Ohnesorg, who had been participating in a protest against Riza Shah Palavi of Iran's visit to Berlin, Adorno prefaced a guest lecture at the Free University in Berlin with an expression of solidarity with the students, criticizing the police brutality and demanding a legal inquiry into the shooting. He condemned the 1968 shooting of SDS leader Rudi Dutschke. And when students occupied the main building of the Department of Sociology, he supported their basic concerns but questioned their tactics and methods, not only in this action but more broadly as he had done throughout the late 1960s. Yet when the students occupied the institute in 1969 he immediately called the police to clear them from the building. The event marked a significant rupture with the student protest movement.

Marcuse's writings greatly resonated with student activists, who found their concerns addressed in works such as One-Dimensional Man (1964), An Essay on Liberation (1969), which was written in the wake of the May 1968 worker strikes and student demonstrations in France, and Counter-Revolution and Revolt (1972). In sum, the Frankfurt School contributed both to social movements and to their study from its founding, through the 1960s, and to today.

Freedom Rides

Susan Love Brown

Freedom Rides were the organized bus trips undertaken from May to September 1961 by racially integrated groups of men and women in order to desegregate both buses and interstate bus terminal waiting rooms in the South. The rides were part of a strategy to test the recent Supreme Court decision, Boynton v. Virginia (December 5, 1960), which outlawed the segregation of interstate bus terminals. Although previous decisions, Mitchell v. US (1941) and Morgan v. Commonwealth of Virginia (1946), had outlawed segregation on interstate buses themselves, both decisions were ignored in the Southern states.

The first Freedom Ride, which began on May 4, 1961, was organized by James Farmer of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). The 13 participants (seven African Americans and six whites, three women and ten men, adults from college age to their sixties) were trained in non-violent techniques before boarding two buses leaving Washington, DC, heading south to New Orleans. The plan was for the whites to sit in the back of the bus and the blacks in the front and for them to use the waiting rooms assigned to people of the opposite race. The riders informed authorities, including the presidents of Greyhound and Trailways bus companies, the Interstate Commerce Commission chairman, the FBI director, the attorney general, and the president of the United States, ahead of time as to their intentions.

The freedom riders first ran into trouble in Rock Hill, South Carolina, on May 4, and then again in Winnsboro, South Carolina, where they were beaten and two of them arrested and then released. The group again encountered hostilities in Anniston, Alabama, when their bus was attacked and firebombed. Their other bus was boarded by six members of the Ku Klux Klan, who forced all of the black passengers to sit in the back of the bus. After arriving in Birmingham, more mob assaults occurred. The attempt of the freedom riders to leave Birmingham and resume their journey to New Orleans was curtailed when the bus companies refused to allow them to board. They were also unable to leave by air due to continuous bomb threats. An assistant to President Kennedy, John Seigenthaler, flew to Birmingham and finally succeeded in getting the freedom riders out of the state on an unscheduled flight to New Orleans.

When news of the abandonment of the mission due to physical danger reached students in Nashville, Tennessee, many of whom were members of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), they decided to pick up where the CORE volunteers had left off. On May 17, John Lewis, a veteran of the first Freedom Ride, left with ten students for Birmingham, where one white and one black student were arrested for violating segregated seating on the bus. The Birmingham police arrested more students before they could board the bus for Montgomery, Alabama, and the students then launched a hunger strike in jail, refusing to move when ordered back to Nashville. They were forcibly loaded onto a bus out of town, but when they found their way back to the bus station, their numbers had increased. The bus left for Montgomery on May 20, but upon arrival the riders and members of the press were beaten by a mob of Klansmen, several into unconsciousness.

On May 24, 27 freedom riders boarded two buses headed for Jackson, Mississippi. Although the bus carrying 12 freedom riders, 16 journalists, and six Alabama guardsmen made it safely to the border, when Mississippi guardsmen took over, the journalists got off, and the 12 freedom riders were arrested for breaching the peace. They were tried, convicted, and fined. Since they refused to pay the fines, they were sent to Parchman State Penitentiary for 60 days, but new freedom riders kept arriving, coordinated by Diane Nash in Nashville, and the Freedom Rides gradually spread to other parts of the South. More than 300 were arrested during 1961.

The Freedom Rides reaffirmed the strategy of testing laws through non-violent direct action. They demonstrated that violence would not be allowed to stop the quest for civil rights and that it would be met with even more resistance. They forced President Kennedy and his administration to take a stand for civil rights, which before had remained a low priority. Many of the student participants were also members of SNCC, and their experiences on the Freedom Rides committed them to the cause of ending racial segregation. Because of the large numbers of students involved, the Freedom Rides also marked a generational shift in the civil rights movement.

Freedom Summer

Susan Love Brown

Freedom Summer was the name given to the summer of 1964 when the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO) decided to carry out a voter registration project among blacks in Mississippi. In June, approximately 500 Northern volunteers converged on Mississippi to assist in the project. In addition, some 40 Freedom Schools, manned with volunteers, conducted classes for poor black students, and the decision was made to challenge the traditional Democratic Party that had excluded black voters. However, the summer is best remembered for the brutal slaying of three volunteers – James Chaney, Andrew Goodman, and Mickey Schwerner.

COFO consisted of three organizations: the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), and the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). The organization had decided to concentrate on voter registration within Mississippi, which was considered one of the most resistant Southern states to black equality. State and local officials in Mississippi had not hesitated to use brutality or to sanction the killing of civil rights activists, including Herbert Lee, Louis Allen, and Medgar Evers. COFO director Robert Moses, a native Mississippian, along with Northern lawyer Allard Lowenstein, had previously worked with Northern volunteers and local organizers to carry out a mock election, which involved encouraging local blacks to participate in a Freedom Vote. This was the first project that COFO had taken after deciding to concentrate on voter registration. The Freedom Vote resulted in the participation of 83,000 blacks.

Encouraged by the success of this project, COFO decided to step up its efforts at voter registration. Discouraged by the lack of progress by local organizers alone, the group sought to recruit volunteers from outside to help in the process, although the decision to bring in Northern whites remained controversial, especially among the members of SNCC, who disliked the class disparities and potential loss of black leadership within the movement. The Mississippi Freedom Project involved the recruitment of mostly white Northern college students, who received training at the Western College for Women in Oxford, Ohio, before they arrived in Mississippi to participate in the project. It would be two veteran workers and one recruit who would become the victims that helped to wake up the nation to the murderous violence of law enforcement officials in league with the Ku Klux Klan.

After visiting Longdale, Mississippi, the site of a church burned down by the Klan, James Chaney, Andrew Goodman, and Mickey Schwerner were arrested on June 21, 1964, by a Neshoba county deputy sheriff, who was a member of the Klan. After holding the three in jail for hours, he suddenly released them. As they drove away, they were followed by Klan members, shot to death, and buried in an earthen dam.

The FBI investigated the disappearances of the three men. In the meantime, national news had picked up the story, and this encouraged the FBI to open an office in Jackson, Mississippi. Search efforts on the part of sailors sent by President Lyndon Johnson exposed previous murders of blacks, whose disappearances the FBI had failed to investigate before. The national publicity led to the firing of Mississippi law enforcement officials who were Klan members. The response of local whites was increased violence. On June 23, the FBI found the car that the three civil rights workers had driven, and on August 4, the bodies of Chaney, Goodman, and Schwerner were found, confirming their deaths by violence.

The voter registration project proceeded, and the publicity resulted in the participation of 300 National Council of Churches ministers who helped to make the project a success. As a result, the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP) was formed as an opponent to the traditional Democratic Party in order to challenge the participation of the segregated party at the upcoming Democratic convention in Atlantic City later that year. In addition to work within the state, veteran activist Ella Baker worked to give the MFDP a national presence by setting up an office in Washington, DC under the auspices of SNCC.

When President Johnson arranged for the MFDP to be given two token seats, while the regular Democratic Party from Mississippi would be seated under regular conditions, members of the MFDP were outraged. Moses and James Forman of SNCC were opposed to any compromise. This political maneuvering on Johnson's part, and the counsel of Martin Luther King, Jr., Bayard Rustin, and others to accept the compromise, led to an increased lack of trust in white liberals who had been their allies in the civil rights movement, and it opened the door to the disaffection of young members and the rise of the Black Power movement within SNCC.

In December 1964, Cecil Price, the deputy sheriff who had arrested Chaney, Goodman, and Schwerner, and 20 others who had been involved in their murders, were charged with violating the civil rights of the three men. Their trial was held in October 1967. With an openly racist judge and an all-white jury, Price and six others were found guilty, but the others were freed.

Although the summer of 1964 was filled with fear and anger over political compromises and racial violence, and while some believed that their efforts to curb Mississippi's violation of black rights had failed, others thought that it marked the beginning of the end of state-sanctioned segregation and voting inequities in Mississippi.

Freire, Paulo (1921–1997)

Michael F. McCullough

Paulo Freire, the Brazilian educator and author of Pedagogy of the Oppressed, published in 1972, viewed education as an integral part of broader efforts to advance personal, social, and political liberation. In what has come to be known as critical pedagogy, Freire sought not only to displace rote teaching methods with participatory learning but to empower students as autonomous actors in social transformation. Through conscientização, defined by Freire as “learning to perceive social, political and economic contradictions and to take action against the oppressive elements of reality,” students cease to be passive observers of reality and achieve a critical consciousness that enables them to partake in and build a world of their own making. Such an approach to learning made Freire a dangerous criminal in the eyes of the military dictatorship that forced him into political exile in 1964, but won him broad international support from educators and activists who espouse the need for radically democratic change.

Freire was born in 1921 in Recife, Pernambuco, the largest city in Brazil’s Northeast, the poorest region in a country whose income inequity has long ranked among the highest in the world. Growing up in middle-class circumstances did not spare him or his family from the ravages of the Great Depression. Hunger-induced sleep often prevented him from doing school homework and made him sensitive to the needs of those even less well off.

Freire considered his work as an educational administrator with the Pernambuco state Serviço Social da Indústria (SESI) in the late 1940s and 1950s “the most important political-pedagogical practice” of his life. The deferential, self-deprecating fatalism that Freire often encountered among Atlantic fishermen, sugar workers in the Zona da Mata, and rural peasants of the sertão while working with SESI became one of the defining characteristics of what he would label the “culture of silence” or the “culture of domination.” Also at SESI, Freire undertook his first experiments in democratizing educational processes, opening several projects to participation by students, teachers, and local administrators. Passed through the prism of theoretical concepts he studied while pursuing a doctorate with the University of Recife – alienation and class struggle in Marx, necrophilia and biophilia in Erich Fromm, and the personalism of Emmanuel Mounier, among many others – Freire’s SESI experiences helped him fashion and solidify his own worldview.

Freire played major roles in the broad-based progressive movement that became a strong political force in Brazil by the early 1960s, co-founding the Movimento de Cultura Popular in Recife in 1960, launching innovative literacy programs through the University of Recife’s Cultural Extension Service, and becoming the director of President João Goulart’s National Literacy Program in June 1963.

On April 1, 1964, a right-wing military coup expelled Goulart from the presidency and lashed out against the progressive movement, including Freire, who lost his national literacy post and spent 72 days in prison, much of the time in a 2 feet by 6 feet cell. In September 1964 the military summoned Freire to Rio de Janeiro to appear before a Military Police Inquiry. Friends concerned for his safety urged Freire to take asylum in Rio’s Bolivian embassy. The day after he did so the regime signaled its displeasure by encircling the Bolivian embassy with army tanks. In the embassy Freire contracted with the government of President Paz Estenssoro to conduct an assessment of Bolivia’s primary and adult education systems. Bolivia’s ambassador to Brazil escorted Freire to Bolivia when, after a 40-day standoff, the military regime finally granted him a safe-conduct pass. Days after his arrival, however, a right-wing coup ousted Estenssoro. Once again Freire became persona non grata in a military dictatorship and had to negotiate a safe-conduct pass out of the country.

Freire lived the next 15 years as a political exile, four and a half years in Chile, almost a year in the United States, and a decade in Geneva, Switzerland with the World Council of Churches. During his exile he traveled the world speaking about his ideas and worked on literacy programs in Tanzania, Guinea Bissau, Angola, Peru, Nicaragua, Australia, and Italy.

During the most repressive periods of its 25-year reign, Brazil’s dictatorship prohibited publication of Freire’s books and did not permit the mass media to mention him by name. Under a general amnesty granted in 1979, Freire returned to Brazil and assumed teaching posts at the Pontifical Catholic University in São Paulo and the State University of São Paulo in Campinas. He served as the secretary of education for the city of São Paulo from 1988 to 1991 in the administration of Workers Party Mayor Luiza Erundina, an experience he reflected on in Pedagogy of the City. On May 2, 1997 he died in São Paulo.

A recurring theme of Pedagogy of the Oppressed echoed by Freire throughout his life is that oppression is dehumanizing for oppressors and oppressed alike and liberation is not simply a project for the oppressed but the vocation of all humanity. Although mainstream educators have generally eschewed such themes in teacher training and classroom curricula, the debates engendered by Freirean critical pedagogy have reverberated through the world of education and beyond. Pedagogy of the Oppressed has been translated into dozens of languages. Institutes dedicated to promoting Freirean ideas and educational practices have been established in South Africa, Spain, Portugal, Malta, Finland, Germany, Los Angeles, and Argentina, as well as his native Brazil. During Freire's Chilean exile such enthusiasm for his message was much in evidence in the neighborhood bars of Santiago that named a drink after him – the Apperitif Paulo Freire. Asked what prompted the name, the Chileans explained: "It's very strong. It makes us lucid. And it opens our spirit."

FRELIMO (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique)

Justin Corfield

FRELIMO (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique; Front for the Liberation of Mozambique) was founded on June 25, 1962, 13 years to the day before Mozambique became independent. It was established after a conference which began on June 20, 1962, when leaders opposed to Portuguese rule in Mozambique met in Dar-es-

Salaam in Tanganyika (Tanzania as of 1964). The leaders who met included Marcelino dos Santos, Eduardo Mondlane, Matthew Mmole, and Uria Simango, with Julius Nyerere of host-nation Tanganyika and Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana urging for a united front. FRELIMO was created from the merger of three anti-Portuguese nationalist movements: the Mozambican African National Union (MANU), the National Democratic Union of Mozambique (UDENAMO), and the National African Union of Independent Mozambique (UNAMI). All three had been fighting the Portuguese but had different backers and different political stances, with MANU being supported by the Tanganyikan government, UDENAMO being essentially Stalinist with aid from Ghana, and UNAMI being based in Malawi. The three groups were brought together under the (elected) leadership of Eduardo Mondlane (1920–69), who gave up his position as professor of anthropology at Syracuse University (New York) to become leader of FRELIMO. The new organization set up its office at 201 Arab Street in Dar-es-Salaam, the street later being renamed Nkrumah Street – FRELIMO appeared in the telephone directories of the period as “Mozambique Liberation Front, Political Party.”

FRELIMO's stated objectives were to run Mozambique as an independent nation, without Portugal having any role in its future. There would be a party government and collective endeavor in the same way that Tanganyika and the People's Republic of China were being run. They also wanted to move away from domination of ethnic groups toward the formation of a Mozambican national identity.

It was not long before FRELIMO decided to send in large numbers of soldiers from Tanzania to fight the Portuguese. The first major operation was led by Samora Machel (1933–86), a nationalist trained in guerilla warfare in Algeria, and one of the military commanders of FRELIMO. It managed to capture parts of Niassa in northern Mozambique, and hold some of it on a semi-permanent basis against Portuguese counterattacks. Gradually wearing down the Portuguese forces, by the early 1970s FRELIMO, with a guerilla force of 7,000, had taken control of much of the northern and central parts of Mozambique, managing to hold its own against 60,000 Portuguese soldiers. However, the Portuguese did manage a number of successes, including the assassination of Eduardo Mondlane, who died after opening a parcel bomb. Mondlane was succeeded by Samora Machel.

The Carnation Revolution of 1974 in Portugal led to the decision to pull out of Mozambique, which resulted in FRELIMO negotiating for independence and then coming to power, with Joaquim Chissano (b. 1939) as premier from September 20, 1974 to June 25, 1975, when Mozambique officially became independent. Samora Machel was subsequently elected president. Machel, who was keen on developing a socialist economy, embarked on an ambitious program of building health clinics and schools throughout the countryside. He also oversaw the nationalization of many Portuguese and South African properties and businesses throughout the country, which led to opposition from many quarters. It was not long before the anti-communist Mozambicans, the Rhodesians, and the South Africans found common cause, establishing RENAMO (Resistência Nacional Moçambicana; Mozambican National Resistance).

There was a bitter civil war between FRELIMO and RENAMO, and visiting journalists were heavily critical of RENAMO's excesses, denouncing the human rights abuses and atrocities by its soldiers. Although RENAMO managed to take control of much of the countryside, the FRELIMO government refused to compromise until finally Machel decided to reach an agreement with the South African government, signing the Nkomati Accord on March 16, 1984, by which he would cease supporting the African National Congress (ANC), and in return the South Africans would stop their support for RENAMO. Although the Mozambican government reluctantly followed its side of the agreement, some elements of the South African military continued to support RENAMO.

Samora Machel was killed when his plane crashed in South Africa on October 19, 1986, and he was succeeded by Joaquim Chissano. Although Machel had moderated his policies from 1985, Chissano was more pragmatic and sought to engage with the West, removing the Marxist ideological background that had underpinned FRELIMO from its earliest days. This led to a truce with RENAMO on August 7, 1992, and the Rome General Peace Accords of October 6, 1992.

With Chissano endorsing the democratic process, elections were held in 1994, which saw Chissano win the presidential vote with 53.3 percent of the vote, while RENAMO's Afonso Dhlakama garnered just 33.7 percent. Five years later in the presidential elections, Chissano received 52.3 percent, with Dhlakama's vote rising to 47.7 percent. In the legislative elections, FRELIMO won 133 of the 250 seats in parliament, but there was considerable criticism from overseas about the fairness of the election. As criticism of Chissano became more pronounced, FRELIMO selected Armando Guebuza (b. 1943) to contest the presidential elections of December 1–2, 2004, gaining 63.7 percent of the vote, with RENAMO's share falling to 31.7 percent. It also saw FRELIMO win 160 of the 250 seats in the parliament, ensuring that FRELIMO would continue to be the ruling party in Mozambique.

French Caribbean in the Age of Revolution

Laurent Dubois

During the early 1790s, Guadeloupe and Saint-Domingue (present-day Haiti) were both French plantation colonies. Their histories paralleled each other during this period. In each there were conflicts among white colonists over the particular meaning the changes of the French Revolution should have in the colonies and violent struggles over the rights and status of free people of color. Most importantly, both saw large-scale mobilization and revolt among the enslaved during the early 1790s. As a result of the mass insurrection of the enslaved in Saint-Domingue, by 1794 the enslaved in both colonies had gained their freedom and become citizens of the French Republic.

For the next several years, the parallels continued: in both colonies administrators created a new order that combined emancipation with new forms of labor coercion in an attempt to maintain the plantation economy. In the early 1800s, the populations in both colonies confronted missions sent by Napoleon Bonaparte to reassert metropolitan control over what the French government then saw as dangerously autonomous leaders of African descent. War erupted in both places, but with quite different outcomes. In Guadeloupe the French relatively quickly overcame resistance, while in Saint-Domingue a two-year conflict eventually led to French defeat and the creation of a new nation: Haiti.

Before the 1790s both islands had, like all Caribbean plantation societies, an important history of slave resistance, both on a daily level and in the form of periodic revolts and the formation of maroon communities. These traditions of resistance lay the foundation for what took shape in the 1790s, when the revolutionary changes that began in Paris in 1789 created a series of important openings and possibilities for political change in the colonies. For different constituencies in the Caribbean, revolution meant different things. Many white planters sought more political representation and freedom of trade, while free people of color demanded political rights and an end to racist laws. The enslaved, meanwhile, sought out ways to change their own condition either incrementally or, ultimately, through an overthrow of the entire slave system itself. It was the enslaved who ultimately produced the dramatic revolutionary transformations of this period in the French Caribbean. Through a large-scale and successful slave revolution, they challenged and ultimately demolished slavery in the French empire, through a combination of military success and the crafting of political alliances with sympathetic French republicans.

Starting in August 1789, there were small-scale revolts in Guadeloupe and Martinique, but all were successfully repressed. It was in Saint-Domingue, starting in August 1791, that revolt went beyond its first stages, burgeoning into a large-scale military assault against the institution of slavery. Burning cane fields, smashing cane-processing equipment, and killing whites, enslaved insurgents gained control of much of the northern plain of the colony of Saint-Domingue. They were never defeated, and ultimately forced local officials to abolish slavery, a decision ratified by Paris and applied to the entire French empire in 1794.

How did they succeed in doing what no other slave rebels in history had done before – destroying the slave system in their society? Slaves were a majority in Saint-Domingue, and this numerical superiority was of course crucial, but this did not distinguish the colony from Jamaica or other colonies. Interestingly, Saint-Domingue had a less strong tradition of slave resistance – smaller maroon communities, and no single event of the size of Tacky's Revolt, for instance – than Jamaica until the revolutionary period. Saint-Domingue did have a heavily African population, and as the scholar John Thornton has argued, among the things these individuals brought was often military knowledge and experience as "African veterans" (Thornton 1991). If they were able to fight off French missions against them, it is certainly in part because of the sophisticated military strategies they deployed.

While the triumph of the enslaved revolutionaries of Saint-Domingue was clearly a military triumph, it was also a political one. The political triumph was not just to mobilize a mass movement against slavery, but to create and secure allies within the French republican movement itself who supported and ultimately embraced emancipation. The way in which they did this is well crystallized in a large revolt that took place in Trois-Rivières, Guadeloupe in 1793. At the time, whites in Guadeloupe were violently divided between republicans, who supported revolutionary changes, and royalists, who were at odds with the revolutionary changes. In Trois-Rivières, several royalist planters sought to arm and mobilize their slaves to fight for them against local republicans. Some of the slaves of these royalist planters, however, chose their own camp. Led by a man named Jean-Baptiste, they rose up and massacred their masters, and then marched off to the nearby capital of the island, Basse-Terre, to explain what they had done. Startlingly, when they met white troops coming to put down the revolt, they presented themselves as “Citizens and Friends” and explained that they had in fact saved the republicans by their actions. Perhaps even more strikingly, the white troops responded sympathetically, ultimately accepting the slaves’ version of the events as true, and even celebrating what they had done as a courageous defense of the republic.

In Saint-Domingue, similarly, slave insurgents eventually found allies among the metropolitan administrators Léger Félicité Sonthonax and Etienne Polverel, who besieged by anti-republican whites and facing widespread slave insurrection – as well as the looming threat of British and Spanish invasion – made a bold decision during June, July, and August of 1793. They offered slaves who would fight for the French Republic freedom and citizenship. Over time, they extended the offer to include volunteers’ families, and then abolished slavery outright in August of 1793. They had no orders to do so from Paris, and indeed took an audacious step in doing so. Their decision was a response to the situation in the colony, and represented both an acceptance that slave insurgents had transformed themselves into the most militarily powerful group in the colony, and an embrace of the political demand for freedom that the slave insurrection represented.

Once this decision was ratified in Paris in 1794, an insurrection directed against France was transformed into an empire-wide project of emancipation in which the French government and former slave insurgents, now free citizens, became allies against France’s slave-holding enemies, particularly Britain. Guadeloupe and Martinique had both fallen to British invasion in early 1794, but a small mission of French soldiers sent out under the command of Victor Hugues managed to take Guadeloupe back by announcing that France had decreed emancipation and so recruiting slaves to their side to fight the British. The British eventually fled the island, leaving behind several hundred French planters who had joined with them, who were executed by Hugues. This event had significant demographic consequences in Guadeloupe, where the richest members of the planter class were decimated both by the slave revolt in Trois-Rivières and by Hugues, leading to the rebuilding and transformation of this class in the early nineteenth century. In Martinique, in contrast, where slavery was never abolished because the British kept control throughout the 1790s, the planter class was able to maintain more continuous control between the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

After being taken back by the French, Guadeloupe saw a massive military mobilization as former slaves were recruited into the army. Emancipation was a powerful weapon of war for the French. Guadeloupe became the central base for French attacks against British colonies in the Eastern Caribbean, which included a successful invasion of St. Lucia, where slavery was abolished by the French, though the British took it back relatively quickly, and widespread attacks in St. Vincent and Grenada, where the French allied with local insurgents. About 60,000 British troops died in the French Caribbean during the 1790s in both the Eastern Caribbean and Saint-Domingue, while the French essentially raised armies on site by recruiting ex-slaves. These armies, furthermore, were fighting not just for France but also for emancipation, a fact which gained them allies among slaves and free people of color in British colonies they attacked.

The French also successfully deployed privateers, ships manned by crews that included many ex-slaves, which attacked shipping heading for British colonies. In the Eastern Caribbean, Guadeloupe became the major base of operations for these privateers, and they brought their spoils to the island, creating an economic boom in the process. Among the ships they captured were slave vessels, and they brought those Africans they captured to Guadeloupe, where they were placed on plantations but granted the limited freedom of other former slaves in the colony. Sailors on the privateers played an important role in spreading news and information about the events in the French Caribbean colonies throughout the Greater Caribbean.

Despite these radical changes, the pinnacles of power in Guadeloupe remained occupied by white administrators sent from France, most notably Victor Hugues. Within the army itself, there was an important presence of officers of African descent who rose up through the ranks through these wars. The situation in Saint-Domingue was quite different, and largely because of the actions of the most legendary figure of the revolutionary period: Toussaint Louverture. Although he did not live to see independence, which was secured by one of his top generals, Jean-Jacques Dessalines, his actions during the 1790s and early 1800s lay the foundation for independence.

Louverture's trajectory remains of central importance. As a leader he confronted perennial problems for the Caribbean, and for other parts of the post- and not-so-post-colonial worlds of the present: the continual, but often failed, striving to escape an economic order based on monoculture and dependency; the search for political formations that can both resist and negotiate with the demands and pressures of empires; and the struggle of leaders to balance the representation of the aspirations of a national constituency with a set of broader conditions that inevitably contain and limit those aspirations.

As soon as emancipation was decreed in 1794, many planters began actively seeking to reverse the decision. Caribbean leaders such as Louverture were well aware that this planter lobby was present and was a threat to liberty, and watched developments in the French metropole carefully, as well as planning for the possibility that they would have to defend emancipation from its enemies. During the next years, the struggle over the future of emancipation took several twists and turns, and the rise of critics of abolition was not as inexorable or as unavoidable as is often assumed. Still, in the midst of a broader process of reaction and the dismantling of certain institutions and discursive hegemonies of the revolutionary period, there was a steady erosion of support for emancipation – and for figures like Louverture – and a growing acceptance of various dangerous forms of nostalgia for the “old regime” in the colonies. As Louverture sought to respond to threats he saw on the horizon, his actions – ironically, though perhaps inevitably – provided new fodder for his enemies in the metropole. The political dynamics of this period were shaped by a complex transatlantic ballet of suspicions and accusations in which each side helped call into existence precisely what it sought to avoid.

The central content of Louverture's political ideology was racial egalitarianism. A part of this was a defense of emancipation, which he consistently insisted was irreversible. But he was willing to accept a quite restricted form of emancipation, one in which the majority of ex-slaves continued as plantation laborers: paid, but poorly, subject to physical and legal coercion, and forced into a circumscribed economic and social existence. He was willing to negotiate a social order that sacrificed much of the content of liberty in order to preserve it as a political reality. This social order, however, was to be devoid of explicitly racial exclusions. The ranks of military and political power were to be open to all people of all races.

At the same time, and despite his keen awareness of the hostility toward emancipation in many quarters in metropolitan France, Louverture did not declare independence from France. Why? He may have simply thought the time was not right. But it could be argued that he was in fact still hoping, at the time, that France could be controlled and appeased, and that ultimately a renegotiated imperial relationship would secure and strengthen the gains of the previous years. Louverture seems to have concluded that it was only through negotiation with the powerful empires that surrounded Saint-Domingue, especially Britain and France – as well as the United States – that a colony without slavery could survive. On an economic level, this meant doing what was necessary to maintain plantation agriculture, to secure this as a foundation for exchange and trade. On a political level, it meant balancing the necessity of securing liberty and racial equality within Saint-Domingue with the necessity of protection and support. Louverture – precociously suffering and seeking to negotiate the dilemmas of Caribbean nationalism – sought to secure sovereignty by accepting the denial of much of its content. He sought to create a social order that would be acceptable in an imperial world and that would allow the fulfillment of the role that world had placed upon Saint-Domingue.

Ultimately, when Napoleon Bonaparte rose to power in France, he came to see Toussaint Louverture's regime as an unacceptable challenge to his own control over and plans for the Caribbean. Despite Louverture's attempt to craft a quite conservative order, the new French regime was unable to accept either his demands for racial equality or his autonomous political action, embodied most potently in his 1801 Constitution, which declared him governor for life of Saint-Domingue and created a detailed set of laws for the colony. Bonaparte's decision to turn against Louverture was a clear turning point, for it created a radically new context for debates about emancipation and sovereignty. The refusal of Louverture's advance on the part of the French essentially eliminated the possibility of compromise around the question of imperial governance. The possibility that a local leadership of African descent could have a role in crafting colonial governance from within was essentially closed off. This polarized the political situation, and ultimately forced a new set of choices on the Caribbean leadership. The battle became one between emancipation and racial equality defended through a more radical sovereignty, on the one hand, and a return to much of the old colonial order on the other.

The period from 1802 to 1804 was one of extremely complex and cross-cutting allegiances and involved a confusing series of surrenders and then desertions on the part of insurgent leaders. In Saint-Domingue, the war began when the French troops arrived and refused to wait for Louverture's permission to land at Le Cap. His commander, Henri Christophe, set the town on fire and began fighting the arriving French troops. Not all of Louverture's officers remained loyal and, especially in the western and southern portions of the colony, many joined the French. Nevertheless, Louverture and his loyal generals – including Christophe and Jean-Jacques Dessalines – forced Leclerc into several months of hard campaigns that culminated in a battle at Crête-à-Pierrot at which the French won a very costly victory. Soon afterwards, Christophe defected to the French, and Louverture and Dessalines followed suit. In June, Leclerc set up a trap for Louverture, fearing that he was still animating resistance in the colony, and deported him and his family to France, where he died in prison.

The first stage in the war was a victory for the French, but not a complete one. A major part of Leclerc's mission, as laid out by Bonaparte in a series of instructions, was to co-opt or eliminate the black officers of the colony and disarm the black army. But the casualties he suffered from disease and battle during his first months in the colony made this impossible: as he confronted ongoing resistance on the part of small bands of rebels after the surrender of Christophe, Dessalines, and Louverture, he had to depend on the very army he was supposed to destroy. And – as both French officials in the metropole (including Bonaparte) and Louverture knew – the rainy months in the late summer and fall, when outbreaks of disease were more common and more virulent, would be a particularly dangerous time for the French troops.

By late 1802, however, defections from the French side began to accelerate. The remaining bands of rebels – led in the north by Sans-Souci and another Congo-born officer, Macaya – attracted more and more soldiers. The French, seeking to stop the defections by threatening and increasingly massacring and terrorizing segments of the black troops in their service, instead accelerated the process. In the end, the officers, including Dessalines, followed the lead of many of their soldiers, and in October the tide clearly shifted against the French. The final stage of the war of independence began, and increasingly the lines of opposition became clear and intractable.

Over the course of 1802, events in Guadeloupe shaped the process of political mobilization in Saint-Domingue. Bonaparte had also sent a mission to Guadeloupe, where they were to confront a group of rebellions. Soldiers had expelled a white metropolitan administrator sent by Bonaparte and set up an autonomous government on the island. The French troops were welcomed by a proportion of the army under the command of Magloire Pélage. The French, however, immediately began disarming all black troops, which prompted another set of soldiers, under the command of Louis Delgrès, to begin resisting the French. At the end of a few weeks of combat, during which Pélage and his troops aided the French, Delgrès retreated to a mountain plantation at Matouba, where rather than surrender he and his troops committed mass suicide, blowing up the plantation with gunpowder to the cry of "Vivre Libre ou Mourir!" – "Live Free or Die!" The French carried out brutal executions and many deportations in the wake of this conflict, and some prisoners were shipped to Saint-Domingue, where they may have helped spread the news of what happened in Guadeloupe.

News about French actions in Guadeloupe, as French General Victor-Emmanuel Leclerc himself admitted, was seen in Saint-Domingue as proof of French intentions to reestablish slavery. In fact the French administrators in Guadeloupe would put off the official reestablishment of slavery until 1803, fearing continued revolt, but even Leclerc himself was convinced in 1802 that slavery had been reinstated in Guadeloupe. This meant that in Saint-Domingue the ambiguity about French intentions, which had been maintained during the campaigns against Louverture, melted away, as more and more people became convinced that the choice before them was between victory against the French and a return to slavery. The repression of revolt succeeded in Guadeloupe, but the impact of that successful repression was to provide inspiration to revolutionaries in Saint-Domingue by making the battle lines and the stakes of the war much clearer. It took months more of brutal fighting, during which many French atrocities were directed against black troops who were fighting for them, to help seal popular support for the opposition, even among free people of color who retained strong loyalties to France. When victory against the French came in late 1803, the army was led by Jean-Jacques Dessalines but included a range of officers from different social backgrounds, including a number of men of color.

As the battle between the French and rebel troops under Dessalines's command raged from late 1802 to November 1803, a series of symbols was deployed in an attempt to craft a new unified identity. The most famous is the blue and white flag that became the flag of Haiti. At the time, many of the insurgents – veterans of the decade-long wars against the British in the colony – seem to have fought under their old French republican flags. In March 1803, an article was published claiming that this signified that they were still seeking, and willing to imagine, a reconciliation with France. Dessalines's response was to produce a new flag: the white was ripped out of the tricolor, leaving the blue and red together. Dessalines did not invent this gesture, however. Nearly a year earlier, the rebels under Louis Delgrès in Guadeloupe had also flown a French tricolor with the white ripped out.

The new flag suggested that the white would be expelled, while those of African descent would remain, united to form a new nation. The language of the January 1804 declaration of Haitian independence, however, took aim primarily at the French rather than at all whites. And Dessalines, while he later declared that all Haitians would henceforth be defined as “black” – an act aimed at undermining conflicts between those of purely African descent and those of mixed European and African ancestry in the colony – also exempted and delivered naturalization papers to a number of French individuals, most notably widows, who were allowed to keep their property, as well as groups of Polish deserters from the French army and German colonists. While mobilizing the symbolism of a rejection of the white color, Dessalines's proclamations took aim at a particular construction of France as the real enemy of the new nation. And he allowed certain individuals – who had to pledge their rejection of France in order to gain naturalization as Haitians – to escape that construction, and the broader expulsion of the “white,” in order to become Haitians, and therefore black (Dubois 2004a).

United in this period of revolution, Haiti and Guadeloupe would move forward into strikingly different futures. Haiti, the second independent nation in the Americas, would become a symbol of black independence and dignity, and suffer political isolation and economic marginalization at the hands of the empires and nations that surrounded it. In Guadeloupe the majority of the population, once reenslaved in 1803, would have to wait until 1848 for a second, this time permanent, emancipation. The island is today a department of France, politically integrated into the nation, though its status and relation to the metropole remain the subject of ongoing debate and conflict. It is now home to an increasing number of Haitian immigrants who are sometimes treated as unwelcome outsiders, but who in fact are also bearers of a common history.

French Guiana, ecological movements against the Guiana Space Center in Kourou

María Ximena Alvarez Martínez

Guiana became a French overseas department in March of 1946. Ninety percent of its land is made up of forest and represents a treasure of biodiversity. It is also rich in gold. Because of its favorable geographic conditions, such as its proximity to the Equator and the Atlantic Ocean, as well as its climatic benefits and its low demographic index (a total population of 45,000 in 1964), it was chosen in 1965 as the site for a French space base, the Guiana Space Center, in the small town of Kourou.

Public opinion over the benefits of the space program was divided. The Socialist Party and other leftist organizations were afraid that it might become a potential site for nuclear conflict during the Cold War, and they feared the risk of the establishment of an apartheid system similar to South Africa. The environmental impact of this development was also protested by the international World Wildlife Fund (WWF), but base experts argued that even though the rockets and engine tests produced pollutants, overall the program posed less of a direct environmental threat than most forms of industry.

On the other hand, the program offered some advantages, such as the employment opportunities it created and the benefits and comfort of modernization. It was necessary to build an infrastructure which included the improvement of the port, the modernization of Rochambeau's airport, and the construction of railroad tracks, housing, and other services.

The indirect effects of the space center were also felt, such as the demographic explosion (the population tripled after 1964), the spread of artificial environments, and the birth of a culture of consumption. In the 1980s the country faced an energy shortage as a result of the demand created by the system of telecommunications operated by Télé Diffusion France (TDF) and the space center; to cover that demand, a dam was built across the Sinnamary River at a site known as Petit Saut. Even though studies on the environmental impact were conducted, the population was concerned about the ecological and health repercussions. There were several protests from environmental and political groups, who shared the view that France was imposing its politics and viewpoints. Finally, a railroad system had to be constructed for the space base. In the 1990s, there were more protests on the streets, and the media responded to the construction of an alternate route to Petit Saut by denouncing the base as a "state within the state."

The ecological problem that the rainforest is faced with is determined not only by the Guiana Space Center, but also by the illegal extraction of gold (which is responsible for most of the damage to the rainforest), along with overharvesting of fauna and the pollution of rivers by mercury and sediment load. More protests took place in 2005 against the creation of a launching platform near Kourou, and the environmental movement succeeded in establishing national parks to protect the rainforest, such as the 2 million-hectare Guiana Amazonian Park, which was created in 2007.

French Guiana, indigenous rebellions

Leticia Pacheco Espejel

Located on South America's northern coast, French Guiana is an overseas department of France. Originally inhabited by Native Americans, it was settled in the seventeenth century by the French, who used it for penal settlements beginning in 1852. This area has seen a number of protests, the earliest of which involved the struggles of the indigenous peoples to maintain their rights to their homeland. Since the 1970s, there have been protests for autonomy from France, as well as ecological protests against the Guiana Space Center in Kourou.

The first contact between the Europeans and the indigenous people can be traced back to the fifteenth century when the first French expedition arrived at French Guiana. The first attempt to evangelize the indigenous people began in 1630, and the rest of the century was characterized by constant indigenous resistance to evangelization, as in every other French colony.

The First War of Resistance

In 1643, the French faced an attack by indigenous peoples at the same time as Poncet de Brétigny led a 281-man expedition to establish a foothold in French Guiana. The indigenous resistance, the inability of the Europeans to adapt to the climate, and de Brétigny's unpreparedness caused the expedition to fail.

In 1652, a new expedition landed in French Guiana under bishops Marivault and Biet, who arrived with 800 marines, soldiers, and, for the first time, women. This expedition lasted until 1654, but because of internal differences and indigenous attacks, the colonists abandoned the country. Owing to disparities in military weapons, the arrival of new diseases, and alcohol introduced by the colonists, the indigenous population declined from 30,000 to 2,000 by the end of the nineteenth century.

One of the most important indigenous resistance struggles was led by the Arouas. They had originally come from Brazil, settling in the area surrounding Cayenne, and aroused the ambitions of French slave traders. The Arouas resisted enslavement, provoking a division between inhabitants and the administration. The colonists wanted to enslave the indigenous population and profit from their labor. However, the missionaries rejected slavery as a violation of Christian principles and led the remaining Arouas into the Mission of Kourou. Although saved from slavery, they were prohibited from practicing their own religion and culture.

In the Mission of Kourou, the established indigenous groups were the Arouas, the Maronnes, and the Coussarys, who had been obliged to work in the plantations that belonged to the Jesuits. Despite arguing against slavery, the missionaries only considered indigenous peoples good if they demonstrated a will to integrate and to be evangelized. Those who opposed their evangelical efforts were seen as wild or savage.

Slavery

During the time slavery prevailed in French Guiana, the African and indigenous slaves formed different methods of resistance. One was passive resistance, such as committing suicide, which they carried out on the plantations and in the mission's habitations. This was, without doubt, the most radical form of resisting slavery. Another form of passive resistance was to ignore the colonists' orders by working slowly or refusing to fulfill orders. An extreme form was to avoid producing descendants to become future slaves. This was most often done by pregnant women provoking abortions by working vigorously. Active resistance was practiced by escaping and trying to live autonomously with other fugitives and rebels in hidden places. This frequently used form of resistance was known as marronage, and typically involved the participation of several slaves, mostly headed by a leader who organized arms. To combat marronage, the colonial government practiced terrible reprisals against slaves who were caught. First they were tortured according to Article 38 of the Código Negro by having their ears cut off, then they were branded with a red-hot iron. Anyone who tried to escape again had his calf amputated. Slaves who attempted to escape more than twice were often condemned to death. Another form of resisting slavery was to become integrated into the colonial system through marriage or inheritance. Various relationships developed between male colonists and enslaved women, a process known as mestizaje.

In 1748, a number of fugitive slaves settled at Plomb Mountain. The colonists first sent the Jesuit missionary Fauque to arrange extradition of the rebels, promising them leniency. Only 50 out of 612 rebels accepted the offer. The Maroons then resisted a massive attack by the French army and began to establish themselves in Reibera de Korou, where they divided the land into equal lots and cultivated potatoes, bananas, and other fruit. They also practiced their own religion and culture. The Maroons of Plomb disintegrated, however, after their chiefs André, Remy Lois, and Félicité died of tropical diseases and cancer.

In 1782, the slaves of the Cayenne Company revolted against the director, Dubois Berthelot, when they learned that he intended to establish another factory where they would be forced to work more. As the protesters burned down the plants and looted houses, the colonists came to recognize that they were powerless to suppress the rebels and tried to calm them with offers of a pardon. While no one was severely punished, most were sold to Tobago and Santo Domingo.

After Slavery

After slavery was officially abolished by a decree in 1848, French Guianese society began to integrate mestizos, creoles, blacks, and indigenous peoples. The initial process of integration took more than a century. The indigenous population had been contracted to work in difficult regions, laboring in unhealthy workplace conditions and being deprived of educational opportunities. The end of slavery and the Maroon communities did not put an end to their struggle to maintain their culture and ensure their basic needs.

French Guiana, political movements against departmentalization

María Ximena Alvarez Martínez

French Guiana, along with Martinique and Guadeloupe, become an overseas department of France with the arrival of the Fourth French Republic in 1946. The approval of the law of departmentalization on March 19, 1946, was led by the leftist majority in the National Assembly, which included the Communist Party and the Gaullists. This new jurisdiction determined the management and transfer of the central government's subsidiary resources, which created a strong economic dependence. Even though on one hand it improved the quality of life, it also led to a decline in productivity and a high unemployment rate. Decisions at a local level had to be authorized by the cabinet of ministers in France, which indicated that the "colonial relationship" with Europe had not improved.

In the 1950s, criticism from leftist organizations against the current system of departmentalization began. Until the 1960s, the political arena was dominated by those who were in favor of decentralization, while wishing to remain integrated with the French nation. In the 1970s, however, some began to go further and promulgate total independence from France. Guiana's Communist Party was one of the groups that had been in favor of the system in 1946, but it then began to promulgate self-determination and autonomy. Guiana's Socialist Party (PSG), however, founded by Justin Catayée in 1956, was in favor of cultural assimilation and was opposed to independence. It called for "special status" for Guiana that would involve keeping its role in the French family, but requested autonomy rights. The party's April 18, 1960 memorandum demanded a number of rights, including the application of self-determination, the creation of a local executive power regulated by a Regional Assembly, and self-management and financial independence.

Anti-colonialist views were prevalent in the ideological context of the time, especially among Guianese intellectuals and students. Most had been educated in France and upon returning were eager to promote revolutionary changes. Such was the case of the Union of Guiana's People (UPG), which was created in 1958 by young Guianese intellectuals to push for the creation of an independent nation.

With the arrival of France's Fifth Republic in 1958, a new constitution was proposed. It would not only modify the system of departmentalization but also deny the right of the French overseas departments (DOM) to autonomy and self-determination. In spite of the opposition led by the Communist Party, it was approved by a majority. Guiana's Socialist Party was in favor of the constitution because the new government promised the special status it promoted. Furthermore, the new constitution promised administrative, political, and social reforms seeking greater equanimity and fairness among the overseas and metropolitan territories.

A great act of repression against the autonomist movements, known as the Vile Ordinance, aroused animosity and led to confrontation on October 15, 1960. Applicable to the departments of Algeria, Guadeloupe, Martinique, and Guiana, the ordinance gave the prefect the authority to expel any public officer who disturbed public order. It was an effort to intimidate the supporters of separatist ideas. After several protests, it was finally abolished in 1972.

In the 1970s, a new economic and cultural context in Guiana, as well as external factors such as Algeria and Surinam gaining independence in 1975, led to the birth of new leftist political organizations with anti-colonialist and separatist ideas. A number of new organizations appeared in the political arena: in 1973 the Guianese National Movement (Marxist-Leninist); in 1974 the anti-colonialist and nationalist group MOGUYDE (Guianese Movement of Decolonization), which had great influence among students; and in 1975 Guiana's National Liberation Front, FNLG (Maoist). These organizations shared the view that the system of departmental division perpetuated colonial dependency, which was disguised as assimilation and economic assistance but in reality amounted to cultural alienation for Guiana. Sovereignty could only be gained through independence. In the Annual Congress of 1973, the Guianese Trade Union

(UTG) proclaimed independence. These organizations were severely repressed by the government, as in the case of "Noel's plot" in December of 1974, when 13 supporters of MOGUYDE and UTG were arrested, leading to a general strike. These movements had minimal impact on elections, however, and the legislative elections of 1973 and 1978 were won by the Gaullist candidate, who favored the system of departmental division.

In the 1981 presidential elections between the Socialist Party's François Mitterrand and President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing, the former garnered 66.5 percent of the vote. When Mitterrand and the Socialist Party took office, reforms were made, leading to the Law of Regionalization in 1982. This would determine greater autonomy and the creation of a Regional Council, a Regional Executive Power, and advisory committees in different aspects such as social, economic, cultural, educational, and environmental affairs. With the transformation of the department into a region, some historical vindications of self-government were achieved, but integration was not obtained.

French Polynesia, protest movements

Justin Corfield

French Polynesia in the Pacific consists of 118 islands which form five archipelagos. It has been occupied by France since 1842, becoming an overseas territory of France in 1946, with its own territorial assembly. Its population is 78 percent Polynesian, 12 percent Chinese, with 6 percent being local French settlers and their families, and 4 percent being French from metropolitan France.

Although a Protestant missionary, George Pritchard, asked the Tahitian Queen Pomare IV in 1837 whether she wanted to make French Polynesia a protectorate of the British crown, it was the French who took the islands. The French Admiral Abel Dupetit-Thouars arrived in Tahiti in 1842 when Pritchard, by then the British consul, and Queen Pomare were briefly absent. When Queen Pomare returned she was forced to agree to the proclamation of the French protectorate over Tahiti on September 9, 1842. Queen Pomare soon realized that the French had come to take over the country and took refuge on a British ship, the HMS Basilisk, which was in Papeete harbor as the Tahitian people rose up against the French.

The first major engagement between the French and the Tahitians was in March 1844 at Taravao. In April of that year the French governor, Armand-Joseph Bruat, and French marines fought with 400 Tahitians on Mahena beach. Some 102 Tahitians were killed, and the remainder retreated to the hills, continuing guerilla attacks against the French. One attack, at Huahine in January 1846, was so successful that Tahitians decided to attack Papeete itself, but were driven back, and in December 1846 the French stormed Fautaua Fort where they were holding out. To stem the rising death toll, Queen Pomare agreed to accept the French protectorate over Tahiti and Moorea on January 7, 1847.

In June 1880 the king of Tahiti, Pomare V, abdicated. He was given a pension of 5,000 francs a month in return for ceding Tahiti, which in 1885, along with nearby islands, became the Etablissements Français de l'Océanie (French Oceania). On September 22, 1914 the township of Papeete was shelled by two German cruisers. Later in the war it became an important rest stop for ships sailing between Australia and the Americas. In World War II, some 300 Tahitians fought with French forces, with the "Tahitian battalion" serving at Bir Hakeim in North Africa. At war's end, in 1945, universal suffrage was introduced and all residents in the colony given French citizenship.

The first modern nationalist movement arose in 1947 when Pouvanaa a Oopa, a World War I veteran, created what became known as the Pouvanaa Committee. This was transformed in 1949 into the Rassemblement Démocratique des Populations Tahitiennes (Tahitian Democratic Group, RDPT). The organization opposed the recruiting of civil servants from metropolitan France, wanting vacancies to be filled with people from Tahiti. Pouvanaa a Oopa was elected to the French Chamber of Deputies in 1949 and became vice-president of the government council in 1957.

His demands for autonomy resulted when the French renamed the Etablissements Français de l'Océanie French Polynesia on July 27, 1957. Charles de Gaulle then offered a referendum in French Polynesia on independence, with two-thirds of the electorate voting for Polynesia to remain French. However, Pouvanaa a Oopa, opposing the election, was arrested on charges of arson, and after a questionable trial, was jailed and then exiled.

In 1963 work began on the construction of the Centre d'Expérimentation du Pacifique and the start of a nuclear testing program; five years later, the first hydrogen bomb was exploded at Mururoa Atoll. When Pouvanaa a Oopa was permitted to run for office, he was elected to the French Senate in 1971, remaining a senator until his death in 1977. In that year the elected local government was given wider powers and in 1984 Tahiti was granted full internal autonomy.

In 1985 France decided to restart nuclear testing at Mururoa Atoll in French Polynesia in spite of objections by signatories of the South Pacific Nuclear-Free Zone Treaty. The international environmental group Greenpeace sent their ship Rainbow Warrior to the Pacific to protest. While the ship was in Auckland Harbor in New Zealand, French agents boarded the vessel while it was open to the public, and at about 11.45 p.m. blew it up with two limpet mines. They did not anticipate killing anybody and did not realize the complication of evacuation procedures on a non-military vessel. The ship was sunk and a Portuguese-Dutch photographer drowned while trying to salvage some of his equipment following the second mine explosion. The French government initially denied involvement, condemning terrorists for the action. However, the New Zealand authorities arrested two French agents traveling on false Swiss passports, who pleaded guilty to manslaughter and were jailed for ten years. After eight months, the prisoners were moved to Hao in French Polynesia to serve out their sentences. New Zealand buckled under threats of a trade war and restrictions on their exports to the European Economic Community (European Union). The French admitted responsibility, paying NZ$13 million compensation, but repatriated both prisoners to metropolitan France in violation of their agreement. The man who placed the bomb has subsequently been named as Gérard Royal, who 20 years later admitted that François Mitterrand, the French president, personally authorized the bombing.

The events coincided with political changes in French Polynesia. Gaston Flosse, president of the council of ministers for the territory, was forced from office in February 1987 after allegations of corruption. In October 1987 major protests and a dock strike were broken, resulting in a mass uprising in the capital, Papeete. Flosse returned to power in April 1991, and again faced charges of corruption.

In 1992 the French government announced a moratorium on nuclear tests in French Polynesia, with French President Mitterrand promising their suspension through at least May 1995 if the US, Britain, and Russia also ended nuclear tests. Without an agreement from the other nations, in June 1995 the new French president, Jacques Chirac, sought to hold eight nuclear tests at Mururoa Atoll and Fangataufa, in spite of protests from many countries in the Pacific. The Australian government, under public pressure, banned French companies from seeking government tenders for bonds. The New Zealand government took France to the International Court of Justice in The Hague. The court later ruled that it had no power to decide on underground nuclear explosions. With a massive increase in spending in French Polynesia, few protests broke out in the islands, but large demonstrations were held in Australia and New Zealand, many coinciding with the annual Bastille Day celebrations held by French diplomatic and consular staff there. At the height of these protests, an Israeli student firebombed the office of the honorary French consul in Perth, Western Australia. The Greenpeace ship Rainbow Warrior 2 sailed for French Polynesia, where it was seized by French commandoes, an event shown on television around the world. The French were surprised by the extent of international press coverage and opposition to the tests, which were quickly cut back to six.

The economic boom brought to the economy of French Polynesia by the tests quickly dissipated, and on September 6, 1995 trade unions called for a strike, resulting in uprisings in Papeete, with shops ransacked and burned. The labor insurrection increased popular support for the small pro-independence movement, with growing support for Oscar Temaru and the Tavini Huia'atira Party. Toward the end of 1995 the French government announced an end to nuclear tests and signed the Rarotonga Treaty, which created a nuclear-free zone in the Pacific. The French gave contributions to supporters of Gaston Flosse who, in 1996, won the elections with 39 percent of the vote, securing 22 of the 41 seats in the Territorial Assembly. Oscar Temaru's party increased its seats from four to ten, seven of which were located in the Iles du Vent (Windward Islands), which had the highest levels of youth unemployment. In May 1998 Flosse was reelected, and two months later the dismantling of the nuclear test site at Mururoa Atoll was completed. In June 2000, the French Foreign Legion, based in French Polynesia since 1963, left the islands.

French Revolution, 1789–1794

Clifford D. Conner

On July 14, 1789, Paris exploded in a massive insurrection that proved to be the opening salvo

In one of the most famous revolutionary acts in European history, workers, shopkeepers, tradesmen, and other members of the Third Estate storm the French prison known as the Bastille on July 14, 1789. This act, which was both an attack upon a hated symbol of oppression and an attempt to seize munitions, has for most people become the symbol of the French Revolution. (Musée de la Ville de Paris, Musée Carnavalet, Paris/The Bridgeman Art Library) of one of history's most thoroughgoing social revolutions. The French Revolution dealt the death blow to the traditional social structure in Europe and cleared the way for the transformation of the continent and the world.

Although Bastille Day, July 14, is celebrated in France every year as the day when the Revolution erupted into the open, it had been developing beneath the surface for a long time before 1789. The beginning of any chain of historical causation is impossible to pinpoint, but a good case can be made for starting with the American Revolution. The expenses of France's involvement in that war stretched the royal government's finances to the breaking point. The monarchy was so deeply in debt that 50 percent of its budget was going for interest on its loans.

Louis XVI's advisors began desperately seeking new sources of revenue. The peasants were already so heavily taxed that squeezing them harder could only produce minimal returns. The crown's frantic search for new financial resources forced it to turn to the aristocracy, which had traditionally enjoyed extensive exemption from taxation. In spite of their privileged social position, the nobles had long been excluded from a direct political role in governing the country. The threat to their economic interest prompted them to begin agitating for political rights as a means of defense.

The "aristocratic rebellion" succeeded in shaking the monarchy, but in doing so it opened the door for other social layers to begin raising demands as well. One of the great ironies of 1789 is that the social class that began the Revolution was the one that was ultimately destroyed by it. Georges Lefebvre, in his seminal work The Coming of the French Revolution, explained how the process unfolded in 1789 as a succession of four overlapping revolutionary waves crashing against the monarchy. The nobles initiated the turmoil, followed by the bourgeoisie (the incipient capitalist class), the peasants, and the urban poor – the sans-culottes.

Estates General

The nobles' drive for political rights led them to demand a reconvening of the Estates General, a medieval parliamentary body that had last met more than a century and a half earlier, in 1614. It was hardly a democratic institution because the three "estates" that constituted the assembly had equal voting weight but represented vastly unequal numbers of constituents. In the population as a whole the First Estate (the clergy) numbered about 100,000, the Second Estate (the nobility) about 400,000, and the Third Estate (everybody else) about 25 million people. Since the clergy could generally be counted upon to vote with the nobles, the assembly would effectively be under aristocratic control.

Nonetheless, because the nobles' call for an Estates General was seen as a challenge to the oppressive monarchy, it gathered broad support among the population at large. Louis XVI's government, pushed to the wall by the fiscal crisis, was forced to accede. The Estates General was set to be held at the beginning of May 1789. The leaders of the Third Estate, however, had a different kind of Estates General in mind, one that would more clearly reflect the real numerical strength of their following.

When the nobles, with the king's backing, refused to consider their demand, the representatives of the Third Estate held their own meeting and on June 17 declared themselves the National Assembly. France then had a new potential focus of governmental power in competition with the existing royal regime. While the leaders of the Third Estate – and therefore of the National Assembly – were almost entirely of the urban “middle classes” (professional people, intellectuals, small proprietors, and so forth), they enjoyed widespread popular support.

Fall of the Bastille

In mid-1789 the Parisian sans-culottes – especially the masses of artisans and tradespeople – were on the verge of open revolt. The spark that ignited the conflagration was the dismissal of an undeservedly popular finance minister, Jacques Necker, on July 12. Angry crowds began arming themselves by looting gunsmiths’ shops. Revolutionary-minded political leaders attempted to bring order to the rebellion by organizing a citizens’ militia, the National Guard. The royal troops, whose ranks had been strongly affected by the spread of revolutionary ideas, withdrew to their barracks.

After two days, on July 14, the uprising came to a climax with the famous assault on the Bastille. The old prison had been used as an armory, and the crowd proceeded to liberate its guns and ammunition. The existing municipal administration was swept aside and a new city government, the Paris Commune, was formed. The National Guard was officially established and placed under the command of a popular military hero, the marquis de Lafayette.

Louis XVI recognized the triumph of the Revolution by publicly accepting the tricolor cockade to the cheers of the Parisian masses. The insurrection had legitimized the rule of the National Assembly and initiated a period of de facto constitutional monarchy. While Paris led the way, it was by no means the only urban revolution. As news of July 14 spread, insurrections occurred in cities throughout France and established the rule of municipal revolutionary committees.

Meanwhile, in the countryside, the peasants were engaged in their own revolution. During July and August, they rose up against their landlords all over the country. Oppressed for centuries by feudal dues, taxes, tithes, and forced labor, they took advantage of the weakness of the royal regime to redress their own grievances. Manor houses were sacked and burned, some seigneurs were chased away, but most importantly the peasant revolts – coming right at harvest time – were able forcibly to block the collection of dues, taxes, and tithes. As the peasants set their fires, their main targets were the archives where records and documents defining their obligations were kept.

Aristocrats Renounce their Privileges

On August 4 – less than a month after Bastille Day – a most peculiar session of the National Assembly took place. Aristocrats stood up, one after the other, to voluntarily renounce their privileges. This was not a case of belated generosity or guilty consciences, as might be supposed if the remarkable session were viewed in isolation from its social context. For one thing, the nobles were renouncing rights and privileges that had already come under sharp attack by the peasants’ revolt. They were in a sense putting the best face possible on a fait accompli.

More significantly, the aristocrats were hoping by their action to win compensation for the privileges they were surrendering and, indeed, the National Assembly backed their requests. The peasants would be expected to pay for their emancipation. Feudal dues were to be legally done away with, but only in exchange for large cash payments. Since hardly any peasants were able to pay such amounts, they were faced with being perpetually in debt to their former landlords. Instead of feudal dues, they would from then on be making payments on their “loans.”

The peasants, understandably, were not at all satisfied with this arrangement. Their struggle continued (often in open rebellion to the point of civil war) from 1789 until their complete victory in 1793, when a more radical legislative body, the Jacobin-dominated Convention, declared the peasants’ redemptive debts null and void.

Meanwhile, back in Paris after the fall of the Bastille, the democratic aspects of the French Revolution began to manifest themselves very directly. The monarchy’s repressive apparatus ceased to function, and Parisians began to exercise long-denied democratic rights of free assembly and free expression. The breakdown of royal censorship resulted in an immediate explosion of publication. In Paris alone, 180 new journals appeared in 1789; by the end of the following year the number had risen to 355.

These newfound liberties were codified by the National Assembly on August 26 in its Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen. Freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom from arbitrary arrest, and religious freedom became the law of the land. In addition to these basic democratic rights, the Declaration affirmed the inviolability and sacredness of property rights, underlining the social character – and limitations – of the Revolution. Its aim was to promote personal liberty and civil equality, not social equality.

“October Days” of 1789

At the beginning of October another major mass action occurred, stimulated by the continuing high price of bread and the fear of an aristocratic plot to militarily crush revolutionary Paris. The king’s court at Versailles, about 15 miles from Paris, was widely assumed to be a nest of reactionary intrigue. A seemingly spontaneous movement erupted with the aim of marching to Versailles, “rescuing” the king from his treasonous advisors, and bringing him and his family to live in Paris under the watchful eyes of patriotic citizens.

On October 5 a huge crowd – largely made up of women armed with broomsticks, pitchforks, swords, and muskets – set out from Paris on foot to march to Versailles. Later, about 20,000 men, including large numbers of National Guards, set out after them. General Lafayette was nominally at their head but it would be inaccurate to say that he was leading them; in a political sense, he was straining to keep up. When the marchers reached Versailles the royal forces were overwhelmed and the king had no choice but to obey the demand of the crowds. He and his family were escorted to Paris and installed in the Tuilleries palace.

With the king pretending to accept his constitutionally limited role, the Revolution entered a phase of relative calm that lasted a year and a half. Throughout 1790 and the first half of 1791 the social turbulence subsided and the class antagonisms seemed to have dissolved into a pervasive mood of social unity. The feel-good spell was broken, however, on June 20, 1791, when the king attempted to make a run for it. In the dark of night he and his family hid themselves in a carriage and sneaked out of the palace, heading for the border, where they hoped to join up with counterrevolutionary émigrés and their Austrian-backed armed forces. Many of these dispossessed aristocrats had gained military skills in the officer corps of the royal army. Their object was to reconquer France and destroy the Revolution. Upon them Louis XVI pinned his hopes for a return to full autocratic power.

The disguised king’s flight was interrupted close to the border in a small town named Varennes. The strange entourage attracted attention, the king was recognized (from his portraits on French coinage) by local patriots, and he was forced to return to Paris under armed guard. The illusions of social unity that had prevailed over the previous year and a half rapidly dissipated. On July 17, 1791, soldiers under Lafayette’s command committed a massacre by opening fire on a massive crowd that had gathered on the Champ de Mars to petition for the king’s removal. The mass radicalization deepened significantly and the influence of Jean Paul Marat and other radical agitators increased by leaps and bounds. Nonetheless, another year would pass before the tension would once again explode in insurrection in Paris.

Monarchy Overthrown

On August 10, 1792 – more than three years after the original Bastille Day – the most powerful insurrection up to that point took place. The sans-culottes emerged as a more independent political force, seeking ever more radical leadership. Lafayette – now unpopular because of his role in the Champs de Mars massacre – attempted to march on Paris to restore law and order, but his troops deserted him and he fled to join the Austrians. The monarchy was overthrown and the Republic was proclaimed the following month. A National Convention was elected on the basis of adult male suffrage, making the new Republic far more democratic and popular than the ousted constitutional monarchy and its National Assembly.

Meanwhile, France had been at war since April of that year against a coalition of old-regime powers determined to crush the Revolution. The government had appealed to revolutionary internationalism by calling on oppressed people throughout Europe to rise against their monarchs, pledging French armed support. But in the field the ragtag French armies, shorn of their traditional officer corps, seemed no match for the professionally led Austrian and Prussian forces. Before long the revolutionary enthusiasm of free French soldiers fighting in their own interests would begin to turn the tide, but at first the Revolution appeared to be in grave danger of military defeat.

A chest of Louis XVI's correspondence was discovered that proved what had been suspected since his flight to Varennes: the king himself was neck-deep in collaboration with the counter-revolutionary armies invading France. In January 1793 citizen Louis Capet – formerly King Louis XVI – was tried, condemned to death, and guillotined for his treason. The execution of the ex-king stood as a powerful symbol of the irreversibility of the Revolution. It threw down the gauntlet to the counterrevolutionary forces both inside France and throughout Europe. In the following months England, Holland, and Spain joined the war coalition against France, and a major counterrevolutionary revolt erupted in the Vendée in western France.

Birth of the Jacobin Republic

With the Revolution under siege from all sides, class antagonisms intensified apace. The mood of the Parisian people was white-hot with revolutionary fervor. They began to perceive the new republican leaders as too moderate and too conciliatory toward the Revolution's enemies; as a result, the radical Montagnard faction gained in influence within the Convention.

An insurrection erupted in Paris on May 31 and came to a climax two days later when armed sans-culottes and units of the National Guard, some eighty thousand strong and organized in a disciplined manner, surrounded the Convention, blocked its exits, and brought more than a hundred cannons into position. The Girondins, the moderates, were ousted from power and replaced by the Montagnards, led by Maximilien Robespierre, Georges-Jacques Danton, Marat, and other popular left-wingers.

The insurrection of May 31–June 2 cleared the way for the birth of the Jacobin Republic. In mid-1793 the French Revolution entered a critical stage in which the gains of 1789 and 1792 were consolidated and made irreversible. On June 17, 1793 the renewed Convention would pass a crucial law canceling all remaining feudal dues and obligations without compensation.

Onset of the Terror

The revolutionary crisis deepened throughout the summer of 1793 as the counterrevolutionary armies drew closer. On September 5 yet another popular insurrection in Paris brought Robespierre to the head of a much more centralized government and marked the onset of the Terror. The climax of the Great French Revolution was at hand. The radical government, in alliance with the rebellious peasants and the sans-culottes, dealt the final, mortal blows to the aristocracy as a class.

Moralizing conservative historians have labored long to discredit the French Revolution by removing the Terror from its historical context and making violence the essence of the revolutionary process – an obvious object lesson with which to frighten future generations. They portray Robespierre and other members of the Committee of Public Safety as bloodthirsty paranoids who used the guillotine to intimidate the masses and eliminate their factional opponents. But the danger to the Revolution was no paranoid fantasy – its external and internal enemies were numerous and powerful.

The Terror was therefore a justifiable policy necessary to the survival of the Revolution. The need for unity and security, however, led the Jacobin leaders to commit unjustifiable abuses of power. Tens of thousands of people are estimated to have been executed in Paris alone, many of whom were undoubtedly innocent of any counterrevolutionary intent. Most notable in this regard were the large numbers of dissident revolutionaries whom Robespierre and his allies silenced by the guillotine, including Danton, Camille Desmoulins, Jacques-René Hébert, and the “red priest” Jacques Roux. (Roux, who had been the leading figure of the Enragés, an ultraradical plebeian movement, cheated the executioner by taking his own life in prison.)

The dangers of war and counterrevolution pressed the Jacobin government to bring the turbulent mass movement under strict control. In doing so, it suppressed the revolutionary energy of its own political base and sowed the seeds of its own downfall. The persecution and liquidation of popular revolutionary leaders like Hébert and Roux was particularly disorienting and demoralizing.

Law of the Maximum

The Jacobins' difficulties stemmed from the fact that the sans-culottes were not a homogeneous social class, but combined elements with different, and at times opposing, social interests. When bread prices rose to the crisis point, artisans and wage-workers alike hit the streets – and sometimes hanged the baker from the nearest lamppost.

A solution to this problem that included nationalization of production and a planned economy might have appealed to the wage-earning part of the urban crowd but not to its more active small-proprietor part. The Jacobins instead attempted to impose equality of consumption – socialization of distribution rather than of production. To that end, the radical government of 1793 instituted the Law of the Maximum, which fixed price ceilings on necessary commodities – in the first place, bread – and threatened speculators and hoarders with the guillotine. Such policies made production less profitable and inevitably led to a drop in production, growing pressure to raise prices, and an increasing scarcity of goods. The Law of the Maximum, far from solving the problem of bread prices, only exacerbated it.

Radical revolutionaries like Robespierre thus found themselves in a bind. The low level of productive forces in late eighteenth-century France prevented them from transcending the bounds of a capitalist revolution. Because the sans-culottes' demands for social and economic equality were for all practical purposes unrealizable, their demoralization was inevitable.

Thermidor: The Moderates Return to Power

By the middle of 1794 the military tide had turned and the threat from the counterrevolution had eased considerably. With the primary justification for the Terror disappearing, the moderate faction in the Convention was able to isolate and defeat Robespierre and send him and his supporters to the guillotine. Revolutionary organizations called for an insurrection in defense of the Jacobin leaders, but this time the demoralized Parisians failed to respond. The fall of Robespierre, according to the revolutionary calendar, occurred on the 9th of Thermidor; hence the end of the radical phase of the Revolution became known as the Thermidorian reaction, or simply Thermidor.

The conservative historian François Furet has pointed out that participants in and interpreters of the French Revolution can be divided into two groups: '89ers and '93ers. The '89ers are the middle-class revolutionary leaders of 1789 and those who identify with them. Like Furet himself, they believe the Revolution would have been better if it had been more moderate – if its participants had been satisfied with what had been accomplished in 1789 and stopped with that. The '93ers, on the other hand, are the radical Jacobins and their latter-day sympathizers who believe that turning the world upside down in 1793 was necessary to consolidate the Revolution's achievements.

Who “won” the Revolution? The Thermidorian reaction brought the moderates – the '89ers and the remnants of the Girondins – back to the fore. It was their task to begin the process of stabilizing French society on a capitalist basis. In 1799 Napoleon Bonaparte would take over and complete the job.

The '93ers had sought to create an egalitarian democracy of small producers that would combine private property rights with social justice. Although they failed, it was their struggle for that utopian dream that mobilized the urban and rural masses to destroy the old regime, clearing the way for a new society with a modern capitalist economy. The Revolution rid France of a class whose right to rule was based upon aristocratic birth and traditional privilege, but it raised up a new ruling class that staked its claim to social dominance on wealth and wealth alone. The problems of poverty and social inequality remained as intractable as ever. Although the '93ers made the Revolution, in the end it was the '89ers who came out on top.

What Did the French Revolution Achieve?

The tumultuous events of the French Revolution obviously had an immense impact on French and European society during the decade following 1789. But after the dust settled, what had been accomplished? Had a fundamental social transformation occurred or not? Were there any positive and enduring results, and if so, what were they? The traditional answer to these questions has been that the Revolution brought about the historic transformation from medieval feudalism to modern capitalism. But what, exactly, does that mean?

Economic activity – the production of the necessities of life – is the basis of all human culture. Before the Revolution, production was predominantly agricultural, and the producers were almost all peasants. Of France's total population of about 25 million, considerably more than 20 million were peasants. Non-agricultural production included the varied output of urban and rural artisans plus a small textiles industry, a small iron industry, and a small chemical industry producing such things as soap, dyes, and gunpowder. In 1789, however, the Industrial Revolution was still three-quarters of a century in the future for France, so both agriculture and industry were characterized by very small productive units.

Prior to the Revolution agriculture was organized in a manner generally described as feudal, but the term "feudalism" has been applied to a broad variety of social arrangements. Classical feudalism legally bound the serfs to the land and subjected them to the arbitrary rule of local landowners. By the late eighteenth century, classical feudalism had vanished from large parts of Western Europe, although it had been maintained in varying degrees of rigidity in the East. Generally speaking (and ignoring the Iberian peninsula), the farther east one looked in Europe, the harsher the lot of the peasant was – from Austria, through Prussia, to Russia, where serfs were virtual slaves well into the nineteenth century.

In France, however, the face of feudalism had changed considerably by 1789. Only about 5 percent of French peasants were still serfs in the classical sense; the rest were legally free. Almost three-quarters of peasant heads-of-households owned at least some of the land they cultivated, but because their holdings were so small, most also had to work as sharecroppers or tenant farmers on land they did not own. The one-quarter who were completely landless worked as rural laborers. The minority of peasant landowners who owned enough to survive without sharecropping or tenant farming were the furthest removed from classical serfdom. Even these freeholders, however, were far from free in their role as agricultural producers.

Plight of the "Free" Peasant

No one could improve on Alexis de Tocqueville's description of the status of the landowning French peasant in relation to his aristocratic "neighbors" in the pre-Revolutionary era. This peasant, de Tocqueville wrote, is a man so passionately devoted to the soil that he spends all his earnings on buying land, no matter what it costs. To acquire it, he must begin by paying certain dues, not to the government but to other landowners of the neighborhood.

When at long last he has gained possession of this land . . . the neighbors aforesaid put in an appearance, drag him away from his cherished fields, and bid him work elsewhere without payment. When he tries to protect his seedlings from the animals they hunt they tell him to take down his fences, and they lie in wait for him at river crossings to exact a toll.

At the market there they are again, to make him pay for the right of selling the produce of his land, and when on his return home he wants to use the wheat he has put aside for his daily needs, he has to take it to their mill to have it ground, and then to have his bread baked in the lord's oven.

Thus, part of the income from his small domain goes to supporting these men in the form of charges which are imprescriptible and irredeemable. Whatever he sets out to do, he finds these tiresome neighbors barring his path, interfering in his simple pleasures and his work, and consuming the produce of his toil. And when he has done with them, other fine gentlemen dressed in black [tithe collectors] step in and take the greater part of his harvest.

When we remember the special temperament of the French peasant proprietor in the eighteenth century, his ruling interests and passions, and the treatment accorded him, we can well understand the rankling grievances that burst into flame in the French Revolution. (de Tocqueville 1955)

Feudal exactions in money, in kind, and in forced labor continued to define and delimit the economic activities of even these "free" peasants. One can only concur with de Tocqueville's conclusion that "even after it ceased to be a political institution, the feudal system remained basic to the economic organization of France."

The landowning peasants in particular had the glories of capitalist agriculture dangled before their eyes, but their hands were tied by all the encumbrances described by de Tocqueville. Under those conditions, the incentive to improve their land or increase production was limited, since the benefits would go more to their parasitic "neighbors" than to themselves. They could see, however, that if they could get the nobles off their backs – if they could take full advantage of the free market without the burden of feudal dues and taxes – greater crop yields would redound to their own profit. Aristocratic domination of the countryside, then, was the primary obstacle to the further development of agricultural productivity.

Despite their differing conditions, all of the peasants were united in their opposition to the feudal system because all faced the same enemy. The freeholder's "neighbor," the sharecropper's landlord, the agricultural laborer's boss, and the serf's lord were all members of the same aristocratic ruling class. The peasants, in alliance with urban revolutionaries, freed themselves by defeating their common enemy in struggle from 1789 to 1793.

Creating a Modern Working Class

The most far-reaching result of the liberation of the peasantry was not its effect on agriculture but its impact on the production system as a whole. An essential prerequisite for the development of a capitalist economy is the existence of a free labor force – a pool of propertyless people who in order to survive are forced to become wage-workers. As long as the vast majority of the population is unable to leave the land, no such labor force is possible and capitalist development must necessarily be sharply restricted.

As previously noted, the moderate revolutionaries of 1789 ended feudalism as a legal system, but proposed that the peasants compensate the nobles by paying a heavy price for their emancipation. Such an arrangement would have replaced the bonds of feudal law with debt bondage, leaving the peasants tied to the land for a long time, as in Russia following the 1861 emancipation of the serfs. The development of a modern working class would have been severely impeded. That is why the 1793 decree canceling all of the peasants' obligations without compensation was the decisive act of the transformation from feudalism to capitalism. It put a decisive end to feudalistic restrictions on the peasants' mobility, thus transforming them into a potential working class.

Changing the Tariff System

The system of non-agricultural production was in dire need of change as well. Urban manufacturing was hamstrung by royal monopolies, internal tariffs, the guild system, and the lack of a uniform system of weights and measures.

The internal tariffs were economic obstacles in a very literal sense. The most notorious case involved a wall built around Paris to prevent smugglers from avoiding certain tariffs. Although smuggling was a capital offense, the death penalty was apparently an insufficient deterrent; it has been estimated that before the wall was built about 20 percent of the goods entering Paris entered as contraband.

A great deal of money was spent constructing impressive buildings along the wall to serve as customs posts. The project became a focus of popular odium. The customs posts were perceived as fortresses for the oppression of the people, and the tariffs were resented because they added appreciably to the cost of food and wine entering the city. During the insurrectionary days of July 1789 the Parisian sans-culottes systematically demolished 40 of the 54 customs posts.

The internal tariff system was much more than a physical wall around Paris, however; it formed economic walls separating all of the provinces of France from each other. To sell a commodity more than a few miles from where it was made meant crossing a tariff barrier and paying a fee. It also meant paying exorbitant tolls for transportation on roads and rivers. The farther a manufacturer or merchant tried to extend the market for his product, the more tariffs and tolls he would encounter. This system prevented the development of even regional, let alone national, markets and set sharp limits to economic growth and development.

In addition to these restrictions on commerce, the guild system directly hampered production by forcing artisans to pay heavy fees for the privilege of plying their trades. In 1776 Jacques Turgot, Louis XVI's finance minister, tried to introduce reforms that would abolish these "arbitrary institutions" that "stifle industry." Turgot issued an edict stating that "by means of the inordinate expenses artisans are compelled to incur in order to acquire the liberty of labor, by the exactions of all kinds they must endure, by the multiplied penalties for so-called offenses," the guilds "surcharge industry with an enormous tax" and "give rise to schemes whose effect is to increase beyond all natural proportion the price of commodities which are most necessary for the subsistence of the people." Turgot's diagnosis of the problem was accurate, but his reforming efforts were to no avail; they led only to his removal from office.

Turgot was but one of many would-be reformers who failed. It took the dynamite blast of the Revolution to dislodge the entrenched interests defending the status quo. By February 1791 the National Assembly had introduced a uniform system of weights and measures, abolished the internal tariffs, eliminated private tolls on roads and rivers, and suppressed the guilds.

The Yuppie Problem

Another critical social problem in pre-revolutionary France affected the “yuppies,” the young urban professionals. In spite of all the handicaps placed upon trade and production, capitalist wealth had continued to expand during the eighteenth century, primarily on the basis of international commerce. The distortion of the economy and the social restrictions of the old regime combined to generate a layer of educated youth with limited prospects for employment. Some found occupations as lawyers, doctors, teachers, writers, or scientists, but many more remained on the fringes of the professions.

Success for a yuppie often depended upon finding noble patronage. The prestigious positions at the top of the professions – especially in politics, law, and the military – were reserved for nobles. As a result, the members of the marginalized intelligentsia became the most vocal proponents of the democratic revolution, raising the powerful slogan “Open careers to talent!” Representatives of this social layer – including Brissot, Marat, Danton, and Robespierre – predominated in the leadership of the Revolution from 1789 forward.

And, in fact, the democratic aspects of the Revolution very quickly answered to the career interests of the young professionals. Freedom of the press stimulated employment in publishing and journalism, equality before the law and the extension of the legal system required an increase in the number of lawyers and judges, and vast opportunities in politics and administration were created with the birth of a parliamentary government. Most importantly, the Revolution succeeded in “opening careers to talent” by breaking the social dominance of the nobility.

In summary, these were the primary accomplishments of the French Revolution: The peasants were liberated from feudal exactions, the guilds and internal tariffs were swept away, and careers were opened to talent. Furthermore, the extensive landholdings of the Church were expropriated, and the very definition of “property” was profoundly transformed.

Good for Business

All of these measures created a relatively free-market economic environment that was good for business. The principal long-term beneficiaries of the Revolution were the business class: entrepreneurs, manufacturers, merchants, and bankers. The new society was geared to serving their class interests rather than those of the landed aristocracy.

That is not to say that a full-blown capitalist economy immediately sprang into existence in France. The destruction of internal tariff barriers, for example, created the possibility of a unified national market, but the actual development of the national market would have to wait almost a century until railroads were able to connect all parts of France.

Likewise, the loosening of the traditional ties holding the peasants on the land provided a potential source of urban industrial workers, but the actual conversion of peasants into proletarians was a lengthy process. Paradoxically, the sale of nationalized Church and émigré lands tended to retard that movement by strengthening the position of the rural smallholders. But again, regardless of the pace of capitalist growth after the Revolution, the Revolution was the indispensable action that cleared the way for capitalist development.

A Contradictory Democratic Legacy

Although the socioeconomic transformation was the essential achievement of the Revolution, that was not its only important legacy. At the time of the 1989 bicentennial celebrations, most commentators paid more attention to the Revolution’s democratic features as symbolized by the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen.

The old regime had been founded on the principle of natural inequality: that some people were by birth superior to others and thereby entitled to special privileges. The Revolution produced a social order based on the opposite premise of human equality. From this premise were derived the rights to equality before the law, representative government, and guarantees of civil liberties.

The importance of the democratic legacy of the French Revolution to the cause of human progress cannot be overstated. But those who focus solely on the democratic achievements are seeing only the surface of events and missing the underlying dynamic, as the Napoleonic experience illustrates. The export of the French Revolution to the rest of Western Europe began before Bonaparte came on the scene. Sister republics were created in Holland, Switzerland, Northern Italy, Naples, and the Papal States by means of revolutionary action led by local “Jacobins” with the crucial support of French arms. Thus was the social transformation of Western Europe initiated, later to be consolidated and extended by the Napoleonic wars.

Bonaparte, however, was anything but a democrat. He did away with the sister republics and converted them into kingdoms ruled by his brothers (as well as other relatives and assorted sidekicks). By naming his brother Jerome as King of Westphalia, his brother Louis as King of Holland, and his brother Joseph as King of Naples (and later Spain), he intended to create a new royal dynasty to rule Europe long into the future. At home he scrapped the French Republic, had himself crowned Emperor, and even created a new titled nobility.

Nonetheless, the Napoleonic system differed in key respects from traditional monarchies. For one thing, the titles of his newly created nobility were not based on birthright or landownership but on merit: military, administrative, or scientific “talent.” It is also significant that this aristocracy was only about one-seventh the size of the old Bourbon nobility. Secondly, he imposed on the territories he conquered a unified body of law, the Napoleonic Code, based on the principle of equality before the law, which is the negation of legal aristocratic privilege.

But most importantly, he exported the revolution in property relations to those areas he controlled. The essence of the Napoleonic Code was the principle of private-property rights, which supplanted the old-regime system based on birthright and the feudal system of production. In 1807 Napoleon sent a constitution for Jerome to impose on the newly created Kingdom of Westphalia. The main point, he wrote to his brother, was “that every trace of serfdom, or of a feudal hierarchy between the sovereign and the lowest class of his subjects, shall be done away with.”

Bonaparte’s armies, in short, reproduced throughout Western Europe that new social order that was good for business. Again, Bonaparte’s regime did not create capitalism out of nothing, nor did it produce fully developed capitalist economies, but it did liberate peasants and clear away obstacles to the future development of capitalism.

Spread of a New Social System

The spread of the dynamic new social system extended beyond the bounds of Bonaparte’s conquests. After his victory over Prussia at Jena in 1806, he directly abolished serfdom in territories wrested from Prussian control. But Prussia itself, which was defeated but not conquered or occupied, also experienced a social transformation. The Prussian Reform Movement came to power and abolished serfdom throughout its remaining territories. The French Revolution had created a new Europe, and Prussia was forced to modernize or cease to exist as a sovereign state.

What Bonaparte’s armies carried with them of the French Revolution was not democracy or republicanism, but the social relations that characterize the capitalist economic system. That was the essential legacy of the French Revolution to human progress. Parliamentary democracy and stable republics were far in the future for most of Western Europe.

After Bonaparte’s final defeat at Waterloo in 1815, the Bourbon monarchy was reimposed on France, and the Metternich era of reaction descended upon Europe. But for all the superficial, symbolic reversals, the essential achievements of the Revolution survived, both inside and outside France. Some of the French aristocratic families got some compensation – hush money, really – but they never got their lands back. Nowhere were freed serfs returned to serfdom; nowhere were the results of the peasant rebellion undone. (These generalizations must be qualified with regard to two countries – Poland and Spain – where the incipient capitalist “middle class” was relatively small and weak. In Poland, Bonaparte had emancipated the serfs but was unable to liquidate the aristocracy, so de facto feudal relations persisted. Spain was the only country where Napoleonic reforms were actually reversed after the final defeat of the Napoleonic empire.)

Fifteen years of Bourbon restoration in France vanished with hardly a trace in 1830 as a relatively small insurrection dispatched the Bourbons once and for all and allowed Louis Philippe, widely known as "the bourgeois king," to come to the throne. Louis Philippe immediately displayed a partiality toward the great magnates of finance capital. Although he appeared to be their royal patron, the opposite was the case: it was they who had put him on the throne.

The spirit of the times can be appreciated by looking at Daumier's prints and reading Balzac's novels. Balzac's Père Goriot, for example, illustrates that during the Bourbon restoration the trappings of aristocracy were highly prestigious, but money nonetheless was what made the world go round. The essential transformation wrought by the French Revolution proved to be irreversible.

French Revolution, historians' interpretations

Soma Marik

As one of the great turning points in modern history, the French Revolution has naturally been the focus of immense historiographical examination and debate. Conflicting interpretations have reflected the opposing political and ideological standpoints of the historians who have studied it. For more than the last hundred years the primary conflict has been between Marxist and non-Marxist (or anti-Marxist) interpretations. The first major historical account of the French Revolution to be inspired by Karl Marx's philosophy of history was a multi-volume work published by Jean Jaurès between 1901 and 1904. Jaurès's Socialist History of the French Revolution was an early example of "history from the bottom up," highlighting the role of the masses instead of elite maneuvering.

Radical interpretations of the Revolution were further stimulated by two eminent academicians, Alphonse Aulard and his student Albert Mathiez. Their analyses were not identical – Aulard portrayed Danton as the hero of the Revolution, while Mathiez exalted Robespierre. But although both Aulard and Mathiez demonstrated extraordinary mastery of the historical sources, their tendency to lionize a personal hero often made their work unconvincing to others. Following the path opened by Jaurès, major studies of popular participation in the Revolution were produced by Georges Lefebvre and Albert Soboul, both of whom also looked to Marx for inspiration.

The first salvo in the great ideological war against the French Revolution had been launched in 1790 by the English conservative Edmund Burke. His Reflections on the Revolution in France assailed radical social change and lauded tradition as the tried-and-true basis of social policy. The extreme elitism of his position, however, was revealed in an infelicitous reference to the majority of the population as “the swinish multitude.” Dozens of radical pamphleteers in England challenged Burke’s manifesto, but by far the most influential response was Thomas Paine’s The Rights of Man. Paine, who had earlier distinguished himself as a major participant in the American Revolution, found himself the ideological leader of a powerful radical movement in England. He then moved on to France and was soon at the center of revolutionary events there as well.

Another direct participant in the French Revolution who attempted to interpret it as a historian was Antoine Barnave, whose 1792 work Introduction to the French Revolution initiated the important idea that what had just transpired in France was a bourgeois revolution – that is, a socioeconomic transformation led by men of new property. Barnave explained that during the eighteenth century artisan production and commerce had “succeeded in penetrating the people and created a new means to wealth” to such a degree that “all was ready for a revolution in political laws; a new distribution of wealth produced a new distribution of power.” Although this line of interpretation was later to be condemned by conservative historians as a Marxist precept, it was not at all controversial in the first half of the nineteenth century; at that time liberal historians simply took it for granted.

Barnave’s notion of the bourgeois revolution placed blame on the aristocratic class – feudal nobles who possessed the land and ancient privileges – for retarding the social progress of the nation. The rising bourgeois class, by contrast, was credited with advancing personal liberty, political equality, and industrial development. Karl Marx obviously did not initiate this idea, but he adopted it as the basis of his own interpretation of the Revolution. For Marx, however, the formal democracy and equality before the law produced by the Revolution were not ultimate goals, but were important steps along the way toward the final emancipation of humankind.

Georges Lefebvre was the most important of the historians to follow Marx’s lead. Lefebvre held the chair of the History of the French Revolution at the Sorbonne, the institutional reflection of his stature as the leading interpreter of the great event. His masterful weaving together of all the disparate strands of social history, known as the “Lefebvre synthesis,” became the standard account of the Revolution. After his death in 1960 his chair at the Sorbonne was occupied by Albert Soboul, a prominent intellectual spokesman for the French Communist Party.

Lefebvre backed his analysis with a series of studies. He was able to demonstrate the existence of an autonomous peasant revolution that was not simply an adjunct of the urban struggle against the monarchy. His studies of the role of the urban poor, the sans-culottes, encouraged other historians to follow suit, resulting in important works by Soboul, Daniel Guérin, and George Rudé.

The Revisionist Challenge

Throughout the first half of the twentieth century the Marxist interpretation of the French Revolution went virtually unanswered. In the 1950s, however, a “revisionist” current arose that called some of the fundamental Marxist assumptions into question. The revisionist challenge was initiated by Alfred Cobban’s The Social Interpretation of the French Revolution, which argued that the bourgeoisie could not be considered revolutionary, and even if it could, no clear line could be drawn between the nobility and the bourgeoisie. Although Cobban was able to identify what appeared at first glance to be flaws in the Lefebvre synthesis, he did not attempt to present an alternative picture that could replace it.

Stronger challenges were to follow. Although the revisionist school originated in the English-speaking world, it eventually gained a following in France as well. The most prominent among the French revisionists was François Furet, a former member of the French Communist Party who had succumbed to the anti-communism of the Cold War era. Furet argued that the Revolution was not a historical necessity. The problems that sparked it, he maintained, could and should have been resolved by a compromise between the monarchy and the bourgeoisie. That possibility had been dashed, however, by the ultraradical Jacobin dictatorship, which represented what Furet saw as an unfortunate deviation from the orderly revolutionary settlement.

The Cold War climate ensured the increasing popularity of the challenge to Marxist-influenced historiography in the 1970s and 1980s. With the end of the Cold War, the revisionists' emphasis shifted from anti-communism to postmodernism. Rather than singling out Marxist interpretations of the Revolution, they claimed to reject all grand historical syntheses or "metanarratives," including Marxism, that offer broad explanations of the course of history. That has put them in a rather ambiguous position. Although most recent books on the French Revolution reflect the revisionists' outlook, they cannot be said to have triumphed over the Lefebvre synthesis, because they have been unwilling to offer a new synthesis of their own to take its place. For those historians who reject the postmodernist premise and remain committed to the proposition that there is meaning and lawfulness in history, the Lefebvre synthesis has retained its potency.

The core of the revisionist case can be summarized in a few sentences: The Revolution was not a bourgeois revolution. It neither destroyed feudal political structures nor paved the way for the development of capitalism. The class struggle played little role in the Revolution. Many of the individuals who were at the top of the social ladder before the Revolution were still on top after it. The nobility and bourgeoisie were part of a single ruling elite of "notables," primarily made up of landowners, with no fundamental social conflict within it. Indeed, all of the elite were in favor of reform, and if only people had been more sensible and patient, political reform was possible without social upheaval.

Guy Chaussinand-Nogaret went so far as to argue that it was the nobility, not the bourgeoisie, that was in the vanguard of change. The Revolution is thus reduced to merely a squabble among sub-elites that is not rooted in any social base but is fueled (as Furet puts it) by the "autonomous political and ideological dynamic" of the struggle itself. According to Nogaret, the nobility exercised cultural hegemony and generously held out a cooperative hand to those members of the bourgeoisie wishing to enter France's social elite. The Revolution's destruction of the nobility was therefore unjust, irrational, and inhuman; Nogaret likens it to anti-Semitic pogroms.

Furet brushes aside the Parisians' great fear of counterrevolution as nothing more than mass plot psychosis, and depicts the repression of counterrevolution not as class conflict but as genocide. This focus accords well with his refusal to see the Revolution as having anything to do with the underlying social conditions of the mass of people: "What matters is not poverty or oppression," Furet insists. By ignoring the French Revolution's social dimensions, neither Furet nor his British co-thinker Simon Schama can make sense of the Terror except by viewing it as either utopian-inspired violence or as the inevitable consequence of any revolution. That leads them to contest not only the question of the nature of the bourgeoisie, but also the meaning of the Reign of Terror, the role of the sans-culottes, why the Girondins and Jacobins split, and the nature of the peasantry and of the counterrevolution.

Some other historians simply turn away from the central issues of the Revolution altogether, focusing instead on cultural or superficial political matters. Lynn Hunt, for example, concentrates on what she identifies as a new type of politics introduced by the Revolution. She discusses the "invention" of ideology, and the institution of a political culture of democratic republicanism, bypassing the classic debates over the class struggle and the Revolution's causes and consequences. Another postmodernist strategy has been to explicitly deny the possibility of meaningfulness in history. The well-researched works of Richard Cobb are valuable for the wealth of information they assemble and present, but Cobb steadfastly resists drawing any conclusions as to the meaning of the Revolution.

An Assessment of the Debate

Historical evidence casts grave doubt on the revisionists' argument that reforms would have sufficed if only the revolutionaries had shown better sense, or had been less suspicious of their real or supposed opponents. The researches of John Markoff and P. M. Jones on the peasantry demonstrate that the kind of reforms the peasants wanted threatened the very existence of the rural nobles. What the peasants wanted is not unknown; studies of cahiers (lists of grievances) reveal that in a number of cases when general cahiers from a locality omitted peasant demands, the peasants drew up separate cahiers of their own.

Between December 1788 and March 1790 virtually every part of France saw collective peasant violence or at least insubordination. In response the nobles offered a compromise granting limited rights to the peasants while preserving most of the landed property for themselves. The compromise was rejected and peasant radicalism remained a central aspect of all the party conflicts in the three great assemblies of the Revolution.

The idea that mindless violence caused by a false sense of insecurity, or by an allegedly "natural" inclination toward terrorism ingrained in the common people, can explain the bloodshed in the Revolution is equally dubious. David Andress's study of the Terror, for example, demonstrates the reality of the aristocratic counterrevolutionary threats. The nobility was unwilling to accept the Revolution even in its early, relatively moderate, phases. The revolutionaries were therefore compelled to defend their Revolution, making its deepening radicalization inevitable.

Two well-known incidents shed light on the reasons why the revolutionaries had recourse to violence. The execution of the governor of the Bastille in July 1789 has been repeatedly decried, ignoring the fact that the governor's troops had just killed a hundred Parisians. And just before the infamous September Massacres of 1792, the Royalist press in Paris published lists of revolutionary "patriots" who were to be executed when the monarchy regained power. But on a grander scale, the greatest source of violence that compelled the revolutionaries to answer in kind were the wars of intervention launched by the European old order in an effort to snuff out the Revolution.

The revisionists' contention that feudalism had disappeared in France long before 1789 is based on a legalistic definition of feudalism. The fiefs that formed the original basis of the feudal order had indeed ceased to exist many centuries earlier. An estimated 95 percent of the French peasants were not serfs. Nonetheless, the peasants continued to be bound to the land by legal and economic restrictions that had survived from the feudal system. The revisionists insist that this should be called "seigniorialism" rather than "feudalism," but this is mere wordplay rather than serious historical analysis.

The revisionists' most effective arguments target a weakness in the Stalinist-inspired caricature of Marxism that influenced Lefebvre

(and even more so, Soboul) – its tendency toward mechanical, deterministic, and teleological explanations. Sometimes the Marxist historians leave the impression that all was preordained – that history inevitably marched toward progress, and that at just the right moment a revolutionary bourgeoisie with a clear consciousness of its class goals sprang up to seize power. Not enough attention is devoted to conscious human intervention in making history, or to how revolutionary crises transform consciousness. But Lefebvre, Rudé, and Soboul were too sophisticated as historians to allow Stalinist determinism to completely undermine their analyses. Together with the anti-Stalinist Marxist Daniel Guérin, their writings continue to provide the only fully developed explanation of the dynamics of the Revolution, together with a narrative that presents it from the perspective of the toiling people.

The revisionists deny the existence of the class struggle by demanding to be shown precisely demarcated lines between social classes and by demanding evidence that the wealthiest capitalists were the staunchest supporters of the Revolution. That neither of these demands can be met does not, however, mean that there were not opposing social classes locked in mortal combat, or that the rising capitalist class as a whole did not back the Revolution. The line between the classes was blurred, especially at the top, with some capitalists making money through land, and some nobles becoming involved in trade. But it is ironic that revisionist historians who complain about Marxist oversimplification themselves end up presenting a simplified, caricature version of classes, ignoring the real complexities.

Nor is the apparent contradiction in the fact that the wealthiest of the French capitalists did not enthusiastically greet the Revolution difficult to resolve. As financiers to the monarchy, they were tied to the old regime by strong bonds of self-interest. The revisionist method is to identify such exceptional groups and use them to deny the validity of the general proposition that capitalist interests provided the underlying motive for the Revolution.

The class analysis of the lower rungs of the French social ladder – the sans-culottes, the menu peuple, the bras nus – has also been a matter of historical dispute. Using contemporary documents, Guérin, Soboul, and Rudé all examined the urban masses and exploded the myth that they were a “mob” of down-and-out gutter-dwellers, as the conservative historian Hippolyte Taine portrayed them. Rudé analyzed police records of those arrested during demonstrations and insurrections – presumably the most militant of the participants – to prove that the “crowd,” as he called them, was not a lumpen mob, but poor working people with fixed places of residence and steady occupations. Rudé’s work established that the Parisian menu peuple exhibited an autonomous rationality, and represented a popular radical politics within the broad framework of a bourgeois revolution. Guerin’s study emphasized, in addition, that the sans-culottes included within their ranks the Parisian working class of the period. Strikes, wage demands, and similar conflicts gave evidence of class struggle within the bourgeois republic. Guerin has been accused of anachronistically reading the twentieth century back into the eighteenth, but in fact, he was pointing out the autonomy of the lower classes and questioning the easy assumption about a firm bourgeois hegemony over the entire third estate.

The debates among historians are echoes of the passionate emotions unleashed by the French Revolution that more than two centuries have not sufficed to completely erode. Anyone seeking to understand the meaning of the French Revolution will not find what they are looking for in the works of the revisionist or postmodernist authors. It is in the comprehensive picture of the French Revolution developed by such historians as Jaurès, Lefebvre, Soboul, Mathiez, Rudé, and Guerin that the legacy of the monumental event has been preserved and defended.

French Revolution, radical factions and organizations

Soma Marik

The French Revolution was driven forward by a series of powerful insurrections in Paris between 1789 and 1794. Those massive explosions of political discontent were by no means unplanned, spur-of-the-moment affairs. A great deal of organization was necessary to give them shape and focus. The political organizations that could mobilize the power of the sans-culottes, call them into the streets, and give them political direction were essential to the revolutionary process.

In 1789 when the power of the French monarchy began to crumble, the people of Paris spontaneously exercised the right of free association by forming political groupings of their own choosing. The best known of these was the Jacobin Club, which has become virtually synonymous with organized radicalism in the French Revolution. A few of the other political groupings that rose to prominence during the Revolution were the Cordeliers, Feuillants, Girondins, Montagnards, Enragés, Dantonists, and Hebertists. These were not cadre or political parties in the modern sense, but organizations, factions, or tendencies that took on some of the key functions of political parties. Trying to place them on a spectrum ranging from counter-revolutionary to ultra-revolutionary would be a waste of time, because the rapidly radicalizing political context in which they operated meant that a group could quickly move from one end of the spectrum to the other.

Jacobins, Cordeliers, and Feuillants

When deputies to the Estates General met in mid-1789 to transform themselves into the National Constituent Assembly, a left wing formed among them. The left-leaning deputies, many of whom were from Brittany, formed a loose association called the Breton Club. In the early stage of its existence, it consisted of about 205 of the delegates to the Constituent Assembly at Versailles. In October 1789, as the result of a massive insurrectionary movement in Paris, the seat of government was relocated from Versailles to Paris. Soon thereafter, in December, the Breton Club was reorganized as the Society of the Friends of the Constitution. Because it held its meetings in a former Jacobin monastery, it became widely known as the Jacobin Club.

The Jacobin Club transformed itself into a more general political organization by ceasing to restrict its membership to Assembly delegates. Its membership fees were high, however, which tended to exclude the less affluent. A more democratic alternative appeared in the form of the Society of the Friends of the Rights of Man and Citizen, which was far less expensive to join, and which accepted women into membership. This group also took its popular name, the Cordeliers Club, from the monastic order that had formerly owned the place in which its meetings were held. Due to its less elite social composition, the Cordeliers were at that time more radical than the relatively moderate Jacobins. No sharp line divided the two groups, however; many of the Jacobins' members also joined the Cordeliers. A young lawyer, Georges Jacques Danton, and a young journalist, Camille Desmoulins, emerged as the Cordeliers' foremost spokesmen. By the middle of 1790 the Cordeliers were in the vanguard of a movement to set up patriotic societies in every Parisian section, incorporating articulate members from among the disenfranchised, a major step in the process of rapidly spreading political organization.

In the summer of 1791 a political confrontation developed when the majority of the Constituent Assembly moved to establish two unequal categories of citizenship, active and passive. A massive protest campaign opposed the move. The Constituent Assembly, feeling threatened by this expression of direct democracy, adopted decrees restricting the freedom of action of the popular political societies and the elected councils in each of the Parisian sections. Radical democrats within the Assembly, led by Maximilien Robespierre and Jérôme Pétion, opposed the decrees, but they passed anyway.

The crisis deepened after the king and his family were caught, on June 20, attempting to flee Paris to join with counterrevolutionary forces militarily threatening the Revolution. The Cordeliers Club agitated for the ouster of the king, and a left-wing faction within the Jacobin Club led by Robespierre concurred. By this time the Jacobins had achieved national scope with some 900 affiliates throughout France. Most of its members in Paris, however, were adamantly opposed to overthrowing the king, so the organization split, with the less radical majority leaving to form a rival political group, the Feuillants Club. (Once again, the name was taken from a monastic order whose former premises the club occupied.) Although the split caused the Jacobins to suffer a significant drop in membership (from about 2,400 to 1,200) and a temporary loss of influence as the vast majority of its parliamentary deputies left, it also changed the club's political character by bringing the left-wing faction, and especially Robespierre, to the fore.

The Feuillants represented a wing of the original supporters of the Revolution who believed the Revolution had gone far enough and wanted to see a return to normalcy in the form of a stable constitutional monarchy. The Cordeliers and Jacobins, however, felt the Revolution had not gone nearly far enough in the direction of democratizing French society, and that Louis XVI was an obstacle that had to be removed. On July 17, 1791, the Cordeliers held a mass demonstration of tens of thousands at the Champ de Mars to demand the king's ouster. Defenders of the constitutional monarchy, however, still held the main positions of power, and they called out the National Guard to suppress the demonstration. National Guardsmen under General Lafayette's command opened fire against unarmed demonstrators, killing dozens. The Champ de Mars massacre thus drew a line of blood between the radicals who remained committed to extending the Revolution and the moderates who were resisting it.

The issue of counterrevolution had been posed in a new way. Now the threat came not only from royalists and aristocrats, but also from those who had thought of themselves and presented themselves as moderate revolutionaries. In October, a newly elected Legislative Assembly took up where the National Assembly had left off. At this juncture a new political grouping, the Girondins, came onto the scene.

Jacobins and Girondins

The loosely knit faction of radical deputies to the Assembly that came to be known as the Girondins was at first called the Brissotins, after their best-known leader, Jacques Pierre Brissot. The hard core of this faction's deputies numbered about 50 or 60, but they generally controlled between 130 and 200 votes. Because many of their most influential members (though not Brissot himself) represented the Gironde area of France, the name "Girondins" was later attached to them.

The political turmoil and the constant threat of external military invasion produced a paradoxical political situation in which both left-wing and right-wing extremists were agitating for the same thing: for France to declare preemptive war on Prussia and Austria. The royalists and their new Feuillant allies were in favor of war because they were confident that the ragtag forces of revolutionary France would be no match for the professionally trained and led Prussian and Austrian armies. The Revolution would thus be militarily crushed.

Brissot and the Girondins, on the other hand, were using an ultra-radical rationale to beat the drums for war. The French revolutionary armies were not only capable of defending French territory, they declared, but could mount a great international crusade of liberation to extend the Revolution throughout Europe. Everywhere they went, the French forces would find rebellious patriots rising up to greet them and join them in overthrowing feudalism and autocracy. It was an intoxicating idea with great appeal for the revolutionary-minded people of Paris, so it is not surprising that the Girondins were able to attract overwhelming support for it. They should have been more suspicious, however, when the king appointed them, rather than Feuillant politicians, to ministerial positions so they could implement their war program.

Almost all of the revolutionary-minded opinion leaders of the day supported the Girondins' call to war, but there were some important exceptions. Neither Robespierre, still the most influential Jacobin leader, nor Jean-Paul Marat, the most influential radical journalist in Paris, was caught up in the war mania. Instead they warned that the royalists were trying to draw them into a trap that would end in the bloody defeat of the Revolution. To the idea that the peoples of other countries would welcome the French armies as liberators, Robespierre responded with a famous line that "armed missionaries" were never welcomed abroad. And, both Marat and Robespierre presciently warned, even if the French armies could somehow pull off a victory, their generals would be emboldened to try to impose a military dictatorship on the Revolution.

The Girondins prevailed and in April 1792 France declared war. A coalition comprising Austria, Prussia, and the French émigré nobles repulsed a French offensive and soon invaded French territory. The Assembly called for a levy of 100,000 military volunteers, but the king vetoed the decree. At that point the Girondins made a left turn and attacked the king. As Prussian forces drove toward Paris, their commander, the Duke of Brunswick, committed a fatal public relations blunder by issuing a manifesto promising to burn Paris to the ground and massacre its inhabitants if any harm were to befall the royal family. The Brunswick Manifesto was intended to intimidate the Parisians, but it had the opposite effect. The reinvigorated mass movement launched a great insurrection in Paris on August 10 that resulted in the decisive end of the monarchy and the birth of the Republic. The Legislative Assembly of the constitutional monarchy was to be replaced by a more democratically representative body, the National Convention.

Jacobins, Girondins, and Montagnards

The National Convention provided the stage for the next great political battle of the Revolution. The combatants were rival factions within the Convention, with the Girondins on one side and a coalition of left-wing delegates, the Montagnards, on the other. The Montagnards (or “men of the mountain,” because they occupied the highest tier of seats and loomed above the other delegates) were mostly Jacobins and Cordeliers who looked to Robespierre and Danton for leadership. As the hostility between Girondins and Montagnards heated up, the battle lines became ever more clear. Brissot, despite his ferocious rivalry with Robespierre, had remained a member of the Jacobin Club, but in October 1792 the Jacobins expelled him. Meanwhile, Marat, who had previously presented himself as an independent radical standing aloof from factionalism, became ever more closely identified with the Jacobin leadership.

The Girondins’ great military crusade of liberation proved to be the disaster Robespierre and Marat had predicted. On August 19 the enemy armies crossed the frontiers of northern France and on September 2 the fortress of Verdun fell into their hands, giving the invaders an apparently clear path to Paris. The monarchist press had been issuing bloodcurdling threats, publishing lists of revolutionaries to be executed once the counterrevolution was victorious. Thirty thousand Parisian militants had volunteered to go to the front to fight the invaders, but a fear arose among them that their departure might leave Paris defenseless against its internal enemies who, although currently imprisoned, remained a formidable threat. If the counterrevolutionaries were to gain the upper hand, they would open the prisons and the freed royalists would massacre the families that the volunteers were leaving behind in Paris. As a result, many of the militant revolutionaries decided to make a preemptive strike on the prisons and mete out summary justice. Most of the prisons were broken into, and makeshift tribunals heard the cases of the prisoners. Between 1,100 and 1,400 were executed, and a similar number were freed. These “September massacres” greatly exacerbated the conflict between the Girondins, who decried them as mindless mob violence, and the Montagnards, who tended to justify them (although not taking direct responsibility for them).

The struggle between the two factions reached crisis proportions in the dispute over the fate of Louis XVI. When the former king was put on trial for treason his guilt was not in question, but whether he should be put to death or not was hotly contested. The Girondins were hesitant, given the political climate, to appear as defenders of the monarch, so rather than overtly arguing that his life be spared, they demanded that the question be decided by a popular referendum. When the Convention voted, the ex-king was unanimously found guilty (673 to 0) and the proposal for a referendum was defeated (424 to 283). The former monarch was guillotined on January 21, 1793, signifying an irreconcilable rupture with the old order.

The next flashpoint occurred on April 5, when a leading general with close ties to the Girondins, Dumouriez, defected at the front and went over to the enemy forces threatening Paris. That supreme act of treachery sealed the alliance between the Montagnards and the radical Parisian populace, the sans-culottes. The Girondins made efforts to raise the provinces against Paris, but they failed. The overthrow of the Girondins was accomplished by an immense insurrection that shook Paris from May 31 through June 2, 1793. The Girondin leaders were arrested, imprisoned until October when they were put on trial, and executed on October 31.

Sans-Culottes*, Montagnards, and Enragés

Through all of this the bond between the Montagnards and the sans-culottes had grown strong but far from absolute. The sans-culottes were not a homogeneous social class but contained within itself serious conflicts of material interest. The Montagnards tended to support the interests of the better-off layers – the master artisans, shopkeepers, and small manufacturers – as opposed to the more numerous wage-workers, laborers, and urban poor. The rapidly rising prices of basic necessities led the Parisian poor to demand strict state control of prices, to be enforced by harsh measures against hoarders and speculators, and terror against the aristocracy.

Meanwhile, a loosely organized group of radical democrats, including Jean Varlet, Théophile

Leclerc, Jacques Roux, and two radical feminists, Claire Lacombe and Pauline Léon, had given birth to a movement independent of the Montagnards and Jacobins that put forward social demands corresponding to the needs of the sans-culottes. The extremism of their demands and their demeanor prompted their opponents to call them enragés – madmen – but the name stuck and they bore it with pride. The Enragés were revolutionary activists who emerged in 1792–3 from the popular society movement of the earlier years.

The differences between the Enragés and the main body of the Montagnards, led by Robespierre, were clear. When, early in 1793, the sans-culottes repeatedly demanded the imposition of price controls, they were rebuffed and eventually denounced by the Montagnards. Roux and Leclerc preached a doctrine very different from the economic liberalism of the Montagnards. They demanded the death penalty for speculation and usury, and argued that property was a trust, and that the land belonged to the nation. Robespierre perceived these men and women as dangerous because they expressed the deepest egalitarian instincts of the sans-culottes.

Before the fall of the Girondins, in March 1793 Varlet and his allies created a Central Assembly of Public Safety, which challenged the authority of the central government and thus resulted in competing centers of power in Paris. The Girondins were bitterly opposed to the Enragés, and most of the Montagnards were only lukewarm toward them.

When the Girondins were removed from the scene, the Enragés stepped up their demands for economic justice and direct democracy. The Montagnards resisted, citing the war emergency and arguing that the need for unity in the face of powerful enemies required a strong central government. From that point forward, the struggle of the Montagnards to control the popular movement would become increasingly tense.

Hebertists, Dantonists, and Thermidorians

As long as the Girondins had posed a mortal threat on their right, the Montagnards needed the mobilizations of the Parisian poor as a counterbalance on the left. But the fall of the Girondins allowed the Montagnards to turn their attention to fighting challengers from their left, namely the Enragés. A left wing within the Montagnards led by Jacques Hebert emerged to rival the Enragés for the allegiance of the Parisian poor. But while adopting the Enragés' program, Hebert joined the other Montagnards in attacking the Enragés' leaders.

Another major insurrection in Paris on September 5 pressured the Convention into introducing price controls (the Law of the General Maximum) and making Terror the "order of the day." But the partial adoption of the sans-culottes' social program was accompanied by the swift suppression of their independent leaders. Varlet and Roux were arrested; the latter committed suicide in prison. Leclerc disappeared to the front. The independent organization of sans-jupons (female sans-culottes) founded by Léon and Lacombe, the Society of Revolutionary Republican Women, was hounded by the Jacobins until it was formally abolished in October. The demise of the sans-culottes' independent organizations greatly diminished their political influence.

With both the Girondins and the Enragés removed from the scene, the Jacobins no longer faced organized external opposition. But the political struggle between moderates, radicals, and ultra-radicals soon reproduced itself within the Jacobin party. The Cordeliers Club and other political organizations continued to exist, but the Jacobin Club had become the predominant theater of political action. Hebert's faction, known as the Hebertists, denounced the centralization of power by the Committee of Public Safety and demanded that the democratic provisions of the new "Constitution of the Year II" produced by the Convention be immediately implemented. Robespierre and his supporters denounced the Hebertists' demands as impractical – and virtually treasonous – at a time when the Revolution was struggling for its very survival in the face of civil war and foreign invasion. The threats Robespierre cited were certainly genuine and his arguments were sufficiently compelling to allow him to maintain control of the reins of power. The Constitution of the Year II had been officially suspended until the coming of peace and emergency government by the Committee of Public Safety was for the moment secure.

Meanwhile, a relatively moderate faction led by Danton – the "Indulgents" – also chafed at the emergency measures of the Terror and called for peace negotiations with the enemy powers. When the Hebertists and the Indulgents clashed at the Jacobin Club, Robespierre intervened on the side of the latter, leading Danton to form a bloc with Robespierre to isolate Hebert and his co-thinkers. On March 2 a leading Hebertist, Charles Philippe Ronsin, addressed the Cordeliers Club and called for another insurrection in Paris. For that, Robespierre had Ronsin, Hebert, and other Hebertist leaders arrested for treason, and they were executed on March 24. The Hebertists' base had been at the Cordeliers Club, which effectively ceased to exist after their demise.

After the Hebertists had been destroyed, Danton's faction was the only remaining political group capable of organizing opposition to Robespierre's policies. Continuing to play the war-threat card, Robespierre was also able to portray the Indulgents as traitors to the Revolution, and to have them physically removed as well. Danton, Desmoulins, and their associates were guillotined on April 5.

As long as the counterrevolutionary threat was palpable, the rest of the Convention considered Robespierre indispensable, but after the great military victory at Fleurus in late June 1794 freed France from imminent danger of foreign invasion, the Convention turned sharply against Robespierre's personal rule. The destruction of the Enragés had meant the end of popular initiatives, and the removal of the Hebertists and Dantonists left Robespierre's faction all alone to face the remnants of the Feuillants and Girondins, who now came out of the woodwork, coalesced, and defeated him. He and his lieutenants were arrested on July 27 and executed the following day. The moderates who overthrew him, though not a cohesive political tendency in their own right, came to be known collectively as the Thermidorians. With their ascendance to power, the revolutionary phase of the French Revolution was over.

French Revolution, women and

Soma Marik

The French Revolution is often cited as a defining moment of modernity. Apart from a number of specialized studies, much of the general work on the revolution has ignored the questions raised by feminist scholarship, but it is necessary to look at the complex ways in which women took part in this revolution, and the ideological positions that developed. Landes (1988) describes the period as one in which women actually lost status. Referring to the salons like those of Madame Du Deffand and Madame Geoffrin, the patroness of the Encyclopedia, she suggests that women had a greater degree of freedom in the last decades of the ancien régime. Noblewomen and nuns even had some political space, as shown by the elections to the Estates General, where some of them could be represented, even though by

This painting, entitled French Revolution, 1789, depicts Parisian women marching to Versailles on October 5, 1789. Parisian women took an active part in the French Revolution by forming clubs, such as Etta d'Palme's Friends of Truth, which provided meeting places where women could discuss revolutionary ideals and develop feminist concepts. The Revolutionary Republican Women sought to expand literacy and obtain female suffrage and the right to bear arms. (The Granger Collection, New York)

men. The revolution and its consciously masculinist discourse, however, excluded them from the public sphere and, as Landes shows, the republic was not just constructed without women, but against them. This reading of the revolution suggests that women, as a category, did not have a revolution.

Women's Conditions and Protests to October 1789

Women had few rights in law during the last decades of the ancien régime. Their testimony could be accepted in criminal or civil courts but not for the purpose of notarized acts such as the making of wills. A woman, never an adult, lived under the authority of her father, husband, or son. Over and above this, there hung the threat of arranged and indissoluble marriages, disinheritance through the rule of primogeniture, and forced relegation to the convent. Upper-class women enjoyed some limited political opportunities, including the regency in case of minority, and the right to send representatives from some religious orders.

As for the mass of women, the level of poverty in eighteenth-century France was such that they, during a hard winter, even demanded to be arrested as beggars, simply to avoid starvation. Though women's earnings were essential to the survival of lower-class families, their wages were very low. Guild offices were closed to them.

What little industrial modernization had occurred before the revolution tended to worsen their conditions. Domestic service, heavy labor, and ill-paid labor-intensive sectors such as the lace trade were the sectors open to them, and there was no general provision for women's education under the ancien régime.

Some feminist pamphlets appeared during the terminal crisis of the old regime (1787–9). The Marquis de Condorcet, advocating a propertied franchise for women, propagated the sharing of domestic authority. A few Cahiers de Dallianges (lists of grievances) appeared, showing women's demands and occasionally demanding votes for women. By and large, however, women remained marginal all the way to the July 14, 1789 attack on the Bastille. Their participation in the revolution began on that day, however, as Marie Carpenter Hauserne, a laundress, was one of the 900 conquerors of the Bastille and Pauline Leon helped barricade the streets.

On October 5 and 6, 1789 women took center stage. Incensed by price increases, Parisian women sparked off an uprising when news came of counterrevolutionary activities by soldiers in Versailles. Marching to Versailles on October 5, arms in hand, around 7,000 women, followed by the National Guard, compelled the royal family to return to Paris and the king to give his consent to the Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen and the decrees abolishing feudal rights. Women of almost all classes went, mostly spontaneously, but the principal role was played by poor women of the artisan and wage-worker mix that would eventually be called sans-culottes.

That the October Days were primarily days of political self-expression for women is borne out by the testimonies of some of the participants like Marie Rose Bare, Louise Chabry, and Françoise Rolin. Their words demonstrate that they had made the connection in their thinking between the immediate shortage of bread in the capital and the shortcomings of the existing political system, and also bear witness to the truth of the statement that they wanted bread but not at the price of liberty. The women's action revealed, not a mere bread riot, but articulations of anti-feudal as well as anti-clerical political ideas. Statements made by the women showed they were quite determined to break the deadlock in the Constituent Assembly. And their action threatened not only the king, but also patriarchy.

Early Political Societies

Thousands of women participated in public celebrations, as in the Fête de la Fédération at the Champ de Mars in Paris on July 14, 1790, the first anniversary of the capture of the Bastille. This was also an occasion when women were allowed to act as citizens, an issue that was deeply contentious throughout the revolutionary period, as involvement in mass politics raised the question of organized mobilization.

Most organizations, like the Breton Club, ancestor of the Jacobins, were at first exclusively male in membership. Some, such as the Société des Cordeliers, allowed women to observe and even to speak, though not to vote. However, a great number and variety of political and popular societies and clubs soon opened their membership to women as well as to men. Théroigne de Méricourt founded Amis de la Loi (Friends of the Law) in Paris (1790). Claude Dansard's Société Fraternelle de Patriotes des Deux Sexes (Fraternal Society of Both the Sexes) was established in March 1791 and aimed at disseminating political education for all and rejected the division of citizens into two groups and the image of all women as passive. Louise Keralio (later Louise Robert), one female member, envisioned a humanitarian role for women in the clubs which would involve an active participation in improving the lot of the underprivileged.

In May 1791 the Comité Central des Sociétés Fraternelles (Central Committee of Fraternal Societies) was created with François Robert (husband of Louise Keralio) as president. From that day forward the women of the clubs were involved in a highly energetic and tenacious political movement which was to grow in strength and determination as the revolution progressed. Pauline Léon appeared before the Legislative Assembly in March 1792 with a petition signed by more than 300 women demanding the right to arm themselves for defense. Only a few days later, Théroigne de Méricourt, member of the Fraternal Society, proposed to the women of the Faubourg Saint-Antoine that a legion of armed women be formed in order to repulse the enemies of liberty. Meanwhile, from 1789, exclusively women's societies were also formed outside Paris, for example in Dijon, Breteuil, Aunay, and Bordeaux.

Women's activities entered a different phase after the king accepted the new Constitution in September 1791. There had been no serious attempt to enfranchise women by the Constituent Assembly. In the very month in which the new Constitution went into effect, however, Olympe de Gouges demanded this right in her historic Declaration of the Rights of Women. Declaring that the Constitution had freed men, but not yet women, Palm d'Aelders moved a petition to the Assembly on April 1, 1792, seeking political liberty, legal equality, and a divorce law. Indeed, the Assembly later in the year did grant women legal majority at the age of 21, including the right to appear as witnesses in civil lawsuits, and produced a law making divorce possible by mutual consent or marital incompatibility. The period of the Constituent and Legislative Assemblies also witnessed the appearance of a number of newspapers published by women's groups and edited by women or addressed to a female audience. One such journal complained that women suffered more than men and demanded female representatives at the National Assembly.

Women activists like Reine Audu, Théroigne de Méricourt, Claire Lacombe, and Pauline Léon also played an active role in the invasion of the Tuileries Palace on June 20, 1792, as well as in the insurrection of August 10, 1792 which overthrew the monarchy. Some women were formally decorated for their efforts with civic crowns from the Commune of Paris.

Two Notorious Women

One woman who played a striking, but rather individual, role was Olympe de Gouges, who wanted revolutionary reform to encompass women, who she saw as victims of oppression and social corruption. Her Declaration of the Rights of Woman and Citizeness (September 1791), prepared on the model of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen, was a bold charter for women. Apart from demanding political equality, it also identified male tyranny as the major burden on women and denounced the concept of illegitimacy and advocated equal property rights for women.

Théroigne de Méricourt, an agitator and street activist, was another prominent player in the revolutionary drama. She is often portrayed as the sword-wielding woman in a riding cloak, sometimes mounted on a white horse, who directed the action in the streets during some of the most memorable days of the revolution, like the storming of the Bastille, the march to Versailles, and the insurrection of August 10, 1792. She delivered a famous address on March 25, 1792 to the Société Fraternelle des Minimes (Fraternal Society of the Small Ones) advocating the formation of battalions of females to serve in the defense of the nation. She is often accused of murdering the royalist collaborator François-Louis Suleau. While direct responsibility for Suleau's murder is difficult to prove, there is no doubt that on that day she played an important role in urging the crowd to arm themselves and use courage and patriotism to defend their fatherland from danger.

In her Address to the Forty-Eight Sections she proposed a system whereby women would participate in patriotic life in a positive but non-military manner, unlike the proposals made in 1792 for battalions of female soldiers. On May 15, 1793 de Méricourt was to become involved in an altercation with women belonging to the Citoyennes and was subjected to a public whipping. Soon after, she lost her mental stability. Her political career was ended, and she died in 1817, locked up for a decade in an asylum.

Sans-Culotte Women

In the course of 1792 and 1793 many poorer women moved from passive to active politics, forming their own organizations. In Lyon in September 1792 members of the women's club posted price lists all over the city, the rates being fixed on a revolutionary vision of just price emanating from the will of the people. Women "police commissioners," posted to enforce the prices of essential commodities, compelled the municipal and departmental authorities to take some price-control measures and root out counter-revolutionaries. Neither their economic program, nor the fact of women's militant participation, was wholeheartedly supported by the Jacobins. Clearly, there was both a class and a gender issue involved here. The bourgeoisie supporting the Jacobins had profited from the purchase of the nationalized land and war contracts and were willing to make slight concessions to the sans-culottes to save the revolution.

Meanwhile, a new patriotic club, the Société des amies de la liberté et de l'égalité, was established in 1792 to push for price control, support the jurors (Constitutional Clergy), and even demand votes for women. Nonetheless, at each radical turn, the original pressure came from below, and the Jacobins sometimes responded half-heartedly, as on May 31 to June 2, 1793, when a popular insurrection broke out to expel the Girondins. Militant women played a very active role in these popular struggles. Eventually, the club collapsed under Jacobin pressure and was formally shut down in November 1793.

At the same time, to fight "counterrevolutionary women," there was a need to enlist the support of revolutionary women. But the dynamics of organization turned the radical women into activists going beyond the narrow limits set by Jacobinism. The early women's clubs combined patriotic politics with religious devotion and charitable activity along with overtones of pre-revolutionary religious confraternities. But these were overtaken by the new tasks and the new ways of thinking promoted by the revolution. The clubs of Nancy, Le Mans, Besaçon, and Beaumont reproached the Convention for denying them the right to express their vote.

The massive participation of sans-jupons in political and social movements and their transgressions against the code ascribed to them by patriarchy raised male hostility. It was assumed that women's mentality made them suitable for only "caring" tasks, and they were deemed unsuitable for more direct politics. Women's role was not to change the political course of the revolution, but rather to decorate and inspire, to crown and to animate. The women's societies seemed at times to suggest that revolutionary education could change her "natural" mysterious, seductive, and deceptive characteristics. This shows the strong grip of patriarchal values which made the women themselves internalize the social construct of femininity.

Even as they sought to influence public politics, the women's clubs never denied that their primary role was within the home. Yet the participation in politics was transforming how they visualized home and their role in it. For example, in a 1792 speech in Bordeaux, Marie Dorbe urged unmarried women to marry only those men who were ardent patriots, and to tell men that they did not care for flattery and romance, but frankness and truth. But this had its own problems. If women were to act as moral regenerators, it opened them to close scrutiny of their own sexuality and moral code.

Society of Revolutionary Republican Citizenesses

It is within this wider context that we should locate the rise and fall of the Société des Citoyennes Républicaines Révolutionnaires. This organization came into being in 1793 and its best-known presidents were Claire Lacombe and Pauline Léon, both of whom were republicans who had been active in the revolution prior to this. The women of this group viewed the defense of the patrie (fatherland) as a dual undertaking – men were responsible for defense on the exterior, while women took upon themselves the task of safeguarding the revolution in the interior by being ever alert against counter-revolutionary threats.

Shortly after its formal organization the Citoyennes began to involve itself in the struggle for dominance between the Jacobins and the Girondins. They supported free access to the Convention galleries. Finding the Assembly unresponsive, they resorted to direct action, stopping people carrying passes at the gate of the Assembly hall and tearing up their passes. On May 18, 1793 Gamon, a Girondin member, accused these women as agents of the enemies of the republic. He also accused them of deliberately trying to create disorder. A Montagnard deputy, Ruhl, stated that equality existed everywhere and if passes to the galleries were suppressed the women would no longer have this pretext for coming there and they would cease to do so. On May 29, 1793 the women of the Mont Blanc section were forbidden to observe the meetings of the General Assembly, and they employed the same methods at the door of the section assembly as they did at the door of the Convention. A dozen of them were posted at the door so that no “aristocrat” could enter the meeting room.

The insurrections of May 31 and June 2, 1793, which saw the fall of the Girondins, were the work of the sans-culotte masses, both men and women. These committees with the women of the Citoyennes were in the very vanguard of the action. A very visible demand was for the fixing of prices. Prevented from speaking at the General Council of the Paris Commune, the women’s delegation presented their own petition on June 2, when the movement to unseat the Girondins accelerated. According to the testimony of the Girondin deputy Gorsas, armed and “shameless” women were among those who ensured that the proscribed Girondin deputies could not escape. From the side of the victors in the insurrection, Jacques Roux, before the General Council of the Commune, praised the Citoyennes for their role. Led by the Citoyennes, the women prepared themselves for the insurrection and participated in it, in the Convention, the Commune, the sections, and on the streets in their own way.

Since mid-June the women of Paris had expressed their discontent with the standard of living forced upon them, and they advocated stringent punishments for hoarding. On June 25, 1793 a group of laundry women stopped two wagons loaded with soap on the Rue Saint Lazare. They fixed prices and compelled on-the-spot selling. This was the start of three days of rebellion in the streets of Paris. Then, on August 26, Claire Lacombe led a deputation to the bar of the Convention. It demanded the implementation of the new Constitution, which emphasized sans-culotte demands for direct democracy and a state-regulated economy, geared to the needs of the poor masses. Throughout the summer months the capital had been plagued with a severe shortage of bread and on September 5 the women rose in protest. Although the problem of subsistence was secondary to their main political concerns, during the later part of August the members of the Citoyennes served mainly as vociferous complainants on the subject of hoarding. The culmination of these feelings of discontent was the journée of September 4 and 5, as a result of which Terror was made the order of the day.

Now that the opposition had been expelled from the Convention, threat of counterrevolution minimized, and news of French victory coming from the battle front, the Jacobins no longer felt the need for mass support to save the revolution. A new phase of reaction and terror was unleashed to eliminate popular initiatives for democracy so that the gains made by the propertied during the revolution could be perpetuated at any cost. The Enrage leaders and the women were among the first casualties. On October 6, Le Société des hommes du 10 août (Society of the Men of 10 August) denounced the Citoyennes to the Convention as “unpatriotic.” The crime of Charlotte Corday, who had assassinated Marat, was held against seemingly all political women. The next day, Claire Lacombe, at the head of a delegation of the Citoyennes, addressed the Convention. She argued that women had produced only one monster, while men had produced many tyrants.

In early November 1793 came the trial and execution of two famous female revolutionaries, Olympe de Gouges and the Girondin Madame Roland. At the same time, the Jacobins decided to deliver the final blow to the pro-Enrage women. The working women were involved in the war effort as much as in the struggle for bread. They contributed tons of household linen, often their main assets, as bandages for the wounded. But such sacrifices were accepted by bourgeois leaders without any qualms even as they set about the task of destroying the organization of these women. The Jacobins now mobilized market women, who were obviously opposed to price fixation. On October 28 some 6,000 market women invaded the headquarters of the society. On October 29, at the Convention, the Dantonist deputy Fabre d'Églantine denounced the members of the society for not being good mothers and daughters, for going after bread like "pigs at a trough," and for being "emancipated girls." Two days later in the Convention, Amar, deputy from the Isère, embarked on an astonishingly brutal tirade against the Citoyennes. He believed that women must not leave their families and private functions to which they were destined by nature in order to involve themselves in the affairs of government. Finally, the National Convention banned all kinds of women's popular clubs by the October 30 (9th Brumaire) decree. After two abortive attempts to revive women's political activities, on November 20 women were also forbidden to attend section meetings.

What Did Women Gain?

While there is no doubt that most male revolutionaries were positively opposed to women's political participation, women nonetheless made gains in the course of the revolution. The Constitution of 1791 made women passive citizens, but accorded them a slender rights base from which to proceed further. It was the Constitution of 1795 that took away citizenship from them.

Wives gained some rights through the social legislation of the revolution. In 1791 marriage was recognized as a civil contract, so that divorce became possible. On September 20, 1792 divorce on the basis of mutual consent was legalized. The land transfer as well as the abolition of feudalism benefited millions of peasants and their families. A countrywide cultural revolution increased awareness and therewith birth control, giving women some control over their own bodies.

French revolutionary theater

Christina Suszynski Green

In the early to mid-eighteenth century, theater was an integral part of the French urbanite's life, as tickets were affordable for most economic classes, and the theater house was considered a nexus for social gathering, gossip, political discourse, and romantic intrigue. The audience was as much a part of the performance as the actors on the stage: the lights were always up, talking was commonplace, spectators mingled with actors on the stage, and opinions were not reserved for the end of the show. In fact, the parterre section of the auditorium (all-male standing room on the main floor) was renowned for the rowdiness of its patrons. Many attempts were made to silence the theater throughout the second half of the eighteenth century with armed gunmen, dimmed lights, seating in the parterre, and the removal of seating closest to or on the stage, but the spirit of individual rights that was sweeping over France was felt as strongly in the theater as in the circulating political pamphlets demanding the representation of the people before the king. Attempts to silence audiences were thus analogous to attempts to silence the will of the people, and the parterre became a soapbox for the resistance of passivity.

Measures to silence the masses were also considered reflections of the paranoia felt by the crown (under Louis XV and later Louis XVI), as the theater possessed the potential for serving as a meeting place for dissidents eager to plan the overthrow of the king. Such a suspicion was perhaps justified given that actors were among the first to take up arms in the National Guard – the military arm of the revolution – in the days immediately leading up to and following July 14 (Bastille Day). J. B. Jacques Nourry and Jean-Baptiste Naudet – actors from the king’s theater (comédiens du roi) – were prominent for the leading roles they took in defending the city against the royal guard. And Collot d’Herbois, though retired from the theater, would live to serve on the Committee of Public Safety, renowned for ensuring the opposite of safety after the revolution.

Actors stood much to gain by the revolution, considering they did not possess full citizenship under the old regime. They were considered no better than prostitutes, tolerated only for the entertainment they offered. It did not help their cause that comédiens du roi were formerly employed by the king and existed as a mouthpiece for the regency. This tainted image cast doubt on the sincerity of actors’ convictions in this new role and stripped them of the dignity with which so many others served; they were regularly attacked in pamphlet literature and denounced at public hearings.

Not all aspects of the political life were hostile to the virtues of the theater. Civic life began to look quite like a staged production, there being a few places of assembly under the new regime architecturally akin to theaters (the Assembly of Notables, the Salle de Spectacle in the Tuileries Palace, and the Assemblée fédérative). Indeed, seats for spectators were now common, and tickets were sold for entry into the largest political clubs. And in a crystallizing episode for the theater and the political stage, the revolution’s Cicero of the Assembly – Mirabeau – was regularly honored as a man of the theater, even receiving applause when he attended performances as a patron. Without question, the art of political persuasion owed much to the art of performance.

Friedan, Betty (1921–2006)

Shari Childers

“I did not set out consciously to start a revolution,” said Betty Friedan. Even so, her book The Feminine Mystique (1963) is credited with launching second wave feminism and significantly energizing the women’s movement in the United States. Certainly, her path to revolution began inauspiciously enough. Born Bettye Naomi Goldstein, in Peoria, Illinois, she attended Smith College and then married Carl Friedan in 1947. Her story, though still questioned by some, is that she was fired from her job as a journalist as a direct result of her pregnancy with her second child. Like most women, she went home to devote herself to her family.

Unlike other women, however, Friedan's sense of isolation and lack of fulfillment in her role as housewife led her to conduct a series of interviews with her former female classmates from Smith College. She published the results of her interviews in The Feminine Mystique, which became a bestseller, and exposed the "secret" that many women were not entirely fulfilled in their roles as wives and mothers – she called it "the problem with no name." This revelation, however bold, was not revolutionary. The book, though, was revolutionary, for two reasons. First, it unraveled the cultural, Victorian myths of what a woman should be by attacking their roots in the language of science and psychology. More importantly, it brought the "secret" out in the open. Women had been told that they were physically or intellectually unfit for jobs outside of the home, where they should be perfectly happy; they now had words for their feelings and words to counter the cultural discrimination and condescension. They began talking – to one another, to their spouses, and to politicians and doctors.

While Friedan posed as a "sister suburbanite" in her text, though, she was already a radical. She may not have intended to start a revolution, but she undeniably had a revolutionary political consciousness born of her longtime involvement in anti-fascist left and union movements – a radical past that she omitted to help her book succeed. Consequently, the book that earned her notoriety as a radical feminist also earned her criticism from fellow radicals because, to avoid "red-baiting," she focused her work on the problems of middle-class housewives rather than those of minorities or the working poor.

While Friedan's publication of The Feminine Mystique is her most frequently cited contribution to the women's movement, she was actively involved in the movement in many other ways. She played a significant role in the passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, including Title VII that prohibited employer discrimination on the basis of sex. In 1966 the National Organization for Women (NOW) was founded by women who had their first meeting in Friedan's hotel room. She also served as the organization's president until 1970. In 1967 she led a Mother's Day campaign in which women asked for "rights, not roses," and in 1968 she was one of a few feminists who led invasions of men's only clubs. On August 26, 1970 she led a Women's Strike for Equality on the 50th anniversary of women's suffrage. In 1971 the National Women's Political Caucus was formed to begin fielding female political candidates for office, and Friedan was an early member. She served as the vice president for the National Association to Repeal Abortion Laws from 1972 to 1974 – an important position considering Roe v. Wade legalized abortion in 1973. Through her activism, she urged women to work in solidarity to improve their collective condition and provided them with concrete outlets for doing so.

Her path, however, was not untarnished. Her initial insistence that NOW exclude lesbians resulted in personal and public reproach and caused considerable discontent within the women's movement. She officially changed her position, however, at the National Women's Conference held in Houston, Texas, in 1977. When she seconded the resolution that opposed any discrimination based on sexual orientation, lesbian activists cheered and released balloons – a defining moment for Friedan, the women's movement, and lesbian rights. Her widely publicized and baseless disparagement of Gloria Steinem, which also included accusations that Steinem was working with the CIA, yet again led to unnecessary division within the movement – a sad irony. These recurring claims seem to be the result of post-McCarthy suspicions, which, in the case of Steinem, were complicated by Friedan's personal jealousy: the media recognized Steinem as the leader of the women's movement, a title Friedan felt that she had earned. Both of these errors in judgment are representative of a more general difficulty that Friedan seemed to have with the younger generation of women's activists. While she and her original comrades had come directly from other movements that taught them to "politicize and publicize" social and economic injustice by relying on solidarity and disciplined action, the younger "women's lib" generation, for Friedan, seemed too focused on sex and self-transformation and had no political background.

Many veteran feminists were very disappointed in Friedan's second book, The Second Stage (1981), which critiqued the women's movement. She claimed "the feminine mystique" had simply been exchanged for the "feminist mystique," an equally dangerous problem. Drawing on examples of what she saw as a growing "feminist fatigue," she argued that "Women may have to think beyond 'women's issues' to join their energies with men” in the task of redefining home life, careers, intimacy, and national priorities. Friedan remained an activist and author until her death, on her 85th birthday, in 2006.

Friedländer, Benedikt (1866–1908)

Rowena Griem

Benedikt Friedländer (or Benedict Friedlaender) was active in the natural sciences before becoming a social and political philosopher and activist in the modern German homosexual rights movement. He sought to normalize relationships between men by viewing them in their historical and cultural context. He embraced the Frei Körper Kultur (Free Body Culture) movement and published articles advocating nudism in nature. In 1903 his first of several works on homosexuality appeared. His most influential book was Die Renaissance des Eros Uranios (1904).

Friedländer was a member and financial supporter of Magnus Hirschfeld’s Wissenschaftlich-humanitären Komitees (WhK) or Scientific-Humanitarian Committee. WhK fought against Paragraph 175, which criminalized all homosexual acts in Germany, and educated the public on homosexuality. In 1902 Friedländer co-founded the Gemeinschaft der Eigenen (Community of the Special), an all-male intellectual and cultural society. In 1906 Friedländer broke with Hirschfeld to help establish Sezession des Wissenschaftlich-humanitären Komitees (Secession of the Scientific-Humanitarian Committee). While Hirschfeld described homosexuals as an effeminate “third” or “intermediate sex,” Friedländer bristled at this characterization. He was married and considered bisexuality the norm, but promoted the benefits of male-male relationships, including those between men and youths. He believed homoerotic relationships to be normal, beneficial to the nation, and superior to male-female relationships. He objected to Hirschfeld’s reliance on science and medicine to define homosexuality. Friedländer believed that this would portray homosexuality as an illness or anomaly, engendering pity rather than equality based on moral grounds. Friedländer emphasized historical, cultural, and anthropological concepts in his support of male-male homoerotic relationships. Although Hirschfeld and Friedländer had similar goals, these ideological and philosophical differences adversely affected the homosexual rights movement in Germany.

Fries’s Rebellion

Paul Douglas Newman

Fries’s Rebellion was a popular resistance movement, or “regulation,” by rural Pennsylvania Germans in the Lehigh Valley region in 1798–9. It followed two earlier post-Revolutionary regulations: Shays’s Rebellion of 1786 in Massachusetts, and the 1794 western Pennsylvania Whiskey Rebellion. In Fries’s Rebellion the resisters sought to regulate the federal government by protesting against and petitioning for the repeal of the Alien Acts, the Sedition Act, and the Direct Tax, mostly the work of the Federalist Party. When a federal marshal arrested resisters for obstruction of process and sedition and prepared to transport them to the nation’s capital for trial, the local militia mobilized to free the prisoners and secure a local trial. Within weeks, the national government sent an army into the region to quash the “insurrection” and make arrests. A year of trials followed with dozens of minor convictions, and three convictions of treason carrying the death penalty, including the rebellion's namesake, John Fries. President John Adams pardoned Fries at the eleventh hour.

In 1798 the Federalist Party controlled both houses of Congress and the Executive, and had for several years pursued a pro-British economic and foreign policy, to the chagrin of the erstwhile US ally France as well as the admirers of the democratic ideals of the French Revolution in America, the Democratic-Republican Party. During the Anglo-French wars the Federalist Washington administration first proclaimed neutrality, and then in 1795 negotiated the Jay Treaty with Britain, opening the West Indies to American trade while forgoing trade with the French. After ratification in 1796, the French Directory began attacking American trading vessels heading to British ports. By 1797 the Federalist Adams administration sent a team of envoys to Versailles to negotiate an end to hostilities, but the Directory sent three anonymous agents to demand a bribe before granting them an audience. The envoys sent written proof of the slight back to Adams, who released the "XYZ Dispatches" to the media in March, 1798 and enraged the public. Adams hoped to use the anti-French sentiment to quell Democratic-Republican dissent in the newspapers, and to justify the augmentation of the US navy and coastal defense. More conservative Federalists in the House and Senate clamored for war and the creation of a standing, professional army. By July a number of bills passed both houses and sat on the president's desk for signing: the Sedition bill to outlaw anything "false, scandalous, and malicious" written or spoken against the government or president with the intent to "bring them into contempt or disrepute;" a series of Alien bills, designed to undercut the urban base of the Republican Party, that increased the period required for naturalization to 14 years and authorized the president to deport aliens of enemy nations; the authorization of more than $10 million in military expenditures, including the creation of the "New Army" and the "Provisional Army" to meet the French threat and the "Eventual Army" to put down domestic rebellions, three warships, and dozens of defense projects in ports and harbors; and the Direct Tax on Lands, Dwelling Houses, and Slaves to fund the expenditure.

To collect the tax, the Adams administration appointed loyal Federalists, and in the Lehigh Valley that meant English-speaking Quakers and their fellow town-dwelling and pacifist German-speaking Moravian allies, both of whom had been recently turned out of office by rural Pennsylvania German Lutherans and Reformed. These "Church People" or "Kirchenleute," as they called themselves, had joined the Democratic-Republican Party in 1796 to take local control of northern Bucks and Montgomery counties, and most of Northampton county from the wealthier Quaker and Moravian minority. The Kirchenleute celebrated their service in the Revolution as citizen soldiers and still resented those who had refused to serve. They also resented the new Sedition Act, the standing professional army, and the saber-rattling directed at the French who helped secure American independence.

In October 1798 Democratic-Republican politicians campaigned in the region for the US House and the Pennsylvania Assembly, and told the crowds that the laws could be repealed. The Lehigh Valley elected a Republican Representative to the US House, and the local militias drafted and passed around petitions to the US Congress. Communities erected liberty poles with slogans denouncing the "Gag Law," the alliance with Great Britain, and the House Tax. The militias and the communities formed "Associations" that crossed township and county borders, in which the signers pledged to resist the assessment of their homes, to refuse to do business with the assessors, and to boycott or pressure any neighbors who complied with the tax on property until they heard back from the Congress about their petitions. While Thomas Jefferson and James Madison were authoring the Kentucky and Virginia Resolutions, developing the theory that states could determine the constitutionality of a federal law and legally nullify it, the Lehigh Valley Kirchenleute argued that the people held that right, and used the militia as the arm of popular nullification within their conception of popular constitutionalism, in accordance with the Second Amendment.

The Adams administration disagreed. Federal judges were sent to the area to take depositions in January 1799, and they sent a federal marshal with warrants for arrests for the obstruction of the tax in late February. The marshal succeeded in serving 20 resisters, and held them prisoner at a tavern in Bethlehem while preparing to take them all to Philadelphia for trial. Approximately 150 armed militia and 250 unarmed Associators from Bucks and Northampton converged on Bethlehem on March 7 and offered to bail the prisoners provided that their trials be held in the area where they were presumed to have been committed, in accordance with the Sixth Amendment. The Marshal refused bail and reported the prisoners stolen. President Adams declared the situation to be insurrection on March 12, and called for the insurgents to submit. Within a week, the militias of the region met and unanimously voted to submit to the laws of the United States. Two weeks later the Eventual Army of 600 regulars and 320 Philadelphia militia marched into the region and arrested nearly 100 men on charges of treason, sedition, obstruction of process, and other charges.

Of 92 indictments, the federal prosecution won only 32 convictions, including just three treason convictions from eleven true bills. The most celebrated of the three was John Fries. Fries was not the leader of the rebellion, he was one militia captain from one township who happened to be the eldest captain at the Bethlehem rescue, and so assumed the role of negotiator with the marshal. Yet Federalist prosecutors, newspaper editors, and politicians made him into the figurehead of insurrection. Many conservative or “High Federalists” thought that Fries’s conviction and execution was imperative for the nation and the Federalist Party, including three of Adams’s four cabinet secretaries and the party’s intellectual leader, Alexander Hamilton. When in May 1800 a Philadelphia jury convicted Fries and two others of treason, and Judge Samuel Chase sentenced them to death, President Adams pardoned all 32 convicts, including Fries. This was the last in a chain of perceived missteps that led Hamilton and his followers to withdraw support from Adam’s reelection bid in 1800.

Fromm, Erich (1900–1980)

Richard Schaefer

Humanist-philosopher, psychoanalyst, and public intellectual, Erich Fromm was born in Frankfurt am Main, Germany in 1900. Author of over twenty books, Fromm’s socialist humanism was influential in New Left circles in the second half of the twentieth century. Raised in a strongly religious Jewish household, Fromm was attracted to the radical politics of Judaism, but ceased practicing the faith in his mid-twenties. After earning his PhD in sociology from the University of Heidelberg in 1922, Fromm underwent training to become a psychoanalyst at the Berlin Institute for Psychoanalysis.

Fromm was the co-founder of the Southwest German Institute for Psychoanalysis in 1929, and was later invited to join the Institute for Social Research at the University of Frankfurt in 1930. While at the Institute, Fromm undertook a study of the social psychology of German workers that supplied key material for Max Horkheimer’s Studies on Authority and Family (1936) and Theodor Adorno’s The Authoritarian Personality (1950). Fromm was also very influential in promoting the synthesis of Marx and Freud that became the hallmark of Critical Theory.

Immigrating to the United States in 1934, Fromm’s critique of Freud’s theory of drives led to a break with the Institute, and put him at the center of the movement known as neo-Freudianism. This critique emerged fully in Escape From Freedom (1941), in which Fromm sought to contextualize Freud’s unconscious in a more robustly sociohistorical direction by articulating the concept of the “social character.” A theoretical attempt at mediating individual psychology with the Marxian dialectic of human history, the concept helped Fromm explore the appeal of fascism as an attempt to overcome feelings of isolation and alienation.

In the 1950s Fromm joined the American Socialist Party and helped organize the Society Against Nuclear Energy (SANE), and in 1968 he worked on behalf of Eugene McCarthy's presidential campaign. Fromm's activism found its counterpart in a series of popular writings, such as The Sane Society (1955) and The Art of Loving (1956), in which he advocated a renewal of ethics and the cultivation of "communitarian" socialism as a means to overcome the problems of advanced technological society.

During the Cold War, Fromm worked closely with many people, including Raya Dunayevskaya, to rehabilitate Marxist humanism and stimulate East-West dialogue, editing An International Symposium of Socialist Humanism in 1965. Though his influence on Critical Theory and Marxist humanism has often been underestimated, recent scholarship has made important strides towards rehabilitating Fromm's important contributions in these areas. Fromm died of a heart attack in Muralto, Switzerland in 1980.

Fronde, France, 1648–1653

Wendy Maier

The Fronde was a series of revolts that occurred in France between 1648 and 1653, during the minority of Louis XIV. The word fronde means "catapult" or "sling" and its use to signify these revolts derives from the device utilized to throw mud or rocks at coaches and government buildings during the disturbances.

The Fronde began as a struggle for power over the crown among the nobility and members of Parliament. This conflict later developed into a series of serious revolts that directly challenged the existing crown and estate hierarchy. The Fronde spread to the masses, who suffered the most during this time. A contemporary description of the way the common people saw themselves was as "a being who always goes on foot, who has no millions, as all of you wish to have, no castle, no valets to serve him, and who lives simply with his wife and children, if he has any, on the fourth or fifth floor. He is useful, because he knows how to plow a field, to forge, to saw, to file, to roof a building, to make shoes." It was the legal and societal distinctions between the classes, coupled with challenges to crown authority and individual desires for power at the expense of the people, that gave rise to the rebellions of the Fronde and led to the absolutist state of Louis XIV.

The first phase of the Fronde, known as the Fronde of the Parliament, occurred from 1648 to 1649. Precipitated by a severe financial crisis due largely to France's involvement in the Thirty Years War (1618–48), the crown relied heavily on taxes to restore the treasury. In addition to rate increases on existing tariffs, the government increasingly attempted to impose new taxes at the expense of the populace, the majority comprising the lowest socioeconomic classes in France, and who could not afford to pay more. Illegal searches and seizures of property escalated as tax collectors became more aggressive, causing irrevocable harm to the image of the crown and Parliament in the eyes of the general population.

This first wave of revolts occurred in January 1648, in direct response to the negative financial restructuring policies of Anne of Austria, the king's mother who ruled as de facto regent, and the crown's primary consultant, Cardinal Mazarin, who increased his personal wealth at the expense of the citizens. The crown also sold judgeships and royal offices to generate income. To raise crown revenue for war and other expenses, Anne and Mazarin devised a plan that included manipulation and exploitation of the rentes (national treasury shares). For example, Mazarin and other crown advisors would postpone interest payments on the shares until their price fell, and then the crown would buy more. Increased interference with the rentes caused a great deal of discord among the upper classes.

In addition, Mazarin moved to abolish taxes, such as the paulette, which did not directly benefit the royal treasury. Some nobles were heavily reliant on taxes like the paulette in order to maintain hereditary authority of government offices and autocratic control over their provinces. In the eyes of the nobles, abolishing the paulette amounted to an attack on their hereditary fiscal rights. Another crown scheme was to revoke the salaries of members of the courts. The Parliament and law courts not only refused to ratify that proposal, but countered with a petition demanding limitations on crown authority. This was a serious challenge to the monarchy, and the courts pressed ahead by demanding legislative reforms. One key demand was that the crown cease arbitrarily imposing taxes and instead seek legislative approval for all taxation. Some members of Parliament threatened that failure to reform unpopular tax practices would result in civic unrest.

When the magistrates called for limitations on crown authority, however, Anne and Mazarin refused to back down and ordered the arrest of some of their severest parliamentary critics. Word of the arrest of the parliamentary agitators, including the popular Pierre Broussel, spread to the streets of Paris and elsewhere, precipitating riots. Broussel and the others were released, but that failed to end the insurrection. Crowds of rebellious citizens barricaded the main thoroughfares of Paris, and the royal regime seemed to be losing control of the capital city.

Forced to capitulate by the immediate threat of revolution, Mazarin and the queen regent agreed to most of Parliament's demands; including continual payment of the rentes and an end to Mazarin's illegal fiscal machinations. In early 1649, however, Anne, on Mazarin's advice, revoked the agreement and again ordered the arrest of some of her leading opponents. She was able to get away with it because by then the Thirty Years War was over, freeing up more royal troops to defend Paris. The first revolt thus officially ended in March 1649, but the problems that had sparked it not only remained, but had been exacerbated.

The second phase of the Fronde, known as the Fronde of the Princes, lasted from 1650 until 1653 and included both noble uprisings and massive civic unrest. The turmoil of the first Fronde prompted a "prince of the blood," Louis de Bourbon, Prince of Condé, to try to wrest control of the monarchy from Anne and to remove Mazarin. Alerted to the possibility of a coup attempt, Mazarin ordered Condé's arrest. The Prince, however, had gained a measure of popularity with the parliamentarians and the "Third Estate" (the commoners) because he was perceived as a possible champion who could rid them of Mazarin. Condé had the backing of a section of the nobility and the support of Marshal Henri Turenne, an important general, so when he was imprisoned, a provincial army was raised against the royal forces. Mazarin was forced to release Condé, who immediately made a treaty with Spain against the French monarchy. Turenne then changed sides and led the royal armies against Condé, his regional factions, and Spanish troops. Civil war ensued, civil order broke down in many French cities and provinces, and the suffering of the people escalated.

During this phase Mazarin was forced to flee to Cologne, and despite Anne's attempts to pacify Condé's supporters, she was in constant danger of losing control of her son, the boy-king Louis XIV. Despite being only 13 years old, his majority was declared, but this had little effect on the war, as Spanish troops drew closer to the French borders. At the end of 1651 Mazarin returned at the head of a small army and France descended further into war and anarchy. A number of French provinces experienced waves of chaotic civic rebellions, mass starvation, and looting and pillaging by crown soldiers. Marie-Angelique Arnauld, the abbess of Port Royal, described the suffering of the ordinary people in these words:

This poor country is a horrible sight; it is stripped of everything. The soldiers take possession of the farms and have the corn threshed, but will not give a single grain to the owners who beg it as alms. It is impossible to plough. There are no more horses; all have been carried off. The peasants are reduced to sleeping in the woods and are thankful to have them as a refuge from murderers. And if they only had enough bread to half satisfy their hunger, they would indeed count themselves happy.

The Fronde of the Princes ended in 1653, and shortly thereafter France went to war against Spain. The widespread turmoil and misery caused by the Frondes ushered in the absolutism of

Louis XIV by making royal autocracy appear as a preferable alternative. Louis XIV took control of the government in 1661, consolidating the military and Parliament under his jurisdiction. He also removed the seat of government from Paris to Versailles as a means of insulating it from popular disorders. Louis's absolutism brought order and stability, but taxes increased, war ensued until almost the end of his reign in 1715, and living standards generally did not increase. The majority of the Third Estate, with the exception of some of the educated and merchant classes, experienced no improvement in its socioeconomic status. However, even after the final phases of the Fronde, members of the aristocracy continued to protest against usurpation of their noble privileges. Their grievances continued to smolder for several generations, until 1788 when they burst forth again with explosive force and ushered in the French Revolution.

Fuller, Margaret (1810–1850)

Holly M. Kent

Most famous for her pathbreaking feminist text Woman in the Nineteenth Century (1845), Sarah Margaret Fuller devoted much of her short life to challenging the narrow, restrictive notions about women's abilities and proper sphere and advocating greater educational, social, and professional rights and opportunities for women. Fuller was a quintessentially public figure, in an era in which women were expected to be quiet, domestic, and self-effacing.

Fuller was encouraged in her early intellectual endeavors by her father, politician and lawyer Timothy Fuller. A sometimes harsh and exacting parent, he nonetheless enabled his young daughter to receive a remarkably thorough home education, encouraging the young Margaret to study subjects traditionally deemed “unfeminine,” such as classical Latin and Greek. Fuller also had a considerable amount of formal education outside of the home, attending several schools for girls and young women, including the prestigious Boston Lyceum for Young Ladies. Frustrated at being barred from attending college because of her gender, Fuller began to channel her considerable intellectual energies towards a consideration of why women were so severely discriminated against.

When Fuller was 23 she moved with her family to Groton, Massachusetts, where she became involved in the region's Transcendentalist circles. With its mystical, nature-centered spirituality, a tremendous faith in the power of the individual to shape reality, and commitment to radical social change, Transcendentalism attracted many great nineteenth-century thinkers, including Bronson Alcott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and Henry David Thoreau. Between 1836 and 1839 Fuller worked as a teacher at several different schools in Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

In 1839 she began hosting her famous “conversations” in Boston. These conversations (which Fuller ran until 1844) provided women with the opportunity to meet and discuss significant intellectual, political, and theological issues in a women-only environment. Deeply frustrated by her lack of access to a university education, Fuller used her conversations to provide like-minded women with the opportunity to discuss art, literature, and politics with one another, voicing their ideas without having to fear being belittled by men skeptical of their intellectual abilities.

After having worked as the editor of The Dial, a Transcendentalist newspaper, between 1840 and 1842, Fuller published “The Great Lawsuit, Man vs. Men and Woman vs. Women” (1843). She expanded upon it and published it as Woman in the Nineteenth Century in 1845. In this treatise she tackled an assortment of subjects, including the need for women to be financially independent, the injustices of the American sex trade, and women's rights to property, higher education, and intellectually stimulating employment. Although Fuller believed that there were fundamental gender differences between women and men, she argued passionately that women ought to have the right to pursue whatever profession they saw fit, regardless of whether or not the work they chose was considered “feminine” by mainstream society. Women in the Nineteenth Century was widely read and fiercely discussed in the United States, the United Kingdom, and Europe, earning Fuller both fulsome praise and harsh condemnation for her daring challenge to America’s rigid gender system.

In 1846 Fuller traveled to Europe as a foreign correspondent for the New York Tribune. Traveling widely across the continent, she was present during Italy’s revolutions of 1848 and 1849, becoming a staunch supporter of rebel leader Giuseppe Mazzini’s attempts to form an independent Roman republic. While in Italy, Fuller met, fell in love with, and possibly married a young revolutionary, Giovanni Angelo, the Marchese d’Ossoli. Fuller, Ossoli, and their newborn son left Italy for the United States in 1850, drowning in a shipwreck in July of that year. The manuscript of the history Fuller had been writing of the Italian revolution was also lost in the wreck. Although her life was tragically short, Fuller’s influence on American society was profound, fundamentally shaping the ways in which the American public thought about women in their roles and rights in society.

G

G8 protests, Genoa, 2001

Dario Azzellini

The protests against the G8 (Group of Eight, most industrialized nations) summit in Genoa, Italy, from July 19–21, 2001, was a highpoint in the history of the “alter-globalization movement.” On July 21, after months of mobilizing across Europe, around 300,000 people took part in one of the largest “movement of movements” demonstrations in the world to date. At the same time, the police unleashed violence of a dimension unknown in Western Europe in the previous two decades, shooting dead the young Carlo Giuliani.

The mobilization’s success was primarily attributable to the coming together of a broad spectrum within the Genoa Social Forum (GSF), which organized the protests. It reached from grassroots Catholic organizations and left-wing neighborhood associations, over One World initiatives, non-governmental organizations (NGOs), Rifondazione Comunista (Refounded Communist Party), the grassroots trade union Cobas and metal workers’ union FIOM, to the Tute Bianche (TB) and squatted social centers. The coalition was enabled on the one hand through a rejection of offensive violence, and on the other through the acceptance of the “defensive-offensive” approach of the TB, which involved forms of self-defense against the police, including the building of barricades. In addition, the protests found themselves at a political conjuncture favorable for the extra-parliamentary left in Italy. The right-wing electoral coalition, composed of the authoritarian Forza Italia, Alleanza Nazionale (AN), which emerged from the fascist party, and the regionalist-racist Lega Nord, had won the election, and Silvio Berlusconi, a businessman embroiled in numerous scandals and criminal offenses, had come to power.

Democratici di Sinistra (DS, the ex-Italian Communist Party (PCI)), and their electoral coalition, “Ulivo,” had created disappointment first of all through their neoliberal policies and then with their weak opposition. The grassroots were in search of possibilities for expressing dissent. This was to be found in the mobilization at Genoa.

At the same time, it was the first G8 summit in Europe since the “Battle of Seattle” around the World Trade Organization (WTO) ministerial in 1999. With the protests against the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank in Prague in September 2000, and against the European Union (EU) summit in Gothenburg in June 2001, the European movement had been “warming up.”

The Protests

On Thursday, July 19, the Day of the Migrants, Genoa was overflowing. Tens of thousands were being accommodated in parks turned into campsites, while over 10,000 TBs and associated groups and networks (who later together formed the Disobbedienti) were camped in the city’s Carlini Athletic Stadium. Demanding equal rights for everyone and the opening of borders, 60,000 took part in the demonstration. The spectrum of those involved reached from Nigerian opposition groups and Kurdish PKK sympathizers, over Roma initiatives to numerous Turkish communist parties, exiles, and war refugees. Alongside anti-racist groups, factory delegations, trade unions, and church initiatives, they marched amid a sea of flags, banners, and placards. And all this despite the increased number of identity checks being carried out by the police in the city which had intimidated many migrants out of participating. For weeks, the press had warned of “violent attacks” and those presumed to be demonstrators were turned back at the Italian border. Police identity checks were set up on the

A group of demonstrators, their hands painted white to symbolize their opposition to violence, march through downtown Genoa, Italy, during the 2001 Group of Eight (G8) summit that began on July 20. About 200,000 people participated in demonstrations that quickly overshadowed the actual summit due to police violence. Hundreds were arrested or injured, and one 23-year-old anarchist, Carlo Giuliani, was shot dead by the police. Numerous charges of excessive force and planting evidence were brought against police and other officials, but none was found guilty. (Darko Bandic/AP/PA Photos) roads leading into Genoa and accredited journalists were among those taken to police stations to have their identities confirmed. It was here that the first assaults took place.

On Friday, July 20 different parts of the movement gathered throughout the city to protest in various ways. Forms of action reached from “Inter-Confessional Praying Against the G8,” far away from the Red Zone (the security cordon around the conference center), to the anarchist “Black Bloc” demonstration which involved hundreds of people moving through the city looking for objects to attack. Beyond this, there was a “Pink and Silver Bloc” with imaginative costumes, pom-poms, and samba music; a meeting point for ATTAC and related NGOs, as well as for Trotskyists and for Cobas. These demonstrations, like that of the TB, attempted to reach the Red Zone. The non-violent grassroots Catholic organization, Lilliput, organised a sit-in.

The police attack, which began in the morning, was directed against the entire movement. Even the participants in the sit-in were shot at with tear gas and brutally beaten. The most severe attack, however, was launched against the TB demonstration of “civil disobedience.” Alongside baton charges and the use of hundreds of gas grenades, several shots of live ammunition were fired, and 18 bullet casings were later collected.

Around 15,000 people took part in the demonstration from Carlini Stadium. This exceeded the size of all previous TB actions. The militancy of the action concentrated itself on overcoming the police lines and the steel wall which blocked the route into the Red Zone. In order to publicize the concept of an offensive, politically directed approach, no damage was supposed to be done to property in the city. The armaments taken to the demonstration – helmets, protective padding made from foam and plastic, and Plexiglas shields – are neither explicitly legal or illegal under Italian law. The ability to use such armaments is generally a political question. For precisely this reason, an example was made of the most radical wing of the GSF coalition, the TB, which had grown the most in size. Though the demonstration had official permission, the police attacked demonstrators with tear gas and batons, using a narrow street to confine demonstrators, leaving them unable to move either forward or backward. The disciplined and highly organized nature of the demonstration prevented the outbreak of chaos at that point.

A seven-person caucus, appointed by a plenary meeting in Carlini Stadium, had decided upon the common approach and laid out the phases of the concept for action ahead of time. The caucus was to decide, in conjunction with the front of the demonstration, about advancing, retreating, breaks, and other actions. Right up until the end of the demonstration, decisions were communicated via a sound-system in several languages. Various groups were responsible for extinguishing gas grenades with buckets of water. Others helped wash gas out of people’s eyes, while others distributed water.

Even with such careful planning and coordination, however, chaos did eventually erupt after a young demonstrator named Carlo Giuliani was killed by a shot to the head from a Carabinieri (military police) jeep. The leadership of the demonstration decided not to become embroiled in a spiral of escalation and to spend the evening inside the stadium. The DS officially canceled their mobilization to Genoa, but their grassroots reacted in the opposite way with thousands making their way to Genoa in special trains, busses, and under their own steam.

Only with difficulty was the 300,000-strong demonstration able to make its way through Genoa’s narrow streets, and police resumed their attack as columns of smoke rose from the banks and grand shops on the seafront. A sizeable proportion of the Genovese population who had remained in the city supported the demonstrators. In the heat, water hoses were turned on the thankful demonstrators. Drinking water and fruit were distributed, escape routes pointed out, and demonstrators hidden.

The Repression

On Saturday night police special forces stormed the A. Diaz School in which G8 opponents and journalists were sleeping. Out of 93 who were present, 82 were injured. Over 60 were carried out of the building covered in blood, unable to walk. They had multiple compound fractures, fractured skulls, and broken teeth. Three were beaten into a coma. Several were critically injured. Many found themselves in a state of shock. One German received serious damage to his head, requiring an emergency operation, and one British person's rib was broken, puncturing his lung. Information about the state of the injured – who were then also arrested – and their locations was still being withheld from relatives days later. Lawyers and civilian medics were not allowed to visit the prisoners. The state prosecutor was only informed about the arrests over 18 hours after the assault on the school.

According to the police, the school building was occupied by “the hard core of the Black Bloc who had provoked the excesses.” Stones were said to have been thrown at police vehicles from the school and officers attacked with knives as they stormed the building. The evidence: two Molotov cocktails, two empty bottles, several iron bars, and a Swiss Army knife. There was no search warrant. The police made use of an emergency law introduced under Fascism in 1931 which stated that permission to enter a building was not needed from a judge if there was suspicion of weapons being present. The attack in the Diaz School took place out of sight of the public. While screams and calls for help were heard from the building, five Italian members of parliament as well as lawyers and journalists were all denied access. Two members of parliament were beaten and thrown to the ground. Among the victims in the school were numerous journalists. The floors, walls, steps, and radiators were covered in blood. The following day, the police removed all the evidence. Shortly after, the police forced their way into the Pertini School, opposite to where the GSF and Independent Media Centre were based. Here, journalists were also beaten, and computers and other facilities destroyed. Hard discs, photographs, and film materials were stolen.

The police had declared the ominous Black Bloc public enemy number one. The possession of a black t-shirt was enough to get one arrested, abused, and charged with participation in the excesses. The balance sheet read one death and hundreds injured and arrested, 49 of whom still remained in prison a week later. This systematic abuse and removal of basic rights did not just occur during the demonstrations and in the storming of the schools. In police vehicles, in custody and prison, arrestees were beaten, burned with cigarettes, had their bones broken, and were denied medical assistance. In several instances, prisoners were required to stand with their hands raised and faces against the wall for up to 26 hours. A woman with a broken leg was beaten into continuing to stand. Tear gas was fired into numerous police cells. Women and men were threatened with rape and death. Prisoners were beaten and tortured for days on end at the Bolzaneto Detention Center, where 250 people were taken. Prison doctors ripped piercings out of people's bodies and guards banged their heads against the walls until they bled. Amnesty International expressed serious concern and demanded an independent investigation into the events. They claimed democracy had been suspended while the most serious abuses of human rights in any EU state over the previous years had taken place. Indeed, the fascist disposition of many Italian police and Carabinieri is no secret. Pictures of Mussolini and the German Wehrmacht (German armed forces, 1935–1945) hung on the walls of police stations. Several police units sang anti-Semitic, racist, and right-wing songs. However, it was only through the support of the government that the officers were able to unleash such violence without fear of repercussions.

Excesses, the Black Bloc, and Agent Provocateurs

The hysteria about the Black Bloc died down a few days after the G8 as the media and part of the left began to calm down. At that point, the police violence became the focus of interest. Many factors pointed toward the excesses in Genoa being politically desired by the authorities in order to provide a political legitimation for repression, intended to divide the movement. It has been shown on numerous occasions that the police allowed those who moved through the city streets setting fire to residents' cars and looting small businesses to do so relatively undisturbed, away from the Red Zone, while other demonstrators were subject to massive attack. Video evidence also shows masked and helmeted "demonstrators" with iron bars walking in and out of police stations. Police were observed swapping their uniforms for black clothes, close to their headquarters. Senator Gigi Malabarba, while visiting a police station, saw black-clad and masked people walking into the police station and talking to officers, sometimes in French and German. Neo-Nazis are also known to have taken part in the excesses. A known British Nazi drunkenly bragged in an interview with a journalist from the Italian il manifesto newspaper in Genoa that he had been contacted by "Italian comrades" to whom the police had given "a free hand in the destruction of the city." A social worker from the Genoa region also made known to Secolo XIX newspaper that an activist from the Forza Nuova Nazi group, whom he worked with, had told him that around 60 comrades were in Genoa.

Official Reaction

Much suggests that the repression in Genoa was planned and coordinated at the highest level. The deployment of firearms was not simply allowed for, but planned. The Carabinieri were ordered to fire. Vice-Premier Gianfranco Fini from the AN was present in the Genovese police control room throughout the G8. He provided the political line. According to La Repubblica newspaper, the far-right minister of justice, Roberto Castelli, who was recognized by blood-covered prisoners on his visit to Bolzaneto on Saturday, July 20, claimed to have seen "no indication" of assault. Minister of Interior Claudio Scajola argued during a parliamentary debate on 23 July, 2001 that "The security forces behaved with exemplary dignity."

As expected, the right-wing ruling majority rejected both the opposition's mistrust of Interior Minister Scajola as well as calls for a parliamentary investigation commission. Nevertheless, events were not able to be simply swept under the carpet. The Italian and then the international press documented hundreds of assaults. The large number of media activists present in Genoa contributed to the generation of publicity, releasing thousands of videos and photos. On Tuesday, July 24, 300,000 demonstrators took to the streets of different Italian cities to protest against what had happened. Demonstrations and actions took place around the world. Human rights organizations and trade unions, Italian and EU members of parliament, and members of European governments expressed their concern.

Inquiries and Legal Proceedings

The pressure led to the dismissal of three high-ranking police chiefs, including Arnaldo La Barbera, the head of the Anti-Terror Unit (UCIGOS), and the highest-ranking officer involved with the case of the Diaz School. Others dismissed included Francesco Colucci, chief of police in Genoa, who ordered the action, and Ansoino Andreassi, Italy's deputy chief of police and a member of the G8 Security Committee who was present as a supervisor.

The young Carabinieri Mario Placanica, accused of killing Carlo Giuliani, was found not guilty in May 2003, deemed to have acted in self-defense. Numerous video recordings, however, disprove the self-defense thesis. Because the shooter is not visible in any of the videos, Placanica provided contradictory evidence, and numerous inconsistencies remain unresolved, it has often been presumed that Placanica was made into a scapegoat to protect a more senior officer.

On April 29, 2005 a number of police, including several high-ranking officers, were accused of grievous bodily harm, the fabrication and concealment of evidence, abuse of authority, and perjury in relation to the events in the Diaz School. The police heavily impeded legal clarification of events, but one of the deputy chiefs of police in Genoa, Michelangelo Fournier, offered extensive testimony, admitting to having remained silent for six years out of esprit de corps. It was found that the storming of the Diaz had been decided upon in the afternoon. The throwing of stones from the building and the knife attacks had been made up. Both Molotov cocktails were planted by police on the orders of senior officers. Despite everything pointing toward the assault as being planned, the actions of the police at both schools were widely presented as irrational acts. In the Diaz School, and moreover in the GSF headquarters, the police destroyed tens of thousands of pieces of evidence, photographs, and video recordings documenting crimes committed by the authorities, and stole records of items which had been confiscated. The GSF had requested in advance that evidence be collected there. Forty-five judicial officers, doctors, nurses, and police were accused of abuse of office, bodily harm, and the concealment of evidence in relation to the assaults in Bolzaneto. The treatment of prisoners was found to be in breach of the European and UN conventions against torture.

The investigating judge concluded that collective punishment should be handed down for falsifying evidence, as all police commanders present knew what was taking place and the course of action had been planned by the national police command. Even so, almost all police officers involved with the assaults were rewarded with promotions. Andreassi was appointed deputy director of the secret service (SISDE) and Caldarozzi, accused of perjury, libel, and abuse of office, was promoted within his job as chief of Criminalpol at Central Operations Service.

Around 300 demonstrators were also subjected to preliminary proceedings. Charges included destruction and looting, arson, the manufacture, transportation and possession of explosives, possession of illicit weapons, and resistance and violence against officers. The legal proceedings against the 93 people in the Diaz School were discontinued in February 2004 after a judge was unable to find evidence for actions of violence.

The Italian Movement After Genoa

Within the Italian left, Genoa is generally understood as the beginning of a new era. On the one hand, it is seen as a “declaration of war” on the global movement, and on the other as an anticipation of the transformation which took place after September 11, 2001, where war became a primary instrument of political control.

Genoa clearly demonstrated what a broad movement is capable of – and what it will be confronted with. In particular for the generation which had not lived through the 1970s, the “movement of movements” protests in Genoa offered a new experience which despite – and also because of – the brutal repression, led to an enormous politicization which showed itself in numerous movements to come. Over a few weeks, over 150 social forums were set up throughout Italy. In the following two years, movement followed movement and numerous demonstrations with 2.5–3 million participants took place, as well as half a dozen with 1–1.5 million. A broad movement against the Afghanistan war emerged, mobilizing hundreds of thousands. On the initiative of the Italian General Confederation of Labor, following three general strikes organized by Cobas and a year of movement activism by the FIOM, more than 3 million people demonstrated in Rome on March 23, 2002 against the reform of Article 18 which practically abolished protection against being fired from work. Three weeks later an 8-hour general strike brought the country to a halt. Grassroots trade unions and the Disobbedienti, who had by this point emerged from the TB, took part in the strike. On July 20, 2002, the anniversary of Carlo Giuliani’s death and the G8, rallies and actions took place throughout the whole of Italy. In Genoa, nine days of public debates, conferences, actions, street theater, concerts, and demonstrations took place and 150,000 people took part in the main demonstration.

Around 1 million people took part in the demonstration that followed the European Social Forum in Florence in November 2002. This was followed by a broad protest against the Iraq war which mobilized more than 3 million people to its main demonstration in February 2003. In spring 2004 it was still able to bring 1.5 million into the streets. At the same time, workplace struggles erupted, adopting forms of social disobedience.

From the end of 2003 onwards, blockades and occupations were increasingly used in social struggles, protests against nuclear waste, and in teachers’ strikes. The attempt to destroy the movement in Italy had the opposite effect. The movement first entered a downturn as the liberal left and Rifondazione Comunista began orienting themselves towards the next election, and finally with the electoral victory of the center-left coalition in April 2006. The new government prevented the parliamentary inquiry into Genoa from taking place, which they had themselves demanded while in opposition. Instead, Minister of Interior Giuliano Amato appointed Gianni De Gennaro to the Cabinet. He was the former chief of police in Italy and in the process of being prosecuted for incitement to perjury.

G8 protests, Gleneagles, 2005

Emma Dowling

The G8 summit is an annual meeting of the Group of Eight most industrialized nations (France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Canada, the UK, the United States and, since 1998, Russia). It is designed to help form a consensus around issues of mutual political and economic importance. The 2005 G8 summit in Scotland, however, was met by protest networks active within the global justice movement who had organized a number of activities to draw attention to the responsibility of the G8 for continued poverty, exploitation, and environmental destruction across the globe.

Relations between the multiplicity of actors associated with the global justice movement have never been straightforward, given the diversity of their tactics, strategies, and aims. At past protest events there had been at least some sense of unity against the effects of neoliberal globalization and the institutions associated with it. In Scotland, however, three different component forces of the movement organized separately from, and in many ways in opposition to, one another. Importantly, efforts ranged from a pro-G8 stance intent on lobbying the G8, to a complete rejection of the G8 and the capitalist system it stands for. Additionally, the massive Live 8 concerts, organized by philanthropic pop stars such as Bob Geldof and Bono, were a new feature of the summit events. Further to this, the UK government, as host to the G8, succeeded in conveying itself as not so much the object of the protests, but as an ally to certain elements of the movement, i.e., Make Poverty History (MPH) and Live 8.

Make Poverty History, G8 Alternatives, and the Dissent! Network

Led by the UK's poverty and development non-governmental organizations (NGOs) such as Oxfam, Christian Aid, Action Aid, and Cafod, the MPH campaign brought together a broad range of what is often termed "civil society," including charitable organizations, church groups, local councils, members of the public, businesses, and celebrities. Its intentions were to lobby the G8 (via the UK government) to implement policies that would alleviate extreme poverty in developing countries through trade justice, debt cancellation, and "more and better aid." The campaign began in the autumn of 2004 and involved awareness-raising to mobilize broad sections of the British public to support the campaign and its three demands. Participating organizations sold white wrist bands for people to wear to symbolize their support for the initiative, and thus raise money for their individual projects. Celebrities were brought on board and TV advertisements used to mobilize British society successfully.

Key to the campaign was the generation of public support for the lobbying efforts of organizations seeking to put moral pressure on the G8 to eradicate extreme poverty in the world. On Saturday July 2, before the official opening of the G8 summit, 300,000 people congregated in Edinburgh, mostly dressed in white, forming a large circle around the city center, symbolizing a giant white band to demand the G8 implement the policy proposals of MPH.

Political divisions as to the extent to which to collaborate with the UK government existed within the coalition between the larger (and wealthier) organizations such as Oxfam and the smaller, often politically more radical organizations such as War on Want or the World Development Movement, who also fostered close links with other wings of the movement. Yet the dominant organizations of the MPH campaign succeeded in stamping their vision of a close proximity to UK government policy on the campaign. MPH became the dominant actor in the public perception of the protests around the summit.

MPH was part of the Global Call to Action Against Poverty (G-CAP), which includes NGOs, but also networks and organizations traditionally associated with the global justice movement, such as local and national ATTAC groups (Association for the Taxation of Financial Transactions in the Aid of Citizens). In terms of the social base of the campaign, participants in MPH were almost exclusively UK-based. In many ways, MPH could be said to represent the “liberal” wing of the global justice movement, one which seeks to influence state power through lobbying its national government to achieve reform on a global scale.

A different grouping was the G8 Alternatives coalition, a Trotskyite-dominated coalition which involved some political parties, trade union branches, and smaller NGOs, as well as elements of the anti-war movement. They differentiated themselves from MPH by taking a more critical stance towards the G8 and neoliberalism, albeit encompassing “those who are against the G8 and also those who wish to lobby the G8,” as G8 Alternatives spokeswoman Gill Hubbard stated at the time. Their politics found expression in a counter-summit conference to discuss alternatives to neoliberal globalization and the G8, as well as a legal protest march (predominantly) against the G8 in Auchterarder, a town near to the Gleneagles Hotel, where the summit security fence was breached by protesters. Many speakers at the counter-summit were public figures recognized as activists of the global justice movement, such as Third World Forum director Samir Amin, former ATTAC vice president Susan George, and South African anti-privatization activist Trevor Ngwane. G8 Alternatives adopted the slogan “Another World Is Possible,” originating from the World Social Forum.

A third initiative was the Dissent! network, encompassing groups and individuals who had previously been involved in Britain’s ecological direct action movement, the People’s Global Action (PGA) network, the anti-war movement, and mobilizations against previous international summits. This network took an explicitly anti-G8, anti-capitalist, and anti-authoritarian stance, with a focus on direct actions involving disruption to the running of the summit and its policing efforts. Actions included road blockades, a Carnival for Full Enjoyment in Edinburgh (which intended to draw attention to the increasing precariousness of employment conditions), a series of discussions and training workshops entitled Days of Dissent at the University of Edinburgh, the opening of an independent media center (for activists to write and publish reports and photos of the protests), an eco-village protest camp in nearby Stirling, and the formation of a theatrical direct action group, the Clandestine Insurgent Rebel Clown Army (CIRCA).

Dissent!’s days of action spanned the weekend before the summit, where workshops were organized in Edinburgh and “convergence centers” (self-organized protest camps) opened to begin planning direct actions. The greatest visibility this network had was on July 6, when groups blockaded the roads out of Edinburgh and around Gleneagles in an attempt to disrupt the summit. The network as a whole issued no public statements due to its refusal of representational politics. Overwhelmingly, participants in this network rejected the G8 in its entirety, along with the state as a reference point for social change, intent on achieving the desired “other possible worlds” through self-organization beyond the realms of the nation-state. The politics of this network can be associated with anarchism, autonomism (non-institutionalized organization of class struggle), and anti-authoritarianism, but also more generally with notions of non-hierarchical and non-party/non-institutionalized activism associated with new social movements.

Relations Between MPH, G8 Alternatives, and Dissent!

The relations between these different initiatives were mostly antagonistic. While some ties existed between G8 Alternatives and Dissent!, whose participants equally perceived themselves as the direct descendants of previous summit mobilizations, their engagement with one another was cautious. This was because Dissent! network activists were largely both reluctant to find themselves being represented by those considered less radical than themselves and critical of G8 Alternatives’ perceived reluctance to take practical, direct action against the summit; while many of G8 Alternatives' protagonists were critical of what they saw as the elitism of a movement which privileged action taken by relatively small groups of activists over the building of broad-based mass movements with strong leadership structures.

At the same time, an understanding existed of the necessity to not appear divided in public. For example, David Miller, a spokesperson of G8 Alternatives, publicly condemned the police for their heavy-handed policing of actions associated with the Dissent! network. MPH existed virtually outside of this nexus, and hostilities were played out via the press where particularly the actions of the Dissent! network were relegated, much like in the discourse of the UK government, to an apolitical realm.

Live 8 and the UK Government

A novel feature of the 2005 event was the celebrity-led Live 8 pop concert extravaganzas, which took place in a number of cities across the globe simultaneously on July 2. Organized by musicians Bob Geldof, Midge Ure, and Bono with the involvement of the filmmaker Richard Curtis and the sponsorship of corporations such as AOL and Nokia, these concerts sought to revive the spirit of the Live Aid initiative of the early 1980s in drawing attention to the plight of African countries and calling for the G8 to act in line with the demands of MPH. The Live 8 leaders surpassed their role as entertainers for a good cause and became political actors, making demands of the G8 and commenting publicly on the political process taking place. Bob Geldof, Bono, and Richard Curtis all had previous involvement with charitable work and in the run up to the G8 they gave press conferences and met regularly with UK governmental advisors.

The ideological emphasis here was on salvation, on the global North helping the "poor victims" of Africa who could not help themselves. The imagery of these concerts resonated perfectly with a position that would enable the political course of neoliberal globalization to continue, whereby the wealthy and powerful countries are understood as benign agents of positive change. Moreover, Live 8 exhibited the idea of politics as entertainment and consumption sold to a public that in this way is not so much politicized as disciplined into towing the line set out for them by those with power in the existing system.

The relationship that Live 8 exhibited towards other currents of protest was one of domination. The MPH/Live 8 axis was an uneasy one. In the run up to the event, the Live 8 protagonists supported MPH, but increasingly attempted to dominate the agenda by making direct comments regarding the political process of the G8 summit.

The UK government played an unusually active role in its attempts to integrate more moderate elements of the movement into its poverty alleviation discourse. It sought to insert itself as a movement actor, publicly supporting MPH and Live 8 and deploying discourses previously associated with the global justice movement. It created an image of itself as the representative of the movement for global justice within the G8 negotiations, taking the policy demands of MPH to the G8 and "doing its best" to see them implemented. Under the leadership of British Prime Minister Tony Blair, the plight of Africa had been placed at the top of the agenda for the summit meeting and the Commission for Africa set up, bringing together UK government departments with carefully selected civil society actors from the UK and the African continent, as well as celebrities such as Bob Geldof.

This further contributed to shifting the discourse which had previously targeted the G8 as a hindrance to global justice, to one in which the G8 could now be understood as part of the solution to the ills of neoliberal globalization. Clear dividing practices were employed selectively to facilitate and repress the different sections of the movement. While direct actions such as street blockades were branded as "violent" and without political content, the MPH campaign was seen as a welcome ally in tackling the world's problems with concrete policies supported by broad sections of UK society.

The year 2005 was also the first time the J8 (Junior Eight) summit gained larger visibility, where school children enacted the summit meeting and were also invited to develop their own ideas for how to make the world a better place, which were in turn submitted to the actual G8 meeting. This initiative formed part of the construction to position the G8 as an institution with the political will and power to alleviate social ills. It thus reflected the basic message that Live 8 and MPH carried: the G8 is a legitimate institution which, if effectively lobbied, can provide for the type of social change demanded by the global justice movement.

On July 7, news of bombings in the London Underground by an al-Qaeda sympathetic Islamist group (as became public in the subsequent days) interrupted summit events and bestowed a more somber atmosphere on the protests. Tony Blair declared to the press that he would not be deterred by violence and used the attacks in London as a way of separating the good forces for change (civil society, the G8, and benign state actors) from those supposedly intent on mindless disruption. While the deployment of a poverty alleviation discourse by heads of state, civil society actors, and the G8 itself signals a shift, critics argue this to be a smoke-screen to enable “business as usual” by the G8 states.

The 2005 G8 summit protest events reflect the complexity of activism for social change. It is not always easy to understand the dividing lines between progressive and reactionary forces. For some, MPH was a real success in bringing a more human and environmental focus to the table of the G8. For others, it signaled cooption and the failure of the global justice movement to maintain a legitimate yet confrontational voice in emphasizing the importance of struggles and grassroots movements as opposed to the top-down, market-oriented solutions of policy advisors, government officials, and multinational corporations.

G8 protests, Heiligendamm, June 2007

Ulrich Brand

From June 6–8, 2007, the annual summit of the Group of Eight (G8) most industrialized nations took place in Heiligendamm, Germany, on the Baltic coast. The gathering was hosted by the German government and accompanied by intense protests.

The G8 is an informal group which gathered for the first time in the city of Rambouillet, close to Paris, France, in November 1975. The heads of government of France, Germany, Japan, Italy, Great Britain, and the United States participated. In 1976 the Canadian government joined, and the government of Russia in 1998. The EU Commission has participated since 1977, although since it is a supranational organization it is not an official member state.

The G8 fulfils a symbolic function. It is seen as where the “world leaders” get together in order to efficiently steer the world economy. Institutionally, it intends to be an important forum to deal with conflicts among the major political and economic states and problems within the world economy, such as currency imbalances, inflation, external debt, and energy security. It aims to ensure both the stability and dynamism of the global economy. More recently, other topics have been integrated into the agenda. In Heiligendamm the issues discussed included financial and capital markets, investment security, intellectual property, energy efficiency, climate politics, and development in Africa.

The noncommittal results of the summit were criticized and reinforced the political concerns of the protesters. The growing critique of neoliberal-imperial globalization led to an expansion of the agenda and the invitation of heads of governments of poor countries (especially from Africa). This was on top of an outreach initiative which has led to the governments of China, India, South Africa, Brazil, and Mexico – the most important so-called “emerging markets” besides Russia – being invited as guests, though not official members.

Beyond the annual summits and the meetings of finance ministers, which generate major publicity, the G8 is an ongoing process between high-ranking officials based in a range of government departments geared towards coordinating political-economic activities. The G8 plays a central role in global economic governance, or – to use a more critical concept – is a part of contemporary “ultra-imperialism” (a term used by Karl Kautsky to describe a period of capitalist development which characterized the early twentieth century) where powerful states coordinate among themselves, developing the political rules of the world economy. Yet the G8 is not the political center of the global economy. It is better understood as one node where major conflicts among powerful nations are dealt with and strategies developed. Nevertheless, it is a symbol of neoliberal imperial globalization and as such has become a target of protest.

As a result of the growth in protests against the annual G8 summits, and the 2001 summit in Genoa, Italy, in particular, meetings have since tended to be located in mountain regions or the countryside to make protest more difficult. It is for this reason that the 2007 summit did not take place in a major city, as with earlier meetings in Germany – Bonn in 1978 and 1985 (which was then the capital of West Germany), Munich in 1992, and Cologne in 1999 – but in a resort close to the town of Heiligendamm. Heiligendamm marks an important step in the history of the global justice movement as a result of the large, intense, and international mobilization, and because of the gaining of strength of the radical left within the counter-globalization movement in Germany in particular.

Towards the Protests

The mobilization began two years ahead of the summit in the autumn of 2005. The autonomous left formed the Dissent network in continuation of the network of the same name which was formed ahead of the 2005 G8 summit protests in Gleneagles, Scotland. Another network, the Interventionist Left (IL), was formed in the same year, describing itself as “post-autonomous” (in other words, radical left and anti-capitalist, with an openness toward working with non-autonomous others, such as trade unions and political parties). ATTAC Germany also decided early on to mobilize against the summit. Two annual conferences of BUKO (the Federal Coordination for Internationalism), which has existed since 1977, focused on the G8 in 2006 and

2007. In 2006 a large number of non-governmental organizations (NGOs), the Left Party, and the Green Party all decided to mobilize. (The Greens were voted out of the federal government in late 2005 and subsequently tried to reestablish the relationship with social movements that it had almost completely lost during its seven years in a power-sharing government.)

Countless local, regional, federal, and international meetings took place. Something along the lines of a nationwide steering committee, the Hannover Group, was formed by representatives of different actors within the mobilization to try and coordinate activities during the week of protest. Hundreds participated in three “Action Conferences” in Rostock itself to coordinate the preparation of specific events. An international initiative produced 50,000 copies of ten different posters, each produced by a different artist, under the label “Holy Damn It.” The posters criticized processes of privatization and exploitation, militarization and war, and racist, patriarchal, and class domination. They also called for the opening of space for alternatives.

In March 2006 a strategy paper was published by BUKO, articulating for the first time political positions which were widely shared by others within the mobilization (similar strategy papers published by others later put forward similar arguments). The paper interpreted the intensity of the mobilization, which began long ahead of the summit, as indicative of a widespread recognition of the need to organize politically and develop strategies against neoliberal and imperial globalization. The G8 was described as a node in a complex web of relations of global domination which had been placed under pressure due to numerous crises and the growth of protest. It concluded that central strategies for the mobilization should involve a delegitimation of the G8, using the occasion of the summit to reflect on the current situation, to mobilize, to bring different movements together, and to organize politically. The goal would then be to undermine dominant thinking and action, to criticize dominant politics, and to strengthen counter-movements and alternatives. In addition, an important aspect of the protests should involve allowing visibility and a voice for those people and forces which are generally marginalized. Special attention, the paper also pointed out, should be given to the fact that the state and media would likely try to divide the protest movements.

From the winter of 2006/2007 onwards, the production of alternative knowledge began to play an increasingly central role. Dissent, the Interventionist Left, and ATTAC all produced their own information and propaganda. Several anthologies and monographs were published. Numerous alternative and radical publications produced a special issue about the summit, and the Internet played an important role. Several left-wing and center-left daily newspapers, such as Neues Deutschland, Junge Welt, die tageszeitung, and the Frankfurter Rundschau, provided extensive coverage of the event in advance and supplements during the week with detailed reports and background information. A number of raids by police on offices and apartments thought to be connected to those involved with the mobilization served as a final mobilizing factor. They were widely criticized, including within the liberal media.

The Week of Protest

Camps were organized to accommodate thousands of protesters, with the support of the local government in Rostock and the state of Mecklenburg-Vorpommern. The protests opened on June 1, 2007 with a demonstration against the “Bombodrom” (a site where bombs are test-dropped), near Rostock. The largest demonstration took place on Saturday, June 2, in Rostock, where 80,000 people protested against the G8, neoliberal and imperial globalization, and the recent repression of social movements in Germany. The demonstration ended with a confrontation between some protesters – parts of the Black Bloc, which consisted of between 3–5,000 anarchists, members of autonomous and anti-fascist groups, and others – and the police. The police had already criminalized protesters in the run-up to the week of protest and consciously provoked them during the demonstration and blockades. While the police might not have “started it” during the demonstration, many witnesses reported that they did deploy violence in situations where there was no provocation. Their policy was a long way from the “de-escalation” they had promised. Many argued that the police and government both had an interest in producing images of confrontation during the demonstration on Saturday. Occurring within the context of an increased dismantling of civil and social rights in Germany, the protests in Rostock and around Heiligendamm have since been used to further justify demands for an expansion in the state’s security apparatus.

A significant moment that followed the demonstration on Saturday was the refusal of the grassroots to allow a split to emerge within the movement, despite a number of statements by “representatives” of the protest in this direction, including demands for the blockades of the summit planned for later in the week to be cancelled. Despite a number of people distancing themselves, the fact remained that the radical and autonomous areas of the left formed a major part of the protests. It had not “attached” itself to the mobilization, or “instrumentalized” it (despite some people exploiting the opportunity of the demonstration, or displaying irresponsibility towards other protesters while throwing stones). They remained an important and dynamic part of the movement.

On Sunday, June 3 a day of action took place on the issue of agriculture and genetic engineering. On Monday the 4th, protests and demonstrations took place demanding global freedom of movement and equal rights for everyone, including migrants and refugees. On Tuesday the 5th, a day of action was held against war, militarism, torture, and the “global state of exception.”

The centerpiece of the week of protest was the blockade of the summit itself on Wednesday the 6th through Friday the 8th, involving around 13,000 people. They produced images of colorful, radical, and successful protests against the summit, blocking many of the roads into the conference center, forcing many delegates, journalists, and service providers to be either flown in or to be brought into Heiligendamm by sea. The blockades were complemented by an Alternative Summit in Rostock, with around 2,000 participants.

Alongside the demonstration and blockades, one of the events that drew the most media attention was a huge pop concert on Thursday, June 7, which drew around 60,000 spectators. The concert sought to provide a “voice for Africa” and had been organized by Herbert Grönemeyer, a well-known German rock musician. Musicians and lobbyists Bob Geldof and Bono, who had organized a similar event to coincide with the 2005 G8 summit, drew further media attention by also taking to the stage.

Beyond Heiligendamm

During the two-year mobilization against the G8 summit, and during the week of protest itself, the diversity of the movement – and the benefits that could be drawn from this diversity – became clear to most of those either directly involved or observing the process. Mutual points of reference, common forms of action, and intense debate and marked difference, all characterized the movement around Heiligendamm. Public credibility was gained through sound reasoning and sharp criticism. The left in Germany moved along a steep learning curve, as well as growing numerically, with a large number of younger people becoming politically active for the first time. The interaction between the movement and political parties – and the Left Party in particular – was relaxed and cooperative. In all these respects, the mobilization served as a genuine crystallization point for the broad left.

Despite all this, and the clear orientation as being of the left (the extreme right in Europe, of course, is also against globalization), success was limited. It has since been pointed out that the production of a positive public image for left-wing social movements is not the same as subverting neoliberal and imperial hegemony, or the construction of alternative forms of social interaction (Brand & Wissen 2005; Mertes 2004; della Porta 2007). The culture of the market, competitive individualism, and the culture of fear – all of which make emancipatory thought and practice difficult – do not simply disappear. During the mobilization the question of political organization was widely debated. While the protests were successful in attracting a large number of people not affiliated to any political organization, the challenge of developing organizational and institutional structures to increase the effectiveness of struggles remains largely unfulfilled.

A further perceived failure of the mobilization was the inability to formulate coherent, emancipatory positions on climate change and energy use – key topics discussed at the summit. Increasing efficiency and ecological modernization, as propagated by the German government and others around the summit, have made considerable ideological inroads – including into the left. The primary criticism of radicals has simply been that these policies do not go far enough. There has been very little success in terms of making connections between, for example, global warming, social crises, and questions of power and domination.

The movement in Germany has largely set itself the task of extending the positive experiences of the mobilization and applying them to other parts of society, developing a “rebellious consciousness,” articulating concrete critiques of social relations along various lines of conflict, and building alternative structures and transforming existing institutions. In other words, “translating” the recent experience of the mobilization into everyday politics and everyday life in order to shift the current balance of forces.

Gabriel's Rebellion

Douglas R. Egerton

The enslaved revolutionary known only as Gabriel was born in 1776 near Richmond, Virginia, at Brookfield, the Henrico County plantation of Thomas Prosser. By Virginia standards, Brookfield was a large plantation, with approximately 50 laborers. Most likely, Gabriel's father was a blacksmith, the occupation chosen for Gabriel. Status as an artisan provided considerable standing in the slave community, as did his ability to read and write. In the fall of 1798 Gabriel's master died, and ownership of Brookfield passed to 22-year-old Thomas Henry Prosser, who maximized his profits by hiring out his surplus slaves, so Gabriel spent a considerable part of each month smithing in Richmond for white artisans. Although still a slave, he enjoyed a rough form of freedom.

Emboldened by this quasi-liberty, in September 1799 Gabriel moved toward overt rebellion. Caught in the act of stealing a pig by a white neighbor, Gabriel wrestled the man to the ground and bit off the better "part of his left Ear" and was formally charged with attacking a white man, a capital crime. Although found guilty, he escaped the gallows by pleading "benefit of clergy," which allowed him to avoid hanging in exchange for being branded on the thumb with a small cross as he was able to recite a verse from the Bible.

Gabriel's branding and incarceration served as a brutal reminder that despite his literacy and privileged status, he remained a slave. By the early spring of 1800 his fury began to turn into a carefully considered plan to bring about his freedom, as well as the end of slavery in Virginia. Slaves and free blacks from Henrico County would gather at Brookfield on the evening of August 30 to march on Richmond. If Governor James Monroe and the town leaders agreed to Gabriel's demands for black liberty and an equitable distribution of the property, the slave general intended to "hoist a white flag" and drink a toast "with the merchants of the city."

The conspiracy matured in the context of Atlantic and political affairs of the late 1790s. Since 1793, large number of refugees from the slave rebellion in French Saint Domingue had arrived in Virginia, many of them bringing their bondservants with them. But if the uprising in the Caribbean helped to inspire mainland rebels, it was the divisive election of 1800 that provided Gabriel with his opportunity. Rumors held that if Thomas Jefferson was victorious the Federalists would not relinquish power, and one Federalist newspaper predicted an "ultimate appeal to arms by the two great parties." Most likely, Gabriel not only hoped to exploit this split among white elites, but also to throw his lot in with either side who would do the slaves the most favor in the coming civil conflict.

The planned uprising collapsed just before sunset on the appointed day, when a severe thunderstorm hit the Richmond area. The chaos of the storm convinced two Henrico slaves that the revolt could not succeed. They informed their owner of the conspiracy and he hurried word to Monroe. After hiding along the James River for nearly two weeks, Gabriel risked boarding the schooner Mary. Captain Richardson Taylor, a recent convert to Methodism, spirited him downriver to Norfolk, where he was betrayed by an enslaved crewman, who had heard Monroe offered a $300 reward for the rebel's capture.

Returned to Richmond under heavy guard, Gabriel was quickly tried and found guilty of "conspiracy and insurrection." On October 10, 1800, the 24-year-old revolutionary died on the town gallows. In all, 26 slaves were hanged for their part in the conspiracy. Eight more rebels were transported to Spanish New Orleans; at least 32 others were found not guilty. Reliable sources placed the number of slaves who knew of the plot to be between five and six hundred.

In the aftermath, white authorities tightened restrictions upon all slaves. In late 1802 Monroe established the Public Guard of Richmond, a nighttime police force designed to protect the public buildings and militia arsenals. The state assembly passed a law ending the right of masters to hire out their surplus slaves, and in 1806 the legislature amended the state's Manumission Act of 1782 by requiring liberated bondpeople to leave Virginia or face reenslavement.

Gaitán, Jorge Eliécer (1898–1948), UNIR, and revolutionary populism in Colombia

Raina Zimmering

Jorge Eliécer Gaitán was a popular politician in Colombia and advocate who appealed to common people, and is best remembered for his tremendous oratory. His death created the deepest crisis in Colombian history. He was born on January 23, 1903 in Bogotá and died in April 9, 1948. After studying political science and law in Bogotá at the National University of Colombia and obtaining his doctoral thesis with the title “The socialist ideas in Colombia,” he completed a doctorate in law at the Sapienza in Rome, where he earned the second doctor title in jurisprudence with the thesis “The positive criteria of the premeditation.”

Gaitán was educated as professor of law at the National University of Bogotá and the Free University. He was critical of the control of Colombia by a small oligarchy and the marginalization of peasants and workers and opposed the growing imperial influence of the United States. As a congressman of the Liberal Party he became known for the denunciation of the massacre of banana workers of Magdalena. In 1933 Gaitán was elected leader of the Chamber of Representatives.

Frustrated by the failed reforms of the Liberal government of Olaya Herrera, Gaitán and supporters founded the Unión Nacional Izquierdista Revolucionaria (UNIR) as a movement of popular masses and labor unions that differed from the traditional parties. As advisor for unions in their fight for better life and labor conditions, Gaitán broadened the organization’s basis. The UNIR disbanded after winning only 3,800 votes in parliamentary elections in 1935. This was the result of its temporary elections boycott and the Liberal Party tactic of coopting the demands of UNIR for social intervention with the notion of “Revolution in March.” In 1936 as mayor of Bogotá, Gaitán implemented important social reforms. The Liberal Party offered Gaitán a seat in parliament; he accepted with plans to introduce UNIR’s strategy. His view was that the people should take command of the party, fire the Liberal oligarchy, and establish a democratic program, transforming the Liberals into a genuine people’s party.

As minister of education in the government of Santos (1938–40) Gaitán was responsible for a series of educational reforms, especially the campaign of alphabetization. He instituted free school shoes, school lunch, and the ambulant educational cinema, and expanded cultural events. President López Pumarejo named Gaitán labor minister and supported the agrarian and tax reforms (Café Export), reintroduction of general voting rights, and an active union policy. Not only the Conservatives, but also the Liberal oligarchy resisted all these reforms. From 1945 Gaitanism grew to a mass movement without a solid structure or organization.

In the 1946 presidential elections Gaitán ran as a dissident candidate of the Liberal Party, and came third behind the Conservative Ospina Pérez and the Liberal Gabriel Turbay. Most of Gaitán’s support was from his base on Colombia’s Atlantic coast and Bogotá. The Conservative Party victory encouraged conservative landowners to suspend land reform. Gaitán left the populist efforts and returned to the liberal mainstream, opposing a general strike on legal grounds. In 1947 Gaitán, as Liberal Party leader, gained popularity among Liberals and Conservatives in Congress, and was considered a most promising candidate to win the next presidential elections in 1950. In the years leading up to the elections he proclaimed the March of Silence and the March of Torches in opposition to the Conservative government’s state repression and assassination of a journalist.

On April 9, 1948 Gaitán himself was assassinated by Juan Roa Sierra as he was leaving his law office in Bogotá. According to CIA Director Hillenkoetter, Roa was related to a murder victim in a case Gaitán had successfully tried the day before. The assassination took place during the Ninth Pan-American Conference in Bogotá from March to May 1948, presided over by US Secretary of State George Marshall. The final act of the conference was a pledge for hemispheric solidarity in opposition to “international communism,” marking the beginning of the Cold War in Latin America. The Organization of American States (OAS), headquartered in Washington, DC, was also founded at the Bogotá meetings.

The assassination of Gaitán was followed by days of rioting in Bogotá known as Bogotazo, and in cities across Colombia. Supporters of Gaitán attacked the Government Palace of the Conservative President Ospina Pérez and other official buildings. Many soldiers and policemen were called in, including the Chulavitas, a militia from Boyacá, to fight the insurrection and protect the palace. Almost the whole center of Bogotá burned; some 3,000 people lost their lives in the Bogotazo. The Bogotazo represented the beginning of the civil war between Conservatives and Liberals, known as La Violencia, which claimed the lives of 200,000 people from 1948 to 1963. During La Violencia the Liberal and Communist parties organized autonomous defense groups (later FARC) against the violence of the Conservative bands of Pajaros and Chulavitas who were massacring the peasant population in the countryside. From the armed hostilities emerged “independent republics” in many parts of the country, consisting of members of the Communist Party and Liberal and independent countrymen.

Jorge Eliécer Gaitán is considered among the most important symbolic figures in Colombian history, used as a heroic symbol by people of diverse political perspectives.

Galleani, Luigi (1861–1931)

Jeff Shantz

Luigi Galleani was, during his lifetime, among the most significant and best known anarchist-communists. Largely forgotten for decades, he has recently been rediscovered by the generation of anarchists politicized during the alternative globalization struggles.

Born in Vercelli, Italy, Galleani studied law before turning into one of its most dedicated enemies; early in life, he was forced to flee from country to country to escape prosecution, traveling through France, Switzerland, Egypt, and Britain – punctuated by a five-year jail stint on the island of Pantelleria – before reaching the United States in 1901. There, he led a textile workers’ strike in Paterson, New Jersey, before resettling in Vermont and Massachusetts, where he published a weekly newspaper, Cronaca Sovversiva (Subversive Chronicles). Deported to Italy with eight of his followers in 1919, Galleani quickly landed in prison again three times for inciting soldiers to mutiny, receiving anarchist propaganda by mail, and speaking out against the rise of Italy’s Fascist Party. Toward the end of his life, he penned La fine dell’anarchismo? (The End of Anarchism?, 1925) as a retort to the disparaging comments of ex-anarchist Saverio Merlino, who had turned toward parliamentary politics (Seele 1998).

Already suppressed in 1918 for its anti-war stance, then targeted by Attorney General Alexander Mitchell Palmer following a series of bombings committed by Galleani’s supporters in 1919, the Cronaca Sovversiva gained international attention during the trial of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti (1920–7), as the supposed association of Galleani’s paper with the two accused was used as evidence of their avowal of violence. For his part, as a defender of “propaganda by the deed” – exemplary acts of violence by individuals – Galleani refused to separate any particular act of rebellion from the context in which it arose, an intricate convergence of predisposing conditions which, at certain times, demand “force and violence,” since the ruling classes, reigning by these means, will yield to them alone (1925/1982: 11). Likewise, Galleani declined to separate propaganda by the deed from the broader revolutionary process, seeing it as a necessary phase between theoretical affirmation and insurrectionary movement. He presented “propaganda by the deed” as the manual counterpart to the intellectual labor of speeches, writings, denunciations, and public meetings. One fulminates, the other acts; both are necessary.

Galleani drew a distinction between “anarchist-communism” and “socialist-collectivism” and offered a critique of the “administrative government” or council system which some socialists envisioned as a replacement for the state. He also provided a strong defense of the “free individual within the free society” (1925/1982: 10), arguing against even limited administration and representation. Establishing himself as a firm opponent of reformism, Galleani used economic as well as political arguments to illustrate how reforms restore the advantage of capital, helping capitalists to reorganize and extend their rule. Reforms, “the ballast the bourgeoisie throws overboard to lighten its old boat in the hope of saving the sad cargo of its privileges from sinking in the revolutionary storm” (1925/1982: 13), were, for him, the business of ruling classes, not anarchists or socialists.

In place of short-range reformism Galleani advocated “tactics of corrosion” and “continuous attack.” Galleani offered an immanent view of anarchism, seeing anarchist proclivities in selfless acts of aid and support in the present, reminding his readers that such acts are received with a joy and appreciation that “never greeted a commandment of god, an edict of a king, a law of parliament” (1925/1982: 27). Recognizing the daily contradictions and obstacles anarchists face – e.g., jobs, rent – he advocated, wherever possible, carving out realms of autonomy, creativity, and self-determination (1927/2006). Such tactics should not be limited to pursuing material gains, although Galleani and his comrades were extremely poor, but must seek a more extensive experience and deeper awareness in various aspects of life. Galleani enthusiastically advocated “immediate attempts at partial expropriation” along with “individual rebellion” and insurrection “for the sake of struggle itself” (1925/1982: 12).

In rather harsh terms, Galleani dismissed the supposed disagreement between “individualist” anarchists such as Max Stirner and “organizational” anarchists such as Luigi Fabbri and Errico Malatesta as having no “really important basis,” characterizing it rather as “only the result of incomprehension and equivocation, caused more often by inaction and indolence than by bad faith, and which hard experience is bound to dispel” (1925/1982: 35). Galleani’s position derives from his definition of anarchism as the struggle for a social condition in which the solidarity of material and moral interests provides the only link among individuals, in the absence of vicious competition.

The character of solidarity is itself formed from spontaneity and freedom. Communism, understood as the free cooperation of people, and individualism, the development of the individual free from institutional authority, rather than being contradictory or incompatible, are complementary terms. Conversely, those who “presume to practice individualism in the name of their ego, over the obedient, resigned, or inert ego of others” are merely “heralds of domination” (1925/1982: 40). While championing free cooperation, however, Galleani reserves little sympathy for formal organizations, be they proletarian parties, programmatic groups, or labor unions. Galleani rejects any notion that anarchists, simply by virtue of their being anarchists, would not succumb to the hierarchies and authorities structured within organizations (1927/2006).

Galleani’s perspective is marked by a strong progressivism in which anarchism is presented as an evolutionary phase beyond socialism, and he viewed human development in terms of the satisfaction of an ever-growing variety of ever more complicated and extensive needs, which provide the index of progress, both for individuals and communities. He viewed this development as nothing less than the increasing solidarity of humans united in struggle against nature, their common adversary.

Gambetta, Léon (1838–1882)

Torbjörn Wandel

Léon Gambetta was instrumental in bringing down the regime of Louis-Napoleon Bonaparte (Napoleon III) and the Second Empire (1852–70) and in bringing about the Third Republic (1870–1940). Born in Cahors in southwest France to an Italian grocer of modest means, Gambetta went to Paris to study law and soon joined the opposition to the Second Empire that fomented in the Latin Quarter in the 1860s. He emerged as a leading voice of a new generation of republicans. He and his confidants, who were often young, from the provinces, fresh to the political scene, and hostile to the Catholic Church, represented a new breed in French politics, labeled by Gambetta himself as “the new social layers” (les nouvelles couches sociales), which called for an end to the “monopoly of the elders” (monopole des Messieurs) that dominated Second Empire politics and finance.

As a leader of the opposition, Gambetta helped pave the way for the republic that would fill the vacuum left by the collapse of the empire during the Franco-Prussian War in 1870. Two days after the emperor's defeat at Sedan, the “men of September 4,” led by Gambetta, declared France a republic at the City Hall of Paris. Although he had opposed the war – and had left Paris in a dramatic balloon flight out of the city – Gambetta, now as minister of the interior, urged his compatriots to continue the fight. After Adolphe Thiers, the executive, had crushed the Paris Commune in the Bloody Week and signed a treaty with Prussia to end the war, Gambetta, while never muting his fiery rhetoric, began to moderate his politics. Many republicans would settle for nothing less than a unicameral assembly modeled on the First Republic, established during the French Revolution in 1792. With monarchists in a sizable majority in the makeshift legislative body, Gambetta argued that it was better to save a moderate, compromised republic than lose it completely, thus inaugurating the major political division among republicans for the remainder of the century, that between Opportunists and Radicals. For the same reason, he supported the conservative constitution of 1875, modeled on the Restoration Charter of 1814 that formally inaugurated the Third Republic and abandoned the Radical program of social legislation and immediate separation between church and state. At the same time, he conducted speaking tours around the country, helping to elect republican candidates in the by-elections that followed the ratification of the constitution. His tireless efforts and enormous appeal enabled republicans to capture the Chamber of Deputies, Senate, and presidency by 1879. Thus, Gambetta deserves much of the credit for diminishing support for the empire, ushering in the Third Republic, and placing it securely in republican hands, where it would remain until 1940, making it the longest-lasting constitutional regime to date in French history. His vast popularity caused his fellow republicans, suspicious of magnetic personalities, to refrain from offering him the post of prime minister until late 1881 and early 1882. He died less than a year later.

Following his death in 1882, Gambetta received a majestic state funeral and his heart was placed in the Pantheon, where the greatest French citizens are interred. In the twentieth century, however, his reputation fluctuated. His advocacy of free trade, education, and election reform, along with his opposition to socialism, exemplified to many a bourgeois republic that fecklessly presided over a stalemated society. Recently, with the decline of Marxism and rise of neoliberalism in France and elsewhere, Gambetta's reputation has soared, with many hailing him a clear-headed pragmatist and sober realist. Neither image is totally accurate. Clearly, Gambetta came to favor educational reform and access to the ballot box over a more direct solution to the social question. Whatever flaws have subsequently become apparent, he did more than anyone else to bring down the empire and establish what was at the time politically one of the most democratic societies in the world.

Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (1869–1948)

Kunal Chattopadhyay

Mohandas Karamchand (Mahatma) Gandhi was a foremost Indian nationalist and considered by many as the founder of modern non-violent resistance. Born in Porbandar, Gujarat State in 1869, Gandhi was married to Kasturbai when he was 13 and she slightly younger, an experience that turned him into a bitter opponent of child marriage. Gandhi left for England in 1888 to study law, after which he went to South Africa in search of a job. In 1907, fighting against a Transvaal law imposing the compulsory registration and fingerprinting of Indians, Gandhi developed a unique non-violent method of agitation known as satyagraha. This non-violent form of protest involved the peaceful violation of specific laws, courting mass arrests, occasional hartals (a form of general strike or closing shops and markets), and spectacular rallies. The protest was followed by another satyagraha of Indian women and miners against the imposition of a poll tax, refusal to recognize Indian marriages, immigration regulations, and indentured labor. In 21 years in South Africa, Gandhi's ideas were formulated, inspired by Ruskin, Tolstoy, and Thoreau. Motivated by Ruskin, Gandhi lived an austere life in a commune, first in Phoenix Farm in Natal, and then in Tolstoy Farm just outside Johannesburg. During this period certain experiments involving diet, childrearing, nature cure, and his personal and professional life convinced Gandhi that a political leader must also be morally pure.

The Gandhian Style

The peculiar conditions of South Africa made possible the unity of Hindus, Muslims, Christians and Parsis, Gujaratis and South Indians, upper-class merchants and lawyers as well as mineworkers. This made Gandhi, by the time he returned to India, much more of an all-India figure than any of his predecessors. The basic Gandhian style, worked out in South Africa, included satyagraha, meticulous attention to organizational and specifically financial details, training of disciplined cadres, a readiness to negotiate and to call off movements unilaterally even when it was unpopular, the cultivation of vegetarianism, experiments in sexual self-restraint, and so on. During World War I Gandhi campaigned for military recruitment, in the hope of winning postwar political concessions. Pre-Gandhi nationalist politics had oscillated between the “moderate” politics of “mendicancy” (petitions, meetings in halls, editorials in nationalist journals, and so on) and “terrorism” (individual violence). Working-class strikes in Bombay after Bal Gangadhar Tilak's arrest in 1908 or on other occasions made mill owners fearful. Gandhian techniques promised to bind the mass movement to a leader whose social ideas, especially ideas about property rights, were impeccable. Non-violence made Gandhi and the Gandhi-led Indian National Congress able to mediate internal social conflicts so that they did not transgress bourgeois limits, thereby assuming the character of an umbrella-type organization that straddled all social divides.

Another aspect of Gandhi's appeal lay in his program of social regeneration, which was combined with the political struggle for independence. This enabled him to work out a model of hegemony. Taking over and extending the Romantic critique of industrialism from Ruskin, Gandhi argued that mere political swaraj (self-rule) would mean English rule without the English. His alternative was a small peasant utopia, as outlined in his book Hind Swaraj (1908). Gandhi argued that railways had spread plague and produced famines by exporting food grain, and western medicine was costly and ruined natural health measures. All this, he averred, had to go, and the upper classes had to live the life of a peasant. He concretized this vision by the programs of khadi (handspun coarse cloth), village reconstruction, and later welfare of the Harijan (lower caste or untouchables). None of these were programs capable of challenging fundamental social relations, so the upper classes could be happy. Noted Indian Marxist historian Sumit Sarkar

Mahatma Gandhi is, for many, the embodiment of non-violent peaceful popular resistance. Here he marches with Indian poet and politician Sarojini Naidu and 77 others to protest the British monopoly on salt production. This "Salt March" protest covered 241 miles in 24 days in 1930 and has inspired a number of peaceful protests since, including Martin Luther King, Jr.'s civil rights marches in the United States. has used this feature to refute the imperialist, Cambridge School-style interpretation that sees Gandhi as principally a broker between different factions, saying they ignore his immense mass appeal. Given the diverse social matrix of India, a Gandhi-type leadership was historically necessary. On one hand, peasant participation was giving a radical twist to Gandhi's program. On the other hand, when he called off movements, they had no alternative leadership to carry the struggles forward: they still could not represent themselves but had to be represented. This fact of ultimate peasant limitation as regards centralized leader-centric politics has possibly been ignored by scholars of the subaltern school such as Ranajit Guha, who in their romanticization of the spontaneous revolutionary potential of the peasantry tend to overestimate the possibility of localized peasant resistance.

The Rise to Leadership

Gandhi returned to India in 1915 and gained a political reputation through three local struggles. In Champaran, a village in Bihar, the key role was played by rich and middle peasants who had invited Gandhi, local moneylenders who resented planter competition, and some village teachers. Gandhi's role lay in giving indigo planter oppression in Champaran wide publicity through an inquiry. In the Kheda district of Gujarat, there was a struggle for rent reduction in times of poor harvest by the patidars (peasant proprietors). Though the initial movement had limited success, Gandhian methods were appreciated because the peasants, as property owners, did not want a violent revolution. But the peasants had their own views and were far from mindless puppets manipulated by Gandhi and his "subcontractors." In the same Kheda area, Gandhi's campaigns for war recruitment met not just with refusal but with outright hostility. The Ahmedabad struggle was one of Gandhi's rare interventions in urban working-class protests. Textile workers in this city in Gujarat were demanding a 50 percent wage hike in a period of rising prices, but owners were unwilling to give more than 20 percent. However, the textile magnate Ambalal Sarabhai had been a follower of Gandhi and had contributed substantially to the Sabarmati Ashram (retreat) that he had set up in Gujarat. Gandhi used the tactic of the hunger strike for the first time and the workers got a 35 percent wage rise. This outlook never spread beyond Ahmedabad, and unlike other bourgeois nationalist leaders, Gandhi kept himself aloof from the All-India Trade Union Congress when it emerged a few years later.

Gandhi made his debut in all-India issues only after creating this reputation and wide base for himself, when the Rowlatt Act (1919) continued the suspension of civil rights even after the war. While all sections of Indian political opinion opposed the Rowlatt Act, it was Gandhi who showed the way to mass protest without leaving the terrain of elite control. The initial plan of courting arrest by public sale of prohibited works was expanded by Gandhi to include the novel and radical idea of an all-India hartal. Trouble broke out in Punjab, where Lieutenant Governor Michael O'Dwyer, who already had a bad reputation, imposed martial law. On April 13, 1919, General Dyer ordered his troops to open fire on an unarmed gathering without warning, in the enclosed ground named Jallianwalabagh. Nearly 2,500 men, women, and children were killed or injured. This unprecedented violence seems to have frightened most politicians, including Gandhi. Seeing widespread violence in retaliation, Gandhi confessed that he had made a “Himalayan blunder” in introducing satyagraha to Indian agitation, as people were not yet prepared for non-violent confrontation, and he unilaterally called it off.

Non-Cooperation

Gandhi hoped to cement Hindu–Muslim unity by calling for support for the Khilafat movement, which demanded that the Turkish sultan, as the khalifa (religious head of the Sunni Muslims), should retain control over Muslim sacred places, with enough territory to enable him to defend the Islamic faith. The movement had a moderate and a radical wing. Lower-middle-class journalists and ulama (Muslim legal scholars) with considerable influence in small towns and villages, led by Mohammed Ali and Shaikat Ali, wanted countrywide hartals. It was this group that first demanded non-cooperation at the Delhi all-India Khilafat Conference on November 22–3, 1919. According to Brown (1972), Gandhi emerged as an important broker between Khilafatists and Hindu politicians. After the Treaty of Sèvres, the radicals became dominant in the Khilafat movement and Gandhi sided with them. He now began pressing the Congress to adopt a plan of campaign around three issues: the “Punjab wrong,” the “Khilafat wrong,” and the nebulous concept of “swaraj.” Between September and December 1920, Gandhi was emerging as the supreme leader of the Congress, which approved a program of surrendering titles awarded by the British, boycotting schools, courts, and councils, boycotting foreign goods, and encouraging national schools, arbitration courts, khadi, and a no-tax campaign. Even Gandhi’s main opponent, Chittaranjan Das, dramatically changed sides. Crucial structural changes, made at Gandhi’s insistence, included expansion of the Congress’s mass base so that it was possible to recruit beyond the middle classes; a hierarchy of village taluka (district or town) committees; reorganization of provincial Congress committees on a linguistic basis (laying the foundations for the future states reorganization principle in independent India); and the creation of a small Congress Working Committee (CWC) as executive head.

Gandhi received mass support on the crest of a popular upsurge. At the biggest ever Congress session in Nagpur (December 1920), his supporters included the countrywide network of Marwari (People from Northwestern India) businessmen and traders, Muslim Khilafatists, and the Andhra delegates, whose linguistic identity was submerged. Muslims below the elite category gave Khilafat a social dimension absent in the original. In addition, there was a rising tide of labor and peasant struggles. The Congress-sponsored non-cooperation movement assumed a more militant phase of black flag demonstrations against the visit of the Prince of Wales in November 1921. Angered by the arrest of the Ali brothers, Khilafat leaders like Maulana Hasrat Mohani were demanding complete independence at the Ahmedabad Congress in December 1921. By February 1922, Gandhi decided to begin a no-revenue campaign at Bardoli, in Gujarat, on the issue of infringed liberties of speech, press, and association. But on February 5, 1922, angry peasants at Chauri Chaura, in Gorakhpur district of the United Provinces, burned 22 policemen alive. Gandhi immediately called off the entire movement unilaterally, greatly alienating the Khilafatists and completely disregarding the mood of the masses.

Despite attempts to contain the movement to a narrowly anti-British line, excluding social dimensions, popular response tended to go over the line. This was why Chauri Chaura was, for Gandhi, not a single incidence of violence but the capstone of an entire edifice. British alarm at the incident is recorded by the fact that initially 172 of the 225 accused were sentenced to death (eventually 19 were hanged). But neither Gandhi nor any other leaders condemned this. Gandhi’s self-justification revealed his political orientation. While stressing absolute non-violence he argued, in Young India on February 16, 1922, that if the country became independent, such violent people would pose a problem. Gandhi was now arrested and given a six-year jail term. The next few years saw realignments. Motilal Nehru, C. R. Das, and others formed the Swarajya Party within the Congress and pressed for participation in elections with the radical purpose of “wrecking the constitution from within.” After his release from jail, Gandhi, who was noncommittal about this proposal, concentrated on constructive programs like impressive relief work in emergencies (floods), in building national schools, the promotion of khadi and other cottage crafts, anti-alcohol propaganda, and work among the untouchables. As a program for India's social problems, the effort was a failure. National schools were never successful except in brief periods of political excitement. Even Gandhi's program for the untouchables was very limited. In rejecting basic land reforms, he ignored the deeply exploitative agrarian system that was at the base of the poverty of most of the Dalits (oppressed: the term former untouchables prefer to Gandhi's term Harijan). Radical anti-casteists, like E. V. R. Naicker of Tamil Nadu, were disappointed when Gandhi defended the Varnashrama ideals (caste ideals as formulated in the Vedic literature). Gyanendra Pandey (2002) and other modern studies confirm that the constructive program was valuable in building political linkages and establishing Congress hegemony. But Gandhi never parted company with Madan Mohan Malaviya, founder of the Hindu Mahasabha (a Hindu fundamentalist organization), and his followers, who had never fought British imperialism.

Civil Disobedience

In November 1927, the British government announced the all-white Simon Commission to look into the question of further constitutional and administrative changes. A Simon Commission boycott movement generated radical political developments. But given Congress softness toward the Mahasabha, the Congress was largely responsible for the aloofness and hostility of Muslim leaders toward the next round of the Gandhian movement two years later.

Throughout 1928 and 1929, Gandhi sought to limit pressure for a fresh round of all-India mass struggle aimed at complete independence. Despite repeated Congress resolutions on purna swaraj (complete independence) from 1927 to 1929, Gandhi emphatically demanded a moderate proposal for dominion status. Gandhi's hesitations reflected business reluctance and ambiguity. In a March 1929 speech, Homi Mody, chairman of the Bombay Mill Owners' Association, focused on the "unprecedented general strike" organized by the communist-led Girni Kamgar (Worker) Union. In 1929, Dorabji

Tata, Cowasji Jehangir, and Ibrahim Rahimtulla, the most pro-government capitalists who were dependent on state contracts and patronage, sought to develop a business-oriented party distinct from the Congress. Rather different was the strategy of Ghanshyam Das Birla, seeking to use Gandhi's influence to counter growing radicalism. On November 2, 1929, Gandhi, Motilal, the Liberals, and Malaviya joined in accepting Viceroy Irwin's offer of a Round Table Conference on the condition of discussing amnesty and the details of dominion status among other issues. Subhas Bose, one of the radical leaders, objected, but Jawaharlal Nehru ultimately went along. With the viceroy rejecting Gandhi's conditions, however, negotiations broke down. Then in the Lahore Congress of 1929 with Jawaharlal's presidential address attacking capitalism and trusteeship theory, Gandhi emerged fully in control at the sessions. Subhas Bose's proposals for non-payment of taxes and general strikes were rejected. Gandhi pushed through the main resolution so that it ultimately had a word of praise for Irwin, and endorsed initial acceptance of his offer. Nonetheless, despite the hesitant leadership, a qualitative leap forward was taken in the anti-colonial struggle. Delegates welcomed the unfurled tricolor which displayed not only the traditional slogan Bande Mataram (salutations to the motherland), but also Inquilab Zindabad (long live the revolution).

Gandhi neutralized the radical turn in the Congress by launching a new program of satyagraha against the tax on salt involving a 400-kilometer march from Ahmedabad to Dandi (March 12–April 6, 1930). Though his 11-point ultimatum to Irwin seemed a climbdown from the demand for complete independence, this charter reflected his expertise in harmoniously combining bourgeois issues with peasant ones couched as a national demand. Demands included 50 percent cuts in military-bureaucratic expenses as well as three specific bourgeois demands (lowering of the rupee-sterling exchange ratio, textile protection, and reservation of coastal shipping for Indians) and two basically peasant themes (the lowering of land revenue and the abolition of the salt tax). Gandhi clearly had no intention of endorsing Jawaharlal's suggestions for anti-zamindar (landlord) no-rent campaigns. The salt tax had the effect of being a peasant issue which targeted only the government.

Popular pressure was evident when village officials began resigning along Gandhi's route, and patidars in the Borsad taluk of Kheda district demanded permission to start non-payment of revenue – a demand Gandhi conceded with great reluctance. However, it was no longer possible to restrict everything as Gandhi would have liked. A few instances of violence occurred, such as the armed rising and seizure of the Chittagong armory organized by Surya Sen in April 1930 and the refusal of upper-caste Hindu soldiers sent by the British government to attack the Khudai Khidmatgar organized by Khan Abdul Gaffar Khan in Peshawar, thwarting British hopes of creating a communal divide. Gandhi repudiated this action, saying that as soldiers they ought to have obeyed their superiors. Finally, in Sholapur, an industrial city in Maharashtra, news of Gandhi's arrest sparked off a textile strike which turned violent. Order was restored only through martial law after May 16.

The stated goal of the civil disobedience agitation was nothing short of complete independence. Brutal violence was used on the most peaceful of agitators. Purushottamdas Thakurdas bitterly complained about the beating of women and children by the police. The no-rent campaign was highly successful in the Gandhian base at Bardoli. Negotiations at this stage, with Gandhi and Nehru demanding a complete national government with control over defense and finance, broke down. From September 1930 onwards, both traders and mill owners were showing signs of strain. In the countryside, purely Gandhian forms of struggle, based on relatively prosperous peasants, were losing potency, while socially dangerous forms such as no-rent campaigns and tribal rebellions were emerging. Mass movements from below stimulating capitalist pressure from above led to Gandhi's sudden shift. By a formal pact in March 1931, the British government agreed to set all political prisoners free in return for the suspension of the civil disobedience movement. Furthermore, Gandhi was invited to attend the Round Table Conference in London as the sole representative of the Indian National Congress. Radicals in the leadership felt badly let down by these constitutional concessions. Gandhi made little attempt to save the life of Bhagat Singh, who had been sentenced to death on March 23, 1931. This was just before the Karachi Congress, and the Naujawan Bharat Sabha (Young India Association) organized a demonstration against Gandhi at the Karachi station, with the slogan Naujawan ko kya mila? Bhagat Singh ko phansi milla (What did the youth gain? The hanging of Bhagat Singh). But at the Karachi session, Gandhi's left-wing critics failed. Jawaharlal again surrendered to Gandhi, a pattern that would be seen repeatedly. Gandhi emerged as the victor once more.

The British had been compelled to treat Gandhi as a national leader and negotiate with him. After the Gandhi–Irwin Pact, the Congress expanded. The assumption of office by a Tory-dominated National Government, headed by the renegade Labourite Ramsay MacDonald, meant a further shift to the right. At the second Round Table Conference in 1931, offers concerning central power were minimized. Meanwhile, at the level of provinces, the Hindu Mahasabha was intransigent about not giving Muslims majority seats in Bengal and Punjab, two Muslim-majority provinces. This alienated the Muslim delegates. Now separate electorates were demanded by diverse groups, including the depressed castes. Along with Indian Christians, Anglo-Indians, and Europeans, they came together in a “minorities pact.” Gandhi fought against this trend, arguing that the solution to the communal question would crown the constitution rather than be its foundation. Gandhi then, as later in 1945–6, would offer to accept most of the Muslim demands if they accepted the demand for full independence, but given the Mahasabha intransigence about not providing any guarantees to Muslim sensibilities, this was a meaningless gesture. Gandhi eventually returned empty-handed to India. The one gain for Gandhi was a dubious one. In 1932, through the campaigning of the Dalit leader B. R. Ambedkar, the government granted untouchables separate electorates under the new constitution. In protest, Gandhi embarked on a six-day fast in September 1932, successfully forcing the government to adopt a more equitable arrangement via negotiations mediated by the Dalit cricketer turned political leader Palwankar Baloo. At the same time, the Harijan welfare work of Gandhi and his associates did help in taking Congress hegemony to those castes, and for several decades, including in independent India, they would remain part of the core Congress vote bank. But this reform work was a bid to establish hegemony over more radical struggles, like E. V. R. Naicker's Self-

Respect movement in Tamil Nadu. The militant atheism and resistance to upper-caste oppression of such movements steered some of their members in the direction of communism.

In 1937, when elections were held under the new Government of India Act 1935, the Congress gained 711 out of 1,585 provincial assembly seats, winning absolute majorities in five provinces out of 11. The Muslim League cut a sorry figure, even in the Muslim-reserved seats, as did the Hindu Mahasabha in general seats. Only in Bombay did Ambedkar's Independent Labor Party win 13 out of 15 seats reserved for Harijans, showing that on the Dalit question there existed a real challenge to the Hindu communalist as well as Gandhian alternatives. The All-India Congress Committee (AICC) session of March 1937 accepted a resolution on conditional acceptance of office, moved by two old Gandhians, Patel and Rajendra Prasad. Jayaprakash Narayan's left amendment rejecting office was defeated by 135 to 78 votes. Gandhi himself played a less than glorious role, his task being to persuade Nehru to toe the line.

The election of Subhas Bose in 1938 as Congress president posed a problem. While less internationalist than Nehru, Bose was also less likely to toe Gandhi's line. Before the Tripuri Congress, in 1939, Subhas was reelected president by defeating Pattabhi Sitaramayya, Gandhi's candidate. But Gandhi aided the Congress right to snatch victory out of defeat. On February 22, 13 out of the 15 members of the old CWC resigned, including Nehru. At the Tripuri Session in March, the right won a vote on a resolution moved by Govind Ballav Pant, asking Bose to nominate his new executive in accordance with the wishes of Gandhi. Ineptness and internal discord within the left enabled Gandhi to control the Congress. When Gandhi told Bose he was free to choose his own committee, Bose failed to take up the challenge against this cultism and resigned. By 1940, he was hounded out of the Congress.

Gandhi, Women, and Sexuality

Gandhi's emergence as a mass leader had a partially positive impact on women's participation in politics. He was not a believer in equality, but he did believe that men and women were complementary. He stressed the need to draw women into the freedom struggle, upwardly valuing the kind of work women could do for the nationalist struggle, such as spinning cloth at home, and bringing about a feminization of politics. He also tactically approved women's violation of the law to shame more men into joining the movement. But he was reluctant to accept full equality of women in the movement, and during civil disobedience, it was only after pressure from women like Kamaladevi Chattopadhyay and Sarojini Naidu that he accepted women's participation in the salt satyagraha.

At the same time, Gandhi had a very troubled vision of female sexuality. He wanted women in his movement to be chaste, and flew into a rage when some prostitutes took part in constructive Gandhian work. While arguing that women were sisters (thereby shifting to a non-sexual identity), he also felt women's sexuality to be threatening for men. He opposed Sucheta Kripalani's proposed marriage to his follower J. B. Kripalani, saying that she would be breaking his right arm. Finally, his sexual experiments, including sleeping in the nude with a number of women to find out how far he could control his sexuality, were done without any evident regard for what the women felt.

World War II and Quit India

When World War II broke out, Gandhi's initial response had been to offer "non-violent moral support" to the British effort, but other Congress leaders objected to the unilateral declaration that India too was in the war, without consulting the people's representatives. And Gandhi's moderate line of individual satyagraha only contributed to the petering out of the movement. The aim was clearly to register a token protest without making serious trouble for the government. Gandhi was more concerned by the appeal of communism to youth than with fighting imperialism. As often before, when he took the decision to move to a more militant struggle, the reason may well have been a desire to defeat the left.

Initially, capitalist circles in India were happy with a war that brought profits. It was the left that saw the war as an imperialist one. But the Communist Party of India (CPI) decided that after Hitler's invasion of the USSR the war had become an anti-fascist "people's war." Nehru sought for a compromise to enable Indian support for the war during the Cripps Mission negotiations. Subhas Bose viewed the war as an opportunity to strike at a weakened enemy.

Gandhi's perspective was different to that of the Congress right wing. As the war progressed, Gandhi increased his demands for independence, drafting a resolution calling for the British to quit India. In his famous "do or die" speech on August 8, 1942, Gandhi said that every Indian should consider himself to be a free person, and for the first time in an interview, he even considered the weapon of the general strike. But the Quit India resolution was kept suitably vague as a bargaining counter. It was turned into an upsurge not by the Congress high command, which was promptly arrested, but by socialists and other radicals. By the arrest of the leadership, the British thought they would provoke Indians and crush them. Instead they had to confront an upsurge, described by Viceroy Lord Linlithgow as the most serious rebellion since 1857.

Gandhi could gauge the popular mood better than others, including the communists. The defeat at the hands of Japan had taken a tremendous toll on British prestige. It also revealed once more the gross racism of the rulers of India. The result was a combination of anti-white anger and a belief that English rule was about to end. Sumit Sarkar suggests that the United Provinces and Bihar, scenes of some of the most powerful unrest in August 1942, were also areas from where migrant labor went to Southeast Asia. Losses incurred in Southeast Asia possibly also led to a change in attitude within the business communities. Hartals, strikes, and clashes with police and army occurred in many places. From the middle of August, the struggles shifted from the towns to the countryside. Parallel governments were formed, as in Satara and Midnapore, respectively in Maharashtra and Bengal. Gandhi was held for two years in the Aga Khan Palace in Pune. He was released on May 6, 1944, because of his failing health: the Raj did not want him to die in prison and enrage the nation.

Freedom and Partition of India

In July 1945, the Labour Party, the soft imperialists, swept to power after the elections. The objective situation was such that no alternative existed to getting out of India. But the decisive shift came from the postwar upsurge. A restive army and navy (the navy actually revolted) and mass civilian unrest nearly on the scale of 1942 showed Labour that it had to act. On February 20, 1946, Clement Attlee announced that a Cabinet Mission would be sent to India. At this point, Gandhi, Nehru, right-wing leader Patel, and Muslim League supremo Jinnah stood shoulder to shoulder, condemning the mass movements. Gandhi condemned the display of interreligious unity by the rebel Royal Indian Navy ratings, saying that a combination of Hindus, Muslims, and others for the purpose of violent action was unholy. However, once the battle of the barricades was discarded, Gandhi found there was no place for him either. The elections of 1946 were held in a communally charged situation. Astute moves by the Muslim League after the 1937 drubbing had enabled it to emerge as the voice of Muslims. The Congress did well in the non-Muslim seats, winning 57 out of 102 seats in the Central Assembly. In the provinces it won everywhere except Bengal, Sind, and Punjab. It was in this context that the Congress gave up its slogan of a Constituent Assembly elected by universal suffrage. Only the communists raised this demand seriously. Congress leaders, including Gandhi, accepted the election of the Constituent Assembly by the indirect method of election from the Legislatures, themselves elected by very restricted franchise. This was not an abstract issue.

So when the British Cabinet Mission came to India in 1946, imperialism and Indian bourgeois leaders were united in their desire to halt any further progress of radicalism, whether of the CPI variety or any other. The strike wave of 1946 involved 1,629 stoppages, 1,941,948 workers, and 12,717,762 labor days. This time negotiations were serious on both sides. But the situation further changed with the rise of the most fascistic form of communalism, both that of the Muslim League and that of the Hindu Mahasabha and the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (National Volunteers' Association or RSS). The Cabinet Mission had proposed a scheme of a weak central government with three groups of states, the Hindu majority center and the Muslim majority northwest and northeast. When Nehru refused to accept that the groupings would be permanent (Bengal and Assam, for example, would be united into a permanent Muslim majority state), Jinnah called on Muslims for direct action. Direct Action Day, August 16, 1946, was a day of mass riots in Calcutta. Hindu rioters hit back. Soon, the entire country seemed engulfed. To many, including Nehru, partition now seemed the lesser evil so that communal peace could be restored. But for Gandhi this was not the case. He even proposed the seemingly quixotic suggestion that Jinnah be made prime minister and the British stay on for a while to protect the majority. But with power so close, the bourgeoisie did not want to let it go. The Hindu bourgeois politicians also had little time for the utopian old man who did not want power. Isolated from the Congress leadership, Gandhi at the age of 77 decided to stake everything in a bid to vindicate his lifelong principles of non-violence and change of heart. Sarkar calls this “the Mahatma’s Finest Hour.” He spent his time in the riot-torn villages of Noakhali in East Bengal, followed by Bihar, and then in Calcutta. He lived with a handful of companions in hostile Muslim-dominated villages, threatened a fast-to-death if Hindus in Bihar did not change their attitudes, and walked barefoot through Noakhali, singing the Rabindranath Tagore song Jadi tor dak shume keu na aashe tabe ekla chalo re (if none heeds thy call, walk alone). At a moment when all forms of political power could have been his, had he uttered a word, he shunned it all and fought on for communal amity, rethinking strategy and principles at this stage of his life. Congress leaders prevailed upon him not to oppose partition, and he accepted their pressure with a heavy heart. But he did not return to Delhi, staying on in Beliaghata in Kolkata to halt rioting.

The Final Period

After India’s independence, Gandhi focused on Hindu–Muslim peace and unity. When riots began in Delhi, with a massacre of Muslims as revenge for the Punjab, Gandhi’s fast in January 1948 had a temporary impact. This last fast seems also directed in part against the increasingly communal attitudes of his erstwhile disciple, Sardar Patel, who was thinking in terms of a total population transfer in the Punjab and was refusing to honor a prior agreement according to which India was obliged to hand over Rs. 550 million as Pakistan’s share of the pre-partition government of India’s assets.

The post-partition period saw the Hindu communal forces who had always acted as loyal subjects of the empire now become increasingly vocal. The RSS at that time openly expressed its admiration for Hitler. V. D. Savarkar, head of the Hindu Mahasabha, was implicated in a conspiracy to kill Gandhi. This was part of a general attempt to destabilize the new government and make a bid for Hindutva power. On January 30, 1948, when Gandhi was on his way to a prayer meeting, Nathuram Godse, who had renounced his RSS membership to keep the organization out of trouble, confronted Gandhi and shot him. Godse and Narayan Apte were condemned to death and executed. What is significant is that the Delhi and Bombay police had had ample warning that a conspiracy was being hatched, but had done nothing. Gandhi’s last words as he was shot are said to have been He Ram (roughly translated as “Oh God”).

Garibaldi, Giuseppe (1807–1882)

James Baer

Giuseppe Garibaldi was born in Nice and gained renown as the “Hero of Two Worlds” for his exploits in the Risorgimento (Resurgence) movement that brought about the unification of Italy and in South America in defense of liberty. Best known as the leader of the Red Shirts, an army of Italian patriots that defended the short-lived Roman Republic in 1849 and successfully brought down the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies in 1860, Garibaldi’s prior achievements in South America are significant for two reasons. First, Garibaldi gained his skills as a guerrilla fighter in South America. Second, Garibaldi came to lead the Italian Legion in Montevideo, Uruguay, which formed the original band of Red Shirts. With these skills and an armed force of Italian patriots Garibaldi became one of the best-known revolutionary leaders in the nineteenth century.

As a young man Garibaldi earned his license as a ship’s captain and worked in the coastal trade in Italy. He learned about the Giovane Italia (Young Italy) movement, led by the Italian patriot Giuseppe Mazzini (1805–72), and joined in an unsuccessful rebellion in 1834. Garibaldi escaped to France and, after being sentenced to death in absentia in Genoa, fled to Brazil. There he used his skills as a sailor in support of a republican uprising against the monarchy of Brazil. Garibaldi was given command of troops and began his military career as a guerrilla fighter in the backlands of southern Brazil. It was at this time Garibaldi met Anita, a young woman whose husband was away at war. Their mutual attraction was immediate and Anita left with Garibaldi, never to return. She later married Garibaldi and bore him four children: Menotti, Rosita, Teresa, and Ricciotti.

In 1841, with the war going badly for the rebels, Garibaldi and Anita left Brazil for Uruguay. Garibaldi and his family settled in Montevideo, where he taught mathematics in a local school before volunteering his services to the government. Uruguay was then embroiled in a war with Argentina. Juan Manuel de Rosas, the Argentine strong man, had supported Manuel Oribe, Uruguay’s ex-president, in his attempt to retake power from the current president, Francisco Rivera. Initially, Rivera had the support of Great Britain and France, who opposed Rosas’ dominance in the River Plate region. But in 1840, when the French withdrew from active participation in the conflict, Oribe began to take control of Uruguay, besieging Montevideo in 1843. Foreign residents in Montevideo responded to Oribe’s threat not to respect the lives and property of those who supported Rivera by forming military companies. The Italian community created a legion of about four hundred soldiers, formed into three battalions. Garibaldi became the leader of this Italian Legion, nick-named the Red Shirts for the uniform.

One of Garibaldi’s first assignments in 1842 was to take a flotilla of small ships up the Paraná River into Argentine territory. In 1843 Garibaldi led the Italian Legion to victory at the battle of Tres Cruces on the outskirts of Montevideo. For the next few years he fought on land and sea as the circumstances required. In 1845 Garibaldi assisted the British naval squadron in its blockade of Buenos Aires by attacking the island of Martín García in the Rio de la Plata. Later that year he successfully led his troops in an attack on the small city of Colonia, Uruguay, where Manuel Oribe’s forces had congregated. Perhaps Garibaldi’s greatest fame, however, came from the battle of San Antonio in 1846 when, surrounded and outnumbered, he held out successfully, killed many of the enemy, and escaped with his troops. In June 1847 Garibaldi was appointed commander-in-chief of all Uruguayan forces, although he resigned one month later because of complaints about a foreigner in command of national forces.

In April 1848 Garibaldi left Uruguay for Italy after hearing about the uprising under Giuseppe Mazzini that created a liberal republic in Rome. Garibaldi took with him approximately eighty of his legionnaires on the ship

Esperanza (Hope) provided to him by the people of Uruguay through donations. Garibaldi and these Italian Red Shirts became famous fighting for Italian unification. In Italy Garibaldi unsuccessfully defended the short-lived Roman Republic in 1849 against a much larger French army that restored the pope. In his retreat through Austrian-held territory Garibaldi lost much of his army. His wife, Anita, became sick on the retreat and died near Ravenna in 1849. Garibaldi then fled abroad, living in the United States and later serving as a ship's captain on voyages from Peru to Asia.

Garibaldi returned to Italy in 1854 and purchased a home on the small island of Caprera. He continued to look for opportunities to serve Italy, secretly planning a rescue of political prisoners in Naples, and agreeing to join the Piedmontese army in its war with Austria in 1859. By now he had come to believe that only a strong state, like that of the king of Piedmont-Sardinia, could effectively unite Italy. Garibaldi's volunteers, called Hunters of the Alps, took Varese and Como in the war. Victor Emmanuel (1820–78), the king of Piedmont-Sardinia, gained Lombardy with the peace treaty. Garibaldi was elected to parliament from Nice, but became furious when the city of his birth was transferred to France.

Finally, in 1860, Garibaldi and a volunteer army of about a thousand Red Shirts invaded the island of Sicily and then Naples, toppling the Bourbon Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. In an agreement with Victor Emmanuel Garibaldi achieved the unification of Italy, except for the city of Rome, then under the authority of the pope. This led Garibaldi to form an expedition against the pope in 1862, in defiance of the king. At Aspromonte Garibaldi was wounded and captured. After recovering he returned to his home in Caprera, but remained active in Italian politics. Garibaldi died in 1882 and is considered a hero in Uruguay, the United States, Italy, and most of Europe because of his dedication to liberty. In the Spanish Civil War the anti-fascist Italian volunteers in Spain named their brigade after Garibaldi, and so did the communist partisans during the Resistenza; in the 1948 general elections the Italian Fronte Popolare, an alliance between communists and socialists, used Garibaldi as an electoral symbol. The legacy continues, as many countries have honored Giuseppe Garibaldi with statues and monuments.

Garrison, William Lloyd (1805–1879)

Amy Hatmaker

William Lloyd Garrison, controversial editor of The Liberator, was a central figure in the abolitionist crusade. Garrison's radical views on immediate emancipation, women's rights, and political non-resistance put him frequently at odds with more conservative abolitionists. His commitment to the abolitionist cause never wavered, and he is hailed as one of the most important voices of the anti-slavery movement.

Garrison was born December 10, 1805, in Newburyport, MA. He was the third child of Abjah and Fanny Garrison. Abjah, a sailing master with a penchant for whiskey, abandoned the family when Garrison was 3 years old. Fanny worked as a nurse, employment she found demeaning, to support her small family. A devout Baptist who had been banished from her Anglican family because of her faith, Fanny was determined to prevent her two sons from sliding into the same state of sinful disrepute as their father. The rigors of maintaining a household required that Fanny separate the family. Garrison was left in the care of Ezekial and Elizabeth Bartlett, a devout couple who made sure he was well schooled in spiritual matters but neglected to provide him with an education. The family was reunited in Baltimore briefly, but Garrison was unhappy in Baltimore and with his unstable family life. At the age of 11, he left his family to head back to Newburyport.

In Newburyport at the age of 13 in 1818, Garrison entered into an apprenticeship contract

William Lloyd Garrison, pictured here in a daguerreotype by Albert S. Southworth (1811–94) and Josiah Hawes (1808–1901), was a nineteenth-century American abolitionist and social reformer. Garrison, founder of the New England Anti-Slavery Society, advocated immediate and complete emancipation, in opposition to those who sought a gradual end to slavery and to the American Colonization Society, which proposed recolonization of enslaved Africans in Africa. (Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, Massachusetts, USA, Gift of Edward Southworth Hawes in Memory of his Father/The Bridgeman Art Library) with Ephraim W. Allen, owner and editor of the Newburyport Editor. It was during his time learning the printing trade that Garrison would teach himself how to read. He also became a staunch supporter of the Federalist Party. Garrison had a failed attempt at newspaper ownership following his seven-year term with Allen in Newburyport. He then moved to Boston and became part of the evangelical reform movement. He received a job as an editor of a temperance publication, but his tendency toward rhetoric extremism alienated many of his readers. He came to the cause of abolition when he met Benjamin Lundy, the most prominent adversary of slavery, in 1828. Garrison, never reticent in taking up moral causes, joined the anti-slavery movement. After another brief editorship in Vermont, he took a position as co-editor of Lundy's The Genius of Universal Emancipation. Around this time he married Helen Benson, the daughter of a Connecticut abolitionist Quaker, and they had seven children.

The emancipation cause would define Garrison's life. He became one of the leading figureheads of the battle against slavery calling for immediatism, the immediate emancipation of slaves rather than colonization or gradual abolition, and he was frequently attacked for his position. In Baltimore, Garrison was jailed in 1830 for libel over an article condemning a local merchant who was involved in the slave trade, and he and a group of abolitionists were mobbed in Boston in 1835. Yet his resolve never wavered.

The role that brought Garrison the most acclaim was his publication of The Liberator. Financed through the aid of some elite Bostonians who shared Garrison's beliefs, the first issue of The Liberator was published January 1, 1831. It unabashedly denounced the institution of slavery, and Garrison made it clear to his readers that this was the aim of the publication: "I will not equivocate – I will not excuse – I will not retreat a single inch – AND I WILL BE HEARD." The Liberator created such a stir that when Nat Turner led a revolt of slaves later that year, many held Garrison accountable and he was barraged with hate mail, many containing death threats.

Garrison would also have instrumental roles in the development of anti-slavery organizations. He and a small group of followers started the New England Anti-Slavery Society in 1832. Further, Garrison played an active part in organizing the American Anti-Slavery Society the following year, for which he served as secretary of foreign correspondence due to his contact with English abolitionists. He also wrote the Declaration of Sentiments for the organization, calling for the use of non-violent methods to bring about the end of slavery and fight against race prejudice. This was to be accomplished through the reformists' tactics of "moral suasion," or appeals to the conscience.

Convinced of the moral superiority of his position, Garrison became more radical in his views. He embraced the belief of perfectionism, living strictly for the will of God. Part of this new doctrine was the certainty that all humans, including women, should be granted certain rights. He began to see the church and state as institutions that were inherently flawed because they interfered with the human achievement of perfection by denying rights to women and the ad hoc acceptance of slavery. Garrison would begin to espouse a platform encouraging non-resistance, a doctrine that called for withdrawal from obedience to civil and religious participation. Many supporters denounced Garrison for this stance, known as Christian anarchy, and it caused a split within the abolitionist organization. Garrison stood steadfast in his beliefs despite renunciation by many former friends.

At the conclusion of the Civil War and the emancipation of the slaves, Garrison was once again hailed as a leader of abolitionists. People recognized that he had continuously fought for his beliefs, even as others turned against him. The final issue of The Liberator was printed in December 29, 1865, when the news arrived that the Thirteenth Amendment has been ratified.

After a trip to England, Garrison retired with a pension collected by friends and admirers.

Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940) and Garveyism

Ernest A. Amador

Marcus Garvey, the son of a modest Jamaican family, used his skills as a charismatic orator, gifted journalist, inventive entrepreneur, and political advocate to pioneer the first global black movement, a “back-to-Africa” campaign, known as Garveyism. The movement enraptured millions and influenced future black activists and organizations for generations.

Marcus Mosiah Garvey was born in St. Ann’s Bay, Jamaica, on August 17, 1887. He was the youngest of nearly a dozen children, although only one sibling survived childhood. His father, also named Marcus, was a stonemason by trade and an avid reader, an uncommon characteristic in an area where illiteracy was prevalent. His mother Sarah was a domestic worker who was known for her compassion and even disposition. Although Garvey was considered an above-average student, it was the access to his father’s large personal library that allowed him to develop an intellectual curiosity and an immense vocabulary – tools that helped him gain recognition as one of the greatest orators of his day. As a young boy, Garvey frequently played with his classmates and neighbors, blacks and whites alike. However, as a teenager he realized there was an unsettling division among races: his white childhood companions eventually distanced themselves from him socially.

At 16, Garvey’s curiosity prompted him to move to Kingston, where he found work as a printer for the Jamaican pharmaceutical company, P. A. Benjamin. Even this early in life his leadership ability was pronounced; it only took him a few years to become the youngest master foreman in Kingston, a position that was usually outsourced to Europeans or North Americans. However, his success came to a halt when he, as the Kingston Union vice president, was fired for siding with strikers. Although his participation in the strike ended unsuccessfully, it marks the origin of his lifelong commitment to eradicate the deplorable conditions suffered by blacks worldwide. During his stay in Kingston, Garvey became a proficient public speaker: he paid close attention to the different speaking styles at church and was placed well in many public speaking contests. He worked for three local Kingston newspapers, including his own, Garvey’s Watchman.

In 1910 Garvey, who by age 23 was already known as a respected journalist, speaker, and political activist, followed many of his fellow Jamaicans overseas. Garvey’s first stops were in Central and Latin America. While working as a journalist and laborer, he recognized not only the cruel conditions forced upon West Indians, but also the absence of an institution to represent or protect them. Within a few months, Garvey’s inquisitive, restless nature carried him to London.

He attended Birkbeck College and eagerly accepted a position for the Pan-African, Pan-Oriental magazine Africa Times and Orient Review. Again, he took note of the many blacks in England and the harsh conditions they faced, but, as in Central America, an organization representing the welfare of blacks could not be found.

Dismayed at the worldwide mistreatment of blacks, in July 1914 Garvey sailed back to Jamaica with a very clear agenda: within two weeks of his return, he founded the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), which ultimately grew to over 900 branches in dozens of countries. This organization, boasting 6 million members at its peak, would serve as the political machine for the first worldwide Pan-African movement, known as Garveyism.

Garveyism was a composite of several principles. It called for all peoples of African descent to approach every endeavor with a “black-first” state of mind; it encouraged all blacks to embrace the idea of self-love; and it postulated that blacks could be liberated from their intolerable circumstances by economic self-reliance. Realizing that the desolate conditions blacks experienced world-wide stemmed from the lack of a unified black nation, Garveyism campaigned for the repossession of Africa to be inhabited only by blacks.

The drive for a “black-first” mindset was apparent, even in religion. The African Orthodox Church, founded by the UNIA, insisted blacks should visualize God in their own likeness: a black Christ. In turn, conceiving the image of a dark-skinned God or Christ helped reinforce the idea that possessing dark skin should not be considered a mark of shame, but that “black is beautiful” and good.

In 1919, with the help of an all-black pool of investors, Garvey provided his movement with a concrete example of economic self-reliance by opening a shipping company called the Black Star Line. Although the Black Star Line failed after only a few years, it employed blacks for almost every position, and it abandoned racist practices that were common in white-owned shipping companies. The Negro Factories Corporation, which also failed after a few years of business, was also an invention of Garvey to promote black economic self-reliance.

Perhaps the most radical aspiration of Garveyism was the eviction of all non-black authorities from Africa. Garvey officially voiced this ambition in August 1920 at the month-long First International Convention of the Negro Peoples of the World, which filled Madison Square Garden with over 25,000 UNIA representatives from all over the globe. Garvey was convinced that a strong, independent all-black nation would foster a new-found sense of African nationalism throughout the world; however, this extreme tenet of Garveyism was the catalyst for much of Garvey’s growing opposition. Europeans were disconcerted by this goal because it would disturb their economies. In North America, W. E. B. De Bois, who promoted integration and assimilation, criticized Garvey’s call for an all-African country because it promoted racial segregation. The aggression against Garvey and Garveyism in the United States came to a climax when he was imprisoned in 1925 for mail fraud and deported to Jamaica in 1927.

Although it was banned in many parts of the world, Garvey’s most successful newspaper, Negro World, spread the ideas of Garveyism to millions of followers worldwide. Garvey’s message was also preserved by his second wife, Amy Jacques, who anthologized his writings in Philosophy and Opinions of Marcus Garvey, which was first published in 1923. In 1940 Garvey died without seeing the African continent free from non-native powers (and, strangely enough, without a single visit to Africa). But it was Garvey and his ground-breaking, yet controversial ideology that would inspire others, such as members of the Rastafari movement and the Nation of Islam, organizations that endorsed many of Garvey’s doctrines.

German Democratic Republic protests, 1945–1989

Michael E. O'Sullivan

During the Cold War, the German Democratic Republic (GDR) gained a reputation as the most successful and stable communist state in Eastern Europe. It experienced less unrest and better economic results than its neighbors in Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia. This apparent tranquility made the revolutionary events of 1989 especially surprising. Previously silent East Germans demonstrated until the ruling communists granted them the freedom to travel and voted for unity with their western neighbors. Heated debates have ensued to explain both this long history of stability in the GDR and the sudden upheaval of 1989.

Social histories of the GDR have proven difficult because of the nature of the communist dictatorship. The state existed largely because of Cold War disagreements and Soviet intervention. It possessed limited popular legitimacy. Therefore, many historians diminish the importance of popular behavior. Totalitarian studies of communist East Germany claim that society withered away and ceased to exist in the midst of a powerful state. Others insist that the social history of the German Democratic Republic can only be understood through political history. Furthermore, several GDR supporters and dissidents alike argue that the state's overall stability stemmed from the lack of opposition of a passive population. For example, a former GDR human rights advocate, Ehrhart Neubert, wrote: "The rapid downfall of the GDR should not conceal the fact that the long-lived domestic political stability derived from SED policies which induced people into active cooperation and passive toleration" (Ross 2002: 106).

Revisionist scholars, however, express differing views regarding popular protest. Researchers, such as Ralph Jessen, claim that social history is most significant when analyzing the development of the GDR. He believes that society restrained and shaped the policy of the SED (Socialist Unity Party of Germany) from below. Communist functionaries frequently changed policies to accommodate preexisting social structures, the Christian churches, and complaints about the workplace. In addition, many other studies indicate a high level of protest against the GDR. Most prominently, Stefan Wolle and Armin Mitter claim that significant patterns of resistance occurred throughout the entire history of the GDR. According to this interpretation, the state maintained stability only through coercion.

These conflicting views of the GDR can be reconciled through two theories. First, Thomas Lindenberger's ideas about Eigen-Sinn (Sense of One's Interests) provide a complex view of relations between state and society. Lindenberger argues that people played a role in both constructing and deconstructing the GDR. East Germans adopted state policies and reshaped them based on their own interests. The population acted in its own self-interest both when protesting and cooperating with GDR policy, providing motives both for outbursts of dissent and long phases of silent perseverance. Furthermore, Konrad Jarausch postulates the notion of "civil society" to the debate about popular protest in the GDR. He argues that attempts by dissidents and everyday Germans to create a public sphere of peaceful cooperation outside the privacy of the home and external to the influence of the state eventually weakened the GDR dictatorship and hastened its downfall. The SED crushed civil society during the 1950s and 1960s, but dissidents revived it beginning in the 1970s as a prelude to 1989. The concepts of Eigen-Sinn and civil society can be used to trace the history of protest, coercion, and compliance in the GDR. They illuminate the ways that popular behavior influenced the construction, stability, and downfall of the socialist project in Germany.

The Difficulties of Grassroots Activism in the Formation of the GDR, 1945–1949

Political opponents of Nazism entered a period of agitation in the immediate years following World War II in both East and West Germany. After toiling in prisons, concentration camps, exile, and underground resistance groups, they campaigned for ideal and radical forms of government in post-National Socialist Germany. The occupying powers quickly relegated these activists to the fringe in both east and west. Grassroots advocates of communism and socialism made little impact on the Soviet occupation and the formation of the GDR because their goals conflicted with Soviet policy and their ideas diverged with those of the mainstream population.

The most powerful group of German Marxists consisted of exiles from the former German Communist Party (Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands, KPD) who spent the war years in Moscow. These men received training under the Stalinist system and sometimes even gained dual citizenship in Germany and the Soviet Union. As they prepared to enter Germany at the end of the war, the Soviets flew a cadre of these exiles, led by Walter Ulbricht, to ease the transition of Germany to the Soviet occupation and arrange the beginnings of a “civilian administration.” Led by Ulbricht, Wilhelm Pieck, and others, this group quickly seized control of the KPD and sought positions of power in local governments throughout the Soviet zone of occupation. Favored by the Soviets, these German communists maintained power through their ability to anticipate Soviet aims and formulate policy accordingly.

Several anti-fascist groups that spent the war resisting Nazi rule also became active from 1945 to 1946. The few remaining members of the German left wing welcomed the Soviet arrival as an opportunity to spread socialism in Germany after their persecution under the Third Reich. For example, the concentration camp in Buchenwald (Saxony) became a center for communist activism. Communists and socialists ran the internal machinery of the camp and anxiously awaited liberation.

One group of anti-fascists advocated a “Soviet Germany” with workers’ councils, a counter-revolution, and the immediate nationalization of industry. They hoped for a Bolshevik Revolution in Germany and began renaming streets after Rosa Luxemburg and Ernst Thälmann, and encouraging Germans to greet one another with the KPD saying “Red Front.” The Soviets and the “Ulbricht Group” referred to these zealous activists as “sectarians” because of their willingness to alienate other political groups in the name of radical revolution.

Besides the “sectarians,” other bands of socialists worked for a departure from traditional political parties in favor of “anti-fascist fronts.” Through radio broadcasts, the Soviets had encouraged committees of anti-fascists that combined communists and socialists in 1944. They believed these groups would make the Soviet liberation more orderly. These “antifas,” as they were called, hoped to avoid past mistakes and promote unity between socialists and communists. They demanded the termination of the KPD in favor of a “people’s republic” based on “anti-fascist democratic principles.”

The sectarians and anti-fascists failed to extend their influence for two major reasons. First, the Soviets and the “Ulbricht Group” opposed them. The occupying powers worried about how their radicalism would influence the population. Most importantly, the Soviets wanted to work with groups they could control. Stalinists remained suspicious of grassroots organizations. The sectarians and anti-fascists both opposed their early goals of creating multiple political parties. The Soviets hoped the KPD would utilize the resources provided them by the occupation to gain legitimacy through electoral victories. Once this course of action failed, the Soviets pressured the Social Democratic Party of Germany (Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands, SPD) into a unity party, known as the Socialist Unity Party of Germany (Sozialistische Einheitspartei Deutschlands, SED). This unity party did not match the goals of the anti-fascists. They desired committees that genuinely combined both socialist and communist points of view. Communists dominated the SED and it became the conduit for Soviet policy in its eastern zone of occupation.

Grassroots movements for communism and socialism also failed because of their lack of connection with the German population. Most Germans experienced the end of the war in a tired, hungry, and disillusioned state. They usually had little sympathy with either the Soviets or communism. Influenced by negative wartime propaganda about the brutality of Soviet communism and angered by Soviet rapes, the German people initially viewed the prospect of communist rule with fear. Radicalism of the sectarians and the anti-fascists often frightened them even more than the Soviet occupation authorities.

Despite the marginalization of these left-wing anti-fascists, they affected the future of the German Democratic Republic in two ways. First, they inspired the Soviets and the SED to use anti-fascism as one of the major justifications for their state. SED leadership emphasized the role of communist resistance during the Third Reich and portrayed itself as an anti-fascist alternative. Second, these organizations sowed the seeds of hope for reform socialists who emerged as GDR dissidents in future generations. Many of the most significant East German critics of the SED dreamed of a more humane form of socialism and looked back at the sectarian and anti-fascist movements with nostalgia.

Failed Revolution and Muted Protest, 1949–1968

After the thorough Stalinization of the GDR, the consolidation of power by the SED, and the election of Walter Ulbricht as general secretary of the party, East Germany resembled the communist dictatorships in other East European Soviet satellite states. In the early years of this “People’s Republic,” elements within the population staged both large and small-scale protests. The most famous of these articulations of dissent occurred with the workers’ uprising on June 17, 1953. Elite members of the SED as well as ordinary GDR citizens offered less vocal protests during the revolt in Hungary during 1956, the construction of the Berlin Wall in 1961, and the Prague Spring of 1968. Despite these actions, popular protest never created revolution or the destabilization of the communist state. Increased social control and unity by the SED and growing resignation by the populace made the German Democratic Republic the most stable of all the Soviet satellites of Eastern Europe.

The workers’ revolt of 1953, which included a national strike, passionate demonstrations, and calls for a new government, was the most significant instance of meaningful popular protest in East Germany before 1989. Celebrated in the West as a revolt against socialism and in favor of unity, this landmark event caused the SED to increase its levels of popular surveillance and coercion. This incident resulted from a build-up of popular resentment; changes within Soviet policy; inefficiency on behalf of the SED; and anger at rapid changes in expectations for industrial workers.

One full year of policy modifications by the SED preceded the uprising of June 1953. For example, the government increased border fortifications and restrictions of movement during the summer of 1952. Furthermore, the pressure to conform increased through a handful of public trials as well as more subtle measures against social democratic sympathizers and young members of Christian organizations. Finally, the pace of agricultural collectivization increased in 1952–3, which caused discontent in the countryside and the emigration of many farmers to the West.

Against this backdrop of general discontent, an abrupt change toward industrial workers sparked mass protests. While the SED tried to ease the increasing tension among the middle class and the peasants, they made a surprise announcement that workers had to dramatically increase their productivity (“work norms”) despite complaints about wages and poor living conditions. The contradictory nature of SED policy caused shock in the population. Dissension within the SED and a change in the direction of Soviet leadership created this inconsistent treatment of peasants and workers. After Stalin’s death, new Soviet leadership called for a “New Course” in East Germany that would include a liberalization of domestic and foreign policies. These new policies received support from some prominent SED leaders, such as Rudolf Herrnstadt and Wilhelm Zaisser, but were rejected by Walter Ulbricht. The confusing dissonance within GDR leadership led to the contradictory course of easing restrictions in the countryside and increasing hardship for industrial workers.

Disunity at the highest levels of the SED caused a minor protest about “work norms” to escalate into a major uprising. On June 16, 1953, a group of angry workers staged protests outside the central trade union building in Berlin as well as before the administrative building housing SED ministers. They received assurances that the new “work norms” would be abandoned from Minister of Heavy Industry Fritz Selbmann, but the Politburo offered only a vague promise of change. The workers felt both empowered and confused at the results of their action. Some leaders of the spontaneous and decentralized uprising called for the removal of the Ulbricht regime and lower prices. To achieve these goals, they demanded a mass strike for the following day. On June 17, at least 300,000 GDR industrial workers, representing a minimum of 5.5 percent of the workforce, did not show up for work and joined demonstrations in Berlin, Leipzig, Magdeburg, and other cities. The workers were encouraged by supportive editorials in a party-controlled newspaper, Neues Deutschland, while the official SED trade union newspaper, Tribüne, condemned the uprising. Disarray and lack of communication within the SED simultaneously encouraged workers about the possibility for change and angered them with denunciations.

The demonstrations on June 17 were uncoordinated, spontaneous, and without clearly defined leadership. Participants addressed a wide range of issues. Some workers simply wanted a repeal of the new work norms, while many others desired sweeping economic changes that would improve their standard of living. Many East Germans used the uprising as a platform for other issues, such as the freeing of political prisoners, freedom of movement, and German unity. Although protesters usually came from the ranks of industrial workers, many students, housewives, and other spectators joined the demonstrations. With a broad base of participants and several issues, the uprising possessed a complicated amalgam of causes and aims.

The uncoordinated protest met a disorganized response by the SED. Local officials struggled to articulate state policy and GDR leadership doubted the capability of their police force and army to quell the unrest. These workers’ protests posed a serious problem for the political survival of Walter Ulbricht and his followers. Therefore, they requested the intervention of the Soviet military. In the afternoon of June 17, Soviet tanks supported by GDR police violently clashed with protesters and the uprising was quieted.

Three major consequences resulted from this instance of public protest. First, the SED repealed work norms and passed other measures to increase the amount of consumer goods available and to adjust prices. More important, dissent within the GDR was crushed. The police arrested over 6,000 people with connections to the unrest of 1953, including many strikers and leaders of the uprising. Thousands of SED party members throughout East Germany received punishment if they indicated social democratic tendencies or failed to support the party line. Top SED officials, such as Rudolf Herrnstadt and Wilhelm Zaisser, were purged from the party, and the effectiveness of the police and the Stasi was increased to prevent such events from occurring in the future. Finally, Ulbricht’s political position was strengthened. Despite his disagreements with its “New Course,” Moscow supported him rather than risk further disturbances. They believed that any other position would have been a concession to the protesters and signaled weakness. In the stifling atmosphere that followed the uprising, all of Ulbricht’s political rivals were suppressed and the repressive institutions of the GDR were strengthened to the point that they discouraged future protest from above and below.

Throughout the remaining years of the 1950s and 1960s, only scattered and muted protest existed. Occasionally, elite members of the SED leadership pressured Ulbricht to undertake a thorough process of de-Stalinization. For example, Wolfgang Harich and his Marxist allies published a call for democratization and possible reunification in 1956. Economists Fritz Behrens and Arne Benary demanded economic reform and a decentralized economy. The Politburo also contained Marxists critical of Ulbricht during the late 1950s, such as Karl Schirdewan, Fritz Selbmann, and Gerhart Ziller. Each of these figures, however, was removed from positions of influence, silenced, or imprisoned.

The events of 1956 in Hungary and the Soviet Union as well as the Prague Spring sparked only small waves of dissent in East Germany. A few disparate groups caused an increase in strikes, sabotage, and arson in East Germany after Khrushchev’s Secret Speech and the disruptive protests that sparked Soviet intervention in Hungary. For example, Magdeburg witnessed a few factory strikes during 1956. In one case of dissidence, a group of workers burnt swastikas and SS (Schutzstaffel or Protective Squadron) insignias into their bricks as a protest against GDR policy. The Prague Spring of 1968 in neighboring Czechoslovakia sparked a stronger reaction. Trade union members, youth, the intelligentsia, and students utilized the event to articulate distaste for SED policies. Evidence exists for widespread discontent among all classes and regions during the summer of 1968. However, most dissenters contradicted one another, lacked cohesion, and possessed no unified leadership. Some youths sang fascist songs, while simultaneously calling for political freedom. While political graffiti leaflets, sabotage, and accounts of conversations by the Stasi indicate discontent, most anger was directed toward events occurring outside the borders of the GDR.

Perhaps the greatest protest that followed the June 1953 unrest was the wave of westward emigration that occurred during the 1950s. A lack of consumer goods and unpopular policies, such as collectivization, caused increasing numbers of people to move to the Federal Republic of Germany by way of West Berlin. By 1961, three and a half million people emigrated out of the GDR for the West. This figure caused the erection of the Berlin Wall by Ulbricht and the SED to seal the border. Although many citizens grumbled about the Wall, few voiced their opinions openly.

The years that followed the uprising of 1953 lacked popular upheaval for several reasons. The SED leadership emerged unified in the aftermath of 1953. After several party purges, few cracks occurred in the top echelons of the communist state, which inhibited any revolutions from above. Furthermore, the state increased the extent and effectiveness of its surveillance. After the failures of 1953, the money, infrastructure, and reach of the State Security Service (Ministerium für Staatssicherheit, Stasi) increased. The SED effectively crushed what remained of civil society in East Germany. They denied the population a public sphere that was independent of the state. The population resigned itself to life under the GDR dictatorship as well. Although they anonymously complained about some policies, the surveillance of the Stasi and the realization that revolution was impossible without western intervention deterred most opposition. East Germans' interests were best served by adapting to life in a communist dictatorship. In sum, both state leadership and the population made adjustments after 1953 that decreased the possibility of unrest.

Revolt and public protest failed to materialize throughout most of the 1970s as well for one further reason. After Erich Honecker replaced

Walter Ulbricht in 1971, he pursued “the unity of economic and social policies.” The GDR undertook economic reforms that improved the quality of life of its citizens. They increased their foreign debt in order to bring about social changes that would gain support from the population. Although they failed to reach the material standards of the West, welfare, full employment, and increasing access to some consumer items allowed many to live fulfilling private lives under communist leadership. Programs to open swimming pools, increase the availability of food, improve housing, upgrade public transportation, and provide vacations helped ease tension between the GDR and its people. This phenomenon of trading social programs for popular support is what Mary Fulbrook calls “paternalism” and Konrad H. Jarausch terms the “Welfare Dictatorship.” It contributed to the persistence of only muted protest during the 1970s.

The Stasi: Coercion in the GDR

While “paternalism” and “welfare” contributed to the stability of the GDR, repression created a culture of fear that inhibited organized dissent. The most infamous element of GDR power was the State Security Service, known as the Stasi. Formed in February 1950, the Stasi increased its strength and power throughout the history of the GDR. By 1989, the reach of the intelligence service was remarkable. It possessed a budget of four million marks, kept files on six million people, and paid as many as 105,000 employees. Furthermore, an estimated 500,000 people, or one in every 13 citizens, acted as informers for the Stasi throughout its history. The coercion of the Stasi contributed to the lack of unrest from 1953 to 1989 because of its cooperation with the state and its ability to gain collaborators from within the East German population.

The leader responsible for much of the Stasi's influence was Erich Mielke, minister for state security from 1957 to 1989. A powerful figure joining the Politburo during the 1970s, Mielke expanded the reach of the State Security Service. In the aftermath of June 1953, he helped articulate the mission of the Stasi to find and prevent political dissent in “its earliest stages.” In Mielke's eyes, anything that could “potentially” harm “the victory of socialism” required immediate suppression. He gradually increased his army of informers and officers to the point that they could observe almost all aspects of life in the GDR. After Honecker's rise to power, the Stasi grew exponentially. Employing around 9,000 people during the 1950s, the organization grew to 59,458 employees in 1975 and 105,000 by 1989. The most active period of growth from 1968 to 1982 occurred as a result of détente because increased contact with the West necessitated more extensive security.

The Stasi experienced success in its tasks as a result of cooperation with the state police and the SED. Although some rivalry existed, Stasi coercion was reliant on collaboration from the People's Police, the National People's Army, and SED leadership on a local and national level. This combination of forces contributed to a culture of fear in the GDR that forced numerous individuals to retreat from public life. Despite the unhappiness of large sections of the populace with SED policy at various times, the information provided by the Stasi helped the party and the police to suppress dissent before it bubbled to the surface.

The greatest threat posed by the Stasi was the ability to destroy private and professional lives. Through its army of informers, it gathered information about people's domestic affairs, pressured them to stop unwanted political activity, and began harmful rumors about those who failed to cooperate. It often spread gossip and doctored photographs to discredit reputations, disturb family lives, and stall careers. This undercurrent of surveillance and fear caused many GDR citizens to retreat from the public world of politics. Many people strove for external conformity and tried not to invite unwanted interest from the state. They retreated into what Günter Graus has termed a "niche society," where citizens obeyed authority publicly, but expressed their true opinions in private and domestic settings.

The most problematic element of the Stasi's legacy remains the high level of popular collaboration. Without its long list of informants, the State Security Service would have been far less invasive in people's everyday experience. Information provided about friends, family, neighbors, colleagues, and acquaintances ruined lives and aided the SED's desire to maintain a façade of popular legitimacy.

A book by British historian and journalist Timothy Garton Ash carefully scrutinizes his own Stasi file from time spent in the GDR during the late 1970s and 1980s. It illustrates the wide variety of motives for becoming a Stasi accomplice. For example, one female informant who provided information about him became involved with the Stasi as a result of ambition. Through her collaboration she gained several professional promotions as well as the rare freedom to travel to western countries, such as Switzerland and Austria. Another of his informants cooperated out of fear of blackmail. A junior lecturer in English during the 1960s, he was denounced for becoming drunk, telling unflattering stories about a state-sponsored trip to Asia, and flirting with male students. Cultivating the informant's dependence on alcohol and threatening to punish him for these past events, the Stasi received reports from him until his sudden death in 1984. Another informant was an Englishman who moved to the GDR after marrying an East German woman. The Stasi coerced him into cooperating after falsely informing him that his name was associated with western intelligence agencies. Fearing deportation and under the illusion that he could alter the state from within, he provided detailed reports for over a decade. Finally, a German Jewish woman provided surveillance for the Stasi after years of committed service and suffering for the sake of communism in the Soviet Union and the GDR. In sum, a combination of self-interest, ideology, and fear led people to aid the Stasi and contribute to the perceived tranquility of a police state. While voluntary help existed, the Stasi relied upon incentives and blackmail to recruit its collaborators and stifle East German civil society.

The Protestant Churches: Between Dissent and Cooperation

Few topics attract as much scholarly controversy as the role of the Protestant churches in East Germany from 1949 to 1989. Historians, theologians, and journalists, such as Gerhard Besier and Ehrhart Neubert, have lambasted the churches for collaboration in the communist dictatorship of the GDR. Others, such as Mary Fulbrook and Christoph Klessmann, take a more balanced view and emphasize the significance of church dissent during the 1950s and 1980s. The churches alternated between inhibiting and contributing to the existence of the GDR. They shifted positions based on their own self-interest in maintaining their institutions as well as their desire to best serve their congregations.

The Protestant churches, which claimed at least nominal loyalty from 15 million of the 17 million inhabitants of the Soviet Zone of occupation, firmly opposed the GDR in several prominent ways. First, they clashed with the regime over the place of Christianity in a socialist dictatorship. Church officials led protests about the secularization of school instruction in 1951; the attempt to undermine the Protestant Junge Gemeinde (Youth Groups) in favor of the state-sponsored Free German Youth (Freie Deutsche Jugend, FDJ) in 1952; and the imposition of the secular youth confirmation (Jugendweihe) in 1954. The tension over confirmation became especially intense, as the numerous church elites condemned the state's attempt to replace a Christian ceremony with an event based on "an atheistic-materialistic worldview."

The church also publicly disagreed with SED leadership about some political issues. For example, churches formed the center of opposition to the remilitarization of East Germany. They protected conscientious objectors to military service after the start of conscription in 1962. Protestant leadership helped establish alternative forms of compulsory service by successfully advocating for work on construction projects as a substitute for joining the military. Protestantism also served as a focal point for dissent over the collectivization policies pursued in 1959–60.

Finally, the churches provided a haven for opposition to the GDR, even if those articulating dissent were not devout Christians. They incorporated contemporary music into their services that was scorned by the SED for its association with western consumerism. For example, they instituted Gottesdienste einmal anders (services which are different for once), which included jazz, blues, and spiritual music. The churches ran programs that aided drug addicts, homosexuals, alcoholics, and others with no place in the socialist Welfare Dictatorship as well. Throughout all of its efforts, Protestantism created a forum for civil society that was absent elsewhere in the GDR. It cultivated a public space where people could express opinions that were free of SED slogans and coercive influence.

Two major developments caused the churches to retreat from their persistent opposition to the GDR during the 1970s and 1980s. Protestant East Germany experienced the secularization process that overwhelmed much of the industrialized western world after 1945. Between 1950 and 1964, the percentage of non-practicing East German Christians increased from 7.6 percent to 31.5 percent and the proportion of self-identified Protestants declined from 80.5 percent to 59.3 percent. Church attendance suffered especially among the young and in cities. Many church officials also felt stifled by constant church–state conflict and sought an accommodation with the SED in order to improve the standing of Protestantism in the GDR.

These motives led many church leaders to reconciliation and collaboration with the GDR dictatorship. Many officials lived by the slogan of Bishop Schönherr: "We want to be a church not alongside, not against, but rather a church within socialism." Recognizing that the GDR seemed permanent, Protestants sought avenues for church–state convergence. They emphasized common goals of socialism and Christianity and cooperated with the SED on shared charitable endeavors, such as hospitals, orphanages, nursing homes, day care, and mental institutions. The church also lent the GDR much-needed legitimacy in the international community through a well-publicized church–state agreement on March 6, 1978. This accord secured the existence of several church institutions and endorsed the existence of a socialist dictatorship in East Germany.

The most extreme examples of church–state accommodation involved collaboration with the Stasi. During the 1950s, the Stasi already infiltrated church institutions in Thuringia by gaining the cooperation of Gerhard Lotz, an influential church official who encouraged the pro-GDR course of Bishop Moritz Mitzenheim. Lotz also arranged for Ingo Braechlein, another Stasi informant, to succeed Mitzenheim. The most prominent case of partnership with the Stasi was that of Manfred Stolpe, a powerful church functionary who became a social democratic prime minister of Brandenburg after German unity. Stolpe provided detailed information during frequent discussions with Stasi agents. It is debatable whether Stolpe intended to aid the state in its attempt to control and observe the church's sphere of influence or to help preserve church institutions by cooperating with the dictatorial state. Either way, he inhibited opposition groups that sought shelter from the church and damaged the personal lives of several individuals.

In sum, the church wavered between opposition and accommodation in its relations with the GDR. While the church contributed to the construction of a sphere of civil society that would be significant to the protests of 1989, it also legitimized the SED-led state out of self-interest for its own institutions. The heated debates over the role of Christianity in the GDR indicate the ambiguous nature of the church's actions.

1989: Revolution from Below, Above, and Within

Three explanations are commonly used to explain the fall of the Berlin Wall, the collapse of the GDR, and the surprising opportunity for German unity in 1989. Some scholars emphasize the importance of foreign policy by stressing the role of Mikhail Gorbachev's moderate policies, the unwillingness of the Soviets to intervene, and the aggressiveness of Helmut Kohl in pursuing unity. Others highlight the role of popular protest throughout the 1980s and in the months that led to the opening of the Berlin Wall. Finally, some academics argue that the GDR self-imploded through ineffective economic policies that ultimately caused the regime to cave in. In reality, a combination of these factors contributed to the swift fall of the seemingly permanent communist dictatorship in East Germany.

Before the rupture of 1989, several types of dissent emerged during the 1970s and 1980s that revived spheres of civil society in East Germany. Some groups advocated for changes within the system by using the institutions and ideology of the SED to request reform. Some youths used the Free German Youth to avoid military service, and SED university groups utilized special access to banned writings in order to discuss "subversive" ideas. People successfully submitted petitions utilizing the language of Marxist ideology to demand material improvements in their everyday lives. By staying within the system, they often received a response from local authorities to complaints about prices, living conditions, and work arrangements.

Much more aggressive patterns of dissent also developed among pockets of youth during the 1970s. Rock music caused several public confrontations over issues of free speech. A 1977 concert that attracted at least 8,000 spectators devolved into chaos when police halted the music. Clashes between concertgoers and police resulted in two dead officers and 200 wounded people. The most renowned individual who protested through music was Wolf Biermann. After moving east as an idealistic young communist, he soon became disillusioned with SED abuses and was banned for his critical songs. After years of circumventing authorities with popular church concerts and informal gatherings, he was expelled after a well-publicized concert in Cologne, West Germany. Biermann's expulsion sparked a protest by 100 GDR intellectuals and caused international embarrassment for the SED.

Handfuls of GDR citizens also sought an alternative public sphere within Protestant churches that increasingly supported and protected regime critics. For example, they aided peace movements and environmentalists in a series of vigils, workshops, and minor demonstrations. Although these acts of civil disobedience involved a small number of individuals, were subject to repression, and usually caused little immediate change, they prepared the way for the major changes of 1989. Left-wing reformers began a revival of civil society in the GDR that made more significant transformations possible.

The protests that led to the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989 and German unity in 1990 contained two major elements. The largest and most significant group of protesters came from the mainstream population and demonstrated in favor of freedom of movement. After Hungary removed its fences on its western border in May 1989, East Germans began escaping through this new gateway to the West. The SED tried to contain the illegal exodus throughout the summer and fall by pressuring its eastern neighbors, easing some travel restrictions, and cracking down on East German refugees. These events led to massive demonstrations. A protest movement of only a few hundred people developed around Leipzig's St. Nicholas Church, which had long nurtured GDR dissidence. It quickly grew into a national movement that attracted several hundreds of thousands to demonstrations in November. At the highpoint of the protests, 300,000 people showed up to a demonstration and a crowd of 500,000 formed in East Berlin. These public protests utilized peaceful methods, but frequently suffered from a violent police response. The growing numbers of protesters caused the GDR to repudiate violent police tactics on October 9 and eventually ease travel restrictions and open the Berlin Wall on November 9. After months of illegal border crossings, a torrent of East Germans entered West Germany. Throughout 1989, 343,854 refugees voted with their feet against the socialist experiment in the GDR.

Although the refugee crisis sparked this protest movement, it had several long-standing causes. Throughout the 1980s, the citizens of the GDR became increasingly disillusioned with their material conditions and the SED's reliance upon political repression for stability. A Stasi report stated: "The great majority of refugees resent problems and deficiencies of social development, especially in the personal sphere and living conditions." Both Stasi reports and opinion surveys indicate that economic complaints about lack of consumer goods, a poor working environment, low salaries, and inadequate health care motivated many of the illegal refugees of 1989. These problems resulted from a faltering East German economy. Although special trade agreements with West Germany provided the GDR more financial strength than other Eastern European nations during the same time period, its dependence on imported fuel and raw materials caused major disruptions with the price increases of the 1970s. East Germany fell behind the West in the new field of electrical engineering and computers and its growth rates plummeted. East Germans also articulated disillusionment with political repression. Travel restrictions, unfavorable prospects for the future, and suppression of free speech were among the most frequent motives named in surveys conducted by the West.

The effective articulation of grievances was aided considerably by left-wing dissenters in the GDR with roots in protests from the 1970s and 1980s. The 1989 protests emanated from St. Nicholas Church, a Protestant church in Leipzig that encouraged the peace movement in previous years. Many left-wing intellectuals found sudden popular support after several years of activism. For example, Bärbel Bohley, a painter, became a leader of the 1989 demonstrations after years on the fringes. She founded the Initiative for Peace and Human Rights in 1985 as an association of secular intellectuals devoted to critiquing and reforming the abuses of the GDR. In 1989, she and her colleagues formed the New Forum. This group, along with others, such as Awakening 89 and Democracy Now, created organization and leadership structures to lead a spontaneous and diverse mass of demonstrators. Scientists, pastors, writers, and film directors, such as Katia Havemann, Rolf Heinrich, Jens Reich, and Reinhard Schult, joined Bohley in a call for dialogue with government officials. They demanded democratic change, economic reform, civil rights, and better environmental care. This leadership core, absent in June 1953, helped achieve changes, such as freedom of the media and the founding of new political parties. Eventually these protest leaders formed the Round Table, which created a series of meetings with SED leaders and GDR organizations to initiate major changes.

Bohley and other left-wing intellectuals became bitter at the outcome of German unification. She and her fellow intellectuals sought a democratic reform of socialism within the GDR, but rejected unity with the West as a desirable goal for the future. They supported a "third way" for East Germany and hoped to create "socialism with a human face." Their ideas diverged from the majority of East Germans. Hungry for western consumer goods and a better standard of living, they voted for German unity. After the surprisingly aggressive intervention of West German Prime Minister Helmut Kohl with his "Ten-Point Plan for German Unity" on November 28, 1989, momentum increased for a quick reunification. Despite warnings by reform socialists in the East and the Social Democratic Party, East Germans voted for the Christian Democratic Union's Alliance for Germany in March 1990 and chose union with the capitalist West over a resumption of socialist reform in an independent East. The majority of East Germans opted for the quick material improvements offered by Kohl and a currency union with the Federal Republic of Germany.

While popular protest sparked the fall of the Berlin Wall, it was not the only factor in the rapid changes of 1989. Foreign policy played a major part in the collapse of the GDR. One of the major differences from the events of 1953 was the unwillingness of the Soviet Union to intervene. The refusal of Mikhail Gorbachev to aid Erich Honecker in the repression of protesters during a state visit in October 1989 caused a significant change of course by the SED. It replaced Honecker as party leader with Egon Krenz and attempted to quell unrest with reform rather than violence. Furthermore, the softening of Soviet foreign policy caused the changes in Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia that sparked the German protests in the first place.

Finally, many historians emphasize the internal implosion of the GDR as the primary cause of the 1989–90 revolution. Conditions in the GDR declined for years. The faltering economy and the inability of the SED to maintain order without the coercion of the Stasi and the police caused much of the bitterness behind the protests and the willingness of the international community to approve German unity. Without the glaring political and economic failures of the SED, the motives behind the hundreds of thousands of demonstrators in Leipzig and Berlin in 1989 would not have existed.

The fall of communism and the unity of Germany resulted from a mixture of popular protest with foreign policy and long-term GDR failures. The importance of the demonstrations that gained popularity between the summer and fall of 1989, however, should not be underestimated. The long-developing left-wing leadership as well as the spontaneous popular demand for change provided the pressure necessary to overturn a dictatorship that enjoyed decades of stability and an air of permanence.

The German Democratic Republic contained fewer episodes of popular unrest than any other communist state in the Soviet Union's Eastern European sphere of influence. After the threat posed to East German communists by protesters in 1953, the SED underwent several changes that deterred organized articulations of dissent for decades. By improving SED unity, increasing the reach of Stasi suppression, cultivating economic ties to the West, and strategically implementing several welfare programs, the GDR dictatorship avoided future challenges against its authority, such as the Prague Spring of 1968 or the Solidarity Movement in Poland in 1980–1. To the great surprise of contemporary observers, this veneer of order proved an illusion that could be maintained for several decades in the context of the Cold War, but not indefinitely. Although foreign policy shifts and GDR failures contributed to the sudden collapse of 1989, popular protest set in motion a process that resulted in the fall of the Berlin Wall, the disintegration of the GDR, and the unification of Germany under the capitalist government of the Federal Republic of Germany.

German nationalism and workers' movements, 19th century

Helen Bluemel

The long nineteenth century, which lasted from the French Revolution of 1789 to World War I (1914–18), marked a period of great change for Germany. The French Revolution led to a new consideration of self in the German nation. The French claim for freedom, equality, and fraternity inspired the German people. It resulted in the realization that, despite the rivalry of sectionalism, there was an overarching cultural and historical connection. The rough road from small individual kingdoms to a united German Reich also conditioned the expression that nationalism found after the 1871 unification of the Reich and its progression until the eve of war in 1914. The 1800s were the century when Germany underwent its industrial revolution, and despite a late start, became a world economic leader. It was the century when workers became the "proletariat," and when this new social stratum grew conscious of its position in society and established workers' movements.

The nature of German nationalism in the nineteenth century and the harsh circumstances that necessitated the organization of workers' movements would appear to clash with each other. The former was a romantic ideal of a united nation and country, the latter advanced an international mindset following Karl Marx's battle call in the Communist Manifesto: "working men of all countries, unite." The theoretical concepts behind both movements were different; the protagonists, however, were periodically the same pursuing common aims. This meant that the reality of the development of German nationalism and the workers' movements progressed interactively and symbiotically. German workers were calling for a united fatherland, and the demands of the middle classes for free political participation included the proletariat. Both movements were revolutionary as they rebelled against the status quo of their time.

Political Background

The political development of Germany in the nineteenth century was enormous. Through the Napoleonic wars, the former Holy Roman Empire of the German nation broke down in 1806. The emperor abdicated and the imperial crown was laid to rest. Although this empire could not be described as a united state, it still provided a common denominator. From 1806 until the liberation wars against Napoleon during 1813 to 1815, the German states were no longer linked through the Holy Roman Empire, and even fought on different sides of the Napoleonic system.

The wars of liberation, especially the Battle of Leipzig in 1813, facilitated the defeat of French foreign rule. These victories reestablished a sense of patriotic pride and of belonging together in the German people. However, the 1814 Congress of Vienna, called to redraw the European map after the defeat of Napoleon, constituted a setback for these aspirations. The Austrian Clemens von Metternich (1773–1859) used his leading position in the congress to reestablish a reactionary system, devoid of the "follies" of the French Revolution and its concepts. The agreement reached for the German territory was the foundation of the Deutscher Bund (German federation); however, this could not satisfy the patriotic longing for a united fatherland. This federation consisted of about forty rather autonomous members. Political participation of the people was only granted in the middle states through their constitutions. The powerful and influential states, however, most predominantly Austria and Prussia, would not allow for constitutions.

The German federation was dominated by Austria; thereby Metternich was enabled to further exercise his reactionary rule. This was shown for the first time in response to the Wartburgfest (celebration at the Wartburg castle) in 1817. Two years previously, after the foundation of the Deutscher Bund, the first Burschenschaft (student fraternity) was founded at the university in Jena, and other universities followed suit. These associations, filled with romantic ideals of a united fatherland, echoed the maxims of the French Revolution. In 1817 students congregated at the Wartburg for a symbolic celebration. It was 300 years since Martin Luther's theses, which founded Christian Protestantism. In addition, the Wartburg was the place where Luther translated the Bible and, as legend has it, attacked the devil with an inkstand. The speeches given at the Wartburgfest revolved around the theme of a united nation, and expressed a deep yearning for a united Reich under a single Kaiser.

This provocation was soon to be avenged. When the writer and journalist August Kotzebue (1761–1819) was murdered in 1819, Metternich seized the opportunity and proclaimed the Karlsbad decrees. These decrees included a ban on student fraternities, censorship of all newspapers, and the directive to remove all lecturers from university office guilty of having furthered civil unrest. Pursuant to these directives, an addition to the treaty of the German federation (Wiener Schlussakte) was made in 1820. It decreed that all political power was to be exercised exclusively by the respective sovereigns in their states. Therefore, all political ambition outside the courts was suppressed.

It was not until 1830 that a new lease of life came into the political aspirations of the German people. The July Revolution of 1830 in Paris sparked popular unrest and regional uprisings in the German states, but also enabled people of the middle states to achieve improvements of their constitutions. The culmination of these developments was the Hambacher Fest (Hambach celebration) in May 1832. Over 30,000 people gathered, making it the largest mass demonstration in modern German history. It was yet another expression of the demand for more political freedom and a united fatherland. The repressive response was immediate. In July 1832 a federal resolution for the maintenance of law and order in the Deutscher Bund was proclaimed, reinforcing press censorship, banning all political organizations, curtailing the right of assembly (including celebrations), and banning all public political speeches.

However, economic development in the German federation produced a dynamic toward further unification. The requirements of the market necessitated the removal of tariff borders between individual German states. Therefore, a Deutscher Zollverein (German tariff union) was established in 1834. The exclusion of Austria in this alliance was an early harbinger of the united German Reich without Austria. In addition, despite all repressions, the spirit for political change could not be extinguished anymore. Unrest and tensions grew over the following decade and were released in the Revolution of 1848. Again, it was France that led the way; after the February insurrection in Paris, uprisings followed in both Vienna and Berlin in March 1848. This revolution ended the era of Metternich; he fled to Britain and was not to return to political importance. Other early successes of these events included freedom of assembly and the granting of a constitution for Prussia by King Frederick William IV (1795–1861). Furthermore, the unification of Germany seemed within reach. A so-called pre-parliament was established in Frankfurt am Main. It decided to convene a German National Assembly with the task of formulating and ratifying a constitution for Germany. This constitution was finally accomplished in March 1849; it envisaged a unified Reich under the Prussian king who was to be its emperor. However, the Prussian king refused what he called a “crown of dirt” and thereby created a crisis in the national assembly that led to its final demise. The revolution had failed, a unification of the German states “from below” (meaning through the German people) did not take place, and in an effort of restoration of the old power, relations were reinforced.

The next major political change was engineered, not by the German people, but by Otto von Bismarck (1815–98), a politician who became Prussian prime minister in 1862. His main political aim was the furthering of Prussia’s role in Germany and Europe. Initially, he increased Prussia’s territory in an 1864 war with Denmark. The resulting problems with Austria (which had fought alongside Prussia in the Danish war) were “solved” in the Bruderkrieg (war of brethren) in 1866. Thereby, Bismarck achieved concurrently both a territorial increase and the supplanting of Austria’s importance in the German federation. In 1867 he founded the North German federation under Prussian leadership. In 1870 Bismarck engineered a war against France; the Reichseinigung (unification of the Reich) crowned the victory over this old enemy of Germany on January 18, 1871. The new German Reich consisted of the states of the North German federation and the South German kingdoms, excluding Austria. The king of Prussia was crowned as Kaiser of Germany; the unification from “above” was accomplished.

The size and growing industrial and military power of the German Reich, paired with an unwise alliance policy in the post-Bismarck era (after 1890), led Germany into conflict with the other European powers. The resulting mounting pressure found its final release in World War I.

Economic Background

The German territories around 1800 were pre-industrial. About two thirds of all Germans were living and working in the countryside. There were small manufactures but no large factories. Germany was backward in comparison with other states, such as Great Britain. The manufacturing occupations were organized in guilds that controlled the trades. The Napoleonic wars instigated the necessity to change. Starting from Prussia, reforms were initiated to modernize society and thereby the economy. In 1807 Prussia ratified the liberation of farmers. That meant that farmers, previously the bondsmen of their princes, were free people. Other reforms included the establishment and widening of the state education system, and the granting of freedom of trade (only fully achieved in the 1860s).

These reforms created wageworkers for the first time. Previously, work relations between masters and servants were on levels outside mere economic considerations, for the entire person was bound to the lord for better or worse. Now, people began to work for money. However, while liberation had definitely taken place, it was not salvation. Farmers had to buy themselves from their princes or leave their land in exchange for their freedom, thereby losing their livelihood. Journeymen were free to set up businesses quickly. However, the consequent wave of business foundations left most destitute, as the heavy competition made making a living impossible. Reforms which would have assisted a furthering of industrialization came too early. The result was an army of workers looking for work that did not exist, which in turn led to pauperization. The climax was reached in the 1840s, when several workers' revolts demanded the barest living essentials (the most famous was the Silesian weavers' uprising of 1844).

However, it was also around 1830–40 that industrialization came into full force in Germany. In 1834 the German Tariff Union removed tariff barriers between members. The first German railway was built in 1835 and the railway industry expanded quickly. From 1850 onward, the first great wave of industrialization captured Germany. New factories took in as many workers as possible, and demanded more. Many people moved from the countryside to the cities as this process gathered speed. Nevertheless, although these developments ended the pauperization process, they also led to the "social question." The living and working conditions of the workers were at the center of this question. Workers were forced to work 80-hour weeks. There were insufficient safety measures in factories and accidents resulting in disability were common.

When Germany defeated France in 1871 it gained reparation payments. This 5-billion francs influx stimulated the German economy. Another positive effect of the Reichseimigung was the unification of measurements, which simplified trade and gave an additional impetus to economic development. The German Reich also profited in unforeseen ways from its rather late industrialization. The basic industries had been tried and tested in other countries. Thus, Germany did not encounter the early troubles that accompanied the burgeoning years of the industrialization process elsewhere. This enabled the concentration on new technologies that furthered Germany's international economic standing and guaranteed a leading role for the country. Especially in the areas of electrical and electronic engineering, the chemical industry, optical instruments, and automobiles, Germany occupied one of the pole positions. On the eve of World War I every second electrical machine and installation worldwide came from a German company.

Germany also acquired a leading role as a trading region. It was the country with the world's oldest trade fair and it developed this heritage comprehensively. Furthermore, the two great harbors of Bremen and Hamburg facilitated a traffic in goods that from the late 1880s onward exceeded the levels of places like Liverpool or Marseille. These harbors also allowed for a boom in shipbuilding. Emperor Wilhelm II (1859–1941), who supplied it with massive state contracts, favored this industry. He attempted to supplant the British fleet and recreate Germany as a seafaring nation. His delusional ambitions were proved wrong in World War I.

Development of German Nationalism and Workers' Movements

With these political and economic circumstances in mind, one can see the problems facing any movement for change, be they national or social. Both German nationalism and the workers' movements were revolutionary, as they demanded change. German nationalism was based on several concepts. Both the philosophies of the Enlightenment (such as that of Immanuel Kant) and Romanticism (the prevailing art and literature genres of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries in Germany) showed Germans that regardless of location, they shared a common cultural heritage and the same language. However, with the breakdown of the Holy Roman Empire, the last linking element was lost. A show of existing national consciousness was the fact that many Germans, especially students, enlisted for the Battle of Leipzig in 1813 to defeat Napoleon. The subsequent formation of the German federation raised hopes for a new connection between the German states and their people. However, these expectations were crushed when it became known that all members would remain largely autonomous within this loose federation. The first group to voice in public their aspirations for a properly united fatherland after 1815 was fraternity students. Their approach at the Wartburgfest ended with the Karlsbad decrees. Many students, as well as their university professors, had to go into exile to avoid imprisonment or poverty (lecturers found guilty of causing public unrest were prohibited from working at any university inside the German federation).

Around the same time, economic problems for the growing number of free wagedworkers reached a level that forced them to seek labor elsewhere. Journeymen, who traditionally took to the road during their vocational training, went abroad. These men had the great advantage of being able to use traditional networks common to their trades to secure safe journeys and a livelihood. Abroad (mainly Switzerland, France, and Britain), they were introduced to liberal notions of politics and, in the more industrialized parts, to the concepts of workers' movements. It is therefore not surprising that journeymen were the precursors of the German workers' movements. They formed workers' associations abroad that focused on developing ideas to achieve more rights for workers. It is abroad that the German workers' movement began. The first exponent of the workers' associations was the Volksverein (people's association) founded in 1832 in Paris.

The term "worker," in the context of German development, was a generic term encompassing different people. Journeymen had a rather good social standing. Unlearned wagedworkers, the former farmers and domestics, were a social underclass. Students and their professors also belonged to a mid-section of society. However, it was a mixture of all these groups that formed the core of the early German workers' movement. The economic situation, the shared status of poverty, merged them into one class. It was not until the 1830s that the term "proletariat" first surfaced to describe this new emerging social stratum that evolved alongside the unfolding industrialization in Germany. Nevertheless, the proletariat grew into one of Germany's biggest classes, thereby facilitating political change. Thus, the worker is to be seen as synonymous with the proletarians, the working class.

The fact that the workers' associations emerged abroad where the German language was not spoken meant that the sense of togetherness between German speakers grew. The regional differences disappeared into the background, journeymen from all over Germany understood themselves to be just Germans, and thus the national element appeared naturally. The involvement of students in the foundation of the workers' associations particularly influenced their orientation on national as well as social demands. These students had already voiced their nationalist sentiments at Wartburg and Hambach. The call for a united German fatherland always accompanied demands for freedom and sociopolitical change.

Workers' associations also founded branches within the German states. These, however, were persecuted and their numbers minimized through multiple arrests in the 1840s. Nevertheless, the growth of a working class influenced German ruling elites. Prussian King Frederick Wilhelm IV founded a Zentralverein für das Wohl der arbeitenden Klassen (Central Association for the Good of the Working Classes) in 1844. This was followed by the formation of Arbeiterbildungsvereine (workers' educational associations) to facilitate improvement of workers' living conditions through education. Workers slowly began to develop a political consciousness of their position and the injustice of their status.

The plight of the working classes also surfaced in the 1840s. The Silesian weavers' revolt, among others, demonstrated that workers were struggling to secure their existence. This added to the growing unrest in wider circles of the German public during this decade. Political interest was not only the vocation of workers or intellectuals. It reached into the middle classes, which grew dissatisfied with their lack of political influence and began to hold assemblies to discuss political matters. A crop failure in 1846–7 increased the misery of the lower classes and fueled their wrath. These tensions climaxed in the revolution of 1848–9. Although the revolution is largely understood to have been a bourgeois one, meaning that its leading protagonists were middle class, workers were at the heart of events. The barricades of March 1848 in Vienna and Berlin were manned with workers and their fights triggered the concessions made in all German states. In addition, workers' associations used the early success of achieving the freedom of assembly to legally establish organizations in Germany. An Arbeitervorbrüderung (unity of workers) with a large membership was founded.

Although the convocation of the National Assembly in Frankfurt should have secured a united German state with a constitution, the infighting in parliament soon superseded the uniting political aim. There was no agreement about which territory the new state should encompass, for the question of a Kleindeutschland ("lesser Germany," without the German part of Austria) or a Großdeutschland ("greater Germany," with Austria) caused great dispute. Accordingly, the final constitution of March 1849 was merely a compromise.

Reactionary forces had already weakened whatever power the parliament had in late 1848. Therefore, the rejection of the crown by Prussia's king completely ended its aspirations to political importance. As the monarchs retained the command of the armed forces over the entire period, they quickly disposed of the remainder of the assembly after the refusal of the crown. The revolutionary forces had tried to achieve too much and had failed, while the old forces soon took over again and secured their position through the persecution of the revolutionaries. Many had to go into exile, while others were imprisoned or executed.

The Communist Manifesto of Marx and Engels, published in 1848, was targeted at German workers to direct their role in the forthcoming revolution. It had nearly no impact in Germany during the events of 1848–9, but the philosophy of Marxism was to shape the coming developments of workers' movements considerably.

When a slow liberation found its way into Germany in the 1860s and allowed for the freedom of coalition, Ferdinand Lassalle (1825–64) founded his Allgemeiner Deutscher Arbeiterverein (General German Workers' Association) in Leipzig in 1863. This was the first political workers' party in Germany. Lassalle pursued an improvement of workers' status through political reform proposals. In contrast, the Social Democratic Workers Party, under August Bebel and Wilhelm Liebknecht, followed Marxist revolutionary principles. These two parties finally merged during growing state persecution in 1875 into the Socialist Workers Party. However, they did not manage to reconcile the contradictions of reformism and revolution until 1914.

Bismarck engineered a united Reich with the so-called three wars of unification (1864, 1866, 1870–1). He created a constitutional state under the rule of an emperor. Through this, German unification was achieved, yet it was not the united fatherland of freedom and equality. The euphoria of unification and the defeat of France could not gloss over the problems within Germany. Workers' resentment about their low position found its expression in stronger support for workers' parties. Bismarck perceived this as a threat to his established order and suppressed the political influence of workers' representatives through the Sozialistengesetz (law against socialists) of 1878, which banned the Socialist Workers Party. However, he was not able to remove the destitution of workers and their anger. Thus, in an effort to stabilize the state and save it from further revolutionary tendencies, he enacted a social security policy, thereby establishing the first welfare state. The measures included health insurance (1883), casualty insurance (1884), and a pension scheme (1889). His plan of winning over the workers did not work. The prosecution of politically active workers and the Marxist claim that proletarians had no fatherland were too ingrained in the working class's mind to be resolved by Bismarck's legislation. In 1890, the year of Bismarck's resignation, the Sozialistengesetz was abolished and the Socialist Workers Party renamed itself the Social Democratic Party of Germany. Despite attempts by churches to organize workers' unions with a Christian ideal, the majority of the proletariat backed this political organization. It grew over the turn of the century into the largest party in Germany and became, despite an unfavorable electoral system, the largest parliamentary party in 1912. However, the main demands of the workers, such as the 8-hour workday, were only realized after the war in the Revolution of 1918–19.

German nationalism took a turn for the worse after the Reichseinigung and especially after the coronation of Wilhelm II in 1888. Militarism, furthered through the armaments industry under this emperor's rule, became the leading feature of a somewhat engineered patriotism that claimed German superiority on a world scale. It was this national arrogance, a trait Imperial Germany shared with other European powers, which allowed for the catastrophe of World War I.

German Peasant Rebellion, 1525

Simone Cezanne De Santiago Ramos

The Peasant War of 1524–5 was an uprising of several hundred thousand peasants, workers, and artisans in mostly southern Germany but also in Tyrol, Alsace and Lorraine, as well as Carniola, Slovenia. The war, brought on by a combination of several factors, including changes in social and economic structures, heavy taxation by both the nobility and Catholic Church, religious changes engendered by the Reformation, and a crisis of the old feudal system, is often seen as the last medieval peasant revolt in Europe. Marxists, however, interpret it as the first modern revolution.

In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, Germany started slowly to industrialize. Weaving industries, including silk, emerged around southern trade cities, particularly Augsburg and Nuremberg. Other industries, such as fine metals, etching, and woodcarving, provided employment. This in effect increased commerce, and more money was distributed. More and more people moved into cities to find work, and the countryside was developed into farmland to feed the growing population. Yet other parts of Germany had little trade or commerce beyond their regions. Commerce was heavily regulated by the guild system in the cities and the nobility in the countryside. To complicate matters, various currencies used in the fifteenth century also contributed to agricultural economic instabilities. Standards of grain measurement differed from region to region.

Social and economic structures were also changing. A tiered nobility structure in Germany consisted of knights, or lesser nobility, which

Referred to as “the last great medieval peasant revolt” and “the first modern revolution,” the German Peasant Rebellion of 1525 was inspired by the Reformation ideas of Martin Luther, Huldrych Zwingli, and Thomas Müntzer. Though Luther condemned the rebellion, his teachings, such as the idea of a priesthood of all believers, inspired the peasants by convincing them their cause was divinely sanctioned. (Bibliothèque des Arts Décoratifs, Paris/Archives Charmet/The Bridgeman Art Library) slowly disappeared through the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The middle nobility was also disappearing since the medieval feudal system had shifted the power structure and it lost many of its privileges over the decades. Finally, the princes or upper nobility in Germany were almost independent of the ruling house and possessed sovereign rights. With new trade opportunities and new industries opening up, the taste for luxury items grew among this group and the needed funds were collected by heavily taxing the lower orders, predominantly the peasantry. These payments included the “great tithe” for livestock and “small tithe” for fruits and vegetables, a Handlohn or hand fee on all feudal property if there was a change in ownership, a death duty if either the landowner or tenant died, taxes on cheese and wine in wine-producing regions, as well as an acorn levy. Nobility also owned the right to decide whether peasant pigs could feed in their woods. In addition, an investiture tax had to be paid for every new bishop's inauguration to cover some of the expenses. A "huff tax" for every cow sold was implemented in 1522, followed by the Turk tax in 1524.

Thus, not only were peasants taxed but their old rights were circumvented. These "old rights" or laws existed only orally but had a long tradition in Germany. Old manorial obligations to the landlords were now converted into direct payments, while "old rights" like hunting, collecting firewood on manor lands, or fishing became increasingly restricted. Fishing rights in particular were seen more as a symbol of freedom going back to biblical times. Around the same period, the Catholic Church started to place greater monetary demands on the peasants, increasing the expenses and resulting tensions.

Although the Peasant War of 1525 was mainly an agrarian rebellion, the Reformation had a major influence on the war. In 1517, Martin Luther posted his 95 Theses in Wittenberg, after he translated the Bible into German, and common men began to question "God's will" and the interpretation the Catholic Church offered. Many peasants believed erroneously that the nobility, which embraced and introduced the Reformation, would be on their side. Other church reformers, including Huldrych Zwingli and Thomas Müntzer, further emboldened the peasants with their theories that the common man could have a relationship with God without an indispensable intermediary like the Catholic Church.

Even as it was growing as an opposition force, the peasantry was as fragmented as the nobility. Serfdom itself was rare in most German regions after the Renaissance. However, landless agricultural laborers and so-called cottagers were at the bottom of the spectrum. Because of their lack of property, these day-laborers or migrant workers could freely move to other regions or cities to find work. Leaseholders, who made up the majority of the peasants, rented the land they farmed and consumed most of what they produced, so little money was left to pay the levies and taxes imposed. Particularly in southern Germany, a hereditary law of divisible inheritance existed, making farms smaller and smaller over the generations. Landowning peasants actually had improved their positions throughout the fifteenth century, although they were still required to pay certain taxes and tithes.

Ironically, it was not the landless peasantry that revolted in 1524 but the peasant middle classes, together with the artisans and skilled workers from the cities. Furthermore, doctors, lawyers, even some mayors of smaller towns, as well as monks and lower clergy priests, and a few knights, were on the side of the peasants. In addition there were regional differences in rationale behind the uprisings. In Franconia, at least in the beginning, the revolt was concerned with urban matters of town self-government. Most peasants in southern Germany were hereditary leaseholders living on fixed-rent farms. An agrarian depression combined with several years of bad harvests had hit Germany in the fifteenth century, with smaller nobility and manor holdings suffering the most. The agrarian economy also underwent structural changes when cities attracted people, causing a population shift and labor shortages in the rural regions. Peasants and landowners had a harder time finding help, and those who were working could demand higher wages. Yet this changed around the mid-fifteenth century when the agriculture population grew and the labor force increased. By the outbreak of the uprising, the southern German regions of Swabia, Franconia, and southwest Germany had fairly dense populations. The rural population, dissatisfied with the political structure in Germany, existed in a confusing overlapping of unevenly defined and unevenly consolidated political sovereignties, with the middle peasantry wedged between the two groups of the growing landless masses and the ever-demanding upper nobility, including the church.

Local peasants began an uprising in the summer of 1524 on the property of Count von Lupfen in the vicinity of Schaffhausen under the leadership of Hans Müller. A loose organization was formed, and the peasants were asked to make a small monetary contribution for the cause. Their demands were simple: there should be no lord but the emperor to whom the taxes were owed, and they wanted to return to the "old rights" discussed above. At the same time, a few hundred miles away in Franconia peasants refused to pay the grain tithe, followed by more insurrection into the fall of that year around Lake Constance and Villingen. These uprisings were again based on grievances over the "old rights" or the denial of them. Over the course of the winter and the early part of 1525, more and smaller, but more radical, uprisings broke out in the same regions. The main revolts took place in the late winter and May of 1525 in the southern and central parts of Germany. The revolts had spread from Swabia and the Black Forest region into northern Switzerland, north to Franconia, Wurttemberg, parts of the Palatine, and all the way to Thuringia.

In the southwest, peasants rallied under the slogan “divine justice” and, through the Memminger Peasant Parliament, presented their demands through the Twelve Articles. Modeled after a Swiss peasant organization, these articles were reprinted in Augsburg and distributed throughout the other German regions. The Twelve Articles requested not only the return to the “old rights” but also free access to the forests, hunting and fishing rights, and a suspension of the obligation to pay tithes. Common lands taken by nobility should be returned to the people as communal lands. While these requests clearly show an interest in agricultural concerns, the demand for the gospel to be preached according to the true faith was asking for church reforms. No political demands were made, nor were topics affecting burgher, artisans, or landless peasants incorporated into the articles.

The Swabian League, the armed forces of the nobility which was co-financed by wealthy cities, was assembled to keep the peace and if necessary fight against the revolting peasants. Under the leadership of Truchsess von Waldburg, who was financially supported by the Augsburg Fugger bank, the League eventually assembled 9,000 Landsknechte and almost 2,000 armed horsemen. At the end of March 1525, Truchsess and the League marched toward Leipheim where more than 5,000 peasants had plundered and burned church property. The armies met on April 4 and Truchsess was able to defeat the peasants. The city of Leipheim had to pay reparations as punishment for aiding the peasants.

While the League was engaged in Leipheim, several counts and knights were killed further north near Weinsberg by revolting peasants. After this incident, known as the Weinsberger Blutat or blood deed, the peasants were portrayed as vicious and cruel. The Weinsberger peasants eventually joined up with lower nobility and fought side by side with Florian Geyer and Götz von Berlichingen.

In the meantime, the League defeated the Leipheim peasant armies and started negotiations with the Allgau section back in the south, encouraging the false belief that the demands of the Twelve Articles would be met. In reality, Truchsess needed time to defeat Berlichingen and his men. This was an easy task, since Berlichingen had abandoned his men a day before the battle. Leaderless and without guidance, the peasants were crushed by the League and almost 8,000 peasants died within two hours. Believing they would not be attacked by the League, the Allgau section of the peasants prepared to present their complaints to the courts. Before their demands could be heard, the League had broken the armistice and was approaching fast. The peasants, acting in anger, burned down castles and confiscated church property, but they were no match for the League. Hans Müller was able to assemble roughly 12,000 men and at the end of May 1525, marched with his army toward Freiburg. Without major fighting, the city opened its gates while fighting was still continuing on the Alsatian side of the Rhine until the Duke of Lorraine suppressed the revolt.

The peasants were at a disadvantage, not only because they had little or no military training, but also because of poor coordination. The inability to unify and properly communicate with revolting groups in other regions and to form one cohesive group contributed to this shortcoming. While there were exceptions, the majority of conflicts were fought with scythes, axes, flails, and other farming tools. The League was also at an advantage by having armed horsemen, who could cover long distances much faster than a marching peasant army.

Altogether about 100,000 peasants and sympathizers either died in combat or were later executed during the Peasant War of 1524–5. Many survivors were tortured and lost their privileges and property. Cities and villages that aided the revolts lost their rights; their weapons were confiscated and they were forced to pay reparations.

German Reformation

Kevin Ostoyich

On the night of October 31, 1517, an Augustinian monk and university professor named Martin Luther (1483–1546) nailed his “Ninety-Five Theses on Indulgences” on the door of the Castle Church in Wittenberg. This cataclysmic event heralded the German Reformation, a movement that spread throughout the Christian world.

Luther’s actions, however, were not without root and precedent. Almost a full century prior to his Ninety-Five Theses, the Bohemian reformer Jan Hus (ca. 1369–1415) had denounced both the theological and material underpinnings of the Catholic Church. Hus and his followers (known as Hussites) were branded as heretics, and Hus himself met with a fiery end at the heretic’s stake.

Besides the “heretics,” a much more immediate and influential precedent came from within the accepted parameters of late medieval Christianity through Desiderius Erasmus (ca. 1466–1536), who embodied the growing intellectual movement of humanism. Humanists looked favorably upon the ability of man to actively know the surrounding world. They believed that through the cultivation of knowledge and the pruning of superstition, man could establish a harmonious relationship with nature and God. The humanists’ growing appreciation of cultivated knowledge at the expense of rigid dogma helped establish an intellectual environment by 1517 whereby Luther’s ideas (although similar in many ways to those of Hus) could spread healthy roots, despite official condemnation by both church and state.

Martin Luther

When Luther nailed his Theses to the door, he was immediately responding to the use of indulgences by Catholic leaders. An indulgence can be thought of as a contract in which a Christian would pay for the remission of his sins or the sins of a loved one in Purgatory. Church officials frequently used indulgences in order to pay for the construction of church buildings.

Luther’s condemnation of the practices of the Roman Catholic Church and its papal head led to legal proceedings and his eventual excommunication on January 3, 1521. In April of that year, Luther was summoned before the Imperial Diet of Worms, where under the guidance of the Holy Roman Emperor Charles V (1500–58; r. 1519–56) he was asked to recant his views. He refused. The Edict of Worms was decreed on May 25, 1521, officially condemning Luther and his writings throughout the empire.

Luther was saved through the intervention of the elector Frederick of Saxony. Frederick, known as “the Wise,” had the homeward-bound Luther whisked away to Wartburg Castle. While hiding in Wartburg for the next year, Luther continued to develop his attack on the Catholic Church and drafted a German translation of the Bible. The first part of Luther’s translation appeared in 1522. The full translation, which Luther produced with the assistance of his colleagues, was finally published in 1534.

Indulgences were only the tip of a large iceberg. In Luther’s eyes, the clergy and the pope in particular promoted idolatry and superstition among the laity. For Luther, the papal indulgence was symptomatic of the clergy’s attempt to obfuscate the true means of salvation in order to serve their own interests. The clergy had become burdensome middlemen standing between God and Christian. They fed upon Christian fears by promoting Pelagianism, or the belief that the Christian could earn the grace of God through good works and, thus, bring about his salvation. According to Luther, the church’s promotion of this erroneous belief in meritorious works strengthened the clerical hold over a prostrated laity.

Luther’s fundamental breakthrough was his realization that salvation was neither earned by the Christian nor dispensed by the clergy. For Luther the Catholic insistence that salvation was to be achieved through penance and meritorious works only heightened Christian anxiety. Luther knew only too well that man is an inherently sinful beast, and he argued that the Christian did not earn salvation, but rather received it from the righteous Christ. Thus, the inherently sinful Christian need not perform spiritual gymnastics (be it penance, monastic life, or purchase of indulgences), but only believe that he is “justified by [God’s] grace as a gift, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus” (Romans 3: 24). This doctrine of “justification by faith alone” was the key to Luther’s reform. From it followed Luther’s views on the sacraments and the Mass and his rejection of monasticism and ecclesiastical authority.

Luther’s reform movement expanded throughout the German lands despite the efforts of Charles V and the various meetings of the Imperial Diet in Nuremberg, Augsburg, and Speyer during the 1520s. Luther’s message spread largely due to the growing importance of the printed word (Luther’s works would quickly become the first “bestsellers” in the aftermath of Gutenberg’s printing press). His message of reform was communicated through pamphlets, pictorial broadsides, and by word of mouth. Given the high illiteracy rate (perhaps as high as 95 percent) within the German lands, a combination of these forms was necessary for the movement’s success.

Luther’s words and actions took on lives of their own, and as new reformers added their own complaints to those of Luther, the Reformation took on new meanings for different people. The reformers who would gain followings in Zurich and Geneva (two cities that would eventually join Luther’s Wittenberg as Reformation centers), for example, often espoused beliefs that coincided with Luther’s own; nevertheless, these points of commonality were quickly overshadowed by points of variance.

Huldrych Zwingli

The leading voice of reform in the southwestern German lands (including the German-speaking part of Switzerland) belonged to Huldrych Zwingli (1484–1531). Zwingli, although in agreement with Luther in many respects, such as his condemnation of indulgences, was ultimately more radical than the Wittenberg professor when it came to such matters as images and the Mass, the latter of which Zwingli abolished in Zurich on April 13, 1525. While Luther viewed images as unnecessary for the faith but not harmful, Zwingli believed that any religious image was a form of idolatry and thus unacceptable and subject to eradication.

The disagreement between the two reformers on the Mass and the sacramental qualities of the Eucharist was perhaps even more crucial. The debate turned on the definition of the word “is” in the passage “This is my body . . . This is my blood” (Matthew 26: 26–8; Mark 14: 22–4). Luther’s literal interpretation of the passage led to his doctrine of consubstantiation. As with Catholic transubstantiation, Luther’s consubstantiation involved the real flesh of Christ; however, unlike transubstantiation, consubstantiation did not require miraculous action on the part of the clergy. At the invitation of Landgrave Philip of Hesse (1504–67), Luther and Zwingli met in Marburg in October 1529 in an attempt to iron out their differences. The attempt failed. Luther stuck to the literal meaning of “is,” arguing for the real presence of Christ in the Lord’s Supper. He challenged Zwingli to provide scriptural proof that “This is my body” somehow did not mean “This is my body.” Zwingli and the Basel reformer Johannes Oecolampadius (1482–1531) countered that “is” was to be taken symbolically and that their proof could be found in John 6: 63 in the words “The flesh is of no avail.” The disagreement at Marburg proved too deep to overcome.

The reform movements of Luther and Zwingli also split on sociopolitical lines. In his doctrine of the Two Kingdoms, Luther emphasized the division of the temporal and spiritual realms. Zwingli was set on merging the temporal and spiritual together within one Christian community. Zwingli’s radical message that social and spiritual reforms were one and the same had great resonance within the Imperial cities of southwest Germany and German-speaking Switzerland. Zwingli’s days were numbered, however, as Switzerland became a battleground of religious civil war. He was killed in the Second Battle of Kappel on October 11, 1531. After Zwingli’s death, Heinrich Bullinger (1504–75) became the leader of the Swiss Reformation.

Conrad Grebel and the Anabaptists

Even Zwingli’s radical reform was criticized for not being “radical” enough. This criticism came from within Zurich itself. In 1525 Zwingli was taken to task by his former disciple Conrad Grebel (1498–1526). Quarreling since 1523 about the Mass, the two men ultimately broke ties over infant baptism: Zwingli supported the practice and Grebel did not. On January 21, 1525, Grebel started the Anabaptist movement by baptizing the adult George Blaurock. The following year Grebel died of the plague without leaving any major published works, but the Anabaptist movement did not die with him.

On February 24, 1527, the Anabaptists articulated their beliefs in the Schleitheim Confession (primarily written by Michael Sattler, ca. 1495–1527). The seven articles of the Confession not only set down the main tenets of the Anabaptist movement, such as adult baptism, but also addressed the proper stance of Anabaptists vis-à-vis the secular state. The Anabaptists, by stressing communal Christianity, refused to accept the authority of the traditional state. This did not mean that the Anabaptists led undisciplined lives. On the contrary, they pursued a strictly pious lifestyle and as the second article of the Schleitheim Confession attests, implemented the ban to purify their ranks. Given the radical implications of Anabaptist communalism for the traditional secular states, the Anabaptists were actively repressed by Catholic and Lutheran princes.

The most spectacular repression of the Anabaptists on German soil occurred in June 1535 in the Westphalian city of Münster. Münster had been drawing Anabaptist refugees from all over Germany, and in February of 1534 a group of Anabaptists influenced by the reform teachings of Melchior Hoffman (ca. 1495–1543) seized the city and imposed their brand of communal Christianity. In their New Jerusalem there was to be no private property, no unbelievers, and none but the Good Book. Books were burned and dissenters banished. This New Jerusalem was short-lived, however.

Lutherans and Catholics banded together, conquered the city, and administered harsh justice. With their New Jerusalem sacked and their ringleaders' corpses displayed in cages on St. Lamberti's Tower in Münster, the Anabaptists left Germany for Moravia, Poland, and the Netherlands. In their new environs the Anabaptists mixed austere discipline with a decidedly more pacific demeanor.

The Peasant Rebellion of 1525

The blood of Münster was by no means the first shed as a consequence of the Reformation. A full decade earlier, in the countryside of the southwestern German lands, the Reformation had taken a particularly ugly turn. Starting in the Black Forest territory of Stühlingen in June 1524, unrest swept through the German lands as peasants listed their grievances against their lords.

The first demand in the Articles of the Peasants of Memmingen was the right of the peasants to choose their own pastor, and they had in mind the radical reformer Thomas Müntzer (ca. 1489–1525). Müntzer believed that the time had come to bring about God's kingdom on earth, even if it required the sword. Müntzer and thousands of peasants were soon to die by that sword, however, as the Peasants' Revolt ended in complete and bloody failure.

The Reformation as Revolution

Although the Reformation was at its core a religious phenomenon, it was not without social and political consequence. It was nothing short of revolutionary in its curtailing of the Roman Catholic Church's power as a social, economic, political, and religious institution. While Martin Luther believed his message to be purely spiritual, whether he liked it or not, it had socio-political consequences. The Catholic Church in 1517 was by no means simply a spiritual entity; rather, it was a central (often the central) social and political institution of European communities. Luther's conception of the church differed greatly from the institution as it then existed. He defined the church to be the collection of the faithful as opposed to the hierarchy in Rome. In so doing, Luther's views, although religious at the core, could not help but have social and political meaning and consequence.

John Calvin

The last major reform movement to take hold on German soil was forged in the French-speaking Swiss city of Geneva under John Calvin (1509–64). Calvin was deeply influenced by the years that he had spent with the reformer Martin Bucer (1491–1551) in Strasbourg from 1538 to 1541. Calvin took from Bucer the desire to build an ecclesiastical hierarchy to run parallel with civil administration. Ultimately, Calvin was more successful in achieving this goal in Geneva than Bucer had been in Strasbourg. Calvin agreed with the Lutheran emphasis on the Word and upon the Lord's Supper but rejected Lutheran consubstantiation. This did not mean, however, that he agreed with the assertions that had been made by Zwingli at the Marburg Colloquy. Instead, Calvin took a middle position in which “the signs of bread and wine become an instrument of God’s grace in uniting the believer to Christ” (MacCulloch 2003: 250).

Another point of distinction between Calvin and Luther was that whereas the Wittenberg professor believed Christ’s presence to be “ubiquitous” on earth and thus, within the whole congregation, Calvin believed that Christ was only present with God’s elect. Calvin’s emphasis on a limited number of God’s elect (or “saints”) derived from his doctrine of “double predestination.” According to this doctrine God has already ordained all those who are to be saved and all those who are to be damned.

Reformed Protestantism

In the Zurich Agreement of 1549, the Calvinist and Zwinglian movements were reconciled into the Reformed faith. In the years that followed, Calvinism spread much more easily than did Lutheranism outside the German lands. Calvinism quickly spread through France and the Netherlands, and then in the 1560s reentered the German lands along the Dutch border. The essential figure for the spread of Calvinism in the northwestern German lands was the elector and count palatine of the Rhine, Frederick III (1559–76), who made the city of Heidelberg the center of German Calvinism and who in 1563 sponsored the Heidelberg Catechism, which consolidated doctrine for the German Reformed Church. The German Reformed Church, however, was not protected under the Peace of Augsburg; thus, the rights of Calvinists within German lands were not secured.

Despite their numbers in Western European states, Calvinists only resided in tiny pockets within the Holy Roman Empire. German-speaking lands were for the most part split along Lutheran and Catholic lines. The Peace of Augsburg solidified the confessional boundaries on the German map. Lutheranism predominated from the Danish border in the north to Franconia in the south, as well as from the center of the Holy Roman Empire to the borders with Poland. In the south, Catholicism constituted the majority from Baden in the west through Bavaria in the east. The western German lands along the Rhine River were much more checked. After the conclusion of the Thirty Years’

War (1618–48), the Peace of Westphalia guaranteed the rights of the minority Reformed Protestants along with those of the much larger Lutheran and Catholic population within the Holy Roman Empire.

German Revolution, 1918–1923

Alex Zukas

The German Revolution of 1918–1923 was one of a number of popular insurgencies that had roots in class-based inequalities and grievances before World War I, the unprecedented carnage of the war itself, severe deprivation on the home fronts, war-weariness, and anti-war organizing by revolutionaries. The greatest wave of collective revolts in Europe since the revolutions of 1848, they began with the Russian revolutions of 1917 and continued with a flood of revolutions and class-based civil wars that ebbed and flowed across Europe from 1918 to 1923.

The German Revolution has held particular interest for political scientists and historians, especially after World War II, precisely because the democratic promise of the mass uprising of sailors, soldiers, and workers against the Kaiserreich (German Empire) found only partial expression in the ensuing Weimar Republic. The revolution's democratic deficit relates to broad questions of German history, in particular, how this democratic shortfall contributed to the Weimar Republic's fatal instability and lack of legitimacy with broad sections of the German population, resulting in its overthrow by counterrevolutionaries in 1933 and its replacement by a brutal, racist, and dictatorial Nazi regime that embarked on a war of terror and conquest of world-historic dimensions and deadly consequences for tens of millions of people. The urban and industrial regions of north, western, and central Germany in and around Berlin, Hamburg, Bremen, the Ruhr, the Rhineland, Saxony, and Thuringia were strongholds of revolutionaries, whereas the heartland of counterrevolution lay in the rural areas of eastern and southern Germany. While some historians end the German Revolution in spring 1919 and others in spring 1920, a close analysis reveals that the revolution went through four distinct phases and the pent-up waves of revolutionary energy unleashed in late 1918 which found expression in assassinations, coup attempts, general strikes, mass demonstrations, and the creation of a mass-based communist party and only finally ebbed in late 1923.

Social and political tensions in Germany predated World War I. A major capitalist industrial powerhouse, political power in Imperial Germany remained in the hands of a small agrarian-based pre-industrial elite: the Kaiser (emperor, head of state), his advisors, and leaders of the army and civil service. The most forceful challenge to that elite came from the main workers' party, Social Democracy (SPD), which featured three ideological tendencies: revisionist (conditions for workers can improve under capitalism through reforms), orthodox (conditions need to ripen under capitalism for a successful workers' revolution in the future), and revolutionary (conditions are ripe for a workers' revolution).

The differences between these tendencies would intensify during the German Revolution. The national leaders of the SPD were revisionist and orthodox socialists who equated democracy with parliamentary representation and activity. Unions also saw a split between a reformist leadership and a militant rank-and-file, especially in mining and metallurgy. Social tensions were aggravated rather than eased by the experience of total war after 1914. New sections of the population (women and youth) found jobs in industry as men went to the front and new workers became increasingly politicized as they gained first-hand experience of union organization, confrontation with employers, and revolutionary socialist ideas of "class war." As World War I dragged on, circumstances on the home front worsened. Food supplies became a problem as early as 1915 and everyday life became politicized.

First Wave of Revolution, 1917

In April 1917 the first major strikes occurred in Berlin and other large cities to protest a reduction in bread rations. For the first time strikers made political demands (one of them being equal franchise); workers' councils and revolutionary shop stewards organized these strikes, since the official trade union leadership had promised not to initiate strikes during wartime and actively worked to suppress them (the so-called Burgfrieden). Such a commitment to social peace while workers suffered during wartime with longer hours, a faster work pace, and dwindling rations would detach much of the union leadership from the rank-and-file membership by war's end.

To wage the war more effectively and stifle discontent on the home front, the army high command assumed effective control of Germany in July 1917, creating a de facto military dictatorship. This move did not stem the revolutionary tide. In August 1917 sailors, whose leaders were in contact with the anti-war Independent Social Democratic Party of Germany (Unabhängige Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands) (USPD), carried out a politically motivated mutiny in favor of a compromise peace with the Allies. The armed forces suppressed the mutiny but sailors continued to believe that the war was being prolonged to suppress demands for changes to the German and Prussian social, political, and economic orders.

In November 1917 workers demonstrated in Berlin and other German cities for an end to the war, and strikes broke out in a number of important factories that lasted until early December. In January 1918, 400,000 workers went on strike in the Berlin metal industry. The strike leadership consisted of three leaders from the pro-war SPD and three leaders from the break-away anti-war party, the USPD, founded in April 1917. The strike demands were political as well as economic.

For instance, the strikers wanted a peace without annexations or indemnities (Lenin's formula) at the Russo-German negotiations in Brest-Litovsk and demanded a democratic government based on universal suffrage, the abolition of martial law, worker representation at peace negotiations, and bigger rations. Rehearsing his later counter-insurrectionary role, Friedrich Ebert (1871–1925), who supported the war and was one of the SPD leaders of the strike, later said he joined the strike leadership in order to end the strike as soon as possible and keep it from becoming a political insurrection against the state. The strike only lasted a few days and met with severe repression under the wartime "state of siege," but before it was over a million workers throughout Germany had laid down their tools. Military courts jailed thousands of strikers and sent their leaders off to the front. Food prices rose dramatically during the war and people worked longer hours (including Sundays) to pay higher prices. By 1918 agricultural production was 40 to 60 percent below prewar levels and official food rations limited consumption to no more than 47 percent of prewar levels, although this official level was rarely achieved. In addition, war casualties were high: nearly 2 million German men were killed and over 4 million wounded.

German military offensives in 1918 failed to achieve victories and the German high command suggested to the imperial chancellor (prime minister) in October that he form a broad coalition government to improve Germany's negotiating position with its enemies, since the German army was on the verge of collapse. As a result, Social Democrats entered the government for the first time. On October 5 the new government approved the change to a parliamentary system in which the chancellor (executive branch) would be responsible to the elected Reichstag (legislative branch) rather than to the Kaiser. Prussia would institute equal suffrage and national decisions about war and peace were to be the responsibility of the civilian Reichstag. The Reichstag passed the bills on October 26 and went into recess until November 9. A "palace revolution," orchestrated to a large extent by the old elites to displace onto the new parliamentary leaders the odium of suing for peace with the Allies, had altered the system of government in Germany but left the military, social, economic, and bureaucratic structures, the bases of elite power, intact. While Ebert and the SPD leadership were content with these political reforms and saw no need for a "revolution from below" to secure the new German state, the German masses had other ideas. Because their opinion differed on the kind of democratic state which should succeed the monarchy, in short order Ebert regarded those insurgent masses as the enemies of German democracy, not its most ardent supporters.

An unanticipated spark set off the tinder that had been gathering and would fuel the German Revolution "from below" for years to come. Hoping to improve its negotiating position, the German government acceded to President Woodrow Wilson's (1856–1924) demand to end submarine warfare; however, German admirals decided on their own initiative and without consulting the government to put to sea and attack the much larger British fleet in a final suicidal engagement. The fleet had been at harbor for three years and the ordinary sailors who had endured bad conditions while at anchor refused to follow orders. They mutinied on October 30 and hoisted a red (i.e., socialist) flag, initiating the first wave of the German Revolution. While the mutiny was being suppressed in Wilhelmshaven, it broke out in Kiel on November 3 and then spread to army troops and citizens of the coastal towns of north Germany. By November 8 the uprising had spread inland to all the major urban centers of Germany. The hastily constructed but democratically elected councils of servicemen and workers followed one of three options: they assumed the duties of local authorities, exercised control jointly with existing authorities, or supervised local authorities who remained at their posts. The collapse of military officers' authority in the army meant that an armed revolutionary movement took control of state power in Germany since, apart from some divisions on the western front, the councils were the only effective power in Germany. A moderate council movement developed most strongly in those industries where there had been little or no union organization before 1914, like textiles or railroads, while the radical council movement developed in those industries where there had been a massive influx of new, young proletarians during the war, as in metallurgy, chemicals, and mining. The councils had broadly socialist aspirations and rank-and-file council members were frankly unimpressed with the minimal parliamentary concessions of the outgoing imperial regime. However, the SPD leaders had been instrumental in gaining those reforms and they had no interest in, and saw nothing to gain by, fomenting a popular uprising that would decisively democratize the state and society. In fact, as members of the central government, they had every interest in dampening popular action and the initiative for mobilizing broad masses of workers for extensive social, economic, and constitutional changes came from USPD rather than SPD council members.

On November 7 a revolutionary movement of workers', soldiers', and farmers' councils overthrew the king of Bavaria (the first of four royal houses to fall in Germany). On November 8 USPD member Kurt Eisner (1867–1919) declared a council republic and he became head of a coalition government of USPD and SPD members. The national SPD came under increasing pressure from the party's rank-and-file members to take a more radical stance in the fluid circumstances of revolutionary upheaval. SPD leaders, worried about growing working-class support for the anti-war USPD and the even more radical Spartacist League, demanded the abdication of the Kaiser as the only way to avert social revolution, which SPD leaders abhorred, and as the price of their remaining in the government. The Kaiser, Wilhelm II (1859–1941), refused to abdicate and the SPD left the government. By November 9, when Wilhelm finally abdicated, it was too late to save the Prussian/German monarchy. On that day armed workers and soldiers carrying red flags marched into central Berlin and took possession of public buildings. No one defended the old regime and power lay with the revolutionary left.

The wartime divisions within the socialist movement on issues of annexations and war credits found expression in divergent attitudes toward the revolution. Revisionist and orthodox SPD leaders like Gustav Noske (1868–1946) and Ebert had not wanted a revolution and were content with a liberal parliamentary regime which meant convening a national assembly (i.e., constitutional convention) as soon as possible. That regime, granted in October, predated the revolution by a few weeks. Wanting to make the most of the revolution's transformative momentum to sweep away the oppressive structures of the old regime, revolutionary USPD leaders sought to postpone convening such an assembly until after the revolution had been secured and old-regime power bases eliminated by socializing the economy and democratizing the military and civil service. Cognizant of the power of the popular protest which had swept aside the monarchy, they wanted to institute far-reaching social, economic, and political changes while the forces of reaction were overwhelmed and not squander the revolutionary surge by running a caretaker government pending national elections. Finally, Spartacists pushed for a council government on the Russian soviet model.

On November 9 Karl Liebknecht (1871–1919), a Spartacist leader and Reichstag deputy, pushed the revolutionary process forward: he led a demonstration to the Berliner Schloß where he declared a German Socialist Republic while the SPD leader Philipp Scheidemann (1865–1939), hoping to undermine support for a revolutionary worker's state, proclaimed a German Republic on the same day without consulting any of his SPD colleagues. In a mass meeting the next day, November 10, 3,000 representatives from the Greater Berlin workers' and soldiers' councils elected six People's Commissioners, three from the SPD and three from the USPD, to form a Council of People's Commissioners and bestowed a mandate on the Council to govern Germany. Germany had become a de facto council republic. Fatefully, the Council elected Ebert, a long-serving SPD party bureaucrat fond of order, wary of insurrection, and fearful of popular initiatives, as its chairman, not knowing that he was already working to curtail the momentum and power of the revolution.

The day before, November 9, the chancellor of the outgoing imperial government, Prince Max of Baden (1867–1929), had appointed Ebert his successor in a procedure of doubtful legality, but it provided members of military and business circles for whom a council republic (i.e., bolshevism) was an abomination with an alternative government. In this situation of "dual power" (which reflected the opposing aspirations of revolutionary workers, soldiers, and sailors who favored a socialist council democracy and reformist workers, party and trade-union bureaucrats, and bourgeois who favored liberal parliamentary democracy), Ebert allied with the defeated but still potent forces of the old imperial order to stem the forces of change.

In a series of secret conversations culminating on November 10, General Wilhelm Groener (1867–1939) and Ebert agreed that the imperial army would maintain Ebert in office as chancellor in return for Ebert's ensuring that officers retained power of command and his pledge to fight bolshevism (i.e., a council republic) and social disorder. This covert alliance between a reformist socialist leader and one of the most detested elements of the old regime, the military, resurrected the defeated army's role as one of the pillars of the German state and inaugurated the political counterrevolution.

At the same time as Ebert was negotiating with Groener, the head of the SPD-oriented trade union federation, Carl Legien (1861–1920), was publicly negotiating the Stinnes-Legien Agreement with the heads of German big business and agreed on November 15 to guarantee orderly production, end wild-cat strikes, drive back the influence of the councils, and prevent a nationalization of means of production. In return the employers agreed to introduce the 8-hour day, recognize free unions as sole representatives of workers (instead of company unions or revolutionary workers' councils), and arbitrate contract disputes. Inaugurating an economic counterrevolution by allying themselves with old-regime capitalists, union leaders leveraged the threat of revolutionary upheaval to extract many of their longstanding demands, but they deliberately derailed all efforts to nationalize the means of production and to institutionalize the power of the councils.

Nevertheless, these agreements did little to end the fundamental hostility of the broadly nationalist right to the new regime because on November 11 representatives of Chancellor Ebert, not representatives of the government of the deposed Kaiser or of the army high command who had prosecuted the war, signed an armistice with the Allies at the high command's urging. To disguise the operational collapse of the German army and avoid culpability, the high command immediately propagated the rumor that an undefeated Germany was sold out, "stabbed in the back," by socialist and liberal politicians. German monarchists and militarists accepted and spread the claim which helped legitimize future right-wing, counterrevolutionary coup attempts against the government of "November traitors."

Ebert's USPD colleagues on the governing council had no knowledge of his secret deal and while they agreed with him that a national assembly needed to be convened to form a new state, they argued that the council would use the momentum of a people's revolution to dismantle the existing class structures by socializing the economy and democratizing the military. Reflecting the SPD's organizational advantages, on December 20 about 80 percent of the delegates to the first all-German congress of workers' and soldiers' councils rejected the demand for a government based on the councils (a key Spartacist demand) and voted to hold immediate elections for a national assembly (on January 19), a key demand of Ebert. Unaware of Ebert's pact with Groener, the congress also passed radical restructuring resolutions which would not be implemented under Ebert's watch: the socialization of "ripe" industries, particularly coal mining, and the establishment of a people's militia, an old SPD demand to have elected officers and democratize the army.

A new situation emerged after the congress and the character of the councils underwent a substantial change inasmuch as they swung to the left. The USPD and Spartacists attained dominant positions in many local and regional councils, especially in those regions where the left traditionally had strong support (Berlin, Saxony, Thuringia, Hamburg, the Rhineland, etc.), and these councils looked to become an alternative government. Radical council governments took over a considerable number of large cities, including Bremen, Düsseldorf, and Brunswick. In Berlin a group of revolutionary sailors (the People's Marine Division) angry over arrears in pay invaded the Chancellery and seized SPD leaders on December 23. A prisoner of revolutionary militia, Ebert phoned Groener to use army troops against the sailors, but the attack ended in a stalemate with the soldiers openly siding with the sailors. Angry Spartacist demonstrations then broke out, ending in the seizure of SPD newspaper offices in Berlin and other German cities. The USPD commissioners, already suspicious of Ebert's visibly cozy relationship with the former imperial high command, saw his summoning troops to attack the sailors as a confirmation of his hostility to the revolution; on December 29 they resigned from the council.

The next day the Spartacists left the USPD and formed the German Communist Party (Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands) (KPD) and, on January 6, 1919, identifying the Ebert government with counterrevolution, representatives from the KPD, the Berlin USPD, the People's Marines, and the revolutionary shop stewards agreed to launch an armed struggle with the goal of overthrowing the Ebert government in order to pursue a thoroughgoing revolutionary transformation of German politics and society. Strikes and building occupations ensued in Berlin, pitched battles were fought with police and soldiers, but the attempted coup was poorly led and badly coordinated. Since the regular army was no longer reliable, Gustav Noske, Ebert's chief of defense, invited volunteer right-wing anti-republican paramilitary units (Freikorps) organized by senior officers of the old army into Berlin to curb the insurgent left. Freikorps troops fomented a blood bath and counterrevolutionary forces won the day by the time fighting ended on January 12. Among many atrocities that cost the SPD the support of large sections of the German working class, on January 15 Freikorps troops found and murdered the unarmed communist leaders Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg, sealing an enmity between the SPD and KPD that would last throughout the Weimar Republic.

Elections for the national assembly were held on January 19, 1919, under the bayonets of the Freikorps. Thanks to its well-established electoral organization, the SPD won nearly 38 percent of the vote, while the USPD won nearly 8 percent, the Catholic Center Party almost 20 percent, the liberal Democratic Party (DDP) almost 19 percent, the conservative German People's Party about 4 percent, and the monarchist German Nationalists about 10 percent. Social Democrats were disappointed with the results since it meant forming a coalition government, but they took some comfort in the fact that the anti-republican parties won only 16 percent of the vote.

The SPD, Center, and DDP formed a coalition government of moderate socialist and bourgeois parties that was even less prone to structural social and economic reforms than the People's Commissioners and the National Assembly at Weimar, meeting under Freikorps guard, and elected Ebert president of the republic. The convening of the National Assembly marked the end of the first phase of the German Revolution, but in many respects the revolutionary impetus had only been deflected because workers' fundamental grievances had been left unaddressed.

Second Wave of Revolution

By late January a process of mass grassroots radicalization had begun across Germany. Counterrevolution in Bavaria began the second wave of revolutionary upheaval. Violence swept Bavaria after the February 21, 1919 assassination of Kurt Eisner by a right-wing anti-Semitic ex-soldier. In April successive council governments were established in Munich in competition with a SPD-led parliamentary regime. The council prevented the parliament from convening, declared a republic based on workers' councils following the Russian soviet model, and a revolutionary council called for a general strike. The government of Bavaria refused to capitulate and once again armed forces of the state settled the issue with great brutality.

Early in March renewed fighting broke out in Berlin during a general strike called by the revolutionary shop stewards to enforce socialization of the factories and the dissolution of the Freikorps. Noske once again dispatched the Freikorps who killed anyone found armed. In spontaneous social protests, leftist governments took over Bremen and Brunswick and mass strikes of gigantic proportions rocked the Ruhr, Berlin, and central Germany. The revolutionary workers involved in these strikes, harboring great distrust of established trade unions and the SPD as collaborators with the class enemy, demanded immediate socialization of major industries and workers' control.

A second congress of workers' and soldiers' councils met in April 1919. Skirmishing continued throughout Germany but by the end of May the Ebert government and the Freikorps had crushed the insurgents and the independent power of the workers' and soldiers' councils. Nevertheless, the Ruhr and Halle-Merseburg remained under a state of emergency through 1919 and into 1920 as civil war smoldered. German militarism, discredited by the events of World War I, revived swiftly and the Freikorps became the basis of the new German army (Reichswehr), making sure it retained the anti-republican spirit of the old imperial army.

This was not difficult since the harsh treatment of a defeated Germany in the Treaty of Versailles, which the republican government had no choice but to approve on June 23, 1919, aroused great anger among Germans, but especially within the reactionary, monarchist, and nationalist right composed for the most part of large landowners, military officers, ex-officers and ex-soldiers, civil servants, big businessmen, and rural farmers. It confirmed for them that revolution was the cause of national defeat and humiliation rather than the reverse: that the oppressive structure of the old regime and the experience of protracted war were grounds for an anti-authoritarian revolution. These groups provided the social basis for recurring violent attacks against the republic and revolutionary workers from 1918 to 1923.

After approval by the assembly, Ebert signed a liberal-democratic constitution into law on August 11, 1919. Perhaps to maintain a link to the past and appease its right-wing opponents, the new republic was officially Das deutsche Reich (German Empire) rather than Die deutsche Republik (German Republic). While the creation of a parliamentary regime was already in the works in October 1918 before the revolution broke out, revolution had not accomplished the three goals set forth by its protagonists: democratization of German society and administration; expropriation of big business and socialization of major industries; and transformation of the repressive army into an egalitarian people's militia.

Third Wave of Revolution

After ebbing for a few months, the third wave of the German Revolution began in March 1920 when right-wing officers and civil servants initiated a coup (putsch) against the republican government in Berlin. Known as the Kapp-Lüttwitz Putsch, the main organizers were a civil servant named Wolfgang Kapp (1858–1922) and counterrevolutionary Generals Walther von Lüttwitz (1859–1942) and Erich Ludendorff (1865–1937).

Lüttwitz was an outspoken critic of the Treaty of Versailles. He especially disliked its provisions to reduce the German army to 100,000 soldiers and to disband the right-wing paramilitary Freikorps. When ordered by Defense Minister Noske to disband the Freikorps under his command, Lüttwitz refused. Noske removed him from command for insubordination and Lüttwitz decided to act. On the night of March 12 the Freikorps Marine Brigade Ehrhardt, which had been under Lüttwitz's command and targeted for disbanding, marched on Berlin to depose the government and establish a right-wing military dictatorship. Lüttwitz, who commanded troops in the Berlin area, supported the putsch with his forces. Much to the shock of the government, the regular army under the command of General

Hans von Seeckt (1866–1936) refused to intervene against the putschists and the government fled to Dresden. The coup only lasted a few days: a general strike called by the trade unions paralyzed Germany, defeated the putsch, and restored republican government.

Before the putsch collapsed, thousands of workers had armed themselves and taken over large areas of the Ruhr. Workers' dissatisfaction had been building in the Ruhr for almost a year and there the general strike became an armed uprising against the military and paramilitary presence in the region, but also against the policies of the deposed government.

In many instances the "Red Ruhr Army" was more than a match for the riot police, Freikorps, and army units and after the collapse of the putsch the workers refused to surrender their weapons given the doubtful loyalty of the armed forces to the republic and the republic's own conservatism. This proletarian army based itself on a new kind of council movement, on radical factory councils that had little in common with the old workers' councils. As new centers of revolutionary activity, these councils promoted open class warfare. They demanded guarantees against future military coups and the initiation of the structural social changes promised by the SPD before and after 1918.

Under the Bielefeld Agreement of March 24 negotiated with the government, which recognized the revolutionary nature of the Ruhr movement, workers agreed to hand over their weapons and return to work. The government agreed to disarm and punish those who participated in the coup, to disband all anti-republican organizations, to purge the government bureaucracy of counterrevolutionary elements and reform it along democratic lines, to implement "co-determination" (a weakened form of economic democracy) by workers and owners in industry and commerce expeditiously, to socialize "ripe" industries (especially the highly monopolized coal and potash industries) immediately, to form pro-Republic local militias, to expand social welfare legislation, to provide financial help for the dependents of those Red Ruhr Army personnel killed and wounded, to institute no reprisals against those workers who had joined the Red Ruhr Army, and to keep regular army units out of the Ruhr as long as the workers kept their side of the bargain. Most workers relinquished their weapons, but the government did not live up to its side of the agreement. Army and Freikorps units were sent into the region and even into the demilitarized zone in violation of the Versailles Treaty and enacted brutal reprisals.

In the wave of revulsion to the aftermath of the Bielefeld Agreement, workers turned away from the SPD, which lost heavily to the USPD and KPD in the June 1920 elections. For the first time the USPD outpolled the SPD in major centers of revolutionary activity: Halle–Merseburg, Berlin, and Leipzig. Trade unions suffered a tremendous hemorrhage of members unhappy with union support of the increasingly unsatisfactory status quo. Partly in reaction to the behavior of the SPD government leaders, in December 1920 a majority of USPD members joined the KPD (making it a mass party for the first time) and became unremittingly hostile to a Republic which had not only abandoned any attempt to institute socialism but did not seem able or willing to defend workers from predation by the anti-republican and counterrevolutionary military, bureaucracy, and big business, the prewar “forces of order” against which workers revolted and with which the SPD leaders had fatefully allied themselves in November 1918. Fearing even greater loss of working-class support, the SPD withdrew from leadership of the national government until 1928, although Ebert remained president until his death in 1925.

Fourth Wave of Revolution

Revolutionary embers kept burning. Armed uprisings occurred in the central German industrial districts in March 1921, but the fourth wave of the German Revolution began on January 11, 1923 when Franco-Belgian forces occupied the Ruhr in an attempt to force Germany to comply with the reparations clause of the Versailles Treaty. The German government declared the occupation illegal and urged passive resistance (ceasing economic production and refusing to cooperate with the occupiers) by the Ruhr’s population. Passive resistance failed to break the French occupation and the need to subsidize citizens in the Ruhr cost the German government 40 million marks a day. Unable to raise enough revenue to cover costs, the government printed money, causing the value of the mark to fall until German paper currency had no value. The German government declared an end to passive resistance in the Ruhr on September 26, 1923.

During the social chaos and suffering created by horrific inflation, Hans von Seeckt and other military officers planned a coup to institute a military regime and end the Republic. Before such plans could be realized, ex-officers staged a coup attempt in Berlin that Seeckt’s forces put down and Adolf Hitler and various associates staged a coup attempt (the so-called Beer Hall Putsch) in November to take over the government in Bavaria as a prelude to a March on Berlin to overthrow the national government in a recreation of Benito Mussolini’s (1883–1945) successful March on Rome in 1922. The coup failed within 24 hours, but it seemed to have kept Seeckt’s plan in check. The revolutionary impulse was still alive in regions that had supported the USPD and council democracy during the revolution. Communists revolted in Hamburg from October 23–26, 1923, and hoped it would lead to a general uprising in Germany, which it did not. Socialist-Communist coalition governments in the left-wing strongholds of Saxony and Thuringia formed workers’ militias in anticipation of a revolutionary upsurge and counterrevolutionary attacks from Berlin and Munich. Seeckt ordered the army to disband the militias and depose the elected parliamentary governments, something he did not do in Bavaria despite the increasingly separatist activities of the right-wing government of Gustav von Kahr (1862–1934), which came to power in a coup and had inspired Hitler’s own coup attempt. With the defeat of these movements, armed revolutionary struggle in Germany came to an end. Ten years after the end of the German Revolution Hitler staged a successful counterrevolution in league with the very forces of the old regime that the revolutionaries had tried to obliterate.

Germany, Green movement

Eric F. Trump

The German Green movement flourished as part of the post-materialist political agitation of the 1960s German left and student protest movements. The Green Party, officially founded in 1980 and today formally known as Bündnis

90/Die Grünen (Alliance 90/The Greens), is the most politically successful Green party in the world. A product of complex ideological strains, its core members were devoted to integrating ecological and socialist politics. Though early Greens wanted to transcend partisan categories, some theorists argue they simply reconstructed Marxian socialism. From the start Greens aimed to give voice to members of marginalized groups, such as gays and lesbians, radical ecologists and women's rights activists. From 1998 to 2005 as junior partner in a coalition with the Social Democratic Party (SPD), the party was lodged between protest and power, testing its dedication to its founding principles.

The Green movement began as a loose, politically variegated constellation of groups and citizen initiatives from right to left and seeking to change power structures in loosely organized extra-parliamentary opposition, or Ausserpolitische Opposition. At the local and state levels, protesters were motivated by, among other issues, the Vietnam War, NATO, nuclear power, and West Germany's postwar industrialization. Such groups as the Red Army Faction, the anarchist Spontis and Putzgruppe, and K-Groups, or communist groups, self-organized by resisting the 1966–9 Grand Coalition of the liberal SPD and conservative CDU (Christian Democratic Union). The stationing of NATO missiles in Germany and passing of the German Emergency Acts in 1968, allowing the federal government to restrict civil rights in case of crisis, drove many of the extra-parliamentary groups to join the Greens against a common enemy.

Initially, Green parties were less opposed to political institutions than the system itself. Core member Petra Kelly referred to the Greens as the "anti-party party." In the mid-1970s discontinuous pressure groups and action committees fared poorly in all but two local elections. In 1979 a Green Party representative won a German state legislative seat in the Bremen legislature for the first time, and afterward the Green-oriented parties coordinated to form a national party. At two founding conferences in 1979 in Offenbach and Karlsruhe the new national party program was drafted on four pillars: sound ecology, social responsibility, grassroots democracy, and pacifism. The groups arrayed at the two conferences from far left to far right, including core member and former CDU parliamentarian Herbert Gruhl, founder of Green Action Future.

The four broad principles were acceptable to conservative and alternative forces alike. The remarkable convergence of political strands prompted Gruhl to coin his famous slogan for the Greens: "neither left nor right, but out in front."

The big electoral break for the German Greens came in 1983 when they garnered 5.6 percent of the vote and 28 seats in the Bundestag, or federal parliament. The Green platform transformed the postwar status quo almost as much as the tennis shoes and jeans worn by its representatives: withdrawal from NATO, legalizing marijuana, shutting nuclear plants providing Germany with one-third of its electricity, abolishing advertising in public media, and speed limits for the highway system.

Just after winning seats in the Bundestag, enduring strategic divisions opened within the party between the realos ("realistic" reformers) and fundis (fundamentalists). Fundis, as represented by Petra Kelly, considered compromises would lead to politics as usual. Subversion trumped reform. The realos, whose spokesperson was Joschka Fischer, probably the Greens' most recognizable figure, argued that change occurs through existing power structures and opposition was insufficient. These trying debates were highly public, as the Greens invited the press to all meetings.

Despite the internal strife, the various factions coalesced in the 1980s to protest Pershing missiles, nuclear power, and construction of a new runway at Frankfurt Airport. Acid rain and the Chernobyl nuclear disaster gave their message urgency, and the party performed well in state elections. The Greens were central in triggering investigations into influence peddling of the German conglomerate Flick with federal political parties. Owing to consistent Green pressure and legal dexterity, Chancellor Kohl canceled amnesty for those implicated, forcing the resignation of the economics minister. In the early 1990s, following German unification, the Green Party in the West joined with civil rights activists from the former East Germany called Bündnis 90 (Alliance 90). The West German Greens' focus on the environment did not resonate with a nation still euphoric over reunification and despite the alliance the Green Party has failed to gain traction in the East.

For two electoral terms from 1998 to 2005 the Green Party formed a coalition with the SPD, the Red-Green coalition, with Joschka Fischer as foreign minister and vice chancellor. The party's traditional repulsion to NATO and dedication to non-violence was tested when Germany joined the US-led NATO air war against Serbia. German aircraft were placed into combat for the first time since World War II, causing a major identity crisis for the party and leading to resignations of numerous outraged members. With Fischer's approval, Germany sent troops again to Macedonia, the Congo, and Kuwait, leading to a string of local and regional electoral defeats.

Despite these electoral losses, the party managed to push through reform of the citizenship law, no longer based solely on blood lineage, but birthplace. The party also presided over passage of the Nuclear Exit Law that will gradually close Germany's 19 nuclear power plants by 2020. Other reforms include arms-export guidelines, legalization of gay partnerships, and an ecology tax.

In 2002 the Green Party adopted a new program called Grün 2020, its first major restructuring since its founding. Observers consider the manifesto signifying continued commitment to ecological renewal and social justice, but on a more pragmatic basis than 1980. Visions of a new society based on radical ecology or anti-capitalism are not evident. In 2005, Alliance 90/The Greens came fourth in federal elections, and with a new generation of leaders the party maintains a larger electoral presence than any Green party in the world.

Germany, Red Army Faction (Baader-Meinhof Group)

Brian Vetruba

Through three decades and 53 major terrorist acts against the West German state, the left-extremist Rote Armee Fraktion (Red Army Faction) (RAF) became one of the most violent and persistent terrorist groups in Western Europe. The RAF grew out of the Außerparlamentarische Opposition (Extraparliamentary Opposition) (APO) and the Sozialistischer Deutscher Studentenbund (Socialist German Student Union) (SDS), two of the main groups of the New Left in West Germany protesting against the Vietnam War, proposed curtailment of citizen rights during national crises, and the conspicuous silence on Germany's Nazi past.

Tensions escalated between student groups and police in the aftermath of the shooting of 26-year-old student Benno Ohnesorg by a policeman in West Berlin on June 2, 1967, during a demonstration. Gudrun Ensslin, future founder of the RAF, exclaimed, "This fascist state means to kill us all. . . . Violence is the only way to answer violence. This is the Auschwitz generation" (Aust 1985: 55). The attempted assassination of Rudi Dutschke, SDS leader, in 1968, led to more violence against the "fascist" West German state.

On April 2, 1968 a group of four people, including Andreas Baader and Gudrun Ensslin, future leaders of the RAF, fire-bombed two department stores in Frankfurt to protest the Vietnam War and West German capitalism (Becker 1989: 67). Arrested shortly thereafter and convicted of arson, the four were released while their case was under appeal. After losing the appeal, Baader and Ensslin went underground in Paris but returned to West Berlin, where Baader was recaptured on April 4, 1970.

Ensslin, together with prominent leftist journalist Ulrike Meinhof and four others, freed Baader from prison on May 14, 1970. This daring prison break is considered the birth of the Red Army Faction. The fugitives fled in the summer of 1970 to a Jordanian training camp led by the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), where they were instructed in urban guerrilla warfare. Returning to West Berlin in August 1970, they began a series of bank robberies. In May 1972 the RAF bombed US military bases, police stations, and the Springer publishing house, and attempted to assassinate a federal judge. During a massive manhunt in June, Baader, Ensslin, and Meinhof were captured.

Throughout the mid-1970s the second generation of the RAF continued with assassinations and abductions. On April 25, 1975, six RAF members took hostages at the West German embassy in Stockholm, demanding the release of 26 RAF prisoners. When these demands were not met, two hostages were killed, but a subsequent accidental explosion allowed the remaining hostages to escape and police to arrest the perpetrators. The trial against Baader, Ensslin, Meinhof, and other RAF prisoners began in May 1975 in Stammheim, a specially constructed prison.

On May 9, 1976 Ulrike Meinhof hanged herself in her prison cell. Although her death was ruled a suicide, many leftists suspected government involvement (Varon 2004: 198). In spring 1977, Baader, Ensslin, and Jan-Carl Raspe were convicted and given life sentences.

With the assassination of federal prosecutor Siegfried Buback and Jürgen Ponto, head of the Dresdner Bank, in 1977, the RAF began another offensive which culminated in the abduction of Hanns-Martin Schleyer, a leading industrialist, on September 5. A 43-day stand-off ensued when the West German government refused to release Baader, Ensslin, Raspe, and others. In support of this demand, militants belonging to the PFLP hijacked Lufthansa Flight 181 on October 13, 1977. Eventually flown to Mogadishu, the plane was stormed and the hostages freed on October 18, 1977 by the GSG 9, the West German counterterrorism unit. That same evening, Baader and Raspe died of gunshot wounds in their cells and Ensslin by hanging. Although the authorities claimed suicide, the RAF and its supporters accused the government of murder (Varon 2004: 198). On October 19, 1977 the kidnappers executed Schleyer. This six-week period became known as Deutscher Herbst (German Autumn), reflecting the perceived scale of the threat internal terrorism posed to the Federal Republic (Deutscher Herbst 2007).

Changing its tactics in the late 1970s and 1980s, the RAF concentrated on thwarting perceived imperialism in Western Europe, targeting both NATO and the US. Assassination attempts were made against General Alexander

Haig in June 1979, in Brussels, and against General Frederick Kroesen in Heidelberg in August 1981. Car bombs struck at US air force bases in Ramstein in August 1981 and in Frankfurt in 1985. The RAF also began cooperating with other left-wing terrorist groups in Western Europe, most notably Action Directe (Direct Action), which assisted with the attack in Frankfurt. Together with Direct Action, the RAF issued a joint communiqué calling for the “unity of West European revolutionaries” against imperialism (Alexander & Pluchinsky 1992: 65).

With the dissolution of the German Democratic Republic, the RAF not only lost a model of Marxism-Leninism but also its prime benefactor. It is now well documented that the Stasi (East German Ministry for State Security) provided training to the RAF as well as refuge in East Germany for RAF fugitives. (Schmeidel 1993: 59). Following unification, ten former members of the RAF were arrested.

Protesting the Persian Gulf War, the RAF strafed the US embassy in Bonn with automatic weapons fire in 1991. The last victim of the RAF, Detlev Rohwedder, who headed the governmental agency responsible for privatizing East German government property, was shot on April 1, 1991. On April 18, 1998, the RAF declared itself disbanded.

To this day, Germany is still conflicted on how best to come to terms with the RAF legacy. An art exhibition focusing on the RAF which opened in Berlin in 2005 was highly criticized for glorifying the terrorists and failing to discuss the suffering of the victims and their families.

Germany, resistance to Nazism

Ingo Schmidt

Resistance to Nazism began during the Weimar Republic in an effort to contain the Nazi movement and stop its rise to power. Once Hitler was appointed as chancellor and the Nazis transformed representative democracy into a terrorist dictatorship, resistance took various forms ranging from attempts to organize mass action and topple the government to sabotage and absenteeism in the production process and cultural non-conformity. While direct efforts to overthrow the regime obviously failed, the role of passive forms of resistance and opposition to the Nazis is still controversial. There is also debate about the impact of all kinds of resistance on the shape of postwar Germany after the military defeat of the Nazi regime.

Resistance and Opposition in Context

For a long time, historians defined resistance as conscious efforts to overthrow the Nazis either through the organization of mass actions or by counterterrorist acts. This view was widely shared by those who had been active in any such resistance movement. During the Cold War there was considerable dispute about which kinds of resistance would qualify as legitimate and truly anti-Nazi. In East Germany the ruling Socialist Unity Party, mostly a successor of the Communist Party, argued that the labor movement, led by the communists, had been the major force in anti-Nazi resistance, whereas the failed coup d'état on July 20, 1944 that was planned and carried out mostly by army officers had only been an attempt to avoid military defeat and the subsequent deconstruction of German imperialism. Ideologues of the West German ruling class, on the other hand, saw the communists as a vehicle of Soviet rule in the East. Since, according to their notions of totalitarianism, there was no difference between the Soviet and Nazi regimes, no actions that were undertaken or initiated by communists would qualify as anti-Nazi or anti-totalitarian resistance. Other oppositional activity, such as that by the student group Die Weiße Rose (The White Rose), Christian circles, or Georg Elser's individual attempt to assassinate Hitler by means of a bomb attack in 1939, stood in the shadow of the disputes about the significance of either communist-led labor resistance or the conspiracy that led to the July 20 attack on Hitler.

The focus on labor and military conspiracy was not only caused by Cold War controversies but was also founded in the potential role those two kinds of resistance could have played. A military conspiracy was much more appropriate under the conditions of a terrorist regime than any attempt at mass mobilization; some observers go so far as to suggest that counterterrorism would have been the only viable strategy of anti-Nazi-resistance (Haffner 1940: 181–90). However, even if the July 20 attack on Hitler had been successful, it would not have led to substantial political changes. The pro-communist bias of former East German research notwithstanding, it still provided plenty of evidence that the anti-Hitler conspiracy shared most of the Nazis' principal goals and was opposed to the Nazi leaders only because they were obviously not capable of achieving those goals (Petzold 1984: 131–6).

Labor, on the other hand, had been declared and treated as enemy no. 1 by the Nazis. In fact, 90 percent of all individuals who were convicted for opposition to the Nazi regime had ties to the labor movement (Abendroth 1972: 145). Therefore it is no surprise that the largest numbers of people working against the Nazis came out of that movement. Moreover, no other social group in Germany had constituted itself as a class through so many and (in terms of membership) in such large organizations as the workers.

Why was labor resistance to the Nazis unable to stop their rise to power? Why, after the consolidation of the Nazi regime, did the hoped-for mass action against the Nazis fail to occur? The first question is usually answered with reference to the deep political divisions and animosities within the labor movement (Scharrer 1987). The organization of mass action became virtually impossible once the Nazis had established their terrorist regime. Conspirative underground work, which was necessary to at least try to protect Nazi resisters, is, by definition, not geared to reach out to broad masses. Thus, small groups of determined activists, pursued, imprisoned, tortured, and often murdered by the Nazi state, could do little more than agitate masses of workers who had been active in unions, labor culture, and sport organizations during the Weimar Republic but didn't want to risk their own or their families' lives under the Nazis.

However, a new labor history developed in the 1970s which considered the dominant focus on labor organizations and their theoretical and strategic debates insufficient and patronizing. This new approach looked at the daily lives of workers, activists and non-activists alike, and discovered a wider variety of passive or unorganized resistance, ranging from slow work, absenteeism, and sabotage, through cultural non-conformity to helping hunted Jews, prisoners of war, or forced foreign laborers. Some historians went so far as to argue that this kind of "workers' opposition" not only replaced much "workers' resistance" (Eiber 2003), which the Nazis could suppress to a great extent, but even impacted Nazi policies. Discontented with their working and living conditions, more and more workers reduced their work efforts and asked for higher wages. To restore control over the production process through martial law, these historians argue, the Nazis had to go to war much earlier than they had planned (Behrens 1974).

Workers' Resistance

The establishment of the Nazi regime found labor organizations largely unprepared (Schneider 1999: 791–850). Although the communists had prepared for illegal activity since 1932, they had underestimated the viciousness, brutality, and effectiveness with which the Nazis would suppress the labor movement. Moreover, they thought the Nazi regime would just be an interlude on the way to revolutionary change and had planned neither organizationally nor strategically for long-term resistance. The social democrats, as opposed to the communists, did not try to reach out to masses of workers but instead attempted to maintain illegal networks among their old membership base. While this strategy helped to reduce the number of arrests, there was no attempt to organize a resistance movement. As with the communists, they thought of the Nazi regime as a short-term episode and were not prepared for long-term resistance or opposition. Smaller groups, such as the Communist Party Opposition or the Socialist Workers Party of Germany, were better prepared for illegal activity, but compared to the Communist and Social Democratic Parties, had only a very small membership base upon which to draw. Regardless of organizational capacities and strategic outlook, practically all labor organizations were mostly occupied with building and rebuilding (after the arrest of some of their activists) networks of communication and distribution of propaganda materials, much of which had to be smuggled into the country. By 1935 most of those networks were destroyed and could only be rebuilt on a very small scale. By this time, efforts to mobilize mass resistance had effectively been crushed by not only state repression against the most determined opponents but also by the social and economic consolidation that was achieved by the mid-1930s. In the face of labor shortages, which had replaced mass unemployment, and strong growth, workers expected a recovery of their real wages that were still at depression levels. However, with ever more economic resources devoted to arms production, any such claims were rejected. The regime's attempts to integrate the working class thus had only limited success. Yet the Nazi regime's mix of terror against its dedicated opponents and attempts to integrate more cautious workers was rather effective in unmaking the German working class as a political force (Schneider 1999: 766–82).

Workers' Opposition

The Nazis never managed to win the same wholehearted support from workers that they had from much of the peasantry and middle and capitalist classes, at least until the demise of the regime was written on the walls of bombed cities. One reason for this was that too many workers had either been actively involved or were at least sympathetic to one wing of the labor movement or another. Another reason was that the National German Socialism that the Nazis' own proletarian base was waiting for after it had helped to destroy the labor movement was called off after the leaders of this proletarian wing of the Nazi party were killed in June 1934. Thus, workers knew that they had to expect wage pressures, speed-ups, and longer hours.

Without autonomous union or political representation, the Deutsche Arbeitsfront (German Labor Front) with its mandatory membership was an effective tool to apply the Nazi state's Führerprinzip (Führer Principle) to workplace organization. Under these conditions workers found subtle ways to slow the labor process down, neglect quality of work, or even engage in acts of sabotage. Once the economy was short of labor, there were even spontaneous strikes for higher wages, mostly momentary and on the level of single shops of larger companies. This kind of workers' opposition mostly ended with the beginning of the war in September 1939. On an individual level, managers could send unwanted workers to the front. On the aggregate level, war mobilization changed the composition of the working class. Many male workers had to trade their work clothes for uniforms and were increasingly replaced by female and forced foreign workers. These latter two groups had either little experience in capitalist work places or were subject to the most brutal conditions, where even a short break could cause beatings or killings from Nazi supervisors. Impressively enough, even under those conditions, there were rudiments of resistance in the form of mutual help to lessen individual workers' exposure to terror. On the other hand, some of the remaining German male workers adopted the role of a labor aristocracy in a patriarchal and racially structured workforce. Although even German workers, male and female, faced ever harder working and living conditions during the war, the Nazis were able to contain growing discontent by avoiding starvation through increasing economic robbery of food supplies from the occupied countries. Moreover, a significant number of Germans from all classes feared advancing foreign troops would take revenge for their actual and/or supposed complicity with the Nazis (Abendroth 1972: 147). This led to the paradox that a vast majority of Germans couldn't wait for the war to be over, but were also in fear of the Third Reich's downfall and subsequent military occupation.

Exile

The first political refugees started to emigrate from Germany even before the Nazi regime was fully established. The communists relocated their headquarters to Paris, the social democrats chose Prague. Exiled labor activists spent much of their time acquiring visas, work, and accommodation for themselves and newly arrived refugees. They were also busy in establishing and maintaining contacts with their illegal comrades in Nazi Germany. While the immediate impact of workers' resistance in Germany was very limited, there were endless theoretical and strategic discussions in exile. More often than not the divisions and factional splits that had already existed in Germany and helped the Nazis to get into power were replicated in exile. Mutual accusations between communists and social democrats as "red painted fascists" and "social fascists," respectively, were maintained, although there was a common understanding that a united front of the big workers' parties might have stopped the Nazi rise to power. Such factional disputes were actually more prevalent in exile than they were in Germany, where the common threat often helped to overcome organizational competition and ideological battles. A major shift finally occurred in 1935, at the same time that workers' resistance in Germany had mostly been stamped out, when the Communist International adopted its Popular Front strategy. This would comprise not only the various factions of the labor movement, but also bourgeois and religious opposition to the Nazi regime. A practical test case for this strategy was the Spanish Civil War (1936–9), in which many political refugees from Germany fought on the side of the republic against Franco's troops, who received military support from the fascist regimes in Germany and Italy. Unfortunately, the popular front in Spain was not only overpowered by its military adversaries but also torn apart by internal ruptures. There were two internal reasons for this failure. First, the communists, advised by their Soviet comrades, applied the same methods to break internal opposition that Stalin used to consolidate his power in Moscow. Second, the communists were regarded with suspicion by non-communist Nazi opponents because of the Hitler-Stalin pact (1939–41). Practical problems weakened exile resistance when a seemingly unstoppable German war machine swept over most of Europe and forced refugees either underground or to one of the few countries the Nazis had not occupied. Eventually, it was the troops of the anti-Hitler alliance, not internal resistance of any sort, which destroyed that war machine and the Nazi regime. Against this background it is sometimes argued that resistance, and the death toll that came with it, was in vain. However, others, particularly surviving resistance fighters, maintain that humanistic ideas, no matter whether they were couched in socialist, religious, or radical democratic philosophies, were kept alive only through resistance.

Germany, socialism and nationalism

John M. Cox

Led by Adolf Hitler, the National Socialist, or Nazi, Party took power in Germany in January 1933, promising a “thousand-year empire.” Twelve years later, Germany and most of Europe lay in ruins, German Nazism having been subdued by the armies of the Soviet Union and the Western Allies, led by the United States and Britain. But while outside forces were required to bring down Hitler’s tyranny, the Nazi dictatorship was never free from domestic opposition. The Third Reich, as the Nazi government was called, found its most persistent and numerous enemies in the remnants of Germany’s left-wing parties, which Hitler had ruthlessly suppressed upon taking power. Although many thousands of German workers and socialists undertook anti-Nazi resistance activity, their story has been overshadowed, in Germany and elsewhere, by an attempt on Hitler’s life organized by opponents within the military elite in July 1944. This conservative military resistance is often inaccurately designated the German resistance. However, the resistance of Germany’s socialists and communists began in the first days of the dictatorship and only ended with its defeat.

Socialist and Communist Parties Before Hitler

By 1914 the Social Democratic Party of Germany (Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands) (SPD) was the largest socialist party in the world, with a membership of nearly 1.1 million. Its associated trade unions grew in membership from less than a quarter million in 1893 to 2.5 million by 1913. The party’s strength was reflected in its electoral successes; the SPD received 34.7 percent of the national vote in 1912, giving the socialists the largest delegation in the Reichstag, the German legislature. The SPD commanded the allegiance of most German workers, and through its numerous mass organizations – including sporting, cultural, youth, and women’s clubs – the party built a thriving social and cultural milieu.

issue of support for the German military effort precipitated a split within the Social Democratic Party. On the eve of the war in July 1914, the SPD’s leadership instructed the party’s Reichstag delegation to vote for the war budget – a decision that was deeply unpopular among the party’s rank and file.

The war greatly compounded the party’s internal divisions and by 1917 open factions had appeared, competing for control of local organizations and of the party’s formidable press apparatus. In April 1917 the left wing formed its own party, the Independent Social Democrats (Unabhängige Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands) (USPD). The USPD was, however, not simply a product of dissension within the SPD leadership; it also reflected the explosive social conditions of 1917 resulting from labor protests and a deepening popular abhorrence of the war.

Shortages and austerity combined with war-weariness to produce widespread discontent, culminating in massive strikes and civil unrest in April 1917 and a general strike in January 1918. This upsurge in working-class militancy gave further impetus to the left wing of German socialism. Meanwhile, the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, in October 1917, promoted the growth of communist and left-wing socialist parties and movements throughout Europe. This influence was both direct – through the efforts of the Communist International (Comintern), founded in March 1919 – and indirect, through the inspiration that the Russian Revolution initially provided to many thousands of workers and intellectuals.

Revolution broke out in Germany in November 1918, the same month World War I ended, and swept away the centuries-old Hohenzollern monarchy. When navy leaders ordered an attack on the British at the end of October, sailors in Kiel rose up in protest, and within a few days a generalized mutiny erupted. The sailors’ grievances intersected with those of large sectors of German society, and sailors, soldiers, and workers quickly established revolutionary councils. Kaiser Wilhelm II fled Berlin, and then the country, and on November 9 SPD leaders Friedrich Ebert and Philipp Scheidemann proclaimed a republic.

By this time the Independent Social Democrats had grown to more than 100,000 members, a figure that would increase several-fold in subsequent months. The USPD was strong in some of the industrial centers, most importantly Berlin, which had always been a bastion of left social democracy. The new USPD's far-left wing adopted the name "Spartacus League" in homage to the anti-Roman slave rebellion. The Spartacists, a small minority, abandoned the USPD at the end of the year, meeting on December 30 to form the Communist Party (Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands) (KPD).

The SPD, now the governing party, enlisted the aid of right-wing paramilitary forces to suppress the communists and other revolutionary forces in Berlin, Munich, and elsewhere during the first months of 1919. The memory of the short-lived revolution – and of the moderating and even counterrevolutionary role of the SPD in those dramatic days – would far outlive the 1918–19 German Revolution, causing bitter recriminations on the left and, for conservatives and rightists, stoking fears of workers' revolution.

German Socialism During the Weimar Republic

The Weimar Republic was the German government and political system that originated in a February 1919 National Assembly meeting in the town of Weimar. Throughout most of its 14 years, the republic was governed by a "grand coalition" comprising the SPD and two centrist parties. The SPD's leading role in a government that was beset by severe economic problems, forged alliances with discredited business and bureaucratic elites, and sought pacification in its first months through the excesses of right-wing military forces drove large numbers of workers out of the political center and into the ranks of the socialist left in 1919. The radicalization of large sections of the industrial workforce aided the USPD first and foremost. The USPD's membership increased from approximately 300,000 to 750,000 during 1919 and continued to grow at a more modest pace for the first few months of 1920.

But the Independent Socialists would soon be overtaken by the Communists as the second-largest party in German socialism. Despite ill-conceived communist uprisings in 1921 and 1923 – each of which was met with harsh repression – the KPD established itself as a major political force throughout the Weimar years. The USPD disappeared in the early 1920s, much of its membership joining the KPD, which by the end of the decade began to rival the Social Democrats. In the midst of a generalized polarization and radicalization, the KPD's membership burgeoned from 117,000 in 1929 to approximately 360,000 by 1932. The party's strength was demonstrated in the November 1932 elections – the last election before the Nazi takeover – in which the Communists drew 16.9 percent of the overall vote and 38 percent in Berlin. By 1933 the KPD was the largest communist party in the world outside the Soviet Union.

The KPD's increasing numerical strength was accompanied, however, by its political degeneration. Under the influence of changes in the Soviet Union – where the consolidation of power by Josef Stalin and his supporters signified the abandonment of anything resembling democratic and socialist values – the KPD became in many ways an appendage of the Soviet party, which handpicked its leaders and dictated its political line. These problems were compounded by the Comintern's imposition since 1928 of a bizarre doctrine known as the "third period" theory. Under this theory, capitalism had supposedly entered a third and terminal stage by the late 1920s, and the communist parties should assume leadership of the coming revolution by attacking their "opponents" in the workers' movement, primarily the Social Democrats. Thus the KPD lost considerable time and energy in Weimar's final years denouncing and trying to outmaneuver the SPD, rather than preparing for its real enemy, the ever-growing far-right and Nazi movements.

Rise of the Nazi Party

The left was not the only political force to gain sustenance from Germany's deepening economic and political turmoil. Initially a minor grouping in the spectrum of nationalist and racist organizations, the National Socialist German Workers Party or Nazi Party (Nationalsozialistische deutsche Arbeiterpartei or NSDAP) drew German nationalists, anti-Semites, and other right-wingers under its banner during the Weimar years. Founded as the German Workers Party in early 1918, the party adopted its full name in early 1920, a few months after a 30-year-old demobilized army veteran from Austria, Adolf Hitler, found his way into its ranks.

In the early 1920s the Nazis were based in Munich, the site of their ill-fated 1923 Beerhall Putsch, which led to the deaths of a few members and Hitler's conviction and imprisonment. A sympathetic criminal justice system ensured that Hitler served less than one year of his five-year sentence. While in jail he composed his magnum opus, the 700-page collection of diatribes and malicious outbursts that would be published as Mein Kampf (My Struggle). The NSDAP languished in the political wilderness for a few more years after Hitler's release from prison, but gained greater support as well as converts at the end of the 1920s. The Nazi Party quadrupled its membership in the second half of the decade, from 25,000 to 100,000, although this was still not a large number on the landscape of German politics.

The Nazis combined radical-sounding populism with ultra-nationalism and extreme anti-communism and anti-Semitism. Their paramilitary outfits and penchant for street battles with leftists appealed to wayward youths, and they benefited from a broader upsurge in nationalist sentiment. While most of the Nazis' vote, as well as membership, came from lower-middle-class Germans, by the early 1930s they received significant support from workers as well.

The worldwide economic depression brought about the collapse of Weimar's governing coalition. The centrist parties were pushed to the sidelines by the far right and far left, whose parties made significant electoral gains in the early 1930s, and in July 1932 the Nazis gained the largest share in federal elections. Those elections registered the severe polarization of German politics, which was now embodied in the spectacle of 100 uniformed KPD deputies and 196 brownshirted Nazi deputies sitting in the Reichstag. By this point a growing number of Germany's landowning and industrial elites had come to see the Nazis, whose hooliganism and overheated rhetoric they had earlier disdained, as their best defense against the far more frightening specter of revolution from the left.

Meanwhile, the left was paralyzed. The Social Democrats, committed to legalism and a program of gradual reform, believed that the institutions of state and society would withstand the Nazi threat, while the Communists failed to recognize the extraordinary nature of the Nazi menace, seeing in Hitler simply another pawn of big business, barely distinguishable from other bourgeois politicians. Both parties issued hollow threats of more resolute action, such as a general strike, but as Weimar democracy collapsed and the Nazis moved to fill the void, there was still no unified action.

1933: Disaster for the Working-Class Movements

After going through three chancellors in less than three years, in January 1933 President Paul von Hindenburg and other ruling conservatives appointed Adolf Hitler to the post, mistakenly believing they could thereby rein in the Nazis. The traditional conservative elite would be grossly mistaken. Hitler and his movement consolidated its hold over the next year and a half.

While each of the two large working-class parties underestimated the danger, the Communists were particularly short-sighted in their disastrous refusal to unite with the Social Democrats in the hour of greatest need. The KPD tirelessly attacked the Social Democrats as "social fascists" and went so far as to label them the "major enemy," a greater menace to the working class than the true fascists. Communist leaders simultaneously preached that Hitler's gang would only last a short time, and that the Nazi government would simply exacerbate the crisis of bourgeois rule, paving the way for a KPD victory. "First the Nazis, then the Communists!" went the KPD slogan, though as it turned out most Communists would be in exile, jail, or the grave well before the year was out.

Hitler had declared in Mein Kampf his belief that the "elimination of the Marxist poison from our national body" should be the "very first task of a truly nationalist government," and his regime wasted little time achieving this goal. The burning of the Reichstag by a 24-year-old Dutch immigrant at the end of Hitler's first month in power provided a handy pretext for the Nazis. The manifold repressive agencies of the state and party unleashed a fearsome terror on the working-class movements; thousands of communists, including as many as 1,500 in Berlin alone, were arrested immediately. By the end of Hitler's first year tens of thousands of KPD members were under arrest, many of them subjected to that feature of Nazism that would come to define its rule throughout Europe, the concentration camp. Approximately half the KPD's 1933 membership would be subjected to Hitler's extensive, ghastly jail and camp system, and some 20,000 communists perished under the Third Reich. Among them was Ernst Thälmann, leader of the KPD since 1925, who would die in Buchenwald concentration camp in 1944. The Social Democratic Party also suffered greatly under this reign of terror. Thousands of its members were arrested, and the government banned the party in June 1933. The Nazis had already destroyed the SPD-led trade union movement and confiscated its funds.

Beginning of Leftist Resistance

But the socialists and communists were not simply passive victims of Nazism. From the moment of Hitler's appointment as chancellor in 1933, they energetically resisted the regime. Communist activists engaged Nazis in street battles on the day the Hitler Cabinet was announced, and in working-class districts of several cities the KPD staged public demonstrations against the new government. Working-class and socialist resistance would take many forms in subsequent years, and indeed "resistance" is still a difficult concept to define. Today, many historians and other commentators acknowledge that acts of nonconformity, passive and moral resistance, refusal to submit to the Nazis' social and political policies – in short, anything that consciously undermined the goals of the regime – should be included in any appraisal of resistance.

Communist Underground Resistance

In the first weeks and months of the dictatorship, communist resistance primarily consisted of illicit production and distribution of leaflets, newspapers, and other literature. The KPD managed to publish its main newspaper, Die Rote Fahne (The Red Flag), until 1935. The party also sometimes organized public actions. Communists also held secret May Day celebrations, which helped to maintain morale and a fighting spirit. In addition, KPD members organized a charitable endeavor called Red Aid, which collected money for family members of political prisoners. The heavy hand of the state took its toll over the first two years of the regime, though, and by the end of 1935 the KPD underground had greatly reduced its activity. The Gestapo, the German secret police, successfully employed double agents within the communist underground and gathered additional information through torture, threats, and other such techniques. The entire leadership of the Berlin KPD was arrested in March 1935.

The Nazis never succeeded in completely destroying the communist resistance, however, as KPD members organized in smaller units, increasingly isolated from one another and from the party's exiled leadership. Many of the KPD's leaders – those fortunate enough to have eluded the mass arrests of 1933 – fled the country for the relative safety of the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, and other locales. Under the excessively strict guidance of the Soviet party, the KPD leadership sent directives to its German members as best it could, often proposing sharp reversals or shifts in policy. In 1935, for example, German communists were instructed to abandon the counterproductive hostility toward the Social Democrats they had cultivated for many years, and to seek alliances with underground socialists and other anti-fascists. This shift came a few years too late to have presented a threat to Nazism, and at any rate the new-found friendliness of KPD members toward Social Democrats was often met with understandable confusion and suspicion. Nevertheless, KPD members were able to initiate and participate in some common anti-Nazi activity with non-communists throughout the remaining years of the Nazi period.

The German communist resistance was continually buffeted by such unpredictable shifts of Soviet diplomacy and politics. For rank-and-file German communists, the August 1939 Soviet German Non-Aggression Pact (or Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, named after its respective foreign ministers) between Stalin and Hitler was especially disorienting. The two dictatorships agreed to refrain from aggression against one another and secretly divided parts of eastern and northern Europe into spheres of influence. The pact was accompanied by a trade agreement. For more than six years the KPD had energetically denounced the Hitler regime and, within their means, worked to undermine it. The August 1939 agreements implied a new, unforeseen friendship between Moscow and Berlin – or at the very least, a cessation in political and diplomatic hostility – and the KPD's subservience to Moscow placed the German communists in an untenable position.

The KPD leadership, however, heartily promoted this treaty that had so dismayed much of the party's membership. No longer was communist criticism directed at Hitler. England, France, and the United States were now the "enemies of peace," and KPD literature began speaking in vague terms about the responsibility of international imperialism for the world war. German communists were now instructed to laud the pact with Hitler, thereby alienating any allies they may have established among non-communist resisters. Compounding this, the KPD wasted little time renewing its tirades against the Social Democrats, this time dubbing them “agents in the pay of English and French imperialism.” Communist leaders falsely believed that the non-aggression treaty would offer their members more political freedom within Germany – some even fantasized that perhaps Hitler would legalize their party. Despite Stalin’s overtures – draping the Kremlin in the swastika flag to welcome Nazi diplomats, for example – there was never any possibility that Hitler would mitigate his hatred of communism, the unholy twin brother of Judaism in his fevered imagination.

Marking another reversal, the KPD resumed a more energetic resistance following Germany’s June 1941 invasion of the Soviet Union, which rudely disabused Stalin of his misplaced faith in the pact with Hitler. Now almost completely cut off from their external leadership, local communist networks organized smaller and more isolated units, and in some cases collaborated with people of other political persuasions.

The relatively large Robert Uhrig network organized several hundred resisters in Berlin and had cells in several of the city’s factories, including as many as 80 members in one armaments plant alone. Uhrig was a toolmaker and communist who, like many of the resisters in the network he started in 1940, had spent time in prison for his political activities in the 1930s. His network also attracted some Social Democrats as well as other youths who had never been in the orbit of the KPD. Uhrig expanded his operations substantially after the German invasion of the Soviet Union and united his groups with those of Beppo Römer, whose background was quite different from Uhrig’s. A former captain in the German army, Römer had been a leader of the Nazi Party in the 1920s, but later traveled in communist circles and eventually joined a group of leftist intellectuals, which led to his arrest in 1933 and 1934 and a five-year incarceration at Dachau concentration camp.

In short, the Uhrig network bore little resemblance, in organization and in social and political composition, to the communist underground of the first years of the Third Reich, which were homogenous and tightly controlled by the party leadership. This was characteristic of the KPD-related underground in the last years of the war and dictatorship: the isolation of individual communists from their exiled leaders allowed them to develop new, more imaginative units and political tactics. At the same time, though, the war-weary, terrorized population was less receptive than ever to resisters’ appeals for even more sacrifice and danger than was already the lot of the German people.

Other important communist-led resistance circles during World War II included those of Bernhard Bästlein and Franz Jacob in Hamburg, Berlin’s Saefkow-Jacob group, and a group led by Wilhelm Knöchel, also in Berlin. These groups continued to produce clandestine leaflets, undermine industrial production by holding work slowdowns, and assist families of working-class prisoners, among other activities. The Saefkow-Jacob group was similar to Uhrig’s network in its composition – it included large numbers of Social Democrats and other workers – and was able to establish large cells in several Berlin factories, including armaments plants, where the Saefkow-Jacob members worked to sabotage production. Wilhelm Knöchel, a member of the KPD’s central committee, returned to Berlin from exile and established an underground network in 1942 that published an anti-war newspaper and distributed plastered stickers and posters in factories and working-class neighborhoods denouncing the regime. The group was broken up by the arrests and execution of Knöchel and two dozen of his comrades in 1944.

The Red Orchestra was another particularly intriguing resistance operation which organized wide-ranging political discussions, produced and distributed literature, and gathered intelligence on Nazi military activities and atrocities. This group originated in a large intellectual and political circle around Harro Schulze-Boysen, a German intelligence officer, and Arvid Harnack, who worked in the Economic Ministry. Their loose network was based principally upon personal relations, and comprised similarly well-educated, middle-class, left-leaning Germans of all ages. The Red Orchestra (a title invented by the Gestapo, but not used by the group) included a few communists, most importantly Hans and Hilde Coppi. Schulze-Boysen and Harnack had contact with the Soviet embassy during the period of the Non-Aggression Pact, but had little success in keeping this contact open after the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941. German army decoders deciphered a radio broadcast from Moscow that led them to Schulze-Boysen in August 1942, and over the next several months the police rounded up 126 resisters who were connected to the Red Orchestra – and four dozen, including the central leaders, were executed.

Intersections of Leftist and Jewish Resistance

Other KPD-related groups are harder to categorize. Berlin's Herbert Baum groups, for example, were led by a veteran of the KPD (Baum), but included an assortment of Jewish youth activists, socialists, communists, and others. Many of Baum's comrades were too young to have been members of the KPD or the SPD and felt an allegiance to socialist ideals rather than to any particular party or ideology.

Herbert Baum, who had been a leader of the KPD's youth organization before Hitler's rise to power, acted as the coordinator of this network of groups, which originated in the late 1920s and persevered until 1942. The Baum groups are notable for their large number of young Jews – Baum's groups conducted many of the same activities as other leftists: nighttime leafleting or "graffiti-actions," distribution of newspapers, gathering and conveying news from outside Germany, and so on. They also placed great importance on study groups, with members secretly gathering in groups of seven or eight at an apartment for lengthy and passionate discussions of literature, political texts, and music. These sessions buoyed the morale of the members and lent cohesion to the groups.

The Baum groups are known to history primarily for a spectacular attack they engineered in May 1942. Nazi propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels had staged an exhibition ironically titled "The Soviet Paradise," depicting the deprivations of daily life in Russia in exaggerated and lurid detail. Anti-Semitism was a prominent feature of the Soviet Paradise, which was staged in Berlin's central Lustgarten square. Herbert Baum and several of his colleagues decided to sabotage the offending exhibition, and on the evening of May 18 placed firebombs in two locations of the Soviet Paradise, damaging a portion of the show. This is among the very few semi-military actions undertaken against the Nazis within Germany, and was particularly bold given that most of the perpetrators were Jewish. The Gestapo reacted swiftly, arresting Baum and most of his comrades within a few days. More than thirty members of the Baum groups were eventually executed, and the Nazis murdered an additional 500 Jewish citizens of Berlin in reprisal.

The Baum groups are often cited as an example of "Jewish resistance," while others label them "Communist resisters." Neither categorization captures the heterogeneity and ever-changing character of the Baum groups, which evolved over the decade of their existence. But clearly the Baum groups exemplify the courageous resistance of the most threatened and oppressed segment of Hitler's Germany. Jews resisted their tormentors in large numbers and in multiple ways throughout Nazi-occupied Europe – from the Warsaw Ghetto to the Lithuanian forests, in partisan armies in Poland and the Soviet Union, by participating in Western European resistance outfits, fighting in the Spanish Civil War and in the ranks of Allied armies, and organizing uprisings in concentration and death camps – and also through their work in groups like Baum's in the heart of the Nazi empire.

Socialist Anti-Nazi Resistance in Germany and Exile

The communist-inspired resistance was supplemented by an equally substantial resistance of Social Democrats and other socialists. The non-KPD socialist underground encompassed the SPD as well as numerous small groups whose origins and politics placed them in the socialist or anti-Stalinist tradition. The Social Democrats withstood their initial losses and regrouped in order to fight the Nazi tyranny. Underground SPD groups were stronger than the KPD in many industrial areas, owing to the party's considerable support among industrial workers throughout the Weimar Republic. Socialists produced leaflets and distributed them in factories where they worked and put up posters under cover of the night in large cities like Berlin and even in Munich, the bastion of Nazism since the early 1920s.

Socialist resisters developed an intricate system of courier transport to smuggle illegal literature into the country from exile bases in Czechoslovakia, Switzerland, Holland, and Denmark. Socialists disguised anti-Nazi literature with fake covers and mixed it with titles by Schiller, Goethe, and other traditional German authors. Underground activists devised elaborate methods to distribute their literature while avoiding arrest. A device called the jumping jack (Knallfrosch), for example, was used to propel leaflets from atop buildings or in rail stations. The SPD's executive committee (Sopade), based in Prague, maintained contact with the German membership, gathering reports on public opinion that provided realistic assessments to the exiled leadership, and in later years would prove useful to historians.

Resistance of Smaller Leftist Groups

The fragmentation and dispersal of the two large parties – the KPD and the SPD – gave rise to smaller leftist groups in the first months and years of the Third Reich in the 1930s. Numerous smaller groups had already split off from the communists and socialists in previous years, and new organizations emerged as well. These groups usually comprised many former members of the KPD and SPD, had youthful memberships, and created new forms and strategies to combat Nazism. Their anti-Stalinist character places them within the rubric of socialist, rather than communist, resistance.

With the exception of the SPD, the Socialist Workers Party (SAP) was the largest of the non-Stalinist left organizations throughout most of the 1930s. The SAP was strongest in Berlin, and had a membership of about 17,000 at the time of Hitler's rise to power in 1933. The SAP barely managed to survive the suppression of the left, with most members arrested, driven into exile, or discouraged from political activity. The SAP maintained a diminished presence on the domestic front, operating three regional organizations in the late 1930s. The group continued its struggle outside Germany, establishing a leadership unit in Paris, where it collaborated with other exiled anti-Nazis. Many SAP activists fought in the Spanish Civil War in the militias of the left-socialist Workers' Party of Marxist Unification (Partido Obrero de Unificación Marxista) (POUM).

The International Socialist Combat League (Internationale sozialistische Kampfbund) (ISK) combined various left-wing traditions and philosophical ideas in its distinctive character. The group, which was founded in the mid-1920s, was based in Göttingen in central Germany. The ISK anticipated the massive repression that a Nazi government would unleash, and, by dissolving itself at the beginning of the dictatorship, many of its members avoided the dragnets of 1933.

The ISK reorganized into six regional outfits and for cover used such venues as vegetarian restaurants and a bread store. These fronts provided some funds for the group's production of illegal leaflets and other literature, and the ISK managed to distribute a monthly newspaper up to the end of 1937, when the organization was virtually destroyed by arrests.

A variety of even smaller socialist groups carried out anti-Nazi activities in the mid-1930s. The Socialist Front, based in Hannover, distributed hundreds of its newspapers until the summer of 1936. A wave of Gestapo arrests led to the convictions of about 250 members, effectively dismantling the group. A left-socialist group, called the Red Shock Troop, included students, workers, and others and maintained contact not only with Social Democrats and Communists but with Quakers and other opponents of the regime. The Shock Troop distributed thousands of newspapers in Berlin and collected aid for Hitler's leftist prisoners, but the organization was broken up quickly by arrests and internment. Approximately 200 of its members were sent to prisons and concentration camps in 1933; a few members kept the group's spirit alive by carrying out anti-Nazi activity until the last days of the Third Reich.

The Org: Anti-Stalinist Intellectuals and Workers

The Org was a particularly significant socialist group that originated in the left wings of the KPD as well as the SPD. Walter Loewenheim, a member of the KPD's left wing, and a few close associates founded the Org (short for its original name, the Leninist Organization) in 1929, in Berlin. A one-time leader of the Communist Party, he became disenchanted with the KPD's politics by the mid-1920s and began to take an interest in Leon Trotsky's critique of Soviet domestic and foreign policies. Loewenheim resigned from the KPD in 1927, and began recruiting such people to his own group at the end of the 1920s in Berlin, soon establishing contacts in a few other cities as well.

The Org began small, numbering about 100 members at the time of Hitler's victory in 1933, but it grew in the first months of the Nazi dictatorship to approximately 500. The Org had many members and contacts among Berlin's working-class population, and recruited several dozen trade-union leaders and functionaries. The group maintained a full-time staff of about twenty people that included a secretariat, archivists, and couriers. In addition, Loewenheim – or Miles, as he was known in the underground – was a skilled and charismatic organizer. The Org also cultivated an extensive network of sympathizers, who included the underground leaders of the railroad workers' union and leaders of the Religious Socialists, a group of about a hundred people based in Berlin.

In 1933 Walter Loewenheim wrote a pamphlet entitled Neu Beginnen (New Beginnings), a name by which the group would often be known after the war. Neu Beginnen was subtitled "Fascism or Socialism: A Basis for Discussion among Germany's Socialists," and it succeeded in provoking debate, creating a stir among leftists beyond the Org's periphery, as well as among exiled German socialists and communists, even inspiring some socialists to form study groups to discuss the pamphlet.

As was the case with the other sections of the left-wing and working-class German resistance, the oppressive Nazi state prevented the group from achieving anything resembling mass action. Its main task was distribution of a newspaper, Sozialistische Aktion, which was printed by exiled members and smuggled into Germany through a complicated courier system. The group distributed 27,000 copies of the paper in 1935, and more than 5,000 of the paper's final edition in 1938. The Org also produced and distributed anti-Nazi leaflets and raised funds to support political prisoners. And, like members of other oppositional networks, Org activists maintained their spirits by combining the personal and social with the political.

The Org eventually succumbed to a combination of state repression and internal division. Loewenheim left Germany in 1935, and many of his adherents left the group or fled the country. An opposing faction retained the name "Org" and, even after arrests claimed about one-third of its members in late 1935 and early 1936, had a brief revival in 1937. By the end of 1938, though, arrests and attrition had taken their toll, and the Org was no longer able to sustain its operations in Berlin, which had always been the group's nexus. Once captured, Org members – like many other political prisoners – attempted to carry out resistance activities in the camps and prisons. The Org maintained a network in exile – with members in Paris, Prague, London, and New York – and only formally disbanded after the fall of Nazi Germany. After World War II, many Org veterans attained prominence in academies and politics in both parts of Germany, as well as the United States.

Other Arenas of Resistance

Alongside other Germans, communists and socialists also resisted the Third Reich by sheltering Jews from the Nazis' genocidal policies. An intriguing but little-known group that called itself the Community for Peace and Construction (Gemeinschaft für Frieden und Aufbau) coalesced in 1944 through highly unusual circumstances. The resistance activities of a Berlin Jew named Werner Scharff, an electrician born in Poland in 1912, began in 1941 when he was ordered to install lighting at a deportation assembly point located in a synagogue. He obtained work with the administration of the deportation center during the initial round-ups of German Jews in order to help those targeted for transportation to the prison-like Lodz Ghetto. Scharff aided some in relatively small ways – returning property stolen by the German guards, for example – and others in much larger ways, enabling some Jews to avoid being transported eastward by recording their names as "deported" rather than "to be deported."

Scharff went into hiding in June 1943, but was soon arrested and deported to the Theresienstadt ghetto in August 1943. While in transit to Theresienstadt, Scharff learned about a non-Jewish Berliner, Hans Winkler, who helped hide and protect Jews. Scharff escaped and returned to Berlin, where he located Winkler. The two started the Gemeinschaft and rapidly attracted approximately thirty people, including Communists and Social Democrats. Some of their literature emphasized the destruction wrought upon Germany by Hitler's war, while other leaflets publicized, for example, the atrocities that the German army had visited upon Poland and other countries overrun by the Wehrmacht, the German armed forces. A wave of arrests disbanded the Gemeinschaft in October and December 1944. Although Scharff perished in the Sachsenhausen camp, most of the other Jewish members survived the war, saved by the advancing Red Army. Their trial, scheduled for April 23, 1945 – a week before Hitler's suicide – never took place, as the government and its institutions were already collapsing.

Effects and Legacies of Resistance

The Nazis' leftist enemies never threatened to overthrow the Third Reich and had little influence on public opinion in Germany. Yet the success or failure of any form of resistance cannot be measured in an empirical, immediate sense. Seemingly humble and non-threatening actions – cultural activities and self-education, for example – thwarted the Nazi ambition to dehumanize and crush its victims. Collections for families of political prisoners and food-distribution operations could not topple Hitler or the Nazi Party, but they prevented the dictatorship from corrupting its victims morally and spiritually, another of its goals. Leaflet and graffiti actions, and the rare spectacular act, alerted some portion of the public that not everyone had submitted, and that it was possible to resist.

It is also impossible to evaluate or appreciate the significance of the leftist opposition to Hitler by only examining the years of the Third Reich, 1933–45. Despite the great losses and immense suffering of much of the memberships of the left-wing parties, they ultimately outlasted the Nazi regime. The tenacity and courage of the socialist resistance helped to preserve democratic traditions and human ideals, and contributed to the moral and political rebuilding of West Germany after the war. The legacy of anti-Nazi resistance was more complicated in East Germany, where communists transformed their earlier opposition to Hitler into a state ideology that sought to legitimize a new, if less brutal and aggressive, dictatorship. In both West and East Germany, the Cold War made it difficult to accurately assess and place in context the efforts of Hitler's leftist opponents, which were downplayed in the West while simplified and exaggerated in the East. It is now easier to appreciate the extent and significance of this resistance, which deepens our understanding of life in Nazi Germany in all its complexities.

Ghana, nationalism and socialist transition

Seunfunmi Molatokunbo Olutayo

The Gold Coast (now Ghana) was the first African state to gain its independence from Britain, through a mass movement led by Kwame Nkrumah, on March 7, 1957. After this, other African nations hastened the pace for independence, putting pressure on France and Belgium as well as on Britain. Nkrumah's ultimate aim was backed by the determination to build a socialist society in Ghana. Socialism for Ghana was supposed to be uniquely "African," for he was strongly opposed to neocolonialism, that is, imperialism and capitalism. He was of the view that capitalism was too complicated a system for a newly independent nation, and he saw socialism, the antithesis of capitalism, as the only means of development in Africa. Despite his hopes for a customized African socialism, he took as a model the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR).

The world situation determined Nkrumah's orientation as well as that of other former colonies in Africa, where independence had become the utmost desire and capitalism was equated with colonial domination. Colonialism, to most Africans, was the precursor of capitalism which, in turn, destroyed the indigenous social structure through the exploitation of Africa and its resources. The question for the new leaders of Africa was how to maintain the precolonial ideal of "communalism" in spite of the new technology and market economy that had penetrated the indigenous structure.

Kwame Nkrumah and Socialism in Ghana

At independence, Ghana was placed on the road to socialism. This was mainly because of Nkrumah's view and theoretical foundation of scientific socialism. He believed that the underdevelopment of African societies was a consequence of politics, with the colonial powers being responsible for the social, economic, cultural, and political backwardness of Africa. His choice of socialism was based on the belief that only the socialist form of society could enhance a rapid rate of economic progress without destroying social justice, freedom, and equality. His principle is best illustrated by the often quoted injunction of "seek first the political kingdom and all things will be added unto it." In other words, it is political freedom that dictates the pace of economic and social progress. He also believed that Ghana as a socialist society would give to each person according to his ability and receive according to his need. Unfortunately, this idea was informed by the belief that Ghana was an egalitarian society and failed to take cognizance of the introduction of colonial capitalism through the mining of gold and the cultivation of cocoa which, to all intents and purposes, had restructured the indigenous economy.

As in the Zambia of Kenneth Kaunda and Julius Nyerere's Tanzania, the one-party system was the norm in Nkrumah's Ghana: the state owned everything, with the support of international organizations, and Nkrumah retained most of the control. Regulations imposed by the colonial government were expanded, including the rights and powers of trade unions, and private interests were taken over by the government. Nkrumah launched a seven-year economic plan and moved to collectivize agriculture against the wishes of indigenous large-scale cocoa farmers who constituted the tax base of Ghana's economy. Within five years he established over 40 state-run industries and enterprises in distilling, metallurgy, manufacturing, vegetable oil production, boat building, paper mills, cocoa processing, footwear manufacturing, and pharmaceuticals.

Unfortunately, these enterprises could not make profits. First, the technologies involved were not indigenously created and thus had to be bought in from the world capitalist economy, leading to lower currency reserves. Also, Nkrumah's Youth Party members, the Young Pioneers, could not operate the farms successfully. At the same time, there was much corruption among members of the governing Convention People's Party.

As the Ghanaian economy tumbled, the British and US governments, who considered Nkrumah a "dangerous opponent," held meetings and devised plans to contain and, if possible, eliminate him. Nkrumah was successfully overthrown in 1966. By that point, his popularity had dwindled as a result of his dictatorial posture and his repression of political opponents and trade unions.

Socialism after Nkrumah

The fall of Nkrumah led to the demise of socialism in Ghana. He had been the embodiment of the socialist ideology and there was little or no succession. Having been successful at mobilizing marginalized workers, peasant farmers, demobilized war veterans, students, small traders, teachers, and junior professionals into an anti-imperialist force, through which he was able to break the back of colonialism, a combination of historico-sociological exigencies contributed to his overthrow in February 1966.

Of utmost significance was the lack of a rigorous theoretical basis for his brand of socialism. Ghana at independence was not as "communal" as Nkrumah perceived, neither were the means of production well developed enough to determine the political superstructure. Indeed, Nkrumah, along with the mobilized workers and peasants, lacked the economic wherewithal to create a technology relevant to the industries established. As such, it was a superstructure grafted onto a "faulty" substructure. Coupled with these problems were the international dimensions of the Cold War and the world capitalist economic structures within which the socialist agenda could be undertaken.

The military that overthrew Nkrumah was lacking not only in any ideological bases but in economic and political backbone as well. The civilian regimes that have subsequently ruled in Ghana, as in other African nations, have had to subordinate their values to the capitalist ideology that prevails in most of the world. This is even more the case with the end of the Cold War and the reforms that have been imposed on African nations. Sociopolitical and economic constructions and reconstructions have, therefore, had to align and realign themselves with the global economy.

Giustizia e Libertà, Partito d'Azione

Chiara Colombini

From 1929 to 1947, Giustizia e Libertà (Justice and Liberty), and then Partito d'Azione (Action Party), actively resisted Italian fascism on the principles of democracy, the legacy of the Italian Risorgimento, and the ideals of social reform.

Giustizia e Libertà (GL) was founded in Paris in the summer of 1929 by Carlo Rosselli, Emilio Lussu, Fausto Nitti (all of whom had escaped confinement on the island of Lipari), Alberto Tarchiani, Gaetano Salvemini, Alberto Cianca, and Cipriano Facchinetti. The movement was polemically opposed to apathetic forms of resistance to fascism and helped form the Concentrazione Antifascista (Anti-Fascist Concentration) in exile. However, GL considered Concentrazione Antifascista an opportunistic movement unprepared for underground action within Italy.

GL brought together socialists, republicans, democrats, and liberals (mostly influenced by Piero Gobetti and Giovanni Amendola), who sought to overcome ideological factionalism to unify resistance in the revolutionary battle to overthrow both the fascist regime and the pre-fascist reconciliatory form of democracy they considered had produced the dictatorship. GL aimed therefore to remove the historical, economic, and cultural causes of fascist dictatorship.

In November 1931, GL aligned politically with Concentrazione Antifascista, emerging as the unifying force behind underground action in Italy. But GL's relations with the constellation of organizations in Concentrazione Antifascista became strained, as it did not restrict itself to underground action but began defining an independent political program. The Revolutionary Program published in January 1932 in the Quaderni di Giustizia e Libertà stated the political aims of the republic: state organization based on local autonomy, socialization of many industrial sectors, bank and agrarian reform, and separation between church and state.

The GL leaders in exile in Paris engaged in public demonstrations, including the flight over Milan by Giovanni Bassanesi in 1930 and support for underground groups in Italy. But GL's efforts were repeatedly targeted by police, who were alarmed by the organization's militancy and the spread of its influence into the middle classes. Between 1930 and 1934, GL cells in Lombardy, Florence, Rome, Sardinia, Turin, and Venezia Giulia were dismantled and organizers arrested.

Upon Hitler's rise to power in Germany in 1933, GL warned of the warlike objectives of fascism. GL recognized the importance of the Spanish Civil War and in August 1936 formed the Italian Column, which went into combat on the Aragonese front. After Rosselli's assassination in 1937, Emilio Lussu and Silvio Trentin assumed the GL leadership, endorsing a radical socialist transformation even as ties with Italy were decreasing. After Nazi Germany's invasion of France in May 1940, GL members were dispersed throughout Europe, North Africa, and the Americas.

Partito d'Azione (PdA) was the newly founded party (May–June 1942) that mobilized former GL members and democratic and anti-fascist organizations, including the Milan Liberal Democrats and Liberal Socialist movement. A seven-point program was promulgated for a republic, calling for local autonomy, mixed economy, agrarian reform, free unions, separation of church and state, and a European federation. After fascism's fall in September 1943, PdA elected an executive committee that firmly supported republicanism and rigorously opposed the monarch and the government of Pietro Badoglio that came to power after Mussolini was overthrown.

The PdA, socialists, and communists formed the National Liberation Committee (CLN) and in October 1943 organized a provisional government with full constitutional rights. But in April 1944, after Communist Party leader Palmiro Togliatti formed an alliance with the Badoglio government, the Actionist project waned along with the central role of PdA in the coalition of the anti-fascist parties. After the communists, the PdA was the largest political force in the resistance movement, but the party was weakened by divisions on the right and left and by regional differences.

After liberation in June 1945, PdA leader Ferruccio Parri emerged as the country's first prime minister in a fragile government that collapsed in November 1945. Internally, the PdA was gripped by disunity. Its first national congress in Rome in February 1946 brought about a split, with Parri and his faction founding the Movimento per la Democrazia Repubblicana (Movement for Republican Democracy). On June 2, 1946, elections were held for the Constituent Assembly. PdA, unable to compete with the mass-based parties, won a scant seven deputies. The azionisti contribution to the Italian constitution was nevertheless important.

Fernando Schiavetti, Riccardo Lombardi, and Alberto Cianca were the party's subsequent secretaries until the party dissolved in October 1947. While most of its members joined the Socialist Party (PSI), the azionisti elite, who had strong anti-fascist and democratic sentiments, gained significantly greater influence in post-war Italian politics than their limited political dimension.

Glasgow general strike, 1820

Gordon N. Pentland

The Glasgow general strike of 1820 was part of a wider and, ultimately, abortive attempt to initiate a general rising in the south of Scotland and the north of England. Estimates vary, but some 60,000 workers struck in and around Glasgow during the first week of April in response to a proclamation, purportedly the work of the Committee of Organization for Forming a Provisional Government, calling upon "all to desist from their labour . . . and attend wholly to the recovery of their Rights" (Ellis & Mac a'Ghobhainn 1970: 23).

While this was probably the first attempt in Britain to effect a general strike, it seems to have been intended not to paralyze the economy but to release men to pursue their political rights. Large numbers did indeed go on strike from work and the government received numerous reports of "idle" crowds in the streets, but far fewer seem to have responded to the call to arms. The week witnessed a group of radicals from Glasgow defeated and captured at the Battle of Bonnymuir on April 5, further arrests after a contingent of men from Strathaven marched out armed, before returning home on April 6, and a bloody encounter that left 11 dead, when a crowd rescued radical prisoners who were being escorted to Greenock gaol on April 8. Three men (Andrew Hardie, John Baird, and James Wilson) were executed for their role in the events and 19 others were transported to Botany Bay.

Different explanations have been forwarded for the failure of 1820. It should be noted that the response to the call for a general strike, albeit a localized one, was a marked success: the failure lay in the lack of response to the call to follow this up with a general rising. One interpretation sees the rising as largely the work of agents provocateurs in the first place, who operated at the behest of government to entrap ardent Scottish nationalists (Ellis & Mac a'Ghobhainn 1970). This interpretation has been strongly challenged, and both the nationalist agenda of the strike and the rising and the role of government spies have been called into question (Davidson 2003; Donnelly 1976). The events of 1820 retained a place in popular memory and thereafter have intermittently provided inspiration for political and industrial action by Chartists and Scottish nationalist and labor activists as well as appearing in novels, poems, plays, and paintings.

Glencoe Massacre, 1692

Evan M. Gaughan

The Glencoe Massacre took place on the morning of February 13, 1692. Two companies under Captain Robert Campbell of Glenlyon, whom the MacDonalds of Glencoe had peaceably billeted for nearly two weeks in the Western Highlands of Scotland, began a rampage against their hosts, leaving over 38 dead. The massacre became symbolic – an act of political terrorism on behalf of the English government and its sympathizers in lowland Scotland. The massacre reveals the complex political relationship between England, lowland Scotland, and highland Scotland in the wake of William III's succession. Two issues were of particular relevance. On the one hand, William's invasion in the so-called "Glorious Revolution" necessitated that Scots choose between James VII and William of Orange. On the other hand, it heightened tension between lowland elites, who tended to favor a closer union with England, and highland clans, who emphasized their independence. When the Edinburgh-based Scottish parliament accepted William as their king, highland Scots revolted. These Jacobites, supporters of James VII, were defeated decisively by late 1691.

The pretext for attacking the MacDonalds was a result of King William's directive requiring all Scottish chieftains to sign an oath of allegiance to the crown by January 1, 1692. Through a series of unfortunate events, chief Alexander MacDonald, also known as Alasdair MacIain, submitted his oath five days late. Though the king's instructions pledged mercy to all who submitted to the oath, even after the deadline, joint secretary of state for Scotland, John Dalrymple, used MacIain's tardiness to further his own political ambitions. A lowland presbyterian, Dalrymple disliked the highland MacDonalds, seeing them as an impediment to unification.

By the time news reached Edinburgh that MacIain had acquiesced, a plot to eradicate the MacDonald clan was already in motion. The plan, engineered by Dalrymple and approved by the king, called for three regiments to "root out" the "damnable sept" at Glencoe by "fire and sword and all manners of hostility" (Roberts 2000: 226–8). Two of the regiments never arrived, claiming setback by bad weather.

Robert Campbell and his soldiers entered the Glencoe valley 12 days before the massacre. The soldiers were welcomed and quartered in MacDonald homes according to highland codes of hospitality. On the morning of February 13, Campbell's troops received orders to begin their annihilation of the clan. Some of the soldiers defied the command and alerted their host families, giving them time to escape. Still, by the end of the hostilities, 38 lay dead, including chief Alasdair MacIain. Though many MacDonalds found shelter in the hills, an unknown number died from exposure on the mountainside.

Scotland was incensed by the malice of the slaughter, calling it “murder under trust.” When the Scottish parliament met in 1695 it drew up an Address to the King touching the Murder of the Glencoe Men. Although the document exonerated the king from any responsibility, it laid blame on Dalrymple, who was consequently dismissed from office.

Global Day of Action Against Capitalism, June 18 (J18), 1999

Ben Trott

Friday, June 18, 1999 (which became dubbed simply “J18”) was a global day of action against capitalism, primarily in financial and banking centers around the world. It was the opening day of the 25th G8 (Group of Eight, most industrialized nations) summit in Cologne, Germany. Emerging out of a global movement which had been gradually growing in the wings of the world’s stage, and going on to inspire the protests against the World Trade Organization (WTO) ministerial in Seattle, USA, later that year, J18 belongs to the little-known prehistory of what has since become referred to as the counter-globalization or global justice movement.

Restarting Global History

The collapse of the Soviet Union, the demise of western social democracy, the downturn in trade union militancy worldwide, and the crushing or cooptation of many anti-colonial and anti-imperialist struggles led Francis Fukuyama (1992) to declare “the end of history.” Fukuyama’s thesis, however, did not ring true for long. On January 1, 1994, several thousand armed rebels, belonging to the Zapatista Army of National Liberation (EZLN), emerged from their hide-outs in the Lacandon Jungle to seize control of a number of towns in Chiapas, Mexico, on the day the neoliberal North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) was due to come into effect.

The inspiration the Zapatistas provided to movements around the world stemmed not only from their hope for a world of “democracy, liberty, justice” (EZLN 1998: 19) at a time in which revolutionary possibility was thought dead, but in the innovative nature of their discourse, practice, and organizational forms. The Zapatistas did not claim that they (or anyone else) had all the answers. They were not seeking to seize state power, but to claim autonomy and dignity for Mexico’s indigenous – and to inspire others to do the same, making possible “a world where many worlds fit” (EZLN 2001). In July 1996 they played host to the First Intergalactic Encuentro (encounter) for Humanity and Against Neoliberalism. At this gathering, 3,000 delegates from social movements around the world met to discuss the economic, political, social, and cultural aspects of life under – and resistance to – neoliberalism; and the means by which a global network of resistance could be built.

The following year a similar number gathered in Spain for the Second Encuentro, inspired by the success of the first. On the back of this event, a three-day meeting followed seeking to establish a more permanent framework for the coordination of action directed against the institutions and structures of neoliberalism. The result was an invitation to the first meeting of People’s Global Action (PGA) Against “Free” Trade and the World Trade Organization (WTO), in the WTO’s own hometown of Geneva, Switzerland, in February 1998. It was here that the G8 summit in Birmingham, UK, and the WTO ministerial in Geneva, both scheduled for May that year, were decided upon to become the first targets for global, coordinated action by PGA.

Both events were regarded as successful. A Call for Action had been issued by London Reclaim the Streets (RTS), who had attended the meeting in Geneva and taken on the role of PGA European Convenors, for a Global Street Party on May 16 as the G8 were set to meet in Birmingham. RTS was already well known for its organizing of huge events, reclaiming often large and busy roads with thousands of people, transforming them into party zones designed to highlight both the ecological impact of cars as well as the means by which private vehicles serve as a way of enclosing public space. Street parties were held in 30 cities around the world. In Birmingham the summit was relocated to a rural location at short notice because of the threat of protest. Six thousand took part in one of the largest RTS events to date as 75,000 others demanded the G8 “drop the debt.” A few days later, in Geneva, riots erupted as the WTO held its second ministerial. At around the same time, 200,000 farmers marched in Hyderabad, India, against the organization, while 10,000 others took to the streets of Manila, Philippines, demanding the cancellation of the WTO treaties its government had signed.

History Returns in the UK

While global networks of resistance had been developing through the Zapatista encuentros, the PGA network, and the first global days of action, a similar process was underway in the UK. A radical ecological direct action movement, within which RTS had played a key role, had been developing throughout the 1990s. Many thousands had taken part in the protests against the new road building program that formed the cornerstone of Margaret Thatcher’s so-called “great car economy.” Many more had taken part in Reclaim the Streets parties. The campaign of solidarity with the Liverpool Dockers (sacked in 1995 for refusing to cross a picket line), led by London RTS, as well as the experience of direct confrontation with the state by those resisting the road building program, had radicalized the movement. By the late 1990s the beginnings of a movement that could call itself “anti-capitalist” could be seen in Britain.

At around the same time as the PGA meeting in Geneva, an invitation was issued by part of the recently disbanded Class War Federation for an event entitled Reclaim Mayday on May 1, 1998, a few weeks before the Global Street Party scheduled to take place around the G8 summit in Birmingham. The event brought together a large number of people from the ecological direct action movement with an older generation of political militants whose background was largely in the anarchist and anti-authoritarian movement of the 1980s. It was partly on the basis of this new cooperation that the mobilization in Birmingham was to be such a success.

The Mobilization Begins

It was from this position of strength, rooted in increased communication and cooperation among groups and movements both in the UK and on a global level, that the ambitious call for an International Day of Protest, Action and Carnival Aimed at the Heart of the Global Economy: The Financial Centers and Banking Districts on 18 June, 1999 was born. In the early summer of 1998 an informal dialogue began between RTS and London Greenpeace (a small, radical environmental group set up in the early 1970s which predates the international NGO of the same name and to whom it was never affiliated). During the 1980s the group had been involved with organizing a series of four Stop the City actions in London’s financial center, designed to highlight its role in war, environmental destruction, and oppression. Out of the discussions, an idea for a similar, but globally coordinated, day of action began to take shape.

That year’s nationwide Earth First! Summer Gathering brought together people from the anti-roads movement, RTS, London Greenpeace, and former members of Class War Federation. Delegates discussed for the first time at this meeting a proposal for the simultaneous occupation and transformation, through carnival (an expansion of the RTS concept), of the world’s financial districts on the opening day of the following year’s G8 summit in Cologne, Germany.

At first, there was some skepticism. The Provisional Irish Republican Army (IRA) had detonated a series of bombs inside London’s financial district, the City of London (also known as the Square Mile) in the early 1990s, bombing the Stock Exchange in 1990, the Baltic Exchange in 1992, and setting off a car bomb in Bishopsgate close to the site of the 1992 bomb a little over a year later. As a result, a security and surveillance “ring of steel” was established around the city, consisting of closed circuit television (CCTV) cameras, police sentry points on all roads running in and out of the area (some of which were armed, which is very unusual in the UK), and a series of chicanes and roadblocks which enabled the area to be sealed off to traffic with ease. The area was regarded as one of the most secure, easy to control, and observed in the world. Nevertheless, confidence and ambition had been gained by the successes and strengthening of the global movement over the previous years. A few weeks after the Earth First! Gathering, a nationwide meeting was held in London to discuss the proposal in more detail. Here, an international call to action was drafted. It was taken to the PGA Continental Convenors meeting in Finland in September 1998, where it was endorsed and circulated around the world.

From this point on, the idea began to snowball. Working groups were set up with responsibility for various tasks: networking, producing publicity, researching the city, and developing ideas for actions. One group began working on a website where news, photos, and video from actions scheduled to take place around the world could be collated. Its conception and software went on to form what became the global Indymedia (www.indymedia.org) network of dozens of websites around the world to distribute news about social movements worldwide, circumventing the mediation of the mainstream media. Meanwhile, local groups were set up around the UK, organizing fundraising events, producing publicity, and planning their own autonomous actions to carry out on the day. In London, Reclaim the Streets started to plan an ambitious Carnival Against Capital to move through the City of London, ending at a secret location.

The Day of Action Draws Closer

The City of London is a unique part of Britain's capital city in terms of having such a large workforce (around 300,000 in 1999) relative to its population (around 7,000). It was therefore decided that the best way to cause disruption to the city would be to try to stop its workers from reaching their places of employment.

In the week preceding J18, and coinciding with a visit by hundreds of mostly Indian farmers taking part in the PGA Inter-Continental Caravan designed to facilitate an exchange between movements in the global South and North, tens of thousands of spoof versions of London's right-wing local newspaper, the Evening Standard, were distributed across the city. With the title Evading Standards (mocking what was seen as the poor journalism published in the London paper), it explained the reasoning behind the day of action and the history behind the movements which were calling for it (both in the UK and beyond), highlighted the importance of everyday resistance in anti-capitalist struggles, and encouraged workers to "phone-in sick" and not go to work on June 18.

While trying to encourage absenteeism, the mobilization also started looking at ways of cutting the city off from its workforce through various acts of direct action and civil disobedience. Access points into the city (major roads, bridges, and train and underground stations) were identified and various groups within the now national J18 network took responsibility for disrupting different routes into the city.

June 18, 1999

In London, on the day of action itself, there was relatively minor disruption during the morning rush hour. Several mainline and underground trains were delayed after emergency cords were pulled, and a number of roads (including London Bridge) were partially obstructed for a short time. Banks and offices were occupied in protest at their involvement in the arms industry, and a demonstration was held in front of a McDonald's restaurant. Several arrests were made. From around midday, people started to gather at Liverpool Street Station, a short distance from the Square Mile, for the Carnival against Capital.

Over the preceding months a small group had been working on a strategy for moving thousands of people from Liverpool Street to a secret location. The goal was to maintain confusion among the police, who were keen to prevent disruption to the financial center's smooth running. In accordance with this plan, the crowd was divided into four different groups with around 3,500 people in each. At exactly the same time, one hour after the official meeting time, the groups were led off in different directions by clusters of 10–15 people who knew the secret destination.

The police were surprised by the maneuver and soon lost control. The confusion was exacerbated by the lack of coordination between the City of London Police, who had official jurisdiction in the city, and the London Metropolitan Police, who had been called in for back-up and had much more experience of crowd control.

By around 14:00, three of the four groups had successfully been led to their final destination in front of the London International Financial Futures and Options Exchange (Liffe). At the time, Liffe was one the world's three largest futures exchanges. It was chosen as the destination of the Carnival because of both its important function within the global economy and the symbolism involved with its buying and selling of futures (a contract to deliver an agreed commodity for a particular price at a certain time in the future). (The fourth group was absent because it had become embroiled in a fierce battle with the police, triggered by a woman being run over by a speeding police van.) As the crowd arrived, sound-systems, stages, public announcement equipment, and decorations which had been hidden in vehicles parked nearby were unpacked.

As the day drew on, a number of windows of banks and car dealerships were broken and in some cases property inside the buildings was also damaged. Several hundred people took part in the demolition of the glass front to the Liffe building, before an attempt was made to storm the trading floor. Brokers fought with demonstrators, holding them back until riot police were able to clear the building.

By early evening, the police gradually regained control of the area in front of the Liffe, pushing people out of the city and towards Trafalgar Square, where a rally had been called by the Movement Against the Monarchy. By around 21:00, the day's activities were over.

Consequences and the Simultaneous Rise and Fall of a Movement

The day of action was initially considered a momentous victory by many who had taken part. Around 15,000 people had been mobilized; far more than thought possible on a working day. A major police operation had not been able to stop the Carnival reaching its planned destination. Around a dozen new groups had been set up across the UK, developing a network that could prove useful in the future.

The Internet project collating news and reports had worked well, and a surprisingly large number of actions and events had also taken place around the world. In Nigeria, Port Harcourt, the country's oil capital, was completely shut down in a coordinated protest action. In Pakistan demonstrations demanded, among other things, an end to the country's nuclear testing program. In Mexico demonstrations were held in front of the stock exchange. In South Korea a demonstration was held in the capital, Seoul. A Reclaim the Streets Party was held in Tel Aviv, Israel. The stock exchange was occupied in Madrid, Spain, and stock exchanges blockaded in New York, USA, Amsterdam, Netherlands, and Vancouver, Canada. Further actions were held in Australia, Argentina, Bangladesh, Belarus, Brazil, Czech Republic, France, Greece, Italy, Malta, Nepal, Portugal, Senegal, Slovakia, Switzerland, Uruguay, and Zimbabwe. An "electronic blockade" of the Mexican embassy's website was organized in solidarity with the Zapatista rebels, and hackers attempted to break in to the Liffe computers while demonstrators rioted in front of its doors.

In Cologne, Germany, where the G8 summit was getting under way, demonstrations were limited. Around 500 people, including many of the Indian and other farmers participating in the PGA Inter-Continental Caravan, were surrounded by police and prevented from taking part in the actions they had planned. The following day a demonstration took place through the city with around 10,000 participants.

In the UK, however, the period following June 18 was characterized by a downturn in the emergent anti-capitalist movement. The reaction of both the media and the British state was considerable. The tabloid media ran articles focusing on the day's violence (with almost no mention of police brutality, or the running over of a demonstrator which caused the day's first confrontations), creating a political climate in which lengthy custodial sentences could be handed down to those arrested on the day. The City of London set up a website displaying pictures of those suspected of committing crimes in connection with the day and wanted for questioning by the police. Numerous people received prison sentences of up to four and a half years for their actions. The police published a lengthy report on the event and developed a number of new strategies for crowd control which controversially included preventatively surrounding and detaining large sections of crowds on demonstrations and other events. The City of London

Police, Britain's oldest police force, was almost disbanded as a result of its inability to maintain control on the day.

Alongside the increasing state repression over the years which followed, the movement was faced with a number of other challenges. On the one hand, some felt that RTS had started to lose its original ecological focus in favor of the social. Others argued that a radical, transformative politics could not simply focus on organizing occasional spectacular "events," but rather had to develop a more everyday political practice, rooted in specific localities and work places. And still others argued that the day of action, by concentrating on finance capital and big business, had failed to understand the nature of its supposed target: capitalism, a particular set of social relations without a "center." Exploitation, they argued, is certainly enabled by finance capital and big business, but they are not its precondition. At the same time, debates around the issue of political militancy and the extent to which movements should be committed to the principle of non-violence, around the role of mass mobilizations and large events in processes of social change, and the centrality which ecological and social struggles should respectively occupy within contemporary social movements, drove a number of wedges between different areas of the movement.

Even so, much of the inspiration for the carnivalesque blockades which famously shut down the opening ceremony of the WTO in Seattle, USA, later that year is attributed to J18. Indeed, some of those who had been involved with organizing the events in London were invited to several events in the US designed to train and inspire those working towards the Seattle protests. Similarly, inspiration was drawn from J18 and the politics and street tactics of Reclaim the Streets by those organizing events around the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank meeting in Prague, Czech Republic, in September 2000 and the Genoa G8 summit in 2001.

The influence of carnival as a form of protest was also formative of the EuroMayDay events which, since 2001, have sought to both highlight the increasingly precarious conditions of life and work under neoliberalism, as well as expose the challenge that this poses to the organizational forms that traditionally claim to represent the interests of those who work. Their goal has been to highlight the plurality of social subjects involved in production and social reproduction today, as well as to develop new forms of self-representation which celebrate their common struggles. In some ways, the EuroMayDay events can be understood as a reply to the charge of the movement's earlier superficial approach to critiquing and organizing against capitalism, focusing on symbols and institutions rather than contemporary relations of production/reproduction.

June 18, 1999, then, simultaneously marked a high point, followed by a period of steep and steady decline, of the burgeoning anti-capitalist movement in the UK; as well as a partial launch-pad for the rise of the global movement against neoliberalism.

Global Day of Action Against the IMF and World Bank, Prague, September 26 (S26), 2000

Radim Hladík and Chelsea Mozen

The protests against the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank in Prague, Czech Republic, in September 2000 were a pivotal moment in the history of the post-socialist Czech Republic's alter-globalization movement. As an expression of radical politics in an era of relative social peace and political stability, following the so-called Velvet Revolution of 1989, the protests left a deeper imprint on Czech collective memory than have other ad hoc, single issue, or trade union mobilizations. The principal day of protest, September 26, became known as simply S26 and was called for as a Global Day of Action against the IMF and World Bank by the Peoples' Global Action (PGA) network.

The protests in Prague were certainly not the first time international financial institutions had been the object of protest. For over twenty years, demonstrations had been held, primarily in the global South, as a response to the IMF and World Bank's imposition of neoliberal Structural Adjustment Programs. In Prague, criticism focused on the institutions' promotion of a form of economic globalization which involved the opening of markets, privatization, and the cutting of social spending.

Initiative Against Economic Globalization (INPEG)

The first public meeting to discuss holding a protest against the anticipated summit took place in Prague in September 1999. It attracted representatives of anarchist, socialist, and environmental groups and non-governmental organizations (NGOs), as well as a number of politically active individuals. Among the groups represented were the Czechoslovak Anarchist Federation, Earth First!, Initiative for the Support of EZLN, Socialist Solidarity (International Socialist Tendency), NESEHNUTÍ (Independent Social Ecological Movement), and other Czech groups.

Agreement was reached as to the need for visible protests against the summit, and coordination meetings became regular. The original informal group evolved into a common Platform with the establishment of the Initiative Against Economic Globalization – Prague 2000 (INPEG). The inclusion of “Economic” in the Platform's name was intended to illustrate a desire to unite humanity, while refusing globalization driven by economic interests. Its founding document, entitled “General Position,” argued that economic globalization was not a solution, but instead “a major cause of the serious problems of today's world.” It emphasized that “the desperate condition of today's world is not natural – it is merely a logical consequence of the system in which heightening of the profits of the most rich is the only respected value.”

INPEG's orientation as explicitly anti-capitalist, rejecting economic protectionism as an alternative to neoliberal globalization, led to the disengagement of NESEHNUTÍ, the only well-established NGO participating in the Platform. After doing so, they joined forces with Hnutí Duha (the Czech branch of Friends of the Earth) (FoE) and Central and Eastern European BankWatch. In contrast to INPEG, their strategy focused on seeking a dialogue with the IMF and World Bank, as well as the Czech government, in officially sanctioned forums, rather than street protests.

Czech trade unions also failed to participate in INPEG, not wanting to be associated with radicals. In addition, some believed that the unions were worried that participation in the protests would undermine their collaboration with the Czech Social Democratic Party which was in power at the time. As a result, the involvement of organized labor was restricted to a small number of press releases critical of IMF and World Bank policies towards workers. The absence of the Czech unions was in stark contrast to the heavy participation of US unions in the protests against the World Trade Organization (WTO) which had taken place in Seattle, USA, the previous year.

INPEG clearly distanced itself from Czech neo-Nazis, many of whom were also opposed to the forms of globalization the IMF and World Bank were seen as promoting – favoring instead policies of economic protectionism, seen as allowing the Czech Republic to develop a stronger, independent national economy. On September 23, a few days before the summit opened, several dozen neo-Nazis demonstrated against globalization and in defense of Czech national and “racial” identity. Their demonstration was disrupted by left-wing anti-fascist demonstrators.

INPEG, then, was primarily composed of grassroots activists, anarchists, and one Trotskyist organization, Socialist Solidarity. Despite little involvement by many large or established organizations, INPEG became the primary space within which the mobilization took place, and the focal point of coordination for many activists coming from abroad.

Mobilization

Few of those involved with INPEG were able to trace their political history back beyond 1989. The majority had become politically active through their engagement with the emergent anarchist and socialist milieu. Of particular importance for many was a series of Reclaim the Streets parties in 1998 and 1999, which were formative of the Czech alter-globalization movement. Inspired by similar events in the UK and elsewhere, these parties sought to take over major roads, “reclaiming” them from private vehicles and returning for use as common spaces of interaction, debate, celebration, and protest. The first such event coincided with the G8 (Group of Eight most industrialized nations) meeting in Birmingham, UK – alongside several dozen similar events taking place around the world. Three thousand people took part, and the event ended in the destruction of property belonging to multinational corporations. A second Street Party took place on September 18, 1998, and a third on June 5, 1999. Each attracted around 10,000 participants. It is through these series of parties that a debate around the issue of globalization began to be discussed among the public.

Images of these street parties, alongside the disruption of the WTO ministerial in Seattle, were used by the media as a means of focusing on the issues of potential conflict and violence around the upcoming summit, and both sides were aware of the potential for disorder. An ad hoc NGO, Civic Legal Watch, was formed in order to provide independent observation of the police during street demonstrations. At the same time, the police underwent intensive training and their equipment was modernized. As a result, those organizing the protests felt intimidated and threatened by the apparent militarization of the policing operation around the meeting, resulting in distrust of a number of proposals by President Václav Havel, such as to allow a camp for protesters to be constructed within a disused sports stadium. Indeed, police harassment and intimidation of protesters intensified ahead of the protests with, for example, identity cards being checked at public lectures delivered by IMF and World Bank officials. A climax was reached a few days ahead of the summit when numerous suspected protesters – including an entire train from Italy, in which 1,000 Tute Bianche activists were traveling – were denied entry into the Czech Republic, at least temporarily.

As the protests drew closer, INPEG appealed for international support. In response, a small number of activists, mostly from the UK, Spain, Norway, the United States, and Canada, moved to Prague in the summer of 2000. Three international organizing meetings were held between May and August 2000 to draft calls for action, plan the protests, and arrange the logistics. These meetings were attended by around 60–75 people, largely from Western Europe. The international mobilization largely took place through PGA. An independent media center was established in Prague, largely by international volunteers. The fact that ahead of the summit INPEG became a genuinely international group was picked up on by the Czech media, largely as a means of casting the protests as “illegitimate” – organized by and for an external “other.”

Days of Action

Protest activities were organized from September 22–28. On September 22–23, INPEG held a “Counter-Summit” – a series of lectures and panel discussions involving both grassroots activists and renowned academic figures such as Samir Amin, Walden Bello, and Alex Callinicos. Central and Eastern European BankWatch, Jubilee 2000, and Friends of the Earth held their own forum, A Different Message (Jiná zpráva), with lectures and film screenings from September 24–27.

Parallel to the neo-Nazi demonstration (and the anti-fascist protests organized by INPEG), a number of other events also took place on September 23. Various NGOs and church-based initiatives held a theatrical funeral march, commemorating the deaths of children from malnutrition which result from neoliberal policies. They demanded the cancellation of the debts of poor countries. On September 24, a cultural festival featuring musicians and other performers had been scheduled by INPEG. However, the venue cancelled at the last minute, apparently the result of government pressure to do so.

The main protest event coincided with the opening of the IMF and World Bank summit on September 26 (S26). Final plans for the protest had been formed the previous evening at a meeting of hundreds of activists at the convergence center – the primary meeting point for the coordination of protests. INPEG's original pledge "not to initiate violence" was again agreed upon, along with the suggestion to emulate the success of the anti-WTO protests in Seattle – but in reverse. Whereas delegates had been prevented from reaching the conference center in Seattle by decentralized, coordinated blockades, in Prague the plan was to blockade delegates inside their meeting, symbolically giving them time to reflect on their previous activities and dissolve their organizations.

The protests were to begin with a central rally in Prague's Náměstí Míru (Peace Square). From here, one united march would commence, later splitting into different color-coded strands. Each strand would approach the congress center from a different angle. Color codes corresponded roughly to different political tendencies and tactical preferences. The pink march was predominantly socialist in orientation. The yellow was led by Tute Bianche, the Italian network who used helmets, shields, and body-protection beneath white overalls in order to try and push their way through lines of police. The blue march was composed primarily of anarchists, autonomists, and those who defined themselves as anti-authoritarian. The pink and silver march was inspired by the carnivalesque tactics of Reclaim the Streets. Between 10–15,000 people assembled at the rally in Náměstí Míru.

The blockades, however, proved rather ineffective. The pink march went back on its agreement to try and blockade a number of streets around the congress center, leaving several roads unblocked. Instead, it followed the yellow march to the most visible (and least difficult to block) point: a large bridge leading directly into the congress center. The pink and silver route was made up of a samba band and costumed dancers, as well as a group carrying a reinforced banner at the front of the demonstration bloc to try to push their way through lines of police. After an initial, failed attempt, however, the police launched a fierce attack on the demonstrators, some of whom fought back with sticks and stones, while others sought to de-escalate the situation. The blue march also failed to reach its intended destination. After attempting to break through lines of police, a violent confrontation ensued which lasted for several hours before the police finally regained control. In retreat, crowds of protesters attacked symbols of economic globalization such as banks and multinational corporations. While the blockades, as such, failed in their stated goal, the intensity of the conflict which ensued and the difficulty the police had in controlling the situation led to delegates being escorted out of the congress center by metro to a safer location.

As part of the Peoples' Global Day of Action, collectives from around forty countries reported holding actions and demonstrations in solidarity with the protests in Prague and against the IMF and World Bank on S26. Many of these actions took place in the Global South, as well as the United States, Australia, and a number of Eastern European countries.

After S26

The days following S26 in Prague were also originally planned to be filled with protest. However, the police prevented this from happening by arresting 859 people. Of those, 330 came from outside the Czech Republic. Most international activists left the country on the morning of September 27, to the frustration of Czech activists left to bear the brunt of the fall out. Only a few hundred people took part in the demonstration planned for September 27, a legal demonstration prevented by the police.

Stories were published in the media comparing the protests to a war. The hitherto ambiguous public opinion turned strongly against the protesters. Later in the day, the IMF and World Bank declared the meeting had been concluded ahead of schedule. Many activists read this as a sign that the protests had been successful in shutting down the meeting.

By September 28, protest activity had shifted its focus from the IMF and World Bank to highlighting police brutality and showing solidarity with those who had been imprisoned. As arrestees were released, reports were gathered about cruel treatment in custody. Physical violence, humiliation, and psychological abuse were claimed to be commonplace within the police stations. Subsequent investigations found evidence of such unlawful behavior, but specific perpetrators were not identified.

Aftermath

In the period immediately following the protests, many Czech activists evaluated the events with ambivalence. Although the mobilization had seemingly successfully disrupted the conference proceedings, the police brutality and the markedly adverse public opinion toward the protests could not be overlooked. Repression of activists in Prague continued after the protests, including the eviction of the squatted Ladronka social center, an established and important focal point of activity for the alter-globalization movement in the Czech Republic.

Over the months that followed, the Czech alter-globalization movement began to fracture. Grassroots activists and anarchists became increasingly unwilling to work with the socialist organizations who had failed to carry out the agreed plan on S26 and the NGOs they regarded as having been too uncritical of the IMF and World Bank, as well as the Czech government, in order to get a seat at the negotiating table. Many NGOs also became even more unwilling to be associated with radicals than had been the case throughout the 1990s, largely as a result of the scenes of violence around the congress center picked up on by the media.

Several international activists also voiced criticism of the way in which INPEG had organized its media work, using spokespeople seen as having little mandate to represent the views of all those who had gathered to take part in the protests. Further criticism was also made of the way in which INPEG dealt with media claims that protesters had initiated violence. These criticisms intensified already ongoing discussions within the alter-globalization movement about militancy and the destruction of private property as a form of political protest, as well as the role of the mainstream media and the means by which the movement should relate to it, if at all.

Despite the fracture created by the protests, within the Czech area of the European alter-globalization movement in particular, the Prague protests nevertheless represented an important moment in the growth and development of the movement. Not only was the summit regarded as having been successfully disrupted, but new connections and networks had been built between political activists in Eastern and Western Europe and beyond. Moreover, the European wing of the alter-globalization movement had held its first large counter-summit event since the WTO protests in Seattle the previous year. The event went on to inspire later mobilizations, against the European Union summit in Gothenburg, Sweden, and the G8 summit in Genoa, Italy, the following summer – as well as against a NATO conference in Prague itself in November 2002. While INPEG itself ceased to exist soon after the summit, its existence helped establish a far better networked radical milieu that remains politically active.

Global justice movement and resistance

Ben Trott

The protests against the World Trade Organization (WTO) ministerial in Seattle, 1999, brought the growing global movement against neoliberalism into mainstream consciousness worldwide. It has since manifested itself in numerous mobilizations against political and economic summits, from Quebec, to Prague, Cancun and Hong Kong; given birth to the World Social Forum in Porto Alegre; and taken to the streets against the global “war on terror.” Having contributed to the rupturing of the neoliberal project at the beginning of the twenty-first century, however, the movement for a different kind of globalization (“counter-globalization movement” hereafter) is also presented by a number of serious challenges.

The End of History

In the summer of 1989, the year in which the Berlin Wall fell, further accelerating the collapse of what had often been dubbed “really existing socialism,” political economist Francis Fukuyama famously declared “the end of history.” In his essay, which he later extended into a widely debated book, The End of History and the Last Man, Fukuyama proclaimed “an unabashed victory of economic and political liberalism.” Western liberal democracy, he argued, was able to present itself as “the final form of human government” on the basis of “the total exhaustion of viable systemic alternatives” (Fukuyama 1992: xi). Despite the enormous criticism that Fukuyama’s book drew, he nevertheless seemed to capture the sentiment of the moment perfectly. The earlier proclamation of Margaret Thatcher, British prime minister 1979–90, that “There is no alternative” to neoliberal globalization appeared to ring true.

Fukuyama was writing in a period that saw the implementation of the policies of Glasnost and Perestroika in the Soviet Union under Mikhail Gorbachev (general secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union 1985–91). Glasnost was a series of political reforms related to the freedom of the press, information, and dissent, and Perestroika an economic reform package. These changes were followed by the declaration of independence from the Soviet Union by a large number of states, and ultimately the USSR’s dissolution in December 1991. Elsewhere, the entire workers’ movement had suffered a symbolic defeat with the crushing of the 1984–5 British miners’ strike, a central battlefield in the struggle against neoliberal restructuring. The election of Thatcher in the UK and Ronald Reagan (US president 1981–9) in the US was taken to symbolize the end of western social democracy.

Many of its proponents finally turned toward what they described as a “Third Way,” displaying a new openness towards the market. Anti-colonial and anti-imperialist struggles in the so-called “Third World” had either long since been defeated, or else achieved victory often only to be seen by many as having betrayed their original principles once forced to face up to the challenges of political and economic survival on the world stage. And finally, the mostly youth-based sub- and countercultural movements which had blossomed in Western Europe, North America, and beyond in the 1960s and 1970s had entered a steady but certain demise.

History’s Inevitable Return

However, in the first few hours of 1994, emerging from the perhaps unlikely location of the Lacandon Jungle in Chiapas, Mexico, a group of rebels catapulted themselves onto the world stage, declaring war on neoliberalismo. History was back.

Having recovered from the 1980 debt crisis, the Mexican economy had gone from strength to strength, becoming a poster-child of neoliberalism by the early 1990s. The economy had been opened up to the world market and a process of privatizing state-owned industries embarked upon. In 1992, Carlos Salinas (president of Mexico 1988–94) amended Article 27 of the Constitution, meaning that previously communally held land was now available for sale on the free market. In doing so, he paved the way for Mexico’s signing up to the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) with the United States and Canada.

At this point, Mexico was one of the countries with the greatest income disparity in the world. In 1992 almost 40 percent of the rural population were living below the poverty line. NAFTA – which would remove many barriers to trade, open up new markets in Mexico (especially in the realm of intellectual property), and end the subsidizing of Mexican agriculture – was seen by many as likely to have catastrophic consequences for the rural poor.

On the day on which the agreement was due to come into effect, a group of mostly indigenous rebels, calling themselves the Zapatista Army of National Liberation (EZLN – Ejército Zapatista de Liberación Nacional) emerged from their rainforest base to seize control of seven cities in Chiapas. They called for the millions of Mexico's dispossessed to join them, "so that we will not die of hunger" (EZLN 1993). The EZLN's spectacularly successful military operation, the elegance of their prose, and the apparent novelty of their discourse – which talked more about dignity and autonomy than the seizure of state power – found resonance throughout Mexico and beyond. On January 10, 1994 over 100,000 people demonstrated in Mexico City against the federal army's operations against the Zapatistas. Two days later, a ceasefire was declared.

Despite this, and the fact that the EZLN have engaged in neither offensive nor defensive military operations since these initial days of the conflict, a low intensity war against the Zapatistas continues to this day. Even in the face of severe brutality, the solutions they have sought have been consistently civil rather than military. Practically, their philosophy of "walking asking questions" (preguntando caminamos) – the sign of a new openness and uncertainty in an age in which "revolutionary ideology" (be it Marxist, anarchist, or socialist) was no longer able to claim to have all the answers – has involved constantly attempting to connect their own, indigenous struggle to those of others, in Mexico and around the world. The first, and perhaps most historically important attempt, was the First Intergalactic Encuentro (Encounter) for Humanity and Against Neoliberalism, attended by over 3,000 delegates from 44 different countries from July 27 to August 3, 1996. The delegates gathered to discuss politics, economics, identity, and culture in a conference center built by Zapatista communities deep inside the conflict zone.

A year later, in the summer of 1997, thousands converged again for the second Zapatista Encuentro, this time spread over four locations in the Spanish State. Like the first gathering, it sought to provide a forum for dialogue among the world's left-wing social movements. A three-day meeting followed, focusing on the means by which the dialogue and exchange of information and inspiration could continue. And importantly, those who met attempted to devise a means by which this could be translated into forms of common action which would mutually reinforce day-to-day struggles against neoliberalism worldwide.

Peoples' Global Action

The result of the meeting was the issuing of an invitation for the world's social movements to attend the founding conference of Peoples' Global Action (PGA) in Geneva, Switzerland, in February 1998. Here, after days of discussion between hundreds of delegates from over seventy different countries, a basis for cooperation was established in the form of a Manifesto and – more importantly – a set of Hallmarks which would define the network. Essentially, the Hallmarks articulated a commitment to "horizontal" (non-hierarchical organization) and decentralization, the development of structures which allowed for and promoted autonomy, to recognizing and rejecting a multiplicity of structures and mechanisms of domination, and to direct action and civil disobedience as a means of resisting neoliberalism.

The Peoples' Global Action network came into being at a time when discussions around globalization were dominating academic debate and defining popular discourse more generally. NAFTA and a number of other regional trade agreements had recently come into effect. The controversial (and eventually abandoned) Multilateral Agreement on Investment (MAI) was a hot topic of discussion. The 50-year-old General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) had just, in 1995, been formalized into a permanent institution: the World Trade Organization (WTO), a multilateral body responsible for devising and implementing international trade rules. While the network agreed to embrace a wide range of struggles, it particularly sought to establish cooperation and coordination around resistance to the WTO and other neoliberal institutions.

In this spirit, the 1998 G8 summit (Group of Eight most industrialized nations), to be held in Birmingham, UK, in May later that year, and the second ministerial of the WTO, to be held in Geneva shortly after, were to be the first focal points for coordinated action by PGA.

Partly as a result of the call for action by PGA, hundreds of thousands of peasants and workers took to the streets of Hyderabad, India, on May 2, calling for the country's withdrawal from the WTO. Two weeks later, in Manila in the Philippines, 10,000 fishermen and women called for the cancellation of treaties signed at the WTO and Asian Pacific Economic Conference (APEC). On May 16, inspired by the British-based Reclaim the Streets (RTS) movement which had brought together social and ecological struggles to temporarily take back city streets from enclosure by cars and return them to commons, a Global Street Party took place in 30 cities around the world on the opening day of the G8 summit. In Birmingham, 75,000 people took part in an action, organized by Jubilee 2000, to surround what would have been the summit location, calling for debt cancellation as 6,000 others joined an RTS party, transforming the city's streets into a carnival. The summit was relocated at short notice from the city center to a rural location, for fear of disruption by protest. In Geneva two days later, over 10,000 demonstrated against the WTO ministerial and three days of rioting followed.

In the summer of 1998, in large part as a response to the success of these early coordinated actions, a call was issued by London Reclaim the Streets – who at this time was the first European Convenor of PGA – for a global day of action in the world's business and finance centers on June 18, 1999 (J18), the opening day of the following year's G8 summit to be held in Cologne, Germany. The call was later endorsed by all of the PGA continental convenors at a meeting in Finland in September 1998.

On June 18 itself, over 15,000 people took over London's financial center for a Carnival Against Capital. Protesters forced their way into the lobby of the London International Financial Futures and Options Exchange (Liffe) and almost made it up the escalators and on to the trading floor, but were evicted by riot police shortly before doing so. In Port Harcourt, Nigeria, a similar number of people succeeded in closing down the country's oil capital for the day. The stock exchange was invaded in Madrid, Spain, and blockaded in Amsterdam, Netherlands, Vancouver, Canada, and New York, USA. Other actions took place in over forty countries, including Brazil, Israel, Zimbabwe, and Nepal. A central website was used on the day to collate video, audio, and text reports about actions taking place around the world. The concept, and the software used, was later partly developed into what became the Indymedia (www.indymedia.org) network of independent news websites reporting on social movements and struggles around the world.

Around six weeks later, from August 23–26, 1999, the Second PGA Conference took place outside Bangalore, India. It was here that PGA took the decision to support and take part in the protests around the third ministerial of the WTO, scheduled to take place in Seattle, from November 30 to December 3, 1999, preparations for which were well under way by the North American-based Direct Action Network (DAN) and others. November 30 was set as a Global Day of Action.

Seattle: A Movement's "Coming Out" Party

The protests in Seattle were more successful than anyone could have predicted. While 75,000 took part in an official, mostly trade union organized demonstration away from the city center, 10,000 others joined early morning mass blockades of the ministerial, preventing the opening ceremony from taking place. Neither US Trade Representative Charlene Barshefsky nor US Secretary of State Madeleine Albright were able to make it out of their hotel rooms. Simultaneous actions were held in over thirty countries around the world.

The breadth of the spectrum taking part in the blockades – which ran from trade unionists to environmentalists, nuns to queer activists, college and high school students to pensioners – came as a surprise to many commentators. But the protests which occurred on the streets of Seattle were in fact just one manifestation of a new era, or "cycle," of struggles which had its roots in a thousand other ways and means of struggling with which people had been experimenting around the world for years. The Zapatista struggle in Chiapas is an obvious but pertinent example of this. Texas-based academic Harry Cleaver (1998) commented:

“In a very real sense, the Zapatista movement emerged as a tentative and transitory solution to precisely the problem which confronts us everywhere: how to link up a diverse array of linguistically and culturally distinct peoples and their struggles, despite and beyond those distinctions, how to weave a variety of struggles into one struggle that never loses its multiplicity.” And for many, Seattle – this taking of common action, despite and beyond difference – marked the beginning of something very new.

History and Struggle

History, however, is obviously not quite as neat as the above chronology would seem to imply. To paraphrase Marx and Engels in The Communist Manifesto (1888), history is nothing other than the product of those struggles which make it. In this sense, neither history nor struggle can simply “end” or “return” as we perhaps implied above. It is always there.

Capitalism, in the late 1960s and early 1970s, had been shaken, globally, by a series of ferocious struggles. In France in 1968 over 10 million workers went on strike, joining forces with rebellious students. The so-called Italian Hot Autumn of 1969 overflowed into a decade-long movement known as autonomia. Uprisings occurred in numerous US cities, from Newark and Detroit to Los Angeles. Resistance to the US military in Vietnam grew alongside a whole range of anti-colonial and anti-imperialist struggles worldwide, many of which received both political and material support by radicals in the world’s “core.” The ability of capitalism to continue to reproduce itself was seriously called into question. It is as a response to these struggles that neoliberalism, and a number of other transformations within the organization of capitalist production, can – at least in part – be understood.

Neoliberalism is generally thought of as being born alongside the Thatcher and Reagan administrations, although Harvey (2005) has shown that Pinochet’s Chile was in fact the first time neoliberal economic policy was systematically implemented. The policies were adopted by successive administrations (such as those of Tony Blair and Bill Clinton in the UK and US, respectively), as well as other governments elsewhere. Neoliberalism was also often “imposed” on countries, primarily in the global South, via IMF and World Bank Structural Adjustment Policies (SAPs) generally attached as conditionalities to loans.

In general, neoliberalism has meant the privatization of state-owned industries, the cutting back of any existing welfare state, and the curbing of trade union power. Barriers of entry into markets have been opposed. Often this has meant either opposition to treaties and regulations designed to protect the environment or labor rights, or speaking out in favor of creating new markets in fields such as intellectual property. On an international level, market access has been ensured via a series of bi- and multilateral trade agreements and the creation of organizations such as the WTO, able to impose sanctions on those engaging in forms of “protectionism.” Processes of neoliberalization have tended to coincide with a number of transformations in social production.

The period running from the 1930s to the 1970s is often referred to as the Fordist era. The name derives from Henry Ford of Ford Motors, the primary innovator of mass commodity production, often based around the conveyor belt, for mass markets. Fordism is generally associated with the Taylorist organization of workers around F. W. Taylor’s principles of “scientific management.” Relatively unskilled workers perform simple, repetitive tasks, with the idea being that the more often one repeats a task, the quicker one is able to do it. Fordism/Taylorism was dominant in a political climate of Keynesianism, where the state intervened relatively freely (at least in comparison to neoliberalism) in the economy and where the welfare state was still – in many places at least – reasonably strong.

However, the bringing together of large numbers of workers within one plant or factory, upon which production in this period was largely premised, provided favorable conditions in which workers were able to organize. Workers were easily able to identify the common condition in which they found themselves, and communication was relatively easy, considering many workers were spending upwards of 40 hours a week standing next to each other on assembly lines. A widespread refusal of work (strikes, sabotage, and absenteeism) spread like wildfire towards the end of the 1960s. In Italy in 1969 over 7 million hours of work were lost due to unrest, in the engineering sector alone (Katsiaficas 1997: 20). Stanley Aronowitz (1991: 214) explained of 1967 in the US, “The number of strikes as a whole, as well as rank-and-file rejections of proposed union settlements with employers, and wildcat actions has exceeded that in any similar period in the modern era.” In much of the global North, workers’ confidence to struggle was often boosted by the safety net of the welfare state.

In response to these struggles at the point of production, mass Fordist/Taylorist production processes tended to be gradually replaced by smaller scale, more decentralized, networked and flexible forms of production, along the “just-in-time” model promoted by Toyota, Benetton, and others. In this system, goods are delivered to the market shortly before they are expected to be purchased. This allowed firms not only to respond more easily to fluctuations in demand and changing market conditions, but also to reduce the number of workers congregated in one place.

Conditions of work in what has been called post-Fordism are generally considered more insecure or “precarious,” with long-term employment contracts increasingly uncommon. Such conditions have presented the traditional organizational forms of the workers’ movements, such as trade unions, with enormous challenges. On the level of regulation, neoliberalism both attacked the ability of unions to act through legislative reforms, and increased the mobility of capital through restricting international barriers to market entry, enabling it to flee those areas where workers are able to organize. Neoliberalism and the move towards post-Fordism, then, simultaneously involved capital’s own restructuring, while depriving existing resistance movements of their power to act and influence.

From the End of Fordism to “the End of History” and Beyond

In the period of neoliberalism’s ascendance and the initial period of post-Fordism, there was of course not a complete absence of struggles. So called “single issue” campaigns (against nuclear weapons, or for the environment), or movements based on “identity politics” (which sought to further the interests of a given group on the basis of a presumed common identity, related for example to ethnicity, gender, sexuality, or physical disability) thrived. While many of these movements grew to considerable size, and some won substantial victories, they generally failed (or refused) to move beyond their respective niches and connect with the struggles of others. Difference was privileged over commonality. It is worth noting here, however, that many of the characteristics later identified with the counter-globalization movement (networked organization, a rejection of leadership and traditional representational forms) were very often defining characteristics of these movements.

Some commentators, such as Michael Hardt and Antonio Negri in their book Multitude (2004) (the sequel to Empire (2000), which was tremendously influential in the counter-globalization movement), have described the way in which horizontal, networked forms of struggle (such as the first Palestinian Intifada which began in 1987, and the South African anti-apartheid struggles of the late 1970s and 1980s) began to emerge parallel to existing vertical and centralized structures (like the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) and the African National Congress (ANC)) during the move from Fordism to post-Fordism.

The Zapatistas present an even clearer example of this process of transformation. They remain an army, with a centralized and hierarchical command structure, yet they consistently undermine their own hierarchy. For example, by claiming to “govern obeying,” frequently engaging in lengthy processes of consultation and rotating leadership positions. The forms of organization experimented with and developed by the Zapatistas have been said to represent a broader tendency. So much so, in fact, that the RAND Corporation, which grew out of the US military following World War II, has described them as the “prototype” for what it calls “social netwar” in the twenty-first century (Arquilla & Ronfeldt 1996: 73).

The move away from hierarchical, centralized forms towards dispersed, decentered, horizontal networks continued apace following the Zapatista uprising in 1994, alongside not only the rise of post-Fordist processes of production but also a tendency towards the networked form of global governance characteristic of the neoliberal era (involving complex webs of national governments, international organizations and institutions, large non-governmental organizations (NGOs), and others). This tendency was observable in the movement which erupted around French Prime Minister Alain Juppé’s (1995–7) proposals for welfare reforms in France in 1995; the protests surrounding the Asian Pacific Economic Conference (APEC) in Manila, Philippines, in 1996; in the so-called IMF riots which erupted throughout the 1990s in response to the imposition of neoliberal policies; in the demonstrations around the European Union summit in Amsterdam, Netherlands, in 1997; and the rise of anti-corporate activism in the United States and beyond throughout the 1990s.

It is for this reason that Naomi Klein (author of No Logo (2000), another book influential in the early counter-globalization movement) was able to describe Seattle as the movement's "coming out party" (Klein 2004: 219). The street protests which took much of the world by surprise were only the latest – albeit perhaps the most "developed" – manifestation of a series of movements and struggles developing an organizational form based around decentralization and autonomy; and where, unlike previous eras of struggle, the composition of the movement was not defined by sameness or driven by a desire for unity, but the establishing of commonality despite difference.

In an article which has become influential within the European wing of the counter-globalization movement, Rodrigo Nunes (2005) built on the empirical work of network theorists such as Manuel Castells (2000) and sought to relate their research to ideas of "horizontality" and "openness" within the movement. Nunes argues that while these can in a way be understood as "ethics" of the movement, seeking to address previous problems related to democracy or power imbalances within social movements, the prevalence of the network form today needs to be understood as having been made possible by a more general "becoming-hegemonic" of the network form throughout social life: from industrial production processes, to telecommunications, and military organizations.

The Beginning of the End of Neoliberalism?

The WTO ministerial in Seattle, however, did not only mark the breaking of the surface of public consciousness of a movement which had been growing in the wings of the world stage. It also marked a turning point in the dominance of the politics of neoliberalism. Partly encouraged by the scale and intensity of the protests on the streets outside, a coalition of countries from the global South formed a temporary alliance, refusing to back down to the US delegation and others' intransigence on demands for reform – for example, in relation to the speed at which certain liberalization programs were to be implemented, and the means by which decisions were made within the organization. The negotiations, which had been designed to provide the basis for another round of trade talks, faltered. The first very overt cracks in the hegemony of the neoliberal project had begun to emerge.

Almost every round of trade talks which have followed (perhaps with the exception of the fourth WTO ministerial in Doha, Qatar, in November 2001, where conditions for protest were somewhat unfavorable) have been surrounded by scenes of protest on the streets, and a lack of consensus within the conference hall.

The 2003 WTO ministerial in Cancun, Mexico, for example, saw the formation of the G21 (Group of 21) nations, led by South Africa, China, and India. They broke off negotiations after countries from the global North declined to reciprocate the opening of barriers in the South, while fierce battles raged on the streets outside. In 2005, at the sixth WTO ministerial in Hong Kong, again no consensus was found and thousands demonstrated against the WTO, which was beginning to be declared "dead" as an institution.

The Free Trade Area of the Americas (FTAA) negotiations have faced a similar destiny. After negotiations led to the proposal of a watered down agreement ("FTAA-Lite") at the talks in Florida, in 2003, the November 2005 round of talks in Mar del Plata, Argentina, coincided with huge street protests – before finally collapsing.

Further indication of the beginning of the end of neoliberal hegemony was to be found in the series of presidential electoral victories in Latin America won on what was – at least superficially – an anti-neoliberal ticket: Chavez in Venezuela, first Nestor and then Cristina Kirchner in Argentina, "Lula" in Brazil, Vasquez in Uruguay, Morales in Bolivia, Ortega in Nicaragua, and Correa in Ecuador. A similar, although somewhat less wide-ranging or radical tendency can be observed in Europe, such as Zapatero's Spanish Socialist Workers' Party (PSOE) victory over Aznar's ruling Partido Popular in the 2004 Spanish general election. The "No" vote in the referendum on the European Constitution in France and the Netherlands in May and June of 2005, respectively, can also be understood as a recognition of the bankruptcy of the neoliberal project – as well as itself dealing it a further blow. In Britain a similar result was expected. The referendum was cancelled.

At the same time as the neoliberal project seemed to be coming apart at the seams, the forces of opposition were gaining strength. One of the important means by which they went about doing so was through the development, first, of the World Social Forum (WSF), and later of a series of continental, regional, national, and local social fora worldwide. It is within such fora – some of which have involved upwards of 150,000 participants and the first of which was held in Porto Alegre, Brazil, in January 2001, parallel to the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland – that a relatively open space has been created for discussion, debate, and an exchange of proposals for action against neoliberalism and the domination of the world by capital. The fora have provided spaces for movements to discuss issues such as militarism, racism, ecology, gender, indigenous rights, workers' struggles, food sovereignty, democracy, and sexuality.

Challenges to the Movement

Nevertheless, despite a number of real or perceived gains won by the counter-globalization movement and blows struck against neoliberalism, the movement has also found itself confronted by a number of serious challenges.

First Challenge: Global War

From July 20–22, 2001, the G8 met in Genoa, Italy, around a month after three protesters had been shot (one of whom critically) during an international demonstration against the European Union summit in Gothenberg, Sweden. On the opening day of the summit, upwards of 200,000 took to the streets for rallies, demonstrations, blockades, attempts to enter the security Red Zone where the conference was being held, and militant actions. The demonstrators were subjected to brutal and indiscriminate attack by the police. According to Amnesty International (AI), demonstrators, people clearly identified as doctors or nurses, and journalists reporting on the protests all became targets. The Carabinieri (military police) later admitted firing 15 shots of live ammunition, and 23-year-old protester Carlo Giuliani was shot dead.

The following day, July 21, the Diaz School, being used for accommodation by the Genoa Social Forum (the main organizers of the protests), was raided by a special police unit. AI later reported that of the 93 people being detained at the school, 62 were injured and 20 were carried out of the building on stretchers, two of them unconscious. Of the hundreds arrested, many reported mistreatment and brutality in custody.

Police brutality had often been deployed against counter-globalization movement activists, yet Genoa marked a new level in the intensity and indiscriminate nature of this violence – in the global North, at least. Voices within the movement, such as that of George Caffentzis (2001), described the policing of Genoa as the waging of war on its European wing.

Less than two months later, on September 11, 2001, two hijacked airplanes were flown into the Twin Towers of the World Trade Center in New York City and a further plane into the Pentagon, the headquarters of the US Defense Department. The response of the governing Republican administration was to announce the onset of what President George W. Bush (2001–8) described as an open-ended global “war on terror.” The war has not only involved the US-led military invasion of Afghanistan (in October 2001) and Iraq (in March 2003), but also the introduction of new counterterrorist legislation in the US and elsewhere (much of which has been criticized for curtailing civil liberties) and the adoption of a number of new resolutions by the United Nations (UN) said to be designed to restrict terrorist activity. The truly global nature of the “war on terror” and its implications have since become apparent through the range of nation-states who have joined the US-led operations in Afghanistan, Iraq, and elsewhere; those who have lent this effort various levels of support; the international agencies (from the UN to NATO) who have become embroiled in the conflicts or “reconstruction projects”; the scope of the so-called “fields of operation”; and the proliferation of regionally based, supposedly related operations which have taken place around the world, from the UK and Spain to Pakistan and Indonesia. From late 2001 onwards, the issue of war became a key focus for the counter-globalization movement. On February 15, 2003, millions took part in demonstrations around the world against the forthcoming invasion of Iraq.

The onset of war has posed a number of challenges to the movement. How do those struggling to build movement strength and challenge the dominant order continue to do so without becoming embroiled in cycles of violence and counter-violence which, ultimately, can only lead to the movement's military defeat? How should the movement understand the current global war? And how can it be resisted?

One of the responses to the deployment of massive state violence in Genoa has been the developing of new, innovative forms of disobedience around international summits which aim to establish a common political practice (avoiding the emergence of divisions within the movement) designed to demonstrate its continued power to act and intervene. One example of this was the Block G8 coalition in 2007. It was made up of a broad range of movements from the radical left and anti-fascists, over parts of the counter-globalization network ATTAC and student organizations, through to NGOs, church groups, and trade union youth organizations. It succeeded in blockading two of three main roads leading to the G8 summit in Heiligendamm, Germany. The coalition stated in advance that, even if provoked, they would not allow themselves to become embroiled in an escalation with the police, yet they would do all that they could to make sure they occupied and remained in the roads leading to the summit, using various methods of civil disobedience.

Discussions around the nature of the "war on terror" have been a topic of heated debate within the movement. Many have cast the military interventions in Afghanistan and Iraq as essentially imperialist projects, with the control of oil and other resources in the region the primary motivating factor. Others have emphasized what they understand as the new role of war in contemporary societies; namely, the production, control, and management of social life in general. In particular, the shift from "defense" to "security" which came about in US policy in 2002 (where military strategy no longer aims simply to defend and maintain the status quo, but to shape and form society both within and beyond the national boundaries) is taken as one example of this (Bush 2002).

Those who have emphasized the imperialist nature of US-led interventionism since 2001, such as Britain's Trotskyist Socialist Workers' Party (SWP), have tended to adopt a reasonably traditional "anti-imperialist" strategy, lending political support to those resisting the perceived imperialist project "at the sharp end." Meanwhile, those who have argued the global war to be a more dispersed project of social control and management have tended to emphasize the multitudinous ways in which this can be resisted and rejected the privileging of particular struggles in particular places. For this second, seemingly more nuanced, approach, however, the question as to how to effectively "wage war on war" remains largely unanswered.

Second Challenge: The Temptation of a Global Keynesianism

A further significant development within the global political economy over the last few years, which also poses the movement with huge challenges, is the partial appropriation of its discourse by certain factions within capital. Perhaps the clearest – although by no means the only – example of this occurred around the 2005 G8 summit, held at Gleneagles in Scotland. Here, a new constellation of actors came together which included the governing British Labour Party, the Make Poverty History (MPH) coalition of British NGOs set up to lobby the summit, and Live8 – a campaign led by pop stars Bob Geldof and Bono, culminating in simultaneous mega-concerts around the world ahead of the summit supporting MPH's policy proposals.

This perhaps unlikely axis, acting largely in cooperation with one another, professed to want to influence both the G8 summit and world politics in general to achieve a number of goals which had long been demanded by the counter-globalization movement itself, namely: the reduction of poverty, increased investment in medical and other provisions, and greater access to education for the poor in the global South. Some dismissed this as a mere smoke-screen, creating the illusion of concern when the G8, which was being hosted by Britain, intended nothing other than business as usual. Others, however, recognized the strategy as an attempt to genuinely reduce world poverty: albeit with the stabilization of a global political economy headed towards crisis as its ultimate goal.

One of the primary ideological influences on MPH and Live8, with not inconsiderable influence within the British Foreign Office around this time, was Jeffrey Sachs. Shortly before the summit, Sachs published a book, The End of Poverty (2005), in which as an economic advisor he takes on the role of a twenty-first century John Maynard Keynes. Against the neoliberal grain, his argument was that avoiding crisis and creating growth required short-term political intervention in the economy. He proposed investment in education, health, and nutrition as a means of lifting up to a billion people out of poverty and into the global labor market within 20 years. Like Keynes before him, Sachs similarly refused to get drawn into debate as to the extent to which waged-laboring practices may be rooted in exploitation, or how the nature of capitalist social relations could be the ultimate cause of the very poverty he claimed to want to root out (Caffentzis 2005).

Of course, there had always been currents within the movement with a Keynesian orientation, such as those represented by former Association for the Taxation of Financial Transactions to Aid Citizens (ATTAC) vice president Susan George (2007) and British Guardian newspaper columnist George Monbiot (who incidentally was himself critical of Live8 and Make Poverty History). However, the adoption of a neo-Keynesian discourse by the British government and others around this time served to seriously disorient the movement.

In particular, radicals within the counter-globalization movement were presented with a twofold challenge. On the one hand, it needed to deploy a critique which went beyond calling into question a neoliberal politics which even the G8 itself no longer seemed to be (quite so overtly) deploying, rejecting more fully capitalism as a social system based on exploitation and alienation. And on the other, it needed to avoid isolation – the buying off of the most “moderate” end of the movement by offering them a (temporary) seat at the negotiating table, while its “radical fringe” continued to be subjected to repression. It was a challenge to which the movement, at this particular time, was largely unable to rise.

Moving Beyond “Unity in Diversity”

If the question raised at Gleneagles was how the diversity of the movement could be maintained, this was expanded on and reformulated in both the theory and practice of a range of movement actors. The task became one of creating a movement in which no one single element was able to establish a hegemony or remake all the others in its own image. It was also important for the movement’s component parts to move beyond merely existing indifferently alongside one another. Through open and honest debate and – importantly – the developing of new political practices which did not remain the exclusive terrain of a particular niche, there was a possibility of not only maintaining diversity, but rising to the challenge of developing organizational forms that establish “commons” (both what the constituent parts have in common, as well as the production of the commons as shared social wealth) despite difference.

Certain steps were taken in this direction with the Block G8 coalition around the 2007 G8 summit, described above. La otra campaña (The Other Campaign), initiated by the Zapatistas with their Sixth Declaration of the Lacandon Jungle, moved in this direction as well. They are no longer simply discussing with non-indigenous others such as students, workers, and the unemployed, but becoming directly involved in collaborative action with a range of social actors right across Mexico (Marcos 2006).

The EuroMayDay movement, in a similar way, has set as its goal not only attempting to open up the realm of social production and reproduction as a concrete sphere of struggle to be addressed by those involved in the cycle of struggles from Seattle to Genoa (and beyond), but to do so in a way which highlights the plurality of social subjects this involves today. Since a few thousand people took part in the first EuroMayDay Parade in Milan, Italy, on May 1, 2001, intended to highlight the “precarious” and insecure conditions of life and work under neoliberalism, the event has grown to involve upwards of 100,000 people. It has spread as an annual event occurring simultaneously in numerous cities across Europe and beyond. The goal has been precisely the establishing of that which those who participate – from temporary and part-time workers, over migrants and refugees, to students, environmentalists, and queer activists – share with one another: namely, their role as producers (as opposed to appropriators) of the social wealth that capitalism deprives them of everyday.

There are, of course, serious limitations to La otra campaña and the EuroMayDay movement, as there were with the Block G8 coalition. And indeed, many of these problems are connected to an inability to fully move beyond the identity oriented and ideologically loaded politics they each claim to be trying to leave behind. What all of them and other similar projects indicate, however, is that despite a relatively low level of institutionalization (compared, for example, to trade union movements or projects headed by political parties in previous eras), the movements have been able to accumulate knowledge and develop a collective intelligence. In particular, it has been able to both stay attuned to developments taking place at the level of (economic) production and (political) regulation and the challenges and opportunities that this poses; as well as learn from both the victories and defeats of its own young history.

Glorious Revolution, Britain, 1688

Steven Pincus

England's Glorious Revolution of 1688–9 holds a special place in our understanding of the modern world and the revolutions that had a hand in shaping it. For the better part of three centuries scholars and public intellectuals identified England's Revolution of 1688–9 as a defining moment in England's exceptional history. Political philosophers have associated it with the origins of liberalism. Sociologists have contrasted it with the French, Russian, and Chinese revolutions. Historians have pointed to the revolution as confirming the unusual nature of the English state. Scholars of literature and culture highlight the Revolution of 1688–9 as an important moment in defining English common sense and moderation. All of these interpretations derive their power from a deeply held and widely repeated narrative of England's Revolution of 1688–9. Unfortunately, that narrative is wrong. Replacing that historical narrative with a new one will necessarily force us to revise many of the basic historical, political, moral, and sociological categories we use to make sense of the modern world. The old narrative emphasized the Revolution of 1688–9 as a great moment in which the English defended their unique way of life. Recent scholarship suggests instead that the English revolutionaries created a new kind of modern state. It was that new state that has proved so influential in shaping the modern world.

Men and women all over the English-speaking world once knew what happened in England's Revolution of 1688–9. In 1685 the Catholic King James II inherited the crown of England. In 1689 the English people agreed to replace him with Protestants – King William III and Queen Mary II. In the intervening years, James II gradually and myopically alienated the moderate and sensible English people. He did this in a series of well-known missteps. In late 1685 he overreacted to the romantic but hopeless rebellion of his nephew, the Protestant Duke of Monmouth, by judicially murdering hundreds of humble inhabitants of the English West Country in the Bloody Assizes. Determined to improve the social and political status of his Catholic co-religionists, James then ran roughshod over English law. He insisted on his right to defy parliamentary statute and awarded Roman Catholics military and naval commissions. In 1687 he used his newly formed and illegal Ecclesiastical Commission to force England's Protestant universities to accept Roman Catholic fellows. When the fellows of Magdalen College Oxford resisted their king's demands, he had the dons stripped of their fellowships, turning the institution into a Catholic seminary.

According to this once well-known narrative, after James II had failed to persuade the House of Commons or the House of Lords to repeal England's laws against Roman Catholicism, he decided to emasculate Parliament. He first asserted his right to nullify the Test Acts and Penal Laws. These parliamentary statutes – requiring, in the case of the Test Acts, that all political or military officeholders take the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England, and in the case of the Penal Laws punishing those who officiated at or attended non-Church of England services – had successfully insulated the English from continental Catholic practices. Then, James determined to have his royal fiat ratified by a Parliament packed with men whom he knew would do his bidding. When, in June 1688, seven Bishops of the Church of England defied James II by refusing to have his Declaration of Indulgence, emasculating the Penal Laws and Test Acts, read from England's pulpits on the grounds of its illegality, James had the seven men dragged into court for a show trial. That even a carefully picked English jury acquitted the bishops demonstrated the limits to which the English were willing to go in support of their king. Soon after the trial, the English invited the Dutchman William III Prince of Orange to England to vindicate their religious and political liberty.

The English people enthusiastically welcomed William upon his arrival in the West of England in 1688. James's army quickly melted away after a series of spectacular defections, including that of the future Duke of Marlborough. James himself, preceded by his wife and newborn son, fled to France. The English people, in what was thought to have been a remarkable moment of political unanimity, agreed to replace James with William and Mary in February 1689. The English justified the crowning of the new monarchs with the publication of the Declaration of Right, detailing the ways that James II had violated English law, thereby insisting on the limited power of English kings. In the traditional account of the Glorious Revolution, the English people, led by their natural leaders in the two Houses of Parliament, changed the English polity in the slightest of ways in 1688–9. They slightly altered the succession, they made it illegal for a Catholic ever to inherit the throne, and they passed the Toleration Act, allowing Protestant Nonconformists to worship freely. There were, to be sure, some significant unintended consequences of this bloodless revolution. But these outcomes were to be understood less as a direct consequence of these events than as the natural outgrowth of the English national character – a character that the Catholicizing Stuart monarchs had done much to pervert.

This was the story that every English school-child, and many North American ones, used to know. This was the story that the great Victorian historian Thomas Babington Macaulay laid out in his magisterial History of England, first published in the middle of the nineteenth century. That History was an immediate and runaway best-seller, and has deservedly been deeply influential ever since. Macaulay told his story in beautiful and accessible prose. He based his account on exhaustive research.

Macaulay's thesis became the classic statement of the Whig interpretation of the Revolution of 1688–9. It had a number of distinctive facets. First, the revolution was unrevolutionary. Unlike other subsequent revolutions, England's revolution was bloodless, consensual, aristocratic, and above all sensible. The English had no desire to transform their polity, their society or their culture. Instead, they worried that James II had intended to do just that. Second, the revolution was Protestant. James II had tried to reinstitute Catholicism in England. The revolution insured that England would remain a Protestant polity. Third, the revolution demonstrated the fundamentally exceptional nature of English national character. Continental Europeans vacillated between the wild extremes of republican and popular government on the one hand and tyrannical royal absolutism on the other. The English, by contrast, were committed to limited monarchy, allowing just the right amount of tempered popular liberty. Just as the English church was a sensible middle way between the extremes of Roman Catholicism and radical Protestant sectarianism, so the English polity, by maintaining its ancient constitution, was sensible and moderate. In this context the English remained committed to their hierarchical social structure precisely because it did not impose unbridgeable gaps between the aristocracy and the people. Fourth, there could have been no social grievances undergirding the revolution of 1688–9 because English society had changed little in the period prior to James II's flight. It was only once English property rights were secured by the revolution, only once absolutism was no longer possible in England, that the English economy could truly flourish.

Recent scholarship challenges every element of this established account. England's Revolution of 1688–9 can now be understood as the first modern revolution. The English experience in the late seventeenth century was not exceptional, but in fact typical (if precocious) of states experiencing modern revolutions. The Revolution of 1688–9 is important not because it reaffirmed the exceptional English national character, but because it was a landmark moment in the emergence of the modern state.

England in the later seventeenth century was rapidly becoming a modern society. Its economy was booming. Its towns were growing and growing more comfortable. Its trade was expanding. These developments made it possible for English statesmen to conceive of a more active role for the English government. But social and economic change did not make the Revolution of 1688–9 inevitable. James II, deeply influenced by the particular brand of Catholicism he practiced and by the successful political model of his cousin, Louis XIV of France, sought to develop a modern absolutist state. James and his supporters created a centralizing bureaucratic state, a professional standing army, and a world-class navy. At the same time, James fashioned a modern Catholic polity. James, like his cousin Louis XIV, wanted Catholic subjects but not a papal overlord. Instead, James insisted on absolute sovereignty within his own dominion, while at the same time seeking to Catholicize his Protestant country. James successfully promoted the spread of Catholic apologetic literature, the proliferation of Catholic schools and colleges, and the opening of Catholic churches. No one living through the 1680s in England could have failed to appreciate the new prominence of Catholicism in English everyday life. James and his advisors appreciated that his modern state needed an expanding set of resources to support his more interventionist state. They quickly concluded that a centralized overseas territorial empire, with bases in India, North America, and the West Indies, was an essential prop. James marshaled newly available resources, and devised plans for a vastly increased empire, to create a modern Catholic state.

James's opponents were, by and large, revolutionaries, not reactionaries. They appreciated that only a modernized English state could compete in contemporary Europe. Unlike James, however, the revolutionaries looked to the Dutch Republic rather than to the French monarchy for political inspiration. They, too, wanted a state that could support a powerful army and a first-class navy. They, too, imagined that such a state would have to be centralized and interventionist. But, unlike James and his advisors, the revolutionaries imagined that England would be most powerful if it encouraged political participation rather than absolutism, if it were religiously tolerant rather than Catholicizing, and if it were devoted to promoting English manufactures rather than a landed empire. The revolutionaries understood full well that these political preferences put them at ideological loggerheads with Louis XIV's modern Catholic monarchy. The revolutionaries were therefore fully committed to fighting an all-out war against France, not only to protect the British Isles against a potential French-backed Jacobite restoration, but also to ensure that there would be European markets available to English manufactures and that European liberty would be preserved against French-style absolutism.

James II and his opponents did not only advocate radically different modernizing programs, they also were able to deploy a modern arsenal of political tools. James had succeeded in raising, maintaining, and deploying an efficient and disciplined army. He was in the process of molding most corporations throughout England and Wales into loyal instruments of local politics. James used the press and various political institutions to spread his regime's values and silence alternative viewpoints. James's regime may look brief and fragile in retrospect, but from the perspective of the later seventeenth century he had created a powerful edifice. It was precisely because James had been able to create such a powerful state that many of James's opponents realized that it could only be resisted with violence and that only a revolutionary transformation could prevent a future English monarch from recreating his modern absolutist state. Those who overthrew James II in 1688 and shaped the new regime in the following decade were necessarily revolutionaries.

Though we have come to view the Glorious Revolution as bloodless, aristocratic, and consensual, the actual event was none of these things. The Revolution of 1688–9 was, of course, less bloody than the violent revolutions of the twentieth century, but the English endured a scale of violence against property and persons similar to that of the French Revolution of the end of the eighteenth century. Englishmen and women throughout the country threatened one another, destroyed each other's property, and killed and maimed one another throughout the revolutionary period. Englishmen and women, from London to Newcastle, from Plymouth to Norwich, experienced violence or threats of violence, or lived in terrifying fear of violence. This was not a tame event. Nor was it a staid negotiation conducted by elites. Men and women of all social categories took to the streets, marched in arms on England's byways and highways, and donated huge amounts of money – some in very small quantities – to support the revolutionary cause. When the members of the House of Lords tried calmly to settle the succession issue after James II had fled the country, an angry crowd numbering in the tens of thousands cut short the nobles' deliberations and forced their hands. Given the power, efficiency, and ideological cohesion of James II's new regime, it was not surprising that many supported their king with great enthusiasm even in 1688 and beyond. Since many of the revolutionaries sought to replace James II's French-style modernization program with one based on a Dutch model, it was also predictable that many others would support the undoing of James II's new state edifice while doing everything they could to prevent the creation of a Williamite alternative. The English throughout the 1680s, 1690s, and thereafter were politically and ideologically divided. There was no moment of English cohesion against an un-English king. There was no period in the late seventeenth century in which the sensible people of England collaborated to rid themselves against an irrational monarch. The Revolution of 1688–9 was, like all other revolutions, violent, popular, and divisive.

The English in the later seventeenth century forged the first modern revolution. This revolution had long-term causes and long-term consequences. The English could not have transformed their state and society in the ways in which they did in the 1680s and 1690s had the events of the previous century – especially those of the crisis of the 1640s and 1650s – not unleashed a series of ideological debates that informed and transformed conceptions of state, religion, and society. English politicians, whether supporters of James II or of William and Mary, could not have transformed England's state institutions had the English economy not diverged from the late seventeenth-century European pattern of recession and retrenchment. Because there were long-term causes of the Glorious Revolution, the consequences of that revolution were not necessarily unintended. The creation of the Bank of England, war against France, and religious toleration were all explicit goals of many of the revolutionaries. Precisely because the debates over these issues had long pedigrees, it would be wrong to understand 1688 or 1689 as a fundamental break in English history. The debates over these issues continued, albeit modified and reshaped by new institutional realities. Early Modern England did not come to an end in 1688, nor did Modern England begin then. It would, however, be fair to say that the character of English state-society relations was fundamentally transformed.

The revolutionaries created a new kind of English state after 1689. They rejected the modern, bureaucratic absolutist state model developed by Louis XIV in France. But they did not reject the state. Instead, the revolutionaries created a state that was intrusive in different ways. Their state sought to transform England from an agrarian into a manufacturing society, oversaw the massive military buildup that was necessary to fight a war against the greatest military power that Europe had ever seen, and sought to promote a religiously tolerant society. John Locke, often described as one of the earliest and most influential liberal thinkers, was one of these revolutionaries. If the Glorious Revolution was a critical moment in the development of modern liberalism, that liberalism was not antagonistic to the state. The liberalism spawned in 1688–9 was revolutionary and interventionist rather than moderate and anti-statist.

The Glorious Revolution was not the triumph of a group of modernizers over defenders of traditional society. Instead, the revolution pitted two groups of modernizers against one another. Both sides tried, against long odds, to appeal for the hearts and minds of the reactionaries. This was a pattern typical of all modern revolutions. Revolutionary situations, in the vast majority of cases, have been created when the regime in power decides, for whatever reason, that it needs to modernize. In so doing, the regime extends the tendrils of the state deeper and more extensively into society than they had ever gone before, necessarily generating resentment. At the same time, by announcing a break with the past, the regime has lowered the bar for opposition movements. Potential revolutionaries no longer need to persuade their fellow subjects to break with traditional and trusted ways of life. They merely need to persuade them that they have a superior model for change. The regime in power can no longer rely on the habitual loyalty of elites. The revolutionaries of late seventeenth-century England set the model for this now-typical political pattern.

Marco de Waard

William Godwin's works of philosophy, history, and fiction were instrumental in the formation of modern anarchist thought. Writing in Britain in the aftermath of the French Revolution, and in a climate of hardening reaction, he developed a critique of government and a utopian philosophy of justice which made social and moral progress dependent on the increase of philosophical understanding and the free, unshackled exercise of private judgment.

Godwin was brought up in the English tradition of religious dissent. In his early teens he was the pupil of an independent minister whose hyper-rationalistic "Sandemanian" doctrines in theology reinforced the gloom and anguish he had imbibed in his Calvinist youth. From 1773 to 1778 he received a rigorous philosophical training at a dissenting academy in Hoxton, where he prepared for the ministry. Godwin failed to secure a post as minister, however, and from 1782 a reading of Helvétius, Holbach, and Rousseau radicalized his thought. Over the next ten years he held a variety of religious views, ultimately becoming an atheist. Importantly, the philosophes also redirected his attention from theological to political concerns, teaching him that political solutions can be found for “ills which he had hitherto considered endemic in human nature” (Marshall 1984).

The French Revolution incited Godwin to write a work of political philosophy that was published as An Enquiry Concerning Political Justice in February 1793. Initially, his goal was to replace the environmental determinism of Montesquieu with a theory of political and psychological determination, and to examine how governments could help virtue and morality develop. As his manuscript grew, however, Godwin became convinced that government itself “by its very nature counteracts the improvement of individual mind” and that the perfect society would render government superfluous. The utopian individualism which he then developed – aimed at realizing an ideal of moral self-direction in society through the optimization of private judgment – was original in its context. It provided a utilitarian alternative to Helvétius, whose assumption of self-interested behavior Godwin rejected in favor of a theory of rational “benevolence.” It also provided a radical alternative to Thomas Paine, whose belief in natural rights Godwin did not share.

Godwin associated with many advocates of reform. In Cursory Strictures on the Charge delivered by Lord Chief Justice Eyre to the Grand Jury (1794) he defended English Jacobins of the London Corresponding Society who had been charged with high treason. Yet his distrust of political associations soon placed him at the head of an anti-revolutionary faction among English radicals, and in subsequent editions of Political Justice (1795, 1798), as well as shorter philosophical essays (e.g., the volume The Enquirer, 1797), his cautious gradualism became more pronounced. Godwin propagated reform through education and enlightenment rather than political action and agitation. In line with his educationism he produced a spate of novels, children’s books, and works of history which explored the affections on which virtue is based but also the pathological states induced by a corrupt society. This prolific output notwithstanding, Godwin’s reputation declined sharply after 1800. Continued biographical interest has been generated, however, by his affair resulting in marriage to Mary Wollstonecraft (1796–7) and his relations with the poet Percy Bysshe Shelley, husband to his daughter Mary.

Although, formally speaking, Political Justice is a work of political philosophy, it is underpinned by original – albeit unsystematic – propositions in moral philosophy and ethics. In his metaphysical assumptions Godwin was a Lockean sensationist of a necessitarian cast. He was also an “intellectualist” who believed that ideas have greater agency than physical stimuli, and that ultimately mind will achieve control over matter. His premise that there are no innate differences between people at birth meant that all inequalities could be analyzed as the result of social arrangements. Godwin’s critique of inequality and interpersonal dependence compares well to Rousseau’s in the positive conception of freedom underlying it, but as Crowder (1991) points out, Godwin was far more optimistic about humanity’s capacity for recovering free and authentic forms of living. Belief in perfectibility sustained his thought. If in potential everyone is rational and capable of benevolent intentions, Godwin believed, reason would lead the way out of the predicament of modern culture, if only the social and political constraints upon it would be abolished.

Godwin’s ethics were sanctioned by criteria of utility. Much has been made of his advocacy of impartiality in relations, illustrated by his famous “fire case.” If facing the choice between rescuing the archbishop Fénelon from a burning house or a servant who is also one’s parent, the choice, Godwin argued, should be for the former: to respect domestic affections in this case would amount to a failure of reason to grasp that Fénelon’s survival would better contribute to producing a greater balance of good over evil in the world. Yet if Godwin subtly combined “act” and “rule” utilitarianism (Clark 1977), some of his central tenets – that virtue is essential to happiness, that people are social beings whose individuality places them in need of autonomy – were never assimilated within a utilitarian system. In recent years, analyses of Godwin’s utilitarianism have therefore been supplemented by readings which see his theory of private judgment as a secularization of the Dissenting and Calvinist traditions of private conscience (Philp 1986).

In Godwin's political theory the central question is which arrangements are most conducive to the increase of rationality, benevolent dispositions, and happiness. Criticizing all man-made laws as arbitrary and oppressive, and government as essentially coercive, he proclaimed the desirability of a total "euthanasia of government." Godwin distinguished strictly between government and society, however, and some of the functions of political arrangements could in his view be transferred to decentralized, simplified societal forms. The ideal form was the parish community or voluntary federation, in which individuals could be self-sufficient with a minimum of cooperation and dependence. As long as reason did not reign supreme, justice would be administered by small, non-professional juries. A permanent regulating function was assigned to public opinion, which would function by means of social censorship and social sanctioning among equals, the only form of "punishment" which Godwin believed was rational and just. The resulting anarchic community would achieve the highest form of order.

In terms of a theory of revolution and protest, Godwin's philosophy is restricted by the fact that in his view the possibilities for reform and change rest almost exclusively on the intellectual and moral improvement that can be achieved by individuals. His distrust of all forms of cooperation and association – which even extended to orchestras – left little space for political action, and his educationalism and trust in the gradual diffusion of truth by enlightened opinion have been criticized as restricted or even elitist. Characteristically, while in the editions of Political Justice of 1795 and 1798 Godwin's anarchism became more consistent, he also grew more conservative and suspicious of sudden change. In 1811 he reiterated that he was "an enemy to revolutions" and looked "to the understanding alone for all real & solid improvements in the structure of human society" (Marshall 1984).

Put alongside Godwin's philosophical writings, the cultural impact of his literary work was vast. His first mature novel of six, Things as They Are, or The Adventures of Caleb Williams (1794), gave his anti-authoritarianism a very wide dissemination. Its psychological plot, demonstrating how society creates the very crimes it punishes, reads like an early exercise in the analysis of hegemonic discourses. Godwin's historical writings have rarely received due attention. From his early History of the Internal Affairs of the United Provinces (1787), to his later History of the Commonwealth of England (4 vols., 1824–8), Godwin was more appreciative of republicanism and political revolt as historiographer than he was as theorist, an appreciation that was based on his recognition of virtuous characters and not on constitutional or legalist considerations (Morrow 1991).

Godwin's work remains relevant to the traditions of philosophical anarchism, non-revolutionary socialism, and modern liberalism. Although he welcomed technology, his propagation of parish communities may have set the pattern for the opposition to industry and machines of a following generation (Luddites). His influence extended to the Chartists, the Federalists, and American abolitionists, and his unorthodox utilitarianism, enriched by a notion of positive liberty and by concern with the quality of life, anticipated John Stuart Mill. Godwin's work was acclaimed in nineteenth-century France and Russia, where his treatment of property and conception of voluntary communism were taken up by anarchists like Proudhon and Kropotkin.

Goldman, Emma (1869–1940)

Heidi M. Rimke

Emma Goldman, an anarcho-feminist intellectual, activist, writer, organizer, and public speaker, is arguably the most famous, or perhaps infamous, anarchist in the history of North America. She spent a lifetime agitating for universal principles such as: an end to war, nationalism, authoritarianism, imperialism, and gender inequalities; social justice for all working people; reproductive freedom; the abolition of capitalism; and freedom of spiritual, political, intellectual, and sexual expression – including polyamory or free love. Admirers called her “Rebel Woman” and “the modern Joan of Arc,” while the press and her enemies mockingly named her “Red Emma,” “High Priestess of Anarchy,” or the “Anarchist Queen”; her resistance was so formidable to authorities that she was described by J. Edgar Hoover as “the most dangerous woman in the world.” From approximately the age of 20, Goldman dedicated her life to an unrelenting campaign of political agitation for social revolution, becoming a pivotal figure in the history of political philosophy. She faced lifelong criminalization, expulsion, public humiliation, and social scorn as a result of her controversial convictions and activities.

Goldman was born in a Jewish Orthodox family to Taube Bienowitch and Abraham Goldman on June 27, 1869 in Kaunas, Russia (now Kovno, Lithuania), the youngest of three daughters. She endured a harsh childhood, and her father forced her to work when she wanted to attend school as a teenager. Shortly after the assassination of Tsar Alexander II in 1881, her family moved to St. Petersburg, where the Jewish community suffered a wave of pogroms. Although her father prohibited her from pursuing formal education on the grounds that girls only needed to know how to cook and be a good wife, she was an avid reader and became an astute observer of the social and political world, particularly its oppressive effects on class, gender, sexuality, ethnicity, and politics.

Goldman and her step-sister Helena immigrated to Rochester, New York, in 1886, where she worked in a clothing factory and married Jacob Kershner, a fellow worker. The marriage lasted less than one year. While Goldman already possessed a revolutionary consciousness, it was the horror of the Haymarket events that inspired and moved her to anarchism. The blatant injustice of the 1886 trial and state execution of the Haymarket anarchists profoundly stirred Goldman and from that day forward defined her entire life course, which she tirelessly devoted to advancing the revolutionary cause. Her goal of human emancipation was predicated on overthrowing the capitalist, patriarchal, and hierarchical structures of society that she viewed as the root of all human suffering.

In 1889 Goldman moved to New York City, where she met Alexander Berkman and Johann Most, amongst other prominent radicals, decided to join the anarchist movement, and began delivering public lectures. In 1892, inspired by Most’s theory of attentat or propaganda by the deed, Berkman and Goldman planned to assassinate Henry Clay Frick in retaliation for his role in the death of the Homestead strikers by Pinkerton armed guards. Without Goldman’s knowledge or presence, Berkman shot and wounded Frick. He was convicted of attempted murder and sentenced to 14 years in Western Penitentiary. Goldman’s defense of Berkman gained her public notoriety as well as prominence in the anarchist movement. Goldman became a marked woman and her public speeches were regularly disrupted by the authorities. In 1893, she was arrested for encouraging the unemployed to take food “by force” at a demonstration. Goldman was sentenced to ten months in Blackwell’s Island Penitentiary, where she became a prison nurse. In 1895, she traveled to Vienna, Austria, to study nursing. Shortly thereafter, while in London, she met renowned anarchists Errico Malatesta and her political mentor, Peter Kropotkin. In November of 1899 she met and began a relationship with the anarchist Hippolyte Havel and went to France to help organize the International Anarchist Congress.

Goldman’s anarchism was inextricably intertwined with her feminism, which differed sharply from the first-wave women’s movement. She rejected the suffragist’s goal of securing the vote as well as their growing efforts to criminalize prostitution. The women’s movement often supported laws that hurt working-class women’s interests. Goldman criticized those feminists who treated prostitutes as criminals rather than as victims of an unjust society built upon economic exploitation. While organizing women into trade unions and working as a nurse and midwife among immigrant workers on the Lower East Side of New York City in the 1890s, Goldman became convinced that birth control was fundamental to women's sexual and economic freedom and smuggled contraceptive devices into the United States. Despite her woman-centered activism, Goldman refused to identify herself as a feminist and denounced the women's movement of her time, which she saw as bourgeois and exclusive of the real sufferers of society – the working class. Goldman rejected the suffragists' argument that the vote would make women better Christians, wives, and citizens, on the grounds that such aspirations would fortify rather than eradicate women's oppression.

Goldman maintained that women would achieve equality not through the ballot or by the moral purification of society but by taking direct action against the sources of their collective misery, oppression, and exploitation – the church, the family and marriage, and the state. Accordingly, women needed to resist the “internal tyrants” of tradition by assuming control of their bodies and sexuality. The goal was for women to become self-defined and self-directing agents rather than blindly conforming to social dictates governed by traditional gender rules that benefited one sex to the disadvantage of the other. Overthrowing institutions and practices of oppression, not choosing one's oppressor through the ballot, was the only means of breaking free from the social, political, and economic chains shackling womankind to a social system based on sexual and economic exploitation.

In 1901, Theodore Roosevelt and the United States Congress passed the Anarchist Exclusion Act in response to the assassination of President William McKinley, marking the first time a US policy explicitly set out to interrogate the political views of prospective immigrants. When Leon Czolgosz, a self-proclaimed anarchist, committed the assassination, Goldman was blamed and forced underground along with many other radicals in a massive anti-anarchist campaign. In 1903, she became involved with the Free Speech League in New York City in response to the passage of the draconian anti-anarchist laws. She began the publication of the radical monthly, Mother Earth, in 1906 and wrote essays on anarchism, politics, prisons, labor issues, drama, atheism, militarism, freedom of speech, socialism, homosexuality, and feminism; some were later published as a collection in Anarchism and Other Essays (1910).

By 1915, Goldman was working with Margaret Sanger in a mass movement for birth control, lecturing frequently on “the right of the child not to be born.” Demanding that women's bodies be freed from the coercion of government and tradition, she urged women to go on a “birth strike” to achieve equality between the sexes. Goldman was arrested in February 1916 and charged with violation of the Comstock Law, which prohibited the dissemination of “obscene, lewd, or lascivious articles,” including information relating to contraception. She spent two weeks in prison.

As the United States government appeared to be heading for war in 1916, Goldman used the magazine as a medium to oppose the military agenda. The federal government crushed the anti-war movement in what became known as the Palmer raids, orchestrated by the Woodrow Wilson administration in an anti-radical, pro-patriotism crusade. The passage of the Espionage and Sedition Acts of 1917 and 1918 resulted in extensive prison terms for those who protested the United States entry into World War I. The Mother Earth headquarters was among the first to be raided in the crackdown and the magazine was outlawed along with other anti-war literature and actions.

Goldman co-facilitated the founding of the No-Conscription League in May 1917 soon after the United States joined World War I. The following month, Goldman was arrested and charged with conspiring to obstruct the draft. She was convicted and sentenced to two years in prison. After an unsuccessful appeal to the Supreme Court, Goldman entered the Missouri State Penitentiary and was released on September 27, 1919, when she was immediately rearrested on the order of J. Edgar Hoover. He persuaded the courts to deny Goldman citizenship, thus making her vulnerable to deportation under the 1918 Alien Act, which allowed for the expulsion of any immigrant identified as anarchist. One of numerous cases prosecuted under a web of wartime legislation designed to throttle resistance, she and Berkman were deported alongside 247 other radical immigrants to Soviet Russia, on December 21, 1919, aboard the SS Buford.

The advantage to deportation was directly experiencing the Russian Revolution. Goldman was prepared to overlook the First International's conflict with anarchism in order to support the Bolsheviks. However, in 1919 as Goldman and Berkman traveled throughout the country, they were revolted by the growing bureaucracy, political persecution, and forced labor they witnessed throughout Soviet Russia. Goldman was shocked by the brutal authoritarianism of the Bolshevik regime, its ruthless repression of anarchists, and its disregard for individual freedom and liberation. Nonetheless, she continued to defend the revolution as distinct from the Bolshevik regime itself. She was able to sustain this theoretical position until 1921, when libertarian sailors revolted at Kronstadt by siding with striking workers against the Bolshevik government. When Trotsky and the Red Army killed 600 sailors and arrested 2,000 more, she realized Soviet Russia was anything but the revolutionary society she had envisioned and so tirelessly worked toward her entire life.

The repression of the Kronstadt rebellion was intolerable to Goldman, and in a state of disenchantment she and Berkman left Soviet Russia in 1921 and moved to Britain, where she was essentially alone on the left in condemning the Bolsheviks. Her critical analysis was unpopular amongst radicals because most still wanted to believe that the Russian Revolution was a cause for celebration, not critique. To avoid deportation in 1926, Goldman married James Colton, an anarchist miner, in order to obtain British citizenship, which permitted her to stay in France and Canada while writing her two-volume autobiography, Living My Life (1931). After numerous attempts she was finally permitted reentry into the United States in 1934 for a period of 90 days to give a lecture tour.

In 1936, shortly after Berkman committed suicide, an anarchist-inspired revolution erupted in Spain due to an attempted coup d'état against the government of the Second Spanish Republic. For the following three years, Goldman committed to supporting the anarcho-syndicalist fight of the Spanish Confederación Nacional del Trabajo and Federación Anarquista Ibérica. Her invited participation in the Spanish Civil War lifted the weight of Berkman's crushing death. For the first time in her life, she lived in a community run by and for anarchists, acting as editor of the weekly CNT-FAI Information Bulletin and replying to English-language mail. She disagreed with joining the coalition government of 1937 in the name of uniting against fascism, not only on the basis of the anarchist tenet of refraining from participation in state structures: cooperating with communists would be a denial of fallen comrades in Stalin's concentration camps. Goldman returned to Canada in 1939. She suffered three strokes and died in Toronto on May 14, 1940, at age 70. She was permitted back into the United States to be buried in the German Waldheim Cemetery, Chicago, next to the Haymarket anarchists and other celebrated radicals and revolutionaries.

Law enforcement officials monitored Goldman for much of her life in exile from the United States. She was deported by the governments of Soviet Russia, Holland, and France and denied entrance to many others. The state repression and infamy forced Goldman to occasionally withdraw from the public arena and to adopt the pseudonym "Miss E. G. Smith." Goldman resisted every governing institution of her time, and, like other revolutionary visionaries, experienced tyranny for advocating new possibilities for the social world, problems second-wave feminists addressed again in the 1960s, and all of which still remain to be realized today.

Emma Goldman wrote hundreds of pamphlets, numerous newspaper and magazine articles, and six books throughout her life. These include: Anarchy and the Sex Question (1896), Anarchy Defended by Anarchists (1896), Mother Earth (1906–17), What I Believe (1908), A New Declaration of Independence (1909), Anarchism: What it Really Stands For (1910), The White Slave Traffic (1910), Marriage and Love (1911), The Failure of Christianity (1913), Syndicalism: The Modern Menace to Capitalism (1913), The Social Significance of Modern Drama (1914), The Philosophy of Atheism (1916), The Truth About the Bolsheviks (1918), My Disillusionment in Russia (1923), My Further Disillusionment in Russia (1924), Voltaire de Cleyre (1932), The Tragedy of the Political Exiles (1934), and Was My Life Worth Living? (1934).

Gomas, Johnny (1901–1979)

Lucien van der Walt

Johnny Gomas (John Stephen Gomas), a leading South African syndicalist, was born in 1901 on a mission station in the Cape to David and Elizabeth Gomas. He was largely brought up by his mother, a devout Christian; he was profoundly alienated from his drunken father, a laborer who abandoned the family. He was educated at a mission school, until his mother moved to Kimberley in 1911 in search of work and to escape her abusive husband. The family lived in the Malay Camp slum, and the studious Gomas was forced by poverty to leave school to find a job. In 1915 he was apprenticed as a tailor at a local firm, Gordon’s, where his employer, a Russian Jew, apparently introduced him to socialist ideas.

In 1919 the revolutionary syndicalist International Socialist League organized two syndicalist unions in Kimberley, the Clothing Workers’ Industrial Union and the Horse Drivers’ Union, based among the town’s Colored workers. Gomas joined the Clothing Workers’ Industrial Union; he was among a number of Colored workers who also joined the International Socialist League, and went out on strike when employers reneged on an agreement with the union. He also joined the Industrial and Commercial Workers’ Union (ICU) and the South African Native National Congress, later renamed the African National Congress (ANC). In 1920 he was arrested for a burglary at Gordon’s and imprisoned for three months. His family moved to Cape Town after his release, where he resumed work as a tailor.

Unlike many of the local revolutionary syndicalists, Gomas did not join the Communist Party of South Africa (CPSA) when it was formed in 1921. In 1923 he became a full-time ICU organizer and union secretary for the Western Cape, and joined the CPSA in 1925, becoming branch secretary and later a member of the Political Bureau. As part of the group trying to reform the ICU, Gomas was expelled with other CPSA members like T. W. Thibedi in 1926. He remained active in union work, and also became the vice president of the provincial ANC. In 1928 Gomas was sentenced to three months in prison after organizing a protest against police brutality, and was involved in the short-lived Independent ANC.

A supporter of the 1928 two-stage “Native Republic” strategy of the CPSA, Gomas escaped unscathed from the purges of the “New Line” period, and was an important figure in the Popular Front period, the epitome of a party loyalist. Gomas was a founder member of the National Liberation League, active in the Non-European United Front formed in 1938, and, in the 1940s, was an official in the Tin Workers’ Union and a leading CPSA leader. He was marginalized in the CPSA in the late 1940s for his increasingly Africanist views. Although he was among those arrested in the state of emergency declared in the aftermath of the Sharpeville Massacre of March 21, 1960, Gomas was not notably active in his later years, and died in 1979.

Kathleen Ruppert

Edith Maud Gonne was an Irish revolutionary, feminist, and actress. Of Anglo-Irish descent, she actively promoted the cause of Irish nationalism and other social causes throughout Europe, particularly in France and America. Gonne also founded Inghinidhe na hEireann (Daughters of Erin), an Irish nationalist organization for women.

Gonne was born to an upper-class English family in Surrey in December 1866. She spent the early years of her childhood in Ireland, where her father, Captain Thomas Gonne of the 17th Lancers, was stationed. Following the death of their mother in 1871, Gonne and her sister Kathleen moved several times before ending up in France under the care of a governess. At the age of 17 Gonne rejoined her father, who was once again stationed in Ireland. Gonne moved among the circles of Dublin high society for the next three years until her father's death in 1886.

In 1887 Gonne returned to France where she began a relationship with the radical politician and journalist Lucien Millevoye that would last until 1899. She would bear him two children: George (b. 1890), who died in infancy, and Iseult (1894–1954). Millevoye enlisted Gonne's help in support of the Boulangist cause – a French nationalist movement of somewhat right-wing character that aimed at restoring the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine to France – and he encouraged her to work for the Irish nationalist cause as well. At a meeting of the Contemporary Club, an informal debate society in Dublin that included prominent nationalist intellectuals, Gonne was introduced to Fenian leader John O'Leary. O'Leary urged her to read all that she could about Irish history and literature in order to begin lecturing in support of Irish independence.

As a woman, Gonne was denied membership in the Contemporary Club and other nationalist organizations, including the Celtic Literary Society and the National League. The latter had replaced the then-defunct Land League and was overseeing a Plan of Campaign in rural Ireland. Funds and morale were low, however, and mass evictions threatened in the wake of an agricultural depression. Tim Harrington, a member of parliament and the head of the National League, recognized the value of Gonne's talents as a propagandist. Although Gonne's gender barred her from full membership in the National League, Harrington sent her to Donegal to raise awareness of the plight of evicted tenants. Gonne wrote countless letters to newspapers and cared for the sick in her small hotel room. She also helped resurrect the practice of building Land League huts for the homeless.

Gonne's experience in Donegal deepened her commitment to Irish nationalism and instilled in her both a deep-rooted hatred of the landlord class and a disdain for parliamentary politics, which seemed to her to be accomplishing little of value. She regarded the British presence in Ireland as the root cause of Ireland's problems and dedicated herself to the cause of Irish independence. A warrant for her arrest in June 1890 forced Gonne to return to France where, after suffering the loss of her infant son, she embarked upon a lecture tour to raise awareness and funds for evicted tenants. In the early 1890s she also took up the cause of Irish political prisoners in English jails. She toured England and Scotland, and later America, speaking on behalf of the treason-felony prisoners and raising money for the Amnesty Association. When the Conservative government fell from power, the warrant for Gonne's arrest was cancelled and she was free to return to Ireland. After giving birth to her daughter Iseult in 1894, she continued to divide her time between Ireland and France. She launched the newspaper L'Irlande Libre in 1897 to promote Irish nationalism on the Continent and, with the help of the poet and dramatist William Butler Yeats, with whom she had a tumultuous affair, she founded a Paris branch of a group called Young Ireland in emulation of the mid-nineteenth-century nationalist movement of that name.

Frustrated by the lack of access that women had to nationalist organizations in Ireland, Gonne founded Inghinidhe na hEireann in 1900 and became its first president. Among other things the Inghinidhe offered free classes in Irish history, language, and culture for the children of Dublin. It also staged propagandist nationalist pageants; most famously, Gonne played the title role in Yeats's Kathleen Ni Houlihan (1902). Inghinidhe na hEireann also produced a monthly journal, Bean na hEireann (The Irish Woman), to which Gonne contributed numerous articles on both nationalist and feminist topics.

While busy launching Inghinidhe na hEireann, Gonne also chaired the Irish Transvaal Committee, an organization aimed at discouraging Irish men from enlisting in the British army during the Boer War. It was through her anti-recruitment activities that Gonne met Major John MacBride, the head of an Irish Brigade organized to fight on behalf of the Boers. Gonne and MacBride toured America together to raise support for the Irish Brigade. The two were married in 1903 and gave birth to a son, Sean MacBride, the following year. The marriage quickly disintegrated, however, and after an acrimonious separation in 1905, Gonne spent most of her time exiled in France with young Sean. She continued to campaign for Irish nationalism and for various social programs, including the feeding of Dublin schoolchildren.

At the outset of World War I Gonne worked as a Red Cross nurse in Argelès. Following John MacBride's execution for his part in the Easter Rising of 1916, Gonne returned to Ireland with her son. She spent nearly six months in Holloway Gaol in 1918 for leading an anti-conscription campaign. During the Irish War of Independence Gonne worked with the White Cross to assist victims of the war and their dependents. Following the signing of the 1921 treaty, which Gonne ultimately opposed, she and Charlotte Despard established the Women's Prisoners' Defense League (WPDLe) to help Republican prisoners and their families. As a result of her involvement with the WPDLe, Gonne was again arrested in 1923, this time by the Irish Free State, and joined other prominent female prisoners on a hunger strike.

Gonne remained an outspoken republican and prisoners' rights advocate throughout the remainder of her life. In 1932 she became the chair of the Indian-Irish Independence League.

Six years later Gonne joined the Anti-Partition League and published her autobiography, A Servant of the Queen (1938). Maud Gonne died on April 27, 1953, and was buried in the Republican Plot in Glasnevin Cemetery, Dublin.

Gorbachev, Mikhail (b. 1931)

Luke Perry

Mikhail Gorbachev rose from meager beginnings to become one of the most powerful figures in an international system dominated by the Cold War. A pivotal figure in domestic and international politics, Gorbachev's legacy will be debated for decades; however, there is no denying his significance in the course of Russian history and the end of the Cold War.

Gorbachev was born on March 2, 1931 in the village of Privolnoye in southwestern Russia. Born to a peasant family, Gorbachev began working on a state farm at 13 and joined the Communist Youth League at 15. After graduating high school, Gorbachev studied law at Moscow State University, graduating in 1955. In addition to his law degree, he took correspondence courses from Stavropol Agricultural Institute, culminating in a second degree in agricultural economics in 1967.

Gorbachev returned home after graduation and began working for the Communist Party. By 1970 he held the highest post in Stavropol, one of the largest and most economically significant territories in Russia. This was the same year Gorbachev was named a member of the CPSU (Communist Party of the Soviet Union) Central Committee. Gorbachev moved to Moscow in 1978 after becoming a Central Committee secretary.

Originally responsible for Soviet agriculture, he was soon involved in a variety of policy areas and became a full member of the Politburo (political bureau) in 1980. Five years later he became general secretary of the Party Central Committee, making him the youngest member in the Politburo at the time.

The Soviet Union was characterized by economic underdevelopment at home and significant power abroad. According to Valerie Bunce (1993), no previous leader sought to address the gap between domestic weaknesses and projected international strength. Gorbachev's development strategy was embodied in three concepts: glasnost (openness), perestroika (restructuring), and demokratizatsiia (democratization). Richard Kelley (1999) argues that each was purposely utilized as a political weapon: these weapons sought "to mobilize the intelligentsia that had given up hope of reform or meaningful involvement in public life, to reassure the dissident community that had been pushed aside or worse in the Brezhnev years, and to win the support of the general public that had soured on the fiction of Soviet democracy and the promise of a better life." Gorbachev, more than any other political actor, was responsible for the pluralization of the Soviet political system.

1989 was a watershed year. While Gorbachev promised material improvement, there was a reversion to food rationing. Technological divisions between the Soviet Union and industrial capitalist countries had widened in all sectors but weapons procurement. Agriculture was so inefficient that food imports constituted 40 percent of hard currency expenditures. These and other social ills precipitated a state of economic emergency. Gorbachev suddenly faced "two life-or-death alternatives: either abandon the reforms or make them more radical"; abandoning reforms was never seriously considered.

Nationalist dissent rose throughout the Soviet republics. Political leaders convinced citizens that respective national problems could not be effectively addressed without greater economic and administrative reforms. The KGB stopped arresting citizens for unlawful dissent. A moderately independent press slowly emerged. Many republics created democratically elected presidencies and legislatures, though the degree of democracy varied from region to region. Every country east of the Elbe River was communist at the beginning of 1989. By the end of the year, just one country, Albania, was still communist. In February of 1990 Gorbachev sought approval from the Congress of People's Deputies for multi-party politics, which was ratified in April of that year.

In January 1991, 15 people were killed when Soviet Special Forces in Lithuania overran a Vilnius television tower in an attempt to deter separatist ambitions. Determined to preserve territorial integrity in the USSR, Gorbachev organized a public referendum in March that asked: Do you consider necessary the preservation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics as a renewed federation of equal sovereign republics in which the rights and freedom of the individual of any nationality will be guaranteed? The vote included a second referendum that proposed the creation of a Russian presidency. This was even more popular than preserving the Union. On June 12, 1991 Boris Yeltsin became the first publicly elected president of Russia. Yeltsin was concerned that if the Communist Party did not adapt to changing political attitudes, they would be dealt a total historical defeat.

Gorbachev orchestrated a new Union treaty that would grant greater autonomy to regional governments. The treaty was accepted in principle by the Central Committee, but was not signed because of an attempted coup by prominent Soviet leaders, including the prime minister, the vice president, and the head of the KGB, who feared the treaty would dismantle the Soviet Union. Gorbachev was held in isolation while coup leaders declared him incapable of fulfilling his duties and implemented a state of emergency. A major setback to the coup was their failure to test the loyalty of Pavel Grachev, the chief of military operations. When put to the test, Grachev refused to abandon Gorbachev and Yeltsin. This enabled Yeltsin to organize an impromptu rally at the White House. Tens of thousands of Russians gathered as Yeltsin famously climbed on one of the tanks and from an exposed position declared his opposition to the coup. Unwilling to be responsible for significant casualties, the coup ended shortly thereafter.

Gorbachev returned to Moscow severely discredited. Though Gorbachev refused to blame the CPSU, the general secretary reluctantly agreed to dissolve the party under pressure from Yeltsin. The coup had fundamentally changed the USSR with Yeltsin, not Gorbachev, emerging atop the political hierarchy. Gorbachev sought to redraft the Union treaty, but these efforts unraveled when Ukraine supported a referendum for independence on December 1, 1991. The Commonwealth of Independent States was formed days later as a loose association of states who shared a commitment to economic coordination. Gorbachev resigned on December 25, 1991 and at midnight, December 31, 1991 the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics came to an end.

Although Gorbachev struggled to avoid the disintegration of the Soviet Union, it was the natural outcome of policies that he and his administration implemented. By embracing democratization, Gorbachev permitted the articulation and defense of dissent, which forever altered the centralized nature of the Soviet system. The Soviet political process was never in line with western conceptions of democracy, even though both the Soviet Union and the Russian Federation shared formal elements of democracy, such as constitutions, elections, and institutions that meant very little in terms of a competitive political system with representative government. The key question after 1991 was if and how the system would change.

Gorbachev remained politically active during the subsequent two decades. The former Soviet leader undertook an unsuccessful presidential bid in 1996, and founded the now-defunct Social Democratic Party of Russia in 2001. In the private realm, Gorbachev created the Gorbachev Foundation in 1992 to provide in-depth analysis of evolving social, economic, and political developments, and the Green Cross in 1993 to deal with environmental consequences of war. He was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1990 for his leading role in the Cold War peace process, which according to the committee opened new possibilities for the world community to solve its pressing problems across ideological, religious, historical, and cultural divides.

Gordon “No Popery” Riots, Britain, 1780

Colin Haydon

The Gordon Riots, which resulted from anti-Catholic tensions, were some of the most serious riots in eighteenth-century England. In 1778 Parliament passed the first Catholic Relief Act, curtailing various provisions of the persecuting English penal code. Soon afterwards, a Protestant Association, demanding the measure’s repeal, was founded under the leadership of Lord George Gordon (1751–93), an eccentric MP from a Scottish noble family. Petitions for the Relief Act’s repeal were raised in London and the English provinces. In Scotland petitions inveighed against a proposed relief bill for that country; and, early in 1779, rioting in Edinburgh and Glasgow ensured the abandonment of the planned legislation.

London followed suit with massive “No Popery!” rioting from June 2–8, 1780. It began when 60,000 “Protestants” marched to Westminster and Gordon presented to Parliament London’s petition – boasting 44,000 signatures – for the Relief Act’s repeal. There were scuffles in Palace Yard and some MPs and Lords were jostled. The crowd dispersed from Westminster in the evening, but later the chapels of the Bavarian and Sardinian embassies were burnt. Attacks followed on subsequent days on other Catholic chapels and Catholic schools, businesses, and homes. A crowd wrecked the Bloomsbury house of Lord Mansfield, a prominent supporter of Catholic relief. The scope of the riots quickly widened. At Newgate a mob released the prisoners and burnt the gaol. Prisoners were released from the Fleet prison, part of which was then fired, as were the King’s Bench prison, the New Gaol, Southwark, and the toll houses on Blackfriars Bridge. At the height of the violence an unsus-cessful assault was launched on the Bank of England. There were also demonstrations and disturbances in the provinces – at Bath, Birmingham, Hull, and Newcastle upon Tyne. In some places there were false alarms or anticipated rioting was prevented.

Eventually, the military suppressed the riots. Despite the riots, Parliament did not repeal the Relief Act; and it passed a comparable measure for Scotland in 1793. Gordon was tried for high treason in 1781, but was acquitted. Twenty-five rioters were hanged; others were imprisoned or whipped. The Gordon Riots appalled contemporaries, who called for a strengthening of the forces of authority.

Gori, Pietro (1865–1911)

Franco Bertolucci

Pietro Gori was born in Messina, Italy on August 14, 1865. He was a lawyer, writer, and poet, but above all he was one of the most important leaders of Italian and international anarchism from the end of the nineteenth century to the beginning of the twentieth. While studying in Pisa, he became an anarchist and wrote political pamphlets, one of which, “Pensieri ribelli” (Rebel Thoughts) (1889), became famous because of his subsequent arrest and trial. On May 1, 1890, after a demonstration of workers in Livorno, Gori and other students and workers were arrested. He was sent to the prisons of Livorno and Lucca, finally being released in 1890. In 1891, he took part in the congress to create the Revolutionary Anarchist Socialist Party, along with other anarchist leaders such as Errico Malatesta. In December the same year, he founded the magazine L'Amico del popolo (The People's Friend), which was forced to close after six issues. Gori wrote for many anarchist magazines and translated the Communist Party manifesto. He also published poetry in Prigioni e battaglie (Prisons and Battles). During a conference in 1892, he expounded anarchism's critical position regarding authoritarian socialism. During a national congress the same year, he defended, along with Galleani, the anti-parliament faction's intransigent position against reformist socialists. He was expelled with Cipriani from the congress of the Socialist International. On July 8, 1894, a few days before the approval of Crispi's laws against anarchists, Gori went to Lugano, escaping the libelous theory that linked him with the outrage of Caserio against the French president, Carnot.

In Lugano Gori became an important point of reference for anarchist exiles, which led to his and other anarchists' expulsion. “Addio a Lugano” (Farewell to Lugano), a song about this situation, was written by Gori in prison and became very popular. After traveling to Germany he went to Belgium, where he met Elisée Reclus, and then to Amsterdam, where he met Domela Nieuwenhuis, finally settling in London, where he remained in contact with the most important anarchist leaders (Kropotkin, Michel, Malato, Faure, and Malatesta).

His public speaking abilities were impressive: traveling around the United States he gave many conferences, the most famous of which, “Il vostro ordine, il nostro disordine” (Your Order, Our Disorder), took place in San Francisco. On returning to London, Gori participated in the Third Congress of the Workers' International. After the exclusion of several anarchists from the congress, Gori signed a document protesting the attempt made by the social democrats to gain hegemony over the international workers' movement.

After being treated at the National Hospital in London Gori returned to Italy and regained contact with the anarchist movement. He supported the idea of acting with the working-class parties to defend their rights and freedoms, but he also opposed any kind of government. The unrest that followed the rising price of bread forced him to leave Italy. He went to Buenos Aires and opened a legal office with Antonio Riva, another anarchist lawyer. In Buenos Aires he wrote and printed La nostra Utopia (Our Utopia), a synthesis of his political thought, written after the murder of Umberto I by Gaetano Bresci and the severe attacks on anarchists by Giovanni Bovio. In November 1898 he directed and published the magazine Criminologia moderna (Modern Criminology). While in Latin America he gave conferences in Uruguay, Paraguay, Patagonia, and Chile; his powerful oratory brought many workers close to the anarchist movement and helped give rise to the Federacion Obrera Argentina in May 1901.

Owing to an amnesty and because of his health problems Gori returned to Italy, where he edited the magazine Il Pensiero (Thought) with Luigi Fabbri. In November 1905 he took part in a revolutionary syndicalist meeting in Bologna where he expressed the need for a strongly unified working class. On November 14, 1909, in Portoferraio, he made his last speech, a commemoration of Francisco Ferrer. He died two years later in Portoferraio. His funeral lasted three days, during which workers from all over Tuscany paid their last respects to the poet of anarchy.

Gorz, André (1923–2007)

Nichole Shippen

André Gorz was a western social philosopher whose work combines the insights of Marxism, existentialism, and ecology. Gorz is predominantly known for his politics of autonomous free time, and his reinvigoration of socialism with what he viewed as the inherent anti-capitalist politics of the ecology movement. André Gorz was born in Vienna in 1923 to a Catholic mother and a Jewish father. Educated in Switzerland at the Institut Montana boarding school and at the University of Lausanne, Gorz subsequently moved to Paris in his early twenties, and later acted as a political editor for Les Temps Modernes, a French political and literary journal founded by Jean-Paul Sartre and Simone de Beauvoir.

In his early work, Gorz concentrated primarily on “workerism” (e.g., worker control, workers’ councils, self-management); however, the redivision of labor under advanced capitalism greatly undermined his confidence in the workplace as a place of democratic possibilities. Gorz believed early on that the new class of technological experts would act as the radical vanguard for the mass of workers, only to recognize later that the new division of labor ultimately created a distinctive hierarchy among the workers and further contributed to the alienation felt by all workers.

In contrast to orthodox Marxists, Gorz moved to a post-Marxism position in the mid-1960s. He reprioritized individual emancipation by increasing the sphere of autonomy outside of wage work, arguing that consumerism and work no longer gave existential meaning to people’s lives and that dissatisfaction logically manifested itself in the form of demands for higher wages.

As outlined in Farewell to the Working Class (1980), Gorz was very focused on the politics of time. He argued that with the increase in part-time and temporary work, it has become possible for society as a whole to work fewer hours, which in turn offers the potential to enlarge the sphere of autonomous work versus heteronomous work or work for economic ends. Gorz was also one of the first theorists to fuse socialism and ecology; in Ecology as Politics (1975), he declared that the lifestyles of excessive consumerism and “built-in obsolescence” lead to excessive waste and contribute to the decline of the environment. Gorz further identified the affinity between capitalism and Marxism in their promotion of industrial productivity (albeit for different ends), but recognized early on that economic growth arguments fail to consider that resources could be more equitably distributed. In 2007, Gorz and his wife Dorine committed suicide together in France, after his wife’s prolonged illness.

Gouges, Olympe de (1745–1793)

Karen Offen

Olympe de Gouges, playwright, pamphleteer, opponent of black slavery, and advocate of women's rights, is best known for her Declaration of the Rights of Woman (1791). Born Marie Gouze in May 1745, officially to Anne-Olympe Mouisset and her husband in Montauban, she nevertheless claimed descent from a local noble. Indeed, scholars have since established, as Marie claimed and physical resemblance confirmed, that her mother's lover, Jean-Jacques LeFranc, Marquis de Pompignan, was very likely her real father.

In 1767, already widowed with a small son (Pierre Aubry, who subsequently became a French general), the young Marie Gouze moved to Paris where she reinvented herself as Olympe de Gouges and led a lively social existence. Well known in progressive literary and political circles in Paris, she published plays, a fictionalized autobiography, and during the French Revolution, many exuberant and patriotic pamphlets and broadsides. During the early years of the revolution (1789–91) de Gouges identified herself with the cause of constitutional monarchy. She supported the efforts of the Girondins and was on good terms with Condorcet, Mirabeau, and Brissot.

In September 1791 de Gouges published her best-remembered tract, "The Rights of Woman" (Droits de la femme). She deliberately followed the style and format of the celebrated Declaration of the Rights of Man (1789), and invoked its principles on behalf of the female sex. Her analysis of women's position was more radical than those of Condorcet, who had demanded women's admission to citizenship in 1790, or the English feminist Mary Wollstonecraft, whose Vindication of the Rights of Woman appeared in 1792.

De Gouges addressed all her political writings – including those on women – to royal patrons. In the Droits de la femme she called on the queen, Marie-Antoinette, to turn away from counter-revolutionary intrigue with foreign powers (especially Austria, then governed by the queen's brother, Joseph II) and to champion instead the cause of women, the better to lead a long overdue revolution in morals. "The revolution will occur," she wrote in the dedication, "only when all women are convinced of their deplorable fate and of the rights they have lost in society. Madame, support such a good cause, defend this unfortunate sex, and you will soon have one half the Kingdom on your side, along with at least one third of the other half."

The Droits de la femme opened with a challenge: "Men, are you capable of being just? It is a woman who asks you this question; at least you will not deny her this right. Tell me! Who has given you the sovereign authority to oppress my sex?" She quickly called for a national assembly of women – "mothers, daughters, sisters" – and drafted her Articles in the Preamble. The first of her 17 articles is: "Woman is born free and remains equal in rights to man. Social distinctions can be founded only on general utility." She also demanded that women be "equally admissible to all public offices, places, and employments" (Art. 6) and that, being equally liable for their crimes, women must have the right to speak out in public (Art. 10). Clearly mirroring Rousseau's Social Contract, she drafts a model marriage contract, which included a formula for legitimizing children "from whatever bed they might spring." She also advocated civil divorce. She took part in a number of revolutionary festivals, sometimes leading the women's processions. She published vitriolic polemics against the Jacobins Marat and Robespierre.

The Jacobins (who took control of the new French Republic in 1792–3) cracked down on women's political action as part of the Terror. In early November 1793, after a peremptory show trial, they guillotined de Gouges, making it unmistakably clear that the combination of her monarchist politics with her "unwomanly" behavior, especially her assertive campaign for women's equality, would no longer be tolerated. "She wanted to be a statesman, and it appears that the law has punished this conspiratrice for forgetting the virtues of her sex" (Feuille de salut public, Nov. 1793).

The reputation of Olympe de Gouges has been rehabilitated since the late twentieth century, and in 1993 a group of French feminists proposed that her remains be transported to the Pantheon in Paris. In 2003 Olivier Blanc published the most authoritative, deeply researched, and contextualized biography, a major update of his earlier efforts (1989 and 1981). This biography includes a complete bibliography of published works by Olympe de Gouges.

Gramsci, Antonio (1891–1937)

Paul Le Blanc

Antonio Gramsci was the foremost revolutionary Marxist theorist of the Communist Party of Italy, of which he was a founder, and an insightful critic of society, culture, and politics whose influence can be found among an incredibly large number of theorists, intellectuals, and activists both internationally and across the political spectrum.

Born on the island of Sardinia, Gramsci's early years were shaped by his family's economic distress – mainly because his father, a clerk in a state agency, had been suspended from service and put in jail for some misdoings related to his job. In his later years, Gramsci recalled that his poverty made him especially sensitive to social injustices.

Thanks to a scholarship, Gramsci was able to enter the University of Turin in 1911 and within two years became an activist within the Italian Socialist Party. In 1919 he helped to found a new weekly, L'Ordine Nuovo (New Order), which sought to apply the lessons of the 1917 Russian Revolution to Italy. This paper became the voice of militant factory workers who engaged in a general strike and factory occupations that in 1920 seemed to threaten the overturn of Italian capitalism and a workers' revolution. Socialist Party moderates who led the trade union movement quickly effected a compromise, however, which ended the strike, resulting in modest concessions for the workers and the continued (if temporary) survival of a liberal capitalist regime.

Frightened by the workers' militancy, however, the landed aristocracy and industrialists concluded that a right-wing counter-force was needed, and they poured substantial resources into the rising fascist movement led by Benito Mussolini. Disillusioned by the socialists selling out their principles, Gramsci and many others on the left end of the political spectrum concluded that a genuinely revolutionary workers' party was needed. The result was the foundation of the Italian Communist Party (PCI) in 1921.

Gramsci was one of the key figures of the PCI in the early 1920s, but he also worked for the Communist International (or Third International) in Moscow and Vienna in this period. The rise and succession of victories of the fascist movement was a major concern to Gramsci and his comrades, but there was no agreement on appropriate perspectives for the PCI. Gramsci developed a perspective that was an alternative to what he saw as a sectarian and ultra-left line represented by Amadeo Bordiga and also independent of the moderate line advanced by Angelo Tasca. His perspective became predominant in the PCI, and he was considered to be its central leader. His columns in the Communist daily L'Unità profoundly influenced and helped to educate his party's working-class base. Gramsci was elected to parliament in 1924, and at the Lyon national congress in January 1926, a party majority was won to Gramsci's positions (advanced with the support of Palmiro Togliatti). Later in the year, however, he was arrested as the fascists consolidated their dictatorship.

During his ten years in prison, where his health was finally broken, Gramsci was able to fill 34 thick notebooks with a remarkable range of political, socialist, historical, and cultural writings. The presence of fascist censors forced him to use code words and obscure formulations. The rising influence of Stalinism within the international communist movement – and his resistance to aspects of Stalinist ideology combined with a desire not to be isolated from that movement – also contributed to obscure and contradictory formulations. This is especially so due to a number of indications that his theoretical and political orientation was fundamentally incompatible with that which Stalin imposed.

Gramsci's impact on Italian intellectual life (and beyond) began after the fall of the Italian fascist regime of Mussolini and the conclusion of World War II. The Communist Party had achieved mass influence in Italy, and although, under the leadership of Togliatti, it had adapted to the Stalinist ethos dominant in the world communist movement, it referred strongly to Gramsci's memory. His prison letters were published first and won a wide readership – and this was followed by initial editions of his Prison Notebooks, under the direct supervision of Togliatti. Only in the 1970s did a more authoritative critical edition become available.

“Open Marxism”

Gramsci has been associated with a trend that has been given the misleading label of Western Marxism, associated with such different theorists as Georg Lukács, Karl Korsch, and also some thinkers affiliated with the Frankfurt School (including Max Horkheimer, Theodor Adorno, and Herbert Marcuse). The so-called Western Marxists shared in common a fairly sophisticated philosophical orientation, and also a tendency to reject the somewhat rigid interpretation of Marxism associated with many of the so-called orthodox Marxists of the Second International (or Socialist International) of 1889–1914 – an interpretation which tended to view “subjective” cultural and political factors as being merely reflections of “objective” economic factors, and which also tended to argue that socialism would inevitably come into being through the working of “scientific laws” related to such objective factors.

It is certainly the case that Gramsci was profoundly influenced by the dialectical philosophical orientation of G. W. F. Hegel, popularized in Italy by Benedetto Croce and Antonio Labriola. Croce profoundly altered Hegel's philosophy in order to develop his own system, however, insisting that “Marxism is dead.” In contrast, Labriola emphasized Hegel's philosophy as preliminary to Marxism, a quite sophisticated version of which he advanced through his esteemed position as a university professor.

Gramsci rejected so-called orthodox Marxism as a distortion of Marx's actual revolutionary orientation. “The overall vulgarization of Marxism,” according to Gramsci, has generally taken the form of “deterministic, mechanistic, fatalistic elements.” In his view, the common tendency among Marxists to hold that one or another aspect of capitalist development inevitably assigns to the mass of working-class individuals any specific consciousness (whether revolutionary or non-revolutionary) is highly problematical. “We should, I think, prepare a funeral elegy on the concept of fatalism,” Gramsci concluded, “praising its usefulness in a certain historical period but burying it once for all – with full honors.”

As a Marxist, Gramsci saw future possibilities as being conditioned by past and present “objective” economic and social realities. But his thought was also alive to multiple possibilities – grounded in the understanding that not only are “objective” factors too complex and fluid to be fully grasped in analysis, but that the consciousness and actions of human beings (especially when informed by revolutionary theory and focused through effective organization) can alter the “objective” factors.

Consequently, Gramsci gave one of his first articles about the 1917 Russian Revolution the provocative title “The Revolution Against Capital.” Here he was not referring to the revolution against capitalism, the common position of all socialists, but rather a challenge to a dogmatic understanding of Marx's classic work Capital. This was because that revolution took place in a country where capitalism was very much underdeveloped and the working class a small minority in a predominantly peasant country. He asserted that “events have exploded the critical schema determining how the history of Russia would unfold according to the canons of historical materialism” – although adding that, in fact, “the canons of historical materialism are not so rigid as . . . has been thought.”

In the 1920s a remarkable example of Gramsci's supple interpretation of Marxism emerged in an essay analyzing realities of “Americanism and Fordism” from his prison in Fascist Italy. He rejected the notion, common among Marxists, that somehow political developments in the United States lagged behind those in Europe. Instead, he prophetically suggested that US developments – particularly the efficiencies of the assembly line and high-wage consumerism (associated with innovations of industrialist Henry Ford), and the manipulative and seemingly classless form that “democratic” politics had taken in the US – might show “advanced” Europe aspects of its own future.

He stressed the implications for Europe of the socioeconomic development of US capitalism. He wrote of “an ultra-modern form of production and of working methods” in which industrial and commercial life, freed from “parasitic sedimentations” of Europe’s pre-capitalist traditions, is able to develop on “a sound basis,” allowing increased efficiency and productivity. “These economies affected production costs and permitted higher wages and lower selling prices,” combined with “various social benefits” and “extremely subtle ideological and political propaganda” in promoting capitalism among the workers. Also involved, however, were greater ideological, cultural, and social controls over the working class – especially control over the labor process through which capitalists “maintain the continuity of the physical and muscular-nervous efficiency of the worker.” Gramsci raised the possibility that “America, through the implacable weight of its economic production . . . will compel or is already compelling Europe to overturn its excessively antiquated economic and social basis,” thereby generating “‘a new culture’ and ‘new way of life’ which are being spread around under the American label.”

The Modern Prince

As both a revolutionary and as a prisoner in a fascist prison, Gramsci was naturally interested in the question of political power. Steeped in Italian history and cultural traditions, he turned to the classic text The Prince by Niccolò Machiavelli (1469–1527), foremost political theorist of the Italian Renaissance, for the purpose of theorizing the question of political power in modern times. Like Machiavelli, Gramsci conducted his examination in a manner that superficially seems chillingly amoral. Politics is a science that can serve heroes and villains, progressives and reactionaries, democrats and authoritarians, those bent on self-defense and those bent on murder and theft – the goals of emancipation of Marx and Lenin, but also the despotic designs of Mussolini and Stalin.

Like Machiavelli, Gramsci sees the key to politics as the question of leadership: “The first element is that there really do exist rulers and ruled, leaders and led. The entire science and art of politics are based on this primordial and (given certain general conditions) irreducible fact.” A difference between Machiavelli and Gramsci lies in the phrase “given certain general conditions.” These are the conditions of modern class society, that have not always existed and – as a Marxist – Gramsci believes can and must be overcome. As he puts it: “In the formation of leaders, one premise is fundamental: is it the intention that there should always be rulers and ruled, or is it the objective to create the conditions under which this division is no longer necessary?”

Another difference between Machiavelli and Gramsci is that the theorist of the Middle Ages believed that leadership would be provided by individual heroes or villains – princes – whereas Gramsci believed that the modern prince must be collective and can only be a political party. As he notes, “the formation of the party system” involves “an historical phase linked to the standardization of broad masses of the population (communications, newspapers, big cities, etc.)”

In Gramsci’s discussion there are a variety of ambiguities, deriving from several problems. One is his desire to elude the watchful eyes of various censors – certainly those of his fascist jailers, but also, potentially, some of his own comrades in the Italian Communist Party who were coming under the powerful and intolerant influence of Stalinism (the rigid ideology associated to the dictatorship crystallizing in Soviet Russia and the international communist movement). Intertwined with this is the fact that he is dealing, more or less, with all political parties of modern times. Consequently, it is sometimes unclear whether he is talking about a fascist party; a more or less democratic-republican bourgeois or petty-bourgeois party, whether of liberal or conservative persuasion; a reformist social democratic party; or a communist party (and if the latter, one that is healthy or one that is infected with bureaucratic or sectarian tendencies).

It is possible that certain contradictions are consciously and provocatively advanced. For example, he asserts that “the counting of ‘votes’ is the final ceremony of a long process, in which it is precisely those who devote their best energies to the State and the nation (when such they are) who carry the greatest weight” – but then he goes on to say that “the historical rationality of numerical consensus is systematically falsified by the influence of wealth.” From this point, Gramsci moves immediately to a veiled discussion of an expansive, revolutionary democracy – based on governance by working-class councils (the Russian term being soviets) in which, as he puts it, political life moves beyond “the canons of formal democracy,” and “the people’s consent does not end at the moment of voting,” but rather also involves active participation in implementing the decisions, giving new life and deeper meaning (or, away from the censor’s watchful eye, what he might have called proletarian content) to the idea of self-government.

This relates to Gramsci’s remarks about “that determinate party, which has the aim of founding a new type of State (and which was rationally and historically created for that end).” From his 1921 mini-essay “Real Dialectics” we can see that Gramsci unambiguously viewed the Italian Communist Party in this light, emerging from lessons that were learned from momentous events, “the real dialectics of history,” by growing numbers of individuals who are part of “the worker and peasant masses.” While he makes reference in The Modern Prince to this party’s “inevitable progress to State power, however, he was convinced that victory would also be dependent on the revolutionary party developing in a manner that linked it organically to the laboring masses. He is critical of so-called parties (which certainly include left-wing sects) made up of “‘volunteers,’ and in a certain sense of declassés” that “have never or almost never represented homogeneous social blocs,” but are instead “the political equivalent of gypsy bands or nomads.”

To understand the nature of a genuinely revolutionary party, Gramsci speculates on how the history of such an organization might be written. “A simple narrative of the internal life of a political organization” – focusing on the first groups that bring it into being, “the ideological controversies through which its program and conception of the world” are formed – will provide only an account of “certain intellectual groups” or even “the political biography of a single personality,” but will not provide an adequate understanding of the political party. To develop such an understanding, much more is required:

The history will have to be written of a particular mass of men who have followed the founders of the party, sustained them with their trust, loyalty and discipline, or criticized then “realistically” by dispersing or remaining passive before certain initiatives. But will this mass be made up solely of members of the party? Will it be sufficient to follow the congresses, the votes, etc., that is to say the whole nexus of activities and modes of existence through which the mass following of the party manifests its will? Clearly it will be necessary to take some account of the social group of which the party in question is the expression and the most advanced element. The history of a party, in other words, can only be the history of a particular social group. But this group is not isolated; it has friends, kindred groups, opponents, enemies. The history of any given party can only emerge from the complex portrayal of the totality of society and State (often with international ramifications too). Hence it may be said that to write the history of a party means nothing less than to write the general history of a country from a monographic viewpoint, in order to highlight a particular aspect of it. A party will have had greater or less significance and weight precisely to the extent to which its particular activity has been more or less decisive in determining a country’s history.

The richness of Gramsci’s discussion is deepened as he takes up a variety of questions. This includes an examination of different layers within the party: the “mass element” of “ordinary, average” members, who are essential to the organization’s existence but who by themselves cannot ensure the party’s existence; the experienced, knowledgeable, and “innovative” layer constituting the party’s leadership, whose qualities make it the essential ingredient to the party’s existence; and “an intermediate element” of party militants who provide the crucial physical, intellectual, and moral interconnections between the other two layers. The cohesion (or “centralism”) of the party is dependent on a so-called “policing” function that can either be educational, progressive, and democratic or repressive, reactionary, and bureaucratic. “The problem of assimilating the entire grouping to its most advanced fraction” is an educational problem that is threatened by the “danger of becoming bureaucratized.”

Related to this is Gramsci’s discussion of spontaneity. Gramsci insists that “pure” spontaneity does not exist in history, “that every ‘spontaneous’ movement contains rudimentary elements of conscious leadership, of discipline.” At the same time, it is not possible for “modern theory [Marxism] to be in opposition to the ‘spontaneous’ feelings of the masses.” Nonetheless, he sees “spontaneity” as an ideologically contested terrain, with the possibility of either “progressive” or “regressive” outcomes, and often involving “bizarre combinations.” The revolutionary theoretician (and revolutionary party) must “unravel these in order to discover fresh proof of [revolutionary] theory, to ‘translate’ into theoretical language the elements of historical life.” But he warned that “it is not reality which should be expected to conform to the abstract schema,” and that it is a mistake to see “as real and worthwhile only such movements of revolt as are one hundred per cent conscious, i.e., movements that are governed by plans worked out in advance to the last detail or in line with abstract theory.”

The appropriate interplay of spontaneous upsurges with conscious revolutionary organization, in Gramsci’s opinion, can only be found in democratic centralism, which is, so to speak, a “centralism” in movement – i.e., a continual adaptation of the organization of the real movement, a matching of thrusts from below with orders from above, a continuous insertion of elements thrown up from the depths of the rank and file into the solid framework of the leadership apparatus which ensures continuity and the regular accumulation of experience.

Hegemony, Maneuver, Position

Elaborating on insights developed in discussions of the early congresses of the Communist International, Gramsci developed innovative analyses regarding a contest between the cultural, ideological, and political hegemony (predominance) of the capitalist class and that of the working class – both in relation to the state (institutions through which laws are formulated and enforced) and civil society (formally organized social and cultural institutions interconnected with and helping to shape the norms of everyday life outside of the realm of state coercion). Gramsci followed Lenin, Trotsky, and others in emphasizing important differences between revolutionary options and dynamics in “backward” Russia and “advanced” Western Europe.

“In the advanced capitalist countries,” he noted in 1926 (before being imprisoned), “the ruling class possesses political and organizational reserves which it did not possess, for instance, in Russia.” The result was that “even the most serious economic crises do not have immediate repercussions in the political sphere,” enabling the ruling class-dominated state “in organizing greater forces loyal to the regime than the depth of the crisis might lead one to suppose.” This is related to the class (in this case the capitalist class) believing in and having the capacity to persuade broad social layers of the legitimacy of its leadership and the validity of its worldview (ideology) through a variety of social and cultural mechanisms. In Western Europe, where capitalism had developed and thrived over far more extended periods than was the case in less capitalistically developed areas such as Russia, the bourgeois penetration and permeation of civil society was far more developed and intensive. This would have implications for the revolutionary strategy and tactics of the working-class movement.

In his prison notebooks Gramsci gave considerable attention to such matters. “If the ruling class has lost its consensus, i.e., is no longer ‘leading’ but only ‘dominant,’ exercising coercive force alone, this means precisely that the great masses have become detached from their traditional ideologies, and no longer believe what they used to believe previously.” This by itself would not be sufficient, however, to lead – contrary to the naïve hopes of some on the left – to any automatic replacement of capitalism with a bright socialist future. If “the old way is dying and the new cannot be born,” then it is likely that “a great variety of morbid symptoms” would appear, which is how he saw the rise of fascism in postwar Italy. Bourgeois hegemony as well as the “morbid symptoms” could only be overcome if the working-class movement was able to develop itself as a viable alternative in the eyes of substantial social layers – but this must involve opening “the struggle for an autonomous and superior culture” which would enable the working class to become “really autonomous and hegemonic, thus bringing into being a new form of State” and generating “the concrete birth of a need to construct a new intellectual and moral order, that is, a new type of society.”

Utilizing military analogies, Gramsci contrasted a political war of position with a political war of maneuver. A war of maneuver involves a direct assault on the enemy's positions and fortifications, a "final conflict" launched with the intention of winning an absolute victory, with (in this case) the working-class movement coming to power. But such an assault could be a disastrous failure in an advanced capitalist society, whose "fortifications" involved not only the institutions of the state, but also a cultural and ideological predominance within civil society. Preliminary to any hoped-for triumph in the "final conflict," the working-class movement would have to engage in something akin to a more protracted trench warfare – a war of position – that would increasingly narrow, isolate, and make vulnerable the terrain occupied by capitalist forces.

There must be extended struggles and multifaceted movement-building around immediate, democratic, and transitional demands, involving a variety of united fronts and alliances, undergirded with broad and multi-level socialist education. Through these methods the revolutionary party could establish strong positions on the social, cultural, and political field that would enable it to triumph over the powerful positions of the bourgeoisie when – through economic crises and other crises – revolutionary situations developed.

Some interpretations of Gramsci's thought on the political left argue that his discussions of gradually building up working-class "hegemony" and conducting a "war of attrition" against capitalism (as opposed to a revolutionary "frontal assault") anticipated the reformist Popular Front policies advanced by the mainstream of the communist movement of the late 1930s and after. Some scholars have also argued that Gramsci's thought was so unique that it represented a qualitative shift away from the traditional revolutionary Marxist framework (and, particularly among some postmodernists, many of his notions are advanced independently of any political-activist connections). But Gramsci himself appears to view what he wrote as reflections developed very much within the Leninist political framework that he embraced unambiguously in the early 1920s.

Many Gramsci scholars would concur with the characterization of the man advanced by Carl Marzani, the first person to introduce Gramsci's thought to an English-speaking readership: "He is a Marxist in the great tradition of Marx himself, a thinker with an open mind, disciplined in the search for truth. . . . The deeper one's Marxism, the less one's dogmatism. . . . [Even in his last years] the thinking remains lucid, vigorous, trenchant, while the style continues posed and professional, spiced with humor, irony, and a genial twist of phrase."

Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo

Rita Arditti

In March 1976 a military junta in Argentina established a reign of terror over the country's population. By the end of the dictatorship in 1983, thousands of people had disappeared, primarily leftists, journalists, and political activists. Argentine government sources estimate about 9,000 disappeared, while human rights organizations estimate around 30,000. People were kidnapped, tortured in clandestine detention centers, and killed. The majority of the disappeared were between the ages of 16 and 35.

The relatives of the disappeared pressed the regime for justice and information about their loved ones. On April 30, 1977 a group of mothers gathered at the Plaza de Mayo in front of the presidential mansion, signaling the birth of their group, Madres de Plaza de Mayo (Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo). Some of them were looking for two missing generations: their children and grandchildren. On October 22, 1977, 12 of these women established what became known as Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo (Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo).

The majority of the children who disappeared were kidnapped with their parents or born in captivity in secret detention camps. Most of the pregnant women who were kidnapped were allowed to give birth and were killed afterwards. The Abuelas estimate that the number of missing children – the “living disappeared” – is about 500 (Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo 2007b). These children were given as war booty to families linked to the regime or abandoned, so that they would lose their identities. Separating the children from their families was a major strategy of the military, who believed that if the children grew up with their legitimate families they would end up hating the military.

The Abuelas became veritable detectives in the search for their grandchildren. They worked with forensic anthropologists to identify remains of the disappeared and asked scientists to develop a blood test that would show biological affiliation even when the parents of a child were dead. A grandparenthood test (with 99.99 percent accuracy) was soon developed and is now a standard procedure ordered by judges. In 1987 the Abuelas pressed the government to create a National Genetic Data Bank that would store the blood of relatives of the disappeared so that after their death it would still be possible to check the identity of the found children. The use of science to further human rights was the first of its kind and has since been applied in many other parts of the world (Arditti 1999).

The Abuelas conceptualized a new human right, the right to identity, which has been incorporated into the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, as part of articles 7, 8, and 11. The implications of the right to identity are vast and apply to illegal adoptions, trafficking of children, and other forms of oppression. As of March 2008, the Abuelas have found and identified 88 children. The organization and their president, Estela Barnes de Carlotto, have received numerous awards and recognition from governments, universities and institutes, international human rights organizations, and the United Nations.

Grass, Günter (b. 1927)

Stacy Warner Maddern

Born in 1927 in Danzig-Langfuhr to Polish German parents, Günter Grass is a political activist and writer whose work tends to be emotionally charged in reference to German guilt and the atrocities of the Nazis during World War II. In 1942, Grass was drafted into the Reichsarbeitsdienst (state labor service), and in November 1944 into the Waffen-SS. He would see combat with the 10th SS Panzer Division Frundsberg and was wounded on April 20, 1945. Shortly thereafter he was captured and sent to an American POW camp. Grass's involvement with the Waffen-SS would remain a secret until 2006, when the author disclosed it in an interview for his memoir Peeling the Onion.

After the war, Grass worked as a farm laborer and miner and studied art in Düsseldorf and Berlin. In 1955 he became a member of Gruppe 47, a literary association in Germany that sought to inform the public on democracy after the fall of Hitler. During occupation, Gruppe 47 would have its publishing license revoked by the Allied forces on grounds of nihilism. In 1959, Grass obtained international success with the novel The Tin Drum, which was followed by Cat and Mouse and Dog Years, to form what is called the Danzig Trilogy.

The Tin Drum is recognized as the most highly acclaimed novel of postwar Germany. The novel's hero, Oskar Matzerath, refuses to grow during the war and it is only afterward that he is hit with an onslaught of guilt. The narrative is viewed as a symbolic tract to expose the country's guilt. The novel is an expression of atonement, something Grass would consistently revisit throughout his literary career. In the 1960s Grass became active in politics, participating in election campaigns on behalf of the Social Democratic Party and Willy Brandt, for whom he was a speech writer. The content of his political speeches and essays advocated that Germany be free from fanaticism and totalitarian ideologies. In both The Flounder and The Rat, Grass was very critical of civilization and pressed his concern to promote peace and environmental movements.

Grass was largely critical of the United States during the Cold War, claiming: "There's no shortage of great Führer figures; a bigoted preacher in Washington and an ailing philistine in Moscow." He was especially ashamed to be from a country that considered the United States an ally. After visiting Nicaragua in 1982 he asked: "How impoverished must a country be if it is not a threat to the United States?" He was equally critical when it came to the unification of Germany, fearing that a quick-moving process would lead to the economic exploitation of the East by capitalists in the West.

At the age of 10, Grass joined the Jungvolk, an organization that recruited boys into the Hitler Youth, and by 17 he was a soldier in the Waffen-SS. When he finally acknowledged his involvement he was harshly criticized and accused of being a hypocrite. In his memoir Grass acknowledged: "What I had accepted with the stupid pride of youth I wanted to conceal after the war out of a recurrent sense of shame. But the burden remained, and no one could alleviate it." It was with a moral certainty that Grass held himself accountable. In his recollection of narrative symbols he acknowledges: "Even if an author eventually becomes dependent upon the characters he creates, he must answer for their deeds and misdeeds." While he may have tried to represent German guilt through a fictional tract, it was the consciousness of his own personal narrative that became the truest lesson of atonement. The work of Günter Grass represents a life subjected to turmoil by what is deemed national pride only to be self-realized in age by the consequences of collective guilt. What separates Grass from most is his acknowledgment of participatory crimes and a commitment to learn something from it.

Grassroots resistance to corporate globalization

Walden Bello

Crisis of Multilateralism

The World Trade Organization's first ministerial meeting, held in 1996 in Singapore, opened to an air of triumphalism, a sense among government delegates that corporate-driven globalization was the wave of the future. Mike Moore, the second director general of the organization, toasted the newly established WTO as the "jewel in the crown of multilateralism," and officials of the WTO, the International Monetary Fund (IMF), and the World Bank saw the remaining major task of global governance as the achievement of "coherence." All that was left to do, in their view, was to coordinate the neoliberal policies of the three institutions in order to ensure the smooth technocratic management of the global economy. Those who dissented from this view of the future were definitely a minority. Ten years later, the World Bank and the IMF held their annual meeting in Singapore behind the heavy protective shield of the Singaporean government, which banned possible dissidents from entering the country on various pretexts. Seemingly triumphant a decade before, corporate-driven globalization was in very deep crisis due to widespread resistance.

Several factors indicated crisis. First was the loss of legitimacy of the key multilateral institutions that serve as the political canopy of corporate-driven globalization. For one thing, the IMF was practically defunct. Knowing how the Fund precipitated and worsened the Asian financial crisis, more and more of the advanced developing countries began refusing to borrow from it or paid ahead of schedule, with some declaring their intention never to borrow again. These include Thailand, Indonesia, Brazil, and Argentina. Since the Fund's budget greatly depends on debt repayments from these big borrowers, this boycott is translating into a budget crisis, creating what Ngaire Woods, an Oxford University specialist on the Fund, describes as "a huge squeeze on the budget of the organization."

The World Bank, having been central to the debacle of structural adjustment policies that left most developing and transitional economies that implemented them in greater poverty, with greater inequality, and in a state of stagnation, also began suffering a crisis of legitimacy. Robin Broad, one of the leading experts on the Bank, claimed that the crisis of the Bank was really more profound than that of the Fund, but that careful publicity on the part of the Bank allowed the organization to hide the truth. Even with the publicity campaign, the Bank found more and more governments reluctant to borrow heavily from it. Since the Bank, like the Fund, is mainly supported from debt repayments, this led to a budget crisis as well.

Perhaps the crisis of legitimacy was most acute at the WTO. Talks among the so-called Group of Six collapsed in acrimony. A key reason for this was that developing country governments, under pressure from their citizenries, no longer wanted to open their agricultural markets to dumped goods from the European Union and the United States and to allow their manufacturing industries and services to be bankrupted or taken over by transnational corporations. The pro-free-trade American economist Fred Bergsten once compared trade liberalization and the WTO to a bicycle: they collapse when they are not moving forward, and things had ceased to move forward.

Dimensions of the Crisis of Globalization

Other deeper indicators began to reveal crisis in the globalist project. In the 1990s the writings of the globalists celebrated the emergence of a functionally integrated global economy, the so-called borderless world. Ten years later, despite runaway shops and outsourcing, what passed for an international economy was still a collection of national economies – interdependent no doubt, but economies whose dynamics were still largely determined by internal factors.

Also in the 1990s, advocates of globalization insisted that state policies no longer mattered and that corporations would soon dwarf states. A decade later, however, the European Union, the United States government, and the Chinese state were stronger than before. Moreover, state policies, such as industrial policy and trade policy – that is, interfering with the market in order to build up industrial structures or promote welfare policies – still made a difference. Indeed, interventionist government policies had spelled the difference between development and underdevelopment, prosperity and poverty. Malaysia's imposition of capital controls during the Asian financial crisis in 1997–8 prevented it from unraveling like Thailand or Indonesia. And it was also strict capital controls that insulated China from the economic collapse engulfing its neighbors.

Globalists also expected the emergence of a transnational capitalist elite that would manage the world economy. Indeed, this was a project of Bill Clinton and his Secretary of the Treasury Robert Rubin. The adoption of a strong dollar policy in the mid-1990s that would assist the recovery of the Japanese and German economies, even at the expense of US firms, was Washington's way of saying that it had the long-term strategic interests of global capital in mind. A strong dollar translated into cheaper Japanese and German products in the US and European markets relative to US products, thus acting as a boost to Japanese and German recovery, as Robert Brenner (2002) pointed out. But the Clinton project was aborted under Bush. The transnationalized fractions of the different national capitalist classes have been overwhelmed by the nationalist fractions, and what resulted was a system of national elites in sharp competition with one another. For instance, the US elite did not sign the Kyoto Protocol in order to get the European and Japanese elites to absorb most of the costs of global environmental adjustment and thus make US industry more competitive against them.

Causes of the Crisis

Three main factors led to this crisis. One was the preference of national capitalist classes for a strategy of shifting the burden of adjusting to the global crisis of overproduction and stagnation and the environmental crisis to each other rather than forging one common, cooperative response. A second factor has been the corrosive effects of the double standards displayed by the United States. While the Clinton administration tried to move the US toward free trade, the Bush administration preached free trade while practicing protectionism. Thirdly, there has been too much of a dissonance between the promise of globalization and free trade and the actual results of neoliberal policies, which have been more poverty, more inequality, and stagnation.

Perhaps the most critical factor in the collapse, however, has been people's resistance. The battles of Seattle in 1999, Prague in 2000, and Genoa in 2001, the massive global anti-war march on February 15, 2003, when the anti-globalization movement morphed into the global anti-war movement, Cancun in 2003, and Hong Kong in 2005 were critical junctures in the decade-long people's counter-offensive that has resulted in the equivalent of a Stalingrad for the neoliberal project. For over a decade before Seattle, the United Nations Development Program and other agencies had been publishing data showing the negative impact of Structural Adjustment Programs, neoliberal reforms, and corporate-driven globalization. However, these remained lifeless statistics that were largely ignored by the media, the academy, and policymakers that held on to faith-based assumptions about the beneficial impact of these measures and processes. Seattle, by bringing the message of the protestors so forcefully to world attention, turned abstract statistics into brutal facts. Paradoxically, Seattle made anti-globalization opinions respectable.

Down but not Out

Corporate-driven globalization entered a state of crisis, but it did not die. With things not moving at the WTO, the big trading powers put emphasis on free trade agreements (FTAs) or economic partnership agreements (EPAs) with developing countries. These agreements are in many ways more dangerous than the WTO since they often require greater concessions in terms of market access and tighter enforcement of intellectual property rights. Moreover, the massive flow of corporate investment from the US, Japan, and Europe to China continued, with the tremendously negative consequences for workers in these countries as well as workers in China.

When it comes to FTAs, however, people in the South became aware of their interests and began to resist. The Free Trade of the Americas (FTAA) was derailed by the opposition of key South American governments, under pressure from their citizenries, during the Mar del Plata conference in November 2005. Also, many people came out to resist Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra because of his rush to conclude a free trade agreement between the United States and Thailand. It was assumed that the flow of labor from the rural areas of China, where some 700 million Chinese make an average of $285 a year per capita, would ensure that wages would forever remain low and attractive to foreign capital. On the contrary, increasing resistance of migrant labor and peasants to the low wages, loss of land, and environmental poisoning has accompanied the foreign-capital intensive export-oriented model of growth. In 2004 the Public Security Bureau reported that the number of "mass incidents" had risen to 74,000. In 2005 the number jumped another 13 percent. All this resistance worried the leadership, and a "New Left" emerged and proposed hitching China's growth to the internal market. In order for that to happen, local wages would have to rise significantly to create consumers with purchasing power. That could mean the end of China as the nirvana of cheap labor and the haven of transnational corporations. This could also be accompanied by measures to take China on a more environmentally sustainable path.

The World Social Forum

The World Social Forum (WSF) was founded in Porto Alegre, Brazil in January 2001 as an alternative to neoliberalism. It served as the counterpoint to the World Economic Forum that was taking place in Davos, Switzerland and it elicited widespread enthusiasm in its early years. Proclaimed as an “open space,” the WSF became a magnet for global networks on many issues, providing a place where they could come together, compare notes, and debate. Soon, regional versions of the WSF were spun off, the most important being the European Social Forum and the African Social Forum. The direct democratic experiences of Seattle, Prague, Genoa, and the other big mobilizations of the decade, then, were institutionalized in the WSF or Porto Alegre process.

Greece, anti-dictatorship protests

Loudovikos Kotsonopoulos

After a prolonged period of political instability in Greece, a small group of middle-ranking Greek army officers staged a successful coup d’état, under the auspices of the CIA, on April 21, 1967. Although signs of army interference in politics were omnipresent throughout the 1960s, there were no resistance activities against the military putsch on the part of the country’s political forces. Only after the establishment of the junta’s military regime did the first cells of resistance begin to emerge. At the outset was the creation of Democratic Defense (Δημοκρατική Άμυνα), a resistance group that comprised mainly prominent members of the academic community as well as liberal center-leftist intellectuals.

Subsequently, a group of political cadres and youth leaders associated with the left-wing party Union of the Democratic Left (EDA; ΕΔΑ), which since 1951 had acted as a proxy for the clandestine Greek Communist Party stationed at Bucharest, formed the Patriotic Anti-Dictatorship Front (PAM; ΠΑΜ) on April 30, 1967. Certain fragments of the liberal Center Union (Ενώση Κέντρου) party supporters also joined the resistance movement by founding various organizations such as the National Movement of Democratic Defense (EKDA; ΕΚΔΑ) and the National Resistance (Εθνική Αντίσταση). The aforementioned organizations formed the backbone of the early resistance movement. Their principal aim was to call into question the credo that the military regime was the unanimously recognized guardian of law and order. Hence the activities of this early wave of resistance were directed toward dynamic actions against carefully selected targets in order to pinpoint the weaknesses of the regime. In this respect, Democratic Defense launched a series of bomb attacks mainly against targets of American interests. Targets included an American Express branch, numerous cars belonging to US military staff, and gas stations belonging to the ESSO-Pappas refinery. According to the public prosecutor in the trial of the organization, which took place in April 1970, Democratic Defense launched 19 bombing attacks with no civilian casualties other than five lightly wounded. However, the most spectacular act of resistance came from the centrist National Resistance on August 13, 1968, when Alexandros Panagoulis staged an unsuccessful attempt against the life of the regime's top man, George Papadopoulos. The left-wing PAM, on the other hand, directed its activities toward the distribution of leaflets, slogan painting, and implantation of concealed loudspeakers booming out anti-dictatorship slogans. Later on, as a token of radicalization, it formed a sabotage group called Group Aris (Άρηδ), which recorded an unsuccessful attempt to blow up the American Embassy in Athens in September 1970. The bomb went off inside the vehicle used for the attack, killing two of the group's members, Cypriot George Tsikouris and the Italian Elena Angeloni.

In retrospect, the strategy of armed struggle conducted by small clandestine cells of resistance seemed at the time the most efficient solution, since the preconditions for organizing a massive popular movement capable of bringing down the regime were completely lacking. It is worth mentioning that the passivity demonstrated by the Greek people during the early period of the regime could be explained by the fact that the military coup coincided with the completion of a very intense protest cycle extending throughout the 1960s. On the other hand, the organizational resources necessary for the development of a mass movement were missing as the bourgeois political parties were organized along patronage lines, and thus were unable and unwilling to support organized collective action. Only the Greek Communist Party possessed the practical knowledge to build up networks of resistance, since it had been a clandestine organization for a couple of decades due to its involvement in the Greek Civil War (1946–9), but its organizational ability was undermined in 1968 by the split between the Communist Party of Greece (KKE) and the Communist Party of Greece (Interior) (KKE-Εσωτερικού).

Eventually the first wave of resistance came to a halt by 1969 when the most important clandestine organizations were disbanded by military police and their members were imprisoned. From that time onwards, armed resistance played a marginal role in the anti-dictatorship struggle and was conducted by various left-wing groups. Despite their detention, the protagonists of this early wave of anti-dictatorship struggle continued their contribution to the resistance. Most of the imprisoned militants were brutally tortured by the regime and some of the cases went public, provoking a widespread international outcry against the junta. European public opinion, strongly influenced by prominent Greeks living in exile such as Mikis Theodorakis and Melina Merkouri, as well as by resistance organizations active abroad such as the Greek Committee (Ελληνική Επιτροπή) and the Panhellenic Liberation Movement (Πανελλήνιο Απελευθερωτικό Μέτωπο), successfully discredited the regime's detention practices, resulting in the withdrawal of the latter from the Council of Europe on December 12, 1969 so as to avoid conviction for torturing political prisoners. The early wave of the resistance dealt its most decisive blow against the junta in March 1970, when the regime put 35 militants of Democratic Defense on trial.

Anxious to gain an ideological victory against the liberal intelligentsia, the colonels allowed the newspapers to publish the proceedings of the trial. This initiative boomeranged against them, as it was the first time that people inside Greece could learn in detail, through the daily press, about the tortures conducted by the military police. They watched as numerous personalities of international caliber traveled to Greece to testify in favor of the accused professors. Most significantly, they witnessed important intellectuals, such as Panteion University professor Sakis Karagiorgas (who was a leading member of Democratic Defense), delivering rousing speeches in the courtroom on the virtues of democracy and freedom. Although most of the militants secured heavy sentences for themselves, they managed to question openly the morality and legitimacy of the regime. Broadly speaking, the early wave of resistance succeeded in isolating the military regime at a European level, and in some respects it paved the way for the development of a new wave of resistance characterized by massive collective action.

A preliminary sign of the people's propensity toward collective action was recorded on November 3, 1968 at the funeral of the leader of the Center Union party and former prime minister, George Papandreou, also known as “democracy’s old man.” The funeral march of 300,000 people was transformed into a massive pro-democracy demonstration. Such spontaneous activity appeared occasionally, a case in point being the funeral of the Nobel Prize-winning poet George Seferis on September 22, 1971, which nevertheless failed to provide the impetus for the development of massive resistance activity. Similarly, the (to some extent) spontaneous strike activity of rank-and-file workers in 1970–1 did not manage to forge a political bloc against the dictatorship on the solid basis of an alliance of social interests. In fact, the only social grouping that succeeded in forming a massive resistance movement was the university students. The students participated in the resistance with a reference framework significantly different to that of the democratic struggles of the 1960s, which had shaped the political context of the early wave of resistance. Most of these students entered the universities after 1968, only to discover that the ideology of the military regime, enforced via particular structures of oppression, was utterly inconsistent with their own system of beliefs, forged by the post-1968 youth culture.

Daily actions of non-compliance with the regime’s cultural options involved listening to illegal songs, mainly those of Theodorakis, reading banned books, and watching forbidden movies. The first step toward the formation of collective resistance was the creation of the Greek European Youth Association (EKIN) in August 1970. This was a lawful association comprising students of various universities. Its primary aim was to organize public discussions on scientific and cultural issues in order to keep in touch with novel scientific and ideological trends in Europe.

By so doing, EKIN bypassed the official stance of isolation adopted by the pro-junta faculties and created an autonomous public sphere of criticism within which the students started to converse openly about matters concerning the situation inside the universities. Having already dismissed almost all dissident professors, the junta regime attempted to tighten further its control over the universities through the imposition of a new bill for higher education in 1972. The new legislation decreed that all appointments of professors would be made directly by the regime and that students would be required to possess a certificate of political beliefs from the police in order to enroll at their institutions. In an attempt to enhance discipline within the universities and in order to secure the enforcement of the new measures, the regime appointed commissioners in each university charged with overseeing university life. It also appointed all members of the student unions’ councils so as to suppress student militancy. These measures were met with discontent on the part of the students, who started to self-organize around student action committees.

Throughout the spring of 1972 the students appealed to the courts against the appointed councils, since the latter refused to hold elections. They also bypassed the pro-junta student unions through the creation of lawful associations formed on the basis of their members’ geographical origin. Thus shortly before the disbandment of EKIN in May 1972, a series of associations, such as the Association of Cretan Students, emerged to coordinate student activity. The regime, confident of its capacity to control university life, called for student elections in November 1972, but the anti-regime students denounced them as phony and successfully boycotted them. As a result, the official student unions were completely discredited and a massive anti-dictatorship movement seized the opportunity by calling general students’ assemblies in each university faculty. In view of the situation, the military regime decided to conscript into the army 91 students of various faculties on February 13, 1973. This decision triggered extensive riots between the students and the police in the National Technical University (or Polytechnic School; hereafter Polytechnio), the Law School, and the Economic University of Athens, which culminated in the first occupation of the Athens Law School on February 22.

Although the occupation was terminated within 24 hours following the rector’s intervention, on February 24 university students across Greece abstained from their lectures as a token of solidarity with their conscripted colleagues. Evidently, what had begun as a mobilization to settle university-specific issues was evolving into a massive anti-dictatorship movement. On March 20, 1973, 4,000 students reoccupied the Athens Law School – only this time the occupants were shouting for freedom. The occupation was eventually brutally terminated by the police 24 hours later. The politicization of the movement was enhanced further by student organizations attached to the political parties of the left. The most important of them were Rigas Pheraios (Ρήγας Φεραιός), linked to the Communist Party of Greece (Interior), and anti-EFEE (Αντι-ΕΦΕΕ), linked to the Communist Party of Greece. These were accompanied by various leftist groups such as the pro-Maoist Anti-Imperialist Anti-Fascist Student Association of Greece (AASPE; ΑΑΣΠΕ). It should be noted that although there was a proliferation of student organizations, the antidictatorship student movement remained to a large extent autonomous. The second occupation of the Law School was followed by the intensification of the students' anti-dictatorship struggle at all levels.

The massive nature of the movement was promoted by two political facts. First was the stillborn movement of navy officers against the regime on May 22, 1973, which, even though a failure, demonstrated that the junta regime was not supported by all segments of the armed forces. The second was the transition of the regime from a formal dictatorship to a dictatorship with a democratic façade, from dictadura to dictablanda. The government conceded some liberties, such as amnesty for political prisoners and the appointment of Spyros Markezinis (a right-wing politician) as prime minister in October 1973, but real power remained in the hands of the dictator George Papadopoulos.

Relentless student protests were emboldened by the prospect of liberalization, ending in the famous Polytechnio revolt. On November 15, 1973, students from the Law School sought refuge inside the Polytechnio after an anti-dictatorship march accompanied by street fighting with the police, by that time a relatively common occurrence. Students decided to occupy the Polytechnio building to protest the police brutality. Throughout the night, thousands of students gathered in the Polytechnio to support the occupation. Apart from blocking the city center the students established a radio station transmitting anti-junta messages.

The people of Athens expressed solidarity with the students, and several rank-and-file workers and pupils from the majority of Athens schools actively supported the takeover, while thousands of students occupied university buildings in other major cities, namely Thessaloniki, Patra, and Ioannina. The dictatorship was faced with a rapidly spreading student revolt with large popular support. The regime ordered the army to suppress the revolt, and during the night of November 17, armed forces accompanied by armored tanks rolled over the Polytechnio gates, killing numerous students. Simultaneously, the junta's snipers fired into the crowd gathered around the Polytechnio, injuring and killing many civilians and students. Brutal tactics were applied to terminate the student occupations in every major university in the country.

The immediate result of the revolt was the overthrow of the dictator, George Papadopoulos, by his colleague and chief of the repressive military police, George Ioannides. What followed was the return into a dictadura – and the hunting down of all suspected dissidents, especially students, by the military until July 1974, when the dictatorship collapsed following the Turkish invasion of Cyprus. Although the junta's downfall was set off by the Cyprus imbroglio, the student movement created a profound crisis of legitimization for the military regime.

Greece, partisan resistance

Armed Resistance against the Nazi Occupation and Puppet Governments (1941–1944)

Greece was occupied by the Wehrmacht in April 1941 during the German campaign in the Balkans. Before the occupation, the Greek army had fought successfully against Italian aggression in the autumn of 1940. After Greece's defeat, the country was divided into three zones of occupation: Italian (the largest zone), German, and Bulgarian. The government and King George II fled the country along with the British troops after the latter's defeat in the battle of Crete (May 1941). A new collaborationist government with General Georgios Tsolakoglou as prime minister was installed by the forces of occupation.

The dreadful consequences of the new order were soon felt. The larceny of the country's food supplies and equipment by the occupiers, the wholesale destruction of its transportation system, and a naval blockade imposed by the Allies led to a famine which in the winter of 1941–2 left more than 50,000 dead in Athens alone. The country's very existence came under threat due to claims upon Greek territories by Italy and Bulgaria. In this context, the need for organized resistance by the Greek people against the new order of conquerors and their collaborators was vital.

The largest resistance organization in wartime Greece was the National Liberation Front (EAM), which was an initiative of the Communist Party of Greece (KKE). It was formed in September 1941 with the participation of other smaller parties of the left: the Socialist Party of Greece (SKE), the Union of Popular Democracy (ELD), and the Agrarian Party of Greece (AKE). From the beginning EAM was concerned with the possibility of armed struggle. While EAM was organizing its political struggles and the economic, political, and social conditions for an armed struggle were taking shape, the National Popular Liberation Army (ELAS) was founded by EAM in Athens in February 1942.

Since the country had no recent experience of partisan war, preparations and training were undertaken from scratch. Under these conditions, the skills of Aris Velouhiotis (1905–45) proved invaluable. Born Thanasis Klaras, Velouhiotis was at the time already a veteran communist, having spent many years in exile under the former regime of dictator Ioannis Metaxas. Velouhiotis and his small group of partisans started off in the mountains of central Greece. Despite having to draw men and supplies from the weak communist organizations in the local villages, Velouhiotis's group turned out to be very successful. First, the partisans (andartes) came out of hiding and entered the villages to speak about the national liberation and the need to struggle. The villagers were impressed and many joined the partisans.

A second important step was the confiscation of agrarian production, which up to that point had been gathered by services of the state in warehouses and redistributed to the producers – who kept a small amount for the partisans' needs. The conflict between the collaborationist government and the agrarian population over this production, the small but vital organizational and political support offered by EAM and KKE, and the uncontested skills of Aris Velouhiotis all resulted to the consolidation and strengthening of the partisan armed resistance. This first period was marked by the first major battle between ELAS and an Italian platoon in the Rika position of the Giona mountain on September 9, 1942. The Italian platoon was completely defeated.

During the Axis occupation, the British tried to control the Greek resistance and to coordinate it for their own political and warfare purposes. For this reason, small British military groups entered occupied Greece. The first such group under the command of Major Myers entered Greece on October 1, 1942 with the goal of cutting off the railway connection between Athens and Salonika. The task brought together forces from both ELAS under Velouhiotis and the National Republican Greek League (EDES), which was another, smaller guerilla resistance group under Colonel Napoleon Zervas. The partisans attacked the Italian guards on the railway bridge at Gorgopotamos and successfully blew up the bridge (Margaritis 2003).

During the subsequent period up to spring 1943, political struggle in Athens intensified.

The capital was shaken by massive demonstrations organized by EAM which made political and economic demands against the occupation and the collaborationist government. As a result, the influence and strength of EAM increased. Nonetheless, ELAS was also growing in the countryside, from approximately 500 partisans in December 1942 to more than 10,000 in April 1943 (Sarafis 1980). Large parts of Greece's countryside were liberated along with some bigger towns. Several battles in Thessaly forced the Italian forces to abandon the area (Margaritis 2003).

ELAS was reorganized into an army that could fight tactical battles and drew a great number of officers from the former Greek army. A well-known republican colonel, Stefanos Sarafis, became the commander of ELAS. An organizational formula of a three-member leadership was adopted, from the General Staff down to every unit in May 1943. At the head was the army commander (Stefanos Sarafis), the political leader from EAM (Andreas Tzimas), and the kapetanios (captain) (Aris Velouhiotis). The kapetanios had been the partisans' leader before the restructuring of ELAS and was now responsible for supplies, morale, and army discipline, amongst others (Mazower 1993).

Up to the summer of 1943, ELAS numbered 30,000 fighters. Its strength led to the formation of a semi-governmental apparatus that was responsible for the administration of the liberated territories, which formed a large area designated as "Liberated Greece" (Eleftheri Ellada). In 1944, the EAM administration formed a government of the liberated territories, the Political Committee of National Liberation (PEEA). Meanwhile, ELAS was recognized by the Allies and was given some military aid by the British. Unfortunately, Britain was deeply concerned about the growth of ELAS, which was not only not under its political control, but worse, was even connected through EAM to the Communist Party. For this reason, British liaison officers in Greece made great efforts to enforce other (minor but more loyal) partisan groups like EDES and National and Social Liberation (EKKA). This eventually led to armed conflicts between these partisan groups and ELAS over disputed areas of control from autumn 1943 to spring 1944.

On September 8, 1943, Italy capitulated. As an Allied force, ELAS demanded and forced the Italian troops in its area to surrender to its units.

At a stroke ELAS solved its biggest problem, namely, the supply of weapons and ammunition. As an army of 35,000 men, not a small partisan army, it represented a direct continuation of the former Greek national army led by skilled Greek officers, combining this with the political orientation of EAM. Only the Wehrmacht could confront ELAS in Greece. In fact, the German forces had to reconquer the country following the Italian capitulation. In October 1943, a vast campaign of anti-guerilla operations began. This translated into the methodical destruction of all infrastructure that could support the armed resistance: villages, farms, and livestock were burned down and destroyed, mass executions terrorized the population, and entire communities were slaughtered.

In December 1943 in the village of Kalavryta, the 117 German Jäger Division executed more than 1,000 male residents. These retaliation operations and the war against the resistance forces in general also involved Greek paramilitary groups, the Security Battalions (Tagmata Asfaleias). These battalions were formed by the collaborationist government of Ioannis Rallis and were equipped and led by the Germans, especially the Waffen-SS. One estimate shows that more than 30,000 people were killed in the context of these terrorist operations by the Germans and their collaborators (Margaritis 2003). As a result of the armed resistance in Greece, it is also estimated that the Italian army lost approximately 2,000 men and the Germans another 5,000. A vital contribution by ELAS was the stopping of production and export of chromium from Greece to Germany to cover the latter's military needs.

During the summer of 1944, PEEA and EAM participated in a government of National Unity under Georgios Papandreou. While the Cazerta agreement of September 28, 1944 between the British and the Greek resistance forces recognized British General Ronald Scobbie as the supreme commander of all the Greek and British forces operating in Greece, ELAS had already liberated a major part of the country. On October 12, 1944, the German army left Athens – the moment of liberation had arrived.

After liberation the government of National Unity was confronted with a ruined country. The former political parties, effectively absent from the resistance struggle and participating solely in the governments in exile under the auspices of the British, now had to confront the great political power of EAM, whose biggest party was the Communist Party, and its armed forces, ELAS, numbering 45,000 men. The disarmament of ELAS was the the most pressing issue for the British and for the political parties loyal to them, as well as for the Greek economic elites – both old and new, the latter profiting through collaboration with the occupation regime.

General Scobbie demanded the disarmament of ELAS. As EAM and ELAS refused his demand, the left ministers quit the government of National Unity and it subsequently ceased to exist on December 1, 1944 (Iatrides 1981). Two days later, on December 3, a huge demonstration was organized by EAM to protest these events. Police officers opened fire and killed many unarmed demonstrators. The next day a general strike and several clashes took place in Athens. In the countryside, ELAS forces rather easily disarmed the newly formed police service. The clashes in Athens escalated progressively as neither side could control the capital. The British were increasingly involved in the battles day after day, always on the side of the troops loyal to the government. Overall, the British troops that participated in the December events are estimated to have exceeded 80,000, far more than the troops that confronted the Germans in Greece in 1941.

As the situation worsened and the British casualties were severe, British Prime Minister Winston Churchill visited Athens during Christmas 1944. Negotiations between Churchill, Anthony Eden, Greek Archbishop Damaskinos, Greek Prime Minister Papandreu, and the leaders of EAM and KKE, Siantos, Partsalidis, and Mandakas, ended in failure. After 33 days of fierce fighting, on January 5, 1945, ELAS finally withdrew from Athens.

The Civil War (1946–1949)

Following the end of the December clashes and with the overall situation tipping against them, the leaders of EAM-ELAS decided to agree to a political solution and to disarm ELAS. With the Agreement of Varkiza of February 12, 1945, all armed forces were to disarm and a new National Army was to be formed. A plebiscite on the question of the return of the king was to be held, as well as general elections for a Constitutional Convention. Yet a highly problematic point was that amnesty given for political crimes could easily be misinterpreted by the state's courts.

Indeed, the new governments, with British support, had decided to crash the left movement and to deny it any decisive role in the country's politics. A wave of "white terror" spread through the country as former EAM-ELAS members were brutalized and murdered in the streets and others taken to court and convicted for fictitious crimes – even for collaboration with the enemy. Paramilitary acts against leftist citizens were primarily organized by the right-wing government of Constantinos Tsaldaris, which emerged from the elections of March 31, 1946. One year after the Varkiza Agreement, left-wing citizens had suffered 1,192 murders, 6,413 injuries, 6,567 robberies, and 572 assaults to offices of left-wing newspapers and magazines, according to National Solidarity (Ethniki Allilegii), an EAM organization. In June 1946, the so-called "Third Resolution" was adopted by the government, which punished by death a vast range of activities against the "nation" or the "authorities" – clearly a political act against the left movement and the former partisans. In the next month, the first seven to be convicted were executed, amongst them a teacher, Eleni Gini, the first woman to be executed in Greece.

In this context, and pressured by the former partisans who were hunted by the state, the Communist Party decided to respond to the state's violence in military terms. On October 26, 1946, the Democratic Army of Greece (DSE) was founded under the leadership of Markos Vafeiadis, a former kapetanios of ELAS and member of the Communist Party. Meanwhile, a plebiscite in September 1946 brought back King George II and the army took over responsibility from the police for maintaining order in the largest part of the country. General Constantinos Ventiris, Commander of the General Staff, was a representative of the far right in the army.

In the international context, the Cold War had already begun: the Truman Doctrine for aid to Greece was the forerunner of the Marshall Plan. As Great Britain could not afford any further involvement in Greece, the United States were eager to take its place and did so with the provision of economic as well as military aid.

In 1947 the civil war was raging. The National Army, despite American aid, could not exterminate the partisans. In the political field, the circulation of the left's newspapers was banned, and after the Communist Party formed a Provisional Democratic Government with Markos Vafeiadis as its prime minister, it too was outlawed by the end of the year.

An important aspect of the civil war in Greece was the foundation of the military camp in the deserted island of Makronisos. There, soldiers suspected of having left-wing sympathies were gathered and brutally tortured (often ending in murder), and were forced to deny their beliefs and even fight against the DSE. Many thousands of left-wing citizens were also exiled to small islands like Ikaria and Ai Stratis.

Despite the clear superiority of the National Army in terms of weapons and equipment thanks to US support, it still did not manage to defeat the DSE of the left partisans for another two years. The Democratic Army had some military successes in 1948, but could not tip the balance of power. Finally, in the summer of 1949, the National Army launched an all-out attack (even with planes using napalm bombs) in the mountains of Vitsi and Grammos in northern Greece. The Democratic Army withdrew into Albania. The civil war ended, leaving behind 50,000 dead: 25,000 from the National Army, the police, and paramilitary groups and 25,000 from the Democratic Army. The political result was a state of repression and terror, which concluded in the military dictatorship of 1967–74.

Greece, socialism, communism, and the left, 1850–1974

George Margaritis

Throughout the nineteenth century Greece remained a small country with a population of approximately 750,000; geographically it comprised Peloponnesus, the Cyclades islands, and the hinterland of Athens reaching up to the Lamia region in the north. The annexing of the Ionian islands in 1864 and of the Thessaly region in 1881 did not alter the overall picture significantly: the majority of Greeks lived outside the country's contemporary borders up until 1912. The main centers of what might be called a Greek bourgeois class were to be found in Constantinople, Smyrna, Alexandria in Egypt, in the Russian coast cities on the Black Sea, or elsewhere around the East Mediterranean basin.

This small kingdom missed the first industrial revolution of the steam engine and continued to be an agrarian society. A deficient railroad network was built after the 1880s but was not completed until almost 20 years later. Shipping was active but it was only in the city of Hermoupolis, on the island of Syros, that it had an obvious industrial impact. Mining was another important activity, yet it was mainly to be found on some islands – Euboea, Melos, and Naxos – near the coast, and the technology used was rudimentary. The combination of these factors meant that there was nothing to give rise to a well-defined working class.

Social tensions were never acute in the cities or in the provinces. The agrarian economy was based mainly upon small family holdings. For farmers the main problem was the merchant, not the landowner. Furthermore, migration was a useful channel, always ready to absorb problems, impasses, and frictions.

The appearance of Saint-Simon followers during the reign of King Otto (1830–62), son of King Ludwig of Bavaria, did not prove enough to create a socialist tradition in the country. The revolutionary events of 1848 did not affect Greece in spite of the arrival of political refugees from Italy, Poland, Hungary, and other countries. The annexing of the Ionian islands in 1864 added some radicalism to Greek political thought and a number of intellectuals began to explore socialist ideas of the nineteenth century.

The working class, based in the mining industry (in the Lavrion area of Attica), held occasional strikes and other demonstrations throughout the nineteenth century. Even so, no events that could compare to the unrest prevailing in other European countries occurred in Greece.

By the end of the nineteenth century Greek intellectuals from abroad had pioneered socialism in Greece, including Plato Drakoulis, who in 1908 founded the League of the Working Classes of Greece and in 1909 the Socialist Party of Greece. These groups enjoyed a limited success but were short-lived; yet such initiatives became more frequent and tenacious just before the Balkan Wars.

In 1911, Nikos Yiannios from Constantinople founded the Socialist Center, and the subsequent year the Socialist League of Greek Youth, whose membership comprised some hundreds of partisans. Some trade unions followed but, overall, their influence was also limited and of short duration. Building a socialist movement in the country proved to be a very difficult task, and yet new leaders emerged to continue the effort, including Panagis Dimitratos from the island of Cephalonia.

In Ottoman Salonika, socialism appeared to have a better chance, in part due to the influence of the Young Turks movement of 1908. The equality the latter declared between the different nationalities and religions of the empire, along with the political liberties granted, appeased past nationalistic tensions and allowed for the propagation of a socialist way of thinking. The Macedonian Struggle – the nationalistic dispute over the Macedonian region – had painfully divided the city and its surrounding region for almost ten years.

Members of the city's sizable Jewish community took the initiative to transform this socialist-friendly mood into an organized working-class movement. The first Workers' Club of 1908, created by Jewish workers, saw unexpected success and was promptly upgraded, in April 1909, to the Workers' League of Salonika. Avraam Benaroya, a worker, was the most eminent leader of this socialist association. Workers from the other communities of the city, such as Muslims, Greeks, Bulgarians, and Armenians, came together in the same class organization by embracing this important Jewish core (including, for example, the union of Jewish tobacco workers – which had approximately 1,000 members before 1908). Mass demonstrations held throughout the summer of 1909 revealed the new possibilities opening up for the movement. The suppression it suffered at the hands of the Turkish authorities served to convince a yet larger part of the population of the right of its cause. In August 1909 a unitary conference of both worker and socialist groups of the city, disregarding their national identity, founded a political workers' party – the Federation. This was by far the most important of all the organizations that had made their appearance in Greece, as well as in the regions that were to be annexed by the Greek state in the years to follow.

The first journal of the Federation, the Worker's Voice, was printed in four different languages: Spanish-Hebrew, Greek, Turkish, and Bulgarian. Subsequent papers, Solidaridad Obrera and Avanti, had most of their articles published in Spanish-Hebrew. It is through these papers and the public declarations of the Federation's leaders that we can define the ideology and the political stance of the organization: the influence of German social democracy and of Karl Kautsky seemed to be the strongest current. In 1909 the Federation was linked with the Second International.

Following the Balkan Wars (1912–13), Salonika was incorporated into Greece, whose leadership was anxious to give a Greek identity to the city. The Federation, which had opposed the war and called for the working class not to participate in what was not its own affair, was now faced with the new situation. Under these circumstances it became urgent to establish contacts with Greek socialists. In spite of this rather unfavorable situation, the year 1914 saw the biggest mobilization (to that date) of workers in Salonika and elsewhere. Greek authorities responded with arrests and deportations, mainly of Jewish unionists and socialists. The repression of social disorder had a clear nationalistic aspect.

War in the Balkans broke out in 1912. Socialist initiatives to oppose nationalistic passions were important in this area and it was in the summer of 1915, a few months before Zimmerwald, that a conference of socialist movements in the Balkans met in Bucharest to condemn the war and to proclaim a Balkan Socialist Federation as part of a new International. In this conference Greece was represented by the Federation and the groups collaborating with it.

However, when Greece decided to enter the war, socialists found themselves as divided as the other political forces of the country. Yiannios and his followers opted for the immediate participation of Greece on the side of the Entente powers; the Federation and others championed neutrality – the former aligned with the Venizelist (Democratic) Party, the latter with the royalists. It was on the subject of neutrality that the Federation and other socialist forces of northern Greece collaborated with royalists in the elections of March 1915, electing two deputies to the Greek parliament (Aristotelis Sideris and Alberto Couriel).

Greek socialists were also divided in 1917 over their attitude towards the Russian Revolution. Some, like Dimitratos, saw the revolution as a personal coup d'état of Lenin. Others (including Plato Drakoulis, Demosthenes Ligdopoulos, and the members of Socialist Youth) were enthusiastic about what was taking place in Russia from the very beginning and aligned their cause to that of the Bolsheviks.

The so-called Venizelos era in Greek politics began in 1910 and was marked by the extensive renewal of the country's members of parliament. Among these new politicians some had socialist ideas, in the loosest definition of the term. The movement of the "sociologists" for example, led by Alexandros Papanastassiou, formed an important branch of the Venizelist political reform. A strong workers' movement serving Venizelist aspirations comprised an integral part of the political planning of the Cretan leader. In this sense his leadership was always favorable to trade union organizations or even to socialist political actions. In 1917 what could be described as a Greek working class comprised only a few tens of thousands of workers. But Venizelists were impressed by the dynamism of this small social class: between 1912 and 1916, a number of important strikes demonstrated the possibilities of the movement and made a possible alliance with it an important issue for the major political forces in the country.

Following a series of failures, the process of unification of the various different socialist groups began in the summer of 1917, with the mediation of the Second International. Venizelos was in power, having overthrown King Konstantinos, and joined the Entente powers in the war. As he sought to maximize his claims in the Peace Conference based on national claims, he urgently needed some Greek presence in the European socialist movement to promote his policy. For this purpose, he appointed a Greek socialist delegation to the Socialist Conference that was held in London in February 1918.

However, Venizelos's desire to use the socialist influence to promote his own vision had further consequences. In September 1918 he called a meeting with the most prominent socialist and trade unionist leaders of Greece, mainly those of the Federation. At this meeting it was decided that the government would not oppose any attempt to create a unified social political party nor a confederation of existing trade unions and workers' organizations. In this way Greek socialists and trade unionists were given an unexpected opportunity to establish their political and unionist status.

In October 1918 the General Confederation of Workers of Greece (GSEE) was founded in Athens. It represented almost all of the organized workers of Greece, about a third of the country's total workforce. The influence of Benaroya gave the tone to the final decisions, which were far more radical than Venizelos would have wished. Class struggle was accepted as a basic theory. In November the same radical leaders founded the Socialist Workers' Party of Greece (SEKE), which was later to become the Communist Party.

The war with Turkey (1919–22) ended with a near total collapse of Greece's state structure. The Greek army was entirely destroyed and hundreds of thousands of refugees crossed the Aegean Sea along with the defeated soldiers. In 1923 the agreement between the governments of Greece and Turkey to proceed with a general exchange of populations changed the character of Greek society dramatically. The country was to receive between 1.2 and 1.5 million Christian subjects of the ex-Ottoman empire in exchange for the half a million Muslims left behind in the new Greek territories. Refugees became a new social category that had to be incorporated into the main population.

It was a painful period and many officials, including diplomats of the Foreign Office in Greece and officials in the Society of Nations, considered it to be a revolutionary one, having in mind what had happened earlier in Germany or even in Russia. But Greece was a different case altogether. Soldiers returning from the long war preferred to return home rather than take any form of political action, and most refugees were too exhausted and hungry to foment a revolution. The pro-Venizelist coup, the exile of the king, the proclamation of a republic, and the execution of six members of the royalist regime were more than sufficient to absorb popular anger.

Socialists had almost no influence over these events, partly because theirs was still a divided movement. The most prominent socialist intellectuals followed the Venizelist liberals, attracted by the radical political initiatives that the latter took shortly after the Asia Minor defeat. Papanastasiou, a former leader of the so-called “sociologists” (and now leader of the Democratic Union), became prime minister, using his socialist identity to promote the anti-royalist policy of Venizelos. On the other hand, communists had to deal with strong internal conflict in order to align themselves with the principles and the policy of the Comintern, a goal achieved in 1924 when the name of the party changed to become the Communist Party of Greece (KKE), a Greek section of the Communist International. An important faction of the trade union movement kept its distance from political parties and searched for an independent route to improve workers’ conditions.

Strikes were common throughout this period and often turned into combative demonstrations suppressed violently by the police or even the army. Yet there was nothing that could be described as an open rebellion with any serious political repercussions. Up to 1930 the League of Nations helped the country to resolve its acute refugee problem through the Commission of Rehabilitation of Refugees (EAP). A smooth social policy combined with bold agricultural reform proved able to absorb pressure from below. Communists and other radical elements of the left often found themselves obliged to follow events, rather than to create them. In a society with many urgent problems to resolve, some abstract reference to a socialist revolution was not a high priority. This situation, combined with friction within the Soviet Union, forced the KKE to isolate itself in a quest for its own identity. Its influence dropped considerably: in the elections of 1928 the party had only 1.41 percent of the vote, and in 1931 its organized strength was fewer than 1,800 members.

The Macedonian question and sectarianism marked the first period of the Communist Party. The Comintern opposed the partitioning of the Balkans as dictated by the Paris Conference at the end of World War I. A Balkan communist confederation was founded to propose a communist solution to national disputes. Greek communists protested against this directive, claiming that the large exchange of populations between Bulgaria and Greece had in reality solved the national identity problem of the Greek part of Macedonia, which was now clearly Greek. Nevertheless, the official position of the Comintern was adopted up until 1928. This proved to be a hazardous choice: the young party found itself at the epicenter of a nationalist turmoil which gave its enemies a dangerous advantage. Many considered it to be a form of pan-Slavic organization working for the interests of Slav people rather than the Greeks. KKE was declared illegal for the first time during the Pangalos dictatorship in 1925; its illegalization was mainly a consequence of this Macedonian policy.

Internal crisis was a persistent condition within the KKE and most of its leaders were obliged to leave: Benaroya in 1924, Yannis Kordatos (a historian and the intellectual secretary of KKE) and Pouliopoulos in 1927, and Maximos in 1928, along with hundreds of lower cadres and militants. The radicalization of the party led to a widespread rupture in the trade union movement. In the summer of 1925 the KKE broke its relations with the GSEE and in 1929 founded the Unified General Confederation of Greek Workers (EGSEE).

The central state authorities in Athens had always considered communism to be a major threat. Suppression of the workers’ movement was a permanent preoccupation for the state administration. During the third Liberal government under Eleftherios Venizelos, such oppression became a constitutional policy. By 1929 a notorious new law (idionymo) had been created, legislating against all communist activity; after 1931 this was used against any form of contest in the difficult years that followed. From 1929 to 1931, 12,000 people were persecuted and many hundreds of them were sentenced to prison terms of one year or longer.

Such a policy of violent suppression did not produce the expected results – on the contrary, persecuting any political disagreement and any democratic, socialist, or even liberal idea as a “communist” one meant that the communists gained a leading reputation as the protectors of political and social liberties – even when their own policy did not reflect this role. In fact, up until 1931 the political practice of the KKE was characterized by voluntarism and sectarianism, accompanied by an intense, almost militaristic, activity. The approach that all reformists, social democrats, and liberals (not to mention Trotskyists) were allies of the bourgeois class and fascism – “social fascists” as they were frequently defined – made the political presence of the KKE a very isolated one.

In 1930–1 internal struggle and external pressure led the Communist Party to an impasse; however, the intervention of the Comintern helped resolve internal problems, while the complete failure of the social democratic government of Papanastasiou in 1932 helped reestablish the dominant position of the party inside the Greek left.

The Comintern imposed a new leadership upon the KKE from November 1931. Nikos Zachariades, 31 years old at the time, was elected to be the secretary general of the party in 1934. The new leadership, backed by the mechanisms of the Comintern, changed the internal structure of the party, dissolved factions, and imposed discipline at all levels. The policy of “social fascism” was abandoned progressively, to give way to a more flexible policy. From 1933 onwards, the main threat was recognized to be the spread of Nazism in Europe and, in the case of Greece, the restoration of the monarchy and the dictatorial tendencies and ambitions of the army.

The new direction was fully adopted in 1934 and the Communist Party tried to organize an anti-fascist front, searching for allies among democrats, socialists, agrarians, or even anti-monarchist elements. In reality this entire surrounding political field proved to be very weak and too dispersed to form a coherent response to Greek totalitarianism. Communists did not succeed in influencing the political situation in 1935 when military coups marked the end of the Greek republic and the return of the monarchy. Nor did they succeed in preventing the arrival of the dictatorship emanating from the Greek palace and materialized in the figure of Ioannis Metaxas in August 1936. Nevertheless, the unitary policy of the communists impacted, in a way, upon the future. Their final efforts to prevent the dictatorship included overtures to the Liberal Party and the reunification of the trade union movement. While not quite enough to succeed, this activity nevertheless established the KKE as the main political force combating fascism in Greece. Aspiring to a radical overthrow of the bourgeois parliamentary system, the party found itself to be the final defendant of a limited democracy.

On August 4, 1936, Ioannis Metaxas, backed by King George II of Greece and with no reaction from the two main political parties (populists and liberals), established a dictatorship. The Metaxas regime lasted for four and a half years, but the efforts of the dictator to consolidate his power through a massive fascist movement, the National Youth Organization (EON), failed. His was a profoundly anti-communist regime, with its main rhetoric including preventing a communist revolution and thus saving Greece from the fate of Spain at the time.

The Communist Party was once again declared illegal and its members were persecuted, put in jail, or deported to concentration camps or small islands across the Aegean Sea. A vast anti-communist campaign developed in many forms. On the eve of the war the organized force of the KKE had dropped to about 2,000 members, the large majority of whom were in prison or had been deported.

Nevertheless, the anti-communist focus of the Metaxas regime had unexpected consequences. While repression focused on communist activities, and all democratic opposition was identified as communist, previously held anti-communist feelings among liberal elites and middle classes faded away. The fact that almost 2,000 communist detainees in prisons and concentration camps refused to engage in any kind of compromise with the regime added a moral and political advantage to communist opposition. Thus the Metaxas regime’s repression gave the communists a leading position in the struggle for democracy, given the passivity of the “traditional” political formations during the same period.

On October 28, 1940, Greece entered World War II. The Italian invasion turned into an indecisive six-month war deep in the Albanian mountains. Germany invaded the country on April 6, 1941; Greek resistance collapsed soon after and the country was divided into three occupation zones: German, Italian, and Bulgarian.

The war proved to be the decisive moment for the Greek left overall, and for the communists in particular. At the beginning of the war, just a few hours after the Italian invasion, Nikos Zachariadis called from his prison cell for the communists, with all their forces, to take part in the war effort, even if the latter was administrated by the Metaxas regime. His call was published and thus the illegal KKE came to be the only political party to publicly call for resistance. Zachariadis and 2,000 communists remained, of course, in prison and in April 1941 they were handed over to German military forces. Yet even in this way the patriotic prestige of the communist forces had significant gains: the political bases for an anti-fascist patriotic front had been established.

From the first days of Axis occupation the communists tried to create a large patriotic and anti-fascist front with the participation of all political parties, groups, or individuals regardless of their ideological beliefs. The effort was only delayed by the poor condition of the organized forces of the party, with fewer than 250 party members managing to escape from prison. In September 1941, the National Liberation Front (EAM) was founded. Its initial declaration was signed by the Communist Party and by a small number of political formations of the socialist left: the Union for Popular Democracy (ELD) and the Socialist Party of Greece (SKE), who were later joined by the Socialist Workers' Party (SEK), the Agrarian Party (AKE), and the Social Democratic Union (SDE). A few high-profile individuals from the old Liberal Party also joined the front.

The occupation regime turned out to be a system of brutal exploitation of all of the country's human, natural, and productive resources. Great numbers of people in the cities and in the countryside soon found themselves in a desperate condition. Several thousands of people, mainly in the cities, died of starvation during the terrible winter of 1941–2. Meanwhile, the deregulation of the economy, the emergence of black market activities, and the construction of important public works on behalf of the occupying forces (e.g., fortifications, roads, air and naval bases) created opportunities for enrichment and opened up a huge social gap, as many lost everything in order for a few to profit. This collaboration was an economic and social issue well before its evolution into a political one.

The appearance and development of the EAM was a social as well as a political process. The struggle against the Axis forces was also an expression of the struggle against social upheaval. The resistance movement accomplished a small miracle in the country: in only a few months it became the principal political force, with 1.5 million organized militants in a total population of no more than 7.5 million people. A whole army, the Greek People's Liberation Army (ELAS), with a front-line force of 50,000 and reserves of about 30,000 militants, was created, equipped mainly with Italian weapons left behind during the Italian collapse in September 1943. An unofficial administration was formed to cover almost one-third of the Greek territories, and an actual government – the Political Committee for National Liberation (PEEA) – was established in March 1944.

The Communist Party demonstrated political and tactical abilities during this period and consolidated its dominant position in the Greek left. It had become almost an entirely new party, as most of its old members were executed or killed during the occupation. The old leadership represented a minority in the new central committee and included Giorgis Siantos and Yannis Ioannidis, who assumed the responsibilities of the absent Zachariadis, who had been deported to Dachau earlier on. It was also a question of unitary policy, a practice almost unknown to the communists in the prewar past. In September 1944, the communists and their socialist or liberal allies in the EAM or PEEA joined a government of national unity.

In October 1944, at the time when the Axis forces evacuated Greece, the resistance movement (and within it the KKE) was the most important political force in the country. But compromise with the conservative forces was precarious and within a few weeks social tensions and political unrest overtook Athens. When British General Ronald Scobie ordered the demobilization of all "volunteer" military formations except the royalist third brigade, a new armed conflict occurred. In December 1944, for 33 days, fighting broke out all over Athens. The British faced an open revolt in the popular quarters of Athens and sent in expeditionary corps and elements from five different divisions, including almost 80,000 men, with air and naval gunfire, in order to defeat the ELAS and assume control of the capital. The bloodshed ended with a new compromise, the Varkiza Agreement (February 1945).

Political and physical persecution of the left and the resistance movement – "White Terror" as it was called – took on disproportionate dimensions during 1945 and 1946. The abstention of the Communist Party and some of the socialist and liberal elements was a feature of the elections held on March 31, 1946, and the result was far from convincing. The new conservative government under Tsaldaris added new legal instruments to the already sizable anti-communist inventory of the Greek legal system.

In the summer of 1946 clashes between small groups of the persecuted, police forces, and irregulars of the anti-communist bands multiplied all over the country. After the monarchy was restored in September the tension soon turned into a civil conflict. At the end of October the Communist Party approved the creation of the Democratic Army of Greece (DSA) under the command of an ex-general of the ELAS, Markos Vafeiadis. Yet it was only in December 1947, when the KKE adopted military action as the main plank of its policy, that the conflict rapidly turned into an open war. Great Britain was obliged to detach itself from the Greek situation, having neither the financial nor the military means to support the conservative camp. From the beginning of 1947 the United States supplanted the British in this role. The Truman Doctrine was the first clear signal of the decisive American involvement in Greek affairs.

The Greek civil war lasted for three years until the end of 1949, with more than 50,000 fatalities. The communists formed a Provisional Democratic Government in the mountains and hoped for a general rupture between the East and West. Substantial military and humanitarian aid was sent to the Provisional Government and the Democratic Army through communist parties and trade unions of Eastern Europe. In 1948 and 1949 the rupture between Titoists in Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union restricted all kinds of material support to the Greek communists.

The Democratic Government and the Democratic Army were in fact a purely communist affair and Nikos Zachariadis, who was reinstated in the post of secretary general after his repatriation from Dachau in June 1945, became the incontestable leader in this struggle. There was no form of national unity similar to that of the EAM during this conflict, in spite of the fact that the KKE assimilated this war as a struggle against imperialism and American occupation. American intervention was of course decisive for the final issue of the conflict, offering the conservative camp huge economic and military assistance.

However, with the exception of some advisors and specialists, there was no direct military involvement of US forces.

The EAM legacy did not survive the postwar tensions and most of the allies of the communists in the resistance movement chose to follow independent political options. It seems that an important section of the communists themselves, mainly in the big cities, rejected the military solution and instead preferred to retire from political activity. Plenty of those who opted for such passive resistance were concentrated by the authorities in the “reformation” camp of Makronissos Island (near Lavrion, Attica). In 1949 the Democratic Army was obliged, after crucial military defeats, to evacuate Greece and to cross the border to Albania or Bulgaria, together with the main leaders of the communist movement.

At the beginning of the 1950s Greece entered the Cold War era with a political system inherited from the civil war. It was not a dictatorship, as elections were held and the parliamentary system was similar to that of the other West European countries, but with some crucial differences: all communist activities were illegal and laws relating to espionage or high treason could send people not only to jail but also to the firing squad. The monarchy, the army, and a number of secret organizations, such as the famous Sacred Bond of Greek Army Officers (IDEA), were always ready to take action in order to “protect the nation” from supposed communist infiltration and subversion. In 1950, 2,289 people were condemned to death for communist activities, 22,000 were imprisoned, and 13,000 deported. Meanwhile, the bulk of the members of the Communist Party, numbering more than 30,000, found themselves dispersed in exile, mainly to Tashkent in the Soviet Union.

Back in Greece, liberal individuals, socialists, and former allies of the communists in the resistance movement created small organizations looking for ways to reestablish some kind of political representation of the left. In August 1951 a number of these political formations met to create a new united political expression of the left. The Unitary Democratic Left (EDA) was founded, bringing together the Socialist Party of Greece (Yannis Passalidis), the liberals of the left, the Radical Democratic Party (Michalis Kyrkos), and other smaller formations. The effort had the approval of the communist leadership in exile.

The impact of this new party was extensive, given the circumstances. Just a few weeks after its formation, the party received 10.57 percent of the vote in the general election, gaining ten deputies, all imprisoned or deported. In Athens and Salonika the electoral percentages were 20 percent and 28 percent respectively, reflecting the strong social background of this political formation. Of course the background of the EDA was a hotbed of internal as well as external tensions. As it included “legal” socialists and liberals, along with illegal communists, the dispute about its real character never ceased. The former wanted it to be a social democratic formation open to all possible collaborations with other political formations against the conservative right; the latter wanted it to function as no more than a legal expression of the illegal KKE. In spite of these internal conflicts the EDA received 25 percent of the vote in the elections of 1958, becoming the main political force of the opposition.

The Cypriot revolt against British colonialism gave the left the opportunity to once again organize mass mobilizations on a patriotic issue. The transformation of Greek society changed the audience of the left: the emergence of a middle class, mass migration to Germany or Australia which absorbed social tensions, the development of local industry, and public works, and the intense rebuilding of the great cities all changed the economic profile of Greek society and gave new dimensions to the democratic demands of the left. As the conditions changed, many more people needed political rights to defend and to promote their new social status. Liberal mobilizations at the beginning of the 1960s expressed this climate and brought demands for political change (and even socialism) to the fore. The left-wing tendency of the Union of the Center (Enossi Kentrou), the party that won the elections of 1963 and 1964 under the leadership of Georgios Papandreou, openly referred to a social democratic policy.

This must have been a step too far for the conservative forces within the country: interventions from the king and many brutal actions against the left took place, including the assassination of the EDA’s deputy Grigoris Lambrakis (1963), and the killing of left activists due to an explosion during the Gorgopotamos National Resistance anniversary celebrations (1964). The army took the initiative to uphold “law and order”: on April 21, 1967 a military coup gave power to a junta consisting mainly of colonels of the Greek army. This form of dictatorship lasted until July 1974.

The dual presence of the Greek left in exile and in the interior of the country caused many frictions from 1951 up to the dictatorship. The coup took the organized forces of the left by surprise and there was virtually no opposition to the establishment of the colonels’ regime. Internal conflicts of the past came to the fore and, in 1968, the Communist Party of Greece split into two different parts: the traditional KKE and the KKE Office of the Interior (or KKE–Esoterikou). The crisis in the communist faction marked the democratic resistance against the dictatorship. It also permitted the emergence of a number of important organizations of the left, some with a communist profile (Maoists, etc.) and some with a social democratic – but no less combative – profile. The movement of Democratic Defense (Demokratiki Amyna) and the PAK (Panhellenic Liberation Movement) of Andreas Papandreou were the most important among them. The latter formed the nucleus of the Panhellenic Socialist Movement (PASOK), a party that was to govern Greece for almost 20 years after 1981.

Greece, socialism, communism, and the left, 1974–2008

Christos Giovanopoulos and Giannis (Jean-Marie) Skolidakis

Greek history after the dictatorship is characterized by a transition from a post-civil war police state to democratic stability, known as metapolitefsi (Μεταπολίτευση). This process was to a large extent a reaction to the forceful political presence of a socialist and communist left movement, leading to a deeper integration of the traditional left in the “national backbone” of political life. At the same time, grassroots movements and a dynamic extra-parliamentary left contested this political mutation and reinforced antagonistic struggles, on some occasions with spectacular results. Thus it is no coincidence that the Greek left and communist movement remains one of the strongest in Europe.

The Radical Seventies (1974–1981)

The seven-year (1967–1974) dictatorship (“junta of colonels”) collapsed on July 24, four days after the Turkish invasion of Cyprus that was prompted by a failed coup d'état on the island (July 15). However, it was the Polytechnic School uprising of November 17, 1973 that managed to derail the process of gradual democratization of the military regime toward a pre-1967 model of limited democracy. A plan promoted by the dictatorship and accepted by a unified national political front – including the pro-Soviet Communist Party of Greece (KKE) and its Eurocommunist split Communist Party of Greece-Interior (KKE-Esoterikou; KKE-Εσωτερικού) – caused initial condemnation of the advocates of the revolt by KKE as agents provocateurs (Panspoud- astiki 8, January–February 1974). The KKE's initial stance was quickly replaced by an attempt to recuperate the revolt as it was embraced by the people while dealing a blow to the regime.

The 1974–81 period is marked by political radicalization, the upsurge of a strong anti-imperialist and anti-American movement, and the struggle for the “dejunification” of the state apparatuses. Karamanlis, the most prominent conservative leader and first post-dictatorship prime minister, was forced to withdraw Greece from the military wing of NATO and called for a reconsideration of the presence of US bases in Greece. The absorption of this radicalization became a crucial element in the developments of the next period. Hence the political contract of metapolitefsi saw the legalization of the communist parties and of political activity (outlawed since the civil war in 1946). This in turn translated into drawing limits on acceptable activities and demands by the movement, expressed by the secretary of KKE Florakis's theory of “juntolitefsism,” namely that the ultra-left functions in favor of the ultra-right.

An initial test of the left's intentions was the proclamation of the first post-dictatorship elections on the first anniversary of the November 17 revolt. The postponement of celebrations until after the elections was respected by the left parties. Thus the political significance of the one million-strong official demonstration after the election was absorbed within the limits of metapolitefsi and the left's aim to become integrated in the political establishment. Nevertheless, a crowd of 50,000 gathered on November 15 to celebrate the uprising, thereby disrespecting the electoral atmosphere and marking the presence of a strong extra-parliamentary left. This revolutionary left consisted of numerous organizations of various complexions, the most prominent being the OMLE/PPSP (Organization of Marxists-Leninists of Greece) which later founded the KKE M-L and EKKE/AASPE (Revolutionary Communist Movement of Greece), both Maoist.

Karamanlis's New Democracy Party (ND; ΝΔ) triumphed in the elections, winning 54.4 percent of the vote. The “official” communist left (KKE, KKE-Interior, and EDA) as the United Left received 9.5 percent, and PASOK (Panhellenic Socialist Movement; ΠΑΣΟΚ) emerged with 13.5 percent. The latter was formed by two anti-dictatorship organizations, the PAK (Panhellenic Liberation Movement) of Andreas Papandreou and Dimokratiki Amyna (Democratic Defense). PASOK's "3 September manifesto," with strong elements of "third worldism," demanded "national independence, popular sovereignty, social liberation, and democratic structures." PASOK's advent marked the leftwards shift of the political center and gave life to a viable "socialist" party in Greece, between the center and the communist left, by absorbing the former and recuperating the slogans of the latter.

"Dejunctification" was a concern of the established political parties in securing the post-1974 democracy, but also a demand of the anti-fascist movement owing to the strong links between the conservative government and the military regime. "Para-state" centers were left more or less intact, however, and a new military coup was threatened in 1975. The assassination on May 1, 1978 of A. Panagoulis, a hero of the anti-dictatorship struggle and a member of parliament for Enosi Kentrou (Union of the Center), followed by suppression of the mass movement, confirmed the continuation of police state tactics.

Anti-imperialist protest in this period was directed against both US interventionism and the European direction of the Greek bourgeoisie, demanding Greece's complete disengagement from NATO and the European Economic Community (EEC). The struggle for national independence was central to this movement, even for the urban guerilla groups, most prominent among whom were November 17 (17 Νοέμβρη, named after the date of the anti-dictatorship uprising) and ELA (People's Armed Struggle; EAA), which chose their targets accordingly, continuing the tradition of the anti-dictatorship armed struggle.

Student and working-class urban youth comprised the critical mass of the revolutionary movement which in 1975 and 1976 spurred grassroots syndicalism, wildcat strikes, farmers' road blockades, and lengthy strikes and factory occupations across most industries. The unrest alarmed the state as well as the reformist left. The former reacted by intensifying state oppression, while the GSEE (General Confederation of Greek Workers), controlled by the official left, maintained a reluctant and hostile stance, labeling many of these workers' initiatives the acts of agents provocateurs and aiming to control and marginalize grassroots factory assemblies.

However, these struggles succeeded in securing above-inflation pay rises of 25–35 percent.

New Democracy conservatives won the elections of 1977 with 41.84 percent of the vote, with PASOK emerging as the leading opposition party with 25.3 percent. KKE achieved 9.36 percent and the Alliance of Progressive and Left-Wing Forces (KKE-Interior) 2.72 percent. The 1979 student movement that led to the government's lockout of universities in order to restrict the advancing occupations dealt a second blow to Karamanlis. In his 1980 New Year's Eve message, he announced the cancellation of the already voted law 815/1978 for the "modernization" of higher education. Once more the split between the reformist and the revolutionary communist left was expressed by the condemnation of the student occupations by KNE (the Communist Party's youth organization), which sent its members to violently break up the occupation of the School of Chemistry in Athens (December 17, 1979), earning it the congratulations of Minister of Home Security Balkos. The appearance of the Autonomous current was a new element in this movement.

The last event of this radical wave was the attempt to break the ban on the annual November 17 march to the US embassy, which had been in force since 1975 and was respected by the parliamentary left. The initiative (November 17, 1980) was taken by extra-parliamentary organizations, resulting in severe clashes with police next to the Greek parliament and the deaths of two demonstrators, Koumis and Kanelopoulou. This was a critical moment for the movement which, despite its vitality and determination, had been unprepared for such escalation.

The Years of PASOKism (1981–1990)

"Change" was the central slogan in the electoral victory of PASOK in October 1981, with 48.1 percent of the vote. Its phenomenal rise to power demonstrated the shift of Greek society away from 40 years of anti-democratic regimes and a deeper transformation within the Greek bourgeoisie. The years 1981–90 defined the second phase of metapolitefsi, which saw the rise and fall of the first socialist, even if only nominal, government in Greece and the stabilization of a western-type democracy.

PASOK's triumph created great expectations in the Greek people and great problems within the communist left. Very soon Andreas Papandreou and PASOK shifted away from their "contract with the people" to a more pragmatic stance, abandoning the pledge for Greece's withdrawal from NATO and the EEC and for ousting the US bases. PASOK introduced the basic elements of a welfare system, democratized the state and education, created a national health system, and recognized gender equality and civil marriage. Additionally, it officially recognized the Greek resistance to the Nazis and promoted national reconciliation between right-wing nationalists and the communist resistance. These measures helped PASOK to build a popular profile and, especially during the first period of its governance, to put pressure on the left as many of the latter's immediate demands were materialized. The two communist parties met PASOK's policies with tolerance due to its friendly tendencies toward the eastern bloc. Yet PASOK's foreign policy was nothing but a more daring continuation of Karamanlis's, which Papandreou was better able to implement. In addition to his links with the Arab states, Papandreou's creation of the "initiative of the six nations" for nuclear disarmament was another of his moves to project Greece as an independent player.

The "socialization" of financially problematic industries was accompanied by restrictions on trade union activity, and erupting strikes forced PASOK to a trade union coup d'état in the GSEE's 22nd Conference in December 1983. This was the first point of conflict with the official left, which still demanded to be part of the change, as KKE's slogan, "change cannot be done without the KKE," clearly expressed. PASOKism, however, affected even the most radical forces of the previous period, which were disbanded during 1981–2. The thousands of members of these organizations had given life to numerous campaigns regarding the rights of privates in the army (mandatory in Greece), of prisoners, and for the extension of civil and social rights. The latter was a response to PASOK's stop and search operations "Areti" (merit; Επιχείρησιδ Αρετή), which were part of an urban gentrification plan targeting politically active public spaces. The occupation of the Polytechnic School and the dynamic response to the lethal shooting of a 15-year-old by the police in November 1985, as well as the anti-fascist march against Le Pen's visit to Greece, indicated a new generation of youth political activity influenced by anti-authoritarian and anarchist ideals.

The student movement remained strong and contested PASOK's modernization from as early as 1982. This movement, which opposed EEC educational reforms, culminated in the occupation movement of 1987 that also spread to secondary education. Thus it set up a precedent for successive movements by teachers and students against educational reforms, causing the seat of the ministry of education to be dubbed an "electric chair."

By 1989 PASOK had established its own status quo. The disclosure of the Koskotas economic scandal against the backdrop of radical changes in Eastern Europe created what many believed to be the end for PASOK. One important actor in this period was Synaspismos (Alliance of the Left and of Progress; Συνασπισμός), formed in 1989 by KKE and EAR (the successor of KKE-Interior) under the auspices of perestroika. When the June 1989 elections failed to deliver a working majority for any party, Synaspismos (with 13.1 percent of the vote) attempted to occupy the center of political life by forming a short-term coalition government with the New Democracy conservatives under the slogan "catharsis" (clearance; κάθαρση) from PASOK's corruption. This caused the entire youth sector of KKE to split from the party. PASOK mobilized its anti-conservative populism and managed to retain power, succeeding with a respectable 39.1 percent. In the November 1989 elections, once again no party was able to form a government; PASOK achieved 40.7 percent of the vote, while Synaspismos lost 2.1 percent. Another short-term "ecumenical" government was formed that included PASOK, New Democracy, and Synaspismos.

In the third elections within a year in April 1990, New Democracy won 151 out of 300 seats and formed a government. PASOK slipped to 39.3 percent and Synaspismos lost another 0.5 percent. This period coincides with the introduction of neoliberal policies and the corresponding reconstruction of political and social life. The privatization of the nationalized industries was met by consecutive strikes, the most prominent being that by EAS (ΕΑΣ), the public transport drivers' organization. The latter challenged the need for reforms by the "ecumenical" government and official trade unionism, which failed to provide support and coordination to numerous workers' struggles that received unprecedented popular support. The slogan "when you agree within the parliament, we are the only opposition" voiced by hundreds of thousands of students in the winter of 1990–1 expressed the popular belief of the time. Educational reform proposals were challenged by the occupation of 95 percent of schools and universities in the country, bringing education to a standstill. The government's attempt to put an end to the occupation of schools by violent means in January 1991 resulted in the murder of a teacher, Nikos Temponeras, while four other people were burned by police smoke bombs the following day in Athens, and clashes with police erupted all over Greece. These events forced the minister of education to resign and the white paper was withdrawn. It was the first defeat of neoliberal policies in Greece, achieved by a genuine grassroots movement.

Throughout the 1990s, even after (New) PASOK's return to office in 1993, constant opposition to educational reforms by teachers' strikes and students' occupations acted as a hotbed for a young generation of radical activists. KKE abandoned Synaspismos in 1993 and opposed the Maastricht agenda for a neoliberal restructuring of the EU. The rebalkanization of the Balkans in the 1990s was another focal point of this decade. PASOK's tactics, which were now lined up with US policies, fostered a strong anti-war and anti-imperialist movement in Greece, especially after the handing over of the Kurdish leader Öcalan to the Turkish authorities, with Greek involvement, and the bombardment of Yugoslavia by NATO in 1999. It persisted until the huge global movement against the war in Iraq in 2003. During the same period there were numerous workers' protests against privatization and the effects of globalization and EU policies. Most prominent were the farmers' month-long road blockades of 1996 and the 200,000-strong demonstrations of March 2001 which postponed PASOK's restructuring of the pension system.

The Seattle anti-World Trade Organization (WTO) demonstration and the anti-G8 protest in Genoa, in which thousands of Greek activists took part, contributed to the formation of an anti-globalization movement in Greece, which made its first dynamic appearance at the anti-EU summit protests in Salonika in 2003. The fourth European Social Forum in Athens (May 2006), with its 70,000-strong demonstration, acted as a catalyst, followed by a new movement in education that lasted more than a year and stopped a constitutional reform permitting private universities.

The last decade has also seen the emergence of a permanent anti-racist movement. The disastrous forest fires of 2007, caused by neglect on the part of the conservative government and the handing over of Greece's few remaining open spaces to developers, elicited a strong public reaction and a grassroots movement for the defense of public spaces. This environmental catastrophe almost cost the elections for New Democracy conservatives, who won with only a two-seat majority. These developments saw the vote shift to the left, which recorded its highest score since 1977, and a deep crisis for both PASOK and the two-party political system. The end of metapolitefsi, desperately sought by the Greek bourgeoisie in the hope of finishing with a strong left movement, ironically coincides with the emergence of a new, modern, radical left that once again challenges the rules of the game.

Greek nationalism

Yanis Yanoulopoulos

Greece became independent in the early 1830s, after a prolonged war of liberation/secession from the Ottoman empire. Like the contemporaneous revolts of the Carbonari in Italy and France (1820, 1821) and the victorious uprising of the anti-monarchist Spaniards (1820–3), it was a war fueled by the ideas of the French Revolution, which the diaspora Greek merchants of the secret society Philiki Etairia (Association of Friends) had enthusiastically espoused in order to bring down the Ottoman ancien régime. It was a war carried out by the “damned of the earth” (mostly landless peasants) in the poor and inconspicuous southwestern corner of the sultans’ possessions that had fired the imagination of liberals and radicals all over post-Napoleonic, counterrevolutionary Europe. An eight-year confrontation with the Porte (1821–9), with many ups and downs and considerable infighting, ended in the defeat of the radical elements that had started the revolt. Territorial expansion was the compensatory mirage offered by the new rulers, King Otto and his Bavarian army, since Greece, as the first Balkan nation to achieve statehood, was allowed to exist only as a monarchy, and it ventured into the modern world under the watchful eyes of the three Protecting Powers – England, France, and Russia – who carefully monitored the first steps of this energetic newcomer into the china shop of the Eastern Question.

This was due to the fact that the liberation of the “unredeemed Hellenes” of the empire and, as an ultimate goal (of a millennial nature), the restoration of Christian Byzantium to all its former glory, very soon came to constitute the central pivot of Greek foreign policy. A grandiose program of action, named the Megali Idea (Great Idea), permeated life and society in the new state at all levels. It was much more ambitious than the analogous Nacertanije (Program) of the Serbs, who had first risen up in revolt (1808, 1816) to gain their autonomy from the Ottoman sultan. The means to achieve the Megali Idea, or any substantial part of it, were simply not at Greece’s disposal, but the threat of the unforeseen consequences arising from local action during one or more – or indeed all – of the recurring crises of the Eastern Question throughout the nineteenth century was very real, from the vantage point of London, Paris, and St. Petersburg.

The Greeks may have lacked military strength but they possessed certain advantages at least until the middle of the nineteenth century. They could address appeals for an Athens-led campaign against the “Ottoman yoke” to the other Christian populations of the Balkans, most of whom were still ethnically undifferentiated. Greek was the language of the Orthodox Church and of commerce. Many outward-looking Slavs or Albanian Christians with the necessary means aimed at a Greek education for themselves or their children (the University of Athens opened its doors as early as 1837), adopted Greek surnames, and considered themselves Greek as a way of enhancing their social and economic status. New Greece, “reborn from its ashes,” was an object of admiration of the Philhellenes of liberal Europe. It looked as though the liberation of the Balkans could go hand in hand with its hellenization.

Europe’s approving enthusiasm, however, did not last very long. New Greece did not at all look like the “model kingdom in the East” that was expected to blossom at the southern part of the Balkan peninsula. Philhellenism was steadily going out of fashion. This was preceded by the gradual retreat of the ideas of the Enlightenment that gave it birth. Before the middle of the nineteenth century, the first stirrings of nationalism began to appear in areas other than Serbia (which was already an autonomous entity ruled by a local dynasty). What was worse for Greece’s prospects for western support was the fact that liberal opinion itself seemed to have second thoughts about its Greek “investment.” Administrative chaos, an “incurably eastern” mentality, a civil society that refused to emerge, and an emphasis on religion, which ruled the lives of its mostly agrarian population, were characteristics of a state fit to serve as a client of the hated tsarist Russia rather than as a representative of the ideas of progress and liberty. A staunchly liberal German professor, Jacob Philipp Fallmerayer, came up with the theory that the belief forming the lynchpin of the philhellenic movement – that the Greek-speaking former rayas of the Sublime Porte were the true descendants of Pericles and Aristotle – was all wrong. And Karl Marx, writing on the Crimean War, concluded that all liberation movements in the Balkans were either intentionally serving or simply ended up helping Russia’s reactionary rulers. These adverse conditions for Greek aspirations, however, took some time to seep through. By the middle of the nineteenth century, the Greek position in the Balkans appeared somewhat battered, but it was still fairly strong.

“The Predicted Fall of Constantinople” depicts an allegory of the independence of Greece: a sultan sits on his throne by the Istanbul strait, while Rhigas de Velestino inspires Greek troops to rise up and fight, ending in the establishment of Greece in the Treaty of Constantinople, 1832. From the Pictorial History of the Greek War of Independence (artist unknown/Greek School, nineteenth century). (Private Collection, The Stapleton Collection/The Bridgeman Art Library)

Things began to change with the acceleration of the Tanzimat reforms, the price paid by the sultan for Anglo-French support in the Crimean War. For the Greek-speaking Orthodox Christians of the empire, reform was a mixed blessing. It guaranteed a much greater degree of security of property and of commercial transaction, but it also dealt a serious blow to the exclusive authority of the Ecumenical Patriarchate over all Orthodox Christians in the Balkans, who now claimed their right to appoint their own priests and bishops and to hear the church liturgy in their own language rather than in Greek.

This language was the outward manifestation of the growing sense of nationality that gained momentum, first in Bulgaria – an exarchate, administratively independent from the Patriarchate Bulgarian Church, was established in 1870 – and later in Macedonia, toward the end of the century, among the Vlachs (who, as mostly Greek-speaking merchants, nevertheless tended to side with Athens), and later still in Albania, where the Patriarchate (by now fully hellenized) fought a protracted rearguard battle until the 1920s to prevent the establishment of an autocephalous Albanian Church.

To the growing strength of Bulgarian and, later, Macedonian nationalism, Greece replied using similar methods. It laid a claim to Ottoman Macedonia, based on its “historical rights” in the area and the “real wishes” of its mixed population. These “real wishes,” needless to say, were interpreted very differently by each of the other interested parties (Bulgarians, Serbians, and Macedonian autonomists). The conflict was to develop into an open and bitter war of schools, churches, cultural societies, statistics, and, ultimately, of armed bands, backed by all the above-mentioned parties.

A new and much more radical change in Balkan affairs was heralded by the Young Turk revolution of 1908. In the early days of the new regime, the Greek government toyed with the idea of cooperation with the Porte against their “common enemy,” Bulgaria. The clear victory, however, of the Committee of Union and Progress over their rivals in the Young Turk movement – the liberal wing, who planned to delegate a substantial degree of power to the ethnic/religious minorities in a quasi-“federalized” empire – sounded as a warning bell in Athens, and the same seems to have happened in Sofia.

A policy of cooperation of rival nationalisms in the area seemed to be the only alternative. Sofia decided to bury the hatchet and Belgrade did the same, with more than a little help from Russian diplomacy. Greece, under its new charismatic prime minister Eleftherios Venizelos, joined up at the last moment with almost unseemly haste. The end result was the Balkan Wars of 1912–13, which at one stage brought the western frontiers of the empire to less than 160 kilometers from its capital. It was indeed a time of great exaltation that made it difficult for outsiders to discern the developing cleavage between King Constantine – an admirer of all things German – and his anti-Slav priorities and the more pragmatic approach of his liberal pro-Entente prime minister. World War I brought this conflict into the open and led to the well-known Dichasmos (division) of the nation into two almost equal parts, with Constantine favoring (pro-German) neutrality and Venizelos advocating direct involvement in the war, on the side of the Entente, on account of the “lavish rewards” at the Peace Conference.

With military help from the Entente, Venizelos prevailed and at the end of the war, the prizes were there for the picking. Western Thrace was severed from Bulgaria and passed into Greek hands, and in May 1919, Greek troops landed in Izmir as a result of a rather impromptu decision by the Paris Peace Conference. In opposition since the elections of November 1920, the leader of the liberals was the first to see the writing on the wall from his self-imposed Paris exile. In view of the growing strength of the Turkish national liberation movement, led by Mustafa Kemal, he supported a drastic limitation of Greek military objectives – a necessary first step, perhaps, to a negotiated compromise. It was too late. His opponents, in thrall to an excited public opinion, which was kept in total ignorance by the Athenian press of the real difficulties ahead, had to carry on, smiling confidently in newspaper photographs.

The military impasse that followed the failed advance on Ankara (August 1921) was accentuated by serious financial difficulties. Greece needed an immediate diplomatic exit from the war. It did not happen. Defeat came a year later, in August 1922, and it was Venizelos as the principal Greek negotiator at Lausanne who was called to sign the bankruptcy documents of the Megali Idea (July 1923). The entire leadership of the conservative party, five leading politicians, and the last commander of the Asia Minor army were tried and executed in Athens on charges of high treason.

The combination of military defeat on a grand scale in the Asia Minor war and the political, socioeconomic, and cultural tensions brought about by the influx of more than one million destitute refugees (in an existing population of around five million) had a shock effect on Greek society. The old nationalist/expansionist rhetoric that had reigned supreme in the newspaper headlines of previous decades became discredited, if not suspect.

During the interwar years (1922–40 in the case of Greece), Greek nationalism underwent a genuine metamorphosis, turning inwards in two distinct yet interrelated directions. The movement shifted, on the one hand, toward an exploration of the notion of hellinikotita (Greekness), in an attempt to gain new insights into its indestructible “essence,” and, on the other, it turned militantly against a new enemy. The enemy in question was an internal one: the Greek communist left and its novel internationalist mentality, which gained a firm foothold, mainly in the trade union movement, during the 1920s and 1930s – a development not unrelated to the Asia Minor defeat and the uphill struggle of the refugees in the often unwelcoming environment of “old Greece.”

Even far-right groups in northern Greece, heirs, in a way, to the Greek or Greek-sponsored armed bands who had fought bitterly against other armed contestants over the division of Ottoman Macedonia at the beginning of the twentieth century, had turned their attention not against Greece’s Slav neighbors, the age-old adversaries of “hellenism” in the Balkans, but against another internal foe – the Jewish community of Thessaloniki, which, until the post-1922 exchange of populations with Turkey, was by far its largest ethnic group.

Greek foreign policy between the wars was a policy of both compliance with the decisions of the League of Nations and avoidance, at almost any cost, of external military “adventures.” General Metaxas’s dictatorship (1936–40) – a cross between the Estado Novo of Salazar in Portugal and Fascist Italy – had to toe the same line.

The extensions of World War II into the Balkans, inaugurated by the unprovoked attack by Mussolini’s army on Greece’s Albanian borders in October 1940 – the failure of which was followed by the occupation of the whole peninsula by the Wehrmacht (1941) – radically changed the scene once again. In occupied Greece, as in occupied Yugoslavia and Albania, an all-powerful resistance movement (EAM/ELAS) emerged, one that was initiated – again as was the case with its northern neighbors – by the outlawed Greek Communist Party (KKE) (which had been banned at the beginning of Metaxas’s dictatorship). It was run by local recruits who answered the “patriotic” call for the liberation of their fatherland from the Nazis, in keeping, no doubt, with the best traditions of rebelliousness, which was still at a high premium in the then predominantly rural Balkan societies.

The governing liberal and conservative/royalist elites of the interwar years were completely marginalized during the Axis occupation. Most of their clientele transferred their allegiance to the resistance and its promise of a “fairer society” after the end of the war, some collaborated openly with the occupiers and their puppet government in Athens, while others preferred the time-honored practice of attentisme. The only way in which the former political rulers of Greece could hope to emerge from oblivion in the postwar era was to wave the flags of Greece’s Ethnika Themata (National Issues) – in other words, past territorial claims against its northern neighbors which, in their view, could be reopened following the unexpected victory of the Greek army against the Italians in the winter of 1940–1. The victory came just at the moment when Britain stood alone against Hitler and created a positive attitude toward “little heroic Greece.”

These so called “National Issues” comprised the question of northern Epirus, i.e., the largest part of southern Albania to which Greece had finally lost its longstanding claim back in the early 1920s, as well as two non-starters: the substantial “correction,” in Greece’s favor, of its borders with Yugoslavia and the “rolling back” of the long Greek–Bulgarian frontier to a safe(r) distance from the Aegean Sea. If in the case of the territorial dispute between Athens and Tiranë one could argue that this matter had been settled de facto (as Greece had refrained from even mentioning its claims for almost 20 years) but not de jure, the last two claims involved the “correction” of the peace treaties of 1913 and 1919 following, respectively, the Balkan wars of 1912–13 and World War I, which had been unchallenged ever since.

This did not stop the anti-EAM forces in Greece, when, after Stalingrad, the tide of the war began to turn against the Axis, from accusing members of the resistance that they were not keen on the territorial rewards due to their country because these were issues likely to bring them into conflict with their communist comrades in other resistance movements in the Balkans, which were poised to seize power in Yugoslavia, Albania, and (eventually) Bulgaria, after Germany’s expected defeat. At the height of their power and influence (1943–4), with about two-thirds of Greece under their effective control, EAM/ELAS and the KKE had no problem answering these charges (in clandestine or freely circulating publications), pouring scorn on the “cheap tricks” of the Greek nationalists who, “like nationalists and fascists everywhere,” were engaged in the lowest form of political deceit. They were heirs to the same “criminal rhetoric” that had led to the ignominious defeat in the Greco-Turkish War of 1922, “fatherland mongers” who were, at best, conspicuously absent from the only front for “true patriots”: the resistance front.

Following the military defeat of the Greek left, however, in the Battle of Athens (December 1944–January 1945) – which was fought for control of the Greek capital shortly after the German withdrawal by local ELAS resistance members, along with British troops brought in from Italy and their motley allies, including many ex-collaborators – the tables were turned against them. Faced with this new situation, Zachariadis, KKE’s general secretary, who had just returned to Greece from a German concentration camp where he had spent the war years, opted for a complete volte-face in regard to the so-called “National Issues.” Instead of continuing to denounce their right-wing protagonists, he decided to join the game, promoting his own “National Issues” which were of guaranteed popularity, since they too involved territorial gains for Greece designed to embarrass the opponents to the left.

The first of these left-sponsored “National Issues,” which, admittedly, made only a brief and somewhat awkward appearance in some left-wing newspapers during 1945–6, was the demand for the “return” of eastern Thrace to Greece. This was a province of the Ottoman empire that Greece had held from 1920 to 1922 following a treaty that was never ratified, and then lost to Turkey as a result of the Greek defeat in Asia Minor. This call for the unilateral revision of the international Treaty of Lausanne (1923) came out of the blue. It was put forward for the simple reason that the Greek government, propped up by British troops, and the government of Turkey were at the time close allies in the ideological war on communism – it has been argued that they were forerunners in the Cold War which began in earnest in 1947 – and on the Soviet Union.

The other focus however, for which KKE propagated the need for “panhellenic agitation” – the Cyprus Question – was a much more serious matter. It was in fact, and to a large extent still is, six decades later, albeit in a different context, the Greek “National Issue” par excellence, leaving an indelible imprint both on the Greek left and on its rivals. Interestingly, when Zachariadis first placed the need for a “concerted struggle for the liberation of Cyprus from British colonialism and its Enosis [union with Greece]” on the public agenda in 1945–6, General Grivas, the future leader of EOKA, the pro-Enosis guerilla movement on the island in the mid-1950s, condemned the KKE initiative as an “anti-national ploy” designed to sow the seeds of discord between Greece and Britain, its most valuable ally. General Grivas was at that time heading a British-sponsored paramilitary organization of the far right (called X), which had fought alongside British troops in the Battle of Athens.

During the civil war (1947–9), Cyprus made the headlines again. At the closing stages of that war when, in an attempt to replenish the ranks of its guerilla army, the KKE promised complete autonomy to the Slav-speaking minority of Greek Macedonia, the left found itself once again on the defensive amid the minefield of “National Issues.” To charges of “treason” – a view now shared, to various degrees, by a sizable portion of public opinion, particularly in northern Greece – Zachariadis replied with an urgent call for an all-out struggle that would lead to the Enosis of Cyprus with its “motherland.”

In 1949, against its better judgment, the Cypriot Communist Party (AKEL) was prevailed upon to finally turn down the set of constitutional proposals for extensive self-government of the island which Britain, hard pressed on a number of fronts in its colonial empire, had put on the table a year earlier. In the early 1950s, however, no longer under the influence of the KKE, the left in Cyprus became skeptical about the wisdom of pressing for instant Enosis, and AKEL changed its position. In yet another move of musical chairs, Grivas, a staunch anti-communist, took up the cause of Enosis, turning the fire power of his EOKA guerillas not only against British troops on the island but also against other selected targets: AKEL “traitors” and Turkish Cypriots. The KKE, on the other hand, having been defeated in the civil war and banned, with its leadership in exile in Eastern Europe and its political front in Greece – EDA/United Democratic Left – operating in conditions of semi-legality, continued to toe the “patriotic” line on the Cyprus Question and never wavered in its support for EOKA.

It has been argued that this policy of outdoing the church (at the head of the pro-Enosis Panhellenic Committee in Athens) and the traditional right-wing nationalists in anti-British rhetoric made a lot of political sense at the time. True, Britain was no longer the military power that propped up the Greek regime, having relinquished this role to the US in 1947, but both were pillars of NATO. The pro-Enosis agitation in Greece, therefore, leading to massive demonstrations with the wholesale participation of the left (and occasionally ending in serious clashes with the police and the shooting dead of demonstrators), did acquire an anti-NATO and anti-western dimension.

What was even more important, however, was that by immersing itself in the pro-Enosis movement, the KKE, less than ten years after the end of the civil war, achieved a remarkable comeback into the fold from which it was ostracized in 1948 on account of its pro-autonomy policy for the Slav-speaking Macedonians. Long after it was deemed a mistake and rescinded, the policy constituted for many years the main ideological weapon of the victors in the civil war against the side that lost it. In other words, and in view of the fact that nationalism was always extremely popular in Greece (save for the brief period of EAM preponderance during the resistance), the Cyprus issue was the deus ex machina that ended the political isolation of the Greek left. But it came at a price. It endowed its discourse with a quasi-permanent element of populist/nationalist rhetoric – this is certainly true of the KKE today and to a much lesser extent of the new left radicals and activists of Synaspismos (which had incorporated the Eurocommunist KKE-Interior) – long before these matters became commonplace with the post-1989 communist parties in Eastern Europe and in Russia itself.

With the Cyprus Question still open for almost 50 years after independence (1960), another “National Issue” made its unexpected yet spectacular entrance into Greek politics in the early 1990s. This was the resurrection of the old Macedonian controversy in a new form. Following the breakup of Tito’s Yugoslavia (1990–1) and the imminent independence of its southern part, the Republic of Macedonia – so named in 1944, without any protest or signs of annoyance from the Greek side at the time – a number of mayors of northern Greek towns began a vote-catching campaign on the subject of what Greece's northern neighbor "ought to be called," and came up with the absurd demand that the former Yugoslav Republic should not, as an independent state, include the word "Macedonia" in its name in any form, since all things "Macedonian" – in their view, which was enthusiastically endorsed by all mainstream political parties – were an intrinsic part of Greek cultural heritage. Faced with the refusal of the newly independent republic to comply with this demand, and the inability of the rest of the world to understand what the Greeks were talking about (and why), Athens responded with a 19-month trade embargo that badly damaged Macedonia's landlocked economy.

The embargo was lifted in 1995, after a UN-negotiated Interim Agreement – by 1993 Macedonia was already a member of the UN under the provisional name of the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (FYROM) – which provided for the inviolability of its frontiers and left the two countries to find a solution to the name dispute. With Athens insisting on its original position in the years that followed, "negotiations" became a mere formality and Skopje used that time to gain diplomatic recognition under its constitutional name, the Republic of Macedonia, from about two-thirds of the UN's members, including four out of the five permanent members of the UN Security Council.

In 2008 Athens finally decided to change its position and limit its demand to a name that reflected the geographical fact that its northern neighbor represented a part and not the whole region of Macedonia. On this basis, Greece had successfully vetoed the accession of the Republic of Macedonia to NATO until a new agreement between the two parties could be worked out.

Green bans movement, Australia

Meredith Burgmann and Verity Burgmann

The Australian green bans movement lasted from 1970 to 1975. It was the first such action in the world. It occurred when builders' laborers (BLs) took the unusual action of refusing to work on environmentally or socially undesirable construction and a significant social movement developed in support of these bans. The movement saved Sydney from much of the devastation that would otherwise have been wrought by developers and had international ramifications within environmental politics.

The trade union involved was the New South Wales branch of the Australian Builders' Laborers' Federation (NSWBLF), which covered unskilled and certain semi-skilled workers employed on building sites. The NSWBLF, with about 11,000 members, was guided by many committed officials, including three particularly outstanding union leaders: Jack Munday, Joe Owens, and Bob Pringle. They were strongly influenced by new left ideology with its emphasis on equality, participatory democracy, and direct action. The union became committed to the principle of “the social responsibility of labor,” insisting all work should be socially useful and ecologically benign. Munday maintained unions had to become involved with environmental issues because “too few people question the products we make” (Munday 1988: 179–80). Owens argued that unions had the ability to restrain corporations and prompt governments to reconsider foolish decisions, so had to concern themselves with “important social issues” and “become more active in opposing pollution and despoliation of natural resources” (Canberra Times, March 2, 1973).

Green bans were also imposed by other state branches of the Builders’ Laborers’ Federation (BLF), preserving threatened bush, parkland, housing, and historic buildings in Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Canberra, Perth, and Hobart. However, green bans were most significant in Sydney and other areas of New South Wales, where the construction boom was centered and the union branch most committed to the bans.

In February 1973, Munday coined the term “green bans” to distinguish them from traditional black bans. He claimed the use of “green” expressed the union’s determination to save open space or valued buildings and ensure people in any community had some say in what affected their lives (Munday 1981: 105). The neologism assisted “green” to enter the world’s political vernacular. Petra Kelly’s launching and naming of the German Greens was motivated by her experience of the green bans when she visited Australia in the mid-1970s and became inspired by the way they brought together resident activists, conservationists, and unionists.

The first green ban was imposed by builders’ laborers in Melbourne in October 1970 to prevent a developer destroying a park in the inner-city suburb of Carlton. In Sydney, the first green ban occurred in June 1971 when a resident action group from the suburb of Hunters Hill sought the help of the NSWBLF to save Kelly’s Bush on Sydney Harbor foreshore, where developer A. V. Jennings wanted to build luxury houses. The union agreed to ban the destruction of Kelly’s Bush, which remains a public reserve – with a plaque to commemorate the green bans.

The green bans were of three main kinds: to defend open spaces from various types of development; to protect existing housing from demolition to make way for freeways or high-rise development; and to preserve older-style buildings from replacement by office blocks or shopping precincts. Environment, heritage, and social issues were intertwined. In contrast to the pattern of middle-class flight from American inner-city areas, gentrification of inner-Sydney suburbs threatened low-income residents with displacement by developers keen to exploit more affluent markets. The Rocks on the edge of Sydney Cove was both a working-class residential area and site of the first British settlement. Despite its historical significance, only a green ban prevented these oldest buildings in the country being replaced by high-rise office blocks and luxury apartments. In other instances, the green bans’ defense of working-class residential areas was linked with the NSWBLF’s opposition to freeway construction and diversion of funding from public transport. Many fine old theaters, banks, and other civic buildings were also preserved, because the NSWBLF refused to demolish any buildings deemed valuable by the National Trust.

After the first success at Kelly’s Bush, resident action groups rushed to ask the NSWBLF to impose similar bans. The union was prepared to defend its green bans on picket lines and at demonstrations, and was aided by enthusiastic residents inspired by the bans, which enhanced their chances of success. A popular green bans movement slogan was “People before Profits,” indicative of the radicalized resident activism encouraged by the NSWBLF action in challenging developers. The green bans movement also rallied left-wing students and other political activists after the intense campaigns around Vietnam and apartheid sporting tours had subsided. In Victoria Street in Kings Cross, green ban supporters squatted for months in the houses protected by green bans to prevent deliberate damage to them by criminal associates of the developer.

By 1975, in New South Wales, more than 40 green bans had stalled AU$5 billion worth of development at mid-1970s prices. About half of these prevented the destruction of individual buildings or green areas; the other half thwarted development projects affecting much larger areas, such as Woolloomooloo. Munday maintains that the political significance of the green bans movement was that it forged a “winning alliance” between environmentalists and unionists.

The movement ended when developers, desperate to break the green bans, bribed federal officials of the BLF to move against its New South Wales branch. Late in 1974 these officials arrived in Sydney, declaring the NSWBLF had “gone too far on green bans.” Despite massive protests against this “intervention,” the federal union and employers worked together to ensure only builders’ laborers with new “federal” union tickets were employed in the industry and those with “state” tickets were denied a living. Work commenced on some sites that had been subject to green bans – but many were saved permanently.

Despite the breaking of the bans, they had a significant longer-term impact on environmental legislation, town planning, and public attitudes. Because of the power wielded by the builders’ laborers and the popularity of the green bans, governments were obliged to respond to the union’s challenge. At both state and federal levels, governments initiated or improved legislation to ensure more socially responsive and ecologically responsible planning and development.

Greencorn Rebellion, Oklahoma, 1917

John Trumbour

An uprising against military conscription in World War I, the Greencorn Rebellion mobilized a social base of eastern Oklahoma tenant farmers including whites, African Americans, and Native Americans against US intervention in Europe and wider economic injustice. Centered in Seminole, Hughes, and Pontotoc counties during early August 1917, this rebellion led to the cutting of telegraph lines, destruction of bridges, and wider mayhem, provoking the authorities to round up over 450 people in the sparsely populated region. In total, 184 people received indictments, with 150 found guilty.

The Greencorn name refers primarily to the early harvested crops used to feed the rebels and secondarily to the annual rites celebrated by several Native American nations in the weeks before the uprising. Though rebels were armed, they hesitated to fire upon the posses suppressing the insurrection. As Greencorn rebel Walter Strong recalled: “Some of the men in the posse were neighbors of ours, and we couldn’t shoot ’em down in cold blood. That’s the way we felt ’bout the Germans too. . . . We didn’t have no quarrel with them at all” (Green 1978: 360).

Spearheaded by the Working Class Union (WCU), an organization that established a national headquarters in 1914, the revolt sought to ignite a wider social conflagration by enlisting farmers and the downtrodden in many states. The leaders envisioned a people’s march on Washington, culminating in the overthrow of the Democrat regime of Woodrow Wilson, whom the Oklahoma protesters called Big Slick. They labeled World War I “a rich man’s war, a poor man’s fight.”

Wilson had run for US president in 1916 and secured Oklahoma’s electoral votes under the slogan “He kept us out of war.” Even so, Oklahoma gave the Socialist Party presidential candidate Allan Benson his greatest state support: 15.55 percent of the total compared to a figure of 3.3 percent nationally. In 1912, socialist Eugene Debs had received 6 percent of the national vote and over 16 percent in Oklahoma, a percentage exceeded only in Nevada. US Senator Thomas Pryor Gore of Oklahoma, a Democrat, steadfastly opposed US entry into World War I even after the intervention, and some contemporaries blamed him for emboldening the Greencorn rebels. A populist who did not like people, in the formulation of his grandson Gore Vidal, T. P. Gore lost his Senate seat in 1920 due to the counterattacks on his putative lack of patriotism.

Oklahoma radicalism had several currents, incorporating populism, Pentecostal Christianity, and socialist visions of a just social order ultimately stirred into action by severe agrarian distress and the ravages of boom-and-bust capital. According to the 1890 census, less than 1 percent of Oklahoma farmers had tenant status, though the actual figure may have been higher as recent arrivals into Indian Territory anticipated they would make a swift transition to ownership. With an extraordinary burst of speculation increasing land prices by 246 percent from 1900 to 1910, over half the farmers had fallen into tenant status by 1915. The Panic of 1907 in particular drove many farm owners into foreclosure and tenantry. Of those who still owned farms, a majority found themselves paying off burdensome mortgages, which in the three counties of the rebellion carried the nation's highest interest rates. Anti-usury statutes in the state of Oklahoma had proven ineffectual in stopping the exorbitant gouging of tenant farmers, who reported annual interest rates ranging from 20 to 200 percent and on occasion higher (Sellars 2002: 1110–13). The WCU called for the “total abolition of the crime, disease, and death-producing practice of rent, interest, and profit taking.” Henry Starr, who carried out spectacular thefts of trains and banks, gained sympathizers among the hill people of Oklahoma for saying that the bankers were indeed in “the robbery business, too” (Burbank 1976: 141, 148).

The Greencorn Rebellion has been dismissed as an upsurge of country bumpkins and yokeldom, the doomed remnants of rural idiocy. The reality is that finance capitalism had spread the railways, the telegraph lines, coal mines, and oil wells to Oklahoma, and many tenant farmers had experience laboring in a variety of industries, especially in mining and petroleum drilling. WCU organizer “Rube” Munson is frequently dismissed as a rube; but Cal State Hayward feminist Roxanne Dunbar-Ortiz and Harvard historian John Womack, Jr. in an unpublished essay note that Munson's father had joined up with John Brown in the fight against slavery, while Rube himself had decades of work and organizing experience in Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, and Oklahoma (Dunbar-Ortiz & Womack ca. 2007). In his autobiography, the socialist organizer Oscar Ameringer conceded that, despite “poor schooling,” the rebellious tenant farmers had “a great deal of native intelligence. . . . Their state of illiteracy protected them, partially at least, against the flood of lying propaganda with which their ‘betters’ of press, pulpit, and rostrum deluged the country, while their native common sense allowed them to see through the pretensions of the war mongers far better than could many a PhD, LL.B., or D.D.” (Ameringer 1940: 350).

Even though the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) had largely spurned tenant farmers and Greencorn rebels later expressed betrayal at the hands of “electric-light city” socialists, the authorities cited the rebellion as justification for a suffocating blanket of repression thrown upon the IWW and the Socialist Party (Dunbar-Ortiz 1997: 15). With the support of town notables, respectable professionals, and a variety of petty bourgeois elements, the Ku Klux Klan unleashed further waves of reactionary terror against radical sympathizers in the countryside. Though the IWW had some bursts of vitality in the 1920s, agrarian radicalism in the Southwest fell into decline. In August 1940 Oklahoma arrested 12 people, including the Ivy League-educated state secretary of the Communist Party Robert Wood, under a law inspired by the Greencorn Rebellion proscribing criminal syndicalism, which was defined as “the doctrine which advocates crime, physical violence, arson, destruction of property, sabotage or other unlawful acts or methods, as a means of accomplishing or effecting industrial or political ends, or as a means of effecting industrial or political revolution” (Howell 1991).

The Greencorn Rebellion continues to generate reflection on a number of scholarly and activist fronts. Communication scholars have wondered whether attacks on telegraph lines, while having immediate strategic aims, may have also reflected a deeper hostility to corporate abuses in monopolizing the communication system, which rendered prices many times more expensive in the United States than in the telegraph systems of other nations under public post office control (Schiller 1996: 8–10). Meanwhile, Thomas Frank's polemic, What's the Matter with Kansas? (2004), has contrasted the agrarian radicalism of the early twentieth-century Plains with the postwar conformity and reaction that persists into the twenty-first century: “The poorest county in America isn't in Appalachia or the Deep South. It is on the Great Plains, a region of struggling ranchers and dying farm towns, and in the election of 2000 the Republican candidate for president, George W. Bush, carried it by a majority of greater than 80 percent” (Frank 2004: 1). The Greencorn Rebellion remains a signal event for retracing the origins of this extraordinary historical rupture.

Greenpeace

Terry Simmons

Greenpeace is a household name associated with dramatic efforts to save whales and harp seals from commercial exploitation and to stop nuclear testing in Alaska and French Polynesia. Known around the world for its aggressive environmental advocacy, non-violent direct action, and clever, media-savvy events, Greenpeace International has organizations in 42 countries in Europe, the Americas, Asia, and the Pacific. Headquartered in Amsterdam, it has about 2.8 million supporters worldwide, and describes its actions as “bearing witness in a non-violent manner.” In short, Greenpeace is the manifestation of the common elements and concerns of the environmental movement and the peace movement.

The group's activism began in 1971, when protesters and journalists sailed to confront US underground nuclear testing at Amchitka Island in Alaska's Aleutian Islands. Despite humble beginnings, Greenpeace established fundamental, innovative attributes that transformed and expanded the way Greenpeace International and the environmental movement operates today. The origins, values, and tactics of Greenpeace were shaped in the formative years of 1969–74. Greenpeace began as both an organization and a concept in 1969 with a small group of a few dozen single-purpose, ad hoc volunteers in Vancouver, British Columbia. Greenpeace's original goal was to stop or at least protest the US Atomic Energy Commission's detonation of the Cannikin underground nuclear test on Amchitka Island scheduled for October 1971. But events at Amchitka Island transcended the concerns of anti-nuclear protesters. Since Amchitka Island had been part of the US Fish and Wildlife Service wildlife refuge system, more conservation activists had become concerned about the island as well.

The combination of environmental and peace politics at Amchitka Island illustrates the unique ability of Greenpeace to deal with issues and circumstances that reach far beyond an organization's normal sense of purpose or boundaries. Many protest groups strictly avoid entanglement in issues beyond their own stated concerns, while others form alliances or coalitions with related protest groups. In contrast, Greenpeace combined aspects of the environmental and peace movements to become a hybrid. It merged and expanded the scope of a traditional conservation organization (concerned with wildlife, natural landscapes, and public land management) with the purposes, tactics, and moral urgency of well-established pacifist groups.

The Quakers, the American Friends Service Committee, the Committee for Non-Violent Action, and other pacifist groups had vocally opposed nuclear warfare, testing, and weapons development during the 1950s and early 1960s. But many active and powerful peace organizations became moribund after the ratification of the Limited Nuclear Test Ban Treaty of 1963, while others shifted their attention to the escalating war in Vietnam. In contrast, the Amchitka protest was strictly limited: no position was taken against the war in Indochina. Greenpeace opposed nuclear testing by all the nuclear powers, including France, the Soviet Union, China, and the United States. Since sailing to the Chinese test site in the Gobi Desert was not possible, Greenpeace started with the US testing site in Alaska. A protest voyage of the Vega, or Greenpeace III, to Mururoa in French Polynesia would follow.

Greenpeace created a necessary bridge between those persons concerned about the environmental consequences of nuclear testing and those individuals opposed to nuclear testing and nuclear warfare generally. While environmental health studies of radiation and fallout had been conducted in the 1970s, mainstream environmental groups would not embrace issues concerning the environmental consequences of military activities or the civilian use of nuclear power plants until the mid-1970s. As obvious as it may seem now, the first lasting contribution of Greenpeace was to create a successful hybrid – Green + Peace – that expanded the dimensions and possibilities of the environmental movement.

Greenpeace's most distinctive and enduring attributes are the concept of bearing witness and the strategy of non-violent direct action. Both were originally inspired by the attempts of Albert Bigelow and the crew of the Golden Rule to sail to the Eniwetok test site in 1958, and by Earle Reynolds, who sailed the Phoenix into the security zone established around Bikini Atoll. The Golden Rule's crew was arrested and the vessel seized in Hawaii; Reynolds was arrested for sailing into a prohibited zone too close to the test site.

Together, the voyages of the Golden Rule and the Phoenix provided a model for action, a renewed sense of purpose, and valuable lessons for a new, ambitious organization. Ultimately, the fishing vessel Phyllis Cormack, soon renamed Greenpeace, sailed from Vancouver's False Creek fish dock on September 15, 1971, en route to the Amchitka underground test site, 2,400 nautical miles northwest, in the stormy waters between the North Pacific and the Bering Sea. Following the principles of non-violent direct action, the crew of Greenpeace planned to arrive at Amchitka shortly before the scheduled test to observe and record the environmental impact of Cannikin insofar as it was possible, and to establish a floating picket line in international waters off the island.

The voyages of the Golden Rule and the Phoenix had demonstrated to Greenpeace a serious flaw: the protest voyages had little political impact. Very few persons had been aware of the peace activists' drama on the high seas. Bearing witness often involves standing or sitting in silence in the public plaza or in the middle of the road. Protests are non-violent and tend to be passive, since the demonstration, be it a picket line or voyage to a distant island, speaks for itself.

Greenpeace embraced a distinctly secular version of bearing witness during its voyage to Amchitka. At the same time, the volunteers about Greenpeace realized that floating picket lines were not enough. Accordingly, the crew organized its own media campaign onboard. The crew of 12 included, by design, four experienced journalists, who sent almost daily accounts back to Vancouver for distribution to the media and the general public. Direct action journalism transformed the process of bearing witness from a distinctly local phenomenon into a worldwide event.

Greenpeace created a new modus operandi which combined direct action with sophisticated, aggressive use of mass media. The protest vessel became an active stage for crafting purposeful messages, spreading daily news, exploiting newsworthy events, and even making explicit political propaganda. The crew of Greenpeace was well versed in the media theories of the age, including Marshall McLuhan's dictum that "the medium is the message." For these activists, the entire world was a stage, literally and figuratively, whether sailing to remote islands or speaking to large urban audiences. Non-violent direct action took the form of practical and media-savvy activities.

Ultimately, the Greenpeace voyage was turned back by the US Coast Guard and the prospects of heavy, early winter seas. In the middle of Akutan Bay, one of the most dramatic events during the entire voyage occurred when the Greenpeace crew received a simple, handwritten letter of support, signed by 18 US Coast Guard crew members, just as their commanding officer was in the process of ordering the skipper of the Phyllis Cormack to turn around and to report to US Customs at Sand Point, Alaska. Significantly, this was the only Greenpeace event that reached the US mass media directly, when Walter Cronkite reported the incident on the evening television news.

Nonetheless, political momentum was building. The Cannikin underground nuclear test was detonated on November 6, 1971, but the nuclear testing program was canceled a few months later, and the US Atomic Energy Commission returned management of Amchitka Island to the US Fish and Wildlife Service. Altogether, the first voyage of Greenpeace, initially a mere battered halibut-fishing boat, increased the scope of environmental activism by merging the environmental movement with the peace movement, and by embracing and transforming non-violent direct action with new, sophisticated tools for aggressive, global environmental action.

Grenadian Revolution, 1979–1983

Brian Meeks

Early in the morning of March 13, 1979, a small group of armed militants of the opposition New Jewel Movement (NJM) stormed and captured the army barracks at True Blue on the tiny southern Caribbean island of Grenada. Simultaneously, another detachment secured the sole radio station, renaming it “Radio Free Grenada” and calling on the citizenry to take to the streets and demand, by popular demonstration, the surrender of all police stations across the island. Six hours later, NJM and constitutional opposition leader Maurice Bishop declared the formation of the People’s Revolutionary Government (PRG), arguing that the revolution was for “work, food, shelter, and a bright future for our children,” and all resistance ended. The NJM was in effective control of Grenada and her two smaller Grenadine islands of Carriacou and Petit Martinique.

The Grenadian Revolution lasted for some four and a half years. It collapsed in October 1983 when deep, though previously hidden, divisions in the party leadership led, first, to the detention of Bishop, the popular prime minister, and then, in a series of fast-moving events, to his release by a crowd of supporters, their seizure of a military base, and, tragically, the recapturing of the base and murder of Bishop and some of his closest allies by soldiers of the People’s Revolutionary Army (PRA), of which he had been, until these events, commander in chief.

The Grenadian Revolution can be considered part of a powerful though short-lived wave of postcolonial revolutions that occurred in the late 1970s. Indeed, while in terms of scale and international significance it pales in comparison to the Iranian and Nicaraguan Revolutions that both took power in the same year, it shares many structural similarities. All three involved a postcolonial government that was widely considered corrupt and had lost support across the social and political spectrum. All three took power in an international window of possibility, predicated by the hesitancy of the United States in the latter phase of its post-Vietnam syndrome, to intervene in local insurgencies. And all three declared themselves militantly anti-imperialist, though Grenada and Nicaragua adopted more typical Marxist revolutionary principles, while Iran chose its unique brand of Shi’ite Islamic fundamentalism. Yet, it would be an error to see these processes as simply local manifestations of an international conjuncture. All three owe their origin and development significantly to local histories and conditions. The Grenadian Revolution, in particular, requires careful scrutiny, because it is the single instance of revolutionary overthrow in the Anglophone Commonwealth Caribbean, a region where parliamentary electoral politics has predominated in the postcolonial period.

Historical Background: From Eric Gairy to Revolution

The origins of the 1979 Revolution can be traced to the popular upsurge of 1951 and the rise to prominence of Eric Gairy in Grenadian politics. Unlike many other Caribbean territories, Grenada avoided the riots of the 1930s against extremely adverse social and economic conditions. However, when agricultural staple prices fell in 1950 and employers demanded a rollback in wages, local stoppages and other forms of resistance, including incendiary acts, occurred, leading to a general strike across the island in February 1951. Despite the declaration of a state of emergency, the presence of a British warship, and the detention of the striker leader, Eric Gairy, the governor was unable to prevail, and the strike gained momentum through February and into March. Eventually it was only Gairy, released by the governor, who was able to convince the workers to return to work in exchange for wage increases and union recognition. This victory signaled the decisive rise to prominence of the black trade unionist Gairy in Grenadian politics, a position he would not lose until the triumph of the Revolution in 1979.

Gairy can be considered a prototypical messianic leader. From a poor, rural background, he had traveled to nearby Aruba to work in the oilfields. On his return, with newly acquired trade unionist skills, he placed himself at the head of the unrepresented workers as their hero and redeemer from both economic and racial bondage. His political role can be divided into two periods. Before Grenada's independence in 1974, he sought to provide some relief for his poorest supporters. This was manifested primarily in wage increases and the normalization of trade union negotiations. However, it created a bedrock of loyal followers, many of whom never deserted him. More substantially, he used his limited control over the state apparatus to illegally enrich himself and a small elite of his supporters. This was evident in the 1961 "Squandermania" scandal, when under the damning report of a commission of inquiry exposing extensive corruption, he was forced from office and banned from participating in politics for five years. When he returned to leadership after victory in the 1967 general elections, Gairy resumed his old policies. His 1968 "Land for the Landless" program bought out or acquired the estates of the local oligarchy, but the beneficiaries were not so much the genuinely "landless" as the government itself or its closest associates. Gairy also bent the electoral rules to suit his purposes. In both the 1967 and 1972 electoral exercises, credible charges of vote rigging and intimidation of opponents were made against Gairy and his party, the Grenada United Labour Party (GULP).

After his 1972 victory, however, Gairy faced new, formidable opponents. In 1970, nearby Trinidad and Tobago had experienced the "Black Power Revolution" – three months of huge demonstrations against the perception that eight years after independence the economy was neocolonial and that there still remained deep racial biases in employment and social life. The Trinidadian movement and the regional and international upsurge of radicalism of the late 1960s had profound effects on Grenada. Newly returned university graduates combined with local activists to form a variety of black power organizations. The nascent movement opposed Gairy's authoritarian rule, describing it as a dictatorship, and supported popular actions like the 1970 nurses' strike. Gairy in turn formed a detachment of police aides – derisively labeled the "Mongoose Gang" – who brutalized members of the growing movement and their supporters, particularly among the unemployed youth. The perception of widespread vote rigging during the 1972 election gave further impetus to the radical opposition. Some younger members of the losing Grenada National Party (GNP) were now convinced that the Gairy regime could not be defeated by conventional means and joined the black power movement.

However, it was Gairy's decision to seek independence from Britain without having raised it as an election issue in 1972 that helped to create the decisive coalition against his leadership. Supporters of the movement from the working classes and unemployed saw independence as an opportunity for Gairy to unleash further brutality against them, without the constitutional restraints of the colonial power. Members of the middle and wealthy classes who had always seen him as an arbitrary usurper were also afraid of unhindered Gairyite power and were convinced that he had gone too far. The new organization that emerged to address the widespread dismay was led by members of the young, radical intelligentsia, notably Maurice Bishop and Unison Whiteman, and was called the New Jewel Movement.

The NJM was formed in 1973 and began immediately to organize large demonstrations against the regime and other targets of the movement. In May, it gathered some 15 percent of the country's population to a Convention on Independence. In November, on the eve of a People's Congress to call for Gairy's resignation, the leadership of the NJM, including Maurice Bishop, Unison Whiteman, and Selwyn Strachan, were brutally beaten by members of the Mon-goose Gang and police regulars, precipitating a general strike and popular street demonstrations that lasted for three months.

The 1974 pre-independence lockdown can be considered the first phase of the Grenadian Revolution. The widespread support for the action suggested the extent to which Gairy, with his messianic, authoritarian brand of leadership, had become isolated. The upsurge also decisively placed the NJM and its leaders, particularly Maurice Bishop, at the head of a broad national movement. The NJM was not, however, able to remove Gairy in 1974. In February the strike was broken and Gairy, with British support, declared independence. The defeat of the popular upsurge led to a rethinking within the NJM of its ideological and organizational structures. The decision was made to abandon loose and open structures and to create a Leninist vanguard. Ideologically, the new approach provided the basis for a variety of alliances, including a critical one with the bourgeoisie against the common opponent of the Gairy regime. Leninism also implied the elaboration of different levels of organization within the party, including legal as well as clandestine forms, all under the strict direction of a Central Committee (CC) and Political Bureau (PB).

The new approach began almost immediately to pay dividends. In the 1976 general elections, the NJM was able to forge an alliance with the traditional opposition GNP. Unable to defeat Gairy in what was again considered a rigged election, Bishop, along with Whiteman and Bernard Coard, nonetheless won their seats, and Bishop became the formal leader of the opposition in parliament. From this new position, Bishop and the NJM were able to consolidate their popular support and campaign against Gairy more effectively in local, regional, and international forums. The NJM, however, never abandoned clandestine forms and prepared a small military contingent alongside its legal, parliamentary arm. On March 10, the houses of a number of NJM leaders were searched simultaneously while they attended a party meeting. On March 12, PB member Vince Noel was arrested and while in custody urged by sympathetic police to escape by nightfall in order to save his life. That day Eric Gairy left for New York, and NJM leaders claimed that he had left orders for their arrest and murder. NJM militants assembled that evening and at 4.00 a.m. on March 13, launched the decisive attack against the army barracks at True Blue.

The NJM in Power

The first years of NJM rule witnessed the paradoxical juxtaposition of a healthy pragmatism in political and economic policy with a dogmatic approach to internal party organization. The first statements of the leadership, including forgiveness of former supporters of the regime, the retention of the Commonwealth principle of the queen as head of state, and the announcement that elections would be held in due course, all served to win support among the moderate elements in Grenadian society and neighboring parliamentary regimes in the Caribbean. The election promise, however, increasingly became a millstone around the party's neck, with the failure to hold elections in the first four years. The policy of detaining opponents of the Revolution, or "counters," was also paid scant attention when it involved just a few members of the Gairy regime. But as the number of political prisoners increased over the years, it became a major point of contention with regional governments and human rights advocates.

The PRG did undertake some novel political initiatives. The annual budget debates, of which three were held, involved citizens at all levels in the discussion and ratification of the annual budget. While this process was still very experimental, it suggested an alternative impetus, toward a reliance on popular direction and away from centralist control. This was also the case with the Parish Councils, which were nascent bodies of popular debate and democracy in the communities, though throughout the life of the Revolution, they were more receivers than initiators of policy. These were accompanied by innovative educational programs, like the adult literacy Center for Popular Education (CPE) and the National In-Service Teacher Education Program (NISTEP).

The most striking feature of the Revolution, however, was one largely hidden from the public. The party, reaping the benefits of power from its policy of centralism and clandestinity, which helped in the March 13 overthrow, sought not to expand its membership by bringing in its many supporters but to further restrict entrance by the application of rigid, supposedly Leninist principles of selectivity. This led to a tiny, centralized, and increasingly hierarchical party, with a membership overburdened with administering the state and increasingly alienated from the population at large.

The economic policies of the regime were equally pragmatic. Based more on neo-Keynesian policies of infrastructural development than on more esoteric notions of “socialist orientation,” they centered on the building of an international airport. A full-sized international airport with the ability to land the largest carriers had always been a dream of Grenadians, but one never fulfilled under previous regimes. The PRG was able to assemble the finances from an international consortium, though the greatest technical and manpower assistance came from Cuba. This project, along with others in roads, public works, and housing, helped to significantly reduce youth unemployment and won greater support for the government throughout the country.

The government’s international policies were more complex. The PRG followed a consistent policy of opposition to “US imperialism,” which won it no friends in the Reagan administration. This, it could be argued, might have been its best defense, given the stated hostility of the US government to the PRG. However, the absence of nuance in this approach was also obvious. When the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan in 1980, rather than adopt a neutral position in keeping with its non-aligned status, the PRG sought to stand with a small minority of states that supported the USSR, creating unnecessary enemies. Yet, the sources of finance that the government was able to secure for the airport and other projects, from Europe, Canada, the OPEC countries, and elsewhere, suggest that on the diplomatic front it was far from being isolated.

The Collapse of the Revolution

By early 1983 the Grenadian Revolution appeared to be more consolidated than ever. It had weathered a number of early tests to its power, including attempts to assassinate the PRG leadership in 1980. Despite the numerous threats coming from the US government and the various military maneuvers in the Caribbean and the Atlantic directed at a mock invasion of Grenada, the country seemed secure so long as it retained a measure of acceptance in the Caribbean Community (CARICOM) and the wider Caribbean. This seemed certain, for when in 1980 some Caribbean leaders had tried to isolate Grenada at the CARICOM summit in Jamaica, the attempt backfired and Maurice Bishop emerged triumphant, with the full support of the meeting and the applause of the local population.

There were, however, profound rifts within the party and government and these would soon prove to be fatal. Bernard Coard, deputy leader and minister of finance, had resigned from his party positions in October 1982 on the basis that he did not have the support of other members of the leadership. This reflected a deeper division that had grown between Coard and Bishop as the Revolution progressed. Bishop had always been the popular leader of the NJM, with his attractive, charismatic personality. Coard, on the other hand, had been the ideological and organizational genius, who had helped convert the party to Leninism in 1974 and build its clandestine structure for the overthrow in 1979. However, when Bishop became prime minister, his profile and that of the PRG as a whole rose both nationally and internationally, while that of the NJM slipped into the shadows. It was this tension between the small, centralist party with its increasingly overburdened membership cadre that actually ran the government and the growing national and international profile of the popular leader, coupled in 1983 with a downturn in the economic fortunes of the government, that led to a crisis of leadership and the denouement of the Revolution.

In early 1983 a number of loans promised to the PRG were not fulfilled. This led to some layoffs, and unemployment, for the first time in four years, was once again on the increase. Party members also reported significant declines in attendance at NJM meetings, popular functions, and militia training at the same time that the US was staging new maneuvers off the coast of Barbados and making increasingly bellicose sounds toward Grenada. Within the NJM, the response to these threats was to strengthen Leninism, and more critically to call for the return of Bernard Coard to the party in the position of joint leader with Maurice Bishop.

The introduction of joint leadership eventually led to the destruction of the Grenada Revolution. Whatever the intention of the advocates of this notion, whether conspiratorial or benign, it was fraught. Bishop had been projected for four years as the single leader. He had developed a mass following far beyond that of the party and, despite Grenada's diminutive size, had become an international figure of substantive proportions. To ask him to simply reduce his stature within the party to that of joint leader, without any evident crisis, was entirely unrealistic. When the Central Committee and subsequently the majority of the NJM membership voted for such a proposal, they placed the party and the Revolution on a crash course. In order to understand this, it is important to recount the sequence of events. On September 16, 1983, the majority of the CC voted in favor of joint leadership, with Bishop abstaining. On October 25, an extraordinary meeting of the membership of the NJM again voted in favor. After intense debate, a wavering Bishop was eventually won over to the idea. On September 26, Bishop left for a scheduled trip to Eastern Europe and Cuba. On October 8, he returned and immediately expressed renewed reservations. On October 12, a rumor circulated that Bernard Coard and his wife were planning to kill Bishop. On investigation, one of Bishop's personal security officers suggested that the rumor started with Bishop himself. On October 13, in response to this accusation, Bishop was detained indefinitely. On October 19, after days of popular agitation, he was freed from detention by a large group of demonstrators, overwhelming the guard at his residence. Bishop and his supporters then marched and took over the large garrison at nearby Fort Rupert. The Fort, now under his control, was soon attacked by a contingent of soldiers loyal to the NJM, who after skirmishes, recaptured it, arrested Bishop and a number of his closest followers, and executed them.

The death of Maurice Bishop signaled the fatal blow to the Grenadian Revolution. Six days later, a force of US Marines and soldiers landed by air and sea in Grenada and, after fierce but limited resistance, defeated the PRA and arrested the surviving leaders of the party and army. Many of the former leaders, including Bernard Coard, remain in prison to this day.

The demise of the Grenada Revolution was not simply, if at all, a question of hegemonic power and military superiority, but an internal political breakdown and a failure of the creative imagination. The NJM, despite some novel and promising policies, failed to move beyond dogmatic notions of ideology and political organization rooted, ultimately, in another experience, and therefore was unable to forge creative approaches to politics and society appropriate to the needs of Grenada and the wider Caribbean in the postcolonial period.

Grimké, Angelina (1805–1879) and Sarah (1792–1873)

Danielle Gougon

Sarah and Angelina Grimké helped pioneer the anti-slavery and women's rights movement in the United States. Although they were born into a wealthy, slaveholding family in Charleston, South Carolina, the sisters were profoundly disturbed by the concept of slavery and shared the belief that all people are created equal.

The sisters became formally involved in anti-slavery efforts when they converted to the Quaker faith in the late 1820s. In addition to its anti-slavery doctrine, Sarah and Angelina were also attracted to the Quakers' acceptance of women into leadership positions within the church. However, the sisters soon found that the church's views on women were too conservative for their taste; they were disappointed by their limited roles within the church and they longed to be more involved with the anti-slavery effort.

A letter to the editor Angelina wrote in 1835 to William Lloyd Garrison's newspaper, The Liberator, changed the sisters' lives forever. In the letter, Angelina professed her support and commitment to the abolitionist cause. The letter, which was published without Angelina's knowledge, received an overwhelming response and was later reprinted in all of the major reform newspapers of the day. The anti-slavery community embraced the sisters as it was rare to have members of Southern slaveholding families, especially women, speak out against slavery. The American Anti-Slavery Society asked Sarah and Angelina to become agents of the Society and tour the country lecturing about their experience and knowledge of slavery.

In 1837 Sarah and Angelina officially embarked on a tour of 67 American cities. The tour caused great controversy. The sisters were arguing for immediate abolition, a strategy that was rebuked by many in the abolition movement. Even more controversial was the fact that Sarah and Angelina Grimké were among the first women to speak publicly to audiences composed of both men and women. The sisters endured a bevy of criticism for speaking in public; ministers, fellow abolitionists, and the general public accused the sisters of violating the "natural role" and "proper sphere" of women.

Sarah responded to the attacks by writing a series of letters defending a woman's right to speak in public. The public outcry over their lectures also heightened Sarah and Angelina's awareness of the parallels between the condition of slaves and the subjugation of women in society. These letters were later compiled and published as the Letters on the Equality of the Sexes and the Condition of Women, one of the first documents to link slavery to the unequal treatment of women. Angelina concluded the tour in 1837 with an address to the Massachusetts State Legislature and in doing so became the first woman in United States history to address a legislative body.

Grove Vallejo, Marmaduke (1879–1954)

Mauricio González Arenas

Marmaduke Grove Vallejo, military man, political and revolutionary Chilean, was born in Copiapó on July 6, 1878. Son of the attorney Jose Grove and Ana Vallejo Burgoa, between 1924 and 1949 he stood out as one of the principal figures of Chile's political scene.

In 1892 he joined the naval academy, from which he was expelled for taking part in a so-called “revolt of the hard bread,” which took place in 1894. In 1897 he entered military school, graduating as sub-lieutenant of artillery. In 1906 he traveled to specialize in a German regiment of artillery, returning to Chile in 1911 with the rank of captain. In 1913 he became part of the Artillery Regiment of Tacna. Between 1920 and 1924 he served as assistant director of the military school of Santiago.

On September 2, 1924, 56 army officers entered the Senate abruptly during the voting of new parliamentary diets to protest the rising incomes of politicians while there were legislative delays and problems concerning labor laws and the pay of soldiers. This action, with Grove as outstanding figure, was named the “noise of sabers” and constituted the commencement of the coup d’état of September 1924. The coup was led by a group of civilian and military leftist opponents to Alessandri. As a colonel, in January 1925 Grove was designated by the new government as director of the school of military aviation and head of the military mission in Europe. In 1926 Vice President Carlos Ibáñez del Campo, who in 1927 would become dictator, sent him again to Europe. Understanding that Ibáñez sent him to Europe only to remove him from political life, in January 1929 he signed the Agreement of Calais. In this document the conspirators swore to reconquer democracy for Chile. He was expelled from the army and exiled in November 1929. On September 21, 1930 he returned to Chile on board a red plane ready to depose Ibáñez. Caught again, he was deported to Easter Island.

After the fall of Ibáñez, Grove, who had fled to Europe, returned to Chile and in February 1932 was reincorporated into the army. One month later he was designated chief of the Chilean air force. On June 4, 1932 he rose against the government and proclaimed the Socialist Republic of Chile, in which he served as secretary of defense. A product of the political and social chaos, the movement was led by Grove and Carlos Davila, among others. At this time, the Communist Party was weak and the Socialist Party had not even been founded.

The socialist experiment only lasted 12 days. On June 16, 1932 Carlos Davila, president of the meeting, betrayed and demolished the Socialist Republic with another coup d’état, and Grove was deported to Easter Island. This did not prevent him from being proclaimed presidential candidate for the elections in October 1932. Despite returning from exile only two days before the voting, he obtained second position with 17.7 percent of the vote. The winner was Arturo Alessandri Palma.

On April 19, 1933 Grove helped found the Socialist Party of Chile (PS). He was elected senator for the periods 1933–41 and 1941–9. As senator he stimulated a rejected Agrarian Reform titled “No to the land without men, no to the men without land.” Marmaduke Grove died in Santiago on May 15, 1954 at the age of 75.

Guadeloupe, labor protest

Yarimar Bonilla

Guadeloupe came under the authority of the French crown in 1674 and, with the exception of a few brief British takeovers, has remained under French control until the present day. However, despite its seeming stability as a French territory, its place in the French nation has always been ambiguous, fluctuating, and often violently contested.

French citizenship was originally granted to Guadeloupean residents in 1848 following the abolition of slavery. Yet, this was at best a partial or “colonial citizenship” in that they did not possess the full spectrum of rights and responsibilities as citizens of mainland France. In 1946 political elites in the French Antilles sought to remedy the social and economic disparities in the region by promoting greater integration into the French nation. Thus, at a time when the colonial territories throughout Africa, Asia, and the Caribbean were being swept into the global tide of decolonization through political independence, politicians in the French Antilles sought to strengthen, rather than break, their ties to the colonial center by fully integrating the Antilles into the French nation as “overseas departments.”

The political project of departmentalization, as conceptualized by its main proponent Aimé Césaire, was born out of the conviction that the lingering economic disparities and structural inequalities that plagued the French Antilles could only be resolved through full political integration into the French nation. However, this move coincided with major shifts in the global market for tropical exports that radically transformed the local economy. As a result, under departmentalization, agricultural production slowly gave way to a service-based economy, centered on tourism, commerce, French imports, a bloated government bureaucracy, and an ever-increasing dependency on French welfare and government subsidies. The collapse of the agricultural economy led to skyrocketing unemployment rates, increased rural-to-urban migration, and significant social unrest, including numerous labor strikes, most notably among agricultural workers. Many of these strikes and protests became the targets of government repression, as in the February 14, 1952 labor strike at the Gardel sugar mill in the town of Le Moule, during which French military police opened fire on striking workers resulting in four deaths and over a dozen injuries.

During this period, the French government sought to calm rising dissatisfactions through the promotion of migration to the French mainland. This led to the creation of an Office for the Development of Migrations from the Overseas Departments (Bureau des migrations intéressant les Départements d’Outre-mer, BUMIDOM), which during its operations from 1963 to 1981 successfully recruited more than 84,000 Antillean workers to mainland France. The establishment of the BUMIDOM responded to numerous objectives, including the stabilization of the political and economic climate in the Antilles, and the demographic control of the outrre-mer populations. In addition, Antillean immigrants provided a cheap labor force, particularly for poorly remunerated jobs in the public sector.

Many of these immigrant workers became actively involved with local labor unions and civic associations. Initially, these activists were concerned with improving the reception and training of migrants arriving in France. However, over time, greater emphasis was placed on improving work conditions back home in order to put an end to organized migration from the Caribbean, and specifically to put an end to the BUMIDOM, which became a symbol of the unfulfilled promises of integration. In fact, the BUMIDOM offices were seized by Antillean activists in May of 1968.

As Antillean migrants increasingly headed to the metropole in search of education and employment opportunities, there was also a notable influx of mainland French citizens (locally referred to as métropolitains) to the Caribbean overseas departments. These French transplants filled positions as top administrators, civil servants, technocrats, and cadres in the enlarged government bureaucracy. The influx of French bureaucrats, combined with the massive migration of Antillean workers, led Aimé Césaire to describe the situation as a form of “genocide by substitution.”

The increasing dissatisfaction of local political elites with the results of departmentalization led to the rise of a new anti-colonial movement in the French Antilles. From the 1960s to the 1980s Guadeloupe experienced a strong nationalist wave that included numerous bombings, riots, and other forms of social protest. This movement was fueled by the militancy of both Antillean workers and students in mainland France. University students in particular were significantly influenced by the struggles for decolonization in the former French colonies, the rise of pan-Africanism, the Cuban and Algerian Revolutions, and the political climate leading up to the May 1968 movement in France. These students came together under new or reinvigorated student associations such as the General Association of Guadeloupean Students (Association Générale des Etudiants Guadeloupéens, AGEG). From the AGEG numerous organizations sprouted, including the Front Antillo-Guyannais (FAG) in 1961 and the Groupe d’Organisation Nationale de la Guadeloupe (GONG) in 1963.

These groups consisted of only a handful of leaders (mostly former AGEG members), but their propaganda campaign against the French presence in the Antilles, and their efforts to build a mass movement, quickly caught the attention of the French government. In May of 1967, during a GONG-supported labor strike among urban construction workers, national police opened fire on demonstrators leading to three days of racial violence, rioting, and police repression which left numerous Guadeloupeans dead. The exact number of deaths is unknown; at the time French police claimed only seven deaths, while militants claimed that over 45 died in the three-day massacre. In the days that followed, numerous activists and militants were arrested and charged with treason. In 1968, 18 activists were tried for political crimes before the Court of State Security (Cour de Sûreté) in mainland France. Several of them were sentenced to stiff prison sentences for their presumed involvement in the nationalist struggle.

This period of repression led to a shift in the anti-colonial movement in the French Antilles. In response to increased persecution, nationalist activists went underground in the Guadeloupean countryside and began mobilizing agricultural workers. In the tradition of the Marxist and Maoist movements of the time, labor leaders began organizing rural peasants, carrying out literacy campaigns in the countryside, and setting up “night schools” where peasants were taught basic reading and math skills. Labor activists gained wide support from local peasants, in part because of their use of the Creole language, but also because their form of “popular” unionism differed sharply from the previous “old guard” unions that were simple extensions of national organizations in France, and thus ill equipped to address the needs of Guadeloupean workers. These efforts eventually led to the creation of the Union of Agricultural Workers (Union des Travailleurs Agricoles, UTA) in 1970, and the Union of Poor Guadeloupean Peasants (Union des Paysans Pauvres de la Guadeloupe, UPG) in 1972. Both of these unions merged together into the General Union of Guadeloupean Workers (Union Générale des Travailleurs de la Guadeloupe, UGTG) in 1973.

With the rise of this new labor movement, the nationalist current became reinvigorated once again in Guadeloupe. In 1978 labor activists and nationalists created a new political organization, the Popular Union for the Liberation of Guadeloupe (Union Populaire pour la Libération de la Guadeloupe, UPLG), which sought to bring together different factions of the nationalist movement under the political platform of national independence, while highlighting the importance of cultural practices such as Creole language revival, and an emphasis on gwo ka music and dance.

While the UPLG represented a mainstream alternative for nationalist politics, during the 1980s a new series of militant and clandestine pro-independence and armed struggle groups emerged, such as the Armed Liberation Group (Groupe de Libération Armée, GLA), the Caribbean Revolutionary Alliance (Alliance Révolutionnaire Caribéenne, ARC), and the Popular Movement for Guadeloupean Independence (Mouvement Populaire pour la Guadeloupe Indépendante, MPGI). During the early 1980s these groups claimed responsibility for over 60 bomb attacks throughout the Antilles and mainland France. Targets included hotels, department stores, airline companies, automobile clubs, banks, prisons, restaurants, police stations, and tax offices. Their movement soon became a target for state intervention. In 1984 the French government arrested Luc Reinette, the presumed leader of the MPGI, and by the end of the 1980s the French government had incarcerated or forced into exile many of the movement’s principal leaders.

During the 1990s these armed struggle movements faded away, and labor activism remained the main site of social struggle and protest. The 1990s marked the height of the labor movement’s strength in Guadeloupe as the UGTG expanded into the lucrative hotel industry, the mammoth civil service sector, and other key sectors of the economy such as communications, commerce, and the petroleum industry. These efforts were aided by the political climate of the Mitterrand government in France (1981–95) and its decentralization policies, which created a fertile ground for both labor organizing and social struggle. In addition, union membership rose dramatically during the implementation of the 35-hour work week in France (1998–2000), as workers became syndicated in order to enforce the 35-hour work week in their industries.

Today the UGTG is the largest labor union in Guadeloupe with over 6,000 members and is responsible for over 70 percent of all labor strikes on the island. It currently represents workers across a wide spectrum of labor sectors, including hotels, hospitals, gas stations, civil service, transportation, and even the fast food industry. Although the UGTG has become an important presence in Guadeloupean politics, it is often criticized for bringing an anti-colonial ideology into the sphere of syndicalism and for becoming involved in struggles that extend beyond the workplace – such as battling for Abolition Day to become a local holiday, or going on strike to force multinational companies to sell their franchises to Guadeloupean workers rather than foreign interests.

In order to engage in these wider struggles, labor leaders have sought to foster the development of a new organization (or cultural arm) charged exclusively with issues of historical memory and cultural identity. In collaboration with a handful of politically engaged historians and university professors, in 2001 they created a new organization called NONM which was charged with expanding the politics of the UGTG beyond the sphere of syndicalism. The organization takes its name from the Creole word for “Man” or “Humanity.” Their stated goal is to fe nonm, which in Creole means literally to “make man.” Within the domain of union struggles this idea is often invoked in relationship to the development of an increased political consciousness. Labor strikes are thought to fe nonm on the picket line through the creation of new social relationships with fellow strikers, bosses, and the wider society. Within the context of the NONM organization, to fe nonm speaks to the creation of a new historical consciousness through an engagement with local histories of resistance and collective struggle, particularly previous histories of anti-colonial resistance, and the histories of slave revolts and Maroon communities.

As Guadeloupe enters the new millennium, the local labor movement remains an important site of social struggle. Through labor organizing, Guadeloupean activists continue to question the lingering colonial ties that link the French Antilles to mainland France, while simultaneously emphasizing local cultural practices and fostering an active engagement with previous histories of protest and resistance.

Guaicaipuro (ca. 1530–1568)

Dario Azzellini

Guaicaipuro was a pre-Columbian indigenous leader, or cacique, in the Spanish province of Venezuela in the sixteenth century who organized fierce and successful resistance against the Spanish colonialists, driving them from the region of Los Teques in the Caracas Valley and the nearby coast for nearly a decade. In the twenty-first century, Guaicaipuro remains a popular icon in Venezuela of indigenous power and resistance to foreign colonial incursion. Guaicaipuro was cacique of his own village called Suruapo or Suruapay, situated in the region of Los Teques, north of the Caracas Valley. As chief of several indigenous clans in the region, Guaicaipuro formed a broad alliance against Spanish colonialism.

In 1560, after the Spanish discovered gold in Los Teques and commenced mining, Guaicaipuro and 500 rebels defeated the Spanish soldiers, forcing an end to their operations. In other battles, Guaicaipuro defeated settlers and colonialists, prompting Venezuelan governor Pablo Collado to send a force to mollify the indigenous insurgency and resume mining operations. After the Spanish soldiers left, mistakenly believing Guaicaipuro dead, he attacked the mines and killed all the workers, destroying Fajardos, a new settlement in the Caracas Valley. Continued efforts to restore Spanish control over the indigenous peoples failed. In 1561, Guaicaipuro ambushed and killed colonial leaders of the settlement.

In February 1562, Guaicaipuro organized a strategic alliance of caciques in the region, defeating Luis de Narváez's Spanish expeditionary force. Out of 150 Spanish soldiers, only three survived, forcing the colonialists to flee to Margarita Island, just north of Venezuela's mainland. However, intent on colonizing the mainland, the Spanish soon returned to wage war for control over Venezuela. On July 25, 1567, Spanish armies defeated 17,000 indigenous soldiers from 16 regional tribes in the western Caracas Valley. Guaicaipuro and several other caciques had been unable to engage the Spanish forces, due to poor weather. After the Spanish victory, the alliance unraveled, leaving the way for Spanish forces to conquer indigenous communities one by one.

In 1567, the Spanish founded Santiago de León de Caracas, but remained wary of attacks by Guaicaipuro and set out to capture him, dead or alive. In 1568, with the assistance of indigenous collaborators, Spanish military forces reached and attacked Suruapo. In a fierce struggle, Guaicaipuro was killed by colonial troops who set fire to his dwelling.

Through the centuries Guaicaipuro has represented the fearless and courageous struggle of the indigenous people. However, the Venezuelan government did not officially commemorate Guaicaipuro until 2001, when President Hugo Chávez, a descendant of indigenous peoples, ceremonially inaugurated him into the country's National Pantheon. His memory was further publicly honored in October 2003 when Venezuela created Mission Guaicaipuro, a program to restore collective land rights, human rights, and sustainable ecology for the 500,000 members of the country's 33 indigenous communities.

Guatemala, Democratic Spring, 1944–1954

Henry J. Frundt

The Guatemalan revolution of 1944 remains a high point of democratic resistance in Central America, and perhaps the western hemisphere, in the mid-twentieth century. The revolution offered the structural opportunity for state and nation to integrate, networks to expand, and new indigenous and oppressed identities to surface and have a voice in society. Jorge Ubico's policies generated an explosive buildup of resentment that culminated in a series of strikes in 1944 at United Fruit and elsewhere, but the revolutionary movement really expanded as students filled the streets. Soon they were joined by disgruntled small business people, military officers, and intellectuals. When the telegraph and railway workers organized a general strike, Ubico stepped down and Juan José Arévalo (1944–51) soon emerged as the national leader. While he mainly reflected youthful, middle-class interests, Arévalo also made structural changes beneficial to workers and indigenous. He eliminated the vagrancy law and rural militias and promoted a fairer economic system. Labor unions coalesced via the National Committee of Trade Union Unity (CNUS) "for unity for the proletariat and protection of rights for all." Workers successfully gained the 1947 Labor Code that set minimum wages, equal pay, social security, and the right to strike, despite objections from the US and the United Fruit Company with its 40,000 workers and thousands of unplanted acres. However, like earlier liberal visionaries, Arévalo also sought to include Indian communities in the national project by replacing backward and feudal models with "sensible capitalist development." To promote this approach, his administration asked the Instituto Indigenista Nacional to implement a rural education program that would promote national culture and appropriate patriotic emblems. To stimulate greater Mayan involvement in political life, the government encouraged political parties at the municipal level. Of these, the Revolutionary Action Party especially became a network of Indian campesinos that challenged local ladino leaders. By 1948, half of the highland communities had elected indigenous mayors. Peasant organizations also successfully lobbied to extend labor rights to rural workers. Labor actions against United Fruit accelerated.

Even broader Indian participation occurred in the subsequent administration of Jacobo Arbenz (1951–4), a colonel in the Guatemalan army. Under Arbenz, hundreds of thousands of indigenous workers joined a national movement that pursued their new right to unionize and accelerated their claims over local property. According to ministry of agriculture surveys, they owned 88 percent of farms but only 14 percent of the land. Even more amazing, less than 12 percent of privately owned land was under cultivation. The Guatemalan Section of the Communist Party (PGT) played a key role in unifying 400 worker organizations under the banner of the General Confederation of Guatemalan Workers (CGTG), bringing together Indians and ladinos in one broad movement of 200,000 workers with both Christian and communist ties that portended significant implications for the rest of Central America. Petitions from newly organized indigenous also led Arbenz to issue a major land decision in 1952. While conceived as an anti-feudal proposal, the Agrarian Reform Law 900 was mainly aimed at unused plantation land which the law would transfer to campesinos. The law also set up a fairly careful process in which local agrarian councils evaluated the suitability and fairness of any land transfer by considering historical claims and earlier expropriations. In addition, the government provided extension services and credit.

Decree 900 was effective, largely because of the willingness of campesinos and rural workers to organize and confront the violent opposition of landowners. They created more than 3,000 councils by October 1952, and distributed 1.5 million acres to 100,000 families. Rural unions rapidly expanded in most villages, competing with campesino leagues to see who could better provide social services and protect the dispossessed against violence from landlords and armed officials. At times, the interests of small rural hamlets (aldeas) conflicted with ladino municipal leaderships, so the peasant unions created a separate route of influence beyond traditional state and religious structures. They displaced local officials and rented municipal lands to broader constituencies. Several scholars suggest that these steps undermined traditional community supports, thereby weakening indigenous coherence and identification. Indeed, some land was given to the landless, bypassing propertied campesinos. Nevertheless, despite the residue of traditional disputes, most evidence points to a strengthening of local communities.

In 1953, Arbenz nationalized unused United Fruit properties. At one point the company held 20 percent of Guatemala's arable land. The government agreed to compensate United Fruit for double its purchased value. But it also sought a new Pacific highway that would end the United Fruit shipping monopoly. The banana firm summoned its friends in Washington and the CIA to protect American power from the "communist threat." Historians debate the degree to which the takeover of United Fruit properties precipitated the US intervention that sadly ended the Guatemalan revolution, an action for which US President Clinton finally apologized in 1998. What is clear is that the US was very worried about the rising autonomy of Mayan and ladino workers and communities as they gained a sense of their own power. US leaders feared their efforts could well be replicated in other nations and therefore had to be terminated. In addition, the Guatemalan army felt its traditional role in the countryside was being supplanted by activist unions. All agree that the US intervention established a new kind of professional army in Guatemala, one schooled by US officers to torture civilians and impose severe human rights violations. It also ushered in a period of repression against all forms of social activism that continues to have severe and detrimental consequences for labor unions, non-profit organizations, and autonomous indigenous Mayan entities throughout the country. The US government cancelled military aid in response to a congressional mandate because of these abuses.

Guatemala, popular rebellion and civil war

Henry J. Frundt

More than any Central American nation, Guatemala remains a country of indigenous as well as ladino (mistiso) protest and revolution, joining the ranks of Bolivia and Ecuador. In its struggle, the Mayan “nation” often contests an authoritarian or capitalist “state” and the interests it represents. As time progresses, the struggle assumes an increasingly nuanced character that integrates class and ethnicity.

Mayan Resistance to Spanish Colonialism (1524–1820)

Guided by their commitment to a spirituality and culture centered on maize, in the sixteenth century the Guatemalan regional population stringently resisted the Spanish occupiers. The Maya’s foundation document, the Popol Vuh, urged “that all arise, that all be called.” Although Tecún Umán, leader of the Quichés, was defeated near Quetzaltenango (the region’s second largest city) in 1524, the neighboring Cakchiquels fought on for five years. Mayan resistance that characterized the Yucatan peninsula up through the nineteenth century also marked western Guatemala, despite that region holding the Spanish Captaincy General of the isthmus. As a countermeasure, the Spanish concentrated the Indians into separate towns, intended to facilitate agricultural labor and taxation. The division also reinforced the more than 20 differing Mayan language and subcultural systems. Nevertheless, notable rebellions periodically developed in the Verapaz provinces (1556, 1633), Tecpan Guatemala (1764), and Cobán (1770, 1803). The Mayan Quiché took over church lands in 1811, rebelled against levied tributes in 1818, and declared an independent Totonicapán with a separate constitution in 1820 under Anastasio Tzul. Nevertheless, the Maya and other Mesoamerican indigenous groups’ predominant mode of protest was to form a “closed corporate community,” as Eric Wolf has characterized it, one that “emphasizes resistance to influences from without which might threaten its integrity.” The communities downplayed personal acquisition or manifestations of wealth as an antidote to colonial pressure and acquisitiveness. They surrendered taxes to the crown, but in exchange received local autonomy. Since Guatemala did not have extensive mines or plantations (lowland cacao areas proved disease-prone), the government did not require a massive labor force. Certainly some workers migrated from the highlands to work for wages in indigo or sugar production and several thousand became forced labor on indigenous Spanish (Creole) wheat farms. In so doing, they learned Spanish and adopted Creole dress and religion, becoming cultural “ladinos.” Biological mestizaje also increased ladino membership. However, most highland Mayans resisted such transformation, preferring to farm their own communal plots, practice their own cofradia brotherhood rituals, and govern their municipalities via elders or principales.

In a separate protest, the urban Creole, mestizaje, and acculturated families became increasingly disenchanted with the tax and control system imposed by the Spanish crown, especially after the Bourbon reforms of the late 1700s. They desired to “liberalize” the country from foreign control. As part of Mexico, Central America became independent when that nation won its independence in 1821. The following year the autonomous Central American nation was founded, consisting of Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador, Costa Rica, and Nicaragua.

Thus as a process, Mayan protest and revolution developed quite distinctly from liberal protest and revolution. Although both impetuses had commonalities, they also contained important differences that affected each of the three bases of social movements: structural opportunities, mobilizing networks, and forged identity. The postcolonial period reveals three major phases of each movement: indigenous reaction to nineteenth-century liberalization (1821–1944); indigenous involvement with the nation’s democratic revolution (1944–54); and Mayan participation in social demands and guerilla campaigns (1960–96). In the second two periods, indigenous and ladino protest joined forces in notable ways.

The Anti-Liberal Revolts (1821–1943)

The colonial period established the context for subsequent protest. At the time Guatemala declared independence, it still retained the provincial structures that the crown used to control much of the isthmus, from Chiapas to Costa Rica. Both the local Spanish elite and the more liberal Creole elite had established bases in the capital which they tapped to form the United Central American States. By 1830, this political congruence had disintegrated. So under Dr. Mariano Gálvez (1830–8), an admirer of the US Constitution, Guatemala established a separate liberal regime that abolished ecclesiastical privilege and sought to fully integrate the Mayan people on an equal basis. The results had unanticipated structural, network, and identity effects. First, such integration meant that indigenous communities lost the special autonomy they had received from the crown and Spanish elites (an opportunity indigenous elsewhere did not receive). So when Gálvez imposed the new changes, the Mayan highland communities reacted negatively. From the standpoint of identity, they had no desire for an equality that assimilated them into a national project, even one that promised economic development and investment. In 1837 and 1838, they rebelled against fresh attempts at forced labor. By 1838, with Mayan assistance, the conservative elites overthrew Gálvez and restored Indian protections along with ecclesiastical benefices. The Rafael Carrera administration that followed (1837–46) maintained some of these protections and identities. While capitalist development expanded in other areas, Guatemalan Indian communities retained control over their own property, labor, and religious practices with only minimal incursions from urban administrative and religious interests. When this regime was not honored, uprisings restored traditional arrangements, such as in 1846 in Verapaz, Sololá, Ixtahuacán, Chichicastenango, and Cotzal.

This situation remained until the liberal takeover of 1871 under Justo Rufino Barrios, who abolished church and Indian lands to stimulate capitalist development, and implemented a modern army, civil bureaucracy, and well-funded infrastructure. Like Gálvez, Barrios took a proactive view toward Indian assimilation. However, his new structural rationale was to expand coffee exports that were already rapidly transforming the central highlands and neighboring El Salvador. The Barrios government redistributed communal Mayan land to investors who would produce for wider markets, attracting German families for coffee production. When the state added guaranteed labor recruitment, an increasing number of Mayans joined the ranks of permanent ladino workers to prepare the earth and tend seedlings on landed estates. However bean harvests required a much larger workforce, including women. Highland villages in the “closed corporate community” mode often mounted a major resistance against Barrios policies, with a dramatic show of force in 1876 in Totonicapán. This caused Barrios to retaliate with significant military force that restored entrepreneurial claims on indigenous labor. Soldiers entered communities and transferred land from dissidents to those who cooperated, thereby undermining Mayan community networks. While the city of Quetzaltenango remained under Mayan control, traditionalists sought subtle rapprochement with the nation-state.

Nevertheless, both Mayans and ladinos reacted against liberal policies. Indians revolted in 1885 (Alta Verapaz), 1898 (San Juan Ixcay), 1905 (Totonicapán), and 1906 (Alta Verapaz). Elsewhere, workers confronted other foreign investors, such as Electric Bond and Share and United Fruit. When the latter took control of the International Railways of Central America and operated Guatemala's largest port, it brought together large groups of workers who had never before interacted. The company's abusive treatment of these workers fomented resentment, creating a structural opportunity for new worker consciousness. The International Railways' 15,000 workers helped establish the Guatemalan Section of the Communist Party (PGT) of Central America in 1922, and the Workers' Regional Federation of Guatemala as a radical alternative to class-collaborationist efforts from the AFL. In 1931, the ruling classes consolidated behind dictator Jorge Ubico. Ubico followed the state policies of Barrios, implementing a vagrancy law with the primary intent of providing labor for coffee. Army officers with coffee interests oversaw its implementation. Ubico also lowered wages, banned strikes, and executed scores of labor leaders. In the mid-1930s, the leader expressed his admiration for Adolf Hitler.

By 1940, three social classes had structurally developed within the region: the Creole elite, which now included an influx of German capital in the coffee sector; the ladino workforce that served as permanent workers, plantation administrators, and lower-middle merchants; and the semi-proletarian Mayans who lived communally in the highlands and traveled seasonally to labor in coffee, sugar, and other traditional exports. Structurally, however, Ubico made the miscalculation of alienating both ladino and Mayan sectors, precipitating reactions such as the 1944 Cakchiquel rebellion in Patzicá against loss of lands. Just as the economy was behaving precariously, the president sided with fascist Germany, to the dismay of international elites.

The Insurgent War (1960–1996)

The considerable repression unleashed between 1954 and 1960 sent most protest underground. In its horrendous attack, the government cancelled the registration of 533 local unions, arrested known communists, and killed thousands of community activists. While the US raised a perfunctory protest, it implemented its regional military counterinsurgency training program. At the same time, economic conditions deteriorated significantly for 90 percent of the population, in part because it did not have enough land on which to subsist while wages remained stagnant. However, rebellion against these conditions subsequently expressed itself in three major phases: the early guerilla movement (1960–8); urban labor and popular protest (1972–80); and the struggle for peace (1986–96).

Early Guerillas (1960–1968)

In 1960, a group of officers training near Quetzaltenango learned that without army knowledge, lands were being utilized as a training area for anti-Castro forces readying an attack against Cuba. Having been exposed to the principles of a patriotic military under Arbenz, these officers found such use of national territory vilely objectionable. They also had increasingly become attuned to economic conditions faced by the people. In November, nearly a third of the army mobilized to overthrow the corrupt Ydígoras administration (1958–62). When they were rebuffed, several leading officers (Turcios, Yon Sosa) escaped to the eastern ladino region where they enjoyed peasant support. Meanwhile, the largely underground PGT, which had roots in the 1944–54 period, also formed a military unit that sought a revolutionary response. With some PGT support, in 1962 the officers formed the Revolutionary Movement of November 13 (MR-13), which demanded land for campesinos through a moderately socialist program. Just as students' and women's groups protested fraud in the interim elections, the insurgents consolidated as the Rebel Armed Forces (FAR), gaining notable peasant recruits east of the capital. FAR pursued the foco approach of irregular attacks developed by Che Guevara that depended on a revolutionary vanguard leading the population. Its strategy was first to create liberated areas of self-defense, and then consolidate sufficient popular strength to take state control.

Operating from such focos, FAR attacked army barracks for armaments and captured hostages to negotiate for funds. Several scholars believe that FAR and its allies (which went through various divisions and permutations) enjoyed greater success than most other Latin insurgencies. However, by its own later admission, the project held an idealistic vision about what “action by example” would accomplish; it did not sufficiently mobilize its base in the east, much less make inroads in the Indian highlands. This made it more vulnerable to the 1967–8 extermination campaign led by General Carlos Arana Osorio, a protégé of US counterinsurgency training. With the guerillas defeated, Arana gained the national presidency on a platform of political and free market reforms. He then turned his attention to urban troublemakers, declaring a state of siege in 1971 in which 700 political and union leaders were murdered. Despite Arana’s rule, the officers of the mountains became the haven for new protest movements that continued for the next 25 years.

Indigenous Involvement

In part because of suffering enormous losses following the 1954 coup, the indigenous population retreated to their “corporate communities.” Nevertheless, several factors challenged this condition. The state proposed a new “Plan for National Development,” introducing structural changes similar to the liberal period of 1871. US funding for economic diversification enhanced communications, added infrastructure for non-traditional export crops, and altered commercial relations. While the government restricted most organizations in the countryside, arriving foreign clergy, Catholic Action cells, and “base communities” were able to set up cooperatives as a new avenue for credit and savings and consumption, especially chemical fertilizer. These changes affected traditional power relations in indigenous municipalities, especially around the mainstay crop of maize, and the cofradía brotherhoods and principales who distributed employment and rented community land.

Young catechists also questioned why traditional rituals should hold exclusive claims on ancestral identity. Although market capitalism made inroads, with religious assistance a fresh group of indigenous leaders pursued secondary and university training. They stimulated a national debate over Indian conditions and why the guerillas had failed to win their involvement. These leaders formed the Pastoral Indígena and Seminarios Indígenas and other venues where people from various indigenous affiliations (Quichés, Ixiles, and so on) began to share common political and economic experiences, such as the spike in petroleum and fertilizer prices that created extensive hardship at the end of 1973. Study groups also probed peasant rights and constitutional implementation, while the more traditional indigenous leaders sought greater power via the Christian Democratic Party, gaining several assembly seats as Indians for the first time.

The Struggle for Peace (1986–1996)

Although the new civilian government under Vinicio Cerezo (1986–91) remained stymied under military control, the regional Esquipilas II Accords in 1987 established conditions for negotiating a peace respectful of cultural and linguistic differences. Divisions within the upper class and army opened further opportunities for economic protest. The Unidad Acción Sindical Popular (UASP), formed in 1988, fought together the Committee for Campesino Unity (CUC), the union federations, angry indigenous and ladino women who had lost loved ones (Grupo Apoyo Mutuo, GAM; Comité Nacional de Viudas Guatemaltecas, CONAVIGUA), students, and others, once again bridging racial differences to protest structural adjustment requirements dictated by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) for Guatemala to qualify for international loans. In March, the UASP negotiated an agreement on price controls, agrarian improvements, minimum salaries, and recognition of unions. As prices continued to rise, UASP-led demonstrations mushroomed. Agricultural and urban workers bottlenecked major traffic routes and government buildings, winning higher minimum wages over the next several years. The US Guatemala Labor Education Project (later US Labor Education Project in the Americas, US/LEAP) offered supportive assistance from the north.

Meanwhile, despite government detentions and secret prisons, the Guatemalan National Revolutionary Unity (URNG) continued its sporadic resistance, led by such leaders as Everardo, who was eventually captured, brutally tortured, and killed without trial by a CIA operative with US complicity. Peace efforts increased in Guatemala during the early 1990s, as the URNG and presidents Serrano Elías (1991–2) and de León Carpio (1993–5) tested possibilities for negotiation despite continuing a strategic war. Social movements also exploited the opportunity. Unions and indigenous organizations became major participants in evaluating political and economic proposals, as well as constructing new social institutions. The Consejo de Comunidades Étnicas “Runujal Junam” (CERJ) became increasingly effective in demanding the elimination of the civil self-defense patrols (PACs). Out of CUC had come the more directly ethnic Coordinadora Nacional de Pueblos Indígenas y Campesinos (CONIC), which was able to resolve campesino petitions, gain some lands for redistribution, and achieve local development committees. Defensoría Maya helped resolve legal human rights cases and revive indigenous customs for conflict resolution.

CERJ, Defensoría, and another 150 organizations in the Coalición de Organizaciones del Pueblo Maya (COPMAGUA) set up in 1994 actively participated in the Guatemalan Asamblea Civil, which brought to the peace negotiations table issues that both the government and the URNG had neglected. With labor and popular participation, the Asamblea is credited with winning a widely respected accord on indigenous rights, although it was less successful in gaining a solid socioeconomic agreement. Indigenous organizations helped establish the Frente Democrática Nueva Guatemala (FDNG) in 1995 which successfully elected six Mayan representatives to Congress. In December 1996, the Peace Accords negotiated with the Arzú administration (1996–2000) came into effect. Although they were not publicly ratified in a 1999 plebiscite, subsequent governments have had to acknowledge most of the principles the accords established.

During the 1990s, the Mayan movement underwent various permutations, but its solid growth led to a plethora of public presentations and debates. Language and cultural institutions thrived, such as the Academy of Mayan Languages and Consejo de Organizaciones Mayas de Guatemala (COMG). While deep racism remained, representatives from all sectors articulated the social value of understanding and promoting the nation’s indigenous heritage. The five major universities devoted special attention to Mayan issues, as did the Centro de Investigaciones Regionales de Mesoamérica (CIRMA) library in Antigua. Women’s groups and NGOs such as the Centro de Acción Legal en Derechos Humanos (CHARLA) advocated for the disenfranchised in a way that integrated indigenous and ladino interests. Nevertheless, women assumed important leadership positions in many NGOs and union locals. Due to continued efforts by CERJ, CONIC, Defensoría Maya, CHARLA, the Catholic Human Rights Office, AVANSCO, Fundación Ebert, the United Nations Verification Mission, and other local and international groups, human and labor rights continued as a national preoccupation during a fresh cycle of attacks in the twenty-first century.

Following Spanish occupation, protest and revolution in Guatemala has undergone four phases: early Mayan resistance (1524–1820); anti-liberal revolts (1821–1944); the Guatemalan Revolution (1944–54); and the insurgent war (1960–96). The last three revealed similar structural opportunities that developed from the liberal attempt to modernize agriculture, reorganize Mayan communities, and impose uncontrolled capitalist development. In their protest, Mayans and ladinos organized separate networks and expressed distinct identities; nevertheless, under Arbenz, Indian and ladino identities began to “merge” via the General Confederation of Guatemalan Workers. They did so again in the fourth period with the marches of CNUS/CUC and joint actions of the URNG, UASP, and the Asamblea Civil. Both Mayan and ladino participants revealed a growing consciousness that common class issues could be integrated in a way that valued ethnic differences and led to a more humane and democratic society.

Guatemala, worker struggles and the labor movement, 1960s–1990s

Henry J. Frundt

The military suppression of the Guatemalan Revolution of 1954 destroyed official labor unions and forced the workers' movement to go underground. From 1954 to 1960, the Guatemalan government cancelled the registration of 533 local unions, arrested communists, and killed thousands of labor and community activists. With the assistance of the US, Guatemala implemented regional military counterinsurgency training programs to suppress all forms of worker and community organization in the 1960s. The removal of legal rights for labor organization and the right to strike for better wages contributed to a decline in living standards for workers and peasants who comprised more than 90 percent of the country's population. The rural working class was prevented from organizing collectives and wages and conditions deteriorated dramatically. Due to the elimination of formal labor rights, the labor movement was pushed underground and into insurrectionary and direct action against employers and the state.

While political and military repression from 1954 continued through the 1960s and early 1970s, by 1973, poor economic conditions for Guatemala's workers boiled over into mass unrest and popular revolt through a series of labor strikes in the face of state repression. The labor mobilization began among school teachers in 1973, when 20,000 teachers went on strike to publicize poor classroom conditions and a ten-year wage freeze. The teacher actions were soon followed by additional strikes among railroad, electrical, tobacco, and bank workers. Following a 1976 lockout, the Coca-Cola workers refused to vacate their factory compound, generating a rallying point for three major union federations to recreate the National Committee of Trade Union Unity (CNUS). A dramatic earthquake in 1976 devastated highland areas, leaving one million homeless. The national government's ineffective and corrupt response broadened the structural opportunity for local organizations like Catholic Action, helping to delegitimize official responses and "radicalize" younger "base community" participants. Despite racism and mistrust, earthquake relief united Catholic organizations, indigenous, and urban labor unions such as the National Workers' Central (CNT) to which Coke workers belonged. Traditionalists formed a Mayan political party, but its ambivalent links to repressive national leaders furthered class polarization among other Mayans. Just as CNUS was expanding its demonstrations in 1976–7, indigenous campesinos sought an organization for “all tillers of the earth” (EGP leader Pablo Ceto, quoted by Arias 1990: 247).

Self-directed yet inspired by events elsewhere in the hemisphere, remnants from the Rebel Armed Forces (FAR), which had also separated from the Guatemalan Section of the Communist Party (PGT) over strategy, aided the development of two guerilla units among indigenous. The Guerilla Army of the Poor (EGP) and the Organization of People in Arms (ORPA) began around 1972 and soon grappled with the severe exploitation of Indian migrations and the importance of Mayan identity. They emphasized political opportunities in place of foquismo's military objectives, and sought to avoid actions that jeopardized the broader Mayan population. In the Ixcán highlands, Quiché base communities found sustenance from the largely indigenous EGP, despite its denouncement by traditionalists from Nebaj and Santa Cruz.

ORPA operated even more quietly around Lake Atitlan and west toward coffee and sugar areas of the coast until 1979, when it also expanded into urban areas. In fact, throughout the 1970s but especially after 1978, three of the four guerilla organizations formed alliances with urban constituents. The FAR, which now had a base in the Petén, linked with city labor unions. The PGT, a nucleus of which operated on the southern coast, made a similar move. ORPA promoted connections with university students. All mounted sporadic attacks on military outposts, political figures, and landowners.

Campesinos such as Vicente Menchú (the father of Nobel Prize winner Rigoberta Menchú) from an Ixil base community began organizing the Committee for Campesino Unity (CUC) to protest land takeovers and mandated military service. In a notable symbolic protest in November 1977, Indian and ladino miners from Ixtahuacán linked to CNT and CNUS walked 351 kilometers toward Guatemala City to demand better working conditions. As they moved along the highway, various indigenous groups offered food and sometimes joined so that 150,000 reached the city. Simultaneously, striking CUC sugar workers marched from the south. In a follow-up action the following spring, CUC demanded an end to discrimination, repression, high living costs, forced recruitment, and the landless conditions faced by all the peasantry. Its “May 1 demonstration was transcendental for the country's political life. The presence of Indians in the street, with their typical clothes . . . immediately aroused great applause” (Arias 1990: 250). Sympathy grew for CUC, especially when the government massacred 150 Q'eqchi at Panzós. Radicalized Indian campesinos broke away from traditionalists and Indian bourgeoisie who had significant commercial connections as they searched for a fresh identity. Their CUC–CNUS alliance became the first bona fide confederation of urban and rural indigenous workers since 1954.

In 1978, the newly elected and partly indigenous president, General Romeo Lucas García, inaugurated a dramatic state-sponsored counterinsurgency attack on labor unions and popular movement participants, hoping to sever them from the revolutionary effort. While the state remained an agent for capitalist development, it preferred to repress the entire population to prevent modernizing features from changing the power structure. However, its actions ultimately revealed to both landed and middle rural classes that the existing “pre-capitalist” order no longer made any sense.

Coca-Cola leaders were among Lucas García's first urban targets, but as the military increased the number of peasant massacres in the highlands, leaders of popular organizations were routinely killed. Until that point, the indigenous favored mass organization in place of armed struggle. Responding in the Ixil, guerillas held public forums in various municipalities, helped young men to escape conscription, and aided communities with survival techniques. Following government attacks against cooperatives, schools, and clinics, CUC engaged in direct resistance, supporting guerilla activities with highway barricades and sabotage. Meanwhile in Quezaltenango, Mayan traditionalists and commercialists stressed indigenismo as the only route to authentic identity, hoping to recuperate power lost in Spanish times.

In late 1979, a CUC commission arrived in the capital to urge President Lucas García and the Congress to stop repression in the Ixil. Turned away, they occupied the Spanish embassy which the government quickly burned, killing 26 Mayan representatives including Vicente Menchú, and nearly killing the ambassador. The embassy fire precipitated an international outcry against official Guatemalan atrocities that would only conclude with the signing of the Peace Accords 17 years later.

Many in the wider population now felt they had few options but to join the war. On the southern coast, as many as 70,000 CUC and CNT workers struck, uniting with indigenous from the highlands. Implored to confront military onslaughts, when CUC issued the Declaración of Iximché (a virtual declaration of war), thousands of young Mayans joined the EGP in Sactepequez, Chimaltenango, Quiché, Huehuetenango, and Alta and Baja Vera Paz. A smaller number entered ORPA in San Marcos, Quezaltenango, Sololá, and Chimaltenango. Some 250,000 to 500,000 men and women participated in self-defense practice, offering supplies to the guerillas and collaborating in larger military operations. “When EGP guerrillas occupied the villages of Chichicastenango and Sololá, local Indians cut telegraph lines and blockaded the highways with nails, barricades, fallen trees” (Arias 1990: 255).

FAR stepped up operations in the eastern part of the country as the PGT’s military wing operated in the capital. By 1981, the entire country was touched by rebellion. Traditional indigenista groups also took action, although their tensions with the guerillas remained. Nevertheless, the state’s counterinsurgency soon took its toll. In June, 27 CNT leaders were abducted and killed, sending unions underground once again. To counter popular mobilization, the army initiated a genocidal project throughout the countryside.

In 1982 the four guerilla factions officially united as the Guatemalan National Revolutionary Unity (URNG), with forces poised to capture large areas of the country. What they did not anticipate, however, was the government’s expansion of the scorched earth policies of Lucas García under Generals Efraín Ríos Montt (1982–3) and Mejía Victores (1983–6): instead of directly targeting the guerillas, it eliminated whole indigenous communities. Such genocidal attacks resulted in the extermination of 600 villages and 200,000 people (Guatemalan Archbishop’s Office for Human Rights [ODHAG], 1998). After the army had cleared or burned an area, it would often establish model villages and recruit returning males to form self-protective civil patrols (PACs). While some former insurgent irregulars felt forced to comply, others joined the Communities in Resistance that disappeared into the mountains to maintain their identity and avoid being placed in army villages or development poles. An additional 100,000 Mayans fled to Mexico.

Although they still experienced incursions from the Guatemalan army and felt disillusioned with the guerillas, Committees in Resistance developed a fresh sense of pride and assertiveness. Out of these three strands new grassroots movements emerged from popular organizations and cultural institutions. Internationally, support groups developed such as the Network in Solidarity with the People of Guatemala (NISGUA) and the Guatemala Human Rights Commission in the United States, which played important advocacy roles in reorienting northern state policies toward the country.

In 1983 and 1984, Guatemala experienced a deteriorating economy, provoking a major rise in inflation. Widespread knowledge that corrupt military officers were personally gaining from currency devaluations and relaxed import regulations increased public demand for accountability. A phony bankruptcy closure of Coca-Cola brought a year-long union occupation of the plant in Guatemala City in 1984 that offered a haven for resistance in the midst of persistent attacks. This helped catalyze the union movement’s three strands, the US/AFILD-backed Confederation of Labor Unity of Guatemala (CUSG), the Christian Democratic General Confederation of Guatemalan Workers (CGTG), and the formation of UNSITRAGUA, an independent labor confederation with 27 affiliates.

From the 1990s to 2005, due to employer opposition and the restriction of rights to organize unions, the Guatemalan labor movement made limited inroads in organizing workers employed in garment and other industries exporting goods abroad, chiefly to North America and Western Europe. However, labor unions remained strong in state offices, the banana industry, and the food sector via FESTRAS (Guatemalan Food and Agricultural Workers’ Federation) and other labor organizations. The privatization of government functions, the shift of employees from the formal to the informal sector, the withdrawal of international financial resources, and the persistent and severe anti-union attacks placed social movements on the defensive.

Guerilla theater

Chris McCoy

Guerilla theater is a form of political protest that presents unannounced, politically or socially motivated performances in public spaces for an unsuspecting audience. Derived from the Spanish term which loosely translates as “little warrior,” guerilla theater stems from the legacies of Russian agit-prop, Antonin Artaud’s Theater of Cruelty, and Erwin Piscator and Bertolt Brecht’s Epic Theater.

The phrase was first used around 1965 to describe the work of the San Francisco Mime Troupe, a nomadic theater company performing socially and politically relevant plays in the parks of San Francisco. The invention of the phrase is commonly attributed to R. G. Davis or Peter Berg, founding director and member of the San Francisco Mime Troupe respectively (Davis 1975: 70). The term became prevalent upon the publication of Davis’s essay, “Guerilla Theatre: 1965,” in the Tulane Drama Review (1966). In this essay, Davis asserts that guerilla theater is intended to present “effective protest or social confrontation” in order to “confront hypocrisy in the society” (1966: 132).

Many political activist theater troupes adopted the methods of guerilla theater during the Vietnam War and social protests of the 1960s in order to explore, provoke, or raise awareness of sociopolitical issues. The most pervasive of these are The Living Theater, Bread and Puppet Theater, El Teatro Campesino, the Youth International Party (or Yippies), and Free Southern Theater.

Evolving beyond the watershed protests of the 1960s, guerilla theater became a mainstay in political and social resistance adopted by many national and international organizations in the late 1970s to 1980s. Guerilla tactics were used in drawing attention to many social ills, such as the absence of female artists in museums and the visual arts through the Guerrilla Girls, the environmental crisis and ecological issues through Greenpeace, and the AIDS epidemic through ACT UP (AIDS Coalition To Unleash Power). These groups used guerilla tactics and evolved the form from small grassroots organizations to encompass national and multinational political movements.

Since the 1980s, guerilla theater has remained prevalent in all forms of social and political protest. Contemporary guerilla troupes take aim at a panoply of social and political issues in creative, subversive, and often satirical forms. Reverend Billy and the Church of Stop Shopping have appeared in New York and across the country to spread their message of anti-corporate control of the US economy; Church Ladies for Choice takes aim at the anti-abortion movement; the Church of Euthanasia attempts to raise awareness on overpopulation; the Clandestine Insurgent Rebel Clown Army is a British group using clowning techniques to mock pertinent political issues; the Oil Enforcement Agency satirically informs of the economic and ecological issues of dependence upon oil; Billionaires for Bush poked fun at the corporate lobbying and control of the US political system; and Reclaim the Streets is an international organization dedicated to reclaiming privatized, homogenized public spaces for free expression.

Guerrilla Girls

Brett M. Van Hoesen

Founded in 1985, the Guerrilla Girls is a collective of anonymous female artists and art world professionals committed to monitoring sexism, racism, and corruption in pop culture, the arts, and the film industry. Calling themselves the “Conscience of the Art World” they are famous for their provocative posters that attempt to police the injustices of the art establishment. Additional causes over the course of their movement have included labor issues, abortion rights, gay rights, AIDS awareness, and anti-war protests.

Using humor to invoke change, their fame is also linked to their practice of wearing gorilla masks in public. This disguise allegedly gives them “mask-ularity.” It also protects their real-life identities and engenders the group’s autonomy. According to art critic Lucy Lippard, “The Guerrilla Girls had the sense to realize that anonymity was a perfect weapon against art-scene/art-market greed and gossip, and they have adamantly remained in their masks, from behind which they can say the unspeakable” (Lippard 1995: 257). To further ensure the Guerrilla Girls’ anonymity, each member assumes a pseudonym, the name of a dead female artist or writer such as Frida Kahlo, Käthe Kollwitz, Gertrude Stein, or Lee Krasner.

Drawing attention to the lingering legacy of influential women throughout history, the Guerrilla Girls are devoted to challenging the patriarchal paradigms of western art history. Their 1998 publication, The Guerrilla Girls’ Bedside Companion to the History of Western Art, radically re-envisioned the Middle Ages to the present by showcasing the lives and work of female artists as the exclusive producers of culture from the past five centuries. This overt bias of rewriting the history of western art as a 100 percent female achievement is in direct response to the shocking lack of representation of women artists and artists of color in mainstream museums, galleries, and art criticism.

Their first target, which prompted the foundation of the group, was the Museum of Modern Art’s 1985 show, “An International Survey of Painting and Sculpture,” promoted as the most up-to-date evaluation of the contemporary art scene. The exhibition featured 169 artists, only 13 of whom were women, and none of whom were artists of color. The curator of the exhibit, Kynaston McShine, suggested that “any artist who wasn’t in the show should rethink his career.” This inspired the development and widespread dissemination of propaganda-style posters and open letters targeting individuals and institutions responsible for such glaring imbalances.

Additional museums under the Guerrilla Girls’ surveillance and scrutiny have included the Metropolitan Museum of Art, Whitney Museum of American Art, and most recently the new Broad Contemporary Art Museum at the Los Angeles County Museum of Art. While two of the founding members of the Guerrilla Girls, Frida Kahlo and Käthe Kollwitz, remain active participants, over the duration of the group’s existence nearly 100 women have served as members. The group continues to spread its message by delivering public talks at universities, museums, and conferences, as well as through publications, their newsletter Hot Flashes, and commercial items available on their website, including copies of their famed posters, t-shirts, postcards, and CDs. As their website touts, the Guerrilla Girls continue to “reinvent the f-word – feminism” striving to “fight discrimination with humor, facts, and fake fur.”

Guevara, Ernesto "Che" (1928–1967)

Mike Gonzalez

Two generations after his death in 1967, Ernesto "Che" Guevara retains an extraordinary symbolic significance. His face adorns t-shirts and posters across the world in two iconic guises: the youthful and energetic figure embodied in the myriad reproductions of Alexis Korda's photograph, or the thin, sparsely bearded face which, on each reprinting, comes more and more to resemble the Renaissance portraits of Christ by Andrea Mantegna.

While succeeding generations have identified a timeless quality of resolution and vision in that face, it has become disengaged from the brief but significant political history of the young Argentinian doctor. This is not to say that it is a false vision of the man – only that it is both partial and strangely depoliticized. His brief life (he was 39 when he died) was exemplary in its unwavering dedication to a revolutionary cause. Every one of his collaborators testifies to the depth of his commitment, and to the constancy he demanded of others. That resolve could be unforgiving and at times even cruel – but it was applied with equal intensity to himself.

The battle for control of the image of Che continues between new generations rediscovering the value of resistance and rebellion, and the advertisers anxious to exploit the icon while draining it of ethical or political content. Yet for all it has inspired for a new generation of anti-capitalists, it is Che Guevara's political engagement – its errors and achievements, and the consequences of both – which offers the richest practical lessons for a new generation.

An Awakening

Born in Rosario, Argentina, in 1928, Ernesto's childhood was dominated by his asthma, a condition that encouraged his characteristic refusal to allow external conditions to limit his ambition. Equally influential were his parents, but particularly his mother, Celia, whose connections with the Argentine Communist Party were mainly social but whose home was also the venue for frequent gatherings and debates. This was the era of Perón, the skilled demagogue and acknowledged leader of the new working class now flowing from the provinces toward the Argentine capital. The relationship between Perón and the Communist Party could hardly have been worse, and the party's relative isolation from a mass working-class base of any kind shaped its politics. Indirectly it also shaped Guevara's perception of what it meant to be a communist.

There is little to suggest more than a passing interest in politics in Guevara's life until the life-changing trip through Latin America recorded in his Motorcycle Diaries. It began as the adventure of two young men in search of new experiences, but it became a journey from a white and urban Latin America into a very different, more brutal, and more divided reality. In Chile, Guevara records, he met two migrant laborers seeking work in the nitrate mines of the north, whose story of exploitation and persecution deeply moved the young Argentinian medical student.

It was at the Inca city of Machu Picchu that Che came face to face with the greatness of the Inca past and the monstrous act of destruction that had swept it away. Like Pablo Neruda (1904–1973) just a few years earlier, Guevara found in this last redoubt of Inca resistance the evidence of another America, the marks of the anonymous men and women who had created an extraordinary civilization and whose successors had been reduced to exploitation and poverty.

Persuaded to return to finish his medical studies by the Peruvian Marxist doctor Hugo Pesce, Guevara worked hard, graduated, and immediately embarked on a second journey. It was 1953, a year after Bolivia had lived through a social revolution; its echoes could be felt in the political confrontation that still rocked the society when Guevara arrived there. He was not indifferent to the racist undertones of the conflict between the indigenous miners of the country and the state. But he declared himself still to be a "neutral observer," and seemed equally fascinated by more exotic aspects of the worlds he was encountering.

Ernesto "Che" Guevara (1928–67) was an Argentinian Marxist revolutionary philosopher, medical doctor, and guerilla leader who played a pivotal role in the Cuban 26th of July Movement. In 1967, Guevara was captured and assassinated in Bolivia by CIA operatives. Since his death, popular identification with Guevara, known simply as Che, has grown worldwide, and by the early twenty-first century he remains an enduring symbol for anti-imperialists, progressive youth, and revolutionaries. (Rene Burri/Magnum Photos)

This journey ended in Guatemala where Guevara experienced a political conversion of some kind. He arrived in December 1953, as the country was going through a social and political transformation. The government of Jacobo Arbenz (1913–1971) was far from revolutionary, but it was dedicated to continuing the process of reform and modernization that had begun in 1944. The heart of his strategy was agrarian reform and the redistribution of land. Inevitably this meant a confrontation with the giant United Fruit Company, which for half a century had shaped and dominated the national economy. Some 40 percent of Guatemala's cultivable land was owned by what was called "La Yunai" and devoted to the cultivation of bananas for export.

It is perhaps not surprising, therefore, that United Fruit and its directors, who included the Dulles brothers – one the secretary of state, the other head of the FBI – should have organized a military coup to overthrow Arbenz. Six months after Che's arrival, aircraft strafed the streets of Guatemala City and a US-backed military force entered the country. Arbenz resigned a week later. Despite circulating rumors, there was no armed resistance; the Guatemalan communists, the PGT, had accepted Arbenz's decision rather than mobilize resistance.

The fall of Arbenz was a traumatic and revealing event. It showed how implacable imperialist hostility was to processes of reform that in any way challenged US economic or political interests in the region. Roosevelt's proclamation of the "four freedoms" ten years earlier, with their emphasis on democracy, were clearly no match for the desire for hegemony in a Cold War era.

The debates that followed among the Latin American exiles had a seminal influence on Guevara's personal political education. In Guatemala he met Hilda Gadea, a Peruvian communist who helped to develop Che's interest in and knowledge of Marxism. In his correspondence at the time, Che speaks approvingly of the Communist Party and of the Soviet Union, but it is clear that Guevara was not involved in any kind of military or political activity, though he did volunteer for the medical services. His meditations on the Guatemalan experience were largely personal and abstract, and they focused almost entirely on the military question: Why did Arbenz not fight back? Why did he not distribute arms? Guevara's conclusion was that there had been a failure of will on the part of the political leadership of the left, which had been unable to organize a sufficient response to the US-backed aggression.

Despite his growing interest in communism, there is no indication that Che was beginning to think through questions of class struggle or the role of political organization. His comment to a friend that he would probably join the Communist Party "at some point" once he had "seen Europe" suggests it was not a priority.

A Historic Meeting

Leaving Guatemala, Che joined many other Latin American exiles in Mexico City, where he earned a precarious living as a photographer and worked part-time in an allergy clinic. Early in July 1955, he was taken by a Cuban friend to meet Raúl Castro, Fidel's brother. The two men agreed that the only way to gain power in the region was through military engagement, a conclusion Che drew from his Guatemalan experience. When Che met Fidel a few weeks later, their instant rapport was at least in part the fruit of their agreement on these strategic matters.

In Mexico, many of Che's friends were Cuban exiles who prepared the way for his meeting with Fidel. He continued to read Marx, possibly guided by Hilda, who had joined him in the Mexican capital and whom he later married. As he said at the time, rather whimsically, "Saint Charlie (Marx) had become the axis of my life." Che saw himself now as a revolutionary, driven (according to Fidel) by "the desire to act." Their fates from then on would be inextricably tied together.

Even at this stage there were ideological differences, but Che deferred to Fidel's history and the force of his conviction. After all, his plans for making a revolution were at an advanced stage. On the other hand, Fidel was a revolutionary nationalist whose guide was José Martí (1853–1895), while Che described himself as a communist and was exploring political theory, an activity with which Fidel had little patience.

What drew Che and Fidel together was a shared conviction that the key role in the process would be played by resolute revolutionaries. Fidel Castro's history of involvement in armed actions together with his skepticism about the Cuban Communist Party and the tradition it represented led him inexorably to that conclusion. Guevara's reading of Marxism until then had not embraced the debates around organization in the socialist tradition, but his Guatemalan experience did emphasize both the urgency and the possibility of an armed response. These were the circumstances under which the two men began their training in preparation for the landing of an armed expedition in Cuba.

The Politics of Revolutionary War

The motor launch Granma landed in Cuba on December 2, 1956 with 82 men aboard. Che and Fidel had trained in the Mexican countryside with Alberto Bayo, a veteran of the Spanish Civil War. The small, leaky craft was bought with cash gathered from supporters of the enterprise, including enemies of Batista from the old bourgeoisie. Within Cuba, the attitude of the Communist Party was deeply hostile, so it was members of the 26th of July Movement (J-26-M) who prepared for the Granma's arrival. On November 30, the agreed arrival date, J-26-M members took to the streets of Santiago. They withdrew at the end of the day, leaving nine dead. When the boat failed to arrive, the group waiting with weapons and support assumed the expedition had been aborted and left.

But it seemed that others were also expecting the group. They were met by Batista's troops and only 19 survived the shootout that followed.

The survivors scattered, and Che himself was wounded. He recorded the moment when the bullet hit, in the cane field at Alegría del Pío, as well as a symbolically significant decision he had to make. Faced with a box of medicines and another of bullets, and unable to carry both, he abandoned the medical chest. For the following few days Che and a small group of five wandered in the Sierra Maestra mountains, linking up with Fidel only on the 17th. Fidel's reaction when they met was to severely criticize Che for the loss of their arms, demoting and humiliating Che in the process. Che's acceptance of Fidel's rebuff says much about his regard for the man and his recognition of the structure of command.

The beginning of the Cuban guerilla war was inauspicious. Fidel had assumed that early military actions, combined with urban actions, would produce a general popular rising. And Che recorded his growing impatience as December dragged on with no direct conflict. He was becoming impatient with Fidel's paternalistic and at times arbitrary style of leadership. The story of the revolutionary war would be rewritten in the aftermath of the overthrow of Batista and given a sense of strategic direction it did not exhibit at the time. It would be Guevara's key political task to interpret the guerilla war for the rest of Latin America.

Che Guevara's military role very quickly became key, despite his lack of experience under arms. He compensated for that inexperience with a courage bordering on recklessness, and by an uncompromising discipline, applied to himself and to others. His execution of the informer Eutimio Guerra was carried out with speed and efficiency. It is as if he saw himself being tested, perhaps by Fidel or by his own relentless conviction.

In these early weeks of 1957, the rebel army grew slightly with the addition of peasant recruits who knew the terrain and lived with the violence of life in the Sierra Maestra. But they were hardly revolutionaries in any conscious political sense. There is some element of concern in Guevara's notes at the time, at the low level of political commitment among the fighters. In fact, Che was a member of the army's command structure, but still had no political role. Thus when Castro conducted his famous interview with Herbert Matthews for Life magazine, Che was not present. The moment did provide the opportunity, however, for him to meet for the first time with J-26-M's political leadership. His diaries express his surprise and concern at their political limitations: "Through isolated conversations . . . I discovered the evident anti-communist inclinations of most of them." They were, he felt, nationalists fighting to overthrow a corrupt dictatorship, rather than revolutionary socialists. Che was now discovering the complexities of Cuban politics and his own limited knowledge of these complexities. He could not participate, for example, in the battle for leadership that was currently taking place within the J-26-M – between Frank País and the urban movement in el llano (the plains) and Castro in la sierra (the mountains).

For Che, the guerilla struggle was the heart of the matter; he saw the movement in the cities or of the working class as secondary. Given that his source of understanding of Cuban politics was Fidel, this is hardly surprising. But it also complemented the politics of individual action and exemplary moral fervor which drove him. By mid-1957, the defeats suffered by the J-26-M in the cities, and the continuing hostility of the Communist Party, tilted the balance definitively toward a guerilla war.

Che was convinced that the revolution would be made in the mountains. Who would be the subject of that process, however, was less clear. The relationship between the peasantry and the revolutionary army was one of support rather than control. Those who had joined the rebel army in the Sierra Maestra had not always proved reliable, and Che's stern discipline was clearly directed at those new recruits. It was the revolutionaries themselves, therefore, who were the leading protagonists in the process of change rather than the social forces they represented. This view explains the deep unease felt by Guevara over the Miami Pact which Fidel had entered into without consultation with his fellow leaders – a skepticism he shared with Raúl. Yet while Raúl was demoted in the wake of this disagreement, Che was given the rank of comandante toward the end of July. Perhaps the point Fidel was making was that the vision of the role of the revolutionary army was one that he shared with Che. A correspondence with Daniel, an urban leader of the J-26-M, in the wake of the murder of Frank País, makes it clear that Che supported absolutely Fidel's argument that the "sierra" must have the unquestioned leadership of the movement.

In September, a rising of naval officers in Cienfuegos was timed to coincide with simultaneous actions in Havana and Santiago. They failed to materialize and 300 conspirators were murdered in the repression that followed. Che wrote that his judgment at the time was that "a generalized uprising throughout the country was looming on the horizon." This was a misjudgment of serious proportions, though one shared by Fidel, and it explained the decision to move to "total war" against the regime, starting with a general strike in April. It was a disaster all the more so because the Cuban communists refused to support the J-26-M's call. In the mountains, however, relations with the Communist Party were prospering, though Che remained suspicious of the enthusiasm of the communists for a guerilla army which it had previously dismissed as "adventurist."

The meeting of the National Directorate of the Movement in May marked the definitive consolidation of Castro's undisputed command of the J-26-M. In Che's words, "the guerilla conception would emerge triumphant from that meeting."

The revolutionaries could not have known how brief a period in power remained for Batista, though they were almost certainly aware of Washington's declining support for the dictator. The response of the regime after April was to intensify repression and encircle the rebel forces in the Sierra Maestra. Throughout May and June, Fidel and Che commanded separate camps, with Che running the rebels' communication center, which was becoming increasingly central to the struggle. Raúl's second front in the Sierra de Cristal was also under siege. Within the guerilla encampments, tensions were emerging, particularly among the new recruits. Che, while admired, was implacable; he imposed severe punishments and in some cases approved executions of deserters. By late July of 1958, it became clear that Batista's exhausted and demoralized troops were retreating. The rebel army had survived.

To seize the advantage from this situation, Fidel saw opening a second front in Escambray as a necessity, and entrusted Che with the task of creating it. On August 30 Che set out for the center of the island. The journey should have taken four days; instead it became, according to Gonzalez (2004), "a harsh 42-day trek through mud and rain. In the course of the 'long march,' the legend of Che Guevara was definitively born." It is unlikely that these less than hardened fighters would have survived the journey without the leadership of Che Guevara. Equally, it seemed that these very conditions (and he would face worse later) reinforced his moral fervor and his conviction that self-sacrifice oiled the wheels of revolutionary struggle.

The legend of the "long march" also served another purpose. There were several other armed groups functioning in Escambray, and it was Castro's urgent purpose to unite them under the leadership of the J-26-M. Che was the person best able to do that, and particularly with the aura of heroism with which he and his men finally arrived in Escambray on October 16. The critical issue was the hostility between the communists and the J-26-M in the area. Che was far more sympathetic to communism than Fidel, but had absorbed Castro's deep suspicion of the Cuban party. Nevertheless, he was able to negotiate with their cadres in Escambray, even though tension in Castro's own circle remained unresolved. Patiently negotiating on the one hand, on the other Che insisted on launching a series of small actions in the run-up to the November elections – although his comrades vetoed the suggestion of a bank robbery!

By late December, the 350 men under Che's command approached the city of Santa Clara. The garrison there consisted of over 4,000, and a supply train with arms and weapons was on its way to reinforce them. The decision to rip up the rails and prevent the train from arriving was attributed to Che; in any event, the three-day battle ended in defeat for the government troops. One day later, on December 31, 1958, Batista fled the country.

A Revolutionary in Power

On January 2 Che and Camilo Cienfuegos (1932–59) led the 300-kilometer column into Havana; in the east, Fidel was occupying Santiago. Che was absent from the final parade into the city, however, having arrived the night before with responsibility for organizing security and the beginnings of revolutionary justice. Some have argued that it was Che's absolute and uncompromising reliability, as well as his military discipline, that led Castro to have him organize security instead of leading the victory column – which was carried out by Cienfuegos instead. In the first weeks of the revolution, the hated secret police and torturers of the Batista regime were dealt with in summary executions in the La Cabaña fortress in Havana under Che's command. It was a new kind of justice, dispensed in public and at speed – but it was conducted according to specific rules. In any event Che's involvement would be brief, as he became virtually bedridden with asthma for the next four months.

Che won a central role in the conduct of the guerilla war; he had distinguished himself in battle and earned a place in the political leadership of the movement. He had also become a key symbolic figure in post-revolutionary iconography, an exemplar of discipline, commitment, and courage. He would become all the more prominent as the history of the Cuban Revolution was written as an essentially military victory. The other contributory elements – the internal corrosion of the regime, the withdrawal of US support, and the broad character of the anti-Batista alliance, for example – were not addressed. Che's status was a consequence of this military way of understanding the revolution; soon after he would face a new range of tasks in consolidating the infant revolutionary state.

In Escambray, Che enacted a revolutionary agrarian reform, echoing Castro's slightly more timid program in the Sierra Maestra. From government, he returned repeatedly to the central significance of the agrarian reform as a guarantee of peasant support for the revolution. Similarly, as the sugar harvest approached and Cuba began to seek new buyers for the sugar previously sold in the United States, Che observed to a colleague that unemployment was a central issue for the semi-employed rural workers, and that a shorter working day should be introduced.

Politically, Che's interest in the socialist tradition, and his vision of the Cuban Revolution as a socialist process, was explicit from the outset. Castro, it should be noted, was less clear at this stage about the character of the Cuban Revolution. At the same time, Che's thinking about revolutionary leadership still emphasized the centrality of the rebel army and its leading cadres as the subject of revolution.

Fidel used the early months of the revolution to travel to North America and test attitudes, though the nationalization of US assets in Cuba predisposed the US government to hostility. At this stage Fidel's relations with Cuba's communists were strained, and his intention was to marginalize them. Che, like Raúl, was suspicious of these trips. For him, the US government was clearly the enemy, and Guatemala had taught him to be on the alert for intervention from the north. When Fidel met with Che and Raúl at a stopover in Houston during his April travels, it is likely that he faced criticism from both men.

Che was playing a central role in the reorganization of the army, the elaboration of economic policy, and, with some circumspection, the political debates about the direction of the revolution. His perception of the army's role was as "the vanguard" – a role ascribed in the socialist tradition to the revolutionary party. In the economic arena, agrarian reform was central for Che – and his vision was the socialization of land. When Fidel signed the bill into law on his return on May 7, it represented a radicalization of the revolution – and a response to the US government's hostility. It was logical, therefore, that the next step should be to seek out other allies and markets in anticipation of a US embargo. Che was given that mission. It was recognition of his central political role; however, some have suggested that it was also Fidel's way of distancing Che from the Cuban scene.

Che's journey took three months and he visited 14 countries. The most important part of the trip was his secret sugar negotiations with the Soviet Union. When Che returned to Cuba, events had moved forward with speed. Fidel had now taken direct charge of the Agrarian Reform Institute. A new Department of Industrialization within the Institute was to be headed by Che. At the same time, Che's role in the army, as head of security and as a comandante of the revolutionary army, would continue. Two months later, Che was named director of the National Bank, and his famous scrawled signature appeared on Cuba's banknotes.

Even for a committed revolutionary, this was a heavy workload, but also evidence of how central Che was to the revolution. In fact the three roles were connected: the future of the Cuban economy needed to break its dependence on sugar, always the tie that bound the island to the US. Che was a fierce advocate of rapid industrialization, though the manner of it would later involve him in a crucial and bitter debate. At the same time, the US trip had shown that Washington's hostility was implacable and military preparedness was essential. Che was crucial here too. The directorship of the National Bank was, at that stage, a highly political task to which Che's authority and absolute reliability were essential. The internal political atmosphere was hardening, as the trial of Huber Matos, described as "an old anti-communist," showed. Raúl, as head of the armed forces, argued for exemplary maximum punishment; Che was persuaded to advocate a 30-year jail sentence instead.

As the Cuban Revolution began to define itself politically, the increasingly close relationship with the Soviet Union confirmed Che's economic and political vision. Internally, the growing emphasis on discipline and effort closely corresponded with Che's view. Neither was it an accident that his Guerrilla Warfare appeared in April 1960. It was significant that for neither Che nor Fidel was internal democracy a key question. Their command view transferred effortlessly from the army to the state.

The Cuban Revolution gave hope to a new generation of revolutionaries. And it was Che's writing that generalized that experience into a political method: foquismo, the creation of small guerrilla cells that could develop the campaign of "armed propaganda," undermining the state and stimulating a more generalized resistance. For Che, it was important to open new fronts against imperialism, and from all over Latin America young men and women were arriving to train for their own guerilla war. The problem was that Latin America's ruling classes and their American allies had also generalized from the Cuban experience. Their response was to isolate Cuba politically and economically, and to reinforce the military apparatus throughout the region. The result was the effective crushing of most guerrilla strategies as they were attempted, from Guatemala to Paraguay.

The intensification of external attacks, mainly from Miami, and the new radical direction taken by the revolution were reflected in an increasing internal emphasis on discipline and sacrifice, the recurrent themes in so many of Che's speeches and writings of the time. His June 1960 article, "On Sacrifice and Dedication," set out his concept of "the new man," with its emphasis on moral as opposed to material benefits. It was an argument that had particular relevance as it became necessary to divert resources from the health and education programs, which marked the revolution's first two years in the area of economic development. Che was clear that this was the inescapable cost of political and economic independence, but he argued that material benefits should be replaced by social gains and a sense of the advance of the revolution.

The October Missile Crisis of 1962 showed both Che and Fidel the limits of Soviet support for Cuba, and left in both a deep distrust of Soviet intentions. It also served to deepen the political cracks that were beginning to show within the Cuban leadership itself. The Soviet presence in the state, and particularly in the economic ministries, sharpened the debate that had flowed out of Che's emphasis on the new man. The political core of the debate renewed the argument over moral and material incentives: should state enterprises act like individual firms, measuring profit and loss in the same way as any other capitalist firm, or should the economy as a whole be seen as a single unit whose different component parts contribute to the global development of the economy?

Behind the technical argument lay a political disagreement, particularly with the Cuban Communist Party who were now central to the state – a reflection of Soviet influence. In the wake of the Missile Crisis, Che's deepening distrust of the Soviets and their Cuban allies resonated in the debate around the new man. It expressed his frustration with what he saw as an economistic version of the transition to socialism, as well as recognition of the economic difficulties to come and the political challenges they would pose.

In order to escape the trap of growing dependence on the Soviets and the consequent slowing down of the process of revolutionary transformation, Che offered two linked answers: one was the growth of socialist consciousness, an ideological great leap forward in which ideas could once again overcome material limitations and stimulate a culture of voluntary labor; the other was a return to the continental revolutionary strategies he had espoused early in the revolution's history – the development of a continental guerilla struggle based on the peasantry. There was an increasing urgency in his speeches and writings of the time, public appearances in which he was seen pushing himself to new levels of work, as well as a growing irritation with the inadequacies and inefficiencies of some state enterprises and their Soviet suppliers. There were clearly growing differences among the communists within Cuba (over economic questions) and in Latin America (over guerilla strategy). This in turn seemed to be opening a gulf between himself and Fidel.

Che's reception at the Moscow meeting of communist parties in 1963 was very different from three years earlier. There were official complaints aimed at his position, and his speech on his return in November 1963 made clear his growing disillusionment. It was not clear at the time, but this was the first step in Che's departure from Cuba. While Fidel, pragmatist that he was, protected his relationship with the Russians and with the communists, Che was more trenchant in his views – some said even dogmatic. He was also becoming more short-tempered with his colleagues. The Cuban–Soviet Sugar Agreement of 1964 set back any notion of rapid diversification of the economy. In March, his address to an UNCTAD conference in Geneva was radical and acerbic; his visit to Africa on his return journey was more significant. In an interview later that year he commented that the trade unions had no independent role, an indirect criticism of the state bureaucracy. He returned to Africa in January 1965 and the following month, in Algiers, delivered what was his most explicit criticism of the Soviet Union at a Third World Solidarity meeting.

When he returned to Cuba in March it was to resign. Shortly thereafter, Che disappeared; we now know that he went to the Congo, to relaunch an international guerilla strategy there. It was a disaster, as the Cuban fighters found themselves embroiled in sectarian conflicts and endless delays. Che had clearly been inadequately advised, but the Congo debacle exposed a deeper political problem. The experience of the early 1960s had shown very clearly that a guerilla strategy alone could not carry forward the revolution in Latin America. Yet Che remained wedded to that strategy and was putting it to the test again in Africa. Its failure should have led to recognition that force of will alone could not overcome objective conditions, and that revolutions are made by social forces and not by dedicated individuals alone.

Che's most important essay, "Man and Socialism in Cuba," was published in Uruguay after his departure (in late March 1965), and only later in Cuba. It was a clear sign of his alienation, his fall from grace. Before he left, he gave a letter to Fidel renouncing his Cuban citizenship. It was clearly intended for publication in the event of his death; instead it was published by Fidel in October. Effectively, it made Che's return impossible. Having escaped from the Congo, Che spent several months in Prague, isolated and depressed; his second wife, Aleida March, was his only visitor. He returned to Cuba later that year, in disguise and in secret, to prepare for what would be his final campaign – Bolivia.

The Bolivian campaign was apparently masterminded with key figures in the Cuban state. It was a strange decision; the strategy of rural guerilla warfare isolated the revolutionaries from the key social force in Bolivia, the organized workers' movement – as Che's Bolivian Diary so poignantly revealed. And a recent agrarian reform, however opportunistic it may have been, undermined the conditions for peasant resistance. Perhaps Che's vision was to create a continental guerilla nucleus; if so, it was misplaced. Above all, the mistaken idea that the Bolivian Communist Party would support the guerillas was quickly exposed. In fact, Che's closest advisors expressed severe doubts even before he arrived in October 1966. Why he went is still a matter of debate.

Che's Bolivian Diary does not explain why he went to Bolivia, but it does reveal the isolation of the group, its failure to connect with wider social forces, and the high level of organization on the part of counterinsurgency forces, advised as they were by US personnel. Che was captured, exhausted, sick, and separated from most of his comrades, and taken to the village schoolroom at La Higuera, where he was murdered on the explicit orders of a US agent.

Guillén, Abraham (1913–1993)

Rady Roldan-Figueroa

Born in Guadalajara, Spain, Abraham Guillén was a leading Latin American theorist of urban guerilla warfare. His work was informed by his first-hand experience in the anarchosindicalist popular militias that were active during the Spanish Civil War (1936–9). Ideologically, Guillén was firmly rooted in the Spanish anarchosindicalist tradition of the National Confederation of Labor (Confederación Nacional del Trabajo, CNT) and the Federation of Spanish Anarchists (Federación Anarquista Ibérica, FAI). He spent several years in prison after the civil war until successfully escaping in 1945, first to France and then, in 1948, to Argentina.

In Argentina he worked as a journalist, publishing his works under two different pseudonyms, Jaime de las Heras and Fernando Molina. In 1956, he published his two-volume Agonía del imperialismo (The Agony of Imperialism). In the early 1960s he became involved with the Argentinian guerilla movement known as the Uturuncos. He was detained in 1961 by the Argentinian security forces, and after his release he moved to Montevideo. It was there that Guillén commenced work on his Estrategia de la guerilla urbana (Strategy of the Urban Guerilla), which appeared in 1966. In this work Guillén advocated an alternative to the “established” thinking in guerilla warfare. In contrast to the Fidelista model, Guillén shifted attention away from the jungles and mountains and made cities the new focal points of insurrection. His thinking was influential among the Tupamaros and other urban guerilla movements in Argentina, Brazil, and the Dominican Republic.

In the 1970s he authored a series of works criticizing the Soviet model of bureaucratic socialism and articulating a form of socialist autogestión (self-management) inspired by the model of the former Yugoslavia. In 1972, he published his "Socialismo de autogestión": De la utopía a la realidad ("Socialism of Autogestion": From Utopia to Reality), in which he laid the foundations of his economic thought along the lines of the Yugoslav experience. He fully developed his criticism of the Soviet model in the 1979 work El capitalismo soviético: última etapa del imperialismo (Soviet Capitalism: The Last Phase of Imperialism), an obvious allusion to the classic work by Russian political philosopher and revolutionary strategist Vladimir. I. Lenin. He returned to Spain after the death of General Francisco Franco (1892–1975) and continued writing and lecturing in progressive circles.

Guinea-Bissau, nationalist movement

Justin Corfield

The Portuguese first arrived in what is now Guinea-Bissau in about 1450 and began trading in slaves, gold, ivory, and pepper. They gradually started building forts, and it became Portuguese Guinea. The Portuguese only ventured into the interior from the 1880s; prior to that they had been happy to trade with the people along the coast. In the 1920s, however, the Portuguese government decided to keep out foreign companies and let Portuguese businesses run Guinea and the rest of the Portuguese Empire. The result was that most of the peasant population of Guinea-Bissau who were not working on subsistence farms had to be laborers on plantations growing peanuts.

In Bissau, the capital of Portuguese Guinea, on September 19, 1956, a number of nationalists led by Amílcar Cabral founded the Partido Africano da Independência do Guiné e Cabo Verde (PAIGC) to fight for independence for both Portuguese Guinea and the Cape Verde Islands, after, if necessary, an armed struggle. To this end, the PAIGC started recruiting African bureaucrats, artisans, and laborers. In 1959 they managed to organize a strike at the Pijiguiti dockyards, located on the Geba River in Bissau. There the longshoremen refused to work and picketed the place. The Portuguese responded by shooting and killing 50 strikers and wounding another 180. The Pijiguiti Massacre, as the event became known, not only inflamed many people in Portuguese Guinea, but also managed to persuade Amílcar Cabral and many other moderate leaders of the PAIGC that they would have to resort to the armed struggle for independence.

The PAIGC drew many of its leaders from better-educated Cape Verdeans, but most of its members were from Portuguese Guinea, which became its first target. In 1961 soldiers of the PAIGC, backed by Guinea (formerly French Guinea), left that former French colony to infiltrate into isolated parts of Portuguese Guinea. With the remoteness of much of Portuguese Guinea, their task was relatively simple, and it was not long before they had 10,000 men under arms. The Portuguese responded by deploying 25,000 and raising an African militia of another 10,000. However, Portuguese efforts were largely in vain. By 1966 the PAIGC had control of half of Portuguese Guinea, with the Portuguese and their supporters pulling back to towns and cities.

The Portuguese commander, General Antonio Riberio de Spínola, pledged himself to the creation of a "Guinea for the sons of Guinea within a Portuguese community." With Bissau swollen with refugees, in 1973 Portuguese agents assassinated Amílcar Cabral in Conakry, French Guinea, but the war was largely over. Guinea-Bissau was effectively in nationalist hands by late 1973. The PAIGC held elections in much of Portuguese Guinea with, by their own counts, 52,400 voters from a registered electorate of 58,000 electing 15 regional councils, which in turn elected 80 members of a National Assembly. On September 24, 1973 the PAIGC, based in Dakar, Senegal, announced that the National Assembly had proclaimed the independence of the Republic of Guinea-Bissau after a meeting near the village of Medina de Bow in the eastern part of the country. It was not long before 80 countries recognized independence. By then, the Portuguese government had changed. The military coup d'état in Lisbon, Portugal's capital, on April 25, 1974, led by General Spínola, saw the end of Portugal's colonial ambitions.

Guinea-Bissau faced many problems. First, there were only a few factories, mainly for the processing of peanuts, and a brewery left behind. Literacy was as low as 5 percent, with life expectancy at 35 years of age, and nearly half of all children were dying before their fifth birthday. There were only 14 university graduates in the entire country, and no trained doctors. To try to improve this, Guinea-Bissau wanted a merger with the newly independent Cape Verde Islands. However, Guinea-Bissau's president, Luiz Cabral, brother of Amílcar Cabral, was overthrown in 1980 when he was visiting the Cape Verde Islands. The new military government of Joao "Nino" Vieira then took power, with Vieira, a hard-line Marxist, becoming president. The Soviet Union gave the new government military aid, but Vieira also managed to get non-military aid from the West. In 1986 following a coup attempt, Vieira became more pragmatic and began to endorse the free market system. Vieira narrowly won the 1994 presidential elections, with opposition leader Kumba Ialá (or Yalla) urging his supporters to accept the result and not precipitate a civil war.

On June 7, 1998 General Ansumane Mane, the former head of the army who had been sacked by President Vieira five months earlier, started a coup d'état. Mane had the support of the vast majority of the army, with Vieira relying on soldiers from neighboring Guinea and Senegal to keep him in power. In August 1998 a ceasefire was arranged, and elections were planned for 1999. In May 1999 General Mane came to power, overthrowing Vieira. Koumba Ialá became president on February 17, 2000. Mane was killed in an ambush by Ialá's supporters on November 23, 2000, and Ialá survived an attempted coup in December 2001, but was overthrown in another coup on September 14, 2003.

Gunawardena, Don Philip Rupasinghe (1901–1972)

Charles Wesley Ervin

Don Philip Rupasinghe Gunawardena is considered the first leader of socialism in Sri Lanka. Born in rural Boralugoda, then in colonial Ceylon, Philip Gunawardena was the son of a prominent landowner and Sinhalese patriot, Don Jacolis Rupasinghe Gunawardena. While studying at the University of Illinois-Urbana and the University of Wisconsin-Madison, he became a socialist through his friendship with fellow student Jayaprakash Narayan, who would later form the Congress Socialist Party in India. Gunawardena graduated from Columbia University in New York City with a doctorate in agricultural economics. Here he joined the communist-led League Against Imperialism (LAI) in 1925.

In 1928 Gunawardena went to London, joined the Communist Party of Great Britain (CPGB), and was assigned to work in the LAI and the India League, where he met and recruited youth from the various British colonies, including the handful of very talented intellectuals who later would help him form the Lanka Sama Samaja Party. As a courier to the Communist International's headquarters in Berlin, he witnessed the disastrous impact of Stalin's ultra-left line. Gunawardena became a secret Trotskyist. As Ervin (2006) has documented, he even made an attempt to visit Trotsky, who was then living in exile on the Turkish island of Prinkipo after his expulsion from the USSR. In 1932 Gunawardena was also expelled by the CPGB for his criticism of the party line and connections with British Trotskyists.

Building the Lanka Sama Samaja Party

Returning to Ceylon in late 1932, Gunawardena joined the South Colombo Youth League, a nationalist group affiliated to the All-Ceylon Youth Congress. Joined by his recruits from London, Gunawardena developed a Marxist nucleus within the Youth League. His roaring speeches earned this charismatic leader the nickname "the Lion of Boralugoda." In December 1935 Gunawardena and his followers launched the Lanka Sama Samaja Party (LSSP) as an anti-imperialist and broadly socialist party. The first Marxist party in Ceylon fielded candidates in the elections to the second State Council. Being elected, Gunawardena and N. M. Perera turned the chamber into a platform for denouncing the British and proposing reforms to benefit the urban and rural working people.

Outside the Council, Gunawardena fought to get a working-class base for the party in Colombo, combating the authoritarian style of pioneer labor leader A. E. Goonesinghe, which took him two years. The LSSP had a more difficult time penetrating the upcountry plantations, where the vast majority of the island's working class, the Tamil estate laborers, lived and toiled. In December 1939, after the Stalin–Hitler Pact, the LSSP majority condemned the Third International, expelled the Stalinist minority, and in March 1940 openly solidarized with the Fourth International, launched by Trotsky in 1938 as the revolutionary alternative to the Stalinized Comintern. In 1939 Philip married Kusuma (Amarasinha), the first woman member elected to the parliament in Ceylon.

In April 1940 the Ceylonese government banned the LSSP and imprisoned Gunawardena and three other senior party leaders in an attempt to silence the party's anti-war propaganda and stop the plantation strikes that the party was leading. Forced underground, the LSSP stepped up its efforts to unify the Trotskyist groups in India. Gunawardena had developed the thesis that a revolution in India was the precondition for independence and a socialist transformation in Ceylon. In April 1942 Gunawardena and his comrades escaped from jail, slipping away to India and joining the Bolshevik Leninist Party of India (BLPI), the Indian section of the Fourth International formed in May 1942. The BLPI, unlike the Communist Party of India (CPI), gave unconditional support to the Quit India movement in August 1942. In July 1943 Gunawardena along with other BLPI activists was arrested by the police, acting on information provided by the CPI (Ervin 2006). After six months in a Bombay jail, he was deported to Ceylon and imprisoned for the duration of the war.

From Mass Mobilizer to Parliamentarian

Gunawardena played a prominent role in the militant strikes that flared during 1945–7. He formed the powerful All-Ceylon Harbor and Dock Workers' Union in 1946. He was elected to the first parliament in 1947. In 1950 Gunawardena and his followers split from the LSSP and formed the Viplavakari (Revolutionary) LSSP (VLSSP). It formed a United Front with the Ceylon Communist Party, which had grown substantially during the war, when it supported the government and was allowed to function freely. Gunawardena believed that Stalinism was on the decline and therefore Trotskyism was a "dead ideology."

In the 1956 elections Gunawardena allied with the rural-oriented democratic socialist Sri Lanka Freedom Party (SLFP) to create the People's United Front (MEP). The MEP swept into power with a massive majority. Gunawardena was appointed minister of agriculture, food, and cooperatives, while P. H. William de Silva became minister of industries and fisheries. In 1958 Gunawardena, as the general secretary of the Central Council of Ceylon Trade Unions, drafted a sweeping land redistribution scheme, the Paddy Lands Act, eventually implemented in a less radical form. He pushed to nationalize bus transport and the port and agitated for the takeover of the British air force and naval bases. His radical proposals combined with his ability to stage disruptive strikes, especially in the harbor, polarized the cabinet and led to the famous “cabinet ministers’ strike” that forced Gunawardena and de Silva to leave the government in 1959.

His next move astonished even those who expected him to make bold leaps. In 1965 he made an alliance with the United National Party (UNP), so long demonized as a party of the rich, westernized elites. He served as minister of industries and fisheries in the UNP’s “Middle Path” government until 1969. However, Gunawardena continued to profess to be a revolutionary. He was one of the few senior Sri Lankan politicians to hail the insurrection of the Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna (JVP) in 1971.

Gustav Rebellions

Nathan James Martin

Protest and revolution are historically integral to the democratic transformation of Sweden from an autocratic monarchy to a constitutional democracy with egalitarian norms. Many of the major social changes in the country’s political and economic development occurred over the three centuries of Gustav rule, from 1521 to 1792.

Opposition to Kristian II and End of the Union of Kalmar

A period of civil war undermined the effectiveness of the Union of Kalmar. Following the defeat of King Kristian I’s army by Sten Sture the Elder in 1471 at the Battle of Brunkenberg, the realm was ruled by regents until 1523. In 1515 a dispute developed between the regent, Sten Sture the Younger, and the elected archbishop of Uppsala, Gustav Trolle, instigated when Sture threatened the castle and fief of Ståket, the traditional demesne of the archbishopric. Tension between Trolle and Sture escalated in 1517 when Sture appealed to the Riksdag (parliament) and to peasants and miners of Dalarna in opposition to the archbishop. Sture was summarily excommunicated, and Kristian, an ally of Trolle, attacked Stockholm in 1517, but was defeated and imprisoned by Sture’s forces. After another attack in 1518, Sture was forced to sign an armistice permitting six members of the Swedish nobility to return from Denmark, one of whom was Gustav Vasa. In 1520, after careful planning, Kristian raised a mercenary army and won major battles in Halland, Västergötland, and Tiveden. Sten Sture was killed in the first battle on Lake Åsunden and Kristian later surrounded Stockholm and was crowned king by the archbishop.

In November 1520 Trolle petitioned the king to punish those in the Riksdag who supported Sture’s opposition to the archbishop three years earlier. Trolle claimed that miners and peasants supporting Sture’s resistance breached the papal decree of Roman authorities and should be burned at the stake. Kristian agreed and 82 resisters were executed, including churchmen, council members, and lesser nobles. In a symbolic act, Kristian ordered Sten Sture’s body exhumed and burned with the rest. Kristian’s purge of the Swedish nobility became known as the Stockholm Bloodbath.

Kristian II was unpopular with the Swedes. In the traditional Eriksgata procession (king’s path) to the provinces after the coronation of a new king, the king collected heavy taxes and executed resisters. Local revolts erupted in central and southern Sweden. In Dalarna, with its strong tradition of opposition, revolts broke out as well. Gustav Vasa traveled to Dalarna in February 1521 to win support in resistance against Kristian, but did not gain support from the local inhabitants. Reconsidering the rejection, the Dalarnese sent their best skiers to catch up with Vasa, who was approaching the Norwegian border. Once accepted by the Dalarnese, others were won over and Vasa began a war to liberate Swedes from the Danes. He allied with the Hanseats and

Frederick, who had vied with Kristian for control of Denmark. Kristian was eventually defeated and pushed out of Swedish territory. Despite the debt incurred by Gustav for the war of liberation, he was crowned king of Sweden on June 6, 1523, and the modern Swedish state was born.

Rebellions During Gustav Vasa's Reign

Though the people of Dalarna supported Gustav Vasa's ascent to the throne in 1523, two years later a new revolt erupted against higher taxes, higher living expenses, and shortages of salt and other commodities. The driving force behind the revolt was the Daljunkare, a pretender claiming to be the son of Sten Sture, who had a strong legacy in Dalarna. Having won the support of the Estates of the Riksdag held in Västerås, Vasa proceeded with confidence. He summoned the rebels to Tuna, where the Daljunkare's supporters were brutally executed. The Daljunkare fled to Germany, was captured and killed.

Another revolt in Dalarna occurred in 1530, and was precipitated by Gustav's issuance of a decree stating that each church should give up one bell to give to the crown's coffers. A similar decree was announced earlier, but it only pertained to town and monastery church bells. When Gustav's men came to collect the bells, they were met by the commoners who were ready to fight. It may seem a trivial matter, but to these churchgoers, bells had great significance, and with the Lutheran threat of Olaus Petri looming, it had even greater significance. Gustav's response to the indignant Dalarnese was delayed because of a new threat by Kristian II, but in 1533 he ruthlessly punished the rebels, some of whom had supported him earlier in 1521. After the Bell Rebellion, Dalarna no longer was a threat to Vasa's sovereignty.

The last major revolt during Gustav's reign was the Nils Dacke Rebellion in 1542 in Småland. The peasantry opposed high taxes, opposed the stripping of ornamentation from churches, and the control of the regional economy by foreign interests. Nils Dacke, a peasant organizer opposed by authorities, recognized the discontent as an opportunity to launch a rebellion. Dacke amassed a rebel army of several hundred peasants and seized Kronoberg. Dacke and his rebels planned to overthrow the monarch, but Gustav, in power for 20 years, called on loyal nobles to quell the opposition. Gustav benefited from a general suspicion of Smålanders, who were geographically closer to Denmark and were not as zealous in the war against the Danes. After Dacke's revolt, Gustav consolidated control over Sweden's monarchy, and no major dissent followed during his reign.

Assassination of Gustav III

Starting in the 1730s and continuing for several decades, Swedish politics were defined by a rivalry in the noble's estate by two groups, the Hats and the Caps. The Hats, generally, represented the older aristocracy and nobility, while the Caps supported the lower estates of clergy, burghers, and farmers. During the mid-eighteenth century, two Swedish sovereigns (Frederick and Adolf Frederick) ruled with limited power due to the competing factional dispute. In 1765 the Caps sought to institute progressive change based upon the ideals of the Enlightenment, such as free speech, education, and an end to noble privilege.

Gustav III, crowned in 1771, drafted a new constitution in 1772 as a response to the reforms. The passage of this constitution is often referred to as a "peaceful coup" that expanded the power of the king. The constitution included a clause that the king would lead the four estates of parliament. The power of the nobles was preserved, and the lower three estates of clergy, burghers, and farmers were reduced. Noble influence expanded steadily throughout Gustav's reign. In 1789 at the Riksdag, the king sought to reduce the power of the nobles by advancing the lower three estates, passing the Act of Union and Security. This reduction in power through the reforms infuriated the nobility, leading the lords to plot a conspiracy against Gustav. On March 16, 1792 Jacob Johan Anckarström shot Gustav, who died from his wounds 13 days later. The assassination was memorialized in Verdi's Un Ballo Maschera and represented the end of a period of artistic and scientific achievement under Gustav's rule.

Gutiérrez, Gustavo (b. 1928)

Stefan Thimmel

Gustavo Gutiérrez, who in 1999 joined the Catholic Church's Dominicans fraternity, is considered the "Father of liberation theology." He was born in 1928 in Lima, Peru, and studied medicine, theology, psychology, philosophy, and theology in Lima, Leuven, Santiago de Chile, and at the Pontifical Gregorian University in Rome. In 1967 he coined the expression "theology of liberation." His 1971 book Theology of Liberation converted him into a public person and brought upon him the wrath of the conservative sectors of the Catholic Church, which accused him of developing a theory with Marxist influences.

The conservatives tried to marginalize him and at the Episcopal Conference of Puebla in 1979 he was excluded, together with other Latin American progressive priests like Hugo Assmann (Brazil), Ignacio Ellacuría (El Salvador), and Pablo Richard (Chile/Costa Rica). The conflicts with Rome were intensified during the 1980s, when Cardinal Ratzinger, the current Pope Benedict XVI, was chairman of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. Gutiérrez had to defend himself against the charges of Marxism and accusations that he had disobeyed the Catholic Church.

The liberation theology Gutiérrez made famous has become a broad social movement. Also called "liberation Christianity," it is supported by some Catholic priests and bishops, especially in Latin America. It has played an important role in a number of Latin American movements, such as in the revolutionary process in Nicaragua in the 1980s, social justice movements in El Salvador, the new movements of small farmers in Brazil, and the Chiapas Uprising in Mexico. This theology of liberation demanded radical political and social change in Latin America from as early as the 1970s, showing that the poor and excluded could be actors of their own history and subjects of their own liberation.

Gutiérrez, who in his youth lived in the shantytowns of Lima, was ordained a priest in 1959 after several years of study in Europe. After his return to Lima in 1960 he became a professor, teaching classes at the University of the Peruvian capital. In his classes he tried to involve the works of philosophers such as Camus, Marx, and Vallejo because he did not want to separate the religious world from the real world. In 1975 he founded a study center in Lima named the Instituto Bartolomé de la Casas. Today he teaches at the University of Notre Dame in the United States, but his home remains the endless slums of his hometown, Lima. His lifelong link with the poor makes the difference: the man who "invented" the system of base communities in Latin America and who has been honored throughout the world has never given up contact with ordinary people.

Guyana, protests and revolts

Teruyuki Tsuji

On June 13, 1980, an explosion broke the evening peace in Georgetown, the capital of Guyana, taking the life of Guyanese historian Walter Rodney. He was assassinated – though there has been no official investigation to date – by the People's National Congress (PNC) regime, led at the time by Forbes Burnham. The bomb was reportedly placed inside a radio device that had been given to Rodney by a member of the Guyana Defense Force. Rodney's pioneering documentation and lectures across the world illuminated the repercussions of European colonialism, and increased awareness of the conditions of Africans and the African diaspora. His numerous publications include his influential book, How Europe Underdeveloped Africa (1972), which is an often-cited reference in the literature on third world development and has given impetus to the evolution of Pan-Africanism.

Being a preeminent scholar, Rodney also became internationally renowned as a self-defined Marxist and political activist. While in Jamaica, where he held a lectureship at the University of the West Indies (UWI), Rodney frequently left classrooms for groundings – a Rastafarian term for reasoning through discussion – with and lectures to the underprivileged in the ghettos of Kingston, particularly those who professed Rastafarianism. He believed that Rastafarians were the “leading force of the expression of black consciousness in the Caribbean” and saw in their faith and expressions the potential to assist the region to gain not only political but also social and cultural freedom from imperial domination. His statements, speeches, and reflections on his encounters with Rastafarians during this period were published in Groundings with My Brothers (1969), which became a vade mecum for those concerned with the Black Power movement. Rodney’s groundings with the working poor, in addition to his sympathetic attitude toward the Cuban Revolution, concerned the Jamaican Labor Party government, and in 1968 the government actually expelled him from the country, declaring him persona non grata. This action triggered riots in Kingston, Jamaica, which resulted in the loss of several lives in clashes with police. Choosing a date to mark the beginning of the Black Power movement in the Caribbean is an arbitrary act; but it is unarguable that the so-called Rodney Riots were a critical juncture, giving momentum to the movement, which would infect the region during the 1970s. In 1974, Rodney returned to Guyana to take up a professorship at the University of Guyana, but the government abrogated his appointment. Shortly thereafter, Rodney joined the newly organized political group, the Working People’s Alliance (WPA), and acted as a leading figure in the resistance against the increasingly authoritarian PNC government until his death.

Guyana, formerly known as British Guiana, is where this vibrant and passionate “revolutionary intellectual” – Rodney’s self-defined goal – was born, nurtured, and died a violent death. Rodney’s life, though spanning only 38 years, represents the potential and limitations of social revolution and protest within the context of Guyana, and to some extent the entire Caribbean. He stated in a speech: “The revolution is made by ordinary people, not by angels, made by people from all walks of life, and more particularly by the working class who are in the majority.” In Guyana, the long history of labor militancy and resistance is equivalent to the struggle to organize and mobilize the “working class who are in the majority” across racial and ethnic segmentation, which is, according to Rodney (1981), an enduring “contradiction among the working people.”

Plantation: A Matrix of Races and Ethnicities

Guyana has a population of 769,095 people (2007). In 2002, the largest ethnic group was Indo-Guyanese and accounted for 43.5 percent of the population, followed by Afro-Guyanese, who made up 30.2 percent of the population. The rest of the population identified themselves as mixed heritages (16.7 percent); aboriginal Indians (9.2 percent); European Creoles, including the descendants of former Portuguese colonies (0.06 percent); Chinese (0.19 percent); and “other” (0.01 percent). Despite some shifts afterwards, the current racial and ethnic configuration is essentially an outgrowth of coerced and voluntary settlements of immigrant laborers for plantations.

British expansionism in the Americas was typically driven by a quest for production of sugar. There are two requirements for making sugarcane cultivation a profitable undertaking: land and labor. Sugar is a labor-intensive crop – it will not become sound until extreme care and attention are given throughout the months of the plant’s growth. The British colonization necessarily brought about dramatic demographic shifts – an explosion and diversification of the population – through the introduction of large-scale migrant workers: first African slavery, and then the indentured labor system in the post-emancipation era. Placed under British control in the late eighteenth century, this sugar-induced revolution of the social structure was repeated in Guyana, but sugar affected the configuration of Guyanese society in ways limited to its own contextual conditions and produced unique consequences within the general framework of the British West Indies.

Britain abolished the slave trade in 1807; however, the demand for African laborers was greater than ever in Guyana and other conquered colonies, which had just started supplying sugar to the international market. The unlawful importation of workers from Africa continued; at the same time, the planters' search for labor generated an influx of Africans from traditional colonies where sugar production had already peaked. In order to relieve the labor shortage caused by emancipation, the British adopted an extensive labor importation scheme in Guyana and other possessions, recruiting indentured servants from diverse places, including Portuguese-ruled Madeira and the southern provinces of China, though a majority came from India, the most populous colony in the British empire at that time. By the time the indentured system was repealed (1917), 400,000 laborers had departed from various parts of the Indian subcontinent for the British West Indies, 60 percent of whom – 239,000 laborers – arrived in Guyana, which used indentured labor longer than any other Caribbean colony.

In Guyana and other plantation colonies, immigrant workers were incorporated into the unified stratification system according to their putative racial and cultural traits. This entailed the emergence of an ethnic division of labor and residence, under which settlers with different cultural origins framed distinctive and exclusive socioeconomic activities and relative claims. This reflexively reinforced their sense of ethnic affiliation. In Guyana, there were several geographic and economic conditions that formed a reproductive mechanism of this mutually reinforcing relationship between race/ethnicity and institutional activities.

V. S. Naipaul (1962), the Nobel laureate writer from neighboring Trinidad, describes the landscape of Guyana: "One can learn much about British Guiana from the air: its size, its emptiness, the isolation of its communities." Guyana was the largest British West Indian colony (83,000 square miles), but a substantial portion had poor soil and was not suitable for commercial agriculture; the best arable land was on a narrow strip along the northern coastline. Even so, the coastland was generally below sea level, so drainage and irrigation were required for sustained agriculture in the face of endemic floods and drought. The environment of the Guyanese coastland required a constant provision of workers, not only for cultivation but also for land reclamation and dam maintenance. This reinforced the sugar monoculture, with little room for other crops, and allowed a few giant corporations to dominate Guyana's small colonial economy (Rodney 1981). The difficult nature of the Guyanese terrain and the sugar plantations' monopoly of the best land slowed the growth of free peasants in Guyana. Given that small-scale independent farming was less attractive, generally speaking, former slaves migrated to towns and cities, and sought work in the mining industry, whereas time-expired indentured laborers remained on estates as contract workers. In consequence, racial and ethnic distinctions came to coincide with job specialization and residential separation. The two isolated sub-economies – Indo-Guyanese agriculture and Afro-Guyanese commercial urbanism – still characterize Guyana, though they are not as clear cut as they used to be.

Compared to other West Indian territories, it was easier for planters and colonial administrations to control the labor market in Guyana, with its spacious and fertile lands. Consequently, Guyanese planters were relatively successful in their attempt to compensate for deteriorating productivity by a further concentration of landowning and an expansion of the labor force, rather than through diversification and modernization of the industry. In response, strikes and insurrections became a frequent occurrence as workers fought for increased wages, improved working conditions, the abolition of various taxes, and the relaxation of land tenure. However, spontaneity rather than organization characterized working-class resistance in the nineteenth century. More importantly, the ethnic divisions of labor and residence created communal social protests and resistance during this period. Most of the participants in strikes and insurrections on sugar estates were of East Indian origins and their local-born descendants, who came to represent more than 80 percent of plantation workers by the end of the nineteenth century. Moreover, although low wages and poor work environments were the result of the elites' control of the labor market, growing working-class grievances increased intraclass and interracial/interethnic conflicts. The constant arrival of new immigrants, urged by the landowners' quest for a dependable and affordable workforce, stirred resource competition among the working class, and had a dampening effect on their struggles for a better standard of living. This partly explains why anti-Portuguese sentiment ran high among African workers in post-emancipation Guyana. There were also instances of authorities using Africans against East Indians – for example, black drivers assaulting and beating East Indians, and black policemen harassing East Indians – as an increasing number of East Indian workers participated in protests and uprisings in the late nineteenth century.

Paving the Way: Trade Unionism

Percy Hintzen (1989) pointed out that in the colonial setting, where the apparatus of government and bureaucracy served as the machinery of elite domination, social change was made possible only through mass mobilization. In order to unsettle the colonial order by transgressing rigid social, economic, and political bounds, mass mobilization must assume a class and nationalist character, encompassing different socioeconomic sectors. It also needs leadership that is able to translate the participants' demand for economic and material welfare into public political issues.

These characteristics were present in the riots of November–December 1905. The riots are often referred to as the “Rumveldt Riots,” due to the fact that workers from Plantation Rumveldt were among the first to lose their lives in the violence. Unlike earlier labor rebellions, whose implications were regional and limited to a particular economic sector and thus a particular ethnic group, the disturbance in Rumveldt spread to Georgetown, where dock workers stopped working to protest poor working conditions and inadequate wages. Eventually, European business owners and administrators became the target of the rebellious crowd. In an effort to suppress the riots, the police opened fire, leading to the deaths of eight individuals.

The 1905 riots were a critical juncture in the history of labor militancy and social protest in Guyana because they demonstrated the possibility that racial, occupational, and residential divisions within the working class could be transcended. The events had implications for future labor movements as well, because middle-class individuals rose up as political figures through their negotiations with colonial authorities on behalf of the rioting workers (Rodney 1981). They included those who would later take active roles in the creation of trade unions and the organization of labor movements in the 1920s and 1930s.

A sharp rise in the cost of living during World War I resulted in many labor disturbances and the formation of the British Guiana Labor Union (BGLU), the first trade union in the British West Indies, in 1919. From the late 1920s on, the dramatic decline in the price of sugar crippled the Guyanese economy and aroused extensive strikes and demonstrations in Georgetown. In 1931, the second trade union in Guyana, the British Guiana Workers' League (BGWL), came into being. As representatives for different economic sectors and occupations, the trade unions had already assumed the character of ethnically based organizations. Competition among the working class made it extremely difficult to mobilize labor across racial and ethnic lines, even in the general economic plight of the 1930s. However, during this period, race and ethnicity played a relatively small part in the upsurge of political consciousness among the working masses. Trade unions did not often call for strikes or demonstrations; however, as a rare vehicle for expressing the grievances of the working class, their actions and statements functioned to forge a common purpose and overarching strategy across regional, occupational, and racial boundaries, which laid the groundwork for a more extensive mass mobilization in the future.

Into a Merger: Enter Nationalist Politics

In the early 1940s, circumstances furthered the politicization of working-class grievances. First, constitutional reforms were implemented in Guyana, which expanded local representation in the Legislative Council, although mass interests remained unrepresented due to the stringent qualifications for voter eligibility. Second, a group of professionals and intellectuals, largely educated abroad, launched the Political Affairs Committee (PAC). The first issue of the PAC Bulletin set forth its goal to “assist the growth and development of the Labour and Progressive Movements of British Guiana, to the end of establishing a strong, disciplined, and enlightened Party, equipped with the theory of Scientific Socialism.” The PAC filled a historic vacuum of middle-class leadership necessary to channel mass discontent into a nationalist movement.

Most importantly, Cheddi Jagan and Forbes Burnham – the two most dynamic and influential leaders in labor and national politics in Guyana – were among the rising political actors during this period. Having returned to Guyana in 1943 after seven years of study in the United States, Jagan participated in the formation of the PAC and founded a new union, the Guiana Industrial Workers' Union (GIWU). He was a self-proclaimed Marxist whose ideology, principles, and political technology enabled the PAC to provide a definite course to the dispersed trade union movement in Guyana, and made the GIWU more successful than the other unions in creating political mobilization in support of demands for radical redress. Burnham developed his radicalism while in England under the rule of the British Labour Party. He immediately joined the PAC and, under his presidency, successfully transformed the BGLU from a conservative to a radical and dynamic union.

Burnham became as popular among the Afro-Guyanese working class as did Jagan among his Indo-Guyanese supporters, but they did not seek to develop political organizations in close alignment with particular ethnic groups. As a reflection of this, in 1950 the PAC developed into the first mass-based political party, the People's Progressive Party (PPP), with Jagan as leader and Burnham as chairman. Since decolonization had begun and the focus of political campaigns had shifted to domestic contentions over who would control the inherited state, the mobilizing idioms in the trade union movement (e.g., anti-imperialism) had become less effective. However, the PPP's socialist agenda, as a supplement to anti-colonialism, enabled the party to achieve mass support. Indo- and Afro-Guyanese, together, formed political groups within the party structure throughout the country. In the first general elections under adult suffrage, held in May 1953, the PPP scored an impressive victory, winning a majority of the parliamentary seats and more than half of the popular vote.

A Split in the Movement: The (Re)ethnicization of Politics

Once it had gained power, the PPP came under pressure to disintegrate its comprehensive nationalist movement. Its socialist ideas, rhetoric, and symbols had unquestionably allowed the PPP's revolutionary politics to achieve a level of integration among the working-class mass that no other political groups or organizations could ever have reached. Yet the ambitious and expansive image of socialism around which the PPP's policies and strategies were fashioned turned from a force of convergence to one of divergence. First, it created ideological cleavages within the party between two factions, which respectively advocated softer and stronger lines of socialism. Second, in the escalating Cold War, the adoption of socialism connected Guyana to the international struggle between the great power blocs and resulted in international interventions. Because it considered the PPP a threat to foreign capital with interests in Guyana, the British government suspended the constitution to remove the PPP from power in October 1953. The British governor declared a state of emergency; a number of PPP leaders were placed in detention; and the PPP's organs, including the Pioneer Youth League, were declared illegal and banned.

Equally importantly, the party organization – and thus national electoral politics – eventually became realigned along racial and ethnic lines. In Guyana, it was extremely difficult for local middle-class political leaders to mobilize the electorate across ethnic bounds that embodied conflicting socioeconomic interests. The political institutions introduced by the British through constitutional reforms only served to reinforce the impact of ethnicity on political organization. Given ethnically divided residential patterns, which shared more or less the same boundaries as electoral political constituencies, the single-seat electoral district system has rendered party alignments assured, and election outcomes predictable. The national electoral politics of Guyana was bound to racialize/ethnicize despite the intentions of leading actors because of the association of racial and ethnic boundaries with class and occupational and residential distinctions, whose roots reach to the colonial period.

After another victory in the 1957 general elections, the PPP split into two factions, represented by the two most popular leaders, Jagan and Burnham. As a result, Burnham and his followers left the PPP in 1958 and formed a new political party, the People's National Congress (PNC). This party has since supported the interests of Afro-Guyanese urbanites and consequently drawn its support mostly from Afro-Guyanese electorates in Georgetown. In reaction, the PPP had to realign itself along ethnic lines and came to focus on Indo-Guyanese voters in rural districts. In Guyana, as in many other postcolonial societies, non-political institutions representing the interests of the majority working mass have remained undeveloped; as a result, politics has retained a commanding position for resource allocation since independence. The support derived from ethnic alignment is a prerequisite for being competitive in Guyanese elections – and for gaining the control of the state.

From 1964 to 1992, the Burnham-led PNC dominated Guyana's national politics, chiefly through rigged elections. Although Rodney held a good opinion of Jagan's contribution to labor militancy and national politics, he did not join the PPP primarily because he felt the party exclusively represented Indo-Guyanese interests. Rodney instead participated in the development of the WPA and worked with various pressure groups, such as the African Society for Cultural Relations with Independent Africa, Indian People's Revolutionary Associates, and the Working People's Vanguard Party. As the most active leader in the WPA, which became a political party in 1979, he continued to work with all the forces opposed to the increasingly authoritative PNC government in forming national unity government until his death.

H

Haiti, democratic uprising, 1980s–1991

Alexander King

Following the overthrow of the dictator Jean-Claude Duvalier early in 1986, a democratic rebellion unfolded in Haiti that opposed the restoration attempts by the elite class of the Duvalier era. In the presidential election at the end of 1990, the strength of this democratic movement found expression through the clear victory – despite the restorative attempts within Haiti and by the US – of Jean-Bertrand Aristide, the candidate of the progressive social movements. After seven months in office, a violent coup forced the president into exile. The democratic movement was then subjected to years of persecution.

The Overthrow of Jean-Claude Duvalier in 1986

The Dictatorship of the Duvalier Family

The rule of the Duvalier family over Haiti lasted nearly 30 years. It began with the election of Jean-Claude's father, François Duvalier, to the office of president in 1957. Formerly a country doctor, François Duvalier had the support of the Army when he ran for president; after his election, however, he quickly consolidated his power by purging potential opponents within the military and by creating, beginning in 1959, the Volontés de la Sécurité Nationale (VSN) (the Free Corps for the National Security), a separate armed apparatus for repression. In 1964 Duvalier named himself “president for life” and initiated a bizarre personality cult.

The VSN was recruited primarily from the lumpenproletariat of the capital city, Port-au-Prince, and grew to a strength of 10,000 men and women. The VSN took over the key positions within the police and secret services. Its goal was to crush all opposition before it could begin. Feared among the populace as the ton tons macoutes (“cannibal uncles”), the VSN embodied state terror under Duvalier. Between 30,000 and 50,000 were killed by the regime (Le Monde Diplomatique, August 1987).

A member of the Ethnographic Institute, François Duvalier built his power base with the support of the black middle and upper classes. His rule was ideologically nourished by a form of black nationalism (noirisme haïtien) that was directed against the mulatto bourgeoisie and presented as a popular movement drawing on the cult of voodoo. To secure his rule, Duvalier instrumentalized longstanding social and economic conflicts between the black and mulatto populations. In addition to obtaining the support of the black middle and upper classes and of the urban lumpenproletariat, he secured the support of the Levantine merchant class, which competed against the mulatto bourgeoisie for economic influence. Within this constellation, Duvalier built up a malevolent and intimidating base of political and economic power that depended upon favoritism and the systematic appropriation of government revenues derived from state enterprises as well as from supposedly charitable foundations.

The rule of François Duvalier was characterized not only by corruption and terror, but also by economic collapse and social exclusion. Per capita income fell annually by an average of 1.4 percent. Infrastructural and social development fell well below that of other Latin American countries.

After the death of François Duvalier (“Papa Doc”) in 1971, the presidency was transferred to his 19-year-old son Jean-Claude (“Baby Doc”). He transformed the political base of the family's domination and entered into a pacte de domination (Dupuy 1997, 2007) with the mulatto elite, consolidated through his 1980 marriage to Michèle

Bennett, of the mulatto bourgeoisie. Under Jean-Claude Duvalier, the Army was strengthened both in manpower and in logistics, and a new unit to suppress rebellion was created. In contrast to his father, who had ruled as an autocrat by decree, Jean-Claude Duvalier built his rule upon a technocratic state apparatus and upon economic incentives to foreign investors as well as the participation of the mulatto bourgeoisie. However, to a large extent he lost the support of the black middle class.

The son further developed the kleptocratic system of the father. The Duvaliers absconded with a total of between 600 and 900 million US dollars (Le Monde Diplomatique, August 1987), including 120 million US dollars diverted from the state treasury between January 1983 and February 1986, of which 86 million was transferred into foreign bank accounts.

The Forces and Movements in Opposition to the Dictatorship

That the Duvalier system stood on clay feet, despite repression and favoritism, became apparent when the opposition dared to come increasingly into the open in the 1980s. The rejection of Duvalier by large sectors of the Church, along with the spread of grassroots Catholic parish organizations (Ti Legliz = “small churches”), was decisive. The visit of the pope in March of 1983 and his call “Fòk sa chanje” (“things must change”) encouraged the forces within the Catholic Church of Haiti that wanted to bring about change.

From 1985 on, the opposition movement against Duvalier grew ever stronger. Demonstrations were organized and communications networks (radio projects and so on) created around the demand for déchoukaj – a “clearing,” meaning the complete eradication of the Duvalier system. The youth movement played an important role both within and outside the Catholic Church. Student groups were founded in the universities. The Youth Council that was held in Jérémie from April 8 to 14, 1985, complained in its “Manifesto of Youth” of bad living conditions, repression, and corruption and demanded freedom of speech, agrarian reform, and investment in health care and education. During a demonstration in Gonaïves in November 1985 in which primarily young people took part, the Army and tontons macoutes killed three students. As a result, the country became increasingly restless, and the protests grew.

The Role of Foreign Countries

Although the US discontinued humanitarian support for Haiti from 1963 to 1969, the US government supported – against the backdrop of the Cuban Revolution – the regime of Duvalier as a bulwark against communism. After the change in leadership from Papa Doc to Baby Doc, the US substantially increased its support.

The European Union (EU) and multilateral banks were also strong contributors. During a brief phase under US President Carter, support was conditioned upon concessions in the arenas of political and human rights. But beginning in 1980, under President Reagan, the pressure on the Haitian regime was again reduced, and the repression of the Haitian opposition was increased via arbitrary arrests, deportations, and the closing of radio stations.

Because of the widening democratic movement in Haiti, the US government was finally forced to withdraw support from the Duvalier regime so as not to lose control over the political developments in Haiti and so as to prevent further radicalization. On February 7, 1986, the US finally convinced the Duvalier government to step down; Duvalier was then flown to France rather than being brought to justice, as the opposition had demanded.

The Difficult Transition to Democracy

After the flight of Duvalier, the National Government Council (Conseil National de Gouvernement, CNG) took over the government. The CNG consisted of four military and two civilian members under the leadership of General Henri Namphy and was to organize free elections and to prepare the way for a democratic society.

The end of the dictatorship set into motion a grand democratic reform movement that presented itself in a great multiplicity of organizations. Ever more political parties, professional associations, trade unions, human rights organizations, youth groups, women’s groups, farmers’ groups, neighborhood and community committees, grassroots initiatives, and media (radio and newspapers) sprang up in all regions of the country, thereby bringing political discourse well beyond the capital city of Port-au-Prince for the first time. Within the democratic camp, there were two main tendencies. The enlightened sectors of the bourgeoisie and of the middle class had ended their alliance with Duvalier and his supporters and were pushing for civil liberties and parliamentary democracy. The democratic movement “from below” was articulating more extensive demands for complete democratic, economic, and social participation.

On the other hand, the restorative tendencies in the CNG soon became evident. Many functionaries and elites of the Duvalier regime were largely unscathed by the change and remained part of the government and administrative apparatus. The tontons macoutes were not held accountable, but instead became members of the Army or fled into exile with the help of the Army. With their privileged role threatened by the democratic rebellion, the tontons macoutes and the Army – which for decades had been rivals – now formed an alliance that was supported by the US government and that was joined by parts of the Church hierarchy. On February 9, 1986, the Bishop of Cap-Haïtien, François Gayot, explained the “common-sense” reasons for this alliance: “It is time to reconcile. The danger to guard against from now on is Communism!” (cited in Aristide 1992).

The Struggle Against Neo-Duvalierist Restoration

The Military Government of General Namphy

In the course of the year it became ever clearer that the military and the neo-Duvalierists who dominated the CNG did not want to give up control of the country. Those whose courageous protest had brought about the end of the dictatorship saw themselves confronted with a “Duvalierism without Duvalier.” The democratic movements felt cheated of their success by the CNG. The latter rejected the aspirations of the opposition with extreme and increasing rigidity. As a result, only 20 percent of those entitled to vote participated in the election of the Constitutional Assembly of October 19, 1986. In March and April 1986, several demonstrators had already been killed in confrontations with the Army.

In order to bring under control the electoral process that was to commence with a presidential election in November 1987, the CNG in June of 1987 issued a decree to limit the independence, power, and authority of the independent electoral commission (Conseil Electoral Provisoire, CEP); the CEP had been formed on May 15, comprising representatives of civil society (the churches and human rights organizations) and of the executive and legislative branches of government. Furthermore, the civilian oversight of the military was to be revoked. At the end of June and the beginning of July 1987, church groups, unions, and political parties complained about the reduction of the authority of the CEP. The Army killed at least 25 people; however, finally the decree was withdrawn. Nevertheless the intimidation of the CEP by the tontons macoutes increased. The CNG altogether refused to provide the CEP with the necessary protection for the electoral process.

The conflicts grew so extreme that the bourgeoisie saw its political, social, and economic privileges threatened. On July 23, 1987, in Jean-Rabel in the northwest, as many as 300 small farmers were killed, after they had made demands for land reform through their organization Tèt Ansanm, in a massacre instigated by large landowners.

The threat to the democratic movement by the restorative elements necessitated increased consolidation and organization by the opposition. In January 1987, a broad array of social democratic organizations founded the KONAKOM (Komitè Nasyonal Kongrè Oganisasyon Demokratik), which would henceforth have important influence in the political discussions and which would serve as a counterweight to the neo-Duvalierists. In August 1987, more than 50 organizations within the KONAKOM founded a political platform named FNC (Front National de Concertation), in order to take part in the electoral process to come and, by this means, take over the power from the neo-Duvalierists. The FNC named the human rights activist Gérard Gourgue as its presidential candidate. Further political alliances were formed, primarily within the moderate bourgeois spectrum, including the ANDP (Alliance Nationale pour la Démocratie et le Progrès), launched by Marc Bazin, who was formerly a government minister under Duvalier and an official of the United Nations as well as of the World Bank.

But on election day, Sunday, November 29, 1987, the fledgling democracy was drenched in blood. The presidential election that was to have taken place on this day had to be abruptly canceled after the tontons macoutes massacred the voters at the polls. The presidential candidates withdrew their candidacies. The election was nevertheless repeated as “farce” on January 17, 1988. But then, only a small number of voters participated, resulting in the election of the Christian Democrat Leslie Manigat as president. His cabinet stood in a continuum with the CNG, especially in the person of the defense minister, General Williams Regala, who had previously been a member of the CNG and who was accused of having been involved in the massacre of November 29, 1987.

But on June 20, 1988, Manigat was removed from office, and General Namphy himself took power again. He was strongly supported by the Duvalierist hardliners and the former tontons macoutes in the Army. The terror against the democratic movement increased again and reached a new climax in the massacre of September 11, 1988, when approximately 100 tontons macoutes forced their way into the Jean-Bosco Church in the north of Port-au-Prince – where the Catholic priest and grassroots activist Jean-Bertrand Aristide was preaching – and killed 13 people.

The Putsch Government of Avril and the Transition to Democracy

Namphy was, however, increasingly confronted with rivals within the Army. On September 17, 1988, there was a military putsch by General Prosper Avril, who immediately began to purge the macoutes from the upper ranks of the Army. And in 1989, against the backdrop of the end of the East–West confrontation, international pressure grew to clear a way for a transition to democracy. The US government and, increasingly, the Haitian bourgeoisie calculated that the more quickly this transition could be made, the more difficult it would be for the forces of the left to organize themselves – and the more likely it would be that the forces of the moderate right could prevail in an election.

Avril saw himself increasingly isolated from the US, from the Church, and from the bourgeoisie. Like his predecessor, he turned to the neo-Duvalierists and increased the repression until, finally, he received the telephone call of the US ambassador in Port-au-Prince, who demanded that he resign (Dupuy 1997, 2007). General Avril left the country on March 12, 1990.

A Supreme Court judge, Eartha Pascal-Trouillot, was appointed temporary president. She was provided with a provisional council, on which 11 political parties were represented. Despite the conflict between the president and the council, and despite the attempts of the Duvalierists to make use of this conflict in order to delay the process of democratization, preparations were made for the first free elections in more than 30 years, to be held on December 16, 1990.

The Grassroots Churches and the Rise of Jean-Bertrand Aristide

The grassroots movement in the Catholic parishes had created the fundamental conditions for the overthrow of Duvalier and was also the backbone of the movement against neo-Duvalierist restoration. Some 2,000 grassroots parish organizations (Ti Legliz) existed in Haiti at this time. They arose, beginning in the 1970s, under the influence of Latin American liberation theology. The emphasis of their work in the parishes was popular education (éducation populaire) and the articulation of the needs and demands of the poor. The degree of support from the official Church varied. For example, while Bishop Romélus in Jérémie actively supported the grassroots parish organizations as well as the resistance against Duvalier and the military regime, Archbishop Ligondé in Port-au-Prince remained on the side of the Duvalierists to the end.

The priest and soon-to-be president Jean-Bertrand Aristide rose quickly, beginning in 1985, to become a leading figure in this grassroots movement. Bishop Romélus fostered his rise, but others in the Church hierarchy vigorously opposed him.

Born on July 15, 1953, in Port-Salut in a small house in the mountains of the southern peninsula, the son of a farmer, Aristide moved to Port-au-Prince soon after the death of his father, but he did not lose contact with his rural homeland. He went to a school run by the Salesian Society (a Roman Catholic religious order originally known as the Society of St. Francis de Sales) and in 1966 entered the seminary in Cap-Haïtien. His work towards a degree in theology and psychology included study abroad, for example in Israel and in Greece. In 1982, he was ordained as a priest. He had always regarded the Catholic Church in Haiti critically, and upon returning from doctoral studies in Canada, he took over the parish of Saint-Jean Bosco in a slum on the northern edge of Port-au-Prince on January 5, 1985. His parish would serve him as a base for his political work against the military government and against the outrageous social injustices in his country.

Aristide quickly gained in popularity among the poor, but he also made powerful enemies.

Several assassination attempts were made upon him and his supporters. On August 23, 1987, on the way back from a ceremony commemorating the victims of Jean-Rabel, his convoy was attacked in Pont Sondé near Saint Marc. As noted above, on September 11, 1988, macoutes forced themselves into his church and killed several worshippers. In December 1988, Aristide was expelled from the Salesian Society because of his political engagement.

His popularity did not suffer. Numerous activists in the democratic mass movement urged Aristide, the priest, to get into politics and run for president in the election scheduled for December 16, 1990. Aristide finally agreed to run and was nominated by the FNCD (Front National pour le Changement et la Démocratie), a coalition of leftwing political parties founded in 1990. However, Aristide did not regard himself as the candidate of any political party, nor of a coalition of parties. He had a low opinion of the political effectiveness of political parties, that is to say, he had no confidence that they could achieve any significant influence that would extend beyond small academic circles (Aristide 1992, 1994).

The numerous grassroots organizations seeking democratic change from below joined together in a mass movement, Lavalas (Creole for “flash flood”) to support him in the election campaign. The candidacy of the priest of the poor, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, brought forth a surge of enthusiasm. Accordingly, there was a high level of participation in the election of December 16, 1990. Long lines formed at the polls. For the first time in the history of the country, this was an election in which the hopes and aspirations of the masses found expression. The enthusiasm culminated in mass gatherings in the capital city. The result left no room for doubt: over 67 percent voted for Aristide, while only 14 percent voted for Marc Bazin, whose candidacy was supported by the US government and by Haitian businessmen. The Church hierarchy immediately sought a confrontation: Archbishop Ligondé turned his New Year’s sermon into a harangue against Aristide.

Aristide was sworn into office on February 7, 1991. On January 6, 1991, the neo-Duvalierists had already tried to prevent this through a putsch. Roger Lafontant, previously interior minister under Duvalier, as well as the ringleader of the tontons macoutes, stormed the presidential palace with some militias and declared the presidential election void. He was supported neither by the Army’s leadership nor by the US government. An authentic national uprising came to the defense of the president. Lafontant had to concede and was arrested; Archbishop Ligondé was able to escape.

The Putsch of September 1991

On the night of September 29, however, a second putsch was carried out by the Army leadership and was supported by the Haitian bourgeoisie. General Raoul Cédras, whom Aristide had himself named Chief of the General Staff and then Chief Commander of the Army, was the leader of the putschists. Soldiers surrounded Aristide’s residence and the presidential palace and stood guard throughout the city to prevent the people from again rising to defend Aristide. The putschists were supported by tontons macoutes who had returned from the Dominican Republic. Hundreds of Lavalas members were killed. Radio stations were occupied or destroyed. As a result of diplomatic pressure, Aristide was flown out of the country and thereafter spent three years in exile in the US.

On October 7, 1991, the parliament named, under pressure, a new president (Joseph Nérette; Jean-Jacques Honorat was named prime minister). The bourgeoisie applauded the coup. The resistance of the enlightened political class was weak and to some extent half-hearted. In contrast, the social movements resisted fiercely and with great sacrifice. In the following three years under the putsch government, Lavalas suffered massive casualties and was never able to recover from these traumatic experiences.

Haiti, foreign-led insurgency, 2004

Alexander King

In the year of the 200th anniversary of national independence, Haiti witnessed the second violent overthrow of its president, Jean-Bertrand Aristide. Those democratic forces within the Haitian bourgeoisie which had, from the end of the 1980s to 1991, supported his rise to president now formed an alliance with the death squads of the past dictatorships, along with former military officers, with the aim of overthrowing Aristide. In this they counted upon the support of foreign powers. The resistance against the coup was weak because Lavalas, the grassroots movement that supported the president, had lost a significant amount of support.

Overthrow Instigated by the Military

On February 5, 2004, the Revolutionary Artibonite Resistance Front took over the port city of Gonaïves in western Haiti. The Front was led by Jean Pierre Baptiste and Butteur Métayer, both of whom had been freed from the Gonaïves prison through a break-in by the Cannibal Army in August 2002. Métayer was the leader of the Cannibal Army, which developed from a grassroots group within the government party, Fanmi Lavalas; however, he had turned against Aristide and had been arrested in connection with violent riots in Gonaïves. Baptiste had done time in Gonaïves prison for his participation in the massacre of Raboteau (in 1994, during the putsch government).

Starting out in Gonaïves, the rebels began a campaign of conquest throughout the northern part of the country. First they cut a path from the west coast to the border with the Dominican Republic in the east. There they were joined by armed military units, led by Guy Philippe and Jodel Chamblain, that crossed into Haiti from the Dominican Republic; these units had been recruited mainly from exiled cadres of the Haitian army (Forces Armées d’Haïti, FAd’H) that had been dissolved in 1995. As a known participant in the 1994 massacre of Raboteau, Chamblain had gone into exile in the Dominican Republic. Philippe had relocated there in October 2000, in connection with a failed putsch attempt. Together the rebels conquered the big northern cities and then advanced south.

In response to the advance of the rebel troops, the Haitian president, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, left the country on February 29, 2004. Whether he left of his own will or whether due to pressure by the US soldiers who picked him up at his residence in the capital city of Port-au-Prince and flew him to the Central African Republic is still debated today. The forcible regime change was accompanied by the armed intervention, on March 1, 2004, of a US, French, Canadian, and Chilean multinational strike force under US command. The UN Security Council had mandated this intervention on February 29. Beginning in June of 2004, the multinational strike force was replaced by a UN mission, MINUSTAH (Mission des Nations Unies pour la Stabilisation d’Haïti), which was under Brazilian command, with broad participation of Latin American armies, as per UN Resolution 1542.

Civil Opposition

From May 2000, a crise post-électorale had been smoldering in Haiti, sparked by manipulation of vote counting during the elections for the parliament and the senate. Through this manipulation, the government party, Fanmi Lavalas, had sought to enlarge the majority it had already achieved in these chambers. In response, the opposition had boycotted the presidential election of December 2000 and had selected a “counter-president.”

Lavalas had long benefited from the fact that there were no alternatives to it: the scant competition consisted only of a deeply divided bourgeois opposition that hardly had any popular support, and the old insider networks from the era of the Duvalier dictatorships (up until 1986) and the era of the neo-Duvalierist military government (1986–90). Specifically:

- Social democratic parties (some with communist roots) that had close relations to the Socialist International and to the contemporary social democratic governments of Europe, but had no mass base in Haiti; a majority of these had been in the camp of Aristide supporters in 1990, and some had been part of Lavalas until the split of the mid-1990s.

- Conservative parties and personalities that had been somewhat discredited as a result of their work with the neo-Duvalierists after 1986: for example, Leslie Manigat, whose career was fostered by Germany's Konrad Adenauer Foundation, as well as representatives of the old Duvalierist and neo-Duvalierist elites.
- The most influential group: the rich merchant families, many of them of German or Syrian origin, who had organized and financed the first coup against Aristide (1991 to 1994).

But the influence of the opposition never extended much beyond the bourgeois neighborhoods of Port-au-Prince and the villas of the wealthy suburb of Pétionville. In elections, the opposition always had the overpowering voters' block of Lavalas – the masses of the poor – against it, and did not have a chance. Their good international contacts were their most important trump card. Only by internationalizing the political crisis in Haiti could the opposition hope to further its own interests.

The Internationalization of the Conflict

The coup in Haiti was prepared with international participation. Relations between the US and Haiti had grown significantly worse since the autumn of 2000, when Aristide was elected president of his country in a contested election. In 2003 alone, the Bush administration, which came to power as well in a disputed election, invested about a million US dollars for regime change in Haiti. In this the US was able to make use of the justified displeasure over the increasing use of repressive means to secure Aristide's rule and also the disappointment regarding the unrealized promises of social reform.

In 2000 and 2001, the opposition joined together to form a coalition with the name Convergence Démocratique (CD), later enlarged to the Group of 184. The US International Republican Institute (IRI) supported the growth of the fledgling Haitian opposition by, among other things, holding seminars in Santo Domingo, the capital city of the neighboring Dominican Republic, and inviting opposition representatives. Through these efforts, the IRI obtained the commitment of the regime's opponents to an uncompromising course of action against Aristide, and this substantially contributed to the destabilization of the situation in Haiti.

The government of Aristide reacted with increasing repression against the protests, which spread rapidly among the students and some other parts of civil society. However, the civil opposition was not well rooted and therefore still lacked significant power. The latter came about only through the appearance of the armed rebels. It was decisive that former military personnel and death squads from the time of the junta and the putsch supported the rebel gangs from Gonaïves in their campaign. From their exile in the Dominican Republic, where they had for months prepared the intervention, these gangs came into Haiti and augmented the rebel troops, finally taking charge of the command of the revolt.

The rebels could in fact easily reach the provincial cities, where they were not met with resistance. Only 50 rebels were able to take Hinche; only 180 rebels took Cap-Haïtien, the second largest city in the country and the metropolis of the north. But the power of the rebels would not have been sufficient to conquer Port-au-Prince, with its 2.5 million inhabitants. Thus the advance of the rebels came to an abrupt halt at the gates of the capital city. Only the rapid intervention of the multinational strike troops under the leadership of the US brought a quick end to the Aristide government.

US-Imposed Interim Government and Changeover to René Préval

After the coup, the US government set up an interim government in Haiti; those who had been in exile in the US held the important positions. The new head of state was Gérard Latortue, previously a member of the 1988 government, which had been formed under controversial circumstances; he had subsequently lived for 16 years in the US. His government, which was limited to two years, had absolutely no support among the people. It was isolated within the region. The Caribbean Community and Common Market (CARICOM) suspended Haiti's membership, seeing a dangerous precedent in the regime change, and in the participation of the western states in that change. In addition, the government of Latortue proved incompetent: for example, in the crisis management with respect to the two flood catastrophes in the fall of 2004.

Following the overthrow of Aristide, violence escalated. During Latortue's period in office, more than 1,600 people died violently, including 78 police. Thousands of Lavalas members lost their government positions, and there were arbitrary arrests, while no serious efforts were made to collect and destroy the weapons held by the armed gangs.

At the same time, in the slums of the capital city and especially among the poor, a sense of social injustice combined with unhappiness at the overthrow of the president. Above all in the slums of the capital city, the protest against the UN occupation, the absence of government infrastructures or authority, and the high level of criminal violence created a mixture so explosive that it was impossible to tell the difference between political and criminal motives. During MINUSTAH's campaign against gang criminality, numerous innocent residents of the slums were killed.

The situation was first stabilized through the elections of February 7, 2006, with the convincing victory of the candidate René Préval, formerly president from 1996 to 2001 and a political partner of Aristide in Lavalas. His return to politics was a great shock to the bourgeois political establishment and the merchant class. They felt cheated of the victory they had thought was assured. The Social Democrat Micha Gaillard had even declared in September 2005 that the presidency must always be reserved for "democratic" forces; he thereby explicitly excluded members of the former Lavalas government.

But the vote-getting power of Lavalas – even though split – was then, and remains to this day, the decisive electoral force in Haiti. To be sure, René Préval did not present himself as the candidate of Lavalas, but instead as that of a new group, Lespwa (Creole: hope), but he appealed to precisely the same constituency – the slum inhabitants and the farmers – that had won a majority in every free election. The electoral victory of René Préval was unambiguous: 51.2 percent on the first ballot. His nearest competitor, the Christian Democrat Leslie Manigat, received 12 percent; Charles Baker, the favorite of business, received around 8 percent. This electoral result gave clear expression to the broad unhappiness with the political and social results of the coup and the foreign occupation, as well as the hope for a new democratic beginning.

Haiti, protest and rebellion, 19th century

Stewart R. King

The political history of Haiti in the years after independence parallels in many respects similar developments in other newly independent Latin American countries. The fault lines are familiar to any student of nineteenth-century Latin America: military versus commercial elites, rural/small city versus capital, peasant versus capitalist agriculture, conservatives and monarchists versus liberals, and divisions on racial or ethnic lines. The groups divided by these fault lines formed a kaleidoscope of shifting alliances, which resulted in periods of calm, usually under a strong leader, with interludes of violent conflict.

Haiti became independent in 1804, at the end of a 13-year war of independence that radically transformed society and killed or drove into exile between one third and one half of the population. At the end of the struggle, Haiti, like the Spanish colonies some years later, found itself with a large, battle-tested, very professional military with little call for its services. Haiti feared reconquest by France, and in fact both Napoleon I and his successor, Louis XVIII, considered sending troops to renew the struggle. For the first ten years of the nation's independence, though, French forces were bottled up in Europe by the British navy. Britain had tried to conquer the island early in the Haitian Revolution, but after its forces were expelled by the Haitian rebels it developed a tacit ceasefire and in fact preferred an independent Haiti to one controlled by France. This also paralleled the experience of the newly independent Spanish American nations, which were theoretically subject to reconquest by Spain but de facto protected by Britain, which preferred small, weak, independent nations in the Americas, especially ones with free trade principles, to empires owned by potential rivals. Haiti did face one military threat at the time of independence: the thinly populated eastern two-thirds of the island of Hispaniola, the future Dominican Republic, inhabited by Spanish speakers and ruled by Spain since 1493, became part of the French colony of Saint-Domingue in 1795. This colony was still controlled by French troops in 1804. Haitian and British troops cooperated to throw out the French in 1808, and turned the colony over to Spain. Spanish Santo Domingo continued to pose security threats for Haiti and justified preserving a significant military force.

But, for the most part, the Haitian armed forces had little military role to play after the end of the revolution. The leader of the victorious Haitians, Jean-Jacques Dessalines, crowned himself Emperor Jacques I in 1805 and tried to organize the country along military lines. Former slaves were required to return to work on their plantations, for wages fixed by government inspectors, who were also responsible for enforcing order and protecting the “cultivators” against the plantation owners. The plantations were owned or leased by military officers, and soldiers were assigned higher-status jobs on the plantations or put to work repairing the colony’s infrastructure. In theory, everybody had a job and a wage, but in fact the system was rife with abuses. If the emperor was paying attention, things worked fairly smoothly, but if he was away, corruption, mistreatment of workers, theft, and violence were rampant. Dessalines’s officers resented his dictatorial style and feared for their own prerogatives. They finally sparked a rural rebellion, then ambushed and killed the emperor while he was marching to attack the rebels.

The two leaders of the conspiracy, Henry Christophe and Alexandre Pétion, could not agree on who was to succeed him. They each retreated to their own home areas: Christophe to the north around Cap-Haïtien and Pétion to the west near Port-au-Prince. Christophe was black and had been one of Toussaint Louverture’s generals from the early days of the revolution. Pétion was mixed-race and had supported a variety of factions during the long war of independence. His supporters were many of the pre-revolutionary free people of color who had lost plantations and businesses during the war and who hoped he would restore their fortunes. The struggle between Pétion and Christophe was also the struggle between the capital, a city of growing size and importance, and the northern regional center of Cap-Haïtien, which had been the “Paris of the Antilles,” the wealthiest city in the world and one of the largest in the Americas before the revolution. Cap had been burned to the ground twice, once by slave rebels in 1792, and once by Christophe and his men when the last French army arrived in 1802.

The two factions fought an intermittent struggle, mostly a war of attrition along the mountainous border between the north and west regions, but marked by one serious attempt by each side to conquer the other. Pétion’s forces invaded the north in 1806 and were defeated by Christophe at the battle of Siebert, January 1, 1807. Christophe invaded the south in 1810 and besieged Port-au-Prince for two months before retreating. Finally, the two leaders agreed to divide the country between them: the north became the Kingdom of Haiti under King Henry I, while the south was the Republic of Haiti under President-for-Life Pétion.

Monarchy was part of the black political discourse, and several Haitian leaders in the nineteenth century tried to establish kingdoms or empires. This parallels the experience of Spanish American conservative, rural-based parties, who often thought about establishing monarchies, like the two short-lived Empires of Mexico (1821–3, 1863–8) or the Empire of Brazil (1822–89). During the early phases of the Haitian Revolution, the slave rebels thought of the king as their protector and benefactor and fought in his name against the revolutionaries, who appeared to be allied with their white oppressors. Christophe also tried to continue Emperor Dessalines’s policy of militarization and forced labor, while Pétion rewarded his military veterans with small farms carved out of the former plantations. As a result, Christophe faced numerous rebellions while Pétion was known as “Pè Bon Kè” (Father Goodheart).

Pétion died in 1818 and was succeeded by Jean-Pierre Boyer, another mixed-race, pre-revolutionary free colored general who had fought against the revolution in his early days. Christophe was finally overthrown and killed himself in 1820, and Boyer became the ruler of the entire country. In 1822, the colonists in the eastern part of the island declared their independence from Spain, and Boyer promptly invaded and took control there, too. Finally, in 1825 Boyer signed a treaty with France that imposed a ruinous indemnity on the fledgling Haitian state (to repay the French slave owners who had lost their "property" during the revolution), but gave Haiti recognition and membership in the club of nations. Meanwhile, in 1823, US President James Monroe had proclaimed that the US would not accept any European invasions of the independent nations of the Americas, and, although American governments refused to formally recognize Haitian independence until after slavery was abolished in the United States in 1863, Haiti was finally free of the threat of reconquest from France.

Boyer's rule lasted until 1843. He reduced the size of the military and tried to reestablish plantation agriculture, using a system of forced labor that was less onerous than that employed by Christophe and Dessalines. He was able to bring in some foreign investment and increase exports. However, in the early 1840s, economic troubles and a government financial crisis caused by the large payments on the French indemnity led to unrest in the countryside.

Rural Haitians by this point had decided that they were not interested in working on plantations, no matter how regularly wages were paid. In this, they took the same attitude as freed slaves throughout the Americas were taking. From Argentina to Mexico, newly freed people were leaving the plantation areas, looking for land where they could live as peasants. Everywhere planters were searching desperately for labor, offering wages and better living conditions than the slaves had gotten, and not getting many takers. In the British Caribbean, planters imported East Indian coolies, whose descendants make up a significant percentage of the population of Trinidad and some of the other Lesser Antilles islands. In the remaining French colonies, there was an abortive move to import "indentured servants" from Senegal, Syria, and Madagascar, which the British opposed as a covert renewal of the slave trade. But Haiti had no such access to new labor sources, and so plantation agriculture was in decline there. By 1843, the end of Boyer's tenure in office, Haitian exports of sugar, worth 150 million francs in 1789, had fallen to 10 million francs. The mixed-race elite, Boyer's supporters, had moved from rural plantations to urban commercial wealth. The commercial capital of the country by this point was Port-au-Prince, and the country increasingly became divided between an economically vibrant capital and a countryside in decline.

The countryside still had more people, however, and those people had not forgotten how to fight. As Boyer's efforts to renew the plantation sector became more repressive and the benefits of a powerful central government became less apparent as the central government had less and less money to spend, the country people became restive. They finally rose in rebellion, starting in the south near Les Cayes and forming rebel armies known as piquets for the pikes they carried as their principal weapon. Boyer finally fled into exile as a rebel army approached the capital. At the same time, the Spanish-speaking people in the eastern part of the island declared their independence as the Dominican Republic.

The leader of the rebel army that overthrew Boyer, Charles Hérard, became president but only kept power for a few months. He was succeeded by three more presidents who ruled, in total, for two and a half years. Each of them was a black military leader who hoped to wrest some of the benefits of power from the mixed-race Port-au-Prince elite for his own region and racial group. In each case, the Port-au-Prince elite tried to co-opt him, with greater or lesser degrees of success. This process of co-optation of a charismatic black military leader by the mixed-race interests became known as the politique de doublure, or puppet policy, a common feature of Haitian politics to this day.

The political chaos caused by the fall of Boyer was finally resolved when Faustin Soulouque came to power. Originally selected as president by the mixed-race power brokers who had supported Boyer, he represents a failure of the politique de doublure. He appeared biddable until invested with power, at which point he turned on his patrons and became a powerful advocate for the black rural interest, declaring himself the second emperor of Haiti in 1849. Under his rule, the political division in Haiti became formalized with the creation of two parties, the National Party representing the black, provincial interest and the Liberal Party representing the mixed-race, urban interest.

Faustin also created another important institution in Haitian politics, the personal militia. He was supported by a political police and bodyguard called the zinglins. His zinglins would beat or imprison or kill his political opponents, operating under the cover of night and using symbols of the traditional religion, Vodun. The terror they inspired, and fervent support from the rural masses, kept Faustin in power for ten years.

During this time he strengthened central government institutions and tried once again to build up the plantation sector, relying on good economic relations with Britain. He also tried repeatedly to reconquer the eastern part of the island, but without success. Haiti's army was more numerous, but by this time all the veterans of the earlier wars were gone, and doctrine and equipment were outmoded. The Dominican Republic had a good relationship with the United States and Spain and was able to field better-organized and equipped troops who, fighting defensively, were able to prevail. The tension caused by these repeated invasions remained strong and justified important investments in the armed forces in both countries. Faustin was finally overthrown by a military uprising led by his chief of staff, Fabre-Nicholas Geffrard.

Geffrard was the first Haitian chief of state to be born after the end of slavery. He was a black military officer, but he tried to balance the interests of the liberals and nationalists. He cut the military and tried to build better relations with the Dominican Republic. When Spain briefly reestablished its colonial rule over the eastern part of the island, Geffrard supported the Dominicans seeking independence, and after they won, he signed a treaty with the new republic ratifying the current border between the two countries. He also normalized relations with the United States, gaining full international recognition. He tried to encourage American blacks to move to Haiti by offering land grants, similar to those that other Latin American countries offered to immigrants from Europe at this time.

Geffrard was also a faithful Catholic and he finally managed to end the isolation of Haiti from the Catholic Church. The Vatican had withdrawn Haiti's priests at the time of the revolution, in part because of the anti-Catholic measures adopted by the French revolutionary government. The Vatican and the French under Napoleon resolved their differences in 1801, but this agreement did not apply to Haiti. For more than half a century, while most Haitians remained at least nominally Catholics, Haiti had few or no priests. Geffrard's agreement with the pope gave considerable control over church affairs to the government, including the right to approve the choice of priests and bishops, but in return obligated the government to suppress Vodun.

There was a prominent trial in 1863, the Affaire de Bizoton, in which important Vodun practitioners were convicted of ritual murder and executed. A harsh crackdown on popular religion followed, with destruction of temples and ritual objects, imprisonment of practitioners, and consequent rural unrest. Geffrard called on his British allies for military support against the rural rebels, and British gunboats defended Haitian government positions against rebel forces on several occasions. Persistent unrest, though, especially in the north, finally brought Geffrard down in 1867.

Geffrard's defeat led to a period of instability that lasted for several years, during which the urban/rural and black/mixed-race tensions were inflamed. Sylvain Salnave, a mixed-race military officer, was nominally president for two years, but never controlled much of the country outside Port-au-Prince. The rebel forces controlled the country's navy, so Salnave borrowed the price of a new ironclad steamer from America. The American ship defeated the Haitian vessels, but when the rebels finally overthrew Salnave they repudiated the debt, along with some other loans that defeated factions had obtained from France and Spain. The political crisis that erupted around this debt threatened Haitian sovereignty, but was finally resolved by sharp negotiating by Nissage Saget, president from 1870 to 1874 and the first Haitian head of state to complete his constitutionally mandated term and leave office peacefully. Saget ushered in a period of relative calm in Haitian politics, during which a consensus liberal policy combined with an easy rule in the countryside resulted in relative prosperity. Most transfers of power during this period were unconstitutional in some respect, but there were few casualties and the central government preserved effective control over the entire country for most of this time.

This period of stability ended with the fall of President Nord Alexis in 1908. Alexis was the grandson of King Henry Christophe and shared his political commitment to the interests of the provinces, especially the north, and the black military class over the Port-au-Prince mixed-race commercial elite. By this time urbanization had created a black working class in Port-au-Prince, which Alexis had mobilized for his support. This added element of the black constituency has proven to be an important factor in twentieth- and twenty-first-century Haitian politics. At the time, it proved destabilizing. There were three main sources of power in Haitian politics during the period 1908–15: peasant rebel forces, called the cacos, urban workers, increasingly organized through political parties and unions, and the private guard forces of the commercial and political elite. The professional armed forces of the country were split by factions and were no longer either well trained or well equipped. The central government lost the monopoly on armed force that is one of the basic components of sovereignty. Presidents succeeded one another with dizzying rapidity: nine men held power in Port-au-Prince during these seven years, with several other contenders assuming the title of chief of state without ever controlling the capital.

In August 1914, World War I broke out in Europe. Germany had been interested in Haitian affairs for some time. In one incident in Gonaïves in 1902, a rebel force took control of the Haitian navy's flagship, named the Crête à Pierrot after a heroic defeat during the Haitian Revolution. A German warship, seeking to collect on a claim that some German businessmen had against the Haitian government, and also perhaps trying to support the government of Nord Alexis, tried to capture the ship, at which point its commander, Commodore Killick, sent the crew into the lifeboats and blew the ship up at the cost of his own life rather than letting it fall into foreign hands. Germany had tried to get a lease on the northern port of Môle St.-Nicholas from the Alexis government, and preserved good relations with the various mixed-race Liberal factions from 1908 on. The United States opposed the German project, both on the principle of the Monroe Doctrine and specifically because after the outbreak of World War I a German military presence in the Americas threatened American neutrality. In 1915, General Guillaume Sam, a black military officer from the north, took control of Port-au-Prince, promising among other things to keep the Germans out. However, he rapidly sparked rebellion by harsh reprisals against mixed-race politicians, including a massacre in which more than 100 died. His supporters were overwhelmed and he took refuge in the French embassy. A rebel mob stormed the embassy and killed him. The invasion of diplomatic premises provided a pretext for an American intervention that lasted more than 20 years, ushering in another period of relative calm in Haitian politics.

Haiti, protest and rebellion, 20th century

Matthew J. Smith

In the first century of its existence (1804–1904), the republic of Haiti established a reputation as the most rebellious nation in the Caribbean. While most of its neighbors welcomed the twentieth century as outposts of European imperialism, Haiti remained a beacon of self-rule in spite of its complex history of protest, coups, and revolts. One of the consequences of this history was a political culture that by 1904 was defined by exclusion. Democracy remained a seemingly unattainable goal, and the largely peasant majority was more often than not on the periphery of much of the contests waged by political elites and powerful military leaders. This experience, rooted in the nineteenth century, sowed the seeds for a new century of political discontent, protest, and rebellion that would change its dynamic several times as the century progressed.

Late nineteenth-century political rivalries between liberals and nationalists were all but gone by the time of the Haitian centenary in 1904. The aging general Nord Alexis, president since 1902, managed through strong-man rule to keep his foes at bay, giving the country a surface appearance of political quiet. Not far beneath, his rivals within and outside the army led by, among others, Anténor Firmin, a former statesman and esteemed intellectual, worked to undermine Alexis's rule. Like so many nineteenth-century rulers, Alexis tried to eradicate his opposition through forced exile. And like them, Alexis would learn that forced exile could not extinguish the determination of his rivals. Political elites inside and outside of Haiti remained heavily invested in overthrowing Alexis.

Their opposition was based on both the uncompromising despotism of Alexis's rule and a perception that a weak state run by corrupt generals would expose the country's vulnerabilities and invite foreign invasion. In this regard Alexis's rivals were correct. By the turn of the century, German settlers in Haiti had dominated much of the urban commercial sector and managed to gain political influence. The expansion of United States imperialism in the Caribbean region following Cuban independence also meant that Cuba's closest neighbors in Hispaniola would be highly attractive to US interests. President Roosevelt's foreign policy toward Haiti included a commitment to weakening Germany's financial role. Haitian political elites remained divided on how to treat the United States in the context of Big Stick policy initiatives. While some argued that US, or even British, influence would bring an end to the violent political tribalism, others maintained that any direct foreign influence would serve to weaken the country's cherished independence. Indeed, an early attempt to establish a railroad in Haiti under a US company, MacDonald, in 1910, met with popular resistance among peasant workers. Still, US and German interests proved far too powerful a force in a country with a weak economy and wracked by unending political instability.

These factors would prove significant in shaping the political climate following Alexis's ouster in 1908 by rival military forces. Firmin, the favored successor, was unable to secure the presidency in two failed attempts in 1908 and 1911. Instead, a series of short-term presidents, each susceptible to a range of external influences, ruled Haiti for the next few years. The internecine battles that were drawn on regional and class lines stripped the Haitian state of its defenses. The unifying factor among political elites, the protection of independence and Haitian property against foreigners (enshrined in the constitution), was used as a bargaining chip by power-hungry generals seeking to gain external support and weaken their opponents. World War I increased the competition between Germany and the United States in the Caribbean and raised the stakes for Haitian leaders in need of foreign capital to finance their expeditions. Generals were primarily reliant on the armed support of rural forces who formed a rag-tag army. These armies were instrumental in supporting and resisting rebellions.

Thus much of the protest in the first decade and a half of the twentieth century, while frequent, was nonetheless prone to co-optation by well-financed generals. Rivals would routinely rally their own groups to cause disorders in the provinces, which would eventually enflame the country and force a coup against the head of state. Once these funds ran out, however, the leader was in jeopardy of losing control of his forces. This situation only served to encourage a high level of repression on the part of the sitting president desirous of holding on to power. In March 1915, Vilbrun Guillaume-Sam became the seventh president since Alexis. When he ordered the murder of opponents in the national prison, Haitians, exhausted with abuses of successive military leaders, responded with violent force. Guillaume-Sam was captured and brutally murdered by a large and angry mob. The execution of President Guillaume-Sam brought Haiti to the brink of anarchy and provided the impetus for the United States to respond. In an effort to forestall the entry of European powers to abate the crisis, the United States landed troops in Haiti on July 27, 1915.

When the US Marines set foot on Haitian soil in the summer of 1915, they had no intention of establishing a long occupation. They were, in fact, more concerned with claiming geopolitical control of the republic and neutralizing the threat posed by the German presence in the Caribbean. They achieved this fairly early on through control of the customs houses and the Haitian national bank. But the complicated set of events that preceded the occupation and the ostensible goal of building democracy in Haiti forced the Marines to remain in the country for two decades. Moreover, US business interests and policymakers hoped to reap economic benefits from Haiti as they did in neighboring Cuba and the Dominican Republic during their simultaneous occupations. This would take time. Haitian laws prohibiting foreign ownership of land had to be abrogated and previous European interests weakened before the United States could harness Haiti's untapped economic potential.

The hostile and violent means by which the Marines set about clearing the ground for this to happen raised immediate protest from Haitians. When Dr. Rosalvo Bobo, a popular leader in the country, was prevented from pursuing the presidency, his supporters rose in revolt. The cacos, as the rural armies were called, became symbols of militant peasant resistance to the occupation, launching a prolonged guerilla struggle against the Marines. Lacking the technological advantage of their occupiers, the cacos succumbed to harsh Marine reprisals. Thousands of cacos and their allies in the interior of the island were murdered before the war ended. A second conflict in 1918 had similar results. The two principal leaders of the insurgents, Charlemagne Péralte and Benoît Batraville, were murdered by 1920. Péralte, whose dead body was put on public display and photographed, would become a martyr for peasant resistance and an enduring hero of twentieth-century Haitian protest whose memory is evoked by Haitian leaders to this day.

The end of the caco insurgency dampened the prospects of armed protest against the occupation. Haitians of all classes nonetheless remained antagonistic to the Marines during the 1920s. They had ample reason to be incensed. The Marines practiced Jim Crow segregation in Haiti, revived a forced labor law, the corvée, which recruited hundreds of peasant farmers, and imposed restrictive laws on social movement. They also sought to maintain social control by creating a military school and a semi-professional army, the gendarmerie. These measures found tacit government support through two US-installed presidents, Sudre Dartiguenave and Louis Borno.

While these developments limited the potential of popular class protest, a new generation of elites began to engage in new forms of resistance. Drawing on the cultural influences of the Harlem Renaissance, Négritude, and the late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century writings of Haitian intellectuals such as Firmin, elite intellectuals of the 1920s created a new cultural movement called Indigénisme. The doyen of the movement was Jean Price-Mars, a writer, ethnologist, and educator. Price-Mars's book Ainsi Parla L'Oncle (1928) was a provocative critique of the attitudes of the Haitian elite and a celebration of the country's indigenous culture. Price-Mars argued that Haitian folk culture was the source of national pride and should be embraced rather than shunned.

Price-Mars's work released shockwaves among the Haitian intelligentsia and encouraged several writers and poets to take up their pens and chronicle aspects of Haitian social life previously neglected. This "generation of the Occupation" included young revolutionary elites such as Jacques Roumain, Emile Roumer, Carl Brouard, and others who became contributors to the short-lived but highly influential journal, La Revue Indigène. The indigenous writers were critical of the US occupation, which they saw as the negation of Haiti's anti-colonial past. Their work, while restricted to an elite audience, would provide inspiration to subsequent generations of Haitian radicals. Some of the writers, such as Roumain, would meld this literary resistance with political organization after a change in the political climate at the end of the decade.

In December 1929 public protest against the occupation was reawakened. The global impact of the Wall Street crash had a severe effect on Haitian workers and students. When restrictions were placed on students at the agricultural school in Damien, several rebelled. The student strike stoked the frustrations of workers in Port-au-Prince and eventually set off a national strike against the government's limited response to the economic conditions. When the Marines retaliated and shot a dozen peasant protesters in the south, the Hoover administration was embarrassed. In the face of mounting criticism in the US about the occupation, and international concerns over the handling of the strike, Hoover sent a commission to Haiti to review the state of affairs. The Forbes Commission was received by parades of nationalistic Haitians brandishing red and blue flags and calling loudly for a return to political autonomy. The commission recommended the gradual removal of Marine control over the course of the next few years.

President Louis Borno was pressured to step down in 1930, and in his place, Sténio Vincent became the head of state. Vincent was a critic of the occupation early in his political career. This position won him support from some elite radicals who dubbed him Haiti's "Second Liberator." In reality, Vincent became less concerned with revolutionary nationalism and more conciliatory to the United States shortly after his ascendance. When the Marines left in 1934, Vincent shifted to a more autocratic form of leadership that would arouse a great deal of resentment at a time when popular disenchantment was giving way to ideological resistance.

The defining period in twentieth-century protest in Haiti came in the two decades following the US occupation. During this period, a wave of radical nationalism engulfed Haiti, leaving few sectors of Haitian politics untouched. In 1934, the Parti Communiste Haïtien (PCH) surfaced after two years of underground activity. It was the first such organization in Haiti. Under the leadership of Jacques Roumain, the party made an attempt to build a network of communist cells across the country with a view to challenge the Vincent government. Their reach was extremely limited, however, as most Haitians were unfamiliar with Marxism and unwilling to support the movement. The membership of the PCH was also elite and urban-based, and without a viable labor movement, unable to extend itself. The party's presence nonetheless gave Vincent the opportunity to clamp down on his opponents by outlawing the PCH. Roumain, Christian Beaulieu, and Max Hudicourt, the leftist leader of another radical organization, Réaction Démocratique (RD), were arrested, tried, imprisoned, and eventually exiled.

Marxism was not the only radical ideology competing for political space in the 1930s. A group of young intellectuals who revered Price-Mars sought to continue his work in the journal Les Griots. Among them were Lorimer Denis, a lawyer, and François Duvalier, then a young medical doctor. Together, Denis and Duvalier authored scores of ethnological studies that went beyond the cultural nationalism of the indigenous movement, to promote a political ideology of "black power" commonly referred to as noirisme. The noirisme of the Griots broadened similar nineteenth-century ideas by advocating the natural legitimacy of dark-skinned leaders, rather than light-skinned ones, to rule. Most of these men hailed from the black middle class that came into prominence during the occupation years and viewed themselves as best endowed with the qualities the country needed to progress. Their position raised a long-lasting debate with the Marxists over class and color that would define Haitian politics during these years.

Color and class conflicts in the country deepened under the leadership of Elie Lescot, Vincent's successor in 1941. Lescot ruled with a firm hand and like Vincent relied heavily on the Garde d'Haïti (the former gendarmerie) to retain his rule. Still, he was unable to contain the radical impulses unleashed by the victory of the Allied forces in 1945. Young Marxists in Haiti drew much inspiration from the Russian Revolution, the Spanish Civil War, French Marxists, and the previous generation of Haitian communists, particularly Roumain, whose renown and legend grew after his sudden death in 1944. Defiantly revolutionary in their outlook, these Marxist students, who included the gifted writers Jacques Stephen Alexis, René Depestre, and Gérald Bloncourt, were agitated not only by elite abuse of political power, but also by the interference of the United States in Haitian politics and economy during World War II. In the 1946 New Year's edition of their organ La Ruche, they called for a dramatic reorientation of Haitian politics and an end to dictatorship in Haiti. Lescot's forced closure of the press prompted a mass student protest led by members of the La Ruche collective. Within days the student protest swelled to a large countrywide strike. A helpless Lescot was forced to resign.

In the aftermath of the "1946 Revolution," Haiti experienced a period of intense radical activity. For the first time in the country's history, there was a flurry of radical newspapers and dozens of political parties formed, including several prominent left-wing parties. Among them were a revived PCH and the Parti Socialiste Populaire (PSP). The PSP was led by former allies of Roumain and had stronger connections with Marxist groups in Cuba, the Dominican Republic, and the United States. But it was the noiriste groups that held the greatest influence in 1946. Noiriste radicalism owed a great deal to the expansion of black consciousness in the 1940s and the late development of a labor movement in 1946.

The leading figure in the labor movement and of the pre-Duvalier era was unquestionably

Daniel Figiolé. A young mathematics teacher and writer from a poor rural background, Figiolé was an extraordinarily gifted orator with phenomenal appeal among the urban majority in Port-au-Prince. Figiolé's emergence on the political scene in 1946 was attributed to his unique ability to tap into the concerns of the majority of Haitians in dramatic speeches delivered in Krèyol. Noiriste writers regarded Figiolé as the epitome of their hopes, and his enormous following saw him as a savior from the political dominance of the bourgeoisie. Figiolé's party, Mouvement Ouvrier et Paysan (MOP), was formed in 1946 and became the largest labor organization in Haitian history.

In spite of Figiolé's magnetism, and the radical agenda of the Marxists, the United States and the Garde d'Haïti remained the most important powerbrokers in 1946. Under the direction of the Garde elections were held in August and resulted in the victory of Dumarsais Estimé, a deputy from Verettes with noiriste sympathies. Estimé's administration proved to be one of the more progressive of the twentieth century. During his presidency, Estimé introduced several far-reaching labor laws and supported the expansion of noirisme in all major areas of Haitian life. This was especially pronounced in the popular culture and the arts, which celebrated the aesthetics and heritage of Vodou and found state sponsorship in the monumental bicentenary celebration of Port-au-Prince in 1949–50. For all his merits, Estimé was unable to shake the international taint of his government as being leftist, nor the proclivity of Haitian presidents to succeed themselves. His attempt to do so in 1950 was read by his opponents, particularly the PSP (the only remaining Marxist party after the autodissolution of the PCH in 1947) and Figiolé, as a betrayal of the democratic promise of 1946. Figiolé, who launched intermittent labor protests against the government throughout the late 1940s, lent his support to a widescale protest against Estimé in 1950.

The 1950 coup removed Estimé from office and shifted the tenor of Haitian politics once again. Estimé's rivals in the Haitian army were instrumental in usurping him and promoted as his replacement General Paul Magloire.

Magloire was the first military president of Haiti since the beginning of the occupation. He was also a staunch supporter of anti-radicalism in Haiti, using his position as leader of the army and state to quash the remaining radical movements of the era. The PSP and MOP were outlawed by the middle of the decade and all radical papers were closed. Magloire also strengthened Haiti's ties to North American interests, though the economy was hard hit following the devastation of Hurricane Hazel in 1954. The economic plight, which intensified with rapid urbanization and poor yields from the country's major export, coffee, served as a backdrop to popular resentment. By the time Magloire made his own attempt to remain in power in 1956, Haitians were ready for a change. Magloire was overthrown by a coup in December of that year.

The protracted election campaign in 1957 proved to be a greater challenge to reestablishing democracy than predicted. The leading candidates included representatives from across the political spectrum. The more popular candidates were Daniel Figiolé and his former associate in MOP, François Duvalier. After several violent clashes among supporters of the various candidates, Figiolé became provisional president. His administration would be short-lived. A coup led by army leaders who supported Duvalier cleared the way for his victory on October 22, 1957.

1957–1986

The coming to power of François "Papa Doc" Duvalier in 1957 effectively muted the oppositionist voice in Haitian politics. During much of his presidency, the large public demonstrations and protest movements of the past seldom, if ever, surfaced. Duvalier's firm military support enabled him early on to use force to intimidate his opponents, both radical and conservative. Never one to place his trust in any institution, Duvalier, along with his closest associates, built a paramilitary force in the late 1950s that would buttress the armed forces as protectors of the state while maintaining exclusive loyalty to the executive, something his predecessors were unable to achieve. First called cagouards, la milice civile, and later the Volontaires de la Sécurité Nationale (VSN), this group was more commonly referred to by their more sinister name, the Tonton Macoutes. With state support, the Macoutes, which eventually outnumbered the national army, were charged with the responsibility of quelling all potential resistance against the dictatorship.

Under Duvalier, the noirisme of the 1930s and 1940s metamorphosed into Duvalierism. While Papa Doc continued to make symbolic reference to black consciousness, noiriste politics were emptied of their historical significance and subordinated to Duvalier's cult of personality and complete domination of the state apparatus. The transition was made complete in 1964 when Duvalier made himself president for life, and declared himself the personification of the state.

All of this served to increase cruelty and repression. Threat, intimidation, and outright state violence were part of daily life under the Duvalier dictatorship. The labor movement, once the source of much anti-government protest, was forced underground and then eventually outlawed. Left-wing organizations never functioned openly, and most of the leading radicals of the previous two decades numbered among the thousands of Haitian exiles of the 1960s. In spite of the weaknesses in militant protest, Duvalier proved as adept as his regional contemporaries in using the threat of communism's spread in the Caribbean to gain international support for his dictatorship.

The challenge to democracy posed by François Duvalier's regime, coupled with the success of the revolution in nearby Cuba and the expansion of leftism in Latin America in the 1960s, inspired young Haitian militants to attempt armed resistance against the dictatorship. In April 1961, then-exiled Jacques Stephen Alexis, the gifted writer and activist of the "1946 Revolution," organized a handful of communist members of the Parti pour l'Entente Nationale (PEP), a party he formed in 1959, to launch an insurgency against Duvalier. The group was captured by Macoutes shortly after arriving on Môle St. Nicholas, and Alexis was assassinated.

A stronger operation against the dictatorship occurred in August 1964. A group of 13 exiles, mainly from the southern province of Jérémie, calling themselves Jeune Haïti, launched a three-month guerilla campaign in the south. Over the course of their campaign, most of the members of Jeune Haïti died in combat with the Haitian army. The last two survivors were taken into custody and given a public execution. Prior to that, Duvalier had ordered the massacre of several of their family members and associates in Jérémie.

The twin forces of Macoutism and Duvalierism cast a long shadow over Haiti after the death of Papa Doc in 1971. Both would endure under the leadership of his successor and son, Jean-

Claude "Baby Doc" Duvalier. Baby Doc maintained the structure of the Duvalierist state, though there were notable differences in his administration. Pressure from the Jimmy Carter administration in the United States over human rights violations, and the exodus of thousands of Haitians to the US by the late 1970s, forced Baby Doc to ease the harshness of the regime by supporting a brief period of liberalization. Independent papers were unmuzzled for the first time in decades, and pro-democracy organizations formed. In 1979, however, the government reversed its policies, dramatically announcing the full return to repression with a brutal attack on a human rights rally in the capital.

Like his father, the younger Duvalier had to contend with small-scale and unsuccessful guerilla attempts to topple him, notably in 1978 and 1981. During the late 1970s and early 1980s, torture, slaughter, and imprisonment were sufficient to dissuade large-scale protest. Little, however, could be done to conceal the downturn in the economy. In an attempt to separate his rule from that of his father, Jean-Claude introduced new economic policies that were of greater benefit to the country's elite and foreign interests than to the national economy. US firms set up assembly plants and hotels in Haiti and employed Haitians at extremely low wages. The firms were given great latitude by the dictatorship. These moves shifted attention from the agricultural sectors and deepened the plight of the peasantry and urban poor.

By mid-1983, following the visit of Pope Jean-Paul II, who made a veiled critique of the regime, grassroots and religious groups began to organize. Many were inspired by liberation theology then sweeping across much of Latin America and having its echoes in the ti legliz (little church) movement, which exploded in Haiti in the 1980s. Ti legliz raised the political consciousness of the Haitian peasantry through its advocacy of democracy and disavowal of oppression. In October 1985 a protest in Gonaïves began a series of rebellions that would shatter the regime. In the face of brutal retaliation, massive numbers of protesters overwhelmed the state's security forces in all the major cities over the course of four months of daily protests. This era of dechoukaj (uprooting) witnessed a remarkable outpouring of popular resistance to Haiti's rulers and a fearless determination on the part of the populace to topple the dictatorship. By February 1986, concerned over the crisis in Haiti, both the Reagan administration and the Jamaican government strongly urged Duvalier to step down. On February 7 he fled the country into exile with his family and ended the long dynastic dictatorship.

The excitement and euphoria of the popular 1986 overthrow of the Duvalier dictatorship echoed the events of 1946. Indeed, there were clear parallels between both in the immediate aftermath. Veterans of the earlier period returned from exile, such as labor leader Daniel Fignolé, who briefly considered running for the presidency before his death later in the year; independent papers and radio stations flourished; history and the country's brave rebellious tradition were celebrated in the popular culture; a wave of democratic promise swept across the country; and there was renewed international solidarity with Haiti. Nonetheless, there were more important differences. The demolition of the physical remnants of Duvalierism could not erase its ideological foundations, which remained firmly institutionalized in the Haitian body politic. Although scores of exiles returned with hopes of participating in political rebuilding, state power remained in the hands of the army under the leadership of Henri Namphy. The army supervised elections in November 1987, which were aborted when dozens of voters were killed. Namphy's firm rule ended with an overthrow in 1988 by another army leader, Prosper Avril. Macoutist terror, corruption, and authoritarianism were still very much present during this period of "Duvalierism without Duvalier."

Frustrations with military rule and international attention to human rights abuses propelled grassroots movements into action. A coup against Avril pushed the country into a spiral of political instability marked by increasing violence and rebellion. At the center of much of this protest was Jean-Bertrand Aristide, a Catholic priest from a rural background, and key player in the ti legliz movement, who would become the most important political force in late twentieth-century Haiti. Possessing great intellectual talent and tremendous charismatic appeal, Aristide developed a large following in the late 1980s. Although there were several popular leaders in the post-Duvalier period, none proved as capable of leading a massive nationwide following. Aristide expertly managed his supporters into the Lavalas (Avalanche) movement to contest the 1990 general elections, the first truly democratic election in Haiti's long history. Despite declaring his candidacy only a few weeks before, Aristide won 67 percent of the national vote.

Inaugurated on February 7, 1991, Aristide's presidency was heralded as the promise of democratic change that Haitians had so long hoped for. So great a promise could not last. Seven months later Aristide was overthrown by a military coup. For the next three years while Aristide remained in exile, the country was once again in the hands of the military forces under the command of Raoul Cédras, who ruled with great terror. The result of all this was censure of the independent press, massacres, and large-scale emigration. Intervention from the Bill Clinton administration, including a forced embargo on Haiti, forced Cédras to capitulate. Aristide returned and finished his term of office in 1996, when he was succeeded by another civilian president, René Préval.

Prior to demitting office, Aristide disbanded the Haitian army, so long the arbiter of political power in the country. A controversial decision, the move had the dual effect of weakening the army (although the Haitian police force was strengthened) and creating new enemies for Aristide. Under Préval's five-year term these enemies would regroup. In 2001, Aristide once again ran and won the general elections. By this time, however, the Lavalas Party had undergone several transitions. Rival political parties were created among defectors and Aristide could count former supporters from a cross-section of Haitian society among his opponents. Many grew dissatisfied by the slow growth in the economy, unchecked corruption, and a perceived neglect on the part of the country's leaders of increasing crime and violence. The unsolved 2000 murder of Jean Dominique, a popular radio journalist on his self-owned station Radio Haïti, and a radical voice since the 1950s, highlighted the political tensions of the period. Added to this, violence increased in the city's urban centers, where marauding thugs known popularly as chimere patrolled the streets and kidnappings increased. Aristide's opponents lay the blame for all of this at his feet and began to wage a series of public anti-Lavalas protests. They demanded Aristide's resignation and new elections. Support from former military leaders resulted in a series of large protests that began in late 2003 and would end with Aristide's controversial overthrow in February 2004. Two years later, under the watch of foreign military forces, elections were finally held and Préval won a second term in office.

In 2004 as debates over Aristide's forced removal raged on, people across the globe duly commemorated the incredible achievement of Haitian independence and reflected on the magnificent story of rebellion and revolution that created it. The 2004 bicentenary also allowed for a consideration of Haiti's rocky course from Alexis to Aristide. In the century between both men, Haiti experienced foreign occupations, revolutions, radical political awakenings, repressive dictatorships, military rule, and several political transitions. The one constant has been the undying rebellious spirit that has enabled the oldest country in the Caribbean to endure. As Haiti settles into a post-Aristide era, it is this rebellious spirit that will doubtless prove most important in the uneasy struggle for political stability.

Haiti, resistance to US occupation

Stewart R. King

Haitian politics in 1915 was very disorderly. Political power in Haiti had long been traded back and forth between primarily black, military, provincial forces and primarily mixed-race, urban, commercial leaders. Both sides made use of militias drawn from the country's many poor. These militia groups were called cacos. The international community had mostly isolated and ignored Haiti since the Haitian Revolution of 1791–1804, though there were substantial American business interests, especially the Haitian American Sugar Company (HASCO), which owned substantial land in the fertile Plaine du Cul de Sac north of the capital, Port-au-Prince.

But by 1915, the United States was no longer interested in letting Haitians work out their own political destiny. Two factors led to this change in policy. World War I had broken out in Europe. The United States was neutral, though friendly to the Allies. Germany had been interested in expanding its commercial and colonial presence in the Americas since well before the war, and in 1914 had tried to negotiate the lease of a port with the Haitian government. The United States was very much opposed to the establishment of a German naval base in the Caribbean, and even more opposed to the possibility that Britain or France would invade the country to prevent it. The Roosevelt Corollary to the Monroe Doctrine was the basis of American policy in the Caribbean Basin, and it held that the US had the duty to intervene in the internal politics of Caribbean nations if their actions might lead to intervention by powers from outside the Americas and a consequent violation of the neutrality of the Americas in European struggles. This doctrine had been used to justify a number of other American adventures in the region during the 20 years leading up to 1915, in such places as Nicaragua, Cuba, Venezuela, and the Dominican Republic.

Secondly, the relatively bloodless exchange of power between the two factions in Haitian politics had been interrupted in 1915 with the overthrow of President Guillaume Sam. Sam was from the black, military faction, and he favored closer economic and military ties with the United States. He came to power in March of 1915 with the aid of caco militiamen from the north, and he paid his militias by looting the members of the mixed-race political opposition. Protesters were locked up in Fort Dimanche, in the poor district of the city where President Sam's partisans were strongest. On July 27, 1915, Sam ordered the execution of these political prisoners, including the former president, and 167 of them were killed. The killings outraged the urban middle class, who rose up against Sam, driving him from power. He took refuge in the French embassy, whereupon his political opponents stormed the building, lynched him, dismembered his body, and paraded the parts around the city in triumph.

United States President Wilson ordered the Marine contingent on some US Navy ships moored in Port-au-Prince harbor to enter the capital on July 28, beginning an occupation that was to last until 1940. The original mission of the Marines was to protect American and other foreign citizens' lives and property during the disorder, but mission creep meant that they rapidly became the effective government of the country. Marines and Navy Department civilian employees managed many of the Haitian government departments, especially those dealing with taxation and spending. There were Marine officers in each of the departments of the country with substantial armed contingents, who had veto power over the decisions of local government officials. Haiti retained a central government, its own president and congress, and nominal sovereignty. In many ways, the occupation of Haiti prefigured later American occupation and nation-building missions, including that under way in Iraq from 2003 onward, rather than being modeled on European colonial rule at the time. The mixed-race faction in Haitian politics was more friendly to European interests, and especially to the Germans, to begin with, but for cultural reasons related to American racial attitudes, the Americans fairly rapidly began to favor mixed-race politicians as their intermediaries with the Haitian people. It is unclear how much American officers really understood Haitian politics at the time, rife as it was with regional, racial, military-civilian, and class divisions. But the effect was that the Americans mostly allied with their former enemies and fought against their former friends, at least in the early years of the occupation.

The powerful black military faction, and regional forces represented by the cacos, felt betrayed. Originally, they saw the American intervention as saving their movement from their urban, mixed-race, pro-European, centralizing, business elite enemies. Caco chieftains throughout the country, but especially in the Northern Department, rose up in rebellion almost at once. The Marines fought several campaigns in 1915 and 1916 against various caco groups, with Major Smedley Butler playing an important role and winning a Congressional Medal of Honor for bravery. In 1917, a fragile calm prevailed, and Marine units began to withdraw as the United States geared up for war in Europe. Major Butler became commander of the Haitian Gendarmerie, a rural paramilitary police force that was to replace the American forces in the provinces. The Gendarmerie organization did not grow quickly enough to replace the withdrawing Marines, though, because Haitians mistrusted the American occupiers' motives and the Americans distrusted the Haitian recruits on racial and political grounds. The level of repression in the countryside declined, and resistance began to appear possible again.

At the same time, the US occupation forces and the Haitian government had an aggressive agenda of rural development, much of it designed to force subsistence farmers in the countryside into a cash-cropping system, either on their own land as small capitalist farmers or, if their resources were not sufficient, as landless farm laborers on American-owned plantations. The roads and other infrastructure necessary for this system were built by forced labor, a corvée harshly administered by Gendarmerie and Marine troops. The harshness of the system revived memories for Haitians of the forced labor systems of Jean-Jacques Dessalines, Henry Christophe, and Toussaint Louverture during the revolutionary period, and of the slave system that preceded the revolution. Even many Haitians who had the status to resist conscription into the corvée hated it for nationalistic reasons.

A young Haitian army captain, Charlemagne Péralte, who had resigned his commission in 1915 rather than serve the occupying forces, was arrested for anti-American political agitation in the central plateau area in the fall of 1917. Péralte broke out of prison and rallied caco forces for a fight against the occupiers. Units of the Gendarmerie went over to him, and he rapidly commanded thousands of troops. His base was near Grande-Rivière du Nord, not far from the Citadelle of Christophe and the strongholds of Toussaint during the Haitian Revolution. Péralte appealed to Haitians' memory of their successful resistance to foreign occupation in that struggle, and began to forge a national coalition and establish a provisional government. The Americans reacted energetically, sending aircraft and more Marine ground troops to oppose Péralte's movement. By the spring of 1919, two brigades of US Marines plus Army soldiers and airmen were in the field, alongside thousands of Haitian gendarmes. Heavy fighting lasted for more than a year, during which about 2,000 Haitians lost their lives. Finally, Péralte subordinate Jean-Baptiste Conzé betrayed him to the Marines, who killed Péralte in 1919. They publicized photographs of the dead Péralte, in an attempt to demoralize the resistance forces, but the effect was to galvanize political opposition. The image of Péralte, hanging as if crucified, unified the resistance in the same way that Toussaint Louverture, betrayed and murdered by Napoleon, had done for the Haitian rebels after 1801.

Armed resistance to the occupation in the countryside did die down after 1919, though, to be replaced by urban resistance. A wave of strikes and riots swept the country in 1929, in response to the worsening economic climate. An agricultural depression had hit the United States in the mid-1920s, presaging the Great Depression to follow, and American policy on agricultural imports was becoming harsher. In addition, Haitian elites began to get a sense that the temporary occupation was becoming permanent. The strikes finally led the American government to promise withdrawal of the occupying forces over a five-year transition period, with American supervision of Haitian government taxation for a further ten years. The Haitian government accepted this, and the disengagement began in late 1929. It was accelerated by the Franklin Roosevelt administration's Good Neighbor policy under which the Roosevelt Corollary to the Monroe Doctrine was officially renounced, and a system of collective security and multinational institution building was designed to replace it.

The American occupiers had favored the educated urban elite, but still many of their members felt excluded by American racial attitudes. In addition, economic growth during the colonial period, and an improved educational system, had created a black middle class that experienced racial prejudice both from the Americans and from the mixed-race old elite. This group expressed itself in a cultural movement of Négritude, or black consciousness, led by anthropologist Jean Price-Mars. His defining work, Ainsi Parla l'Oncle (Thus Spake the Uncle), appeared in 1928. Many American artists and intellectuals, as well as some Marines, had begun to take an interest in Haitian culture. The Marine pharmacist's mate and shameless self-promoter Doc Reeser famously stayed on in Haiti after the end of his enlistment, working at the Haitian national insane asylum and becoming a vodun houngan, or priest. American occultist and folklorist William Seabrook's The Magic Island brought American attention to Haitian culture. The flowering of Haitian culture, and of American interest, that resulted connected with an international movement to revalorize black culture and African roots that included the Harlem Renaissance in the United States and the black consciousness movement around the world. In Haiti, it led to a period of relative harmony between the racial groups and steady economic progress that lasted until 1957, when Price-Mars's student Dr. François Duvalier, known as "Papa Doc," came to power.

Haiti, revolutionary revolts, 1790s

Alexander King

On the eve of the French Revolution and the start of the slave uprising in Saint-Domingue, the French central government attempted – even as late as the 1880s – to modernize the colonial system and at the same time bind the colonies closer. The system of Exclusif was liberalized through trade agreements with England (1786) and the USA (1787), as well as through the partial opening up of some of the ports (1784) for the importation of selected foods. The French secretary of the navy, Castries, promised an improvement in the status of the free blacks and mulattos. The whites in Saint-Domingue responded to this aspect of the reform process with fierce resistance, and it failed. Castries was forced to resign in 1787: this demonstrated that the white planters had effective political networks at their disposal not only in the colonies, but also in Paris.

The announcement in 1787 by the French monarch Louis XVI that he would convene the Estates-General for the first time in 175 years aroused great expectations among the planters of Saint-Domingue. They saw it as an opportunity to obtain a hearing regarding their dissatisfaction with the Pacte colonial to have their demands for economic reforms and more political self-determination heard. However, opinions were mixed as to whether or not to send a delegation to the Estates-General. In 1788 the Saint-Domingue planters residing in France founded their own separate political party, and the wealthy planters and aristocrats in Saint-Domingue, as well as the merchants and the Chamber of Commerce of Cap Français, joined it. They put forth a demand to have a representative of their colony seated in the Estates-General and submitted a petition with 3,000 signatures. The more conservative planters rejected this approach; they wanted to avoid the colonies becoming the subject of political debate in the Estates-General. Their concern had been stirred up by the activities of a new group, the Société des Amis des Noirs, which was founded in February 1788. This group lobbied for the abolition of slavery and for equal rights for free blacks and mulattos. It was led by Jacques-

Pierre Brissot, who would later become a representative; among its members were influential men such as the Marquis de la Fayette, the Marquis de Concorcet, and Abbot Henri Grégoire. Organized in the form of networks, the Société des Amis des Noirs anticipated the organizational structure of the Jacobins.

Despite the opposition of the conservative planters (who feared that representation for the colonies in the Estates-General could provoke the Amis des Noirs into a debate about the colonies and slavery) and also against the will of the governor of Saint-Domingue, delegates from the Chamber of Commerce of Cap Français were indeed elected. And in fact at the first session of the Estates-General, on May 5, 1789, there was a heated debate regarding the participation of representatives from the colony. The Marquis de Mirabeau, a spokesman for the Third Estate in the Estates-General (and later the chairman of the National Assembly and the president of the Jacobin Club) rejected colonial representation on the grounds that it was not democratic, as it had come about when a large proportion of the free inhabitants of the colony had been excluded from the political process. He was supported not only by the Amis des Noirs, but also by the Club Massiac, an association of Absentéistes who were interested in maintaining the Pacte colonial and who were therefore against representation in the Estates-General by a delegation from Saint-Domingue.

Ultimately, seven delegates from Saint-Domingue were admitted to the Estates-General on July 7, 1789, as the French Revolution began its stormy course: the founding of the French National Assembly by the representatives of the Third Estate in the Estates-General, with the self-defined mission of drafting a new constitution; the disempowering of the aristocracy; the storming of the Bastille on July 14, 1789; the issuing of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen on August 26, 1789. And in the face of these events – also confronted by ever more determined demands for equality by the Parisian mulattos of the society Colons américains, who were encouraged by the progress of the French Revolution – the Club Massiac decided to form a coalition with the delegates from Saint-Domingue. The colonists together came to the conclusion that new power structures needed to be created in Saint-Domingue in order to wrest away from the National Assembly its mandate to reconfigure the political order of the colony and to instead vest this mandate in the local corporate bodies in the colony.

In this showdown with the mulattos and the Amis des Noirs the white planters initially prevailed. In the deliberations of the Constitutional Assembly in February 1790 a Committee on the Colonies was even included in the language of the new constitution. The interests of the white planters were quite aggressively represented in the committee, which criminalized any criticism of slavery and placed the property of the colonists – including the ownership of slaves – under special protection. The committee called for constitutional powers for the colonies and set forth in its decree of March 8, 1790 that separate legislative bodies could be established in the colonies, the Assemblés coloniales. Thereby the strategy of the white planters, to strengthen their own political sphere of influence in the colonies and to separate from the French central government, was realized. This was a clear defeat for the Amis des Noirs. And for the free blacks and mulattos it meant their hopes – that in the course of the French Revolution, they would achieve legal equality with the colonial whites – were for the time being rebuffed.

By this time the planters in Saint-Domingue had already begun implementing their plans. With the consent of the secretary of the navy they had, beginning in September 1789, prepared the convening of provincial assemblies (the Assemblés provinciaux) that were to take control of the colony. The provincial assemblies were to take responsibility for the internal affairs of the provinces of Saint-Domingue; they were to be directly accountable to the king alone and were thus to have no relationship with the French National Assembly.

Meanwhile, the power relationships within the white society of Saint-Domingue shifted. The storming of the Bastille on July 14, 1789 inspired a wave of revolutionary enthusiasm – particularly among the petits blancs and the small planters. Opposition forces, the “Patriots,” took over the militia and drove out the colonial administrator, the intendant Barbé-Marbois. The planter aristocracy felt under pressure to allow whites from all social strata to stand for election as representatives to the provincial assemblies. The Northern Province Assembly elections were held on November 1, 1789, and the oppositional Patriots indeed won a victory in that election. The Western Province Assembly elections followed in January 1790; the Southern Province elections were held in February 1790. Of course, only whites could vote and become members of these assemblies.

In March 1790 the first Colonial Assembly (Assemblée coloniale) was convened in Saint Marc. The Patriots dominated here as well and expressed their separatist sentiments by changing the name of this Assembly from Assemblée coloniale to Assemblée générale, as well as mandating the drafting of a constitution for the colony. Through their resolute approach the Patriot majority drew upon itself the displeasure of government representatives and provoked a dispute among the white planters.

Per the draft of the constitution for the colony presented on May 28, 1790, the Colonial Assembly declared itself the highest authority in the colony and responsible only to the king. Accordingly, neither the French National Assembly nor the representatives of the French government in Saint-Domingue were to retain any political authority over matters pertaining to the colony. This secessionist draft constitution brought the Colonial Assembly not only into opposition with the French government and its highest local representative, Governor Puyricard, but also incurred the displeasure of the provincial assemblies, which saw their own sphere of influence endangered through this proposal to grant the Colonial Assembly such wide-ranging authorities. The powerful Northern Province withdrew its representatives from the Colonial Assembly and allied itself with the French government representatives: for the first time, a seriously divisive situation arose among the white colonists. The Colonial Assembly with its Patriot majority – above all supported by the petits blancs and disaffected small planters – faced a coalition of French government representatives and the conservative planter elite, whose main stronghold was the Assembly of the rich Northern Province.

The conflict escalated into a civil war when the Colonial Assembly set up its own military and then sought to persuade members of the regular troops to defect and join their new armed forces. However, their opponents prevailed. Under their general, Chevalier Mauduit, and with support from the Pompons blanches, which was a militia set up by the planters of the Western Province, the government troops put down the insurrection of the Patriots and on August 8, 1790 dissolved the Colonial Assembly.

The civil war left behind a colony divided into three parts. In the West, the French government had for the time being prevailed; in the South, the Patriots continued to dominate; in the North, the Provincial Assembly had absolute rule. In the conflict between the Patriots and the government, the Assembly at first remained neutral. But in March 1790, with the help of reinforcements from a French battalion that had defected, the Patriots again took control of the West, while the planters of the North declared their loyalty to France. Even prior to the beginning of the great uprising of slaves, the colonial society was already characterized by explosive contradictions. These contradictions split the society of the white colonists. But it became evident that there was an even sharper conflict of interest between the white planters and the free blacks and mulattos, who were themselves owners of plantations and slaves.

From the Uprising of the Mulattos in the West to the Concordats

Like the white planters from Saint-Domingue, the free blacks and mulattos hoped that their lot would improve as a result of the upheavals in the mother country. Their interests, however, were diametrically opposed to those of the white planters. The planters wanted to keep their domination over the colony and at the same time free themselves from the constraints of Pacte colonial. In contrast, the free blacks and mulattos wanted to achieve legal and political equality with the whites and therefore had no interest in secession: quite the contrary, they were keen to link further developments in Saint-Domingue as closely as possible to the political upheavals in France.

The mulattos were lobbying on the fringes of the Estates-General and the National Assembly. They had strong allies in the Amis des Noirs. Their cause nevertheless advanced quite slowly and their opponents initially retained the upper hand. In its decree of October 20, 1790 the National Assembly left to the colonies the power to regulate the status of all persons living in their territories. The white colonists had thus prevailed despite the efforts of the Amis des Noirs, who sought to have Paris enforce a uniform code on the status of free blacks and mulattos in the colonies.

The political confrontation concerning the legal status of the free blacks and mulattos was of course echoed in the colony itself. As early as the fall of 1789 there were increased hostilities targeting the free blacks and mulattos, including murders. Gradually, the colony began drifting into a civil war between the whites and the mulattos. The petits blancs and their political representatives, the Patriots, were particularly hostile. Provoked by the economic success of the mulattos and by their growing self-confidence inspired by the French Revolution, the petits blancs became markedly more radical out of concern for their own political privileges.

In March 1790, simultaneous to the convening of the Patriot-dominated first Colonial Assembly in Saint Marc, there was an insurrection by the mulattos in the nearby valley of the Artibonite that was quickly put down by local militias. In October 1790 there followed a further insurrection under the command of Ogé, a leader of the mulattos in the North, near the Spanish border. Vincent Ogé was born in 1768 in Dondon in the mountains of the Northern Province. He was the son of a white planter and a free mulatto woman and was educated in France. In Paris he had been one of the lobbyists on behalf of the free blacks and mulattos and had pushed for an alliance between the white and mulatto property owners in the colony. Disappointed by the Massiac Club's rejection, he returned in October 1790 to Saint-Domingue and armed his followers in the region of Dondon. The uprising was suppressed. Ogé fled but was arrested in Hinche, which was at that time in the Spanish part of the island. This revolt had a strong impact that only grew stronger upon reports of the barbarous execution of Ogé.

In France there was increasing revulsion at the archaic social relations in the colony and also increasing sympathy for the cause of the mulattos. The disputes concerning the legal status of free blacks and mulattos were carried on bitterly in France, and public opinion gradually turned in favor of equality. After a fierce debate in the National Assembly, on May 15, 1791 a compromise formulated by Representative Rewball was agreed upon. The compromise agreement provided that the status of free blacks and mulattos not born of free parents could only be changed in consultation with, and upon the wish of, the colonies; however, freeborn blacks and mulattos were to be admitted to all assemblies at once. This decree, enacted despite the resolute resistance of the colonial delegation, was the first major victory of the Amis des Noirs. Not surprisingly, it provoked much opposition among the whites in Saint-Domingue. Secessionist efforts increased. Even Blanchelande, the French governor who had succeeded Peynier, criticized the decree in a letter to the central government; he threatened that the colony would be moved to secede if the government enforced the decree. Wishing to distance themselves from the National Assembly and ward off its decisions, the white planters called for a new Colonial Assembly to convene on August 8, 1791. Following an adjournment, it convened on August 25 in Cap Français.

For their part, the mulattos of Saint-Domingue were determined that the decree of May 15, 1791 be enforced. Beginning in August 1791, they started up their own associations in the Western Province, particularly in Vallée de l'Artibonite in the north of the Western Province, where the mulattos had their strongest base of support: the remainder of the Western Province, particularly the capital city, Port-au-Prince, was at this time dominated by the Patriots. However, through their revolutionary zeal, the Patriots drove new allies over to the camp of their worst enemies, the mulattos. In Port-au-Prince the Patriots had established white ethnic domination under the Maltese adventurer, Praloto. The royalists felt themselves deprived of their usual broad powers and gathered in Croix-des-Bouquets on the plain of Cul-de-Sac, to the east of Port-au-Prince.

At the same time, the first reports of slave rebellions in the Northern Province reached the West and the South. To save the colonial society and their own privileges, the royalists now rested their hopes on a coalition with the battle-ready mulattos. Letters from contemporary witnesses indicate that the royalists intended no more than a temporary pragmatic alliance with the mulattos and did not think of sharing their privileges on a permanent basis. They hoped, and apparently speculated, that the counterrevolution in France would triumph and would then do away with the National Assembly and its decisions recognizing the demands of the mulattos. The alliance of convenience between royalists and mulattos brought together diametrically opposed interests: the royalists wanted to push through a restoration of the old order; the mulattos wanted to achieve legal equality with the whites in accordance with the decree of May 15, 1791. This alliance based on mutual opposition against the revolutionary and racist zeal of the radical petits blancs was nevertheless sealed on September 7, 1791 by the Concordat of Croix-des-Bouquets. This concordat specifically recognized, as per the decree of May 15, 1791, the equality of all free persons and therefore the equality of the whites and the free blacks and mulattos. Moreover, all assemblies of the colony that had been elected without the participation of the free blacks and mulattos were to be dissolved, and new assemblies were to be elected with their participation. Worried by the reports of slave uprisings in the north of the colony, the National Guard of the planters of Port-au-Prince concluded a concordat on September 11, 1791 with the army of the free blacks and mulattos. In this, the Concordat of Port-au-Prince, September 11, 1791, the free blacks and mulattos were able to achieve even more of their demands. Their right to bear arms was recognized, and it was agreed that the insurrectionists would be granted a blanket amnesty. The free blacks and mulattos were even to be allowed to possess weapons at a later time. Further concordats with the planters of Saint-Marc and Saint-Louis-du-Sud were concluded.

However, the Colonial Assembly in Cap Français rejected these concordats, and in Port-au-Prince there was rioting against the Concordat of September 11. The Patriots feared the restoration of the old order. But at the end of October 1791 the royalist troops blockaded the capital city and thus forced the city administration to sign the concordat and to approve the stationing of mulatto troops in Port-au-Prince.

In November there were more riots: the French National Assembly had revoked the decree of May 15 and had put the status of free blacks and mulattos back under the authority of the Colonial Assembly; against this backdrop there was to be a referendum in Port-au-Prince that would decide whether or not to keep the concordat in force. In the course of the referendum the explosive mood took a violent turn: a racist mob attacked rich merchants and unarmed mulattos and drove the mulatto troops out of the city. Port-au-Prince, built of wood, was turned into rubble and ash within a few hours.

Given this development, the mulattos were now all the more determined to use armed force to defend the concordat. A cruel civil war exploded all over the Western Province, while the capital city remained at the mercy of the reign of terror of Praloto the Maltesean. The civil war among the wealthy classes accelerated the decline of the colonial social order of Saint-Domingue. And exactly at this time, in the summer of 1791, the colony was shocked by the first slave uprisings. The fundamental contradiction and the most explosive element in the colonial order – the enslavement of 80 percent of the population – finally erupted.

Slave Revolt in the North

The history of slavery in Saint-Domingue is also the history of the attempts of the subjugated to throw off the shackles of slavery, whether individually through flight or suicide, or collectively through different, sometimes drastic, forms of disobedience. Reports of slave revolts in Saint-Domingue go back to the earliest period of the colony, the end of the seventeenth century. From that time on, occurrences of this kind took place regularly without ever fundamentally endangering the colonial order. There was the legendary fame of François Mackandal, the Black Messiah, who in 1758 together with a group of co-conspirators planned to poison the drinking water of Cap Français and then, after everyone fell ill, capture the city and murder all the whites. Mackandal's plan was discovered; he was arrested and executed. He remained alive in the memory of the blacks of Saint-Domingue and inspired many imitators.

There had already been isolated slave revolts in 1791, when finally, in August 1791, there was a large-scale slave insurrection carried out with cruel vehemence in the Northern Province. According to Haitian mythology, this insurrection began with the ceremony of Bois Caïman, which likely took place on the evening of August 21, 1791 near Petite-Anse, just south of Cap Français in a small forest called the Bois Caïman. The stories about this gathering serve as the basis for the fame of the legendary slave leader Boukman, a coachman from Clément at Acul-du-Nord, a small sugar plantation southwest of Cap Français. Historians are not absolutely certain of the exact place, or even the date, of this ceremony, nor the exact sequence of events. But generally the events are described as Bellegarde (1953) described them. According to his account, one evening approximately 200 leaders of the black slaves from the surrounding plantations gathered in the forest Bois Caïman to plan the insurrection. Boukman, who inspired those present with his incendiary speeches, led this meeting, which ended with a voodoo ceremony held in thunder, lightning, and pouring rain. A tall female slave – a voodoo priestess – appeared, armed with a long knife. Those present gathered in a circle around her as she danced in a hypnotic trance. Then a pig was brought to her: she killed it by stabbing a knife into its throat and collected the blood in a bowl. At a signal from the priestess, all those present fell to their knees, vowed loyalty to Boukman, and sealed their vows by drinking the pig blood that was passed around in the bowl. It is thought that, in addition to Boukman, Jean-François and Biassou were chosen as leaders of the insurrection during this ceremony.

These details have not been confirmed. For a long time skeptics questioned whether such an event ever took place. Today, however, it can safely be assumed that this event, or a similar event, did indeed happen. Nationalist poets and politicians have often called the ceremony of Bois Caïman a constituent element of Haitian national identity – a symbol of the close connection between the war of independence and voodoo, the religion of the common people. The rebellion actually was planned a week prior to the ceremony during a gathering of slave leaders on the Lenormand plantation in the parish of Plaine-du-Nord on August 14, 1791. The ceremony in the Bois Caïman was meant ceremoniously to seal the conspiracy and mobilize support for it.

The insurgency began on August 22, 1791 – not the day that had been planned, historians believe. They conjecture that in the original plan the uprising was to have commenced on August 25, the day when the Colonial Assembly was to convene in Cap Français. On that day the entire political class of white planters would have been in the city – especially the representatives of the Patriots, the most determined opponents of black liberation. But as a result of several arrests there was a danger that the conspiracy would come to light. Boukman was therefore forced to begin the uprising earlier than planned. He proclaimed it on August 22 from the sugar plantation Clément in Acul-du-Nord.

Because of this change in plans the insurgents were forced to improvise. The insurgency was not coordinated and did not reach the city of Cap Français, but it spread semi-spontaneously from plantation to plantation across the whole territory of the Plaine-du-Nord and developed a tremendous destructive force: 200 sugar cane fields and 1,200 coffee plantations, as well as several dozen indigo plantations, were burned down, and all the equipment on them was destroyed. A huge conflagration blazed across the plains for days. In the space of two months about 2,000 whites were murdered – sometimes in most cruel ways – and their homes and farms were wrecked and burned. The resistance of the colonists was ineffective. On August 23, 1791 the insurgents, who had 60,000–100,000 armed men, repulsed an expedition of regular troops and militias (according to a report of Governor Blanchelande). The Plaine-du-Nord, the great plain of the North surrounding Cap Français and once the treasure house of the colony, was turned into a smoky military camp: the insurgents in their positions confronting the colonial troops and militias in theirs. Everywhere the roads were lined with corpses or parts of corpses put on display. Boukman himself was killed in battle on November 6, 1791. His head was chopped off and displayed in the central square of Cap Français.

First Civilian Commission

In the fall of 1791 the once-prosperous colony of Saint-Domingue was reduced to a picture of decline and destruction: in the North the Colonial Assembly and the white planters were helpless against the slave insurgency. The plantations were destroyed along with all of their facilities. Sugar cane production was virtually at a standstill. In the West there was a civil war between the Concordat of white royalists and mulattos on one side and white Patriots on the other. The Patriots had established white rule in Port-au-Prince. The Concordat dominated in the Vallée de l'Artibonite. In the South, meanwhile, the white planters still ruled without challenge. They had created the Confederation of Grande-Anse and were increasingly secessionist.

On November 29, 1791, on orders of the French National Assembly, the first Civilian Commission arrived in the port of in Cap Français to stabilize the situation. The success of this mission was in question from the outset. First, there was a lack of clarity regarding its mandate: it originally had been put together on the basis of the decree of May 15, 1791, which it was supposed to implement; however, just before the departure of the commission from France this decree was superseded by the decree of September 24, 1791. Second, the commission received no support from France, where the power of the Jacobins was growing. The Jacobins were victorious in the new elections to the National Assembly on October 1, 1791; with 136 representatives, they were a powerful opposition party in the National Assembly, which was overall more than before dominated by radical forces, with many newly elected representatives. The Jacobins saw in the insurgency a conspiracy of the counterrevolutionary planters. They were also vociferous opponents of the decree of September 24. They had had some supporters of this decree within their own ranks, and these had been excluded from the Jacobins' Club immediately after the decree was passed. Together with the Amis des Noirs the Jacobins had several times prevented the authorization of military support for Saint-Domingue, despite the ever more urgent calls for help from the colony.

The commissioners Frédéric-Ignace de Mirbeck and Philippe-Rose Roume installed themselves in Cap Français; the third commissioner, Edmond de Saint Léger, traveled on to Port-au-Prince. Mirbeck and Roume had some initial success in the North, but ultimately they failed due to the rigid attitude of the white planters. Jean-François and Biassou, the leaders of the black insurgents, had even made a peace offer to the commission and had declared their readiness to end the insurgency and send black slaves back into the fields in exchange for an assurance of freedom and amnesty for the ring-leaders, along with some amelioration of the work regime.

At the beginning of their revolt the insurgents were not focused on the goal of complete liberation of the slaves; instead, they sought to address concrete issues having to do with the working conditions on the plantations, such as abolishing the whip and extending their free time to three days. But the white planters were not in the least interested in granting amnesty and insisted on the sole authority of the colonial administration regarding the legal status of any subordinate. As a result, the insurgency was reignited and even spread to neighboring regions in the Northeast (Fort-Dauphin, today's Fort-Liberté) and in the Northwest (Môle Saint Nicolas). At the same time, there were sharp conflicts between the Colonial Assembly and the Civil Commission regarding which was to be the ultimate authority. The Colonial Assembly, which saw its regulatory powers threatened by the commission, joined together with the petits blancs of Cap Français in a common front against the commission and Governor Blanchelande. After an unsuccessful uprising by the petits blancs against the representatives of France, a frustrated Commissioner Mirbeck left the island on March 30, 1792 and sailed to France.

Meanwhile, civil war raged in the West. To counter effectively the threats of slave uprisings and of an armed group near the border with the Spanish part of the island, Commissioner Saint Léger attempted to reconcile the whites and mulattos in the West. To this end, he traveled to Port-au-Prince at the end of January 1792. However, there he encountered fierce opposition from the Patriots; he then joined the Concordat. The Concordat fell apart in February 1792 after the killing of many whites during an uprising by the mulattos in Vallée de l'Artibonite. A new front arose: now the white factions united to fight against the mulattos. The entire Western Province was engulfed in civil war. Saint Léger traveled back to France on April 9, 1792 without having accomplished anything. Now only Commissioner Roume remained in Saint-Domingue. He stayed in Cap Français in order to prevent Governor Blanchelande from aligning himself with the counterrevolutionary forces. Roume was indeed able to tally up another – though double-edged – success: white royalists and mulattos in the West revived their alliance in April 1792, with the aim of jointly putting down the slave insurrection in their province. Once this was achieved, these allied troops – together with the representatives of France, Roume and Blanchelande – took the capital city of Port-au-Prince from the Patriots. But Roume's subsequent efforts to persuade the mulattos to break their alliance with the royalists and join on the side of the Revolution were unsuccessful.

Second Civil Commission

While in Saint-Domingue the first Civilian Commission failed overall and the breakdown of the colonial society continued, in France the Jacobins gained more influence during the spring. The Feuillant government faltered – partly due to negative reports from the colony of Saint-Domingue, reports which materialized in rising prices for coffee and sugar and thus contributed to widespread discontent. Even within conservative circles in France there was less and less sympathy for the rigid attitude of the white planters in the colony, who were unwilling to agree voluntarily to any change in the status of the free blacks and mulattos and therefore also unwilling to return to central government for a solution.

In a decree of April 4, 1792 the French parliament finally acknowledged the rights of the free blacks and mulattos and decided to send a new Civil Commission to Saint-Domingue, accompanied by 6,000 soldiers to enforce the decree and end the insurgency. The new decree, formulated by the Jacobin Gensonné, included the following provisions. The Colonial Assembly and the provincial assemblies were to be dissolved, and new assemblies were to be elected. The free blacks and mulattos were to be allowed to vote and to run for office. The second Civil Commission was to have full powers to enforce this decree. Its authority extended over the civil administration, the military, and the judiciary. The commissioners of the second Civil Commission were empowered to dissolve the provincial assemblies and the Colonial Assembly and, in case of resistance, to order every possible sanction up to and including deportation. To preserve the colony for France, they were to win over the free blacks and mulattos, to strengthen the alliance between them and the white planters, and to combat the secessionist ambitions of the whites.

Heading up the commission was the Jacobin Léger-Félicité Sonthonax. An attorney, Sonthonax was a member of the Société des Amis des Noirs and belonged to a radical wing of the Jacobins, the Enragés. In an article that was published a year before he was sent to Saint-Domingue, he wrote about his beliefs as follows: "The ownership of land both at San Domingo and the other colonies belongs in reality to the negros. It is they who have earned it with the sweat of their brows, and only by usurpation do others enjoy the fruits" (quoted in Stoddard 1914: 183). With this stance, radical for its time, Sonthonax set forth to Saint-Domingue with the second Civil Commission, in which the Jacobins Etienne Polverel and Jean-Antoine Ailhaud were also members. The composition of this commission reflected the power relations in France after the fall of the Feuillant government in March 1792 and gave a clear indication of France's new policy in dealing with the colony. Upon receiving reports of the new May 1792 decree, the white planters of Saint-Domingue were horrified. At first they did not mount active resistance; they greeted the commission upon its arrival on September 18, 1792, though clearly rather aloofly. Many planters feared that the commission had come to the colony with the secret intention of abolishing slavery. Even though the commissioners quickly gave assurances that they had no plans to abolish slavery, a confrontation between them and the white planters was imminent.

That confrontation took shape against the background of the radicalization brought about by the French Revolution and the rumblings of war in Europe. On August 10, 1792, when crowds in Paris stormed the royal city palace, the Tuileries, the National Assembly resolved to depose the king. But the National Assembly itself was rapidly losing its own legitimacy in the face of the increasing revolutionary spirit and the growing political aspirations of those who had been excluded from voting under the "census" election rules, the so-called "passive citizens." The National Assembly dissolved itself and called for the election of a National Convention that would be mandated to draft a new constitution. This National Convention was the first parliament in France to be elected under elections in which all could participate. It convened on September 20, 1792 and proclaimed the Republic on September 21, 1792. This radicalization took place in the face of growing threats to the revolution from counterrevolutionary forces both inside and outside the country.

The close connection between the revolution and the colonial question can also be seen in the American Legion that was deployed by the revolutionary forces between December 1792 and April 1793. In this legion mulattos and blacks fought in France for the revolution; at the same time the French commissioner, Sonthonax, was in Saint-Domingue to enforce equal rights for mulattos and blacks with whites. In this phase the interrelation between the course of the French Revolution and the upheavals in Saint-Domingue becomes especially clear. After disbandment of their unit, the members of the American Legion published a manifesto against slavery that was addressed to the Convention. In it they called upon the French revolutionaries to unite with the insurgents in Saint-Domingue, to fight with them together against the "tyranny of the colonists," and to break with colonial society.

The royalists in Saint-Domingue feared all the more a loss of their privileges and strove to get rid of the commission. But Sonthonax was resolved to accomplish his mission. By exploiting the rivalries between the different factions in white society in Cap Français, and with the help of the Patriots, he succeeded in eliminating the royalists as a political force. Having achieved this, he turned to challenge the Patriots and abolished their Club.

Sonthonax ruled sternly. In contrast to his predecessors of the first commission, he had been granted broad powers and an army of 6,000 soldiers. He dismissed Governor Blanchelande and had him deported to France (where he was guillotined in April 1793). The Colonial Assembly was dissolved and not reelected, but instead replaced by a Provisional Committee comprising six whites, five mulattos, and a free black. Sonthonax had several influential whites deported and replaced them with mulattos. He soon lost all support from the white population of Cap Français and instead relied on the free blacks and mulattos.

Commissioner Polverel and his colleague Ailhaud had in the meantime installed themselves in the West. In response to the aggravations in the North a new coalition formed in the West. The Patriots joined together with the royalists, while the mulattos went over to the commission. On April 13, 1793 the mulattos and Polverel seized the capital city, Port-au-Prince. The whites fled to the South, where the white planters' Confederation of Grand-Anse ruled. In the North, the intense conflicts in Cap Français had overshadowed the insurgency in the surrounding Plaine-du-Nord. But tensions were rising on the plains as well: the white colonists fled in great numbers, and the insurgents set up their camps in the mountains or headed to the Spanish-occupied eastern part of the island.

Production in this once very productive region came to a standstill.

After some half-hearted and not very effective attempts to put down the insurgency militarily, Sonthonax hoped that a new National Convention might resolve the slave question. He saw himself and his mission confronted by a new difficulty when the new French governor, Galbaud, arrived in Cap Français. Right away a conflict between the governor and Sonthonax flared up regarding who between them had the ultimate authority. This developed into an armed conflict between the commissioners and the mulatto troops and Galbaud and the white militias. The latter at first had the upper hand. Sonthonax called upon the black insurgents from the plains for assistance. Following Sonthonax's promise to free them from slavery, 15,000 black insurgents marched into Cap Français under the command of the rebel leaders, Pierrot and Macaya, and took back the city from Galbaud. As Cap Français burned down in the heavy fighting, Galbaud fled with a thousand whites across the ocean to the US.

At the same time as the whites in Cap Français were rising up under the leadership of Governor Galbaud against the commission, the colony was increasingly threatened by an outside danger: the enemies of the French Republic – Spain and Great Britain – pushed forward to Saint-Domingue and established a beachhead. Sonthonax and Polverel sought to win over the insurgent black armies – some of which had placed themselves under the Spanish flag – to the cause of the Republic. They hoped to gain additional troops for their resistance against the British and Spanish invaders. They therefore decided, in view of the growing inner and outer dangers, to take the decisive step, and on June 21, 1793 proclaimed liberty from slavery for all blacks who bore arms.

In the North, Sonthonax announced the universal abolition of slavery on August 29, 1793; in the South, Polverel pronounced the same on September 21, 1793. The French National Convention declared the universal abolition of slavery on February 4, 1794. This radical measure could not, however, stop the leading commanders of the black insurgents such as Toussaint Louverture, Biassou, and Jean-François from continuing to fight on the side of Spain, which had also promised them freedom.

In the course of the year 1793, with the support of the insurgents, Spanish troops pushed further and further into the French colony. In the fall of 1793 the British also fell upon Saint-Domingue. Already by the end of 1793 a large part of the French colony was occupied by Spanish or British troops. On June 4, 1794 Port-au-Prince fell to Great Britain. The commissioners were faced with the failure of their mission. They were removed from office upon a decision of the French National Convention; in 1794, they were deported to France as prisoners. But even if they must be regarded as having failed – in face of the advancing British and Spanish invasion – in their mission to pacify the colony and save it for France, on balance they had taken some key steps, through their alliance with the mulattos and through the abolition of slavery, for the war of liberation that would follow.

Haiti, revolutionary struggles

Alexander King

Toussaint Louverture did not accept the transfer of authority from Hédouville to Rigaud, but instead brought Roume from Santo Domingo, who arrived in Port-au-Prince in January 1799 and took over the function of representative to the directorate in Saint-Domingue. Formally, in taking this step Toussaint demonstrated his interest in showing his lasting loyalty for his mother country and countered existing rumours which claimed he was aiming at independence.

In fact, Roume was only subordinated to Toussaint who was close to the zenith of his power. In February 1799, based on the initiative of Toussaint, Roume revoked André Rigaud's supreme command over some districts in the South that had until then been under his control, and placed them under Toussaint's command. Tensions between the mulatto André Rigaud and the black Toussaint Louverture increased and quickly took military dimensions. Both sides were able to mobilize the racial hatred between the "old" and the "new" free people, the mulattos and the blacks. This racial hatred between mulattos and blacks had its roots in the experiences in slave society where the former had been slave owners and the latter slaves. The hostilities were also nourished by the competition between these two groups in their struggle for positions in the new society in which one group, the anciens libres, had a clear advantage in terms of property rights, while the other group, the nouveaux libres, had to fight for their place in society as well as their share in property.

Finally, in July 1799, Toussaint, who had been provided with arms and ammunition from Great Britain and the United States, marched with 20,000–30,000 soldiers into the South in order to force Rigaud to surrender. Although the military confrontation mainly took place in the South, the conflict impacted the whole colonial society. The followers of the leader of the mulattos, Rigaud, stood up in other regions, too, especially in the Artibonite valley and in Môle Saint Nicolas, where they were defeated by the Toussaint's troops. In August 1799 numerous followers of Rigaud were executed as traitors in Cap Français, which had been the center of the mulattos until the failed coup d'état of Villatte. The civil war ended in August 1800 with the invasion of Toussaint Louverture in Cayes and the flight of Rigaud and his officers – among them Alexandre Pétion. Toussaint had fought the civil war with utmost rigor against the mulattos and four months after the war's end a massacre ensued against Rigaud's officers. During the civil war Jean-Jacques Dessalines, who had risen to the position of the second strongman after Toussaint and would later become the emperor of the new state of Haiti, revealed extreme zealotry in eliminating his opponents. He achieved his greatest military victories for Toussaint Louverture and thereby was driven by the decisive antagonism against the mulattos. These hostilities between the "new" and the "old" free people have endured the postcolonial phase and are determining Haitian politics today.

After the flight of his fiercest opponent and enemy, André Rigaud, Toussaint Louverture started to consolidate his power in the colony. Between 1794, when he had switched sides from the Spanish to the French, until 1799 his forces had grown from 4,000 to 30,000 men. The upper ranks were mainly occupied by black nouveaux libres, a new elite also benefiting from the reorganization of the agricultural sector. The administration of the majority of confiscated plantations that had been left by their white owners was transferred to black officers, some of whom were also officially registered as owners.

Toussaint prepared the occupation of Santo Domingo, the eastern part of the island which since the peace agreement of Basel formally belonged to France. For Toussaint, the unification of the island was another necessary precondition for securing his regime and, in the long term, to prevent the return of the old regime. The French government warned Toussaint against taking this step. However, Roume, who in concordance with his successor in Santo Domingo, the French representative Antoine Chanlatte, had resisted the plans for occupation, was arrested on November 25, 1800 and interned in Dondon. Therefore, the political prerequisites for unifying the island had been established. On January 6, 1801, 4,500 soldiers under the command of Paul Louverture, Toussaint's brother, crossed the border Rivière Massacre in the North. After the capitulation of the Spanish governor of Santo Domingo and Chanlatte's flight to Venezuela, on January 26, 1801 Toussaint Louverture received the keys to the town of Santo Domingo and abolished slavery.

Toussaint had virtually got rid of French authority, chased away the Spanish and British occupying forces, and prevailed against internal rivals. At the same time, with the conquest of the eastern part of the island and flourishing economic relations with Great Britain and the United States, he built the foundation for the final separation from the mother country. The first constitution of Saint-Domingue, announced in a ceremony on July 8, 1801 in Cap Français, further substantiated his claim on power. The constitution provided him with the title of governor of Saint-Domingue for his lifetime and transferred all legislative and executive competences completely to him. Accordingly, his political life's work gained constitutional momentum with the abolition of slavery and racial discrimination.

The commissioners Sonthonax and Polverel had a special interest in rebuilding the productivity of the colonial economy to the pre-revolutionary level, of course, without slavery. The military conflicts with Spain and Great Britain in Europe and in Saint-Domingue had soaked up many resources; France could no longer abdicate from the lucrative colonial economy. Sonthonax and Polverel constructed a new labor regime designed to further enable the profitable exploitation of the colony and structurally resembled the slave economy. The Code de Travail brought plantation workers several improvements as opposed to slavery: in particular, there were no property ownership relations between plantation owner and worker. However, plantation workers were not allowed to become landowners. Polverel unambiguously countered the claims of freed slaves for the distribution of individual land rights: the plantations were not to be divided.

The whip as disciplinary means was abolished, and workers were to receive one quarter of the profit produced on the plantation. Nevertheless, workers were further bound to their respective plantations and were not granted freedom of movement; they had to work six days a week, from sunrise to sunset. Workers were allowed individual parcels of land (places à vivre) that they could cultivate at their own cost on their free days. The parcels were limited in size to 600 square meters. By and large the plantation system was left untouched, and the work conditions improved only gradually.

Workers reacted with different forms of protest to the new constraints: some of them illegally enlarged their places à vivre by occupying plantation territory, others openly refused to work, and a group of workers went as far as destroying tools and sugar cane fields, or fled from the plantations. These actions resulted in the decision to provide repressive provisions inscribed in a police decree of February 28, 1794. Now, at least, repression was in the hands of the state and not based on the arbitrariness of plantation owners.

In the South, however, where André Rigaud ruled in a mulatto republic that was de facto independent from colonial authorities, the measures of coercion and punishment were much more drastic. In his territory the organization of the labor market had a military character.

Under the reign of Toussaint Louverture the rigorous labor regime was not only maintained, but in addition labor relations were militarized. Toussaint viewed the plantations as regiments and the agricultural workers as soldiers. He leased confiscated plantations to his soldiers of higher ranks or installed them as administrators. According to a decree of October 12, 1800 the workers were now completely bound to their plantations, normally to those where they had already worked as slaves; any freedom of movement was abolished. The commanders of the communities were to report any unauthorized movement of any worker to his plantation, and to arrest and incarcerate the "delinquent." Military law was put in place for all administrators, foremen, and workers. With the constitution of 1801 the militarization of the agricultural sector was established by constitutional law. Feeding the army expended 60 percent of the national budget.

Nevertheless, Toussaint Louverture's agromilitary state did achieve economic success. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, for the first time since the outbreak of the revolution in 1789, there was a slow economic turnaround. In 1801 sugar exports reached 13 percent of the capacity of 1789, prior to which they had fallen to only 1.2 percent in 1795. While in 1795 cotton exports were only at 0.7 percent of the capacity in 1789, they rose to 35 percent of their pre-revolutionary value; coffee exports, which had almost ceased, even reached 55 percent. This economic boom correlated with the rigorous reintroduction of the plantation economy and the concurrent opening up of the economy for international trade. From 1792 onwards the French government had already loosened the Exclusif and hence enabled exchange with other partners, especially the US. Saint-Domingue under Toussaint Louverture was committed to active trade relations with Great Britain and the US. The trade decrees of 1798 (with the US) and 1799 (with Great Britain) anticipated the autonomy of the colony in economic matters.

At the same time, these economic achievements had been bought with the growing discontent of the agricultural workers. Resistance mounted against the strict labor regime which bore little difference to slavery. In the Plaine-du-Nord, which 10 years before had set the stage for the first general slave uprising of Saint-Domingue, in October 1801 a revolt broke out among agricultural workers, in the course of which 300 white persons were massacred. Although the uprising was crushed mercilessly by Toussaint's troops, and hundreds of insurgents were killed, this event marked the beginning of the final decline of the plantation economy and the reign of the planters. Agricultural workers left the plantations in huge numbers and lived in the mountains, where their visions of freedom could be met.

In the course of the civil war, two fundamentally different views developed regarding the question of how the freedom that was achieved against the slave owners could be created and maintained in the long term. In other words, which form of society was to take the place of the colonial order? In the revolutionary process, state and nation formed juxtaposing tendencies. When Boukman, the leader of the slave revolt in August 1791, appealed to his followers to listen to the voice of freedom, the term "freedom" did not correspond to the European notion of freedom. Neither did it imply democratic principles, nor was it based on the ideology of the foundation of the state. Instead, the struggle for freedom was nourished by the concrete daily experiences of the slaves – humiliation, subjugation, exploitation – and focused on the right to resistance by any means. For the slaves, freedom meant being granted a piece of land to use for subsistence agriculture, where they could grow crops for individual consumption or sell in local markets. The insurgent slaves were constantly looking for cooperation with the French government and its representatives in Saint-Domingue and for some time even struggled by its side and under its flag.

The Paysannerie developed under the conditions of slavery and in the course of the liberation struggle. Based on the aspiration for independent work and the ownership of a small piece of land, it thus manifested itself in the so-called places à vivre, gardens that had been granted to the slaves in which they were allowed to grow vegetables for their own use. The cultivation of potatoes, manioc, corn, etc. for a rapidly growing population only played a subordinate role in the slave economy, in quantitative as well as in structural terms. However, food production was functional for the colonial economy in so far as the places à vivre, mainly located on the property of the plantation, secured the reproduction and therefore the possibility of exploitation of slave labor. Under these harsh conditions, rudimentary peasant markets had already developed in which surpluses were traded.

Repeatedly, claims for three free days were made and played a decisive role in the mobilization of the insurgencies. This claim focused on the goal to spend more time in the places à vivre and to cultivate them in a self-determined way and according to one's own needs. Concurrent with the beginning of the slave economy, resolute slaves aimed at leaving the plantations once and for all, in order to form an independent existence in the mountains. The escaped slave that took up the struggle against the white planters in the mountains was later honored by a memorial in the center of Port-au-Prince: Le Marron inconnu, designed by the Haitian sculptor, architect, and painter Albert Mangonès and erected in 1968.

As early as 1751 there were an estimated 3,000 marrons. They found protection in the inaccessible mountains of the island, often in the borderlands between the French and Spanish parts. Among them were many women, and thus, half a century before the foundation of the independent state of Haiti, a self-contained society began to form and reproduce itself. At night, the marrons would often walk down into the valleys to steal livestock, raid plantations, and plunder. In some cases they also committed murder. The marrons always kept their ties with the slaves in the plantations and played a focal role in the revolution, although none of the revolutionaries was a marron and despite the fact that the marrons' notion of freedom stood in fundamental contradiction to that of the revolutionaries, especially in the final phase of the revolution. In their draft of an alternative society they relied on organizational forms that they had known from their mother country. Regardless of the attempts of the post-colonial elites to maintain the plantation economy, the contre-plantation developed steadily: the counter-draft of the small farmers set against the capitalist agriculture. Barthélemy (1989) defines the cultural elements of this society as common language (Creole), religion (Vodou or a syncretism of Vodou and elements of Catholicism), and the specific organization of reproduction that deviated from the capitalist model (extended families, no marriage). In the economic sphere, a superstructure consisting of three elements evolved: égalité, auto-suffisance, and auto-régulation.

The equality of all members is a requirement that the Paysannerie still hangs on to. Real property relations that do not meet this requirement disappear in daily life, behind the facade of a homogenized culture and uniform social habits. However, in the daily life of the Paysannerie there are no institutional hierarchies. In this society of equals, bare of any institutionalized relations, the role of self-sufficiency, autonomous reproduction, was central. The Paysannerie developed contrary to the capitalist model not only in terms of its worldview, but also in geographical terms. Whereas the sugar cane plantations from the colonial era were located in the plains, the establishment of the Paysannerie took place in the mountains.

The Paysannerie developed in resistance against the slave economy and also counteracted the idea of the state as developed by Toussaint Louverture. The small farmers resisted his regime as they had resisted the slave owners, they acted against the attempt to maintain the plantation economy even after the final days of slavery and the white supremacy in Haiti, and they protested the revival of these oppressive structures. Like the French commissioners Sonthonax and Polverel, Toussaint Louverture and his successors did not keep the plantation economy in independent Haiti from 1804 onwards.

Haiti, Saint-Domingue Revolution, 1789–1804, aftermath

Alexander King

The colony of Saint-Domingue was succeeded by Haiti, the first independent state in Latin America. The declaration of independence on January 1, 1804, called out by Jean-Jacques Dessalines – “Independence or Death” – expressed the fierce determination underlying the defense of national independence and the liberation from slavery against foreign powers, especially France. A few days later this vigorous determination was demonstrated with the murder of all French citizens still residing in the country and the deportation of all foreigners. The new state stood in continuity to the regime of Toussaint Louverture. This continuity was reflected in the elevated position and overarching power of one leading person. In the course of 1804 Jean-Jacques Dessalines turned into Emperor Jacques I. The new constitution of May 20, 1805 provided him with all-encompassing political, military, and judicial rights. The power of the state was completely transferred to one person.

The intention never again to submit to any external power was also manifested in the constitution which prohibited foreigners to acquire property in Haiti. This instruction was maintained until the country's occupation by the United States starting in 1915, which modified the constitution in order to enable the penetration of the Haitian economy by US capital.

Dessalines concentrated his efforts at dismantling the military force. He founded a regular army of 60,000 men. He also paralleled his predecessor Toussaint Louverture in his project of creating a strong state defense focusing on the inland which he likewise turned into a fort. Moreover, he moved the capital to the town of Marchand at the foot of the Montagnes Noires. Dessalines also continued his predecessor's economic policies. He kept the system of large-scale plantations intact and held on to the export-oriented agricultural model. The agricultural workers were bound to their plantation and shared a quarter of the profits. At the same time, property relations were fully reorganized. Hence, the state was the largest landholder. In a law of July 24, 1805 he ordered the inspection of all property titles. This measure enraged landowners who held properties of different sizes, as well as mulatto landholders.

The mulatto upper class resisted Dessalines' dictatorial leadership style and refused to cooperate with his reign. This group saw their economic interests seriously threatened by Dessalines' land policies, a stand supported by racist sentiments against the black elite. The discontent raised by Dessalines' failed attempt to conquer militarily the Eastern part of the island and his ineffective and wasteful governance finally led to insurgencies in the South and the West. On October 17, 1806 Dessalines was murdered on his way from Marchand to Port-au-Prince and chopped into pieces.

The separation between the anciens and nouveaux libres that had appeared to belong to the past in the war of independence broke out again. This schism remains a decisive factor in Haitian politics. After the murder of Dessalines this separation even manifested itself in the temporary division of the country: following his death, Alexandre Pétion ruled the mulatto elite in the South and West.

On January 1, 1807 Henri Christophe took power in the North and on March 26, 1811 declared himself Emperor Henri I. He continued the project of large state plantations and militarization, while Pétion started to distribute land to his followers. The division of the country could only be surmounted in 1822, following the death of both rulers. Neither private nor state large-scale ownership of land prevailed as a dominant cultivation model. Former slaves left the plantations in order to found family farms on formerly uncultivated land. Due to a shortage of labor the plantations had to be divided and leased in small units. There emerged a new residential and societal pattern which until today is present in the form of settlements with scattered buildings (habitations) and family farms (lakou). These settlements irrevocably unlocked the Haitian mountain regions as additional living space. In turn, due to the title of inheritance favoring every child the family farms were scaled down from generation to generation. As a consequence, at present rural Haiti features by far the smallest average farm units in all Latin America, contrary to the colonial order.

From the very first moments of its independence Haiti was isolated in the international arena. The United States only acknowledged Haiti's independence 60 years after the event. France acknowledged it through the payment of compensation amounting to 150 million gold francs. Even Latin American states did not let Haiti participate in their political rise following the liberation. Although Alexandre Pétion supported the South American liberation fighter Simón Bolívar by sending ships and soldiers and providing him with protection, Haiti was not granted acknowledgment by newly founded South American states and was not invited to the first Pan-American Congress in 1826 in Panama.

Slavery was maintained in the South American states for many decades after independence. In the French colonies slavery was reintroduced in 1802 and finally abolished as late as 1848. Great Britain first ended slavery in 1807 and in 1832 officially banned it. In the United States slavery was banned in 1865 after the Civil War. The men and women of Saint-Domingue were exceptional in many regards: the majority was born in Africa, illiterate, according to western standards uneducated, and in the dominant discourse not accepted as fully human. Despite all these obstacles they became the pioneers in the struggle for basic rights for freedom. They completed the French Revolution by staking their claims for all people, no matter the color of their skin. They were far ahead of their time. In this sense their contribution to the history of human rights is of crucial importance.

Haiti, Saint-Domingue and revolutionary France

Alexander King

The revolution that took place from 1789 to 1804 in the French colony of Saint-Domingue mirrored the French Revolution. Its dynamics developed in the context of the mercurial revolutionary upheavals in the French metropolis; and conversely, the revolution in Saint-Domingue was of fundamental importance for the course of the French Revolution. The events in Saint-Domingue also influenced the struggle for independence throughout Latin America and paved the way for the worldwide liberation of the slaves.

The end result of the conflict in Saint-Domingue was the African slaves' self-liberation from slavery and the founding of the first independent nation-state in Latin America, but the path towards that end was not at all unilinear. And the interests that initiated these developments – that drove them forward with the utmost determination – were not at all in harmony with each other. The large white landowners fought against the white proletarians, and both together fought against the colonial government; the mulattos fought at times on the side of monarchists and against the revolutionaries and at other times in alliance with the revolutionaries and against the monarchists; the black slaves at first fought in alliance with the Spanish monarchy against revolutionary France, and then they fought with France against Spain. Constantly changing fronts and coalitions characterized the final 15 years of the French colony of Saint-Domingue.

The dynamics of the conflict finally culminated in the creation of the first modern black nation-state: Haiti. The founding of a state by a people who had shortly before then been captured, enslaved, and brought against its will from Africa to the Caribbean – a people who had come from very different parts of the African continent – is a unique historical event.

Colonial Society and Its Contradictions

In accordance with the Treaty of Riswick, which was concluded between Germany, France, Holland, and Spain in the year 1697, the western part of the Spanish possession of Santo Domingo became French property. This part of the island, henceforth to be known as the French colony of Saint-Domingue, had for the most part not been touched by Spanish colonization; French and English settlers, the so-called Boucaniers, had therefore been able to settle here during the decades prior to the signing of the treaty. The Boucaniers supported themselves mainly through hunting wild cattle and pigs; they also were traders of leather and meat. Their customers were the Flibustiers: pirates who were already carrying out operations from their base on the Ile de la Tortue as early as 1520 and partly on contract from the French government.

The Boucaniers at first settled on the Ile de la Tortue, an island off the north coast of the land now known as Haiti; thereafter they settled on the north coast itself. Beginning in 1625, and increasingly after 1660, the French settlements received systematic support from the French government. Settlers and their employees were offered financial incentives: these included trading privileges, tax relief, and start-up aid, as well as making grants of land to contract workers and bringing in female orphans as settlers. Contract workers were promised that they would receive land upon completion of their contracts.

In 1663 there were in total 14 French possessions in the Caribbean. To carry on colonial trade and to structure the relationship between the mother country and the colonies, the Compagnie des Indes Occidentales was established in 1664 and granted military rights and trade privileges. Furthermore, this company was allowed to appoint governors and to maintain its own army. It was granted a tax break of 50 percent of all import and export taxes and from the beginning enjoyed a virtual monopoly in colonial trade. To exclude foreign competitors from the colonies and to further the growth of the French economy, the colonial trade was organized under the system of Exclusif (also called Pacte colonial). The system of Exclusif included the following provisions (Stoddard 1914: 16):

- 1 The colonies were required to obtain all of their agricultural and industrial imports exclusively from France.
- 2 The products of the colonies were exported to France exclusively.
- 3 France obtained tropical products exclusively from its colonies.
- 4 No industrial production could take place in the colonies.

The system of Exclusif must be seen as an essential component of mercantile state intervention. In France under Prime Minister Colbert this intervention was designed to secure primary capital accumulation, in which the colonies were supposed to play a key role. This is the means by which capitalist development of the mother country was begun.

Up until 1680, tobacco cultivation by small farmers was the dominant industry in Saint-Domingue. In addition, cocoa and indigo played a role in trade. In this phase the productive labor was not carried out by slaves from Africa, but by contract workers from France. The transition to slavery only commenced after the beginning of sugar cane cultivation, when there was a revolution in the relations of production. A condition of the new form of production was the creation of larger enterprises. Small planters were ousted. They were pushed out through the sale of their land, or they were driven into handicraft occupations; some became foremen on the plantations. Collectively, the former small planters formed the basis of a new social strata, the petits blancs. There was a significant concentration of land ownership.

The conversion of the colonial economy from the small-scale cultivation of tobacco, cocoa, and indigo to the cultivation of sugar cane and coffee on large plantations produced a surge of economic growth. The révolution de la canne (Hector & Moïse 1990: 78) began early in the eighteenth century and reached its highpoint, as well as the beginnings of its reversal, between 1770 and 1789 – that is to say, just before French control over Saint-Domingue was ended. During this period high population growth in Europe along with increasing population concentration and industrialization enabled the development of rapidly expanding markets for colonial products. The colonial economy in Saint-Domingue flourished. Trade in the products of the colony brought an industrial and economic boom to the commercial cities of the mother country such as Nantes, La Rochelle, and Bordeaux. Sugar refining, shipbuilding, the iron, textile, and export-oriented industries, the trade in flour, meat, and other food products, and the re-exporting of colonial goods all grew rapidly and contributed to the industrial development of France.

On the eve of the uprising, Saint-Domingue was the richest colony in the Caribbean and was contributing more than a third of the total of France's revenue from foreign trade: 70 percent of all of France's revenue from trade with the colonies in the New World was derived from Saint-Domingue. One out of eight French citizens was living directly or indirectly from the wealth created by this colony. Each year 1,500 ships were sailing from Saint-Domingue to bring a total of 220,000 tons of colonial goods (sugar, coffee, indigo, copper) annually to France. The number of sugar mills in Saint-Domingue grew from 35 in 1671 to 793 in 1789. Alongside these, manufacturing grew up in the form of steam boilers, furnaces, and distilleries.

France organized the exploitation of its colonies for the benefit of industrialization in the mother country – just like Britain did – in an extremely efficient manner. The existing conditions in Saint-Domingue were exploited in the most rigorous possible way to create value. The disappearance of the original population enabled the French government to obtain unlimited access to the fertile plains of the colony. Permits for large tracts of land (usually of several hundred hectares) were issued to French entrepreneurs. The large size of these land grants allowed for a certain amount of vertical integration on the plantations; for example, there were often processing plants on the premises.

To ensure ease of trade between the colony and mother country, a network of roads was created leading to the harbors that were used for export of goods. Because the plains had fertile soil but barely enough rainfall, they were crisscrossed with irrigation systems more extensive than have ever existed there since that time. A merchant fleet ensured the efficient transportation of agricultural products from the colony and their distribution to the European market, and all of this trade was required to pass through France. The decisive factor, however, was the exploitation of unpaid labor. The work of the slaves formed the basis of the new production system, which in turn to a large extent enabled the economic development of the metropolis.

In addition to 800 sugar cane plantations in Saint-Domingue, there were about 3,000 coffee, indigo, and cotton plantations. A large amount of capital from the metropolis was invested in the colony. With the large-scale and standardized production on the plantations, the need for unskilled labor grew concurrently. The demand could not be met in Europe, as labor contracts under these conditions could no longer be negotiated. Instead, to carry out the labor-intensive production processes (clearing, weeding, harvesting), hundreds of thousands of inhabitants of Africa were forcibly brought to Saint-Domingue and enslaved there. Stoddard (1914: 51) estimates that the total number of slaves imported to Saint-Domingue by 1789 was about 1 million.

Some 150,000 Africans were brought to Saint-Domingue and enslaved between 1784 and 1789; 55,000 of them were brought in 1789 alone. Most of them were deployed to the North. In 1788 over one hundred ships were engaged in transporting slaves from Africa to Saint-Domingue. The slave trade was then a lucrative business. Due to inhuman working conditions and poor medical care and nourishment, the mortality rate of the slaves in Saint-Domingue was very high: it stood at 2.5 percent annually, 11,000 deaths per year. Hilliard d'Auberteuil (1776) expressed the common opinion of the slaveholders: "it is cheaper to buy slaves than to breed them" (quoted in Stoddard 1914: 51). Despite this, because of the massive import of slaves, their number grew from 20,000 in 1701 to 230,000 in 1754 and finally to 450,000 in 1789. The slaves were faced in 1789 with only 35,000 whites (including about 10,000 women), along with 27,000 Affranchis (free blacks and mulattos).

At the end of the eighteenth century the three provinces making up the French part of the island of Saint-Domingue – the provinces of the North, the West, and the South – were densely populated and characterized by bustling economic activity; however, the Spanish part of the island languished in a state of economic lethargy even though geographical conditions there were better. In 1789 only 125,000 people were living in Spanish Santo Domingo, mainly as livestock breeders and shepherds. Almost no export-oriented agriculture was carried out. Only about 14,000 slaves worked on the Spanish side of the colony. After the mineral resources were extracted, there was no economic restructuring in the Spanish colonies along the lines of modern capitalist requirements. On the contrary, the colonization of the Spanish possessions by settlers from the mother country and the farming economy they created aimed only at meeting their own subsistence needs and ran counter to the necessary requirements for capitalist development – the separation of agriculture and industry, the separation of producers from the means of production, and an increasing division of labor and standardization of production.

With the growing prosperity and the increasing importance of Saint-Domingue for economic development in France, in the mid-eighteenth century the French central government made increasing efforts to bind the colony closer politically. A judicial and police apparatus was created, and a system for taxation was introduced. Against the will of the local planters, the de facto local system of justice was replaced by a system of justice imposed by the metropolis.

Politically, French rule over the colony was characterized by a hybrid leadership structure. The governor was the crown's representative in the colony. He was the commander of the military and was responsible for the foreign relations of the colony. Usually, he was himself a former soldier or sailor. The intendant was the second representative of the mother country, usually a bureaucrat, who supervised the civil administration and the judiciary. Contemporary observers described this hybrid rule, in which the governor was the main center of power, as a mixture of anarchy and tyranny. The administration of the colony was subject to a "European caste." The local colonists did not participate in it.

The colonial system gave rise to a specific use of space. The population of the colony of Saint-Domingue was concentrated primarily on the fertile plains, the Plaine-du-Nord (in the Northern Province), Plaine de Cul-de-Sac and Plaine de Leogane (in the Western Province), and the Plaine des Cayes (in the Southern Province). Among the first French settlements, which were founded before the government instituted its settlement policy, were Ile de la Tortue, Port Magot, and Port-de-Paix on the northern coast and Grand-Goâve, Petit-Goâve, Miragoâne, Les Nippes, and Baradères on the southern peninsula. Following the Treaty of Riswick and international recognition of the French claim to Saint-Domingue, further settlements were established on the northern plains: for example, Limbé, Dondon, Quartier Morin, Limonade, Grande-Rivière-du-Nord, Trou-du-Nord, Terrier Rouge, or Bayahà (later Fort Dauphin, then Fort-Liberté). Jacmel, Cayes, Grande-Anse, and Saint-Louis-du-Sud, among others, rose up on the coastal plains of the southern peninsula. In addition, settlements were begun at the Artibonite Valley (Vallée de l'Artibonite) and on the plain of Cul-de-Sac.

The first capital city of the colony was Cap Français. Even after the establishment in 1749 of the new capital city of Port-au-Prince, Cap Français remained the largest and most important city in the colony. It formed, together with the surrounding Plaine-du-Nord, the Northern Province: the oldest, richest, and most densely populated province in the colony within a spatial structure that consisted mostly of many separate lots of land. The Western Province, which included Port-au-Prince and Léogane, was climatically at a disadvantage; only with the assistance of irrigation could its plains be put to productive use. The Southern Province had the least economic significance and was socially and economically the least developed. It was isolated from the other provinces by the highest mountain chains in the colony and had few valleys and plains. However, it was accessible to the British island of Jamaica only 200 kilometers away.

On the eve of the revolution of 1789, Cap Français was with 20,000 inhabitants the largest city in the colony. After only 40 years, Port-au-Prince had become, with about 8,000 inhabitants, a dynamic and busy port city. In an economy based entirely on foreign trade, the port towns of Port-de-Paix, Gonaïves, Saint Marc, Léogane, Grand-Goâve, Aquin, Jacmel, Cayes, and Jérémie played an important role. These port towns were able to develop a social life quite equal to that of the cities of Cap Français and Port-au-Prince. The provincial towns benefited from the colonial infrastructure, which connected isolated production units with the nearest ports. Each of these port towns had its own backcountry, from which it supplied itself with trading goods. This decentralized structure of the colony played an important role during war of independence: the various parties in the civil war formed different coalitions in the North, in the West, and in the South, and for a time two separatist parliaments were constituted in Cap Français and Saint Marc.

The society of the white colonists of Saint-Domingue was small (35,000) in number, but had reached a high level of social stratification. At the top of "white" society – and much disliked by the local planters – was the "European caste." This caste was made up of the officials from the mother country, in charge of colonial administration, and of the aristocratic large-scale planters (Absentéistes) who had close ties to French nobility and resided sometimes in the colony and sometimes in France. The representatives of the clergy were also in this caste. The middle class consisted of merchants and shopkeepers; it was made up exclusively of Europeans. Small local planters (Creoles) comprised the rural middle class. The so-called petits blancs were at the bottom of the social hierarchy. In the countryside the petits blancs worked in such occupations as plantation inspector, mechanic, and so forth; in the cities they often had marginal jobs doing manual labor or managed to get by in some other way. Among the petits blancs were many foreigners, particularly Germans, Italians and Maltese.

The Affranchis, as the free blacks and mulattos were called, rose rapidly in number during the eighteenth century. Free blacks were former slaves or the children of former slaves set free by their owners. Among the Affranchis the mulattos were dominant both numerically and in terms of social status; they were the descendants of black women who had had relations with white planters. Due to a high number of excess white males in the colony many planters cohabited with black housekeepers or courtesans. Economically, many free blacks and mulattos caught up with the white middle class: free blacks and mulattos possessed, according to various sources, between one tenth and one third of all agricultural property and between 50,000 and 100,000 slaves. In the granting of civil and political rights, racial separation nevertheless remained the rule. This was set forth in the Code Noir laws of 1685. Mulattos were not allowed to hold any public office and were not allowed to enter skilled occupations or receive honors; they were required to sit in the segregated seats reserved for them in theaters and in churches.

By far the largest social class in Saint-Domingue society was composed of the black slaves. Their number rose in the course of the eighteenth century to around 450,000 and thus surpassed the combined population of the whites, the free blacks, and the mulattos many times over. Their relationship to the slaveowning classes was therefore not only characterized by extreme exploitation under the harshest working conditions, but also by fear on the part of slave owners. On the isolated plantations the planter families often faced as many as 200–300 slaves. Their fear of delinquencies led them to impose ever harsher discipline: for even the slightest offenses against the whites' established order, punishments of indescribable cruelty were meted out.

The blacks of Saint-Domingue had been kidnapped from different regions of Africa – from Senegal to Mozambique. The largest group among them came from the west coast of central Africa (today, the Congo and Angola); the second largest group came from the Gulf of Benin (today, Nigeria, Cameroon, and Benin). At the time of the revolution, 60–70 percent of the black slaves in Saint-Domingue had been born in Africa. They brought with them their cultural heritage into the colonial society of Saint-Domingue. Their strong affiliations to their respective ethnic groups and communities shaped the development of new patterns of cultural expression and the creation of new social relations – and also shaped the patterns of the slaves' resistance against the colonists. Quite a few of them could even draw upon previous military experience from the civil war of 1779 to 1788 in the kingdom of the Congo.

Colonial relations were designed so as to promote the industrialization of the mother country while preventing industrialization of the colony. Thus the colonial economy remained dependent and unstable. The market for the products of the colony remained artificially limited; conversely, the colonial economy was dependent upon the monopoly of French importers, leading to inflated prices for imported goods. French merchants were the profiteers; the planters of Saint-Domingue were the losers.

The slave economy made possible a significant quantitative advance in the development of productive forces, but proved an obstacle to qualitative innovation. For lack of purchasing power, no market could develop in the colonies. Therefore, there could be no realization of capital. Rather than a free and equal contract between workers and employers, the former were totally at the disposal of the latter. For this reason a flexible commitment of productive labor to the demands of developing productive forces was not possible. On the contrary, to prevent a mass exodus of the slave labor force out of the system, a large amount of effort was of necessity dedicated to repression.

The society of Saint-Domingue had developed a multiplicity of class and racial contradictions. The dominant class of big merchants and large-scale sugar planters – who as Absentéistes profited from the colonial system of trade although they did not live in Saint-Domingue – was in conflict with the so-called Créoles: the small, local planters whose dissatisfaction with the colonial system often brought them into conflict with the mother country. From 1750 an increase in coffee exports led to the rise of the free blacks and the mulattos. They formed an economically potent social stratum that was nevertheless excluded from political participation. They did not have the same legal rights as whites and were subject to extensive restrictions. The whites insisted all the more assiduously on these restrictions the more they felt threatened by the economic progress of the free blacks and mulattos.

Within this society, which was doubly stratified along class and racial lines, the petits blancs had an ambivalent role: as whites they were socially privileged in comparison to the mulattos and free blacks, even when the latter were large landowners. But as proletarians or small farmers, they found themselves in a situation of structural dependence and economic precariousness.

The most obvious contradiction – and simultaneously the explosive element in this social formation – was the situation of the slaves whose unpaid labor created the wealth that the other social strata and groups competed among themselves to distribute, while the slaves were themselves excluded from the distribution of this wealth.

The French Revolution – with its aspiration of achieving freedom, equality, and fraternity – resonated in Saint-Domingue in diverse and contradictory ways. It was the signal that brought the social contradictions of the slave-owning society to a crisis of violent conflict and thus ended the Ancien Régime in the colony of Saint-Domingue as well as in the mother country.

Haitian Revolution and independence, 1801–1804

Alexander King

In 1801 Toussaint Louverture consolidated his power over Saint-Domingue, reaching the zenith of his military and political career. Formally, however, Saint-Domingue continued to be a French colony, but the constitution from July 8, 1801 granted him unfettered power in every political realm. The military and political ranks subordinated to him were placed with followers, mainly nouveaux libres. The leaders of the anciens libres, especially André Rigaud and Alexandre Pétion, resided in French exile. For the first time since 1697 the island was unified under a single reign.

Meanwhile, in France, Napoléon Bonaparte attained overarching power. Born in 1769 in Corsica, Napoléon had climbed the social ladder in the army during the French Revolution. At the end of 1799 he spearheaded a coup d'état and as the first consul gained far-reaching authority with the constitution of December 25, 1799. His military successes during the Second Coalition War and the resulting peace treaty with Austria (February 9, 1800), Russia (October 8, 1801), and Great Britain (March 25, 1802) strengthened his popularity. Moreover, following a successful plebiscite in 1802, he was granted the title of consul for life, furthering his determination to turn to the problem of France's overseas possessions, especially Saint-Domingue.

Although Toussaint Louverture never openly aimed at independence, Napoléon viewed the self-made constitution of Saint-Domingue as a challenge to France's reign over the colony. For Napoléon, it was unacceptable that the constitution granted Toussaint the title of governor for a lifetime and provided him with overarching power, as well as the close economic cooperation with Great Britain and the United States. He also disliked the fact that Toussaint Louverture defied the orders of the French representatives by subjugating the Eastern part of the island. Napoléon aspired to reverse the separation of Saint-Domingue and to win back control of the colony. At the same time, he approved of Toussaint's skills in politically and economically stabilizing the colony, commanding a huge and disciplined force, and striking back against France's enemies in Saint-Domingue.

This situation offered Napoléon two scenarios for action. He could cooperate with Toussaint Louverture and accredit him as civil and military leader, and, in a countermove, introduce a French trade monopoly and the taxation of plantations led by black officers. Or he could recapture the island, deport the black officers, and enforce the ownership of the white planters. Napoléon anticipated that the second scenario would lead to enduring conflict in the colony and possibly to a sustained weakening of France, but he finally opted for the latter. He prepared a military expedition on October 23, 1801, entrusting its leadership to his brother-in-law General Leclerc, who at the same time became supreme commander and first magistrate of the colony. On November 18, 1801 Napoléon informed Toussaint Louverture in a letter about the forthcoming arrival of the expedition.

Leclerc was ordered to crush and disarm the black insurgents. He ordered Toussaint Louverture's arrest, his deportation to France, and the restoration of property rights to the white planters. The goal was to cooperate with the mulatto leaders and to reintroduce French trade monopoly. The reintroduction of slavery was ordered explicitly, yet unofficially. However, Blancpain (2004) suggests that from the very beginning of the expedition the reintroduction of slavery was on its secret agenda. A strengthened planter lobby had great reach: Josephine Beauharnais, since 1796 wife to Napoléon, originated from a rich Creole planter family from the Caribbean island of Martinique and was among the advocates of slavery.

At the same time, French traders complained about the economic loss caused by the removal of the Exclusif and the clear-cut orientation of the colony's trade politics towards Great Britain and the United States. In addition, Napoléon may have been further motivated to act militarily due to recent developments in international relations: in the United States, with the change from President John Adams to his successor, Thomas Jefferson (he took office in March 1801), the attitude towards Saint-Domingue also changed. Jefferson, a Southerner, was himself an advocate of slavery and, in contrast to his predecessor, opposed the independence of Saint-Domingue. It was not expected that he would voice any dissent against the military expedition. Great Britain, after signing a temporary peace treaty with France on October 18, 1801, also took a neutral position.

Starting on December 14, 1801, 73 armadas with 30,000 soldiers were shipped to Saint-Domingue, among them 6,000 Swiss, German, and Polish soldiers. A Dutch marine division also took part in the expedition. Furthermore, in the Spanish part of Saint-Domingue 3,000 Spanish militias were recruited. Among those who arrived with the expedition were the leaders of the anciens libres André Rigaud and Alexandre Pétion. Pétion, born in 1770 in Port-au-Prince to a French soldier and a mulatto, had gained honors when serving during the war against the British, but later during the conflict between Toussaint and Rigaud took the side of the latter, left Toussaint's army, and joined the army of the South. After the defeat, together with Rigaud and other mulatto leaders, he left for French exile.

By the end of January 1802 the French armadas gathered at the Samaná peninsula in the Eastern part of the island. From there they headed towards the coastal towns of Fort-Dauphin, Cap Français, Port-au-Prince, and Santo Domingo. Toussaint had given orders to burn these towns; Henri Christophe, the commander of Cap Français, followed the order and destroyed his town before he handed it over to Leclerc and his troops. Other important towns, however, were voluntarily handed over to the French (Santo Domingo and Santiago in the East, Jérémie and Cayes in the South), or they fell after little resistance, like the capital Port-au-Prince.

Following the defeat of the coastal regions, resistance rose in the heartland, with a focus on Canton Louverture and the mountainous areas bordering to the South. When the message of the arrival of the expedition arrived, Toussaint had restocked his colonial army to 20,000 men for the general mobilization struggle. Christophe held the command of the Northern Division consisting of 4,800 soldiers; Dessalines led the Western Division with 11,000 soldiers, Clervaux the Eastern Division with 4,200 men. The colonial army was able to inflict huge losses on the expedition. Nevertheless, it succumbed in the decisive battles of Ravine à Couleuvres, east of Gonaïves, on February 23, 1802, and of Crête-à-Pierrot at Artibonite, from March 4–24, 1802.

On April 26, 1802 Christophe turned himself over with 1,000 soldiers and several localities, among those Acul-du-Nord, Dondon, Grande-Rivière-du-Nord, and Sainte Suzanne. Hence, the complete Northern frontline between the Plaine-du-Nord and the Canton Louverture fell to Leclerc. Toussaint Louverture, too, finally handed himself over on May 6, 1802. He first withdrew to his estate near Ennery, but he stayed in close contact with his followers in order to lead a new offensive against the expedition. On June 7, 1802 Leclerc, in the know about these moves, ordered Toussaint's arrest. Toussaint was finally deported to France and on August 23, 1802 interned in the prison of Joux in the Jura mountain range. There he died only half a year later, on April 7, 1803.

Notwithstanding the defeat of Crête-à-Pierrot and Toussaint's deportation, the drive for freedom of the blacks against the expedition was not broken. Resistance was carried on by a third party in the War of Independence, the marrons and parts of the nouveaux libres, a federation of militias fighting in changing alliances, sometimes together with the French against the black army, then on the side of the black army against the expedition army. These militias did not aim at national independence of the colony, but opposed the state model as drafted by Toussaint Louverture. Their notion of freedom focused on the right to live as independent farmers on their own parcels of land and to cultivate their land at their own cost and for their own benefit. Drawing support from black generals and officers they resisted the general disarmament carried out by the expedition troops.

However, the peace between the black generals and Leclerc was temporary. They were only linked in their opposition against the marrons and their alliance marked a short break for the armies to get ready for the decisive battle in the War of Independence. Following Toussaint's arrest and after the message arrived in Saint-Domingue concerning the reintroduction of slavery in Guadeloupe (July 16, 1802), resistance intensified, joined by Dessalines, Henri Christophe, and Alexandre Pétion. The insurgency extended from the North to the South. All military commanders, mulattos and blacks, anciens libres and nouveaux libres, allied themselves for the final joint battle against the expedition army as well as against the militias of the marrons. In an assembly in May 1803 they elected Jean-Jacques Dessalines as leader.

In the meantime, yellow fever became the most brutal enemy of the European troops: 15,000 men are believed to have fallen victim to the fever, among them Leclerc himself on November 2, 1802. Thus decimated and confronted with the fierce and determined resistance of the blacks and mulattos under their most competent military commanders, the military fate of the expedition worsened. Under the command of Leclerc's successor, Comte de Rochambeau, and despite his cruel and pitiless acts, the expedition troops rapidly lost significant positions and finally only held on to Cap Français. The final battle of this war – now a real war of independence – took place on November 18, 1803 in Vertière, a suburb of Cap Français. With the defeat of the expedition troops, Cap Français fell and thus Napoléon's first military reverse did not occur in Europe, but in the Caribbean.

Of the 43,000 soldiers sent to Saint-Domingue, only 7,000 survived. In addition to the 36,000 soldiers killed in the war or by yellow fever, 20,000 more civilian casualties were counted among the French. Roughly 100,000 dead were counted among the local population. This was the price paid for independence, proclaimed on January 1, 1804 in Gonaïves by Jean-Jacques Dessalines, the leader of the successful troops in Vertière.

Hamas: origins and development

Lawrence Davidson

Origins

Hamas was founded in 1987, soon after the outbreak of the first Intifada, or uprising, against Israeli occupation, in Palestine. Its founders were educated professionals residing in the Gaza Strip. All of them, led by the charismatic Shaykh Ahmad Yasin, were members of the Society of Muslim Brothers and dedicated to reviving Muslim values and piety within their community. They also believed that Palestine should eventually become a Muslim state.

Shaykh Yasin had proven himself a dynamic and talented organizer. In 1973 he established the Islamic Center in Gaza city and quickly made it the hub of an Islamist infrastructure that delivered religious, social, medical, educational, and economic programs to tens of thousands of people. Affiliated programs were established in the West Bank. Soon the center was one of the most influential institutions in the Occupied Territories and, slowly but surely, it was injecting a religious point of view into Palestinian national consciousness. By the 1980s the talent and organizational potential necessary for an Islamic fundamentalist mass movement existed in Palestine.

In 1983, in response to the activities of the Israeli occupation forces, Yasin established a paramilitary organization called the al-Qassam regiments. It was authorized to use violence against selected Israeli targets as well as Palestinian collaborators. Later, when Hamas was founded, both the regiments and charitable efforts were folded into the new organization. That same year Yasin was arrested by the Israeli authorities and charged with belonging to a group hostile to Israel. He never denied the charge. Ten months later he was released as part of a prisoner exchange.

It was the spontaneous outbreak of the Intifada in 1987 that served as the catalyst for Yasin and his companions to form Hamas as an organization designed, in part, to sustain the uprising. Hamas assumed a leadership posture in the Intifada by encouraging the popular demonstrations and swelling the ranks of the demonstrators. Beyond these immediate actions, Hamas was designed to begin the process of competing politically with Palestine's secular parties. It also sought to work out its own strategy for the war for liberation against Israeli occupation. As the Hamas activist Mahmud al-Zahar has put it, Hamas aims at once to "change the corrupted system" of governance (the Fattah-controlled Palestine National Authority or PNA) and "force the Israelis to abandon the occupation."

Yasin organized Hamas to operate in a decentralized fashion. This was essential given the frequent arrests of Hamas principals by the Israeli authorities. Decisions were, and continue to be, taken by consultative councils whose members can be readily replaced from second and third tier cadres. In this way the organization has been able to repeatedly reconstruct its leadership throughout the Occupied Territories. Yasin also established Hamas offices outside of Palestine, for instance in Damascus and Amman, and principals from these sites also are part of the organization's leadership structure.

Hamas has become very popular throughout the Occupied Territories. The population sees it as a successful national defense organization and it is also responsible for an array of charitable activities which the PNA cannot provide. In addition, Hamas has associated the fight for national salvation with the religious drive for personal salvation. It takes as its rather wordy motto the following phrase: "Allah is the goal, the Prophet is the model, the Quran is the constitution, jihad is the path, and death on God's path is our most sublime aspiration." The promise of personal salvation through death in the cause of national liberation is something the secular resistance groups cannot offer. And, since the odds are great that death will come to one in the struggle against a vastly superior enemy, fighting under the banner of Hamas brings a deep sense of comfort and determination. As Yasin said, "When all doors are sealed, Allah opens a gate."

What Hamas Wants

Hamas' success in becoming a leading participant in the first Intifada and those uprisings that followed, along with its allied social services programs, transformed the organization into a major political contender for control of the Palestine National Authority. Thus, one must consider what Hamas wants in relation to Palestinian governance as well as in relation to Israel.

What Hamas wants the PNA to do is adopt its Islamic program. However, the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), while controlled by Fattah, had always advocated a secular state. Indeed, until it decided to participate in country-wide elections in 2006, Hamas considered the whole idea of a Palestinian national government premature. The organization's position was that there needed to be liberated territory before the formation of such a government was warranted. Therefore, it opposed nationwide elections in the Occupied Territories, viewing them as an Israeli tactic to distract world attention from the process of colonial expansion. Nonetheless, by 2005 Hamas was forced, by virtue of its very success, to alter its position on elections. By that time its base was very large and its supporters were urging it to take power. Its growing popularity meant that Hamas had reached a point where it would have done the organization's reputation more harm than good to remain aloof from national governance.

When it comes to the struggle against Israel, Hamas' position has also evolved. In the long term it seeks the destruction of the Zionist state. Therefore, Hamas opposed the "peace process" to which the PLO, again controlled by Fattah, committed itself in the early 1990s. Negotiations with Israel were worse than a waste of time because, as a Hamas pamphlet put it, they were designed to "defeat the will of our people in the Occupied Territories, tranquilize the Muslim Arab people around us, and remove them from the scene of the battle." Yasin told the Palestinians that "our enemy will not concede anything to us except by force." Until the early 2000s Hamas held to this position consistently. Yet once more, it was success in building a mass base that forced the leadership to look for maneuvering room in its position. As an Islamic mass movement it has to remain true to its religious doctrines, but also remain responsive to its supporters' desires. Most Palestinians, including those who favor Hamas, strongly desire final status negotiations with the Israelis. This creates a dilemma for Hamas. Given that Israel is dedicated to the preservation and expansion of a Jewish state, and Hamas to the establishment of a Muslim state in Palestine, there would seem to be no common ground for negotiations.

By 2005, however, Hamas had publically foreseen the possibility of eventual talks with Israel. The organization's prime minister, Ismail Haniya, has said that "If Israel withdraws to the 1967 borders" and "recognizes Palestinian rights" then Hamas could negotiate "peace in stages." This means that the organization would leave to "future generations" the question of the ultimate destruction of the Zionist state. This is diplomatic maneuvering that should be taken seriously. The leaders of Hamas have a clear conception of present power relationships. It was in recognition of Israel's ability to ratchet up the hardships suffered by the Palestinians that Hamas agreed to what amounted to a unilateral ceasefire in March 2005. The organization's victory at the polls in January 2006 only deepens its dilemma in relation to Israel. How does it continue to wage war on an enemy that can cause immense suffering to the people Hamas must now govern? This being said, one should not underestimate Hamas' determination to resist Israeli occupation. Hamas will not accept the western assertion that for it to be a proper government it must renounce violent resistance to Israel. To do so would, in the minds of the Hamas leadership, mean renouncing the struggle for independence. Thus Ismail Haniya has declared, "Our weapons are not up for discussion. They are non-negotiable." This should not strike the western observer as unreasonable. If Hamas did renounce violence it would be the only governing power in the world to have embraced pacifism in the face of invasion and occupation.

The Issue of Tactics

History is replete with people of all religions who believed that their cause came from God. In many cases these people ended up losing touch with humane "rules of engagement." The men of Hamas certainly experienced a variation on this theme. They did not, and still do not, believe that those who "fight in God's path" and who "suffer under the yoke of intruding oppressive occupation" have any obligation to struggle according to the rules set down by others. Thus, on occasion, Hamas has resorted to acts of terrorism.

If the western observer cares to understand the more extreme aspects of Palestinian resistance he or she must honestly consider the "facts on the ground." Keep in mind that what brought about the founding of Hamas was the same thing that brought about the Intifada, and that is the material conditions under which the Palestinians have lived and continue to live. Those conditions can be found documented in United Nations reports, the publications of numerous human rights organizations, and even the annual country reports of the US State Department. The public record they present goes like this: the ongoing Israeli colonization of the West Bank and East Jerusalem along with the conditions imposed upon the Gaza Strip has pushed a Palestinian population of some two and a half million people into canton-like enclaves. Israeli policies regulating movement into and out of these enclaves have reduced the general mobility of the Palestinians and commerce has suffered. A majority of the population live at or below the poverty level. Other Israeli policies and practices have reduced Palestinian access to healthcare and education. Frequent community wide curfews keep the populations of whole towns and cities indoors, with only brief breaks, for weeks at a time. Access to water supplies for the Palestinians is limited. Frequent land confiscations lead to the destruction of the livelihoods of increasing numbers of the rural population.

The Israeli government and Zionist spokespersons have defended these policies in the name of Israeli security and have offered historical and religious arguments to justify taking large tracts of land in the Occupied Territories. Whether one agrees or disagrees with their arguments does not speak to the issue laid forth here. The immediate point is one of simple historical reality. If you put roughly two and a half million people of whatever religion or nationality in a series of boxes and then proceed to reduce their society to its primitive basics, you are going to get resistance that will sometimes take violent form. An important source of this kind of resistance encountered by Israel comes from Hamas.

From the point of view of the Palestinians, the policies of forced confinement and societal destruction constitute massive state terrorism on the part of Israel. Israel dismisses this judgment and has been able to keep western media descriptions of their behavior toward the Palestinians in line with the Jewish state's own perceptions of the situation. Yet western opinion has little to do with the tactical decisions of Hamas and other resistance organizations. They do not play to a western audience. Palestinian resisters have used an array of tactics, including non-violent ones, about which the western media report little. They have also carried out suicide bombings on civilian targets which the western media report fully. What is not reported at all is that, with the one difference of the perpetrator committing suicide, the terror tactics of the Palestinians have a multitude of historical precedents, some recent ones being found in the behavior of resistance movements during World War II, as well as in the tactics of Zionist organizations such as the Irgun and Stern gang.

In words that echo the French resistance under the Nazis and the Zionists under the British, the Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal asserts: "We live under occupation and we don't have the traditional tools of warfare." Therefore, Hamas feels that it must pursue other options. The severity of the options chosen is dictated by Israeli behavior. For Hamas, Palestinian terror is a response to the terror of the occupier. The strategic goal is to exact such a cost on Israel that it will give up the occupation. Western observers might conclude that this makes Hamas an uncivilized organization. However, as long as the Israelis do not adhere to the rules set forth by the fourth Geneva Convention, Hamas (and most other Palestinians) will dismiss western demands for the end of Palestinian terrorism as hypocrisy.

In January 2006 a combination of military prowess and social accomplishment brought electoral victory to Hamas. This achievement was helped along by the fact that many Palestinians viewed the Fattah-run Palestine National Authority as corrupt and ineffective. It has been reported that Hamas' leaders were taken aback by their victory. They now controlled the Palestine National Authority (except for the office of the president, which continued to be held by the Fattah leader Mahmoud Abbas) and were required to confront the problem of satisfying a population yearning for stability and economic well-being while carrying on a war against an enemy that has shown itself willing to inflict great hardship on the Palestinians.

Before Hamas could resolve their dispute with the Israelis, the United States government and the European Union moved to cut off all material and financial assistance to the new Hamas government. In essence they sought to punish the Palestinians for the democratic choice they made in a free and fair election. Simultaneously, the US and Israel began to support militant elements within Fattah that sought to use their militia forces against the elected Hamas government. In this they found a cooperative partner in the PNA President, Mahmoud Abbas. In June 2007 things came to a head when Hamas successfully moved to expel the subversive Fattah elements from the Gaza Strip. Abbas then declared the Hamas government "illegal" and, with Israel's help, overthrew its government representatives in the West Bank. Palestine, under siege in Gaza and occupation in the West Bank, now had two opposed movements claiming the loyalty of its people.

Hampton, Fred (1948–1969)

Roderick Bush

On December 4, 1969, the Chicago police raided the apartment of Fred Hampton, chairman of the Illinois Black Panther Party (BPP), killing Hampton and Mark Clark. With the assistance of a paid FBI informant, William O'Neal, the FBI had amassed a 12-volume, 4,000-page file on Hampton. This ended the life of one of the most promising young leaders of the 1960s. It is crucial to understand the larger context in which this action was taken.

The Black Panthers believed that black communities could develop by utilizing the strengths of the people themselves. They did not translate the struggle for self-reliance as a struggle for autarchy. Not only did they utilize external forces, they were also able to inspire people to undertake struggles in their own interests. Thus they were able to get wealthy liberals such as Leonard Bernstein to assist them in raising funds, and develop alliances with organizations such as the Puerto Rican Young Lords in Chicago, the Chicano Brown Berets, the white working-class Young Patriots who had moved from Appalachia to the northside of Chicago, and the Chinese American Red Guards.

One of the most remarkable of the young leaders of the BPP was Fred Hampton, leader of the Maywood, Illinois NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People).

Known in Maywood as a remarkable young man, Hampton is said to have defused a potential riot by leading 500 angry youth on a non-violent march to protest a whites-only swimming pool. When Hampton assumed leadership of the youth section of the Maywood NAACP, he increased the membership from 17 to 700, drawing the attention of the FBI who began to monitor his activities via informants and wiretaps (Austin 2006: 197).

Lennie Eggleston of the LA branch of the BPP met and talked to Hampton while on a speaking tour in Chicago. The black nationalist-leaning Hampton was persuaded that black people should define their own reality instead of simply reacting to the racism of the white working class. In this way, a poor minority could use a strategy of class solidarity as a tool to unite the poor and revolutionize America (Rice 2003: 50).

In December 1968, FBI informant William O'Neal reported to his superiors that Hampton was on the verge of pulling off a merger between the BPP and the Black Stone Rangers, a south-side street gang with several thousand members. This merger would have doubled the size of the national BPP. The FBI sent anonymous letters to Black Stone Ranger leader Jeff Fort and BPP leader Hampton to create antagonism between them.

In November 1969 Hampton traveled to California to speak at UCLA and meet with BPP national leadership. They informed Hampton that he was being selected to serve on the Central Committee as chief of staff and main spokesperson for the national BPP (Churchill & Vander Wall 1988: 64–9). To prevent this enhancement of the BPP national leadership, FBI agents helped arrange an arms raid on Hampton's apartment, on the basis of information supplied by O'Neal about weapons located there. O'Neal had supplied them with a floor plan of the premises, showing the bed in which Hampton would be sleeping.

Hani, Chris (1942–1993)

Allison Drew

Born in Sabalele, Cofimvaba, in the former Transkei, South Africa, “Chris” Martin Tembisele Hani was the fifth of six children, three of whom died in infancy. His father was a migrant mine-worker and building worker, and his mother was engaged in subsistence farming.

As a child Hani was an eager student and an altar boy so committed to the Catholic Church that he hoped to become a priest; his father forbade this. In 1954 the apartheid government introduced Bantu Education; Hani’s anger at this initiative laid the foundation for his political activism. Three years later he joined the African National Congress (ANC) Youth League. He attended Matanzima Secondary School, Cala, and Lovedale Institute, Alice, matriculating in 1958. He studied at Fort Hare College between 1959 and 1961, coming into contact with Marxist ideas and graduating from Rhodes University in 1962 with a BA in Latin and English.

In 1961 Hani joined the South African Communist Party (SACP). The next year he joined Umkhonto we Sizwe (“Spear of the Nation” or MK) and left South Africa for military training in the Soviet Union. In 1967 he became a political commissar in the Luthuli Detachment of MK’s joint military campaign with the Zimbabwe People’s Revolutionary Army forces at Wankie. He narrowly escaped capture but was detained in Botswana for arms possession until late 1968, when he was deported to Zambia. In 1974 he joined the ANC’s national executive council. That same year he infiltrated into South Africa to build an underground network and then operated from Lesotho for seven years. The target of several assassination attempts, Hani left Lesotho for Lusaka, Zambia, in 1982. In 1987 he replaced veteran communist Joe Slovo as MK’s Chief of Staff.

Following the unbanning of the ANC and SACP in February 1990, Hani returned to South Africa, where he rapidly became popular amongst radicalized black youth. He became a member of the SACP’s central committee in July 1990 and replaced Slovo as SACP general secretary in December 1991, resigning as MK’s Chief of Staff to devote more time to the SACP. That December, the Convention for a Democratic South Africa (CODESA) was launched as a forum to negotiate a democratic transition. CODESA gave significant representation to the apartheid and bantustan parties, and the ANC was under pressure from its youth and radical wings not to sell out. Despite his own skepticism, Hani had agreed to the suspension of armed struggle to pave the way for negotiations. As an MK veteran and militant communist, Hani’s presence legitimized CODESA.

Hani was assassinated in front of his home in Dawn Park, Boksberg, by Polish anti-communist immigrant Janusz Walus. Hani was second only to Nelson Mandela in popularity amongst black South Africans, and his assassination almost derailed the negotiations. Walus and his accomplice Clive Derby-Lewis were sentenced to death for the murder; their sentences were commuted to life imprisonment following South Africa’s abolition of the death penalty.

Hardy, Thomas (1752–1832)

Victoria Arnold

Thomas Hardy was a leading figure in the French Revolution-inspired British Jacobin movement. He was a working man – a shoemaker by trade – who founded the London Corresponding Society (LCS), the first successful organizational attempt in England at bringing the working class into the political arena. The LCS was dedicated to promoting parliamentary reform, specifically universal manhood suffrage and annual parliaments, but it also included within it more radical currents that developed explicitly revolutionary agendas.

Hardy was born in Scotland, where he was brought up by his mother and maternal grandfather. His father, Walter Hardy, had drowned when Thomas was 8 years old. Hardy was schooled until the age of 10 and then trained in the cobbling trade, eventually moving to Glasgow to find work. In 1771 he abandoned shoemaking and worked briefly as a bricklayer, but in 1774 after a workplace accident in which one of his colleagues died, Hardy decided to return to his original trade and relocated to London. He found work as the foreman of a shoemaking shop and in 1781 married Lydia Priest. Together they had six children, none of whom survived past infancy.

In 1791 Hardy set himself up as a master bootmaker in Piccadilly, which despite early growing pains became a profitable business. At about the same time Hardy began to involve himself in radical politics, his interest having been aroused initially by reading Richard Price's Observations on Civil Liberty and the Justice and Policy of the War with America (1776). He also began to read pamphlets issued by the Society for Constitutional Information (SCI) calling for parliamentary reform and universal suffrage, which had a significant impact on the development of his political thought.

The reform movements of the era were, like the SCI, all solidly middle class in composition, but Hardy devised a plan for a reform society made up of and directed by working men like himself – a bold political innovation for the late eighteenth century. After reading Price's Discourse on the Love of Our Country (1789), he decided that a network of progressive-minded societies, all in contact with one another, was the best way to promote the cause of reform. In January 1792 Hardy's plans for a London Corresponding Society were approved at a public meeting he had called. Eight members joined and Hardy was elected both secretary and treasurer. By April 1792, LCS membership had increased to 70 and the society continued to grow thereafter.

Hardy quickly set about establishing links with other provincial reform societies and the SCI. The LCS also issued a number of public statements calling for political rights and social justice. Despite its insistence on the need for legal and constitutional methods in order to achieve change, the government regarded the politically radical LCS with suspicion, believing it to be in league with French revolutionaries. The publication by the LCS of a Congratulatory Address to the French Nation in September 1792 did little to quell the government's fears.

In April 1794 Hardy issued a letter to the SCI and likeminded provincial associations calling for a general convention to promote reform. In the context of recent French revolutionary experience, a "convention" could suggest the creation of a quasi-governmental body – an alternative parliament – that could challenge the legitimacy of the existing parliament. The government, convinced that radical societies would use the opportunity to plan revolution, took action against them and in May arrested Hardy and several other LCS and SCI members. Hardy was confined in the Tower until October 1794 when he stood trial on suspicion of treasonable practices. If found guilty, Hardy and his associates would have been hanged as traitors.

A few years later government prosecutors would perfect the art of rigging juries, but at the time of Hardy's trial London jurors tended to be independent-minded and not necessarily unsympathetic to political radicalism, so on November 5, 1794, Hardy was triumphantly acquitted. Exhausted by his ordeal, and devastated by the death of his wife while he had been imprisoned, Hardy stepped down as secretary of the LCS and ceased his political activism. He focused instead on rebuilding his business, which had fallen into ruin due to his incarceration, and set up another shop in Covent Garden. Despite a brief period of initial success, the business failed to prosper. Although he distanced himself from politics, Hardy remained in touch with his radical friends and continued to support parliamentary reform and allied social causes.

In 1815, in poor health and with his business failing, Hardy retired. By the early 1820s his savings had run out and he was forced to appeal to his friends for aid. The most radical MP of the era, Sir Francis Burdett, stepped forward and supported Hardy with a pension of £100 per annum. Hardy died on October 11, 1832, just four months after the passage of the 1832 Reform Act, which he welcomed as an important step toward more extensive parliamentary reform. His importance to the development of working-class political movements in Britain can be partially appreciated by the fact that his 1794 acquittal was celebrated with a commemorative dinner every year until 1842.

Harlem Renaissance

Michael Zeitler

The Harlem Renaissance, as identified, defined, and celebrated by Alain Locke in the preface to his 1925 anthology, The New Negro, was a consciousness-transforming political, aesthetic, and spiritual “Coming of Age” for black Americans. Cutting across the whole spectrum of culture and social thought, including literature, criticism, music, dance, theater, painting, and sculpture, the black artists and intellectuals of the Harlem Renaissance reconfigured black history, explored contemporary urban life, and experimented with new, culturally derived aesthetic forms. Its influence spread far beyond the borders of Harlem, impacting not only America and the English-speaking world, but all of the cultures of the African Diaspora. The Harlem Renaissance powerfully influenced Négritude writers such as Léopold Senghor and Aimé Césaire, and every aesthetic and political expression of pan-African ideology that would follow.

The Harlem Renaissance had its beginnings in the decade preceding World War I, as Harlem, centered around 135th Street and 5th Avenue, became the destination of choice for tens of thousands of blacks leaving the American South and the West Indies for better opportunities in the cities of the urban North. More than a seismic demographic shift, the Northern Migration was also a collective redefinition of what it meant to be a black American. “In the very process of being transplanted,” Alain Locke (1925) wrote of the movement north in his preface to The New Negro, “the Negro is becoming transformed . . . Negro life is seizing upon its first chances for group expression and self-determination.”

Among those first attracted to Harlem were members of what W. E. B. Du Bois had called the “Talented Tenth,” the vanguard of black writers, artists, intellectuals, and political leaders who would spearhead African Americans’ fight for political and economic justice. Harlem quickly became home to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the National Urban League (NUL), the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), The Crisis, Opportunity, Negro World, and The Messenger, edited by socialists A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen. Over the next 20 years, however, Harlem was to become more than a political center; this “New Negro,” as the literati of Harlem would proclaim themselves, would generate an explosion of artistic creativity and racially conscious expression in poetry, music, theater, dance, and the visual arts that would define its own political legacy and force Americans to view blacks in a new way.

From its beginnings, black political leaders like W. E. B. Du Bois and James Weldon Johnson understood the political implications of the growing artistic renaissance. In Johnson’s 1922 preface to The Book of American Negro Poetry, he emphasized the need to change white Americans’ “mental attitude” toward blacks, arguing that “nothing could do more to raise his status than a demonstration of intellectual parity by the Negro through the production of literature and art.” As editor of The Crisis, Du Bois eagerly embraced the new generation of writers and artists, hiring as literary editor Jessie Fauset, a Phi Beta Kappa graduate of Cornell University and one of the Renaissance’s most important novelists. In addition to its political coverage, The Crisis was soon publishing important poetry by Langston Hughes, Countee Cullen, and Claude McKay, and the artwork of Aaron Douglass. Not to be outdone, Opportunity, the journal of the NUL, offered a regular column by Cullen in addition to short stories, poetry, plays, and illustrations by up-and-coming black artists. Both publications sponsored literary prizes, award dinners, and all-star galas attended by celebrities, both black and white.

The embracing of the Harlem Renaissance by progressive whites continued a bond with black leadership that had been growing since the early days of the Niagara Movement and the founding of the NAACP. White publishing houses like Boni and Liveright, Knopf, Macmillan, Harper & Brothers, and Harcourt Brace eagerly brought out works by black authors, breaking down longstanding barriers between those writers and mainstream publication. Jean Toomer's novel Cane (Boni and Liveright, 1923) and Countee Cullen's book of verse Color (Harper & Brothers, 1925) were the first books of African American fiction and poetry published by major American publishing houses since the turn of the century. White social scientists like Franz Boas, writers like Eugene O'Neill, and musicians like George Gershwin discovered the Negro and black culture as both subject and inspiration. Sculptors and Cubist painters discovered the power in African ceremonial masks. White audiences flocked to concerts by Paul Robeson and Roland Hayes, to stage productions like Shuffle Along starring Josephine Baker and the music of Eubie Blake, to Harlem venues like the Apollo and Cotton Club to hear the jazz of Duke Ellington and Cab Calloway and entertainers like Bessie Smith and Ethel Waters. White patrons such as the novelist Carl Van Vechten, whose controversial bestseller Nigger Heaven (1926) sensationalized the wild side of Harlem night life, Fannie Hurst, and Charlotte Osgood Mason encouraged and financially supported a number of black writers, including Langston Hughes, Claude McKay, and Zora Neale Hurston. To the bohemian literary left of Greenwich Village, the art of the Harlem Renaissance offered an exuberant alternative to the complacent "normalcy" of post-World War I America. "Harlem," in Langston Hughes's phrase from The Big Sea (1940), "was in vogue."

Although the poets and novelists of the Renaissance shared a strong sense of racial pride and commitment to the struggle for economic opportunity and social equality, they were never limited to a particular literary style. While Langston Hughes's verse, for example, owes much to Walt Whitman and Carl Sandberg in its democratic embracing of the lives and idioms of everyday Americans, poems like "Jazzonia," "Dream Variations," and "The Weary Blues" also incorporate the syncopated rhythms of jazz and verbal patterns of the 12-bar blues to evoke the sights and sounds of Harlem night life. Poets like Claude McKay and Countee Cullen, on the other hand, mastered traditional European forms such as the sonnet to explore the black experience. McKay's "If We Must Die" (1919) heroically responds to the anti-black riots that swept across America after World War I: "Like men we'll face the murderous, cowardly pack / Pressed to the wall, dying, but fighting back." Cullen's "Yet Do I Marvel" (1925) confronts the black artist's alienation and outsider status; "Yet do I marvel at this curious thing / To make a poet black, and bid him sing!"

Similar stylistic variety exists among the fiction writers of the period. Jessie Fauset's Plum Bun (1928) and Nella Larsen's Quicksand (1928) and Passing (1929), while staying within traditional novelistic forms, opened up new territory in their psychological depiction of educated, middle-class African American women. In contrast, Zora Neale Hurston's Jonah's Gourd Vine (1934) and Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937) drew heavily on the idioms, music forms, and folklore of the rural South. More modernist and experimental than either, Jean Toomer's Cane impressionistically combined prose, poetry, and drama to connect the deep racial memories of the rural South still alive in the urban North.

Differences in style and subject were never just aesthetic or just generational. By 1926, the political aims and ideology of the NAACP officialdom were, as often as not, at odds with the creative impulses of the writers they had once showcased in The Crisis. Outraged by what he felt was an uncritical acceptance by both blacks and whites of the stereotypical images of blacks as uneducated criminals, drug pushers, prostitutes, gamblers, and clowns that populated white novelist Carl Van Vechten's Nigger Heaven, W. E. B. Du Bois used The Crisis as a pulpit to denounce the direction the New Negro writers were going. He bitterly attacked not only Van Vechten's novel as a "slap in the face" (Lewis 1994) but McKay's Home to Harlem as well. He hosted a symposium on "The Negro in Art: How Shall He Be Portrayed?" and argued in "The Criteria of Negro Art" that black artists were politically regressive and irresponsible in choosing the underside of Negro life for their subject rather than uplifting stories of struggle and resistance. “All art is propaganda,” he declared. “I do not give a damn for art that is not propaganda” (Lewis 1994). Although the ideological split would remain, few writers went along with Du Bois’s dictum.

By the mid-1930s, the Harlem Renaissance was in decline. Unemployment reached 50 percent in Harlem in 1932. The Great Depression also meant fewer publishers interested in black authors, fewer recording contracts for black musicians, and fewer patrons for black artists. The end of Prohibition in 1933 opened other venues for the white patrons of Harlem night life. As the economic crisis worsened, many of the leading figures of the Renaissance turned increasingly to Marxist aesthetics and the militancy of the Communist Party. On March 19, 1935, Harlem erupted in rioting, resulting in three deaths and over two million dollars’ worth of property damage. A multiracial Mayor’s Commission headed by African American sociologist E. Franklin Frazer attributed the rioting to its root causes in job discrimination, segregation, and police brutality; the riots, more than anything else, symbolized the waning of that optimism, vitality, and creativity that had fueled the Harlem Renaissance. In its wake, many key figures of the movement left Harlem, either for black universities in the South, like Du Bois and James Weldon Johnson, or following Paul Robeson, Langston Hughes, Josephine Baker, and Claude McKay for the increased tolerance of Europe. Nevertheless, the Harlem Renaissance, in its exploration of a new racial consciousness, successfully redefined how America, the world, and blacks themselves understood the African American experience. By doing so, it set the stage for the progress in civil rights that would be its most enduring political legacy.

Harris, Charles (1896–1939)

Wessel P. Visser

Charles Harris, a white unionist of Jewish descent, began to work in the mining industry in 1914 as a developer, including at the Randfontein Estates, Luipaardsvlei, and Robinson Deep gold mines. He was involved with the South African Mineworkers’ Union (SAMWU), and served on the executive of the South African Industrial Federation alongside figures like Archie Crawford. After the 1922 Rand Revolt, he was blacklisted on the mines for four years.

Harris subsequently rose quickly in SAMWU, becoming its general-secretary. There were allegations of irregularities during his election, and a great deal of controversy and dissatisfaction with his management style throughout his tenure. He forged the office of general-secretary into a powerful and almost untouchable position of authority, virtually becoming dictator of SAMWU. Among the methods used were irregular measures to alter the union’s constitution, the falsification of minutes, rigged elections, and, in several cases, violence against dissidents.

The Harris administration was dogged by rumors of gross mismanagement and by widespread corruption. While the gold mines boomed and workloads increased in the 1930s and early 1940s, real wages for many whites on the mines remained static or declined. Harris was insulated from rising dissatisfaction in the ranks by his autocracy and SAMWU’s shop agreement with the Chamber of Mines from 1937: acting harshly against opponents and unofficial actions, the Harris administration was increasingly regarded as disciplining the white workers on behalf of the mine owners.

The union was also afflicted by ethnic tensions. By the 1930s, most members were Afrikaners, many supporters of the Afrikaner nationalist National Party. Harris was widely regarded as pro-English and as a supporter of the predominantly English South African Labor Party. National Party-supporting factions in the unions like the Afrikaner Bond van Mynwerkers (Afrikaner League of Mineworkers), followed by the Herformingsorganisasie (Reformers' Organization), were established: championing members' grievances, and led by figures like Daan Ellis, they aimed at ousting Harris.

The struggle in SAMWU took a dramatic turn when, on Saturday June 15, 1939, a young Afrikaner miner from Springs called Jacob Moller Hugo shot and killed Charles Harris opposite the SAMWU offices in Johannesburg. Some sources suggested Hugo committed the murder under the influence of the Reformers' Organization, but the court found no evidence: considering Hugo mentally disturbed, it sentenced him to life. The new general-secretary, Bertie Broderick, ran the union in much the same way as his predecessor, and it was only after the National Party's 1948 election victory that the Reformers finally managed to capture SAMWU; the newly installed apartheid government also released Hugo from jail.

Hasan al-Banna (1906–1949) and the Muslim Brotherhood

Lawrence Davidson

Hasan al-Banna was the founder and first leader of Egypt's Society of the Muslim Brothers. As such he stands as a model for many subsequent Islamic fundamentalist leaders. He was born in the Egyptian delta town of Mahmudiya in October 1906. As a youth, al-Banna went to lay schools but also joined a series of religious societies, the most important of which was the Hasafiya Sufi order. His early upbringing oriented him toward an active interest in and concern for the community's welfare, which he saw in Muslim religious terms.

In 1923 al-Banna left home for Cairo, where he entered Dar al-Ulum, Egypt's teacher training college. While in Cairo he personally witnessed the process of transformation Egypt was undergoing as western influences permeated the local culture and affected the lifestyles of the country's middle and upper classes. By the first half of the twentieth century Egypt suffered from many of the problems that beset the Muslim world. The country remained subject to British imperial control. From behind the scenes, a British high commissioner set the parameters of official action for Egypt's constitutional monarchy. With imperial control came a quickening of an ongoing westernization of major institutions. Civil law, for example, increasingly displaced Shariah or Muslim religious law, and secular education competed with the religiously oriented mosque schools. Trade had long been directed toward Europe, and a wealthy indigenous upper class had grown up with western tastes and values. This alien point of view spread, as all things European were touted as modern, progressive, and superior. His experiences in Cairo convinced al-Banna that Egypt was in a morally weak social condition and this was allowing it to be drawn away from the Islamic traditions he so valued by a process of westernization.

After graduation from Dar al-Ulum, al-Banna was assigned as an instructor in Arabic at the primary school in Ismailiya, the town along the Suez Canal which was also the site of the Suez Canal Company's headquarters. Here he experienced at first hand the racism and foreign dominance that went with British imperialism. It was this collective experience that finally led al-Banna to found the Society of the Muslim Brothers in March 1928. Because al-Banna believed that the root cause of Egypt's (and generally the Muslim world's) problems was its deviation from a true Islamic community, the goal of his society was to bring Egypt's Muslim population back to an accurate understanding and practice of Islam. This meant a return to traditional Muslim values and assuring that the government ruled on the basis of Muslim norms.

The new organization faced many challenges, some of which were suggested by al-Banna's critique of Egyptian society. British colonialism, of course, had to be fought against and eventually eliminated. But the corruption of Egyptian institutions by British rule compounded the problem of organizing political resistance. For instance, the major political parties (such as the large Wafd Party) within the parliamentary political structure encouraged by the British had, in al-Banna's view, been captured by a western worldview. He associated this worldview with the qualities of radical individualism, gender equality, class conflict, materialism, and atheism. While many of these Egyptian political parties stood for independence, their secular and western orientation did not allow them to address the country's cultural alienation or socioeconomic woes. Their platforms had little or no Islamic content. Thus, argued al-Banna, Egypt possessed a pseudo-democracy that was only leading the country away from its Islamic traditions and duties of piety, altruism, community fellowship, strong family orientation, domestic roles for women, and social justice. Similarly, Egypt's western law codes had "no relation to its citizens and does not spring from their hearts." Just so, Egyptian capitalism, as it had evolved under the influence of western-dominated trade, served only to exploit the land and the peasants. It entailed no acknowledgment of the Muslim belief that wealth comes from God and requires the well-to-do to have a sense of obligation to serve the community.

What sort of future did al-Banna and his young organization offer in the place of this dismal present? As with all Islamic fundamentalists, the Muslim Brothers drew inspiration from the past. As the Brothers interpreted it, the initial period of Muslim rule – the time of Muhammad's rule at Medina followed by the first four Caliphs – set forth the outlines of ideal government. In that period the Caliph was elected by the community, which therefore represented the source of the ruler's authority. Those people elected were pious men well versed in Islamic law. Tax monies were devoted to community needs, and a sense of religious brotherhood prevailed. That the Muslims had fallen from this state of governmental grace was due to the mistakes and sins committed by the Umayyad dynasty and other successor regimes following the first four "rightly guided" Caliphs. After them, the Caliphate was transformed into a hereditary kingship, factionalism replaced Muslim solidarity, and greed and materialism prevailed. Eventually, these conditions so weakened the Islamic community as to allow foreign invasion to occur. The latest manifestation of this decline was modern western colonialism.

If the decay and disintegration of the Muslim world were to be reversed, the original virtues, that is, the example set by the earliest Muslims, had somehow to be reinterpreted in light of twentieth-century realities. Hasan al-Banna and his followers did not espouse a return to the lifestyle of the seventh and eighth centuries. Rather, they sought to create a community governed by age-old Islamic ideals, which they thought were inherent in Muslim religious law and practice and also compatible with the technical and scientific advances of their day. Thus they sought an Islamic order at once old and new.

Central to al-Banna's vision of an Islamic order was the reinstatement of Muslim religious law and the concept of rule by consultation (shura). He often quoted the motto, "the Quran is our constitution." As long as the community was governed by these general principles, the particular form of government adopted was secondary. Outright dictatorship, however, was ruled out by al-Banna's interpretation of the nature of the early Muslim polity as being one where the ruler was elected, and by the Quranic injunction that governance was to involve consultation. From these principles, the Muslim Brothers saw the root of authority resting with the community of Muslim believers as a whole. A consultative body of learned and pious men, chosen by the community, would lead both the people and the ruler down the “straight path” and thus produce an environment conducive to a good Muslim life. Neither al-Banna nor the other thinkers produced by the Society of the Muslim Brothers went much beyond these general principles. Yet, in terms of the ideal, most Muslims do not believe that Islamic fundamentalist political thought leads only to some form of tyranny.

Hasan al-Banna would seek to convince the Egyptian people that this ideal Islamic order was possible. He did so by establishing a pattern of operation that proved so successful that the organization he founded grew with great rapidity. Energetically preaching in the mosques and coffee houses, he sought to win the support of “opinion makers” (the ulama, the shaykhs of the Sufi religious orders, the heads of leading families and clans, leaders of the various social and religious clubs and teachers). With their financial support, he organized community self-help projects such as the building of mosques, clinics, recreation halls, and small community businesses. All of this was organized around the message that improvement and contentment could come by pursuing goals based on altruistic Islamic values: charity, cooperation, generosity, the social responsibility that came with wealth. The message plus the achievement of specific community based projects tied theory to practice.

By the time World War II broke out in 1939, the Society of the Muslim Brothers was one of the most active and popular organizations in Egypt. Its membership crossed all class and occupational lines, encompassing laborers, peasants, artisans, merchants, educators, students, and civil servants. It ran its own press, youth groups, hospitals, and schools. It even ran athletic training and physical fitness groups.

As the society grew it took on an organizational form that could be called benevolent autocracy. This format did not quite match the consultative and elective ideal the society held for an Islamic state, but it did reflect the cultural norm in Egypt and much of the Arab Muslim world. That is, in its organization, the Society of the Muslim Brothers reflected the hierarchical arrangements that characterized family, economic, social, and political life in its culture. Al-Banna led the brotherhood with the title “General Guide.” All members took an oath of loyalty in which they swore to “have complete confidence” in the organization’s “leadership and to obey absolutely under all circumstances.” The day-to-day operation of the brotherhood was managed by a General Consultative Council of 12–15 members out of which a Secretary General was elected. He was the chief operations officer, but both he and the Consultative Council were responsible to the General Guide. The organization also had a Consultative Assembly that met annually to review the society’s status, and periodic mass meetings of members also were held. The ultimate power, however, rested with the General Guide.

Many administrative subdivisions evolved over time. A section devoted to the “propagation of the Message” ran missionary programs, trained speakers for public meetings, and oversaw publications and the general education of members. Other sections of the organization dealt specifically with peasants, laborers, students, and the professions. Each section shaped the message and activities of the brotherhood to the needs of its particular assigned constituency.

At the base of this organizational structure were local chapters or branches, each of which had its own “council of administration.” The branches broke down into “families” of five to ten members. Each member was encouraged to see himself connected to each other “family” member in a way that expressed the living out of Muslim values. They were to be mutually responsible for each other in good times and bad; they spent time together, and supported each other in avoiding such Islamic defined evils as gambling, drinking, usury, and adultery. More positively, they were to encourage each other in the establishment and maintenance of an Islamic home life (cultivation of individual virtue, devotion to wife and children, and restriction of women to domestic roles). Every “family” was to maintain a “cooperative treasury” contributed to by each member.

As has been suggested, al-Banna’s dedication of the society to the service of the community in the name of age-old Muslim values proved very successful. It will also be remembered that al-Banna saw Egypt’s problems as stemming in large part from a compromised and corrupted political environment that could only be redeemed through an “Islamic order.” Thus we have a very large organization with a growing and dedicated membership ultimately seeking the re-Islamization of Egyptian society. The political implications of this stand were undeniable. The Society of the Muslim Brothers could not help but eventually be drawn into politics.

The political cause over which the brotherhood most easily mobilized was anti-imperialism. Muslim brothers were called out repeatedly to demonstrate against the British role in Egypt. In the same vein, they actively supported the Palestinian cause against Zionist settlement. With the outbreak of World War II, the society advocated a status of non-belligerency for Egypt. This stance brought the organization into direct conflict with the pro-British government of the day and led to the first serious action against the society by the Egyptian state. In 1941 al-Banna and other leaders of the Muslim Brothers were temporarily arrested and the society's publications banned.

It was in these times of trouble that al-Banna took a fateful step. In late 1942 or early 1943 he created a section of the brotherhood called the secret apparatus. It was a clandestine group within the organization designed to defend the society from both the British and the government. But the secret apparatus also developed an aggressive, offensive capability of an extralegal nature, often expressed through hit-and-run attacks on British personnel and Egyptian police. The identity of those brothers belonging to the secret apparatus was unknown to the society's general membership, and its leaders reported directly to al-Banna. In theory, he controlled the group and its activities. However, control was never complete, and herein lay a fatal flaw for the future.

The end of World War II did not bring peace between the Muslim Brothers and the government. The economy turned downward and unemployment rose sharply. A great number of peasants left their villages and migrated to the cities in search of work. The Brothers' response was to expand their schools to offer technical training that would increase the employability of these often unskilled migrants. The Brothers also began more small businesses and increased the number of their medical clinics. While the Society of the Muslim Brothers reached out to the unemployed and the poor, the government seemed indifferent to their sufferings, leaving many Egyptians alienated from the ruling elite. Continuous labor strife as well as ongoing anti-government and anti-British demonstrations marked the postwar period.

Finally, in December 1948, the Egyptian government, fearing that the Muslim Brothers were plotting an imminent uprising, issued orders dissolving the society (a decree that would remain in effect until December 1951). Much of the Brothers' leadership was again arrested. Although al-Banna was allowed to remain free, he was placed under "strict surveillance." What the Egyptian government failed to realize was that by taking this action it had cut the chain of command between al-Banna and the secret apparatus. As closely watched as he was, he could no longer receive information or issue orders. This meant that there was now a religiously motivated, well trained group of brothers whose identity remained hidden, ready to do violence against a government that had declared its intention of suppressing the society. The one man who could restrain them was beyond communication. On December 28, 1948 one of these secret apparatus operatives assassinated the Egyptian prime minister, Mahmud Nuqrashi. Al-Banna had nothing to do with the attack and immediately repudiated it, but the government held him ultimately responsible. On February 12, 1949, in an act of revenge, government agents assassinated Hasan al-Banna.

From that point on the brotherhood was subject to periodic banning and mass arrests by the various postwar Egyptian governments. While such suppression did prevent the Muslim Brothers from becoming an effective political challenge in Egypt, it did not prevent them becoming a role model for many of today's contemporary Muslim fundamentalist movements.

Hatta Shūzō (1886–1934)

Takashi Ikeda

Hatta Shūzō was a Japanese anarchist in the interwar years, known as a representative of “pure anarchism” and an opponent of anarcho-syndicalism, the most influential anarchist theory at that time. He was born the last of seven children in Mie, Japan. In his teens he worked at a post office in Taipei, Taiwan, where he encountered Christianity. After returning to Japan, he graduated from a theological college in Kobe and started to engage in missionary work. While working as a clergyman, however, he lost his faith in Christianity and showed more and more sympathy with anarchism. In 1924 he was banished from the church and moved to Tokyo, where he worked intensively on creating the pure anarchism theory.

The main point of his criticism is that under the influence of Marxism, anarchosyndicalism pursues revolutionary change through class struggle and organizes it in a labor movement. In his view, such an attempt cannot lead to a genuine revolution insofar as it is led by a specified set of people – namely, city workers or the proletariat. He believed that the revolution for a decentralized community for all people must exclude all kinds of power, including the dictatorship of the proletariat. He insisted that the necessary condition for realizing such a revolution was to abandon the division of work, which is originally demanded by the capitalist economy and divides the people into groups concerned with their own industry and its profit.

Following Peter Kropotkin’s (1842–1921) theories of “social physiology,” Hatta argued that revolutionary action should be exercised in a number of small communes on the basis of research about how people can satisfy their needs with the least human energy. According to Hatta, the reason why such a proposal is regarded as utopian is based upon the assumption that human need is infinite and must be controlled by a certain kind of central power. But such an assumption, he claimed, results from the sickness in developed capitalist societies which constantly increases human desires. He believed that decentralized mutual aid for satisfying finite common needs is partially realized in Japanese farming areas, so these areas could be the origin for spreading revolution. This “pure anarchism” became one of the most important streams in the Japanese anarchist movement after World War II. Supporters founded an association named the Nihon Anarchist Club.

Hatuey (ca. 1400s–1512)

Camila Piñeiro Harnecker

Hatuey, an indigenous Taino chieftain of Arawak origin, is revered as the first Cuban independence martyr and cited as an example of national dignity and courage. Having seen the horror of Spanish colonization on his native island, Hispaniola (Dominican Republic and Haiti), Hatuey fled from western Haiti to eastern Cuba in 1511 and organized the first major resistance to European conquest. From 1492, when Columbus’s expedition landed on Hispaniola, to 1510, nearly 75 percent of the island’s indigenous population were exterminated, reducing their numbers from an estimated 200,000 to 46,000 people.

Conquistadors – Spanish nobles and merchants who sought to extract the riches of the “new world” and enslave its inhabitants – carried out massacres across the island against unarmed people, often after having been received with the hospitality that characterized the Taino people. Many Tainos also died from the hardships of forced labor, starvation, sexual servitude, and disease.

When Hatuey learned that the Spaniards were planning to move to neighboring Cuba in search of more gold, he gathered the surviving 400 men, women, and children of his clan and traveled there to warn other Tainos of the Spaniards’ motives. Seeking to create a united front to defend against the common enemy, he arrived at what is now Maisí, Cuba, and explained to his people that the Spaniards' brutality was due to a need to appease their God: gold. Many in Cuba were skeptical and declined to join him at that time. Diego Velázquez de Cuéllar (a Spanish conquistador, then governor of Haiti and later of Cuba) arrived in northeastern Cuba in pursuit of the rebel leader and founded the first Spanish settlement in Baracoa. After initially trying to avoid confronting Velázquez's troops, Hatuey launched an offensive using guerilla warfare tactics, and helped bring together Cuban Tainos and Ciboneyes in several major rebellions. For three months he kept the Spaniards on the defensive, confining them to their fort in Baracoa.

Hatuey was betrayed by a fellow Taino and captured by Spanish forces on February 2, 1512 in Yara. According to the testimony of the conquistador turned Dominican friar, Bartolomé de las Casas, the Taino leader was sentenced to death and offered a choice by his captors: accept the Spaniards' Christian faith and receive a swift execution, or be burned alive at the stake. He chose the latter, claiming that if there were Spaniards in heaven he preferred going to hell. Nearly 500 years later, he remains a powerful national symbol and important part of Cuban identity. During the 1895–8 Cuban independence war, the "Hatuey Regiment" – formed by Cubans of indigenous descent, under the instructions of José Martí – fought audaciously under Major General Antonio Maceo (Barreiro 2004). A town in Camagüey Province is named after him, as well as a brand of beer, and his legend has inspired pilgrimages, paintings, poems, and other literary tributes.

Hauptmann, Gerhart (1862–1946)

Romena Griem

Gerhart Hauptmann was a German literary author, chiefly known today for his early naturalistic social drama Die Weber (The Weavers), which was published in 1892. It portrays the 1844 weaver revolt in Silesia and features a realistic portrayal of the suffering and humanity of the poor, and the hopelessness of their situation. While Hauptmann argued that the play was merely a faithful depiction of a historic event, the Prussian government feared that it condemned contemporary conditions for weavers. Public performances were temporarily banned in Berlin and elsewhere in Europe out of a fear that it would lead to class conflict. When it was performed publicly, the German imperial family cancelled their theater box in protest. The anarchist Johann Most participated in an American staging that included extra incendiary sections provided by its leftist performers.

Hauptmann's early social dramas successfully revealed the suffering of the poor to a new middle-class audience who might otherwise have turned a blind eye to the conditions of the poor. He was criticized by leftists for not being militant enough, while conservatives considered his early social dramas to be troubling and potentially dangerous. Hauptmann later turned to other themes, earning the derision of contemporary and modern critics.

In 1912 Hauptmann was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature. The next year he was commissioned to write a play to commemorate the one hundredth anniversary of the end of the Napoleonic Wars. After a few performances, the production was halted by Crown Prince Wilhelm, who complained that the work was not nationalistic enough and objected to its depiction of monarchs as puppets. Hauptmann's closing scene in the play compared war to murder, but after World War I broke out in 1914, the author supported the German war effort.

Havel, Václav (b. 1936)

Christopher W. Harwood

A Czech dramatist whose absurdist plays earned him international acclaim in the 1960s, Václav Havel became widely known in the 1970s and 1980s as a human rights activist and prisoner of conscience, and later as the central figure in the Velvet Revolution of 1989, which ended 40 years of communist rule in Czechoslovakia. Havel then served as the last president of Czechoslovakia and first president of the Czech Republic.

Havel won fame as a playwright with successful productions of his early plays at Prague's Theater on the Balustrade. During the period of liberalization that culminated in the Prague Spring of 1968, Havel's essays and speeches prominently advocated free expression and democratic reform. After the invasion of Czechoslovakia by Warsaw Pact forces in August 1968 and subsequent imposition of a repressive, pro-Soviet regime, Havel was blacklisted from the theater and his writings were banned.

In April 1975 Havel wrote an open letter to communist leader Gustáv Husák in which he diagnosed the grim, demoralized state of Czechoslovak society under the post-1968 regime of "normalization" and held party leadership accountable. In January 1977 he co-authored Charter 77, a petition calling on the Czechoslovak government to uphold its commitment to international human rights agreements, and began serving as spokesperson for the Charter 77 civic initiative for monitoring human rights. For these activities he was jailed for four months. In October 1978 Havel wrote "The Power of the Powerless," deepening his analysis of totalitarian society and raising the ideal of "living in truth" as an antidote to political repression and concomitant moral malaise. The essay became an inspiration for dissident movements throughout Eastern Europe. In 1979 Havel was arrested and sentenced to four and a half years in prison for "subversion of the republic."

After student demonstrations initiated the Velvet Revolution on November 17, 1989, Havel co-founded Civic Forum, an umbrella group of activists seeking an end to authoritarian, single-party rule. As the group's spokesperson, Havel led negotiations with communist authorities on the transfer of power, which led to his being elected president, first by the Communist Federal Assembly in December 1989, then by a freely elected parliament in July 1990. Unable to avert the dissolution of Czechoslovakia negotiated in parliament, he resigned in July 1992.

Havel was elected president of the Czech Republic in January 1993 and reelected in January 1998. Thanks in part to his efforts, the Czech Republic joined NATO in March 1999 and advanced toward membership of the European Union. In February 2003 Havel left active politics at the end of his second term to pursue humanitarian projects and return to playwriting.

Hawaii, resistance to US invasion and occupation

Stacy Warner Maddern

On January 16, 1893, Queen Liliuokalani yielded to the "superior force of the United States of America," in an effort to avoid bloodshed and in the hope that the United States would one day undo the wrong it had inflicted on the Hawaiian people. The monarchy in Hawaii had thus been toppled by an armed insurrection of a small group of men, mostly American businessmen, with the backing of US troops sent ashore from a warship located in Honolulu Harbor. In justification of this “revolution” from above, the wealthy sugar planters who led the coup cited corrupt and unsatisfactory conditions in government. Sugar was the principal commodity of the Islands, with a large portion of profits coming from the US market. With plantation ownership dominated by American and European interests, the growth of the industry contracted large numbers of laborers from China, Japan, and some European countries.

In 1887, a Hawaiian League was formed by a group of planters and businessmen seeking to gain economic and political control of the Island. The League was a secret organization comprised predominantly of American businessmen, with a membership not exceeding 400. This took place during the reign of King Kalakauna (Liliuokalani’s brother) over a population of Native Hawaiians not exceeding 40,000. The League was organized and led by a lawyer named Lorrin A. Thurston, the grandson of American missionaries.

After threatening Kalakauna with insurrection, the League convinced him to accept a new cabinet. After further protests, the king was also compelled to form a new constitution, which came to be known as the Bayonet Constitution. The new constitution granted the League complete executive power by stating that the king could not dismiss cabinet members. It also removed the majority of Native Hawaiians from the political process by extending the voting privilege to foreign residents of American and European descent. Asians were excluded from voting even if they were naturalized citizens. The House of Nobles, a political body formerly appointed by the king, was now subject to election. However, in order to vote or to be a candidate, individuals had to meet high property ownership or income requirements that excluded two-thirds of the native population. Native Hawaiians could still vote for appointees to the House of Representatives, but they could only vote for candidates who swore to uphold the Bayonet Constitution.

Protests by Hawaiians over the erosion of their voice in governance and outrage over the diminished capacity of the monarch’s powers fell on deaf ears. The cabinet offered no explanation, retorting that only an act of the legislature could override the constitution – the same constitution that had never been put to a vote. In 1889, a group of about 80 Hawaiians, led by Robert W. Wilcox, staged an uprising to overthrow the Bayonet Constitution. The intent was to march to Iolani Palace, the center of government, and to present a new constitution for the king to sign. Wilcox and his men were put down after the cabinet called out troops. Wilcox was tried for conspiracy and later acquitted by a jury of Native Hawaiians.

Liliuokalani ascended the throne after her brother’s death in 1891. Soon thereafter, in 1892, Thurston brought together the Annexation Club, whose sole purpose was to overthrow the queen and pursue annexation by the United States. On a trip to Washington to promote annexation, Thurston was encouraged by President Benjamin Harrison’s message that he would find there “an exceedingly sympathetic administration.”

On January 14, after being inundated with petitions for a new constitution, the queen decided to act to restore power to the throne and rights to the Native Hawaiian people. Nevertheless, after heated arguments with her cabinet, who refused to sign a new constitution, and fearing her enemies would remove her from the throne, the queen deferred. Even so, an alerted Annexation Club moved quickly to finalize plans for her overthrow and establish a provisional government. The queen had provided the justification for revolution, according to Annexation members, who claimed she had, in constructing a new constitution, committed “a revolutionary act.” With the American warship USS Boston anchored in Honolulu Harbor, Thurston notified US Ambassador John L. Stevens, who had pledged to deploy troops “to protect American lives and property.” Stevens offered recognition of the provisional government by the United States once Annexation members were in possession of government buildings or in relevant control of the city.

Sensing a mounting crisis, the queen issued a proclamation on January 15 declaring that she would not seek to alter the constitution except by constitutional means. She also sought the assurances of Ambassador Stevens, but to no avail. The following day, several hundred Native Hawaiians congregated around Palace Square to express their support of the queen and their loyalty to the monarchy. When Thurston arrived, he vehemently denounced the queen and asked for a resolution to remove her from the throne. Against the wishes of the crowd, the resolution was passed and the monarchy was overthrown. On hearing of this, Ambassador Stevens deployed 162 fully armed troops from the Boston.

On January 20, 1893, the provisional government was formally recognized as the de facto government of Hawaii, and by the end of the month Ambassador Stevens authorized the raising of the American flag. The new administration then sent a commission headed by Thurston to Washington to negotiate a treaty for annexation. Thurston's negotiations with Secretary of State John Foster were fruitful, and on February 14, 1893, the treaty of annexation was drawn up and signed by both parties. The Senate favored ratifying the treaty until incoming President Grover Cleveland ordered that it be withdrawn for further consideration. The president followed by sending Colonel James A. Blount to Hawaii as special commissioner charged with conducting a thorough investigation of the affairs connected with the revolution.

On his arrival in Hawaii on March 29, Colonel Blount immediately ordered that the American flag be lowered. Thurston and other members of the provincial government viewed Blount's investigation as a mere formality in the path toward annexation. However, as spring gave way to summer, annexationists became less hopeful. By June, Thurston was given the impression that the best that might come from President Cleveland was a declaration of protection. Colonel Blount completed his investigation and left Hawaii on August 8, 1893. The provincial government expected that President Cleveland, reassured, would make a formal statement reflecting his support of the Hawaiian policy. No statement was ever made. Instead, the president appointed Albert S. Willis as the new ambassador to Hawaii in November 1893, making no mention of annexation.

Blount's investigation charged that Ambassador Stevens had conspired with Thurston and others to overthrow the monarchy. He further suggested that the events of January 17, 1893 would not have been possible without the support of US troops. He concluded that the undoubted sentiment of the people was "for the queen, against the provincial government and against annexation." Blount went even further to suggest that "There is not an annexationist in the Islands, so far as I have been able to observe, who would be willing to submit the question of annexation to a popular vote." President Cleveland accepted Colonel Blount's recommendations and ended all hope of annexation. In response to the misuse of power by Ambassador Stevens, the president offered that "the United States cannot fail to vindicate [Hawaiian] honor . . . by an earnest effort to make all possible reparation." President Cleveland then placed the entire matter in the hands of Congress.

John Tyler Morgan, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and a strong supporter of annexation, conducted the Senate hearings. His final report placed all responsibility for the revolution squarely on the queen. While Morgan's findings were disputed in the Senate, the House censured Stevens and passed a resolution opposing annexation, but to no avail. Congress ended up taking no action toward restoring the monarchy, and took no official position on annexation.

In Hawaii, Thurston and the annexationists were frustrated but not defeated as they moved to form a republic. Their new constitution required all voters to swear allegiance to the republic, which thousands of Native Hawaiians opposed out of loyalty to the queen. Because property and income requirements were necessary to qualify for the right to vote, most of the Native population was once again excluded from the process. The constitution was proclaimed law by a vote of those who had originally favored annexation. On July 4, 1894, Sanford Dole, cousin of the pineapple magnate James Dole, was chosen by Thurston to serve as the first and only president of the Republic of Hawaii.

Unrest and frustration on the part of Native Hawaiians set the stage for counterrevolution with the aim of restoring the monarchy. In January 1895, Robert Wilcox led another insurrection that was eventually quelled, after ten days of fighting, by the Republic's troops. After Wilcox and ten others were captured, troops entered the home of Queen Liliuokalani where they found a cache of arms buried in a flower garden. The queen was arrested and charged with having knowledge of treason and failing to report it. After being tried by a military commission, she was found guilty and sentenced to five years of hard labor and a $5,000 fine. Although the sentence was eventually suspended, she was kept prisoner in the palace for another eight months, after which she returned to her home and remained under house arrest until late 1896.

The queen traveled to Washington one last time in 1897 to meet with President Cleveland and present documents signed by many Hawaiians requesting her reinstatement. Unfortunately, the president could no longer help, as his successor, William McKinley, had already begun the process of annexation by sending a new treaty to the Senate for ratification on June 16. The following September a group of Senators visited Hawaii, among them John Tyler Morgan, who urged annexation. Morgan gave public speeches and newspaper interviews informing Native Hawaiians of the benefits and improved status they would have as American citizens.

Later that month a group of some 3,000 Native Hawaiians gathered in Palace Square to express clear opposition to annexation and to address Senator Morgan. F. J. Testa, editor of the Ka Makāainana, a Hawaiian-language newspaper, read a “Memorial to the President and Congress of the United States” outlining reasons against annexation. J. O. Carter, a confidant of the queen, warned of the “grave responsibilities for the Hawaiian people” of an alliance with the United States, maintaining that so long as Hawaii remained independent, she would be “free from all the entanglements that beset the rest of the world.” The event raised doubts in those Senators present, other than Morgan. On November 20, 1897, four Hawaiian men – John Richardson, William Auld, James Kaulia, and David Kalauokalani – traveled to Washington with a petition of 40,000 signatures of Hawaiians opposed to annexation. Assisted by Senator Richard Franklin Pettigrew, the Hawaiians presented their petition during the treaty debates. Soon after, the Senate failed to ratify the treaty, but any celebration would be shortlived.

In 1898, with the outbreak of the Spanish-American War, Hawaii was given strategic preference because of its position in the Pacific. This strengthened the annexation movement, and when it proved to be unavoidable, Grover Cleveland wrote that he was “ashamed of the whole affair.” Sovereignty of Hawaii was officially transferred to the United States on August 12, 1898. During annexation ceremonies, Hawaiians listened to their national anthem as they watched their flag being lowered and replaced with the American flag, to the accompaniment of the “Star-Spangled Banner.” Honored and revered by her people as queen for the rest of her life, Liliuokalani, died in 1917, at the age of 79.

Haya de la Torre, Víctor Raúl (1895–1979)

César Germana

Without doubt, one of the most discussed political characters in twentieth-century Peruvian history is Víctor Raúl Haya de la Torre. During his long political career, which took him from exile to the underground and finally to the presidency of the 1978 Constituent Congress, Haya de la Torre was an active participant in the central affairs of Peruvian politics. Distinguished and praised by his supporters, wronged by his enemies, no one remained indifferent to his proposals.

Born to a middle-class family in the northern coastal city of Trujillo, Haya de la Torre attended private schools and studied at the Universidad Nacional Mayor de San Marcos in Lima. In 1919, as president of Peru’s Student Federation, he carried forward the struggle for university reform. In 1920, invited by the Textile Workers’ Federation, he founded the People’s University, Manuel Gonzales Prada, in Lima and Vitarte. In 1923 he led a movement against Peru's consecration to the Heart of Jesus, promoted by the government of Augusto B. Leguía in order to legitimize his second presidential term. That same year, Haya de la Torre was deported because of an alleged conspiracy to overthrow the government.

In 1924, while in Mexico, Haya de la Torre established the programmatic and organizational bases of the Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana (APRA), which became Peru's strongest party and for years the most serious threat to the oligarchy's waning hold on power. From its inception, APRA played an important role in Peruvian politics. It is today the largest and best-organized political association in Peru. More than any other political party, APRA was able to use its vertical structure to infuse its members with a powerful mystique of sacrifice. Within the party, Haya de la Torre, who was addressed as the "Maximal Chief" or the "Great Teacher," exercised total authority.

The first period (1924–39) of Haya de la Torre's political development was marked by his espousal of a democratic nationalist radicalism and a proposal for a "non-socialist social revolution." Deported in 1924, Haya de la Torre traveled throughout the United States and Europe. He attended union and political meetings, met with socialist and social democrat leaders, and followed courses in economics and anthropology at Oxford. He returned to Peru in 1931 and that year ran for the presidency of the republic. President Leguía (1919–30) had already been ousted and the Partido Aprista Peruano (1930) had been founded. Defeated in the elections, Haya de la Torre led an uncompromising opposition against the government of Luis M. Sanchez Cerro (1931–3). The year 1932 was known in Peruvian history as the "year of barbarism" because of the bloody repression that killed hundreds of APRA militants during an uprising in the northern city of Trujillo. The imprisonment of Haya in the same year marked the beginning of a long period of underground activity for APRA.

Haya de la Torre's main theses during that period were developed in his book El antimperialismo y el Apra (1936). At the core was his imperative belief in the capitalist modernization of the country. The basis of his argument was how to overcome the secular backwardness of a society dominated by imperialism and feudalism. Then there was the problem of how to make "our own French Revolution," in a country where the national bourgeoisie was not powerful enough to displace from power the imperialist bourgeoisie and its internal ally, the feudal class.

Thus, the originality of Haya de la Torre's political proposal was to assert the new characteristic that the bourgeois revolution would assume in countries dependent on imperialism. Unlike the bourgeois revolutions in Europe, in colonial or semi-colonial countries the bourgeois process could not rely on either private capital or liberal democracy. In the Mexican Revolution of 1910, Haya de la Torre saw both the state model that should be built and the mistakes that should be avoided. Through this experience he concluded that "a triumphant anti-feudal and anti-imperialist revolution cannot use the old state apparatus (liberal-bourgeois) for its purposes," because in doing so it "would inexorably fall on the rollers of imperialism."

The "anti-imperialist state" would conduct the national economy, denying the "individual or collective rights of economic order whose use implied an imperialistic danger." Haya de la Torre's name for this new economic organization was "state capitalism." He argued that the development of a national capitalism in semi-colonial countries could not rely on private property and liberal capitalism, because if this "classic model of capitalism" were introduced, the revolution "would soon fall into the imperialism machinery from which no bourgeois national body can escape."

The "anti-imperialist state" was seen as an expression of national majorities, but the middle class, the only social class Haya de la Torre deemed capable of developing an anti-imperialist consciousness, would lead it. With this program, in an anti-liberal and anti-socialist project, Haya de la Torre sought to systematize the nationalist and democratic aspirations of the social classes oppressed by the imperialist domination of the time.

In the 1940s there began a change that would be crucial in the development of the political thought of Haya de la Torre. In this period his political project was evolving, abandoning the most radically democratic and nationalist elements. Haya de la Torre returned to public life in 1945, when APRA supported the candidacy of José Luis Bustamante y Rivero, who was elected president and governed the country until being overthrown by a coup d'état in 1948. During the dictatorship of General Manuel A. Odría (1948–56), APRA operated clandestinely once more and Haya de la Torre sought political asylum at the Colombian embassy in Lima (1949), only managing to leave the country in 1954 under the protection of the International Court of Justice.

The confluence of changes occurring both internationally and in Peru was critical for the reformulation of Haya de la Torre's political project at this time. Regarding changes in international circumstances, F. D. Roosevelt's New Deal policies and the opposition of democracies to the Nazi-fascist regimes during World War II were crucial. The fight against totalitarianism and the defense of "western democracies" were present in the liberal democratic characteristics of Haya de la Torre's thinking and in his abandoning of the corporate proposal of functional democracy. In addition, the new role of American foreign policy forced him to review imperialism issues. Starting in 1954, Haya de la Torre traveled through several cities in Europe and was influenced by the policies of the social democratic governments in the Nordic countries.

Two important changes in Peruvian society also affected his program. First, the oligarchic-imperialist coalition's ability to restore its economic and political power was broken by the crisis that began in 1930. Secondly, the middle class had become complacent owing to growing satisfaction of their economic, political, and social demands by the expansion of the export economy. Haya de la Torre managed to adapt to the new conditions, and APRA co-governed the country with President Bustamante y Rivero (1945–8).

Returning to Peru in 1956, Haya de la Torre again became involved in politics. That year he supported the candidacy of Manuel Prado, a conspicuous representative of oligarchic imperialist interests, whom he had questioned in the 1940s. In 1962, Haya de la Torre was a candidate for the presidency of the republic, but the electoral process was annulled by the military, which had overthrown President Prado's government. In the elections of 1963, Haya de la Torre was defeated by Fernando Belaunde Terry, who ruled the country until 1968 when another military coup d'état unseated him. That year marked the beginning of the radical nationalist regime of General Juan Velasco Alvarado (1968–75), whose government carried out far-reaching anti-oligarchic and anti-imperialist reforms very similar to those proposed by APRA in the 1930s. General Morales Bermudez replaced General Velasco as president of Peru (1975–80); he called for a Constituent Assembly, whose presidency was held by Haya de la Torre as the candidate who had received most votes. He signed the new Peruvian constitution a few days before his death in 1979.

The evolution of Haya de la Torre's political ideas clearly shows his originality. His career also highlights his skills as a politician, constantly adapting himself to the changing conditions of Peruvian society and giving meaning to political actions. This involved not only abandoning proposals for the radical democratic nationalism of the 1930s, but also accommodating himself to the demands of an audacious, and often cynical, struggle for power.

Haymarket tragedy

Heidi M. Rimke

The Chicago Haymarket tragedy is a seminal event in the social history of anti-capitalist movements in the United States. During the 1870s, Chicago was an active center of revolutionary organizing and radical thought. Class antagonism was especially heightened due to the bloody clashes of the 1875 Long Strike and the 1877 railroad strike. This tension increased a decade later when the Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions (the predecessor to the American Federation of Labor) called for a movement to fight for the eight-hour workday as part of an international struggle to improve working conditions and to establish workers' rights. The basic plan was to spend two years demanding that all bosses implement a standard eight-hour day instead of the 10- to 16-hour days that were prevalent. After May 1, 1886, all workers not yet on an eight-hour schedule were to participate in a national strike until their demand was met.

On May 1, 1886, nearly 350,000 workers went on strike for a shorter day at approximately 1,200 factories nationwide. An estimated 80,000 in Chicago took part in demonstrations. The anarcho-syndicalist International Working People's Association played a central organizing role in the protest. Chicago's bourgeoisie and press viewed the actions as a forewarning of revolution and demanded a police crackdown.

On May 3, August Spies, the editor of Abeiter-Zeitung, spoke at a meeting of 5,000 workers, including approximately 500 strikers from the nearby McCormick plant. A short time later, fights broke out as strikebreakers attempted to cross a picket line. The police arrived and opened fire, killing four people and wounding many more, sparking outrage in working-class communities. Anarchists distributed fliers calling for a rally near Haymarket Square. The leaflets denounced the police for murdering the strikers on behalf of capitalists and urged workers to seek justice.

On May 4, an assembly of 2,500 people near Haymarket Square protested the most recent police brutality against workers. As the last speaker was closing his address, 180 police marched in and demanded an immediate end to the rally. In response to the peremptory dispersal order, Samuel Fielden pointed out that the peaceful gathering was about to close. At this moment a dynamite bomb was thrown into the police lines, which incited a hail of police gunfire, leading officers to shoot many of their own as well as fleeing demonstrators. Medical evidence later showed that their own bullets caused most of the injuries sustained by the police. The number of dead among the police rose to eight over the next week, and at least four dead among the protesters. The bomb thrower's identity was never determined. Many working people, including Albert Parsons, were convinced that an agent provocateur threw the bomb to turn public sentiment against the workers' movement, particularly the fight for a shorter workday. Others believed that a police agent threw the bomb with the express purpose of derailing the eight-hour movement, jailing activists, and terrifying workers into silence and submission.

In the weeks following the bombing, Chicago authorities carried out an accelerated campaign of repression. The mayor banned all meetings and demonstrations. Radicals of all stripes were rounded up, arrested, charged, and imprisoned, characterizing the period as one of unprecedented police terrorism. The press sensationalized stereotypes about radical immigrants and dangerous revolutionaries and published unsubstantiated theories about violent anarchist plots, which polarized public reaction to the incident and fed the anti-union fervor amongst the privileged classes.

At the behest of prosecutor Julius Grinnel, police began raiding homes and press offices, seizing records, confiscating manuscripts, books, and banners, and they closed at least 50 headquarters and halls. Hundreds of women and men were arrested and subjected to cruel interrogation and denied food, water, counsel, and medical treatment. Eight known anarchists – August Spies, Michael Schwab, Samuel Fielden, Albert R. Parsons, Adolph Fischer, George Engel, Louis Lingg, and Oscar W. Neebe – were charged with conspiracy to commit murder even though only two of the accused were present at the time of the bombing.

Court proceedings against the eight anarchists commenced on June 21, 1886 and held that their "inflammatory speeches and publications" incited the actions of the bomber. The prosecution did not offer evidence connecting any of the defendants with the bombing yet argued that they shared equal responsibility for the crime. On August 20, the jury returned guilty verdicts for all eight defendants. Neebe received a sentence of 15 years' imprisonment and the remaining seven were sentenced to death by hanging. International protest erupted and legal appeals were launched but the Illinois and US Supreme Courts upheld the decision.

The Chicago Bar condemned the trial as a farce. The prosecutor stacked the jury with men who openly admitted their prejudice; witnesses for the prosecution contradicted themselves and each other and confessed to accepting money, jobs, and immunity for their testimony; and the presiding judge, Joseph E. Gary, constantly ruled against the defense attorney, who was inexperienced in criminal law.

Within days of the execution date, two of the condemned men's sentences were commuted to life imprisonment. Louis Lingg committed suicide in prison by biting a fulminating cap. Albert Parsons, August Spies, George Engel, and Adolph Fischer were killed on the morning of November 11, 1887, in the Cook County Jail. Oscar Neebe, Samuel Fielden, and Michael Schwab remained in prison until Illinois Governor John Peter Altgeld granted a full pardon to the eight men on June 26, 1894.

The Haymarket events made the defendants international political heroes. Many revolutionaries and radical labor unions, including the Industrial Workers of the World, were inspired to establish May 1 as an International Workers' Day in many countries. Although it was never officially adopted as a holiday in the United States and Canada, many radical groups continue to celebrate international labor solidarity every May Day.

Haywood, Big Bill (1869–1828)

Stacy Warner Maddern

Born in Salt Lake City, Utah, William D. "Big Bill" Haywood was the son of a Pony Express rider and became one of the most prominent, although volatile, leaders of the American labor movement. Haywood began working in the silver mines at the tender age of nine and after witnessing the Haymarket Riots in 1886 and later the Pullman strikes in 1893, "Big Bill" would obtain a keen interest in radicalism and labor politics. After hearing a speech by Western Federation of Miners (WFM) president Ed Boyce in 1896, Haywood decided to join the union and by 1900 was a member of its executive board.

During this time the WFM engaged in very militant and difficult strikes. Outside of the already dangerous conditions that were a part of mining in the West, miners found themselves in the midst of a labor war that involved dozens of strikes and battles with a government that was unsympathetic to their cause. The WFM dealt constantly with court injunctions, state militia, imprisonment, and deportation of strikers. In addition, miners were frequently attacked by armed guards working for mine owners.

In 1902 Boyce stepped down from leading the WFM and named Haywood and Charles Moyer as his successors. Unfortunately, the two men were polar opposites. Moyer was cautious and deliberate. He favored negotiations over strikes. Haywood, on the other hand, was volatile and overbearing. He was a natural organizer who had a talent for stirring up crowds at union meetings. One of Haywood's championed causes was the 8-hour work day for which he would bellow, "Eight hours of work, eight hours of play, eight hours of sleep – eight hours a day!"

At the turn of the twentieth century the most significant battles between labor and capital were occurring between miners and mine operators. In most cases state government and its authorities maintained strong support for the mine operators. In Colorado the struggle reached what some historians regard as the closest the United States ever came to outright class warfare. Standing right in the middle of this conflict was the WFM and the period would later be referred to as the Colorado Labor Wars. From 1902 to 1905 the WFM, under the leadership of Haywood and Moyer, was constantly engaged in brutal and bloody conflicts with mine operators, particularly the Cripple Creek Mine Owners' Association. These conflicts would result in the loss of 33 lives and considerable casualties of both union and non-union workers. One incident in Independence, Colorado involved a train-station bombing, which killed 13 non-union workers. While Haywood was suspected of organizing the explosion, he was never charged.

On December 30, 1905 former governor of Idaho Frank Steunenberg was killed in an explosion near his home in Caldwell, Idaho. Immediate speculation concurred that the bombing was again the work of Haywood and the WFM, citing the governor's tough anti-union stance as a motive for the killing. In his own state's battle with the WFM, Steunenberg directly stated, "It is a plain case of the state or the union winning and we do not propose that the state shall be defeated." Following his death, the state of Idaho contracted the Pinkerton Detective Agency and renowned investigator James McFarland to hunt down Steunenberg's killers. After a long exhaustive manhunt that involved debates over extradition Haywood, Moyer, and a close advisor George Pettibone were arrested and tried for the murder. While in jail awaiting trial Haywood spent much of his time designing new WFM posters and reading books like Upton Sinclair's The Jungle. He even ran for governor of the state of Colorado as a socialist, for which he received 16,000 votes. At trial the three men were represented by legendary attorney Clarence Darrow and were acquitted, but the event was not without consequences for Haywood, who was later ousted from the WFM by Moyer, who considered his tactics too militant and thus too violent.

Haywood next turned his attention to the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and in 1915 became its formal leader. In the years leading up to America's entry into World War I, Haywood helped to recruit over 3 million members into the IWW. He led textile strikes in both Massachusetts and New Jersey. At the same time Haywood had begun to mesh his political views into his philosophy of organizing. For many years, Haywood had been an active member of the Socialist Party of America. His political views were largely Marxist, and he was a regular supporter of Eugene Debs for whom he campaigned during the 1908 presidential election. In addition, Haywood had represented the Socialist Party in 1910 as a delegate at the Second International, an organization working towards international socialism, and in 1912 was elected to the Socialist Party National Executive Committee. However, odds between Haywood and the Socialist Party began when the IWW started calling for the abolition of the wage system and the overthrow of capitalism. Tension between the more moderate faction of the party and the IWW was largely due to Haywood's insistence on direct action and strikes. When these often led to violence, the party was critical and began calling for political tactics or more respectable forms of negotiation to resolve conflict. When Haywood continued to encourage the practice of sabotage and imprisonment to foster revolution he was eventually ousted by the National Executive Committee in January of 1913. As a result thousands of IWW members followed Haywood out of the Socialist Party.

The entry of the United States into World War I resulted in an opportunity for the government finally to quell the agitations of the labor movement. Citing the Espionage Act, passed in 1917, government officials began raiding union establishments, including the IWW. In 1918 Haywood would be among nearly 100 IWW members arrested for violating the Espionage and Sedition Acts, namely for organizing strikes in war-sensitive industries. In the midst of these federal indictments against the members of the IWW, Haywood would urge them to surrender to the authorities. This came as a surprise to most radicals, considering the labor icon's personal distaste for those who had "sold out."

Haywood would be convicted and sentenced to 30 years in prison. Released on bond, provided by the IWW, to await an appeal, he would flee the country for the Soviet Union, where he remained a confidant of the Bolsheviks until his death in 1928. Haywood's self-imposed exile was seen as an act of cowardice by members of the IWW. Having to forfeit the bond they had provided for Haywood's release shattered the labor union financially. Haywood's decision to flee had made a mockery of solidarity and those who had provided for his release found it hard to forgive him. Still, the legacy of William D. "Big Bill" Haywood left an indelible mark on industrial unionism in America. Upon his death in 1928, half of Haywood's ashes were buried in the Kremlin while the remaining half was returned to the United States and buried near a monument to the Haymarket Riots in Chicago, the event that had so inspired him.

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (1770–1831)

Frank M. Kirkland

Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel was one of the founders of the philosophical movement known as German idealism. He is best known for his dialectical theories which inspired many later philosophers, most famously Karl Marx. Born in Stuttgart in southwestern Germany, to Georg Ludwig and Maria Magdalena Louisa Fromm Hegel, he read the works of Enlightenment authors and followed the events of the French Revolution with enthusiasm. He taught at universities in Jena, Heidelberg, and Berlin and published four books – Phenomenology of Spirit (1807) (also known as Phenomenology of Mind), Science of Logic (1811, 1812, 1816), Encyclopedia of the Philosophical Sciences (1816), and Elements of the Philosophy of Right (1822).

Because Hegel's philosophy played a key role in influencing Karl Marx, helping him form the core ideas that led to Marxism, many historians have focused on his connection to revolution. Because the revolutions in Russia and China were Marxist revolutions, many see a clear connection between Hegel and revolutionary ideology, via Marx. Looking at Hegel's views on the French and Haitian revolutions, however, it becomes clear that the connection is not so simple.

Although Ritter (1977), a noted scholar of Hegel's political philosophy, is quite ardent with the claim that, "in its innermost aspirations, only Hegel's philosophy is the philosophy of revolution," there is much in Hegel's work to suggest that claim to be problematic. Now this neither signifies nor implies that Hegel or his work harbored counter-revolutionary tendencies. Even Habermas (1963), who sustains Ritter's claim by asserting that "Hegel raised revolution to the principle of his philosophy," admits "Hegel's philosophy of revolution is his philosophy as the critique thereof." This suggests that Hegel's position regarding revolution is more nuanced, more complicated, than Ritter concedes.

Hegel's philosophy of revolution is meant to address the problem of the political realization of the principle of freedom. Historically, not philosophically, Hegel comes to address this problem through his embrace of the French Revolution. To be sure Hegel was a celebrant of the French Revolution. He was known to have danced the carmagnole during his youthful days at Tübingen and to have remained an admirer of that revolution, despite its violence, throughout his life. He was also an avid reader of the highly regarded Minerva, a political journal of intellectual gravitas edited by Johann Wilhelm von Archenholz, which provided non-partisan yet favorable reportage of the French Revolution widely across Europe.

Hegel did not extend his admiration to the Saint-Domingue Revolution, which was not engendered through the revolutionary ideas and actions of the French, but through the actions of enslaved Africans. That revolution, taking place in the French colony of Saint-Domingue in the Caribbean, was the first successful armed struggle of enslaved Africans, not only against the brutal exploitation committed by the European plantation owners and maritime bourgeoisie, but also against the consecutive waves of French, Spanish, British, and again (later) French expeditions, over a 12-year period, sent to crush the revolution.

When Hegel's quietude regarding the Saint-Domingue Revolution is introduced into the discussion along with his critique of the French Revolution, his stance toward revolution is rendered more complicated and more problematic than Ritter and many other scholars make it out to be. In affirming, through the French Revolution alone, the importance of the right of acting under the idea of freedom, Hegel seeks to find that right's political realization, as Ritter claims. But he does so not only while criticizing the revolutionaries who integrate, as their immediate objective, that entitlement with revolutionary action, but also while ignoring a concurrent revolution which emphasizes the same aforementioned right and that right's political realization. These two points need to be examined. Hegel's criticism pertains to the idea that the right to act under the idea of freedom can never be or include the right to revolution. Those two rights neither are equivalent to nor entail one another. The capacity for revolution is not the right to it.

Hegel takes revolutions as extralegal activities of violent resistance, which fail necessarily to be effective rationally, because their concept of right can never be valid, can never be conceptually bound up with or realized in those activities. To be rationally effective is for a free person to have a justifying reason for an action whose normative authority would be dependent on certain social/political arrangements enabling such a reason for action to be recognized. So a right to revolution would have to entail the free activity of individuals whose rules or norms govern or define it as revolutionary conduct while being incorporated in a polity operating in terms of such norms.

However, for Hegel, it is impossible for revolutionary activity to be rationally effective because, albeit free, it cannot sustain a reason whose authority is reliant on political institutions incorporating it as a norm to be acknowledged. No social/political arrangement of the modern world, for Hegel, would enable a reason for or a right to revolutionary activity even under the idea of freedom. Rather, they would disable it for the very sake of the right to act under that idea. Hegel thus criticizes the right to revolution, because the reason to engage in such free yet “destructive” activity must always be detached from the capacity of any social/political arrangements to incorporate it normatively for the sake of being recognized.

Hegel’s critique of the right to revolution still carried his appreciation of the French Revolution’s importance. Its significance was that it was a historical event that prompted in principle the shift to the notion that all persons could rightfully act under the idea of freedom. In Hegel’s mind, it made possible the shift to the realization of that state of affairs and the principles that sustain it. However, only through the shift it engenders, not by the revolution itself, does history become, for Hegel, the actualization or the rational effectiveness of all persons acting under the idea of freedom.

But what is the bearing of Hegel’s critique on his willful neglect of the Saint-Domingue Revolution? The French Revolution was framed under banners such as “Live Freely or Die” and “Rather Death than Slavery,” both of which would be apropos to the Saint-Domingue Revolution as well, but the phrase “rather death than slavery” would have a different connotation for each revolution. In the French case, the phrase would refer to the act of resisting the despotic coercion of the sovereign and centuries-old feudal obligations in the face of (physical) death. In the Saint-Domingue case, it would refer first to the act of abolishing the social condition wherein one is unable to take possession of oneself, is unable to be the subject of one’s life. French revolutionaries were always able to be the subjects of their own lives, as members of a polity or a family, even when they had submitted to despotic coercion and were unable, as members of a polity, to secure the right to act under the idea of freedom, in effect, unable to secure the right to live freely.

As slaves, Africans were denied all duties and claims to a polity, a family, a heritage. They were prohibited from anchoring their understanding of a social world to the meanings they inherited and, thus, could never be the subjects of their own lives, because slavery was a secular excommunication. The resistance against colonial oppression and the establishment of a civil state under a constitution wherein all persons could rightfully act under the idea of freedom then became concomitant with their abolition of slavery.

Hegel had the philosophical and conceptual wherewithal to examine the Saint-Domingue Revolution and its attachment to the abolition of slavery. He never brought it, however, to bear on that revolution. His silence became distortion when he claimed in the three editions of his Encyclopedia that Africans had formed a state in Haiti on Christian principles. No mention is made of a violent revolution conducted by enslaved Africans for the sake of the abolition of slavery and colonial despotism and the political realization of the right of all people to live freely. The claim that Hegel’s philosophy is the philosophy of revolution becomes suspect then, not because Hegel denies that there is a right to revolution, but because he denies (enslaved) Africans the realization of their capacity to engage in revolution.

Herzen, Alexander Ivanovich (1812–1870)

Paul Le Blanc

Alexander Ivanovich Herzen, one of Russia's foremost revolutionary intellectuals, was born in Moscow, the "illegitimate" son of a wealthy nobleman and a young woman of German background and humble social origin. Inspired by the revolutionary conspirators who plotted the ill-fated Decembrist uprising of 1825, when he entered Moscow University a few years later Herzen was also profoundly influenced by the utopian socialist ideas of St.-Simon and Fourier. No less important to him were the development of the natural and social sciences, the historical example of the French Revolution, and the revolutionary ferment filtering through Europe in the 1830s.

Such influences caused Herzen to help organize and lead a secret circle of intellectuals who swore to dedicate their lives "to the people" and to the cause of liberty "on the basis of socialism." The group broke up when Herzen and one of the other organizers, Nikolai Ogarev, were arrested for "vile and ill-intentioned expressions" regarding the absolute monarchy of Russia's tsar. During a brief exile in Russia's hinterlands, Herzen engaged with Hegelian philosophy, which he described as "the algebra of revolution" and utilized in the development of a radical critique of the political and social realities around him – particularly the expansion of capitalism, which he saw as "a syphilitic sore infecting the blood and bone of society."

In 1847, Herzen went into self-imposed exile in Western Europe to escape the stifling atmosphere of the tsarist autocracy. While critical of the rising bourgeois order as well as of the residual repressiveness of the remnants of feudalism's "old order," Herzen hailed the popular democratic upheavals that swept through the continent in 1848. "Repent, gentlemen, repent," he challenged the upper classes (albeit from the margins of the radicalized literary intelligentsia); "the judgment day of your world is here." When the democratic insurgencies went down to disappointing defeat – largely due to the business classes choosing to align themselves with aristocrats and despots, against the radicalized lower classes – Herzen became more confirmed in his social radicalism than ever. Disillusioned by France as it drifted toward the dictatorship of Napoleon III, he moved first to England and finally to Switzerland, which was a major center of radicalized Russian émigrés.

From 1857 until 1869 Herzen published a quite influential revolutionary journal, The Bell (Kolokol), which secretly passed from hand to hand among the Russian intelligentsia. Tolling on behalf of freedom and enlightenment, against oppression and prejudice, it was read for a time by all of literate Russia, from the tsar himself to secondary school children. Yet, finally, the intolerance of the authorities cut off its circulation, and aspects of his own outlook increasingly cut him off from rising layers of radicalizing youth.

In his later years, Herzen's hopes for the future were especially focused on the possibility of a revolutionary transformation in his native Russia. Yet he was inclined to avoid revolutionary intransigence and class struggle, appealing to both the upper classes and the lower. To Russia's nobles, he appealed: "You can't be a free man and own household serfs, whom you buy like chattels and sell like a flock of sheep. . . . You can't even talk of human rights when you own human souls." On the other hand, "we say to the peasant there is no freedom without land, and add only this: land is not secure without freedom." And he dared to foresee a relatively painless transition to the hoped-for future.

While Herzen was a relatively well-to-do literary intellectual, his life was not without personal tragedy, but even more was marked by political disappointment. Once a prominent figure among Europe's revolutionary, democratic, socialist, and nationalist intellectuals, when he died in 1870, during a visit to Paris, it could be said that “Herzen had outlived his political importance” (in the words of biographer E. H. Carr). Those coming into collision with the old order were increasingly drawn to other intellectual influences – to the inflammatory anarchism of Mikhail Bakunin and his manipulative disciple Sergei Nechayev, to the uncompromising revolutionary populists under the spell of Nikolai Chernyshevsky, and to the worker-oriented “scientific socialism” of Karl Marx.

Hezbollah: organization and uprisings

Lawrence Davidson

Hezbollah (Party of God) is Lebanon’s strongest and best-known Islamic fundamentalist organization. The group was formed in the early 1980s in reaction to the Lebanese Civil War (1975–90) and the Israeli invasion of Lebanon (1982), both of which traumatized the nation.

Lebanon had long been dominated by Christian and Sunni Muslim communities, while the Shi’ite community represented the poor and discriminated sector of society. Lebanon’s Shi’ites gained inspiration and encouragement from the Iranian Revolution of 1979, however, and the founders of Hezbollah initially saw Iran as a model for what they wished to achieve in Lebanon. Thus, Hezbollah at its inception had the following agenda: to wage a struggle against Lebanon’s Christian and Sunni leadership along with what were perceived as their foreign backers: France, Israel, and the United States; to promote an acceptance of martyrdom and self-sacrifice among the Lebanese Shi’ites in order to carry on this effort; and upon the defeat of their enemies, to transform Lebanon into an Islamic republic along the lines of Iran.

One of the founding members of Hezbollah was the former Lebanese schoolteacher Abbas al Musawi. Musawi had become dissatisfied with the more moderate policies of the dominant Shi’ite militia organization known as Amal (hope). He objected to Amal’s acceptance of a secular state for Lebanon that gave considerable power to the country’s Christian minority. Musawi left his teaching position and relocated to the city of Baalbeck, in the Bekaa Valley of eastern Lebanon. There he began a new militant organization, Hezbollah, committed to the creation of a Muslim state. Musawi had come to Baalbeck because it was the center of Iranian-inspired activity in Lebanon, and the headquarters of 1,500 Iranian revolutionary guards who, in 1982, had volunteered to fight in Lebanon against the invading Israelis. The Iranians would provide the weapons and initial training for Hezbollah.

Hezbollah grew rapidly into a series of chapters organized around mosques in the Bekaa Valley, the capital city Beirut, and throughout southern Lebanon. Local leadership became vested in young Shi’ite clerics who saw fundamentalist Islam as an alternative to the secular political systems of the capitalist West and communist East. Thus, the organization evolved along more or less decentralized lines, a convergence of like-minded people attracted by Musawi’s militancy.

Hezbollah became more structured over time. A supreme consultative council made up of clerics and militia leaders was formed and regional committees were set up. Influential clerics emerged as “spiritual guides” to the organization, for instance, Sayyid Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah. Fadlallah, whose parents were Lebanese immigrants, was born in Najaf, Iraq, a city of Shi’ite religious schools and holy shrines, on November 16, 1935. He received a thoroughly Shi’ite Muslim education and proved himself precocious and gifted – an accomplished poet and charismatic speaker.

In 1966 the repression exercised by the secular-minded Iraqi regime against the country's ulama (the learned of Islam) forced Fadlallah out of Iraq and back to Lebanon. He settled first in the mixed Shi'ite-Palestinian shantytown of Nabaa, which was part of east Beirut. There he became the community's teacher and preacher. He developed a strong bond with the poor and oppressed of the area, setting up clinics, youth clubs, and Islamic schools. In the sermons he delivered at his mosque, he spoke of the need for an Islamic government as the best means of solving Lebanon's social and economic problems. He also denounced the imperialist economic and cultural policies he believed the West pursued in the Muslim world, as well as the existence of the state of Israel. He perceived Israel as "an instrument of the West."

In the mid-1970s, at the beginning of the Lebanese civil war, Fadlallah wrote a book entitled Islam and the Logic of Force (1976). In this work he said that the Shi'ites must arm themselves not only in self-defense against other aggressive Lebanese sectarian groups, but also so as to participate in a broader war against imperialism and Israel. He predicted that Lebanon would be a "flashpoint" in a worldwide struggle between Islam and the West. Muslims had to prepare for this struggle by gaining absolute faith in their cause. This faith would banish the fear of confronting militarily superior foes and give them the strength to make necessary sacrifices. On the other hand, he espoused careful and realistic planning. "Legitimate and effective violence," he noted, "could only proceed from belief welded to sober calculation."

The civil war forced Fadlallah out of Nabaa in 1975, and after taking refuge in south Lebanon, he was again forced to flee in 1976 because of Israeli attacks. He finally resettled in the southern Beirut neighborhood of Bir al-Abd. Here he slowly rebuilt his congregation and social service network.

The 1979 Iranian Revolution gave Fadlallah and most of his fellow Shi'ite clerics great encouragement. The notion of an Islamic government was no longer a dream. Fadlallah cooperated with the Iranian representatives in Lebanon, but initially he opposed the creation of the militant organization Hezbollah because he feared it would split the Shi'ite community. Most Shi'ites already gave their allegiance to the more moderate Amal. Instead, Fadlallah wanted to transform Amal into an Islamic fundamentalist organization. Hezbollah was established, however, with Iranian aid and soon was involved not only in the civil war, but, by the early 1980s, also in fighting the Israelis and other foreign forces in Lebanon. Fadlallah supported Hezbollah in these efforts, though he regretted the need for violence against civilians.

By this time Fadlallah was an active member of Hezbollah. Through his public anti-American and anti-Israel stance, he became identified as one of the Hezbollah leaders responsible for terrorism. In the 1980s there were repeated attempts on his life reportedly organized by both Israeli and American agents. Fadlallah survived them all, giving his supporters the impression that he was divinely protected.

Despite charismatic leaders such as Musawi and Fadlallah, Hezbollah never became truly centralized. To this day, its structure remains a relatively loose one, and individual Hezbollah chapters often operate independent of one another. This is why attempts to destroy the organization (mostly carried out by Israel) by assassinating its leaders (Musawi was murdered in 1992) have proved ineffective.

Hezbollah's leaders have maintained close connections with Iran. Into the 1990s, the Iranian embassy in Damascus, Syria, coordinated the distribution of money and supplies to Hezbollah. At the time, this amounted to some ten million dollars a month. Hezbollah used this income to two ends. One was the creation of a network of social welfare programs for the poverty-ridden Lebanese Shi'ite community. The network included schools and educational scholarships (Hezbollah has reportedly subsidized over 400,000 students), hospitals and clinics, food cooperatives, and low-income housing projects. The other end was the waging of war against those whom the organization saw as the enemies of Lebanon and responsible for the oppression and injustice in the country. This included not only many of the country's Christian and Sunni leaders, but also Israelis, Americans, and the French.

These latter groups were often targets of Hezbollah "martyrs" in the 1980s and early 1990s. The organization was involved in the 1985 hijacking of TWA flight 847 in Beirut, as well as the kidnapping of Americans such as the journalist Terry Anderson (who was the last American hostage to be released in Lebanon in December 1991) and Colonel William Higgins. Higgins, who was assigned to the United Nations peacekeeping force in Lebanon, was accused of being a spy for American intelligence and was executed while in captivity in 1990. It should be noted that Shaykh Fadlallah opposed the hijacking of a TWA airliner at Beirut and generally disapproved of hostage taking; however, his opposition to such tactics was kept within Hezbollah circles.

One of the operations that Fadlallah likely supported was the October 1983 suicide truck bombing of the United States Marines barracks on the outskirts of Beirut, which killed 250 American servicemen. It was Fadlallah who tried to explain the reasons for such suicide attacks. He explained that such suicide attacks were justified when they were part of a jihad recognized by legitimate Muslim authorities. He also observed that since the Shi'ites did not have the modern war machines of the West and Israel, they were forced to use other means; they did not have to play by the rules set by their enemies.

With the end of the Lebanese Civil War in 1990, Hezbollah's violence diminished and its political radicalism moderated. Fadlallah had much to do with this shift. While the West identified him with the organization's violent tactics, he actually proved to be one of Hezbollah's more adaptable and compromising leaders. As he put it, "I learned to be pragmatic and not to drown in illusions." Such an attitude allowed him to combine religiously derived principles and tactical realism. He argued that the Lebanese situation was very different from that of Iran, and so Muslims had to adapt to the new conditions in Lebanon. Though it would continue to seek the establishment of an eventual Islamic state in Lebanon, Hezbollah would no longer call for the violent overthrow of the government. It would accept the country's re-created democracy and seek to achieve its ends through the use of the ballot box.

Since the 1990s Hezbollah has functioned as a political party within the Lebanese parliamentary system. As of 2007, 12 members sit in the National Assembly, which makes Hezbollah the largest single party bloc. It has actively aligned itself with other parties to try to bring constitutional changes that would make the distribution of power more equitable. Such changes would increase its power within the government.

While Hezbollah now operates as a political party, it also continues to operate as a militia organization and maintains effective control of the southern part of the country. One major reason for the continuation of its armed status is the reality of aggressive and intrusive Israeli activity along Lebanon's southern border. Until 1999, Israel occupied a portion of southern Lebanon and funded an armed Maronite Christian force in the area. It was resistance on the part of Hezbollah and the high casualties it inflicted on Israeli occupation forces that helped push the Israelis out of the country. That made Hezbollah a very popular institution not only in Lebanon, but throughout the Middle East. Hezbollah, now led by the charismatic Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, repeated this performance when, in July of 2006, Israel reinvaded southern Lebanon. Ostensibly done as a response to border violence which saw the capture of two Israeli soldiers by Hezbollah, Israel's action was more likely the implementation of a plan of attack that had long been prepared. Although Israel used its superior fire power to inflict massive damage on Lebanon's civilian infrastructure, it could not defeat Hezbollah forces which were well dug in throughout the south. It also could not stop a continuous barrage of Hezbollah ground to ground missiles from disrupting life in northern Israel. Once more, Hezbollah was seen as a heroic and victorious organization throughout the region.

Hidalgo y Costilla, Miguel (1753–1811)

Edward T. Brett

Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla, born on May 8, 1753 on a hacienda in Guanajuato where his father served as overseer, was a leading Mexican nationalist and opponent of Spanish colonialism. When he was 12 he was sent to Valladolid to study with the Jesuits at the Colegio de San Francisco Javier. There the Jesuits had recently replaced traditional scholasticism with the new rationalism and scientific methods then in fashion in Europe. This innovative curriculum greatly influenced Hidalgo throughout his life.

When the Jesuits were expelled from Mexico in 1767, San Francisco Javier was closed and Miguel was forced to complete his basic education at the nearby, but more traditional, diocesan Colegio de San Nicolás Obispo. It was here that he became proficient in several indigenous languages. He matriculated at the University of Mexico, earning a bachelor's degree in theology in 1773. He was ordained a priest in 1778. Two years earlier he had begun teaching at San Nicolás Obispo, where he was eventually named rector, a position that enabled him to revise the curriculum in accordance with the Jesuit-inspired reforms he had long championed. Meanwhile, he continued his studies at the university, working towards a doctorate. Although he finished his dissertation and it was awarded a prize for the best thesis in theology, he did not receive his doctorate, since he never defended his dissertation before his doctoral board. In 1792 Hidalgo was forced to resign from his academic position, probably as a result of his radical teaching methods, his questionable orthodoxy, and his scandalous lifestyle. He had already fathered three of his five children and was said to be addicted to gambling.

After serving for ten years as pastor of two churches named San Felipe, he was assigned in 1803 to the parish of Nuestra Señora in Dolores. He immediately began projects there aimed at developing his parishioners' social awareness and mitigating their poverty. He soon began to associate with criollo (American-born Spaniards) conspirators and by 1810 had been brought into a revolutionary plot led by Ignacio Allende, a captain in the Guanajuato cavalry. Hidalgo had developed a great rapport with local Indians and mestizos and his fellow criollo conspirators hoped he could convince them to serve as foot soldiers in the revolt they planned for December 1810. In early September, however, governmental authorities discovered the plot. This caused Hidalgo and Allende, who had not yet been arrested, to begin the uprising prematurely.

Summoning his Indian and mestizo parishioners to his church, Hidalgo mesmerized them with his Grito de Dolores, possibly the most famous speech in Mexican history. Promising them a chance to regain their lost lands and win freedom from their Spanish oppressors, about 600 of his poor parishioners heeded his call. Armed with machetes and lances, they marched with Hidalgo in command and Allende as subcommander to San Miguel el Grande, attracting hundreds of additional followers along the way. Although the residents of San Miguel offered no resistance, Hidalgo was either unwilling or unable to control his undisciplined followers. After much looting, killing, and destruction of property, Allende had to call on his criollo cavalry to restore order. The rebel army next moved on to Celaya. Although they faced no resistance, the priest's rag-tag forces looted and pillaged and Allende was again forced to restore order. These two episodes mark the beginning of what eventually led to a split between Hidalgo and his criollo supporters, a split that would in the long run destroy his revolution. For whereas Hidalgo seems to have envisioned a genuine socioeconomic revolution, this was anathema to his fellow creoles, who saw his uprising as no more than a means for usurping the top-level governmental and economic positions hitherto reserved for peninsulares (Spanish-born officials in America). The criollo class initially supported Hidalgo because they expected him to use his Indian and mestizo army as cannon fodder for the criollo cause. When the priest's lower-class followers refused to adhere to their script and instead turned their wrath against all Spaniards, making no distinction between criollos and peninsulares, most creoles turned against the revolution. Switching sides, they now allied themselves with the hated peninsulares in order to protect themselves from a genuine revolution.

Following the pillaging of Celaya, Hidalgo's forces, now numbering about 25,000, moved on to Guanajuato, where for the first time they faced armed resistance. Although Hidalgo's untrained forces suffered heavy casualties, they were eventually able to take the city because they greatly outnumbered their opponents. Again the mob looted and all royalists who had survived the battle were massacred. The rebels next took Valladolid, where Hidalgo issued a proclamation declaring the abolition of slavery and the Spanish tribute system.

The insurgents next moved on towards Mexico City. As they approached the capital, they encountered a small royalist army. After a fierce battle in which Hidalgo's untrained fighters suffered heavy losses, the royalists retreated, leaving the capital with only about 500 soldiers to protect it. By this time rebel forces had swelled to about 80,000 and it seemed like Mexico City was theirs for the taking. But inexplicably, to the chagrin of Allende who urged him to attack, Hidalgo chose to retreat. With their expectations of victory and looting dashed, about half of his soldiers deserted. Moreover, for the first time since he marched from Dolores, he was unable to find new recruits. To make matters worse, his retreat enabled General Félix Calleja to move a new royalist army to the capital to bolster its defenses. It is worth noting that the royal forces consisted largely of criollos, fighting under the command of a peninsular general. This is significant for it demonstrates that the Creole class, which had earlier supported the uprising, had now turned against it due to their fear of Hidalgo's Indian and mestizo soldiers and the possibility of a genuine revolution.

By March 1811 most criollo officers who had sided with Hidalgo had switched sides and were now turning cities and towns over to royalists without a fight. One such turncoat, Francisco Elizondo, set an ambush for what was left of the rebel army. He suggested that Hidalgo and Allende, who had earlier separated their forces, rendezvous at Baján in Coahuila, where there were wells and the insurgents could replenish their water supply. Not knowing that Elizondo had turned against them, the rebel leaders fell into his trap and were captured. Hidalgo was tried and found guilty of heresy and treason and executed by firing squad on July 31, 1811, ending the first phase of the war for Mexican independence.

Hijos Movement, Children of the Disappeared

Sebastián Cominiello

In porteño jargon (the popular language of Buenos Aires and other major cities in Argentina), escrache means to put in evidence, to expose, or to make public the bad deeds of someone who previously enjoyed a good reputation and was considered honorable. Escraches consist of public protests outside the homes of those responsible for political crimes in Argentina in the 1970s to alert the neighborhood to the identity of presumed criminals. A festive spirit and a range of cultural activities, including musical and theatrical performances, accompany these forms of protest. Protesters seek to isolate accused individuals through publicly shaming them and encouraging neighbors to repudiate them. Escrache is, then, a form of popular justice arising from moral condemnation. Escraches began to be held in Argentina in 1998, during the debates in Congress surrounding the derogation of the Due Obedience and Full Stop laws, when most of those accused of human rights violations during the military dictatorship of 1976–83 were allowed to escape prosecution for their crimes. Protests were led by middle-class, professional groups.

HIJOS (Hijos por la Identidad y la Justicia contra el Olvido y el Silencio [Children for Identity and Justice and against Forgetting and Silence]) is the organization that introduced escraches as a form of protest. Its members include the children and relatives of those who “disappeared” during the military dictatorship and the previous Peronist government (which between 1973 and 1976 carried out the first killings, especially through the actions of paramilitary squads such as the Anti-Communist Argentine Alliance – Triple A – led by Juan Domingo Perón’s personal assistant, José López Rega). Created in October 1995, the main purpose of the organization is to bring justice and seek punishment for those state and parastate agents responsible for the deaths (disappearances) of thousands of men and women during the 1970s. Its first national congress set the goals, basic agenda, and the dynamics of the organization.

In social terms, escrache is a form of action corresponding to the categories of “manifestation,” “protest,” or “demonstration.” Demonstrations are one of the oldest and most common forms of political action in the expression of social interests. Escrache, then, does not constitute a novel form of protest in the history of social struggle, neither in Argentina nor in the rest of the world. Not even the festive and cultural activities surrounding escraches are new. What does distinguish escraches from other forms of protest are their goals and the social interests being represented.

Previous research has identified 66 escraches in Argentina between 1995 and 2001, 44 of which were carried out in Buenos Aires and 22 in the rest of the country. These protests were organized by HIJOS and other human rights organizations. One or two weeks before an escrache, the neighborhood was covered in graffiti depicting the face of the escrachado for the purposes of identification. Then flyers were distributed to inform people about the day, time, and location of the upcoming event. Escraches were accompanied by murgas (groups of street dancers and singers), together with art shows, sculptures, and other cultural activities. Escraches carried out by HIJOS demanded a huge amount of organization, which is why they cannot be described as the spontaneous activities that some analysts have perceived them to be.

This type of action was carried out centrally by groups of the urban petty bourgeoisie, Argentina’s “middle class,” including small and medium-size businessmen and professionals. In political terms, escraches expressed the defeat of the social forces that during the 1970s sought society’s radical transformation. The social and political context in which escraches took place (from the end of Carlos Menem’s government in 1999 to that of Fernando de la Rúa between 1999 and 2001) witnessed the moral strengthening of these subaltern classes as they reconstituted themselves as a social force. In other words, by vindicating the struggle of the 1970s and the social activists who took part in it (the desaparecidos), the participants of escraches became part of the process of creating a new social force in which new forms and actors such as the piquetero movement converged. This new social force became the main actor in the insurrections leading to the fall of de la Rúa’s government in December 2001. Escraches, then, fall between the end of one cycle of struggles (those of the 1970s) and the beginning of a new one (those of the 1990s).

Despite having their origins in the activities of human rights organizations, a large number of escraches were organized by labor unions, political parties, and other organizations. This process relates to the rise of protests leading to the popular insurrection in Buenos Aires on December 19 and 20, 2001, known as Argentinazo. Unlike escraches organized by HIJOS, in which the individual targeted was a criminal, escraches carried out by other organizations had the goal of denouncing politicians in office, such as those identified with Carlos Menem (1991–8), including economics minister Domingo Cavallo and minister of justice Carlos Corach, or organizations identified with neoliberalism such as the IMF and the World Bank.

Escraches and cacerolazos (involving protesters banging pots, pans, and other utensils) were original forms of protest developed in Argentina before the Argentinazo. Different studies undertaken from a Sartrean or autonomist perspective indicate that these forms of protest were a radical novelty, both in Argentina and throughout the world. Among these studies, the work of Colectivo Situaciones deserves particular mention. Their most representative work is the book Genocida en el Barrio: Mesa de escrache popular (2002), which highlights the phenomenon’s originality and spontaneity.

Hilferding, Rudolf (1877–1941)

Robert Goodrich

Rudolf Hilferding proved the most influential of the Austro-Marxist economists and the leading socialist theoretician under the Weimar Republic (1918–33). The son of a Jewish Viennese merchant family, Hilferding joined the circle of socialist students around M. Adler, with whom he co-founded the Marx-Studien in 1904 that served as the catalytic forum for Austro-Marxism. Hilferding later participated in the German November Revolution in 1918, supported the short-lived Independent Social Democratic Party (USPD), and twice served as finance minister of the Weimar Republic (1923, 1928–9). Following the Nazi seizure of power in 1933, he fled into exile where he was captured by the Vichy French police and disappeared in Gestapo custody in Paris in 1941.

Hilferding rose to leadership in the Social Democratic Party of Germany (SPD) through his relationship with Karl Kautsky, his editorship of Vorwärts, and his reputation as a leading economic theoretician. Yet his opposition to World War I led to his removal as editor and his consequent allegiance to the anti-war USPD for whom he edited Die Freiheit and briefly served as finance minister in 1920. Hilferding sought a centrist position during Weimar's first chaotic years, though he ultimately favored a merger with the SPD by 1922 and supported a moderate policy of parliamentary coalition to defend Weimar. In 1924 he was elected to the Reichstag where he served as the SPD's chief spokesman on financial matters. Together with Kautsky he formulated the Heidelberg Program in 1925. He again served as the finance minister between 1928 and 1929 on the eve of the Great Depression, by which time his increasingly cautious economic policies contributed to the growing alienation of rank-and-file socialists.

While Hilferding's political legacy appears one of failure (SPD support for the war; collapse of the USPD; brief tenures as finance minister; overthrow of Weimar), his theoretical contributions included his concept of organized capitalism, his contributions to the Crisis Debate, and his ideas of the “total state.”

Hilferding developed the so-called economic reading of Marx in his defense of Marxism against the Neoclassical Austrian School, or Marginalists. Building on his preliminary Böhm-Bawerk's Criticism of Marx (1904), Hilferding's Finance Capital (1910) applied the empirical experience of Central European cartelization to Das Kapital and explored the transformation of “liberal capitalism” into monopolistic “finance capital.” From these new conditions, Hilferding foresaw a new path towards socialism: “Once finance capital has brought the most important branches of production under its control, it is enough for society, through its conscious executive organ – the state conquered by the working class – to seize financial capital in order to gain immediate control of those branches of production.” In effect, monopoly and banking had altered capitalism and the state, which could serve as a neutral institution; the social revolution was transformed into a political revolution. Thus, Hilferding not only proposed the first theory of developed capitalism, later elaborated in 1915 to encompass a full theory of “organized capitalism,” but he also drew the political conclusion that socialism could be achieved through control of the state and socialization in a highly monopolistic economy even if capitalism were not fully developed. Further, he concluded that finance capital inevitably led to imperialism and the war conditions that would lead to revolution. Both propositions deeply influenced Lenin and Bukharin.

As part of the socialist response to the economic crises of the 1920s and 1930s, Hilferding participated in the Crisis Debate. He rejected the orthodox Marxist view of the inevitable breakdown of capitalism and instead contended that the concentration of capital served to stabilize capitalism. Later, in the wake of the Nazi victory, Hilferding reassessed his views on the state as he came to see the state, especially through its monopoly on violence, as an autonomous force. His theory of the “total state” became one of the foundational analyses of totalitarianism.

As the heir to Kautsky, Hilferding’s theories shaped the official views of the Second International throughout the 1920s and 1930s. However, the failure of the Weimar Republic led to an inevitable critical reaction. Consequently, Hilferding’s reputation suffered. The English and German literature offer few monographs, and, aside from translations of his major works, neither an English anthology nor a translation of the Marx-Studien exists. Nonetheless, each of his three theoretical contributions remains seminal in their respective fields; indeed, particular attention has returned to Hilferding’s Finance Capital due to the economic trends of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, explaining the noticeable increase in scholarship beginning in the 1990s.

Hindu nationalism, Hindutva, and women

Soma Marik

Gender and Hindu Nationalism

The attempt of the British colonial state to establish a centralized administration in India ended in heightened tensions between Hindus and Muslims. At the same time, British rule defined itself in a gendered manner, seeking to justify itself in part by reference to the plight, real and supposed, of Indian women. Consequently, responses to colonial rule also had to confront gender issues, especially in the context of growing Hindu cultural nationalism in the late nineteenth century, when a number of early nationalists, in their search for definitions of Indianness, identified Indian with Hindu. Having accepted British rule in the public sphere, nationalists decided that battle must be given on the terrain of the private, claiming the illegitimacy of colonial interference in domestic issues and redefining community by modernizing patriarchy.

The attempt to create a militant nationalist ideology often resulted in a sharply gendered image. Bankim Chandra Chattopadhyay, a forerunner of cultural nationalism, wrote novels which envisaged the country as motherland, with its song, Bande Mataram (salutations to the motherland), becoming a rallying cry for nationalists of Hindu origin as well as Hindu communalists. The early writings of Chattopadhyay displayed a great deal of concern for class, caste, and gender oppression, but in his later works his focus changed to a search for an ethico-religious site to define the nation. Despite his early concern for women’s rights, he also developed careful gender codes. In his 1869 Mrinalini he valorized sati, the act of self-immolation by a “chaste” woman in her husband’s funeral pyre. Thus, the nation is identified with, and rejuvenated by, the most extreme form of violence that the woman can exercise upon herself in conformity with her religion. Significantly, this came after the actual ban on sati. Many of Chattopadhyay’s contemporaries, too, argued that westerners could not understand the capability of the Hindu woman for self-sacrifice. For example, during a debate over the Age of Consent Bill (1891) Hindu nationalists argued against forbidding child marriage by insisting that saving the community was more important than the health or even life of a few individual women.

From Cultural Nationalism to Hindu Communalism

This Hindu cultural nationalism provided the basis for a more aggressive Hindu communalism in the early twentieth century. Challenges to the upper-caste and class power from peasants, “untouchables,” and other backward castes, and from other communities, led to a rise in militant Hindu chauvinism. The caste and community identifications in the census reports and the creation of the fear of the “dying Hindus” resulted in the numerically defined strength of the community becoming a significant component of communal consciousness.

It was argued that the Muslim population was rising faster, partly supposedly due to the marriage between Muslim men and Hindu widows, abducted by the former. It was also claimed, through gross distortions of history, that child marriage, and the resulting increase in widowhood, had been caused by the Muslim conquest of India and the need to protect women from the Muslim rapists. It was because of these complexities that erstwhile opponents of widow remarriage now became supporters. Widows were attacked for their lustful and carnal desires, but it was argued that these problems could be turned into advantages by reversing the decline in Hindu numbers. Thus the focus of reforms like widow marriage was changed from a rights issue to community interest. Dayanand Saraswati, founder of the Arya Samaj, was an early proponent of such views, which became quite pervasive by the 1920s.

The early 1920s saw important political changes as the unilateral withdrawal of the Non-Cooperation movement by Gandhi angered Muslims, while the assertions by “untouchables” also created tensions for the upper-caste Hindus. Hindu Mahasabha (the Hindu Assembly), and the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (the RSS – National Volunteer Organization), the first political organizations of Hindutva (radical right-wing politics based on projecting a homogeneous Hindu identity), emerged with the clear aim of restoring Brahmin-landlord-elite hegemony by constructing an ideology of Hindu supremacist fundamentalism. They sought to create an upper-caste dominated, yet apparently unified, aggressive Hindu identity by fostering an enemy image of the Muslims.

Gender was central to the Hindutva ideologues’ redefinition of the Hindu. Scholars like Gupta (2001) have demonstrated that the Hindus, according to this imagery, were, though the majority of India, always oppressed by the minority Muslims because of the former’s “effeminate” character. Women formed the boundaries of the Hindu “nation” or “race,” and were called upon to restore the manhood of the Hindus by producing strong sons – not to fight the British colonialists, but the Muslims.

From the 1920s the creation of the Muslim “Other” involved attacks on Allah, the Prophet, as an assertion that it is not merely this or that Muslim, but the essence of Islam that represents sexual perversion and a threat to all Hindus. There was a fear of the women of the other community producing more children. In 1923 Madan Mohan Malaviya, president of the Hindu Mahasabha, in a speech delivered at Benaras attempted to create a systematic narrative of abductions or victimizations of Hindu women by the aggressive males of the other community with three consequences: women were to become active agents, not merely passive victims, to protect their chastity, and therewith the honor of the community; Hindu virility was to be manifested by restricting women’s mobility and by imposing controls on women’s sexuality; and the Hindu male was urged to become aggressive and to kill the enemy so as to defend the honor of the Hindu women and community.

During the Shuddhi and Sangathan campaigns in the 1920s to “reclaim” those who had converted from Hinduism to other religions, it was explained among other things that the prime religious duty was for every sister to have a sharp knife to protect her chastity and honor. The creation of “a sister in arms” image to exhort women to be empowered for self-defense gave women an opportunity to reinforce their stereotyped mother and wife roles in a public space. They would be simultaneously brave women capable of striking terror into the enemy and of shaming Hindu men.

Such efforts eventually led to the formation, by Lakshmibai Kelkar, of the Rashtra Sevika Samity (Society of Women Serving the Nation – Samiti), a subordinate women’s wing of the RSS. In this organization the component of self, as institutionalized in atmaraksha (self-defense), is identified with the womb rather than a comprehensive individual. So the Hindu woman’s body became the appropriate site for the formation of hostile community identities which cater to the needs of the Hindu supremacist agenda.

Retributional violence, including violence on Muslim women, was advocated in a particularly frenzied tone by V. D. Savarkar, one of the founders of Hindu Mahasabha, in his voluminous communal distortions of the history of India. His vision of history always had the Aryans as a race confronting the Other. Portraying the Muslims not as Turks, Afghans, or Mughals, but as Muslims, was essential to validate the construction of Islam as the principal enemy to the Hindu nation. Hindus alone were defined as a nation, having their fatherland as well as holy land in India, while all others were outsiders. It was then argued that Muslim males were all rapists, who could only be stopped if Hindu men gave up their misplaced chivalry by raping the women of the “Enemy” community.

Contemporary Hindutva and Women’s Mobilization

Immediately after India’s independence there was tremendous communal violence, culminating in the murder of Gandhi (January 30, 1948) by Nathuram Godse, associated with both the RSS and Hindu Mahasabha. Both organizations lost credibility. To regain legality the RSS Supremo M. S. Golwalkar promised that the group would remain a “cultural” association, but it floated an electoral front, the communal and aggressive nationalist Jan Sangh (People’s Association) in 1951. After some years as a marginal force, the RSS and Jan Sangh gained in stature, especially during 1974–7, when a left-right alliance fought Indira Gandhi’s regime, resulting in her defeat in the 1977 elections. That year saw the formation of the Janata Party (Peoples’ Party), in which the Jan Sangh was an important constituent. Eventually, RSS supporters formed the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP – Indian Peoples’ Party) at the end of 1980. By the second half of the 1980s an aggressive fascist type of Hindu communalism began to be projected. The major rallying cries were the special status of Kashmir, the Uniform Civil Code (UCC), and above all, the construction of a Ram temple at the so-called Ram Janmabhoomi (birthplace of the Hindu mythological figure, Ram) by destroying the existing Babri mosque.

Gender became an important aspect of the Hindutva mobilizations as women were brought into extremely visible and active roles. During the campaigns of the late 1980s and early 1990s the Rashtra Sevika Samiti literature emptied motherhood of its customary emotional and affective load and charged mothers with bringing up heroic children. But the thrust of the transformation of the Samiti was to erase concern with social and gender justice and to situate the public identity in a totalitarian model derived from the RSS as an all-male organization.

While the Samiti looked at middle-class women of mainly upper castes, other organizations were floated to attract women of other kinds. The Durga (goddess of power) Vahini (forces) was launched to create vocal women who would actually take part in communal violence. Female role models and leaders exhorting violence included Uma Bharati and Sadhvi (female ascetic) Rithambhara. The latter, a relatively obscure young woman, projected dramatically during the Ramjanmabhoomi campaigns of 1986–92, delivered hate-speeches. These ringing exhortations to Hindu men to arise and kill Muslims were recorded and distributed through audio cassettes even in areas previously free of communal tensions. Warrior images were also drawn to mobilize women, who were to use their anger to give birth to avenging sons, while the space for violence was ultimately reserved for men. Uma Bharati, another sanyasin (ascetic), also played a central role during the attack in 1992, on the Babri Masjid, which had been created by a general of the emperor Babar by destroying a temple dedicated to Ram, according to the myth created by the RSS and its “family,” including the Viswa Hindu Parishad (World Hindu Council–VHP) and the Bajrang Dal (Party of Hanuman, a Gray Langur who was the greatest devotee of Ram in the epic).

Hindutva and Muslim Women

The campaigns also included sustained planning to inflict violence on women of the Other, primarily Muslims, but also Christians, and even Hindu women who did not conform. The election of BJP or BJP-led governments, whether at provincial or central levels, gave added thrust to the gender dimensions of the Hindutva brigade’s strategies. One of its repeated arguments has been the need to bring in a Uniform Civil Code. But while the demand for a UCC from the women’s movement even before independence had been based on a concern for gender justice and a perceived injustice in all religious Personal Laws, the Hindutva forces identified the UCC with the Hindu legal code, possibly with marginal modifications, imposed on all communities in the name of national unity.

Court verdicts having Hindu slants, from the Shah Bano case (1985) to the Sarla Mudgal case (1995), strengthened this campaign. It was argued that the existence of the Muslim Personal Law made them non- or anti-national.

For public consumption there was often a claim that Muslim women were oppressed due to the existence of Muslim polygamy and the survival of a form of divorce in which the husband can simply say “talaq” three times to the wife to divorce her. This concealed the fact that there are more illegal Hindu polygamies than legal Muslim polygamies. Also, targeting Muslim Personal Laws ignores the reality that all communities are governed by unequal anti-woman Personal Laws, and that even people who do not identify as Hindus are linked to Hindu laws of inheritance and various forms of Hindu customs and rituals. Thus the campaign over the UCC was sought to be hijacked by the BJP and turned into a weapon against Muslims. It also compelled Muslim women, many of whom had fought for their rights under secular laws, to choose between gender and community while their community came under extreme threats.

Violence on women was carried out and justified in a number of ways. The rape of nuns in Jhabua (BJP-ruled Madhya Pradesh) in 1998 was declared a patriotic Hindu reaction to Christian conspiracies concerning conversions by the general secretary of the VHP. Home minister L. K. Advani refused to condemn this in parliament. But the most sustained violence carried out according to the fascist worldview was in Gujarat in 2002. Savarkar’s formula excluded Muslims and Christians from the body-politic as outsiders. The central conclusion drawn from this by the Hindutva brigade is that revenge must be taken on all Muslims. The prolonged BJP rule in Gujarat (since 1995) enabled it to communalize state and civil society alike within a few years. Following this, careful plans were laid for a pogrom, with names of Muslims and Muslim-owned establishments marked out, using voter lists and sales tax records. A fire in a train that killed a number of people at the Godhra station in Gujarat, including Ram Janmabhoomi activists returning from Ayodhya (the site of the so-called Janmabhoomi), in February 2002, was used as the excuse to set off pogroms.

One of the most spectacular forms of sadism in these events had been the nature of violence on Muslim female and infantile bodies. At the mass grave that was dug on March 6 to provide burial to 96 bodies from Naroda Patiya (Ahmedabad), 46 women were buried. In a large number of cases women were paraded naked, raped, gang-raped, mutilated, and objects were inserted into their bodies, and children were killed in front of them.

In readings of community violence, rape is taken to be a sign of collective dishonoring. Patriarchy designates the female body as the ultimate symbol of community purity. Therefore, rape of women of the Other community constitutes the greatest dishonor to them. Rape, in Gujarat violence, obviously performed that function. The violence of Gujarat reflected the revenge theme, as well as the fear of Muslim fertility. Hence the killing of children and their bearers, too. At the same time, by drawing in dalits and adivasis (former “untouchables” and “tribals”), they were assured that at least in inflicting violence and sexual assault on Muslims, they would be treated as equals.

Hirschfeld, Magnus (1868–1935)

Larry W. Heiman

Magnus Hirschfeld was a German physician, sexologist, and author best known today for his exhaustive study of all aspects of human sexuality.

A prominent champion of the acceptance and decriminalization of homosexuality, he was also a social reformer in areas of women's reproductive rights, socialized medicine, and prostitution.

In 1896 Hirschfeld published the pamphlet Sappho und Sokrates, under the pseudonym Th. Ramien, prompted by the suicide of a patient distressed by society's rejection of his homosexuality. It presented Hirschfeld's first ideas on the biological basis of homosexuality. He argued that homosexuality was a variant of human love that should be both scientifically studied and decriminalized, "a natural, inborn variation that simply occurs statistically less often than heterosexuality but can equally form the basis of the noblest love" (Brennan & Hegarty 2007: 8). Although criticized in his time for theories not always supported by science, Hirschfeld's doctrine of Zwischenstufenlehre or "sexual intermediaries," with its primacy of sexual variance and rejection of a hetero/homosexual binary, foresaw by decades twentieth-century queer theory discussions of a dichotomous sexuality.

Other groundbreaking publications by Hirschfeld would follow, including Die Transvestiten (Transvestites) in 1910, a term he originated; Die Homosexualität des Mannes und des Weibes (The Homosexuality of Men and Women) in 1914, his major study of homosexuality; Sexualpathologie (Sexual Pathology) in 1917–20, intended as a textbook for physicians and medical students; and Geschlechtskunde (Sexology) in 1926–30, a summation of his life's work.

In 1897 in Berlin, Hirschfeld cofounded the Wissenschaftlich-humanitäres Komitee (Scientific-Humanitarian Committee). With "justice through science" as its motto, it was the world's first organization dedicated to social and legal emancipation of homosexuals and other sexual minorities through scientifically based research and understanding. The Komitee's first point of action was to start a campaign for repeal of Paragraph 175, the provision of the German Criminal Code that made male homosexual acts a crime. Supported by political parties of the left and with the signatures of many prominent Germans, Hirschfeld and the Komitee worked during the next 30 years, making various petitions to the Reichstag, but the provision's repeal never attained a majority of support in the German parliament. (The provision would not be completely nullified until 1994.) In 1899 the Komitee began publishing Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen (Yearbook for Sexual Intermediaries), the first journal devoted to scholarship on sexual variance. It ceased publication in 1923 after 23 volumes.

In 1919 Hirschfeld opened in Berlin the Institut für Sexualwissenschaft (Institute for Sexual Science), a center for the study of all aspects of sexuality. It also served as a counseling service on marriage and sexual problems and would eventually house the results of over 10,000 interviews from a questionnaire on sexuality developed by Hirschfeld, as well as a library and museum of international scope on sexuality. As a means of bringing sexologists together, Hirschfeld organized the first International Congress for Sexual Reform in 1921 in Berlin, which led to the formation of the World League for Sexual Reform. Other conferences followed, under the new name of the Congress of the World League for Sexual Reform, in Copenhagen, London, Vienna, and lastly in Brno, Czechoslovakia, in 1932.

Hirschfeld's notoriety as a sexologist eventually led to his becoming a controversial figure and the object of both personal and professional attacks. Carl Jung and Albert Moll published prominent criticisms of his work and were eventually joined by Sigmund Freud, an early supporter. Among the criticisms were inflated statistics, unsubstantiated theories, and his political activism getting in the way of science. Hirschfeld's court appearances as an expert witness publicly identifying homosexuals, most notoriously during the Eulenberg Affair, caused many supporters to turn against him, even though his testimony often kept people from being jailed. Benedikt Friedländer, Adolf Brand, and other homosexual rights activists broke with Hirschfeld over his ideas on homosexuality, which in their view identified all male homosexuals as effeminate and all female homosexuals as masculine. His being Jewish made him a target of right-wing nationalists and Nazis. His lectures were often disrupted, and he was physically threatened and assaulted on several occasions.

In 1930 Hirschfeld left Germany for a lecture tour of the United States, where the press dubbed him "the Einstein of Sex" (Bauer 2004: 1). He extended his tour to include Hawaii, Japan, China, the Philippines, Indonesia, Ceylon (Sri Lanka), India, Egypt, and Palestine. Throughout his travels abroad he was received with honor and lauded for his achievements. Returning to Europe in 1932, he remained in France after receiving warnings about the growing anti-Semitism in Germany. In 1933 the Nazis ransacked the Institut für Sexualwissenschaft, burning its library and files, an event Hirschfeld viewed in newsreel footage at a Paris cinema. He died in exile in Nice in 1935.

Hitler, Adolf (1889–1945) and German Nazism

Amy Beth Carney

Nazism was a political movement and mass ideology that developed in Germany following the country's defeat in World War I. As a form of fascism, Nazism did not have a single founder or ideological theory but drew upon many ideas and philosophies that originated in the nineteenth century, including a racial history of civilization, the “science” of eugenics, and notions of crowd psychology. It was also influenced by nationalism, which was on the rise throughout Europe by the last third of the nineteenth century. Nazism differed from other forms of fascism by its devotion to the ideal of the “blond-haired, blue-eyed” Aryan race. The perception of Germans possessing these physical attributes derives from the work of the first-century Roman historian Tacitus, who erroneously depicted ancient Germans in such terms.

The Growth of Fascism in the Postwar Years

Though strongly shaped by the recent past, fascism, and subsequently Nazism, only developed as an independent ideology following World War I. As with communism, the other ideology born from that war, fascism promised to solve society's postwar ills and to foster greater unity among the people. However, whereas communism had an international focus, fascism had a national one. It additionally pledged to deliver a strong leader who would overcome the paralysis in society that had been created by inefficient democracies. This promise of an authoritarian leader appealed to many people, especially as they suffered from political instability, inflation, and unemployment in the postwar era. Fascism further boasted that it was anti-communist: during the interwar years, both fascism and communism gained popularity on the basis that one ideology represented the antithesis of the other.

Fascism appealed to many people worldwide in the 1920s and 1930s. For example, the British Union of Fascists promoted a patriotism which emphasized the values of king, country, and empire. It called for a strong government that would rejuvenate the economic, political, and social life of Britain. In Spain, the Falange Española (Spanish Falanx) made little headway politically until after the Spanish Civil War when Francisco Franco's new government turned it into the country's sole political party. Despite this status, the Falanx had no real power in Franco's authoritarian regime. Fascism likewise developed in the United States, but no movement ever gained a large following. However, a few prominent Americans espoused fascism, including poet Ezra Pound and Louisiana governor and senator Huey Long. Active movements were also established in China and Japan, both of which emphasized the militaristic aspects of fascism. As for Latin America, groups in Argentina and Chile imitated the European parties, though they never achieved electoral success. Thus, while acceptance of fascism was widespread, fascist parties never achieved any major success except in Germany and Italy.

German Fascism

Within Germany, World War I had bankrupted the imperial regime militarily, politically, financially, and morally and had left the nation unprepared to cope with defeat. Furthermore, although it symbolized a hope for a new start, the Weimar Republic, which had been proclaimed on November 9, 1918 following the abdication of Kaiser Wilhelm II, was beset with internal and external problems.

The Weimar Republic

Domestically, the new government had to manage a sudden and large demobilization. Officials feared this mass movement of soldiers might create disorder; however, demobilization went smoothly because it was the only task the army had to complete. The soldiers were proudly welcomed home, and the jovial reception by the public helped shape the legend that the German army had never been defeated on the battlefield. This inability to recognize their military loss was politically damaging to the fledgling Weimar government as many Germans came to believe that the army could have won the war had the republic not stabbed it in the back.

The new government additionally had to convert the economy from one concerned with military needs toward one designed to serve the general public. There were several impediments to this transition. Inflation, which had begun during the war, inhibited recovery. The postwar Allied blockade, the shortages of general supplies, and the lack of government purchases following the war created more problems. The Weimar Republic also made poor economic choices: decisions that would have aided financial growth in the long run were not implemented because they were politically disastrous in the short term. Instead, the government created policies that were designed to foster immediate political support from the people at the expense of long-term economic recovery.

A third domestic issue that plagued the Weimar Republic was nostalgia among the people for the prewar period. Numerous Germans believed that World War I, combined with postwar inflation and abortive revolutions, had unraveled the moral fabric of their country. Thus, many of them wanted to return to what they believed had been a “normal” life. They assumed that if the moral decline could be reversed, then normal peacetime conditions would return. However, this life that many Germans imagined had existed in the past never actually existed, and the Weimar government bore responsibility for the failure to return to the perceived better times.

The Legacy of Versailles

Beyond these internal issues, there was one major external problem that stigmatized the Weimar Republic: the Treaty of Versailles. Signed on June 28, 1919 at the Palace of Versailles, this treaty imposed harsh and vindictive terms. Throughout the 1920s and 1930s, hatred for this treaty, especially Article 231 which branded Germany as the sole instigator of the war, was the only factor that united all Germans. There is no doubt that the treaty harmed Germany economically and politically, but in reality, the myth of the severity of the treaty caused more psychological than material damage. The humiliation imposed by the Versailles Diktat, as the Germans referred to it, disenchanted many people and embittered them toward the democratic government that had signed it.

Overall, the Weimar Republic was beset with domestic and foreign setbacks that it could not resolve. The German people became disenchanted with democracy before it had a chance to establish itself. However, the failure of democracy did not automatically lead to the rise of National Socialism. The Nazi party was only one of many political factions vying for power and voters in the 1920s. These small groups challenged the hegemony of the traditional political parties by proclaiming they could solve the problems of German society, especially the plights of the middle and working classes.

The German Workers' Party

The German Workers' Party (Deutsche Arbeiterpartei, DAP) – the precursor of the Nazi party – was founded on January 5, 1919 by a Munich locksmith named Anton Drexler. It espoused nationalism and lionized the importance of a unified German people. The party also promoted anti-Semitism, though this was not unique, as this mentality had been prominent since the last decades of the nineteenth century.

Party leaders had ambitions to develop the DAP into a mass organization that would represent the German workers. However, initial growth was limited. The transformation of the party into a nationally recognized and successful political entity primarily resulted from the efforts of the man who would become the DAP's most famous member: Adolf Hitler. The DAP had originally come to Hitler's attention through his work for the German army when the military had assigned him to monitor the Munich faction. Hitler was not initially impressed with the party, but he still joined in September 1919 because he believed its content and goals could still be molded.

Over the next few months the DAP shaped its political program, laying out a 25-point plan in February 1920 that included calling for the creation of a German state based on national self-determination. That same month the party changed its name to the National Socialist German Workers' Party (Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei, NSDAP). The term "Nazi" comes from the compression of the first two words. Another change to the party was its size: its numbers grew throughout that year, largely due to Hitler's rhetorical abilities. His skills as a propagandist provided the NSDAP with a reputation for being more energetic than other political parties, and the people of Munich began to attend NSDAP rallies in greater numbers. By 1921, party membership reached 3,000 and several local party branches had been formed outside of the Bavarian capital.

The Rise of Adolf Hitler

This popular leader, Adolf Hitler, was born on April 20, 1889 in Braunau on the River Inn, Austria, to Klara Hitler. Though there are doubts about his paternity, Alois Hitler raised him as his son. He was their fourth child, but the first one to survive infancy. Hitler attended many schools in his youth, and while he received fairly good marks as a young child, his performance declined during his adolescence. After he finished school at age 16, his father had high hopes for Hitler to follow in his career path and become a civil servant. Hitler, however, wanted to become an artist and rejected the idea of joining the civil service. He attempted to enter the Academy of Fine Arts in Vienna in 1907 and 1908; he failed the entrance examination both times. Hitler spent the next five years in Vienna painting and performing manual labor. There he was exposed to anti-Semitism, which was endemic in prewar Vienna.

In 1913 he moved to Munich, partially to continue to avoid military service in the Austrian army. Yet, when World War I broke out, Hitler volunteered for a Bavarian regiment. He fought on the western front, where he was wounded in the leg, promoted to lance corporal, and received the Iron Cross First and Second Classes. Hitler believed that the war was the most important time in his life, and he was upset with Germany's defeat, which he learned about while recovering in a hospital from temporary gas blindness. After the war, he remained in the army, but returned to Munich. In 1919, the army ordered him to investigate the German Workers' Party, and that is what led to his involvement with the party, which gave him a niche to which he could devote his energy. During his early years with the party, he dedicated his time to propaganda speeches, a task for which he was eminently suited. The topics of his speeches ranged from contrasting Germany's present weakness with its former strength, accusing Jews of obstructing German victory, lambasting the British and French for their intention to destroy Germany, condemning the Treaty of Versailles, and censuring the German government for ruining the country politically and economically. These topics were hardly original, but Hitler's success lay in his ability to present these unoriginal ideas in a novel way.

By May 1921, Hitler was no longer just the leading propagandist of the NSDAP, he had also become its leader. His ascendancy created friction among party leaders, many of whom did not want to have Hitler direct the party. Nonetheless, other leaders capitulated to Hitler's personal rule because they recognized that the successful growth of the party was due to him, so they amended the party's constitution and gave him dictatorial control.

Hitler consolidated his rule by gaining the loyalty of party members. His primary supporters were from the party's paramilitary organization, the Sturmabteilung ("Storm Troopers," or SA). The role of the SA was to protect party meetings and march in rallies, though these duties often led to scuffles with other political soldiers, especially communists. With the backing of the SA, Hitler believed he could ignite a revolution that would topple the Weimar Republic. On November 8–9, 1923, the Nazi party attempted to emulate Benito Mussolini's successful March on Rome with its own march on Berlin; this abortive coup, known as the Beer Hall Putsch, failed and led to the dissolution of the NSDAP and the incarceration of its leader.

Hitler was placed on trial for treason, and during the proceedings he assumed full responsibility for his actions. The court sentenced him to five years in jail, but he remained incarcerated for only nine months, during which he dictated Mein Kampf. In this book, Hitler expounded on his basic worldview. He proclaimed that history was a struggle among different races and that Germany, with its superior Aryan race, would be led to victory in this struggle by a dictator who could make the German people aware of their racial heritage and future. Part of this future victory included attaining Lebensraum, or living space, for the German people. Besides spending his time dictating Mein Kampf, Hitler also requested that the Austrian government terminate his citizenship in March 1925 because of his service record in the German army and his desire to become a German citizen. His Austrian citizenship was terminated one month later, although he would not gain German citizenship until February 1932.

The Nazi Party

After his prison sentence, Hitler devoted himself not just to reestablishing the party, but to making the NSDAP a legal force in German politics. Weimar Germany was a democratic republic, so the re-formed Nazi party sought to achieve power through the electorate. Throughout the mid- and late 1920s, the party continued to grow, gaining support primarily from people who longed for an authority that could save Germany from its worsening economic problems. Starting in late 1928 and deteriorating further with the onset of the Depression in late 1929, Germany's economy plummeted, exacerbating the poor economic decisions made by the government earlier in the decade. Moreover, this economic downturn eroded democracy as each successive chancellor sought to solve the problem by ruling through emergency decrees and not through the Reichstag, the German parliament. These chancellors normalized authoritarian rule as a viable alternative prior to the Third Reich.

Once on the fringe of the political system, the NSDAP now came to the forefront. In each successive Reichstag election, the Nazi party gained seats, and by 1930 it had become the second largest political party. With this electoral achievement, Hitler ran for president in 1932 against incumbent Paul von Hindenburg. In his campaign, Hitler traveled around Germany by plane and personally addressed millions of people. Despite this successful modern propaganda campaign, Hitler lost the election. Nonetheless, the Nazi party subsequently became the largest party in the Reichstag by July 1932 after receiving over 37 percent of the vote. Hitler tried to use this electoral success to persuade Hindenburg to appoint him chancellor. Hindenburg refused at first, and this refusal was Hitler's greatest setback since the 1923 putsch. However, after former Chancellor Franz von Papen persuaded the president to reconsider his refusal, Hindenburg relented and appointed Hitler chancellor on January 30, 1933.

Hitler consolidated his power over the course of the next few months. In March 1933, the Reichstag building was set on fire, enabling Hitler to solidify his control when the Reichstag subsequently passed the Enabling Act, which indefinitely suspended all personal liberties granted by the Weimar constitution and essentially gave him the power to rule uninhibited. This Act furthermore signaled the end of other political parties. By July, every political party but the NSDAP had been banned. Hitler additionally strengthened his position by seizing the presidency upon the death of Hindenburg in August 1934. Shortly thereafter, the German army personally swore an oath of allegiance to him. The actual impetus for this oath did not come from Hitler or any member of the Nazi party, but from the army leaders, who hoped that such a pledge would divorce Hitler from the NSDAP and make him loyal to the armed forces.

Totalitarianism in Germany

The reordering of German life to suit the Nazi party was never specifically instigated by Hitler. He was simply the ultimate beneficiary as millions of Germans willingly collaborated with the Nazification of the country. While the Nazi party maintained the support of over one-third of the German population until the end of the Third Reich, a much higher portion acceded to the changes because of their confidence in Hitler. In the mid-1930s, this trust seemed to be well placed. For example, the economic policies of the Hitler government, although not radically different from those made by the Weimar Republic, solved the economic and unemployment crises. Approval for the Nazi regime increased due to foreign policy decisions, such as the withdrawal of Germany from the League of Nations, the remilitarization of the country, the formation of the Berlin–Rome–Tokyo Axis, and the removal of Germany’s signature from the Treaty of Versailles.

Faith in the Führer (leader), as Hitler was commonly called, remained strong. He did not have to direct either the party or the government, especially as it became common for party and government officials to implement policies that they believed would promote what they presumed to be Hitler’s will. This course of action meant that the Führer could be a dictator without having to dictate. It established a cult of Hitler that permeated the country. The very existence of Nazi society became based not on a shared loyalty to fascist ideology, but on a collective allegiance to one man. From 1933 to 1945, this fidelity was bolstered through propaganda which, as clearly illustrated by the slogan Ein Volk, ein Reich, ein Führer (One people, one nation, one leader), promoted Hitler as the man who had restored Germany to its former strength and glory.

The solidification of Nazi control led to the permeation of the NSDAP into the everyday lives of the German people. For many, this infiltration came from belonging to the party or one of its organizations. The SA still existed and boasted a strong membership. However, the leadership of the German army as well as many prominent businessmen who supported the party felt threatened by the ambitions of the SA and its leader, Ernst Röhm. To gain the backing of the army and to continue the sponsorship of the business community, Hitler had the SA purged on June 30, 1934. During this event, the Night of the Long Knives, approximately 200 people were killed, including Röhm. Two weeks later in a speech to the Reichstag, Hitler accepted full responsibility for the murders. The international community was horrified by this incident, though there were no real signs of domestic disapproval.

The SA continued to exist, but following the purge, its place as the dominant party organization was taken over by the smaller, more elite Schutzstaffeln (“Protective Squadrons,” or SS). Founded in 1925, the SS had begun its meteoric ascension under the leadership of Heinrich Himmler, who became its head in 1929. As the elite faction of the party, SS men supposedly embodied the ideal characteristics of the superior Aryan race, but although all applicants had to meet strict physical guidelines, most members did not have blond hair and blue eyes. Furthermore, during the 12 years of the Nazi regime, the SS built up its own economic empire, almost becoming an independent state within the Third Reich.

All sectors of society were brought into the Nazi fold. For women in Nazi society, there was the Nationalsozialistische Frauenschaft (National Socialist Women’s Association, NSF). The top female leader of the NSF, Gertrud Scholtz-Klink, promoted the Nazi standpoint that encouraged women to stay home raising large families. A women’s role was exemplified by three Ks: Kinder, Küche, Kirche (children, kitchen, church). As for children, adolescent and teenage boys joined the Hitlerjugend (Hitler Youth) and young girls participated in its female equivalent, the Bund der deutscher Mädel (League of German Maidens). Membership in these youth organizations reached into the millions, and the Nazi party developed a comprehensive program to educate the children about the values of National Socialism and to instill in them a reverence for their Führer.

Even people who did not join either the party or any affiliate organization could not escape Nazi encroachment into their lives. One of the Nazi party’s highest aims was to create a Volksgemeinschaft, or people’s community, that incorporated all ethnic Germans. The NSDAP posited that it would form a racial state by accumulating all Germans whom it believed had “good” hereditary qualities and convincing these people to reproduce, thus creating a healthy and thriving German population. This perspective led the Nazi party to assert that married couples should produce a minimum of four children and to value women who exceeded that number.

Eugenics and Race in the Nazi State

Not everyone in Germany, however, was a valued member of the Volksgemeinschaft, and the NSDAP clearly indicated who did not belong in the Third Reich. The primary group that the Nazi party excluded was the Jews, though the Nazis sought to remove anyone they deemed inferior, such as Slavic peoples. The Nazi government implemented various measures designed to eradicate these people from German society. In July 1933, the regime passed a compulsory sterilization law that affected anyone with certain physical or mental disabilities. During the 1935 Nuremberg rally, the party proclaimed the Nuremberg laws, which defined who was Jewish, prohibited marriage and sexual relations between Jews and Germans, and stripped Jews of their German citizenship. Other ostracized groups included asocials, communists, criminals, gypsies, and homosexuals.

The Nazi party successfully enforced its racial policies because it had the cooperation of the majority of the people. Without this support, the Nazi government and its secret police, the Geheime Staatspolizei (“Secret State Police,” or “Gestapo”), could have never efficiently implemented such measures. Although many Germans believed that the Gestapo had agents everywhere, in reality this police organization relied on denunciations. For the Gestapo to create an effective police state, it had to elicit the participation of the people and then act on the information they provided. Consequently, ordinary German citizens, most of whom were not fervent Nazis, played a key role in the creation of the Nazi state.

Hitler’s Foreign Policy

As chancellor, president, and head of the German armed forces, Hitler set an aggressive foreign policy. He withdrew Germany from the League of Nations in late 1933, arguing that while Germany had disarmed as stipulated by the Treaty of Versailles, other world powers had not followed through with their promises to reduce their armaments. He formed the Rome–Berlin–Tokyo Axis between 1936 and 1940. This alignment of powers started with the signing of an accord between Germany and Italy in 1936. It continued with the joining of Germany and Japan to form an anti-Comintern pact later that same year. Germany and Italy then created a military alliance in May 1939, and Japan joined this partnership in September 1940. Once formed, the Axis powers remained aligned with one another until Germany’s unconditional surrender at the end of World War II.

Additionally, in blatant violation of the Treaty of Versailles, Hitler remilitarized the Rhineland in 1936 by sending German troops across the Rhine River to occupy the demilitarized zone that had existed between Germany and France since 1919. The citizens of the region warmly welcomed the arrival of these soldiers. Both France and Britain criticized Hitler for this aggressive action, but neither nation physically intervened. Emboldened by his success in the Rhineland, Hitler continued to make brash foreign policy decisions. Speaking to the Reichstag on his fourth anniversary as chancellor in 1937, he removed Germany’s signature from the Treaty of Versailles. Hitler declared that the treaty had been signed by a weak German government which had acted under duress and against its better judgment. By withdrawing Germany from the confines imposed by Versailles, Hitler claimed that he was primarily disregarding the clause in the treaty which had branded Germany solely responsible for World War I.

The Quest for Lebensraum and Appeasement

Hitler’s foreign policy decisions in the interwar era culminated with the physical expansion of Germany. One of the first points of the Nazi party program was the unification of all German people into one land. This process began when the Hitler government forced an Anschluss, or unification, of Germany and Austria in March 1938. Despite the pressure used to compel the Austrian government to capitulate to its own obliteration as a sovereign nation, the people of Austria fervently welcomed Hitler’s arrival to his home country, and in a plebiscite held less than one month after the Anschluss, the Austrian people voted almost unanimously in favor of the union.

Hitler continued on his path to unite all Germans when he demanded that Czechoslovakia turn over the Sudetenland, a region of the country primarily populated by Germans, to Germany. To forestall German military aggression against Czechoslovakia, other foreign leaders intervened in September 1938. Hitler met with fellow fascist leader and Italian Prime Minister Benito Mussolini, British Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain, and French Premier Edouard Daladier in Munich. The latter three leaders sought to appease Hitler and avoid war by permitting an immediate transfer of the Sudetenland to Germany in return for his promise that he would respect the territorial integrity of the remaining land of Czechoslovakia. Hitler agreed, and the other leaders left Munich believing they had secured peace. However, Hitler betrayed this promise in March 1939 when he sent German troops to occupy Czechoslovakia.

Nevertheless, Hitler's popularity among the German people soared. Most citizens firmly backed him because he had revitalized the nation and restored its dignity without any bloodshed. His authoritarian rule was bolstered by this popular support. By this time, Hitler reigned supreme in Germany because not only he, but most of the German population as well, believed in his infallibility as a leader. The only other power in Germany which could have kept Hitler and his ambitions in check was the army, but the military was far more concerned with restraining the Nazi party than its leader.

The Nazi–Soviet Non-Aggression Pact

The final prewar foreign policy decision that Hitler made for Germany involved the Soviet Union. In August 1939, to the surprise of other European powers, these two countries signed the Nazi–Soviet Pact, or Molotov–Ribbentrop Pact. Officially, this was a non-aggression pact which meant that Germany and the Soviet Union would not fight one another should a European war break out. Unofficially, it allowed for the division of Eastern Europe between Hitler and Soviet ruler Joseph Stalin. While this agreement came as a shock to the German people, it did mean that Germany could avoid a costly two-front war, as had plagued the country during World War I.

World War II

The Nazi–Soviet Pact ultimately provided Hitler with the security he needed to invade Poland on September 1, 1939. Two days later, Britain and France declared war on Germany, and World War II had commenced in Europe. Following the defeat of Poland, Germany continued with successful attacks against Norway, the Low Countries, and France in the spring of 1940, ending with the French capitulation in June 1940. Hitler was elated when the French government sued for peace in June 1940, and he forced the French to sign their capitulation in the same railcar that Germany had signed the armistice ending World War I. These successes gave Hitler a series of almost unprecedented political, diplomatic, and military triumphs.

With the fall of France, Hitler wanted to end the war between Germany and Britain, but the British continually rejected all German peace offers. He then attempted and failed to invade Britain in late 1940. This failure led Hitler to believe that Britain was holding out against Germany because it was waiting for support from the Soviet Union. He thus thought that beating the Soviet Union would force the British to admit defeat too. Therefore, in June 1941, under the pretense that the Soviets were going to invade, Germany attacked the Soviet Union. This German invasion was initially successful, but despite early gains it became clear that the invasion was a failure. The Soviet Union was eventually able to rebound, and after the catastrophic German loss at Stalingrad in February 1943, the German armed forces found themselves on the defensive.

The Beginning of the End

The war in the east absorbed all of Hitler's energy and left little time for public appearances, which had been the basis of his political success since he had joined the Nazi party in 1919. Consequently, his popularity among the German people began to fall. Despite mounting German losses in the eastern theater between 1941 and 1944, and a growing desire among the German people to see the fighting end, Hitler insisted on continuing the war. During these years his distrust of the German army officers grew, and he believed that all of Germany's military problems were caused by the betrayal, incompetence, disobedience, and weakness of others. Hitler felt that he could only rely on himself for command decisions; no other Axis or Allied head of state was so intimately involved with the military affairs of his country. World War II took a heavy toll on his health, and he also survived many assassination attempts, including an assault on July 20, 1944. Because some army officers had been involved in this failed plot, Hitler's conviction that he could not trust the army leadership grew even stronger.

In spite of the continued successes of the Allied forces by 1945, Hitler refused to retreat. He no longer had a clear perception of the military action, and his orders became more chaotic. Finally realizing that the war was lost, he gave up command responsibilities in late April. On April 29, he married his mistress Eva Braun and dictated his will. In this testament, he named his political successors – Karl Dönitz as president, Joseph Goebbels as chancellor, and Martin Bormann as party chancellor – and expelled long-time supporters Hermann Göring and Heinrich Himmler from the party. One day later, he and his wife committed suicide. Their bodies were removed from his bunker in Berlin and burned. The only physical remains of Hitler were fragments of his jaw bone, which the Soviet army confiscated when they captured the bunker. The empire that Hitler had built, the so-called Thousand Year Reich, outlasted him by one week.

Genocide

Despite military defeat, the Nazi regime expended an enormous amount of resources implementing the Final Solution. Prior to the war, the NSDAP had wanted to rid Germany of the Jews, and coercing them to immigrate was the principal method of removal. The war eliminated this possibility, and following the invasion of the Soviet Union, Nazi Germany instigated a more lethal solution. Originally, a series of battalions called Einsatzgruppen (task forces) was deployed to round up Jews, communists, and other enemies on the eastern front and execute them by firing squad. Within a year, this method of execution was supplemented with the opening of six death camps in occupied Poland. No documentation exists to indicate when the Nazi regime decided upon the Final Solution or if Hitler knew of or ordered this course of action. However, by the end of the war, over 11 million people had died in the Holocaust, 6 million of whom were Jewish.

The End of the Nazi Regime

Overall, World War II had a tremendous influence on Germany and the Nazi regime. Although support for Hitler never completely diminished, his popularity did fall throughout the war as the brutal realities of the conflict were evident not only to the soldiers at the fronts, but to the civilians at home who suffered material deprivations and constant aerial bombardment by Allied bombers.

After the war the Allied governments recognized that the treaties which had ended World War I were partially responsible for the rise of Nazism and World War II, and they opted to hold trials to conclude this war instead of writing new treaties. The Trial of the Major War Criminals was held in Nuremberg, Germany from November 1945 to October 1946. Twenty-four high-ranking Nazi and German officials as well as six organizations – including the Nazi party, the SA, and the SS – were put on trial. The charges were conspiracy to commit crimes against peace; planning, initiating, and waging wars of aggression; war crimes; and crimes against humanity. The defendants received a range of sentences from acquittal, to prison terms, to execution. This trial marked the initiation of an intense de-Nazification process that the Allied governments believed was necessary for German recovery.

Hitler, assassination plot of July 20, 1944

Ingo Schmidt

On July 20, 1944, on his way to a military briefing, general staff officer Claus Schenk Graf von Stauffenberg placed a bomb in Hitler's headquarters in East Prussia. By pure chance, Hitler survived the assault. Later that day, Stauffenberg, along with a number of co-conspirators, was arrested and executed without a trial. The goal of this attempted coup was to replace the Nazi regime by a military dictatorship and to enter a coalition with Britain, France, and the US that could have continued the war against the Soviet Union. The conspirators realized that Nazi Germany's defeat was imminent when they planted the bomb in 1944, but their reasons for wanting to oust Hitler went deeper than a desire to prevent Germany's humiliating defeat.

Indeed, the history of the assassination attempt went back to the late 1930s when the Nazis and the German Armed Forces were preparing the annexation of Czechoslovakia and open warfare against other neighboring countries. Most state and military officials shared the imperialistic goal of expanding Germany's political and economic rule, particularly in Eastern Europe, and establishing German hegemony over all of Europe, but they argued for the use of diplomatic instead of military means, or at least for the postponement of military action until the German army was sufficiently prepared. Among those skeptics were Ludwig Beck, Chief of the General Staff in 1938, and Carl Goerdeler, Commissioner of the Third Reich (Reichskommissar) until 1935 and mayor of the city of Leipzig until 1937. Beck was designated to be named president after a successful assassination of Hitler, and Goerdeler was to be made chancellor in that case. However, these plans were delayed by German military victories between 1939 and 1942.

Things began to change during the battle of Stalingrad, which signaled the imminent defeat of Germany. With German troops in withdrawal from Russia, Northern Africa, and Italy in 1943, criticism of Nazi strategy and warfare came to the fore again among clandestine military and state official circles. Joined by the Kreisauer Circle, a group of conservatives of the gentry and traditional aristocracy who met to coordinate resistance to the Nazi regime, social democrats, and church personnel who opposed the Nazis, a coup d'état was planned, but disagreements over the future structure of the German state occurred during the planning period.

Supporters of Beck and Goerdeler and members of the Kreisauer Circle agreed that under the reign of Nazi terror and the state of war, only Hitler's assassination and the subsequent unfolding of a coup d'état could change the course of politics before Germany would be militarily defeated and occupied by foreign troops. They did not see any room for, and were not interested in, mass upheavals to achieve that goal. However, whereas members of the Kreisauer Circle wanted to establish a democratic regime after the coup, the Beck and Goerdeler circles, many of whom came from noble families, favored the reinstatement of the German monarchy without the right of independent workers' organizations or other democratic rights. Since these circles were the only ones that could infiltrate military ranks needed for a successful coup, the Kreisauer Circle eventually gave in to the conservative-monarchical design for a post-Nazi regime.

Hlinka, Andrej (1864–1938) and the Slovak People's Party

Stanislav J. Kirschbaum

Roman Catholic priest, social activist, and politician, Andrej Hlinka was a major force in advancing Slovak national self-determination. As a Slovak politician in the first Czechoslovak Republic, Hlinka determinedly opposed Prague centralism and the ideology of Czechoslovakism employed to legitimize Czechoslovakia as a nation-state. He demanded that Slovakia be granted the autonomy promised in the Pittsburgh Pact, signed by the first president of Czechoslovakia, Tomas G. Masaryk, during World War I.

Hlinka's political career began in 1905 when, together with Ferdinand Juriga and František Skycák, he broke away from the Hungarian People's Party to form the Slovak People's Party. Initially lacking organizational structure, the party's activities were minimal until July 1913 when the party was formally institutionalized with Hlinka as president. Although inactive during World War I, in October 1918 Hlinka became a co-founder of the Slovak National Council and a signatory of the Declaration of the Slovak Nation, which indicated the willingness of the Slovaks to join the Czechs in a common state. In November 1918, Hlinka founded the Catholic Clerical Council, and through its initiative recreated the Slovak People's Party a month later. He remained chairman of the party until his death in August 1938.

The Slovak People's Party program initially concentrated on religious and social issues, confessional schools, and the resolution of church–state relations. After 1919, inspired by the Pittsburgh Pact, the party made autonomy the mainstay of its political agenda. Except for the years 1927–9 when it had two representatives in the Czechoslovak government, the party was in opposition in parliament. In 1925 it was renamed Hlinka Slovak People's Party (HSPP) to honor its founder. It won a plurality of seats in the Czechoslovak National Assembly from Slovakia in 1925, 1929, and 1935. In 1938, after Slovakia established its autonomy, the HSPP was the sole Slovak party to contest the elections to the Slovak Assembly. It remained in power throughout the existence of the first Slovak Republic.

Hlinka first gained national and international prominence at the time of the Černova massacre in 1907. He came to the attention of the world again when he traveled in August 1919 to the Peace Conference in Paris on a Polish passport to try, unsuccessfully, to make the case for the autonomy of Slovakia before the conference. On his return from Paris he was interned by the Czecho-Slovak government in Mirov, Moravia, despite being a member of the Czecho-Slovak Revolutionary Assembly, and was not released until his election to the Czechoslovak National Assembly in the elections of 1920. He continued to be reelected thereafter and remained a member of parliament until his death, when he was succeeded by Josef Tiso as head of the HSPP.

As a parliamentarian, Hlinka was a fiery speaker and consummate politician who fought for the autonomy of Slovakia, as well as the rights of the Catholic Church, a democratic system, social justice, and free enterprise. He opposed socialist and communist ideologies and policies.

He remained loyal to the common state of the Czechs and Slovaks, acknowledging the improvements that Slovakia had undergone since the founding of Czecho-Slovakia.

During his lifetime, Hlinka's popularity was such that many political organizations were named after him. Among them were the Hlinka Academic Club, later the Hlinka Academic Guard, and the Hlinka Guard, a paramilitary organization of the HSPP, created in 1938. It was a highly structured organization, based on the black shirts in Italy and the SA and SS in Germany. The Hlinka Guard backed the fascist pro-German wing of the HSPP, published the daily newspaper Gardista, and intervened in public life despite the absence of a political mandate. Its units were involved in the rounding up and deportation of Slovak Jews in 1942 and in the emergency squads created to hunt down partisans when the 1944 uprising broke out. It was dissolved in 1945.

Hô Chi Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh) (1890–1969)

Pang Yang Huei

Hô Chi Minh (alias Nguyen Tat Thanh) was an anti-imperialist communist revolutionary who worked determinedly throughout his life for the goal of independence and unification of Vietnam. His revolutionary leadership was a leading factor in the defeat and expulsion of French and US occupying forces in the Indochina Wars from 1946 to 1974. He went on to become the president of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (DRV). A native of Kim Lien village, Nghe An province (central Vietnam), Hô was born on May 19, 1890 to a minor government functionary, Nguyen

Hô Chi Minh (1890–1969) was a revolutionary, anti-colonialist, and Marxist-Leninist president of Vietnam, shown here at a military base in Viet Bac in 1950. He was the founder of the Vietnam Workers' Party, which waged a massive military campaign against French forces in Indochina. The conflict later resulted in a full-scale Indochinese war with the French and then the US that ended in 1975. (AFP/Getty Images)

Sinh Sac. The patriotic elder Nguyen regarded the Vietnamese Imperial household with contempt as it was functioning as a French protectorate. He only reluctantly worked for five years before he was dismissed from the government in 1910. Hô inherited from his father that same stubborn patriotism. He studied at the National Academy (Quoc Hoc) in Hue, but he was expelled when he took part in peasants' protests (May 1908). He fled south to become a schoolteacher in Phan Thiet and later studied for a little while in a vocational institute in Saigon.

Eager to see the world, Hô left Vietnam in 1911. For the next six years, Hô experienced at first hand the toils of a common laborer. He was a kitchen helper on French ships for two years. In the United States, he labored at Boston and New York. Next in London, Hô washed dishes at the Carlton Hotel.

When he arrived in France in 1917, he promptly joined the French Socialist Party. The years in France were prolific ones for Hô, who supported himself through a series of menial jobs. He unsuccessfully lobbied for Vietnamese legal rights and political representation in Indochina during the Versailles Peace Conference (1919). His moderate petition made no mention of Vietnamese self-determination. However, Hô's actions gave him a prominent place among his Vietnamese nationalists.

Obviously, he found the French Socialist Party too docile. He urged the splinter leftist group to join the Comintern (Third International), as Lenin's anti-imperialistic tract, "Thesis on the National and Colonial Questions," proved irresistible. Hence, the creation of the French Communist Party (1920) partly owed its existence to the indefatigable Hô. He tried to rally the energies of exiled colonial radicals in Paris. To this end, he had a hand in the founding of the Intercolonial Union in 1921. Under this organization, he contributed as the editor of La Paria (The Pariah) on the problems of colonialism. Combining his experiences as an organizer, agitator, and educator, he further expounded his views on the colonial problem. In Le Procès de la colonisation française (French Colonialism on Trial), he argued for the relevance of Marxism for Vietnamese independence. Class revolution, Hô stressed, must go hand in hand with the demands of nationalism.

For most early revolutionaries, the allure of USSR experiences and doctrine was magnetic. Hô enthusiastically traveled to Moscow. He studied in the University of Oriental Workers in 1923. During the same period, Hô also functioned as a cadre of the Comintern from 1922 to 1924. In Moscow, he assumed the Krestintern's (Peasant International) vice-presidency. Such was his prominence that Hô addressed the Comintern Fifth Congress. In his speech, Hô again stressed the importance of the colonial peasantry struggles as opposed to a hitherto European emphasis.

On Comintern orders, Hô arrived in Guangzhou (1924) as the translator of Michael Borodin (Soviet advisor to Sun Yat-sen's Kuomintang) and immediately started organization work. He contacted his father's old friend and renowned Vietnamese nationalist, Phan Boi Chau. He founded the Thanh Nien Cach Menh Dong Chi Hoi (Vietnam Revolutionary Youth League), which was responsible for disseminating communism among exiled Vietnamese. The expansion of membership was another vital aim of his organization. Appropriating his experiences in Moscow and his revolutionary vision in a readily accessible form, Hô wrote Duong Cach Mang (Revolutionary Path) outlining approaches toward a revolution in Vietnam.

When the united front between the Chinese Communists and the Kuomintang was torn asunder in 1927, Hô quickly left. He took this opportunity to travel the length and breadth of Southeast Asia as an agent of the Comintern. In February 1930, he went to Hong Kong to address the split within the Thanh Nien. To further consolidate the disparate, fractious, but revolutionary exiled elements under his leadership, he launched the Indochinese Communist Party.

One of the issues that Hô had to address was the growing importance of a rival non-communist group, the Vietnamese Nationalist Party (Viet Nam Quoc Dan Dang or VNQDD). The VNQDD proved at this point even more militant than Hô's group. It launched a military mutiny at Yen Bay in February 1931. Although it was crushed, the Yen Bay mutiny prompted other revolts and even the setting up of proto-soviets in Nghe An and Ha Tinh. Because of the communist connection, Hô was fingered as the head of a vast communist conspiracy. The French crushed these revolts and passed a death sentence on Hô in absentia.

The British quickly arrested Hô in Hong Kong for his covert activities as Comintern's Far East Bureau liaison officer in June 1931. In reality, Hô's reputation preceded him. The British were taking precautionary measures lest Hô agitated the crown colonies. In mid-1932, Hô escaped from Hong Kong and slipped back into the Soviet Union via Shanghai.

Owing to his Comintern responsibilities, Hô returned to Moscow in 1933. During this fateful period, Hô experienced and witnessed at first hand the horrors of Stalin's purge of the Communist Party and the Comintern from 1936 to 1938. Hô was particularly vulnerable, as he seemed more nationalistic than communist, especially after many prominent foreign communists, including Bela Kun, were executed by Stalin. It was only in 1938, when the party line, as dictated by Stalin, on indigenous nationalism shifted that Hô was permitted to leave the USSR. He arrived in Yanan, China, in time to observe the debilitating impact of the Japanese military invasion. Because of his close ties with the Chinese Politburo, he was welcomed as a training officer with the Eighth Route Army.

The French repression had continued throughout the 1930s. Large numbers of Hô's party members were executed or languished in jail. Still, the repression was more of a boon than an unmitigated disaster, as it cleared the scene of the VNQDD for Hô's embattled party veterans to emerge onto the national level. Remnants of Hô's party had escaped to Southern China, Guangxi. Hô moved to South China to gather his lieutenants in 1940. Hô was able quickly to rebuild his party upon the grievances of the local populace, aided by his strict organizational leadership in the inaccessible mountainous region of Pac Bo.

With the onset of World War II, Hô's Viet Minh came up against the Japanese, which controlled the whole of Indochina. Hô formed the Viet Nam Doc Lap Dong Minh Hoi or Viet Minh (League for the Independence of Vietnam) in May 1941 as an armed paramilitary group, which would insert into Vietnam as guerillas. Hô shrewdly emphasized that Viet Minh's foremost purpose would be national independence through participating in anti-Japanese activities. He quietly downplayed the role of class struggle. At one stroke, his new position broadened the Viet Minh's appeal and the organization qualified for aid from the US Office of Strategic Services (OSS). At this point, this revolutionary formally assumed the name Hô Chi Minh (Bearer of Light). In one of his numerous forays into China, Hô was arrested by Chiang Kai Shek's forces in August 1942. He was incarcerated for a year. Upon his return, Hô established, together with General Vo Nguyen Giap, numerous strategically placed Viet Minh armed camps throughout North Vietnam by 1944.

When the Japanese interned all the French administrators in March 1945, and then ignominiously surrendered later in August, the Viet Minh stepped into the political vacuum. In the so-called August Revolution, Hanoi was seized with little Japanese resistance on August 26, 1945. Other Northern provinces soon fell. Viet Minh's National Liberation committee accomplished the seemingly impossible. Bao Dai, the last Nguyen emperor, abdicated in acknowledgment of Hô's fait accompli. The Democratic Republic of Vietnam was established on September 2, 1945.

Hô had seized the strategic initiative by persuading the remaining nationalist parties to form a provisional government with the Viet Minh. Cooperation resulted in a functioning National Assembly. Hô was even formally elected by the National Assembly as the president in 1946.

These were all superficial successes. The Viet Minh was faced with rival returning Vietnamese nationalists backed by the occupying Chinese Nationalist forces in the North. British troops under General D. D. Gracey occupied the South. Gracey was so efficient that large tracts of South Vietnam passed into the control of the returning French under General Jacques Leclerc.

From this precarious position, Hô reached a temporary agreement with the French on March 6, 1946. In return, for the status of a Viet Minh-controlled Vietnamese “free state” within a French union, French troops would substitute for the Chinese forces in the North. This rid Vietnam of Chinese troops and gave a much-needed respite for Hô’s forces to consolidate their bases.

For three months in Fontainebleau (France), Hô was very much in favor of negotiations and he proved conciliatory. But the French were unwilling to give up what was not lost on the battlefield. Domestically, the Viet Minh under Giap conducted a brutal campaign of sweeping terror, rooting out dissenters and “traitors” in rival nationalist groups when the Chinese troops left. This political cleansing contributed to the breakup of the alliance with other Vietnamese nationalists, which resulted in a rump National Assembly. The French backed away from the initial agreement of having a Vietnamese “free state.” Still, Hô managed again to salvage another limited understanding with the French in September 1946. The agreement was tenuous at best. Three months later, war resumed between the belligerents.

The First Indochina War (1946–54) was a brutal affair where no quarter was given; it prefigured the intensity of the later conflict. The Viet Minh retreated to the mountains. Giap conducted guerilla warfare on the French troops and mounted a campaign of terrorism and assassination in the cities. The “puppet” government led by Bao Dai was systematically targeted. In late 1953, the Viet Minh had isolated the cities and effectively controlled all of the countryside.

The embattled French tried to destroy the Viet Minh in a setpiece battle at Dien Bien Phu (1954). However, the Chinese managed to contribute significant military hardware (mortars and artillery) and advisors to the Vietnamese communists. Rings of artillery bombardments, which Giap had set up, trapped the French. France gave up only when its military debacle in Dien Bien Phu and US inaction dissolved whatever colonial pretensions it had harbored.

Nevertheless, China’s aid meant that the Chinese premier Zhou Enlai had considerable leverage over his Vietnamese partners. In the June 1954 Geneva Conference, China and the Soviet Union applied pressure on the Vietnamese to accept the provisional partitioning of Vietnam at the 17th parallel. Over the outright protests of his party, Hô agreed to a temporary divide. Hô pragmatically reasoned that half a loaf of bread guaranteed was better than none. He further cautioned his colleagues that stubbornness would only provoke the US.

This split was formalized in 1956. The Republic of Vietnam (RVN) under Ngo Dinh Diem, with US President D. D. Eisenhower’s acquiescence, refused to hold elections for the purpose of unification as stipulated in the Geneva Accords. Diem’s counterrevolutionary security forces uprooted entire Communist Party structures in the South.

As a countermeasure, the DRV decided to support the Vietcong (South Vietnamese Communists), which were to infiltrate and unify South Vietnam in 1959 through armed struggle. The Hanoi Politburo created a broad front, the National Front for the Liberation of South Vietnam (NFLSV) combining the efforts of the Vietcong and other nationalist groups repressed by Diem. The infiltration route became the famous Hô Chi Minh Trail. Starting from North Vietnam, the route snaked through the inhospitable jungles and mountains of Laos and Cambodia into the flat plains of South Vietnam. At the same time, the DRV’s foreign policy supported communist activities in neighboring countries such as Laos and Cambodia. Pathet Lao and Khmer Rouge thus had their first sponsorship from the DRV.

Hô was acutely aware of how his persona had become synonymous with the Vietnamese revolution. To that extent, he cultivated a humble image, living in a modest house in Hanoi. Photos of Hô surrounded by grinning children were distributed. The image of Bac Hô or “Uncle Hô” softened the steel of the revolution and endeared Hô’s cause to the deprived population at large.

Nevertheless, Vietnam’s partitioning and the obstacles to various domestic economic and political policies such as collectivization in 1956 and class struggles eroded the popularity of the Workers’ Party of Vietnam (Lao Dong). At this juncture, through the sheer weight of his prestige, Hô Chi Minh moved in to smooth inner-party disagreements and reaffirmed the party’s linkage with the people through reassurances.

Still, he left most of the administration to loyalists such as Pham Van Dong, General Vo

Nguyen Giap, Le Duan, and Truong Chinh. Hồ retreated voluntarily from politics. In 1955, he ceded the premiership to Pham Van Dong. At the Third Congress of the Lao Dong (1959), Hồ stepped down as secretary-general for Le Duan. Although enfeebled by bouts of ill health, Hồ reminded a potent presence. He performed his role as the mediator between conflicting interest groups, which had grouped around personalities such as Secretary-General Le Duan and Truong Chinh, Chairman of the National Assembly. Perhaps Hồ's experiences in the Soviet Great Purge left an indelible mark. He placed emphasis on group decisions. He did not go all out, as Mao Zedong or Stalin had done, to purge the inner rungs of the leadership. Most of the time, violence was reserved for opponents of the party.

Throughout the Cold War, Hồ also deftly navigated between the demands of his communist neighbors. He made various visits to the USSR and the People's Republic of China (PRC). However, he avoided choosing sides. Even with the Sino-Soviet split of the 1960s, the DRV maintained and received material support from the PRC and the Soviet Union. This dexterous diplomacy stood the DRV in good stead as it battled RVN's main sponsor, the United States, at the outbreak of the Second Indochina War (1965–75).

It was in this issue of Vietnam unification that Hồ remained active in championing Vietnam's cause on the international arena. Hồ refused to accept the Korean solution, but settled upon the strategy of a war of attrition. Due to the military limitations of the DRV and the superiority of the US forces, preparing for protracted guerilla warfare was a logical outcome. Hồ declared in 1966: "nothing is as dear to the heart of the Vietnamese as independence and liberation." Hồ carefully avoided Marxist jargon. Instead, he drew for available western journalists stark Manichean contrasts of steadfast Vietnamese purpose and rapacious US neo-imperialism. He played upon rudimentary stereotypes of the perseverance of the Vietnamese peasant nationalists against the ruthless engagement of the US military, which had vast technological superiority in arms.

Ultimately, his immense international visibility proved profoundly disastrous for South Vietnam's viability and upsetting for US President L. B. Johnson. In a celebrated exchange of letters in 1967 with LBJ, Hồ counterdemanded that the US should "unconditionally" cease "all other acts of war" against the DRV. Despite his professional revolutionary past, Hồ ironically became a symbol for US anti-war peace activists, and chants such as "HỒ, HỒ, HỒ CHI MINH! NLF IS GONNA WIN" were standard fare throughout US university campuses.

On the eve of his death, Hồ provided political support for the Tet Offensive, which was a military failure, but a political success for the DRV. After the offensive, LBJ declined to run for the presidency and suspended aerial bomber operation "Rolling Thunder" (March 31, 1968). Hồ subsequently generously dispensed advice to North Vietnamese negotiators at the 1968 Paris peace talks.

Hồ died on September 2, 1969. His greatest achievement was undoubtedly his iron determination in advocating the unification of Vietnam. That being the ultimate goal, Hồ was forced to respond in kind to the violence of the French and then US armed strategies of pacification. The ingenuity of Hồ lay in his flexible advocacy posture, and the irresistible combination of Vietnamese nationalism and the internationalism of the communist movement. Although Hồ remained a strong supporter of the Comintern's vision, he pragmatically rooted his programs in local Vietnamese conditions most of the time. The resulting matrix of Hồ's aspirations, Marxism, Comintern's international communism, the needs of the Vietnamese peasantry, and external foreign pressures were all tempered and contained within the structure of Hồ's Lao Dong party. Unlike Mao or Stalin, Hồ worked within the party and graciously stepped aside for younger and more vigorous leaders. From a comparative perspective among communist states, his actions vis-à-vis succession were unprecedented.

The starkest reminder of Hồ's presence in modern-day Vietnam is Hồ Chí Minh City, which was formerly known as Saigon. Renamed in 1975, the former capital of the deposed RVN has transformed willy-nilly into Vietnam's largest city. Elsewhere in Hanoi, a mausoleum dedicated to the memory of Hồ is the best-maintained building in the capital, attracting thousands of tourists. Forty years after his death, the poignant symbol of Hồ Chí Minh has served to unify the north and south in a manner Bac Hồ would surely not have expected.

Hobbes, Thomas (1588–1679)

Deborah Kepple-Mamros

Thomas Hobbes was one of England's most prominent philosophers and political theorists during the age of the Enlightenment, as well as one of the most vilified personalities in the early modern period. He can generally be seen as part of two distinct revolutions. Politically, he was part of the English Revolution of the mid-seventeenth century, writing tracts that supported a strong sovereign entity and opposed interference from either parliament or the church. Unlike a typical authoritarian figure, Hobbes's theoretical sovereign authority rested upon a covenant made between the sovereign and the people, an idea that was a precursor to John Locke's social contract. Intellectually, he was a part of the scientific revolution, corresponding with the likes of René Descartes and Marin Mersenne, and commenting in scholarly circles on the work of Galileo and Baruch Spinoza. His writings sometimes showed outright hostility toward both religion and the church.

Hobbes was born into a middling family in the west of England during the reign of Elizabeth I (1558–1603). His education began at a small country school in Gloucestershire where he became proficient in both Greek and Latin. By age 15, Hobbes had entered Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he received a typical education grounded in Aristotelian logic. Upon receiving his BA in 1608, he was recommended to the position of personal tutor to the son of William Cavendish, Baron Hardwick (future Earl of Devonshire).

Over the course of Hobbes's life, he tutored three generations of Cavendish males, as well as becoming a secretary, traveling companion, and intellectual correspondent to various members of this large and extended family. Through his connections with the Cavendishes, Hobbes was able to travel to the continent, meet Marin Mersenne and Galileo, and tutor the future King Charles II.

By Hobbes's own account, the turning point of his career was 1640, when animosity between the English king, Charles I, and his parliament finally came to a head. It was this political controversy that led Hobbes to produce his first political tract, The Elements of Law, which outlined his theories on absolute monarchy, arguing against parliamentary rights and for the supremacy of the monarchy. The backlash against this work caused Hobbes to go into exile in France, where he would spend the next 11 years of his life. While in France, Hobbes produced many shorter tracts, as well as his most celebrated work, Leviathan (1651), which argued for the supremacy of the rightful sovereign to keep the peace and contained elements that undermined the existing state church.

Holbach, Baron d' (1723–1789)

Melanie A. Bailey

Paul-Henri Thiry, Baron d'Holbach, participated in the Enlightenment and thereby the intellectual stirrings that fueled the French Revolution of 1789 both as a patron and as a controversial writer. He wrote articles on chemistry and geology for the Encyclopédie, along with several influential philosophical works. He also provided a meeting place for the important thinkers and writers who passed through Paris in the mid-eighteenth century.

After attending the University of Leyden and enjoying the relative freedom of thought in the Netherlands in the 1740s, Holbach returned to Paris, where he had been raised by his uncle. The beneficiary of large legacies left by his uncle and his father-in-law, Holbach had the resources to provide warm welcomes to friends at his home in Paris or his château in Grandval. He became renowned for his extravagant dinner parties and for facilitating discussions of controversial topics. His weekly salons and his patronage enabled men such as Denis Diderot and Claude-Adrien Helvétius to publish their works. Even those who did not share his atheism or agree with his trenchant critiques of the French monarchy enjoyed their visits to Holbach's salon. Even though Rousseau disagreed with many of his views, he used Holbach as a model character, an atheist with the morals of a Christian, in La Nouvelle Héloïse.

Holbach published controversial books such as Système de Nature (System of Nature) (1770) and La Politique Naturelle (Natural Politics) (1773) anonymously; all were banned in France and some were publicly burned. According to his naturalistic ethics, humans are driven by self-preservation and motivated to seek happiness. People behave virtuously when they correctly understand the best means to preserve their life and happiness. Vice results from ignorance; ignorance is caused by our failure to understand the true laws of nature or by our willingness to yield to passion rather than reason. Holbach criticized many religions, especially Christianity as practiced in his time, for undermining virtue. By distorting human perceptions of nature and rejecting reliance on reason, the Roman Catholic Church prevented its followers from becoming truly happy. Education and the cultivation of reason would enable people to develop a more enlightened perception of self-interest.

Once equipped with an accurate understanding of how to secure happiness, people would interact more peacefully. Government, Holbach contended, should provide for the general welfare by protecting property and by ensuring that citizens enjoyed freedom of conscience and expression. When the government failed to fulfill these basic responsibilities, then the people had the right to effect revolution. Indeed, he thought that a revolution would be likely if a government failed to educate its citizens, given that passion would therefore gain sway over society. In light of the manifest failings of the French government in the later eighteenth century, Holbach anticipated and justified the revolution that began in the last year of his life.

Hollywood Ten

Melanie E. L. Bush

Between the late 1940s and 1950s, members of the entertainment industry came under scrutiny for left-wing beliefs and alleged connections to the American Communist Party. The Cold War and anti-union political environment provided the context for concern by the United States government and leaders of the Hollywood motion picture industry that Soviet-leaning messages were being conveyed through films. In November 1947, a group of mostly screenwriters, directors, and producers were called before the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) to testify about their affiliations and refused. These included: Alvah Bessie, Lester Cole, Ring Lardner, Jr., Albert Maltz, John Howard Lawson, Samuel Ornitz, Dalton Trumbo, Herbert Biberman, Edward Dmytryk, and Adrian Scott. They became known as the “Hollywood Ten.”

By a vote of 346 to 17 in a hearing before the House of Representatives, these individuals were cited in contempt of Congress. Simultaneously, in the renowned “Waldorf Astoria Declaration,” top Hollywood executives (Motion Picture Association of America) proclaimed that they would not employ individuals who would not swear non-affiliation. Political pressure to do this mounted both internally and from some of their financial bases in banks and corporations. Anti-Semitism may also have played a role. The Hollywood Ten were suspended without pay and in 1950 each served six months to a year of prison time. They ultimately had difficulty finding employment in the industry, with the exception of director Edward Dmytryk, who "named names." Another major public hearing was conducted in 1951; smaller ones were held throughout the 1950s.

Defense lawyers argued that the First Amendment guaranteed the freedom of association and that these rulings were unconstitutional; however, this was ignored due to the anti-communist political climate. There was resistance to this strong wave of censorship and red-baiting, for example in the form of a Committee for the First Amendment, but political times favored actions such as those by the Screen Actors' Guild (with Ronald Reagan as head), which voted to make its officers take a pledge that they were not communists.

The HUAC hearings gave rise to official and unofficial "blacklists," with hundreds of names drawn from sources such as Federal Bureau of Investigation files and analyses of the Daily Worker newspaper compiled by organizations such as the American Legion. A pamphlet called "Red Channels" included such a list and was distributed to sectors of the entertainment industry involved in hiring. People were pressured to "talk," and if they did not, their name was added to the list and they were denied employment.

The Hollywood Ten were the most publicized of cases, especially for their unwavering non-participation in HUAC questioning. They represented a powerful statement against the repressive force that became known as "McCarthyism."

Honduran General Strike of 1954

Edward T. Brett

Virtually all historians agree that the Great Strike of 1954 was the most important episode in Honduran labor history. Following the long dictatorship of Tiburcio Carías Andino (1933–49), Juan Gálvez Durón became president of Honduras. Although he had previously been a lawyer for the Boston-based United Fruit Company (UFCO), the most powerful and richest corporation in the country, he began his presidency by courting labor in an attempt to build a populist base for his presidency. An 8-hour workday law was passed, which also stipulated that employees were to be paid on holidays. UFCO and the Standard Fruit Company, however, chose to ignore these reforms.

On May 1, 1954 UFCO dockworkers in Puerto Cortés, choosing Luis García as their spokesman, requested double pay for work on Sunday. When UFCO officials said they would consider the request, the workers returned to their jobs, but only to find that García had been fired for being an "agitator." When company officials ignored workers' demands that García be reinstated, the dockworkers went out on strike. All 25,000 UFCO laborers, along with 15,000 from Standard Fruit, soon joined them. Mine, textile, tobacco, and brewery employees soon followed suit. The General Strike paralyzed the whole north coast of Honduras.

The strikers demanded a 50 percent increase in wages (in 1954 the average worker earned $1.68 per day), better working conditions, and legal recognition of their union. Standard Fruit and some of the other companies settled with the strikers fairly soon, but UFCO refused. The Gálvez regime could ill-afford to act against the interests of UFCO, but on the other hand it did not want to appear to be breaking a popularly supported strike since national elections were scheduled for October. Consequently, Gálvez decided to establish a government mediation commission and the workers formed a Central Strike Committee, which met with UFCO representatives in San Pedro Sula on May 28. After several days of negotiation, talks broke down.

Meanwhile, UFCO officials in the United States convinced the Eisenhower administration that the supposedly communist government of Jacobo Arbenz in Guatemala was the real force behind the strike. All scholars agree that this was a fabrication of the truth. The US embassy next identified “communists” on the Central Strike Committee for the Gálvez regime, which promptly arrested them. They were eventually replaced with “anti-communists” who were more conciliatory. United Fruit officials then attempted to divide the strikers by offering $20 bonuses to all who returned to work immediately. An agreement was finally reached on July 9 and the strike ended. It had lasted 69 days.

Not surprisingly, the workers got only a small fraction of what they had demanded. They did, however, achieve legal recognition of their unions. About a year later the government issued a decree guaranteeing workers the right to organize, engage in collective bargaining, and strike. As a consequence, the labor movement in Honduras quickly gained in strength and influence.

Hong Kong democracy protests

Michael H. C. Chun

Hong Kong democracy protests, and the democracy movement as a phenomenon, have their origins in the colonial period. As the debate on democracy continued into the post-1997 period, when Hong Kong was faced with a series of challenges, both economic and political, the democracy movement gained new momentum. Democracy protests became part of Hong Kong people's lives, in the form of a mass rally held every year since July 1, 2003. These large-scale protests of the 1980s and the post-1997 period are historic milestones of the Hong Kong democracy movement, which has its origins in the 1980s when the 1997 Question emerged.

Although Hong Kong was a British colony for over 150 years, her struggle for democracy has a long history. Political reform had been discussed by both the government and local activists even before the 1997 Question surfaced. Political changes and advancement, however, were minimal up until the 1980s, as neither the Hong Kong colonial government nor the British government was enthusiastic about political reform. With most having fled from Mainland China during the Chinese Civil War, the majority of Hong Kong Chinese were not interested in politics. Hong Kong's struggle for democracy did not gain momentum and become a full-fledged movement until after the 1997 Question emerged.

However, Hong Kong people were no strangers to social protests and mass movements, for there had been a number of social and political protests and movements in the 1960s and 1970s. Although in the 1980s most Hong Kong Chinese had no interest in politics, there existed pro-democracy activism led by pressure groups. Prominent pro-democracy activists Martin Lee Chu-ming and Szeto Wah later became core members of the Democratic Party, which was founded on October 4, 1994. Lee and Szeto remained active as democracy activists and Legislative Council members in the post-1997 period.

Historical developments surrounding the 1997 Question in the 1980s sparked a new, long struggle for democracy involving both local democracy advocates and Hong Kong people in the next 20 years. Approximately two months before the end of the Sino-British negotiations of 1982–4, in July 1984, the British colonial government embarked on political reform in an attempt to democratize Hong Kong, making sure that a democratic political system would be in place for the sake of Hong Kong's future. In July 1984 the Hong Kong government issued a consultative green paper on political reform. Three years later an official review was carried out on the 1984 political reform plans. The 1984 political reform proposal and the subsequent review sparked off a debate on democratization by local political leaders as well as Hong Kong people. The 1987 review in particular angered local democracy activists. For the government's Survey Office, in its findings for the review, by mistakenly excluding the results of 21 signature campaigns, concluded that there was not enough support for the introduction of direct elections in 1988, when in fact there was overwhelming support for it. Pro-democracy activists such as Martin Lee were outraged.

It was against this background that the democracy movement of the 1980s began. On September 16, 1984 over a thousand people from 89 different pro-democracy groups gathered in a Kowloon park at a rally calling for direct elections to the Legislative Council. Following their unsuccessful campaign for the introduction of direct elections in 1988, pro-democracy activist groups organized gatherings at the Ko Shan Theatre in the following years, including the meeting in November 1986 and another in May 1993. For local democracy activists, the Ko Shan gatherings were historic moments that marked the beginning of Hong Kong's democracy movement. Later, pro-democracy groups from the first Ko Shan gathering formed the loose alliance Joint Committee for the Promotion of Democratic Government.

After the first draft of the Basic Law was made and a five-month consultation on the draft began, pro-democracy activists became even more active. Debates, exhibitions, marches, and signature campaigns were held on the Basic Law. On December 3, 1988 over fifty democracy advocates, including Szeto Wah, who at that time was a member of the Basic Law Drafting Committee (BLDC), participated in a 24-hour fast outside the Xinhua News Agency in protest against the Louis Cha proposal on Hong Kong's future political system, which in their view was too conservative. The fasting group was soon joined by Martin Lee, who led a protest march from Victoria Park the next day. On their way to the Xinhua headquarters, the 600 demonstrators in the march sang songs and held banners calling for democracy in 1997.

The year 1989 was a turbulent one for both China and Hong Kong. The democracy movement in Mainland China sparked off a series of large-scale democracy protests in Hong Kong in May and June 1989. In late May 1989 massive rallies and protests were held in Hong Kong in support of the students in Beijing. On May 20, 1989, 50,000 people protested outside the New China News Agency amid strong winds and heavy rain. Protesters held pro-democracy banners and wore headbands supporting Beijing students. As events in Beijing took a turn for the worse as the Chinese government sent troops into the city, Hong Kong people were outraged. Fear and panic engulfed the colony as Hong Kong people became concerned about the implications events in Beijing might have for the colony's future after 1997.

On May 21 approximately 1 million Hong Kong citizens took to the streets in support of the Beijing democracy movement. The rally was the largest ever held in the history of Hong Kong. Protesters wore headbands and held banners. The protest lasted over 8 hours, starting with a 15-kilometer march from Chater Garden at 2:15 p.m. and ending at 10:30 p.m. after a mass rally at the Happy Valley racecourse. Among the protesters were pro-democracy activists and legislators Martin Lee and Szeto Wah. Shortly after 9:30 p.m. the crowd was joined by members of the left-wing Hong Kong Federation of Trade Unions, which had approximately 170,000 members at the time. Amid the May 21 protest the Hong Kong Alliance in Support of Democratic Movement in China was formed. Following the Chinese government's crackdown on the student movement, more protests and rallies were held in Hong Kong, including the June 5 sit-in protest in Happy Valley, where 200,000 protesters dressed in black protested against the violent crackdown.

The democracy movement was given new life in post-1997 Hong Kong, particularly by the July 1 protest rally of 2003. A number of factors contributed to Hong Kong people's dissatisfaction with the government, which ultimately led to the 2003 protest. Immediately after the 1997 handover, Hong Kong was faced with two crises: the outbreak of the avian influenza (bird flu) epidemic and the Asian financial crisis. Despite Hong Kong's strong economic basis and the fact that the Asian financial crisis was not the only factor contributing to the decline of Hong Kong's economy, the financial crisis sped up its decline. Stock and property values plummeted and the unemployment rate increased. Hong Kong entered into recession, from which it would not recover until 2004.

The post-1997 years also saw the resurfacing of the debate on democracy and the emergence of new pro-democracy groups. From the beginning, the political legitimacy of the first HKSAR administration, under the leadership of Chief Executive Tung Chee-hwa, had a narrow basis. The chief executive was elected not by direct election by the whole Hong Kong population, but by an essentially pro-Beijing and pro-business 400-member Selection Committee. The Tung government's lack of political leadership and legitimacy, the economic problems, and the government's inability to tackle them were all contributing factors to Hong Kong people's anger with the Tung administration. Other factors included the SARS outbreak in early 2003, the controversial "85,000" housing plan (the untimely introduction of which contributed to the fall of property prices), and the proposed National Security Bill (Article 23 legislation). It was feared that the Article 23 legislation would restrict freedom of speech and press freedom. It was Hong Kong people's frustration and anger with the Tung administration over six years that ultimately led to the July 1 protest of 2003.

On July 1, 2003 more than 500,000 people took to the streets in protest against the Article 23 legislation. It was the largest protest since the 1989 pro-democracy rally in which 1 million Hong Kong people participated. The protest went on for six hours and the crowd did not disperse until 9:30 in the evening. Although the 2003 rally was held specifically in protest of the controversial proposed National Security Bill, it was also characterized by the protesters' demand for democracy. The July 1 protest rally was a significant event as it marked a new chapter in Hong Kong's struggle for democracy. It highlighted Hong Kong people's demand for democratic government and gave the democracy movement, which had been somewhat stagnant after 1997, new life. The protest greatly boosted the morale of Hong Kong's democracy movement. Since 2003 the July 1 protest rally has been held every year, providing an outlet for the people of Hong Kong to voice their concerns and demands, particularly in relation to democracy.

Horne Tooke, John (1736–1812)

Pia K. Jakobsson

John Horne Tooke was an English political activist and philologist, and the only Briton to be put in prison for opposing the war with America. Born in Westminster to a well-to-do poulterer, he went to school at Eton and Cambridge and was a law student until being ordained as a priest in 1760, taking up a position in Brentford. His public engagement in politics began with a 1765 pamphlet in defense of the radical John Wilkes. In 1769 Horne, Wilkes, and others founded the Society for Supporting the Bill of Rights to support Wilkes's election to parliament, but also more generally to support freedom and the constitution. They met regularly at the London Tavern, but disagreements about priorities split them apart by 1771.

In 1775 Horne publicly attacked the government's actions in America, raising money for relatives of Americans "murdered" by British troops. He was tried on the charge of seditious libel and spent over a year in prison. After his release he remained a strong supporter of free speech, writing pamphlets, raising money for the defense of prosecuted printers and booksellers, and financing radical works such as Thomas Paine's The Rights of Man. In 1791 he began to work closely with Thomas Hardy and the London Corresponding Society, campaigning for the vote, attacking the government's foreign policy, and working to create links with other reform groups in Britain. By the end of 1793 over 6,000 members had signed their petitions and the government clamped down, arresting several delegates to a national convention.

The reformers tried arranging another convention and this time Horne, Hardy, and John Thelwall were arrested, put in the Tower, and charged with high treason in October 1794. There was little evidence presented at the trial, and the jury found them all not guilty. Yet Horne and the others had lost their energy for the conflict; they became less politically active and less radical in their ideas. Horne still wanted parliamentary reform, but was no longer in favor of universal suffrage.

Horne's moderate positions gave him broader support and made it possible for him to stand for election to parliament in 1801. He won, but his enemies opposed his admission to the House of Commons because he was a minister of the church, and he was never allowed to take his seat. He spent his last years with friends and family at Wimbledon and was known for his parties and his great wit.

Hôtel de Ville, Paris

Stephen W. Samyér

The Paris Hôtel de Ville, or City Hall, found itself at the heart of the four major French revolutions that shook Paris: those of 1789, 1830, 1848, and 1871. In each case, the Paris City Hall symbolized the importance of the capital city and the Parisian people in national politics.

During the French Revolution of 1789, the local city hall erupted onto the French political scene on July 14, the day now celebrated as Bastille Day. Angry protesters who had taken the Bastille turned toward the Hôtel de Ville and gathered on the Place de Grève, the square in front of the building. They overturned the municipal government and killed the head municipal magistrate, Jacques de Flesselles. Following this event, the site was at the center of a decade of revolutionary tumult. By 1793, it was commonplace for Parisian revolutionaries to gather in front of the city hall to manifest their discontent before marching on the Constituent Assembly, the governing body.

In July 1830, the city hall reappeared on the political scene, as the Bourbons, the royal family deposed in 1792 and restored in 1814, were deposed once again. Following the abdication of King Charles X in the throes of revolution, a municipal commission formed within the Hôtel de Ville to govern the nation as a provisional government. The July Monarchy was finally established when Louis-Philippe d'Orléans, the new king, embraced General Lafayette, the hero of the Parisian revolutionaries, in the window of the Hôtel de Ville in front of the Parisian crowd.

The scenario of 1830 repeated itself in 1848. Following the abdication of King Louis-Philippe on February 24, the Second Republic was declared from the Hôtel de Ville. For the first months of the regime, the provisional government remained within the Hôtel de Ville. Subsequent conflicts, such as the workers' uprising on April 16, 1848, would make the building one of the key sites of political conflict during the early months of the Second Republic.

Finally, in 1871, the Paris Commune returned the Hôtel de Ville to center stage. The Commune was announced on the place of the Hôtel de Ville on March 28, but this event marked the end of an almost century-old tradition. When the national troops broke into Paris during the bloody week of May 21–7, 1871, the Communards burned the building. It would be rebuilt in the early years of the Third Republic, but just as 1871 was the last Parisian revolt of the nineteenth century, the Hôtel de Ville's importance in French revolutionary history came to a close.

House, Callie (1861–1928)

Amy Linch

Born a slave, Callie House was an early advocate for reparations for African Americans, founding the Ex-Slave Mutual Relief, Bounty and Pension Association in 1894. She raised five children working as a washerwoman before moving to Nashville, where she was first drawn to the movement by Henry Vaughn's pamphlet Freedmen's Pension Bill: A Plea for American Freedmen. She allied with Isaiah Dickerson in organizing a new movement that would both respond to the immediate health and monetary needs of ex-slaves, and organize politically to seek pensions and slavery reparations on their behalf. While Vaughn, a white democrat, sought reparations as a source of much needed funds to boost the South's economy, House and Dickerson based their claim on equality for blacks, demanding:

“We deserve for the government to pay us as an indemnity for the work we and our foreparents was rob[bed] of from the Declaration of Independence down to the Emancipation.” While white supremacy was being codified in Jim Crow laws and violence against African Americans was at its highest point since the end of slavery, House and Dickerson built a 300,000-member organization that accused the United States government of facilitating the theft of black labor and demanded monetary compensation.

The Ex-Slave Mutual Relief, Bounty and Pension Association was open to all regardless of race, religion, class, or color. At the local level chapters provided burial expenses and care for sick and disabled members. Nationally it worked for the passage of congressional legislation in support of slave reparations. Members paid a 25-cent initial membership fee and 10 cents per month thereafter. Local chapters paid $2.50 to the national organization, which was organized democratically, holding conventions and electing officers. The organization drew disproportionately from the poorest African Americans, whose plight was largely neglected by black elites such as Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. Du Bois. House's grassroots social and political activism was either ignored or criticized by black newspapers and elites, who believed progress for the African American race would come through education and assimilation rather than mobilization.

As the organization grew in strength, House became the target of harassment and surveillance by the United States government. Ironically, white southerners accused House of defrauding people by taking money to pursue slave reparations by alleging that the mission itself was futile. House resigned from her position as secretary of the organization in 1902 in hope that the government would cease its surveillance of the organization. She continued to organize local chapters of the movement, however, and in 1915 filed suit against the treasury department for $68 million in cotton taxes traced to slave labor in Texas. The postmaster general indicted House for fraud in 1916. Refusing to enter into a plea bargain that would involve abandoning the reparations cause, she was convicted by an all-male white jury and sentenced to a year and a day in prison. After 1916, many chapters of the organization became part of the movement led by Marcus Garvey.

Hoy, Senna (1882–1914)

Jesse Cohn

Adopting the nom de guerre of “Senna Hoy” (a reversal of his first name), Johannes Holzmann, a German Jew, made a brief but definite mark on the German anarchist movement, imparting to it a distinct concern for sexual liberation that would grow after his untimely death. In a 1903 pamphlet, Das dritte Geschlecht. Ein Beitrag zur Volksaufklärung (The Third Sex: A Contribution to Popular Enlightenment), and especially through the influential Berlin journal that he published between 1904 and 1905, Kampf: Zeitschrift für gesunden Menschenverstand (Struggle: Journal for Common Sense), Hoy linked homosexual rights and feminism to a broad anti-authoritarian politics. In so doing, Hoy politicized bohemian artists and intellectuals such as Erich Mühsam, Peter Hille, Paul Scheerbart, Else Lasker-Schüler, Ludwig Rubiner, Benedikt Friedländer, Herwarth Walden, and Franz Pfemfert. The sexual politics of Kampf were disdained by some anarchists, however, including Max Nettlau and Gustav Landauer. The government banned 11 of its 25 issues, driving Hoy into exile in Switzerland in 1905. In Zurich, he befriended labor activist Margarethe Hardegger and contributed to another anarchist journal with an anti-militarist focus, Der Weckruf (The Dawn). In 1907, inspired by contacts with Polish and Russian insurrectionaries, Hoy joined an anarchocommunist group in Russia, taking part in robberies to finance the cause. Caught in 1908, jailed and tortured, Hoy languished in a Warsaw prison, dying of kidney disease and tuberculosis in a Russian insane asylum in 1914.

Huerta, Dolores (b. 1930)

Cyrus Ernesto Zirakzadeh

Dolores Huerta co-founded the National Farm Workers Association (later renamed United Farm Workers, or UFW) with César Chávez. Many Americans associate her name almost exclusively with California’s farm worker movement, but she also was a highly effective lobbyist and a leading feminist and proponent of Latino and Latina pride and rights. Chávez and Huerta met in 1955, when both were working in Mexican American barrios for Saul Alinsky’s Community Service Organization (CSO). They shared a profound commitment to the plight of the poor, and when Chávez left the CSO to found the National Farm Workers Association, he asked Huerta to help lead the new group.

Huerta, a lively and quick-thinking orator, was remarkably adept at working the halls of California’s governing institutions. She differed from Chávez, who viewed such exchanges as of secondary importance, instead placing his trust in public events such as boycotts and dramatic fasts that would pressure otherwise unreliable legislators and growers into actions that would help farm workers. Huerta, by contrast, believed strongly in the influence of discussion and discourse. Her obvious skills with words meant that most UFW negotiation and lobbying assignments fell on her lap.

Chávez at first balked at having Huerta work in Sacramento. He preferred her to work in the fields and organize farm hands. He was, however, blind to working-class males’ refusal to be organized by a woman. According to historian

Margaret Rose (2002: 102), “To Huerta, the state capitol was a place where she was not only effective but also removed from the male workers whom she tried to organize and who resisted an independent female labor leader. The elected officials, by contrast, listened.”

In Sacramento, she helped shepherd through bills that provided higher minimum wages for field workers and aid to dependent children of unemployed field hands. Among her most important achievements was facilitating the passage of the Agricultural Labor Relations Act of 1975 – an unprecedented bill that recognized the collective bargaining rights of California’s agricultural workforce. Later, she performed similar feats in Washington, DC, testifying before committees on immigration policy and lobbying individual lawmakers and bureaucrats for medical care and unemployment insurance for farm workers.

Meanwhile, Huerta was given the task of hammering out union contracts with growers. She earned the nickname “dragon lady” because of her toughness and intensity during negotiations. Among the non-wage issues that concerned her were the use of pesticides and medical care for workers’ families. In addition, she and Chávez established the National Farm Workers Service Center to build low-income housing for farm hands, and Radio Campesina, a radio network for rural audiences in California, Washington, and Arizona.

After the mid-1970s, Huerta came to describe herself as a “born-again feminist.” She began to organize voter registration drives for women and to recruit and prepare female candidates for public office. In 1997, Ms. Magazine recognized Huerta as one of the three most important women of the year, and in 1998 President Clinton presented Huerta with the Eleanor Roosevelt Human Rights Award.

Hugo, Victor (1802–1885)

Nicole Martone

Victor Hugo was a French Romantic novelist, dramatist, poet, and political activist. He was an advocate of human rights and sponsored several social and political causes. An ardent republican, Hugo became extremely active in politics following the French Revolution of 1848 and vehemently protested against the overthrow of the French Second Republic by Napoleon III. Remaining critical of the Second Empire, Hugo went into voluntary exile in protest. Hugo’s work as a political writer, activist, and politician influenced the French government and the establishment of the Third Republic.

Hugo was born in February 1802 in Besançon to Joseph Léopold Sigisbert Hugo and Sophie Trébuchet. In 1803, Hugo’s parents separated and he was raised mostly by his mother in Paris. Although Hugo came to support republican views, his childhood was influenced by the beliefs of his parents. Hugo’s father was a Napoleonic general loyal to the emperor, while his mother was a royalist in favor of the Bourbons. While living in Paris with his mother, Hugo had a Catholic, royalist education and thought such beliefs just. As he grew older, however, and with the onset of the French Revolution and Napoleon I’s power, Hugo rejected the ideals of his youth, shifting toward republicanism and the left.

Hugo had a prominent literary career and was accepted into the Académie française (French Academy) in 1841. He gained initial fame as a poet in the 1820s and published his first novel, Hans of Iceland, in 1823. Hugo did not achieve instant success as a dramatist. However, in his preface to Cromwell (1827), Hugo urged performers to free themselves of the restrictions of the French classical style, thereby igniting the debate between classicism and Romanticism in France. In 1830, Hugo wrote Hernani, one of the greatest works of Romantic theater, and helped launch the French Romantic movement. He then embarked on a successful dramatic career, writing Ruy Blas (1838) and an essay on Shakespeare, whose works he sought to emulate. In 1831, Hugo published The Hunchback of Notre Dame (Notre-Dame de Paris), which became an instant success. In 1862, Les Misérables, focusing on the injustices in France following the French Revolution, was finally published after a germinating period of 17 years. Hugo wrote subsequent pieces, but his success as a Romantic began to decline as naturalism gained prominence. His last major novel, Ninety-Three, dealt with the Reign of Terror.

Hugo emerged as a social and political activist, agitating through his works for change and against perceived social injustices. He was against the death penalty and was a staunch defender of human rights. In 1829, Hugo published The Last Day of a Man Condemned to Death, an influential novel that recounts the thoughts of a man condemned to die. Considered an early example of “true crime” fiction, Hugo published Claude Gueux (1834) about a real-life murderer executed in France. He considered this novel a precursor to the themes in Les Misérables.

As Hugo grew older, he became more vocal about his republican political views, which transcended his writings and his political efforts. King Louis Philippe elevated Hugo to the peerage, and in 1841 he entered the Chamber of Peers, the higher house of the French legislature, where he spoke out against the death penalty and social injustice and for rights such as freedom of the press. Hugo was later elected to the Legislative Assembly and the Constitutional Assembly following the French Revolution of 1848 and the establishment of the Second Republic.

Hugo continued to voice his political views, even after Louis-Napoleon Bonaparte seized power in 1851, becoming Napoleon III. Hugo openly declared the self-appointed emperor a traitor to France before going into exile, a status he would maintain until 1870, when Napoleon III was removed from power following the Franco-Prussian War. Hugo went first to Brussels, and then to Jersey, before settling in Guernsey.

While in exile, Hugo continued to protest against the Second Empire through his literary works. His republican beliefs were portrayed through his political pamphlets, which included Napoléon le Petit (“Napoleon the Little”) and Histoire d’un crime (“History of a Crime”). Both pieces opposed the emperor, and although influential, were banned in France. Napoleon III granted political amnesty to all political exiles in 1859; however, Hugo maintained his exile voluntarily in an act of protest.

While abroad, Hugo continued his efforts to eliminate the death penalty. He convinced the British government to spare the lives of two Irishmen convicted of terrorism, and his influence encouraged the abolition of the death penalty in Switzerland and Portugal. Following the demise of the Second French Empire in 1870, Hugo returned to France, where he resumed political activity, being quickly elected to the National Assembly and Senate in the new Third Republic.

Hugo’s financial status deteriorated as his career neared its end. He died in May 1885 and was buried in the Pantheon, an honor reserved for France’s greatest citizens.

Huk Rebellion, 1946–1954

Pierre Rousset

The Huk Rebellion, a major rural guerilla peasant movement, began in 1946 in the months following the Philippines’ declaration of independence and was quelled only in the 1950s, after deeply marking the history and popular consciousness of the country. The Hukbalahap/Communist Party (Partido Komunista ng Pilipinas, PKP) armed struggle was an act of self-defense in response to escalating levels of savage repression by government forces. As the insurrection grew, the movement ascended from Representing the Communist People's Anti-Japanese Army, or Hukbalahap, Luis M. Taruc won a seat in the Philippine Congress in an election held in anticipation of independence from the US in 1946. After gaining independence, however, leaders of the victorious Liberal Party ousted Taruc and other Huk candidates, sparking a peasant movement known as the Huk Rebellion (1946–54). In an attempt to dampen the movement's morale, the government reported Taruc dead a number of times. a protective strategy of defense to a moment of revolutionary liberation.

Situated in Central Luzon, the Huk made use of an explosive social situation, reflecting a popular historical tradition of resistance under the threat of geographic isolation. At independence, regional disparities remained considerable in the archipelago, as resistance to the Japanese occupation during World War II and accession to independence had not been the occasion for a “founding struggle” creating a new collective political and national identity. Independence did not reduce entrenched social divisions that punctuated antagonisms among the dominant classes, working classes, and peasants along political and regional divisions. The dislocation of the Japanese war and occupation only intensified resentment.

Aftermath of World War II

Following independence, the pretense of democracy concealed the upper classes' fear and aversion of the Hukbalahap resistance that was gaining prominence internationally. At the provincial level, large and wealthy families wielded political power outside of the rule of law, and were free to use private armies to punish and impose laws arbitrarily. The ruling family death squads assassinated with impunity popular movement leaders and representatives of competing clans running for election. With state power fragmented, smuggling syndicates flourished and in various regions violence became the norm, distorting traditional patronage relationships. With US support, anti-communism supplied an ideological cover for repression.

In urban areas, the immediate postwar era saw the emergence of a middle class that was subordinated to the key foreign and domestic capitalist interests. US firms supplied capital that dominated trade and mines while in the rural areas the landed oligarchy, especially planters on sugar cane haciendas, directed the export-oriented agro-industry.

Communist and leftist forces for liberation were suppressed by the armed forces, including many former guerillas, supporting the US geostrategic concern that the Philippines archipelago was vital to its interests with the rise to power of the communists in China and leftist forces throughout East Asia and Southeast Asia.

Reorganization of the Peasant and Worker Movements

In the provinces of Central and South Luzon, after liberation, a new organization emerged more powerful than the former PKP: the National Peasants' Union (Pambansang Kaisahang mag Magbubukid, PKM). When PKM military units were disbanded, many Huks joined, and it became among the biggest peasant organization in the history of the country.

In urban regions, the Committee on Labor Organization (CLO), established in March 1945 and soon renamed the Congress of Labor Organizations, maintained dominance. Under Japanese occupation, union development was not seen as a priority of the PKP. But in the postwar era, the Huks actively sought to reconstitute the urban movement. The CLO was rooted in Metro Manila, organized on “industrial lines,” with a federation for each industrial sector: printing, tobacco, water, petrol, and so on. Ten months after its formation, the CLO grew to 80,000 members. In the Visayas in the center of the archipelago, José and Jesus Lava reactivated the Federation of Workers of the Philippines (Federation Obrera de Filipina, FOF), a 70,000-member organization with established links to the CLO.

In response to the deteriorating economic conditions in the first year after the war, 49 strikes broke out, and workers often emerged victorious. Centered on concrete economic demands, the struggles in particular organized the unemployed. In connection with the Democratic Alliance, protests extended to political and anti-imperialist issues. However, the popular peasant, urban poor, workers' movements and progressive parties were suppressed by the violence of the upper classes and the dominant capitalist order. On February 24, 1948, Manuel Joven, CLO general secretary, was abducted and then assassinated.

Democratic Alliance

In 1945–6 the progressive forces (radical or simply liberal) regrouped in a defensive political front, called the Democratic Alliance. It was composed of four organizations that each had few members: the League for National Liberation, the Anti-Traitors' League, the Anti-Japanese League, and the Civil Liberties Union. The alliance, supported by the PKM in the countryside and by the CLO in urban areas, proved capable of organizing demonstrations of tens of thousands. Six of its candidates were elected to the Congress in Central Luzon in the 1946 elections, but they were denied the right to take their seats in government.

Some leaders of the PKP were members of the executive council of the Democratic Alliance. However, the Democratic Alliance leadership was dominated by reformists who had a moderate program. They supported Sergio Osmeña in the presidential election campaign of April 1946, a race that was won by Manuel Roxas of the Nacionalista Party.

Rural Crisis and Agrarian Struggle

At war's end, the stability of traditional rural social relationships was in disarray, undermining capitalist development in agriculture. The impersonal economic character of the legal contract replaced old personal ties between landlords and tenants. For peasants, a moral contract was betrayed. Landowners frequently seized on the subordinate position of peasants to unjustly demand services, but they also were forced to assume customary responsibilities in dramatic situations: granting no-interest loans, distributing food rations in times of scarcity, supplying medicine and hospital treatment for sick children, and authorizing subsistence plantation (rice, vegetables, fruit) on plots of land. In an environment of deep exploitation and great poverty, the obligations of wealthy farmers to their tenants represented a crucial and legitimate security net for peasants.

The breach in the moral contract between wealthy landlord and tenant farmer was brutal, beginning in the 1920s and expanding into the next two decades. The capitalist "modernization" of law reinforced the legal right of landowners, eroding the traditional right of land users. After World War II inequality expanded dramatically: the rural elite earned spectacular wealth from the world trade in rice and sugar and seized on the precariousness of the peasant condition as mechanization displaced rural jobs. The popular feeling was animated by injustice, abandonment, and adversity in the face of the unilateral violation of customary obligations in Central Luzon and beyond, constituting the basis for future struggles.

The PKP program included land redistribution and socialization of much of the economy. In local struggles, land ownership was the primary focus of protests. In the 1930s and 1940s, land struggles were often aimed at reforming the tenancy system rather than its abolition, including respect for landowners' customary obligations. Land redistribution was not a traditional demand as peasants retained an embellished memory of patron-client relationships, explaining in part the success of the counterinsurgency of the 1950s by the Magsaysay regime: the promise of a moderate agrarian reform would seemingly restore protective patronage links.

An ideology of justice punctuated peasant resistance to repression and nurtured efforts to avenge the criminal behavior of landlords and their surrogates, frequently the police. Before taking up arms in the postwar rebellions, the peasantry exhausted all forms of struggle: petition for redress to authorities, strikes, demonstrations, or secret appropriation of part of the harvests. Peasants frequently relocated in search of more human landowners, free land, or complementary non-agricultural work. But the conditions of exploitation became uniform and peasants turned to lawyers and intellectuals for legal assistance in the courts, often in vain. Due to the parliamentary regime, unlike other Asian countries at the time, peasants could explore electoral action, linking with clientelist or progressive parties. But peasants were unsuccessful in these efforts at redress.

The geographic and cultural dispersion of the Philippines has always intensified the capacity of workers and peasants to unify against the dominant classes. In the 1930s and 1940s landlords recruited the most deprived peasants into private armies, the Cawal ng Capayapaan (Knights of Peace) and the Civilian Guards. In resistance, peasants organizing cadres gave rise to numerous exchanges of experience among rural communities, contributing to the advent of a collective consciousness broadening peasants' vision beyond the horizon of the village and creating horizontal links among activists. Similarly, the anonymity and dominance of the new capitalist rural market economy placed into sharp relief exploitative class relationships that were previously hidden behind the idiosyncrasies of local patronage relationships. The rebellion of the Huks was made possible by the decades-long tradition of organization and multifarious struggles among peasants in Central Luzon, of which resistance against the Japanese occupation was only one expression.

The peasants exhausted all peaceful means of appeal and protest against the propertied classes to reconstruct a tolerable life in the rural areas. In response to legal means, the authorities increased repression, which in turn pushed peasants to join the rebellion, as they had done in resisting Japanese occupation. The resumption of armed struggle in Central Luzon was not imposed externally but was a product of regional history, and it was not reproduced identically in other parts of the archipelago. In the interim, the PKP hesitated before reengaging in armed struggle.

The PKP and Armed Struggle

The Hukbalahap and the PKP were officially outlawed only in March 1948. Negotiations continued with mixed success until June 1948, on each occasion failing on the question of disarmament as revolutionaries in local areas were repeatedly under attack. The Huks initially limited themselves to measures of local defense. In May–June 1947, those among the PKP national leadership still hoping for presidential compromise became a minority, as talks continued in spite of the intensification of repression. Huk leaders were abducted and killed. Juan Felco, who had participated directly in negotiations with Roxas, was arrested by men in uniform and disappeared. In August through November, the government launched a massive offensive in Central Luzon, deflating popular morale. Huks continued a defensive posture but, to reduce pressure, began expanding their bases in other provinces of Luzon and the Visayas.

Manuel Roxas died suddenly of a heart attack on April 15, 1948 and was replaced by his vice-president, Elpidio Quirino, who resumed negotiations with Luis Taruc, the emblematic figure of the rural resistance. An amnesty on ambiguous terms was proclaimed on June 21, 1948, and Taruc and other elected members of the Democratic Alliance were finally authorized to sit in Congress. However, in the field, units of the Constabulary Police and the Civilian Guards continued their attacks. With promised reforms aborted, the interregnum finally came to an end on August 15, 1948, and Huk leaders returned to the underground armed struggle. The Democratic Alliance disintegrated and the theater of military operations expanded into the Central and Southern Luzon. The Huks adopted a new name, the Army of National Liberation (Hukbong Mapagpalaya ng Bayan, HMB). Political education was reinforced, and after three years of adopting a defensive posture the leadership of the PKP announced a renewed surge in the tide of revolution.

The radicalization of the PKP did not exclude political maneuvering and HMB provided critical and discreet support to the Nacionalista Party during the 1949 electoral campaign. But the presidential elections of 1949, which included José P. Laurel, who had collaborated with the Japanese occupation, were considered fraudulent and electoral politics entirely lost its legitimacy. A political crisis emerged among the elites as the economy deteriorated, with unemployment spreading and political corruption becoming widespread. In 1949, after the Red Army and the Communist Party had taken power in China, the PKP leadership concluded that a revolutionary situation existed in the Philippines and called for the overthrow of “the imperialist-puppet regime.” The atmosphere shifted from optimism to euphoria in the party ranks. In January 1950, the leadership predicted that the following two years would be decisive in preparing for the conquest of power. For many, victory seemed at hand.

The revolutionary armed forces rapidly expanded, with the PKP commitment to the armed struggle reaching its zenith from 1949 to 1951. Between 11,000 and 15,000 Huks were armed, a figure similar to 1946–8 during resistance to the Japanese occupation. The regional stronghold of the resistance was situated in provinces that made up “Huklandia”: Nueva Ecija, Pampanga, Tarlac, Bulacan (and Laguna and Batangas). But the theater of operation expanded as two commands expanded to six, and by 1951 the resistance grew to 27 provinces in Luzon in sectors of Panay and Negros (Visayas), and even Mindanao. The year 1950 appeared to be a turning point in the Huk Rebellion. But the PKP dangerously underestimated the capacity of US reaction.

Counterinsurgency

The period 1949–50 marked the eve of the declaration of the Korean War. In Vietnam, French expeditionary forces were coming up against increasing resistance. For Washington policymakers, the development of a new revolutionary center in the Philippines was unthinkable. The Philippines was one of the first countries in which the US carried out a comprehensive policy of counterrevolution.

Militarily, the counterrevolution integrated the Philippine Constabulary into the Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP). Subsequently, the AFP expanded beyond external defense and took direct charge of the counterinsurgency, through the creation of New Battalion Combat Teams (BCT), with improved armaments and equipment. The AFP made extensive use of napalm bombardments and the intelligence services were reorganized, reinforced by the CIA under the direction of Edward G. Lansdale.

Politically, Lansdale selected a new strongman, Ramon Magsaysay, a former member of the anti-Japanese guerilla forces in Luzon with close ties to the Americans. His ultimate accession to the presidency was carefully planned with US support and the active participation of the CIA. In 1950, under President Quirino, Magsaysay became defense secretary, taking charge of the army and directing the new Office of Psychological Warfare – renamed the Civil Affairs Office (CAO). Magsaysay publicized his efforts throughout the Philippines and developed networks independent from the political party apparatus, presenting himself as a popular man of action, the opposite of the aristocratic Quirino. He visited villages, walked barefoot in rice fields, and ate ostensibly with his hands, a traditional practice in the Philippines.

In 1953, Magsaysay won a landslide victory in the presidential elections. His rise to power became a model for Washington, which used its inspiration in other countries of the region, and again in the Philippines some 15 years later. Washington also forced the Philippines to renovate its democratic façade. Just as the 1949 elections had openly been “dirty,” so the 1951 senatorial race appeared “clean.” The National Movement for Free Elections (NAMFREL) was created with American support. The army intervened in the campaign to “guarantee” equity, an intervention that created a dangerous precedent but which, at the time, was accepted by public opinion. The Nacionalista Party of Jose P. Laurel won the contest, trust in the elections was restored, and Magsaysay was declared “man of the year.”

Magsaysay launched a program of agrarian reform, appropriating the slogan “land for the landless.” He created the Presidential Assistant for Community Development (PACD) – a CIA project. Thousands of development workers were sent to the villages, appearing to the peasants as direct envoys of the presidency. While the land reform measures implemented were quite limited, their psychological impact was real.

Psychological warfare was the trademark of Lansdale, the CIA, Magsaysay, and the Philippines military. In October 1950, PKP leaders (including José Lava) were captured and party documents seized. Lansdale opened talks with the Catholic hierarchy, the Iglesia ni Kristo, and the Chinese community. Magsaysay launched vast anti-Huk propaganda operations, including disinformation, media infiltration, and intervention in universities and schools, frequently using US missionaries in his operations. The army tried to infiltrate the revolutionary ranks and recruit informers. The operation launched a “resettlement” program for repentant Huks, the Economic Development Corps (EDCOR), a program that was limited in scope but useful in terms of political propaganda.

Beyond electoral demagoguery, many US officials sought genuine capitalist agrarian reform. But landed elites were strongly opposed, and Washington sought to maintain good relations with the rural aristocracy. As revolutionary pressure faded, the reform projects lost much of their radicalism, and all the concrete content of the agrarian laws adopted in 1954–5 was eliminated.

Nevertheless, through counterinsurgency, the Philippine regime and the CIA scored points through maintaining permanent military pressure, multiplying civic action and psychological warfare measures and providing peasants hope for an improvement in their lot through restoring credibility in the electoral process and giving Magsaysay a populist image.

From Decline to Defeat

Revolutionary optimism was short-lived. A posteriori, the year 1954 was decisive. In February–March, the government launched an important military offensive, Operation Milagrosa, with more than 20,000 soldiers and air force units. The offensive was a harsh blow to the morale of the Huks, especially when Luis Taruc, their famous leader, surrendered on May 16, 1954. This surrender sanctioned a conflict within PKP leadership, which had already begun in 1951 when Luis and his brother Peregrino opposed the Lava brothers' turn toward parliamentary struggle. Even in Central Luzon calm was progressively restored: the armed units were forced to become more and more mobile to avoid the AFP, and survival for the Huks became more tenuous. In 1956, the leadership of the PKP resigned itself to adopting the principle of legal/parliamentary struggle, but in June 1957 the party was for the second time outlawed by decree. The leaders of the PKP and the Huks were killed in battle or captured one by one. Jesus Lava himself was finally arrested on May 21, 1964, marking the end of the “centralized” armed struggle. Only local pockets of resistance remained.

In the 1950s the geographical extension of the armed and social struggles in the Visayas and in Mindanao was limited. When the PKP had been committed to total military victory, it sent most of its urban cadres to the countryside to reinforce rural guerillas, neglecting the task of urban mobilization. During the 1950s, in contrast to other countries in the region, students remained politically passive and indifferent to social issues. Faced with the US global policy of counterinsurgency, the Huks were isolated and the PKP could not fall back on traditional bases of support in urban areas.

A Complex Experience

In spite of the defeat, the Huk Rebellion represents a rich historical experience of resistance, with a complex relationship between the peasant movement and the PKP. The PKP played a central role through systematic Marxist political training, supplying cadres and infrastructure, contributing to the geographic spread and coordination of the struggle, and inscribing an international and historical perspective. But the leadership of the PKP was unable to impose authority on the peasant movement. In several instances, important differences emerged between the political choices of the PKP leadership and those implemented on the ground by the Huks. As was the case under Japanese occupation, when the PKP adopted a policy of “retreat for defense,” Hukbalahap military units neither withdraw nor reduced operations. In 1946 and 1947, the rural armed struggle resumed long before the PKP leadership agreed with the plan. In 1950 and thereafter, the capacity of the Huks in rural areas had already begun to decline, even though the PKP political bureau were calling for an offensive to be launched.

The discordance of rhythms pitted the Communist Party against the peasant movement, as if they were two organizations independent of each other. Many cadre members belonged to the PKP and the Huks. Conflicts expressed themselves through “vertical” tensions between different levels of leadership. The central nucleus of the PKP was above all composed of intellectuals, scientists, lawyers, and civil servants, while organizers and the local military command of HBM were village peasants. Veteran militants occupying key intermediary leadership posts arose from peasant and urban working-class backgrounds and were crucial interlocutors between localities and regions, cities and provinces, the Huk command and the PKP Political Bureau. The leaders of the militants included Luis Taruc, José de Leon, and Juan Felco, among others.

Beyond the question of rhythms and the controversial analysis of the relation of forces at each step of the struggle, the PKP leadership set a high bar for the peasant movement, setting out a program for social revolution but offering little support. Thus, in 1950, the communist leadership called for the overthrow of the government while the peasantry fought for an end to repression. If the workers' movement, urban poor, and students had been engaged in a common struggle with the peasants, the expectation for social revolution may have been more realistic.

The Huk Rebellion could simply take over the torch of anti-Japanese resistance. The US did not provoke the same rejection as Japan had, given that it did not occupy the country in the same way, and even played an important role in the background. No remote or border sanctuary could protect the rear base of the peasant army. Geostrategically speaking, the Huk were in a less advantageous situation in the Philippine archipelago than resistance movements in Vietnam or China. Although key socioeconomic problems remained, the Huk Rebellion raised the issues of inequality in a concrete way. Some 20 years later, this historical experience helped a new revolutionary movement.

The PKP and the HBM were defeated as organizations by the counterrevolutionary forces of the Philippine power structure and US military and secret services. But for the peasant movement as a whole, the outcome was more nuanced. Though it did not obtain radical and lasting reforms, in many areas landowners were forced temporarily to reduce exploitation. The basic right to organize, negated by brutal repression from 1946 to 1948, was again permitted. In Central Luzon, the Huks were at the origin of two peasant associations in the following period: the Federation of Free Farmers (FFF) and the Free Farmers' Union (Malayang Samahang Magsasaka, MASAKA). A tradition of organizing was transmitted from one generation to the next, although within a restrictive reformist framework.

The rebellion and return to armed struggle was not a "free choice" for the Huks but a necessity, as witnessed by the statements of peasant veterans to researcher Benedict J. Kerkvliet (1979): "Even if we got nothing, that's not important. What's important is that we had to fight back. And we fought so well that the big people and the government will never forget us again. [. . .] We didn't lie down like whimpering dogs when they started to whip us. We stood up and fought for what was rightfully ours. [. . .] No strike, no demonstration, no rebellion fails. Protest against injustice always succeeds."

Hungary, anti-communist protests, 1945–1989

Caryn E. Neumann

In early 1945, the Soviet-backed secret police and people's courts began to arrest and imprison Hungarian supporters of democracy in a campaign of repression that continued for several decades. Many Hungarians were nonetheless determined to establish democratic governance. Under the control of the Independence Front, national councils were elected to administer municipal governments nationwide. Meanwhile, communists began to take control of trade unions and destroy opposition political parties. They undermined party leaders by declaring them anti-democratic reactionaries and forcing their resignation. The leaders of the governing Smallholders' Party met this fate at the end of 1946. Bela Kovacs, secretary general of the party, was arrested on Soviet orders for allegedly plotting to overthrow the government. Ferenc Nagy was compelled to resign from his post as prime minister in 1947 after the communists kidnapped his son. The party subsequently dissolved. Later that year political leaders were told to conform to the communist agenda or leave the country. Organized democratic opposition was largely eliminated by 1948. Over the next five years under Rákosi as the general secretary of the Hungarian Workers' Party, an estimated one million people – one tenth of the population – suffered arrest, prosecution, imprisonment or deportation (Judt 2005: 192).

Between 1948 and 1953 the communist government forced collectivization of agriculture and nationalized major industries. With the political opposition neutralized, the churches were the primary source of resistance. The communist authorities responded by expropriating church property and nationalizing religious schools. Protestant leaders reached a compromise with the new regime but there was open conflict between the communist authorities and the Catholic Church between 1945 and 1950; most religious orders were dissolved, Catholic associations were forced to disband, religious periodicals were banned, and approximately 2,500 monks and nuns were exiled. Catholics represented over two-thirds of Hungarian society at the time and the churches were important centers of popular resistance. Much of the institutional resistance, however, was motivated not by a commitment to democratic pluralism but by the desire to maintain institutional privilege and restore the Hapsburg monarchy (Kenez 2006).

The death of Soviet premier Joseph Stalin in 1953 revived democratic hopes as the Soviets gradually loosened their grip on Hungary. On June 4, 1953, Imre Nagy, the new Hungarian premier, presented parliament with a reform agenda that included the establishment of collective leadership. Under the Patriotic People's Front, Nagy organized opposition to the Soviets but he was forced out of office by Rákosi and other Stalinist devotees.

In the late spring and early summer of 1956, university students revived the Association of Hungarian University and College Students to call for a pluralist system and universal suffrage by secret ballot as well as economic reforms and prosecution of Rákosi. Hungary's leading writers and journalists further demanded freedom of expression and the ouster of the Communist Party's orthodox leaders, initiating the events known as the Revolution of 1956. With the crushing Soviet defeat of the uprising, the political parties, student organizations, and workers' councils established in the fall of 1956 were disbanded and resistance was silenced for over a decade.

The signing of the 1975 Helsinki Accords by Hungarian representatives initiated another movement for democratization. In January 1977, 34 prominent Hungarian intellectuals signed Charta 77, a Czechoslovak initiative demanding the civil liberties guaranteed by the Accord. Clubs and seminars followed as well as samizdats, illegal publications that gave voice to dissident opinions.

In 1985 about 45 prominent Hungarian intellectuals gathered in Monor to discuss Hungary's growing economic and social crisis. Dissidents, reform economists, historians, sociologists, and independent writers as well as representatives of all the major opposition groups were present. They initiated a public dialogue about the necessary direction of public reform. On March 15, 1986, anti-government demonstrations on a scale not seen in Hungary since 1956 began with the arrest of several dissidents, including Gabor Demszky, Tamas Molnar, Ottillia Solt, and Miklos Haraszti. Protesters demanded reforms and freedom of the press and assembly. New political organizations were formed, including the Association of Young Democrats and the Network of Free Initiatives. During the fall of 1988, the new political organizations became political parties while the Smallholders' and Hungarian People's Parties were resurrected. On March 22, 1989, representatives from the political parties, trade unions, and social organizations formed the Roundtable of the Opposition. On June 13, they joined the newly created National Roundtable and this organization facilitated the election of the first post-communist government. The new government took office on May 23, 1990.

Hungary, protests, 1815–1920

Alexander Maxwell

Hungary underwent tremendous social and political transformations during the nineteenth century, the most significant of which was the development of a more socially inclusive idea of the nation. In 1815 most Hungarians equated the nation with the nobility – a large segment of society relative to other European countries but still only 10 percent of the Hungarian population. The French Revolution inspired reform-minded nobles to support a more modern and socially inclusive idea of the Hungarian nation. Specifically, they supported the abolition of serfdom and other feudal taxes, and promoted economic modernization. They sought to open the civil service to those without an expensive classical education by promoting popular education in Hungarian, and replacing Latin with Hungarian as the language of government administration. Finally, they wanted the Hungarian frontier expanded to include Transylvania, a province with a significant Hungarian population.

Hungary’s Reform Era officially began in 1825, when Count István Széchenyi (1791–1860), a wealthy magnate popularly remembered as “the greatest Hungarian,” offered a year’s income from his estates to found a Hungarian Academy of Sciences. Széchenyi inspired the first generation of Hungarian liberalism, dominated by reform-minded aristocrats such as Baron Miklós Wesselényi (1796–1850) and Count Károly Zay (1791–1871). These Liberal aristocrats enjoyed considerable support beyond their caste, not least because of their willingness to collaborate with people of humbler birth who shared their political goals. Hungarian liberals replaced the Latin based natio Hungarica with the Hungarian based Magyar nemzet: a Hungarian nation claiming its freedom against Hapsburg tyranny.

Hungarian liberals faced opposition from two corners: the Hapsburg court and Hungary’s national minorities. The central government in Vienna saw Hungarian liberals as impractical day-dreamers: Austrian statesman Clemens Metternich (1773–1859) described Széchenyi as “a man lost through vanity and ambition – one of those who bring unhappiness upon themselves.” The Hapsburg central government consistently opposed popular pressure for political change in Hungary, though it often made concessions to liberal demands in hope of avoiding confrontation. This reactive policy foundered with the outbreak of the Revolution of 1848, which brought Kossuth to power, forced Metternich from office, and eventually cost Ferdinand I his throne.

Language War

Hungary’s national minorities agreed with the social demands of the liberals, but objected to the increasingly hegemonic status of the Hungarian language. Over half of Hungary’s population spoke German, Romanian, or a Slavic language, and the Magyar nemzet promised to disenfranchise these “non-Magyars.” In what became known as the Language War (1840–8), minority leaders defended Latin as a neutral language for government administration. When this battle was lost they began demanding a role for minority languages in government administration. Despite Hungarian accusations to the contrary, minority leaders did not seek independence from Hungary, but fought instead for a multi-ethnic Hungary that respected all ethnic groups in the kingdom. Hungarian liberals contemptuously rejected this vision of the polity.

During the Hungarian Reform Era, ethnic Hungarians developed a tremendous fear of Pan-Slavism. In 1840 Michal Hlaváček (1803–85), a secondary school teacher in Levoča/Lősce/Leutschau, published a book of poems extolling “the Slavic Nation and Language.” Another teacher at the school, Karl Kramárčsik (1813–95), denounced him in the Hungarian press: “Nobody who is bound to his fatherland by true feeling can allow that there should be a teacher in Hungary . . . who is a preacher of Pan-Slavism.” Lajos Kossuth took up the issue, and for the rest of the decade Slavs, Croats, and Hungarians published increasingly angry manifestos on language rights. Important titles include Johann Thomášek’s defense of Slovak in The Language War in Hungary (1841), Stephen Ludwig Roth’s defense of Romanian in The Language War in Transylvania (1842), and Samuel Hojč’s Apology of Hungarian Slavism (1843). Texts articulating the Hungarian viewpoint include Károly Zay’s Protestantism, Magyarism, Slavism (1841) and Miklós Wesselényi’s A Voice Concerning the Hungarian and Slav Nationality (1844). Ironically, all these works were written in German, the lingua franca of Hapsburg Hungary.

The conflict led to an increasingly bitter struggle over the language used in various public settings. Latin ceased to be the sole language of government administration in the 1830s. In 1843 Hungarian was made compulsory everywhere in the country except Croatia, which was then a small district around Zagreb. Officials in Slavonia and Hungarian Dalmatia were given a six-year grace period to learn Hungarian. The conflict between nationalities during the Hungarian Revolution of 1848 was an important legacy of the language war.

Hungarian Revolution

After the overthrow of the French monarchy in February 1848 popular demonstrations for political reform erupted throughout the Hapsburg empire. The Hungarian liberal movement won the restoration of the Hungarian parliament during the so-called March Days, captured by Sándor Petőfi (1823–49) in his famous poem Nemzeti Dal (National Song): “rise up, Hungarian, now or never.” Lajos Kossuth (1802–94) became the most powerful politician in Hungary, and a series of radical reforms followed, notably the abolition of serfdom. In July 1848 Kossuth asked parliament to fund a Hungarian army.

Fighting began in the summer of 1848. Hungarian armies defeated Serbian and Romanian uprisings and the Croatian-imperial army led by Josip Jellačić. In January 1849 an imperial army occupied Budapest and the Hungarian government was forced to flee to Debrecen. Despite distrust between Kossuth and Hungarian General Artúr Görgey (1818–1916), a Hungarian offensive in April 1849 drove the Austrians from central Hungary and recaptured the Hungarian capital, though Hapsburg forces in Buda citadel held out until May. Emboldened by this success, Kossuth declared the Hapsburg dynasty dethroned and Hungary independent of Austria, but fighting continued in Transylvania.

Caught between Austrian and Russian intervention, however, Hungarian armies were eventually forced to surrender at Világos in August 1849, though a fortress at Komárom resisted siege until October. The Hungarian prime minister, Lajos Batthyány (1806–49), was executed on October 6, 1849, as were 13 Hungarian officers, remembered as the Martyrs of Arad. Hungary was integrated into a unitary Austrian administration known as the Bach Regime after interior minister Alexander Bach (1813–93).

Non-Magyar Uprisings Against the Magyars

The revolutionary government of Lajos Kossuth made Hungarian the sole language for the administration of Hungary and refused to grant any concessions to Hungary’s national minorities: “never, but never, shall I recognize in the framework of the Holy Hungarian Crown another nation or nationality but the Magyar.” When Djordje Stratimirović (1822–1908) asked Kossuth to support the establishment of a Serbian district, Kossuth told him: “the sword will decide between us.”

The intransigent chauvinism of the ethnic Hungarians or Magyars eventually provoked armed resistance among most of Hungary’s nationalities. Jews were the only minority group in Hungary to side with the revolution. Stratimirović led a Serbian revolt in June 1848 and was quickly defeated despite covert help from the government of Serbia. This defeat inspired Ban Josip Jellačić (1801–59), a career military officer who believed in the unity of South Slavic peoples, to declare Croatia’s “independence and equality with Hungary” in April 1848. In August 1848 he marched on Budapest with an army of 40,000 soldiers. This army was defeated at Pákozd in September by a Hungarian volunteer army that was one-third Jewish. Jellačić retreated to Vienna, but put his army under the control of Austrian General Alfred Windischgrätz (1787–1862), who had already put down revolutionary movements in Italy and Prague. Windischgrätz occupied Budapest in January 1849.

In eastern Transylvania, after a series of political meetings at Blaj in April–May 1848, and a revolt in neighboring Wallachia in June, a Romanian peasant revolt broke out in September. Transylvanian Saxons, under the leadership of Stephan Ludwig Roth (1796–1849), sided with the Romanians out of loyalty to the Empire. A Hungarian army led by Józef Bem (1794–1850) restored Hungarian rule by January 1849, not least because Romanians and Serbs quarreled about the status and organization of the Orthodox Church. Romanian forces retreated to the Érc mountains in central Transylvania, where Avram Iancu led a Romanian peasant army of nearly 20,000 and spurned Kossuth's half-hearted attempts at national reconciliation. Roth, meanwhile, was executed in April 1849 despite Bem's promise of amnesty.

In Slovakia, revolutionary poet Janko Kráľ (1822–76) led a brief peasant uprising in March 1848 over the unwillingness of local landlords to acknowledge the end of serfdom. Slovak leaders protesting his imprisonment had to flee Hungary to avoid arrest. In September 1848 Slovak leaders Ľudovít Štúr (1815–56) and Josef Hurban (1817–88), after attending the Prague Pan-Slav Congress, organized a group of “Slovak Volunteers” in Vienna and entered western Slovakia. The Slovaks did not greatly influence military events.

Magyar nationalists saw the failure of Hungary's non-Magyars to support the revolution as reactionary Hapsburg loyalism and the betrayal of the national ideal. Romanians, Slovaks, Serbs, and Croats, however, remember their fight against Kossuth as a national struggle. Unwillingness to accommodate the “national” demands of Hungary's minorities would remain characteristic of Magyar politics throughout the nineteenth century.

After the Revolution

After the failure of the Hungarian Revolution the Hapsburg central government abolished the Hungarian parliament and tried to rule Hungary directly from Vienna. Passive resistance made this unworkable, and in 1860 Emperor Franz-Joseph (1830–1916) granted an imperial parliament and returned to constitutional rule. Hungarian liberals were not placated, however, and in 1867 Franz-Joseph negotiated the famous Ausgleich (compromise), which granted the Hungarian parliament complete autonomy over Hungarian affairs and jurisdiction over Transylvania.

In 1868 the newly independent Hungarian parliament passed a series of laws extending autonomy to nationalities. An autonomous Croat parliament was established, and while other nationalities were denied such legislative independence, all were guaranteed the right to use their languages in schools, courts, and church administration. The implementation of these rights, however, was patchy from the start, and after 1875, when Kálmán Tisza (1830–1902) became prime minister, the Hungarian government actively suppressed minority cultural institutions. In 1896 Serbian, Romanian, and Slovak political leaders formed the (ineffectual) Congress of Non-Magyar Nationalities, to protest Magyarization and demand regional autonomy.

Congress of Non-Magyar Nationalities

During the final decades of Hapsburg rule, Hungary's electoral system gave wildly disproportionate representation to ethnic Hungarians (Magyars) in the Hungarian parliament. To counteract their disenfranchisement, politicians from Hungary's national minorities began to consolidate their political efforts to resist the Hungarian government's policy of Magyarization. The resulting Congress of Nationalities produced a measured document protesting the Hungarian government's failure to respect the Language Law of 1868 and demanding that minorities receive “freedom within their linguistic frontiers,” which in practice meant regional autonomy and the use of minority languages in government administration. This demand for autonomy was accompanied by declarations of loyalty to the Hungarian kingdom: “the society of Romanian, Slovak and Serbian nationalities declares that it desires to preserve and strengthen in every way the unity and integrity of the lands belonging to the crown of Saint Stephen.”

In April 1896 the non-Magyar nationalities also attacked the Hungarian government's millennium celebrations, which commemorated the thousand-year anniversary of the Magyar conquest of Hungary with monuments and public celebrations. Their document protested that “the millennium celebrations are designed to demonstrate to Europe that the Hungarian state was and is nationally a Magyar state. This however is a falsehood against the historic and ethnic conditions of our state, against which we must protest.”

As elsewhere in the Hapsburg monarchy, domestic politics in Hungary had become sharply divided along ethnic lines. Austro-Hungarian defeat in World War I transformed this discontent into open rebellion. In 1918 national councils appeared in Subcarpathia, Slovakia, Croatia, and Romania, demanding either independence from Hungary or incorporation into one of the various national states emerging from the ruins of the Hapsburg monarchy. The 1920 Treaty of Trianon confirmed the ethnic partition of Hungary: Czechoslovakia, Romania, Yugoslavia, and even rump Austria all received Hungarian territories.

Hungary, Revolution of 1848

Ferenc Laczó

The Hungarian Revolution of 1848 was one of the most important of the near-simultaneous revolutions that encompassed most of the European continent in early 1848. It was the culmination and practical manifestation of a liberal nationalist reform program that had been gradually emerging in Hungary since 1825. This program, which in many crucial ways resembled those of revolutionaries across the continent at the time, was developed primarily at feudal diets held in Pozsony (today Bratislava, Slovakia). Its overarching objectives were the transition to a constitutional, liberal, and polgári (bourgeois citizenship) Hungary that was free to modernize and develop, and the establishment of wide autonomy for the country within the larger framework of the Hapsburg monarchy.

These broad revolutionary goals were initially pursued largely through legal means. They drew their strongest support from the reformist wing of the Hungarian nobility, comprised primarily of the lower gentry. The major opponents of the reforms were members of the loyal aristocracy and the conservative nobility. A group of conservative nobles tried to preempt radical change by urging more Hapsburg-centered reforms. Another group known as the Centralists, who were less influential than the reform wing, strived for an all-encompassing break with the nobility-based feudal system.

The incongruence between this “bourgeois revolution” and its origin with the nobility has long been the subject of debate. The idea that the nobles voluntarily sacrificed their class privilege by liberating the serfs in order to adapt to the pressures of changing times was the accepted narrative of the revolution in nineteenth-century Hungarian historiography. In the early twentieth century this interpretation was challenged by socialist-syndicalist theorist Ervin Szabó, who saw in the developments of 1848 tactical maneuvering on the part of the nobility to maintain its political and economic hegemony.

News of the outbreak of revolution in Paris in February 1848 prompted the most influential representative of the reform-oriented liberal nationalists, Lajos Kossuth, to issue a series of demands to the Hungarian parliament in early March 1848. He called for the adoption of a constitution and the establishment of an independent Hungarian government responsible to an elected legislature, as well as the abolition of serfdom and more equal distribution of the tax burden (nobles had been exempted from their payment). The demands for independent representative institutions were new, while appeals for economic reforms had been issued previously and rejected by the dominant conservative forces.

Meanwhile, an uprising led by radical youth erupted on March 15 in Pest, just a few days after similar developments in Prague and Vienna and a few days before uprisings in Berlin and Milan. The major demands of the revolutionaries were articulated in a list of 12 points including a call for equality before the law, establishment of responsible government and regular meetings of parliament, release of political prisoners, and establishment of a National Guard. This list was originally addressed to the parliament, but at the insistence of a crowd of around 2,000 people the demands were turned into a manifesto. The manifesto was printed without the usual censorship in one of the first instances of freedom of the press – another of the basic demands of the revolutionaries.

The uprising in Pest motivated the Hapsburg emperor, Ferdinand V, to accept the demands of the Hungarian reformists. He appointed Lajos Batthyány prime minister. The new cabinet over which Batthyány presided took office on April 10; the following day the feudal diet was abolished and a package of reforms was passed in what became known as the “April Laws.” The laws authorized radical transformation of the political and economic life of the country, while unifying Hungary and Transylvania. Hungary was nearly independent for a brief period, though still greatly influenced by developments elsewhere in the monarchy, as later events would reveal. The liberation of serfs was nominally accomplished, but effective implementation of the new law remained to be seen.

The activities of the Hungarian revolutionaries from within the system in 1848 at first mainly consisted of defending these major gains. Prime Minister Batthyány, in particular, was interested in dynastic consolidation. Liberal forces prevailed in the elections, which took place in the second half of June. The newly elected parliamentarians gathered July 5 at the newly established government seat in Pest. The specifics of Hungarian independence, including the status of Hungarian finances and military and foreign affairs, remained a bone of contention between the House of Hapsburg and Hungarian nationalists that would continue to cause friction. In an effort to settle the matter in practice, and defend itself against the anticipated move toward restoration by anti-liberal factions, the new parliament focused on organizing the Hungarian army. It also began to issue a Hungarian currency.

Relations between the major factions within the Hapsburg monarchy progressively worsened, and by September 1848 had deteriorated into mass mobilization and open, large-scale warfare. The invasion of Hungary by imperial troops led by the Ban of Croatia, Josip Jelačić, with tacit approval by the emperor, was the first military action. The Batthyány government resigned, and was followed by the Committee of National Defense headed by the somewhat more radical Lajos Kossuth. With parliamentary approval, the new government assumed full powers on October 8.

The Hungarian revolutionary army successfully resisted the invaders at first. On October 6 another uprising took place in Vienna and was suppressed by military means. With order restored in all of the other territories of the monarchy, Emperor Francis Joseph waged a second, much more forceful imperial invasion of revolutionary Hungary. This new attack quickly took control of the western, Trans-Danubian territories of Hungary as well as of Buda-Pest, forcing the authorities to flee. The war was not over yet, however. In the spring of 1849 the Hungarian side saw successes in Transylvania and recovery of Buda. The open, violent conflict led to the dethroning of the Hapsburgs and the Hungarian declaration of independence in April 1849.

With decisive help from the Russian army, the majority of the Hungarian forces were crushed by the end of the summer of 1849. Although it was ultimately defeated, the Hungarian Revolution lasted longest and proved the most resilient of the revolutionary struggles during the Spring of Nations.

During the conflict, confrontation between the different nationalities of the Kingdom of Hungary greatly intensified. In 1848–9, over half of the population of the Hungarian Kingdom belonged to nationalities other than the dominant Magyar. At this time the national belonging of many was still ambiguous, and there was no firm connection between ethnic identification and allegiance in the 1848–9 conflict. Nonetheless, the events of 1848–9 marked the first instance of open, violent conflict between competing nationalist programs – particularly between Hungarian and Croatian, Serbian and Romanian – in modern times. These conflicts, which at times acquired the features of civil wars, ultimately cost more than 10,000 lives from the non-Magyar nationalities within Hungary, a number comparable in range with that of Hungarian (Magyar), Hapsburg, and Russian victims.

Conflicting claims by the various nationalities revealed the limitations of the proposed liberal nationalism. The Hungarian concept of a unified nation, even when combined with a representative government and constitutional rule, was unable to provide an equitable and satisfactory accommodation of the basic demands. However, radicalization of these national conflicts within the Kingdom of Hungary was partly due to imperial support for the nationalities directed at weakening the Hungarian revolutionaries.

The revolution and the ensuing struggle for independence were avenged by repression and the execution of several of its leaders, including Hungarian army generals and former prime minister Batthyány. A decade of neo-absolutism followed during which the spirit of the revolution was largely suppressed. Several reforms were preserved, however, such as the liberation of the serfs, and other modernizing reforms were implemented. Hungary remained part of the Hapsburg monarchy and its political elite retained some of its previous influence. The Hungarian elite eventually achieved a compromise with the House of Hapsburg, reflected in the establishment of the Austro-Hungarian Dual Monarchy in 1867. This unique arrangement fulfilled many of the key demands of 1848, despite the country's continued dependence. Importantly, the nationality conflicts remained unresolved.

After 1867 attitudes toward the revolution constituted the major schism in Hungarian political life for most of the ensuing half-century, until the collapse of the Hapsburg monarchy. The events of 1848–9 have been central to Hungarian national identity ever since, and they have been appropriated and reinterpreted by each new regime. The most important actors of the Reform Era and the 1848–9 Revolution and War of Independence have acquired great symbolic importance occasionally bordering on cult status. Among those held in high esteem are Lajos Kossuth, often viewed as the liberator of the serfs and a heroic fighter for an independent Hungary, and Sándor Petőfi, a major figure within radical circles in Pest who has been regularly hailed as the national poet of Hungary.

Hungary, Revolution of 1956

Ferenc Laczó

The Hungarian Revolution of 1956, commonly referred to as the “revolution and fight for freedom” in Hungarian (forradalom és szabadságharc), denotes the uprising of a significant part of the Hungarian population and the ensuing armed struggle against the Stalinist dictatorship and the Soviet occupation of Hungary. As one of the major challenges to Soviet rule in Eastern Europe during the Cold War period, the Revolution of 1956 is comparable in importance only to the Prague Spring and the emergence of Solidarność (Solidarity) in Poland. François Fejtő memorably called the events the first anti-totalitarian revolution; Hannah Arendt saw in it a peaceful way to a self-ruling society organized through councils.

Historians tend to date the prehistory of the revolution from 1953, with the adoption of the “New Course” by Hungary’s reform communist government under Imre Nagy. Its major direct consequences are commonly seen as concluding in 1963 with the granting of general (albeit partial) amnesty to participants. Strictly speaking, however, the revolution and freedom fight lasted only from October 23 to November 11, 1956. The events can be divided into three phases, each lasting approximately a week. The early days were characterized by a spontaneous mass uprising

Protesters smash the Stalin monument on Hosök tere in Budapest during uprisings in Hungary from October 24 to November 11, 1956. After the monument was brought down and demolished, Stalin’s head was dragged into the city center. (akg-images)
